All these acts require deliberation, united action, collective wisdom.

The original purpose of the Constitution was that the electors should themselves deliberate on and select the candidates for President of their own judgment, without party nominations or previous pledges.

From all this it is certain that the electors must act as a deliberative body, not as members acting separately and apart.

2. The major part of the electors who convene are a quorum to fill vacancies and vote. As against them the minority can do nothing.

The act of Congress expressly so provides:

If there be a vacancy the electors present shall fill it.

They are made the sole judges to decide when an elector has "refused to act," "neglected to attend," or when a vacancy has arisen "otherwise."

This is so on authority. By general parliamentary law, in all deliberative bodies of a fixed number, unless otherwise expressly provided, a majority is a quorum, and a majority of the quorum decides all questions. This has been the settled doctrine of the courts from our earliest history. The supreme court of South Carolina as early as 1821, in an elaborate opinion on this subject, so determined. The court, after reviewing authorities, said :

The conclusion then follows that a majority must constitute a quorum; * * * for, according to the principle of all the cases referred to, a quorum possesses all the powers of the whole body, a majority of which quorum must, of course, govern. * * * Thus, Grotius says, "Though there were no contracts or laws that regulate the manner of determining affairs, the majority would naturally have the right and authority of the whole." (Sec. 2, Rutherford, b. 2, c. 195; State vs. Delieesseline, McCord's South Carolina sep., 62.)

Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, in discussing the constitution and powers of select governing bodies of a fixed number, says :

In the absence of special provision, the major part of those present at a meeting of a select body must concur in order to do any valid act. * * *

And as a general rule it may be stated that * * * where the corporate power resides in a select body, in the absence of special provision otherwise, a minority of the select body are powerless to bind the majority or do any valid act. (Vol. 1, pp. 333-4, sec. 220, 221.)

And again :

If the major part withdraw so as to leave no quorum, the power of the minority to act is in general considered to cease. (Idem, p. 334, sec. 221.)

This sufficiently appears in Downing vs. Ruger, 21 Wendell, 181, where it is said ;

The rule seems to be well established that in the exercise of a public as well as private authority, whether it be ministerial or judicial, all the persons to whom it is committed must confer and act together, unless there be a provision—

As there is in case of electors—that a less number may proceed—

As Odell and Cartwright did.

Where the authority is public, and the number is such as to admit of a majority—

And Odell and Cartwright were a majority—that will bind the minority.

And Cronin was a minority, and so is concluded by the act of the majority.

This must be so on reason and public policy. Oregon is entitled to three electors only. If a controversy exists as to who assembled at the proper time and place, as to who acted or refused to act, it is much more reasonable to take the official certificate of two than of one. If a State has twenty electors, it is more reasonable that eighteen should certify two as absent than that two should certify eighteen absent.

3. The electors present are authorized to furnish evidence conclusive of a vacancy and of their appointment to fill it.

(a) This is made so by the Constitution. It declares that the electors—Shall sign, and certify, and transmit sealed * * * to the President of the Senate
* * * distinct lists of all persons voted for as President.

To certify is to make certain. When the electors certify their list of votes, it is certain that they are the votes, and it must be equally certain that they have properly filled vacancies.

If this can be contradicted by some one elector or other evidence, then it is not certain, it is not certified; the electors cannot say, faciemus certum—we certify.

This rests upon the broad principle so well understood, that it must be presumed that officers will do and have done their duty.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. May I interrupt you, without disturbing your argument? Do I understand your argument to go to this point: that a majority of the electoral college may try the title of a member to a seat in that college?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. No, not by any manner of means; but when the majority say that electors are absent, are not present, fail to attend, the decision of the majority on that question is conclusive and cannot be inquired into. Like any other election return, it is absolutely conclusive.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Why, then, might they not say that a man claiming to sit there had no title?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. In this case no such question arises, because they have not said so. They have only said there were but two electors present; the other, Cronin, failed to attend; he was not there; he did not go at the right time of day; he was not in the right building; he made a mistake and got into the wrong box. That is what they say, and what they say is evidence, and it is conclusive evidence.

Mr. MERRICK. O, they do not say that.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. They say that in effect; they say they were the only ones present, and Cronin himself says he was not present with them.

(b) This must be so on principle and authority.

It is an incident of the authority to appoint. (Broom, Legal Max., 465; Martin vs. Mott, 12 Wheat., 19; Allen vs. Blunt, 3 Story C. C., 742; Gould vs. Hammond, 1 McAll., 235; Noble vs. U. S., Dev., 84.) The electors are clothed with the power to fill vacancies. It is within the scope and purpose of their powers to make evidence of the appointment.

It is said in a work of high authority:

No particular form of credentials is required. It is sufficient if the claimant to an office presents a certificate signed by the officer or officers authorized by law to issue credentials. * * * If several officers or persons are by law required to join in such certificate, it is generally sufficient if a majority have signed it.—McCrary, chap. 4, p. 149.

Where a duty is imposed by law upon officers there is given them as an incident of their duty the power to do all things necessary to make it effectual, including the authority to furnish evidence of their acts, and especially when, as in this case, no other evidence is provided for.

Broom says:

When the Crown creates a corporation it grants to it by implication all powers that are necessary for carrying into effect the objects for which it is created.—Legal Maxims, 435.

Abbott, in his Digest, collects the authorities on the subject, and says:

Whenever a statute gives a discretionary power to any person to be exercised by him upon his own opinion of certain facts, it is a sound rule of construction that the statute constitutes him the sole and exclusive judge of the existence of those facts. (Martin vs. Mott, 12 Wheat., 19; Allen vs. Blunt, 3 Story C. C., 742; Gould vs. Hammond, 1 McAll., 235; Noble vs. United States, Dev., 84.)

But if the evidence furnished by the electors is not conclusive, then they are not, as the law says, "the sole and exclusive judges."

(c) Usage has made this the law.

The practice of nearly a century has so determined. In no instance has the evidence been contradicted.

(d) It is conclusive because it is part of the election-return.

This Commission and the Houses of Congress are merely canvassing-officers; their sole power is to "count" the votes.

Canvassing-officers cannot controvert returns which come with all the formalities of law. This is settled by authority, settled by this tribunal.

All this must be so on grounds of public policy.

Then upon the law, upon the evidence, it is shown that Odell and Cartwright met at the proper time and place; that Cronin "neglected to attend, refused to act" with them; that they filled the vacancy thereby created by appointing Watts; that Odell, Cartwright, and Watts voted for Hayes and Wheeler, and these votes must be counted.

Here I might rest this controversy.

But the contest before this Commission is of too much importance to leave unconsidered any question that may possibly arise, and for that reason alone I proceed to show, as a second proposition, that Cronin was not elected, and on the whole record presents no sufficient evidence of title to the electoral office.

1. His ambiguous evidence of title is disproved by evidence of equal dignity, free from ambiguity.

If it should be conceded that the "governor's certificate of election" unexplained could give a prima facie title to office, yet it is not conclusive.

It does not certify that Cronin, as the law requires, received "the highest number of votes," or that he is duly appointed, but only that he "received 14,157 votes, * * * being the highest number for persons eligible."

The averment as to ineligibility is a stamp of suspicion, an admission of doubt; it opens the door for inquiry. The certificate is not, and does not profess to be, conclusive of the essential fact; it equivocates in a manner equivalent to "a negative pregnant;" it is pregnant with fraud.

The effect of a certificate of election is well understood.

When it is necessary, as in this case, to the canvass of votes for President, the canvassing-board must decide if it is a certificate.—McCrary's Law of Elections, section 82.

In a note to page 319 of Brightly's Leading Cases on Elections it is said of a certificate of election:

If, however, the certificate upon its face recite facts upon which the canvassers rely as their justification and authority for giving it, and these facts show that the holder was not duly elected, it may be disregarded. (Hart vs. Harvey, 32 Barb., 61.)

To this I think I may safely add that if there be two certificates of election, as in this case, to two different persons for the one same office, and one is sufficient in form and free from suspicion, it must take effect as against one which on its face carries doubt as to the fact it certifies. And that is precisely the case before us. Watts has a certificate of election sufficient in form, the list of electors certified to be elected by the secretary of state, under the seal of the State, irregular in a single particular—the attestation of the governor is wanting. The statute makes the secretary of state the sole canvassing officer to ascertain what person has the "highest number of votes." And then it provides that—

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors.

The governor is intrusted with no power. He has a duty, and the whole of this is contained in eight words:

Such lists shall be signed by the governor.

The governor has not signed the lists. But what matter is that? The provision requiring him to do so is directory. It is not of the essence of the lists or the election they evidence. There is a substantial compliance with the law without his signature, and all the authorities say this is sufficient. The want of his name is a mere irregularity. It is not the evidence, but a mere attestation of the real evidence of election made and furnished by the secretary of state. This irregularity cannot affect the evidence or defeat the will of the people. McCrary says :

The principle is that irregularities which do not tend to affect results are not to defeat the will of the majority; the will of the majority is to be respected even when irregularly expressed.—Law of Elections, sections 127, 128.

He cites Juker vs. Comm., 20 Pa. State, 493; Carpenter's Case, 2 Pars., 540; Pratt vs. People, 29 Ill., 72; Brightly's Election Cases, 448-450; Keller vs. Chapman, 34 Cal., 635; Sprague vs. Norway, 31 Cal., 173; Gorham vs. Campbell, 2 Cal., 135; Hardenburgh vs. Farmers' Bank, 2 Green., (N. J.), 68; Day vs. Kent, 1 Oregon, 123; Taylor vs. Taylor, 20 Minn., 107; People vs. Bates, 11 Mich., 363; McKinney vs. O'Connor, 26 Texas, 5; Jones vs. State, 1 Kansas, 270; Arnold vs. Lea, Clarke & Hall, 601.

The whole is summed up in a few words by Brightly, who says :

That a mere irregularity on the part of the election officers or their omission to observe some merely directory provision of the law will not vitiate the poll, is a point sustained by the whole current of authorities. * * * The conduct of the election officers in the performance of the duties enjoined by law, and their observance of the provisions of the statutes in regard to the recording and return of the legal votes received by them, would seem to fall within the description of directory provisions, and any departure on their part from a strict observance of such portions of the election law to be regarded as irregularities which do not vitiate. (People vs. Schermerhorn, 19 Barb., 540; Comm. vs. Meeser, 44 Pa. St., 343; Lancaster election, 4 Votes of Assembly, 127; Thompson vs. Ewing, 1 Brewst., 107; Mann vs. Cassidy, 1 Brewst., 60; Weaver vs. Given, idem., 157; Gibbons vs. Shepherd, 2 Brewst., 74; Doughty vs. Hope, 3 Denio, 249; Elmendorf vs. Mayor, 25 Wend., 696; Ex parte Heath, 3 Hill, 43; Jackson vs. Young, 5 Cow., 269; Stryker vs. Kelly, 7 Hill, 9; People vs. Peck, 11 Wend., 604; 19 Wend., 143; Smith on Statutes, 732, 739.)

These provisions of law make the lists of electors certified by the secretary of state evidence—sufficient evidence. We are not seeking to use evidence unauthorized by law to defeat that which is, but we are asking to defeat that which is in violation of law by that which is in pursuance of law. Watts then comes with sufficient evidence of title.

In examining the evidence of title to office, the question is not so much what a certificate may in mere words say, but what is the legal effect of the facts lawfully shown by it.

Let me illustrate: Suppose a certificate of election shows the vote given for two eligible candidates to be 10,000 for one and 20,000 for another, and then declares the minority candidate elected, when the statute provides that the candidate having the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected; can it be doubted that such certificate would give a title to the majority candidate?

It says in mere words the minority candidate is elected, but in legal effect it says the majority candidate is elected. To hold the minority candidate as having the title to the office, would be to stick in the bark: Qui hæret in litera, hæret in cortice.

Here, then, without going back to the abstract of votes, the Cronin certificate of election is shown by sufficient evidence to be untrue, and so must be rejected.

2. Cronin's certificate is contradicted by the certified abstract of votes, and is therefore invalid as to him.

It is well settled that it is the election which gives the right to an office, and not the commission or certificate of election.

In People vs. Pease, 27 New York, 55, it was said :

It is not the canvass or estimate or certificate which determines the right. These are only evidences of the right.

In Mansfield vs. Moor, 53 Illinois, 428, it was said :

The commission was evidence of the title, but not the title. The title was conferred by the people, and the evidence of the right by the law.

Whatever may be the rule in other States, the constitution and statute of Oregon have limited the power of the secretary of state in declaring the result of a canvass and the governor in attesting it, so that they cannot, for any cause, certify the election of a minority candidate. They give an effect to the result of the canvass which is prescribed by law, and this cannot be defeated by a certificate in violation of law. The final canvass is the substance, the certificate based on it is the shadow—the mere legal result. The fountain can rise no higher than its source; the structure can only stand on its foundation. The abstract of votes is higher in authority and greater in effect than any certificate founded on it. If the secretary of state should, by his certificate, give it a construction contrary to law, his error may be corrected by the law.

This is the result which on the facts arises from the constitution and statute of Oregon.

The Oregon statute requires the votes in each county for electors to be returned duly certified to the secretary of state. It then provides that—

It shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to canvass the votes.

Then the constitution says :

That person or persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected.

And the statute provides that—

The person having the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected.

The constitution says the plurality candidate shall be declared duly elected. This is a direction to the secretary of state in his canvass. But it was foreseen that his certificate might not conform to the actual result of the canvass, and the statute goes further and says “the person having the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected.” Where so deemed? Everywhere. By whom? Not merely by the canvasser, but by the entire public. This authorizes the officer to assert his title on the highest and best evidence which shows who is “the person having the highest number of votes.” This provision is a remedy for such stupendous frauds as that attempted by the governor of Oregon. The same question had been made in the legislature of Ohio in December, 1848, and the statute of Oregon intended to avoid it. The certificate of Cronin, then, is unauthorized, because disproved by the certified abstract of votes.

The result arises on the record. A conclusion declared by law on facts certified according to law cannot be annulled by a certificate in conflict with law, made by an officer whose duty it is to act in obedience to law. If the canvass of votes and lists of electors, certified by the secretary of state, should show that there were three sets of candidates, and should certify the vote or show which candidates “received the highest number of votes," and these officers should certify in the same paper that those receiving the lowest number of votes were elected, could this be claimed as evidence of title to office in the candidates having the lowest number of votes? Such certificate would be valid as to the authorized facts it recites; it would be void in stating a conclusion which the law does not permit to be drawn. The statute is mandatory as to the person elected. It is a universal rule of law that any act done in violation of a mandatory law is void.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Do I understand you to say that the certificate of the governor must show the number of votes given to the electors?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. I say that a certificate which has within it an allegation which is equivalent in effect to a negative pregnant is equivocal, doubtful on its face, and, when contradicted by evidence of equal dignity, it falls. Besides that, I say that Cronin does not come with the certificate required by law, with separate lists prepared and certified by the secretary of the State, and that the governor's paper is not a certificate of the secretary at all. "I, Grover, the governor, do certify;" not "I, the secretary of state." The governor should have attested the lists which were given to the Hayes electors. Instead of that, he has undertaken to certify, when the law does not authorize him to certify anything. He is merely to attest the lists of electors, and Cronin is absolutely without title.

The certificates then show the election of Watts. The utmost that could be claimed for all the certificates taken together is that they show the election of Odell, Cartwright, and Watts by a majority of the popular vote, but that the governor decided Watts ineligible, and so declared Cronin, an opposing minority candidate, elected. It amounts to no more than the expression of a legal opinion by the governor that on the facts Cronin is elected. But if his legal opinion is wrong, if it assigns to the facts an effect they cannot in law have, then the certificates show Watts elected or, at least, Cronin not elected. The legal opinion that he was is disproved by other facts stated, and effect must be given according to the real law, not the governor's erroneous opinion of the law. His legal opinion may be rejected as surplusage; the law rejects it on the facts.

The certificates all taken together show that Watts was duly elected. To illustrate this, let me suppose that a certificate had been made in the form following:

"The undersigned, secretary of state and governor of Oregon, certify as follows:

"The said secretary certifies that at the election of November 7, for presidential electors—

"W. H. Odell received 15,206 votes.

"J. W. Watts received 15,206 votes.

"J. C. Cartwright received 15,214 votes.

"Henry Klippel received 14,136 votes.

"E. A. Cronin received 14,157 votes.

"W. B. Laswell received 14,149 votes.

"That the foregoing votes were, December 4, 1876, opened and canvassed by the secretary, in the presence of the governor, according to law, and that the foregoing is the result of the votes cast.

"The said governor also certifies that of said voters voted for, J. W. Watts was ineligible; and the said governor therefore hereby declares—

"William H. Odell,

"John C. Cartwright, and

"E. A. Cronin to be duly elected electors of said State.
Dated December 6, 1876.

"LA FAYETTE GROVER,
"Governor.

"S. F. CHADWICK,
"Secretary of State."

Can it be doubted that the legal effect of such a certificate would be to vest in Watts the title to the electoral office? Clearly this must be so. Now all the certificates before the Commission show no more than this, and therefore they show Watts to be legally elected, without going back of the returns into evidence aliunde.

To summarize this: the objections to the votes given by the "Tilden electors," all resting on Cronin's assumed evidence of title to the electoral office, are these:

1. Cronin "refused to act" with the other electors duly appointed, or "neglected to attend," and if he was an elector his office became vacant.

2. The governor's certificate of appointment is, as to Cronin, shown to be unauthorized and untrue, by evidence of equal dignity and legal value: first, the list of electors certified by the secretary of state; and, second, the abstract of the popular vote.

3. While the governor's certificate shows two of the Hayes electors, Odell and Cartwright, duly appointed, and the certified abstract of votes proves the certificate as to them to be legal and authorized, it is shown from the same evidence that as to Cronin the governor's certificate on its face gives no title to office, because it does not certify, as the law requires, that he "received the highest number of votes," but only that he received the highest number "for persons eligible." As to Cronin, it is no better than if it should certify that he received the "highest number of votes given for persons of color," or the "highest number for persons of Chinese origin," or "the highest number for native-born citizens of Oregon."

4. Cronin fails to produce any certificate from the secretary of state showing a list of the electors duly elected. In the governor's certificate the secretary of state certifies nothing. He merely, as a subscribing witness, attests the act of the governor. There is no escape from this conclusion unless two principles be resolved in the affirmative:

First, That the governor had power to ascertain and declare the alleged ineligibility; and,

Second, That this would render the election of Watts void, and elect Cronin, a minority candidate.

Neither one of these positions can be maintained. This I proceed to show.

1. Neither the governor, nor secretary of state, nor both combined have any power to inquire or decide whether Watts held an office which rendered him ineligible as an elector.

(a) The governor is not a canvassing-officer, and hence has no power to make any inquiry.

It is by law made the duty of the secretary of state to canvass the votes and make two lists of the electors having "the highest number of votes." The governor canvasses nothing; he makes no certificate. His whole power as to the election and the lists made by the secretary of state is given in eight words:

Such lists shall be signed by the governor.

It is not a power at all, it is a naked duty, to sign his name.

(b) The secretary of state as a canvassing-officer has no such power. The secretary of state is the canvassing-officer. His whole power is given in these words:

It shall be the duty of the secretary of state * * * to canvass the votes, * * * prepare two lists of the electors elected, * * * affix the seal of the State, * * * and sign and deliver them to the electors.

The power to canvass is merely a power to count. It was said in Morgan vs. Quackenbush, 22 Barb., 77, that canvassing-officers "are not at liberty to receive evidence of anything outside of the returns themselves."

The whole law is clearly stated by McCrary, who says of canvassing-officers:

The true rule is this. They must receive and count the votes as shown by the returns, and they cannot go behind the returns for any purpose; and this necessarily implies that if a paper is presented as a return, and there is a question as to whether it is a return or not, they must decide that question from what appears upon the face of the paper itself.—Law of Election, sec. 82.

He has collected the numerous authorities upon the subject, and, among them all, there is not one to controvert this rule, except only the one case in Indiana, of Gulick vs. New. The cases in England and New York concede no such power to any canvassing or executive officer.

The direct question now before the Commission has been decided. In State vs. Vail, 53 Missouri, 97, the facts were these: Dining received a majority of the votes for judge, as shown by the election returns, over Vail. The secretary of state certified the vote as given to the governor. He undertook to inquire as to the eligibility of Dining, and decided that he was ineligible as under age and otherwise, and issued a commission to Vail. The court on quo warranto decided that—

In opening and casting up the votes at an election * * * the secretary of state [as a canvassing-officer] has no discretion and cannot determine upon the legality of the votes, and it is the duty of the governor to issue the commission in accordance with the result so ascertained. All of these officers act ministerially and not judicially.

The court say:

To allow a ministerial officer arbitrarily to reject returns * * * is to infringe or destroy the rights of parties without notice or opportunity to be heard; a thing which the law abhors and prohibits. * * * The law has provided [judicial] tribunals with ample power to hear and determine all questions, * * * where the parties can have a fair trial.

The governor, * * * where he issues a commission, * * * is simply performing a ministerial duty, in which he must necessarily be governed by the returns. * * * He has no means of ascertaining * * * whether opposing candidates are disqualified. These matters * * * may be inquired into elsewhere, [in the courts.]

This doctrine was affirmed in State vs. Townsley, 56 Missouri, 107; where it was held that—

In counting the votes for a circuit judge, neither the governor nor secretary of state has any authority to go behind the returns.

In Commonwealth vs. Cluly, 56 Pa. State, 270, it is said by his honor Judge Strong that votes given for an ineligible candidate "cannot be rejected by the inspectors nor thrown out of the count by the return judges."

The reason is, the want of power to judge of ineligibility. Where votes are so thrown out, where an act is done beyond lawful power, it is ultra vires and void. Bouvier defines ultra vires, as applied to corporations, "acts beyond the scope of their powers," and says, "Such acts are void."

(c) It is not pretended that any power is given in express terms to the governor or secretary of state to pass upon the question of eligibility. But the governor of Oregon, in defending his exercise of power, claims that it exists as incidental to his office, and he quotes from Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, pages 39, 41, as follows:

Whenever any one is called upon to perform any constitutional duty, or to do any act in respect to which it can be supposed that the Constitution has spoken, it is obvious that a question of construction may at once arise, upon which some one must decide before the duty is performed or the act done. From the very nature of the case this decision must commonly be made by the person, body, or department upon whom the duty is devolved, or from whom the act is required. * * * It follows, therefore, that every department of the Government, and every official of every department, may at any time when a duty is to be performed be required to pass upon a question of constitutional construction.

He then assumes that the statute says he "shall grant certificates to the members duly elected," and that hence he must judge who is elected. But there is no such statute as to electors. There is as to Senators and Representatives in Congress. But even as to these he has no power to judge of ineligibility. If he had, it would not enlarge his power as to electors, but rather would show that as to them it did not exist.

The incidental power which Cooley asserts to exist as applied to governor must be limited to executive power, and cannot be enlarged by construction to include judicial power.

In Commonwealth vs. Jones, 10 Bush. Kentucky Reports, 726, it is sufficiently shown that the governor, as a canvassing-officer, cannot pass upon any question of ineligibility. The court held that—

Where the inquiry to be made involves questions of law as well as fact, where it affects a legal right, and the decision may result in terminating or destroying that right, the power to be exercised and the duties to be discharged are essentially judicial, and such as cannot be constitutionally delegated to or imposed upon executive officers.

That was in a case, too, where the canvassing-officers had authority to try contested questions.

The same question in effect was decided in Cæsar Griffin's case, reported in Chief Justice Chase's Decisions, by Johnson.

(d.) The power to judge of ineligibility is judicial power and therefore cannot be exercised by the governor or secretary of state, for they have no judicial authority.

This results from the inherent character of the office of governor and secretary of state. The constitution of Oregon creates three separate, distinct, co-ordinate branches of government, legislative, executive, and judicial. It does more; it expressly prohibits the executive officers from assuming to decide a question of eligibility by declaring that—

No person charged with official duties under one of these departments shall exercise any of the functions of another.

The construction which would give to the governor as incidental to his office authority to judge of the eligibility of candidates would enable him to swallow up the duties of all other departments. It is made the duty of the governor to execute the laws. The laws require the punishment of those who are guilty of crime. But the governor cannot inquire as to the guilt of the smallest offender, though the law would not otherwise be executed as to him, because the inquiry is judicial.

1. The governor had no power to appoint an elector. This is not pretended. As he was utterly destitute of power, Cronin cannot claim any right as an officer de facto by virtue of any unsupported act of the governor.

An attempted appointment would be ultra vires and void. It would confer no color of right. If Cronin claimed under such appointment he would be a mere usurper, and his acts would be void.

"A mere usurper in office," says McCrary, "can have no authority and can perform no valid official act." (Daily vs. Estabrook, 1 Purlett, sections 80, 299.)

And now, to recapitulate on this point, the governor and secretary of state cannot judge of ineligibility:

1. Because the power to canvass votes, as determined by every respectable authority, does not reach back of the returns.

2. The direct question as to eligibility has been decided by courts whose reasoning is unanswerable.

3. The power is judicial, and executive officers can exercise no judicial power.

4. The constitution of Oregon expressly prohibits it by declaring that—

The persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected, without regard to eligibility, which, being a judicial inquiry, is left to the courts.

5. The statute of Oregon expressly prohibits it by declaring that—

The person having the highest number of votes for any office shall be deemed elected, no matter what the governor may, without authority, declare.

2. The ineligibility of Watts would not give the election to Cronin, a minority candidate.

The Constitution of the United States provides that—

Each State shall appoint * * * electors, * * * but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

It is a general rule that if an ineligible person should be elected, he can, by a judicial proceeding by quo warranto, be ousted from office. The fact that quo warranto will lie, shows that the election is not absolutely void. (State vs. Boal, 46 Missouri, 528.)

The election is not void, but at most only voidable.

The authorities are so abundant to prove that a minority candidate is not elected by the ineligibility of an opposing candidate, the reasoning so logical and conclusive, the consequences of so holding, so unjust, pernicious, and against the policy of our republican institutions, that I will content myself with a reference to some of the authorities without commenting on the cases at large. They hold the doctrine that the minority candidate is not elected. This has been decided in Georgia, Wisconsin, Louisiana, Pennsylvania, Mississippi, and California, and it has been well said that these decisions have the stamp of unqualified approval from such distinguished jurists as Cooley and Dillon. Cooley, on Constitutional Limitations, page 620, says:

If the person receiving the highest number of votes was ineligible, the votes cast for him will still be effectual so far as to prevent the opposing candidate being chosen.

Dillon, on Municipal Corporations, volume 1, page 258, section 135, observes:

That when the statute fails to declare that votes cast for an ineligible person are void, (and there is no such statute in Oregon,) the effect of such person receiving a majority of the votes cast is, according to the weight of American authority and the reason of the matter, that a new election must be held, and not to give the office to the qualified person having the next highest number of votes.

He cites the following cases: The State vs. Swearingen, (12 Georgia, 23;) State vs. Giles, (1 Chandler, Wisconsin, 112;) State vs. Gartwell, (20 Louisiana, 114;) Cooley on Limitations, 620; McLaughlin vs. Sheriff of Pittsburgh, (Legal Journal, July, 1863;) opinion of the judges of Maine, appendix to volume 38 of Reports; Saunders vs. Haynes, (13 Cal., 145;) State vs. Smith, (14 Wisconsin, 497.)

Since Dillon wrote, in the State of Mississippi, in the case of Sublett vs. Bidwell, (47 Miss., 266,) it was held :

If the majority candidate is disqualified it does not follow that he who has received the next highest vote, and is qualified, shall take the office.

In Fish vs. Collins, (21 Louisiana, 289,) it was said :

If a competitor received a greater number of lawful votes than the claimant, the latter does not establish a right to the office by showing that his competitor was ineligible.

In California, in 1859, when the justices of the supreme court were Field, Baldwin, and Terry, in Saunders vs. Haynes (13 Cal., 155) the exact question was decided. The court said :

It will be observed that the point of this defense is, that the votes cast for Turner supposing he received the highest number, were nullities, because of his assumed ineligibility. But we do not so consider, although some old cases may be found affirming this doctrine. We think that the better opinion at this day is that it is not correct.

Our legislative precedents seem to be the same way. Upon principle, we think the law should be so ruled. An election is the deliberate choice of a majority or a plurality of the electoral body. This is evidenced by the votes of the electors. But if a majority of those voting, by mistake of law or fact, happen to cast their votes upon an ineligible candidate, it by no means follows that the next to him on the poll should receive the office. If this be so, a candidate might be elected who received only a small portion of the votes, and who never could have been elected at all but for this mistake. * * * It is fairer, more just, and more consistent with the theory of our institutions to hold the votes so cast as merely ineffectual for the purposes of an election than to give them the effect of disappointing the popular will and electing to office a man whose pretensions the people had designed to reject.

And from an eminent lawyer of that State, Hon. George Cadwalader, I learn that "after the lapse of seventeen years the same question again came up before the present supreme bench, and was decided by it in the same way, on the 13th day of November, 1876, in the case of Crawford vs. Dunbar. The court, in its opinion, after stating that Dunbar, receiving the highest number of votes, was not elected because ineligible, in regard to the claim of Crawford, that he should have the office because he had received the next highest number of votes, said emphatically: 'This position cannot be maintained;' and then goes on to approve and adopt the views expressed in Saunders vs. Haynes, seventeen years before."

There are still other American cases against the doctrine that a minority candidate is elected: (Comm. vs. Cluly, 56 Pa. St., 270; Corliss's Case, 16 American Law Register, N. S., 15; Whitman vs. Malony, 10 Cal., 47; People vs. Moliter, 23 Mich., 341; State vs. Vail, 53 Missouri, 97; State vs. Gastinel, 18 La. An., 517; Cochran vs. Jones, 14 American Law Register, N. S., 222; McCrary, Law of Elections, chapter 5, sec. 231-235.)

The legislative precedents generally hold the same doctrine. (McCrary, Law of Elections, sec. 232; Smith vs. Brown, 2 Bartlett, 395.)

The English rule, as stated by Cushing, by Grant, by Angell and Ames, and as shown by the decided cases, is that the ineligibility of the plurality candidate does not secure the election of the minority candidate unless the ineligibility is proved to be known, for it is never presumed unless patent and notorious; and in Queen vs. Mayor, 3 Law Reports Q. B., 629, it was said :

It is not enough to show that the voter knew the fact only, but it is necessary to show sufficient to raise a reasonable inference that he knew that the fact amounted to a disqualification. (King vs. Monday, Cowper, 537; Rex vs. Hawkins, 10 East, 211; Hawkins vs. Rex, 2 Dow, 124; Gosling vs. Veley, 7 Adol. and Ellis, 406; Cleridge vs. Snyder, 5 Barn. and Adol., 81; Douglas, 398, n. 22; Rex vs. Bridge, 1 Maule and Selwyn, 76.)

The rule in New York is stated in People vs. Clute, 50 New York, 451, by the court as follows:

The existence of the fact which disqualifies, and of the law which makes that fact operate to disqualify, must be brought home so closely and so clearly to the knowledge or notice of the elector as that to give his vote therewith indicates an intention to waste it. The knowledge must be such, or the notice so brought home, as to imply a willfulness in acting when action is in opposition to the natural impulse to save the vote and make it effectual. He must so act in defiance of both the law and the fact, and so in opposition to his own better knowledge, that he has no right to complain of the loss of the franchise, the exercise of which he has wantonly misapplied.

The alleged ineligibility of Watts was utterly unknown to the voters of Oregon. There is not one case in any court in any country which supports Cronin in his claim to office. Solitary and alone it stands out in the naked deformity of a huge iniquity which no mantle of charity can cover.

Cronin, then, had no title to the office of elector.

I now proceed to a third proposition material to the inquiry before the Commission, which is:

That upon the law and the evidence Watts was duly appointed an elector.

His appointment by Odell and Cartwright is regular in form. It is attacked upon the ground that there was no vacancy to fill; that the ineligibility of Watts rendered his election void; that he was not an incumbent of the office, and therefore there was no vacancy, but only a case of non-election, and that the statute of Oregon does not provide for filling such place by appointment.

I will maintain—

First, that the Oregon statute does provide for the case of a non-election; and,

Second, that in law and fact no such case has arisen, but that Watts was duly elected.

These positions I will discuss in the order I have stated.

1. The Oregon statute provides for filling a vacancy by non-election.

The act of Congress of January 23, 1845, passed before Oregon was a State, declares—

First. That each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote;

And,

Second. When any State has held an election * * * and failed to make a choice, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the legislature of such State may direct.

This word "may" in each of these provisions is by all the authorities to be construed imperative—shall. (Supervisors vs. United States, 4 Wallace, 435.)

These provisions can give no new power to the legislature. The Constitution had already given the power. But as Congress had fixed a day for the appointment of electors, "the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November," it was necessary to provide for a vacancy by a failure to elect on that day, and for a vacancy occurring thereafter.

The legislature of Oregon knew these contingencies, and with this law of Congress before it provided for a popular election of electors on the proper day, and, to meet both the contingencies I have stated, provided by law as follows :

The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December, * * * and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector occasioned by (1) death, (2) refusal to act, (3) neglect to attend, or (4) otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill * * * such vacancy.

This authorizes an appointment in a case of non-election ; there is in such case a vacancy.

I will present some of the reasons why this must be so.

(1.) This is a statute to be liberally construed.

(a) If it does not provide for a vacancy in case of non-election, no provision is made, and the legislature of Oregon intended to disregard a duty required by the Constitution of the United States ; intended to deprive Oregon of an electoral vote ; intended to deprive all the States of their claim that Oregon should act with her whole political power. Sedgwick says :

It is a safe and wholesome rule to adopt the restricted construction when a more liberal one will bring us in conflict with the fundamental law, the Constitution. (People vs. Board of Education, 13 Barb., 409.)

E converso, when a liberal construction will avoid a conflict with the Constitution and execute a duty required, it must be adopted.

(b) It is a remedial statute, to be liberally construed. It provides a remedy for the accident of non-election, death, and all other cases of vacancy.

There can be no question—

that the words of a remedial statute are to be construed largely and beneficially, so as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy.—Dwarris, page 632.

This is indorsed by Sedgwick, page 359. Broom says this rule is adopted “to add force and life to the cure and remedy according to the true intent of the makers of the act pro bono publico.” Here this rule is emphatically invoked pro bono publico. Its words are fairly capable of a construction which will secure the public good. (State vs. Newhall, 3 Dutcher, 197 ; 14 Opinions Attorneys-General, 265.)

2. The rule that statutes in pari materia are to be considered together, leads to the same result.

“All acts in pari materia,” said Lord Mansfield, “are to be taken together.” This rule is well known and recognized in this country. (Sedgwick, 247.) It enables courts to judge what one provision of a law means, by reference to another. The Oregon statute, in providing for some vacancies in local offices to be filled by the governor and the courts, limits the vacancies by enumerating those which arise from (1) death, (2) resignation, (3) removal, (4) non-residence, (5) conviction of crime, (6) refusal to qualify, and (7) judgment of ouster ; vacancies in all other cases are to be filled by popular vote. The appointing power is limited, because in derogation of popular suffrage. But when the legislature provided for electors these limitations are dropped, and it is declared that a vacancy shall be filled, if there be any, “occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise.”

Here is the broad, unlimited, comprehensive term “or otherwise.” It cannot be said that this is only a provision for vacancies arising from death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, and other like cases. Here is no case for the application of the maxim noscitur a sociis, because this cannot limit the rules of construction to which I have already referred. They apply to this case, and, if so, no other rule can overrule them. But here is clearly no case for the application of the maxim noscitur a sociis. The statute does not say that vacancies may be filled in cases of "death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, and other like cases," but it says "or otherwise."

"Otherwise" cannot be in similar cases, but in dissimilar cases. There can be no similar cases. There is nothing like death, or refusal to act, or refusal to attend, which could create a vacancy.

The statute regulating electors is special and applicable to that particular subject. By a well-known rule of construction it would control any general statute as to vacancies. And it employs words other and different from the general statute to give it a broader, wider, unlimited scope.

3. The rule that statutes are to be construed according to the intention of the legislature, leads to the same results.

It must be presumed the legislature intended to provide for every contingency. A want of skill is not to be presumed. To admit a casus omissus is to impute to the legislature ignorance, or neglect of duty, or both. This cannot be justified. A casus omissus is odious. Attorney-General Stanbery, in discussing the power of the President to fill vacancies, said the policy of the Constitution was clear that "there shall be no cessation, no interval of time when there may be an incapacity of action." (12 Opinions, 36.) The same policy was understood by the legislature of Oregon, and the same policy requires a construction now which shall not leave the office of elector incapable of action at the appointed time.

4. The language employed gives the most plenary power to appoint in case of vacancy by non-election.

The power to appoint is given "if there shall be any vacancy by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise." Worcester defines "vacancy" for legal purposes :

The state of a post, office, or employment, when destitute of and wanting an incumbent ; a place or office which is empty or not filled.

Johnson :

State of a post or employment when it is unsupplied.

Bouvier :

A place which is empty.

When the Constitution creates the office of elector and fixes the number three for Oregon, and only two are elected, and the law requires one more, is not this one "wanting an incumbent," "empty," "not filled?" If so, there is a vacancy, or these philologists are mistaken. The law says :

If there shall be a vacancy by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise.

Webster defines "otherwise," "in a different manner," "by other causes," "in other respects." The statute may be read, then, as if it said :

If there shall be a vacancy by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or "in a different manner," "by other causes," "in other respects."

This would cover a case of non-election.

Philology is with us, reason is with us, justice is with us, common sense is with us.

5. The authority of the courts is conclusive in favor of this result.

The case of The State vs. Adams, 2 Stewart's Alabama Reports, 231, by reason of its ability, research, and sound law, is placed by Brightly in his Leading Cases on Elections, page 286. A part of the syllabus is this:

A failure to elect creates a vacancy, which can be filled by executive appointment.

Two candidates for sheriff received an equal number of votes, and the governor filled the vacancy. The authority of the governor is found in these words of the constitution:

Should a vacancy occur subsequent to an election, it shall be filled by the governor, as in other cases.

The court say:

The whole object of the section—

Of the constitution quoted—is to secure the means by which offices of this description throughout the State shall be filled.

The convention could make no provision by which the office would be at all times filled by the people; there might be vacancies, and as it would require time to fill such offices by the people, it was necessary that the duties of the office should be discharged in the mean time.

The convention therefore intended to provide for filling the office by an election in the first instance, and a vacancy by executive appointment when it occurred. They took it for granted that elections would always be held * * * and they proceeded to provide a mode of appointment in the event of the election by the people not effecting the object of providing a sheriff. * * * This construction, and no other, completely fulfills the intention of the constitution. Should they fail to elect a sheriff by being divided as to their choice, the general election terminates, and a vacancy in the office of sheriff takes place.

In State vs. City of Newark, 3 Dutcher, 185, it was held that—

A law which confers power to supply by appointment a place vacated by death or disability, authorizes an appointment to be made where the vacancy is occasioned by resignation.

The Attorney-General has decided that—

In the event of the disability or death of a surveyor, where there is a power to fill a vacancy, a resignation creates a vacancy.—14 Opinions, 264.

The same doctrine was held in State ex rel. Attorney-General vs. Irwin, 5 Nevada, 111. The constitution of Nevada provides that—

When any office shall, from any cause, become vacant, and no mode is provided by the constitution and laws for filling such vacancy, the governor shall have power to fill such vacancy.

The legislature by act of February 23, 1869, which took effect April 1, 1869, created a new county, requiring county officers. The governor appointed a sheriff for the county, and his right to the office was inquired of by quo warranto, upon the ground that there was no vacancy which the governor could fill. The supreme court held there was a vacancy, which was properly filled, and quoted with approval the language of the supreme court of Indiana in Stocking vs. State, 7 Indiana, 329:

There is no technical nor peculiar meaning to the word "vacant" as used in the constitution. It means empty, unoccupied. As applied to an office without an incumbent, there is no basis for the distinction urged, that it applies only to offices vacant by death, resignation, or otherwise. An existing office without an incumbent is vacant, whether it be a new or an old one. A new house is as vacant as one tenanted for years, which was abandoned yesterday.

In Stocking vs. State, 7 Indiana, 326, it was shown that the legislature created a new judicial circuit for which the governor appointed a judge under section 18, article 5, of the constitution, which provides that the governor shall by appointment fill a vacancy in the office of judge of any court; and it was held that it was competent for the governor to appoint a judge "to hold his office until a judge" should be elected.

In People vs. Parker, 37 California, 650, it was said by Sprague, justice, in his opinion defining the term "vacancy:"

It not only includes vacancies in terms of office which have been partially filled by an incumbent, but includes all offices and terms of office, constitutional and statutory, having no de jure incumbent, either by reason of a statutory vacancy or by reason of the existence of an office or term of office for the incumbency of which no person has been legitimately designated.

Crockett, justice, remarked:

A vacancy in an office begins when there ceases to be an incumbent to fill it, and it continues as long as there is no incumbent.

The California cases hold that the power to fill a "vacancy occurring from any cause gives authority to fill vacancies caused by the failure of the people to elect." Chief-Justice Field, now of this Commission, in his learned opinion in The People vs. Whitman, 10 California Reports, 48, denied that an officer holding beyond a term "until his successor was elected and qualified" prevented a "vacancy." He said:

For many of the most responsible and important offices in the State there can be no election except to fill a vacancy or for a full term, and if a vacancy cannot exist by a failure of a person to qualify, whether such failure arises from death, acceptance of an appointment under the Federal Government, or resignation in advance of the right to the office—and the reasons assigned in the present case will apply to any of those causes—it would often happen that weak and incompetent men, for whom not a vote could be obtained from the people, would retain for long terms positions of great trust and power, to the serious detriment of the public interests.

But it is said that the supreme court of Rhode Island decided in November last that ineligibility avoids an election, and that in such case, with or without resignation, there is no vacancy. (16 American Law Register, N. S., 15.) But the court decided no such general question. The court held that these facts did not create such a vacancy as is provided for in the peculiar statute of that State. Its language is:

If any electors chosen as aforesaid shall, after their said election, (1) decline the said office or (2) be prevented by any cause from serving thereon, the other electors, when met, * * * shall fill such vacancies.

Here the power is not to fill all vacancies, but such vacancies: vacancies of electors who had been actually chosen, vacancies only in two specified cases: (1) when a duly-appointed elector declines to act, and (2) when such elector is prevented from serving by sickness or other causes. The Oregon statute gives a broader power, a power to fill vacancies arising in any manner; not in two specified cases, but in all cases.

There is a class of cases in which some courts have held that, when an officer is elected for a given term, "and until a successor is elected and qualified," in case of a non-election at the expiration of the term, there is no vacancy, because, by force of express provision, the incumbent continues. (Brightly, 670; Comm. vs. Hanley, 9 Pa., St., 513; Comm. vs. Baxter, 27 Pa. St., 444; State vs. Cobb, 2 Kansas, 32; State vs. Jenkins, 43 Mo., 261; State vs. Robinson, 1 Kansas, 17; State vs. Benedict, 15 Minn., 199; McCrary on Elections, page 170, section 236; Stratton vs. Oatland, 28 Cal., 51; People vs. Stratton, 28 Cal., 382; People vs. Tilton, 37 Cal., 614; Contra. People vs. Reed, 6 Cal., 288; People vs. Mizner, 7 Cal., 524; People vs. Parker, 37 Cal., 639.) [These cannot affect the question I am now discussing.]

The Constitution of the United States provides as to Senators that—

If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise during the recess of the legislature any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature.—Art. 1, sec. 3.

It has been held that this does not authorize an appointment in a case where the legislature has failed to elect. But this rests on two grounds not applicable to the case of electors: First, that the word "happen" limits the power to cases where there has been an incumbent, and that a restrictive rule of interpretation applies, because the legislature can always be convened, and the governor should, on grounds of public policy, have no occasion for refusing to call a session, thereby to magnify his own power. (Story, Const., sec. 1559; McCrary, 171, sec. 237; Clarke & Hall, 871.)

I submit, then, to this honorable Commission, that if there was a case of non-election there was a "vacancy" which Odell and Cartwright could and did lawfully fill.

I now proceed to show—

Second, that Watts was elected; that he became de facto an elector, if not de jure; that the acts of such an officer are valid, and that his resignation created a vacancy which was properly filled by his re-appointment.

It has already been shown that Watts received a majority of the popular vote and that he presents sufficient evidence of title to the office. On these facts he was lawfully elected, for reasons some of which I will state:

1. The constitution and statute of Oregon in express terms declare that he "having the highest number of votes shall be declared and deemed elected." The policy of the statute is to secure officers without an interregnum.

2. The disqualifying clause of the Constitution is directory, not mandatory.

The Constitution does not say that "a person holding an office of trust or profit" shall not hold the office of elector, but it directs the people who vote in the exercise of their duties. It prescribes a rule of public policy, but not a mandatory prohibition on the person appointed.

Lord Mansfield declared that those provisions are mandatory which relate to "circumstances which are of the essence of a thing required to be done," while others are directory. (Rex vs. Loxdale, 1 Burr., 447.) The appointment is the essence of the thing required to be done; the qualifications of the candidate are non-essentials, or at least are not the essence of what is to be done.

3. This question is determined by the authorities. In Saint Louis County vs. Sparks, 10 Missouri, 121, the court say:

A statute prescribing qualification to an office is merely directory, and although an appointee does not possess the requisite qualification his appointment is not therefore void, unless it is so expressly enacted. (20 Louisiana An., 114; People vs. Cook, 14 Barb., 259; Greenleaf vs. Low, 4 Denio, 168; Weeks vs. Ellis, 2 Barb., 324; Keeser vs. McKisson, 2 Rawle, 139; McCrary on Elections, sec. 78.)

In Commonwealth vs. Cluly, 56 Pa. State Reports, 270, it was shown that Cluly received a majority of votes as a candidate for sheriff against McLaughlin, the minority candidate. McLaughlin instituted quo warranto proceedings to oust Cluly, on the ground that he was ineligible by reason of having held the office previous to this election as long as the constitution permitted. His honor Judge Strong, now of this Commission, in deciding the case, said:

The votes cast at an election for a person who is disqualified from holding an office are not nullities; they cannot be rejected by the inspectors, nor thrown out of the count by the return-judges; the disqualified person is a person still and every vote thrown for him is formal.

In Saunders vs. Haynes, 13 California, page 153, the court say:

It will be observed that the point of this defense is that the votes cast for Turner supposing he received the highest number, were nullities because of his assumed ineligibility; but we do not so consider. Although some old cases may be found affirming this doctrine, we think that the better opinion at this day is that it is not correct.

4. If Watts was ineligible his election and induction into office made him an officer de facto, and his acts as such are valid.

The courts have met directly the question whether the acts of officers can be declared invalid because not duly elected, and it is now undisputed law that, if a person comes into office by color of legal appointment or election, he is an officer de facto, his acts in that capacity are valid and effectual when they concern the public and third persons, although it may finally appear that he has no legal or constitutional right to the office. His official acts are as valid as those of an officer de jure, and they cannot be invalidated by any inquiry or evidence back of his certificate of election.

This doctrine has been deemed so essential to the public interest that persons declared ineligible by law have nevertheless been regarded as officers de facto and their official acts valid when done under color of legal appointment. The law is so well settled upon this subject that I will content myself with a reference to authorities without reading them. In McGregor vs. Balch, 14 Vermont, 428, it was held that although a postmaster was ineligible to be elected justice of the peace, yet having been elected and acting under color of office he was a justice of the peace de facto, and his acts were valid as to the public and third persons. In Baird vs. Bank of Washington, 11 Serg. and R., (Pa.) 414, the court say:

The principle of colorable election holds not only in regard to the right of electing, but of being elected. A person indisputably ineligible may be an officer de facto by color of election. (Pritchett vs. People, 1 Gilmer, 529; People vs. Ammons, 5 Gilmer, 107; cases collected in Chase's Decisions by Johnson, 462, where see Caesar Griffin's case.)

In Saint Louis County vs. Sparks, 10 Missouri, 121, the court say:

When the appointing power has made an appointment and a person is appointed who has not the qualifications required by law, the appointment is not therefore void. The person appointed is de facto an officer. His acts * * * are valid and binding.

To the same effect is Knight vs. Wells, Luftwych, 508; 16 Viner's Abridgment, 114; Bean vs. Thompson, 19 New Hampshire, 115; McCrory on Elections, sec. 79.

The postmasters who were appointed as electors in 1836, although ineligible, voted for President, and their right to do so was so far conceded that no complete inquiry was made of the facts. (House Miscellaneous Document 13, second session Twenty-fourth Congress, p. 71.)

The Houses of Congress have determined that the acts of officers de facto are valid for all purposes of an election. (Barnes vs. Adams, 2 Bartlett, 760; McCrory, sec. 79.)

Many laws have been passed in Congress by the casting votes of members who were subsequently declared not legally elected. But the laws they made by their votes have always been held valid. The same may be said of the laws in almost every State in the Union. Judgments have been rendered in the courts by judges who were subsequently ousted from office on quo warranto as not legally elected, but their judgments still stood as valid and unquestioned. A large part of the land-titles in many of the States depends on official acts of persons ousted from office as not legally elected, but the titles are not thereby disturbed.

To overturn all this law is to destroy the foundations of society, the title to property, the obligations of the domestic relations, and convert the land into a pandemonium.

The ineligibility of Watts, then, did not render his election void. He was an elector de facto when he did any official act. As there was then no vacancy, it was impossible that Cronin could be at the same time an elector de jure or de facto. Watts did act under his election. He resigned, and that was an official act. He must have entered on the office in order that he might resign. The record shows sufficiently that he acted in the organization of the electors, and after that absented himself, resigned, was re-appointed, again appeared, and acted.

His title to office is twofold: an appointment by the people, shown in evidence by the lists of electors certified by the secretary of state, and an appointment by the remaining two electors, whose title to office is clear and unquestionable.

From all this it is shown that Watts was duly appointed an elector and that the votes cast by Odell, Cartwright, and Watts for President and Vice-President are the votes provided for by the Constitution. This result is not only sanctioned and sanctified by law, but it is still further sanctified by the gratifying fact that it carries out the purpose of our republican institutions by giving effect to the will of the people of Oregon.

If the vote of Cronin could be counted for President and Vice-President, it would rob the people of Oregon of the highest political right they have; it would rob the people of the whole republic of their lawful choice of President and Vice-President, and bring shame and dishonor upon our institutions. It needs no exposé of any attempted bribery to render this purpose effectual, to secure for it the detestation of mankind and the execration of history.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move that the Commission take a recess until seven o'clock, to meet in the Senate chamber.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I move that we now adjourn until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I hope the motion will be withdrawn for a moment until we decide whether we shall extend the time for the argument by counsel.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I withdraw the motion if Judge Thurman desires.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. If we are not to extend the time allowed for argument I should be in favor of adjourning until to-morrow, and then the four hours of argument may be heard and concluded by two o'clock and we shall have time to deliberate; but if the time is to be extended, then I might be quite willing, unwell as I am, to stay to-night.

The PRESIDENT. I understood that counsel asked for an extension.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. If counsel insist upon that request, I hope that will be decided first.

The PRESIDENT. What was the request?

Mr. HOADLY. We did request an extension of time for two hours additional.

Mr. EVARTS. On our part we do not desire any additional time, as we suppose the discussion is mainly one of law.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I should like to have the counsel state whether they propose to offer any testimony and whether they have that offer of testimony now prepared.

The PRESIDENT. I will allow that question to be answered before I put the motion.

Mr. HOADLY. We expect to offer testimony. We have asked the Commission to make an order for the production of certain testimony which we desire to use.

The PRESIDENT. It has been made. The subpoena has been signed.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I should like, Mr. President, before determining the question of the extension of time, to have the offer of testimony made in form, made now.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. So as not to occupy time to-morrow?

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I do not mean by that that I desire the counsel to offer their witnesses now, but I desire to have the offer (which has been made in all the other cases) before the tribunal as to the substance of the fact that is proposed to be proven before voting on the question of the extension of time.

The PRESIDENT. I will inquire, are counsel ready to make the offer?

Mr. HOADLY. We are.

The PRESIDENT. Make it.

Mr. HOADLY. I say "ready." I suppose it is in the next room. We have prepared the offer and caused it to be printed, and I suppose it can be had in a moment.

Mr. MERRICK. It is very brief.

Mr. HOADLY. There is not a copy in the room now.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I move that counsel be permitted to offer that before the other question is decided.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. To occupy the time while this paper is being sent for, I wish to say on the question of the extension of time that it is now Wednesday night; Saturday week will be the 3d day of March, and there are several States yet to be gone through, and one which, according to the general rumor, will be one that we shall be obliged ourselves to act upon. Now it does seem to me that we ought all to submit to much personal inconvenience, as I do, and as I know Judge Thurman does, in order to get on. The Senate Chamber is at our disposal, where we can be as comfortable at night as we can be here in the day-time, except from the weariness of long sitting. So I should hope that on all hands we should be willing now, with all these questions as to what are the offers and how much time may be needed, which perhaps we cannot tell—I should be very glad to give all that is necessary and that is possible—but I think it better that we should take a recess now and meet at seven o'clock, and then, in an hour or two, we can ascertain exactly where we are and what we ought to do.

The PRESIDENT. I think we ought to receive the offer before any motion.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I did not make a motion, only a suggestion.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. Mr. President, I desire to say that considering the critical condition of public business, and the exigency now before the country, we ought not to extend the time. I would always be willing to gratify and accommodate counsel; but I believe that every idea they have to advance, every authority to refer to, can be produced satisfactorily in two hours on each side. I do not believe there is the slightest advantage to be gained by anybody by the extension of time.

The PRESIDENT, (to counsel.) Are you ready to make the offer of proof?

Mr. HOADLY. Not at this moment. Mr. Green has gone for it.

Mr. MERRICK. The papers were here, but accidentally have been mislaid.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Commissioner Miller suggests that we had better take the question upon the motion for the extension of time without waiting for the offer.

Mr. MERRICK. I have a copy here now.

The PRESIDENT. You can read that. The Commission desire that the offer should be read in their hearing audibly.

Mr. HOADLY—

First. The undersigned, of counsel for objectors to certificate No. 1, offer in evidence a duly-certified copy of the commission of John W. Watts as postmaster at Yam Hill, in the county of La Fayette, State of Oregon, which said commission was issued in the year 1873, and they also offer to prove that said Watts duly qualified and entered upon said office, being an office of profit and trust under the United States, and that he was the incumbent thereof on the 7th day of November, 1876, and up to and after the 6th day of December, 1876, and until his successor was thereafter appointed and qualified; and they further offer to prove that said John W. Watts is the same person whose name appears in said certificate No. 1 as having voted for President and Vice-President of the United States as a member of the electoral college of the State of Oregon.

Second. The undersigned further offer to prove that more than eleven hundred voters of the State of Oregon who cast their ballots in favor of said Watts as elector for President and Vice-President of the United States, at the election held on the 7th day of November, 1876, had notice that said Watts was a postmaster in the service of the United States, and that he was thereby disqualified from becoming an elector for President and Vice-President of the United States.

This is signed:

R. T. MERRICK.
GEORGE HOADLY.

The PRESIDENT. Now I will put the question on the extension of time. The request is to extend the time two hours on the side of the objectors to certificate No. 1.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Mr. President, I should be very reluctant to curtail the time of counsel in the discussion of the questions before us, so important as they are, and I always have been disposed to extend time when it has been asked; but it seems to me that after the question has already been discussed in many of its leading aspects, two hours on each side already occupied, with two hours more, will be as much as can be reasonably asked in the present exigency of public affairs. I would much prefer that counsel should confine themselves to the time we have laid down in our rules, and that we should adjourn until to-morrow, instead of extending the time and sitting to-night.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Mr. President, I understand that the two hours proposed to be devoted to the argument of this case on either side embrace also the argument on the offer of testimony and upon the whole case. Now, under the rules of this Commission counsel have a right to debate each offer of evidence for fifteen minutes on each side; and it was understood in the last case, as I believe, that in lieu of those fifteen minutes on the offering of each piece of testimony we should extend the time for the main argument and let all the offers be made at once. I think that rule ought to be pursued in this case; in lieu of the fifteen minutes that the counsel would have a right to debate each offer of testimony under the rule, I think we should extend the time so as to cover that fifteen minutes' debate on each point of testimony. I think, therefore, it is reasonable that the time of the argument should be extended.

The PRESIDENT. I desire to add one remark in explanation of the vote I shall give. I shall vote to extend the time. I do it very largely on the ground that, after the argument closes, there is no opportunity for the examination of authorities. We depend chiefly upon the bar, during the arguments, for our information in respect to the authorities, and with that view I shall vote to extend the time.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I make this motion on the subject of the application for the extension of time:

That we proceed with the case at seven o'clock in the Senate Chamber, and that counsel have three and a half hours.

There are two objections here which would cover half an hour's argument. I want to give all the time possible. I move that they have three and a half hours on a side for the argument of objections, and merits, and everything.

Mr. EVARTS. The offers of testimony?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Yes, including the offers of testimony.

Mr. MERRICK. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. Is the extension of time desired on both sides?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. No; the opposite side say not; but of course in making the order we ought to extend it to both sides. If we can spend two hours this evening, it will be about fair.

The PRESIDENT. I will treat that as the original motion. Please reduce it to writing.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. My motion is that the hearing proceed in the Senate Chamber at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., and that counsel have three hours and a half on each side for the whole case, covering offers of proof, &c.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Mr. President, as that order is drawn up, it does not include the time that might be occupied in hearing the testimony in case any shall be admitted.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I do not intend to have the testimony of witnesses come out of the three hours and a half, because it is obvious that we could not hear the testimony of eleven hundred witnesses, to prove that they knew the disqualification, in that time.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Then the proposition is that the argument shall proceed before any testimony is offered.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That depends. In whatever order they go, they have so much time for speaking.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I have never been able to understand since this Commission had its first sitting why facts that are indisputable have not been admitted and thereby the time of the Commission saved. The first offer of proof in this case is that Watts was postmaster at Yam Hill, in the county of La Fayette, Oregon, on the 7th of November, 1876, and up to and after the 6th of December, 1876. That he was postmaster on the 7th of November, 1876, I have supposed was not a disputed fact. Why that should not be admitted, and proof in regard to that and the time that would be occupied in making the proof should not be saved, I am not at all able to understand. Whether he was postmaster on the 6th of December, 1876, I do not understand to be an undisputed question, and upon that, testimony might well be taken.

So as to the second proposition, as to whether more than eleven hundred voters of the State of Oregon who cast their votes for him knew of his ineligibility; that is a statement, of course, which no one could be asked to admit. But so far as time can be saved by admitting what is indisputable, I have thought from the very first that the admission ought to have been made on both sides.

Now, in respect to this testimony, until the Commission decides whether it shall be received or not, I do not know how counsel can proceed. We propose to give three hours and a half. I think that is ample for the discussion, both of the question of admissibility and of the merits, but until you decide whether the testimony shall be admitted at all I really do not see how counsel are to know how to conduct their case.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. President, if this motion should be adopted, a motion will be made that the counsel, in discussing the admissibility of their testimony on either side, may draw at their pleasure on the time allowed for their final argument, as was done in the Louisiana case. That answers Judge Thurman's question.

The PRESIDENT. I do not quite understand you, Mr. Hoar.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I say, if this proposition of Mr. Edmunds shall be adopted, a further motion will be made, that counsel, in discussing the question of the admissibility of testimony, shall be permitted to add to the fifteen minutes as much of their final time as they see fit to take, as they did in the Louisiana case; that is, counsel having three and a half hours in all, if they choose, instead of spending fifteen minutes only on their first offer of testimony, may spend three and a half hours on it.

The PRESIDENT. I do not consider any motion before the Commission except the one submitted by Mr. Edmunds, that the Commission proceed in the Senate Chamber at seven and a half o'clock this evening, and that the counsel have three and a half hours on each side for the discussion of the whole case.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Mr. President, I have no objection to that proposition if it can be executed in accordance with the manifest intention of the mover; that is, if we can go forward to-night and hold a session which will hear a large part of the argument that we expect to hear. But we did precisely this sort of thing a week ago, extended the time to four hours and a half on a side, with an understanding that we were to have a night session, and before we had started over twenty minutes on that night's session, or a little longer, perhaps, we adjourned over, and then we had the whole accumulated time on our hands and nothing gained.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. That was on account of counsel who said they could not go on.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I was out at the moment that was done. But if it can be that we shall have a session to-night and hear the major part of this argument, I shall cheerfully vote for the resolution.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I want to say one word in reply to the suggestion of brother Hoar. He says that if this rule be adopted, then the counsel may take out of their time allowed for the argument upon the merits as much time as they please and occupy that time in arguing the question of the admissibility of the testimony, as was done in the Louisiana case. But the cases are very different. In the Louisiana case the Commission directed them to argue the question of the admissibility of the testimony, and the Commission decided that question before they were called upon to make any argument on the merits. It is very true that they occupied all their time, so that they had no time left for argument upon the merits. But if this order be adopted, then, without knowing whether they are to give their evidence or not, they are to go on upon each side and occupy the three hours and a half, and they will not know what will be the decision of the Commission as to the admissibility of the testimony. I do not think that is the way to try a case. It seems to me it would be very much better to stick to our rule and allow fifteen minutes upon an offer of testimony which would give half an hour on a side, and then allow the three hours for the argument upon the merits, which would amount to the same thing as the order offered by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. The suggestion I made does not require counsel to take more than fifteen minutes. It leaves the whole matter to the discretion of counsel. Counsel make these two offers of testimony. If they choose to present that point of their case in a fifteen minutes' argument, or without argument, they can do so. If they wish to draw fifteen minutes or an hour out of their final time, as it has been extended, they can do so. The order does not require them; it only permits them in their discretion, to which the case certainly can be intrusted.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. But the question which troubles me is, when will the Commission decide on the admissibility of the testimony?

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. After it is argued.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. When the court get through hearing argument, they decide whether the testimony shall be admitted or not.

The PRESIDENT. The only question before the Commission is on the motion of Senator Edmunds.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I desire to ask Senator Edmunds how long it is proposed that we shall hold a session this evening?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I think we ought to sit two full hours.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I agree to that.

The PRESIDENT. Are you ready for the question on the motion?

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT. That the hearing of the case proceed in the Senate Chamber at half past seven o'clock; and that the parties have three and a half hours on each side for argument.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I suggest that that motion is divisible. The question about going to the Senate Chamber is one thing. I should like to have the question separated.

The PRESIDENT. I will regard the question as divisible. The first question is whether the Commission will proceed with the hearing in the Senate Chamber at half past seven o'clock.

This branch of the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The other division of the motion is that the parties be allowed three hours and a half on a side for the discussion of the whole question.

This branch of the motion was agreed to.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I move that in arguing the question of admissibility of evidence, counsel be permitted to take, in addition to the fifteen minutes allowed by the rule, as much of the time remaining to them as they see fit.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That is unnecessary. This is a substitute for the whole thing. They proceed under this order alone.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. If that is the understanding, all right.

The PRESIDENT, (at six o'clock and forty-four minutes p. m.) The Commission will now take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The Commission re-assembled in the Senate Chamber at seven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

Mr. HOADLY. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, the first proposition to which I address myself is that the decisions made by the Commission in the cases of Florida and Louisiana, applied to this case, require the Commission to sustain the electoral votes cast by Cronin, Miller, and Parker, namely, one for Tilden and Hendricks, and two for Hayes and Wheeler. Without retracing its steps and withdrawing the conclusions the Commission has announced in the cases of Florida and Louisiana, the result cannot be reached which is desired by our learned antagonists.

In order that we may in the briefest possible manner ascertain the point of contention, I will read from the decision of this Commission in the case of Louisiana :

And the Commission has by a majority of votes decided, and does hereby decide, that it is not competent, under the Constitution and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Louisiana, on and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the returning-officers for elections in the said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, or that the determination of the said returning-officers was not in accordance with the truth and the fact; the Commission by a majority of votes being of opinion that it is not within the jurisdiction of the two Houses of Congress assembled to count the votes for President and Vice-President to enter upon a trial of such questions.

I do not understand that this is a ruling upon a mere question of proof, but that is a ruling upon a high proposition of jurisdiction. Nor do I understand that by this decision is meant that anything and everything which any person claiming to be an elector may inclose in an envelope and address to the President of the Senate has the force of testimony before this honorable Commission, but only that those documents and papers which if offered aliunde would be competent, may be considered when found within the envelopes, and that the determination and decision of the returning-board of a State, acted upon by the governor of the State in the manner provided in the one hundred and thirty-sixth section of the Revised Statutes, is final and conclusive, and that the names therein contained are the names of the true and valid electors of the State.

That I am right in this construction of this decision is confirmed by the views of one for whom long knowledge has impressed me with great respect. I am not personally intimate with him, but intimate in the sense in which any citizen may be said to be intimate with the judgment, the opinions, and the habits of accuracy of statement of a statesman. I say, that I am right in this conclusion is confirmed by a statement of reasons for this conclusion given in the Senate of the United States on the 20th of February by a member of this Commission, the honored Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Morton.] He said :

The Constitution says the certificates shall be opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses. Whether he is to count the votes or whether the two Houses are to count the votes, and I assume under this law the two Houses are to do it, or in certain cases this Electoral Commission, what can they do? They have but one duty to perform, and that is to ascertain that these certificates came from the electors of the State. When that is done, "the votes shall then be counted." They must ascertain the fact whether they came from the electors of the State; and when they have ascertained that, their duty is at an end. There is no time, there is no place to try any question of ineligibility or of election when the votes are to be counted. And how are we to know that the certificates came from the electors of the State? In the first place the act of Congress provides prima-facie evidence, the governor's certificate, but that is not conclusive. That is the result of an act of Congress. Congress may repeal that act, or it may provide by another to go behind it, but when you go behind that and come to the action of the officers of the State, there your inquiry is at an end. Whenever the officers appointed by a State to declare who have been chosen electors have acted and made that declaration, it is final so far as Congress is concerned. The action of the State officers is the act of the State.

With this statement of principle I am content. My proposition is that the State of Oregon, through her State officers, through her governor, supported by her canvassing-board, has spoken, and the result of her speech is here in the certificates of E. A. Cronin, William H. Odell, and John C. Cartwright, which certificates are attached to the votes of Cronin, Miller, and Parker, and are the only legitimate, lawful evidence of the act of Oregon, without which the pretended votes of Odell, Cartwright, and Watts fail to have any legal effect whatever.

The views expressed by Senator Morton find confirmation in the case of Dennett, petitioner, in volume 32 of the Reports of the State of Maine, page 508. The opinion was pronounced by Shepley, chief-justice, and there was no dissenting opinion :

The act of opening and comparing the votes returned for county commissioners cannot be performed by the persons holding the offices of governor and of councilors unless they act in their official capacities, for it is only in that capacity that the power is conferred upon them. The duty is to be performed upon the responsibility of their official stations and under the sanctity of their official oaths. The governor and council, and not certain persons that may be ascertained to hold those offices, must determine the number of votes returned for each person as county commissioner, and ascertain that some one has or has not a sufficient number to elect him.

It is, then, the State of Oregon which speaks when the governor, under section 136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in obedience to the return and canvass of the returning-officers, to the declaration and determination of the result of the canvass by the returning-officers, issues that certificate.

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State—to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet.

Again, section 138 :

The electors shall make and sign three certificates of all the votes given by them, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, &c.

And so the next section, that the certificates shall be sealed and delivered, one to the Federal district judge, one sent by mail to the President of the Senate, and one sent by messenger to the President of the Senate.

Now, I ask your honors' attention to the question, Who were the electors ascertained to be appointed by the official decision and determination (that I believe to have been the language used in the Florida case) of the board of State canvassers of the State of Oregon? Or, to use the language adopted in the Louisiana case, Who were the returning-officers upon and according to whose determination of their appointment the governor acted or failed to act, as the case may be, in the issue of the certificates of the State of Oregon?

This leads us to an examination and comparison of the statutes of the State of Oregon in connection with the statutes of the States of Florida and Louisiana, for I refer to Florida and Louisiana in order that we who are of counsel may have a guide to the real effect of the opinions already pronounced by this Commission; I mean, of course, in applying to the case of Oregon the decisions made by this Commission in the matter of Florida and Louisiana.

In Florida certain persons are to form a board of State canvassers, and proceed to canvass the returns of said election, and determine and declare who shall have been elected to any such office or as such member, as shown by such returns.

Here the office of determination and declaration is superadded to the office of canvassing; and by a later provision in the same section the board are required to make and sign a certificate containing in words written at full length the whole number of votes, &c.

And—

When any person shall be elected to the office of elector, * * * the governor shall make out, sign, and cause to be sealed with the seal of the State, and transmit to such person, a certificate of his election.

The point to which I desire particularly your attention is that under the laws of Florida the determination and decision are separated in legal thought, and thus, in legal act, from the canvass itself; and so we find it in Louisiana, as is made manifest in the oath that—

I will carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes.

Again—

Within ten days after the closing of the election said returning-officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state. They shall continue in session until such returns have been compiled. The presiding officer shall, at such meeting, open in the presence of the said returning-officers the statements of the commissioners of election, and the said returning-officers shall, from said statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate; one copy of such returns they shall file in the office of the secretary of state, and of one copy they shall make public proclamation, by printing in the official journal and such other newspapers as they may deem proper, declaring the names of all persons and officers voted for, the number of votes for each person, and the names of the persons who have been duly and lawfully elected. The returns of the election thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers, until set aside after contest according to law, of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected. The governor shall, within thirty days thereafter, issue commissions to all officers thus declared elected, who are required by law to be commissioned.

Now, in Oregon the language of the sixtieth section is this:

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same, &c.

I will come back to that presently. Let us now see how votes are given, received, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. Section 37 is:

The county clerk, immediately after making the abstract of the votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each of said abstracts, and transmit it by mail to the secretary of state, at the seat of government; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed, within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, state printer, justices of the supreme court, members of Congress, and district attorneys.

If this were all the statute, an argument by implication might be made, to the effect that the duty to canvass involves the duty to determine the results of the canvass. But this is not all, for the governor, who is required to be present, is not an idle spectator, as is claimed by the objectors to certificate No. 2:

And the governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes, and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person.

And this is made perfectly plain by the next sentence :

In case there shall be no choice by reason of any two or more persons having an equal and the highest number of votes for either of such offices, the governor shall, by proclamation, order a new election to fill said offices.

For what purpose is the governor present? He is to witness the canvass and declare its result, and his declaration of its result is the certificate he gives, and his proclamation declaring the election of such person. He is not there by way of idle ceremony any more than the two Houses of Congress are present at the opening of the envelopes as a mere idle ceremony. He is there to do what is required of him to do—to witness the canvass and to declare its result. But if this be not so in the matter of members of Congress of Oregon, it is unquestionably so with regard to the final determination, decision, and declaration of the result of the election of electors. The secretary of state is to canvass. No duty is imposed on him to declare any result whatever. He is to canvass, and what is that canvass? I copied—perhaps it was an idle thing—from the approved lexicographers the definition of the word. Worcester says :

1. To sift; to examine; to scrutinize.

I have made careful search, and canvassed the matter with all possible diligence.—Woodward.

2. To debate; to discuss; to agitate.

They canvassed the matter one way and t'other.—L'Estrange.

To solicit votes from; to bespeak.

And Webster traces the origin of the word to the old French word canebasser, and defines it thus :

To examine curiously; to search or sift out, as canvass in Old English, and probably in Old French, signified also a sieve, a straining-cloth.

1. To sift; to strain; to examine thoroughly; to search or scrutinize; as, to canvass the votes for senators.

2. To take up for discussion; to debate.

An opinion that we are likely soon to canvass.—Sir W. Hamilton.

3. To go through in the way of solicitation; as, to canvass a district for votes.

Here is no necessary implication that the word means “to determine the result.” It is to examine, scrutinize, tabulate, and formulate, but not necessarily to ascertain and determine results, and so the word is used in Florida, and so the word is used in Louisiana, and so the corresponding word “examine,” as I shall presently show you, is used in Massachusetts, and so the word is used in Oregon. When we come to the sixtieth section of the statute we find that this view is confirmed. Let us now return to the sixtieth section :

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress.

It does not say “given, received, returned, canvassed, and declared,” or “given, received, returned, canvassed, and certified.” It says, “given, received, returned, and canvassed,” and the provision with regard to the final determination and decision is contained in the next clause of the section :

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors *elect*ed, and affix the seal of the State to the same.

Two lists, not three; the secretary of state, not the governor. It is not under the act of Congress that this is required, for the act of Congress calls for no great seal of Oregon, and calls for no certificate of the secretary of state of Oregon. The act of Congress calls for a certificate which may be without a seal, which may be without the attestation of a secretary. The act of Congress simply provides that it shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified. But Oregon says :

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

And here are the lists prepared under this section, to which are signed the names of the governor and secretary, under the great seal of the State, declaring that William H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and E. A. Cronin are the electors elected :

I, L. F. Grover, governor of the State of Oregon, do hereby certify that at a general election held in said State on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, William H. Odell received 15,206 votes, John C. Cartwright received 15,214 votes, E. A. Cronin received 14,157 votes, for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States; being the highest number of votes cast at said election for persons eligible, under the Constitution of the United States, to be appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, they are hereby declared duly elected electors as aforesaid for the State of Oregon.

This is the voice of Oregon, according to the judgment of this Commission in the cases of Florida and Louisiana. Its truthfulness has been impeached; but one thing I am certain I may say in this presence: it is as true as the certificates which have received the approval of this Commission coming from Florida and Louisiana.

They are duly elected. They are hereby declared—duly elected electors as aforesaid for the State of Oregon.

LA FAYETTE GROVER,
Governor of Oregon.

Attest:

S. F. CHADWICK,
Secretary of State of Oregon.

But, says my learned friend, the secretary of state has simply signed it as a witness. Not so. He signed it in attestation of the truth of the fact. He is a participant in the declaration thereby. He has attached the great seal of the State. It is the act of the governor and the act of the secretary in the ordinary form, and being such, it is in compliance with the sixtieth section of the statute of Oregon, and at the same time with the one hundred and thirty-sixth section of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and thus constitutes the final and conclusive decision and determination of the vote of the State of Oregon, according to the only evidence provided by law by which this tribunal can communicate with the State of Oregon. The laws of the United States have provided but a single method by which this tribunal can communicate with Oregon. It is in the one hundred and thirty-sixth section of the Revised Statutes of the United States. There is the method pointed out by law by which the voice of Oregon may speak to this tribunal, to the two Houses of Congress, and which this tribunal, standing in the place of the two Houses of Congress, may hear as the voice of Oregon, as has been decided in the cases of Florida and Louisiana.

I submit this proposition in connection, however, with a decision in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Who, by the laws of Oregon, had the custody of the great seal of the State?

Mr. HOADLY. I am unable to answer the question.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The secretary of state, by the constitution.

Mr. HOADLY. It has been answered probably correctly. I do not mean by "probably correctly" to impeach my learned friend; I mean—

Mr. MATTHEWS. The constitution says so.

Mr. HOADLY. I have not looked at it; but I say there is nothing in the laws of Oregon which requires any such certificate or exemplification as is presented by the supporters of certificate No. 1. It cannot be found there. There is the provision of Oregon, section sixty, and the abstract, which is simply a certified statement of the number of votes received at the election, is a provision aliunde the laws of Oregon, although it was within the envelope opened by the President of the Senate.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. The secretary of state can certify at common law.

Mr. HOADLY. But the laws of Oregon have determined and prescribed who shall certify to this tribunal. That certificate we present.

Now I call your honors' attention to the opinion of the judges of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, signed by them all—Horace Gray, John Wells, James D. Colt, Seth Ames, Marcus Morton, William C. Endicott, and Charles Devens, jr., Boston, March 5, 1875—to be found on page 600 of the one hundred and seventeenth volume of Massachusetts Reports:

The seventh chapter of the general statutes has constituted the governor and council a board to examine, as soon as may be after receiving them, the returns of votes from the various cities and towns for district attorneys and other officers named in this article of the constitution, and requires the governor forthwith to transmit to such persons as appear to be chosen to such offices a certificate of such choice, signed by the governor and countersigned by the secretary of the commonwealth.

Notice, the governor and council are obliged to examine the returns; it does not say "to examine and declare the result," but "to examine:"

The nature of the duties thus imposed and the very terms of the statute show that they are to be performed without unnecessary delay, and that the certificate issued by the governor to any person appearing upon such examination to be elected is the final and conclusive evidence of the determination of the governor and council as to his election.

I submit that by parity of reasoning the certificate or list signed by the governor and secretary of state of Oregon, under the great seal of the State, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on the first Wednesday of December, is the final and conclusive evidence of the determination of the governor and secretary as to their election. Why are the governor and secretary required to sign these lists? It is that the chief executive of the State and the canvassing-officer shall unite in declaring who are elected. The secretary, the canvassing-officer, is required to prepare two lists of the names of electors elected, and to affix the great seal of the State to the same; and the governor, in whose presence the canvass is made, must also sign, and together their signatures, with the great seal of the State, constitute the final and conclusive, irrefragable evidence who are the electors of the State of Oregon.

I pass from this proposition to consider another. It is a familiar proposition of law that when a commission or certificate of election has been delivered to an officer, and he accepts it, and enters upon the performance of the duties of that office, he becomes an officer de jure et de facto, and is to be so treated in all courts, in all places, under all circumstances, except when his title may be impeached by quo warranto, certiorari, or proceeding under a statute for contest. This evidence is here presented by E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker. They come here, Cronin, as a certificated elector, having vouched in Miller and Parker to vote with him in consequence of the refusal of Cartwright and Odell to act with him. I will stop a moment simply to say that in my judgment the statements contained in the record in connection with certificate No. 2 are confirmed and placed beyond the possibility of a doubt by the statements contained in certificate No. 1. Mr. Cronin says (and he presents the authentic, official advice to this Commission of his election and the election of Odell and Cartwright) that they refused to act with him, and they say that they were elected with Watts, and that they organized with Watts by accepting the resignation of Watts and electing into the place, thus made vacant by the declination of Watts, Mr. Watts himself.

I respectfully submit, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, that there is no contradiction between these certificates. Mr. Cronin was in possession of the official decision and determination of the canvassers of Oregon. He proposed to act. Mr. Watts's name is not in the official decision and determination of the canvassers of Oregon, but was excluded by them. Mr. Watts proceeded to act with Odell and Cartwright. They did not say, as my learned friend who closed the argument for the objectors would have this Commission to understand, that they (Odell and Cartwright with Cronin) made the board, and that Cronin refused to act with them. There can be no refusal without an opportunity. They proceeded to exclude Cronin by accepting Watts's resignation.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Is there any allegation anywhere on that certificate that they refused to act with Cronin or that Cronin refused to act with them?

Mr. HOADLY. Cronin's name is not in that certificate. He is ignored utterly and entirely. Odell and Cartwright state that they acted with Watts, that they accepted Watts's resignation, and elected Watts to take the place of Watts, all the while it being shown by the official decision and determination that Cronin was ready to act, Cronin alleging, with Miller and Parker, that they refused to act with him, and they alleging, without naming him, that they refused to act with him by alleging that they did act without him and with Watts.

I was wrong in saying that their record does not name Cronin. It does name him, but it names him to confirm the statement I have just made. Certificate No. 1 says that Odell and Cartwright required of the governor and the secretary of state certified lists, which both those officers refused to give them, thus adding to their official decision and determination a refusal to give such evidence to anybody else.

And so far as evidence aliunde the lists may be considered (a question which this Commission may yet be called upon to decide) they do say:

And being informed that such lists had been delivered to one E. A. Cronin, by said secretary of state, we, each and all—

That is, Watts, Odell, and Cartwright, each and all—demand such certified lists of said E. A. Cronin; but he then and there refused to deliver or to exhibit such certified lists to us or either of us.

And, therefore, Mr. Cronin produces the lists which do not contain the name of Watts.

I was going on to say that a certificated or commissioned officer who enters upon the discharge of duty is an officer de jure et de facto in all tribunals, in all places, with reference to any action of his in his office, until challenged by writ of quo warranto, or contest of election, or writ of certiorari. The lists provided for by the one hundred and thirty-sixth section of the Revised Statutes and the sixtieth section of the statutes of Oregon being held by E. A. Cronin did make him an elector de jure et de facto as to all persons, except the State challenging upon quo warranto, or except upon certiorari, or except upon contest of election; and to that proposition I desire to direct a few remarks, which will be mainly by way of referring to authority.

I will read first from the case of the People v. Miller, 16 Michigan Reports, page 56. It is the opinion of his honor Mr. Justice Christianity, concurred in by Judge Cooley and Judge Campbell, and I am sure I need not say in this hall that an opinion from such a source, with such confirmation, cannot be challenged with safety in any court of justice in the land.

The certificate of election, whether rightfully or wrongfully given, confers upon the person holding it the prima-facie right of holding it for the term, and this prima-facie right is subject to be defeated only by his voluntary surrender of the office, or by a judicial determination of the right. We do not mean to say that if the respondent had abandoned or should abandon his claim to the office under the election, witnessed by the certificate admitting the relator's right, that the board might not have received and approved the relator's bond, but they certainly had no jurisdiction to try the validity of the election as between the relator and the respondent, and in such a contest the certificate of election was conclusive upon them until the right should be judicially tried.

The head-note or syllabus of the case is :

The certificate of election, whether rightfully or wrongfully given by the board of canvassers, confers upon the person holding it the prima-facie right to the office until his right is rejected by a voluntary surrender or by a judicial determination against him.

This proposition has been three times decided in the State of Pennsylvania, in cases to which I will direct your honors, beginning with the case of Commonwealth ex relatione Ross v. Baxter, 35 Pennsylvania State Reports, p. 263 :

A return by the election-officers that A B received a majority of the votes for a township office is legal and prima-facie evidence of his title to the office; and it can only be set aside by proceedings for a false return under the act of July 2, 1839. It cannot be inquired into by quo warranto.

So in the forty-first volume Pennsylvania State Reports, Hulseman and Brinkworth v. Rems and Siner, page 401, a case of great interest in many respects. I read from pages 400 and 401. It was an action in equity for an injunction, for in Pennsylvania it is held that a conflict between two officers claiming in conflicting rights may be decided under certain circumstances by injunction in equity.

We have, therefore, no ground left for our interference but the single one that the return judges included in their enumeration returns purporting to be from three companies of volunteers, which were forgeries. We admit, therefore, that the evidence proves that these certificates of the election of the defendants are founded in manifest fraud, the forgery of some unknown person, but we do not find that the defendants had any hand in it; and we trust they had not. Can we on this account interfere and declare the certificates void?

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Who were the defendants in that case?

Mr. HOADLY. It was a proceeding in equity by John Hulseman and George Brinkworth, citizens and qualified voters, against James Rems and Charles B. Siner.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Were they the persons claiming the office?

Mr. HOADLY. They were the persons claiming the office and holding the certificates of election.

According to our laws the election has passed completely through all its forms, the result has been in due form declared and certified, and the defendants have received their certificates of election, and are entitled to their seats as members of the common council. The title-papers of their offices are complete, and have the signatures of the proper officers of the law; and if they are vitiated by any mistake or fraud in the process that has produced them, this raises a case to be tried by the forms of "a contested election" before the tribunal appointed by law to try such questions, and not by the ordinary forms of legal or equitable process before the usual judicial tribunals.

In Kerr and others vs. Trego and others, 47 Pennsylvania State Reports, page 292, the syllabus is:

In all bodies that are under law, where there has been an authorized election for the office in controversy, the certificate of election which is sanctioned by law or usage is the prima facie written title to the office, and can only be set aside by a contest in the forms prescribed by law.

To the same effect the case of The People vs. Cook, in 4 Selden's Reports, page 68:

The certificate of the board of canvassers may be conclusive of the election of an officer in a controversy arising collaterally, or between the party holding it and a stranger. But between the people and the party in an action to impeach it, it is only prima facie evidence of the right. It is the will of the electors and not the certificate which gives the right to the office.

So again in 33 New York Reports; I will read from page 606, the case of Hadley vs. The Mayor. It was a case of a policeman suing for salary. In other words, it was an action in which the question arose, as it arises here, collaterally; it did not arise by quo warranto; it did not arise by certiorari; it did not arise by contest; it arose as here:

The second exception was to the decision by which the court excluded the inspector's returns. The object, I suppose, was to show that the returns elected Mr. Quackenbush and not Mr. Perry. But the law having committed to the common council the duty of canvassing the returns and determining the result of the election from them, and the council having performed that duty and made a determination, the question as to the effect of the returns was not open for a determination by a jury in an action in which the title of the officer came up collaterally. If the question had arisen upon an action in the nature of a quo warranto information, the evidence would have been competent. But it would be intolerable to allow a party affected by the acts of a person claiming to be an officer to go behind the official determination to prove that such official determination arose out of mistake or fraud.

So also in Dutcher's Reports, New Jersey, page 355, the case of The State vs. The Clerk of the County of Passaic:

A quo warranto is the legal and usual mode in which title to office may be tried and finally adjudicated.

The determination of the board of county canvassers has no such final effect as to interfere with a full investigation of the result of an election upon a writ of quo warranto.

Again, on page 356:

In the present instance, the writ appears to have been designed as ancillary to the application for a mandamus, in order to bring before the court the decision of the board of county canvassers and the evidence upon which it was founded. That application having been denied, and the office having been filled, a decision upon the validity of the proceedings of the board would be nugatory. It would neither vacate the commission which has been issued nor avail the plaintiff in any subsequent proceedings which may be instituted to determine his rights. If the determination of the board of county canvassers partakes at all of the character of a judicial act, it certainly has no such final or conclusive effect as to interfere with the full and free investigation of the legal result of the election upon a writ of quo warranto.

So in Minnesota, in the fifteenth volume of Minnesota Reports, page 455, the decision of a court, one of the judges of which is now a member of the United States Senate, (Mr. McMillan.) State of Minnesota ex rel. R. A. Briggs vs. O. A. Churchill, auditor, &c.:

Under the laws of this State the result of the canvass by a board of county canvassers is a decision and determination of the election of the persons whom they declare to be elected.

The abstract of the canvass of the votes in the form prescribed in the statute is the authentic and official evidence of the canvass by the board by which the county auditor is to be governed in issuing the certificates of election.

When a certificate of election is issued and delivered by the auditor to a person declared to be elected to a county office, in accordance with the official canvass, regular upon its face, the certificate is conclusive evidence of the right of the person holding it to the office to which it shows him to have been elected, except in a proceeding where this right is directly in issue. To go behind a certificate thus issued and determine the correctness of the canvass involves the determination of the right of the holder of the certificate to the office; this cannot be done upon mandamus.

And so in three cases in the twenty-fifth volume of the Louisiana Reports. Certainly whatever authority this volume may have, whatever respect or want of respect may be shown to it, it is not for those who have sustained before this tribunal the acts of the State government of which the authors of this volume are part and parcel, to challenge the decision made by the court of which Mr. Ludeling was chief-justice. In The State vs. Wharton, page 3, they say :

Where two sets of officers claim to be the legal board of returning-officers, it is difficult to conceive why this is not a judicial question.

In Collins vs. Knoblock and others, page 263, they say :

The adjustment and compilation of election-returns, determining the number of legal and illegal votes cast for each candidate, declaring the result of an election and furnishing the successful candidate with the proper certificate, in short superintending and controlling all the details of an election, belong properly to the political department of the government.

In The State on the relation of Bonner vs. Lynch, page 267, they say :

The defendant having been returned by the legal returning-board of the State as elected judge of the fourth district court of New Orleans, and upon that return the acting governor having issued a commission to him according to law, it cannot be said that one holding an office under such a commission has intruded into or unlawfully holds the office.

In the twentieth volume of Vermont Reports, page 473, in the case of Overseer of the poor of Norwich vs. Halsey J. Yarrington, the court say :

When a person acting as justice of the peace holds a commission for that office from the governor, under the seal of the State, the court will not go behind that commission to inquire whether he had been duly appointed to that office by the general assembly of the State or not.

So in three cases in the State of Ohio.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. That was not in a proceeding directly against him to invalidate the act.

Mr. HOADLY. Of course if it had been a quo warranto, a certiorari, or a contest, the question would have arisen judicially and properly; but it was not. It was a complaint in bastardy, where the woman for the space of thirty days had neglected to charge the putative father, and a controversy thereupon arose.

So in three cases in the State of Ohio, in which it was decided by the supreme court of that State each time that a proceeding to try a title to an office was a judicial proceeding. In one of these cases the supreme judicial court of the State of Ohio were called upon to pass upon one of the most important questions that ever arose in the State. It had been held in the county of Wayne that John K. McBride was elected probate judge of the county of Wayne by reason of the decision that the law allowing the soldiers in the field, out of the State of Ohio, to vote, was not in conformity with the constitution of the State of Ohio; and the cause was taken by writ of error to the supreme court of Ohio. The first question that court was called upon to decide was whether this was a judicial question which could be removed by petition in error, in accordance with our forms of practice, to that court; and the court decided that it was—that a proceeding to contest the election of John K. McBride was a judicial proceeding, and the commission having been delivered to him, the decision and ascertainment of who was the duly-elected probate judge of the county of Wayne was a judicial determination and decision in that cause. To the same effect is the case of The State vs. The Commissioners of Marion County, (14 Ohio State Reports, 578,) and the case of Powers vs. Reed and others, (19 Ohio State Reports, 205, 206,) in which the question that arose was whether the declaration of the result of an election, upon which depended the change of the county-seat of Wood County from Bowling Green to Perrysburgh, or from Perrysburgh to Bowling Green, was a judicial determination, and it was argued before the supreme court of Ohio, as your honors will find by reference to that case, by one of the first lawyers in the Western States, a gentleman who had filled the highest places in the judicial department of the State of Ohio—I mean Judge Ranney—and whose abilities are equal to the positions he has held, that that question was a political question and not a judicial question. But his argument was overruled by the unanimous opinion of the court.

So in the case of Morgan vs. Quackenbush, which was cited to us the other day—I will read a passage or two—decided by Mr. Justice Ira Harris. I will read from page 72 of 22 Barbour:

The certificate of a board of canvassers is evidence of the person upon whom the office has been conferred. Upon all questions arising collaterally, or between a party holding a certificate and a stranger, it is conclusive evidence; but in a proceeding to try the right to office, it is only prima facie evidence.

If the certificate of the canvassers declaring Mr. Perry elected vested him with colorable title to the office, as I think it did, so that he had a right to enter upon the discharge of its duties, another effect of that decision was to exclude the defendant, Quackenbush, as well as everybody else, from the office. They could not hold as tenants in common, each having a legal right to perform its functions. If Mr. Perry became mayor de facto, the defendant Quackenbush, whatever his right, could not be mayor in fact at the same time.

My proposition is that E. A. Cronin became vested with the title and the office, if it may be called an office, at least with the right to discharge the trusts and functions of an elector, by the certificate of the governor of Oregon, attested by the secretary of state under the great seal of the State, and that this made him de facto elector, so that the office could not be held at the same time as tenant in common or otherwise by John W. Watts. He was the incumbent; and the only reply that I care to make to the argument which is founded on the statute of Oregon with regard to vacancies is, that the statute relates to and authorizes an incumbent to resign and does not authorize a claimant to resign, even though he be claiming de jure against an incumbent de facto holding. I am not now alluding to the statute of Oregon with regard to the election of electors, but to the statute in regard to filling vacancies in State offices. That I do not think your honors will find has any reference to this case at all under any circumstances.

Again, in Coolidge vs. Brigham, 1 Allen, 335, Chief-Justice Bigelow, pronouncing the opinion of the whole court, said:

The magistrate before whom the action was originally brought was an officer de facto. He was not a mere usurper, undertaking to exercise the duties of an office to which he had no color of title. He had an apparent right to the office. He had a commission under the great seal of the State, bearing the signature of the governor, with his certificate thereon, that the oaths of office had been duly administered, and in all respects appearing to have been issued with the formalities required by the constitution and laws of the commonwealth. He was thus invested with the apparent muniments of full title to the office. Although he might not have been an officer de jure, that is, legally appointed and entitled to hold and enjoy the office by a right which could not on due proceedings being had be impeached or invalidated, he was nevertheless in possession, under a commission prima facie regular and legal, and performing the functions of the office under a color and show of right. This made him a justice of the peace de facto.

So your honors will find, unless something can be discovered by more diligent search than I have made, and I have been very diligent, that when a man holds a certificate or a commission, whichever may be the ordinary evidence of title, and enters upon the possession of the office, he is an officer de facto, the office is full, there can be no other officer de facto. His title can only be impeached judicially. It may be taken from him by quo warranto; it may be taken by certiorari; it may be taken from him by proceedings to contest his election; but in the absence of these three methods of proceeding his title is perfect against all the world. Where is the quo warranto against E. A. Cronin? It may be said that there was a very short time in which to try it. No shorter, your honors, than was given in the case of Florida. Where is the certiorari? Where was the proceeding to contest? Here comes E. A. Cronin with the certificate of election under the great seal of Oregon, signed by the secretary of state, signed by the governor, and no judicial proceeding to impeach it. Is this tribunal a judicial tribunal? And were it a judicial tribunal, long ago the frauds that were offered to be proven to your honors in the case of Louisiana would have been heard and redressed. Were this a judicial tribunal, long ago the wrongs that were done in Florida would have been heard and redressed. But this is a legislative body, or part of a legislative body—delegates from the legislative body of the United States—without power to exercise any judicial function whatever. You cannot try upon quo warranto; you cannot try upon certiorari; you cannot consider as upon proceedings to contest elections. The judicial power of the United States has been confided to the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the inferior courts; and this is not the Supreme Court of the United States nor any other court, inferior or otherwise.

If it be thought that my argument is inconsistent with what has been argued by others in the cases of Florida and Louisiana, I have to reply that it is consistent with perfect respect to the decisions of this tribunal. It is not for counsel to exhibit such disrespect to this tribunal as to attempt to overrule or overthrow its decisions. The object of this argument is to enforce the decisions of this tribunal and cause their application to the State of Oregon in such way that the decisions made in Florida and Louisiana shall not have the effect to reverse the judgment which the people of the United States on the 7th of November last pronounced. Your determination, which I have the right to cite as authority, written in your decisions, pronounced as the result of your conscientious examination, is here higher authority than any expression of persuasive opinion, however cogent, that I might quote from the decisions of courts, however respectable; and therefore I commend it to this tribunal as final and conclusive evidence of the principles and rules of action which this tribunal ought to adhere to and apply in this case.

But, if otherwise, I submit that, upon the merits of this controversy, waiving for the present the propositions I have made, your honors are required to decide in favor of the Cronin vote. Here I desire to call your honors' attention to two propositions: First, that the papers inclosed with the certificate No. 1 are of no value as evidence by being in that certificate or otherwise unless they are shown to be duly authenticated in conformity with the laws of Oregon. I read from section 78 of Freeman on Judgments:

Nothing can be made a matter of record by calling it by that name, nor by inserting it among the proper matters of record.

And from 27 Connecticut Reports, Nichols vs. City of Bridgeport. This is not on my brief. The question was only called to my attention by hearing the debate of the objectors to certificate No. 2.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. The point you are making now is on your brief?

Mr. HOADLY. It is not. I did not know what was contained in certificate No. 1 until this afternoon. I read from 27 Connecticut, page 465:

Between the reservation of the case and the term to which it had been continued to await our advice, it is obvious that there were no proceedings in the superior court, and that whatever proceedings took place in the case were in this court, and consequently that there were no proceedings, excepting the continuance of it, which it was the duty or province of the clerk of the superior court, or which it would have been proper for him to record as a part of the doings of that court; and, plainly, it is only of the doings of that court that the plaintiff in error can complain on this writ of error. Such being the case, the reservation by that court cannot properly be regarded as a part of its record, notwithstanding it has been inserted, as if it were a part of it, by the clerk, or certified by him to be such; for if it is not, in its nature, a proper method of record in the case, it cannot be made such by the mere circumstance that it has been so inserted or attested. He cannot make it a record, if, from its qualities, it is not so, either by treating it as such or calling it by that name.

And, secondly, a canvass is not even prima facie evidence of eligibility, as held by the court of appeals of Kentucky in Patterson vs. Miller, &c., 2 Mete., Ky., 497:

The certificate which the examining-board issues to a candidate that he is elected to the office of sheriff—although conclusive evidence that he was elected thereto, unless his election be contested before the proper board—is not even prima facie evidence that he was eligible to the office.

In the next place, the question arises, going behind these matters and going to what, if evidence were received, might be called the merits of the controversy, the question arises, what is the law of Oregon—not the general American public law, but the law of Oregon with regard to the election of electors under circumstances like the present? It has been argued and seriously claimed that the governor of Oregon had no right to pass upon the eligibility of electors; that he was bound to see the Constitution of the United States violated; that he was imbecile, without power. My friends seem to deal, as their stock in trade, in want of power, imbecility. It was the imbecility of this tribunal, according to their argument, which prevented the examination of the truth of the fact with regard to Florida and Louisiana, and now it is the imbecility of the governor of Oregon which will enable this tribunal to lend its aid to a violation of the Constitution of the United States, although the governor refused to be a partaker in that wrong. Let us see.

It is admitted that the law of Indiana is that where there is an ineligible elector, the governor not only may but must take cognizance of the fact and refuse the commission. It is admitted that this is the law of Indiana; that the governor not only may but must recall a commission once issued when the evidence of ineligibility growing out of a constitutional disqualification is presented. If it be law in Indiana, why is it not law in Oregon? It is law in Arkansas; it is law in Missouri; it is law in Rhode Island; it is law in Massachusetts; it is law in Oregon; and the authority for the statement is the solemn adjudication of the supreme court of each one of these States; in all but two, of the court, judicially speaking, in a controversy between parties; in two, speaking in obedience to the constitution and laws of the State in answer to a demand by the governor for judicial information. It is the law of Arkansas; so held in two cases in the first volume of Arkansas reports, (Pike's Reports,) and one of those cases is that which Senator Kelly began to read this afternoon, page 21, Taylor vs. The Governor, which was a case where, by the law of Arkansas, a defaulter in office was disqualified. There it was held by the supreme court of that State that the governor had a right to take notice of the disqualification and withhold the commission, and not only that he had the right to do it, but that it was his duty to do it. In the same volume, in a later case, the exact proposition now under discussion was at great length considered. I refer to the case of Hawkins vs. The Governor, pages 570 to 595. There it is said:

Again, the executive is bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed; and he has taken an oath of office to support the constitution. How can he perform this duty if he has no discretion left him in regard to granting commissions? For should the legislature appoint a person constitutionally ineligible to hold any office of profit or trust, would the executive be bound to commission him? and that, too, when his ineligibility was clearly and positively proven? In such case the exercise of his discretion must be admitted, or you make him, not the guardian, but the violator of the Constitution. What, then, becomes of his oath of office?

Your honors, long, long ago, and by one of the greatest men who ever sat in judgment in the United States of America, a man whose word is law to-day, though the grass has been growing over his grave now for more than half a century, the law was thus laid down:

It is argued—

that the legislature can not give a construction to the constitution, cannot make laws repugnant to it. But every department of Government invested with certain constitutional powers must, in the first instance, but not exclusively, be the judge of its powers, or it could not act.

In accordance with the same principle, in the great case of Martin vs. Mott, 12 Wheaton, 29, the President of the United States was declared to be the final and conclusive judge whether a case of insurrection existed calling for the use of the military and naval forces of the United States for its suppression. So it will be found in the case of The State ex relatione Bartley vs. Fletcher, 39 Missouri, 388; and if your honors will refer to the case of The State vs. Vail, 53 Missouri, 97, which was cited this afternoon by Mr. Lawrence, you will find that the two cases can stand together. The case of The State vs. Vail does not overrule the Indiana case of Gulick vs. New, but cites it and distinguishes it. But let me read a passage from 53 Missouri to show that the case in Indiana is there cited and not disapproved:

But in the case in Indiana, it is conceded that where the candidate receiving the highest number of votes is ineligible by reason of a cause which the voters were not bound to know, such as nonage, want of naturalization, etc., the result is a failure to elect. * * * * * It is unnecessary to determine whether it would be the rule, in any case of disqualifications, whether patent or latent.

Now come back to the case of The State on the relation of Bartley vs. Fletcher, 39 Mo., 388. The opinion was pronounced by Mr. Justice Wagner. After reciting that it is by the constitution of the State made the duty of the governor to commission all officers not otherwise provided by law, that this is clearly an exercise of political power of a ministerial character, the court say:

The governor is bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and he has taken an oath to support the constitution. In the correct and legitimate performance of his duty he must inevitably have a discretion in regard to granting commissions; for should a person be elected or appointed who was constitutionally ineligible to hold any office of profit or trust, would the executive be bound to commission him when his ineligibility was clearly and positively proven? If he is denied the exercise of any discretion in such case, he is made the violator of the Constitution, not its guardian. Of what avail, then, is his oath of office? Or if he has positive and satisfactory evidence that no election has been held in a county, shall he be required to violate the law and issue a commission to a person not elected, because a clerk has certified to the election? In granting a commission the governor may go behind the ground that a constitutional prohibition is interposed. (Gulick vs. New, 14 Ind., 93.)

The issuing of a commission is an act by the executive in his political capacity, and is one of the means employed to enable him to execute the laws and carry on the appropriate functions of the State; and for the manner in which he executes this duty he is in nowise amenable to the judiciary. The court can no more interfere with executive discretion than the legislature or executive can with judicial discretion.

The granting of a commission by the executive is not a mere ministerial duty, but an official act imposed by the constitution, and is an investiture of authority in the person receiving it. We are of the opinion, therefore, that mandamus will not lie against the governor in a case like this.

So in the case in Maine, 7 Greenl., 497. In Maine, the language of the constitution is that a majority of the votes shall elect, and yet to the opinion which was read by Senator Kelly this afternoon declaring that by that constitutional provision a majority of votes for eligible candidates is meant are signed the honored names of Prentiss Mellen and Nathan Weston, with their associate, Albion K. Parris. Tell me that the opinion that votes for ineligible candidates are void stands upon no authority in America, when the name of one of the greatest judicial lights that ever illumined the sky of legal jurisprudence in New England and of another second only to him are signed to that opinion!

This opinion comes first to us from one of the signers of the Declaration of American Independence. The first judgment ever pronounced in the United States to the effect that a million of people voting for an ineligible candidate cannot defeat the mandate of the Constitution to elect, came from Samuel Chase, who long presided at the head of the judiciary of Maryland, and as a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, against whose temper much was said, but of whose judicial judgments there has passed into history no sound criticism whatever.

It has been said here this afternoon that a few insignificant opinions are to that effect. Yes, they are the insignificant opinions of Samuel Chase, and Prentiss Mellen, and Nathan Weston, and Albion K. Parris, and Samuel E. Perkins, who, for a score of years, has been a judge of the supreme court of Indiana, and now by the vote of the people last October has entered upon another term of six years. The judicial opinions of these men are those upon which this doctrine rests. The time may come when Justice, blind, deaf, and robbed of the rest of her powers, may be wafted into that Nirvana of intellectual inanition which the majority of the human race believe is reserved for that which is absolutely perfect when its earthly work is done. On that day the names of these great jurists and the recollection of the wise counsels they have left us will be forgotten among those who walk in the ways of American jurisprudence according to the traditions of the fathers, because on that day, but not sooner, a violation of the Constitution will become a municipal office.

But I was considering the question whether the governor had not furnished to us the final and conclusive evidence of the law of Oregon, and I had cited the case in Arkansas, the case in Missouri; I had not cited, but I do now refer your honors to the opinion of Mr. Justice Cooley, as stated in his work on Constitutional Limitations, page 41. I had cited the opinions of the judges of Maine, in the seventh volume of Greenleaf's Reports. I now ask your attention to the very recent action of the judges and executive of the State of Rhode Island, in the case of Corliss, which is precisely the action which was taken in the case of Cronin by the governor of Oregon. Had the governor of Oregon been invested by the constitution of Oregon with the right to call for the opinions of the judges, and upon that call received them, the action of Rhode Island and the action of Oregon would have been precisely parallel. In Rhode Island the governor was confronted by the fact that George H. Corliss was a centennial commissioner and that his name was on the roll of those receiving the highest number of votes for electors. Did he give him the certificate? Did he refuse the certificate? He refused. He called upon the judges of Rhode Island for their judgment and advice. I have furnished the law on this subject in my brief, and you will find, by reference to it, that the advice was given to him not as a judicial judgment, but as advice for the guidance of his executive action, and he acted. He called the legislature together. He did not give the certificate to Corliss; he withheld it from Corliss. He called the legislature together, and they elected Slater, who received the certificate by force of the election by the legislature. So in Oregon; Senator Kelly read you this afternoon the letter from the chief justice of Oregon, from which it appears that in the State of Oregon it has been judicially determined that the governor has a right, although a district attorney may be in office exercising the powers and discharging the duties of the office, to declare the office vacant, and, where the constitution has worked a vacation of the office by reason of the incompatibility of the two officers, to appoint a successor, and this action of the governor in Oregon, in the case of Gibbs vs. Bellinger, was sustained by the supreme court of Oregon. The opinion would have been pronounced and published in the reports long ago but for the death of the lamented Judge Thayer, by whom it was expected to be written.

So, I say that in Oregon as well as in Rhode Island, in Maine, in Arkansas, in Missouri, we are fortified in the opinion that the action of the governor in this case was proper, and that it was and is the action of the executive, conclusive and final as evidence to this court of what the law of Oregon is. Why, consider for one moment. Suppose the governor had given a certificate to Mr. Watts, notwithstanding his disqualification, would not that have been evidence that Mr. Watts was the elector? Would it not have been cited as evidence that the law of Oregon was that, notwithstanding the disqualification, Mr. Watts had a right to the certificate? Was not the governor called upon, compelled, to elect which horn of the dilemma, if it were such, he would choose; which view of the law at least he would take? Could he avoid it? He must say, by giving the certificate to Watts, "Notwithstanding the Constitution of the United States, and although the constitution of Oregon says that I am to maintain the laws, notwithstanding this man is disqualified by law, he shall have the certificate." What is the constitution of Oregon in this particular? Let me read the passage. Section 10, article 5, of the executive department, says, that "he" (the governor) "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." And he is sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and of Oregon; yet it is said that he, bound to see that the laws were faithfully executed and to maintain the Constitution of the United States, violated his duty in not giving to one disqualified by the Constitution of the United States a certificate of election!

In the next place there was no vacancy into which Watts could be elected. First, there was an officer, if it may be called such, an elector holding office de facto, and I refer to the case read the other day by the learned senior counsel on the other side from the eleventh volume of Sergeant and Rawle. I refer to the passages which were read by him to show that when there is in office an officer de facto he completes the whole circumference of the office and occupies it all, and that there can be no vacancy and can be no intrusion upon him while he occupies, otherwise than by the action of a court of justice acting judicially.

Also, there was no vacancy, for the reason that by the laws of the United States contemplation is made of two contingencies, namely, a failure to elect, and a vacancy when the electors meet; and this was the first of these two cases. Upon this subject I have already been heard in the Florida case by the Commission.

My learned friend, if he will allow me to call him such, [Mr. Evarts,] informed us the other day that there is no choice; we have to say office filled or office vacant; there is no tertium quid, no via media in which our footsteps may be safely directed. But such is not the law of the Senate of the United States as held in this chamber. I say that the Senate of the United States, from the foundation of the Government, has never deviated from the rule that the office of Senator cannot be filled by the appointment of the governor of a State when the legislature has failed to elect an incumbent during its session, as is shown by Lanman's case. Clarke & Hall, 871.

But I am told that the House decided otherwise. Ay, the House did decide, and if my friend [Mr. Matthews] had not stopped with his reading of history just where he did, you would have learned all that the House decided in the case to which he referred. I do not consider the decision of a partisan House in times of hot party politics as of much value, and I certainly do not count the decision which was reached by 118 yeas against 101 nays on the 3d day of October, 1837, giving to Claiborne and Gholson their seats as Representatives from the State of Mississippi, as authority when I find that in the list of negative votes are inscribed the names of John Quincy Adams and Millard Fillmore, of John Sergeant and Richard Fletcher, of John Bell and Thomas Corwin, of Caleb Cushing and R. M. T. Hunter, of Henry A. Wise and George Evans, of Elisha Whittlesey and James Harlan and Thomas M. T. McKennan. That is a roll of names before which I bow as possessing greater authority than the whole list of the 118 who voted in the affirmative. But the record of the House does not stop there. On Monday, the 5th day of February, 1838, (page 160 of the sixth volume of the Congressional Globe,) on motion of John Bell, of Tennessee, by a vote of 121 yeas to 113 nays, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the resolution of this House of the 3d of October last declaring that Samuel J. Gholson and John F. H. Claiborne were duly elected members of the Twenty-fifth Congress be rescinded, and that Messrs. Gholson and Claiborne are not duly elected members of the Twenty-fifth Congress.

First, on adopting this as an amendment, the yeas were 119, the nays 112, and, secondly, on adopting the resolution as thus amended, the yeas were 121, the nays 113. And this is "the sober second thought" of the House of Representatives of 1837 and 1838 on this question.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Is there not something peculiar in the conclusion respecting the filling of the office of a Senator by a governor, growing out of the language of the Constitution, that where a vacancy shall happen during the recess of the legislature the governor may fill it by a commission, which shall hold until the next meeting of the legislature? Does not that have some bearing upon the subject?

Mr. HOADLY. No doubt. I do not claim that all the cases are precisely parallel.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. What was the point decided in that case? Be good enough to state it.

Mr. HOADLY. The point was that neither Claiborne and Gholson nor Prentiss and Ward were duly elected Representatives in the Twenty-fifth Congress.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. That was not the point decided; that was the fact.

Mr. HOADLY. The point decided was that the resolution adopted on the 3d of October, to which reference was made the other day, awarding to Claiborne and Gholson their seats as members of the Twenty-fifth Congress, should be rescinded.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. My question was, what was the principle of law which was decided and for which you cited that case?

Mr. HOADLY. It is extremely difficult to answer that question. There may have been differences of opinion among those voting. I do not cite this case as authority, but it having been cited in authority against me the other day, I state the whole of the facts of the case in order that it shall not be vouched in any longer as authority upon the other side. Of course, there was a political controversy, and my own opinion is, if I may be allowed to state it, that the party feeling of the supporters of Mr. Van Buren and the antagonists of his administration had much more to do with the result than any judicial considerations whatever.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Was it not a case where an extra session was called and gentlemen from Mississippi were chosen before the general law permitted them to be chosen, on proclamation of the governor?

Mr. HOADLY. That was the case.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Allow me to interrupt a moment. I would ask you whether or not the resolution of the House of Representatives admitting Claiborne and Gholson to the extra session was not that there was a vacancy in the representation of Mississippi in the House of Representatives in consequence of the expiration of the terms of the previous members of Congress, and the fact that the election for the members of the next Congress did not occur until the following November, and did not the governor of Mississippi cause that vacancy to be filled by a proclamation, in which he called upon the electors to elect Representatives to fill that vacancy? Was not the resolution admitting them as members of the Congress rescinded at the regular session because they were elected only to fill a vacancy?

Mr. HOADLY. I will answer by saying that the whole statement is correct except the "because." It was rescinded. Now, rescinding means withdrawing the original proposition, and that is the language used. It was not by virtue of a vote that, the vacancy having expired or the time having expired, therefore they were no longer members. But Mr. Bell's amendment was that the original resolution should be rescinded.

This reminds me of another matter which I had almost forgotten, and that is that my friends may possibly cite against me the decision of the United States House of Representatives in what is known as the "broad-seal case" from New Jersey, a debate in which the learned President of this Commission participated as a member of the House. My answer to that, if it be cited against me, will be that it was before a House who were the judges of the returns and qualifications of their own members; and a reference to Cooley, page 133, will show that this is a judicial power expressly conferred upon the House.

This reminds me also of a case famous in the annals of Ohio, and which ought to be famous in the annals of the Federal Union, where a question once arose between the certificate of the returning-officer and the abstract of the votes, in which the judgment arrived at was most conspicuous and most beneficent. In the year 1848 the clerk of the court of common pleas of the county in which I live, who, by law, was the returning-officer, certified under the seal of the county that George E. Pugh, Alexander Long, and their associates were elected representatives to the legislature of Ohio; and the abstract of votes, of which a certified copy was taken, by Oliver M. Spencer and George W. Runyan, showed that they had a majority of the votes cast. The question was upon the constitutionality of the act of the legislature of Ohio dividing the county of Hamilton for the purposes of representation in the State legislature. For thirty days the State of Ohio was without a legislature, in anarchy and confusion, with two conflicting parties contending for pre-eminence; and at the end of thirty days, two gentlemen, still living, honored citizens of Ohio, men of neither the whig nor the democratic party, took the responsibility of judging that the certificate of the clerk was the official evidence of the title, and upon it organized that legislature.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Let me ask you there whether or not both sides were not excluded until after the organization?

Mr. HOADLY. That may be; but the organization——

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. Commissioner Payne can answer, probably.

Mr. HOADLY. I accept your statement, as you were one of the authors of the illustrious act to which I allude, a partaker of its honors and of its responsibilities; and among the many reasons for which the people of Ohio have to be thankful that you have lived, this is the most conspicuous.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I hope not.

Mr. HOADLY. I will take your statement. At least the abstract did not secure the seats. What did that act result in? As its first result it made it possible for the black man, who before that time had been an alien and a vagabond in Ohio, to live on its soil a citizen of the State. It made it, in the second place, possible for him to be heard in a court of justice as a witness against a white man. In the third place, it made Salmon P. Chase Senator of the United States from the State of Ohio, to begin that illustrious career which ended in the chief-justice-ship of the Supreme Court of the United States, in which he died. Every man in Ohio who joined in this act has been honored by the people of the State. George E. Pugh became attorney-general and senator; Salmon P. Chase twice governor by the votes of his then opponents. I think, as a citizen of Ohio, I have no reason to be ashamed of the doctrine that the broad seal of the county of Hamilton is better evidence of title to office, even though the clerk in issuing it determine against the constitutionality of a statute, than the abstract of votes copied and certified to by him.

There was no vacancy in the office in Oregon; I come back to that. A vacancy may exist in Oregon when "occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise." My learned friend, Mr. Lawrence, says the word "otherwise" means every other possible manner whatsoever. It is a cardinal rule in the interpretation of statutes that every word must have its force, and that words will not be treated as superfluous; and yet, by this argument, the learned gentleman has eliminated all these words, including the word "otherwise," from the statute. He defines the word "otherwise" so that it might as well be obliterated in fact from the law in which it is written.

And if there shall be any vacancy in the office of elector occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise—

This means that there are some vacancies which the electors present may not proceed to fill. It is not "if there shall be any vacancy in the office of elector, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill it," but it is "if there shall be any vacancy occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise." This is the class of vacancies they may fill; not every vacancy. If it had been every vacancy they might fill, then the words, "occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise," would have been omitted. In order that these words may have their proper force, the word "otherwise" must be construed in its ordinary and normal legal signification, "of other like manner;" noscitur a sociis is the rule. General words are restrained by the fitness of things. We have in the statutes of Ohio a law by which a railroad company may acquire and convey at pleasure all real or personal estate necessary or proper; and yet the supreme court of Ohio, in 10 Ohio State Reports, the case of Coe vs. The Columbus, Piqua and Indiana Railroad Company, have said that although the language of the statute is general, and they may convey any real estate necessary and proper to be acquired by them, yet they cannot convey one foot of the land which is pledged to the maintenance of the public uses for which they are established. They cannot convey the track; they cannot convey the right of way except by mortgage; and that is because the general words are restrained by the fitness of the subject-matter.

"Occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise," does not mean "occasioned by every possible circumstance on earth." If it did the law would have said so. It means "occasioned by these methods," and not occasioned otherwise except by these methods or the like unto them, in like manner; death—

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Death or something like death.

Mr. HOADLY. Death, or something which comes within the chain of thought which connects these three enumerated classes, consisting of occurrences happening after election. The act of Congress makes the distinction. It says if there is a failure to elect, the legislature may decide what provision shall be made. If there is a vacancy when the college meets, the legislature may provide for it. These are all cases of vacancy occurring after the event of the election, and do not contemplate a vacancy which occurs by reason of what I should call the non-filling of the office occasioned by reason of there being a non-election.

Suppose there had been a tie vote. Is that "otherwise"? Does non-election by a tie vote create a vacancy within the meaning of that statute? That tests the question. I say not. Why not? Because "occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise" are words that cannot be dispensed with, and necessarily involve the conclusion that there are some methods of occasioning vacancy which are not within the statute. It would have said "if there be any vacancy the electors present may fill it" had it been supposed these words would be interpreted as now claimed. A tie vote involves a vacancy or what may be called by way of courtesy a vacancy. It is a failure to elect, which is not contemplated by this statute, and not provided for by this statute, and that was the case in the State of Rhode Island of Corliss or might have been. It was alluded to in the decision of the State of Rhode Island. Your honors will find, by referring to the brief which we have on file, a large number of cases in which the same principle is upheld.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. What do you make of the words "refusal to act"?

Mr. HOADLY. An elector who has been elected and refuses to act creates a vacancy. I consider the word "otherwise" to refer to cases which occur after there has been a complete election, just as section 133 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides. These are all cases coming within this section.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. You do not think it necessary that he should have accepted or entered on the duties of the office?

Mr. HOADLY. The words "refusal to act" avoid that difficulty. If it were not for those words and the power of the legislature to provide in that way, I think the rule would have been otherwise. But where there is an elector in office de facto, as Cronin was, another party cannot make a vacancy by refusing to act. The ordinary rule is that in order that a party may resign he must be an incumbent. So Cockburn, chief-justice, in The Queen vs. Blizzard, Law Reports, 2 Q. B., 55, held; so Sawyer, chief-justice, now judge of the United States circuit court, held, in People vs. Tilton, 37 California, 617; so it was held in Miller vs. The Supervisor of Sacramento County, 25 California, 93; so in Commonwealth ex. rel. Broom v. Hanley, 9 Pennsylvania State Reports, 513. And it is held in an opinion, which I will hand to your honors, received to-day by mail, of the supreme court of Missouri, a case printed in the Central Law Journal of Saint Louis, vol. 4, No. 7, on Friday last, page 156, (in accord with the views to which I have alluded,) that the office had been once filled, and therefore there was a vacancy; as they cite with approval the case of The State vs. Lusk, 18 Missouri, 333, to the effect that if the office had not been filled by the qualification of the officer before his death, there would have been no vacancy.

I come to consider the remaining question in the case. I say that by Oregon law, as shown by the certificate of the governor who was obliged to act, as well as by the better opinion, the weight of authority, if not the number of cases in the United States, the mandate to elect is of such paramount authority that the people may not disobey it by voting for a disqualified candidate. My friends on the other side, in order to maintain their proposition, must not only stand upon a violation of the Constitution of the United States by the election of a disqualified person; they must also contend that a plurality may violate the Constitution and prevent an election. That is their proposition; and by making their candidate, Watts, an officer de facto who did not hold the certificate de facto, they thus manufacture this violation of the Constitution of the United States by a plurality into a muniment of title to office.

We have several things to consider here: First, the Constitution of the United States says, "thou shalt elect," to the people of Oregon. If I may, without irreverence, borrow the simile, the first great commandment of the gospel of American liberty is, "thou shalt elect," and the second is, "thou shalt not elect a disqualified candidate." The plurality may elect; and if the plurality may elect, and electing a disqualified candidate defeats an election, then the plurality may defeat an election. What is more than this, it is perfectly easy for more than three candidates each to receive a majority of votes in the State of Oregon. I will take the liberty to ask your honors' attention to a supposition which fairly illustrates the principle we are considering. Thus we may suppose that in the State of Oregon, where there were three electors to be chosen, 20,000 votes may be cast, divided among six candidates: A, B, and C receive each 9,800 votes; D, E, and F receive 9,700 votes. The remaining 500 votes may be thus distributed: To A, B, and D, 200 votes; to A, C, and D, 200 votes; to B, C, and D, 100 votes. The result will be: For A, 10,200; for B, 10,100; for C, 10,100; and for D, 10,200. Supposing, now, that A were disqualified by holding a Federal office, who would be elected, and which rule ought to be adopted? That which rejects A as disqualified, and B and C as not elected, by reason of the votes for them having resulted in a tie, and only D elected; or that which rejects A as disqualified and returns B, C, and D as elected?

This is not very likely to happen at this time, when electors are mere automata to register the wishes of their constituents; but when there shall be three parties again, if that may ever be, and that shall happen which happened in Pennsylvania, that two of them coalesce on the same list of electors, with the intention of dividing the votes of the electors according to the heads of the tickets, as was proposed to be done in Pennsylvania in 1856, this might very easily happen; and yet, according to the proposition of my friends on the other side, the result would be that the man having the highest number of votes was elected though disqualified. Now, the principle, to govern us, must be consistent: First, with the constitutional mandate that the States shall appoint. That is the mandate of the Federal Constitution; it is the mandate of the Revised Statutes; it is the mandate of Oregon. Secondly, with the constitutional inhibition that no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed. Thirdly, with the rule that a majority vote is not necessary, but a plurality suffices for election. Fourthly, with the possibility to which I have just addressed my attention. And, fifthly, with the fact that upon the views of their work entertained by those who made the Constitution, the candidates for electors do not run, like rivals for the office of sheriff, against each other, but the choice is made by selection of the successful candidates out of the whole list of those named in that connection.

I have referred your honors to the decision in Maine. It so happens that in the State of Maine that opinion of Chief-Justice Mellen, Chief-Justice Weston, and Judge Parris became crystallized by the legislative department of the State as one of the laws of the State as early as 1840, and has remained the law of the State of Maine until now, and my brief refers your honors to this law of the State of Maine by which ballots cast for ineligible persons are not to be counted. It is only in ignorance of this opinion and this legislation that Spear vs. Robinson, 29 Maine, 531, (a decision really directly in favor of my proposition,) and the opinion of the judges, 38 Maine, 597, (which does not touch the point,) have ever been cited against it.

It is the law of the State of Massachusetts, God bless her. I have here a book printed by the authority of the State of Massachusetts, being reports of election cases in Massachusetts. This book came from the legislature of Massachusetts, and in it is a decision in 1849 by a committee, approved by the vote of her legislature. This book was compiled by Judge Luther S. Cushing and his associates, by direction of the legislature, and printed by the State for the information of her people and people beyond her borders, in which it is stated as the law of Massachusetts that—

There is no reason why a person who votes for an ineligible candidate should not be put upon the same footing with one who does not vote at all as in both cases the parties show a disposition to prevent an election, and both of them show an unwillingness to perform their duty by aiding to promote those elections which are absolutely essential to the existence of the government; for if every voter refrained wholly from voting, or voted for an ineligible candidate, the result would be the same, no choice; and although it is true that no penalty is attached by law to a neglect of this obligation of voting, yet the obligation is not the less plain for that, and the committee believe it to be a duty too important to be neglected and too sacred to be trifled with by voting for fictitious persons or ineligible candidates.

Maryland spoke in 1794, in the case of Hatcheson vs. Tilden & Bordley, 4 Harris & McHenry, 279; and in 1865 and 1866 the legislature of Maryland, acting once in their legislative capacity, and acting once in their judicial capacity, followed, in the cause of loyalty and of reconstruction upon loyal principles, the rule which Chief-Justice Samuel Chase laid down for their government. I have the house journal and documents of the State of Maryland for 1865, which have been kindly furnished me by a friend in Baltimore in order that I might present the original authorities to your honors. In the constitution of Maryland, as it was in 1865, was the following provision:

If any person has given any aid, comfort, countenance, or support to those engaged in armed hostility to the United States, or has, by any open deed or word, declared his adhesion to the cause of the enemies of the United States, or his desire for the triumph of said enemies of the United States, he is disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust, under the laws of this State.

Hart B. Holton, who had not a majority or plurality of the votes cast for senator of Howard County in 1865, contested the seat of Littleton Maclin, who had the majority of the legal votes of the voters of Howard County, and on the principles enunciated by Chief-Justice Chase, because of the disloyalty of Littleton Maclin, Hart B. Holton gained the seat and sat as a senator from that county. In 1866, before the house of delegates, acting judicially, George E. Gambrell contested the office of Sprigg Harwood, as clerk of the circuit court of Anne Arundel County, on the ground of constitutional ineligibility, caused by an increase in the profits of this clerkship, while Harwood was a senator from Anne Arundel County in 1865. The committee said that Harwood was ineligible, that it "must be presumed to have been known by every voter," that in a case like this it would be highly inexpedient to submit this matter to another election, and on their report the incumbent of the office was ousted and the contestant inducted into the office of clerk of Anne Arundel County.

So in the States of Missouri and Mississippi, by constitutional amendments, introduced and adopted for the purpose of securing the reconstruction of those States in accordance with the loyal sentiment which demanded the maintenance of the Federal Union at all hazards, it was provided that disloyalty should cause such disqualification that votes given for disloyal persons in Mississippi and Missouri should not be cast up or counted as ballots. This principle, springing from our revolutionary fathers and helping the great work of reconstruction, helping to secure the maintenance of the Federal Union and the principles of loyalty to the Federal Union, has so soon as this become so odious to those who maintained and espoused it so recently that by its rejection is to be elected a President of the United States! What is there to the contrary? Six, or eight, or ten obiter dicta, and that is the whole of it, and not one of them in conflict with the principle for which we contend. Why, your honors, the presumption omnia bene et rite esse præsumentur donec probetur in contrarium, sustains the action of the governor of Oregon until there shall be produced in evidence something to show that the governor of Oregon was not justified in the course which he took.

We are justified, then, in presuming—we need not the evidence which we offer—that the fact of disqualification existed, and was so notorious as to work the law of disqualification. Therefore, we are within the rule of Furman vs. Clute, in 50 New York, 451; therefore we are within the rule which has been adopted in the case of Commonwealth vs. Cluly in 56 Pennsylvania State Reports, 277; so that we are within the rule which was adopted in the obiter dicta to which I shall refer.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Did not the court in 50 New York hold also that every voter must know what the law was?

Mr. HOADLY. Precisely so; and it would be a fitting commentary upon the serious character of the suggestions which have been made in disparagement of the course taken by the governor of the State of Oregon if it should be held that his course was improper in consequence of the fact that the 15,000 people who voted for John W. Watts were presumably ignorant of the Constitution of the United States. Of a lurking statute hidden in the corners of a statute-book, like the statute that governed the disqualification of the supervisor of Schenectady, it may well be that the voters might be ignorant, but of a disqualification inherent in a constitutional provision which enables the State to appoint electors no man ought to say that he is ignorant. No man can be heard in any court of law in any such case to say, I submit, that he is “ignorant.”

Three times Indiana has promulgated the principle which I have suggested. It has been espoused by Judge Cushing in his book, sections 177, et seq.; it is espoused by Grant on Corporations, 208; it is the law of the English and Irish cases, all of which are referred to in the brief, that a man might as well vote for the man in the moon, or, as Governor Grover in his decision says, for Mount Hood, as to vote for a disqualified candidate knowingly; and what is there to the contrary? As I said, the Pennsylvania case concedes that a vote given with knowledge for an ineligible candidate cannot be counted. In the cases in California, in the first one, Malony vs. Whitman, 10 Cal., 38, the question did not require or receive decision, for the majority of the court found that the officer was not ineligible. In Saunders vs. Haynes, 13 Cal., 145, the other case, it is assumed that a majority of those voting by mistake of law or fact happened so to cast their vote. The case in Wisconsin (State vs. Giles, 1 Chandl., 112,) which has been considered the leading case on the other side, is as pure a piece of gratis dictum as ever was pronounced in a court in this country. After stating that the officer was not ineligible, the court go on to say:

Such being the opinion of the court, it is unnecessary to pass on the second question whether in the event of the person receiving the highest number of votes being ineligible, the person having the next highest number is elected.

Then, I will not say by the same force with which I address the pupils in my law-school, but by the same judicial authority that I have the right to express when I address students in a law-school, the court go on, having decided that it was not their duty to say anything about it, to expound the law, in order that on future occasions their successors may have the benefit of it, and in State vs. Smith, 14 Wisconsin, 497, their successors get the benefit of it, and adopt it without giving any reasons. Judge Lumpkin, in Georgia, State vs. Swearingen, 12 Geo., 23, followed the same wise example, deciding that no restriction of residence “was imposed on the voters of the young but rapidly growing town of Oglethorpe in their selection of a suitable person to fill the office of clerk and treasurer.” Having decided that there was no such ineligibility, he proceeded to lay down the law of the court obiter in these words:

Under no circumstances could we permit the informant to be installed into these appointments.

In Missouri the first case, State vs. Boal, in 46 Missouri, 528, is in accordance with the views which we maintain.

As regards the votes cast for the defendant, they were nugatory. It was as though no such votes had been cast at the election.

And the case of The State vs. Vail, 53 Mo., 97, does not withdraw this limitation, but simply confines it to cases of latent disqualification, saying:

It is unnecessary to determine whether it would be the rule in any case of qualifications, whether patent or latent.

The case in Tennessee, Pearce vs. Hawkins, 2 Swan, 87, decides that the votes are illegal and void, which is a case, as far as it goes, in our favor. The case in Michigan, People vs. Molitor, 23 Mich., 341, is disposed of by an admission in pleading; the court say the party admitted his case away in pleading. The case in 21 Louisiana Annual Reports, 289, Fish vs. Collins, decides, with modesty, I suppose, if there be such an article in the supreme court of that State, that it was unnecessary to express an opinion whether the votes cast for a person notoriously known to be ineligible should be rejected or not, as no such allegations were made in the petition. The cases in 18 and 20 Louisiana Annual Reports, 114, State vs. Gastinel, are to the same effect.

Whatever might have been his rights had he contested the election of the defendant in accordance with law, we are not called upon to say.

The case in Mississippi, Sublett vs. Bidwell, 47 Miss., 273, is nearest to a case in opposition to the principle for which I contend, of any in the United States. There it is said:

If the majority make choice of a candidate under some personal disability disqualifying him from taking and enjoying the office, the utmost that can be said of it is that there has been no election.

“Personal disability,” not the disability of the State to appoint, but personal disability applicable to the candidate.

In Rhode Island, as is shown by a letter from William Beach Lawrence, of which I have reprinted a large portion in my brief, the opinion on this proposition is purely obiter dictum, there having been a tie between the three highest democratic candidates for elector, and, therefore, the result which was reached by the governor, that there was no vacancy, a failure to elect being the necessary result, and not the result produced by the reasons given by the supreme court.

These are all the cases in the United States. I believe I have referred in my brief to every case within the borders of this land and of Great Britain, except one case in Coxe's Reports, page 318, The State vs. Anderson, which went off on the proposition that in certiorari there was a discretion, but the court would not exercise that discretion to displace a man who was disqualified, because it would leave the office vacant, and did not allude at all to the question whether there was any antagonist or whether his antagonist received any votes.

And if we look beyond the United States, and assume that the common law of England prevails in Oregon, there is nothing to the contrary of our view.

Now, testing by principle, I say Cronin was elected. Testing by method, would a quo warranto have run in favor of Watts? Would not the disqualification have killed his title? Could he by quo warranto or certiorari or contest have obtained the place? Cronin held it de facto; Watts was a postmaster disqualified. Test it now by the rules of method under laws similar to that which we have in Ohio and many of the States in which a quo warranto may be supported at the instance of the competing candidate, and pursued, not merely to the ousting of the incumbent, but to the induction of the man who ought to have been successful; and on what principle of law could John W. Watts, who did not hold this commission, have got from any court of justice in this land the title to which he now lays claim? Cronin held the title; Cronin cast the vote; Watts was not elector de facto, and it is a question whether he was de jure. Ask yourselves, learned judges, whether any one of you sitting in quo warranto would have awarded, as against the officer de facto, possession of the office to a man whom the Constitution of the country said should not hold it? On principle the mandate to elect was fulfilled by the election of Cronin. If Watts be called elected, the mandate to elect was disobeyed. If Watts be called elected, the mandate not to elect a disqualified person was disobeyed. Tested by method and by the rules which apply in courts of justice, tell me how any lawyer can say that a disqualified candidate can seize an office by any process known to the laws of our country out of the hands of one who holds it de facto, even although that one be not elected? He may have a judgment that the office is vacant; that is all he can have, and that is the end of the whole thing as far as he is concerned.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the commission: Into your hands, assisted by the enlightened labors of those who are to follow me in argument, I commit this cause. No cause was ever submitted more momentous in its issues or its consequences. It involves the question whether government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall be suspended in the Executive department of these United States for the next four years.

At the election in November last, Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks received for President and Vice-President of the United States a vast majority of the total popular vote, a majority of the legal popular vote in the States of Louisiana and Florida, and one certificated electoral vote in the State of Oregon. Your sense of duty has prevented your listening to the testimony which would have established their title to the electoral votes of Louisiana and Florida. This was because you possessed no judicial power whatever. Had you been endowed with any portion of the judicial power of the United States, there is no doubt, that, before this time, its exercise would have relieved the people of the United States from the serious apprehension of great danger, of danger that, for four weary years, the choice of the American people shall be frustrated, and a usurper sit in the seat of Washington and Jefferson, of Jackson and of Lincoln.

If you adhere to the principle which has thus far guided your action, this danger will be averted. Without the exercise of judicial power, you cannot deprive Tilden and Hendricks of their Oregon vote, or award it to Hayes and Wheeler.

You have been likened unto judges in Israel, and warned not to make your proceedings so intolerably inconvenient that the people should desire a king. The people, whose cause I represent, will never, never, never wish for a king; but I may remind the counsel that it was not because the action of their judges was inconvenient that the people of Israel desired a king, but because their judges "perverted judgment."

Conscript fathers of the American Republic, the flower and crown of the enlightened jurisprudence of pagan Rome were the two maxims, "Ubi jus, ibi remedium," "Suum cuique tribuito." May it be the happy fortune of our nation and of yourselves, as the expounders of its constitutional powers, not to lessen the force or diminish the universality of their application.

So shall Time, the corroder and consumer of all finite things, pass your work by untouched, and after generations, as they may meet with questions of disputed succession, shall point to and follow it, saying "Behold the great example of our fathers. In their ways will we walk, for they are the ways of righteous judgment and of peace;" and the arms of them who serve liberty in all the lands shall be strengthened, for they shall know that in monarchies questions of succession are resolved by the sword, in republics by justice.

So shall Art, which keeps in eternal remembrance the realities of things, still delineate Justice with bandaged eyes and open ears, and History shall not record that Justice here, at the expense of her hearing, regained her sight.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I move that the Commission adjourn to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow morning in the Supreme Court room.

The motion was agreed to; and (at nine o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Commission adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 22, 1877.

The Commission met at ten o'clock a. m., in the Supreme Court room, pursuant to adjournment, all the members being present.

The counsel representing the objections to the various Oregon certificates were present.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT. Counsel in opposition to certificate No. 2 will now be heard.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Mr. President and gentlemen, of the Commission, life is a series of surprises, and the succession of the arguments which has taken place before this Commission is no exception to, but rather an illustration of, that truth. When the case of Florida was opened by the learned counsel who is to conclude the argument in this, [Mr. Merrick,] he assumed and attacked as our position that the certificate of the governor of a State accompanying the list of electors was conclusive and could not be impeached, could not be set aside, could not be contradicted. And among the first words which I had the honor in reply to say in the presence of this honorable Commission, I was compelled to remove that misapprehension on the part of the adverse counsel, and to say that we held to no such doctrine; and in the course of argument I stated our proposition in this way:

But, Mr. President and gentlemen, if you go behind the certificate, what are you limited to by the necessity of the thing? In my judgment, you are limited to this: to an inquiry into what are the facts to which he should have certified and did not; not what are or may be the ultimate and final facts and right of the case. The facts to be certified by the governor in this or in any case are the public facts which by law remain and constitute a part of the record in the public offices and archives of the State, and of which, being governor for the time being, he has official knowledge.

We undertook to draw a line of demarkation in that instance, first, between the constitutional authority of the State in the making of the appointment, in the doing of all those things which constitute and verify the appointment, which complete it, which constitute a factum to be enrolled in the public offices of the State in perpetual memorial of the fact; and, on the other hand, the Federal authority which took the matter up from the point where the State left it, after it had been transferred by the State into the custody of Federal authority.

We undertook, also, to draw a line of distinction in another place; and that was between things and proofs, between the thing to be certified and the certificate which certified it; and we claimed then, as we have consistently done throughout, that the certificate of a thing was matter of form; the thing certified was the matter of substance; and that in every case where it could be alleged that the certificate was false, in that it did not conform to the thing to be certified, you might correct the certificate by showing the fact to be certified.

The statement of these propositions was made in the opening of the argument in the Florida case on our side. It was enlarged and amplified and demonstrated and applied by the learning and the eloquence of my colleagues who continued the further argument in that and the succeeding case of Louisiana; and under the guidance of their skillful and experienced hands in applying the sound constitutional principle out of which those manifest distinctions sprung, we were guided by a pilot as wise and successful as Palinurus himself between Scylla and Charybdis. It was therefore, Mr. President, somewhat of a surprise to find that the position which we had taken so much pains to make clear and to prove, now not only has been adopted by the gentlemen on the other side, but that, going beyond that, they have adopted the dogma which originally they improperly ascribed to us; and we hear for the first time in this continuous, although interrupted debate, the cry from our adversaries of the sanctity and impenetrability of the formal certificate of the governor. It is now claimed by the learned gentleman who spoke with so much ability in the Senate chamber last night [Mr. Hoadly] that the idea on which he founded the whole structure of his argument has passed into adjudication by the decision of this tribunal in the Louisiana case. The language of this tribunal upon that point is this:

And the Commission has by a majority of votes decided, and does hereby decide, that it is not competent, under the Constitution and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses, to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Louisiana on and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the returning-officers for elections in said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not.

So that the very ground on which we stood at the beginning is the ground which has been hallowed by this tribunal and is the ground on which we stand to-day; and that is, that it is the certificate of the governor which is based on and according to the determination and declaration of the appointment of electors by the returning-officers for elections in the said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, which is under the Constitution and laws of the United States the conclusive evidence of the persons who are entitled to cast the electoral vote of the State.

Mr. President, that is not the only surprise. In the case of Florida the attempt was made by the show and offer of proof to go behind the final action of the State in the appointment of electors by showing that the process had been erroneous, illegal, without jurisdiction, involving transgressions of law, and tainted by fraud. The same offer, though greatly exaggerated and enlarged, was made in the case of Louisiana; and it seemed as if the offers of their proof proposed by the gentlemen on the other side grew the stronger and larger just in proportion to the certainty which they had attained that they would not be put to the test of an attempt to make them good; and we were treated at the same time with exhibitions of virtuous indignation, which for one at least I was not expecting or prepared to witness in that quarter, of the enormity of sanctifying wrong and fraud; and the tribunal and the counsel and all who were engaged in the transaction were involved in one universal sentence of condemnation, as if, by establishing some legal principles in the course of a transaction which at least has the form of a judicial inquiry and professes to be governed by constitutional and legal principles, we were confessing the wrongs which we alleged it was incompetent for this tribunal to investigate.

I was reminded, Mr. President, by that of some remarks which bear the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States, and were delivered by Mr. Justice Field, in the case of Bradley vs. Fisher, in 13 Wallace, 348; where it was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that a civil action for damages would not lie against the judge of a superior court for anything done by him in his official capacity, although it was alleged in the petition to have been done corruptly, wantonly, and maliciously, to the injury of the plaintiff; and that learned judge, who delivered the opinion of the court, made these general remarks, which apply in the present controversy, wherein (quoting from an old authority in Coke as to the ground of that public policy, that it would tend to the scandal and subversion of all justice, and those who are the most sincere would not be free from continual calumnation) he says :

The truth of this latter observation is manifest to all persons having much experience with judicial proceedings in the superior courts. Controversies involving not merely great pecuniary interests, but the liberty and character of the parties, and consequently exciting the deepest feelings, are being constantly determined in those courts, in which there is great conflict in the evidence and great doubt as to the law which should govern their decision. It is this class of cases which impose upon the judge the severest labor, and often create in his mind a painful sense of responsibility. Yet it is precisely in this class of cases that the losing party feels most keenly the decision against him, and most readily accepts anything but the soundness of the decision in explanation of the action of the judge. Just in proportion to the strength of his convictions of the correctness of his own view of the case is he apt to complain of the judgment against him, and from complaints of the judgment to pass to the ascription of improper motives to the judge. When the controversy involves questions affecting large amounts of property or relates to a matter of general public concern, or touches the interests of numerous parties, the disappointment occasioned by an adverse decision often finds vent in imputations of this character, and from the imperfection of human nature this is hardly a subject of wonder. If civil actions could be maintained in such cases against the judge, because the losing party should see fit to allege in his complaint that the acts of the judge were done with partiality or maliciously or corruptly, the protection essential to judicial independence would be entirely swept away. Few persons sufficiently irritated to institute an action against a judge for his judicial acts would hesitate to ascribe any character to the acts which would be essential to the maintenance of the action.

In those cases the offer of proof, even in the form in which it was most offensive, went only to a certain point, to prove, it was alleged, fraud in that return and result which had been declared by the returning-board of the State, in order to penetrate below that, to the primary returns. But when, on the other hand, it was urged that when they were reached we should have occasion to retort with charges of fraud and oppression, and intimidation and cruelty, and arts and stratagems, the effect of which had been to falsify those primary election returns, there we were met with the argumentum ab inconvenienti, and no less a personage and lawyer than the distinguished advocate at that time in the case, from New York, Mr. O'Connor, in answer to the objection, said that when the inquiry took that range—when it came to involve questions of fraud on both sides—this tribunal, by virtue either of some judicial or parliamentary discretion, could stop the inquiry at the most convenient point; could stop the inquiry, I suppose, when they had heard one side, and refuse to hear the other.

No, Mr. President, I am not willing to let this last opportunity in all probability which I shall have to address this tribunal, pass without entering my solemn protest against the pretension to morality which by ascription has been made the foundation and substratum of this complaint. It is a morality which does not go very deep. It is, to say the most of it, not more than skin deep; for when the proposition is made to probe the wound to the bone, then it is said that you cannot go behind the record of the votes actually cast. It is a morality based upon the sanctity of votes actually cast, without reference to who cast them, how they were cast, whether the same man cast more than one, whether or not thousands upon thousands of honest and legitimate votes were not kept out and prevented from being actually cast by the frauds and violence of those who want their votes to be counted because they are cast and exclude those who wanted to cast them and were deprived of the opportunity.

Now, one of the things which are not a surprise is that, in spite of the changed circumstances of the case, we have an exhibition in this of precisely the same standard and gauge of morals. We have Cronin elevated upon a pedestal for public adoration by his inventor as the new statue of popular rights, freedom of elections, purity of the ballot-box, honest ballots, fair voting, and we are all called to fall down and worship him!

We have no offers in this case to prove any bribery, to show that he was paid $3,000, under pretense of his expenses to Washington City as messenger, made by contract notoriously before he flocked altogether by himself to make a college of himself. We have no offer to prove the various tricks, and devices, and stratagems, and the correspondence locked in what were supposed to be undecipherable hieroglyphics, to show that, so far from this being an attempt on the part of any of the parties implicated in it as actors or advisers to maintain constitutional doctrines and constitutional rights, it was a deep-laid and deliberate scheme to defraud and rob the people of Oregon of their just influence in the electoral college.

I wonder that my friend who spoke last night, when he was undertaking to cite to this tribunal the definition of what constituted a vacancy from Worcester and from Webster, did not disclose the little pocket dictionary which was made use of as the means of transmitting unintelligible hypocrisy between Gramercy Park and Salem, and let us see by the application of that cipher what it was he wished to have understood.

Mr. President, the argument made last evening in support of what for convenience' sake may be called the Cronin certificate by my learned friend Judge Hoadly is founded, in my judgment, upon two false assumptions, the proper understanding and recognition of which at once put an end to the whole mountain both of authority and reasoning by which he undertook to support his conclusions. The first of these false assumptions is this: that the Cronin certificate, the certificate of the governor of Oregon appended to the list of electors of which Cronin is one, was and is the authorized declaration of the result of the election by the proper legal canvassing officer of the State of Oregon. He could not claim less than that, for otherwise he was unable to bring his argument within the scope of the decision of this tribunal in the Louisiana case. He was therefore compelled to assume and argue that by the statutes of Oregon the governor of that State was authorized to make such a certificate as he has made, and that in law that document in its form and substance is the canvass of the election for electors, behind which this tribunal has decided that it constitutionally cannot go.

The next false assumption on which his argument is based is that this certificate is in the nature of a commission lawfully issued by the governor to an officer, and which it is necessary that he should have in order to be a warrant in law for the execution of the duties of his office. It is in respect to this second proposition that a large number of authorities was cited to show that, in cases where a governor has, by law or under the constitution of his State, an executive discretion in respect to the appointment and commissioning of officers, that discretion may be exercised by him in granting or withholding that commission for sufficient legal reasons, in which he cannot be controlled by the action of the judicial tribunals of the country by mandamus or quo warranto; and that therefore, in such cases, he is made the judge of the facts in respect to eligibility or otherwise, on which he may proceed in the execution and exercise of his official discretion, the whole of which immediately and peremptorily falls to the ground when it is once known and ascertained and declared, as the law is, that this certificate, even if it had been made in conformity with some law, which it is not, either of Congress or of the State of Oregon, was not intended and does not have the effect of constituting the warrant of these officers for the exercise of their official duties.

Now, let me examine the first of these two propositions in the light of the statutes and constitution of the State of Oregon, in order to ascertain what mode has been adopted by the legislature of the State of Oregon for the appointment of electors for that State. By section 58 (page 141 of the printed pamphlet) it is provided that—

On the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1864, and every four years thereafter, there shall be elected by the qualified electors of this State as many electors of President and Vice-President as this State may be entitled to elect of Senators and Representatives in Congress.

They are to be elected by the qualified electors of the State, by a popular election. Now, by the sixtieth section it is provided that—

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress.

There that proposition ends. We are to ascertain what constitutes the legal canvass for electors of Oregon, and in order to do that we are referred by this section to those steps which by law are provided to be taken in the canvass for the election of members of Congress. Now, we shall ascertain that by turning to the thirty-seventh section, on page 139, wherein it is provided:

The county clerk, immediately after making the abstract of the votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each of said abstracts, and transmit it by mail to the secretary of state, at the seat of government; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, State printer, justices of the supreme court, member of Congress, and district attorneys.

And there that proceeding ends, and there ends the declaration of the statute in reference to all the steps which are included in the canvass for members of Congress. When a canvass takes place, however, for member of Congress, after the canvass is concluded, it is then provided that—

The governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes, and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person.

But inasmuch as that constitutes no part of the canvass for members of Congress, it is not any part of the canvass for electors of the State. On the other hand, the original section, 60, to which I now recur, provides, instead of that:

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same.

But, mark you, that is no part of the canvass; it is a certification merely of the result of that canvass. The canvass is something distinct; the canvass is the determination, the declaration, the record of the facts of the election as they have been transmitted by the clerks of the various counties to the secretary of state, and by him are put into that form which shows who had the highest number of votes, and there entered of record in his office as a part of the public archives of the State for the benefit of whom it may concern; and, as was remarked, any man in the State, any citizen, has a right by law to go to the secretary of state, and, upon the tender of the payment of the lawful fees, demand from him a certificate of that record as of any other.

Now, then, we have arrived at the two things which are separate and distinct: the substantial thing, which consists of the showing made of record of the number of votes cast for each of the electors, showing who had the greatest number of votes, and that is the canvass; and it is not essential, it is no necessary part of that canvass, it is not made so by any law, that the secretary of state or anybody else should by any formal declaration or publication make manifest, more than it is by the inspection of the record, who has been in point of fact elected. There is no discretion in that matter; there is no room for any doubt; there is no possible uncertainty. The law and the constitution of the State of Oregon both unite in stamping upon that document and that record as it remains in the office of the secretary of state the legal, constitutional, and only possible result, namely, that the man appearing from that record to have the highest number of votes shall be deemed to be elected.

Then what have we here? On page 2, certificate No. 1, we have the very thing. It is not proof of the thing; it is an exhibition of the thing; and it is a production of it in court. We have made profert of the identical, substantial, and only real thing; and that is the canvass of the election. The secretary of state of Oregon, who is the custodian of the great seal of the State by virtue of his office, certifies:

That the foregoing tabulated statement is the result of the vote cast for presidential electors at a general election held in and for the State of Oregon on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, as opened and canvassed in the presence of his excellency L. F. Grover, governor of the said State, according to law, on the 4th day of December, A. D. 1876, at two o'clock p. m. of that day, by the secretary of state.

That is the res gestæ; that is the appointment by the State in the manner prescribed by the legislature thereof; that is the muniment of title; that is the constitutional and legal foundation of right. That it is which constitutes the investiture by the State upon the party of his official title, rank, and character. All else is mere certification; all else is mere proof, prima facie or conclusive as the law makes it in express terms, and not otherwise; and no scrap of law, no iota of a statute, no word has been quoted to give effect to any certification other than that which according to the principles of the common law belong to it. It is prima facie evidence; it is to be taken as true until, confronted with the fact, it is shown to be false, just as the exemplification of a recorded judgment is to be taken as true until on allegation of diminution or error or mistake, on certiorari, the court may order up the original and compare it with the alleged copy.

That this certificate provided in section 60 to be made by the secretary of state, containing lists of the names of the electors elected, has no other or greater effect than that I have ascribed to it, and is not in the nature of a warrant required by law to enable the parties named therein to proceed in the execution of their office, is apparent from the language of the statute and from the whole purview and meaning of the constitution and the laws.

Now, Mr. President, leaving the parties to stand upon that document, proven in that way, making manifest that fact, which by the constitution and laws of Oregon constitutes their appointment, is the very appointment to their office of electors, let us examine for a while its rival.

The certificate of the governor, No. 2, is a document which is intruded here in argument as a substitute for that canvass, under pretense of being that canvass. This certificate is a certificate of the governor. It is attested, to be sure, by the secretary of state, but only as a witness. It is not the certificate of the secretary of state; it is not the declaration of the canvassing officer. It conforms in no particular with any statutory requirements affecting the declaration of the result of the election. It, to be sure, purports to give the names of three persons with the number of votes received by each; but it does not state that they are the persons who had the highest number of votes cast at that election, and it interpolates a conclusion of law—at least that is an admissible inference from its face—incorporating the judgment of the governor upon a question of law, when, according to these statutes, if he did anything at all, he could only certify to the fact. And as to the functions of canvassing boards upon that matter, I beg to call the attention of the tribunal to a decision in the case of Newcum vs. Kirtley, in 13 Ben Monroe. I read from page 524, from a decision of Judge T. A. Marshall, of Kentucky, the point of which was that a canvass after an election had been made by the proper canvassing board wherein the facts shown were contradicted by the result declared, and the court held that the facts shown were to be taken as the authority, rejecting the incompetent and unwarranted and unauthorized declaration made by the canvassing officer inconsistent with the facts which he had certified to, saying:

And if the consequence stated be regarded as a decision—

That is, consequently entitling him to the certificate of election—

or a certificate that Kirtley is, on the ground of the majority stated, entitled to the office, it is unauthorized and illegal, because upon the facts found and stated by the board Kirtley had not a majority of the legal votes given, and his title could not be made out either by adding to his votes others not given or by taking from Newcum votes admitted to be legal and actually given for him. If the board had a right to do anything with the 2 votes not given, surely it was to have added them to the poll of Kirtley. But although this would have made a majority, it would not, as we have seen, have entitled Kirtley to the office. And they might just as well and with equal effect have made the majority in correcting the vote improperly set down for Newcum when it was given for Kirtley, by taking 2 from Newcum and adding 2 to Kirtley on that account, as to have made it as they have done, by subtracting 11 instead of 9 votes from Newcum, when from their own showing 9 only should have been subtracted. Or they might as well, after finding that Newcum had a majority of 1 of the legal votes given, have gone on to say, "and subtracting 2 legal votes from Newcum gives Kirtley a majority of 1 vote, consequently entitling him to the certificate of election." The subtraction of the 2 votes, for a reason not only insufficient but actually excluded by statute from all influence in the calculation, is just as illegal as the subtraction of them without any reason at all.

The case, then, as appearing upon the face of the document exhibited by Kirtley to establish his right to the office, is substantially this: that the board, finding that Newcum has a majority of 1 of all the legal votes given, illegally subtract from his poll 2 of the legal votes given for him, and thus produce an apparent majority of 1 vote for Kirtley; consequently, as they say, entitling him to the certificate. And the question is whether the court to which this document was presented as evidence of Kirtley's right to be sworn in as its clerk was bound by this argumentative conclusion, contradicted by the facts established by the document itself, and manifestly based upon an illegal and arbitrary calculation. We say that this conclusion is no more authoritative when based upon a palpable violation of the law of the land directly applicable to the subject, and about which there can be no mistake or difference of opinion, than if it had been based upon a palpable violation of the plainest rules of vulgar arithmetic; that, the document being offered to the court as evidence of the right involved in the motion and for its consideration in determining the right, it was the right and duty of the court to consider the whole document and to determine the right as upon the whole document and the law arising thereon, as it appeared to be for one or the other party; and that if the conclusion had been expressed in the most formal terms, that "consequently," (that is, in consequence of the majority assumed or produced in the mode actually pursued,) "it was adjudged by the board that Kirtley was duly elected and was entitled to the office of clerk," still, as the same document disclosed the process by which this conclusion was arrived at and showed conclusively that it was in direct contradiction of the facts found and a palpable violation of the law applicable to them; it was the right and duty of the court to disregard the concluding judgment as illegal and void, and consequently insufficient to entitle Kirtley to the office.

Now, with respect to the office of this certificate, without reading what nevertheless if there were more time I should think very profitable reading, I ask your honors to remember what you are all familiar with, and that is the language and reasoning of Chief-Justice Marshall in the case in 1 Cranch, of Marbury vs. Madison, wherein he draws the distinction between the appointment and the evidence of that appointment and points out the cases where the commission itself is the appointment and where the delivery is not essential; and I refer also to the case in 19 Howard, of The United States vs. Le Baron, from which I shall read a paragraph on page 78:

The transmission of the commission to the officer is not essential to his investiture of the office. If, by any inadvertence or accident, it should fail to reach him, his possession of the office is as lawful as if it were in his custody. It is but evidence of those acts of appointment and qualification which constitute his title and which may be proved by other evidence, where the rule of law requiring the best evidence does not prevent.

Upon the authority of an officer whose sole duty it is to certify to the facts which constitute a result without inquiry into the right of the party, or into his qualification, or into his eligibility, I ask attention also to a case in 3 Wendell, on page 437:

The relator has been appointed since the 1st day of January, instant, a commissioner of deeds in the city of New York. On presenting himself before the clerk of the common pleas of New York to take the oath of office, the clerk refused to administer the oath, on the ground that the relator was a minor within the age of twenty-one, and therefore incompetent to hold the office. The relator applies for a mandamus directing the clerk to administer the oath.

Chief-Justice Savage says:

A minor and an alien are incapable of holding a civil office within this State, (1 Revised Statutes, 116, sec. 1;) but it is not the province of the officer to whom application is made to administer the oath of office to determine whether the person presenting himself is or is not capable of holding an office. It is the duty of such officer, on the production of the commission, to administer the oath. If an appointment has been improvidently made, there is a legal mode in which it may be declared void. Let an alternative mandamus issue.—3 Wendell's Reports, 437, 438.

And yet why should not the clerk of the court of common pleas in the State of New York, who, I presume, takes the oath to support the constitution of the State of New York and the Constitution of the United States, whenever an incompetent person applies to him to be inducted into an office, and he is required to clothe him with that without which he cannot act—why should he not, in imitation of the example of La Fayette Grover, the governor of Oregon, constitute himself the guardian of the Constitution of the country? Why should he not assume also the same right, the same duty to undertake to exercise a discretion which, if not given to him by statute, yet belongs to him as the natural protector and guardian of the constitutional liberties of the country, and so refuse to do any act which he may be called upon to perform, and which may be necessary to put into office an incompetent, ineligible, and incapable person?

Why, Mr. President, in no particular does this certificate of the governor of Oregon conform in any respect either to the statutes of the United States or to the statutes of Oregon. It is no declaration of the canvass; it does not profess to be. It is not a list of the electors; it does not profess to be. It is not a declaration of the canvassing officer, because he is not that officer, but the secretary of state is; and it might as well be claimed that the attesting witness to a deed is a party to its covenants, and that Mr. Chadwick by attesting this certificate has in that contradicted that which he had no right to contradict, and which he has certified to under the great seal of the State, and which constitutes the valid, sole, and only binding result of that canvass.

But, Mr. President, let us suppose for a moment that this certificate No. 2 is sufficient and proper and conformable to law; and let us see what legal consequences follow. It declares that William H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and E. A. Cronin were "duly elected electors as aforesaid for the State of Oregon." Suppose now for a moment that the governor had a right to make that declaration, and that he had a right to make it in this form; let us see what the result is. Then Odell, Cartwright, and Cronin constituted the college of electors. As has been said forcibly by one of the contestors on our side, that is a body composed of these individuals who are required to meet to consult, to deliberate, to act in conjunction. They cannot each go off by himself and act as an elector individually; it is a college; and a college, even according to the maxim of the civil law, can only be constituted by three persons, not less; and by the Constitution of the United States no college of electors can be composed of any less number, because they must be equal to each State's Senators and Representatives, and as each State is entitled to one Representative without respect to population, the minimum of a college of electors is at least three persons meeting together, consulting together, deliberating together, voting together. There seems to have prevailed a contrary impression in Oregon, and that is that one of them might meet by himself. I beg upon that point, as the only case that I have heard of at all in analogy, to call the attention of the tribunal to the case of Sharp vs. Dawes, decided in the court of appeals of England, reported in the January number of the Law Reports of this year, in the Queen's Bench division, on page 26. It was an—Appeal from an order of the Queen's Bench division making absolute an order to increase the amount of a verdict for the plaintiff.

At the trial it appeared that the Great Caradon mine was a mining company in Cornwall, carrying on business on the cost-book system. The company had offices in London, and on the 22d of December, 1874, a notice was duly given that a general quarterly meeting of the shareholders would be held on the 30th of December, at the London offices, for the purpose of passing the accounts, making a call, receiving a report from the agent, and transacting any ordinary business of the company.

The only persons who attended at the time appointed for the meeting were the secretary, G. Sharp, and one shareholder, R. H. Silversides—who held twenty-five shares. A circular was then sent to the shareholders, with the accounts and the following notice:

The secretary not being a member of the corporation—

"At a general meeting of the shareholders, held at 2 Gresham buildings, Basinghall street, London, E. C., on Wednesday, the 30th day of December, 1874, pursuant to notice, R. H. Silversides in the chair. The notice convening the meeting having been read, the minutes of the last meeting were confirmed.

"The financial statement ending the 28th of November, showing a balance of £33 11s. 6d. against the shareholders, having been read, it was "Resolved, That the same be received and passed.

"Captain William Taylor's report having been read, it was "Resolved, That the same be received and passed, and, together with the financial statement, be printed and circulated among the shareholders.

"Resolved, That a call of 4s. 6d. per share be now, and is hereby, made, payable to the secretary, and that a discount of 5 per cent. be allowed if paid by the 25th of January, 1875.

"Resolved, In consequence of the death of Lieutenant-Colonel W. T. Nicolls, and until the appointment of a shareholder to act in his stead, that all checks be signed by Mr. R. H. Silversides and Mr. Granville Sharp jointly.

"R. H. SILVERSIDES,

"Chairman.

"Resolved, That a vote of thanks be given to the chairman.

"GRANVILLE SHARP,

"Secretary."

There was no rule of the company varying the requirements of the Stannaries act, (32 and 33 Vict., c. 19.) By rule 4 :

"The secretary shall call a general meeting of the shareholders once in every three calendar months, to be held at such time and place as shall be appointed by the committee of management."

The defendant, one of the shareholders, refused to pay this call, and the action was brought against him in the name of the secretary for the amounts due on a previous call and on this call.

Judgment was given for the plaintiff for the amount due on the previous call, with leave to move to increase it by the amount due on the second call.

LORD COLERIDGE, chief-justice. This is an attempt to enforce against the defendant a call purporting to have been made under § 10 of the Stannaries act, 1869. Of course it cannot be enforced unless it was duly made within the act. Now, the act says that a call may be made at a meeting of a company with special notice, and we must ascertain what, within the meaning of the act, is a meeting, and whether one person alone can constitute such a meeting. It is said that the requirements of the act are satisfied by a single shareholder going to the place appointed and professing to pass resolutions. The sixth and seventh sections of the act show conclusively that there must be more than one person present; and the word "meeting" prima facie means a coming together of more than one person. It is, of course, possible to show that the word "meeting" has a meaning different from the ordinary meaning, but there is nothing here to show this to be the case. It appears, therefore, to me that this call was not made at a meeting of the company within the meaning of the act. The order of the court below must be reversed.

MELLISH, L. J. In this case, no doubt, a meeting was duly summoned, but only one shareholder attended. It is clear that, according to the ordinary use of the English language, a meeting could no more be constituted by one person than a meeting could have been constituted if no shareholder at all had attended. No business could be done at such a meeting, and the call is invalid.

MR. MERRICK. Permit me to ask a question. Suppose there had been no dispute about the regularity of the appointment of electors and two of them had died?

MR. MATTHEWS. I suppose the vacancy would have to be filled in some mode to be provided by the legislature. They did not die; they were there in their places. But this gentleman, Mr. Cronin, according to his own statement of what occurred at that time, did not act with the others and went on and appointed two more himself.

MR. COMMISSIONER EDMUNDS. He says in his certificate that they refused to act with him.

MR. MATTHEWS. And he thereupon appointed two others in their stead. Now, Mr. President and gentlemen, I take it that one in a college which necessarily consists of three is not capable by himself of instituting any action, and that the action of a quorum or majority of the body, the record of whose action is before us, who certify that they, having ascertained the existence of a vacancy, went on to fill it, is to be taken as the conclusive and legitimate account of the proceedings of the body. In support of the conclusion to be based upon this argument, I refer with satisfaction to the decision of the supreme court of the State of Oregon, cited by my learned friend Judge Hoadly last evening. That was a case where the prosecuting attorney having accepted an office under the Government of the United States, which was incompatible according to the laws of Oregon with the office which he had previously exercised under the laws of Oregon, the governor of Oregon commissioned another person as district attorney, upon the ground that he had ascertained and declared a vacancy in consequence of the ineligibility of the occupant, on account of his incompetency to continue to hold the office. In that case, by the law of Oregon, the governor is authorized to fill vacancies, and upon the argument that the person authorized to fill a vacancy has the power to ascertain and determine and declare the existence of the facts which constitute a vacancy, by that judgment these two electors, who by the terms of the statute of Oregon were the only persons who had power to fill vacancies, had the right also to ascertain and declare the existence of those facts which constituted in law a vacancy.

And that brings me to a consideration of the question as to what under the laws of Oregon constitutes a vacancy in the electoral college. My friend on the other side who addressed the tribunal last evening expended some time and strength in undertaking to demonstrate by the application of the maxim noscitur a sociis, that the enumeration of the particular instances of a vacancy in that section of the statute which authorizes the body to fill the vacancy excludes the idea of the words "or otherwise" expressing any other than those of a like class. He limits, therefore, what constitutes a vacancy to the occurrence of facts transpiring since the date of the popular election. I think that in such a statute, where the object is to see to it that the substantial rights of the State are preserved in keeping up the full number to which it is entitled in its electoral college, in order that its just influence in public affairs may not be diminished by any of the accidents and casualties of life, no such rule, no such maxim, no such limit can be applied to its interpretation; that it is, on the other hand, to be interpreted in a large and liberal sense for the promotion of the object which the statute had in view, and that is the furnishing to the body of the electoral college the means, the opportunity, the power to fill vacancies in their body which at the day when they meet are ascertained to have occurred, as fully and completely as the legislature itself by any means could supply. Certainly there is no reason why, in its application to such a state of things, the ordinary, plain, and common-sense meaning of the terms should be wrested by the application of any artificial maxim.

But without dwelling on that, I beg to call the attention of yourself, Mr. President, and the tribunal, to one or two authorities on the point that a vacancy such as we claim to have existed in this case may be and be declared. I refer to the case of Stevens vs. Wyatt, 16 Ben. Monroe, 542, where it was expressly held that the election of an ineligible candidate, (the very point made here,) so far from electing a minority candidate, created a vacancy, a vacancy ab initio, from the commencement of the term; and with reference to the case of The Commonwealth vs. Hanley, in 9 Pennsylvania State Reports, 513, and a large number of similar cases, it is only necessary to point out this fact to show their want of application to this argument; and that is, that in these cases, notably in the case in 9 Pennsylvania State Reports, the facts were that there was an incumbent of the office by virtue of a previous election holding over, under a statute to that effect, until his successor should be elected and qualified. The successor was elected, but died before he was qualified and before the commencement of the term of office, and because by express statute the officer already in held over, it was adjudged that there was no vacancy because there was an existing incumbent.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Under the statute he would hold until his successor was qualified.

Mr. MATTHEWS. Until elected and qualified. In the opinion of the judges in re Dinslow, 38 Maine, 597, the judges of the supreme court of Maine certified to the governor the exact state of the case as furnishing the ground for the opinion which I maintain; a majority of the votes at an election having been canvassed for a man already dead, the judges held that there was a vacancy in the office beginning with its term and entitling the governor to appoint.

I have already referred last evening, in a colloquy which took place, between my brother Hoadly and myself, to the Claiborne and Gholson case, which is a valid precedent on the point. What was that? In the interim between the expiration of the term of a member of Congress by the expiration of the Congress itself on the 4th of March and the period provided by the laws of the State for the regular election biennially, in the case of an extra session being called, there is a vacancy in the representation of that State in the House of Representatives, which, under the Constitution of the United States, is to be filled, and it was filled in that case by an election held under a proclamation of the governor calling for an election to fill a vacancy. The two members sent were admitted in the extra session to the whole Twenty-fifth Congress; and afterward the resolution was only rescinded so far as to adjudge that they ought not to have been admitted as members for the entire term, but only to fill that vacancy until by regular election under the statutes of the State the full term could be filled.

Now I call attention to another congressional precedent in re Flanders and Hahn, Thirty-seventh Congress, third session, in which there was a report by Mr. Dawes, chairman of the Committee of Elections. Flanders and Hahn claimed to have been elected members of the House of Representatives from Louisiana. The law of that State, entitled "An act relative to elections," approved March 15, 1855, provided:

SEC. 33. Be it further enacted, &c., That in case of vacancy, by death or otherwise, in the said office of Representative, between the general elections, it shall be the duty of the governor, by proclamation, to cause an election to be held according to law to fill the vacancy.

General Shepley, having been appointed military governor of the State, on the 14th of November, 1862, issued his proclamation ordering an election for members of Congress in the first and second congressional districts, to be held on the 3d of December, 1862. The objection was made in debate that the election was void, because, the time for the regular election having passed without one being held, there was no vacancy occasioned by death or otherwise which could be filled by a special election under the governor's proclamation. Mr. Dawes, in reply, said:

Where the time prescribed by the regular law for the election of a Representative to Congress passes, for any reason whatever, and there is nobody in office, there is a vacancy which the governor of a State is required to fill. I think the office is quite as empty with nobody in it as if somebody had been in it a part of the term and then died. The House has passed upon that question heretofore. The question was up for discussion in this hall in one of the Virginia cases, and the point was taken by the claimant in the House that there could not be a vacancy unless the office had been once filled; but the House thought otherwise, and I think the House was right.

The claimants were admitted. But, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, it is hardly worth while to hunt for authority on this point when it is so near at hand in the State of Oregon itself, for that State has undertaken to define by statute what shall constitute a vacancy. The very text of the statute which prescribes the mode for the election of presidential electors, title 6, section 48, enumerates the instances which shall constitute vacancies. They are:

1. The death of the incumbent.
2. His resignation.
3. His removal.
4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village for which he shall have been elected or appointed, or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged.
5. His conviction of an infamous crime, or of any offense involving a violation of his oath.
6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office, or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law.
7. The decision of a competent tribunal, declaring void his election or appointment.

Now, it is argued on the other side that this cannot apply, because, in the case of Watts, on the supposition that he was ineligible at the time of his original appointment, there was no decision by a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment; and yet the other side have argued that the governor had the right to declare his election void, and that that was the decision of a competent tribunal. If so, then I ask whether the consequence does not flow from this statute that, instead of electing the minority candidate, it merely created a vacancy.

But, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, there is another view to take, much stronger and entirely conclusive. It has been argued—it must be argued in order to sustain the claim made here; without it there is no standing ground—that the election of an ineligible candidate under the Constitution is void, void ab initio, void by virtue of the constitutional provision. On that they base the right of the minority candidate, because they say that a man ineligible to hold an office, or a man ineligible to be appointed to an office cannot take it, cannot hold it; that the attempt is abortive; that it is null and void; in other words, that an ineligible candidate actually elected cannot become an incumbent; and the gentlemen interpret this statute by interpolating the word “incumbent” throughout all of its provisions. Be it so; it establishes my proposition. What is it, then? “The decision of a competent tribunal declaring void his,” that is, the incumbent’s, “election or appointment.” Then a man can be an incumbent, although his election or appointment is void! In other words, this statute recognizes the law and the fact that prohibitions establishing incapacities for office do not necessarily execute themselves otherwise than through the judgments of competent tribunals; that a man, notwithstanding the incapacity, may in fact hold the office, and if his holding of that office is not legal and valid he fills it with his natural person and capacity as completely as if he was invested with all lawful power, until it becomes vacant either by the decision of a competent tribunal declaring the nullity of his original appointment, or by his getting out of the way in some other mode. Now if, notwithstanding the election is void, an ineligible candidate may actually be put into occupation of the office until a decision of a competent tribunal declaring the invalidity of his election creates a vacancy under that statute, I ask in all reason and common sense whether he cannot voluntarily create a vacancy by doing that which he might be compelled to do by a decision of a competent tribunal.

But it is said that this title only applies to vacancies occurring in State offices and cannot be held to apply to the case of the office of elector. But, Mr. President and gentlemen, even on the supposition that it refers primarily to elections to offices held under the State constitution and the authority of the State, nevertheless the reference in the other title, which has express directions concerning vacancies in the electoral body and a mode of filling them, must be construed, because in pari materia, by the context; so that when you come to understand what the legislature meant by a vacancy occurring "otherwise" in the electoral body, it means a vacancy occurring in any one of the ways in which by law a vacancy may be created in reference to State offices.

So, then, there is no flaw in the argument; it is conclusive; it is irrefragable. There it stands on the express terms and letter of the very statutes of the State, showing that, admitting Watts to have been an ineligible candidate, admitting his election to have been utterly void, still he was the person declared duly elected because he had the highest number of votes; and notwithstanding his ineligibility and notwithstanding the voidness of his election, he was capable under the constitution and laws of Oregon of being inducted into the office, of holding it until by resignation or the decision of a competent tribunal ousting him from it a vacancy should be declared; and then a majority of the electoral college by a plurality of votes, and not by the solitary voice of Cronin, were called into being and into efficacy, and had power to fill up to the full measure of constitutional right the number of votes to which the State of Oregon was entitled.

I must confess, Mr. President and gentlemen, that I was not a little surprised at the view which my learned friend [Mr. Hoadly] took about the condition of the law of England and this country on the subject of the effect of votes cast for an ineligible candidate. I know that he has given far more industriously his attention to the collection of cases on that subject than I have, for I confess that I never regarded it as quite worth my while to trace out in detail the history of judicial decisions on that subject. I was satisfied with a general knowledge derived from an examination of a few cases and from the tendency of the reasonings which lie at the foundation of the true doctrine on the subject.

THE PRESIDENT. Is there any difference between a vote cast for an ineligible candidate and a blank?

MR. MATTHEWS. Yes, sir; just as much as there is between a man and a mouse, between a live man capable, by the natural exercise of his functions, of doing the thing which the law puts upon him, and a mere nothing.

A man's a man for a' that.

And though incapable by law of holding an office, he nevertheless may be put into an office, and if nobody objects he can exercise the functions of the office and discharge its duties, and every single act has just as much vitality and validity as if he was the most thoroughly-furnished man by the law for the performance of all its duties. Allow me on that point to refer for a moment to a case that I intended to refer to, a decision and an opinion of Chief-Justice Chase in the Cæsar Griffin case, for the purpose of enforcing what I believe to be the true doctrine on this subject; and that is, that without legislation declaring the consequences of the casting of votes for an ineligible man, under such circumstances there is no power in the Constitution or out of it to put it in force.

By the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution certain persons were declared to be disqualified to hold certain offices, and a judge in the State of Virginia came within the prohibition, the actual incumbent of an office. If the prohibition has that blighting and paralyzing effect which seems to be attributed to it by some, it executes itself at the moment it comes into force upon the state of things just as they are, and it deprives the officer, if he be in office, of the power to continue in office just as much as it deprives the elected man from taking office. And if the doctrine be true, every act done by this judge after the adoption of that fourteenth amendment became utterly null and void, provided always it be, as is claimed, the legal consequence from the doctrine that an incapable person holding an office makes all his acts invalid. In this case it was said to invalidate the sentence of punishment of a criminal who had been adjudged to the penitentiary by this judge while in office, Judge Sheffey. What I call special attention to is that Chief-Justice Chase, not content with referring to the general principle and to the decided cases—which are just as numerous as all the disqualifying acts and statutes of Parliament in Great Britain passed during the time of civil war—but arguing upon our own Constitution, goes on to show by illustrations what his opinion is.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. From what do you read ?

Mr. MATTHEWS. This is Johnson's Reports, so called, of Chase's Decisions, page 425.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Circuit Court Reports ?

Mr. MATTHEWS. Of the circuit court in Virginia.

Instructive argument and illustration of this branch of the case might be derived from an examination of those provisions of the Constitution ordaining that no person shall be a Representative or Senator or President or Vice-President unless having certain pre-prescribed qualifications. These provisions, as well as those which ordain that no Senator or Representative shall, during his term of service, be appointed to any office under the United States under certain circumstances, and that no person holding any such office shall, while holding such office, be a member of either House, operate on the capacity to take office. The election or appointment itself is prohibited and invalidated; and yet no instance is believed to exist where a person has been actually elected, and has actually taken the office notwithstanding the prohibition, and his acts while exercising its functions have been held invalid.

It results from the examination that persons in office by lawful appointment or election before the promulgation of the fourteenth amendment are not removed therefrom by the direct and immediate effect of the prohibition to hold office contained in the third section, but that legislation by Congress is necessary to give effect to the prohibition, by providing for such removal. And it results further that the exercise of their several functions by these officers, until removed in pursuance of such legislation, is not unlawful.

On page 421—

In the judgment of the court there is another, not only reasonable, but very clearly warranted by the terms of the amendment, and recognized by the legislation of Congress. The object of the amendment is to exclude from certain offices a certain class of persons. Now, it is obviously impossible to do this by a simple declaration, whether in the Constitution or in an act of Congress, that all persons included within a particular description shall not hold office, for, in the very nature of things, it must be ascertained what particular individuals are embraced by the definition before any sentence of exclusion can be made to operate. To accomplish this ascertainment and insure effective results, proceedings, evidence, decisions, and enforcements of decisions, more or less formal, are indispensable, and these can only be provided for by Congress.

Mr. President and gentlemen, certainly it is reasonable to suppose that such ought to be the construction.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. I wish to ask a question. Where an office is filled by an ineligible person serving as officer de facto and his acts are held valid as to third persons, could the office at the same time be held to be vacant?

Mr. MATTHEWS. No, sir, it is not vacant. He is in office, acting in office. He can vacate it by resignation; but if there is an officer de facto the office is not vacant.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. My question is whether, holding the office to be vacant, would not the effect be to hold his acts to be void as to third persons?

Mr. MATTHEWS. Yes, sir, if the office was vacant, certainly. Then there is no officer there. But the very point of this decision is that although ineligible to hold, though incapable to take, though prohibited by the constitution from continuing in office, nevertheless he was in office, and there was no vacancy. Such is the case in 11 Sergeant and Rawle, which was read to the court in the Louisiana argument, the case of the director of the Bank of Washington.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. What was the decision of Chief-Justice Chase in regard to the judgment against Griffin?

Mr. MATTHEWS. He upheld the judgment and remanded the prisoner, it being an application for a habeas corpus to discharge him on the ground of the invalidity of the sentence. The case in 11 Sergeant and Rawle, 413, of Baird vs. The Bank of Washington, which argues the question at length, states that—

This principle of colorable election holds not only in regard to the right of election but also of being elected. A person indisputably ineligible may be an officer de facto by color of election.

I was on the point, however, of referring a little more at large to the question about the self-executing power of the Constitution in reference to these prohibitions. It was urged in argument on another occasion that no such legislation was needed in the case of these prohibitions, as was shown by the analogy of certain other prohibitions, as, for instance, it was said that there was a prohibition upon the States against emitting bills of credit; the States are prohibited from passing any ex post facto laws, or any laws impairing the obligation of contracts; and it was asked with an air of triumph, as if the question itself was its own answer, what legislation was ever needed to execute those provisions of the Constitution? Why, Mr. President and gentlemen, the question proves my proposition, because there has been legislation in execution of those provisions, and without it they could not be executed to-day. For instance, what is the sole example of the execution of that constitutional prohibition against the laws of States impairing the obligation of contracts? It is never executed except when it arises as a judicial question between private persons. A sues B upon a promissory note; B sets up a defense that a statute of the State in which he resides has discharged him from his obligation. A demurs to the defense, and the cause is carried, by virtue of the judiciary act of Congress, to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of a State court, in order to determine that question, and they do determine it, because the Supreme Court, having become vested by that act of Congress with jurisdiction and the power to try cases at law and in equity arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, is bound by the doctrine that the Constitution of the United States is the law of that case to enforce it judicially; but if the court had never been empowered to act by an act of Congress, it could not have executed that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Could not members of Congress execute it without any act of Congress ?

Mr. MATTHEWS. Only by that provision of the Constitution which makes each House the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members ; and it is not executed in any other way than as dependent on the political will and power of each House, and each House could, in defiance of the Constitution, without any means of preventing it, admit an ineligible member to its body. Where is the power to execute the Constitution against the House if it chooses to admit an incompetent person, an incapable person ?

Mr. President, just think of it. It is proposed now in this case, without previous legislation, without any indication of the will of Congress as to what ought to be the consequences, to disfranchise the people of a State because some man holding an insignificant and unknown office of trust or profit under the United States, in violation of the provisions of the Constitution, has been voted for as elector. Non constat but that Congress in the execution of its power to legislate to carry into effect those provisions of the Constitution might withhold any such consequence as that ; they might by legislation prevent such appointments, anticipate them, impose penalties for the violation ; but I take it that the American Congress has yet to come into being that, if deliberately called upon to legislate in that behalf, would impose the penalty of disfranchisement upon a State because an elector had been voted for who was incapable of exercising the office.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Your position, then, is that no one but the regularly-constituted authorities has jurisdiction and can oust an ineligible person who has been elected ?

Mr. MATTHEWS. Yes, sir ; because there must be a tribunal to determine the facts. It is a judicial question, a question to be ascertained upon evidence, or at any rate there must be some mode provided by law to go into the question and decide it, whether judicial or otherwise.

Mr. President, I have sufficiently argued all the points arising upon this case that occur to me which require the attention that I ought to give, and I leave the remainder of the argument to be made by the distinguished gentlemen with whom I have the honor to act in this argument. I have endeavored to treat this argument as a judicial argument and as a professional argument. I am aware of the peculiar nature of the question. I am aware of the peculiar constitution of the tribunal. I am perfectly well apprised that this is not an ordinary litigation, that it is a controversy involving party passions, party prejudices, personal interests, and public interests. I have endeavored in the course of what has seemed to me to be considerable provocation, nevertheless to possess my soul in patience. I have not from the beginning until now argued a proposition affirmatively that I did not affirmatively believe to be sound and true. I have not defended any position which I did not sincerely believe not only to be defensible, but worthy of being defended. I do not stand here to-day as counsel for any party or any person. I stand, Mr. President and gentlemen, as I have endeavored to stand from the beginning, in the attitude of a man who stands by great constitutional and legal principles. I care nothing whatever for the popular cry and clamor that it may suit anybody with loud and boisterous trumpets to proclaim to the East and to the West and to the North and to the South. I am satisfied with what I have said or attempted to say, except that I have been able to do it so imperfectly and unsatisfactorily. I am satisfied, and I shall ever remember hereafter with grateful recollections if I shall be able to attribute to any word that I have uttered the safety not only as I believe of our constitutional form of government, but doctrines which lie at the foundation of all possible government.

This idea that any man and every man, whether in his private and individual capacity or in his official character with certain prescribed bounds for his power, has a right to step out of his sphere at any moment when his party interests or his personal prejudices or any other motives may call him to what he considers to be the execution of the high act of conserving and preserving constitutional powers and rights, irrespective merely of his influence morally and politically as a citizen; this idea which has pervaded the action in this case, to ascribe it to the best, to the highest motives—and God knows I only wish it were true that I could ascribe it to any such motives—on the supposition that the governor of a State, limited by law to the performance of certain strictly-defined and well-understood ministerial duties, can upon his own mere motion, on the idea that there is something resting on his conscience on behalf of the great ægis of the Constitution, to take upon himself functions and powers which do not belong to him, which have been denied to him, is simply to confuse all the boundaries and political divisions of government; it is to unite the executive, the judicial, and the legislative powers of society in a single hand; and the wisest statesmen who framed the foundations of our Government warned us at the time of the adoption of our Federal Constitution against that very consummation, and applauded, as they had a right to do, the work of their hands, guided as they were by divine wisdom in the establishment of our present form of government under our model Constitution as the best example the world had ever seen of that deliberate division and entire definition of the boundary between the departments of government. It was the very definition and essence of personal and political freedom.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Mr. President, it is very apparent from the course this argument has taken that the whole time allotted to the counsel on each side is likely to be consumed before we come to the question of the admissibility of this evidence. Already, on the part of the objectors to certificate No. 1, two hours and a half have been consumed, and on the other side nearly two hours have been consumed, and yet the question is pending before us whether there is any evidence to be received outside of the certificates and papers submitted to us by the President of the Senate. This is likely to produce a very awkward state of things. I should like to have the evidence in, if it is admissible, before the counsel yet to speak conclude the argument which shall be submitted by them; and I move you, sir, that the evidence described in the first item of the offer which was made last evening be received subject to the decision of the Commission in regard to its legal effect, and if there be any evidence on the other side which is intended to counteract this, that that also be received at this stage of the proceedings, before the two counsel who are to conclude the argument shall commence their arguments.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. You refer to the first offer in the printed offers, Judge Strong?

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. The first offer.

The PRESIDENT. The motion of Judge Strong is that the evidence specified in the first offer of the objectors to certificate No. 1 be now received, subject to all questions as to its legal effect.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. And any evidence on the same point.

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. Certainly, any evidence on the same point that may be offered on the other side upon the same condition.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion in that form.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS. We may be in a little difficulty, Mr. President and gentlemen. Our witnesses attended all day yesterday, and we were prepared to go on without a moment's delay. I have now inquired whether they are ready, and I find that Mr. Tyner, the Postmaster-General, is not here. He was in attendance last evening and all day yesterday. I have no reason to doubt, however, that he is quite accessible.

Mr. MERRICK. I have not yet learned whether an answer has been returned to our subpoena.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. The Postmaster-General was here, and told me he could not remain a long time, but would come on being telegraphed for.

Mr. EVARTS. I have no doubt he is quite accessible; only we wished to be excused for any apparent remissness.

The PRESIDENT. Of course we understand that there is a necessary delay. The question is addressed to counsel for objectors to certificate No. 1. Are you ready to offer the proof specified in the first article of your offer?

Mr. MERRICK. I presume we are. We issued yesterday a subpœna duces tecum, and I suppose the return is made. It ought to be.

The PRESIDENT. Ascertain that fact and report without delay, if you please.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER, (to Mr. Merrick.) You asked for certain papers, which were ordered to be furnished you.

Mr. MERRICK. Your honors ordered the papers to be furnished, and I presume the papers have been sent here; but I do not know. A request had been previously made, by one of the objectors, of the Department to give certified copies of those public records to be used in this investigation, in the hope that having them on hand any delay might be avoided; but the Department refused to give the papers until required by a subpoena.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Did you not issue a subpoena yesterday?

Mr. MERRICK. There was an order. We asked for a subpoena, and the court gave an order that the papers should be furnished.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Was that served yesterday?

Mr. MERRICK. That I suppose was served, but the Secretary not being in attendance, I am unable to state.

The PRESIDENT. The Secretary will be sent for.

Mr. Commissioner MORTON. Postmaster-General Tyner was here last evening with the papers.

The PRESIDENT. I have sent for the Secretary, and the minute he comes in we shall have the information.

Mr. MERRICK. The papers were placed, by the permission of the court, in the hands of the proper officer of this tribunal to be served on the Postmaster-General; but whether they have been served or not I do not know.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Who was the proper officer to serve the papers?

Mr. MERRICK. I presume the marshal.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Mr. Reardon is here, and he can state whether he has served them or not. [A pause.] The deputy marshal tells me he served the process on the Postmaster-General last evening in this room.

Mr. MERRICK. It has been served, then.

Mr. EVARTS. He would have been in attendance at the opening of this Commission this morning if it had not been arranged for the business to proceed otherwise.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. I understand there was no subpoena duces tecum asked for or served. These gentlemen asked for an order for the production of a certain paper, which I saw the President sign. I think myself they ought to have seen by this time whether that paper was produced.

Mr. EVARTS. Whenever the Postmaster-General comes I think he will have with him all the papers that are desired on either side.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I move that the Commission take a recess until one o'clock. The papers ought to be here by that time.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. I think half an hour would be long enough.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I think the Postmaster-General has been here this morning; and I suppose in twenty or thirty minutes we can have the papers. He may be here sooner than that. I move to amend by making the time half past twelve.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. That is only twenty minutes. I will say till quarter of one, then.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I will accept that.

The PRESIDENT. It is moved that the Commission take a recess until a quarter to one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to at twelve o'clock and ten minutes p. m.

The Commission re-assembled at twelve o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.

The PRESIDENT. The Commission is ready to receive the evidence specified in the first offer, subject to all questions as to its legal effect.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. President, we offer a duly-certified copy of the commission of John W. Watts as postmaster at La Fayette, in the county of Yam Hill, State of Oregon, issued on the 7th of February, 1873.

Mr. EVARTS. This paper, if the court please, is satisfactory enough as being a copy, but it does not prove itself as a copy. The Postmaster-General is in attendance here with these papers under a subpoena duces tecum, and he can produce them as a witness and also give evidence concerning the facts, if necessary.

The PRESIDENT. Are they not certified?

Mr. EVARTS. They are not certified as copies. Still I do not care. They are no doubt copies, excepting that they should come as a part of the testimony of the Postmaster-General, Mr. Tyner, it seems to me.

Mr. MERRICK. Do counsel on the other side object to the evidence?

Mr. EVARTS. I have stated exactly my position.

The PRESIDENT. I understand the paper is not objected to. It will be therefore received.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Are not these copies exemplified?

Mr. EVARTS. They are not exemplified. As I have said, they do not prove themselves.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, Mr. Evarts, whether you object to the papers.

Mr. EVARTS. I submit this to the Commission, that the Postmaster-

General should produce them here under his subpoena; and he, therefore, should be the witness to produce them. I shall make no objection, however.

Mr. MERRICK. We did not issue a subpoena for him.

The PRESIDENT. The paper will be received. The objection goes to its effect, I understand.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I understood Mr. Evarts to make the point that the paper in its present condition is incompetent to prove the fact stated in it, but is willing that it should come in subject to that question.

The PRESIDENT. Subject to that question.

Mr. MERRICK. I take it the objection stated by Mr. Commissioner Edmunds is somewhat different from the character of the objection as stated by the President. Mr. Commissioner Edmunds understands the objection to be to matter of form. The President understood the objection to be waived as to form and go to the substance of the paper, the effect of it. I used inaccurate language in saying that we had issued a subpoena duces tecum. We applied for duly-certified copies of these papers, and the Commission ordered the duly-certified copies to be furnished, and these have been placed in my hands.

The PRESIDENT. Under the order?

Mr. MERRICK. Under and in response to the order of the Commission.

Mr. EVARTS. I have no doubt of their authenticity. All I submitted was that their proper production as proof should be through the witness who brought them as copies, they not proving themselves.

Mr. MERRICK. If that is insisted upon as an objection, and the authentication is not sufficiently formal under the statutes of the United States to justify their introduction into the case as testimony, we shall have to ask the indulgence of the Commission to have them authenticated according to law, that there may be a proper return to the order which you have passed in the premises.

The PRESIDENT. I shall rule, in the absence of any instructions, that the papers in their present form are not sufficient, if objected to.

Mr. EVARTS. The Postmaster-General is in attendance, and is ready to verify them as copies from his office.

The PRESIDENT. Pass them to him, then, and have them verified.

Mr. EVARTS. There is not the least occasion for delay or formality. Mr. Tyner is here.

The PRESIDENT, (to Mr. Merrick.) I think you have a right to certified copies, and it is for you to pass them to the Postmaster-General and have them certified; not for the Commission.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. I concur with the Presiding Officer. I do not think you are compelled to introduce Mr. Tyner as a witness in order to get certified copies of papers from his office. If he has not certified them you can have them certified. I am sorry for the delay.

Mr. MERRICK. I so understand my rights, and with that understanding am endeavoring to discharge my duty.

The PRESIDENT. The Postmaster-General can verify them in five minutes, I suppose.

Mr. EVARTS. If the Commission passes on the question that the Postmaster-General is not the proper party as a witness to produce these papers, then I will waive the certificate. I do not wish to cause delay or trouble. My only point is that the Postmaster-General must have the proper opportunity.

The PRESIDENT. I am of the opinion, Mr. Evarts, that the other side have a right to a certified copy from the Postmaster-General under the order already issued, and Judge Miller concurs with me.

Mr. EVARTS. I am willing that it should be treated as if it were a certified copy.

The PRESIDENT. Very well, then, it will be received. Let the next paper be offered.

Mr. MERRICK. The next paper that we offer in evidence is the commission of Henry W. Hill, as postmaster at La Fayette, in the county of Yam Hill, State of Oregon, issued on the 3d of January in the year 1877, reciting that—

Whereas on the 23d day of November, 1876, Henry W. Hill was appointed postmaster at La Fayette, county of Yam Hill, State of Oregon; and whereas he did, on the 11th day of December, 1876, execute a bond and has taken the oath of office, as required by law, know ye, &c.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Is that one of the offices to which the appointment is made by the President or by the Postmaster-General?

Mr. EVARTS. It is a Postmaster-General's appointment. It is not necessary for me to object to this last paper as not being material, for all these objections are reserved.

The PRESIDENT. Under the words "the effect."

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Have you any evidence that Hill was the successor of Watts? Nothing appears on this paper to show that he was the successor of Watts.

Mr. MERRICK. Nothing appears on the paper to show that he was the successor of Watts, but taking the two papers together, if they are left to stand alone unexplained by the other side, we respectfully submit that they sufficiently show that Hill was Watts's successor.

The PRESIDENT. Have you any further papers?

Mr. MERRICK. We have no further papers. We rest now.

The PRESIDENT. Is there anything in reply?

Mr. EVARTS. We will call the Postmaster-General.

Hon. JAMES N. TYNER sworn and examined.

By Mr. EVARTS:

Question. You are Postmaster-General of the United States?

Answer. I am.

Q. And have been since what period?

A. About the 12th or 13th of July last.

Q. And in the discharge of the duties of that office during that period?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know of Mr. Watts having held office as postmaster in Oregon, at Yam Hill?

A. No, sir; John W. Watts held the office of postmaster at La Fayette, in Yam Hill County, Oregon.

Q. Who has the appointment of that class of officers?

A. It is a fourth-class office, the appointments to which are vested in the Postmaster-General. It is not a presidential office.

Q. Did Mr. Watts resign that office?

A. He did.

Q. At what date?

Mr. MERRICK. Wait a moment. Let the resignation be produced.

Mr. EVARTS. I ask what is the date of the resignation?

Mr. GREEN. We submit that the best evidence is the written resignation, if any exists.

The PRESIDENT. Do you object to the question?

Mr. MERRICK and Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT. I will submit to the Commission the question whether the objection shall be sustained.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. What is the objection?

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I understand the counsel merely desire to know if there was a written resignation, which I suppose they have a right to, upon the question proposed by Mr. Evarts.

The WITNESS. No such question has been put to me.

Mr. EVARTS. I asked at what time the resignation took place.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I understand, then, that counsel on the other side interpose and ask if that resignation was in writing; because if it was the writing would be the best evidence.

The PRESIDENT. No; they objected generally, as I understand. But that question may be put preliminarily whether it was in writing.

Mr. EVARTS, (to the witness.) Did you receive any resignation from Mr. Watts?

Mr. MERRICK. Was it in writing?

Mr. EVARTS. I first asked whether he received any.

The WITNESS. I did.

Q. (By Mr. EVARTS.) In what form?

A. By telegraph; and afterward in writing.

Q. Have you the telegram?

A. I have.

Q. Produce it.

A. [Producing telegram.] This is it.

Mr. EVARTS. I offer it.

The PRESIDENT. Read it.

Mr. EVARTS. It reads:

PORTLAND, OREGON, November 13, 1876.

Received at Post-Office Department, Washington—

Mr. GREEN. We object to the introduction of that paper. We will let it go, however, for what it is worth.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Let us find out exactly what the objection is.

The PRESIDENT. On what ground do you object?

Mr. GREEN. There is no authentication of the signature; there is no proof that Watts sent the paper. It is a mere telegraphic memorandum received by the Postmaster-General at this end of the line.

Mr. EVARTS. We certainly should have to begin with this, I suppose.

The WITNESS. I also stated that there was a resignation in writing. I will submit that also.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. One thing at a time.

Mr. EVARTS. I propose to read this telegram, if I am allowed.

The PRESIDENT. I must submit the question to the Commission. An objection is made to the admissibility of the telegram, and the question is whether the objection shall be sustained.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I do not understand that we are passing finally on the question of its weight, but whether it shall be admitted de bene.

The PRESIDENT. Upon its admissibility at present.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I understand the offer of proof is that the Postmaster-General received a telegram on such a day. That is one step. I do not see why it is not admissible. Whether the whole chain can be established is another thing.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on sustaining the objection. The question being put, the objection was overruled.
The PRESIDENT. Read the telegram.
Mr. EVARTS. It is—

PORTLAND, OREGON, November 13, 1876.

To J. N. TYNER, Postmaster-General, Washington, D. C. :

I hereby resign as postmaster at La Fayette, Yam Hill County, Oregon. Answer by telegraph.

JOHN W. WATTS,
Postmaster La Fayette, Oregon.

Q. (By Mr. EVARTS.) Are the stamps as to the Department receipt of the telegram the stamps of the Department?

A. No, sir; that is the stamp of the telegraph company, whose office is located in the building.

Q. Do you know when this was received?

A. It was received on the morning of the 14th of November.

Q. At what hour, do you know?

A. I should think about ten o'clock.

Q. Did you make any answer to this telegram?

A. I did.

Q. Have you a copy of the telegram that you sent?

A. I made answer by telegram, of which this is a copy, [producing paper.]

The PRESIDENT. Do you offer that?

Mr. EVARTS. I do.

The PRESIDENT. Read it if there be no objection.

Mr. EVARTS. It is—

A. I did; by the Western Union Telegraph Company.

A. This letter was received by the Post-Office Department on the 9th day of December, through J. B. Underwood, special agent of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. EVARTS. It is addressed—

To Hon. J. B. UNDERWOOD, Special Agent of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. MERRICK. The signature of that letter is not identified. We object to it on that ground.

The PRESIDENT. On what ground?

Mr. MERRICK. The signature has not been proved.

Mr. EVARTS. I propose to show that this paper was received, and is on file at the Post-Office Department.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. What is the date of it?

Mr. EVARTS. November 12, 1876.

The PRESIDENT. The Commission have heard the objection to the admissibility of the paper. Shall the objection be sustained?

The question being put, the objection was overruled.

The PRESIDENT. Read.

Mr. EVARTS. It is—

A. That is the first.

The PRESIDENT. Read, if not objected to.

Mr. EVARTS. It is—

SIR: In accordance with your instructions of the 14th instant, I proceeded at once to take charge of the post-office at La Fayette, in Yam Hill County, Oregon, vice J. W. Watts, resigned. I took a full inventory of all property, giving receipts as required by law, and moved the office into another building at once, and got things running in good order the same day. I am now conducting business of the office in my name as special agent and acting postmaster, awaiting the appointment of Henry W. Hill, who is now acting as my assistant under my appointment, it being impossible for me to give my whole attention to the special duties of the office, as just at this time I am crowded with other duties pertaining to the business of the Department. I inclose the oath of my assistant.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, &c.,

J. B. UNDERWOOD,
Special Agent Post-Office Department.

Hon. J. N. TYNER,

Q. State when the letter which I have just read was received.

A. It was received at the Post-Office Department December 9, 1876.

Mr. EVARTS. The telegram which is identified is—

EUGENE CITY, OREGON, November 22, 1876.

To J. W. MARSHALL,
First Assistant Postmaster, Washington, D. C.:

Appoint Henry W. Hill postmaster, La Fayette, Oregon.

J. B. UNDERWOOD,

(To the witness.) When did you say that was received?

A. On the 22d day of November, 1876.

Q. Did you have any further communications anterior to the issuing of this commission to Mr. Hill?

A. Not any; on that recommendation Mr. Hill was appointed.

Q. You made the appointment at what date?

A. Henry W. Hill was designated for appointment as postmaster at La Fayette, Oregon, on the 23d day of November, 1876.

Q. In what way was he designated?

A. He was designated for appointment in the usual form. That is the original, [producing a paper.]

Q. This is the form?

A. It is.

Q. This is Mr. Marshall's signature, is it?

A. It is.

Mr. EVARTS. I will read it:

November 21, 1876, La Fayette Office, Yam Hill County, Oregon State—John W. Watts postmaster, appointed February 7, 1873; salary, $270; postal bond, $2,000; money-order bond, $3,000. Appoint Henry W. Hill in place of J. W. Watts, resigned. J. W. Marshall, First Assistant Postmaster-General.

(To the witness.) That is the ordinary form?

A. It is the ordinary form.

Q. And after that was any action taken by you otherwise than signing the commission?

A. Yes, sir. A letter designating the appointment was forwarded to the appointee accompanied by a blank bond, which bond on being filled by the appointee is returned to the Post-Office Department, after which and after its approval the commission issues.

Q. At what time did any such letter issue?

A. On the 23d day of November, 1876. This is the bond itself, [producing a paper.]

Q. Was this bond forwarded ?

A. That bond was forwarded in blank, filled up by Hill, and returned to the Department.

Q. And then when was the indorsement completed ?

A. The bond was executed on the 11th day of December, 1876, as shown by the certificate of the officer. The commission issued on the 3d day of January, 1877, and was transmitted to Henry W. Hill by mail on the 4th day of January, 1877.

Q. When was this bond in blank forwarded with the designation you have spoken of ?

A. On the 23d day of November, 1876.

Q. It was sent from your Department on the 23d day of November with the designation and the bond to be filled up ?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are there any other papers on the subject ?

A. None.

Mr. EVARTS. We are through with this witness.

The PRESIDENT. The other side can cross-examine.

Mr. GREEN. We have no questions to ask.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I wish to ask the Postmaster-General a question.

(To the witness.) Is there any law or regulation of the Department which requires the accounts of postmasters to be settled up before their resignation takes effect ?

A. No, sir.

By Mr. Commissioner THURMAN :

Q. There is nothing of that kind ?

A. Nothing that I am aware of.

Mr. EVARTS. I will call Mr. Watts.

JOHN W. WATTS sworn and examined.

By Mr. EVARTS :

Question. Were you the postmaster at La Fayette, Yam Hill County, Oregon ?

Answer. I was.

Q. Did you resign that office ?

A. I did.

Q. When ?

A. On the 13th day of November, 1876.

Q. By telegram ?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you receive any acceptance of your resignation ?

A. I did.

Q. When ?

A. On the 14th day of November.

Q. Was that by telegram ?

A. It was.

Q. Do you know J. B. Underwood, special agent of the Post-Office Department; and did you know him in November last ?

A. I did.

Q. What was done in reference to your office after your resignation, by you ?

A. On the 14th of November Mr. Underwood showed me a telegram that he said he had received from the Postmaster-General, directing him to take charge of the office, and I immediately delivered it to him, making my settlement with him, and turned everything over to him.

Q. Did you have a settlement with him ?

A. Yes, sir ; I settled the accounts of my office with him.

Q. Was the post-office kept by you, in what building, or in what relation to any other business ?

A. It was in my drug-store.

Q. Did it continue in that store ?

A. It did not.

Q. Where was it removed to, and when ?

A. It was removed about a block away from my store to the drug-store of Littlefield & Hill on the next morning.

Q. That was on the 14th ?

A. Yes. It was late in the afternoon when I arrived there by rail, and Mr. Underwood did not move it away that night. It was late in the evening, perhaps eight o'clock. It was locked up there, and the next morning it was taken over to the drug-store of Littlefield & Hill.

Q. Did you act as postmaster at all after the 14th of November, 1876 ?

A. I did not.

Q. Was the post office kept open there after that ?

A. It was not.

Q. Not at your place, but in the town ?

A. It was in the town ; not at my place.

Q. Who acted as postmaster in charge of the duties there ?

A. H. W. Hill, as I understood, was appointed by Mr. Underwood when he arrived. He remained there two or three days opening the new office, and he remained there perhaps the third day.

Q. And thereafter the duties of the office were performed not at all by you but by another person and at another place ?

A. It was. I performed no duties as postmaster after that time.

Cross-examined by Mr. GREEN :

Q. Were you a candidate for the office of elector of President of the United States, and Vice-President ?

A. I was.

Mr. EVARTS. I object to that inquiry, unless it is for the mere purpose of identification.

Mr. GREEN. That is all.

Mr. EVARTS. I admit that he is the same person.

Q. (By Mr. GREEN.) Where is Eugene, in the State of Oregon ?

A. Eugene City you have reference to ?

Q. I speak of the place.

A. At the head of the Willamette Valley.

Q. How far is it from La Fayette ?

A. I think about seventy-five miles ; perhaps a little more.

Q. Have you settled your accounts with the Post-Office Department as postmaster at La Fayette ?

A. It is not fully settled, in this way : There is a commission yet coming to me, and I had a few dollars that I did not pay over to Mr. Underwood. There was a commission due to me for part of that quarter and there were a few dollars kept back which would about balance, as we supposed. All the rest I paid to him ; every dollar.

Q. Have your accounts been adjusted by the auditing officers of the Post-Office Department ?

A. Not that I know of. I went to the Post-Office Department since I came here and inquired, and they said that they had immediately sent a full statement to me, but it had not reached there when I left there. I have not seen it.

Q. When did you leave Oregon ?

A. I think I left there about the 15th of December; I think it was on the 15th that I left home.

Mr. GREEN. Has the Commission confined us to testimony under the first offer of proof ?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. We have not passed upon the second offer yet.

The PRESIDENT. It has not been passed upon. If there are no further questions, Mr. Watts can step aside.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. Watts could identify those papers. They are in his own handwriting, some of them.

The PRESIDENT. Unless there are some further interrogatories, he can retire.

J. M. MCGREW sworn and examined.

By Mr. EVARTS :

Question. Does the settlement of postmasters' accounts come under your department ?

Answer. It does.

Q. Has the account of Mr. Watts, as postmaster, been settled by the Department ?

A. It has.

Q. As of what date are his emoluments and salary fixed by that settlement ?

A. To and including the 14th day of November, 1876. This is the last rendered by him.

Mr. EVARTS. I do not care to pursue the details unless it is required. The other side can cross-examine.

Cross-examined by Mr. GREEN :

Q. As the Sixth Auditor, Mr. McGrew, have you charge of the accounts of this postmaster ?

A. I have.

Q. When were his accounts audited ?

A. They were audited some time during the last of the month—during January.

Q. Fix, as near as your recollection serves, the date when they were audited.

A. His accounts were received in the office on the 11th day of December.

Q. And the action of the auditing department took place some time in the month of January, 1877 ?

A. It is impossible to give the exact date, as we have 30,000 accounts of that description to settle each quarter. It was settled some time during the last month.

The PRESIDENT. Is the testimony closed ?

Mr. EVARTS. I suppose it is.

The PRESIDENT. Anything further on the other side ?

Mr. HOADLY. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT. The argument will be resumed.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, in assigning at the outset of this discussion the dividing-line between the authority of the Government of the United States, by any legislation that it might think adequate and desirable, or in execution of the constitutional power of counting the votes without any legislation on the subject, and the authority of the respective States—the line that divided what belonged to the State and what might be the subject of inquiry to the Federal Government, observing constitutional limits on the one side and the other—the counsel for the objectors with whom I am associated laid down the proposition that the ultimate fact under the laws of the State in completion of the election by the certification of boards or officers charged with the completion of the final canvass was a point beyond which, in looking into the transactions of the State, the Federal Government could not go. We laid down at the same time the further proposition that this conclusion of the State's action was the principal fact that under the legislation of Congress was made the subject of any lawful certification, and that as that principal fact could not be overreached by any previous inquiry into the transaction of the State, so that principal fact could not be disparaged or falsified by any congressional authority exercised in certification of that fact.

The proposition as we then laid it down for Florida, we adhered to in the case of Louisiana; and the proposition as thus laid down we adhere to in the case of Oregon. We find in Oregon, as in Florida or Louisiana, that by its laws there is some final ministerial canvass, which, completed, shows what the election was; and we need only to look into the laws of this State, as of the other States, to see whether the apparent canvassing-board was one that had such authority under the laws of the State.

We have also asserted and adhered to but one proposition as to the powers and duties of this Commission. From the first and until now we have discarded any notion that you were a court or could exercise the powers of a court in inquiring into the actual facts of an election in the States. Not so, however, with the learned counsel who from time to time in the different stages of this matter have appeared as our opponents. The whole proposition as to Florida, on their part, was based upon the idea that you were a court, with the powers in quo warranto of a court, and were controlled in the exercise of those powers by no other consideration than seemed to you just in their exercise and as any other court would be governed in such exercise. The logic of that argument was accepted that if you had not that penetrating and purging power of a court, looking for and producing the very right of the matter as the election itself should disclose it, then our proposition that the evidence upon which we rested as the result of the State's action in producing electors in Florida was the "be-all and the end-all," unless some subsequent movement in that State might have displaced it.

When, then, we came to Louisiana—which differed not at all from Florida in the principles of law applicable to it on this point of the State's authority and the point of inquiry which repelled any further inquiry on your part—the principles then avowed were that the idea of your being a court with powers in quo warranto was wholly inadmissible, wholly inadmissible in the nature of the transaction, wholly inadmissible from the impassable barriers interposed by the Constitution. Indeed, these propositions which we had laid down in the Florida case, the support of these propositions in reason and authority, were all adopted and enforced as the doctrine of our opponents in the Louisiana case.

Now when we come to this case, even with more force and earnestness and with a greater reach and exhaustion of argument and authority, every proposition that either in the Florida or in the Louisiana case we contended for, upon this point, is avowed, is defended, is insisted upon by our opponents. Nor will it do for our learned friends to put their acceptance of these propositions upon the mere concession that this Commission has so decided and that further debate is inappropriate and unwarrantable. They have themselves in a prolonged discussion maintained, as matter of law and upon authority, not only the position that we took as to the action of a State bringing an elector into the execution of his power as an elector, but, as I understand the accomplished and experienced lawyer who yesterday presented the argument of our opponents, such a person is, until quo warranto, until certiorari, until some form of judicial contestation disturbs his position, not only a de facto but also a de jure representative of the office.

Never having had a doubt that before many weeks had passed the general judgment of the profession of this country would sustain these positions that we espoused, and that have been sanctioned by this Commission, I must yet confess that I did not expect so signal and immediate a confirmation of that expectation as the present and explicit avowal, espousal, and maintenance of these positions by our learned opponents, and I welcome this as a great and valuable aid in furnishing an answer to the irresponsible and rash comments that have been made in various relations, and especially in the public press, upon these controverted points of law, which have formed the material of the forensic discussions before this Commission and of its decisions.

I understand that in securing that unanimity of the profession so desirable in a community accustomed to look upon the law as the principal safeguard of the welfare of the state, this adherence of our opponents will go far to check any rising disposition to further public contest on the subject. You have decided questions of constitutional law; you have decided them in the presence of great agitations of the people, and you have decided them in a way that will establish them firm and sure principles in the future, when agitations shall take other complexions and be pushed in the interest of other parties. By what you have done, by what you shall do, the principles of the Constitution and the maintenance of the laws of this country in the great transaction of a presidential election are made certain, intelligible, rational, and sound.

Now in Oregon it is very plain that an election was held and through all its stages was conducted with an entire observance of the requirements of law, with an entire acceptance on the part of the whole population of the election and its result, up to the last stage of it, with every step unquestioned in its integrity, its justice, and its conformity to law. The result reached by the authentic canvass of the votes, by the proper authority, and in the proper presence, showed on each side the vote for electors, according to law, being upon general ticket, that three on the one side ran even with each other, three on the other side even with each other, except by the casual and unimportant disparity of a few votes as between the several candidates on the same ticket. All that has disturbed this result has occurred after the completion of the election and its certification as completed by the proper authority, after the final canvass and its certification by the officer of state charged with the duty of canvassing and certifying. That canvass remains of record now in the secretary of state's office, undisturbed, undisputed, unquestioned. That is the fact upon which the title of the electors for President and Vice-President for the State of Oregon rests. Thereafter there remains nothing to be done on the part of any official of that State, under the terms of the Constitution of the United States nothing whatever, and under the law of Congress there remains but one act to be performed, to wit, the provision by the executive of the State and the delivery to the electoral college that was elected of triple certificates to accompany as a formal authentication the action of the electoral college.

All that our learned friends urge as arguments upon what they consider an improvident, an unsound, and dangerous doctrine on our part, but urged only in anticipation of hearing our views, is that this result of the canvass of an election made matter of record according to the laws of a State might be falsified, might be perverted, might be destroyed by the process of certification, if we should hold that the form was greater than the substance. All those hypothetical suggestions are now brought in play as actual transactions occurring in the State of Oregon; and now the pretension that certification is paramount to the thing certified, not amendable by the thing certified, not amendable by the record which is the thing to be certified—all those propositions proceed from our opponents as their champions. They have not changed places with us, for we never occupied any such position. They have, however, assumed the propositions, from time to time, which were necessary and suitable for the particular occasions on which they used them. It has been convenient, as it seems to us, for this representation of diverse sentiments and opinions at different times, that they have not been presented by the same counsel. We have a change in the advocates attending a change in the propositions.

First, let us understand what is presented, in the shape of evidence, that bears upon the construction of what is contained in the certificates which are plenary evidence before you, they having been opened and transmitted by the President of the Senate. It is that Mr. Watts, holding a small post-office of the fourth class in the State of Oregon, appointed years before, was discharging the duties of that office on the 7th of November; that on the 14th of November he resigned his office, and his resignation was accepted; that thereafter the Department accepted the charge of the office and conducted it from that time forward, and that, as matter of fact, the office itself was changed from the place of business of Watts, the postmaster who resigned, to the place of business of the officer designated to take his place, Mr. Hill, having a drug-store, and then becoming immediately assistant postmaster under the special agent, and in due course of time receiving a commission as postmaster in full. Then Mr. Watts, whenever you come to consider, if you do, the question of whether he could be appointed an elector on the 6th of December, on his refusal to act upon his prior appointment, is unmistakably placed before you in the position of a postmaster who had resigned, and who had received from the Post-Office Department the acceptance of the trust that he had laid aside, which thenceforth was conducted by the Department itself under its agents.

I do not think that I need now to re-argue in the least either the question of ineligibility as justifying proof, or the question of whether an ineligible candidate is vested with an office until by some determination he is excluded from it. Whatever we said that received the assent of this Commission in the former arguments needs not to be repeated. Whatever was said that did not receive the assent of this Commission will be of no service in that regard if it be repeated. I shall therefore proceed with the inquiry into the validity of the vote of the three electors in the first certificate, as it rests upon the evidence in your possession proceeding from the State, delivered into the hands of the President of the Senate, and opened before the two Houses of Congress, and now deposited with you as evidence for you to regard.

What, then, does this certificate No. 1 contain? I ask your attention to the parts of it that I shall now designate. I ask attention to the certificate of the electors, commencing at the foot of page 3 of the printed paper. It is their certificate of the votes that they cast :

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Oregon, County of Marion, ss :

We, W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts, electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Oregon, duly elected and appointed in the year A. D. 1876, pursuant to the laws of the United States, and in the manner directed by the laws of the State of Oregon, do hereby certify that at a meeting held by us at Salem, the seat of government in and for the State of Oregon, on Wednesday, the 6th day of December, A. D. 1876, for the purpose of casting our votes for President and Vice-President of the United States—

A vote was duly taken, by ballot, for President of the United States, in distinct ballots for President only, with the following result :

The whole number of votes cast for President of the United States was three (3) votes.

That the only person voted for for President of the United States was Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio.

That for President of the United States Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, received three (3) votes.

In testimony whereof we have hereunto set our hands on the first Wednesday of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six.

W. H. ODELL.
J. C. CARTWRIGHT.
J. W. WATTS.

That is all that the Constitution of the United States requires. The twelfth article of the amendments is :

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President; * * * they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

That, then, is a discharge of the entire constitutional duty, and with the full certification of its discharge that the Constitution requires. What duty has been added by the act of Congress to be performed by the college of electors in this behalf? In the one hundred and thirty-eighth section of your revision this is their duty :

The electors shall make and sign three certificates of all the votes given by them, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, one of the votes for President and the other of the votes for Vice-President, and shall annex to each of the certificates one of the lists of the electors which shall have been furnished to them by direction of the executive of the State.

This paper contains no such list, we will suppose; but is it a failure of duty on the part of the electors? Is there even a presumption that they have received such paper, and have omitted to include it in their return? By no means. If any default, any imperfection in the duty of those electors is to be charged, it must be based on the fact that the executive furnished that college with the list as the act of Congress required the executive to do, and that they have omitted it; and we find as a part of the minutes of this electoral college a statement as to this matter of fact, whether that college was ever furnished with any of the lists that the executive of the State was trusted by the act of Congress to furnish. They make out a sworn statement before a proper magistrate, whose authority to administer the oath is certified by the secretary of state as a proper officer for that purpose :

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Oregon, County of Multnomah, ss :

We, J. C. Cartwright, W. H. Odell, and J. W. Watts, being each duly and severally sworn, say that at the hour of twelve o'clock m. of the (6th) sixth day of December

A. D. 1876, we duly assembled at the State capitol, in a room in the capitol building at Salem, Oregon, which was assigned to us by the secretary of state of the State of Oregon. That we duly, on said day and hour, demanded of the governor of the State of Oregon and of the secretary of state of the State of Oregon certified lists of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Oregon, as provided by the laws of the United States and of the State of Oregon; but both L. F. Grover, governor of the State of Oregon, and S. F. Chadwick, secretary of state of said State, then and there refused to deliver to us, or either of us, any such certified lists or any certificate of election whatever. And being informed that such lists had been delivered to one E. A. Cronin by said secretary of state, we each and all demanded such certified lists of said E. A. Cronin, but he then and there refused to deliver or to exhibit such certified lists to us, or either of us. Whereupon we have procured from the secretary of state certified copies of the abstract of the vote of the State of Oregon for electors of President and Vice-President at the presidential election held in said State November 7, A. D. 1876, and have attached them to the certified list of the persons voted for by us and of the votes cast by us for President and Vice-President of the United States, in lieu of a more formal certificate.

THOS. H. CANN,
Notary Public for State of Oregon.

What becomes now of the proposition of a State being defrauded of its vote in the electoral college when its electors, appointed according to the will of the people of the State, have assembled, discharged their constitutional duty, and are deprived by the executive of the State of the certified lists which it becomes a part of their duty, if they receive them from him, and only in such case, to append in verification? Which is it that is to stand, the electors made by the Constitution of the United States sufficient certifiers of their own action, made by the act of Congress only subject to the single duty besides of inclosing the lists that the governor may have given them? Here you have the electors meeting, voting, certifying, and transmitting, and showing that the absence of the governor's list arises from the governor's default and not their own, and that they have supplied the fact on which the governor's list must rest if it be lawful, the fact of the final canvass of the election, produced before you now here just as if you inspected it yourself in the office of secretary of state.

Now my friends are in the face of the proposition whether a fraudulent, or a perverse, or an ignorant governor can subtract or withhold the paper, and the electoral college be destroyed and the presidential vote be lost. If we were to proceed no further, I should ask, the governor's certificate withheld, was there any excuse for that, is there any pretense that it was delivered? Not the slightest. Nobody pretends that the governor of Oregon ever furnished those lists to the electoral college; nobody pretends that any messenger or intermediary of his ever delivered those lists to the electoral college. What is the language of the act of Congress in that behalf?

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet.

Is it to the college, to the body, or is it not? It is to the college or body. Did the governor ever deliver them to this college or to this body that was met? Did Mr. Cronin ever deliver them as the agent, of the governor to this college or body that was met? Its title to them was complete. The duty and obligation of the governor in this behalf were complete when the college was assembled at the capitol. No matter who composed it, whether Watts was a member or Cronin was a member, the papers were then to be delivered to the college, and their subtraction, their withholding, needs no description of fraud or contrivance. It was an absolute desertion of duty, and such desertions of duty are never gratuitous. They always have an object, and the result that followed is the object designed.

How is the act of Oregon in this behalf?

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

Was that done? If you employ an agent or messenger, instead of delivering with due formality and openly, as I venture to say has been done in every State in this Union, has been done in Oregon until this election, then you are responsible to see that the messenger or agent makes the delivery. I then say that this certification and action of this college are all that the Constitution and the laws of the United States require, and that on the face of this certificate, the college making its representations, and the knowledge of this college in respect to its majority of attending members being open to any inquiry, you are at once face to face with the proposition whether a subtraction, a suppression by the executive of the State of one of these lists, entitles both Houses of Congress to throw out the vote of the State.

But this certificate contains a great deal more. The occasion for its containing so much more is undoubtedly because of this violation of duty on the part of the executive of the State, but what does it contain? It contains an abstract of votes cast at the presidential election as on file in the secretary of state's office. It is the very canvass itself of every county for every candidate and in every figure that becomes the subject of tabulation.

SALEM, STATE OF OREGON:

I hereby certify that the foregoing tabulated statement is the result of the vote cast for presidential electors at a general election held in and for the State of Oregon on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, as opened and canvassed in the presence of his excellency L. F. Grover, governor of said State, according to law, on the 4th day of December, A. D. 1876, at two o'clock p. m. of that day, by the secretary of state.

[SEAL.]

S. F. CHADWICK,

Secretary of State of Oregon.

Besides this there is this certificate, the importance of which will appear from the citation of some of the statutes of Oregon which I shall mention:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OREGON, SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
Salem, December 6, 1876.

I, S. F. Chadwick, secretary of the State of Oregon, do hereby certify that I am the custodian of the great seal of the State of Oregon; that the foregoing copy of the abstract of votes cast at the presidential election held in the State of Oregon November 7, 1876, for presidential electors, has been by me compared with the original abstract of votes cast for presidential electors aforesaid, on file in this office, and said copy is a correct transcript therefrom and of the whole of the said original abstract of votes cast for presidential electors.

That is that transaction which, observed and attended to by the governor in a certificate, would give to his certificate the support in law if he had discharged the duty in fact:

In witness whereof I have hereto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Oregon the day and year above written.

[SEAL.]

S. F. CHADWICK,
Secretary of the State of Oregon.

Besides that there is this:

List of votes cast at an election for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States in the State of Oregon held on the 7th day of November, 1876.

FOR PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

W. H. Odell received fifteen thousand two hundred and six (15,206) votes.
 J. W. Watts received fifteen thousand two hundred and six (15,206) votes.
 J. C. Cartwright received fifteen thousand two hundred and fourteen (15,214) votes.
 E. A. Cronin received fourteen thousand one hundred and fifty-seven (14,157) votes.
 H. Klippel received fourteen thousand one hundred and thirty-six (14,136) votes.
 W. B. Laswell received fourteen thousand one hundred and forty-nine (14,149) votes.
 Daniel Clark received five hundred and nine (509) votes.
 F. Sutherland received five hundred and ten (510) votes.
 Bart Curl received five hundred and seven (507) votes.
 S. W. McDowell received three, (3,) Gray one, (1,) Simpson one, (1,) and Salisbury one (1) vote.

I, S. F. Chadwick, secretary of state in and for the State of Oregon, do hereby certify that the within and foregoing is a full, true, and correct statement of the entire vote cast for each and all persons for the office of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Oregon at the general election held in said State on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, as appears by the returns of said election now on file in my office.

[SEAL.]

S. F. CHADWICK,
 Secretary of State of Oregon.

There is the list by the executive authority of the State of Oregon so far as it was lodged in the office and committed to the secretary of state, so far as the great seal of the State affixed by the executive officer of the State having its custody could make a certification by a State. Who else is there in Oregon that can certify a list? Who has the list? Who has the seal? Who has the office both of record and of certification? The secretary of state. Supposing, then, that to be so for a moment, where do you find any defect of that in being an adequate compliance with the act of Congress and the act of Oregon that gives you a list of the persons appointed? You have nothing to do but to read the laws of Oregon and see that electors are to be appointed by election, and that in every election held in that State the persons that have the highest number of votes shall be declared elected—that is in the Constitution; and in the election laws “that the persons having the highest number of votes shall be deemed elected,” and then you discard all the rest as surplusage and unnecessary verification of the thing certified. What does it want under the act of Oregon? The act of Oregon requires a list to be given by the secretary of state under the great seal of the State, and only requires that the governor shall sign it. The governor, in pursuance of the great breach of trust and duty which he had meditated and was performing, refused his name to that certification. Does that cease to be a certification that the Congress of the United States will accept as an adequate observance of the directory duty that the executive authority of a State shall furnish lists of the persons appointed? I think not. We shall see by very brief references that under the laws of Oregon this paper now here before you is to you as matter of evidence precisely the same as if you had before you the original paper in the office of the secretary of state. I ask attention to the laws of Oregon, not printed in the little syllabus, that relate to the subject of evidence of public writings, at pages 253, 256, and 257 of the Oregon code. The constitutional provision is given in this pamphlet, page 137:

There shall be a seal of State, kept by the secretary of state for official purposes, which shall be called “the seal of the State of Oregon.”

The secretary of state shall keep a fair record of the official acts of the legislative assembly and executive department of the State.

The secretary of state, by the law of Oregon, is keeper of the action of the executive department of the State—and shall, when required, lay the same and all matters relative thereto before either branch of the legislative assembly.

The seven hundred and seventh section of the Oregon revision provides:

Every citizen of this State has a right to inspect any public writing of this State, except where otherwise expressed and provided by this code or some other statute. Every public officer having the custody of a public writing which the citizen has a right to inspect, is bound to give him on demand a certified copy of it on payment of the legal fees therefor, and such copy is primary evidence of the original writing.

The documents that are embraced within this duty of the secretary of State are named, so far as pertinent to this inquiry, on page 256, and within this certificate, as provided in section 738:

Whenever a copy of a writing is certified to be used as evidence, the certificate shall state that the copy has been compared by the certifying-officer with the original, and that it is a correct transcript therefrom, and of the whole of such original or of a specified part thereof. The official seal, if there be any, of the certifying-officer shall also be affixed to such certificate, &c.

Looking at this certificate, then, with the act of Congress before you in reference to certified lists that are to be used and employed, can you have any doubt that this contains all that is necessary to make action, the bona fide action, the complete lawful action, of the electors and of the State that had chosen them electors—the disparagement of the authentication under the act of Congress by the governor's withholding of his certificate, if unexplained, not affecting the certification by the electors, who have done their duty under the Constitution, and are chargeable with no want of duty under the act of Congress or under the act of Oregon?

We have, besides, the minutes of the college. Now are the electors a body? They are so described in the statutes of the United States; they are so described in the statutes of Oregon. They are necessarily a college under the power confided in them to fill vacancies, which both by the act of Congress and by the statutes of their respective States is confided to them.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Mr. Evarts, who made this list?

Mr. EVARTS. The original as now on file?

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Yes.

Mr. EVARTS. The secretary of state, as the canvassing-officer, in the presence of the governor, as I understand.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Permit me to ask if there is any law that you have discovered, Mr. Evarts, which permits the secretary of state to certify to a result drawn from certain figures before him, certain returns? Is it not simply that he can certify to any paper for what it is worth?

Mr. EVARTS. By reason of this general power?

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. EVARTS. He has given a certificate of the full paper; that is the canvass. All the rest is a transaction lower down in the election. These are all the counties of the State, all the votes returned, all the candidates voted for, the distribution and the tabulation, and was done by him in the presence of the governor.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I will call your attention to the certificate on the second page:

I hereby certify that the foregoing tabulated statement is the result of the vote cast for presidential electors, &c.

Mr. EVARTS. Yes.

As opened and canvassed in the presence of his excellency L. F. Grover, governor of said State.

That is canvassing; producing the tabulated vote from the votes forwarded from the precincts and counties is the canvass.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. The next says "copy of abstract."

Mr. EVARTS. Yes.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. "Compared with the original abstract of votes cast for presidential electors aforesaid on file in this office."

Mr. EVARTS. Yes; and the whole of it. Will any one tell me what else there was to canvass? What more can anybody do than take the returns? They cannot alter them; they are all to be opened, all to be canvassed, and the result produced. Whether you call it a result, provided it be a paper formal, complete, recorded, or whether you call it an abstract of the votes according to law, it is the transaction that the law confides to the officer, and it is its execution as he files it after he has performed the duty. You will see by the election laws that section 37 provides:

The county clerk, immediately after making the abstract of the votes given in his county—

The same word is used; that is his return; that is his canvass. The abstract is the canvass set down as the result—shall make a copy of each of said abstracts, and transmit it by mail to the secretary of state at the seat of government; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, state printer, justices of the supreme court, member of Congress, and district attorneys; and the governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes, and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person.

Then for the officers designated in regard to the election of President:

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists, &c.

There being no provision for a governor's commission or anything of that kind; but I will not repeat the argument of my learned associate, so effectually, as it seems to me, made, in regard to this operation. What I have to say to your honors is this, that you have included by authentication satisfactory to the laws of Oregon of the very canvass itself as it now appears of record in the department of state. There is no other canvass. The blotter or the slate in which there may have been a tentative addition of numbers is not the transaction of record. This is the very thing. It never existed as a canvass till it stood in that shape, and standing in that shape, it could acquire nothing additional, tolerate nothing additional.

In the minutes this board proceeds with its own transactions. The hour having arrived,

The meeting was duly organized by electing W. H. Odell chairman and J. C. Cartwright secretary.

The resignation of J. W. Watts, who was, on November 7, A. D. 1876, duly elected an elector of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Oregon. was presented by W. H. Odell, and, after being duly read, was unanimously accepted,

You have his resignation. It was a transaction in perfect good faith. It was in open day. It was matter of record in this college. It rested upon an uncertain opinion as to whether his having been postmaster destroyed his eligibility, whether it would destroy his vote; he refuses to act under that appointment for fear of that public injury to the State of Oregon. He did his duty in the college of electors. If Cronin was a member of the college and Cronin had attended and Cronin had part in the transactions, whatever was done by Watts was done openly and would be seen and known by Cronin as well as the others, and if there remained further controversy, further action of the college to determine who were the three, that would have been taken, that would have been recorded in the minutes; but of the principal fact, that Watts refused to act under his original appointment on the scruple that his State might thereby lose a vote that it was entitled to, the college proceed (the disability having been removed in their construction, and in yours, as I submit) to recognize the will of the people of Oregon in their selection of the person of Mr. Watts, a man known and trusted by that people, and gave him a title which, trusting to, the State of Oregon would not put in peril one of its votes.

Then the voting proceeds, and the ballots are here. The very ballots themselves, the originals that were deposited are here, each of them bearing the indorsement of the elector who deposited it. Therefore you have the election here, and now I should like to know whether under the Constitution of the United States, under the statute of 1792, under the law of Oregon about presidential elections, these minutes are not plenary proof of the action of that college, if that was a college. Did anybody ever pretend that the certificate named by the act of Congress was any part of the warrant of the electors to act in the college? No. It is to be delivered to the electors acting in the college in order that they may use it as part of their transaction. Who can contradict this? Who can be heard to contradict it? You have then this absolute proof. When this college convened and undertook to act, there were present the two men that without any impeachment had a perfect title to the office. There was present a third man, and there was nobody else present, and then the transaction went on.

I apprehend, therefore, that unless you hold that the want of the governor's certificate, its subtraction by the violation of the governor's duty, is sufficient to suppress the electoral college and the vote of the State, you have here everything that you need under the act of Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, without looking at the certificates which they put in in support of their title, out of abundant caution, in the abundant performance of duty, in order that it may be seen that the absence of any formality is not to be imputed to them from the absence of the principal fact on which and from which the formality derives its sole claim to existence.

We have another certificate, and this contains nothing that contradicts the other, nothing that by itself can stand on its own inspection as an adequate transaction. In the first place, what is the certificate of the governor? Does this comply with the act of Congress?

I, L. F. Grover, governor of the State of Oregon, do hereby certify that at a general election held in said State on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, William H. Odell received 15,206 votes, John C. Cartwright received 15,214 votes, E. A. Cronin received 14,157 votes, for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States;—

The syntax arrangement, perhaps, is a little at fault, but we begin after a semicolon thus :

being the highest number of votes cast at said election for persons eligible, under the Constitution of the United States, to be appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, they are hereby declared duly elected electors as aforesaid for the State of Oregon.

That is a negative pregnant. The disparity of votes is shown. The fact of election on a general ticket is matter of law in the State. You have in the other certificate the clear certification of how the fact was as to who had the highest number of votes. Now this governor has undertaken by the insertion of the word "eligible" to cover himself from the condemnation of open and recognized fraud and falsehood, and he has undertaken by giving a reason, instead of obeying the constitution and laws of Oregon, to save himself from having absolutely deserted his duty. If there ever was a State that had taken every precaution to provide that all these suggestions, all these surmises, that by some method of construction, by some usurpation of power, others than the men who received the highest number of votes could be deemed elected anywhere, in that State the constitution and the laws of Oregon had so provided. Why was not the word "eligible" put into the constitution and put into the laws as determining who should be the product of an election, who should be declared the product of an election, who should be treated as the product of an election? The constitution provides, as you have seen, that—

In all elections held by the people under this constitution, the person or persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected.

Concede for the moment that electors are not within that clause of the constitution, nevertheless this shows what the constitutional law of Oregon was with respect to what makes an election; and when the legislature has determined that the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States shall be produced by the method of election, and when they have a law which is not limited to anything except the question whether the election is in the State and ascribes the efficacy of the highest number the case is complete and final, as they do in this clause:

In all elections in this State the person having the highest number of votes for any office shall be deemed to have been elected.

That is section 40. But in the election law you will find the strongest provision as to the highest number of votes in the instance when it does prevent an election, because there are two for the same office having the highest number of votes. In section 36:

If the requisite number of county or precinct officers shall not be elected by reason of two or more persons having an equal and the highest number of votes for one and the same office, the clerk whose duty it is to compare the polls shall give notice to the several persons so having the highest and an equal number of votes to attend at the office of the county clerk at a time to be appointed by said clerk, who shall then and there proceed publicly to decide by lot which of the persons so having an equal number of votes shall be declared duly elected; and the said clerk shall make and deliver to the person thus declared elected a certificate of his election as hereinbefore provided.

Had the clerk a right to discharge the duty limited to casting votes and the imperative obligation to declare the one who received the lot—had the clerk the right to substitute for that duty a determination that there were no two persons that had received the highest number of votes, and the lot was not required, because he thought one of them was not eligible? But the clerk has in regard to those officers every power that the governor has in regard to the other officers, (see section 37:)

In case there shall be no choice by reason of any two or more persons having an equal and the highest number of votes for either of such offices—

the governor shall by proclamation order a new election to fill said offices.

Is not that an imperative duty on the governor when there are two having the highest number of votes? The law of Oregon is that disqualification does not elect the other, and that in that case there must be a new election; and has this governor the authority to determine that, instead of having a new election, he will commission the one, not that has the highest number of votes—for that is inscrutable, they being equal—but the one that he thinks is eligible? What becomes of the right of the people to have a new election? They voted for the men; they have produced that result; and they are entitled to the consequence of the election.

What then is the title? What does it rest upon? It is quite immaterial to you what the Cronin title in the abstract is. The point for you to determine is, which of these colleges is to be counted. There cannot be two colleges. When the civil law lays down the proposition that tres facit collegium, it lays it down in the assertion of a principle, not by an arbitrary rule. The principle of a college is that the majority governs, and that principle cannot be applied to a less number than three. One man is not a college; two men are not a college, for there is not a majority there unless it be unanimity. Unanimity is not the essence of a college. So long as people are unanimous they proceed in their natural rights as individuals; but three make a college because the vital principle of a college is that the majority exercise the power of the college; and here what have you before you? A college of three; a college assembled; and what is Cronin's account of it? That all three met, and instead of saying anything short he undertakes to say that they refused to act as electors of President and Vice-President. Will you allow his statement, backed by the certifying names of two men who were not present—for they came in afterward and were chosen electors by Cronin, after the transaction upon which he bases the formation of his college—will you allow Cronin's statement that these two men resigned, declined, remitted, deserted the duty of voting for President of the United States to outweigh their own certificate, their own action, their own return, their own ballots that are here before you? I should think not. And if you are bound to look at the matter upon the legal question whether the majority of the college can fill the vacancy or whether the minority of the college can fill the vacancy, each having assumed to do it, you will have no great trouble in determining that the majority anchors the college to itself, and that the minority is no college at all.

Supposing it to be true that these electors did not recognize Cronin, did not regard him as an elector; they had the right to that judgment. Nobody else, I think, regarded him as such except upon the experimental invention of him to see whether he could be manufactured to stand until after the counting of this vote. But did you ever hear that when a bank director or a member of any corporation or of any board, municipal or civil, under the Government of the United States or under the government of any State, did not recognize the title of one man claiming to be a member of that board, anything happened except that he was excluded, and if he was wrongfully excluded he must right himself by law? Other parties might question whether the action of the board taken after that exclusion was or was not lawful. But did you ever hear that the exclusion of a member of the board, lawful or unlawful, just or unjust, authorized him to go and fill the board and go on with business? I think that is as great a novelty in the law of colleges, of civil boards, of governmental boards, or of private boards, as was ever suggested. If you depart from the proposition that whatever may have happened in respect to Cronin of injustice or exclusion, that did not make him the college, you have this absurd possibility in a State like Oregon, that you would have three colleges, each man preferring to throw the votes his own way and by his own authority. But if you adopt the rule that the majority constitutes the college, you put yourself under the protection of the principle which governs all corporate action, that there can be but one college, one board, because the majority draws to itself all the powers of the board.

Now look at the very peremptory direction of the law of Oregon in respect to the conduct of the board when it meets to discharge its duty—section 59 :

The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day ; and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college.

Can you have a plurality of votes when only one vote is cast ?

And when all the electors shall appear or the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled, as above provided, &c.

They are not allowed to go on ; they are not allowed to act for the State of Oregon until they are possessed of the means of casting its whole vote.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Permit me to ask you, Mr. Evarts, what would be the case if two of the electors had died since the election ? There is but one left in the land of the living ; must the State lose its two votes or three ?

Mr. EVARTS. If the whole three have died ?

Mr. Representative ABBOTT. No ; if two have died and there is but one left ?

Mr. EVARTS. If two have died and there is one left, the State ought to exercise a power reserved to it to treat the election as having failed, or it may be the votes would be lawful. There is no existing law of Oregon, and no existing law of any State, that in its terms covers the case of there not being a college to proceed to fill vacancies. There can be no college when you are reduced to one. You have an elector, I agree, and it is certainly undesirable that the State should lose its votes. That I agree, and I agree that an honest effort to present the vote to the Congress here acting on the subject should receive every indulgence on the part of the political authority that deals with the question, but I certainly cannot as matter of law admit either under the act of Congress or—

Mr. HOADLY. Will you permit a question ? Does the word "plurality" there refer to plurality of the original number elected, or of those remaining after the vacancy ?

Mr. EVARTS. There is nothing that confines it to the whole number. It is a clear authority to them to choose by the plurality of a quorum.

Mr. HOADLY. To those remaining ?

Mr. EVARTS. Of those remaining ; but that does not touch the question of whether there should or should not be a quorum to act. The ordinary rule of corporations and colleges is that a majority of a quorum is equivalent to a majority of the whole. There must be some statute to the contrary. This college of electors consisted of the two men clearly chosen, that are not blotted out by any evidence before you, except the certificate of Cronin, not that they refused to act with him, but he says they refused to act as electors. Where is his evidence? Where is the record? Where are the minutes? Where is the notice in writing? Where is the absenteeism? That is not certified to; but they refused to act as electors, and he then proceeded to fill their places by his single vote.

Now, whether or not under the laws of some States that faculty could reside in a single elector, it does not reside in a single elector by the act of Oregon. Oregon had, by the provisions of the electoral law of the Union, power to provide for a failure of election. What was that? It was when the election failed, when there was no production of enough electors, if you please, to meet the true exigency of the law in that behalf, if it required a majority to be produced by an election; and it is in that case, and in that case only, that the State is allowed by the United States law to substitute in the place of the regular mode of election some secondary method. But it does not require the State to provide a different mode of filling a vacancy arising from a failure to elect, from the mode that they adopt for filling a vacancy arising in any other manner. Oregon has settled that question for itself, that in whatever way, on the very day of casting the electoral vote, a vacancy in the college should exist, it should be filled. Thus, while the Constitution makes it absolutely necessary that there should be a personal attendance to cast a vote, and that a majority cannot cast an absent vote, because the voting is to be by ballot, and the ballots are to be counted, the State determines that by no chance will it lose a vote if there be persons present on that day who can fill the places and save the State its full representation in the electoral college.

The State of Rhode Island, finical as it was in its legislation, instead of making a better arrangement than this of Oregon and the other States, placed itself under a much worse system, according to the judicial opinion given by the supreme court of that State. Suppose that when the legislature of that State undertakes by a new appointment to fill the vacancies originating from a failure of the people to elect, it should be found that the legislature has filled the vacancy by a person who, when he comes to the college, proves himself to be disqualified, what is to happen in that State then? The legislature has not given to the college the plenary power to fill vacancies. The resignation or withdrawal of the disqualified elector will not allow the college to fill his place. The same vice inheres in the choice by the legislature of an unqualified person that would arise from such an election by the people, and the State must lose the vote. To be sure, practically, in a State like Rhode Island, where the governor by blowing his horn at the door of the executive mansion can summon the legislature as the farmer's wife calls to dinner the hands from the hay-field, there would be no difficulty in suddenly supplying the vacancy; but for the great State of Oregon, where there were found insuperable difficulties in getting the legislature together, no such arrangement would be either wise or suitable.

Now, upon an examination of all these certificates I have been quite gratified to find that, although these operators up in Oregon were as harmless as serpents, they were also no wiser than doves. Nothing has been done there that defeats the Constitution of the United States, that defrauds the State of Oregon, that defeats the election of President. All that has resulted from the attempt to perpetrate and consummate a fraud is to exhibit the fraud to public condemnation; but the safety of the State remains unharmed.

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, it would certainly be extremely grateful to me if I could pass by in acquiescing silence the expressions of satisfaction which the learned counsel who last addressed you was pleased to use at the supposed fact that we of counsel who have been conducting these cases on behalf of the people of the United States had finally, in the vicissitudes to which the cases have been subjected, come to believe in and accept as the law of the land those principles which he and his learned friends had advanced in the beginning of the discussion as the proper and correct rules of law upon which the matters submitted to this Commission should be solved and settled, and which, as he claims, have passed into the judgments of this tribunal. I do not wish to criticise those judgments and shall refrain from any such unpleasant office, but when my personal opinion is challenged or demanded, I should be doing a gross injustice to the profession and to myself if I seemed to acquiesce in the accuracy of the statement made by the counsel. I wish it were different; I lament that the statement is not accurate in every particular, for surely there can be no greater satisfaction to a member of the legal profession than to feel that in the discharge of a conscientious duty he can with all his ability and all his efforts maintain as the law of the land those principles that have passed into solemn adjudication, whether they be the adjudications of courts or the adjudications of tribunals exercising the highest political authority of the country. For myself, as to these principles I occupy now the same position in reference to their conformity to constitutional law and the ordinary rules of justice that I did when I entered upon the office of opening the debate upon the case of the State of Florida; but I must accept, I am compelled to accept, whether I approve or not, the judgment of those tribunals having the authority to pronounce judgment in the premises; and in the argument of cases before the tribunal by which those judgments have been pronounced, and before which they must be respected, it becomes my duty to those I represent and my duty to myself, to conform my arguments and positions to the rules they have laid down and as far as possible adapt my positions to the rulings that have been made; and therefore in the argument of the case of Oregon I shall address myself to this tribunal in an appeal that they shall adhere to what they have already determined and give to Oregon the benefit of the application of the same principles they have applied to Florida and to Louisiana.

It is unquestionably true that if the adjudications referred to had the acceptance and approval of the whole profession of the country, you would have accomplished a result going far to pacify the public mind, and calm the agitations of the public heart, but nothing you can now do will be so effectual in lashing that heart into a higher condition of excitement than to challenge by decisions that are to follow the decisions you have already given.

When we opened the discussion upon the case of Florida, I maintained before this Commission that it was competent for you, in the exercise of the powers vested in you under the organic act, which made you the recipient of all the powers, whether judicial or legislative, in this particular, possessed and capable of being exercised by the two Houses of Congress conjointly or separately, to go behind the certificate of the executive of the State upon charges of mistake or fraud; I speak of the certificate of the executive of the State authorized and directed by the Congress of the United States. In the case of Florida, in addition to claiming for this tribunal the power referred to, we claimed for you the further power to give heed to the voice of the State herself when, after her tones had been simulated by those not authorized to speak for her, she came to the Federal Government through the different departments of her State government, asserting the fact that she had not been truly represented in the electoral college and asking you to hear the voice of her people as testified to by those departments. Her executive, her legislative, and her judicial departments came before you and asked that the opinion of her people might be truly reflected in the estimate to be made of the sentiment of the country upon which was to be founded the title to the succession of the Presidency of the United States.

The learned counsel on the other side took issue upon these positions, and this tribunal determined that there was no authority in this organization to go behind the certificate of the governor authorized by the act of Congress, when founded upon the results of the canvassing-board of the State. But I have always been at a loss to know, I have always been unable to discover, where the tribunal learned that in the case of Florida there ever had been a canvass of the votes of that State by any board other than that which was authenticated in the certificate of the so-called Tilden electors, made under the authority of the act of the 27th of January, 1877, and I therefore infer that whatever may have been in the private opinions of the Commissioners the significance of those words relating to the conformity of the certificate of the governor to the results of the canvassing-board, the true and real meaning of the judgment of the tribunal was that the certificate of the governor was the conclusive fact, the ultimate fact, beyond which you had no power to go.

The learned counsel who opened this case on behalf of the objectors to certificate No. 2, thought proper, in the exercise of a wise and discriminating judgment as to the merits of men, to pay a high compliment to his distinguished associate who has just addressed the Commission. I fully coincide in the high compliment he thought proper to pay to that distinguished gentleman. He spoke of him as the modern pilot in the law, equal in learning and wisdom, upon its vast sea, to guide safely the bark of professional enterprise at whose helm he was placed between Scylla and Charybdis, and challenged in that behalf the fame of old Palinurus. It needed no disclosure from the counsel on the other side to satisfy this Commission that when the bark of the counsel on the other side was tossed against the Scylla of Florida, the pilot looked ahead to the Charybdis that threatened peril in Oregon. It was apparent from the discussion that such was the preconceived purpose of the voyage, and now it is established from the admission. But adroitly as he may have led on his way, if this Commission adheres to the course to which the helm was set to shun the reefs of Florida, the bark must be wrecked on those of Oregon.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, looking to the exact words of the decision in the case of Florida, what is it?

The ground of this decision, stated briefly as required by said act, is as follows:

That it is not competent under the Constitution and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Florida on, and according to, the determination and declaration of their appointment by the board of State canvassers of said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not.

In the case of Louisiana the same identical words are repeated in the decision. Now, are we to infer that there is any particular virtue in the decision either of the returning-board of Florida or the returning-board of Louisiana? Is there anything particularly sacred in either of those organizations, and so powerful as to prevent intrusion from the Federal Government into those States, or to check you in the solemn and serious inquiries you were asked to make? No; the answer has been given by the learned counsel on the other side himself, which was this: that when the United States, in executing the duty confided to the two Houses of Congress of counting the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, meet with an authentication from a State, under its laws they were thereby arrested and debarred from any further proceeding. You may pass beyond the certificate of the governor, if given in pursuance of the act of Congress, for that certificate is not given in the discharge of a State duty confided to the governor by State law, but that certificate is given in response to what purports to be a mandatory act of Congress, but what in fact is simply a Federal request; and which is given in recognition of such request and under the rules of courtesy rather than from the obligations of law.

But, in this inquiry, how far shall you go, and where shall you stop? You go behind the certificate, as you have decided, until you find some authentication of the fact with reference to which you are inquiring, made under the authority and by virtue of a power in the State herself. When, in the case of Florida and Louisiana, you passed by the certificate of the governor, given in obedience to the act of Congress, and found yourselves confronted with the results arrived at of a returning-board, you said, "Here we must stop, for here the State has challenged Federal power, and bade it take no further step in invading the State and the matters of self-government." It was not the result of the canvass; it was not any virtue in the board; it was not because of any sanctity in Wells or Casanave or their associates, but it was because when you reached them you reached the broad seal of the State, affixed as evidence to a State fact, under State law, and by State authority.

It is needless for me to say that the greatest difficulty the fathers of this Republic encountered in the organization of our complex system was, so to adjust its relations and powers that community independence might be preserved in the States and local self-government perpetuated to those organizations, and under such limitations and restrictions that while this power was left unimpaired there should be adequate authority given to the central authority of the Union to deal with our foreign affairs, and preserve and perpetuate the combination of States and peoples that was formed and united under the Constitution of the United States. To mark that dividing-line between the States and the Federal Government was the most difficult office those extraordinary men were called on to perform; and they performed it so well, so wisely, and so perfectly that perpetual harmony and perpetual peace would reign in this country, in so far as any internecine strife could ever disturb the one or the other, if each of these great powers, the Federal Government of the Union and the local governments of the States, would move in those respective orbits upon which they were propelled by the fathers of the republic. In regarding the respective rights of these political organizations, the Federal Government, speaking, as I understand your decisions, through the adjudications of this tribunal, has said that as the appointment of the electors is given to the States by special grant of power, as the appointment of the electors is a power in the States, and the States are required to exercise that power, when they have done so, we will go no further into the inquiry as to the propriety of State action than the authentication of the State act by the great seal of the State; and whenever we find that seal affixed to the ultimate fact under the authority of State law, and by the sanction of the State organization, there we must stop.

If that is not the meaning of the decision, then we are here dealing with the smallest matters of technical law, and indulging in something similar to pleas and replications and rejoinders and rebutters and surrebutters and demurrers indefinite, and settling the rights of forty million people upon technicalities and subtleties that any one of the distinguished gentlemen I now address would scout and discard if introduced into his court in any case involving even the smallest and most insignificant right. Your decision must rest, if it rests at all in the confidence of the people, upon the doctrine of State rights in their relation to the rights of the Federal Union. It must rest in the confidence of the people, if it find repose in their confidence at all, upon some broad principle which they can comprehend and understand, and which, comprehending and understanding, they will recognize and accept, and even in the anguish of their disappointment welcome and cherish as wise and judicious, because it comes from wise and judicious men, and is commended by sound and broad reasoning.

But if these questions are to be settled upon any such narrow and technical grounds as my brothers on the other side contend for, the wound which this Commission was organized to heal in the nation they will only make bleed the freer; and for four years to come the American people, while submitting to legitimate authority, will recognize that there is in this country the anomalous condition of two Presidents, one a President de facto, and another a President de jure though not in office.

I was pleased at first to hear my learned brothers on the other side commend the doctrine of State rights with so much apparent zeal; but I felt their want of earnestness and sincerity, and as I listened to their disquisition upon this subject there was brought vividly to my mind the saddest, grandest, and most transcendent event in the history of the human race: They took him and they clothed him with purple; planted as the insignia of royalty a crown of thorns upon his brow; they put a reed within his hand for a scepter, and fell down before him in the mockery of adoration. When the sacrifice was accomplished, the veil of the temple was rent and darkness was spread upon the face of the earth.

There is a people to-day scattered over the world, inhabitants of every country, but without a home or country of their own.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, in what particular does the law of Louisiana or the law of Florida, in reference to the ascertainment of the result of the appointment of electors, differ from the law of Oregon? By the law of Florida a board is appointed that is required to canvass the returns and determine the result. Similar language, but hardly so strong, is used in the law of Louisiana. Now, what is the law of Oregon upon this subject? Section 60, which has been frequently read, provides:

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress.

And, as was very properly remarked by one of the learned counsel, that ends that paragraph and terminates the duty of canvassing.

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors—

What electors? Not those that have received the highest number of votes, but—two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

Here is an executive duty to be performed. The electors that are elected are to receive this certificate. Who is to determine who is elected? Is not that office confided to the parties who are engaged by the mandate of the law in this transaction?

“Prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected.” They must determine who are the parties elected. In Florida the returning-board was given the power to determine the result and required to report to the office of the secretary of state of Florida all the votes taken, giving a specific account of those they deemed proper in the exercise of their questionable jurisdiction to throw out, as well as all others. All the votes sent to them were to be returned or lists of all the votes sent to them were to be returned; but this tribunal held that the power of determination was in that board. Now, although the word “determine” is not in the section quoted from the law of Oregon, yet the act which the section requires to be performed is an act which cannot be performed unless preceded by a determination. The lists are to be lists of the electors elected. The canvass is to be conducted as is the canvass for members of Congress, and provision is made for certificates. The act as to the canvass for members of Congress is as follows:

And it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, State printer, justices of the supreme court, member of Congress, and district attorneys; and the governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes, and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person.

In the case of members of Congress and certain State officers the provision is that the governor shall grant a certificate or a commission to the person having the highest number of votes. The section that relates to electors, though it refers to the section relating to members of Congress, requires the canvass to be conducted in the same manner in which the canvass required by that section is conducted, yet omits—and omitting in the presence of the thing omitted shows that it was before their minds—omits the requirement in the section in reference to members of Congress to the effect that the executive should perform simply the ministerial office of giving the commission to the party who, by the enumeration to be made by the secretary of state, should be shown to have the greatest number of votes.

I submit, in this connection, that to withhold the commission or to withhold the certificate from a party deemed by the governor to be ineligible to the office, is the legitimate performance of a constitutional and proper executive trust. This Commission has told us that the State cannot interfere with an elector, whether he be eligible or ineligible, whether his election be secured by fair means or foul means, after the time when he has cast his vote. You have further told us that he cannot be interfered with except between the time of the conclusion of the returning-board and the time of his voting, which in Florida was, I believe, some six hours, and in Louisiana some four or five. The State of Oregon, seeking to perform her duty, and its much-abused executive seeking to protect that State from the odium of having wantonly violated the Constitution of the United States, when the subject of the election of these electors came before him, entered upon the consideration of the matter which he and he alone could consider and determine, and the State by the only power at her command at that time—the time to which she was limited by your decision—has solemnly determined that one who claimed to be elected an elector was not elected.

I beg to refer you, gentlemen of the Commission, upon the subject of the executive duty in that regard, to the thirty-ninth volume of Missouri

Reports, page 399. I shall not have an opportunity of reading largely from these authorities; but, as the President of the Commission remarked yesterday, the members of the Commission have no opportunity to examine them after the argument, and they must therefore rely upon counsel for whatever information they have in regard to them, I feel compelled to read a few pertinent extracts. The case is that of Bartley vs. Fletcher, governor:

The governor is bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and he has taken an oath to support the Constitution.

By the laws of Oregon, which my brother Hoadly hands me to read to the Commission, I find a more careful provision than is to be found in the laws of most of the States of the Union:

The organic law is the Constitution of the United States and of this State, and is altogether written. Other written laws are denominated statutes. The written law of this State is, therefore, contained in its constitution and statutes and in the Constitution and statutes of the United States.—Section 712, page 253.

Oregon, therefore, in her reverence for the supreme law of the United States, has not allowed her obligation to the Constitution of the United States to rest only on its authority as the Constitution of the Federal Government, but she has incorporated it into her own laws and made it a part of her State system of laws; and the governor, having taken his oath to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, as required by her constitution, when a candidate for elector comes before him demanding a certificate of the fact that he is an elector under the broad seal of that State, having due regard to his oath and reverence for the Constitution of the United States, and being satisfactorily informed that such applicant is by the Constitution of the United States inhibited from holding the appointment or being appointed, is compelled to refuse to certify to a statement which would be a falsehood, and therefore in direct violation of both the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of Oregon and his oath as governor of Oregon.

Gentlemen talk about simulated virtue, and the learned counsel went on to speak of our simulating virtue, and severely condemned the governor of Oregon, and, I may remark, went further, and I regretted to hear him as he proceeded. There are few men in the profession for whom I have a higher respect, and it pained me to hear his unbecoming intimations of conspiracies in Gramercy Park, and various telegrams between Oregon and New York. He stated that no such evidence had been offered; but, with significant insinuations, indicated what he might have done if such evidence had been in the case or if he had offered it. Had you offered it, gentlemen, we should have interposed no objection to its introduction. We should have welcomed it and rejoiced at it. We have been seeking for the truth and nothing but the truth, and begged for evidence from the beginning, and you well knew that any offer you might have made would have been met otherwise than by technical objections. A fling at us and those we represent, made under the pretexts of testimony not even offered, hardly reaches the dignified plane of professional honor upon which we supposed we all stood in the conduct of this great debate.

The governor of Oregon could not have given the certificate to an ineligible candidate without violating his oath and being guilty of an infraction of the Federal Constitution. Let me read further from the case in 39 Missouri Reports:

In the correct and legitimate performance of his duty he must inevitably have a discretion in regard to granting commissions; for should a person be elected or appointed who was constitutionally ineligible to hold any office of profit or trust, would the executive be bound to commission him when his ineligibility was clearly and positively proven? If he is denied the exercise of any discretion in such case, he is made the violator of the constitution, not its guardian. Of what avail, then, is his oath of office?

Need I pursue this inquiry further? Need I go on to the subsequent decisions of that State and show to this Commission that that opinion stands as the unreversed law of that State to-day? Although the counsel on the other side referred to an opinion as tending to change and modify the ruling I have read, I would, had I time left me, analyze it and show to the Commission that the case referred to in no way changes the law as pronounced in the opinion read, and that this law is to-day the law of Missouri; it is the law of Indiana; it is the law of Massachusetts; and the governor of that State, in the exercise of his functions, may withhold a certificate and refuse to fix the broad seal of the State when the party claiming it is not capable of being appointed to the office title to which it would evidence.

Now, suppose that the governor issues his certificate, what is the effect of that certificate when issued? When he has exercised his power, and issued his certificate, and affixed the seal of the State to the certificate, that certificate so accompanied by the seal is conclusive evidence of the title and cannot be questioned except in a regular legal proceeding for the purpose of invalidating the commission. As the counsel on the other side correctly said, when we entered into this inquiry and commenced this investigation, we asked that this tribunal should proceed as though exercising the powers of a court under a quo warranto, and search all the facts to the very bottom. But he was in error when he said that the argument of inconvenience came from our side, and that Mr. O'Connor had stated that we could stop at a certain convenient point, and suggested that it would be prudent and wise in your discretion to stop at a certain period of the investigation. The argument of inconvenience, in order that you might thereby be induced not to make the inquiries the people hoped and desired you would make, came from my learned friend who now sits upon my right, [Mr. Evarts,] and was pressed with all his great powers of logic and eloquence; and to meet that argument we replied that, if you found it so inconvenient that you could not investigate all the facts, there was a discretionary power in the exercise of which you could limit the scope of the inquiry when you had reached a point at which you became satisfied that you had found the truth.

This certificate when issued is conclusive evidence of the title, only to be impeached by a judicial proceeding, as I have indicated. Such was the decision of the court of last resort in Massachusetts upon questions submitted to it by the executive department of the government. Other authorities to the same effect will be found in the brief which has been handed to you; and I am constrained, I regret to say, from the quick passage of my time, to leave that subject thus superficially considered.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. Merrick, is there a Massachusetts decision of the supreme court on that question? Was not that in Maine?

Mr. MERRICK. There is one in Massachusetts as well as in Maine.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I remember now; there is one in 117 Massachusetts.

Mr. MERRICK. One hundred and seventeen Massachusetts. Shall I pass it to the Commissioner?

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I remember it very well. I have read it. I thought you alluded to another one.

Mr. MERRICK. The language is :

The nature of the duties thus imposed and the very terms of the statute show that they are to be performed without unnecessary delay, and the certificate issued by the governor to any person appearing upon such examination to be elected is the final and conclusive evidence of the determination of the governor and council as to his election.

The learned counsel upon the other side, in order to derogate from the effect of the certificate and the seal, refers the Commission to the case of the United States vs. Le Baron, in 19 Howard, from which he quoted a single sentence. I looked at the book and found it to be an authority in direct opposition to the point for which it had been referred to :

When a person has been nominated to an office by the President, confirmed by the Senate, and his commission has been signed by the President, and the seal of the United States affixed thereto, his appointment to that office is complete.

The sentence quoted by the counsel on the other side was this :

The transmission of the commission to the officer is not essential to his investiture of the office.

We were left to infer that the word "transmission" included everything that appertained to the execution and the issuing of the commission. The following sentence is :

If by any inadvertence or accident it should fail to reach him, his possession of the office is as lawful as if it were in his custody.

The PRESIDENT. Who gave the opinion ?

Mr. MERRICK. Mr. Justice Curtis gave the opinion.

It is but evidence of those acts of appointment and qualification which constitute his title, and which may be proved by other evidence, where the rule of law requiring the best evidence does not prevent.

The governor issued his certificate to Cronin and two others, so-called Hayes electors. Cronin held his certificate, and by virtue of that certificate, whether rightfully or wrongfully issued, I respectfully submit that he was an officer de facto ; and I was gratified to hear the reply of the counsel on the other side to the question submitted by Mr. Commissioner Morton, I think, as to whether or not, if there was an officer de facto in the actual possession of the office, there could be a vacancy ? Counsel replied promptly there could not. Who, then, was the incumbent of this office ? Who had the office on the day that the electors voted, Cronin or Watts ? Cronin held the certificate with the broad seal of the State attached to it. He had the muniment of title to the office, that which by the act of Congress is made the muniment of title or evidence and that which is made evidence or a muniment of title by the law of the State. What had Watts ? Says the learned counsel on the other side in considering the evidence of title, Watts had a certificate from the secretary of state as to the canvass of the votes. What is it ? Concede for a moment that there is in this certificate No. 1 a duly-certified copy of some record in the office of the secretary of state, what does it purport to be ? It is headed :

Abstract of votes cast at the presidential election held in the State of Oregon November 7, 1876, for presidential electors.

"Abstract of votes," not the canvass of the votes. The learned counsel, in order to make it appear that "abstract" and "canvass" were synonymous terms, referred back to the statutes of Oregon which required the clerks at the voting-precincts to make out certain abstracts and send them up to the secretary of state. This is the result of those abstracts so sent up by the clerks, and of which abstracts the law of Oregon is speaking when it requires the secretary of state and the gov-error to canvass. When they have canvassed these abstracts their canvass makes another paper, which should be a paper of record in that office, and which is not here in this certificate.

I hereby certify that the foregoing tabulated statement is the result of the vote cast for presidential electors.

“Is the result of the vote cast.” He certifies to results, not that it is a paper on file purporting to reflect the canvass as made, but that it is the result of the vote cast for presidential electors at a general election. Again:

I, S. F. Chadwick, secretary of the State of Oregon, do hereby certify that I am the custodian of the great seal of the State of Oregon; that the foregoing copy of the abstract of votes cast at the presidential election held in the State of Oregon, November 7, 1876, for presidential electors, has been by me compared with the original abstract of votes cast for presidential electors.

What “abstract of votes”? The abstract of votes that my learned brother found called for by a preceding section of the law anterior to that which refers to the secretary of state, namely, the abstract that is to be sent up by the clerks who officiate in that capacity at the election-precincts; not the canvass of the votes which the law requires to be made by the secretary of state in the presence of the governor.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Mr. Merrick, let me ask you whether, if that paper contains all the abstracts of votes sent up by the clerk of each county, it is not all that the secretary had before him, and all that he could compare? What other paper could he make?

Mr. MERRICK. May it please your honor, in my experience in these cases I have found that officers discharging duties corresponding to that imposed by the statutes of Oregon upon the secretary of state could make other and very remarkable papers.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I should like to ask you one question, if you please, in that connection, Mr. Merrick. When they opened and canvassed the vote, what else would their conclusion be but a result? What would be worked out by the canvass? Then is not the word “result” a correct expression used to express the legal conclusion or determination or whatever the canvass brings them to? When they certify that this is the result, do they not certify that this is the conclusion to which this canvassing-board have come?

Mr. MERRICK. I do not so understand. I understand there is great force in the suggestion of Mr. Commissioner Hoar, as there is force in all that he says, but I do not understand that we can substitute in such papers as these one word for another, and put in some expression that may enable us to give to them an easy and satisfactory construction. I understand that we must take the language as we find it, and that as the statutes of Oregon use the word “canvass” when speaking of the secretary of state, and use the term “abstract of votes” when speaking of clerks officiating at the precinct elections, the “canvass” is something different from the “abstract,” and that he ought to certify if he has made a canvass, and you want to use that paper in evidence “that this is the canvass I made,” and not say “this is some result I may have reached.”

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Is not the canvass an act?

Mr. MERRICK. A canvass is an act.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. You cannot have that certified on paper.

Mr. MERRICK. You cannot have the exact act, but you may have the record of it, the evidence of it.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Is not that what is meant in this certificate?

Mr. MERRICK. I think not. If it had been what he meant, he would have said "this is the canvass of the votes as made." As Mr. Justice Miller suggests, it is probably true that we have before us here what the secretary had before him; but that is not what this tribunal wants.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. Mr. Merrick, if there is anything in that idea, I want you to tell me what you mean by a canvass?

Mr. MERRICK. I mean a sifting of the votes.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. That is the act to be done; but what record on earth ever would be made of it but the putting in of the votes that were canvassed and showing the result? Explain what other thing there could be about it.

Mr. MERRICK. I will explain it if I can. I am required to canvass certain abstracts of votes that you give me. When I have sifted those votes that you have given me, I make a record of what I have done with them. Here are the votes you gave me to canvass, and here is the record of my act.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Mr. Merrick, you will notice at the top it is called an abstract and at the foot it is said:

I hereby certify that the foregoing tabulated statement is the result of the vote cast * * * as opened and canvassed in the presence of his excellency L. F. Grover, governor.

Mr. MERRICK. It is "the result of the vote." It is not the canvass.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. The inquiry I wish to put is this: It is stated at the bottom that the foregoing is a statement. Now what I wish to ask you is, whether you consider that that paper, called at the top an abstract and at the bottom a statement, is a paper that the secretary made, or a paper that came from the county clerks?

Mr. MERRICK. It is the result of the votes, not of the canvass.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. But who do you understand made that thing? Did the secretary of state make it, or did the county clerks, as you understand?

Mr. MERRICK. I presume the secretary of state reached the result.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. Mr. Merrick, let me ask you whether the real question is or is not what by the laws of Oregon is the conclusive evidence of the canvass?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That is another question.

Mr. MERRICK. I have dwelt longer with this subject than I had intended, and have been induced to do so by some inquiries made from the Commission during the progress of the argument on the other side. The real question at issue, as suggested by Senator Thurman, is what is made by the laws of Oregon the conclusive evidence of the canvass. Can you go into the secretary of state's office and get out a paper and have it certified, however solemnly, and set it up against the certificate issued by the governor and secretary of state with the seal of the State attached?

The counsel on the other side have complained that the certificate issued to Cronin and his associates as appears in certificate No. 2 is not the certificate required by the law of Oregon, and I beg to ask the gentlemen of the Commission to look at the law of Oregon as it bears on this certificate.

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected—and affix the seal of the State to the same.

Here is the broad seal of the State.

Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary.

Here is the list signed by the governor and by the secretary attesting the fact that the governor signed it. The secretary made it out; the governor signed it; and the secretary affixed the broad seal of the State to it; and I submit to the Commission that this is the final and conclusive evidence of the canvass, or the result of the canvass, or the result of the votes; the final and conclusive evidence as to who was entitled to exercise and perform the office of elector, if you call it an office.

Secondly, I submit that whether rightly done or wrongly done, as Cronin held that certificate with the seal attached, and entered upon that office, as the certificate here shows he did, the office was not vacant, and the act of the de jure officer even at the same time, he not having the muniment of title, could not countervail and nullify his act.

But I must pass to another question. It is admitted on the other side that the original title held by Watts was not a valid title. Some suggestions were made a few days since in the argument of a previous case by Mr. Evarts, that this provision of the Constitution of the United States was not self-executing, and some similar suggestions have been made to-day in reference to the same point. I had supposed that all reasonable persons had settled down to the conviction that this provision of the Federal Constitution was self-executing. But as the matter is again brought forward I beg to refer the Commission to the case of Morgan vs. Vance, in 4 Bush's (Kentucky) Reports, which is to the following effect:

So far as the Constitution requires of all officers to take the prescribed oath, and so far as it provides disqualifications upon acts, and not upon judgment of conviction, the Constitution, as the supreme law of the land, executes itself without any extraneous aid by way of legislation, nor can its requirements be so defeated.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. How did the case arise?

Mr. MERRICK. My time presses and I must pass from it; I will hand it to your honor. I will also refer the Commission to Taney's Circuit Court Decisions, published by Mr. Campbell, page 235. There was a provision in the constitution of Maryland that no person should charge more than six per cent. interest upon money, and that the legislature should make appropriate enactments for carrying that provision into effect. Chief-Justice Taney said:

The constitution itself makes the prohibition, and all future legislation must be subordinate and conformable to this provision: "Whoever takes or demands more than six per cent. while this constitution is in force, does an unlawful act; an act forbidden by the constitution of the State."

And without legislation he declared the contract to be void.

Upon the subject of vacancy my time will not allow me the opportunity of much discussion, if any, and I regret it, for this is a subject that I should like to have considered by the Commission with some degree of deliberation, and I intended to address your honors' attention to the various authorities that have reference to it. I respectfully submit that unless an office has been once filled there can be no vacancy, and unless it has been once filled there can be no resignation of the office. The Commission will bear in mind that the vacancy claimed to be filled by these electors was a vacancy created, not by Cronin's absence, but created by Watts's resignation. If they had the power to fill a vacancy at all, they executed that power by filling a vacancy created by a resignation from Watts, and not a vacancy created by the non-action of Cronin. Now, if Watts never held the office, Cronin having been the party who received the commission, and therefore the officer de facto, having received conclusive evidence of his title from the State, the resignation of Watts was unavailing for any purpose. I refer the Commission to The People vs. Tilton, 37 California Reports, 617; Miller vs. The Supervisors of Sacramento, 25 California Reports, 93; Broom vs. Hanley, 9 Pennsylvania State Reports, and to the authorities upon page 20 of the brief, and to the Corliss case.

The United States statutes, I must remark in this connection, provide for two contingencies: first, the contingency of a vacancy, and second, the contingency of a non-election. And the statutes of Oregon have provided only for the contingency of a vacancy, and not for the contingency of a non-election. But, say the learned counsel on the other side, the word "otherwise" implies all vacancies, and they repudiate the maxim noscitur a sociis in reference to the construction of language. Now, what is the language of the statute of Oregon?

Any vacancy occasioned by death, resignation, failure to act, or otherwise.

Vacancy "occasioned;" not any vacancy existing, but a vacancy "occasioned." What is the meaning of the word "occasioned?" "To occasion" signifies to produce. Non-filling of an office at the election cannot occasion a vacancy if it was vacant before the election took place. That could not be occasioned which already existed. But that which already existed could be occasioned. There must have been an existing condition upon which some cause operated to produce the effect before you can say that such effect was occasioned. If no change is made in the existing condition, there is no room for the use of the word "occasioned" and nothing to which it can apply. To occasion signifies to produce an effect incidentally. It is even more limited than the word "cause." To cause is to produce an effect in the ordinary operations of human affairs. To occasion is to produce an effect by some incidental circumstance. When the statute of Oregon spoke of a vacancy occasioned by certain causes, it meant a vacancy effected by something that had become operative since the day of election, not in the ordinary course of things, and which produced a condition different from that which existed prior to the commencement of its operation.

The PRESIDENT. The time allowed has expired.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I move, in view of the interruptions, that ten minutes more be granted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERRICK. I beg to extend my sincere thanks to the gentleman for the courtesy, and it will enable me to refer to one or two authorities which I will do very briefly. An authority was referred to on the other side from the State of Maine, in the thirty-eighth volume of Maine Reports, for the purpose of showing to the Commission that a failure to elect according to the laws of Maine would create a vacancy, and it was either stated or left to be inferred that the statutes of Maine in reference to that subject were similar in their provisions to the statutes of Oregon. The case is in 38 Maine, at page 598:

The fourth question asked was, in case the second and third questions should be answered in the negative is not there a vacancy in said office.

There had been in that case a failure to elect, and in answering that question propounded the court stated:

The undersigned, therefore, answer the first, second, and third questions in the negative, and the fourth in the affirmative.

The answers declared that there was a vacancy in the office. But when I look back to the statute law of Maine, I find this provision under which that decision was given:

In all cases of election under the act to which this is additional, when no choice shall have been effected or a vacancy shall happen by death, resignation, or otherwise, such vacancy shall be filled by the governor and council.—Session Laws of 1844, page 84.

This is the authority upon which the counsel on the other side relied for his position that a non-election created a vacancy and he brought it to his support in this behalf. Looking back to the law it is apparent that the authority is directly adverse to the position which the learned counsel used it to maintain.

My associate suggests that I should give the Commission a reference to the post-office law. It is in the Revised Statutes, section 3836, providing for the supplying of vacancies as they occur in the office of post-master.

I can enter upon no new point of the case at this late period of the argument, though there are two or three I much desire to elaborate.

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, I must submit the case upon what has already been said. In closing this argument I respectfully submit that I claim, and I claim most earnestly, that you give to Oregon the benefit of your rulings in Louisiana and Florida. I desire that in this case you should adhere to the spirit and principles of the decisions you have rendered in the cases already tried and decided. It is quite unessential, quite immaterial, whether they conform to my opinions on the subject of constitutional law or not, and quite immaterial whether they conform to the opinions of any one else upon those subjects. They have been rendered by this tribunal, recorded upon the journals of both Houses of Congress, passed into the history of the country, and are in operative effect in the process now going on of determining who shall be the Chief Magistrate of the republic.

These opinions will be accepted or rejected by the people of the United States according to their estimate of their wisdom and soundness; but this people will not pass beyond the scrutiny of their character and their merits unless they are first challenged by the men by whom they were pronounced. Consistent adhesion to the solemn conclusions reached by those great men to whom the people have committed the settlement of their rights is essential to the preservation of loyal respect for authority and character; and while mitigating the pangs of disappointment often secure an acquiescence in judgments seemingly the harshest and the most unjust. But when these judgments antagonize one another, and in their very conflict and antagonism are combined in operative effect to accomplish one and the same result, and that result is one with which individual sympathies are closely and warmly connected, unpleasant thoughts will stir within the public mind, and angry emotions will swell the popular heart.

The Supreme Court of the United States is one of the idols of the people. They have in their estimate of its character invested it with a sanctity and a dignity beyond that of any other tribunal on the face of the earth. They believe that all other Departments of the Government are liable to deterioration and possible defilement; but they look to the Supreme Court as lifted above those currents of impure air that float upon the surface of the world, and as still imbued with the virtues and speaking with the wisdom of the fathers of the republic. When this faith is destroyed, the night will have come.

Mr. EVARTS. Will your honors allow me to ask attention to a case in 53 Missouri, page 111, as the cases in that State are so much insisted upon?

Mr. HOADLY. The State vs. Vail. That case was cited before.

Mr. MERRICK. It was cited, and I referred to it myself as not in any way reversing—although explaining—the case in Missouri that I read from.

Mr. EVARTS. So I understood the learned counsel.

Mr. MERRICK. If there is to be a reply, very well.

Mr. EVARTS. The one hundred and eleventh page is on this precise question of executive authority to give a certificate to a minority candidate on the ground that the majority candidate is ineligible, and it denies the right.

Mr. HOADLY. Excuse me; it denies the right except in cases which are patent, upon which it expressly withholds an opinion in so many words, denies the right in cases of disqualification personal to the candidate, and latent.

Mr. MERRICK. And it refers to the case in 14 Indiana, Gulick vs. New, with approval, upon which we rest.

Mr. EVARTS. The section referred to just now in the Revised Statutes is section 3836, page 756.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. We have a reference to it.

Mr. EVARTS. The tribunal will see that it has no bearing on the question whether the office of postmaster was vacant or not. It expressly provides that if it is vacant the sureties may remain bound for a certain time afterward.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the public session of the Commission be closed, and that we go into consultation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. I suggest that, in order to get the room in good condition and purify the air, we had better take a recess. I move a recess for half an hour.

The motion was agreed to at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.

The recess having expired, the Commission re-assembled at five o'clock p. m. with closed doors.

After debate,

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the certificate signed by E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker, purporting to cast the electoral votes of the State of Oregon, does not contain or certify the constitutional votes to which said State is entitled.

Pending which,

On motion of Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT, it was Ordered, That the vote on the matter now pending be taken at four o'clock p. m. to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner HUNTON, at seven o'clock and twenty-five minutes, the Commission adjourned until to-morrow at half past ten o'clock a. m.

FRIDAY, February 23, 1877.

The Commission met at ten o'clock and thirty minutes a. m., pursuant to adjournment, all the members being present except Mr. Commissioner Thurman.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The Commission resumed its deliberation on the matter of the electoral vote of the State of Oregon, the question being on the resolution submitted by Mr. Commissioner Edmunds yesterday.

At two o'clock and twenty minutes p. m., Mr. Commissioner Bayard presented the following communication; which was read:

Hon. T. F. BAYARD:

DEAR SIR: Mr. Thurman has been in bed all morning, and is now suffering from such intense pain that it will be impossible for him to meet the Commission to-day.

Respectfully,

M. A. THURMAN.

FRIDAY, February 23, 1877.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That Senators Bayard and Frelinghuysen be a committee to call at once on Mr. Thurman to learn if he will consent that the Commission adjourn to his house for the purpose of receiving his vote on the questions relating to Oregon.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative :

|------------|----|
| Nays | 1 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were : Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Bradley, Clifford, Edmunds, Field, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Hunton, Miller, Payne, and Strong—13.

Mr. Morton voted in the negative.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner STRONG, at three o'clock p. m., the Commission took a recess for half an hour.

At three o'clock and forty-seven minutes p. m., the Commission having resumed its session, the committee appointed to wait on Mr. Commissioner Thurman returned, and reported that he would receive the Commission at his house.

Whereupon,

On motion of Mr. Commissioner HOAR, it was Ordered, That the Commission now proceed to the house of Mr. Commissioner Thurman, there to go on with the case now before it.

The Commission accordingly proceeded to the residence of Mr. Commissioner Thurman, on Fourteenth street, all the members being present.

The Commission was there called to order by the President.

The question being on the resolution of Mr. Commissioner Edmunds, Mr. Commissioner FIELD offered the following as a substitute :

Whereas J. W. Watts, designated in certificate No. 1 as an elector of the State of Oregon for President and Vice-President, on the day of election, namely, the 7th of November, 1876, held an office of trust and profit under the United States : Therefore,

Resolved, That the said J. W. Watts was then ineligible to the office of elector within the express terms of the Constitution.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute, it was determined in the negative :

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS submitted the following :

Ordered, That the following be adopted as the final decision and report in the matters submitted to the Commission as to the electoral vote of the State of Oregon :

ELECTORAL COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 23, A. D. 1877.

To the President of the Senate of the United States, presiding in the meeting of the two Houses of Congress, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, A. D. 1877 :

The Electoral Commission mentioned in said act having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates, and papers accompanying the same, of the electoral votes from the State of Oregon, and the objections thereto, submitted to it under said act, now report that it has duly considered the same, pursuant to said act, and has by a majority of votes decided, and does hereby decide, that the votes of W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts, named in the certificate of said persons and in the papers accompanying the same, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by the certificates submitted to the Commission as aforesaid and marked "No. 1, N. C." by said Commission, and herewith returned, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely: three votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and three votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice-President.

The Commission has by a majority of votes also decided, and does hereby decide, and report, that the three persons first above named were duly appointed electors in and by the State of Oregon.

The brief ground of this decision is that it appears, upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject, that the before-mentioned electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, A. D. 1877, of the State of Oregon, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the law.

And we are further of opinion—

That by the laws of the State of Oregon the duty of canvassing the returns of all the votes given at an election for electors of President and Vice-President was imposed upon the secretary of state, and upon no one else.

That the secretary of state did canvass the returns in the case before us, and thereby ascertained that J. C. Cartwright, W. H. Odell, and J. W. Watts had a majority of all the votes given for electors, and had the highest number of votes for that office, and by the express language of the statute those persons are "deemed elected."

That in obedience to his duty the secretary made a canvass and tabulated statement of the votes showing this result, which, according to law, he placed on file in his office on the 4th day of December, A. D. 1876. All this appears by an official certificate under the seal of the State and signed by him, and delivered by him to the electors and forwarded by them to the President of the Senate with their votes.

That the refusal or failure of the governor of Oregon to sign the certificate of the election of the persons so elected does not have the effect of defeating their appointment as such electors.

That the act of the governor of Oregon in giving to E. A. Cronin a certificate of his election, though he received a thousand votes less than Watts, on the ground that the latter was ineligible, was without authority of law and is therefore void.

That although the evidence shows that Watts was a postmaster at the time of his election, that fact is rendered immaterial by his resignation both as postmaster and elector, and his subsequent appointment, to fill the vacancy so made, by the electoral college.

The Commission has also decided, and does hereby decide, by a majority of votes, and report, that, as a consequence of the foregoing and upon the grounds before stated, the paper purporting to be a certificate of the electoral vote of said State of Oregon, signed by E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker, marked "No. 2, N. C." by the Commission, and herewith returned, is not the certificate of the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that they ought not to be counted as such.

Done at Washington, D. C., the day and year first above written.

The question being on the adoption of the order, it was decided in the affirmative:

Nays..... 7

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

So the report of the committee was adopted; and said decision and report were thereupon signed by the members agreeing therein, as follows:

GEO. F. EDMUNDS.
O. P. MORTON.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS offered the following:

"HON. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,

"President of the Commission."

On motion of Mr. Commissioner MORTON, it was Ordered, That the injunction of secrecy imposed on the acts and proceedings of the Commission be removed.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD, (at five o'clock p. m.,) the Commission adjourned until twelve o'clock noon to-morrow, to meet in the Supreme Court room.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE TWO HOUSES.

The Senate resumed its session, on the expiration of the recess taken from the previous day, at ten o'clock a. m., Saturday, February 24.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication; which was read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 23, 1877.

SIR: I am directed by the Electoral Commission to inform the Senate that it has considered and decided upon the matters submitted to it under the act of Congress concerning the same, touching the electoral votes from the State of Oregon, and herewith, by direction of said Commission, I transmit to you the said decision, in writing, signed by the members agreeing therein, to be read at the meeting of the two Houses, according to said act. HON. THOMAS W. FERRY,
President of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. Senator LOGAN, it was Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to inform the House of Representatives that the President of the Electoral Commission has notified the Senate that the Commission has arrived at a decision of the questions submitted to it in relation to the electoral votes of Oregon, and that the Senate is now ready to meet the House for the purpose of laying before the two Houses the report of the said decision, and to proceed with the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President.

The Senate, on being notified, at eleven o'clock and fifty minutes, a. m., that the House of Representatives was prepared to meet it in joint meeting to proceed with the electoral count, repaired to the hall of the House.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, February 24, 1877.

The House resumed its session at ten o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess taken from the previous day.

After the transaction of various items of business,

Mr. George C. Gorham, Secretary of the Senate, appeared and delivered the following message:

Mr. Speaker: I am directed by the Senate to inform the House of Representatives that the president of the Electoral Commission has notified the Senate that the Commission has arrived at a decision of the questions submitted to it in relation to the electoral votes of Oregon, and also that the Senate is ready to meet the House for the purpose of laying before the two Houses the report of the Commission, and to proceed with the count of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President.

After the transaction of business, by unanimous consent,

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication; which was read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 23, 1877.

SIR: I am directed by the Electoral Commission to inform the House of Representatives that it has considered and decided upon the matters submitted to it under the act of Congress concerning the same, touching the electoral votes from the State of Oregon, and has transmitted its decision to the President of the Senate, to be read at the meeting of the two Houses, according to said act.

NATHAN CLIFFORD,
President of the Commission

HON. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Representative McMAHON thereupon submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That the Senate be notified that the House of Representatives will be ready to meet the Senate in joint convention at one o'clock p. m. this day, for the purpose of continuing the count of the electoral vote.

Mr. Representative HALE made the point of order that, under the electoral law, nothing was now in order except to inform the Senate that the House was ready to proceed at once with the electoral count; but yielded to—

Mr. Representative WILSON, of Iowa, who submitted the following resolution, and claimed that nothing else was in order under the law, viz:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House notify the Senate that the House is now ready to meet them in joint meeting of the two Houses to count the vote for President and Vice-President.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order, and treating the resolution of Mr. Representative Wilson, of Iowa, as an amendment by way of substitute for that offered by Mr. Representative McMahon, the amendment was agreed to by a vote of yeas 146, nays 87, and the resolution as thus amended was agreed to by a vote of yeas 156, nays 89; and the Senate was at once notified accordingly.

JOINT MEETING.

SATURDAY, February 24, 1877.

The Senate entered the House hall at eleven o'clock and fifty-five minutes a. m., in the usual manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as Presiding Officer of the joint meeting of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying a chair upon his left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of Congress for counting the electoral vote resumes its session. The two Houses, having separated pending submission to the Commission of objections to the certificate of the State of Oregon, have re-assembled to receive and to coincide, or otherwise, with the decision of that tribunal. The decision, which is in writing, by a majority of the Commission, and signed by the members agreeing therein, will now be read by the Secretary of the Senate and be entered in the Journal of each House.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows:

ELECTORAL COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 23, A. D. 1877.

To the President of the Senate of the United States, presiding in the meeting of the two Houses of Congress, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, A. D. 1877.

The Electoral Commission mentioned in said act having received certain certificates, and papers purporting to be certificates, and papers accompanying the same, of the electoral votes from the State of Oregon, and the objections thereto, submitted to it under said act, now report that it has duly considered the same, pursuant to said act; and has by a majority of votes decided, and does hereby decide, that the votes of W. H. Odell, J. C. Cartwright, and J. W. Watts, named in the certificate of said persons and in the papers accompanying the same, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by the certificates submitted to the Commission as aforesaid, and marked "No. 1 N. C." by said Commission, and herewith returned, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely:

Three (3) votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President; and Three (3) votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice-President.

The Commission has by a majority of votes also decided, and does hereby decide and report, that the three persons above named were duly appointed electors in and by the State of Oregon.

The brief ground of this decision is that it appears, upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject, that the before-mentioned electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, A. D. 1877, of the State of Oregon, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the law.

And we are further of opinion—

That by the laws of the State of Oregon the duty of canvassing the returns of all the votes given at an election for electors of President and Vice-President was imposed upon the secretary of state, and upon no one else.

That the secretary of state did canvass the returns in the case before us, and thereby ascertained that J. C. Cartwright, W. H. Odell, and J. W. Watts had a majority of all the votes given for electors, and had the highest number of votes for that office, and by the express language of the statute those persons are deemed elected.

That in obedience to his duty the secretary made a canvass and tabulated statement of the votes showing this result, which, according to law, he placed on file in his office on the 4th day of December, A. D. 1876. All this appears by an official certificate under the seal of the State and signed by him, and delivered by him to the electors and forwarded by them to the President of the Senate with their votes.

That the refusal or failure of the governor of Oregon to sign the certificate of the election of the persons so elected does not have the effect of defeating their appointment as such electors.

That the act of the governor of Oregon in giving to E. A. Cronin a certificate of his election, though he received a thousand votes less than Watts, on the ground that the latter was ineligible, was without authority of law and is therefore void.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any objections to the decision of the Commission?

Mr. Senator KELLY. I have the honor to file certain objections to this decision, signed by Senators and Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon having submitted an objection to this decision, it will be read by the Clerk of the House.

The Clerk of the House read as follows:

The undersigned, Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States, object to the decision of the Joint Commission directing the counting of the vote of John W. Watts, an alleged elector for the State of Oregon, as given for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States, and for William A. Wheeler, of

New York, for Vice-President, and rejecting the vote of E. A. Cronin as cast for Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, for President, and Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, for Vice-President, on the following grounds:

1. John W. Watts was not elected a presidential elector for Oregon.
2. He (J. W. Watts) was not legally appointed as a presidential elector.
3. He (Watts) was disqualified to receive any appointment as presidential elector or to vote as such, in that he held an office of trust and profit under the United States.
4. E. A. Cronin was elected a presidential elector for the State of Oregon, and in accordance with law, as such, cast a legal vote as an elector for Samuel J. Tilden for President and Thomas A. Hendricks for Vice-President, and the vote so cast should be counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the decision of the Commission? [A pause.] There being none, the Senate will withdraw to its chamber, that the Houses separately may consider and determine the objection.

Accordingly, at twelve o'clock and ten minutes p. m., the Senate withdrew.

IN SENATE, Saturday, February 24, 1877.

The Senate having returned from the joint meeting at twelve o'clock and twelve minutes p. m., the President pro tempore resumed the chair, and laid before the Senate the objection to the decision of the Commission in regard to the electoral votes of the State of Oregon.

Mr. Senator SARGENT submitted the following resolution, which (after debate and the rejection of an amendment) was adopted by a vote of yeas 41, nays 24, viz:

Resolved, That the decision of the Commission upon the electoral vote of the State of Oregon stand as the judgment of the Senate, the objections made thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

On motion of Mr. Senator SARGENT it was Resolved, That the House of Representatives be notified that the Senate has determined upon the objections to the decision of the Commission upon the electoral vote of Oregon, and is prepared to meet the House to proceed with the count of the electoral votes.

At three o'clock and fifty minutes p. m. a message was received announcing the action of the House of Representatives on the objection to the decision, whereupon the Senate at once repaired to the Hall of the House to proceed with the electoral count.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, February 24, 1877.

The Senate having retired from the joint meeting at twelve o'clock and ten minutes p. m., the House of Representatives resumed its session.

Mr. Representative CLYMER submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That for the more careful consideration of the objections to the report of the Electoral Commission in the Oregon case, the House now take a recess until ten o'clock on Monday morning.

Mr. Representative HANCOCK made the point of order that, under the fifth section of the electoral act, a recess was not now in order.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order, on the grounds heretofore stated by him when the same point of order was presented, and held the motion for a recess as made to be in order.

The question being on the resolution offered by Mr. Representative Clymer, it was rejected—yeas, 112 ; nays, 158.

Mr. Representative LANE thereupon moved that the House take a recess until nine o'clock and thirty minutes a. m. Monday, February 26.

Mr. Representative HALE made the point of order that the privilege of the House to take a recess had been exhausted by the vote just taken on a motion for a recess ; that the motion of Mr. Representative Lane was a dilatory one ; that the regular order was the consideration of the objections to the decision of the Commission in the Oregon case, and that the call for the regular order, which he now made, must bring the said objections before the House for present consideration.

The SPEAKER sustained the point of order, and held the motion to be not in order.

Whereupon,

Mr. Representative HALE submitted the following order :

Ordered, That the count of the electoral vote of the State of Oregon shall proceed in conformity with the decision of the Electoral Commission.

Mr. Representative LANE submitted the following order as an amendment in the nature of a substitute, viz :

Ordered, That the vote purporting to be an electoral vote for President and Vice-President, and which was given by one J. W. Watts, claiming to be an elector for the State of Oregon, be not counted.

After debate,

The amendment was agreed to by a vote of yeas 151, nays 106 ; and the resolution as amended was adopted without a division.

During the roll-call on the amendment, a message was received from the Senate announcing its action on the objection and its readiness to proceed with the count.

On motion of Mr. Representative CLYMER, it was Ordered, That the Senate be informed of the action of this House on the electoral vote of the State of Oregon, and that the House of Representatives is now ready to meet them in joint convention in its hall.

JOINT MEETING.

SATURDAY, February 24, 1877.

At three o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m. the Senate entered the House hall in the usual manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as presiding officer of the joint meeting of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying a chair upon his left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of Congress for counting the electoral vote resumes its session. The two Houses having separately determined upon the objections to the decision of the Commission on the certificates from the State of Oregon, the Secretary of the Senate will read the resolution adopted by the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

Resolved, That the decision of the Commission upon the electoral vote of the State of Oregon stand as the judgment of the Senate, the objections made thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House of Representatives will now read the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives.

The Clerk of the House of Representatives read as follows :

Ordered, That the vote purporting to be the electoral vote for President and Vice-President, and which was given by one J. W. Watts, claiming to be an elector for the State of Oregon, be not counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two Houses not concurring otherwise, the decision of the Commission will stand unreversed, and the counting of the vote will proceed in conformity therewith. The tellers will announce the vote of Oregon.

Mr. Senator INGALLS, (one of the tellers.) Oregon casts 3 votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, for President, and 3 votes for William A. Wheeler, of New York, for Vice-President, of the United States.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Having opened the certificate from the State of Pennsylvania received by messenger, the Chair hands it to the tellers, and it will be read in the presence and hearing of the two Houses.

Mr. Senator ALLISON (one of the tellers) read the certificate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there objections to the certificate from the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. Representative STENGER. I submit on behalf of myself and others the objection which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House will read the objection.

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

The undersigned Senators and Representatives object to the counting of the vote of Henry A. Boggs as an elector for the State of Pennsylvania, on the grounds following, namely :

That a certain Daniel J. Morrell was a candidate for the post of elector for the State of Pennsylvania at the election for electors of President and Vice-President on the 7th day of November, 1876, and was declared by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania to have been duly elected an elector at said election.

And the undersigned aver that the said Daniel J. Morrell was not duly elected an elector for the State of Pennsylvania, because, for a long period before, and on the said 7th day of November, 1876, and for a long period subsequent thereto, the said Morrell held an office of trust and profit under the United States, that is to say, the office of commissioner under the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, in the city of Philadelphia and State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876," to which he was appointed by the President of the United States under the provisions of said act.

Wherefore the undersigned aver that the said Morrell could not be constitutionally appointed an elector for the State of Pennsylvania on the said 7th day of November, 1876, under the Constitution of the United States.

And the undersigned further state that on the 6th day of December, 1876, the said Morrell did not attend the meeting of the electors of the State of Pennsylvania, and that he was not, according to the laws of Pennsylvania and under the Constitution of the United States, duly elected an elector of said State, and could not be constitutionally and legally declared duly elected as such elector, and had no legal right to attend the said meeting of electors.

And the undersigned further state that the college of electors had power under the law of Pennsylvania to fill vacancies in the office of elector under and by virtue of the law of Pennsylvania, which is in the words following, and by none other whatsoever, namely :

"If any such elector shall die, or from any cause fail to attend at the seat of government at the time appointed by law, the electors present shall proceed to choose viva voce a person to fill the vacancy occasioned thereby, and immediately after such choice the name of the person so chosen shall be transmitted by the presiding officer of the college to the governor, whose duty it shall be forthwith to cause notice in writing to be given to such person of his election, and the person so elected [and not the person in whose place he shall have been chosen] shall be an elector, and shall, with the other electors, perform the duties enjoined on them as aforesaid."

And the undersigned further state that under said law the electors present had no authority to appoint the said Henry A. Boggs to fill the vacancy of the said Daniel J. Morrell or on any other grounds whatever, and that said supposed appointment of said Henry A. Boggs was wholly without authority of law, and was and is null and void.

Wherefore the undersigned aver that the said Henry A. Boggs was not duly appointed by the State of Pennsylvania in the manner that its legislature directed, and that he was not entitled to cast his vote as elector for said State, and that his vote as such should not be, because it cannot be constitutionally, counted.

And the undersigned hereto annex the evidence to sustain the above objections, which has been taken before the committee of the House of Representatives on the powers, privileges, and duties of the House.

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,

Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania, March 10, 1871.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, in conformity with the recent act of Congress "to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American Independence," &c., I have made the following appointments, which I submit for your approval:

Hon. Daniel J. Morrell, Johnstown, Cambria County, Pennsylvania, to be United States commissioner for Pennsylvania, in accordance with the provisions of the second section of the act.

Hon. Asa Packer, Mauch Chunk, Carbon County, Pennsylvania, to be the alternate United States commissioner for Pennsylvania, in accordance with the fourth section of the same act.

With assurances of my kindest regards, I am, general, very respectfully and truly, yours,

JNO. W. GEARY.

General U. S. GRANT,

President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 22, 1877.

JOHN REILLY, a member of the House from the State of Pennsylvania, sworn and examined.

By Mr. FIELD:

Question. Do you know Daniel J. Morrell, of Pennsylvania?—Answer. I do.

Q. How long have you known him?—A. I suppose fifteen or eighteen years.

Q. Where does he reside?—A. In Johnstown, Cambria County, Pennsylvania.

Q. Was he one of the centennial commissioners appointed by the President?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is he still such?—A. I believe he is; he was at the close of the exhibition; I have not heard of him in connection with it since.

Q. How near to him do you live?—A. I live within thirty-eight miles of him.

Q. Do you know him very well?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is he the same gentleman who was appointed one of the presidential electors in the State of Pennsylvania?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. On the republican ticket?—A. Yes sir.

By Mr. BURCHARD :

Q. Did you serve with him on the Centennial Commission?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you vote for him?—A. I did not.

Q. You have no personal knowledge as to what you have testified to, have you?—

A. I have seen Mr. Morrell at the Centennial Exhibition in the discharge of his duties.

Q. What duties did you see him perform at the exhibition?—A. I saw him around there. I don't know that I can state specifically that I saw him perform any particular act.

Q. Did you not see twenty thousand other individuals about there at the same time?—A. I saw a great many more than that.

Q. One hundred thousand?—A. Perhaps two hundred thousand.

Q. Walking about the grounds?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you mention any particular thing you saw Mr. Morrell do at that time?—A. No, sir; but it is a well-known fact that he was a centennial commissioner.

Q. It is rumor and general information that you have on the subject?—A. I may state that I had from Mr. Morrell himself, directly, a statement that he had paired with a man on the day of the election for the purpose of attending to his duties as centennial commissioner.

By Mr. FIELD :

Q. You saw him at the Centennial Exhibition in the apparent discharge of his duties?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you heard him speak of his duties as centennial commissioner?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is he universally reported to be a centennial commissioner?—A. Yes, sir. He was formerly a member of Congress.

Q. Do you know that he was the candidate for presidential elector?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know that it was the same person?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. BURCHARD :

Q. Do you know that from him?—A. I do not know that I ever heard him speak of it himself directly.

By Mr. FIELD :

Q. But it was well understood among the people in Pennsylvania that Daniel J. Morrell, who was centennial commissioner, was also a candidate for presidential elector on the republican ticket?—A. It was generally understood in that district. I cannot speak as to the whole State.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 23, 1877.

JOHN WELSH sworn and examined.

By Mr. TUCKER :

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. I reside in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Q. Were you a candidate for the position of presidential elector at the late presidential election, and were you certified as one of the electors for the State of Pennsylvania?—A. I was, from the first district.

Q. Did you attend the college of electors?—A. I did.

Q. And cast your vote?—A. Yes sir.

Q. Do you hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States?—A. No, sir.

Q. What is your connection with the Centennial Exhibition?—A. I am a director and also president of the Centennial Board of Finance, which was chartered by the United States on the 1st of June, 1872. It is a stock company. I was elected a director in April, 1873, and every year since then, by the stockholders, and have been chosen president every year by the directors.

Q. Were you president of that corporation on the 7th of November, 1876?—A. I was.

Q. And on the 6th of December, 1876?—A. Yes, sir; and am still.

Q. You are a stockholder in the corporation?—A. I am a stockholder in the corporation.

Q. And have been since 1873?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You held no position as centennial commissioner?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know Mr. Daniel J. Morrell?—A. I do.

Q. Was he a centennial commissioner under appointment of the President?—A. He was and is.

Q. He was acting as such on the 7th of November, 1876, and on the 6th of December, 1876?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is he the same gentleman who was elected one of the presidential electors for the State of Pennsylvania?—A. He is.

Q. Did he appear at the meeting of the electors?—A. He did not.

Q. Did he assign any reason for not appearing?—A. He was not present. I cannot say that he ever assigned any reason for his absence.

Q. Did he send a letter?—A. No. I think he was absent and that his place was supplied.

Q. Who was appointed in his place?—A. If I recollect right, it was Mr. Boggs, of Cambria County, the same county that Mr. Morrell lives in.

Q. Who appointed Mr. Boggs?—A. He was appointed by the electoral college.

Q. Did he hold any Federal office?—A. I think not.

Q. His title as an elector for the State of Pennsylvania was due to an appointment by the college of electors?—A. Entirely.

Q. To fill the place of Mr. Morrell?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. The corporation was a mere private stock corporation?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You had no appointment from the President of the United States?—A. No, sir.

Q. There is no salary fixed by law to the office of director or president?—A. The law allows a salary to be paid to the president and the treasurer, but I have never received any salary. I declined to receive it.

Q. The law does not fix any salary?—A. No, sir.

By Mr. BURCHARD:

Q. The salary would have been paid by the corporation?—A. Yes; it would have been paid by the corporation.

Q. And your relation to the Centennial Exhibition was simply that of stockholder in this corporation and of an officer elected by the stockholders?—A. I was elected a director by the stockholders and president by the board of directors.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. You are no more an officer of the Government of the United States than would be a director of a railroad company incorporated by Congress?—A. No, sir. I have never held any office under the United States.

By Mr. TUCKER:

Q. Did you give any bond as president of the board of finance to the United States?—A. Yes, sir; not as president of the board of finance. Congress appropriated $1,500,000, and there was a provision in the appropriation bill that the president and treasurer should give a bond in $500,000. That bond was given by us, signed by one hundred citizens of Philadelphia.

Q. You executed that bond?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. To whom was the bond given?—A. I suppose the Secretary of the Treasury. The bond was conditioned on our applying the money to the purpose stated, namely, having the building open on the 10th of May, free of debt. The bond was filed, and vouchers to the amount of $1,727,000 were sent voluntarily by us.

Q. Is this the provision of law on the subject? [Reading.]—A. Yes, sir; that is it.

Q. You say that you presented vouchers?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. When?—A. In the course of the season we sent to the Treasury Department vouchers for $1,727,000. They were sent at various periods during the summer.

Q. Did you send them all to the Treasury before the presidential election?—A. Long before.

Q. Did you get an acquittance or discharge of the bond?—A. No, sir; we got no acquittance or discharge.

Q. The bond, therefore, is still outstanding as an obligation?—A. Yes, sir; I do not know whether the Government ever gives up a bond.

Q. It gave you no acquittance?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was there any provision for returning this money to the Government?—A. I have no opinion to offer on that subject. There is a difference of opinion on the subject between gentlemen skilled in the law. My own reading of it is that there is no provision for the return of the money to the Government until after the stockholders shall be paid, unless there be a profit, but I pretend to express no opinion on the subject. It was submitted to the court, and the circuit court has determined that there is no such provision in the law; in other words, that the money which we have on hand belongs to the stockholders; but an appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and it will be argued there.

Q. Then the question was whether there was any money to be paid to the Government in any event?—A. The question was whether any money was to be paid to the Government out of the capital or out of the profits. The construction of the court is that it was to come out of the profits.

Q. Then the court has decided that there is an obligation to refund the money to the Government if there should be a profit sufficient for that purpose?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you hold any fund in your hands now awaiting the decision of that case?—A. We do. We placed before the court a statement that we have about $2,000,000 on hand for which there are two claimants.

Q. Who are the two claimants?—A. The stockholders and the Government. We asked the court to instruct us what to do with the money,

By Mr. BURCHARD:

Q. You were the president of a board of directors, elected by the stockholders under sections 4 and 5 of the act of 1872?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. There has been no change in the law, to your knowledge, in reference to the duration of your term of office or your duties in regard to the Government?—A. No, sir; no change.

Q. That law provides that the president, two vice-presidents, treasurer, and secretary, and such other officers as may be required to carry out the purpose of the corporation, shall hold their respective offices during the pleasure of the board, and the board adopts by-laws for its own government?—A. Yes.

Q. And you are in no way represented as an officer of the United States?—A. No, sir.

Q. You had no power to incur any liability to be charged to the United States?—A. No, sir. Each of the acts of Congress has had specific provisions in that respect—that no debt or responsibility should be incurred on behalf of the United States.

Q. And your relation to this money which was appropriated by Congress was simply that of applying it as the law required?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But it was appropriated to the corporation?—A. Entirely.

Q. For the purpose of the exposition?—A. Yes.

Q. And the act required the president of the board and the treasurer to give bond to the United States?—A. Yes.

Q. You had no special custody of the funds?—A. The treasurer had custody of the funds, but a bond was required from the president as well as the treasurer.

Q. Your only relation to it was simply that of giving a bond?—A. Yes. The fund was under the control of the board of directors, to be disposed of by them. I was their servant. The funds were all applied in exact accordance with the memorial sent to Congress and signed by me, and it is a very curious fact that the $1,500,000 asked for was precisely the amount that was required.

Q. You hold no office of profit or trust under the United States unless the giving of a bond created you an officer?—A. No, sir. If so, I am an officer of the United States in a great many instances, for I am on a good many custom-house bonds for the last fifty years.

By Mr. TUCKER:

Q. You say that $1,500,000 was just enough?—A. Just enough to enable us to open the exhibition.

Q. How much money have you on hand now interpleaded between the Government of the United States and the stockholders?—A. Something rising $2,000,000. We cannot yet determine definitely the amount, because there are certain large claims which may or may not be allowed. If the Government is to be refunded the $1,500,000, then we shall pay 25 per cent. to the stockholders, and in the other case we shall have probably 85 per cent. to pay to the stockholders.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 24, 1877.

DANIEL J. MORRELL sworn and examined.

By Mr. TUCKER:

Question. Where do you reside?—Answer. Johnstown, Pennsylvania.

Q. Are you or have you been a centennial commissioner by appointment of the President of the United States?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the date of your appointment, and up to what time did you hold the office?—A. I don't remember the exact date, but I think it was in 1871 or 1872.

Q. You were appointed by commission by the President?—A. I was nominated by the governor of Pennsylvania and commissioned by the President of the United States.

Q. Are you still a centennial commissioner?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you have continued to be such from the time of your appointment until the present time?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you a candidate for the position of elector at the late presidential election held on November 7, 1876?—A. I was nominated and voted for as an elector.

Q. Was your election certified to you by the governor of the State?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you attend the meeting of the college of electors?—A. No, sir.

Q. Did you resign the position?—A. No, sir; I did not. I was advised that it was not necessary that I should resign, but that I should not attend; that I was not eligible.

Q. Not eligible by reason of your being a centennial commissioner?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You absented yourself on that account?—A. I did.

Q. Who was appointed in your place?—A. Henry A. Boggs.

Q. Henry, not Harry?—A. I have always understood that his name was Henry; he is called Harry generally, however.

Q. He was appointed in your place?—A. That was my understanding. I was not present at the meeting of the electors.

By Mr. BURCHARD :

Q. Are you paid any compensation out of the Treasury of the United States as centennial commissioner?—A. No compensation whatever from any source.

Q. The position you hold is under the act creating the centennial commissioners?—A. Yes sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificate from the State of Pennsylvania? [A pause.] If there be none, the Senate will now withdraw, that the two Houses separately may consider and determine on the objection.

The Senate then (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) withdrew.

The PRESIDENT read the following communication :

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 26, 1877.

SIR: I have the honor to communicate to you, to be laid before the Electoral

PROCEEDINGS OF THE TWO HOUSES.

PENNSYLVANIA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, February 26, 1877.

The recess taken on Saturday, February 24, having expired, the House resumed its session at ten o'clock a. m. Monday, February 26.

A message from the Senate was received announcing its action on the objection to the vote of Henry A. Boggs as one of the electors for the State of Pennsylvania, and its readiness to meet the House in order to proceed with the counting of the electoral votes.

Mr. Representative CLYMER raised the point of order that there was not a quorum present, and moved a call of the House.

No quorum voting on this motion, the SPEAKER directed the roll to be called.

The calling of the roll developing the presence of a quorum, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. Representative KELLEY submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That the vote of Henry A. Boggs be counted as an elector for the State of Pennsylvania, the objections to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Representative STENGER moved to amend the resolution by substituting therefor the following :

Resolved, That the vote of Henry A. Boggs, as an elector for the State of Pennsylvania, should not be counted, because the said Boggs was not appointed an elector for said State in such manner as its legislature directed.

After debate, the amendment was agreed to by a vote of yeas 135, nays 119; and the resolution as amended was agreed to without a division; and the Clerk was directed to inform the Senate of this action and of the readiness of the House to receive the Senate in order to proceed with the count.

IN SENATE, Monday, February 26, 1877.

The Senate at three o'clock and thirteen minutes p. m. was notified of the action of the House of Representatives in regard to the vote of Henry A. Boggs as an elector for the State of Pennsylvania, and immediately proceeded to the Hall of the House.

JOINT MEETING.

MONDAY, February 26, 1877.

The Senate entered the House-hall at three o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m. in the usual manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as presiding officer of the joint meeting of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying a chair upon his left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of Congress for counting the electoral vote resumes its session. The two Houses acting separately have considered and determined on the objection to the certificate from the State of Pennsylvania; the Secretary of the Senate will read the resolution of the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

Resolved, That the vote of Henry A. Boggs be counted with the other votes of the electors of Pennsylvania, notwithstanding the objection thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House of Representatives will now read the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives.

The Clerk of the House of Representatives read as follows :

Resolved, That the vote of Henry A. Boggs as an elector for the State of Pennsylvania should not be counted, because said Boggs was not appointed an elector for said State in such manner as its legislature directed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two Houses not concurring in an affirmative vote to reject, the vote of the State of Pennsylvania will be counted. The tellers will announce the vote of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Senator ALLISON, (one of the tellers.) The State of Pennsylvania casts 29 votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, for President, and 29 votes for William A. Wheeler, of New York, for Vice-President.

RHODE ISLAND.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Having opened the certificate received by messenger from the State of Rhode Island, the Chair hands to the tellers the same to be read in the presence and hearing of the two Houses; also the corresponding certificate by mail is handed to the tellers.

Mr. Representative STONE (one of the tellers) read the certificate from the State of Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any objections to the certificate from the State of Rhode Island?

Mr. Representative O'BRIEN. On behalf of myself and other signers, Senators and Representatives, I send up objections to one of the votes from the State of Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The member from Maryland having submitted an objection to the certificate from the State of Rhode Island, the Clerk of the House will read the same.

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

The undersigned, Senators and Representatives, do hereby object to counting the vote of William S. Slater, alleged elector of the State of Rhode Island, and as reasons therefor assign the following :

First. That the said William S. Slater was not duly appointed elector by the State of Rhode Island at the election in said State on the 7th day of November, 1876.

Second. That George H. Corliss, according to the decision of the Electoral Commission rendered in the counting of the vote of John W. Watts, as elector of the State of Oregon, if said decision be law, was duly appointed elector by the State of Rhode Island, and the substitution for him of the said Slater was illegal and unconstitutional.

Third. If in any event it was competent to complete the electoral college of Rhode Island by adding another elector thereto, it could only have been done under the law as announced by the said Electoral Commission, if said decision be law, and pursuant to the laws of said State by act of the majority of the members of said college, and not by the legislature of said State.

M. I. SOUTHARD,
E. J. HENKLE,
JOHN K. LUTTRELL,
A. M. WADDELL,
WM. P. LYNDE,

Representatives:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificate from the State of Rhode Island? [A pause.] If there be none, the Senate will now withdraw to its Chamber, that the two Houses may separately consider and determine on the objection.

Accordingly (at three o'clock and twenty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate withdrew.

IN SENATE, Monday, February 26, 1877.

The Senate having returned from the joint meeting, at three o'clock thirty minutes p. m. the President pro tempore resumed the chair and submitted to the Senate the objection made to counting the vote of William S. Slater as an elector for the State of Rhode Island, which was read.

Mr. Senator BURNSIDE thereupon submitted the following resolution, which, after debate, was agreed to by a vote of yeas 57, nays none, viz :

Resolved, That the vote of William S. Slater be counted with the other votes of the electors of Rhode Island, notwithstanding the objections made thereto.

On motion of Mr. Senator ANTHONY, it was Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives thereof, and that the Senate is now ready to meet the House to continue the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President.

At five o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m. a message was received from the House of Representatives announcing its action on the objection to the vote of William S. Slater as an elector for the State of Rhode Island and its readiness to receive the Senate to proceed with the electoral count; and the Senate immediately proceeded to the Hall of the House.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, February 26, 1877.

The Senate having retired from the joint meeting, at three o'clock and twenty-eight minutes p. m. the House of Representatives resumed its session.

Mr. Representative POPPLETON moved that the House take a recess until Tuesday, February 27, at ten o'clock a. m.; which motion was disagreed to—yeas 84, nays 178.

Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote just taken refusing a recess, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. Representative O'BRIEN raised the point of order that the motions of Mr. Representative Wood, of New York, were not in order.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order.

The motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to—yeas 182, nays 67.

A message was received from the Senate announcing its action on the objection to the vote of William S. Slater as an elector for the State of Rhode Island and its readiness to proceed with the electoral count.

Mr. Representative O'BRIEN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the vote of William S. Slater as elector for the State of Rhode Island should not be counted because said Slater was not appointed or elected elector for said State in such manner as its legislature had directed.

Mr. Representative EAMES moved to amend the resolution by substituting therefor the following:

Resolved, That the vote of William S. Slater as an elector for the State of Rhode Island be counted, the objections thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

After debate, the amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was agreed to without a division.

Mr. Representative WILSON, of Iowa, moved that the Senate be notified by the Clerk of the action of the House in regard to the electoral vote of Rhode Island, and that the House was ready to meet the Senate at once and continue the counting of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President.

Mr. Representative KNOTT submitted as a substitute for the motion the following:

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House notify the Senate of the decision of the House in the case of the State of Rhode Island, and that the House of Representatives will meet the Senate in this hall at ten o'clock to-morrow morning to proceed with the counting of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. Representative MCCRARY made the point of order that the electoral act (section 1) requires that when the two Houses have voted upon objections, they shall immediately again meet and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.

The SPEAKER sustained the point of order and ruled out the amendment.

The motion of Mr. Representative WILSON, of Iowa, was adopted; and the Senate was notified.

JOINT MEETING.

MONDAY, February 26, 1877.

The Senate entered the House hall at six o'clock p. m., in the usual manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as Presiding Officer of the joint meeting of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying a chair upon his left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of Congress for counting the electoral vote resumes its session. The two Houses having separately determined upon the objection to the certificate from the State of Rhode Island, the Secretary of the Senate will read the resolution adopted by the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

Resolved, That the vote of William S. Slater be counted with the other votes of the electors of Rhode Island, notwithstanding the objections made thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House of Representatives will now read the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives.

The Clerk of the House of Representatives read as follows :

Resolved, That the vote of William S. Slater as an elector of the State of Rhode Island be counted, the objections thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two Houses having concurred in an affirmative vote not to reject the vote of Rhode Island, that vote will be counted. The tellers will announce the vote of Rhode Island.

Mr. Representative STONE, (one of the tellers.) The State of Rhode Island casts four votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and four votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice-President of the United States.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Having opened the certificate from the State of South Carolina, received by messenger, the Chair hands it to the tellers to be read in the presence and hearing of the two Houses. The Chair also hands to the tellers the corresponding certificate received by mail.

Mr. Senator ALLISON (one of the tellers) read as follows :

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Another certificate from the State of South Carolina has been received by messenger, and also by mail. The Chair hands it to the tellers to be read in the presence and hearing of the two Houses.

Mr. Representative STONE (one of the tellers) read as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, 88 :

We, the undersigned, electors of President and Vice-President of the United States of America for the next ensuing regular term of the respective offices thereof, being electors duly and legally appointed by and for the State of South Carolina, as will hereinafter appear, having met and convened in the city of Columbia, at the capitol of the State, in pursuance of the direction of the legislature of the State of South Carolina, on the first Wednesday, the sixth day, of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, do hereby certify that, being so assembled, duly qualified according to the provisions of the constitution of said State by taking and subscribing the proper oath of office therein prescribed, and organized, we proceeded to vote by ballot, and balloted first for such President and then for such Vice-President, by distinct ballots. -

The list of the names of the electors, signed by the governor, with the seal of the State affixed thereto, as required by law, is not attached, and its absence is explained by the following statement :

First. We claim to have been duly appointed electors by the State of South Carolina in the manner directed by the legislature thereof, and to have been elected by general ticket, and to have received the highest number of votes at the election for President and Vice-President, held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, and that such election will appear by a proper examination of the legal returns of the managers of election for the different precincts in the counties of the State, made to their respective boards of county canvassers, which do not sustain, but are directly opposed to, the statements of votes given for electors in the several counties forwarded and certified to the State board of canvassers by the commissioners of election or boards of canvassers in such counties.

Second. The board of State canvassers, after a pretended canvass of the returns of the election, made an erroneous, imperfect, and false statement of the result of said election, and illegally declare the result to be as follows :

|-------------------------|---------|-------------------------|---------|
| Theodore G. Barker..... | 90, 896 | C. C. Bowen..... | 91, 786 |
| Samuel McGowan..... | 90, 737 | John Winsmith..... | 91, 870 |
| J. W. Harrington..... | 90, 895 | Thomas B. Johnston..... | 91, 852 |
| J. I. Ingram..... | 90, 798 | Timothy Hurley..... | 91, 136 |
| William Wallace..... | 90, 905 | William B. Nash..... | 91, 804 |
| Robert Aldrich..... | 90, 860 | W. F. Myers..... | 91, 830 |

Third. In this illegal and invalid canvass of the votes given for the electors of President and Vice-President, the board of State canvassers, after canvassing the votes of six of the counties of the State, by comparing the statements of the county boards of canvassers with the returns of the precinct managers in said counties, and after discovering serious discrepancies between such statements and such returns, showing errors in the statements of the county canvassers, refused to continue such comparison and verification as to the remaining twenty-six counties in the State, also refused to allow copies of such returns to be made, and confined their canvass and count to the aggregation of the erroneous returns of county canvassers, and upon such count declared the above erroneous and false result.

Fourth. The undersigned, who claim that they are duly elected electors, filed in the supreme court of South Carolina a suggestion for writ of mandamus to require the board of State canvassers to correct the count according to the true vote of the people as cast at said election, but pending that proceeding, of which the board had due notice, the board determined and certified the persons elected upon the above erroneous count, and after making a return to the court, and before the decision thereof, secretly and unlawfully adjourned in defiance and contempt of the authority of the supreme court. The secretary of state, upon such erroneous statement and illegal determination, unlawfully certified to him, caused a copy of the certified determination of the board of State canvassers to be delivered to each of the persons therein declared to be elected, viz, Christopher C. Bowen, John Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, William B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and W. F. Myers.

The undersigned thereupon filed in the supreme court of the State their suggestion for a writ of quo warranto, disputing the election of said persons and the validity of their legal title to the offices of electors, which proceeding also is now pending in said court.

Fifth. The undersigned, as electors duly appointed, made demand upon the secretary of state for the lists required by law, and he refused to deliver the same ; and we further certify that the following are two distinct lists, one of the votes for President and the other of the votes for Vice-President :

List of all persons voted for as President, with the number of votes for each.

| Names of persons voted for. | Number of votes. |
|---|------------------|
| Samuel J. Tilder, of the State of New York..... | seven (7.) |

List of all persons voted for as Vice-President, with the number of votes for each.

| Names of persons voted for. | Number of votes |
|--|-----------------|
| Thomas A. Hendricks, of the State of Indiana | seven, (7.) |

In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands.

Done at No. 101 Richardson street, in the city of Columbia and State of South Carolina, the 6th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1876, and of the Independence of the United States of America the 101st.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there objections to the certificates from the State of South Carolina ?

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. On behalf of the Senators and Representatives whose names are thereto attached, I submit the following objections to the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of the State of South Carolina cast by C. C. Bowen and others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary of the Senate will read the objections.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

OBJECTION No. 1.

The undersigned, Senators of the United States and members of the House of Representatives, object to the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of the State of South Carolina cast by C. C. Bowen, D. Winsmith, T. B. Johnson, Timothy Hurley, W. B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and W. F. Myers, on the following grounds :

I.

For that no legal election was held in the State of South Carolina for presidential electors, the general assembly of that State not having provided, as required by article 8, section 3, of the constitution thereof, for the registration of persons entitled to vote, without which registration no valid or legal election could be held.

II.

For that there was not existing in the State of South Carolina on the first day of January, 1876, nor at any time thereafter, up to and including the 10th day of December, 1876, a republican form of government such as is guaranteed by the Constitution to every State in the Union.

III.

For that the Federal Government prior to and during the election on the 7th day of November, 1876, without authority of law, stationed in various parts of the said State of South Carolina, at or near the polling-places, detachments of the Army of the United States, by whose presence the full exercise of the right of suffrage was prevented, and by reason whereof no legal or free election was or could be had.

IV.

For that at the several polling-places in the said State there were stationed deputy marshals of the United States, appointed under the provisions of sections 2021 and 2022 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provisions were unconstitional and void. That the said deputy marshals, exceeding over one thousand in number, by their unlawful and arbitrary action, in obedience to the improper and illegal instructions received by them from the Department of Justice, so interfered with the full and free exercise of the right of suffrage by the duly-qualified voters of the said State of South Carolina that a fair election could not be and was not held in the said State of South Carolina on the said 7th day of November, 1876.

V.

For that there was not from the 1st day of January, 1876, up to and including the 10th day of December, 1876, at any time a State government in the State of South Carolina, except a pretended government set up in violation of law and of the Constitution of the United States by Federal authority, and sustained by Federal troops.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates from the State of South Carolina?

Mr. Senator PATTERSON. I submit, on behalf of the Senators and Representatives whose names are attached thereto, the following objections to the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of South Carolina cast by Theodore G. Barker and others.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House will read the objections.

OBJECTION No. 2.

The undersigned, Senators and members of the House of Representatives of the United States, object to the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of the State of South Carolina cast by Theodore G. Barker, Samuel McGowan, John W. Harrington, John I. Ingram, William Wallace, John B. Erwin, and Robert Aldrich, and by each of them, and to the list of votes by them and each of them signed and certified as given for President of the United States and for Vice-President of the United States, for the following reasons:

I.

The said Theodore G. Barker, Samuel McGowan, John W. Harrington, John I. Ingram, William Wallace, John B. Erwin, and Robert Aldrich were not, nor was either of them, appointed an elector of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of South Carolina.

II.

The said papers have not annexed to them a certificate of the governor of South Carolina as required to be made and annexed by sections 136 and 138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

III.

The said papers have not annexed to them a list of the names of the said Theodore G. Barker, Samuel McGowan, John W. Harrington, John I. Ingram, William Wallace, John B. Erwin, and Robert Aldrich, as electors, to which the seal of the State of South Carolina was affixed by the secretary of state, and signed by the governor and secretary, as required by the general laws of South Carolina.

IV.

For that C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, William B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and William F. Myers were duly appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of South Carolina, and as such electors, at the time and place prescribed by law, cast their votes for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, and the lists of votes signed, certified, and transmitted by such electors to the President of the Senate are the only true and lawful lists of votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

V.

That the said C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, William B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and William F. Myers received the highest number of all the votes cast for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States by the qualified voters of the State of South Carolina at the election held in said State on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, and the proper officers of the State of South Carolina duly canvassed said votes, and made and certified according to law and under the great seal of the State of South Carolina, and delivered to said C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, William B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and William F. Myers lists of the electors of President and Vice-President of the United States elected by the qualified voters of said State at said election, and showing that said C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, William B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and William F. Myers were the persons having the highest number of votes of said qualified voters at such election, and were elected, which certificate is dated the 6th day of December, A. D. 1876, and which has been read before the two Houses of Congress; by reason of all which said Bowen, Winsmith, Johnston, Hurley, Nash, Cook, and Myers were the lawful electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of South Carolina.

VI.

That the lists of votes cast by the said C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, William B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and William F. Myers for President of the United States and for Vice-President of the United States, have annexed to them a certificate of the governor of the State of South Carolina, required to be made by sections 136 and 138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

VII.

That said lists of votes have annexed to them a list of the names of the said C. C. Bowen, John Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, William B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and William F. Myers as electors, to which the seal of the State of South Carolina was affixed by the secretary of state, and signed by the governor and secretary as required by the general laws of South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificates of the State of South Carolina?

There were no further objections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The certificates objected to, together with the objections, will be submitted to the Commission for its judgment and decision. The Senate will now retire to its chamber.

The Senate accordingly retired, at six o'clock and thirty minutes p. m

ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

MONDAY, February 26, 1877.

Its recess having expired, the Commission re-assembled at six o'clock p. m.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

At six o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m., Mr. Gorham, Secretary of the Senate, appeared and presented the following communication; *which was read :

HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 26, 1876.

To the President of the Commission :

More than one return, or paper purporting to be a return, or certificate of the electoral votes of the State of South Carolina having been received and this day opened in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, and objections thereto having been made, the said returns, with all accompanying papers, and also the objections thereto, are herewith submitted to the judgment and decision of the Commission, as provided by law.

T. W. FERRY,
President of the Senate.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I think the certificates had better be read, if they are not too long.

The PRESIDENT. The certificates will be read.

Mr. Commissioner PAYNE. Would it not be in order to have them printed ?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly; but their reading is asked for. They will be read.

The Secretary read the certificates.

The PRESIDENT. I desire to inquire who represent the objectors to certificate No. 1, under the fourth rule ?

Mr. Representative HURD. Mr. Cochrane, a Representative from Pennsylvania, and myself.

The PRESIDENT. Who represent the objectors to certificate No. 2 ?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. I have the honor to represent the objectors on the part of the House, and Senator Christiancy, I understand, represents the objectors on the part of the Senate.

Mr. Senator CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I wish to state, on behalf of the objectors on the part of the Senate, that, beyond the interposition of the objections, we do not propose to argue them, but leave them to be argued by counsel, if they see fit, within the time provided by your rules.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. I move that the papers referred to the Commission by the joint session, be printed.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. By that you mean the papers transmitted by the President of the Senate ?

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Before we proceed to any other matter, I inquire whether it would not be well to ascertain what counsel represent the two sides ?

The PRESIDENT. We have usually made that inquiry after the objectors have been heard; but I can make the inquiry now. Who are the counsel that represent the objectors to certificate No. 1 ?

Mr. Representative HURD. I am unable to state their names this evening, but I will report to the Commission to-morrow, if that will answer the purpose.

The PRESIDENT. I make the same inquiry now of the other side, if it be convenient for them to answer.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The objections to certificate No. 2 will be represented, so far as counsel are concerned, by Mr. Shellabarger and myself.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion of Mr. Commissioner Hunton that the papers be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. I move that the Commission adjourn until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion for a moment, to enable me to make a suggestion.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Certainly.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I do not rise to make a motion; but I wish to suggest that the Commission ought to determine the amount of time to be allowed in this case. It has seemed to me that there might be a reduction of time.

The PRESIDENT. In the absence of any application, the rules determine it.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I know that; but I am speaking now, not in favor of an extension, but a reduction of time.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. We had better wait until counsel come in.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. It has already been announced on the part of the Senate that they do not wish to occupy time.

The PRESIDENT. Excuse me, General Garfield. On one side the counsel are not present.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. No; but I am speaking of the whole subject of time, for objectors as well as counsel.

Mr. Commissioner FRELINGHUYSEN. I think that had better go off until to-morrow morning.

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. Very well; I will call it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT. It is moved that the Commission adjourn until to-morrow at ten o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Commission adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 27, 1877.

The Commission met at ten o'clock a. m., pursuant to adjournment. Present: The President and Messrs. Commissioners Miller, Strong, Field, Bradley, Edmunds, Morton, Frelinghuysen, Bayard, Kernan, Payne, Hunton, Abbott, Garfield, and Hoar.

The respective objectors and Messrs. Stanley Matthews and Samuel Shellabarger, counsel representing the objections to the South Carolina certificate No. 2, were also present.

The PRESIDENT. It was said that the counsel on the part of the objectors to certificate No. 1 would be named this morning.

Mr. Representative HURD. No counsel will appear on behalf of the objectors to certificate No. 1, as we are at present advised.

The PRESIDENT. We are ready to hear the objectors to certificate No. 1.

Mr. Representative HURD. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, I shall as briefly and as rapidly as I can submit to your consideration the reasons which in my judgment require the refusal on your part to count the vote of the State of South Carolina. In the discussion I shall endeavor not to go over any of the ground which has already been traversed. I shall not antagonize any of the propositions which I understand to have already been decided by the Commission. I shall submit, as I regard them, new propositions as to which the opinion of this Commission has not as yet been asked.

The first proposition is that the vote of South Carolina should not be counted, because at the time the election was held there was not a republican form of government in that State. I do not propose in discussing this proposition to refer to the history of the reconstruction measures by which South Carolina was restored to the Federal Union, nor to point out the anti-republican policies by which that result was brought about; nor do I intend to refer to the policies of legislation which have since followed its admission to the Union, policies by which the sovereignty of the State has practically been overthrown and by which the republican nature of its institutions has been destroyed. Nor yet do I intend to refer to the usurpations of those who have held political office in South Carolina, by which more markedly still has the nature of the government of that commonwealth been changed. I simply intend to refer to the condition of things which existed in South Carolina for a few weeks prior to the election, on the day of election, and for a few weeks following it. I apprehend that no person will dispute the proposition that, if in the State of South Carolina there was not a republican form of government at that time, its electoral vote should not be counted.

This seems to follow from two propositions, the first of which is that the Constitution of the United States guarantees to each State a republican form of government. This implies the duty on the part of the State to maintain a republican form of government, and a duty on the part of the United States to make the inquiry, whenever it is necessary, as to whether a republican form of government at that time may exist. The second is that this is a Union of republics, and, if it were permitted that a State without a republican form of government could cast its electoral vote and thus choose a President of the United States, the other republics of the Union would be bound by the act of a State which might be with a government monarchical in its form, or, as in the case of South Carolina, without, in substance, any government at all.

What is meant by "a republican form of government"? This phrase is used in the Constitution of the United States. It does not mean merely the form of a government; it means the essence and substance of the government. It does not mean that the constitution shall be republican in its form, because there is nothing which requires that a State shall have a constitution, and many States have been admitted into the Union without a constitution as that term is ordinarily understood by the American people. It does not mean, either, merely that the legislation shall be of a republican nature; but it does mean that the constitution and the legislation and the administration shall all be republican in their form and in their nature, that they shall together constitute a government based upon republican principles, which gives to the people the right and the opportunity to determine their own rulers freely and without intervention.

In order that it shall be a republican form of government, there must be nothing in the State, at the time that it is objected that there is not a republican form of government, which interferes with a free and fair election, with the free and fair and honest ascertainment of the popular will. Whatever does interfere with that, whatever does thwart the will of the people as it is attempted to be ascertained at the polls, interferes with, and to that extent destroys, a republic and a republican government.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. If I do not interrupt you may I ask you a question, Mr. Hurd? This constitutional provision has been very much discussed, you know, of late years; and really for my own information I should like to get your views very clearly. What importance do you attach to the word "form" in that phrase? It must have some significance. Is the expression the same as "republican government" without the word "form," or does the word "form" have reference to the division of powers?

Mr. Representative HURD. I regard the phrase as amounting to this, that each State in the Union must be a republic.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. What is a republic?

Mr. Representative HURD. That is just the proposition I was about to discuss.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Allow me to inquire, is not your proposition that it must be a form in force as a government?

Mr. Representative HURD. So I said.

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. I so understood you.

Mr. Representative HURD. As I maintained a moment ago, it must be republican in its constitution, republican in its measures of legislation, republican in its administration; that is, it must be a government actually existing, possessing all the requisites of a republican form of government, whatever they may be; and the essence of that (and that is the only point necessary for me to consider in this discussion) is that the people shall have a free and fair opportunity of expressing their will in the selection of their own rulers and in the management of their own elections.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. May not the form of the government be essentially republican and its administration be very tyrannical?

Mr. Representative HURD. Possibly it might be. There may be tyranny under a republican form of government, I concede; but when the form of government as administered, when the administration of the government, becomes such as to take out of the form the substance, the essence, and leave there a government not a republic, then that is not such a form of government as is contemplated by the Constitution.

As I was about to remark, whatever prevents a free expression of the popular will at the polls, whatever prevents a fair ascertainment of the wishes of the people in the choice of their rulers, interferes, and, to the extent that it operates, destroys a republican form of government. It is plain that if a monarchy were established in substance, although in form the government might be republican, that is the destruction of a republic, and no republican form of government exists, because a monarchy is the antipodes of the idea of a republic; and it is just as true that anarchy, so far as it may be effective, destroys the republic; for the literal signification of the word is "without government." Anarchy means no form of government at all, either republican or anything else. If lawlessness prevail so that it is impossible that there should be a lawful election; if violence be practiced so that men are not able freely to go to the polls; if intimidation be practiced so that large numbers of men who would otherwise vote do not go near the polls, or if they do go to the polls, are compelled to vote against their will, then an election held under such circumstances is held in a condition of anarchy, in which a republic is a mere myth and a fiction.

In this case, if your honors please, we propose to show by proof which has been taken by the various committees and which we regard as competent for the House of Representatives or the Senate to consider, that in the greater part of South Carolina on the day of the choice of the electors for President and Vice-President, there was a state of anarchy. The proof that was taken by the majority of the House committee shows that in the counties which gave large republican majorities intimidation was practiced by colored men upon their colored friends who desired to vote the democratic ticket; that men in the city of Charleston and in many of the counties outside of Charleston and in the islands near by were whipped and brutally abused at the polls for no other offense than that of proposing to vote the democratic ticket; that men who came to the polls with democratic tickets in their hands had them taken out of their hands and were compelled in the presence of a mob, in the presence of violence and riot and at the peril of their lives, to vote the ticket of the opposing party. We propose to show by the testimony which was taken by the minority of the same committee, that in the counties which gave large democratic majorities the democratic leaders and managers interfered with the freedom of the election by practicing intimidation upon their black employés and those who might happen to live within their districts. We propose to show that rifle-clubs were organized which were not disbanded in accordance with the proclamation of the President of the United States, and that under the effect of these rifle-clubs and of the intimidation that was practiced in that method large numbers of negroes who otherwise would have voted the republican ticket voted the democratic ticket.

These propositions I submit with the testimony which has been taken by the committee of the House of Representatives. The testimony taken by the subcommittee of which my friend Judge Lawrence was the chairman, or taken under his direction, showed very largely the facts as to the democratic intimidation. The testimony which was taken by the majority of the committee showed very largely the facts as to republican intimidation. We propose to put in evidence the proclamation of the President of the United States, which declared weeks before the election that there was a state of insurrection in South Carolina; a state of insurrection which demanded the presence of United States troops, a state of insurrection which could not have been overcome before the day of election; for there were on the day of election more troops in South Carolina than there were at any time before, after the proclamation was issued—thirty-two companies of the United States Army.

With this practice of intimidation as shown by this testimony, with this lawlessness at the polls, with this violence practiced upon the voters, with this practical anarchy everywhere, with this state of insurrection as declared by the President of the United States, with the presence of thirty-two companies of the Army of the United States there at his order, I submit that it was not possible that a fair and free election could be held in which the true announcement of the result could be made. I undertake to say that no person can read the history of the events in South Carolina and can read the testimony which has been taken before these committees and rise from the perusal without the conviction that he cannot tell what is the truth as to the vote of the State.

Will the Commission hear this proof which we tender? The proof goes directly to the question whether there is a republican form of government in the State of South Carolina or not; as to whether anarchy did not in fact exist in this State on the day of the election, destroying the republic. It is not the question that has been submitted to the tribunal before, as to how the officers of the State have discharged their trust; it is not a question of going behind the returns which have been sent to the President of the Senate to be opened; it does not relate to the manner of conducting the State elections; it does not relate to the honesty of State officials; but it goes to the question of whether there is a State government there at all or not. Will anybody dispute that the Congress of the United States has the power to inquire as to the character of the State government when it is said that it is not republican in form and is asked to perform its constitutional obligation of guaranteeing to it a republican form of government? Will anybody dispute that when the proposition is submitted to Congress for its consideration fairly, when the question fairly comes up for its action, it is bound to make inquiry as to the nature and character of the government to determine whether it be republican in form or not?

If it be true, then, that Congress has the right to make this inquiry at any time, it certainly is true that it has the right to make it now, when the question is as to the counting of the vote of a State, for the question then is whether it is a State that has voted; and in determining that question all testimony which tends to show the condition of affairs in the State at that time is competent. It must be competent, else it would be impossible that the two Houses should intelligently determine the question as to whether there was a republican form of government at the time of the election.

This question has been settled, so far as precedents can settle it, by the objections that have been made to counts and by the action of the two Houses heretofore. When Missouri and Indiana came into the Union, and electors had been chosen before the law had been passed by Congress admitting the States, it was objected at the counting that their votes should not be counted, because when given they were not States in the Union. Nobody disputed at that time that that was a perfectly fair ground of objection. It was within the province of the two Houses then counting the vote to determine whether the State had been admitted into the Union or not; and if in that case they had the power to determine whether it had been admitted into the Union or not, whether, in other words, it was a State, have they not the power to determine whether by adopting a government not republican in its form it has gone out of the Union? It is the same question in both cases, whether there is a State there under the Constitution that has cast the vote, the only difference being in the form in which the questions are presented to the two Houses.

When the Southern States were in rebellion it was decided that their votes should not be counted, and during the process of reconstruction it was decided that they should not be counted because there were not governments there republican in form. Congress undertook to decide the question as to the character of the government when it counted the electoral vote, the very question I ask this Commission now to decide by inquiring as to the condition of the government of South Carolina, hearing testimony which we offer to submit to your consideration, in order that you may ascertain whether there is in fact a State in this Union purporting to be the State of South Carolina which has cast an electoral vote.

But admitting that the State of South Carolina is a republic, that it has a republican form of government, I submit that no election has been held as required by the constitution of the State of South Carolina and by the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution of the United States requires that the electors shall be chosen as the legislature of the State may direct. The constitution of the State of South Carolina requires that the legislature shall from time to time adopt laws of registration.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Can you tell me the date of the adoption of the constitution of South Carolina?

Mr. Representative HURD. The language is:

It shall be the duty of the general assembly to provide from time to time for the registration of all electors.

My friend Mr. Shellabarger will give you the date. I believe it was 1868.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Before you pass from this other matter, Mr. Hurd, do I understand your claim to be substantially this: that, passing the question whether there is a republican form merely, such was the condition of things in South Carolina, from the interference of the military and the violence on the one side and on the other side, that there was not a free election which should certainly undertake to determine the election of electors?

Mr. Representative HURD. To that point I will address myself directly. I have simply, as far as I have gone, undertaken to say that by reason of the existence of anarchy in the State of South Carolina there was no government at all, and could not, therefore, be a republican form of government, whether in the constitution or in the law a republican form might have been established or not.

This provision of the constitution of South Carolina adopted in 1868, article 8, section 3, I regard as mandatory. I will not refer to the many distinctions made between statutes that are directory and statutes that are imperative, but simply to this, that wherever a statute or a provision of the constitution treats of that which is of the essence of the thing, then it shall be regarded as imperative upon those who are required to obey its provisions. In this case the object was to secure a fair and honest election in the State of South Carolina. Registration was required as a means to that end. It became, therefore, of the essence, in the opinion of the framers of the constitution, that registration should be made in order to secure this fairness of election. Most of the States of the Union have adopted registration laws upon the same theory.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY. Has there never been a registration law in South Carolina?

Mr. Representative HURD. There has been no registration-law passed which affects or relates to the choosing of electors, and by which, in the important matter of the representation of the State in the electoral college, this provision of the constitution is to be alone complied with.

I insist, as I was about to remark, that not only have they not passed a law upon this subject with reference to registration, but they have passed a law which defeats the very object in view in the putting of the provision into the constitution. They have enacted a law which has divided the State of South Carolina into four hundred and ninety-two precincts, with only thirty-two counties, a number of precincts in each county; and they have provided that every voter may vote at any precinct in the county that he chooses. The consequence is that not only is there no limitation upon the power of the voter, so far as registration is concerned, but his power to vote, if he be a dishonest man, is limited only by the boundaries of his county and the number of precincts that may be established in it. The consequence is that the object intended to be accomplished by the constitution of the State of South Carolina has entirely been defeated, and a larger vote in proportion to the population is polled this day in the State of South Carolina than in any other State in the Union.

It has been held, over and over again, that where the law requires a registration, and an election is held without a registration, the election is void. I read from McCrary on Elections, page 12 :

It being conceded that the power to enact a registry law is within the power to regulate the exercise of the elective franchise and preserve the purity of the ballot, it follows that an election held in disregard of the provisions of a registry law must be held void.

The authorities cited for the support of the provision are from Missouri and Wisconsin, authorities which fully sustain the text. If that be the effect of a provision of statute, what shall be said of the effect of the provision of the constitution of the State which has been referred to ?

It may be suggested that the legislature has the power under the Constitution of the United States to provide for the choosing of the electors, and that the constitution of the State was not authorized to determine it. But the legislature of the State is organized under the constitution of the State; it has no power excepting that which the constitution confers, and in these matters of election it is determined that there can be no election unless there shall have been a registration. Here then there has been a refusal to regard the fundamental law, a refusal by the legislature to regard the very life of its being, the consequence of which must be to render as void the election as though there had been on the part of the ministerial officers only a disregard of a statutory provision.

But supposing that it shall be held that there was a republican form of government in South Carolina; supposing that it shall be held that the election was regularly and constitutionally conducted, then I say that the testimony which we propose to offer in this case shows that the intervention of the military authority and the lawlessness at the polls prevented any execution of the ordinary functions of government and destroyed the freedom of election. We propose to show that on the 17th day of October the President of the United States issued his proclamation declaring that a state of insurrection existed in the State of South Carolina, in these words :

Whereas it has been satisfactorily shown to me that insurrection and domestic violence exist in several counties of the State of South Carolina, and that certain combinations of men against law exist in many counties of said State, known as "rifle-clubs," who ride up and down by day and night in arms, murdering some peaceable citizens and intimidating others, which combinations, though forbidden by the laws of the State, cannot be controlled or suppressed by the ordinary course of justice;

And whereas it is provided in the Constitution of the United States that the United States shall protect every State in this Union, on application of the legislature, or of the executive when the legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence;

And whereas by laws in pursuance of the above it is provided (in the laws of the United States) that, in all cases of insurrection in any State, (or of obstruction to the laws thereof,) it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the legislature of such State, or of the executive when the legislature cannot be convened, to call forth the militia of any other State or States, or to employ such part of the land and naval forces as shall be judged necessary for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection or causing the laws to be duly executed;

And whereas the legislature of said State is not now in session and cannot be convened in time to meet the present emergency, and the executive of said State, under section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, has therefore made due application to me in the premises for such part of the military force of the United States as may be necessary and adequate to protect said State and the citizens thereof against domestic violence and to enforce the due execution of the law ;

And whereas it is required that, whenever it may be necessary in the judgment of the President to use the military force for the purpose aforesaid, he shall forthwith, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective homes within a limited time :

Now, therefore, I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, do hereby make proclamation and command all persons engaged in said unlawful and insurrectionary proceedings to disperse and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within three days from this date, and hereafter abandon said combinations and submit themselves to the laws and constituted authorities of said State.

And I invoke the aid and co-operation of all good citizens thereof to uphold the laws and preserve the public peace.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 17th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1876, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and first.

[L. s.]

By the President :

JOHN L. CADWALADER,
Acting Secretary of State.

U. S. GRANT.

This proclamation evidently was issued in attempted pursuance of a provision of the Constitution, part of which I have already considered. Its language is that—

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the legislature, or of the executive when the legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence.

The phraseology of this article of the Constitution will be noticed ; it is protection against domestic violence ; that is, protection against that violence which occurs within the limits of the State and as against State authority, as contradistinguished from such violence as amounts to a rebellion against the authority of the United States ; because where it amounts to a rebellion against the authority of the United States the power to suppress it arises from another section of the Constitution. It must be upon the demand of the legislature, excepting in those cases where the legislature cannot be convened. What is the meaning of that provision ? It occurs to me that its true sense is that where by reason of domestic violence it is impossible that the legislature of the State can be convened, then the executive may make his demand upon the United States that there be protection given. As suggested already in what I have said, the violence must be directed against the authority of the State. It is the State that is protected against domestic violence ; it is not the individuals within the State ; it is not the citizens of the State ; it must be such domestic violence, therefore, as threatens the existence of the government, as is directed against the government, such domestic violence as amounts to insurrection. In 1795 a law was passed in these words, found in the Revised Statutes as section 5297 :

In case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President, on application of the legislature of such State, or of the executive when the legislature cannot be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, which may be applied for, as he deems sufficient to suppress such insurrection ; or, on like application, to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he deems necessary.

Section 5298 provides for those cases of insurrection which occur against the Government of the United States, where the President of the United States has the power himself directly to interfere without the request of the State authorities. Section 5299, which was passed in 1871, provides as to power to suppress insurrection in violation of civil rights, and it provides that where insurrection or domestic violence, &c., occurs—

Such facts shall be deemed a denial by such State of the equal protection of the laws to which they are entitled under the Constitution of the United States; and in all such cases, or whenever any such insurrection, violence, unlawful combination, or conspiracy opposes or obstructs the laws of the United States or the due execution thereof, or impedes or obstructs the due course of justice under the same, it shall be lawful for the President, and it shall be his duty, to take such measures, by the employment of the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States, or of either, or by other means, as he may deem necessary, for the suppression of such insurrection, domestic violence, or combinations.

The President was acting evidently under section 5297; because, under section 5298 and section 5299, it would be perfectly competent for him to proceed to issue his proclamation and to call upon the troops without any demand being made on him by the executive of the State or by the legislature of the State. Therefore, it was not an insurrection against the Government of the United States, nor was it an interference with the equal rights or the civil rights of citizens under the law that the President was attempting to suppress; it was an insurrection against the government of the State. Who is to determine whether an insurrection existed in the State at the time this demand was made? The governor of the State in this case made his demand on the President of the United States. But his decision that there was an insurrection in his State was not final, because he was not the final judge. It was the President of the United States who was to determine whether an insurrection existed there or not. Now, let us see what his determination was upon the point. If he had simply said that there was an insurrection in the State, possibly we might not have been permitted to make any inquiry on the subject-matter; but he has stated what the insurrection consisted in, what it was. It was that—

Rifle-clubs ride up and down by day and night in arms, murdering some peaceable citizens and intimidating others, which combinations, though forbidden by the laws of the State, cannot be controlled or suppressed by the ordinary course of justice.

I submit that that did not amount to an insurrection against the government of the State of South Carolina. It was a mere case of violation of law, a case in which the courts, as he said, might be powerless to protect the citizen, but not a case in which there is any evidence that the military authority of the State would not have been sufficient to protect the citizen. The demand was made for troops, merely upon that statement, and it is upon that statement that the proclamation of the President of the United States rests. I say that it does not show a state of insurrection which justified him in issuing the proclamation, and we propose to sustain that proposition by offers of testimony that at the time this proclamation was issued, while there may have been intimidation practiced upon voters, while there may have been excited efforts to carry the election on both sides, there was no such insurrection against the authority of the government of the State as required the intervention of the national authority.

We say with reference to this, therefore, that there was no insurrection which either under the Constitution or the law justified the interference of the President of the United States. We say that the authority of the government of the State of South Carolina was not in danger. We say that the demand that was made by the governor of the State was made when he had abundant power and authority under the constitution to call the legislature together. It was nearly a month until the election, but those troops were kept there for weeks after the election. If they were necessary in the beginning to suppress the insurrection, they were necessary in the end, and in that state of case there was abundant time for the governor of the State of South Carolina to issue his proclamation, bring his legislature together, and make the constitutional demand upon the President for Federal interference.

But I say, in addition to this proposition, that the troops of the United States were in the State of South Carolina unconstitutionally on the day of the election; that, when they were there so unconstitutionally, they violated the laws of the United States which governed them in the performance of their duties as to elections. Sections 2002 and 2003 of the Revised Statutes provide :

No military or naval officer or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls.

No officer of the Army or Navy of the United States shall prescribe or fix, or attempt to prescribe or fix, by proclamation, order, or otherwise, the qualifications of voters in any State, or in any manner interfere with the freedom of any election in any State or with the exercise of the free right of suffrage in any State.

These troops in South Carolina, as I have shown, unconstitutionally, on the day of the election, violated the law of the United States. They were at the polls, where there was no trouble at all, not for the purpose of keeping the peace, but for the purpose of interfering with the freedom of the election; and we propose to submit to the consideration of this Commission abundant proof to show that the elections in many precincts of the State of South Carolina were held in the immediate presence of Federal troops; that men were compelled, in some cases, to pass through files of Federal soldiers to deposit their ballots. We propose to show that, without any excuse, the deputy marshals of the United States called upon armed forces to interfere and to aid them in making arrests. We propose to show that, by this military interference, intimidation was practiced directly under the authority of the Federal Government, and that a result was reached which would not have been reached had the military been kept out of the State, or, if in the State, had been kept from violating the duty imposed upon them by the law. Will the Commission hear proof as to this point?

I submit that this question has not been passed upon by this Commission as yet. It is not a question as to how State officers have performed their duty; it is not a question as to the effect of a return which may have been made by a returning-board; it is not a question as to the powers of the judiciary to interfere with the action of the board after it has been done; but it is a question of vis major coming to control the ballot-box, take charge of the elections, manage them, and give as the expression of the will of the people that which is not the expression of the people's will at all.

I insist, if your honors please, that if the Federal Government, in violation of the Constitution, in violation of the law, sends its troops to a State and prevents a free election, what is the result is not the true voice of the people any more than if they had been the troops of Great Britain or France that had interfered in the State and prevented the free voice of the people from being expressed. I maintain, therefore, that no decision had been made by this Commission which prevents proof upon this subject. We offer to make the proof that the troops of the Federal Government were there unconstitutionally; that they were there on the day of election in violation of law; and that by their presence they interfered with the freedom of the election and prevented the real, true voice of the State of South Carolina from being expressed.

At the very first session, or nearly the first session, of the Congress of the United States a member sought to take his seat, elected from one of the States of the Union, to whom objection was made upon the ground that he had been chosen when the military power was present at the polls. Our fathers, true to what they had learned from their ancestry, held that the election was absolutely void, and the seat was refused to him. In England, from 1741 until this day, there has never been such an interference with the freedom of elections as has occurred in the State of South Carolina within the last six months. From the time that the three magistrates were compelled to kneel before the Speaker of the Commons and receive the reprimand of the Commons until this day, military interference with elections seems in England to have been unknown. It is reserved for this republic to permit military interference without rebuke and without opposition.

Gentlemen of the Commission, there are two propositions which should never be forgotten in a republic: First, that free and honest elections are essential to its existence; and, second, that the civil power should be superior to the military at every point and free from every suggestion of its influence. These two doctrines are the very soul of free institutions. The one puts the breath into the body-politic and the other preserves the life that that breath imparts. The one declares the will of the people, the other sees to it that that will is expressed in all the majesty of its power, free from all restraint and control from all persons whatsoever, excepting as it may have imposed restraints voluntarily upon itself.

These propositions have been defended with a devotion that never flagged and with a watchfulness that never slumbered, wherever republics have continued. The decay of a republic always begins in the indifference of the people to the maintenance of these doctrines. Indeed, in all history, as the republic has receded and the empire has advanced, the infallible test by which to mark the growth of the one and the decay of the other has been the regard in which the people held the freedom of their elections and military interference.

May this republic be saved from the end to which the unrebuked and successful interference of the United States in South Carolina's elections will inevitably lead!

[During the argument of Mr. Representative Hurd, Hon. J. S. Black and Hon. Montgomery Blair entered the room and took seats at the tables provided for counsel.]

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. Mr. President, I desire to say that Judge Black and Mr. Blair will appear as counsel. The objectors to certificate No. 1 had thought that counsel would not be able to attend, but we find that Judge Black and Mr. Blair can attend, and they are here.

The PRESIDENT. It is very proper to notify us before we proceed further.

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. Before the gentleman objecting to certificate No. 2 is heard, I desire to submit certain offers of evidence.

The PRESIDENT. Will there be any further argument on behalf of the objectors on your side?

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. No, sir, no more argument. Mr. Hurd has covered the ground, and I do not propose to argue it; but I propose to submit certain offers of evidence which I will read to the Commission and ask the attention of the Commission to them.

"In support of the objections to certificate No. 1 it is proposed to prove by competent evidence the following facts, which said facts are offered separately and as a whole:

"I. That by reason of the failure and refusal of the legislature of South Carolina to provide for a registration of electors, as required by article 8, section 3, of the constitution of said State, and by reason of the acts passed by said legislature in violation of the spirit of such constitution, great frauds were perpetrated by colored republican voters; that at least three thousand illegal votes were cast for the Hayes electors, which said votes being excluded would give a majority to the Tilden electors.

"II. That immediately after the adjournment of Congress, to wit, in the month of August, A. D. 1876, a large number of the United States soldiers, under command of General Ruger, were sent by the President into said State; that on October 16, General Ruger telegraphed to the authorities at Washington that all was quiet, that there was no need for further troops, that if he (Ruger) deemed further force necessary he would call for the same; that he never did call for more troops; but that on October 17 the President issued a proclamation declaring that the people of said State were in a condition of insurrection, and that immediately thereafter large numbers of United States soldiers were sent into said State; that at no time prior to the last-mentioned date was there a condition of violence or insurrection which the authorities of the State were unable to control; that at no time during the year 1876 did such a state of affairs exist in South Carolina as justified the intervention of the Federal Government.

"III. That the troops were sent into said State without any action of the legislature thereof, although the same could have been readily convened.

"IV. That the troops were sent into said State, not for the purpose of quelling insurrection and preserving peace and good order, but for the purpose and with the design of overawing the voters of said State; that said troops were stationed at and near the polls on election day, and that their presence before and at the day of the election did obstruct and interfere with an expression of the popular will and prevent a free election.

"V. That the presence of said troops served to embolden the more desperate of the negroes; being assured by their party leaders that said troops were there for the purpose of protecting them in any act of violence, the blacks throughout the counties of Beaufort and Charleston inaugurated a condition of riot and lawlessness; that the republican officials incited them to the commission of every character of crime; that murder was committed, and the perpetrators allowed to escape punishment; that justices refused to issue warrants for the arrest of criminals charged even with the crime of murder, and sheriffs refused to execute such warrants if issued; that the police force of the city of Charleston, composed almost entirely of republican negroes, employed its time in shooting down upon the public streets quiet and inoffensive white men, members of said force being in many instances leaders in the riots which occurred; that upon election day the negroes assembled at the polls, and with rifles, shot-guns, and other weapons prevented negroes who desired so to do from voting the democratic ticket; that the State militia, composed of the worst element of the negro population and supplied with State arms, was also at the polls aiding and abetting in the violation of law and in the intimidation of voters; that the sheriff of Charleston County, one of the republican electors"—I refer to Mr. C. C. Bowen—"without warrant or authority of law appointed hundreds of so-called deputy sheriffs, all negroes and republicans, investing them with the power to make arrests at their pleasure; that these deputy sheriffs swarmed about the various polls on election-day, and by their threats of violence did hinder and prevent many citizens from voting, and did arrest and imprison without information or warrant many of those who attempted to vote the democratic ticket; that persons styled United States deputy marshals were also stationed at the polls aiding and assisting said deputy sheriffs; that throughout the State the negroes believed that the United States soldiers had been sent to shoot them if they did not vote the republican ticket.

"VI. That such violence and lawlessness existed throughout the counties of Charleston and Beaufort shortly before and on the day of the election, which said lawlessness was primarily attributable to the occupation of the State by United States soldiers, that no free election could be or was held in said counties; but that upon the contrary the popular will found no expression at the polls; that by reason of the lawlessness which existed in the county of Charleston alone the republican electors secured a majority of about 7,000 votes."

Very few, if any, of the republican electors in the State had a majority of more than a thousand in the whole. The majority in the county of Charleston alone, rolled up by means of these terrible frauds and outrages on law and liberty, was 7,000.

In this connection I will call the attention of the Commission to one section in Blackstone which states the principle more tersely than I could. I refer to 1 Blackstone's Commentaries, page 178:

And, as it is essential to the very being of Parliament that elections should be absolutely free, therefore all undue influences upon the electors are illegal and strongly prohibited, for Mr. Locke ranks it among those breaches of trust in the executive magistrate which, according to his notions, amount to a dissolution of the government, "if he employs the force, treasure, and offices of the society to corrupt the representatives, or openly to pre-engage the electors and prescribe what manner of persons shall be chosen. For thus to regulate candidates and electors, and new-model the ways of election, what is it (says he) but to cut up the government by the roots, and poison the very fountain of public security?" As soon, therefore, as the time and place of election, either in counties or boroughs, are fixed, all soldiers quartered in the place are to remove, at least one day before the election, to the distance of two miles or more, and not to return till one day after the poll is ended. Riots likewise have been frequently determined to make an election void.

The PRESIDENT. The Commission will now hear the objectors to certificate No. 2.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, if the proceedings of this Commission and its decisions were only to be read and judged of by learned lawyers familiar with the truth of history in all that pertains to the electoral vote of South Carolina, I would not deem it necessary to say one word upon the questions which are now submitted for consideration. But they are to be read by others who may not so well understand them, and for this reason it may be proper to submit some remarks. If I had not ceased to be surprised at anything that might be urged on some political questions, however unwarranted, I might confess to astonishment at the objections made to the electoral vote of this State as cast for Rutherford B. Hayes for President and William A. Wheeler for Vice-President.

But when objections are made upon official responsibility they must be met and considered.

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. If the gentleman will excuse me,

I believe it is customary when an offer of proof is made that the objector upon the other side shall determine whether he objects to its reception. I would therefore ask the gentleman to say, before proceeding with his argument, whether he objects to our proving the facts as stated in these offers of proof?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Mr. President and gentlemen, I suppose this Commission would not receive proofs which were clearly incompetent, however much I might undertake to consent.

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. But do you object?

Mr. Commissioner HOAR. Mr. President, I understand that under the rules of the Commission the discretion of objecting to testimony or consenting to its admission is lodged with counsel, on the ground that they are to have the management of the cause, and that question I suppose should properly be addressed to counsel on that side, and not to Judge Lawrence, the objector.

The PRESIDENT. I am inclined to think that is the correct view. It is the office of counsel to object.

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. Very well, sir.

The PRESIDENT. And also for counsel to offer, usually. I will propound the question in due season to counsel.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. To this I can only add, that if the counsel who represent the Hayes electors shall deem it proper to offer proof, and if this Commission shall deem it lawful to hear it, we shall by abundant testimony be able to disprove every material allegation made by the objectors on the other side. We shall be able to show that by reason of intimidation and violence practiced by democratic politicians and organized democratic rifle-clubs in the State of South Carolina, many thousands of republican voters were driven away or kept away from the polls, and that but for this intimidation and violence the majority for the so-called Hayes electors would have been many thousands more than it was.

I will first direct the attention of the Commission to the papers purporting to be certificates of electoral votes cast for Samuel J. Tilden for President and for Thomas A. Hendricks for Vice-President, by Theodore G. Barker and others, claiming to be electors for South Carolina.

To these I object—

1. Because they are here without the certificate required by sections 136 and 138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

These sections require that there shall be annexed to the certificates of the votes cast by electors a "list of the names of the electors * * * made, * * * certified, and * * * furnished to them by direction of the executive of the State."

2. Because they are here without the certificate required by the statute of South Carolina.

By chapter IX of the Revised Statutes of South Carolina of 1873, section 15, it is provided that the secretary of state shall prepare lists—of the names of the electors, procure to the same the signature of the governor, affix thereto the seal of the State, and deliver them thus signed and sealed to the president of the college of electors.—Revised Statutes South Carolina, page 36.

The certificate thus described in the statute is that which is required by the sections of the Revised Statutes to which I have referred. The record of these so-called electors affirmatively shows that they never received any certificate, so that there is no room to make inquiry as to any presumption to support their authority.

3. The assumed authority of these so-called electors is overthrown by the fact that C. C. Bowen and others, electors of President and Vice-President of South Carolina, cast their votes for Hayes and Wheeler, and these are here in proper form and with a certificate under the great seal of the State duly signed by the governor and secretary of state as evidence of the authority of the electors, in the form required by the act of Congress and the statute of South Carolina.

The assumed authority of Barker and his associates as electors is not only without evidence to support it, but it is overthrown by evidence which proves in due form of law the authority of Bowen and his associates who voted for Hayes and Wheeler.

The "Tilden electors," Barker and others, were therefore not "duly appointed electors in" South Carolina, and the votes by them cast are not "the votes provided for by the Constitution."

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. I do not understand that Mr. Hurd on the other side claimed that this certificate No. 2 should be counted, but the objection was to counting the votes of the electors named in certificate No. 1.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Still this certificate is here and we have made objections to it; and I will in a very few words state the reasons why it should not be counted. It is that certificate that sends the case here.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER. If nobody claims that it ought to be counted, I hardly think that it is worth while to waste time upon it.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Very well. This then brings us to the inquiry as to the legal appointment of the Hayes electors, Bowen and others, and the validity of the votes they gave for President and Vice-President. From the evidence to which I have already referred, it is sufficiently shown that they were duly appointed electors, and that the votes they gave for Hayes for President and for Wheeler for Vice-President are "the votes provided for by the Constitution" unless some one of the five objections made to them shall be well taken.

These several objections I will proceed very briefly to notice.

The first objection is:

1. That no legal election was held in South Carolina for presidential electors, the general assembly of that State not having provided, as required by article 3, section 3, of the constitution thereof, for the registration of persons entitled to vote, without which registration no valid or legal election could be held.

The constitution of South Carolina provides that—

It shall be the duty of the general assembly to provide from time to time for the registration of all electors.

And it is assumed that a failure to provide for the registration will defeat the title to office of presidential electors chosen by popular vote.

In reply to this, it is proposed now to show—

1. That clause of the constitution as to registration is DIRECTORY, and a failure to comply with it cannot affect the result of an election.

2. The State constitution cannot take from the legislature the power given to it by the Constitution of the United States to provide for the appointment of electors without registration, "in such manner as the legislature may direct."

3. The legislature HAS COMPLIED with the constitutional provision requiring registration.

To each of these points I will briefly call the attention of the Commission.

1. This provision of the constitution is DIRECTORY, resting for its execution on the conscience of the legislature; and a failure to provide for registration does not invalidate or affect the result of the election.

This position may be illustrated by a clause in the constitution of Ohio. The constitution of Ohio provides as to the legislature that—

No bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title.

But the supreme court has said this provision—is directory only, and the supervision of its observance must be left to the general assembly. * * * It is not to be enforced by judicial interposition. * * * It would be most mischievous in practice to make the validity of every law to depend upon the judgment of every judicial tribunal as to whether an act or bill contained more than one subject. * * * The only safeguard against the violation of these rules of the houses is their regard for and their oath to support the constitution.—6 Ohio State Reports, 176.

Here was a duty imposed by the constitution on the legislature, but a neglect of this duty does not invalidate laws which fail to conform to the constitutional requisition.

The Constitution of the United States, higher than any State constitution, requires the State legislatures to provide for the appointment of electors. A failure of the legislature to follow all the directions of the State constitution as to the registration of voters cannot defeat the duty imposed on the State by the “higher law” of the supreme national Constitution or disfranchise a State in the election of a President.

The right of the National Government to have each State participate in a presidential election cannot be defeated by the wrong of the legislature in not complying with the directions of the State constitution. The right of the entire people of the United States to have all the States represented in the choice of a President cannot be defeated by the wrong stated.

The constitution of South Carolina requires the election of State and county officers by popular vote. To say that an election is void without a registration law, is to affirm that the legislature may dissolve the entire State and local government and produce anarchy. Certainly the convention which made the constitution never intended so disastrous a result to follow the omission to enact a registry law. Yet if this omission defeats the right of the State to representation in the electoral college, it would legalize a fearful anarchy; it would enable a State practically to withdraw from the Union; it would be “secession made easy.”

The statute regulating elections in this State provides that—

All bar-rooms, saloons, and other places for the sale of liquors by retail shall be closed at six o'clock of the evening preceding the day of election and remain closed until six o'clock on the morning of the day thereafter; and during the time aforesaid the sale of all intoxicating liquors is prohibited.

And a penalty is provided on conviction. If the State can be deprived of its electoral vote for want of a registration law, it might, with equal propriety, be so deprived by the non-enforcement of this provision, for it is a part of the election machinery prescribed by the legislature for the appointment of electors.

It is the duty of the legislatures in many States to “pass laws to preserve the purity of elections,” but a failure to do so could not invalidate the elections held in those States.

The claim now set up would invest Congress with a power to furnish pretexts for disfranchising States and dictate the selection of a President. The legislative power would absorb the executive, and defeat the purpose of the Constitution. This is a danger which the framers of the Constitution never intended to authorize. It has been forcibly said that “if there was no check upon the tyranny of legislative majorities the prospect before us would be gloomy in the extreme.” (1 Kent, 450, note, 11th ed.) One of the "checks" provided by the Constitution is that the electoral votes forwarded in due form from the States should not be rejected by "the tyranny of legislative majorities," but should, when opened, "then be counted."

In the light of authority and reason, it seems certain the omission to enact a registration law cannot affect the appointment of electors. Upon this whole subject, I will refer the Commission to authorities as follows: Pim vs. Nicholson, 6 Ohio St. R., 176; Sedgwick on Statutes, 377; 570. To the same effect is Miller vs. State, 3 Ohio St., 475; People vs. Supervisors, 4 Selden, 317; Washington vs. Murray, 4 Cal., 388; Davis vs. State, 7 Maryland, 151; Battle vs. Howard, 13 Texas, 345. And see Haywood on County Elections, 511; Golden vs. Sharp, Clarke & Hall, 410; Van Rensselaer vs. Van Allen, Clarke & Hall, 73; Arnold vs. Lea, Clarke & Hall, 601; Lyon vs. Smith, Clarke & Hall, 101; Orkney & Shetland, Fraser, 360; (see Seaford, Laders III, 3; Case of David Bard, Clarke & Hall, 116; Porterfield vs. McCoy, Clarke & Hall, 267; Colchester, Peckwell I, 503-507; Easton vs. Scott, Clarke & Hall, 272; Mallary vs. Merrill, Clarke & Hall, 328; Draper vs. Johnston, Clarke & Hall, 703; Spaulding vs. Mead, Clarke & Hall, 157; Standish, Cushing, S. & J., 82; Chatham, Cushing, S. & J. 423; West Boylston, Cushing, S. & J., 394; Limerick, Perry, & Knapp, 355; Cochrane & Rowe, 288; Warwick, Cushing, S. & J., 401; McCrary on Elections, sec. 123-130.

I now proceed to show—

2. That the State Constitution cannot take from the legislature the right given to it by the Constitution of the United States to appoint electors without a registration of voters "in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct."

In other words, if the State constitution requires the legislature to enact a registry law for the purpose of choosing electors, it is unconstitutional.

The Constitution of the United States provides that—

Each State shall appoint [electors] in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct.

In every State the legislature has provided by law for the appointment of electors by popular vote. This is done in pursuance of authority given to the legislature by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Permit me to ask you a question. Do you mean to say that it is unconstitutional for a State constitution to provide that elections shall take place by a registry law?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. I do. I mean to say that the manner of the appointment of electors of President and Vice-President is by the Constitution of the United States intrusted solely to the discretion of the State legislature, and that it is absolutely uncontrollable by any provision of a State constitution. That is precisely what I mean to say.

This legislative authority exists not by force of any State constitution, but the "supreme law" above it. As the power is derived from the Constitution of the United States, and is given in plenary and unlimited terms, the State legislature is made the exclusive judge of the manner in which popular elections shall be authorized, regulated, conducted, and the result declared, subject only to the obligations of the amendments of the Constitution in relation to suffrage and such regulations as Congress may be authorized to make.

A State constitution can no more require a "registration law" against the judgment of the legislature than it can impose restraints on the powers given by the national Constitution to Congress. The provision of the South Carolina constitution requiring a registration law is itself unconstitutional and void so far as it attempts to impose a duty on the legislature to require registration of voters authorized to participate in the appointment of electors.

This may be illustrated by other provisions of the Constitution of the United States. This provides that—

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, &c.

In discussing the powers of State constitutional conventions, Jameson, a law-writer of acknowledged authority, denies in emphatic terms that they can make any regulation affecting "the times, places, or manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress." He says:

The rule is general, that it is the State legislatures which apportion their several States for congressional electors. (Jameson on Constitutional Conventions. West Virginia contested-election cases, first session Forty-third Congress; Congressional Record, 35, 36, 38, 46, 816-819, 842-849, 875-880, 884-890, 931-937, 958-963; Speer's speech, Appendix, 34.)

And he shows that the exceptional cases in which constitutional conventions have provided for the election of Representatives, upon the creation of a new State, derive their validity from the action of Congress in ratifying them: His language is, that Congress—having the power to "make or alter," Congress doubtless might ratify such regulations, however made; or if a State, actual or inchoate, were in such a condition that it had no lawful legislature, Congress might itself, for the sake of convenience, establish them by its direct action.

The great American commentator, whose researches explored every field of legal learning and left their impress on all, whose emphatic words I commend to my learned friend the Commissioner from Massachusetts, [Mr. Abbott,] Mr. Justice Story, in the Massachusetts constitutional convention of 1820, in discussing this subject, said:

The question then was whether we have a right to insert in our constitution a provision which controls or destroys a discretion which may be, nay must be, exercised by the legislature in virtue of powers confided to it by the Constitution of the United States.

The fourth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States declares, "That the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof."

Here an express provision was made for the manner of choosing Representatives by the State legislatures. They have an unlimited discretion on the subject. They may provide for an election in single districts, in districts sending more than one, or by general ticket for the whole State. Here is a general discretion, a power of choice. What is the proposition on the table? It is to limit this discretion, to leave no choice to the legislature, to compel Representatives to be chosen in districts; in other words, to compel them to be chosen in a specific manner, excluding all others. Was not this plainly a violation of the Constitution? Does it not affect to control the legislature in the exercise of its legitimate powers? Does it not interfere with the superintending authority of Congress? * * * * It assumes a control over the legislature which the Constitution of the United States does not justify. It is bound to exercise its authority according to its own view of public policy and principle; and yet this proposition compels it to surrender all discretion. In my humble judgment * * * it is a direct and palpable infringement of the constitutional provisions to which I have referred.

There is nothing new in the suggestion that a State constitution may in some of its provisions be unconstitutional and void because in conflict with the higher Constitution of the United States.

But it is not necessary to say that there is any conflict between the national and State constitutions. By a well-known rule of construction, the provisions in relation to registration at most must be deemed as intended only to apply to registration for elections exclusively under State authority. (1 Kent, 460, 11th ed.; State vs. Millburn, 9 Gill, 105; 1 Blackst. Com., 261; Comyn's Dig., tit. Parl. R., 8; King vs. Allen, 15 East., 33; 6 Term R., 194; 2 Mason, 314; 1 Watts, 54; 4 Cowen, 143; 11 Peters, 598.)

It seems certain, then, that the legislature of South Carolina has been guilty of no omission of duty in relation to registration.

I proceed to show—

3. That the legislature has complied with the constitutional provision requiring registration.

The election-law provides as to each voting-precinct that—

Each clerk of the poll shall keep a poll-list, which shall contain one column headed "names of voters," and the name of each elector voting shall be entered by the clerk in such column.

These are public records, which in each county belong to the files of the county commissioners of election. This is a substantial compliance with the constitutional provision requiring a "registration of all electors."

Besides this, the revised statutes of 1873 require a complete census to be taken on or before April 15, 1875, and every tenth year thereafter, and the census for each county is to be deposited with the county auditor. The law, or rather I should say the official instructions under it, require the census returns to show the names of all male persons over twenty-one years of age, and these are voters. This gives a complete registration of all voters, and is a substantial compliance with the constitutional provision requiring registration. This law has been faithfully executed and furnishes the means of detecting illegal voters.

As to municipal elections there is a registry law. The revised statutes of 1873, chapter 11, page 39, require every voter to be "registered in the ward or precinct in which he offers to vote."

The second objection to the "Hayes electoral vote" is:

2. That there was not existing in the State of South Carolina on the 1st of January, 1876, nor at any time thereafter, up to and including the 10th of December, 1876, a republican form of government, such as is guaranteed by the Constitution to every State in the Union.

It is a sufficient answer to this to say that South Carolina was duly represented in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States during all this time, and this is conclusive evidence in every particular against the objection which has been made. In the case of Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard, 42, Chief-Justice Taney said:

It rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For, as the United States guarantee to each State a republican form of government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State, before it can determine whether it is republican or not; and when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority, and its decision is binding on every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal.

And see Ex parte Coupland, 26 Texas, 434; Federalist No. 21, page 112; Calder vs. Bull, 3 Dallas, 386; Wynehamer vs. The People, 13 New York, (3 Kernan,) 392.

Mr. Representative HURD. This Commission has the powers of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. The powers of Congress are powers to be exercised by law and with the approval of the President, and this tribunal cannot annul what Congress has done with the approval of the President in the form of law. Greenleaf says:

Courts will judicially take notice of the political constitution or frame of the government of their own country, its essential political agents or officers, and its essential ordinary and regular operations. The great seal of the State and the seals of its judicial tribunals require no proof.

The constitution of South Carolina of 1868 is before the Commission. It is entirely republican in "form." The government organized under it is republican in "form." It is so in fact. But the Constitution of the United States does not undertake to guarantee at all times a State government strictly republican in its administration or in fact. Its language is: "The United States shall guarantee to every State * * a republican form of government."

The guaranty of a republican form of government is to be executed by the United States as an independent sovereign act, and not collaterally or incidentally when the Houses are engaged in counting the electoral vote, and therefore the consideration of the question is not within the jurisdiction of this Commission.

The admission or restoration of the State of South Carolina into the Union under the so-called "reconstruction acts" was the act of the United States, being the act of the two Houses of Congress with the approval of the President, and that act binds all, the two Houses of Congress as well as others, and therefore binds this Commission. That act was a recognition of the government of South Carolina as republican in form, and that act remains in force to the present time.

The third objection is:

That the Federal Government prior to and during the election on the 7th day of November, 1876, without authority of law, stationed in various parts of the said State of South Carolina at or near the polling-places detachments of the Army of the United States, by whose presence the full exercise of the right of suffrage was prevented and by reason whereof no legal or free election was or could be had.

It is a sufficient answer to this to say there is no proof to support it. Still more, it is not competent for this tribunal to hear evidence in support of it or to make the inquiry. This was decided in principle by the determination of this Commission as to the Florida electors, as to whom it was held—

That it is not competent under the Constitution and the law, as it existed at the date of the passage of said act, to go into evidence aliunde the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses, to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Florida, in and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the board of State canvassers of said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, and that all proceedings of the courts, or acts of the legislature, or of the executive of Florida, subsequent to the casting of the votes of the electors on the prescribed day, are inadmissible for any such purpose.

But if the Commission could make the inquiry, the Government of the United States had authority to place troops in South Carolina, and when so placed it must be presumed to have been properly done, on sufficient authority, and for sufficient reasons.

The Constitution and laws have regarded the elective franchise of such inestimable value as to deserve in those extreme cases where necessity requires it military protection from the National Government. This will be clear from a brief statement. Congress, as already shown, has power to make all proper regulations as to the elections of Representatives in Congress, and authorize all acts "necessary and proper for that purpose." The Constitution also declares that the President “shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.” This he can only do by the defensive means placed by law in his hands.

The act of Congress provides that—

No * * * officer or person * * * in the military * * * service * * * shall have * * * any troops * * * at the place where any * * * election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls. (Revised Statutes, section 2002. For the statute of England on this subject see Congressional Record of January 17, 1877, Johnston's speech.)

From this an unequivocal inference arises, which is positive law, that the President, in executing the Constitution and those laws which give security to the right of voting for Representatives in Congress, may require the presence of troops “at the place where an election is held,” in two cases, (1) when “necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States;” and (2) “to keep the peace at the polls.” By statute, also, the President is authorized to employ the military power for the protection of the civil rights of citizens. (Revised Statutes, section 1989.)

Here, then, is AUTHORITY, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, for the use of troops to protect citizens in exercising the right of suffrage as stated.

There is also a duty to use military power in still other cases.

The Constitution provides that—

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

Here is a covenant for a duty which cannot in good faith be omitted. Whenever there is “domestic violence,” within the meaning of the Constitution, and the proper demand is made by the governor of a State on the President for military aid, it cannot be refused. The character of the violence which justifies military interposition is well understood.

Here, then, is AUTHORITY under the Constitution for the employment of troops of the United States on certain contingencies in a State.

Now, I respectfully submit, it must be presumed that the officers of the Government have observed these laws in the performance of their duties, as the truth undoubtedly is, and this is a sufficient answer to the objection taken.

It would be a monstrous proposition to say that a State should be disfranchised in the electoral college because troops were in the State, when their presence did not change the result of the election. It would be equally monstrous to say that if the troops, used in pursuance of law, only gave protection to voters and aided in securing their just rights, a lawful result should be set aside because the Government performed its duty.

The fourth objection is:

That at the several polling places in the said State there were stationed deputy marshals of the United States, appointed under the provisions of sections 2021 and 2022 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provisions were unconstitutional and void. That the said deputy marshals, exceeding over one thousand in number, by their unlawful and arbitrary action, in obedience to the improper and illegal instructions received by them from the Department of Justice, so interfered with the full and free exercise of the right of suffrage by the duly-qualified voters of the said State of South Carolina that a fair election could not be and was not held in the said State of South Carolina on the said 7th day of November, 1876.

It is a sufficient answer to this that it is unsupported by evidence, that it is not competent to receive proof in support of it, and the legal presumption is that the deputy United States marshals performed their duties properly. If it were competent to make the inquiry, the evidence would abundantly prove the necessity for these officers and that they did not interfere with the free exercise of the right of suffrage by any qualified voter. But as no such evidence is competent, no question of the constitutionality of the law authorizing deputy marshals arises, and if it could, the power of Congress is ample under the authority "to enforce by appropriate legislation" the Constitution, including the amendments thereto.

Upon this subject I invite especially the attention of the Commission to a report or views which I will submit to the House of Representatives, as a part of House Miscellaneous Document No. 31, part 1, second session Forty-fourth Congress, being evidence, &c., relating to the South Carolina election, and which in a day or two I will submit to the House to go into the Congressional Record.

The fifth and last objection is:

That there was not from the 1st day of January, 1876, up to and including the 10th day of December, 1876, at any time, a State government in the State of South Carolina, except a pretended government set up in violation of law and of the Constitution of the United States by Federal authority and sustained by Federal troops.

It is a sufficient answer to this to say it is unsupported by evidence; it is utterly unfounded in fact; it is contradicted by the truth of history, and is overthrown by the authority of Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard, 42.

The legal validity of the government of South Carolina during the year 1876 is a well-authenticated fact in history. This tribunal, as a question of law, is bound to know and recognize the fact without proof, and it has never been doubted or questioned until now, and the "truth of history" is, that troops of the United States were used only as the Constitution and laws authorize, to suppress "domestic violence" or to "keep the peace at the polls."

Here then I close, and in doing so I indulge the hope that upon the questions submitted to this Commission there may be a decision which will command the unanimous vote of all its members. Let it be such that no State shall ever be disfranchised by the Houses of Congress or practically expelled from the Union of our fathers.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Judge Lawrence, let me call your attention to a point in the case which I have not heard discussed.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Certainly.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. The twelfth article of the amendments to the Constitution provides that—

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President.

Now in the examination of this certificate No. 1, I find no evidence that this provision of the Constitution has been complied with in voting by ballot.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. It will undoubtedly be presumed, in the absence of an allegation to the contrary, that the officers have performed their duty. I think that familiar legal principle, known to every lawyer, is a complete answer to the point suggested by my friend from Virginia. There is no law which requires that the certificate shall state that the electors voted by ballot; but if as a matter of fact the votes were otherwise, viva voce, the provision directing that the electors shall vote by ballot, at most, is only directory, and a failure to observe that provision of the Constitution would not affect the validity of the votes.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Has there not been a case before the two Houses of Congress of that character?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Objections on account of the fact not appearing that the vote was by ballot? I am not distinct in my recollection, but my impression is that there has been a case of that sort before the two Houses of Congress in counting the electoral votes.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. I have no recollection of any such case as that, but there may be.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. I only desired to call your attention to it so that it might not escape notice in the discussion.

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Then the two answers which I have made seem to me entirely to meet the case: First, that in the absence of any allegation in the record to show that the vote was not by ballot, it must be presumed that officers have done their duty and that the votes were by ballot. Second, that if in fact the electors failed to observe the direction of the Constitution in that respect, the provision itself is merely directory, and a failure to comply with it cannot invalidate the vote.

Besides that, as I am reminded by my friend with whom I was associated as a member of the committee of the House of Representatives which investigated the South Carolina election, [Mr. Lapham,] no such objection is made by the objectors to the vote of that State.

The PRESIDENT. Do I understand you to have closed on the part of the objectors?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT. There are no other objectors to be heard?

Mr. Representative LAWRENCE. No other. Senator Christiancy waives the right, as I understand, to argue the objections.

The PRESIDENT. Before calling upon the counsel who support the objections to certificate No. 1, I inquire of the counsel on the other side if they object to the offers of proof?

Mr. MATTHEWS. I was not in at the time the offer was made, but of course we object to any proof being offered.

The PRESIDENT. Counsel in favor of the objections to certificate No. 1 will now be heard. One of the counsel will open and the other will have the close,

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. This question is upon the admissibility of the evidence and its effect.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, counsel for the objectors to certificate No. 1 propose to prove, in addition to what has already been offered, that owing to the violence and intimidation existing in South Carolina on the election-day of November, 1876, and then practiced toward voters, and owing to the presence of troops of the United States overawing voters, there was no free election on the part of the people for electors of President and Vice-President. Evidence will also be given to support specifically the third and fourth objections to certificate No. 1, as to the means by which a free and fair election was prevented.

The first ground upon which I shall lay any stress in objecting to the counting of certificate No. 1 is that there was no registration of voters in the State of South Carolina as required by the constitution of that State. The constitution of South Carolina is imperative: "it shall be the duty of the general assembly to provide from time to time for the registration of all electors." It is admitted on the part of the supporters of the Hayes electors that there was in fact no such registration as the constitution requires. All that is contended on their part is that there was a poll-list made at the election by one of the clerks, and that there was a census taken which enumerated the male inhabitants of the different counties in the State, without naming them. That was done in compliance with the constitution.

I am not prepared to show by authorities what a registration is or ought to be. That cannot be necessary. I shall take it for granted that every member of this tribunal knows that neither a poll-list taken by the clerk at the time of voting nor a census is a registration.

I dismiss, therefore, at once and without comment, the attempt to show a compliance with the constitution of the State of South Carolina, and proceed to notice the argument upon which my learned friend [Mr. Lawrence] evidently depends to sustain this certificate; which is, that as the Constitution of the United States provides that each State shall appoint electors in such manner as the legislature thereof shall direct, any provision interfering with the discretion of that body as to the manner of appointment is a violation of the Constitution of the United States. The case of certificate No. 1 rests only upon that proposition. I do not perceive the application of Mr. Justice Story's opinion on the proposed constitutional provisions respecting congressional districts in Massachusetts.

The requirement of a registration of voters does not interfere in any respect with the provision in the Constitution of the United States authorizing the legislature to direct the manner of appointing the electors. There can be no conflict in fact between a requirement and the full exercise of the power by the legislature. For the purpose of appointing an elector the legislature of the State is an agency of the United States; but it is an agency created by the State, and must exercise its agency in accordance with the power which creates it. And, therefore, in the exercise of the authority conferred by the Constitution, it will not be assumed that the Constitution of the United States empowers the legislature to disregard the State constitution, and especially in a matter which is essential to the well-being of society.

The provision in question is indispensable to secure fair elections. The secret-ballot system without registration is simply an unlimited power of repeating, thus invited and facilitated by the laws of South Carolina, whereby multitudes of small electoral precincts have been created in order that the negro voters, many of whom are not easily identified, may repeat their votes indefinitely. How indispensable and necessary to a due ordering of society in such a condition is it that there should be a registration of voters to prevent repeating.

This tribunal will take notice of the constitution and laws of South Carolina, and it therefore is informed of the failure to execute a provision which the constitution itself by the mandatory terms in which it imposes the duty of registration declares to be indispensable to a fair election. Will this tribunal, when the State constitution itself thus pronounces the election fraudulent, permit the irresponsible persons held in power in South Carolina only by the aid of United States soldiers, to decide a great presidential contest?

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD. I wish to inquire, if the failure on the part of the legislature to pass a registry law in obedience to the constitution has rendered invalid the appointment of electors, has it also rendered invalid the appointment of all their State officers and their State government during the last eight years, during which that neglect has lasted?

Mr. BLAIR. If no question has been made on the subject in the State, the maxim communis error facit jus might apply, or acquiescence on the part of the people of the State would make a de facto, and as a de facto a legal, government; but with respect to the electors the question is one with which the whole country is concerned, and has not been waived or permitted to pass sub silentio, but is now here presented for decision, as one arising upon the law. And we insist that the law makes the election void and that the vote of South Carolina ought not to be counted. It is not necessary to prove that the election was fraudulent in fact. The law itself declares it to be so. And this tribunal as a political body knows as a fact in the history of the times that the requirement of the constitution of South Carolina was disregarded to enable the men in charge of its affairs to perpetuate their power and dispose of its electoral vote at their pleasure. You cannot, therefore, shut your eyes to the fact that here is a palpable, gross, persistent violation of law, the only effect of which could be to facilitate fraud.

Every honest and patriotic citizen must feel indignant at the condition to which the criminals who have by military force held South Carolina in thralldom have reduced that State and be inclined to resolve any doubt against them and in favor of the people who hold all the property, possess all the intelligence, and represent the civilization of the State.

And will this tribunal, instead of eagerly availing itself of its violations of law to strike down and crush out the irresponsible power foisted on those people, industriously hunt for quibbles of law and study how to let fraud triumph?

I pass now to the objection founded upon the intrusion of the military power of the United States into the State for the purpose of controlling the election that is claimed, and I think with just reason, to be an all-sufficient ground to invalidate the election; and that also is a matter which does not depend upon proof. It is shown by the proclamation of the President, which is a matter of which all public tribunals can take notice.

This transaction was made known to the public by the proclamations and published orders of the President, to which the attention of this tribunal has been called by the honorable gentleman who opened the case, the obvious purpose of which was to control the election in the interest of the party which here claims the benefit of this illegal and unwarranted interference.

The argument of my learned friend [Mr. Lawrence] is, that inasmuch as these proceedings were by the authority of the President of the United States, we are concluded; that his judgment is final. Is that so? Is that conclusive upon the Congress of the United States that you here represent? Is the judgment of the President of the United States, acting, as he publicly declares, as the representative of a party, decisive against the opposing party? That seems to me to beg the question. We charge that the party organization that possessed itself of power by the war has made use of the power thus obtained to perpetuate it against the will of the people; and when, therefore, you are sitting here in the stead and place of the grand inquest of the nation, must you shut your eyes to the true nature of the transaction and allow an organization to perpetuate its power in defiance of the will of the people because it is done by color of office?

This policy was initiated by what are known as the reconstruction measures adopted on the close of the war. Mr. Stevens, who presented them, admitted in his place that they were outside of the Constitution. In virtue of these confessedly unconstitutional measures electors were openly made by the military power, and the halls of Congress were filled with camp-followers from the transformed States. When these measures produced their natural effect of endangering the hold of the organization upon the great Northern States, it became necessary to fortify themselves then by another amendment of the Constitution spreading negro suffrage all over the United States; and this was done in known defiance of the public will, and after they had expressly disclaimed by resolutions in a national convention that they entertained any such purpose. But, notwithstanding the vast forces thus added, their strength wanes. The tide of intelligent opinion grows steadily against them. Notwithstanding their frantic appeal to sectional hate in the North, they feel that they are losing ground there.

Notwithstanding the indignation that the previous military seizures had aroused, they could not save themselves by again employing the military power to hold the votes of the States when they still held the machinery to call for its interposition. This is the transaction, as seen of all men. It is impossible for any observant man to fail to see it in this light. And I say you will be derelict to your duty if you sanction it and allow its creatures to triumph.

What I have stated is proved by proclamations and orders, all of a public nature, of which you can, as representing Congress, take notice, and by considering which the vote of South Carolina may be rejected without reversing any decision heretofore made. I do not combat what has been decided. I would not waste the time of this tribunal or my own in attempting to get it to reverse its decision. But Congress has itself established a precedent by taking notice of a similar condition of things in these States, and you as the representatives of Congress ought to follow the precedents it has established. Upon just such considerations as now I am addressing to you, Congress excluded the whole southern section of country from participating in the presidential election.

If Congress has refused to allow the votes of States to be counted because they were incapacitated from sharing in the privileges of the Government, is it not equally within the power of this Commission, when it is a matter of general notoriety that a like condition exists, and especially when that condition is produced by the action of a party in power and exercising for the time being, and exercising wrongly, the powers of the Government? It is enough that it appears that such a condition exists as to prevent any legitimate exercise of the franchise, to make the analogy complete.

The general principle is familiar that, where there is disorder in a precinct, where the police have to interfere, where the people are driven from the polls, where there is such oppression as that the polls do not represent fairly the voice of the people, they are excluded.

But here is a grand national case in which you cannot fail to take notice of the proclamation of the President and the governor declaring the State in a state of insurrection, of the march of troops there, of the action of the parties who used the troops and who called them there to put down insurrection. It was because of the insurrectionary character that existed prior to 1865 that the Southern States were not allowed to vote, and here is a proclamation in all respects corresponding with the proclamation declaring an insurrection to exist there. What is the difference in manner or in effect? You would not allow the rebels to vote because they put the States under military duress by force of arms; and now will you allow these people to vote when they are, under military duress, compelled to vote on the other side?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. That was done by an act of Congress, was it not?

Mr. BLAIR. The exclusion?

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. In 1865, or whatever the time was, when the act passed over the veto of President Johnson.

Mr. BLAIR. If I recollect aright about the rule on that subject, a joint resolution was passed which was presented to Mr. Lincoln for his approval, and he said he had nothing to do with it.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. But he signed it.

Mr. BLAIR. He signed it, but disclaimed having any authority in the premises, insisting that it belonged to Congress, that is, to the two Houses exclusively.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Was there not a later act in President Johnson's time which he vetoed, and which Congress passed over his veto?

Mr. BLAIR. There was a series of acts passed over Mr. Johnson's veto.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I mean on that precise point of excluding States from electoral representation.

Mr. BLAIR. There may have been; but the act which was approved by Mr. Lincoln and with his assenting to the power of Congress to throw out votes as they pleased, excluded votes. Mr. Lincoln asserted, and without contradiction from anybody as I remember, that this was a matter entirely with Congress; and the subsequent passage of a law I do not think adds anything to the power of Congress on the subject. That is the view I take of it, and I submit it with great deference to your better judgment.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. The point was, Mr. Blair, whether there was any distinction between this exercise of political power according to the position the State is in, whether exercised by Congress in the constitutional way, or whether it is also competent to exercise it in the act of counting in the presence of the two Houses. That is the point I should like to hear you upon. You ask us to exercise now this same power and upon the same ground that hitherto has been exercised by acts of legislative will in the form of law.

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, sir; I suppose myself that the act of 1792 itself, as well as all acts subsequent to that, was passed in furtherance of the power of Congress to count. I do not know any other clause in the Constitution that gives them any power over the subject. They have the power to count; and in pursuance of that power, and to facilitate it, they required that the executive officers of the several States should send them certificates as evidence by which they were prima facie, as I always understood until the late decisions here, to determine who were the proper names to count in the electoral college. That was an exercise of power by Congress. There is no other clause in the Constitution which gives it to them that my attention has ever been called to.

But that did not exhaust the power of Congress, because Congress in the exercise of the same power has subsequently thrown out votes, as Mr. Lincoln said rightly as I always understood, and as the joint resolution of 1865 and as all the resolutions and acts of Congress taking place since have been, as Louisiana has been excluded up to this time; for her vote has never been counted since the war until the other day. All this was simply by virtue of the power of the two Houses, done without any law, but looking at the condition of the State, purely and simply, Congress excluded her as being not in that condition which made it proper to allow her to participate in the privileges of a presidential election. That was done by the same power, the whole of which is vested in this Commission, the power to look into the state of affairs there to see for yourselves that they are not exercising a perfectly free will.

A Senator of the very highest authority reported in regard to Mississippi last year that it was competent for Congress to decide whether the vote of that State should be excluded because of the exercise of illegal and improper power there in the control of elections. It was deemed perfectly competent by gentlemen of the party with whom I am not now acting, and seemed to be a general expression of feeling upon that subject, that it was perfectly competent to exclude States where there was no interference of the military, no call by the legislature or governor, but in the discretion of the two Houses to exclude States from their own knowledge as legislative bodies that the condition of affairs there was not such as to authorize the votes to be counted.

But in this case evidence is such as must be taken notice of upon the very strictest rules. The proclamation declaring an insurrection to exist in South Carolina puts the case strictly in the category of the States which were excluded by Congress.

My learned friend [Mr. Lawrence] referred to the deputy marshals and the troops that were sent there and the Attorney-General's circular. That strongly enforces our argument. Can it possibly be a free State authorized to vote and decide a presidential election when the State is covered with deputy marshals and troops, and voters have to pass through files of armed men to the polls? Now I assert that we shall be able to show you they had a deputy marshal for every ten negroes, with labels on their shoulders, and marched their squads of ten up before the soldiery and swore them to vote the whole republican ticket, then marched them to the polls and stood by them till they voted. The instructions to these deputy marshals were in the public press.

When such means are resorted to to carry a State, and it is carried by less than a thousand majority, can you justify yourselves in counting that vote? Is there any essential difference in such a case more than if the rebels in South Carolina had carried the State by 1,100 votes, and had asked to cast them against Mr. Lincoln in 1864? Could there possibly have been an election in any proper sense of the word, with all this paraphernalia of United States troops, United States deputy marshals, and armed negro militia, a proclamation of insurrection, and disorder existing everywhere?

You can legally take notice of all this, and if you will let us we will show it all up in limine. But that is not required. You cannot refuse to see what Congress has seen in similar cases, and has acted upon. You cannot shut your eyes to these public documents, which I need not read because they are a part of the statute-book, and every judicial functionary and every legislative functionary is obliged to take notice of them.

I omitted in the consideration of the first point to call the attention of the tribunal to an authority on the subject of the registration question. You will find in the ninth section of the American "Law of Elections," by McCrary, a citation which he adopts as the law. I have the original case here, but will not read it, contenting myself with calling the attention of the tribunal to the ninth section of the book:

It being conceded that the power to enact a registry law is within the power to regulate the exercise of the elective franchise and preserve the purity of the ballot, it follows that an election held in disregard of the provisions of a registry law must be held void. In Ensworth vs. Albin et al., 44 Missouri, 347, an election was set aside upon the ground that there was no registration whatever, although the statute required registration as an indispensable prerequisite to an election. It has been suggested that this doctrine puts it in the power of the board of registration to defeat an election by failing to meet and refusing altogether to discharge their official duties. But it is hardly safe to attempt to test the validity of a statute by presupposing a case so extreme and so improbable as the refusal of a sworn officer of the law to act.

Contrary to the author's supposition of what was possible, we have here the extreme case. The case referred in the text occurred in Missouri, where the officers of the county which was there in question did refuse to make the registry required by the statute, which was not a particle more mandatory than the constitution of South Carolina.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. You cite that, then, as authority to prove that this election was void because the legislature had made no law providing for any registration.

Mr. BLAIR. Exactly.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. The constitution making a general requirement that the legislature should enact such a law?

Mr. BLAIR. Making the positive requirement, just as the statute law of Missouri did.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. On the same principle would you hold on another section of the constitution of South Carolina, which says that the legislature shall make laws for preserving the purity of elections, that, if the legislature had not made any law punishing false voting, therefore the election would be void?

Mr. BLAIR. No, sir. I think there is a very broad distinction between the two cases.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. What is the distinction?

Mr. BLAIR. The purity of election is nomen generalissimum.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. A very important thing, is it not?

Mr. BLAIR. It is very important, to be sure; but it is not mandatory. It is general. But here is a specific thing that is required. There is manifestly a very broad distinction between an act, even if it be mandatory in its nature, which such acts generally are not, that legislation shall be taken for the preservation of the purity of elections, and a mandatory requirement in the constitution requiring specifically a particular thing to be done. The distinction is recognized all through the books. For example, it has been held that where elections were required to be held by ballot and were not so held, that was a violation of law. Here is an election required to be held by registry. The registry is a preliminary indispensable to the election by the express order of the constitution and its manifest intent.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT. Do you find any case where a refusal to carry out the mandate of the constitution requiring registry has ever been sufficient to set aside the election? Are not the cases all confined to the case of a statute being made in reference to a particular election and that not being complied with?

Mr. BLAIR. There is not a case to be found in the books where the constitutional requirement of a registry has ever been defied except in the case of South Carolina.

I thank the Commission for allowing me to trespass upon them so long.

The PRESIDENT. We will now hear from the counsel on the other side.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Counsel on the other side have decided that they will not ask the Commission to be heard. In view of the value of the time that is now left to complete this count, we deem that it is our duty to omit to consume any part of that time by discussion, and therefore on our part we submit the case without argument.

The PRESIDENT. Counsel for objectors to certificate No. 2 submit the case. It now belongs to counsel on the other side.

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. The offers of proof are not printed. The Commission might desire to consider them. I suggest that an order for their printing be made. I understand they can be furnished us in the course of an hour or so.

The PRESIDENT. Do you submit the motion that they be printed?

Mr. Commissioner BAYARD. I submit the motion that the offers of proof submitted by Mr. Cochrane be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President and gentlemen, I had not and have not now any intention to argue this case. I never heard the objections nor knew what they were until they were read in your presence this morning. It would be presumption in me to attempt an argument before a tribunal like this on such a case as this, having had no previous opportunity to consider it which might put me in a condition better than the judges themselves. You have heard as much of this case and know as much about it as I do.

My idea of the duty which a counselor owes to a court or to any other tribunal, judicial or quasi-judicial, is that he should never open his mouth except for the purpose of assisting the judges in coming to a correct conclusion; and if he is not in a situation to do that, he ought to keep silence.

Besides that, I am, I suppose, the very last man in this whole nation who should be called upon to speak here and now. Everybody has suffered more or less by events and proceedings of the recent past, some by wear and tear of conscience, and some by a deep sense of oppression and wrong. But perhaps I, more than most others, have felt the consciousness that I have lost the dignity of an American citizen. I, in common with the rest, am degraded and humiliated. This nation has got her great big foot in a trap. It is vain to struggle for her extrication.

I am so fallen from the proud estate of a free citizen, you have so abjected me, that I am fit for nothing on earth but to represent the poor, defrauded, broken-hearted democracy. And because I suffer more, they think me more good for nothing than the rest, and conclude to send me out on this forlorn hope, judging, no doubt truly, that it matters nothing what becomes of me. I ought to go gladly if anything which I can do or say might have the effect of mitigating the horrible calamity with which the country is threatened: a President deriving his title from a shameless swindle, not merely a fraud, but a fraud detected and exposed. I know not how I would feel if called upon to suffer death for my country; I am not the stuff that martyrs are made of; but if my life could redeem this nation from the infamy with which she is clothed, I ought to go to the grave as freely as I ever went to my bed. I see, however, no practical good that I can do, and it is mere weakness to complain.

We have certain objections to the counting of this Hayes vote from South Carolina which look to me insuperable, but I cannot hope that they will wear that appearance in other men's eyes. Perhaps the feeling which I in common with millions of others entertain on this subject prevents us from seeing this thing in its true light. But you are wise; you are calm. You can look all through this awful business with a learned spirit; no passionate hatred of this great fraud can cloud your mental vision or shake the even balance of your judgment. You do not think it any wrong that a nation should be cheated by false election returns. On the contrary, it is rather a blessing which Heaven has sent us in this strange disguise. When the omnipotent lie shall be throned and sceptered and crowned, you think we ought all of us to fall down and worship it as the hope of our political salvation. You will teach us and perhaps we shall learn (perhaps not) that under such a rule we are better off than if truth had prevailed and justice been triumphant.

Give, then, your cool consideration to these objections, and try them by the standard of the law. I mean the law as it was before the organization of this Commission. I admit that since then a great revolution has taken place in the law. It is not now what it used to be. All our notions of public right and public wrong have suffered a complete bouleversement.

The question submitted to you is whether the persons who gave these votes were "duly appointed." "Duly" of course means according to law. What law? The Constitution of the United States, the acts of Congress passed in pursuance thereof, the constitution of South Carolina, and the authorized acts of her legislature—these taken all together constitute the law of the case before you.

By these laws the right, duty, and power of appointing electors is given to the people of South Carolina; that is to say, the citizens of the State qualified to vote at general elections. Who are they? By the constitution of the State in order to qualify them as voters they must be registered. The registry of a native citizen is a sine qua non to his right of voting as much as the naturalization of a foreigner.

Now, the legislature never passed any law for the registration of voters, and no registration of them was ever made. No doubt has been or can be entertained that the object and purpose of this omission was fraudulent and dishonest; for the legislature as well as the executive department of that government has been in the hands of the most redemptionless rogues on the face of the earth. But whatever may have been the motive, nobody can doubt that the legal effect of this omission is to make the election illegal.

That is hardly the worst of it. The election itself, emancipated from all law and all authority, was no better than a riot, a mob, a general saturnalia, in which the soldiers of the United States Army cut the principal as well as the decenter figure. We offer to prove—the offer will go upon record, and there it will stand forever—that every poll in Charleston County, where they rushed into the ballot-box 7,000 majority, was in possession of the soldiers.

A government whose elections are controlled by military force cannot be republican in form or substance. For this I cite the authority of Luther vs. Borden, if perchance the old-time law has yet any influence. Do you not see the hideous depth of national degradation into which you will plunge us if you sanctify this mode of making a President? Brush up your historical memory and think of it for a moment. The man whom you elect in this way is as purely the creature of the military power as Caligula or Domitian, for whom the pretorian-guards controlled the hustings and counted the votes.

But then we cannot get behind the returns, forsooth! Not we! You will not let us. We cannot get behind them. No. That is the law, of course. We may struggle for justice; we may cry for mercy; we may go down on our knees, and beg and woo for some little recognition of our rights as American citizens; but we might as well put up our prayers to Jupiter, or Mars, as bring suit in the court where Rhadamanthus presides. There is not a god on Olympus that would not listen to us with more favor than we shall be heard by our adversaries. We are at their mercy; it is only to them that we can appeal, because you gentlemen unfortunately cannot help us. You are bound by the new law which you have made. You are of course addicted like other people to the vice of consistency, and what is done once must be done over again.

In the Louisiana case the people appointed electors in favor of Tilden, recorded their act, finished it, and left their work in such a state that nobody could misunderstand it. But other persons, who had no power to appoint, falsified the record of the actual appointment, partly by plain forgery, and partly by fraud which was as corrupt in morals and as void in law as any forgery could be. You thought it right and legal and just to say that you would not look at the record which the people had made; the forgery, the fraud, and the corruption were too sacred to be interfered with; the truth must not be allowed to come in conflict with the imposture, lest the concussion might be damaging.

This precedent must be followed. It is new law, to be sure, but we must give it due welcome; and the new lords that it brings into power must be regarded as our "very noble and approved good masters." Having decided that electors were duly appointed in Louisiana who were known not to be appointed, we cannot expect you to take notice of any fact similar or kindred to it in South Carolina.

Then, again, the question of "duly appointed" was decided in the case of Levissee, an elector who was an officer of the United States Government at the time he was appointed and continued to be afterward. The Federal Constitution says that no man shall be appointed who is in that relation to the Federal Government. But you held, according to law, mind you, that he was a lawful elector and his vote a good vote. In other words, a thing is perfectly constitutional although it is known to be in the very teeth of a constitutional interdict!

Now, you see why we are hopeless. The present state of the law is sadly against us. The friends of honest elections and honest government are in deep despair. We once thought that the verifying power of the two Houses of Congress ought to be brought always into requisition for the purpose of seeing whether the thing that is brought here is a forgery and a fraud on the one hand, or whether it is a genuine and true certificate on the other.

But while we cannot ask you to go back behind this certificate, will you just please to go to it—only to it—not step behind. If you do, you will find that it is no certificate at all such as is required by law. The electors must vote by ballot, and they are required to be on oath before they vote. That certificate does not show that either of those requirements was met, and where a party is exercising a special authority like this, he must keep strictly within it, and you are not to presume anything except what appears on the face of the act to be done.

If anybody will cast back his mind a little into the history of presidential elections or look at the debates of less than a year ago, he will remember that Mr. Jefferson was charged when he was Vice-President of the United States with having elected himself by means of, not a fraudulent, but a merely informal vote sent up from Georgia. The informality was not in the certificate inside of the envelope, but in the outside verification. Mr. Matthew L. Davis in 1837 got up that story. It was not true, but it was believed for a while, and it cast great odium on Mr. Jefferson's memory. It was not an informality that was nearly as important as this, nothing like it. But one of the Senators now on this bench referred to it in a debate only a short time ago, and denounced Mr. Jefferson as having elected himself by fraud because he did not call the attention of the Senate and House of Representatives to that fact. If Mr. Jefferson's memory ought to be sent down to posterity covered with infamy because he in his own case allowed a vote to be counted which was slightly informal on the outside of the envelope, I should be glad to know what ought to be done to those who would count this vote which has neither form nor substance, which leaves out all the essential particulars that the electors are required to certify?

This great nation still struggles for justice; a million majority of white people send up their cry, and a majority of more than a quarter of a million of all colors demand it. But we cannot complain. I want you to understand that we do not complain. Usually it is said that "the fowler setteth not forth his net in sight of the bird," but this fowler set the net in sight of the birds that went into it. It is largely our own fault that we were caught.

We are promised—and I hope the promise will be kept—that we shall have a good government, fraudulent though it be; that the rights of the States shall be respected and individual liberty be protected. We are promised the same reformation which the Turkish government is now proposing to its people. The Sultan promises that, if he is sustained in his present contest, he will establish and act upon certain principles:

First, the work of decentralization shall commence immediately and the autonomy of the provinces shall be carefully looked after. Secondly, the people shall be governed by their natural judges; they will not send Mohammedans nor Christian renegades from Constantinople down on them, but they shall be governed by people of their own faith. Thirdly, no subordinate officer when he commits an illegal act shall be permitted to plead in justification the orders of his superior. How much we need exactly that kind of reform in this country; and how glad we ought to be that our Government is going to be as good hereafter as the Turk's.

They offer us everything now. They denounce negro supremacy and carpet-bag thieves. Their pet policy for the South is to be abandoned. They offer us everything but one; but on that subject their lips are closely sealed. They refuse to say that they will not cheat us hereafter in the elections. If they would only agree to that; if they would only repent of their election-frauds and make restitution of the votes they have stolen, the circle of our felicities would be full.

If this thing stands accepted and the law you have made for this occasion shall be the law for all occasions, we can never expect such a thing as an honest election again. If you want to know who will be President by a future election, do not inquire how the people of the States are going to vote. You need only to know what kind of scoundrels constitute the returning-boards, and how much it will take to buy them.

But I think that even that will end some day. At present you have us down and under your feet. Never had you a better right to rejoice. Well may you say, "We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us: for we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehoods have we hid ourselves." But nevertheless wait a little while. The waters of truth will rise gradually, and slowly but surely, and then look out for the overflowing scourge. "The refuge of lies shall be swept away, and the hiding-place of falsehood shall be uncovered." This mighty and puissant nation will yet raise herself up like a strong man after sleep, and shake her invincible locks in a fashion you little think of now. Wait; retribution will come in due time. Justice travels with a leaden heel but strikes with an iron hand.

God's mill grinds slow but dreadfully fine. Wait till the flood-gate is lifted and a full head of water comes rushing on. Wait, and you will see fine grinding then.

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. Mr. President, will you permit me to refer the Commission to one or two authorities which I neglected to refer to before?

The PRESIDENT. We shall allow it.

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. I must ask pardon of the Commission for the irregularity. I desire to refer you to section 30 of article 8 of the constitution of the State of South Carolina, as contained in the publication of the Revised Statutes of South Carolina, page 28:

Members of the general assembly and all officers, before they enter upon the execution of the duties of their respective offices, shall take and subscribe the following oath.

Which oath is provided for. Then I desire to call your honors' attention to the provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States on page 22, section 139:

The electors shall seal up the certificates so made by them, and certify upon each that the list of all the votes of such State given for President, and of all the votes given for Vice-President, are contained therein.

It is hardly necessary for me to refer you to the provision of the Constitution requiring the voting to be done by ballot, but I simply call attention to this fact, that the certificate upon the envelopes of certificate No. 1 is not in accordance with this provision of section 139. It does not certify that the envelope contains the list of all the persons voted for for President and Vice-President, but simply that it contains the names of the persons voting.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON. Will you read that provision referring to the oath to be taken?

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. Yes, sir.

Members of the general assembly and all officers, before they enter upon the execution of the duties of their respective offices, shall take and subscribe the following oath.

Then follows the oath. The certificate upon the back of the envelope is as follows:

We certify that this sealed envelope contains lists of the votes of the State of South Carolina for President and Vice-President of the United States.

And that is all that it says.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. Your point is that it does not say that it contains all?

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. That it contains all the votes in this certificate. It is said that all the votes were cast for Mr. Hayes and Mr. Wheeler, and that there were no other votes cast except those which are mentioned in this certificate. This certificate is directly opposite in form and terms to the certificates in the cases of Florida, Louisiana, and Oregon.

We further say that certificate No. 2 contains the statement of all these facts, states that the electors were duly sworn under the provisions of the constitution, and that they balloted first for President and next for Vice-President.

The PRESIDENT. I understand that the argument is closed on both sides.

Mr. Representative COCHRANE. I will say to the Commission that if the Commission shall decide to admit the testimony or any part of it offered, the objectors and counsel will be prepared to offer it at once.

Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS. I move that the public proceedings of the Commission be considered now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT, (at one o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) I move that a recess be taken until one o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.

The motion was agreed to; and the Commission accordingly took a recess until one o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.

After the recess the Commission re-assembled with closed doors for deliberation in the matter of the electoral vote of the State of South Carolina.

After debate,

Mr. Commissioner STRONG moved (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) that the vote be taken on the question pending in one hour from that time; and, after remarks, the motion was withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner EDMUNDS, (at five o'clock and seventeen minutes p. m.,) it was, by a vote of yeas 8, nays 7, Ordered, That the vote on the pending question be taken by six o'clock p. m.

The time allowed for debate having expired,

Mr. Commissioner MORTON offered the following resolutions :

Resolved, That it is not competent for the two Houses, assembled for the purpose of counting the votes for President and Vice-President, to inquire by evidence whether a State regularly represented in the two Houses of Congress, and recognized as a State of the United States by the other Departments of the Government, has a government republican in form.

Resolved, That while the existence of public disturbance and anarchy in any State, to such an extent as to make it impossible for the State to exercise its right to appoint electors of President and Vice-President, and to express its will in that behalf, is sufficient cause for rejecting any electoral votes purporting to be the votes of electors appointed thereby, yet, that when a State is regularly represented as a State in the Congress of the United States, and is recognized as a State by the other Departments of the Government, and has a government republican in form, and does appoint electors in the manner prescribed by the legislature thereof, evidence cannot be received by the two Houses of Congress assembled to count the votes for President and Vice-President as aforesaid to show that disturbances existed at the time of election which may have interfered, to a greater or less extent, with the freedom of election at the polls in said State.

Resolved, That it is not competent for the two Houses of Congress when assembled to count the votes for President and Vice-President, by taking evidence, to inquire into the regularity of the action of the President of the United States in sending a military force into any State for the preservation of order or the suppression of insurrection and domestic violence, in order by such proof to lay a ground for rejecting the electoral vote of said State.

Resolved, That, in view of the propositions contained in the three foregoing resolutions, the evidence offered to show that the State of South Carolina at the late election did not have a republican form of government, and the evidence offered on the subject of disorder and violence and the presence of troops in said State during said election, is not competent, but that notwithstanding the offer of such evidence the electoral votes of the State of South Carolina ought to be received and counted, if not objectionable on other grounds.

Resolved, That the other objections to certificate No. 1 show no valid cause for rejecting the same.

Mr. Commissioner FIELD offered the following as a substitute therefor :

Resolved, That evidence is admissible to show that prior to and during the election on the 7th day of November, 1876, in the State of South Carolina, there were unlawfully stationed in various parts of the State, at or near the polling-places, detachments of troops of the Army of the United States, by whose presence and interference qualified voters of the State were deprived of the right of suffrage, and a free choice by the people of presidential electors was prevented.

Resolved, That evidence is admissible to show that at the election on the 7th day of November, 1876, in South Carolina, there were stationed at the several polling-places in the State deputy marshals of the United States exceeding one thousand in number, by whose unlawful action and interference, under orders from the Department of Justice, qualified voters of the State were deprived of the right of suffrage, and a free choice by the people of presidential electors was prevented.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute, it was decided in the negative :

Mr. Commissioner FRELINGHUYSEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Theodore R. Barker, S. McGowan, John W. Harrington, John Isaac Ingram, William Wallace, John B. Erwin, and Robert Aldrich, the persons named as electors in certificate No. 2, were not the lawful electors for the State of South Carolina, and that their votes are not the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and should not be counted.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative :

Resolved, That C. C. Bowen, J. Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, W. B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and W. F. Myers, the persons named as electors in certificate No. 1, were the lawful electors for the State of South Carolina, and that their votes are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and should be counted for President and Vice-President of the United States.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution, it was decided in the affirmative :

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Kernan, and Payne—7.

Mr. Commissioner MILLER offered the following :

Ordered, That the following be adopted as the final decision and report in the matters submitted to the Commission as to the electoral vote of the State of South Carolina.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 27, A. D. 1877.

To the President of the Senate of the United States, presiding in the meeting of the two Houses of Congress under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, A. D. 1877 :

The Electoral Commission mentioned in said act, having received certain certificates, and papers purporting to be certificates, and papers accompanying the same, of the electoral votes from the State of South Carolina, and the objections thereto, submitted to it under said act, now report that it has duly considered the same, pursuant to said act, and has by a majority of votes decided, and does hereby decide, that the votes of C. C. Bowen, J. Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurley, W. B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and W. F. Myers, named in the certificate of D. H. Chamberlain, governor of said State, which votes are certified by said persons as appears by the certificates submitted to the Commission as aforesaid, and marked "No. 1, N. C." by said Commission, and herewith returned, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely: seven votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and seven votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice-President.

The Commission has by a majority of votes also decided, and does hereby decide and report, that the seven persons first above named were duly appointed electors in and by the State of South Carolina.

The brief ground of this decision is, that it appears, upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject, that the beforementioned electors appear to have been lawfully appointed such electors of President and Vice-President of the United States for the term beginning March 4, A. D. 1877, of the State of South Carolina, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the law.

And the Commission, as further grounds for their decision, are of opinion that the failure of the legislature to provide a system for the registration of persons entitled to vote, does not render nugatory all elections held under laws otherwise sufficient, though it may be the duty of the legislature to enact such a law. If it were otherwise, all government in that State is a usurpation, its officers without authority, and the social compact in that State is at an end.

That this Commission must take notice that there is a government in South Carolina republican in form, since its constitution provides for such a government, and it is, and was on the day of appointing electors, so recognized by the Executive and by both branches of the legislative department of the Government of the United States.

That so far as this Commission can take notice of the presence of the soldiers of the United States in the State of South Carolina during the election, it appears that they were placed there by the President of the United States to suppress insurrection, at the request of the proper authorities of the State.

And we are also of opinion that from the papers before us it appears that the governor and secretary of state having certified under the seal of the State that the electors whose votes we have decided to be the lawful electoral votes of the State, were duly appointed electors, which certificate, both by presumption of law and by the certificate of the rival claimants of the electoral office, was based upon the action of the State canvassers, there exists no power in this Commission, as there exists none in the two Houses of Congress in counting the electoral vote, to inquire into the circumstances under which the primary vote for electors was given.

The power of the Congress of the United States in its legislative capacity to inquire into the matters alleged, and to act upon the information so obtained, is a very different one from its power in the matter of counting the electoral vote. The votes to be counted are those presented by the State, and when ascertained and presented by the proper authorities of the States they must be counted.

The Commission has also decided, and does hereby decide, by a majority of votes, and report, that as a consequence of the foregoing, and upon the grounds before stated, the paper purporting to be a certificate of the electoral vote of said State of South Carolina, signed by Theodore E. Barker, S. McGowan, Jno. W. Harrington, Jno. Isaac Ingram, Wm. Wallace, John B. Erwin, and Robt. Aldrich, marked "No. 2, N. C." by the Commission, and herewith returned, is not the certificate of the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that they ought not to be counted as such.

|-----------|---|
| Yeas..... | 8 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Kernan, and Payne—7.

So the report of the Commission was adopted; and said decision and report were thereupon signed by the members agreeing therein, as follows:

SAM. F. MILLER.

JOSEPH P. BRADLEY.
GEO. F. EDMUNDS.
O. P. MORTON.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Field, Hunton, and Payne—4.

REMOVAL OF SECRECY.

On motion of Mr. Commissioner MILLER, it was Ordered, That the injunction of secrecy imposed on the acts and proceedings of the Commission be removed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of Congress for counting the electoral vote resumes its session. The two Houses, having separated upon the submission to the Commission of the objections to the certificate from the State of South Carolina, have reconvened to consider and act upon the decision of that tribunal. The decision, which is in writing, by a majority of the Commission, and signed by the members agreeing therein, will now be read by the Secretary of the Senate and entered in the Journal of each House.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows:

ELECTORAL COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 27, A. D. 1877.

To the President of the Senate of the United States presiding in the meeting of the two Houses of Congress under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any objections to the decision of the Commission?

Mr. Representative PHILIPS, of Missouri. I send up an objection signed by Senators and Representatives, and along with it I present the evidence upon which the objection is founded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The member from Missouri [Mr. Phillips] having presented an objection, it will be read by the Clerk of the House.

The Clerk of the House read as follows:

The undersigned, Senators and Representatives, do hereby object to counting the votes cast by C. C. Bowen, J. Winsmith, Thomas B. Johnston, Timothy Hurlley, W. B. Nash, Wilson Cook, and W. F. Myers, alleged electors of the State of South Carolina, in conformity to the decision of the Electoral Commission, and as reasons therefor assign the following:

I.

Because no legal election was held in the State of South Carolina on the 7th day of November last past for presidential electors in compliance with section 3, article 8, of the constitution thereof requiring a registration of the electors of the State as a qualification to vote.

II.

Because in consequence of frauds practiced in said election, and the interference with and intimidation of the electors in said State by the Federal Government prior to and during said election, stationing in various parts of said State near the polling-places detachments of the Army of the United States, a full and free exercise of the right of suffrage was prevented, in consequence of which there was no lawful election had.

III.

Because in violation of the Constitution of the United States the Federal authorities, at the several polling-places in said State on the day of election, stationed over one thousand deputy marshals of the United States, who by their unlawful and arbitrary action, in obedience to the unauthorized instructions from the Department of Justice, so interfered with the full and free exercise of the right of suffrage by the voters of said State that a fair election could not be and was not held in said State on the 7th day of November, 1876.

IV.

Because the certification of the election held by said electors on the 6th day of December, 1876, was not made by the lawfully constituted governor of said State.

V.

Because the said Electoral Commission, contrary to its duty and the authority vested in it by law, neglected and refused to inquire into the facts and allegations aforesaid, and their said decision is contrary to the law and the truth.

VI.

Because at the time of the pretended appointment of the said electors in the State of South Carolina, it was under duress from the power of the United States unlawfully exerted upon it, and said pretended appointments were made under such duress.

VII.

Because the certificate numbered 1 was and is void.

First. For irregularity in that the electors were not sworn, as by the constitution of the State of South Carolina they were required to be.

Second. The certificate does not state that said electors voted by ballot, as required by the Constitution of the United States.

Third. The certificate upon the envelope in which the said certificate and accompanying papers were inclosed was not the certificate required by the laws of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the decision of the Commission?

Mr. Representative SOUTHARD. I send up in duplicate an objection, signed by Senators and Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The member from Ohio [Mr. Southard] submits an objection, which will be read by the Secretary of the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

The undersigned Senators and members of the House of Representatives object to the counting of the electoral vote purporting to come from South Carolina, in conformity with the decision of the majority of the Electoral Commission, for the reason that the said electoral votes, as well as the votes of the people of said State at the presidential election on the 7th day of November last, were given under duress caused by the unlawful exercise of Federal power.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the decision? [A pause.] If there be none, the Senate will now withdraw to its chamber, that the two Houses separately may consider and determine the objections.

Accordingly (at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate withdrew.

IN SENATE, Wednesday, February 28, 1877.

The Senate having retired from the joint meeting, the President pro tempore resumed the chair at twelve o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m., and caused to be read the objections to the decision of the Electoral Commission as to the electoral votes of the State of South Carolina; whereupon,

Mr. Senator ROBERTSON offered the following resolution :

Resolved, That the decision of the Commission upon the electoral vote of the State of South Carolina stand as the judgment of the Senate, the objections made thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. Senator MERRIMON submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That it is competent to receive testimony to sustain the several exceptions above specified.

Mr. Senator EDMUNDS raised the point of order that, the two Houses having separated to consider objections made to the decision of the Electoral Commission as to what votes returned from the State of South Carolina were the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, it was not competent for the Senate, under the provisions of the electoral law, to consider any question or resolution which did not order a concurrence or non-concurrence with such decision, and hence the resolution of Mr. Senator Merrimon was not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore submitted to the Senate the question whether Mr. Senator Merrimon's resolution was in order, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 43.

Mr. Senator BOGY moved that the testimony submitted with the objections be read, which motion was disagreed to—yeas 21, nays 41.

The question recurring on the resolution of Mr. Senator ROBERTSON, after debate, it was agreed to by a vote of yeas 39, nays 22.

The Secretary was ordered to notify the House of Representatives of this action and of the readiness of the Senate to meet the House to continue the counting of the electoral votes.

At six o'clock and twelve minutes p. m., a message was received from the House of Representatives announcing its action on the objection to the decision of the Electoral Commission upon the electoral votes of South Carolina and its readiness to receive the Senate to continue the count; whereupon the Senate proceeded to the hall of the House.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Wednesday, February 28, 1877.

The Senate having withdrawn from the hall of the House of Representatives, at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m. the House resumed its session.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER moved that the House take a recess till Thursday, March 1, at ten o'clock a. m., which motion was disagreed to—yeas 92, nays 170.

Mr. Representative SHEAKLEY moved that the House take a recess until 7½ o'clock p. m. this day.

Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, raised the question of order that the motion was not in order under the electoral law.

The SPEAKER sustained the point of order and declined to entertain the motion.

From this decision Mr. Representative SHEAKLEY appealed, and, on motion of Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, the appeal was laid on the table by a vote of yeas 184, nays 61.

Mr. Representative SHEAKLEY moved that the House take a recess until to-morrow (March 1) at ten o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER ruled the motion out of order and declined to entertain it.

From this decision, Mr. Representative SPRINGER appealed.

The SPEAKER declined to entertain the appeal, and stated the regular order of business to be the consideration of the objections to the decision of the Commission upon the electoral certificates from the State of South Carolina.

A message was received from the Senate announcing its resolution on the objection to the decision of the Commission in the case of South Carolina and its readiness to meet the House to proceed with the count.

Mr. Representative PHILIPS, of Missouri, demanded the reading of the testimony taken by the Select Committee of the House to investigate the recent election in the State of South Carolina, accompanying the said objections.

Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, objected to the reading of the testimony called for.

The SPEAKER submitted to the House the question whether the testimony should be read; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 87, nays 176.

Mr. Representative WALLING moved to reconsider the vote by which the reading of the testimony was refused.

On motion of Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, the motion to reconsider was laid on the table—yeas 177, nays 73.

Mr. Representative VANCE, of Ohio, moved that parts one and two of said testimony be read.

The SPEAKER held that the motion was not in order, the House having just refused to order the reading of the testimony.

Mr. Representative COCHRANE submitted the following resolution, which was debated for the two hours allowed by the electoral law, viz :

Resolved, That the objections to the decision of the Electoral Commission upon the electoral vote of South Carolina be sustained by the House, and that said votes be not counted.

Mr. Representative WALLING moved to amend the resolution by adding the words "in conformity with the decision of said Commission."

Mr. Representative JONES, of Kentucky, offered the following as a substitute for the pending propositions :

Resolved, That the decision of the Electoral Commission upon the electoral vote of South Carolina be not concurred in by this House.

Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, demanded the previous question.

Mr. Representative HALE raised the point of order that as the electoral law required the main question to be put at the end of two hours' debate, it was not necessary that the ordinary forms of seconding the previous question and ordering the main question should be observed.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order and held that "the main question," as used in the electoral law, embraced the original proposition, an amendment, and an amendment to the amendment.

The call for the previous question was seconded; and, on ordering the main question to be put, the yeas were 190, the nays 72.

Mr. Representative WALLING moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, (unanimous consent being given for the purpose,) submitted the following proposition as a compromise :

The amendment to be withdrawn, and the House to come to a direct vote upon the original resolution as amended by Mr. Walling; the Senate then to be invited to meet the House for the purpose of continuing the count; and when the State of Vermont shall be reached and the two Houses shall separate, then the House to take a recess until to-morrow at ten o'clock.

The proposition was unanimously agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. Representative Walling to the resolution of Mr. Representative Cochrane, the amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

On motion of Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, the Clerk was directed to notify the Senate of the action of the House and of its readiness to receive the Senate to proceed with the count of electoral votes.

JOINT MEETING.

WEDNESDAY, February, 28, 1877.

At six o'clock and eighteen minutes p. m., the Senate entered the House Hall in the usual manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as presiding officer of the joint meeting of the two Houses, the Speaker of the House occupying a chair upon his left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of Congress for counting the electoral vote resumes its session. The two Houses having separately determined upon the objections to the decision of the Commission on the certificates from the State of South Carolina, the Secretary of the Senate will read the resolution adopted by the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

Resolved, That the decision of the Commission upon the electoral vote of the State of South Carolina stand as the judgment of the Senate, the objections made thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House of Representatives will now read the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives.

Mr. Representative JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to inquire if there is a quorum of the Senate present. The law under which we are acting and the Constitution of the United States require that the certificates shall be opened in the presence of both Houses. If, therefore, there is not a quorum of the House and Senate present, I imagine that this proceeding cannot go on.

Mr. Representative BANKS. That is not a question for the convention to decide; the Senate must decide it for itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House will read the resolution of the House.

Mr. Representative JONES, of Kentucky. I protest that this proceeding should not go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. Representative JONES, of Kentucky. My protest is entered and should go on the record.

The Clerk of the House read as follows:

Resolved, That the objections to the decision of the Electoral Commission upon the electoral vote of South Carolina be sustained by the House, and that said vote be not counted in conformity with the decision of said Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two Houses not concurring in ordering otherwise, the decision of the Commission stands unreversed, and the vote of the State of South Carolina will be counted in conformity therewith. The tellers will announce the vote of the State of South Carolina.

Mr. Representative STONE, (one of the tellers.) South Carolina casts 7 votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, for President of the United States, and 7 votes for William A. Wheeler, of New York, for Vice-President of the United States.

UNDISPUTED STATES.

The count then proceeded, the certificates from the State of—Tennessee, casting 12 votes for Tilden and Hendricks; and Texas, casting 8 votes for Tilden and Hendricks—being opened by the Presiding Officer and read by the tellers, and the votes thereof counted without objection.

VERMONT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Having opened the certificate received by messenger from the State of Vermont, the Chair hands the same to the tellers, to be read in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, and the corresponding one received by mail is also handed to the tellers.

Mr. Representative POPPLETON. I ask that the certificate from the State of Vermont be read at length.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The certificate in full will be read, objection being made to dispensing with reading any portion of it.

Mr. Senator INGALLS (one of the tellers) read in full the certificate from the State of Vermont, to the effect that that State had cast 5 votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, for President, and 5 votes for William A. Wheeler, of New York, for Vice-President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any objections to the certificate from the State of Vermont?

Mr. Representative POPPLETON. I desire to inquire of the President of the Senate whether there have been other returns, or papers purporting to be returns, received from the State of Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There have been none received except the one submitted.

Mr. Representative POPPLETON. I desire to say that I have prepared objections, upon information by telegraph and otherwise that there were dual returns from the State of Vermont.

Mr. Representative HEWITT, of New York. I desire to make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the member from New York [Mr. Hewitt] making a statement? [A pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. Representative HEWITT, of New York. I hold in my hand a package which purports to contain electoral votes from the State of Vermont. This package was delivered to me by express about the middle of December last, and with it came a letter stating that a similar package had been forwarded by mail to the Presiding Officer of the Senate. Being informed to-day that no package corresponding to this had been received by mail by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, I called upon him and inquired whether any other than one certificate from the State of Vermont had been received by him by mail, and he informed me that there had been no other received by him than the one which was already in his possession. I then tendered to him this package, the seals of which are unbroken and which is now as it came into my possession. He declined to receive it, upon the ground that he had no authority in law so to do. Under the circumstances, I now tender this package to the Presiding Officer of the Senate as purporting to contain electoral votes from the State of Vermont.

Mr. Representative KASSON. I object to the reception of the package.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I offer the following resolution—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair stated that he had received but one set of certificates from the State of Vermont. He also states that the law prohibits him from receiving any after the first Thursday in February. His duty is to receive and open and have read all certificates that have been received by him up to and on that day.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I understand that a third certificate or return from the State of Florida was received on the 30th day of January, and was laid before the two Houses by the Presiding Officer of the Senate when that State was reached.

Mr. Representative KASSON. This is in the nature of debate, and I must object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 30th of January is not the first Thursday in February. The Chair now asks if there are any objections to the certificate from the State of Vermont.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I submit the resolution which I send up—

Mr. Representative KASSON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it is an objection to the certificate from the State of Vermont, the Chair will entertain it; but if it is a simple resolution the Chair cannot entertain it.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I ask that it be read. It is in reference to "a question arising under the electoral act," which is provided for by the fourth section of that act, to which I call the attention of the Chair:

That when the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or upon objection to a report of said Commission, or other question arising under this act, each Senator and Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once.

This is a "question arising under this act," and I offer the resolution as such, and ask that it be read at the Clerk's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair again states that if the member from Illinois [Mr. Springer] submits an objection to the certificate from the State of Vermont, the Chair will entertain it; but the Chair cannot entertain a resolution.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I submit it as a question arising under the electoral act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot entertain it.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the member states that it is an objection to the certificate from the State of Vermont, the Chair will direct it to be read.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I will read it for information. [Cries of "Object!" "Object!" and "Order!" "Order!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is out of order.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. Gentlemen may as well hear it read, because it is a question arising under the electoral act. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I ask that the resolution be read as a question arising under the electoral act. The question is this—

[Renewed cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. That one of the two returns from the State of Vermont has not been laid before the two Houses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be compelled to direct the member to be seated.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. Mr. President, I have rights upon this floor which you cannot take away from me, rights which were given me by the people I have the honor to represent. I desire to submit a "question arising under the electoral act," and now ask that it be entertained by the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has decided that if the member states that it is an objection to the certificate from the State of Vermont, with the signature of one Senator and one Representative, it will be read; but if not, it cannot be read.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. It is a question arising under the electoral act. It is now in order, and I ask the decision of the Chair upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that he will not entertain anything except objections to the certificate.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot entertain an appeal. [Applause.] The Chair requires order.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I ask that the question be put on my appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot entertain any appeal.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. This objection must be read ; otherwise the count cannot be proceeded with in accordance to law. [Cries of "Order!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The member from Illinois is not in order.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. Will the Chair allow this to be stated as a question arising under the act—as an objection to the counting of the vote ?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has stated, and will state once more, that if the gentleman presents an objection bearing the signature of a Senator and a Representative, the Chair will receive it and submit it to the joint meeting.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. Then I will submit this as an objection to counting the vote, on the ground that another return has been sent here which has not been laid before the two Houses, and ask time to prepare the objection in due form and present it with the signature of a Senator and a Representative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. When the member submits the paper in proper form, the Chair will then rule upon it.

Mr. Representative POPPLETON. I send up an objection—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule upon one case at a time. Let order be restored and gentlemen be seated. We have all night before us. [A pause, during which Mr. SPRINGER was preparing the objection.] The member from Illinois submits an objection to the certificate from the State of Vermont. Has the member a duplicate ?

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. Not now ; it will be prepared hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House will report the objection.

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

The undersigned, Senator and Members of the House of Representatives, object to the counting of the vote of the State of Vermont, for the reason that two returns, or papers purporting to be returns, of the electoral vote of said State were forwarded to the President of the Senate, and that only one of said returns has been laid before the two Houses, the President of the Senate having stated that but one return has been received by him from said State ; and a duplicate copy of one of said returns is herewith submitted for the consideration of the Senate and House of Representatives.

A. S. MERRIMON,

Senator.

W. M. SPRINGER,

A. H. HAMILTON,

Members of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificate of the State of Vermont ?

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I ask that the telegram accompanying this objection be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to reading the accompanying telegram ?

SEVERAL MEMBERS objected.

Mr. Representative TOWNSEND, of New York. It will not do any hurt to read it. It is not long.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. It is a short telegram ; only about ten words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection ?

Mr. Representative PAGE. I object. [Cries of "O, no."]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the gentleman persist in his objection ?

Mr. Representative PAGE. I waive the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the telegram will be read.

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

BURLINGTON, VERMONT, February 23, 1877.

[Received at two o'clock and twenty-six minutes p. m.]

To S. J. RANDALL,

Speaker of the House of Representatives :

Certificate of Amos Aldrich as elector was deposited in this office December 13.

B. B. SMALLEY,

Clerk of the United States District Court for Vermont.

A SENATOR. That is not the post-office. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificate from the State of Vermont ?

Mr. Representative POPPLETON. Yes, sir. I submit the objection which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The member from Ohio submits an objection, which will be read by the Secretary of the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

The undersigned, Senator and Representatives, object to the return from the State of Vermont on the grounds following, namely :

1. That Henry N. Sollace, who is certified to have been elected on the 7th of November, 1876, was at that day and for a long time before had been a postmaster of the United States, and therefore held an office of trust and profit under the United States, and could not be constitutionally appointed an elector of said State under the Constitution of the United States.

2. That the law of Vermont did not authorize the election of said Sollace to fill the vacancy alleged to have been the result of the absence of said Sollace from the college of electors.

3. It does not appear that said Sollace had resigned his office of postmaster at the date of his appointment by the college of electors.

4. That Amos Aldrich, who received the highest vote at the election on the 7th day of November, 1876, next to that cast for said Sollace, should have been allowed to have cast one of the electoral votes of the State of Vermont.

W. H. BARNUM, Connecticut,
Senator.

E. F. POPPLETON,
J. A. McMAHON,
JACOB TURNEY, Pennsylvania,
JOHN L. VANCE, Ohio,
G. G. DIBRELL, Tennessee,
FRANK H. HURD,
A. T. WALLING, Ohio,
WM. TERRY,

Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any further objections to the certificate of the State of Vermont ?

Mr. Representative POPPLETON. I submit the following additional objections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the member from Ohio a duplicate ?

Mr. Representative POPPLETON. I will furnish a duplicate hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objections will be read by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.'

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

The undersigned, Senator and Members, object to the return No. 1 from the State of Vermont on the ground following, to wit :

I. That Henry N. Sollace, who is certified to have been elected on the 7th day of November, 1876, was at that day, and for a long time before had been, a postmaster of the United States, and therefore held an office of trust and profit under the United States, and could not be constitutionally appointed an elector of said State under the Constitution of the United States.

II. That the law of Vermont did not authorize the election of said Sollace to fill the vacancy alleged to have been the result of the absence of said Sollace from the college of electors.

III. It does not appear that said Sollace had resigned his office of postmaster at the date of his appointment to the college of electors, which fact is proper to be inquired of by the Commission established by law.

IV. It is proper for the said Commission to inquire and report whether Amos Aldrich, who received the highest number of votes at the election on the 7th day of November, 1876, next to that cast for said Sollace, and who is certified as an elector by certificate No. 2, is not a duly appointed elector for the State of Vermont.

W. H. BARNUM, of Connecticut,
Senator.

EARLEY F. POPPLETON, of Ohio,
JOHN A. McMAHON, of Ohio,
JACOB TURNEY, of Pennsylvania,
JOHN L. VANCE, of Ohio,
GEORGE G. DIBRELL, of Tennessee,
FRANK H. HURD, of Ohio,
ANSEL T. WALLING, of Ohio,
WILLIAM TERRY, of Virginia,
Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificate of the State of Vermont ?

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I ask that the duplicate return shall now be opened by the Presiding Officer and read by the tellers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The original certificate from the State of Vermont has been read.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I refer to the dual return submitted with my objections, and referred to in those objections. [Cries of "Order!"] I ask that that second return be opened and now read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not an objection.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. That is not an objection, but it is my right to demand that it shall be read as it has been laid before the two Houses. [Cries of "Order!"] It is my right to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the gentleman refer to the one corresponding with that received by messenger ; that is, the one received by mail ?

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I allude to the one submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hewitt.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Chair understood, and rules it out.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I ask that the Chair will now order, the State of Vermont having forwarded double returns, that those returns and the objections thereto shall now be submitted to the judgment of the Electoral Commission. [Laughter and cries of "Object!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer has stated that he has not received any duplicate returns from the State of Vermont.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. They are now before the joint meeting, presented by the gentleman from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificate from the State of Vermont ? The Chair hears none.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. Does the Chair decline to receive the return laid on the table with my objections ?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair declines to receive any return from any State at this time.

Mr. WADDELL. As being aliunde, I suppose, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In any form.

If there are no further objections to the certificate from the State of Vermont, the Senate will withdraw to its chamber to separately consider the objections already presented and read.

Mr. Representative SPRINGER. I make the point that the electoral vote of the State of Vermont now goes to the Commission, and cannot be considered separately by the two Houses. [Laughter.] O, yes; you can laugh now, but the laugh will be on the other side after a while. Let me tell gentlemen that the law which they have been so anxious to carry out heretofore is now being disregarded by them. [Laughter.]

The Senate (at seven o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) withdrew.

IN SENATE, Wednesday, February 28, 1877.

The Senate having returned from the joint meeting at seven o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m., the President pro tempore resumed the chair and caused to be read the objections submitted to the certificate from the State of Vermont; whereupon

Mr. Senator EDMUNDS offered the following resolution; which, after debate, was adopted by a vote of yeas 47, nays 0:

Resolved, That the vote of Henry N. Sollace as an elector for the State of Vermont be counted together with the other four electoral votes of that State, the objections to the contrary notwithstanding.

On motion of Mr. Senator EDMUNDS, the Secretary was directed to notify the House of Representatives of this action and of the readiness of the Senate to meet the House to continue the count of the electoral votes.

The Senate (being advised that the House of Representatives had taken a recess) took a recess at seven o'clock and forty minutes p. m. until to-morrow at ten o'clock a. m.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Wednesday, February 28, 1877.

The Senate having withdrawn from the hall of the House at seven o'clock and ten minutes p. m., the House resumed its session; and the Speaker, acting under the previous unanimous agreement of the House, directed a recess to be taken until to-morrow at ten o'clock a. m.

IN SENATE, Thursday, March 1, 1877.

The recess taken from the previous day having expired, the Senate resumed its session on Thursday, March 1, at ten o'clock a. m., transacting no business.

At ten o'clock and fifty minutes p. m., a message was received from the House of Representatives announcing its resolution in regard to the vote of Henry N. Sollace, claiming to be an elector for the State of Vermont;

Whereupon the Senate immediately proceeded to the hall of the House.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Thursday, March 1, 1877.

The recess taken from the previous day having expired, the House of Representatives resumed its session on Thursday, March 1, at ten o'clock a. m.

Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, rose to submit a resolution, and was recognized by the Speaker.

Mr. Representative WALLING moved a call of the House; which motion was disagreed to—yeas 68, nays 169.

Mr. Representative WALLING moved a reconsideration of the vote by which a call of the House was refused.

On motion of Mr. Representative HALE, the motion to reconsider was laid on the table—yeas 173, nays 66.

A message was received from the Senate announcing its resolution on the objection to the vote of Henry N. Sollace as elector of the State of Vermont and its readiness to meet the House to proceed with the electoral count.

Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the vote of Henry N. Sollace, claiming to be an elector from the State of Vermont, be not counted.

Mr. Representative POPPLETON claimed the floor as objector in the joint meeting to the vote of Sollace as an elector for Vermont.

Mr. Representative CAULFIELD claimed the floor on a question of high privilege.

The SPEAKER declined to entertain the claim of Mr. Representative Caulfield at present, as there can be but one question of privilege pending at a time.

Mr. Representative POPPLETON submitted the following:

Whereas, at a joint meeting of the two Houses on the 28th day of February, 1877, a sealed package, addressed to the President of the Senate, purporting to contain the electoral vote of the State of Vermont, was delivered to the said President of the Senate by Mr. Hewitt, a member of this House, who then stated that he received it by express about the middle of December last, and with it a letter notifying him that a similar package had been forwarded by mail to the President of the Senate; and said Hewitt being informed by the said President that no package had been received corresponding thereto, that he, Mr. Hewitt, had, previously to said joint meeting, tendered said package to said President of the Senate, who declined to receive the same, and which statement was not denied;

And whereas it also appeared by a telegram from the clerk of the district court of the United States for the district of Vermont that a duplicate of said return was deposited in that office on the 13th day of December, 1876;

And whereas objections were made pursuant to law to the certificate purporting to be the electoral vote of Vermont which had been opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses, and said package was in terms made a part of said objection, and still remains unopened, and said objection cannot be considered until said package is opened according to law;

And whereas the said return then tendered to said President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses was retained by him or by the Secretary of the Senate, and the said President of the Senate refused to open said sealed package in the presence of the two Houses: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the refusal of the President of the Senate to open, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, said sealed package, purporting to be the electoral vote of the State of Vermont, was a violation of law and of the privileges of this House, and that, until said package shall be opened pursuant to law in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, the counting of the votes cannot further proceed according to the Constitution and law now in existence for the counting of said electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States.

Resolved further, That the Clerk of this House inform the Senate of the adoption of the foregoing preamble and resolution, and request the Senate to meet this House in joint session, to the end that said package purporting to be a certificate of the electoral vote of Vermont be opened by the President of the Senate, and that the proceedings thereafter be held according to law.

Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, made the point of order that the paper submitted by Mr. Representative Poppleton was not in order under the first section of the electoral act.

The SPEAKER held that, while in his opinion a grave mistake and wrong had been committed in the joint meeting of the two Houses yesterday by the refusal of the Presiding Officer to receive, even for opening and reading for information, a package which had all the surroundings of an authentic and duly-attested paper in relation to an electoral vote for the State of Vermont, he was also of opinion that there was no power in the House to reverse the decision of the Presiding Officer of the joint meeting. In his view, however, so much of the paper submitted by the member from Ohio [Mr. Poppleton] as requests the return of certain papers from the Senate, alleged in the preamble to have been taken away in an undue manner, was in order.

Mr. Representative POPPLETON thereupon modified his resolution to conform to the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER decided this to be the pending resolution, and the proposition of the member from New York [Mr. Wood] an amendment thereto.

Mr. Representative KNOTT submitted the following as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the modified resolution :

Resolved, That this House require that the package tendered by the member from New York [Mr. Hewitt] to the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses on yesterday, and purporting to be a certificate of the electoral vote for the President and Vice-President of the United States in the State of Vermont, shall be opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses, and if found to be such a certificate, the same shall be submitted, together with the certificate read in the presence of the two Houses, to the Electoral Commission for its judgment and decision, and that the Senate be requested to make a like order, requiring the President of the Senate to open said package in the presence of the two Houses; and until such order be made the House will not be ready to meet the Senate to proceed with the count of the electoral vote.

Mr. Representative POPPLETON accepted the proposed amendment.

The question being raised, the SPEAKER ruled that the two hours' debate authorized by the electoral law would now commence; from which ruling Mr. Representative CAULFIELD appealed; but the Speaker declined to entertain the appeal.

A scene of confusion followed, several members protesting against the action of the Speaker and others insisting that proceedings should continue according to the electoral law.

When order was restored, debate proceeded; and after two hours' debate the proposition of Mr. Representative Knott, accepted by Mr. Representative Poppleton, was rejected—yeas 116, nays 148.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. Representative Wood, of New York, to the original resolution submitted by Mr. Representative Poppleton,

Mr. Representative HOPKINS moved to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "Resolved" and inserting—

That this House requires that the package tendered by the member from New York [Mr. Hewitt] to the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses on yesterday, and purporting to be a certificate of electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States in the State of Vermont, shall be opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses; and, if found to be such a certificate, the same shall be submitted, together with the certificate read in the presence of the two Houses, to the Electoral Commission for its judgment and decision; and that the Senate be requested to make a like order requiring the President of the Senate to open said package in the presence of the two Houses.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected—yeas 115, nays 147.

Mr. Representative LANE moved to reconsider the vote rejecting the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Representative HALE moved to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table; which was agreed to—yeas 171, nays 80.

Mr. Representative WALLING moved that the pending resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. Representative McCRARY made the point of order that under the electoral law this motion was not in order, but the main question was required to be put.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order, on the ground that any motions which are allowed by the rules of the House, and which pertain to the main question, are in order at any period of the progress of the main question.

The question being put on the motion to lay on the table, it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 167.

Mr. Representative POPPLETON moved to reconsider the vote last taken.

Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York, raised the point of order that this was a dilatory motion, and therefore not in order at this stage.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order.

The question being taken on the motion to reconsider, it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 162.

The amendment of Mr. Representative Wood, of New York, was then agreed to—yeas 208, nays 17.

Mr. Representative O'BRIEN moved to reconsider the vote last taken.

Mr. Representative GARFIELD moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which was agreed to—yeas 172, nays 55.

The question recurring on the resolution submitted by Mr. Representative Poppleton, as amended by the substitute of Mr. Representative Wood, of New York, viz:

Resolved, That the vote of Henry N. Sollace, claiming to be an elector from the State of Vermont, be not counted,

Mr. Representative VANCE, of Ohio, moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was disagreed to—yeas 53, nays 180.

Mr. Representative MONEY moved to reconsider the vote last taken.

Mr. Representative HALE moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which was agreed to—yeas 170, nays 57.

The question recurring on the original resolution as amended,

Mr. Representative WALLING asked to be excused from voting thereon.

Mr. Representative VANCE, of Ohio, moved that his colleague [Mr. Walling] be excused.

The Speaker declined to entertain the motion.

Mr. Representative WALLING appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The Speaker declined to entertain the appeal.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to—yeas 207, nays 26.

Mr. Representative CLARK, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote last taken.

Mr. Representative HALE moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which was agreed to—yeas 174, nays 59.

Mr. Representative O'BRIEN claimed the floor to submit a resolution notifying the Senate of the action of the House.

The SPEAKER stated that he had allowed a vote to be taken on every legitimate legislative motion. He had allowed the motion to reconsider to be voted on whenever made, so that the House might have an opportunity to correct any error it might have committed. The House had had an opportunity to vote on the motion to lay on the table the propositions themselves and on the motions to reconsider the votes upon those propositions. The House, having now advanced to a declaration of its judgment on the objection to counting the vote from the State of Vermont, was brought to the following paragraph of the law as its guide and its mandatory instruction :

When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the Presiding Officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.

The Senate had notified the House of its action on the objection ; the House had now reached its judgment on the objection ; and it was the duty of the Chair, by the terms of the law, mandatory and ministerial, to notify the Senate to that effect ; and he therefore directed the Clerk accordingly.

JOINT MEETING.

THURSDAY, March 1, 1877.

The Senate entered the hall of the House of Representatives at ten o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m., in the usual manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the Senate took his seat as presiding officer of the joint meeting, the Speaker of the House occupying a chair on his left.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint meeting of Congress resumes its session. The two Houses separately having determined on the objection to the certificate from the State of Vermont, the Secretary of the Senate will now read the resolution of the Senate.

The Secretary of the Senate read as follows :

Resolved, That the vote of Henry N. Sollace, as an elector for the State of Vermont, be counted, together with the other four electoral votes of that State, the objections to the contrary notwithstanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk of the House will now read the resolution of the House.

The Clerk of the House read as follows :

Resolved, That the vote of Henry N. Sollace, claiming to be an elector from the State of Vermont, be not counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two Houses not having concurred in an affirmative vote to reject one of the votes from the State of Vermont, the whole vote of that State will be counted. The tellers will announce the vote.

Mr. Senator INGALLS, (one of the tellers.) The State of Vermont casts 5 votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio, as President, and 5 votes for William A. Wheeler, of New York, as Vice-President.

UNDISPUTED STATES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Having opened the certificate received by messenger from the State of Virginia, the Chair hands the same to the tellers to be read in the presence and hearing of the two Houses. The corresponding one received by mail is also handed to the tellers.

Mr. Representative WOOD, of New York. Mr. President, I suggest that the result be announced without the full reading of the papers.

Mr. Representative LANE and others objected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the certificate will be read in full.

The certificate having been read by Mr. Representative Cook, (one of the tellers,) and there being no objection thereto, the vote of Virginia was counted—11 votes for Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, as President, and 11 votes for Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, as Vice-President.

The certificate from the State of West Virginia was next opened; and having been read by Mr. Representative Stone, (one of the tellers,) and there being no objection thereto, the vote of West Virginia was counted—5 votes for Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, as President, and 5 votes for Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, as Vice-President.

WISCONSIN.

The certificate from the State of Wisconsin was next opened; and, it having been read by Mr. Senator Allison, (one of the tellers,)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any objections to the certificate from the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. Representative LYNDE. I send to the Chair an objection.

The objection was read, as follows, by the Clerk of the House:

The undersigned, Senators and Representatives, object to the counting of the vote of Daniel L. Downs as an elector for the State of Wisconsin upon the following grounds, namely:

That the said Daniel L. Downs held the office of pension surgeon and of examining surgeon for the Pension-Office, by valid appointment under the laws of the United States, prior to the 7th day of November, 1876, the day of the presidential election, and upon said day and upon the 6th day of December, 1876, at the time of his assuming to cast a vote as elector for the State of Wisconsin, and that he has continually held said office from a long period prior to the said 7th day of November, 1876, until the present time; and the undersigned therefore state that said Downs, as pension surgeon and as examining surgeon for the Pension-Office as aforesaid, held an office of trust and profit under the United States on the day of the presidential election and on the day that he voted as an elector for the State of Wisconsin, and therefore could not be constitutionally appointed an elector for the State of Wisconsin or vote as such under the Constitution of the United States.

Wherefore the undersigned aver that the said Downs was not duly appointed an elector for the said State, and that his vote cannot be constitutionally counted. And the undersigned hereto annex the evidence of the facts above stated and to be taken as a part of their objections.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 3, 1877.

DANIEL L. DOWNS sworn and examined.

By Mr. SPARKS:

Question. Were you appointed elector in the State of Wisconsin in the last presidential election?

Answer. I was.

Q. In what district?

A. In the third congressional district.

Q. Did you sit as a member of the electoral college?

A. I did.

Q. And voted?

A. And voted.

Q. For whom were the electoral votes of Wisconsin cast?

A. For Hayes and Wheeler.

Q. You were on the ticket and were elected ?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you hold any office under the Government of the United States at the time you were appointed elector ?

A. I can only give my opinion on that point. I never understood myself as holding an office. I held the position of examining surgeon for the Pension-Office.

Q. Did you hold that position at the time you were elected ?

A. I did.

Q. Did you hold it at the time you acted and voted ?

A. I did.

Q. And hold it now ?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long have you held it ?

A. My recollection is that I received the appointment in 1863.

Q. And that has continued up to the present time ?

A. It has continued up to the present time.

Q. Have you your appointment with you ?

A. I have not.

Q. It was in writing ?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. By whom were you appointed ?

A. By the Commissioner of Pensions.

Q. Did you derive any profit from the position ?

A. I did. The compensation is fixed by law. In the first instance, when I was first appointed, I received nothing from the United States Government. The law was then changed so that I received $1.50 for each examination, which was paid by the applicant and was refunded to him on the first payment of his pension. The law has been since changed, so that now I have a fee which is paid by the Government of the United States.

Q. How much from each applicant ?

A. Two dollars from each person referred to me for examination and examined.

Q. How many applicants do you examine a year ?

A. The biennial examination would probably amount to sixty persons. In the other odd year, there would be some fifteen or twenty examinations in the course of a year.

Q. How many examinations would that make annually ?

A. Probably an average of forty.

By Mr. BURCHARD:

Q. There is no salary connected with your position ?

A. No, sir.

Q. Nothing but a fee ?

A. A fee in each case.

Q. At first it was paid by the applicant ?

A. Yes.

Q. When was the law changed ?

A. I cannot tell you.

Q. Are you now paid on a statement of account ?

A. Yes; I render a monthly account, and return the notice of reference with my accounts to the Pension-Office.

Q. Was there any question raised as to your eligibility as a presidential elector ?

A. Not before the election; there was after the election.

By Mr. LAWRENCE:

Q. It never was mentioned before the election ?

A. Not that I know of.

Q. How many examining surgeons are there in your county ?

A. None, besides myself.

Q. How many in the congressional district ?

A. I cannot answer; I know three or four.

By Mr. SPARKS:

Q. You say that at first the applicant paid a fee of $1.50 ?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that was refunded to the applicant by the Government ?

A. That was my understanding of it.

Q. So that the Government paid it.

A. Yes.

Q. When was the law changed that you got $2 for each examination ?

A. I cannot tell you the time; my recollection is that it was about 1865 or 1870.

Q. Since then the fee has been $2 for each examination, and has been paid by the Government?

A. Yes.

Q. At what period is that paid?

A. Monthly. I make out a monthly statement of the business done by me and send it to the Pension-Office, together with the orders of reference. The Pension-Office approves of the account and returns it, and it goes to the pension agent of the district, and he pays it.

By Mr. BURCHARD:

Q. You did not suppose that you were ineligible as a presidential elector, and do not suppose it now?

A. No, sir; that was not my understanding.

Q. And no one else supposed so, to your knowledge?

A. No, sir; I understand that I was simply an employé of the Pension-Office.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. When did you receive your appointment?

A. My recollection is that I received it in 1863. I cannot state positively.

By Mr. BURCHARD:

Q. The examination biennially is of the same or nearly the same persons, is it not?

A. Of the same persons exactly; all persons except those who are termed permanently disabled have to be examined biennially, simply to ascertain whether a continuation of the disabilities exists.

By Mr. SPARKS:

Q. There is a list of persons whom you examine biennially?

A. Yes, sir.

Y. And then there are original applicants constantly coming in for examination?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you receive $2 per capita for each examination?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Where is your appointment?

A. I am not positive whether I have it in my possession at home or not. I think I have.

Q. What other duties do you perform besides mere examinations?

A. Not any, except that I make a report after I make the examination. I send the certificate of each examination directly to the Pension Office, excepting the certificates of biennial examination. These go to the pension agent and duplicates to the Pension Office.

Q. Do you make any other report except those certificates?

A. No; except that I make out an account monthly of the names of the persons examined, and return them with the orders of examination in order to get my pay.

Q. You draw your pay monthly on those vouchers?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. By whom were you sworn in as examining surgeon?

A. I think I was not sworn in at all, but I would not state positively, as it is a good many years since.

Q. If it is the rule to swear in examining surgeons, you doubtless were sworn in?

A. Yes, sir; I suppose so. I have no recollection at all on the subject. I know that I never received any commission beyond simply the appointment in writing.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 8, 1877.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 6th instant, requesting the certificate of the appointment of Dr. Daniel W. Downs as pension surgeon at Richland Center, Richland County, Wisconsin, the time of his appointment, the amount of fees received by him in the years 1875 and 1876, and whether he has ever resigned, and whether he now holds and has held such position since his first appointment, was received on yesterday, but owing to the illness of the medical referee, who has charge of the papers relating to the surgeons employed by the office, I could not sooner get at the information you desired.

Dr. Daniel L. Downs, of Richland Center, Richland County, Wisconsin, was first employed by the Commissioner of Pensions to make examinations to be used in pension cases as early as May, 1863, and, excepting for the period of his service in the Army during the late rebellion, cases have been occasionally sent to him for examination all along down from that date. In 1875 he made twenty-three examinations, and in 1876 he made thirty-five examinations, receiving for his services $2 for each examination. So far as I am informed, he has never declined to make examinations which have been requested; and he is still employed to make examinations in pension cases in his neighborhood. The last order for a claimant to appear before him to be examined was made as late as the 3d instant.

The above statement does not include biennial examinations which he may have made in 1875, the number of which I cannot readily ascertain, as the certificates of such examinations are sent by the examining surgeon to the pension agent who pays the pension.

I suppose you must be in error as to the name being Daniel W., as no other surgeon at that place named Downs has ever been employed as herein stated than the Daniel L. above referred to.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. A. BENTLEY,
Commissioner of Pensions.

Hon. J. R. TUCKER,
House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further objections to the certificate from the State of Wisconsin? If there be none, the Senate will now withdraw to its Chamber, that the Houses separately may consider and determine the objection.

The Senate retired at eleven o'clock and twenty-seven minutes p. m.

IN SENATE, Thursday, March 1, 1877.

The Senate having returned from the joint meeting, the President pro tempore resumed the chair at eleven o'clock and thirty minutes p. m., and caused the objection to the vote of Daniel L. Downs as an elector for the State of Wisconsin to be read, whereupon

Mr. Senator CAMERON, of Wisconsin, submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to without debate and without a division, viz :

Resolved, That the vote of Daniel L. Downs as an elector for the State of Wisconsin be counted together with the other nine electoral votes of that State, the objections made thereto to the contrary notwithstanding.

On motion of Mr. Senator CAMERON, of Wisconsin, the Secretary was directed to notify the House of Representatives of this action, and that the Senate was ready to meet the House to continue the count of the electoral vote for President and Vice-President.

A message was received from the House of Representatives at three o'clock and fifty-eight minutes a. m., (Friday, March 2,) announcing the action of the House on the objection to the vote of Daniel L. Downs as an elector from Wisconsin, and the Senate immediately proceeded to the hall of the House.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Thursday, March 1, 1877.

The Senate having withdrawn from the House hall at eleven o'clock and twenty-seven minutes p. m., the House of Representatives resumed its session.

Mr. Representative MILLS claimed the floor to submit, as a question of privilege, a resolution for the immediate election of a President by the House of Representatives.

Mr. Representative LYNDE moved that the House take a recess till to-morrow (March 2) at ten o'clock.

The motion was not agreed to, yeas 99, nays 148.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing its action on the objection to the vote of Daniel L. Downs as an elector for the State of Wisconsin, and its readiness to proceed with the count.

Mr. Representative LYNDE submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That the vote of Daniel L. Downs as an elector of the State of Wisconsin should not be counted, because he held an office of trust and profit under the United States, and therefore was not constitutionally appointed an elector by the said State of Wisconsin.

After debate,

Mr. Representative CASWELL moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved" and inserting—

That the vote of D. L. Downs be counted with the other votes of the electors of the State of Wisconsin, the objections thereto notwithstanding.

After debate,

The amendment was rejected—yeas 77, nays 136.

The question recurring on the resolution of Mr. Representative Lynde, it was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In announcing the final result of the electoral vote the Chair trusts that all present, whether on the floor or in the galleries, will refrain from all demonstrations whatever; that nothing shall transpire on this occasion to mar the dignity and moderation which have characterized these proceedings, in the main so reputable to the American people and worthy of the respect of the world.

The whole number of the electors appointed to vote for President and Vice-President of the United States is 369, of which a majority is 185.

APPENDIX OF BRIEFS.

The briefs submitted to the Electoral Commission by counsel in the various cases argued before it, are as follows :

BRIEF No. 1.

SUBMITTED BY COUNSEL FOR OBJECTORS TO CERTIFICATE No. 1 IN THE CASE OF THE STATE OF FLORIDA.

Brief as to the conclusive character of lists of the Executive, presented February 3, 1877, by Ashbel Green, of counsel.

This brief is limited to the consideration of the question, how far this Commission can go behind the lists of the executive, furnished in compliance with the provisions of the United States Revised Statutes, section 136.

It will be convenient to consider—

I. THE POWERS OF THE COMMISSION :

The act approved January 29, 1877, section 2, provides :

“That if more than one return, or paper purporting to be a return from a State, shall have been received by the President of the Senate, purporting to be the certificate of electoral votes given at the last preceding election for President and Vice-President in such State, (unless they shall be duplicates of the same return,) all such returns and papers shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses, when met as aforesaid, and read by the tellers; and all such returns and papers shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision as to which is the true and lawful electoral vote of such State, of a commission constituted” by the act. It then provides, whenever objections presented in the mode pointed out in the act shall be made, that “When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent, in such consideration.”

By the terms of the act, then, the tribunal thus constituted has the same powers which are possessed by the two Houses of Congress acting separately or together.

This would lead to the consideration of the questions—

1st. Whether the Houses of Congress have any powers either together or separately?

2d. What these powers are?

Have the Houses of Congress any powers separately or acting together?

Three theories have been advanced :

a. That the power of counting or rejection of the votes resides in the President of the Senate.

b. That the two Houses, acting together, shall determine the question.

c. That the two Houses have equal power in ascertaining what votes shall be counted, and that if the two Houses disagree there can be no decision allowing the vote, and that what the two Houses do not agree to count, cannot be counted.

It would seem to be unnecessary to do more than to refer to the debates which have taken place upon the right of the President of the Senate to determine what votes should be counted. It cannot be useful to repeat the argument here; for the act constituting the commission has at least settled the question pro hac vice, and must be taken to have decided that the power of counting the vote is not vested in the President of the Senate. The whole theory of the bill is contrary to the idea of the right of that officer. It ignores him except so far as it constitutes him the presiding officer of the joint meeting of the Houses of Congress, grants him the incidental power as such presiding officer to preserve order, and recognizes his duty to open the certificates, and to hand them to the tellers appointed previously by the Senate and the tellers previously appointed by the House of Representatives.

The bill would also seem to have settled the point that the concurrence of two Houses is requisite to the counting of any disputed vote. It was adopted by both Houses for their guidance in the emergency now presented, and the necessity of their concurrence and their equal voice in arriving at the determination of the question are involved in the very fact of the passage of the act. Moreover, the act itself recognizes this right of the two Houses and the control of their concurrent action in the premises. For it reserves to the two Houses the absolute power to overrule by their action the solemn adjudication of the tribunal constituted by the act whenever "the two Houses shall, separately, concur in ordering otherwise, in which case such concurrent order shall govern."

It must, therefore, be held that the Houses of Congress have some powers in the counting of the electoral votes, and that the two Houses, acting concurrently, and only so acting, have the authority to admit or reject any votes which may be "opened or presented to them for action."

II. WHAT POWERS HAVE THE TWO HOUSES OF CONGRESS TO DECIDE WHETHER ANY AND WHAT VOTES SHALL BE COUNTED ?

Here, again, recourse may be had to the act of January 29, 1877. It cannot be reasonably contended that Congress is to act merely as an accountant to add up the numbers of the respective returns and announce the result. If this were true, its action would be paralyzed at the outset; for it would be met by double inconsistent returns, each claiming to be true, and in order to determine which was correct, the exercise of judgment and the adjudication of the question thus presented would be a prerequisite to the mere clerical act of addition and announcement of the result.

Moreover, the examination does not stop here; for it is contemplated by the act that some votes may not be counted at all, and that the whole number of electors which a State has the constitutional right to appoint, may not be appointed. The commission is expressly directed to decide whether any and what votes are the votes provided for by the Constitution, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors. This authority is not limited by the clause preceding, giving the commission "the same powers, if any, now possessed for the purpose of considering the objections by the two Houses, acting separately or together," but is a legislative declaration, free from the saving doubt therein expressed, that there is a clear right to decide whether any and what votes are votes provided for by the Constitution, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors.

In this connection, before proceeding to look at the Constitution, and at the laws heretofore enacted, it may be profitable to refer to the previous practice of Congress in this behalf.

I. (a) The question whether the State whose vote was presented was a State of the Union or not, arose in the following cases, and the votes were counted in the alternative :

1.—1817, Indiana. (p. 46, House Doc. No. 13.)

2.—1821, Missouri. (p. 51.)

3.—1837, Michigan. (p. 72.)

(b) The same question arose in the following cases, and the votes were rejected : (p. 229.)

1.—1865, Virginia.

2.—1865, North Carolina.

3.—1865, South Carolina.

4.—1865, Georgia.

5.—1865, Florida.

6.—1865, Alabama.

7.—1865, Mississippi.

8.—1865, Louisiana.

9.—1865, Texas.

10.—1865, Arkansas.

11.—1865, Tennessee.

II. The question whether a vote was valid on the facts stated in the certificate arose, and was not decided, in one case :

1.—Wisconsin, 1857. (p. 88.)

III. The question whether a vote, duly certified, could be rejected because the election was not valid (i. e., on the ground of fraud) has been raised in one case, and the vote was counted :

1.—1869, Louisiana. (p. 238.)

IV. All of these questions (I, II, III) arose in one case, and the vote was taken in the alternative :

1.—1869, Georgia. (p. 244.)

V. In the cases of Mississippi, 1873, (p. 378,) and Texas, 1873, (p. 382,) two questions arose :

1. That the vote was bad on the face of the certificate.

2. That the certificate was defective in form.

The vote was counted.

In the case of Mississippi the first objection was overruled, on the ground of the provision of the State statute.

VI. In the case of Arkansas, 1873, (p. 389,) two questions arose :

1. Whether the certificate was good in form.

2. Whether it agreed with the actual returns of the election.

The Senate and House disagreeing, the vote was rejected.

VII. In the case of Louisiana, 1873, (p. 391,) there were two certificates, and seven objections were raised. Neither vote was counted.

VIII. The vote of Georgia was rejected in 1873, (p. 407,) because cast for a candidate dead at the time of election.

III. THE PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION IN THIS REGARD ARE—

ARTICLE II.

2. Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

ARTICLE XII.

1. The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, if such a number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

2. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

4. The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

1. The Constitution, therefore, does not prescribe the evidence of the appointment of electors. It does not require certified lists from the governor that persons claiming to have been appointed as electors have in fact been so appointed. It does not require any particular form of proof. It is wholly silent in respect to the evidence by which such an appointment is to be authenticated.

2. In delegating to the State the appointment of electors, and to the legislature of that State the authority to "direct" the "manner" in which such appointment shall be made, the Constitution seems to contemplate that the proof of the appointment should, in the first instance at least, be furnished by the State and its nature and form prescribed by the legislature of the State. "Each State," it declares, "shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct," the electors. It is natural that the power authorized to do an act and to determine the manner in which that act is to be done should also provide for verifying its own act and showing that it was done in the proper manner. The legislative power of the State, in directing the manner in which the act is to be done, might properly direct also the mode of proving that such manner had been followed.

In conformity to the well-established rules of proof, it would seem that the primary and best authority as to what the State had done is the State itself. Its own declarations through its legislature and judicial organs are the most weighty testimony which can be offered.

IV. THE PROVISIONS OF THE STATUTES OF THE UNITED STATES ARE AS FOLLOWS:

SEC. 136. It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified and to be delivered o the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet.

SEC. 137. The electors shall vote for President and Vice-President, respectively, in the manner directed by the Constitution.

SEC. 138. The electors shall make and sign three certificates of all the votes given by them, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, one of the votes for President and the other of the votes for Vice-President, and shall annex to each of the certificates one of the lists of the electors which shall have been furnished to them by direction of the executive of the State.

¶ The statute of 1792 provided that "It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet;" and one of these lists was directed to be annexed by the electors to each certificate of their votes.

This provision, so far as the State executive is concerned, is little more than a request to the governor to make such lists; for there is probably no mode of compelling him to perform the duty. Its real effect is to provide by act of Congress convenient evidence of the appointment of the electors to be considered by the two Houses of Congress when they come to examine and count the votes. The act nowhere goes beyond that. It does not require even the seal of the State to be affixed, nor the countersigning by the secretary of the State, as in the case of a certificate of election of Senators. It does not make this evidence indispensable. It does not make this evidence conclusive. It does not make this evidence exclusive. It does not shut out other evidence. It does not limit the discretion or fetter the judgment of the authority having the power to count the votes and to decide between several sets of papers purporting to be votes, as to which are in truth genuine and valid votes.

Suppose the governor's certified list should happen to have been unattainable at the time the electors voted. Suppose that accident, disability, or death intervened, or that the governor's conscientious judgment on the case, or his willful refusal to perform his duty, deprived the electors of this evidence, are their votes to be destroyed?

Or suppose that by mistake or fraud the governor should give the certified lists in favor of persons who were not appointed electors and should withhold them from the true electors. Suppose, as was said by Senator Frelinghuysen, "a State had notoriously given its vote for one candidate, and by sheer accident the list of votes had such a heading as to give it for another?" Is there no remedy? Must the State lose its votes? Must the State submit to have its votes cast against its real will, as if by false personation made before its eyes, in the open day, but which it has no power to resist?

If it can be shown that the certificate was corruptly made, by the perpetration of gross frauds in tampering with or altering the returns, must it nevertheless flaunt its falsehood in the faces of us all without the possibility of contradiction?

The answer is that the authority commissioned to count the votes (and, in doing so, to determine what are authentic and valid votes entitled to be counted) will receive other evidence besides the governor's certificate, which evidence may prevail over that certificate, and will receive evidence impeaching the truth of that certificate for mistake or fraud. The tribunal might act on the petition of the persons claiming to have been duly appointed electors and wrongfully interfered with in the exercise of their functions; for it is not limited as to the sources of the evidence it will accept. But especially will it receive evidence from the State itself.

1. The Constitution deals expressly with the subject of authenticating the votes, (Article XII.) And it declares expressly what powers of legislation Congress "may" exercise with respect to action within the respective States in the choosing of electors and the casting of electoral votes, (Article II, section 4.) Expressio unius exclusio est alterius is a maxim, and it is very doubtful, at best, whether any other compulsory power over the States in these matters can be exercised by Congress.

2. Section 136 of the Revised Statutes was a very suitable precautionary enactment, and it ought to be obeyed. But under the view last stated it is justly subject to many observations.

(a) Its framers seem to have understood that it was only directory or as a recommendation, and operative only through the presumable respect of the State authorities for the wishes of Congress.

Certainly there was no power in the United States Government to compel a governor's obedience. A mandamus could not be employed in the case by any judicial court.

(b) The section does not declare that the lists referred to shall be conclusive evidence, or the only evidence, or the evidence, or any evidence as to the appointment of the electors; nor does it define, affirmatively, negatively, or in any way, what shall be the effect of their presence or their absence.

(c) If Congress chooses to go behind the governor's certificate and inquire who have been chosen electors, it is not violating the right of the States to prescribe what shall be the evidence of the election of electors, but it is simply going behind the certificate as prescribed by an act of Congress.

The bill creates a tribunal which is to consider the questions and is to decide the issues presented.

1. It is to consider the returns which are double and antagonistic, with the objections of members of Congress, and which thus raise the issues.

2. It is also to decide the issues thus raised, and in so doing is to "take into view" petitions, which may supplement and fortify the claims or the objections of either of the contestants; also depositions and other papers, which are modes of proof of the facts asserted upon either hand.

a. From the character of the members of the Commission, composed of high judicial officers.

b. From the nature of its attributes and functions, viz, examination, impartiality, decision, and judgment.

c. From the methods pointed out for arriving at its decision, viz, consideration of certificates, votes, papers, objections, and taking into view petitions, depositions, and other papers, which include the most inferior means of evidence.

d. From the oath the members of the Commission are to take, viz, "I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that I will impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to the Commission of which I am a member, and a true judgment give thereon, agreeably to the Constitution and the laws: so help me God."

e. From the previous course of procedure by both Houses of Congress in inquiring and investigating "whether elections of electors have been conducted in certain States in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the said States, and what contests, if any, have arisen as to who were elected as electors."

f. From the language of the commission issued by both Houses of Congress to their investigating committees, to send for persons and papers, and take testimony.

These instructions were in the Senate, viz: "That the said committee be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the eligibility to office under the Constitution of the United States of any persons alleged to have been ineligible on the 7th day of November last, or to be ineligible as electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, to whom certificates of election have been or shall be issued by the executive authority of any State as such electors, and whether the appointment of electors, or those claiming to be such, in any of the States, has been made, declared, or returned, either by force, fraud, or other means, otherwise than in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the respective States; and whether any such appointment or action of any such elector has been in any wise unconstitutional or unlawfully interfered with." And in the House, viz: "Resolved, That three special committees, one of fifteen members, to proceed to Louisiana; one of six members, to proceed to Florida; and one of nine members, to proceed to South Carolina, shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House to investigate recent elections therein, and the action of the returning or canvassing boards in the said States in reference thereto, and to report all the facts essential to an honest return of the votes received by the electors of the said States for President and Vice-President of the United States, and to a fair understanding thereof by the people, and whether the electoral votes of the said States should be counted; and that for the purpose of speedily executing this resolution, the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony, and, at their discretion, to detail subcommittees, with like authority to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to take testimony; and that the said committees and their subcommittees may employ stenographers, clerks, and messengers, and be attended each by a deputy sergeant-at-arms; and said committees shall have leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise."

g. From the construction already placed by the Commission upon its own powers by its Rule V, viz:

Application for process to compel the attendance of witnesses or the production of written or documentary testimony may be made by counsel on either side * * * Depositions taken for use before the Commission shall be sufficiently authenticated if taken before any commissioner of the circuit court of the United States, or any clerk or deputy clerk of any court of the United States.

From all this, it follows irresistibly—

1. That evidence and proof were heretofore sought for by the Houses of Congress for the purposes of arriving at a judicial determination of the issues which are now remitted for primary decision to the Commission created; and

2. That this Commission must also employ the common modes which the experience of mankind has pointed out for the purpose of arriving at the truth of any matter submitted to the determination of conscientious and intelligent persons, whether clothed with judicial or quasi-judicial functions or not.

These methods are knowledge and judgment.

It will not be for a moment contended that the members of this Commission have knowledge of the truth of the various disputed questions of fact which are raised by the returns, petitions, and objections.

They must therefore enlighten themselves, and base their judgments upon some evidence outside of themselves.

In so doing they must resort to the ordinary methods by which inquiry after truth is conducted, and must satisfy their consciences and understandings by such proof as any other tribunal employs in seeking the same end.

We conclude, therefore, that the Commission is limited as to the kind of evidence it is to take into consideration by the Constitution and now existing law, only by the petitions, depositions, and other papers as shall be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

But it has been contended with great ability and pertinacity that the certificates of the executive are conclusive evidence of the facts stated in them, and this leads to the consideration of the question—

V. WHAT IS THE NATURE OF THE CERTIFICATES SIGNED BY THE EXECUTIVE?

It will assist in the solution of this problem to inquire what is the end sought to be gained by the signing, delivery, and forwarding to the President of the Senate of these certificates. There can be but one answer to this inquiry, viz: it is to furnish proof as to what persons the State has, in accordance with the forms of law, appointed to vote for President and Vice-President of the United States. This is the fact to be determined. There is no inherent virtue in the mode pointed out by Congress. There is nothing which invests the certificate with a sanctity superior to legislative and judicial acts.†

The certificate is not the election. It is only one proof of the result of the election.

The commission of the President of the United States is not an appointment, but only evidence of an appointment. Marbury vs. Madison, (1 Cranch, 170.)

The election is the foundation, not the return. (4 Coke, Inst., 49.)

Chief-Justice Whiton, in 4 Wis., 792, commenting upon the effect of certificates of canvassers, says:

Before proceeding to state our views in regard to the law regulating the canvass of votes by the State canvassers, we propose to consider how far the right of a person to an office is affected by the determination of the canvassers of the votes cast at the election held to choose the officer. Under our constitution, almost all our officers are elected by the people. Thus the governor is chosen, the constitution providing that the person having the highest number of votes for that office shall be elected. But the constitution is silent as to the mode in which the election shall be conducted, and the votes cast for governor shall be canvassed and the result of the election ascertained. The duty of prescribing the mode of conducting the election and of canvassing the votes was, therefore, devolved upon the legislature. They have accordingly made provision for both, and the question is whether the canvass or the election establishes the right of a person to an office. It seems clear that it cannot be the former, because by our Constitution and laws it is expressly provided that the election by the qualified voters shall determine the question. To hold that the canvass shall control would subvert the foundations upon which our Government rests. But it has been repeatedly contended in the course of this proceeding that, although the election by the electors determines the right to the office, yet the decision of the persons appointed to canvass the votes cast at the election settles finally and completely the question as to the persons elected, and that, therefore, no court can have jurisdiction to inquire into the matter. It will be seen that this view of the question, while it recognizes the principle that the election is the foundation of the right to the office, assumes that the canvassers have authority to decide the matter finally and conclusively. We do not deem it necessary to say anything on the present occasion upon the subject of the jurisdiction of this court, as that question has already been decided and the reasons for the decision given. Bearing it in mind, then, that under our constitution and laws it is the election to an office, and not the canvass of the votes, which determines the right to the office, we will proceed to inquire into the proceedings of the State canvassers, by which they determined that the respondent was duly elected.

The legality of the election, and the rights, powers, and duties of the officer do not depend upon the fact of the declaration of the board of election. That declaration is proper and is the usual practice; but withholding it or neglecting, causelessly or illegally, to make it, will not prevent the installation in and investment with the office. The authority, rights, and powers of such officers are derived from the election, and not from the returns, which are the usual prescribed evidences of it.—(People vs. Killduff, 15 Ill., 492.)

We have, therefore, no ground for our interference but the single one that the return-judges included in their enumeration returns purporting to be from three companies of volunteers, which were mere forgeries. We admit that, in the evidences before us, it appears clear to us all that those returns are forgeries, and that it was only by their inclusion in the enumeration that the defendants have obtained certificates of their election. We admit, therefore, that the evidence proves that these certificates of the election of the defendants are founded in manifest fraud, the forgery of some unknown person, but we do not find that the defendants had any hand in it, and we trust that they had not.

Can we on this account interfere and declare the certificates void? We think not. According to our laws the election has passed completely through all its forms, the result has been in due form declared and certified, and the defendants have received their certificates of election, and are entitled to seats as members of the common council. The title-papers of their offices are complete, and have the signatures of the proper officers of the law, and if they are vitiated by any fraud or mistake in the process that has produced them, this raises a case to be tried by the forms of "a contested election" before the tribunal appointed by law to try such questions, and not by the ordinary forms of legal or equitable process before the usual tribunals. It is part of the process of political organization, and not a question of private rights, and therefore the constitution does not require that the courts shall determine its validity.

The law has appointed a special tribunal to try just such a question, and we can have no right to step in between the case and that tribunal and alter the return of the election-judges and annul their certificates.—(Per Lowrie, C. J.; Hulseman vs. Rems, 41 Penn., 396.)

The title to an elective office is derived from the people through the ballot-box. Somebody must declare the will of the electors as thus expressed. Canvassers are provided for that purpose. The certificate of a board of canvassers is evidence of the person upon whom the office has been conferred. Upon all questions arising collaterally, or between a party holding the certificate and a stranger, it is conclusive evidence; but, in a proceeding to try the right to the office, it is only prima-facie evidence. In such a proceeding, now regarded as a civil action, it is competent for the court to go behind the adjudication of the canvassers. The whole question is thrown open and extrinsic evidence is allowed to show which was the true state of the votes. In such an action, where the right to the office is the very thing in issue, the court will allow nothing to stand in the way between it and the ballot-box. It will put in requisition all the means within its reach to ascertain the expressed will of the electors, and will conform its judgment to such ascertained will.—(Morgan vs. Quackenbush, 22 Barb., 72.)

In deciding the question as to which candidate has received the greater number of votes cast by the electors for a particular office, the court and jury will go behind the canvass to ascertain the intention of the voters, and, when ascertained, will give effect to that intention by giving to each candidate the votes the voters gave him.—(People vs. Ferguson, 8 Cow., 102; People vs. Cook, 8 N. Y., 67, 83; People vs. Pease, 27 N. Y., 45; People vs. Love, 63 Barb., 535; People vs. Wilson, 62 N. Y., 186; People vs. Vail, 20 Wend., 12.)

The false issue, whether a certificate has been issued, cannot be properly substituted for the true issue, who have been appointed electors by the State. That is the question, and it is only as they assist in the solution of that question that there is any power or authority in the certificates themselves. The fact to be determined is the appointment; the certificate is only the evidence, controvertible or incontrovertible, as may be provided by law. The point to be adjudged and declared is, who has received a majority of valid electoral votes, not who has received a majority of certified votes. A President is to be declared elected not by a preponderance of certificates, but by a preponderance of electoral votes. The end, therefore, to be arrived at by the signing, delivery, and forwarding of the certificates, is proof of the fact of the appointment of electors and who the electors are that have been so appointed. There is nothing in the nature of the lists of the governor which forbids inquiry into their verity. They are not revelations from above; they are papers made by men, fallible always, and sometimes dishonest as well as fallible; and, if honest, often deceived; made generally in secret and ex parte, without hearing both sides, without oral testimony, without cross-examination. Of such evidence it may be safely affirmed that it is never made final and conclusive without positive law to that express effect.

Now, it may be competent for the legislature of a State, under its own constitution, to determine how far one of its own records shall be conclusive between its own citizens. It may enact that the certificate of a judge of a court of record, of a sheriff, county commissioner, a board of tax-assessors, or a board of State canvassers shall or shall not be open to investigation. There is, however, no act of Congress on the subject of the present inquiry, and we are left to the Constitution itself, with such guide to its true interpretation as is furnished by just analogy and by history. A President is to be declared elected for thirty-eight States and forty-two millions of people; the declaration depends upon the voice, we will suppose, of a single State; that voice is uttered by her votes; to learn what those votes are, this tribunal is referred to a certificate, and told that it cannot go behind it. In such case, to assert that the remaining thirty-seven States are powerless to inquire into the getting up of this certificate, on the demand of those who offer to prove the fraud of the whole process, is to assert that we are the slaves of fraud and cannot take our necks from the yoke.

In the absence of express enactments to the contrary, any judge may inquire into any fact necessary to his judgment. The certificate is not the fact to be proved, but evidence of the fact, and one kind of evidence may be overcome by other and stronger evidence, unless some positive law declares that the weaker shall prevail over the stronger, the false over the true. There may be cases where, for the quieting of titles or the ending of controversies, a record or certificate is made unanswerable; that is, though it might be truthfully answered, the law will not allow it to be answered. Such cases are exceptional, and the burden of establishing them rests upon him who propounds them. Let him, therefore, who asserts that the certificate of a returning-board cannot be answered by any number of living witnesses to the contrary, show that positive law which makes it thus unanswerable. There is certainly nothing in the Constitution of the United States which makes it so, as there is no act of Congress to that effect.

We may formulate the question in this manner: Whom has the State appointed to vote in its behalf for President? The manner of appointment is the vote of the people, for the legislature has so directed. Who, then, are appointed by the people? To state the question is nearly equivalent to stating what evidence is admissible; for the question is not who received the certificate, but who received the votes; and any evidence showing what votes were cast and for whom is pertinent, and must therefore be admissible, unless excluded by positive law. The law by which this question is to be decided is not State, but Federal. If it were otherwise, the State officers might evade the Constitution altogether, for this ordains that the appointment shall be by the State, and in such manner as its legislature directs; but if the State certificate is conclusive of the fact, the State authorities may altogether refuse obedience to the Constitution and laws, and save themselves from the consequences by certifying that they have obeyed them. And they may in like manner defraud us of our rights, making resistance impossible, by certifying that they have not defrauded. Indeed, they might make shorter work of it, and omit the election altogether, writing the certificate in its stead.

The nature of the question to be determined, the absence of any positive law to shut out pertinent evidence, the impolicy of such an exclusion, its injustice, and the impossibility of maintaining it, if by any fatality it were for a time established—all these considerations go to make and fortify the position that whatever body has authority to decide how a State has voted has authority to draw information from all sources of knowledge.

It has been asserted that the certificates of the executive partake of the nature of records, and it is sought to be argued therefore that they are conclusive evidence of the facts contained in them. We proceed, therefore, to consider the question :

VI. IS THE CERTIFICATE OF THE EXECUTIVE A RECORD INCAPABLE OF CONTRADICTION ?

Records, in the original sense of the word, in which only it is true that they are "authentic beyond all manner of contradiction," include only "the memorials of the legislature and of the king's courts of justice."—Gilbert on Evidence, 7; Plowd., 491; Co.-Litt., 260a; 4 Coke, 71a; Finch Law, 230.

These are said to be "monumenta veritatis et vetustatis vestigia," as also the "treasure of the king."—Coke-Litt., 118a; 293b; 11 Edw. IV, 1, cited in Best on Evidence, 5 ed., § 128.

Outside of these two kinds of documents there are others inappropriately called records, but which derive no vigor or efficacy from their own nature, but only from some potentiality impressed upon or imputed to them by positive statutory enactment. There is nothing in the mere fact of a public instrument being engrossed in a book of records, or being uttered by a public official, even of the highest rank in political office, or in its being stamped or verified by the great seal of a sovereign State, which gives the instrument the attributes of a record as that word is used in the ancient books.

The proclamation of the President of the United States as to the conclusion of a treaty only derives its power from the Constitution and laws of the United States, and not because it is an official document called a record. So, too, with the other proclamations the President is authorized to issue. Rev. Stat., §§ 4067, 4079, 4228, 4230, 5300, 5301, 5317.

The copies of records, books, or papers in the Executive Departments are only evidence equally with the originals. And the instances in which such originals are evidence—plenary, sufficient, prima facie—are rare; and, when having such effect, only derive it from the force of positive enactment, and not from any virtue by reason of being official acts or being recorded in a public office. See Rev. Stat., §§ 862-896, inclusive; Church vs. Hubbard, 2 Cranch, 178; The Amiable Isabella, 6 Wheat., 1; United States vs. The Amistad, 15 Peters, 595.

Neither does the affixing of the great seal of the State impart to the certificate of the executive such absolute verity that the truth of its statements cannot be inquired into.

The authority of the executive of the State to certify the list of names of the persons appointed as electors rests upon the act of Congress of 1792. The form of the certificate is not prescribed, nor does the act require that it should be under seal; and the fact that the election of Senators must be certified by the executive of the State under the seal of the State, and the certificate countersigned by the secretary of state, (U. S. Stat. at L., p. 3,) is presumptive evidence that the certificate to the list of electors would be sufficient without having affixed to it the seal of State. In other words, that the seal is not necessary to give to the certificate of electors the force and effect intended to be conferred upon that paper. This being so, the fixing of the seal of State is a mere harmless superfluity, or, at furthest, is merely evidence of authenticity of the signature to the certificate. In the language of the Chief-Justice, in Marbury vs. Madison, 1 Cranch, 158: "It attests, by an act supposed to be of public notoriety, the verity of the (presidential) signature."

A modern writer has defined a record to be "a written instrument made by a public officer authorized by law to perform that function, and intended to serve as evidence of something written, said, or done." 2 Bouvier's Law Dic., 41, 429, citing 18 Vin. Ab., 170; 1 Kent., 260; Gresley on Evidence, 99; Coke-Litt., 260a; 6 Call, 78; 1 Dana, 595.

But this definition does not imply that the evidence of such records is conclusive. They are intended to serve as evidence, but not as the exclusive evidence, unless made so by positive enactment.

There is nothing in the nature of the certificate itself, nor in the object which it is to accomplish, which brings it within the category of records "authentic beyond contradiction."

It is a mere ministerial, not a legislative or judicial, act, issued without the exercise of discretion, founded not upon testimony of witnesses, and given without opportunity to parties interested to be heard as to its truth or falsity.

Its object is to furnish evidence, and this can be accomplished without giving to it that conclusive character which some records are supposed to possess.

VII. EVEN IF THE CERTIFICATE PARTOOK OF THE CHARACTER OF A LEGISLATIVE ACT OR OF A JUDICIAL RECORD, ITS VERITY COULD BE INQUIRED INTO.

1. As to legislative acts:

The question how far acts of legislatures may be inquired into has been mooted in the courts of the several States, and the power of the courts asserted to go behind statutes and explore their enactment at every stage. Clare vs. State of Iowa, 5 Iowa Reports; Pond vs. Maddox, 38 California Reports; Fowler vs. Pierce, 2 California, 165; Jones vs. Hutchinson, 43 Alabama Reports, 721; People vs. Mahoney, 13 Michigan Reports; Illinois Central Railroad vs. Wren, 43 Illinois Reports; Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, pp. 135, 177; State vs. McBride, 4 Mississippi Reports, 302; Furgusson vs. Miners' Bank, Sneed, Tennessee, 609; People vs. Campbell, 3 Gilman, Illinois, 466; Spangler vs. Jacoby, 14 Illinois, 297; Hurley vs. Logan, 17 Illinois, 151; Prescott vs. Board of Trustees, 19 Illinois, 324; Supervisors vs. People, 25 Illinois, 181; Skinner vs. Demming, 2 Indiana, 560; Board of Supervisors vs. Heenan, 2 Minnesota, 330; De Bow vs. The People, 1 Denio, 9; Bank vs. Sparrow, 2 Denio, 97; People vs. Purdy, 2 Hill, 31; same case, 4 Hill, 484; 35 New Hampshire, 579; Southwark Bank vs. Commonwealth, 26 Pa. State, 446; Miller vs. The State, 3 Ohio, 475; Fordyce vs. Gadman, 20 Ohio State, 1.

The enrolled act duly authenticated as the Constitution prescribes, and approved and signed by the governor, is not conclusive evidence of the terms of the bill as it passed the houses of the general assembly, but the journals of the houses or other appropriate evidence may be received to show what these terms were; and whenever it appears that the enrolled act differs from the bill as it passed, in a substantial manner, the judiciary department of the State may declare the whole act, or the part affected by the change, unconstitutional and void. (State vs. Platt, So. Ca. Rep., 2 Rich, N. S., 150.)

See Jones vs. Jones, 2 Jones, (Penn.), 350; Crouse vs. Crouse, 54 Penn. State, 255.

While the motives of the legislature may not be inquired into, nor fraud in the passage of the act proved, yet the fact whether the act was passed at all or in consonance with due formality may be considered, as well as whether the engrossed or enrolled copy contains all of the act or more than the act actually passed. (Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87.)

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Gardner vs. The Collector, 6 Wallace, 499, (Miller, J.,) say :

We are of opinion therefore, on principle as well as authority, that whenever a question arises in a court of law of the existence of a statute, or of the time when a statute took effect, or of the precise terms of a statute, the judges who are called upon to decide it have a right to resort to any source of information which in its nature is capable of conveying to the judicial mind a clear and satisfactory answer to such questions, always seeking first for that which in its nature is most appropriate, unless the positive law has enacted a different rule.

2. As to judicial proceedings. Noonan vs. Bradley, 12 Wall., 121; Jackson vs. Ludeling, 21 Wall., 631; Ex parte White vs. Tommey, 4 Ho. of Lords Cases, 313; U. S. vs. Gomez, 23 How., 326; U. S. vs. Hughes, 11 How., 566; Maxfield vs. Levy, 4 Dallas, 336; 2 Smith Lead. Cases, 634-636.

There are other matters of record which may be inquired into, viz :

1. Letters-patent.

Scire facias lies to repeal letters-patent where the grant is made upon a false suggestion. (4 Coke Inst., 88.)

2. Grants of land by the United States.

The great difficulty in this case consists in the admission of any testimony whatever which calls in question the validity of a warrant issued by the officer to whom that duty is assigned by law. In examining this question, the distinction between an act which is judicial and one which is merely ministerial must be regarded. The register of the land-office is not at liberty to examine testimony and exercise his own judgment respecting the right of an applicant for a military land-warrant. (Miller vs. Kerr, 9 Wheat., 1.)

In Brush vs. Ware, 15 Peters, 104, the court hold that the acts of the officer being ministerial, and not judicial, the presumption in favor of his acts, if apparently fair and legal, might be impeached by evidence.

The general doctrine is that when the law has confided to a special tribunal the authority to hear and determine certain matters arising in the course of its duties, the decision of that tribunal, within the scope of its authority, is conclusive upon all others. That the action of the Land-Office in issuing a patent for any of the public land, subject to sale by pre-emption or otherwise, is conclusive of the legal title, must be admitted under the principle above stated; and in all courts, and in all forms of judicial proceedings, where this title must control, either by reason of the limited powers of the court or of the essential character of the proceeding, no inquiry can be permitted into the circumstances under which it was obtained. On the other hand, there has always existed in the courts of equity the power in certain classes of cases to inquire into and correct mistakes, injustice, and wrong in both judicial and executive action, however solemn the form which the result of that action may assume, when it invades private rights; and by virtue of this power the final judgments of courts of law have been annulled or modified, and patents and other important instruments issuing from the Crown, or other executive branch of the government, have been corrected or declared void, or other relief granted. No reason is perceived why the action of the Land-Office should constitute an exception to the principle. In dealing with the public domain under the system of laws enacted by Congress for their management and sale, that tribunal decides upon private rights of great value, and very often, from the nature of its functions, by a proceeding essentially ex parte and peculiarly liable to the influence of frauds, false swearing, and mistakes. (Johnson vs. Towsley, 13 Wall., 83.)

3. The case of the United States vs. The Amistad, 15 Peters, 518, is instructive on this point. The court say:

It is argued that the ship and cargo and negroes were duly documented as belonging to Spanish subjects, and this court has no right to look behind these documents; that full faith and credit is to be given to them, and that they are to be held conclusive evidence in this cause, even although it should be established by the most satisfactory proofs that they have been obtained by the grossest frauds and impositions upon the constituted authorities of Spain. To this argument we can in no wise assent. There is nothing in the treaty which justifies or sustains the argument. We do not here meddle with the point whether there has been any connivance in this illegal traffic on the part of any of the colonial authorities or subordinate officers of Cuba; because, in our view, such an examination is unnecessary, and ought not to be pursued, unless it were indispensable to public justice, although it has been strongly pressed at the bar. What we proceed upon is this: that although public documents of the Government accompanying property found on board of the private ships of a foreign nation certainly are to be deemed prima-facie evidence of the facts which they propose to state, yet they are always open to be impugned for fraud; and whether that fraud be in the original obtaining of these documents or in the subsequent fraudulent and illegal use of them, when once it is satisfactorily established, it overthrows all their sanctity and destroys them as proof. Fraud will vitiate any, even the most solemn, transaction; and an asserted title to property founded upon it is utterly void. The very language of the ninth article of the treaty of 1795 requires the proprietor to make due and sufficient proof of his property.

And how can that proof be deemed either due or sufficient which is but a connected and stained tissue of fraud? This is not a mere rule of municipal jurisprudence. Nothing is more clear in the law of nations as an established rule to regulate their rights and duties and intercourse than the doctrine that the ship's papers are but prima-facie evidence, and that, if they are shown to be fraudulent, they are not to be held proof of any valid title. This rule is familiarly applied, and, indeed, is of everyday occurrence in cases of prize, in the contests between belligerents and neutrals, as is apparent from numerous cases to be found in the reports of this court; and it is just as applicable to the transactions of civil intercourse between nations in times of peace. If a private ship, clothed with Spanish papers, should enter the ports of the United States claiming the privileges and immunities and rights belonging to bona-fide subjects of Spain, under our treaties or laws, and she should in reality belong to the subjects of another nation, which was not entitled to any such privileges, immunities, or rights, and the proprietors were seeking by fraud to cover their own illegal acts under the flag of Spain, there can be no doubt that it would be the duty of our courts to strip off the disguise and to look at the case according to its naked realities. In the solemn treaties between nations it can never be presumed that either state intends to provide the means of perpetrating or protecting frauds, but all the provisions are to be construed as intended to be applied to bona-fide transactions.

VIII. BUT OVER AND ABOVE ALL OTHER CONSIDERATIONS REMAINS THE RULE THAT FRAUD VITIATES EVERY ACT.

The general maxims of the law: "Dolus et fraus nemini patrocinentur," "Jus et fraus nunquam cohabitant," "Qui fraudem fit frustra agit," apply to the decisions of tribunals.

Lord Chief-Justice de Grey, in delivering the answers of the judges of the House of Lords in the Duchess of Kingston's case, speaking of a certain sentence of a spiritual court, says:

If it was a direct and decisive sentence upon the point, and as it stands, to be admitted as conclusive evidence upon the court and not to be impeached from within, yet, like other acts of the highest judicial authority, it is impeachable from without; although it is not permitted to show that the court was mistaken, it may be shown that they were mised.

Fraud is an extrinsic collateral act which vitiates the most solemn proceedings of courts of justice.

In such cases, as has been well expressed, the whole proceeding was "fabula non judicium."

The principle applies to every species of judgments; to judgments of courts of exclusive jurisdiction; to judgments in rem; to judgments of foreign tribunals, and even to judgments of the House of Lords.

On an indictment for perjury, the record of the proceedings at the trial, with the finding of the jury and the judgment of the court thereon, in accordance with the evidence given by the accused, is no defense.

It is perhaps needless to add that a supposed judicial record offered in evidence may be shown to be a forgery. (Best on Evidence, § 595, citing 14 Hen. VIII, 8 a; 39 Hen. VI, 50, p. 15; 1 Keb., 546; 10 Co., 45 a; 2 Rol., 17; 3 Cō., 78 a; the Duchess of Kingston case, 11 St. Trials, 262; Brownsword vs. Edwards, 2 Vez., 246; Earl of Bandon vs. Becher, 3 Cl. & F., 479; Harrison vs. Mayor of Southampton, IV De G. & M. & G., 148; Meddows Craft vs. Hugenin, 3 Curties, 403; In re Place, 8 Exch., 704; Bank of Australasia vs. Nias, 16 Q. B., 717; Sheddon vs. Patrick, 1 Macq. Ho. Lo. cases, 535; Hobart, 201; Titus Oates case, 10 How. St. Trials, 1136; Noell vs. Wells, 1 Sid., 359.)

In Ex parte White vs. Tommey, 4 Ho. of Lords Cases, 313, it is held that though the House of Lords cannot reverse their own judgment, they will find a way to protect themselves and parties from fraud, and they annulled their order granting the petition for leave to appeal.

IX. IS THIS TRIBUNAL A CANVASSING BOARD?

For the purpose of the argument, it must be conceded that a wrong exists. It is averred that the highest crimes possible under our Government have been committed, namely: The fraudulent setting aside of the will of the people constitutionally expressed, and the usurpation of the right to choose the chief magistrate of the nation.

It is a maxim recognized in the jurisprudence of every civilized community that there is no wrong without an adequate remedy.

What remedy exists for this alleged wrong?

Will quo warranto lie at the relation of a claimant of the presidential office against the actual incumbent?

Certainly not in any State court; no State court could enforce its judgments by ouster, even if it should entertain jurisdiction. It is not useful to inquire whether State courts might not consider the question in a collateral matter.

It is at least doubtful if the Federal courts are not equally powerless. There is no common-law jurisdiction in the Federal courts. Whatever jurisdiction the Federal courts possess to issue writs of quo warranto is to be found in express statutory enactment.

The only provisions in the Revised Statutes (pp. 95, 111, 318) would seem to exclude the exercise of this jurisdiction in the case now under consideration.

The doctrine that canvassing-boards "act, for the most part, ministerially only, and are not vested with judicial powers to correct errors and mistakes that may have occurred with any officer who preceded them in the performance of any duty connected with the election, or to pass upon any disputed fact which may affect the result," is founded on the reason that adequate remedy exists for the redress of a wrong, false or fraudulent return, in the courts or other tribunals erected for the trial of contested elections, or in the right of legislative bodies to judge of the election and qualifications of their own members.

Justice Christianity, in People vs. Cicotte, 16 Mich., 313, expresses his views as follows:

I cannot go to the extent of holding that no inquiry is admissible in any case into the qualification of voters, or the nature of the votes given. Such a rule, I admit, would be easy of application, and, as a general rule, might not be productive of a great amount of injustice, while the multitude of distinct questions of fact in reference to the great number of voters whose qualifications may be contested is liable to lead to some embarrassment, and sometimes to protracted trials, without a more satisfactory result than would have been attained under a rule which should exclude all such inquiries. Still, I cannot avoid the conclusion that in theory and spirit our constitution and our statutes recognize as valid those votes only which are given by electors who possess the constitutional qualifications; that they recognize as valid such elections only as are effected by the votes of a majority of such qualified electors; and though the election-boards of inspectors and canvassers, acting only ministerially, are bound in their decisions by the number of votes deposited in accordance with the forms of law regulating their action, it is quite evident that illegal votes may have been admitted by the perjury or other fault of the voters, and that the majority to which the inspectors have been constrained to certify, and the canvassers to allow, has been thus wrongfully and illegally secured; and I have not been able to satisfy myself that in such a case these boards, acting thus ministerially, and often compelled to admit votes which they know to be illegal, were intended to constitute tribunals of last resort for the determination of the rights of parties claiming an election. If this were so, and there were no legal redress, I think there would be much reason to apprehend that elections would degenerate into mere contests of fraud.

The person having the greatest number of the votes of legally qualified electors it seems to me has a constitutional right to the office, and if no inquiry can be had into the qualification of any voter, here is a constitutional right depending upon a mode of trial unknown to the Constitution; and, as I am strongly inclined to think, opposed to its provisions. I doubt the competency of the legislature, should they attempt it, which I think they have not, to make the decision of the inspectors or canvassers final under our constitution.

If it be correct to say that no remedy exists for trial of the title to the Presidential office, then it follows that this tribunal must have other powers than those of a mere returning or canvassing-board, for where the reason fails the law ceases.

But it is not necessary even to concede that writ of quo warranto will not lie to test the right to the Presidential office. The object of the writ is to try the question of fact. This, we submit, is one of the purposes of this tribunal. It cannot be that the people of this country are to be kept in a state of suspense while the tedious process of a trial under quo warranto is to be followed. This tribunal can reach a decision more speedily and with equal efficacy, and by the same methods as a court trying the issues raised on the proceeding by quo warranto.

BRIEF No. 2.

SUBMITTED BY COUNSEL FOR OBJECTORS TO CERTIFICATE No. 1 IN THE CASE OF THE STATE OF FLORIDA.

1. The Constitution of the United States does not prescribe the evidence of the appointment of electors. It does not require certified lists or certificates from the governor that persons claiming to have been appointed as electors have in fact been so appointed. It does not require any particular proof of form. It is wholly silent in respect to the evidence by which such an appointment is to be authenticated.

2. In delegating to the "State" the appointment of electors, and to the legislature of that State the authority to "direct," the "manner" in which such appointment shall be made, the Constitution seems to contemplate that the proof of the appointment should in the first instance at least be furnished by the State, and its nature and form prescribed by the legislature of the State. "Each State"—it declares—"shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct," the electors. It is natural that the power authorized to do an act and to determine the manner in which that act is to be done, should also provide for verifying its own act and showing that it was done in the proper manner. The legislative power of the State, in directing the manner in which the act is to be done, might properly direct also the mode of proving that such manner had been followed.

The primary and best authority as to what the State has done is the State itself. Its own declarations through its legislative and judicial organs are the most weighty testimony which can be offered.

3. The statute of 1792 provided that "It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required, by the preceding section, to meet;" and one of these lists was directed to be annexed by the electors to each certificate of their votes.

This provision, so far as the State executive is concerned, is little more than a request to the governor to make such lists; for there is no mode of compelling him to perform the duty. (See Note D, post, p. 30.) Its real effect is to provide by act of Congress convenient evidence of the appointment of the electors to be considered by the two Houses of Congress when they come to count the votes. The act nowhere goes beyond that. It does not make this evidence indispensable. It does not make this evidence conclusive. It does not make this evidence exclusive. It does not shut out other evidence. It does not limit the discretion or fetter the judgment of the authority having the power to count the votes and to decide between several sets of papers purporting to be votes, as to which are in truth genuine and valid votes.

Suppose the governor's certified lists should happen to have been unobtainable at the time the electors voted. Suppose that accident, disability or death intervened, or that the governor's conscientious judgment on the case, or his willful refusal to perform his duty, deprived the electors of this evidence—are their votes to be destroyed?

Or suppose that by mistake or fraud the governor should give the certified lists in favor of persons who were not appointed electors and should withhold them from the true electors—is there no remedy? Must the State lose its vote? Must the State submit to have its vote cast against its real will, as if by a false personation made before its eyes, in the open day, but which it has no power to resist?

The answer is that the authority commissioned to count the votes, and, in doing so, to determine what are authentic and valid votes entitled to be counted, will receive other evidence besides the governor's certified lists, which evidence may prevail over that certificate; and will receive evidence impeaching the truth of that certificate for mistake or fraud. The tribunal might act on the petition of the persons claiming to have been duly appointed electors, and wrongfully interfered with in the exercise of their functions; for it is not limited as to the sources of the evidence it will accept. But especially will it receive evidence from the State itself.

EVIDENCE OF THE APPOINTMENT OF THE TILDEN ELECTORS.

The evidence that Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock, or the Tilden electors, as we shall for convenience call them, were duly appointed by the State of Florida, in the manner the legislature of that State had directed, is complete and conclusive.

GOVERNOR'S CERTIFIED LISTS.

The only defect which can be alleged in the evidence in their favor is that the governor's certified lists specified by the act of 1792 were not furnished "on or before the day on which" they were required to meet for the purpose of casting and certifying their votes, and therefore were not at that time annexed to their statements of their votes; but that the governor's certified lists were furnished and annexed after that day.

GOVERNOR'S CERTIFIED LISTS NOT ESSENTIAL.

It has already been shown that the permanent absence of the governor's certified lists is not fatal to the validity of the vote of the electors; that this piece of evidence is not made indispensable or conclusive or exclusive, or invested with any particular force or effect, by the statute which provides it. The terms of the statute are remarkable. They do not even say that the certified lists shall be required by anybody or as a condition of anything to be done, but are a mere imposition of a "duty" upon the State executive to furnish the lists, with only the moral force of a recommendation. Language could not be chosen fitter to make the injunction fall within the class called in legal parlance directory, as contradistinguished from mandatory, the neglect of which works no invalidity in the act done, but only an omission of duty on the part of the officer who ought to have complied with the direction. And in this instance the injunction is not addressed to the electors who cast the votes or to the tribunal which counts the votes, but only to a third party to do an act for the convenience of the electors and the counting tribunal. There can be no doubt, then, that the permanent absence of the governor's certified lists would work no invalidity of the votes of the electors.

STATUTORY SPECIFICATION OF TIME FOR DELIVERY OF CERTIFIED LISTS DIRECTORY.

Still less can delay in receiving the governor's certified lists, which the electors have no legal power to obtain, but are wholly dependent on the voluntary action of the governor, or a consequent delay in annexing such lists to the electors' statement of their votes, until the day fixed for the meeting of the electors had elapsed, work an invalidity of the votes, or indeed produce any legal consequences whatever.

The reason the governor is directed to furnish his lists on or before the day the electors meet was doubtless in order that the electors might not be hindered in annexing the lists to their statements of the votes if they chose to do so on the first day of their meeting.

The first Wednesday in December is fixed by the statute for the meeting of the electors. The delivery of the statement by the electors of their votes, by messenger, to the President of the Senate, at the seat of Government, is to be made at any time before the first Wednesday in January. Thirty days are thus allowed for transmission and delivery. No doubt it would be a perfect compliance with this provision if the electors' statement of their votes were made out, and the lists of the governor obtained and annexed at any time, so that the delivery should be made within the thirty days. It is true that the statement of the votes to be forwarded by mail and the statement to be deposited with the district judge are required to be sent forthwith; but the one transmitted by the messenger would be good if the others were never received, or never sent. How little the statute regards the times specified in it as of the essence of the transaction is illustrated by the provision directing that whenever neither the statement sent by messenger nor that sent by mail shall have been received at the seat of Government on the first Wednesday in January, the secretary of state shall send a messenger to the district judge, and that he shall forthwith transmit the copy deposited with him to the seat of Government.

No time is fixed by any of the statutes for the arrival at the seat of Government of the statement deposited with the district judge. No doubt if it were received at any time before it was to be used in the counting of the votes, that would be sufficient. The vote could not be objected to because it had not arrived earlier.

Taking all the statutory provisions together, they exhibit careful precautions that the votes shall be received before the count. The Tuesday after the first Monday in November—falling this year on the 7th of November—is fixed for the appointment of electors. The first Wednesday in December—falling this year on the 6th of December—is fixed for the meeting of the electors. They are required to make out three statements of the votes and to transmit one by messenger and one by mail, and to deposit the third with the district judge of the United States for the district in which the electors shall have assembled. The first Wednesday in January—falling this year on the third day of January—is fixed for the arrival of the transmitted statements at the seat of Government, which are to be received by the President of the Senate, or, in his absence, by the Secretary of State as temporary custodian. If the two transmitted statements fail of arriving before the first Wednesday in January, the Secretary of State is directed to take measures to supply the default by means of the statement deposited with the district judge; but no time is fixed for the arrival of that statement, because no subsequent act is dependent on it, and no provision is made to supply the failure of that expedient. And the second Wednesday in February—falling this year on the 14th of February—is fixed for the counting of the votes. The times fixed would be this year as follows:

Appointment of electors, November 7.

Meeting of electors, December 6.

Arrival of transmitted statement of votes, January 3.

Counting of the votes, February 14.

The specifications of the times at which or before which acts shall be done to furnish evidence to the counting tribunal as to who have been appointed electors and for whom those electors have voted, are merely directory. The times are fixed so that each act shall be done in season to enable the next step to be promptly taken, and in season to enable any failures to be remedied. These limitations of time are precautionary and remedial. They are intended to save and give effect to the votes. They are not snares to betray and destroy the votes.

The act of the governor in furnishing certified lists containing the names of the electors; the act of the electors in annexing these certified lists to the statements of their votes; their acts in making out and signing the statements of their votes; in transmitting one set by messenger and another by mail, and in depositing the third set with the judge; the act of the Secretary of State in notifying the district judge, and the act of the district judge in transmitting the set deposited with him, are each and all acts of this nature, intended to furnish evidence of the appointment and votes of the electors. The times when these acts should be done are expressly specified, except in the case of the Secretary of State. But if these acts should not have been done within the times specified, but should be done afterward in season for their object, these acts would not be void, but would be valid and effectual. Take an illustration.

The district judge, who, in the event that the other sets of statements have failed to arrive by the 1st of January, is to transmit the set deposited with him, is required to do so "forthwith."

If he have prompt notice, some six weeks would intervene before the packages could be opened for the counting. If he should happen to transmit them on the last of the six weeks instead of the first, will anybody suggest that his act would be void and the votes should not be counted?

The Constitution commands the electors to seal up their statements of their votes, and orders that the seals shall be broken only in presence of the two Houses when the votes are to be counted. To have them in the possession of the President of the Senate, ready to be opened at that time, is the object; and all the provisions fixing the times when the acts of preparation and transmission shall be successively done are intended to insure that object. They are designed for that purpose and for nothing else. There is no possible utility in having these papers in the hands of their depositaries before they can be opened and used, except to make it certain that they will be there when they are needed for use on the count.

CERTIFIED LISTS FURNISHED AFTERWARD EFFECTUAL.

Such acts of public officers, if not done within the time prescribed by law, do not thereby become incapable of being done afterward. They not only remain capable of being done, but the duty of the public officers to do them subsists in full vigor and obligation, and the right to compel their performance by the public officers accrues for the very reason that the time limited by law has passed. Mandamus, resorted to in innumerable instances to coerce by the mandate of judicial courts the performance by public officers of acts enjoined on them by law, begins by alleging that the time fixed by law for the doing of the acts has elapsed. It is on that very ground that the judicial power is invoked. Such is the general doctrine of our jurisprudence and the settled construction of the effect of statutes fixing the time within which official acts shall be done, adopted by courts and governments.

(See authorities cited, post p. 750, and note A, post p. 756.)

But in the present instance the same result is also established by an enabling and remedial statute enacted by a legislative power having competent jurisdiction over the subject.

CURATIVE STATUTE.

That statute of the State of Florida authorizes and directs the governor of that State to make and certify in due form and under the great seal of the State three lists of electors named in the act, and to transmit the same to the President of the Senate of the United States, and also to make and certify three other like lists and to deliver them to the said electors, who are required to meet and make out new statements of their votes cast on the 6th of December, 1876, and to annex thereto the said certified lists of the governor and the same to transmit and forward to the President of the Senate and to deliver to the district judge in the manner provided by law. And the statute further enacts that the said certified lists of the governor and statements of the votes of the electors "shall be as valid and effectual to authenticate in behalf of this State the appointment of such electors by this State as if they had been made and delivered on or before the 6th day of December, 1876, and had been transmitted immediately thereafter."

Of the competency of the legislative power of the State of Florida to pass a curative statute of this nature, and of the complete efficacy of that statute to remedy such an informality, there can be no doubt. It is simply allowing and requiring a piece of evidence to be supplied after the time within which the law required the public officers to furnish it, but before it is needed for the use intended. It is allowing an act to be done nunc pro tunc in furtherance of right and justice, as courts sometimes do, curing a defect of form which the law-making power has a large jurisdiction to do, and frequently and habitually does.

Not only is such a statute clearly within the power of the government of Florida, under the general authority in respect to appointing electors for the said State conferred by the Constitution of the United States, but it is in perfect harmony with the policy indicated by the Federal Government and the rights on the part of the States over this subject, which are recognized in or granted by the legislation of the Federal Government.

In addition to the precautions against, and remedies for, neglects and omissions provided by the acts of 1792 and 1804, which have been already mentioned, the statute of 1845 affords an illustration of the same policy and purpose. That act was intended to execute the power conferred on Congress by the Constitution to "determine the time of choosing the electors" by fixing a uniform day in all the States. But the first proviso, now re-enacted as section 134 of the Revised Statutes, provided for supplying vacancies happening otherwise than by non-election "which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote."

And the second proviso, substantially re-enacted as section 135 of the Revised Statutes, provided for supplying vacancies happening from non-election, as follows:

Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the legislature of such State may direct.

If a State, by its legislature, may, by itself appointing, or by providing for the appointment of electors, remedy a total failure of election at the time and in the manner prescribed by act of Congress in pursuance of an express authority of the Constitution and may do so after that failure has actually happened, much more may it remedy a delay or omission of a specific piece of evidence of the appointment of electors, not in itself regarded by law as of much significance or value, and not made necessary or conclusive or exclusive, or even expressly, but only by implication, made evidence at all.

THE ILLEGAL PRIOR LISTS.

If the lists made and certified by Governor Drew under this statute would be valid and effectual in the absence of any competing documents, the existence of the prior certified lists can make no difference. Such prior lists are impeached by a statute enacted by the law-making power of the State of Florida testifying to the counting tribunal and declaring that such prior competing lists are illegal and consequently void.

That statute adduces the most absolute proof that such prior lists are false in fact; that the persons whose names are contained in them were not chosen electors according to the laws of Florida; that such persons did not receive the highest number of votes for the electoral offices at the election held on the 7th of November, 1876; that the pretended canvass of the board of State canvassers by which such persons were declared by such board to have been elected has been adjudged by the highest court of the State, after full argument and by a unanimous judgment, to be unlawful and to be in truth no canvass; that, under an enabling statute, a canvass has been conducted in the manner approved and according to the rules prescribed by the supreme court, which showed that such persons had not, but that other persons actually had, the highest number of votes for the said electoral offices at the said election.

Acting on these facts, the legislature of Florida has by statute declared, authenticated, enacted, confirmed, ratified, and renewed the appointment as electors of the said other persons who did receive the highest number of votes at such election, and who are shown by the aforesaid lawful and valid canvass to have been duly chosen. In the mean time, in an action of quo warranto duly brought in a court of competent jurisdiction, the said persons named in such prior and illegal certified lists, and called for convenience the Hayes electors, appeared and defended; judgment was rendered ousting the said Hayes electors and affirming the title of the four other persons, who may for convenience be designated Tilden electors.

The competing certified lists of the Hayes electors are thus effectually impeached and shown to be null and void.

The Supreme Court of the United States, speaking by Mr. Justice Story, in the Amistad case, 15 Pet., 594, said :

What we proceed upon is this, that although public documents of the government, accompanying property found on board of the private ships of a foreign nation, certainly are to be deemed prima facie evidence of the facts which they purport to state, yet they are always open to be impugned for fraud; and whether that fraud be in the original obtaining of these documents, or in the subsequent fraudulent and illegal use of them, when once it is satisfactorily established, it overthrows all their sanctity, and destroys them as proof. Fraud will vitiate any, even the most solemn transaction; and an asserted title to property founded upon it is utterly void.

The extent to which the courts go in the remedy of default in doing official acts within the time limited by law is illustrated by the following cases: Queen vs. St. Pancras, 11 Adolphus and Ellis, 15; (S. C. 39 Eng. Com. Law R., p. 38.)

Facts.—A statute required that “on the day of the annual election,” fixed by the act, inspectors should be nominated by the church-wardens and the meeting, and that after such nomination the parishioners should elect vestrymen, &c.

At a meeting held May 6, which was the statute day, the church-wardens, acting as chairmen, prevented a fair choice of inspectors. A mandamus being moved for on June 6, to compel them to hold a new election, and cause shown on November 4, it was objected that the proceeding was too late.

Held, on November 21st, that the mandamus ought to issue.

Opinion of the court :

The difficulty, or impossibility, rather, of complying now with the act of Parliament, on account of the lapse of time, was not very strongly pressed.

For, though the election is fixed to take place in May, yet the well-known practice of this court is to set aside vicious proceedings held at the regular period, and direct others in their place afterward. It would be too great a triumph for injustice if we should enable it to postpone forever the performance of a plain duty only because it had done wrong at the right season. (pp. 24, 25.)

Mayor of Rochester vs. The Queen, 1 Ellis, Blackburn, & Ellis, 1024.

Facts.—Objections were taken to certain voters, which were unlawfully overruled. After the time limited for holding the tribunal had expired, and its presiding officer, the mayor, had been succeeded by the plaintiff in error, a mandamus was awarded, to which the new mayor returned that he was not the mayor who rejected the objections, but was willing to obey the writ if he could lawfully hold the court. On demurrer to this return, the Queen’s Bench sustained the demurrer and issued a peremptory mandamus.

Held: No error.

Opinion of the court, (Martin, B.):

We are of opinion that the Court of Queen’s Bench was right, and ought to be affirmed. It seems to us that Rex vs. Sparrow, 2 Strange, 1123, and Rex vs. Mayor of Norwich, 1 B. and Adolphus, 310, are authorities upon the point, and that the principle of those cases establishes the doctrine that the Court of Queen’s Bench ought to compel the performance of a public duty by public officers, although the time prescribed by statute for the performance of them has passed; and if the public officer to whom belongs the performance of that duty has in the mean time been succeeded by another, we think it is the duty of the successor to obey the writ and to do the acts (when required) which his predecessor has omitted to perform; and we think all statutes are to be read with reference to this known, acknowledged, recognized, and established power of the Court of Queen’s Bench to superintend and control inferior jurisdictions and authorities of every kind. So, reading this statute, we think it sustains the judgment of the Court of Queen’s Bench as much as if express words were found in it directing what that court has ordered. (pp. 1031–2.)

(Cited and followed, Queen vs. Monmouth, Law Reports, 5 Q. B., 251.)

Ex-parte Heath, 3 Hill R., 42.

Facts.—Ward inspectors of New York City were required by statute to certify the result of the ward election “on the day subsequent to the closing of the polls, or sooner.” A ward election was held on the 12th of April; the result was not certified until the 14th.

Held: The return was valid notwithstanding, and a mandamus should go commanding the mayor to administer the oath to the persons returned as elected.

Opinion of the court, (pp. 46, 47:)

The idea which we understood to be thrown out in argument, that the return from the sixth ward was void because not completed till the 14th of April instead of the 13th, is altogether inadmissible. Nothing is better settled, as a general rule, than that where a statute requires an act to be done by an officer within a certain time for a public purpose, the statute shall be taken to be merely directory; and though he neglect his duty by allowing the precise time to go by, if he afterward perform it, the public shall not suffer by the delay.

This case was affirmed in the court of errors by the unanimous vote of thirty-four members out of the thirty-five constituting the court, one alone being absent. (3 Hill, 53, note.)
(See Note A, post, p. 756.)

STATUTE OF AUTHENTICATION AND CONFIRMATION.

The statute "declaring and establishing the appointment of electors," if considered merely as a testimony of what the State of Florida has actually done in respect to the appointment of electors, is an evidence of a higher nature, of greater authority, and of more cogency than a certified list by the governor.

A statute enacted with the concurrence of the two houses of the legislature, and approved by the governor, is, in itself, a more important and weighty thing than a certificate made by the governor in a merely ministerial capacity, and at best but quasi official. It has attributes and incidents of a public law, and is in its nature, in the absence of any legal standard of appreciation, entitled to more consideration and credit.

The law-making power, except as limited by written constitutions, is the highest of governmental powers, it is the government itself; and, subject to such limitations, may modify the powers of the governor and direct him in their exercise.

And in respect to the appointment of electors by the State, the legislature of the State is vested by the Constitution of the United States with special and exceptional powers. It may direct the mode in which electors shall be appointed, provided they be in reality appointed by the State, through some of its proper organs. It may appoint those electors itself; and even after it has devolved that function on a popular vote may resume the power.

It creates all the machinery by which the appointment of electors by popular election is made, its powers in this respect being limited by the condition that the election shall be a reality and not a fiction; and it prescribes the whole system of authentication and proof of the persons who are chosen, except only the governor's lists. Curative powers to remedy a failure in the appointment of electors have been specially added to the general authority of the legislature or recognized as a part of that authority by the acts of Congress of 1792, 1804, and 1845. These remedial means have been applied to two classes of cases, the one of vacancies in the electoral colleges arising from every variety of cause subsequent to the original appointment, and the other vacancies occasioned by failure to elect. It is not doubted that the legislature might fill such vacancies by its own direct appointment.

The legislature representing the State stands in some sort as a principal to rectify the errors and wrongs of the subordinate agents by which the State might lose its votes, or, what is worse, be misrepresented in the votes given in its behalf. If, in its extensive and various acknowledged powers over the whole subject, no capacity could be found to prepare and submit fresh proofs of what the State has really done, to authenticate the acts of the State, to correct defects of form and give effect to the will of the State, it would be a solecism in governmental polity. Such remedies appeal to the tribunal which is to count the votes with great force, and are entitled to a benign construction.

This statute of Florida contains words of authentication, words of confirmation and ratification, and words of appointment.

If the Commission shall find, what it is not believed it will find, that there was a failure to make a choice of electors in Florida on the seventh day of last November, or an impossibility of ascertaining what that choice was, then these words of appointment in the new law of Florida must be taken as a new appointment under section 134 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which does not limit the time within which such appointment can be made, while authorizing it to be made "on a subsequent day." It would follow that the electors appointed could meet and vote, if they had not already done so, even though it were on a later day than the first Wednesday in December, the statute of 1845 thus making an exception to the statute of 1792. But that question is not involved. The power of new appointment is a larger power than that of perfecting and validating official acts which the legislature had the right to authorize, and did authorize, but which had been imperfectly performed.

CANVASS OF THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

The first canvass of the votes cast at the election of November 7, 1876, in the State of Florida, for presidential electors as well as for Representatives in Congress, governor and other State officers, became the subject of discussion before the Supreme Court in the mandamus case brought on the relation of Drew, a candidate for governor, against McLin and others forming the board of State canvassers. Although Drew alone was relator, and the claimants for the other offices were not parties, the questions involved and the principles declared applied equally to other State officers and to the presidential electors. The board of State canvassers, in obedience to the judgment of the court in this case, made a new canvass of the votes for governor. Mr. Drew was declared elected, and entered upon, and ever since has been and is now in his office without opposition. The new canvass was applied to the lieutenant-governor, though he was not a relator, and he was declared elected and was installed.

The votes for presidential electors were likewise canvassed anew by the same board of State canvassers. In making such canvass, the directions of the Supreme Court were obeyed by them in respect to the returns from all the counties which had been the subject of special correction in the opinion pronounced by the court; but they changed the effect of these corrections, and neutralized the judgment by setting aside their own former conclusions in respect to Baker County. In respect to it, they rejected the perfect returns which they had allowed and canvassed on the former occasion, and substituted as a basis of their revision the imperfect returns which they had before rejected.

In this condition of things the old board of State canvassers went out of office and the new board came in. The legislature deeming both the canvasses of the electoral vote, so made by the former board, illegal and therefore void, passed an act to provide for a new canvass, and requiring that the canvass should be conducted according to the rules prescribed by the Supreme Court. A canvass was made accordingly and recorded and reported to the legislature. It shows that the Tilden electors received the highest number of votes, and that they were duly chosen and appointed as such electors.

THE QUO WARRANTO.

I.—In Florida, as in most other States, the local inspectors of election form the first or primary returning-board. They make returns to a county board or officer, and this second returning-board makes a return to the final or State canvassing-board. Neither the first nor the second of these bodies has any power or duty but that which is most purely and simply ministerial. They can merely compute from the documents before them, and, in their respective returns, report the result.

The State board of canvassers in Florida has authority which may be said slightly to exceed this. They have power to judge of the "returns" on which they act, so far as to reject them if irregular, false, or fraudulent. They have no power beyond this. They cannot investigate the qualifications of voters, or as to the employment of any force, fraud, or improper influence that might justly defeat or vitiate the ballots cast. The powers and duties of all these officers are essentially ministerial.

Outside of, or beyond this, it is the judicial power alone that can investigate and determine any question of fact.

II.—In Florida, as in most if not all the States, if a deeper investigation be necessary to justice, the judicial power must be invoked through the ancient process commonly called quo warranto, or through such other essentially similar judicial process as may be created by statute or established by custom in the particular State. In Florida the quo warranto is used.

III.—It may safely be assumed that, in fact there was no fault in the voting process. Any attempt to color a pretense of this sort by affidavit or otherwise will utterly fail from its own internal weakness. It can hardly require the employment of any evidence to overthrow it. And really, the only questions in the Florida case must arise upon an inquiry: 1st, whether the documentary title to their alleged electoral offices set up by the persons who have cast their vote for Mr. Hayes is so strong in the mere technical forms entrenching it that it cannot be gainsaid; and 2d, if that asserted title be not thus impregnable through the absolute force of its formality, whether an adequate impeachment of it is presented by the opposing documents?

IV.—The material elements of the title set up by the Hayes electors and of the impeachment presented against it may easily be stated in a brief and intelligible form, and so as to be free from dispute about matters of detail.

1. The so-called Hayes electors were reported by the State canvassing-board as duly elected. Mr. Stearns, the governor of Florida, gave them the three lists prescribed by the act of Congress (Revised Statutes of U. S., § 136), and on December 6th, 1876, being the proper day appointed for that purpose (R. S. U. S., § 149), they cast the four votes of that State for Mr. Hayes, and in the prescribed form returned their certificates thereof to the President of the Senate. Their title to their asserted offices and their action as assumed electors, conducing to give Mr. Hayes four votes for the Presidency of the United States, would be in all respects perfect, but for the fact that the report of the State canvassing-board was unlawful and untrue. It was unlawful in this, that such canvassing-board, exercising high powers of a judicial nature not granted to them, rejected certain regular, formal, and true returns duly laid before them, and by this means alone were enabled to reach a result favorable to the so-called Hayes electors. If these returns had been included in the computation made by the State-canvassers, the so-called Hayes electors could not have been returned as chosen; and on the contrary four other persons, who may be called Tilden electors, would have been so returned. Independently of the strict technical questions, 1st, whether the mere documentary title of these so-called Hayes electors can lawfully be drawn in question, and 2d, whether such asserted title has been effectually impeached by stronger and controlling documentary evidence, the correctness of the preceding statement must be conceded.

2. On _____, 1876, and prior to the time when the so-called Hayes electors assumed to cast, and in form did cast, the electoral votes of Florida, proceedings in due form by quo warranto were instituted against them in the proper judicial court of that State; and such proceedings having been prosecuted against them with due diligence and all practicable speed; judgment of ouster was duly entered against them on _____, 1877.

3. The said four Tilden electors, acting without the triplicate lists prescribed by the act of Congress (R. S. of U. S., § 136), did on December 6, 1876, cast the four votes of Florida for Mr. Tilden as President; and, as well in that respect as in all others, acting in entire and perfect conformity with the Constitution of the United States, they certified the same votes to the President of the Senate.

They did everything toward the authentication of such votes required by the Constitution of the United States or by any act of Congress except the said section 136 of the Revised Statutes. And, in conformity with the aforesaid judgment of the Florida court, a governor of Florida, who had been duly inducted into office subsequently to December 6, 1876, did, on the ____ day of _____, 1877, give to the above-mentioned Tilden electors the triplicate lists prescribed by said act of Congress (R. S. of U. S., § 136), which they have forwarded as prescribed by the acts of Congress, as a supplement to their former certification in that behalf.

V.—No technical difficulties exist which can prevent the proper authorities of the Union from seeing the invalidity of the title set up by the Hayes electors.

1. It is a fundamental rule that all intruders into official positions may be ousted by regular judicial action at law in the nature of quo warranto.

2. Judgment against the defendants in a quo warranto determines conclusively that such defendants were without title, and were usurpers holding by unlawful intrusion, as far back, at least, as the commencement of the proceedings against them.

(Note B, post, p. 757.)

3. Acts performed by officers de facto, holding under color of a regular appointment, are held to be valid so far as may be necessary for the public good and to protect rights and interests acquired in good faith under the formal action of such officers; but this conservative principle, adopted from the necessity of the case, can have no application to the unlawful casting of electoral votes for Mr. Hayes now in question.

(a.) Balloting and certifying the votes are preliminary steps only in a process which has no perfection or efficacy until the certificates reach the proper authority at the seat of government, and are there opened and published in the presence of the two Houses.

Until this is done no act of the pretended electors is consummated or perfected. And if, before this act is done, the State of Florida, through its appropriate judicial power, ascertains and condemns the usurpation and ousts the usurpers, the conservative principle in question will not apply. It has never been held that partial and incomplete action during their usurpation by wrongful intruders into an office shall be carried onward to perfection after their ouster by quo warranto.

(b.) The judgment of the circuit court is not impaired or lessened in efficacy by the proceeding to review it in a higher court. At common law the judgment of a court of original jurisdiction takes full effect immediately upon its entry, and until reversed it is as effectual as if pronounced by a court of last resort.

(Note C, post, p. 758.)

VI.—Taking into view the action of the Tilden electors, a case of competition is presented, and their votes should be counted instead of those cast for Mr. Hayes.

1. The Constitution deals expressly with the subject of authenticating the votes. (Article XII.) And it declares expressly what powers of legislation Congress “may” exercise with respect to action within the respective States in the choosing of electors and the casting of electoral votes. (Article II, § 4.) Expressio unius exclusio est alterius is a maxim, and it is very doubtful, at best, whether any other compulsory power over the States in these matters can be exercised by Congress.

2. Section 136 of the Revised Statutes was a very suitable precautionary enactment, and it ought to be obeyed. But under the view last stated it is justly subject to many observations.

(a.) Its framers seem to have understood that it was only directory or as a recommendation, and operative only through the presumable respect of the State authorities for the wishes of Congress.

Certainly there was no power in the United States Government to compel a governor’s obedience. A mandamus could not be employed in the case by any judicial court.

(b.) The section does not declare that the lists referred to shall be conclusive evidence, or the only evidence, or the evidence, or any evidence as to the appointment of the electors; nor does it define, affirmatively, negatively, or in any way, what shall be the effect of their presence or their absence.

3. The Tilden electors, on the day prescribed by the act of Congress, did everything required by the Constitution itself, or by any act which Congress had authority compulsorily to prescribe to the State or any of its officers as a duty.

VII.—Neither the omission of the State canvassers to make proper evidence that the Tilden electors were appointed, nor the want of the lists prescribed by the Revised Statutes of the United States, § 136, can work any prejudice.

1. The failure of an officer to perform a duty at or within a time prescribed cannot, except in very special cases or under very peculiar circumstances, utterly defeat the right which the law intended to secure by enjoining such performance.

2. Of this proof may be found in the practice of the courts on application for a mandamus to compel performance of official duties.

(Note A, below.)

The time allowed for performance of the duty must always be shown to have elapsed before a mandamus will be granted.

If the duty could never be performed after by any accident or misadventure the time had elapsed, the law would by an absurd technical rigor defeat its own object.

VIII.—If there be any incurable defects in prior action, the subsequent legislation of Florida was warranted by the Revised Statutes of the United States, § 134. A just and liberal construction, of the most liberal kind, should be given to remedial acts of this nature.

Note A.

1. State vs. Judges of Bergen County Common Pleas, 2 Pennington N. J. Law R., 541, (3 ed., p. 308.)

Facts.—A statute required that the trial justice should send the papers on appeal to the clerk of the appellate court “on or before the first day of the next term.” The trial-justice delayed filing the return until after such first day, whereupon the appellant filed them himself during the term. The appellate court having dismissed the appeal on the ground of this omission,

Held, A mandamus should issue to compel the appellate court to receive the appeal.

Opinion of the court :

The act * * is only directory to the justice, and not conclusive on the court. The mandamus must, therefore, issue.

2. People vs. Dodge, 5 Howard’s N. Y. Practice R. 47.

Facts.—An inferior court was required by statute to file its decision “within twenty days after the court at which the trial took place.” In a case where the court had made a decision within, but had been prevented by accident from filing it until after the statutory time,

Held, A mandamus should go to compel the filing after the day.

3. King vs. Carmarthen, 1 Maule & Selwyn, 697.

Facts.—A borough charter ordained that no persons should be a burgess except freeholders having specified estates, &c., “*so as such person should make application to the mayor, &c., on Monday next after Michaelmas in each year, and at no other time, and so as such person did then before the mayor so make * * * proof of his qualification; and that upon such proof such person should be admitted at the next or any subsequent court,*” &c.

The prosecutors, some fifty in number, made application on the statute day, and offered proof of their qualifications, but the whole day was consumed in other business, and the mayor, &c., refused to hold an adjourned meeting for taking the proof offered, on the ground of want of power to go beyond the day fixed by the statute.

Held, That the excluding words of the charter did not prevent the issuing of a mandamus compelling the mayor, &c., to record an adjournment and hold an adjourned meeting.

Opinion of the court, (Le Blanc, J. :)

There is no doubt that a peremptory mandamus must go. The provisions of the charter are to enable persons having a previous inchoate right to perfect that right. * * * In this case it seems that from unavoidable necessity the whole day had been exhausted; not before the claims were made, but before the evidence in support of them could be heard. Common sense shows that the charter must have meant that the corporate body should have power to adjourn in order to conclude such business as they had regularly begun; otherwise it would have been in the power of any person, by contrivance, to protract the business and prevent the claims being effectual. (P. 702, 703.)

Dampier, J. :

The argument on the (mayor’s) side would go to show that if the corporation wrongfully refused the claims, those claims must be suspended until another year; that this case is like the case of no election, or of a colorable election, prior to the statute. But that is pushing the argument much too far. It seems to me, from the very nature of this case, to be absolutely necessary that the corporate body should have the power of adjournment, in order to give effect to the inchoate rights of the claimants, and to guard against the possibility of their claims being frustrated by collusion. Therefore, I am of opinion a peremptory mandamus ought to go. (P. 706.)

(See additional authorities cited, ante, p. 750.)

Note B.

1. High on Quo Warranto :

§ 748. The effect of an absolute judgment of ouster is conclusive upon the person against whom the judgment is rendered, and is a complete bar to his again asserting title to the office or franchise by virtue of an election before the original proceedings.

2. King vs. Clarke, 2 East., 75.

Facts.—After a judgment of ouster in quo warranto had been entered against one claiming to be an alderman duly elected and sworn, he obtained a mandamus to have himself sworn in, and was sworn. On a second quo warranto against him, he pleaded that he had been duly elected before the first quo warranto and sworn afterward. On demurrer, Held, That the first judgment was a bar.

Lord Kenyon, C. J.:

The question is abundantly clear of all doubt. * * Upon an information exhibited against the defendant for usurping the office, * * there was judgment of ouster against him, whereby he was actually forejudged and excluded from ever using the office in future. If this were not to conclude him from insisting upon the same election again, I know not what would. Suppose, after this, an application had been made to the court for a mandamus to compel the corporation to proceed to a new election to fill up the vacancy, what resistance could have been made to it? And yet if the prior election could be resorted to again it could be of no avail; or there could be two persons filling one office at the same time. If the defendant could insist on the former election, he would also be entitled to a mandamus to swear him in, and thus the proceedings of the court would be utterly inconsistent. (P. 83, 84.)

3. Queen vs. Blizzard, Law Reports, 2 Q. B., 55.

Facts.—The relator and the defendant were both of them candidates at an election. The relator had a majority of the votes if the defendant was ineligible. The defendant being in fact ineligible resigned the office. Afterward a rule for a quo-warranto information was moved for, and this prior resignation was relied on by the defendant to defeat the rule.

Held, That the object of the relator being to substantiate his own claim to the office arising from the election itself, the rule should be made absolute.

Opinion of the court, (Cockburn, C. J.):

The relator not only denies the validity of the defendant's election, but claims to have been himself elected into the office. * * In order to enable the relator to take that position, it must necessarily be assumed that there never was any election of the defendant. * * * The effect of a resignation would be simply to send the parties to a new election, while the effect of a disclaimer or judgment for the Crown upon the final issue of the quo warranto would be to displace the defendant FROM THE FIRST, leaving it open—which otherwise it would not be—to the relator to claim the office. (Pp. 57, 58.) Mellor and Lush, JJ., concurred.

Note C.

1. Allen vs. Mayor of Savannah, 9 Georgia, 286.

Facts.—Pending an appeal from a judgment declaring a tax ordinance of a city to be unconstitutional and void, the legislature passed an act confirming all the ordinances in operation at its date. Afterward the court of error affirmed the original judgment.

Held, That the confirmatory act did not validate the ordinance in question.

Opinion of the court:

The pendency of the writ of error did not affect the judgment. * * It was binding until reversed, and, being affirmed, was binding ab initio. * * * The judgment of affirmance * * * relates back and takes effect from the date of the first judgment. (P. 294.)

2. Sage vs. Harpending, 49 Barb., 174.

Facts.—After a judgment in favor of a landlord that a tenancy had expired, and while an appeal therefrom was pending, the defeated tenant attempted to oust the landlord, and being repelled by force, sued the landlord for an assault.

Held, That the judgment was a good plea to the action.

Opinion of the court :

The fact that an appeal had been taken to another court did not affect the conclusive nature of the judgment as a bar while it remained unreversed. (Harris vs. Hammond, 18 How. Pr., 124.)

3. Buzzard vs. Moore, 16 Indiana, 107, 109.

Opinion of the court :

The only effect of an appeal to a court of error, when perfected, is to stay execution upon the judgment from which it is taken. In all other respects the judgment, until annulled or reversed, stands binding upon the parties as to every question directly decided. (Cole vs. Connolly, 16 Ala., 271.) And it has been expressly decided that "It is no bar to an action on a judgment that the judgment has been removed by writ of error to a superior court." (Suydam vs. Hoyt, 1 Dutcher, N. J. R., 230.)

Note D.

In this connection the following special message of Governor John Hancock to the senate and house of representatives of Massachusetts, dated November 8, 1792, calling the attention of the legislative power of that commonwealth to the mandatory character of the Federal legislation of March 1, 1792, is most suggestive :

Gentlemen of the senate and of the house of representatives :

By the Constitution of the United States of America, each State is to appoint, in such manner as the legislature shall direct, electors of President and Vice-President. By a late act of Congress it is enacted "that the supreme executive of each State SHALL cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the first Wednesday in December."

I feel the importance of giving every constitutional support to the General Government; and I also am convinced that the existence and well being of that Government depends upon preventing a confusion of the authority of it with that of the States separately. But that Government applies itself to the people of the United States in their natural, individual capacity, and cannot exert any force upon or by any means control the officers of the State governments as such; therefore when an act of Congress uses compulsory words with regard to any act to be done by the supreme executive of this commonwealth, I shall not feel myself obliged to obey them, because I am not, in my official capacity, amenable to that Government.

My duty as governor will most certainly oblige me to see that proper and efficient certificates are made of the appointment of electors of President and Vice-President; and perhaps the mode suggested in the act above mentioned may be found to be the most proper. If you, gentlemen, have any mode to propose with respect to the conduct of this business, I shall pay every attention to it.

Gentlemen, I do not address you at this time from a disposition to regard the proceedings of the General Government with a jealous eye, nor do I suppose that Congress could intend that clause in their act as a compulsory provision; but I wish to prevent any measure to proceed through inattention which may be drawn into precedents hereafter to the injury of the people, or to give a constructive power where the Federal Constitution has not expressly given it.—Columbian Sentinel, Nov. 10, 1792.

[NOTE.—The language of the statute of 1792 is: "The executive authority of each State SHALL CAUSE three lists," &c. That of the Revised Statutes, § 136, is: "It shall be THE DUTY of the executive of each State to cause three lists," &c.]

CURATIVE ACTS.

Thomson vs. Lee County, 3 Wallace, 327.

A statute submitted the question to bonding a town to a vote of the municipality. After bonds had been issued, defects in the voting were alleged, and the legislature passed a curative act legalizing the issue.

Held, That the act was valid.

Opinion of the court:

If the legislature could authorize this ratification the bonds are valid, notwithstanding the submission of the question to the vote of the people or the manner of taking the vote may have been informal and irregular. This act of confirmation, very soon after its passage, underwent an examination in the courts of Iowa, and it was held that the legislature possessed the power to pass it, and that the bonds were valid and binding. (6 Iowa, 391.) * * If the legislature possessed the power to authorize the act to be done, it could, by a retrospective act, cure the evils which existed, because the power thus conferred had been irregularly executed. (P. 331.)

St. Joseph vs. Rogers, 16 Wallace, 644.

Opinion of the court:

Argument to show that defective subscriptions of the kind may in all cases be ratified when the legislature could have originally conferred the power is certainly unnecessary, as the question is authoritatively settled by the decisions of the supreme court of the State (of Illinois) and of this court in repeated instances. (15 Ill., 203; 34 ib., 405; 3 Wallace, 327; 9 ib., 477; 8 Peters, 111; 24 How., 295.)

Mistakes and irregularities are of frequent occurrence in municipal elections, and the State legislatures have often had occasion to pass laws to obviate such difficulties. Such laws, when they do not impair any contract or injuriously affect the rights of third persons, are never regarded as objectionable, and certainly are within the competency of the legislative authority. (Pp. 663, 664.)

Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 137:

A retrospective statute curing defects in legal proceedings where they are in their nature irregularities only, and do not extend to matters of jurisdiction, is not void on constitutional grounds, unless expressly forbidden. Of this class are the statutes to cure * * irregularities in the votes, or other action by municipal corporations, or the like, where a statutory power has failed of due and regular execution through the carelessness of officers or other cause. (1 Penn. St., 218; 17 ib., 524; 26 Iowa, 497; 49 Maine, 346; 69 Penn. St., 328; 4 Vroom, 350.)

BRIEF NO. 3.

SUBMITTED BY WM. C. WHITNEY, OF COUNSEL IN THE CASE OF THE STATE OF FLORIDA.

In the matter of the electoral vote of the State of Florida.—Argument and authorities in support of the validity of the vote cast by those electors whose title to their office has been established by the decision of the circuit court of Florida.

FIRST.

It is proper and relevant to the determination of the main question—What is the electoral vote of Florida?—to ascertain whether the officers of the State, in the execution and delivery of the certificates or evidences of election, have conformed to the laws of the State governing their action.

There are two classes of State officers whose combined action ordinarily contributes to the determination of the question, How has the State voted?

These are the board of State canvassers, a body which, in the discharge of ministerial and quasi-judicial functions strictly defined and limited by law, enumerates and announces the votes cast, and the Governor, who, in the discharge of a purely executive function, and in response to an invitation from the Federal Government, undertakes to certify the result transmitted by the canvassers.

That the functions of the canvassers are thus limited was determined by the supreme court of Florida in the recent gubernatorial contest of Drew et al. vs. Stearns et al., and also with reference to a former election law (in this particular not essentially unlike the present) in the case of the State ex rel. Bloxham vs. Board of State Canvassers, 13 Fla., 55-73.

The court there says of the canvassers :

Their duties and functions are mainly ministerial, but are quasi-judicial so far as it is their duty to determine whether the papers received by them and purporting to be returns were in fact such as were genuine, intelligible, and substantially authenticated as required by law; in other words, whether they contained within themselves evidence that they were authentic returns of the election.

In this discussion it is assumed that the certificate of the governor adds no strength to the force of the announcement of the canvassers, but is a mere attestation of the result of their enumeration as declared by them.

It is also assumed that if this declaration of the canvassers was in disregard and violation of the laws governing their action, the certificate of the governor founded upon that declaration is equally contrary to the laws of the State.

In this view it is unnecessary to treat of the declarations of the canvassers and the governor separately, for they both proceed from the executive department of the government.

What, then, would be the effect of these certificates, if it can be shown that they were given in disregard and violation of the laws of Florida?

It is clear that these certificates do not themselves constitute a right to the office of elector, but can operate only as an evidence of that right.

It is by the popular expression, by the voters through the ballot-box, that a title is derived to an elective office. The certificate of the board of canvassers is mere evidence of the person to whom the majority of the votes was given.—People vs. Cook, 8 New York, 67-82.

And in the case of Rex vs. Vice-Chancellor, &c., of Cambridge, 3 Burr, 647, involving the election of Lord Hardwicke to be chancellor of the university, notwithstanding the contrary declaration of the proctors who canvassed the vote, the court said :

As to the declaration of the proctors, I think it immaterial, for the question depends not upon that, but upon the real majority of legal votes.

But if it is to be held that these certificates, which are mere evidences as to the existence of facts, are not open to question as to their truth, it is of the utmost consequence to determine whether they are certificates. If they are not made according to the laws of the State for which they assume to speak, what authority can they possess?

Would it not be a monstrous perversion of justice and law to accept as conclusive a mere form of law, an assumed instrument of legal evidence, without permitting those who allege its falsity to show that those from whom it emanated executed and delivered it in violation of law?

The certificates assume to speak in the name of the State; they emanate from the executive department of the State; they are, as we have seen, mere instruments of evidence, not judgments of courts; in the absence of any legal provision expressly giving to them a conclusive effect, they cannot defy inquiry as to the legality of the action from which they result.

Neither can it be claimed that there is any infringement upon the independence of the State transmitting the return, if the inquiry be limited, as is now proposed, simply to the question, Has the State itself given formal expression as to the legality of the assumed instrument of evidence?

If it has so determined, that decision may properly be accepted as the voice of the State instead of the certificate, if such determination proceeds from a body possessing revisory powers over the body from which the assumed instrument of evidence emanated.

It therefore is of consequence to ascertain what the law of Florida provides as to the powers of those making these certificates, and whether these certificates result from a lawful exercise of these powers.

SECOND.

In the examination of the question whether or not the State officers have conformed to their own laws in the execution and delivery of these certificates or instruments of evidence, the decisions, if any, of the courts of the State upon the question are competent evidence.

As we have seen, the certificates emanate from the executive department of the State government; they are consequently subject to the determination of the judicial department of the State as to their validity. This is the theory upon which rests the distribution of power under our system of government.

This proposition as to the prerogative of the judicial department is not liable to the criticism that it asserts the existence of a power liable to injuriously affect the public rights. As was said in the Federalist, No. 78: "Whoever attentively considers the different departments of power must perceive that in a government in which they are separated from each other, the judiciary, from the nature of its functions, will always be the least dangerous to the political rights of the Constitution, because it will be least in capacity to annoy or injure them."

From the beginning, our courts have held the power not only of construing statutes so as to decide what requirements they impose and what rights they confer upon those to whom they apply, but even the right to determine whether or not the legislative department has conformed to the fundamental law in making its enactments. This last right is possessed by every tribunal in the land as much as by the Supreme Court of the United States, which differs from the others only in being the court of last resort, from whose decision there is no appeal. Dana's Wheaton, eighth edition, p. 79, n. 1.

And so the courts have always had the authority to determine as to the lawfulness of the act of any person or officer of the Government when presented before them in an actual case, not involving the question of the exercise by any public officer of a discretionary power.

In fact, as is well said by Mr. Yearman, (Study of Government, p. 236:)

Both the legislative and executive departments act independently, not of each other, but of the courts, up to the point of judicial construction regularly had. At this point their independence, such as it properly is, does not cease, but a new rule of action is established, or rather the true rule is constitutionally ascertained and established. A statute is held law only in the sense in which it is construed and applied by the courts. * * *

If the foregoing observations are well founded, it results that the office of the executive in all its ramifications is to execute the law in such a manner as to it seems to be required by the law itself, subject to ultimate authoritative judicial construction. * * * Competent judicial construction becomes a part of the law, or the official and authoritative light by which the law must be read and its real meaning discovered.

And so it was recognized by the United States Supreme Court, Shelby vs. Guy, 11 Wheat., 367, "that a fixed and received construction of their respective statute laws, (of the several States,) in their own courts, makes in fact a part of the statute law of the country."

The State thus seems to be a political community, organized and existing under a system of law by which the declaration of the courts, in matters submitted to their jurisdiction, becomes the declaration of the State itself.

Let us, then, ascertain how the State of Florida has expressed itself with reference to this question, through its judiciary.

THIRD.

A decision has been given by the circuit court of Florida to the effect that the certificate of the canvassers that the vote of the State was given for the Hayes electors is without foundation in law or fact, and also determining that the vote of the State was given for the Tilden electors.

The record has been produced, and will speak for itself.

FOURTH.

The judgment of the circuit court of Florida conclusively determines that the true electoral vote of Florida was that cast by the Tilden electors.

This proposition involves an examination of the following questions:

First. What is the effect of a judgment of a State court when presented before any other tribunal?

Second. Did the circuit court of Florida have jurisdiction of the subject-matter and parties in this proceeding?

Third. Did it render a judgment?

Fourth. What is the operation and effect of that judgment?

These questions are answered in the following discussion.

By the Constitution of the United States, Art. IV, sec. 1, it is declared that "full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

The act of May 26, 1790, (1 Stats. at Large, 115,) declared that—

The said records and judicial proceedings, authenticated as aforesaid, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the State from whence the said records are or shall be taken.

This provision of law has been preserved and continued by section 905 of the Revised Statutes.

While the courts of the several States did not invariably, in the years immediately following the adoption of the Constitution and this act of Congress, recognize the full force of these provisions, the courts of the United States never mistook their effect. The Federal tribunals have from the first regarded as final all judgments of State courts of general jurisdiction over matters and persons within their jurisdiction, and the courts of the several States now, without exception, acquiesce in this ruling.

The earliest as well as the leading case on the subject is that of Mills vs. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 481, wherein the opinion of the court was delivered by Judge Story.

The learned justice says:

Were the construction contended for by the plaintiff in error to prevail, that judgments of the State courts ought to be considered prima-facie evidence only, this clause in the Constitution would be utterly unimportant and illusory. The common law would give precisely the same effect. It is manifest, however, that the Constitution contemplated a power in Congress to give a conclusive effect to such judgments, and we can perceive no rational interpretation of the act of Congress, unless it declares a judgment conclusive when a court of the particular State where it is rendered would pronounce the same decision.

From this decision down to that of Maxwell vs. Stewart, 22 Wall., 77, the Supreme Court of the United States has held to this doctrine.

There has been some discussion as to the necessity that certain preliminary questions of jurisdiction in the court rendering the judgment shall be first settled, but even as to these questions the presumption of regularity and jurisdiction is to be invoked in support of the State record.

See 2 Am. Leading Cases, 5th ed., 652; 4th ed., 797.

It is now clearly settled, according to the opinion of the court, by Mr. Chief-Justice Waite, in Maxwell vs. Stewart, supra, that—

The form of a record of a judgment is regulated by the practice of the court in which the action is prosecuted. To make such a record valid upon its face it is only necessary for it to appear that the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action and of the parties, and that a judgment had in fact been rendered. All else is form only.

In the supreme court of Connecticut, in the case of The Bank of North America vs. Wheeler, 28 Conn., 433-439, the court says:

In Hampton vs. McConnell, 3 Wheat., 234, which was declared by Chief-Justice Marshall to be precisely the same case as that of Mills vs. Duryee, he states that the doctrine there held was that the judgment of a State court should have the same credit, validity, and effect in every other court in the United States which it had in the State where it was pronounced, and that whatever pleas would be good to a suit thereon in such State, and none other, could be pleaded in any other court in the United States. This principle has since been universally recognized and adopted, with the exception of a single case decided by the county court of Baltimore, in which that court, as we think, misapprehending the decision in the case of McElmoyle vs. Cohen, 13 Pet., 312, came erroneously to a different conclusion.

Neither does this conclusive character of the judgment of a foreign tribunal, possessing jurisdiction, depend solely upon the Constitution and laws of the United States. It results from the adjudicated principles of the common law as well.

In 1862 the Court of Queen's Bench, in the case of Scott vs. Pelkington, 2 Best and S., 11, which was an action brought to enforce a New York judgment in England, held the judgment of the New York court having jurisdiction over the subject-matter could not be questioned in England on the ground that the foreign court had mistaken the laws of its own country, or had come, on the evidence, to an erroneous conclusion as to the facts. This conclusion was reached notwithstanding the New York judgment had been rendered on the report of a referee, which embraced conclusions of law that would not have been followed in England, and, also, notwithstanding the fact that an undetermined appeal was still pending from such judgment.

It is also decided that the acts of Congress prescribing the mode of authenticating the records of such judgment do not exclude all other evidence thereof.

See Kean vs. Rice, 12 S. and R., 203; Bennett vs. Bennett, Deady, 299-309.

In order to a determination of the effect of the judgment-record of the circuit court of Florida, it becomes necessary, therefore, to ascertain, according to the rule in Maxwell vs. Stewart, 27 Wall., 77—

First. Whether the court has jurisdiction:

- (a) Of the subject-matter;
- (b) Of the parties.

Second. Whether a judgment was in fact rendered.

These questions may be considered in their order.

First. (a) The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

By the constitution of Florida, adopted February 25, 1868, (Bush's Digest, p. 1,) it is provided in the eighth section of the first article "that the circuit court and the judges thereof shall have power to issue writs of quo warranto." This provision has not been affected by the amendments. (Laws 1875, p. 49.)

By the laws of Florida (1868, p. 33; 1872, p. 28) provision has been made for the exercise and the effect of the exercise of this power by the courts. It is also provided by law (chap. 1561, sec. 2) that the circuit court may issue the writ in vacation as well as in term, and, by rule of the court, that the judge will regulate the practice. (Rule 14; 14 Fla., App. 23.)

By the decision of the supreme court of Florida, (which is hereafter shown to be binding upon the tribunals of the United States,) it was held that this grant of power to issue a writ of quo warranto embraces and includes the proceeding by information in the nature of a quo warranto. It was also held that in absence of statutory regulations as to the mode of procedure, the common-law practice was to be followed. (State vs. Gleason, 12 Fla., 190.)

First. (b) The court also had jurisdiction of the parties.

In the first place, as to the particular branch of the tribunal and the venue within which the proceedings were had.

The defendants in the proceeding were assembled at the capital of the State, Tallahassee, in the county of Leon. By the third section of the twenty-first article of the constitution of Florida the county of Leon is made part of the second circuit, of which P. W. White, before whom the proceedings were had, is judge. (15 Florida Reports, p. 3.)

In the second place, as to the persons of the defendants.

Their appearance in the proceeding would confer jurisdiction of person if the court also had jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

If, however, it be suggested that the proceeding, being instituted with relation to an official capacity or character which the defendants had assumed, and that such official capacity had been entirely exercised and exhausted before the judgment was rendered, the following answer is made:

The proposition that the office had expired or was exhausted is in no wise conceded, but is in all respects resisted, and denied to be true in fact or sound in law.

The office of elector could not determine and expire so long as any act remained to be done to express the true voice of the State. In this respect the same rule applied to the electors as was announced by the supreme court with reference to the board of canvassers, (13 Florida, 55-73:)

The object of the law is to ascertain the whole number of votes cast and who had received the highest number of such votes, so that the choice of the majority of the voters might be ascertained and respected. If the facts are correctly stated by the relator, the respondents neglected to perform this duty, and therefore did not comply with the law, in which case they did not conclude their duties as canvassers nor put an end to their powers as canvassers by an adjournment sine die.

There is no provision of law which determines when the office of elector shall expire, and upon principle it would seem to continue so long as anything could be done by use of the office in accomplishing the object of its creation, the expression of the real and true will of the State.

But even if the claim that the term had expired were true, the judgment of the court would not in consequence be without jurisdiction.

Mr. High, in treating of quo warranto, (Extraordinary Remedies, § 633,) observes that while under the English practice leave to file an information is frequently given, notwithstanding the expiration of the term of office in question, yet in this country a different rule prevails. This is not invariably the case even with reference to the first step in the proceeding, namely, the granting of leave to file an information, which is a matter purely in the discretion of the court. Thus, in the case of People vs. Tibbetts, 4 Cow., 358-381, leave was granted to file an information notwithstanding the near expiration of the term. But an examination of the cases upon which Mr. High rests his unguarded proposition shows that even they do not refer to the initiatory proceeding, the obtaining leave to file the information, and do not indicate the existence of different rules as to the subsequent proceedings. This is shown upon an examination of the two leading cases upon this subject, both decided in the same year, (1807,) and from which every subsequent American decision has drawn its law.

The Commonwealth vs. Athearn, 3 Mass., 285, was a case in which the supreme court of Massachusetts declined to grant leave to file an information as against an alleged usurper whose term would expire before judgment could be given. But, in denying the application, Chief-Justice Parsons says:

The court will be understood by this decision to have determined not that they have no authority to grant an information whenever they shall think a case exhibited to them shall require it, but only in the present case it would not be a discreet and proper exercise of their authority.

In The People vs. Sweeting, 2 Johns., 184, the supreme court of New York, in denying a similar application, said:

This court has a discretion to grant motions of this kind or to refuse them if no sufficient reasons appear for allowing this mode of proceeding.

That this was the sole effect of this decision appears from the subsequent case of The People vs. Tibbetts, 4 Cow., 358, 381, bottom. Here the same court granted such a motion for leave to file an information, notwithstanding the former case, which was cited and considered. They say:

Here the motion was brought before us at the term next after the election. We cannot refuse it upon the mere chance that a trial may fail. To do this would be equivalent to a refusal in all cases where the office is annual; a length to which we presume the court did not intend to go, and to which it was not necessary they should go, in The People vs. Sweeting. On the whole, we are clear, upon the nature of the case, as to our right of allowing the information to be filed; and that the lapse of time is not such as to require us in the exercise of a sound discretion to deny it.

And all the succeeding line of American authorities have arisen upon applications for leave to file informations involving an exercise of pure discretion on the part of the court, or have else been misapplications of the rule laid down in the first cases in Massachusetts and New York, upon which they assume to rest.

But while the courts may and have this discretion with reference to the granting of leave to file an information in the first instance, their discretion is entirely exhausted after that leave is granted. The trial must then proceed like any other.

Says Chief-Justice Ames, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of Rhode Island, State vs. Brown, 5 R. I., 1:

When the information is filed all the discretionary power of the court is expended, and the issues of law or fact raised by the pleadings must be tried and decided under the law, and in the same manner and with the same strictness as in any other case, civil or criminal. (P. 4.)

There is no difference between the authorities of England and America as to the course to be taken after the information is filed—after the discretion of the court has been expended. The only difference has been as to the cases in which the original discretionary power should be exercised.

The circuit court of Florida had passed this point of discretion and had entered upon the actual trial of the issue as to the rights of the contending parties under the laws of Florida. What decision, therefore, was the circuit court bound to give under those laws?

One of the statutes of Florida provides that any office in the State becomes vacant upon a decision of a competent tribunal, declaring void the election or appointment of the one occupying it, and his removal by said tribunal. (Laws of 1868, p. 34.) Another statute provides that, in the trial of an information in the nature of a quo warranto, the court, if requested, must pass upon the title of the claimant as well as that of the defendant. (Laws of 1872, p. 28, ch. 1874.) It is also the practice of the court that an unsuccessful defendant must pay costs.

Vide judgment in The State of Florida vs. Gleason, 12 Fla., 267.

The courts of other States have already determined what duties such statutes impose upon the courts administering them. Even the obligation of the defendant to pay costs is sufficient to induce and authorize, nay, to constrain the court to proceed to a determination of all the rights of the parties, with a view to the settlement of this minor and incidental question.

In the action of The People vs. Loomis, 8 Wend., 396, 397, the supreme court of New York, speaking by Mr. Justice Nelson, said:

The remedy must be entirely fruitless in this case, as the term of office of the defendant has long ago expired. If application had been made for the quo warranto we should have denied it, as was done in The People vs. Sweeting. Although judgment will be unavailing and the damages, if a suggestion be made, must be very trifling, still I am of opinion we cannot suspend the judgment, as the Revised Statutes are imperative, and give to the prevailing party costs.

The same conclusion was reached by the supreme court of Michigan, in the case of The People vs. Hartwell, 12 Mich., 508, 522.

And Mr. High, § 633, supra, states that although a quo warranto information is concededly not to be granted merely for the purpose of vacating an office which the defendant has already resigned, "yet where the object of the proceeding is not only to cause the respondent to vacate the office, but also to establish the title of the relator thereto, a different principle prevails."

It will be remembered that the Florida statute (Laws 1872, p. 33) especially provides for such a trial of the relator's right.

In illustration of this principle may be cited the recent case, (1866,) decided by the court of King's Bench, in which Lord Chief-Justice Cockburn is very careful to place his decision, not upon the prior authorities, but upon the underlying reasons which he states. (Queen vs. Blizard, 7 B. & S., 922.)

The question arose upon an application to make absolute a rule nisi, which had been previously obtained, calling upon the defendant to show by what authority he claimed to exercise the office of town councilor of Tewksbury, to which he had assumed to be elected on November 10, three weeks before the hearing. It appeared, also, that the defendant had resigned the office three days before the relator had made his first application. Nevertheless the court made absolute the rule to file the information.

The chief-justice, after saying that at first he thought the resignation avoided the possibility of the proceeding, and that he reached his conclusions independently of the authority of the cases cited by the relator, decides as follows:

If the object were merely to vacate, so that a fresh election might take place, it is obvious that the resignation of the office would effect it as well as the removal from the office by an information in the nature of a quo warranto; but in the present case the proceeding is instituted by a relator, who not only denies the validity of the election of the person against whom he moves, but also claims to have been elected and to be admitted into the office. * * * Now, in order to enable the relator to stand in that position and be admitted into this office, it must, as he maintains, necessarily be assumed that there was never any election of the defendant. * * * The effect of a resignation would only be to send the parties to a fresh election, whereas the effect of a disclaimer or judgment for the Crown would be to displace and oust the defendant, leaving it open, which it otherwise would not be, to the relator to claim the office.

This reasoning sustains the circuit court of Florida in proceeding to a determination of the relators' rights.

But still another principle, recognized by the courts both of England and of this country, may be invoked in support of the procedure of the circuit court, notwithstanding the assumption (the correctness of which we always controvert) that the term of office in dispute had expired before judgment. That principle results from the necessity of determining the validity of the acts of the defendants, which were of public concern and were intended to confer rights upon others.

So long ago as 1759 this principle received recognition in the case of The King vs. New Radnor, 2 Ld. Kenyon, 498. An information was applied for as against a defendant four years after the expiration of the aldermanic term which the defendant was charged with having usurped. It was held that leave should be granted to try a civil right, for in order to invalidate the "election of other members (chosen while the defendant was in office) it may be put in issue that he was not a legal officer; and, to prove that, it may perhaps be necessary to produce the record of his conviction, as the judge may otherwise say he appeared to have been an officer de facto, and the right to his office is not the issue then to be tried."

And this case was followed and approved by the supreme court of North Carolina, which held (Burton vs. Patton, 2 Jones's Law, 24) that an information in the nature of a quo warranto may be filed against public officers after the expiration of their office, where their conviction is necessary to invalidate their acts, when such acts are of public concern and are intended to confer rights upon others. The court also cites with approval the language of Littledale, J., (Re Harris, 6 A. and E., 475-477,) that "there have been instances in which an information issued after the office expired, where something done in the office would have affected the general administration of affairs in the borough."

Even upon the most disputed assumption that the term of the electoral office had expired, it does not seem possible to doubt that the court had jurisdiction of the parties for either one of the following purposes:

1. To award costs to the plaintiffs.
2. To establish the relators' rights with reference to the office.
3. To invalidate the acts of the defendants, which were of public concern and were intended to confer rights upon others.

And, having jurisdiction for these purposes, the court should and did examine and determine the entire question.

In any event, the court had sufficient jurisdiction of the question to determine whether, under the laws of Florida, it had jurisdiction, and its decision that it had is now conclusive and final.

This brings us, in our consideration of the conditions suggested by Chief-Justice Waite, (Maxwell vs. Stewart, supra), to the—Second. Whether a judgment was in fact rendered.

The profert of the record sufficiently establishes the fact of the judgment, and the cases of Bank vs. Wheeler, Merchants' Insurance Company vs. DeWolf, and Scott vs. Pilkington, before cited, sufficiently demonstrate that it is binding and conclusive, notwithstanding the possibility or pendency of an appeal.

But in its essential features this judgment of the circuit court is founded upon the decision of the court of last resort, the supreme court of Florida, in the quo warranto proceedings of Drew et al. vs. Stearns et al., in which the gubernatorial question was settled. It was there decided, which was the turning-point of the present case, that the board of State canvassers was without judicial functions.

This decision is absolutely controlling upon the courts of the United States, not by reason of any act of Congress or any principle before cited, but upon the ground stated in the cases of Shelby vs. Guy, 11 Wheat., 361, and Green vs. Lessee of Neal, 6 Peters, 291, with reference to the decisions of the State courts upon a question arising under local law. The court say that "the decision of this question by the highest tribunal of a State should be considered as final by this court; not because the State tribunal, in such case, has any power to bind this court, but because a fixed and received construction by a State in its own courts makes a part of the statute law."

So in the case of Tioga Railroad Company vs. Blossburgh and Corning Railroad, 20 Wall., 137-143, Mr. Justice Bradley says, for the court, with reference to the decisions of the New York courts as to the New York statute of limitations: "These decisions upon the construction of the statute are binding upon us, whatever we may think of their soundness on general principles."

And in the very last case upon the subject, (Township of Elmwood vs. Macy, 2 Otto, 289-294,) the court says, as to certain Illinois decisions concerning the effect of Illinois statutes:

We are not called upon to vindicate the decisions of the supreme court of Illinois in these cases or approve the reasoning by which it reached its conclusions. If the questions before us had never been passed upon by it, some of my brethren who agree to this opinion might take a different view of them. But are not these decisions binding upon us in the present controversy? They adjudge that the bonds are void because the laws which authorized their issue were in violation of a peculiar provision of the constitution of Illinois. We have always followed the highest court of the State in its construction of its own constitution and laws.

In fact and in law, therefore, the judgment of the circuit court of Florida is final and conclusive.

We have now to consider what was the operation and effect of this judgment.

It is well observed by Mr. High, (§ 750,) following the case of Attorney-General vs. Barstow, (4 Wis., 567,) that in this proceeding the judgment itself creates no right, but is merely declaratory of rights already existing, the court being the instrument or medium through which the rights created by law are ascertained and definitely fixed. The judgment, he continues, therefore, neither creates a right in the successful party nor destroys one which formerly belonged to the party ousted.

It appears that in the cited Wisconsin case the claim was made that the substitution by the court of the relator as governor would impose upon the people a governor elected or created by the court. The answer was made by Judge Whiton, for the court, (p. 659:)

As the case now appears upon the record, the respondent has no legal right to the office, and the relator has a perfect right to it by virtue of the clause of the constitution above referred to. If the facts should remain unchanged, a judgment of ouster in this court against the respondent and a judgment establishing the right of the relator would not create a right in the latter or destroy one which belongs to the former. Their rights are fixed by the constitution, and the court, if it has jurisdiction of this proceeding, is the mere instrument provided by the constitution to ascertain and enforce their rights as fixed by that instrument. Its office is the same as in all controversies between party and party, not to create rights, but to ascertain and enforce them. The same argument would apply with equal force to an information in the nature of a quo warranto against a sheriff or any other officer. We do not think it well founded.

And so in the Florida case, the judgment in favor of the relators did not create them electors from the day of its rendition, but it declared that from the day of election, November 7, 1876, they were, and had been, the electors of the State of Florida, chosen under its laws, and consequently that all their acts as electors since that time were the acts of the legal and valid electors of the State of Florida.

The position of the assumed Hayes electors was not that of de facto officers, whose acts were valid as to the public and third persons until they were ousted. They had merely undertaken to perform an act which had not yet been finally acted upon by others when the court gave its judgment that they had never possessed the authority necessary to the performance of the act.

At the time of this judgment there were in existence and awaiting the acceptance of Congress the returns evidencing action of each of these bodies of electors. When these returns are opened there is presented to the tribunal about to choose between them the judgment of the court declaring that at the time these returns were prepared the Hayes electors were not, and the Tilden electors were, authorized to cast the vote of Florida.

It does not seem possible that the merely ministerial and executive attestation of the official character of the one body can stand for a moment as against the subsequent judicial determination that these ministerial and executive attestations had been given without warrant in law or fact.

There is also another legal principle which may be invoked in support of the proposition that the tribunal should accept the judgment in favor of the Tilden electors as evidence of their official character.

As has been repeatedly demonstrated, the certificates of the governor and canvassers of the State of Florida did not constitute the right, but were simply the evidence of the right of the electors to their office.

If they had in fact been elected to the office, they were entitled to the evidence of that fact; and if the prescribed instrument of evidence, the certificate, was withheld without sufficient legal reason by the officers whose duty it was to give it to the lawfully-chosen electors, then they could resort to other instruments of evidence to establish the existence of the fact of their election.

The judgment of the circuit court thus operates not only to demonstrate that the governor and canvassers were without legal excuse in withholding from the Tilden electors the prescribed evidence of their election, but it also becomes admissible as itself constituting the constituted evidence of such election.

The authorities for the proposition that, in case of the prescribed instrument of evidence being withheld by those whose duty it is to give it, substituted evidence of the fact may be offered, have all arisen upon matters of contract, but they sufficiently demonstrate the principle that the law in all cases seeks to determine controversies according to existing facts, and that it is not to be defeated in this purpose by the unreasonable suppression or withholding of any particular method of proving such facts.

Among these authorities the following may be cited :

United States vs. Robeson, 9 Peters, 319-327. In this case the defendant had proved in the court below, as an offset, the payment of certain amounts for which it was provided by the contract that certificates of the commanding officer should be obtained, and such certificates were not produced or offered. On this ground the judgment was reversed, the court saying :

The defendant cannot compel the payment of this amount unless he shall procure the kind of evidence required by the contract or show that by time or accident he was unable to do so.

Had the defendant proved that application had been made to the commanding officer for the proper certificates and that he had refused to give them, it would have been proper to receive other evidence to establish the claim.

To the same effect are the decisions of the New York court of appeals in Thomas vs. Fleury, 26 N. Y., 26, and The Bowery National Bank vs. Mayor, 63 N. Y., 336.

It is also to be noticed that no statute makes the certificate of the governor or canvassers exclusive proof as to the question of the election of the electors; other competent proof would therefore be admissible.

It has been decided by the New York superior court (6 Bosworth, 213) that, though a statute provide that a copy of a certificate of incorporation shall be presumptive legal evidence of the facts therein stated, this does not exclude any other method of proving the fact of incorporation.

FIFTH.

The judgment of the circuit court is not impaired or lessened in efficacy by the proceeding to review it in a higher court, if any such proceeding has been taken. At common law the judgment of a court of original jurisdiction takes full effect immediately upon its entry; and until reversed it is as effectual as if pronounced by a court of last resort.

Allen vs. Mayor of Savannah, 9 Georgia, 286.

Facts.—Pending an appeal from a judgment declaring a tax ordinance of a city to be unconstitutional and void the legislature passed an act confirming all the ordinances in operation at its date. Afterward the court of error affirmed the original judgment.

Held, That the confirmatory act did validate the ordinance in question.

Opinion of the court :

The pendency of the writ of error did not affect the judgment. * * It was binding until reversed, and, being affirmed, was binding ab initio. * * * The judgment of affirmance * * relates back and takes effect from the date of the first judgment.—(P. 294.)

Sage vs. Harpending, 49 Barb., 174.

Facts.—After a judgment in favor of a landlord that a tenancy had expired, and while an appeal therefrom was pending, the defeated tenant attempted to oust the landlord, and being repelled by force sued the landlord for an assault.

Held, That the judgment was a good plea to the action.

Opinion of the court :

The fact that an appeal had been taken to another court did not affect the conclusive nature of the judgment as a bar, whilst it remained unreversed. (Harris vs. Hammond, 18 How. Pr., 124.)

Buzzard vs. Moore, 16 Indiana, 107, 109.

Opinion of the court :

The only effect of an appeal to a court of error, when perfected, is to stay execution upon the judgment from which it is taken. In all other respects, the judgment, until annulled or reversed, stands binding upon the parties as to every question directly decided. (Cole vs. Connolly, 16 Ala., 271.) And it has been expressly decided that "it is no bar to an action on a judgment that the judgment has been removed by writ of error to a superior court." (Suydam vs. Hoyt, 1 Dutcher, N. J. R., 230.)

Bank of North America vs. Wheeler, 28 Conn., 441, 462. Suit in Connecticut upon notes. Defendants pleaded that plaintiffs have recovered judgment on them in N. Y.

The plaintiffs finally claim that the judgment in New York is set aside or suspended by the appeal from it to the court of appeals of that State, and that it therefore constitutes no defense in this suit.

The effect of that appeal depends upon the character of the jurisdiction of that court. If, by the laws of New York, a case coming before it by appeal is to be retried by it as upon original process in that court, and it has jurisdiction to settle the controversy by a judgment of its own and to enforce that judgment by its own process, the appeal, like an appeal under our statutes, from a justice of the peace to the superior court, would vacate the judgment of the inferior tribunal.—(Curtiss vs. Beardsley, 15 Conn., 518; Campbell vs. Howard, 5 Mass., 376.)

But if the appeal is in the nature of a writ of error, and only carries up the case to the court of appeals, as an appellate court, for the correction of errors which may have intervened in the trial of the case below, and for its adjudication upon the question whether the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, reversed, or modified, and that court has no other powers or duties than to affirm, reverse, or modify that judgment, or remit the case to the inferior tribunal that it may conform its judgment to that of the appellate tribunal, then such an appeal, like an appeal under our laws from the probate court to the superior court, does not vacate or suspend the judgment appealed from; and the removal of the case to the appellate court would no more bar an action upon the judgment than the pendency of a writ of error at common law, when that was the proper mode of correcting errors which may have occurred in the inferior tribunal. That such an action would not be barred by the pendency of such a proceeding is well settled. The judgment below is only voidable, and stands good until set aside. (Case vs. Case, Kirby, 284; Sloan's Appeal from Probate, 1 Root, 151; Curtiss vs. Beardsley, 15 Conn., 523.)

It was accordingly held, and in our opinion correctly, by Judge Nelson, in the United States circuit court for this district, at its September term, 1854, in Seely vs. Pritchard, that under the laws and practice of the State of New York a judgment was not impaired by an appeal, but that an action of debt was sustainable thereon while the appeal was pending.

BRIEF No. 4.

SUBMITTED BY MR. MERRICK IN THE CASE OF THE STATE OF LOUISIANA.

AS TO VALIDITY OF ACTS OF OFFICERS DE FACTO.

1. The rule that the acts of a de facto officer will be regarded as valid rests upon public policy and the necessities of public convenience. Being an exception to the general rule that no official act is valid unless performed by some party having legal authority in that regard, rather than a rule, it is limited in its application to those exact conditions from which it derives its existence and authority.

2. The acts of an officer de facto are regarded as valid only when it appears that the officer has been in the exercise of the functions of the office for such a period of time and with such degree of public notoriety as to justify the conclusion that those dealing with him had reason to believe that he was an officer de jure.

3. It follows from the last foregoing proposition that where the function of the office extends to the performance of a single act, the exception in favor of the validity of the acts of de facto officers can never apply.

4. As the acts of a de facto officer are regarded as valid only as regards the public and third parties, it follows that such acts will never be treated as valid unless they have, at the time of the inquiry into their validity, already operated to affect the rights of third parties to such an extent as to cause a change in the condition of those to whom such acts may have reference.

5. It follows from the foregoing propositions that when the act of the de facto officer has not operated to accomplish some change in the relation of parties to each other or to property, or to the public, such acts will never be regarded as valid, especially when the particular act in question was performed by the officer de jure at the same time of its performance by the officer de facto, and when the inquiry is as to whose performance is to be accepted as valid.

In support of the foregoing propositions the following authorities are respectfully submitted:

An individual coming into office by color of an election or appointment is an officer de facto, and his actions in relation to the public or third persons are valid until he is removed, although it be conceded that his election or appointment was illegal. His title shall not be inquired into. The mere claim to be a public officer and the performance of a single act or even a number of acts in that character would not perhaps constitute an individual an officer de facto. There must be some color of an election or appointment, or an exercise of the office, and an acquiescence on the part of the public for a length of time which would afford a strong presumption of at least a colorable election or appointment. (Wilcox vs. Smith, 5 Wend., 231; Heirs of Hildreth vs. McIntire's Devisee, 1 J. J. Marshall, 206.)

A road commissioner, declared elected by the court of common pleas, after reversal of that decision by the superior court, but before the declaration by the court of common pleas of the election of another person in obedience to the mandamus of the superior court, was held to be no longer an officer de facto, and his acts as such were void. (Petition of Portsmouth, 19 N. H., 115.)

The act of an officer de facto is good wherever it concerns a third person, who had a previous right to the act or had paid a valuable consideration for it. (Savage vs. Ball, 17 N. J. Eq., 142.)

Where an officer attempts to enforce a legal right by action, he must show himself properly qualified. But where the action is against the officer, it is sufficient if he is shown to be an officer de facto. (Fetterman vs. Hopkins, 5 Watts, (Pa.,) 539.)

The acts of officers de facto are valid when they concern the public or the rights of third persons who have an interest in the act done. But a different rule prevails where the act is for the benefit of the officer, because he is not permitted to take advantage of his own wrong. Venable vs. Curd, 2 Head, Tenn., 582; Patterson vs. Miller, 2 Metc., Ky., 493; Gourley vs. Hawkins, 2 Iowa, 75.

A person not duly appointed to an office cannot justify his acts on the ground that he was an officer de facto. Cummins vs. Clark, 15 Vermont, 653.

When suit is brought against individuals who justify as public officers, they must show themselves officers de jure, and that they were duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by law. A record that they were duly sworn is insufficient. Blake vs. Sturtevant, 12 New Hampshire, 507; Schlenke vs. Risley, 4 Illinois, (3 Scam.,) 483.

1821. Riddle vs. County of Bedford, 7 Sergeant & Rawle, 391 :

There are many acts done by an officer de facto which are valid.

*They are good as to strangers, and all those persons who are not bound to look further than that the person is in the actual exercise of the office, without investigating his title. * * **

Whenever the act done by an officer de facto has been declared to be valid, it is where some third person claims an interest or title in the act done; and I have not been able, after much research, to find any decision where such an act has been considered valid in an action by the officer de facto claiming for an act done by himself.

1855. Vaccan vs. Maxwell, 3 Blatchford, 368, Judges Nelson and Betts.

Facts.—The plaintiff, an importer, whose entry of goods had been appraised by a general appraiser and a merchant appraiser appointed by the collector, and the value of the goods raised by them, protested on paying the duties “that the merchant appraiser was not legally sworn in.” Suit to recover back the overcharge.

It appeared that he had not been sworn in, and the court then treats of his acts as a de facto officer:

We think, however, that the decisions in relation to the acts of officers de facto are reasonably to be restricted to those who hold office under some degree of notoriety, or are in the exercise of continuous official acts, or are in possession of a place which has the character of a public office.

Merchants called in by the collector to estimate the value of merchandise take no rank as public officers.

1874. The United States vs. Insurance Company, 22 Wallace, 99.

The real nature of the rule as to the validity of the acts of a de facto officer is well illustrated in this case. “Their acts are held valid, as it respects the rights of third persons who have an interest in them and as concerns the public, in order to prevent the failure of justice.” Green vs. Burke, 23 Wend., 490.

They rather hold the position of referees or trustees, charged with the performance of a single act or appointed to act in an individual case.

Held that the act was invalid.

The King vs. The Corporation of Bedford Level, 6 East, 368. Lord Ellenborough, C. J.:

An officer de facto is one who has the reputation of being the officer he assumes to be and yet is not a good officer in point of law.

1 Lord Raymond, 660.

In this case Gotobed was never more than deputy; and, therefore, after the death of his principal he never could have had the reputation of being more than a deputy, but such reputation must necessarily have ceased with the knowledge of the death of his principal. When that fact was notorious to the owners of land in this level, no one could have registered his deeds with him under a belief that he was acting as the assistant of one who by the course of nature has ceased to fill the office in the execution of which he was to be assisted by the deputy.

In this case Cole died in December, and the greater part of the conveyances objected to were registered some months after, on the eve of the election.

R. T. MERRICK.

BRIEF No. 5.

SUBMITTED BY MR. MERRICK IN THE CASE OF THE STATE OF LOUISIANA.

THE LOUISIANA RETURNING-BOARD WAS WITHOUT AUTHORITY BECAUSE NOT COMPOSED OF THE FULL NUMBER OF MEMBERS REQUIRED BY THE STATUTES OF THAT STATE.

By the act of November 20, 1872, creating the returning-board of Louisiana, it is provided as follows :

SECTION 2. Be it further enacted, &c., That five persons, to be elected by the Senate and from all political parties, shall be the returning-officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, of either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning-officers.

Where an authority of a public nature is delegated by law to a certain number of individuals, the authority cannot be exercised unless the body created by law is composed of the full number the law requires. It is not contended that a less number than the entire board may not act; but the entire number must be in existence, clothed with authority to act, and have due notice of all proceedings that take place, and an opportunity to attend and participate therein, in order to give such proceedings validity. Wentworth vs. Farmington, 49 New Hamp., p. 120.

Especially is this true where different constituent elements of such body are by the law required to represent distinct and separate interests to be affected by its action.

Now, it is well known that in the elections that take place in the United States there are contests between two or more political parties, and these contests are more or less exciting.

The laws of Louisiana evidently contemplated the appointment on the board of canvassers of members of the different political parties in the State, in order that each of such parties might have a representative who would be a guard and protection against any evil practices that might be designed or attempted by their associates on the board.

It may be stated as a rule, without exception, that where the law provides for the organization of a body of men to execute a public authority, and requires it to be composed of a certain number of persons representing the different interests in regard to which that authority is to be exercised, such body can never exercise the power conferred upon it unless it is, in every particular, constituted in accordance with the requirements of the statute.

In such cases the requirement that a board should consist of a certain number of individuals taken from the different classes of citizens designated is mandatory, and unless so constituted it is not the body created by the law, and therefore not authorized to execute the power conferred by the law.

That one of the individuals composing the organization should, after his appointment and after entering upon his duties, change his political opinions, is no answer to the position assumed. In such a case the statute requirement would have been fully complied with if the appointment had been made in obedience to its mandate in the first instance. Under such circumstances the organization would have been full and complete under the law.

The case now presented is one in which that full and complete organization had not been accomplished, and where those who professed to exercise the entire power conferred by the statute persistently and stubbornly refused to fill up the number required by the law, although repeatedly and earnestly requested to do so by one of the very parties the act of legislation was designed and intended to protect by giving it a representation on the board.

The power of a quorum to act is not denied, provided the body itself had power to act. But we deny that the body had the power to act, because of its defective organization.

The subject was fully discussed in the case from New Hampshire above referred to.

The case is directly in point on the proposition submitted, and the court, in its opinion, says :

Even if the statute goes no further than the common-law rule, a report signed by the majority, under the circumstances of this case, would have been good. According to the case of Grindley et al. vs. Barker, 1 B. & P., 228, before cited, it would have been deemed to be the report of the whole. The real point of the objection is, that at the time when the report was signed there was a vacancy in the board of commissioners, caused by the removal of the chairman from the county; and the general doctrine that in case there be a vacancy in the board the remaining members cannot act, seems to be unquestionable. Palmer vs. Conway, 22 N. H., 148; Mitchell vs. Holderness, 34 N. H., 209, 214.

The question here, then, is whether this doctrine applies where, at the time the vacancy occurred, nothing remained to be done but to reduce to writing, and make the formal report of what had already been determined by the whole board.

In Palmer vs. Conway, before cited, it was held that as there were not three members of the board in office at the time, there was no such board as the statute requires, and therefore there could be no action of the majority.

In that case a report laying out a highway had been recommitted to the same board, and a hearing notified, and before the time appointed one of the commissioners died, but the others went on with the hearing and made several changes in the report, and upon the report being again recommitted, the same two commissioners made further changes, and the report, upon full consideration, was set aside for want of authority in those commissioners to act.

In Mitchell vs. Holderness, before cited, the full board had decided to lay out a road and made known their decision, and thereupon a motion was made that the town of Plymouth be required to contribute to the expense of making the road, and as one of the commissioners lived in Plymouth another was appointed in his place; afterward another member of the board removed from the State, and the petitioners thereupon moved the court to declare his office vacant and appoint another in his stead, but the motion was denied, and upon exceptions to the supreme court this ruling was held to be wrong. The court held that while unfinished business was pending before the board, it became the duty of the court to pronounce the office vacant, and to fill the vacancy under the statute. The court say that they do not understand that because a board of commissioners have decided to lay out a road, and then proceed to inquire whether other towns should defray part of the expense, they may not, upon further investigation, reconsider their original intention to lay the road; that the statute contemplates but one report, and until that is made to the court, commissioners may change it if they think proper. The petition of Nashua, 12 N. H., 425, was for leave to discontinue a highway, and commissioners to whom it was referred reported in favor of the discontinuance; but as one of the commissioners was a resident of Nashua, the report was rejected, the court holding that a majority could not act unless the matter was heard and considered by a full board, all of whom were competent to act.

The court concludes by saying :

Upon the whole, we think that by the removal of the chairman from the county his office ipso facto became vacant, and the others had no power to complete the proceedings by the making of a report.

We should have been glad to have found some satisfactory ground on which the report could have been sustained, but have been unable to do so. What remained to be done was of a substantial character; and should the report now be sustained, it would be difficult to fix any limits beyond which the majority of the board could not go, after the office of one member had become vacant.

The same principle is laid down in the following cases :

Schenck vs. Peay, 1 Woolworth, 175. Opinion Mr. Justice Miller.

Same case, 1 Dillon, 267.

Pell vs. Ullman, 21 Barb., 500.

State vs. Deliesseline, 1 McCord, 52, and criticism upon same by Judge Dillon, in note to Dillon on Mun. Corp., sec. 220.

In Schenck vs. Peay, (1 Woolworth, C. C. Rep., 175,) Mr. Justice Miller says :

We understand it to be well settled that where authority of this kind is conferred on three or more persons, in order to make its exercise valid all must be present and participate, or have an opportunity to participate, in the proceedings, although some may dissent from the action determined on. The action of two out of three commissioners, to all of whom was confided a power to be exercised, cannot be upheld when the third party took no part in the transaction and was ignorant of what was done, gave no implied consent to the action of the others, and was neither consulted by them nor had any opportunity to exert his legitimate influence in the determination of the course to be pursued. Such is the uncontradicted course of the authorities, so far as we are advised, where the power conferring the authority has not prescribed a different rule. (2 Kent's Commentaries, 293, note a, 633, and authorities cited there, note b ; Commonwealth vs. Canal Commissioners, 9 Watts, 466 ; Green vs. Miller, 6 Johnson, 39 ; Kirk vs. Ball, 12 Eng. L. & E., 385 ; Crocker vs. Crane, 21 Wendell, 211 ; Dougherty vs. Hope, 1 Comstock, 79, 252 ; ib., 3 Denio, 252, 259.)

The case before us goes even beyond this, for, according to the statement of the bill, there never was a board of commissioners in existence until after the proceedings in regard to his title were completed. The law required three commissioners. A less number was not a board and could do nothing. The third commissioner for Arkansas, although nominated and confirmed, did not qualify or enter upon the duties of his office until after the sale of the lots to the defendants. There was, therefore, no board of commissioners in existence authorized to assess the tax, to receive the money, or to sell the property. If Congress had intended to confide these important functions to two persons, it would not have required the appointment of the third. If it had been willing that two out of the three should act, the statute could easily have made provision for that contingency, as has since been done by the act of 1865.

II.

If William Pitt Kellogg was, at the time of the meeting of the electoral college of Louisiana, governor of that State, he was, under the laws of Louisiana, disqualified as an elector.

Constitution of La., Art. 117.

If, on the other hand, his appointment as an elector vacated his office as governor, the lists certified to by him as governor are ineffectual, because he was not then governor.

BRIEF No. 6.

SUBMITTED BY COUNSEL FOR OBJECTORS TO CERTIFICATE NO. 1 IN THE CASE OF THE STATE OF OREGON.

In the matter of the electoral vote of the State of Oregon.

ARGUMENT.

We claim that the three votes given for Hayes and Wheeler by William H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and John W. Watts are not the electoral votes of the State of Oregon, but that the three electoral votes cast—two for Hayes and Wheeler and one for Tilden and Hendricks—by E. A. Cronin, J. N. T. Miller, and John Parker—are the true and valid electoral votes of the State of Oregon.

Our inquiry is thus divisible into three branches, viz :

First. Was John W. Watts duly appointed and had he the right to vote as an elector of the State of Oregon at the recent presidential election ?

Secondly. Was E. A. Cronin duly appointed, and had he the right to cast a vote as an elector of the State of Oregon at said election ?

Thirdly. Which was the electoral college of the State of Oregon, that composed of Odell, Cartwright, and Watts, or that composed of Cronin, Miller, and Parker ?

Of these, in their order, we say :

I.

That John W. Watts was not duly appointed, and that he had no right to vote as an elector for the State of Oregon, at the recent election for President and Vice-President of the United States.

His claim of title to this office is twofold. First, by force of the votes of the qualified electors of the State of Oregon cast in his favor at the election held on Tuesday, November 7, 1876; and, secondly, in virtue of the attempted organization on December 6, 1876, by Odell, Cartwright, and Watts, as the electoral college of Oregon, and his resignation and re-election by Odell and Cartwright to fill a supposed vacancy.

Of these claims, in their order, we say :

1. It is not denied that at the election held in the State of Oregon on Tuesday, November 7, 1876, a majority of the votes of the qualified electors were given in favor of John W. Watts.

It cannot be denied that at that time and at least until November 13, 1876, John W. Watts was the incumbent of the office of postmaster at Yamhill, the county-seat of La Fayette County, in the State of Oregon, an office of trust and profit under the United States.

Our contention is that while Watts held this office he could not be "appointed" an elector, and that the attempt to appoint him was during the time when he was laboring under such disqualification.

The provision of the Constitution in this regard (article 2, section 1) is in these words :

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

In form this provision of disqualification is mandatory,

First, because it is coupled with the grant of power to appoint electors by the word "but," which indicates that it is a qualification, diminution, and limitation of the powers granted in preceding words.

Secondly, because it is clothed in negative language.

Sedgwick on Const. & Stat. Law, 370.

Cooley on Const. Lim., 75.

From these expressions the conclusion is sometimes drawn that "negative words will make a statute imperative," which is incontestable.

* * * Negative words will make a statute imperative, and it is apprehended affirmative may, if they are absolute, explicit, and peremptory, and show that no discretion is intended to be given, and especially so when jurisdiction is conferred. Potter's Dwaris on Statutes, 228; Rex vs. Justices of Leicester, 7 B. & C., 6, 12.

In substance, this provision of disqualification is imperative, and admits of no evasion.

Lord Mansfield distinguished mandatory from directory clauses in statutes by dividing "circumstances which are of the essence of a thing required to be done by act of Parliament from clauses merely directory." Rex vs. Loxdale, 1 Burr, 447.

First, considerations relating to the character of the provision, as shown by the Constitution itself, fix its meaning. The grant of power is "to each State"—to each State in its organized governmental, or if we may be allowed the expression, corporate capacity; and the limitation, in like manner, is of the action of the State in the same capacity. The restriction in the choice of electors does not merely work a disqualification of the candidate, nor does it bind merely the voters of the State; for, by the Constitution, the manner of appointing electors may be directed by the legislature of the State, and as was done in Colorado at this election, and formerly in most, if not all the States, need not be left to popular choice at all—it binds the State itself, binds it in its entire action from first to last, binds it in all its departments, binds all its functionaries. This is clearly shown by the distinction taken in the provision itself between the appointing power, which is confided to "each State," and the power to direct the manner of appointment, which is given to the "legislature thereof;" it is further indicated by the subsequent use of the word "State:" "Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

Again, the limitation is upon the action of the State: "No person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector." The State may act so as to appoint electors, but such action shall not have the effect to establish the appointment of any such disqualified person. Again, the limitation works by taking from or carving out of the granted power; it establishes a province into which the power may not extend; it establishes a class of persons from among whom the appointment may not be made, and thus another class from which only it may be made. Each State may appoint, but not from the disqualified class. This is equivalent to saying that each State may appoint from among the whole body of citizens other than the disqualified class.

This, then, is the power as determined by the letter and spirit of the words used, viz: Each State may appoint from among persons not disqualified, in the manner directed by its legislature, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

Secondly, this conclusion follows from the consideration of the reasons for the disqualification; of the mischiefs sought to be prevented by its enactment. The purpose of our wise forefathers was to exclude the possibility, so far as this provision could have effect, of the interference of the officers controlling the Federal Government and its agencies, even with the assent of any State or number of States, to perpetuate their own power. The apprehension of our forefathers was that Federal officers might use the power conferred upon them for the purposes of Federal trust, to prevent the free action of the States in the choice of electors.

Time has not weakened the force of their reasoning; experience has not shown the futility of their apprehensions. To-day we are confronted by this danger, grown into colossal proportions by the augmentation of Federal power and the increased number of Federal functionaries. If it be suggested that the plan of our fathers to avert the peril is insufficient, we answer that the suggestion itself requires a liberal construction of the provision, so that it may have at least all reasonable potency in the prescribed direction toward the desired end.

The history of the disqualifying proviso seems to be this: On July 19, Mr. Gerry and Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved "that the electors of the Executive shall not be members of the National Legislature, nor officers of the United States, nor shall the electors themselves be eligible to the Supreme Magistracy." Agreed to nem. con. (Madison Papers, 343.)

On Thursday, September 6, Mr. Rufus King and Mr. Gerry moved to insert in the fourth clause of the report, (see the 4th of September, page 507,) after the words "may be entitled in the legislature," the words following: "But no person shall be appointed an elector who is a member of the legislature of the United States, or who holds any office of profit or trust under the United States," which passed nem. con. (Madison Papers, 515.)

Several postmasters were chosen electors at the presidential election of 1836, and on January 27, 1837, on motion of Henry Clay, the joint committee of the Senate and House to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes of President and Vice-President of the United States were instructed by the Senate also "to inquire into the expediency of ascertaining whether any votes were given at the recent election contrary to the prohibition contained in the second section of the second article of the Constitution; and if any such votes were given, what ought to be done with them; and whether any and what provision ought to be made for securing the faithful observance, in future, of that section of the Constitution.

Felix Grundy, Henry Clay, and Silas Wright were appointed to this committee on the part of the Senate; Francis Thomas, Churchill C. Cambreleng, John Reed, Henry W. Connor, and Francis S. Lyon (of whom the latter is still living, at great age, in the State of Alabama) were the members of this committee on behalf of the House.

On February 4, 1837, Mr. Grundy submitted to the Senate the report of the committee, from which we make the following quotations:

That the short period at which they were appointed, before the day on which the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States have to be counted, have prevented them from investigating the facts submitted to their examination as fully as might have been done had more time been allowed. The correspondence which has taken place between the chairman of the committee and the heads of the different departments of the Executive branch of the Government accompanies this report, from which it appears * * * that in two cases persons of the same names with the individuals who were appointed and voted as electors in the State of North Carolina held the office of deputy postmasters under the General Government. It also appears that in New Hampshire there is one case; in Connecticut there is one case; in North Carolina there is one case, in which, from the report of the Postmaster-General, it is probable that at the time of the appointment of electors in these States, respectively, the electors or persons of the same name were deputy postmasters. The committee have not ascertained whether the electors are the same individuals who held or are presumed to have held the office of deputy postmasters at the time when the appointment of electors was made; and this is the less to be regretted, as it is confidently believed that no change in the result of the election of either the President or Vice-President would be effected by the ascertainment of the fact in either way, as five or six votes only would, in any event, be abstracted from the whole number, for the committee cannot adopt the opinion, entertained by some, that a single illegal vote would vitiate the whole electoral vote of the college of electors in which it was given, particularly in cases where the vote of the whole college has been given for the same persons.

The committee are of opinion that the second section of the second article of the Constitution, which declares that "no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector," ought to be carried, in its whole spirit, into rigid execution, in order to prevent officers of the General Government from bringing their official power to influence the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States. This provision of the Constitution, it is believed, excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors; and the disqualification relates to the time of the appointment, and that a resignation of the office of deputy postmaster after his appointment as elector would not entitle him to vote as elector under the Constitution.

In the debate ensuing in the House of Representatives upon the report of this joint committee, Mr. Francis Thomas, chairman of the House committee, said that "the committee came unanimously to the conclusion that they (the postmasters in question) were not eligible at the time they were elected, and therefore the whole proceeding was vitiated ab initio."

Fortunately or unfortunately, our American habit of not providing by legislation in advance for apprehended dangers controlled Congress in 1837, and inasmuch as the eligibility or non-eligibility of the five postmasters chosen electors made no difference in the result of the election, Congress passed to its more immediate business without legislating, as Mr. Clay proposed, with reference to cases of disqualification.

(See Gales & Seaton's Register of Debates in Congress, vol. 13, part 1, pp. 617, 698; part 2, p. 1583.)

2. The attempt to elect this disqualified person Watts cannot be treated as if it had any legal effect, unless it were (and this we shall consider in a subsequent part of our argument) to prevent the choice of the next highest competitor.

It was a mere nullity, incapable of ratification or any process of healing. A violation of the Federal Constitution is a wrong which can never ripen into a right; a malady which must necessarily be fatal to the diseased part. As the provision of the Constitution is not merely a disqualification of the candidate, but a limitation of the power of the State, it follows that the action of the State in the appointment of a disqualified person to be an elector, even if consummate and complete in form, has such defect of substance that in law it is a mere nullity, utterly void, and of no effect. It is in law as if it had not been in fact, at least so far as concerns the election of the disqualified candidate.

Any other construction would destroy the whole force of the constitutional inhibition. Like the other inhibitory clauses of the Constitution, this is self-enforcing.

3. The disability relates to the time of the election, and is not cured by subsequent resignation of the disqualifying office.

By the Constitution the manner of appointing electors is left to the direction of the legislatures of the States, but "Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States."

That the words "choosing" and "appointing" are convertible terms, used in the same sense, is obvious from the fact that the manner of appointing (or choosing) is not specified; "choosing" therefore means appointing in such manner as the legislatures of the States may direct.

Congress has determined the time of choosing the electors, viz, by section 131 of the Revised Statutes, now in force:

SEC. 131. Except in case of a presidential election, prior to the ordinary period, as specified in sections 147 to 149 inclusive, when the offices of President and Vice-President both become vacant, the electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed in each State on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November in every fourth year succeeding every election of a President and Vice-President.

In the act of March 1, 1792, the same language was used, viz: "Electors shall be appointed in each State for the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December, 1792, and within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December in every fourth year succeeding the last election."

So also in the act of January 23, 1845, "that the electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed in each State on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November of the year in which they are to be appointed."

It follows that the appointment must be complete on the day prescribed by the act of Congress, and that whatever may be done after that date is not part of the appointment, but is rather the ascertaining who was then appointed. The principle is well stated in McWhirter vs. Brainard, 5 Oreg., 426, thus: "The mode of canvassing the vote and the proclamation of the governor are substantially only modes of ascertaining and publishing the result of the vote."

We have already seen what was the opinion upon this subject of Felix Grundy, Henry Clay, and Silas Wright, and of their associates, the members of the committee from the House of Representatives in 1837.

The same doctrine was held in the case of Searcy vs. Grow, 15 Cal., 118, where the opinion was pronounced by Baldwin, J.; Cope, J., and Field, C. J., concurring. It was a contest for the office of sheriff of Siskiyou County. Grow had been returned as elected to the office. At the time of the election he was postmaster in the town of Yreka, the compensation of which exceeded five hundred dollars per annum. The court below found for Searcy, and Grow appealed. The constitution of California provides that "no person holding any lucrative office under the United States or in their power shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this State, provided that offices in the militia to which there is attached no annual salary, or local officers, and postmasters whose compensation does not exceed five hundred dollars per annum, shall not be deemed lucrative." Grow was postmaster at the time of the election, but had resigned at the time of his qualification. The supreme court unanimously confirmed the judgment of the court below.

In the opinion Justice Baldwin says, (page 121,) "The people in this case were clothed with this power of choice. Their selection of a candidate gave him all the claim to the office which he has. His title to the office comes from their designation of him as sheriff. But they could not designate or choose a man not eligible—that is, not capable of being selected. They might select any man they chose, subject only to this exception: that the man they selected was capable of taking what they had the power to give. We do not see how the fact that he became capable of taking office after they had exercised their power can avail the appellant. If he was not eligible at the time the votes were cast for him, the election failed. We do not see how it can be assumed that by the act of the candidate the votes which, when cast, were ineffectual because not given for a qualified candidate, became effectual to elect him to office."

In The People vs. Pease, 27 New York, 55, it is said that it is the vote of the people which confers title to an elective officer. "It is not the canvass, or estimate, or certificate which determines the right. These are only evidences of the right."

So, also, in Mayfield vs. Moore, 53 Ill., 428, the court say, "Under the law, so soon as a majority of the votes were cast for appellant, at the election held in pursuance to law, he became legally and fully entitled to the office. The title was as complete then as it ever was, and no subsequent act lent the least force to the right of the place. The commission was evidence of the title, but not the title. The title was conferred by the people, and the evidence of the right by the law." To the same effect see Laimbeer vs. Swineburne, 48 Illinois, 400; State ex rel. Cornwell vs. Allen, 21 Indiana, 516; Shannon vs. Baker, 33 do., 380; State vs. Steers, 44 Missouri, 223.

So also in the case of the State of Nevada ex rel. Nourse vs. Clarke, (3 Nev., 566,) the supreme court of Nevada held that a person holding the office of United States district attorney on the day of election was incapable of being chosen to the office of attorney-general of the State, because of a provision in the State constitution to the effect that no Federal office-holder "shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this State." "Which word 'eligible,'" says this learned court, "means capable both of being legally chosen and capable of legally holding."

Since the election of November 7, 1876, the subject has been considered by the supreme court of Rhode Island, in the matter of George H. Corliss. (16 American Law Register, N. S., 15, number for January, 1877.) Corliss was a Centennial commissioner on November 7, 1876, when the qualified voters of Rhode Island cast a majority of their votes for him for the office of presidential elector. The governor, under the laws of Rhode Island, submitted to the supreme court five questions, the answers to which were to guide his action in making the required executive lists of electors appointed. Of these the third, upon the assumption that the court should answer that the office was one of trust and profit under the Constitution of the United States, was: "Is the disqualification removed by the resignation of said office of trust and profit?" There was a dissenting opinion of one judge out of five in answer to the first question, but all agreed in answering the third question as follows:

We think the disqualification is not removed by the resignation of the office of trust unless the office is resigned before the election. The language of the constitution is that "no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector." Under our law (Gen. Stats., ch. 11, sects. 1 and 2,) the election by the people constitutes the appointment. The duty of the governor is to examine and count the votes, and give notice to the elector. He merely ascertains, he does not complete, the appointment. A resignation, therefore, after the election is too late to be effectual.

The manner of appointing electors in Oregon is precisely similar to that adopted in Rhode Island. It has been directed by the legislature by section 1 of chapter 44, page 848, of the general laws of Oregon, as follows:

On the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1864, and every four years thereafter, there shall be elected by the qualified electors of the State as many electors of President and Vice-President as this State may be entitled to elect of Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Therefore if Postmaster Watts was not qualified to be "chosen," "appointed," "elected," on November 7, 1876, he was not chosen, appointed, or elected on that day, and no subsequent resignation of his disqualifying office could, by relation, or any nunc pro tunc action, avoid the operation of the two peremptory constitutional requirements, viz, that he should be qualified when appointed, and that the time of his appointment should be on the day determined by the Congress.

4. The disqualification of Watts did not create a case of vacancy, but of non-election, if not of the election of the next highest competing candidate.

It can hardly be claimed that in principle a different result flows from the disqualification of part of the electoral college, from that which would be the consequence if every elector were disqualified.

If every elector appointed in every State were disqualified, there would be no election.

If every elector appointed in any one State were disqualified, the case would fall within the contingency contemplated in section 134 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 134. Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day, in such a manner as the legislature of such State may direct.

This is a different power, and relates to a different class of cases from that contemplated in section 133 :

SEC. 133. Each State may, by law, provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors, when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

Omne majus continet in se minus. If it be true that whenever a State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice of any qualified electors on the day prescribed by law, the case is governed by section 134, then it follows that the same is true, pro tanto, in the case of the failure to make the choice of all the electors to which the State is entitled from among the class of persons qualified under the Constitution ; in other words, in the case of the choice of one or more disqualified electors.

The distinction here made is between an election held on the day prescribed by law, resulting in a tie vote, or the election of one or more disqualified persons, (a case governed by section 134,) and an election held at the appointed time, resulting in the election of the full number of qualified electors, after which, and at the time when the electoral college meets to give its electoral vote, a vacancy shall occur. This case is governed by section 133. These provisions of law, now separated from each other by being cast in the revision of the statutes into two sections, may be found in the original form in the act of January 23, 1845, the whole of which is as follows :

AN ACT to establish a uniform time for holding elections for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States.

SEC. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed in each State on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November of the year in which they are to be appointed: Provided, That each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancy or vacancies which may occur in its college of electors, when such college meets to give its electoral vote: And provided also, When any State shall have held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and shall fail to make a choice on the day aforesaid, then the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the State shall by law provide.

Approved January 23, 1845.

And this was the act in force when Oregon adopted its statute relative to vacancies in the electoral college. It will appear that whereas Rhode Island, as shown by the Corliss case, enacted laws to meet both the contingencies named in the act of 1845, Oregon made provision only for the case of vacancy "which might occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote."

Without the election of a qualified candidate, there can be no vacancy. A vacancy only occurs where the office has been once filled by the election of a qualified incumbent.

The case of George H. Corliss, already referred to, is exactly in point. The second question propounded by the governor to the judges of the supreme court of Rhode Island was in these words :

Does such a candidate [one disqualified by holding an office of trust or profit] for the office of elector, who receives a plurality of the legal votes given, and declines said office, create thereby such a vacancy as is provided for in section 7, chapter II of the General Statutes ?

This was answered, by the unanimous voice of the judges, thus :

We think a centennial commissioner, who was a candidate for the office of elector, and received a plurality of the votes, does not, by declining the office, create such a vacancy as is provided for in Gen. Stats., ch. 11, sect. 7. Section 7 is as follows :

"If a y electors, chosen as aforesaid, shall, after their said election, decline the said office, or be prevented by any cause from serving therein, the other electors, when met in Bristol in pursuance of this chapter, shall fill such vacancies, and shall file a certificate in the secretary's office of the person or persons by them appointed."

Before any person can decline under this section he must first be elected, and no person can be elected who is ineligible, or in other words incapable of being elected. "Resignation," said Cockburn, C. J., in The Queen vs. Blizzard, Law Rep., 2, Q. B., 55, "implies that the person resigning has been elected into the office he resigns. A man cannot resign that which he is not entitled to, and which he has no right to occupy."

The fifth question propounded to the judges by the governor of Rhode Island was: "If by reason of the disqualification of the candidate who received a plurality of the votes given there was no election, can the general assembly in grand committee elect an elector?"

To which the judges, without dissent, made answer:

Our statute (Gen. Stat., ch. 11, sec. 5) provides that if, by reason of the votes being equally divided, or otherwise, there shall not be an election of the number of electors to which the State may be entitled, the governor shall forthwith convene the general assembly at Providence for the choice of electors to fill such vacancy by an election in grand committee.

We think this provision covers the contingency which has happened, and that, therefore, the general assembly in grand committee can elect an elector to fill up the number to which the State is entitled. The law of the United States provides that "whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors and has failed to make choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day, in such manner as the legislature of the State may direct."

A vacancy was defined by Sawyer, Chief-Justice, in People vs. Tilton, (37 Cal., 617,) as follows: "A vacancy in the statutory sense is when the party enters upon the duties of the office, and afterwards dies, resigns, or in any manner ceases to be an incumbent of the office before the expiration of the term."

In Miller vs. The Supervisor of Sacramento County, (25 Cal., 93,) it was held that "one who has been elected to an office cannot resign the same until the time has arrived when he is entitled by law to possess the same, and has given oath, filed the bond required, and entered upon the discharge of its duties."

In Broom vs. Hanley, (9 Penn. St., 513,) it was decided that even death, after a lawful election and before qualification, does not create an incumbent of the office, nor does it create a vacancy which can be filled by appointment, where the law authorizes vacancies to be so filled.

Article 1, section 3, of the Constitution provides that if vacancies happen in the Senate by "resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

Under this power, it has been held that the State executive cannot fill a vacancy in the Senate unless there has been an incumbent of the term, and the incumbent has ceased to hold during the recess of the legislature.—Lanman's case, Clarke & Hall, 871; Story on the Constitution, sec. 1559; Sergeant's Const. Law, (2d ed.,) 373. See also Schenck vs. Peay, 1 Dillon, 267; State vs. Benedict, 15 Minn., 199; Battle vs. McIver, 68 N. The statutes of Oregon contemplate but one election of electors. The provision in this regard is express and peremptory:

On the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1864, and every four years thereafter, there shall be elected, by the qualified electors of this State, as many electors of President and Vice-President as this State may be entitled to elect of Senators and Representatives in Congress.

“Shall be elected,” “as many electors”—this is the mandate of Oregon. But there were not on November 7, 1876, (unless Cronin was duly elected, of which hereafter,) elected “as many electors” as Oregon was entitled to elect of Senators and Representatives in Congress. There were elected but two electors; whereas Oregon is entitled to elect two Senators and one Representative in Congress. It follows that on November 7, 1876, there was in Oregon a case falling directly within section 134 of the Revised Statutes. Oregon had “held an election for the purpose of choosing electors” and had “failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law.”

But while Oregon has provided by law for “the filling of vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when said college meets to give its electoral vote,” as contemplated in section 133, it has taken no steps whatever to meet the contingency which actually happened—happened on November 7, 1876, by the non-election of the third elector—happened twenty-nine days before its college of electors met to give its electoral vote.

This provision of Oregon law is to be found in the compilation of the general laws, page 849, chapter 45, section 2, as follows :

The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of 12 of the clock at noon of that day, and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college, and when all the electors shall appear, and the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled, as above provided, such electors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Had the legislature of Oregon intended to authorize any vacancy, however caused, to be filled by the electors present, they would not have used the words: “If there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise,” for the words “occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise,” are entirely superfluous upon this theory. For the sentence would then have read: “If there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill by viva voce and plurality of votes such vacancy in the electoral college.” The use of these words, “occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise,” indicates that there are cases of vacancy which the electors may not fill, and this view is strengthened by the character of the vacancies thus described, the three named, death, refusal to act, and neglect to attend, being all the results of events occurring after the election. The words “or otherwise,” upon canons of interpretation well known to every lawyer, cannot enlarge the preceding words so as to make them apply to every case of vacancy, but only refer to other like cases depending upon conditions similar to the enumerated cases. The maxim applicable is noscitur a sociis. So a statute treating of “deans, prebendaries, parsons, vicars, and others having spiritual promotion,” is held not to extend to bishops, though they have spiritual promotion, deans being the highest persons named, and bishops being of a still higher order. (1 Blackstone’s Comm., 88.)

The word “otherwise” here means “other causes;” but whether all other causes, or only some other causes, is the question. If “some other causes” is meant, as has been already shown, then the maxim already quoted indicates what other causes. “Ex antecedentibus et consequentibus fit optima interpretatio.”

If it be said that "otherwise" is a general term, we answer, "Verba generalia restringuntur ad habilitatem rei vel personam."

Broom's Legal Maxims, 565, 620.

Coe vs. Columbus, Piq. & Ind. R. R. Co., 10 Ohio St., 377, 378.

In point of fact, Odell and Cartwright did not assume to appoint Watts to a vacancy under the "otherwise" clause of the statute, but accepted his resignation, and then elected him to fill a vacancy created by his voluntary assumption or pretense of office and resignation.

Thus far we have been considering this claim of vacancy as if the quoted section of the Oregon laws were the only statutory provision thereto relating.

It may be claimed, however, that this vacancy is controlled by chapter 13, title 7, "Of vacancies," sec. 45:

Every office shall become vacant on the happening of either of the following events, before the expiration of the term of such office:

1. The death of the incumbent.

2. His resignation.

7. The decision of a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment.

We do not consider this provision of law applicable to electors for vacancies in whose offices special provision is made by chapter 44, section 2, but if it be, we answer, first, that Watts was never "the incumbent;" and, secondly, that there was and could have been no competent tribunal declaring void his appointment after he became incumbent; and, thirdly, the constitutional inhibition does not operate through the instrumentality of a judgment of conviction or ouster, but works by self-enforcement, (as we shall more fully show hereafter,) rendering nugatory the conflicting appointment.

5. The resignation of Watts did not take effect so as to relieve him from "holding an office of trust or profit under the United States" until his successor was elected and qualified, which was after he had cast his vote as an elector.

Revised Statutes, section 3836:

Whenever the office of any postmaster becomes vacant, the Postmaster-General or the President shall supply such vacancy without delay, and the Postmaster-General shall promptly notify the Sixth Auditor of the change; and every postmaster and his sureties shall be responsible under their bond for the safe-keeping of the public property of the post-office, and the due performance of the duties thereof, until the expiration of the commission, or until a successor has been duly appointed and qualified, and has taken possession of the office; except, that in cases where there is a delay of sixty days in supplying a vacancy, the sureties may terminate their responsibility by giving notice, in writing, to the Postmaster-General, and the Postmaster-General may, when the exigencies of the occasion require, place such office in charge of a special agent until the vacancy can be regularly filled; and when such special agent shall have taken charge of such post-office, the liability of the sureties of the postmaster shall cease.

ARE THE INHIBITORY CLAUSES OF THE CONSTITUTION SELF-ENFORCING ?

We had not supposed that the negative of this proposition would be maintained, but Groves vs. Slaughter has been referred to as if it countenanced such denial.

But Groves vs. Slaughter did not relate to an inhibitory, but to a mandatory clause, and, what is even more significant, mandatory upon the legislature. The clause construed was in the constitution of Mississippi:

The introduction of slaves into this State as merchandise or for sale shall be prohibited from and after the first day of May, 1833.

And the passage quoted from Groves vs. Slaughter admits "that the constitution is mandatory upon the legislature." But inhibitions are not merely mandates; they are limitations of power, thrown into the negative and inhibitory form for the very purpose of rendering them self-enforcing, so that no legislation might be needed (not but that it might be appropriate in proper cases) for their enforcement, and so that all legislation or public or private action in conflict with them, might be absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes, de jure et de facto.

The express inhibitions, such as ex post facto laws, laws impairing the obligation of contracts, treaties between States, export duties, titles of nobility, bills of credit emitted by States, State tariffs, these and the like are inhibited, and by reason of the inhibitions, are utterly without legal force, nec jure neque facto.

In like manner with the implied inhibitions. When was it ever held that a State law taxing Federal agencies protected anybody? These, also, need no aid of legislation, but all laws, or public or private action in conflict with them, are void de jure et de facto.

The inhibitions relating to office are in like manner self-enforcing. They differ only in this, that they point to and operate at different stages, and therefore render the action they inhibit either absolutely void or voidable according to the time at which it may be impugned. Thus—

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, &c.

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, &c.

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress or elector of President and Vice-President, &c., who, having personally taken an oath, &c., to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion, &c.

In these cases, the operation of the Constitution is to render the original election voidable, action under it void; in other words, to render the election void, unless the condition of disability be removed before the candidate shall be Representative, Senator, or elector.

This is rendered very plain by reference to article 1, section 6.

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

Read now in connection with this the clause under discussion, and what room is left for controversy?

But no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

In Morgan vs. Vance, 4 Bush, 323, the court of appeals of Kentucky held (p. 330) that—

So far as the constitution requires of all officers to take the prescribed oath, and so far as it provides disqualifications upon acts and not upon judgment of conviction, the constitution, as the supreme law of the land, executes itself without any extraneous aid by way of legislation, nor can its requirements be so defeated.

The view we are presenting derives strong support from the re-examination of this subject by the court of appeals of Kentucky, in the case of Commonwealth vs. Jones, 10 Bush, 725. Section 20 of the article of the constitution of Kentucky provides that—

Any person, who shall * * either directly or indirectly give, accept, or knowingly carry a challenge to any person or persons to fight in single combat with a citizen of this State * * * shall be deprived of the right to hold any office of honor or profit in this commonwealth, and shall be punished otherwise in such manner as this general assembly shall prescribe by law.

The court held this provision

Not self-executing, except to the extent that persons who cannot or will not take the constitutional oath are thereby prevented from holding office.

Upon page 738, the court (Lindsay, J.,) say :

Upon the other hand, if, instead of the phrase "shall be deprived," the word "ineligible," or the phrase "shall not be eligible," had been used in section 20, some of the difficulties attending the argument to show that it is self-executing would have been obviated. We have already shown that the change of language or phraseology in this regard was deliberate and intentional, and that apt and appropriate words are used to show that participation in a duel between citizens of the State was intended to be treated as a public offense, and that the deprivation of the right to hold office is a penalty or punishment to be inflicted upon those who may be guilty of said offense.

Even the third clause of article 4, section 2, providing for the rendition of fugitives from slavery was held by no less an authority than Joseph Story to be self-enforcing.

Prigg vs. Pennsylvania, 16 Peters, 613.

See, also, Dill vs. Ellicot, Taney's Decisions, 233.

Upon this principle only can be preserved in its full vigor the authority which the second clause of the sixth article declares: "This Constitution * * * shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

How can legislation add to the force of the inhibition? Of what character shall it be? Would the repetition of the inhibition or the addition of penalties lend it more vigor? Would an act antecedently passed enable the proof of violation to be more clearly made than the powers of Congress and the act creating this Commission already provide?

If it be sought to support the action of the disqualified candidate by the judgment of the canvassing officer, we answer in the language of the court of appeals of Kentucky, in Patterson vs. Miller, &c., 2 Metc. Ky., 497:

The certificate which the examining board issues to a candidate that he is elected to the office of sheriff—although conclusive evidence that he was elected thereto, unless his election be contested before the proper board—is not even prima facie evidence that he was eligible to the office.

II.

E. A. Cronin was duly appointed, and had the right to cast his vote as an elector of the State of Oregon.

Watts received 15,206 and Cronin 14,157 votes at the election held upon November 7, 1876. Watts having been shown to have been disqualified, and the votes cast for him therefore being null and void, our contention is that, by the laws of Oregon, Cronin was elected and entitled to cast his vote as an elector.

It will not be contended that it was necessary for Cronin to receive the votes of a majority of all the legal voters casting their vote at the November election. Such is the law in some of the New England States at elections for Representatives in Congress and State and county officers; such is the law, also, in the election of United States Senators, (Revised Statutes, sec. 15,) and this principle explains in part the judgment of the Senate in the case of Abbott and Vance. But such is not the rule at presidential elections. It has often happened that the minority of the people have by plurality of votes chosen electors in the States. Thus, in 1848, in Ohio and several other States, the Cass electors were elected by a plurality of votes in preference to the Taylor electors, the Van Buren electors receiving a much larger number of votes than their plurality. There is, therefore, nothing in American public law to prevent the choice of electors by a minority of popular votes in a State any more than to forbid the choice of a President, as in the case of Mr. Lincoln's first election, by a minority of the total popular vote.

Nor, according to our antagonists, is a majority voting for an ineligible candidate required to defeat an election. On the contrary, our learned opponents must contend that even if the majority of qualified voters desire to elect, and so vote, yet if they divide their votes among several, so that a mere plurality, less than a majority, has supported the disqualified candidate, this plurality, if insufficient to elect, suffices to defeat the next highest competitor, and to force a new election upon the majority.

It may also happen that more than the number of electors to which a State is legally entitled may receive each more than a majority of the votes cast.

Thus, we may suppose, that in the State of Oregon, where there are three electors to be chosen, twenty thousand votes may be cast, divided among six candidates: A, B, and C receive each 9,800 votes; D, E, and F receive 9,700 votes. The remaining 500 votes may be thus distributed: To A, B, and D 200 votes; to A, C, and D 200 votes; and to B, C, and D 100 votes. The result will be: For A, 10,200; for B, 10,100; for C, 10,100, and for D, 10,200 votes. Supposing, now, that A were disqualified by holding a Federal office, who would be elected, and which rule ought to be adopted? that which rejects A as disqualified, and B and C as not elected, by reason of the votes for them having resulted in a tie, and only D elected; or that which rejects A as disqualified, and returns B, C, and D as elected?

We submit these questions to assist in elucidating the principle which should govern us. Under our present plan, by which the electors are mere automata, registering the decrees of party conventions, this case may be said to be unlikely, although the actual state of the vote in Oregon shows variations in the total number of votes given for the several candidates, thus indicating preferences among the voters even of the same party. And, according to the plan of our forefathers, by which the office of elector was to be a personal trust, confided to the wisest citizens, best qualified to judge of presidential capacity and the fitness of candidates, it would not have been at all unlikely that such a result might be developed by the counting of the ballots.

The principle to govern us must be consistent, first, with the constitutional mandate, "each State shall appoint;" secondly, with the constitutional inhibition, "but no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed;" thirdly, with the rule that a majority vote is not necessary, but a plurality suffices for election; fourthly, with the possibility that a majority of the voters may vote for more than the legal number of electors; and fifthly, with the fact that upon the views of their work entertained by those who made the Constitution, the candidates for electors do not run, like rivals for the office of sheriff, against each other, but the choice is made by selection of the successful candidates out of the whole list of those nominated in that connection.

We respectfully submit that the only rule which fulfills these demands is that which treats votes given in violation of the constitutional prohibition as null and void, and not to be used for any purpose, and we believe this proposition to be sustained by the greater weight, if not the greater number, of both the American and English authorities.

The mandate is explicit, "each State shall appoint." Are we to adopt a principle which will permit the majority or, it may be, the minority, being a plurality, of the voters to prevent the execution of this mandate, to refuse obedience to this command? Were this majority or plurality to stay away from the polls, the minority attending and performing the duty of voting, as good citizens, would constitute the State, at least for this purpose. If the majority or plurality attend, and insist on doing that which is null and void in law, by casting blank pieces of paper as votes, or those which are equivalent to blanks, by not having force to elect because bearing the name of a disqualified candidate, should not the law-obeying minority still be considered the State?

In Oldknow vs. Wainwright, 1 W. Black, 228, S. C., 2 Burr. 1017, it was held by the King's Bench, (Lord Mansfield delivering the judgment,) that where a majority dissent from the election, but vote for no one else, an election by the minority is good.

The mandates of the Federal Constitution, "each State shall appoint;" of the act of Congress, (Revised Statutes, section 131,) "the electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed, in each State, on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November;" and of the State of Oregon, "on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1864, and every four years thereafter, there shall be elected," &c., are equally peremptory. The principle to be adopted must secure, or at least be consistent with obedience to this command. And for this reason, to enforce easy and certain obedience to the command, the public law of the United States has adopted the plurality principle in the choice of electors.

The inhibition is equally explicit. "But no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector." The principle to be adopted must enforce this inhibition in its full vigor and effect.

No other rule has this effect, except that which treats the votes cast for an ineligible candidate as in law blanks, which, not having been given in obedience to the mandate "shall elect," and having been cast in disobedience to the inhibition, have no legal force to elect an ineligible, nor to defeat an eligible candidate, and counts only the efficient votes, votes given to elect, not to defeat an election, to obey, not to frustrate the execution of the constitutional mandate.

And such is the weight of American authority, and to this conclusion, as one of general public law, would this Commission be forced to come, were the question directly before them for consideration, unaided by the action of the competent political authority in Oregon, which, as we shall show, is decisive of the rule as it prevails in that State.

The earliest American decision upon this subject was made by one of the greatest lawyers of the revolutionary period, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, Chief Justice Samuel Chase, of Maryland, the attempt at whose impeachment when a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States furnishes such a large item in the early judicial history of this country. That Chief Justice Samuel Chase was a lawyer of the first rank nobody has ever ventured to deny; but his violent temper exposed him to an attack which nearly cost him his high judicial position. In the case of Hutcheson vs. Tilden and Bordley, (4 Harris & McHenry's Rep., 279,) the defendants, being judges of the sheriffs' election, on the first Monday of October, 1794, declared Jones and Hall duly elected sheriffs of the county of Kent, although Hutcheson had more votes than either of them, on the ground that he was ineligible to election by want of sufficient qualification in real and personal estate, as required by law, whereupon Hutcheson sued Tilden and Bordley in an action on the case for damages for refusing to return him as sheriff elect. Chief Justice Chase, after stating the qualification required by the constitution, says:

All votes given for a candidate not having such qualifications are to be thrown away and rejected as having no force or operation in law. The plaintiff can only be entitled to such votes as were given after he received the necessary qualifications, all votes in his favor previous being illegal and void.

The report says that—

The plaintiff had received the necessary qualifications about 12 o'clock on the third day of the election, and, from the state of the polls, if he had received all the votes taken after that time, he could not be elected. Therefore there was verdict and judgment for the defendants.

This decision is the law of Maryland to day, and has been applied in several cases, in more recent times, by the legislative department of that State.

In the constitution of Maryland, as it was in 1865, was contained the following provision of disqualification:

If any person has given any aid, comfort, countenance, or support to those engaged in armed hostility to the United States, or has, by any open deed or word, declared his adhesion to the cause of the enemies of the United States, or his desire for the triumph of said enemies of the United States, he is disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the laws of this State.

In 1865, Hart B. Holton contested the seat of Littleton Maclin as a senator from Howard County, and claimed the same for himself. It was referred to the Committee on Elections, who reported, first, that although Maclin had received the highest number of legal votes, nevertheless, being disqualified under the quoted provision, he was not entitled to the seat; and, secondly, "that Hart B. Holton, having received the highest number of votes cast for any duly-qualified candidate for senator for Howard County, is declared duly elected, and entitled to a seat in this body as senator from said county."—(Senate Journal, 1865, appendix, document E.)

And on February 14, 1865, this report was adopted by the senate, Maclin unseated and Holton inducted into office.—(Senate Journal, 1865, 116.)

In 1866, in the house of delegates, Thomas A. Spence, now assistant attorney-general for the Post Office Department in this city, successfully contested the office of John R. Franklin as circuit judge of the twelfth judicial circuit of Maryland, on the double ground of disloyalty and the want of the necessary majority of legal votes.—(House Journal of 1866, 412, and appendix, document H.)

In 1866, before the house of delegates, George E. Gambrill contested the office of Sprigg Harwood as clerk of the circuit court for Anne Arundel County, on the ground of constitutional ineligibility caused by an increase in the profits of this clerkship while Harwood was a senator from Anne Arundel County, in 1865. Harwood had received the majority of the legal votes, but the committee on elections reported that Harwood was ineligible; that it "must be presumed to have been known by every voter;" and that Gambrill, the candidate of the minority, was entitled to the place.

And we think—

Say the committee, after stating the rule as we claim it, proceeding to show its convenience—in a case like this, it would be highly inexpedient to submit this matter to another election. The result of the election of an ineligible person is that he enjoys the office until the legislature meets; then, if he is declared out of office, he may again offer himself and hold until the legislature may again assemble, receiving the emoluments until again unseated, and perhaps again offer himself as a candidate with the same thing to go through.

The house of delegates, before which contests of this kind are judicially prosecuted in Maryland, sustained this report, ousted Harwood, voted down a resolution that the office was vacant, and inducted Gambrill.—(House Journal, 1866, 279, 280, 281, 282, document G.)

The same rule prevails in the State of Maine, where it was first decided in 1831. It was in Maine that Governor Grover, of Oregon, was born and received his education, and thence he bore to Oregon the principles of law which guided his action in this case. The first elucidation of law upon this subject in Maine may be found in the opinion of all the judges of the supreme judicial court, viz, Chief-Justice Prentiss Mellen and Justices Nathan Weston and Albion K. Parris, published in the appendix to the seventh volume of Greenleaf's Reports, (pages 497 and 501.)

The governor and council submitted to the judges the following among other questions :

Question 4. Can ballots having the names of persons on them who do not possess the constitutional qualifications of a representative be counted as votes under the fifth section of fourth article, part first, of the constitution of Maine, so as to prevent a majority of the votes given for eligible persons constituting a choice ?

To which the judges, in June, 1831, submitted the following answer, (side page 501 :)

To the fourth question proposed, without a particular statement of reasons, we merely answer in the negative.

The fifth section of the fourth article, part first, of the constitution of Maine, (adopted in 1819,) then in force, was as follows :

The meetings for the choice of representatives shall be warned in due course of law by the selectmen of the several towns seven days at least before the election, and the selectmen thereof shall preside impartially at such meetings, receive the votes of the qualified electors present, sort, count, and declare them in open town meeting and in the presence of the town clerk, who shall, from a list of the persons voted for, with the number of votes for each person against his name, make a fair count thereof in the presence of the selectmen and in open town meeting, and a fair copy of this list shall be attested by the selectmen and town clerk and delivered by said selectmen to each representative within ten days next after such election. And the towns and plantations organized by law, belonging to any class herein provided, shall hold their meetings at the same time in the respective towns and plantations, shall be notified, held, and regulated, the votes received, sorted, counted, and declared in the same manner. And the assessors and clerks of plantations shall have all the powers and be subject to all the duties which selectmen and town clerks have and are subject to under this constitution. And the selectmen of such towns, and the assessors of such towns, and the assessors of such plantations so classed, shall, within four days next after such meeting, meet at some place, to be prescribed and notified by the selectmen or assessors of the eldest town or plantation, in such class, and the copies of said lists shall be then examined and compared; and in case any person shall be elected by a majority of all the votes, the selectmen or assessors shall deliver the certified copies of such lists to the person so elected within ten days next after such election; and the clerks of towns and plantations respectively shall seal up copies of such lists and cause them to be delivered into the secretary's office twenty days at least before the first Wednesday in January annually; but in case no person shall have a majority of votes, the selectmen and assessors shall, as soon as may be, notify another meeting, and the same proceedings shall be had at every future meeting until an election shall have been effected :

Provided, That the legislature may by law prescribe a different mode of returning, examining, and ascertaining the election of the representatives in such.

(Constitution of Maine, article 4, section 5, October 29, 1819.)

Spear vs. Robinson, 29 Maine, 531, (decided in 1849,) is to the same effect. At a town meeting in the town of Warren it was—

Voted to choose a fish committee; voted to choose three for said committee; chose Robert Spear 2d, John G. Hoffses, and Waldo Brackett; voted that two more be added to the fish committee; Larkin Bogs and Joseph Vaughan were chosen. It being ascertained that John G. Hoffses was not a freeholder, Robert McIntyre was chosen one of the fish committee in his stead. (Page 532.)

The court held (page 541) that—

The case shows that the town voted to choose five as their fish committee, and they made choice of five persons; but it appearing that one of those elected was not a freeholder, another was chosen in his stead, and that the plaintiffs are those who were freeholders, and have acted as that committee.

The choice of the man who was not a freeholder was a nullity, and the one last elected was chosen in conformity with the provisions of the act.

The opinion of the judges, published in the appendix to 38 Maine, 597, given in 1855, in answer to questions submitted by the governor, does not bear upon the question under discussion.

The last governor and council had issued a commission to Abel C. Dinslow as county commissioner of Sagadahoc county. It subsequently appeared that there was no such man as Abel C. Dinslow, but there was one whose name was "Abel E. Dinslow," and for whom there was good reason to suppose the voters intended to throw their votes, instead of Abel C. Dinslow.

Upon this state of facts the succeeding governor submitted four questions to the judges, viz: First. Whether the governor and council could revise the doings of the last governor and council so as to receive proof of the eligibility to said office of such a man as Abel C. Dinslow? Secondly. If they found there was no such man as Abel C. Dinslow, but that the voters intended their votes for Abel E. Dinslow, it was competent to issue a new commission to him? Thirdly. If not, could they throw out the votes for Abel C. Dinslow, and issue a new commission to "such person who is eligible to said office as shall appear to have the highest number of votes?" (And, fourthly. If not, was there a vacancy in the office which the governor might fill?)

The judges reported, in reply, that the new governor and council could not review the proceedings of their predecessors; that they were not authorized by the act to receive any other evidence of the number of votes or names of the persons voted for than what is contained in the copies of the records of votes given in the cities, towns, and plantations of the county. They "therefore answered the first, second, and third questions in the negative, and the fourth in the affirmative."

Indeed, it is not possible that Spear vs. Robinson, and the opinion reported in 38 Maine, could have any effect adverse to our views, for the reason that the principle of public law enunciated by the judges in 1831, as reported in 7 Greenleaf, was adopted by the legislative department, and is now the law of that State, as shown by the Revised Statutes of Maine of 1840, page 65, section 27, and the Revised Statutes of 1871, page 98, section 32, in the following words:

And in all returns of elections the whole number of ballots given in shall be distinctly stated; but blank pieces of paper, and votes for persons not eligible to office, shall not be counted as ballots.

The same rule prevails in the commonwealth of Massachusetts.

By resolves approved May 18, 1852, Luther S. Cushing, C. W. Storey, and Lewis Josselyn were "appointed commissioners to prepare and publish a new edition of the Reports of Contested Elections, prepared and published by said Cushing in pursuance of an order of the house of representatives of March 1, 1834, including therein reports of all cases which have occurred since the time of said publication."

From this work, a volume of 757 pages, we find, on page 576, that, in 1849, it was decided, on a petition against the election of the member returned from the town of Somerset, that "a vote for a candidate who is constitutionally ineligible is not to be counted." The committee to whom the subject was referred made an elaborate report, which was agreed to April 10, 1849. They state (p. 578) that they—

Believe the question to have been settled by the 'decision of the house in the case of the town of Whately, (reported on page 439 of the same volume,) in 1843, but as that decision is perhaps of doubtful authority, having been made at a time of much party excitement, and as it seems desirable that a question so important should be finally settled, they venture to suggest a few reasons in favor of rejecting votes given for ineligible candidates at elections for representatives.

In the first place, it is to be presumed that such votes are cast by mistake, as, whenever the names of the persons giving such votes have been ascertained, it has generally been found that their votes had been cast inadvertently.

Again, the policy of the law requires that such a construction should be put upon all proceedings at elections as to make such proceedings valid rather than nugatory. An election is always attended with trouble, inconvenience, and expense, and should not be set aside for light or frivolous causes. If votes cast by mistake for persons not eligible are to be counted, then the intention and will of the voter is defeated; if, on the other hand, such votes are wilfully put into the ballot-box, the person who thus votes indicates so clearly his disregard of the value of the elective franchise that it is only a deserved punishment for his delinquency to deprive his vote of all weight and influence at such election. By so doing a voter is not deprived of any legitimate exercise of his right, because he can always manifest his opposition to any one candidate by voting for some other.

Finally, it seems to the committee that there is no reason why a person who votes for an ineligible candidate should not be put upon the same footing with one who does not vote at all, as in both cases the parties show a disposition to prevent an election, and both of them show an unwillingness to perform their duty by aiding to promote those elections which are absolutely essential to the existence of the government. For if every voter refrained wholly from voting, or voted for an ineligible candidate, the result would be the same—no choice; and, although it is true that no penalty is attached by law to a neglect of this obligation of voting, yet the obligation is not the less plain for that, and the committee believe it to be a duty too important to be neglected and too sacred to be trifled with by voting for fictitious persons or ineligible candidates. It may be urged that, since the Revised Statutes provide that blank pieces of paper shall not be counted as votes, the absence of any provision to reject votes for ineligible candidates is a strong argument that the legislature did not intend that they should be so rejected. The committee, however, believe that it was not at that time contemplated that any provision could be necessary, it being supposed that the practice of rejecting such votes by the legislature was so uniform as to have taken the place of law; otherwise, it is difficult to see why the same section was not made to comprehend both cases.

The voter who puts into the ballot-box a blank piece of paper as clearly indicates his opposition to all the candidates as he who puts in a vote for an ineligible candidate, and there seems to be no reason why the opinion of one should not be entitled to consideration as well as that of the other.

New York, by the unanimous judgment of her court of appeals, has approved the same rule in the case of People on the relation of Furman vs. Clute, 50 N. Y., 451, in an elaborate opinion, of which this is the summary:

A minority of the whole body of qualified electors may elect to an office where the majority decline to vote, or where they may vote for one who is ineligible to the office, knowing of the disqualification. Notice of the disqualifying fact and of its legal effect may be given so directly to the voter as to charge him with actual knowledge of the disqualification, or the disqualifying fact may be so patent or notorious as that his knowledge of the ineligibility may be presumed as matter of law; but not only the fact which disqualifies, but also the rule or enactment of law which makes it thus effectual, must be brought home so clearly to the knowledge or notice of the elector as that to give his vote therewith indicates his intent to waste it, in order to render his vote a nullity. Where a majority of the electors, through ignorance of the law or the fact, voted for one ineligible to the office, the votes are not nullities; but while they fail to elect, the office cannot be given to the qualified person having the next highest number of votes. The election is a failure, and a new election must be had.

Three times has Indiana spoken in emphatic approbation of the doctrine for which we contend: Gulick vs. New, 14 Ind., 93, decided in 1860; Carson vs. McPhetridge, 15 Ind., 327; Price vs. Baker, governor, 41 Ind., 572, decided in 1873.

In Gulick vs. New, the principle decided is summarized by the reporter in these words:

The governor may determine, even against the decision of a board of canvassers, whether an applicant is entitled to receive a commission or not, where the objection to his right to receive it rests upon the ground that the constitutional prohibition is interposed. If the governor should ascertain that he has commissioned a person who is ineligible to the office, he may issue another commission to the person legally entitled thereto. Where a majority of the ballots at an election were for a person not eligible to the office under the constitution, it was held that the ballots cast for such ineligible person were ineffectual, and that the person receiving the greatest number of legal votes, though not a majority of the ballots, was duly elected and entitled to the office. The mayor of a city, under the general law, has jurisdiction as a judicial officer throughout the county, and the voters of the county are therefore chargeable with notice of his ineligibility under the constitution to any office other than a judicial one during the term for which he was elected.

Of Price vs. Governor Baker, the syllabus is as follows:

Where a majority of the ballots at an election are given to a candidate who is not eligible to the office, the ballots so cast are not to be counted for any purpose. They cannot elect the ineligible candidate or defeat the election of the opposing candidate by showing that he did not receive a majority of the votes cast at such election. It follows that the eligible candidate will receive an office, although less than a majority of the votes are cast for him.

The same principle is supported by the cogent reasoning of the dissenting opinion of Chief-Justice Thompson in Commonwealth vs. Oluly, 56 Penn. St., 277:

But I confess my inability to see, if it must be treated as a preliminary question, why, if the constitutional disqualification of the defendant be established, the relator is not entitled to the office. He had votes enough to elect him, if the votes for the defendant be regarded as thrown away. This cannot be disputed. It seems to me this proposition cannot be controverted; that if the votes cast for the defendant would not confer the office on him, they do not possess the faculty or capacity of depriving the plaintiff of his election, having, as already said, enough votes to elect him. The majority of votes operates only in one direction, namely, to elect, and, by electing, defeat any competitor; but without electing, I deny that the effect is to elect a competing candidate. The thing is not possible. If it were, a majority of votes for a fictitious candidate, or one notoriously ineligible, would defeat an eligible candidate. The elective franchise cannot operate in such a way. If people do not vote, generally they consent that those that do may elect. This is the rule in all popular elections. If, therefore, people do not vote for candidates who can by law exercise the offices voted for, it seems to me to follow that they tacitly consent that those who do vote for such as are eligible shall elect on equivalent principles. If such an excuse were good for anything, it ought to be good to render effective the votes for the ineligible candidate, and thus give him the office in spite of the existing disqualification."

An analogous proposition was adopted and acted upon in Commonwealth vs. Read, 2 Ashmead, 264; where the defendant [Read] was held to have been elected treasurer by the county board, having received but one legal vote out of twenty cast. The other nineteen were decided to have been void and ineffectual, because they were cast viva voce, and the single vote by ballot to have controlled the election, that being the mode prescribed by law.

The view we present has the support of the best text-writers in England and America.

Judge Luther S. Cushing, in his standard work upon the law and practice of legislative assemblies, states the rule thus :

SEC. 177. In England, where a plurality only is necessary to an election, and where the votes are given orally, it is also held that if the electors have notice of the disqualification of a candidate, every vote given for him afterward will be thrown away and considered as not having been given at all. The effect of this rule is that not only will the election of a disqualified person be held void ; but if such election takes place after notice of the disqualification is given to the electors, the candidate having the highest number of votes will be elected. This doctrine, however hard it may seem, is founded in the familiar principle that every man is bound to know the law with reference to any act which he undertakes to do, and consequently that when an elector is apprised of the fact of disqualification of a candidate, and notwithstanding gives his vote for him, the elector takes upon himself the risk of losing his vote if his construction of the law turns out to be wrong.

SEC. 178. In this country it is equally true that an election of a disqualified person is absolutely void, and in those States where a plurality elects and where the votes are given orally, as in England, votes given for a candidate after notice of his disqualification are thrown away, and the candidate having the next highest number of votes is elected.

SEC. 179. In reference to elections by ballot, in which secrecy is the distinguishing feature, and in which, consequently, neither the returning officers nor the electors themselves are supposed to know for whom the votes are given until the result is declared, it seems not unreasonable to consider the votes for ineligible candidates to be thrown away in all cases, and the opposing candidate elected where the electors know, or must be presumed to know, the disability, and in all cases where there is no such actual or presumed knowledge to hold the whole proceeding merely void.

And we are supported by an unbroken array of the expositions of the law made in our mother country, as we shall presently show, as well as the approval of her best text-books.

Mr. Grant, in his work on corporations, at page 208, says :

A disqualification patent or notorious, at once causes the votes given for the candidate laboring under it to be thrown away ; the same would probably be held to be the case where the electors had the means of knowledge of the candidate's qualification, or the contrary, and might have ascertained the facts if they had pleased.

These judgments also find a large measure of support in the legislative practice of the country, as may be learned by examination of the speech of Senator Carpenter, of Wisconsin, at the second session of the Forty-second Congress, in the case of the disputed senatorial election in North Carolina. See Congressional Globe, part 3, March 19 to April 23, 1872, appendix.

What can be produced to the contrary ?

Pennsylvania is vouched in aid, but presents herself with the broken voice of a divided court, speaking however only obiter, and conceding that a vote given with knowledge for an ineligible candidate cannot be counted. Commonwealth vs. Cluly, ut supra.

California is cited in aid of the proposed rule that a plurality may, by voting for an ineligible candidate, defeat the constitutional mandate to elect.

People ex rel. Malony vs. Whitman, 10 Cal., 38.

Saunders vs. Haynes, 13 Cal., 145.

In Malony vs. Whitman the question did not require or receive decision. The majority of the court held that Mandeville, the officer whose qualification was in dispute, was not ineligible. The dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Field abstained from discussion of the question now under debate. He says : "As we hold that Mandeville was eligible, we refrain from the expression of any opinion whether, if he were ineligible, the votes given for him should be thrown out as so many blanks, and Whitman declared elected, as contended by counsel. Much argument may be had against the propriety of a rule which would, in a popular government, give an office to a person who was clearly not the choice of the people, as shown by the election." (See State of Wisconsin vs. Giles, 1 Chandler, 117; opinion of the judges of the supreme court of Maine in answer to the questions propounded by the governor, 38 Maine, 597.)

In Saunders vs. Haynes, the opinion was pronounced by Baldwin, J., who, as counsel, had argued the case of Malony vs. Whitman on the same side, Terry, C. J., concurring. It, however, assumes that the "majority of those voting, by mistake of law or fact, happen to cast their votes upon an ineligible candidate," and thus justifies the conclusion that an opposite rule would have been applied, if the result had not been produced "by mistake of law or fact."

The decision in State of Wisconsin vs. Giles, 1 Chandler, 112, is mere gratis dictum. The court held the majority candidate qualified, but added (p. 117):

Such being the opinion of the court, it is unnecessary to pass upon the second question—whether in the event of the person receiving the highest number of votes being ineligible, the person receiving the next highest number is elected. But as the question was fully argued, and as it is one that may arise again, it is proper to say, that we are all of the opinion that the mere ineligibility of a candidate does not, as the law now is, render void the votes cast for him; that such votes should not be rejected, but should be counted by the canvassers, and in the event of such ineligible person having the highest number of votes, the person having the next highest number is not thereby elected. If any public embarrassment is apprehended from this, such as that an office may remain indefinitely vacant, by reason of a majority of the electors obstinately persisting in voting for an ineligible person, it is within the undoubted power of the legislature to prevent it, by enacting that all such votes shall be deemed void, and not to be counted.

This decision was followed by the case of The State of Wisconsin on the relation of Off vs. Smith, 14 Wisc. 497, in which the gratuitous and unnecessary observations just quoted were treated, without re-examination, or any even the most superficial consideration, as having settled the law in Wisconsin. The court say, (page 498,) and this is all of their opinion upon this question:

The last question has been already settled in this State by the case of The State vs. Giles, 1 Chand., 112. It was there held, by the unanimous judgment of the court, that in the absence of a statute declaring it so, the mere ineligibility of a candidate does not render void the votes cast for him; that such votes should not be rejected, but should be counted by the canvassers; and that in the event of such ineligible person having the highest number of votes, the person having the next highest number would not be thereby elected.

Georgia is supposed to have pronounced against our proposition, State ex rel. Hardwick vs. Swearingen, 12 Geo., 23. In this case, also, the remarks of the court upon the matter now under debate are purely obiter dicta, for the majority candidate was found to have been free from disqualification. The objection to him was that he was not a corporation and resident within the city of Oglethorpe, as clerk and treasurer, of which he claimed to have been elected. But the court, (Lumpkin, J.,) pronouncing the opinion, held that the objection was not well taken, in that—

No such restriction was imposed upon the voters of the young and rapidly growing town in their selection of a suitable person to fill the offices of clerk and treasurer. They are at liberty to select from Macon, Columbus, or any other part of the State, the person in their judgment best qualified to discharge these functions.

And thus having decided and disposed of the case, added:

Under no circumstances could we permit the informant to be installed into these appointments, he not having received a majority of the legal votes of the city. Under such circumstances, if the incumbent be removed, a new election will be ordered.

Which addition is about as valuable, without being as true, as this, with which Judge Lumpkin's wisdom follows and concludes the opinion, viz:

These municipal corporations are the germs and miniature models of free government; and their internal police and administration should not be interfered with for slight causes; not unless some great right has been withheld or wrong perpetrated.

Missouri is claimed to have dissented from our proposition.

State ex rel. Kempf vs. Boal, 46 Mo., 528.

State ex rel. Attorney-General vs. Vail, 53 Mo., 97.

But the first of these cases sustains the principle for which we contend. Both relator and defendant were disqualified, and therefore judgment could not be rendered in the relator's favor, but the court say in addition:

As regards the votes cast for the defendant, they were nugatory. It was as though no such votes had been cast at the election. The constitution distinctly prohibited their being cast up or treated as votes at all, as it also prohibited the issuing a certificate of election because of them. The evident intention of the constitution is that the party receiving the majority of the available votes should have the certificate of election; that is, the majority of votes that "it was permissible for the canvassers to cast up."

The provisions of the constitution of Missouri, here referred to, are the following, (article 2:)

SEC. 7. Within sixty days after this constitution takes effect, every person in this State holding any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the constitution or laws thereof, or under any municipal corporation, or any of the other offices, positions, or trusts mentioned in the third section of this article, shall take and subscribe the said oath. If any officer or person referred to in this section shall fail to comply with the requirements thereof, his office, position, or trust shall ipso facto become vacant, and the vacancy shall be filled according to the law governing the case.

SEC. 8. No vote, in any election by the people, shall be cast up for, nor shall any certificate of election be granted to, any person who shall not, within fifteen days next preceding said election, have taken, subscribed, and filed said oath.

State vs. Vail does not withdraw this affirmation of the view for which we contend, although it does limit it to disqualifications other than those personal and latent. The syllabus No. 6 is this:

The candidate who at an election receives the greatest number of votes, except the successful candidate, is not entitled to the office when the successful candidate is ineligible, owing to personal disqualifications and such as were not patent to the voters.

In the course of the very elaborate opinion of Judge Napton, he comments upon and distinguishes the case of Gulick vs. New, without disapproving it, in these words:

But in the case in Indiana, it is conceded that where the candidate receiving the highest number of votes is ineligible by reason of a cause which the voters were not bound to know, such as non-age, want of naturalization, &c., the result is a failure to elect. (P. 115.)

And afterward added, (p. 116:)

To declare a candidate elected, who has received but few votes, on the ground that his competitor who received, perhaps, twice as many, was disqualified, would not accomplish the will of the electors. The object of an election is to ascertain the choice of the majority. [Query, plurality?] If a disqualified candidate receives a thousand votes and his competitor only a hundred, to pronounce the latter elected is not in accordance with any ascertained will of the electors, unless it may be inferred that the votes for the disqualified candidate were cast with a knowledge of his inability to take the office—an inference which could not be drawn where the disqualifications are such as are enumerated in the pleadings in this case. [Not a citizen for five years, nor a qualified voter, non-age, and disloyalty.] It is unnecessary to determine whether it would be the rule, in any case of disqualifications, whether patent or latent.

The case of Pearce vs. Hawkins, 2 Swan, 87, sometimes cited in argument against the view we present, really sustains it. Two sentences in the opinion of the court contain all that is said upon the subject:

But as he was a resident in the tenth civil district when elected constable for the eleventh, he was ineligible to the office, and his appointment was void. And in an action against him for an alleged trespass, he cannot defend and justify the act as being done in virtue of his office, when it is made to appear that he has no title thereto, and that his assumed appointment was illegal and void.

The case of The People on the relation of L. C. Crawford vs. Moliter, 23 Mich., 341, was disposed of by an admission in pleading. It was a quo warranto to inquire into respondent's title to the office of supervisor. His plea set up that one hundred and fifty votes were cast at the election, of which relator, Leonard Crawford, had two votes, respondent sixty-nine votes, and that seventy-two ballots contained the name, "L. C. Crawford," whereby the relator claimed to be duly elected. The court say they can—

Consider any admissions in the plea as binding on the respondent, and as showing all he can aver in his own behalf; and this plea is an admission that respondent has no title, because it shows, affirmatively, that he did not receive the greatest number of votes cast. The statute in relation to town elections is substantially like those governing other elections. It provides that "the persons having received the greatest number of votes given for any office at such election shall be deemed and declared duly elected." It does not, under any circumstances, allow a minority candidate to be deemed elected—whether the person for whom the majority appear to have voted can or cannot be installed. The majority here are alleged by the plea to have voted for some one whom they designated as "L. C. Crawford." Whether there is in fact a person of that name or not does not change the state of the canvass, nor make 69 a larger number than 72.

Fish vs. Collins, 21 La. Ann., 239, may be claimed to be, but is not, against us. All things considered, the modesty with which it refrains from deciding this question is remarkable. Ludeling, C. J., says:

The plaintiff does not allege that he received a larger number of votes cast at the election than either of his competitors; but, on the contrary, he admits that the defendant received a greater number of votes than he did. * * It is unnecessary in this case to express any opinion as to whether the votes cast for a person who is notoriously known to be ineligible should be rejected or not, as no such allegations are made in the petition.

In State ex rel. Staes vs. Gastinel, 18 La. Ann., 517; S. C. 20 La., 114, it was shown that Gastinel was not of sufficient age (thirty years) to be eligible to the office of recorder and justice of the peace, and he was accordingly ousted. The court said:

We cannot adopt the theory of the relator, that the ousting of the defendant by means of this proceeding inures to his benefit. What might have been his rights had he contested the election of defendant in accordance with law, we are not called on to say; but we are of the opinion that, having, as a candidate, acquiesced in the result of that election, we must in these proceedings consider him only as a citizen before us, seeking to have the law enforced against the recorder de facto; and, under the provisions of the C. P. and the 15th section of the city charter, notify the corporation of the necessity of a new appointment. The law does not authorize us to declare the relator, under the circumstances, to be the choice of the people. Upon his own showing, he did not receive a majority of the votes cast, and but for some action, on the part of some one authorized, the present incumbent would have continued in the performance of the duties of the office, as the duly-elected recorder of the second district of New Orleans.

In Sublett vs. Bidwell, 47 Miss., 273, where the candidate was disqualified by having been a registrar of voters at the registration preliminary to the very election, it was held that—

It cannot be said that the candidate has been elected unless he has received a majority of the legal votes cast; he is not the choice of the people. If the majority make choice of candidate under some personal disability, disqualifying him from taking and enjoying the office, the utmost that can be said of it is, that there has been no election. The election, by a majority or plurality of votes, (as the law may be,) is the foundation of the "right" to the office. The certificate or the commission is only evidence of that fact.

If the majority candidate is disqualified, it does not follow that he who has received the next highest vote and is qualified shall take the office. * * * The general principle pervading our election system is that the highest vote entitles to the office, if its recipient can take. There is by implication a negation of the office to the minority candidate in all cases, except those covered by the last section of the schedule to the constitution (sec. 15.) * * * The section is as follows: "If any candidate receiving the highest number of votes cannot take the oath of office prescribed in this constitution, then the candidate receiving the next highest vote shall be entitled to enter the office." * * * The constitution does establish the rule that votes cast for a person thus disqualified are void and of no effect, unless the disfranchisement has been removed. The practical interpretation put upon the section has been that it is a personal disability to "hold office," and if that be removed before the term begins, the election is made good, and the person may take the office. * * * Without going into the general reasoning, the great weight of American authority, and, as we think, upon the soundest consideration, is, that although the majority vote for a disqualified person, the votes so cast are not illegal, and therefore to be treated as naught; but the result is, if the ineligible candidate cannot take the office, the electors have failed to make a choice. In truth, there has been no election at all, and the minority candidate has no right to the office.

The cases cited are State of Georgia vs. Swearingen; State ex rel. Off vs. Smith; State vs. Giles; Saunders vs. Haynes; 23 Louisiana, 314, and the opinion of the supreme court of Maine in 38 Maine, 597.

And again, (p. 277:)

The votes are ineffective to confer the office, not because of any legal infirmity in the electors, but because the individual has not himself the capacity for the office. In such cases as already observed, upon the fact being ascertained, there has been a failure to fill the office, and it is vacant de jure.

Rhode Island is the last State which can be cited against us. We refer to the case, in the matter of George H. Corliss, ut supra. To the fourth question, the judges of the supreme court of Rhode Island made answer:

We think the disqualification does not result in the election of the candidate next in vote, but in a failure to elect.

In England it has been held that where electors vote for an ineligible candidate, knowing his disqualification, their votes are not to be counted any more than if they were thrown for a dead man or the man in the moon; and that in such a case the opposing candidate being qualified, will be elected, although he has had a minority of the votes. (King vs. Hawkins, 10 East., 210; Reg. vs. Coaks, 3 Ell. & Bl., 253.) But even in England, if the disqualification is unknown, the minority candidate is not entitled to the office, the election being a failure. (Queen vs. Hiorns, 7 Ad. & E., 960; Rex vs. Bridge, 1 M. & Selw., 76.) And it has been held that to entitle the minority candidate to the office, it is not enough that the electors know of the facts which amount to a disqualification, unless they likewise know that they amount to it in point of law. (The Queen vs. The Mayor, &c., Law Rep., 3 Q. B., 629.)

In this country the law is certainly not more favorable to the minority candidate. (State vs. Giles, 1 Chandler, Wis., 112; State vs. Smith, 14 Wis., 497; Saunders vs. Haynes, 13 Cal., 145; People vs. Clute, 50 N. Y., 451.) The question submitted to us does not allege or imply that the electors, knowing the disqualification, voted for the ineligible candidate in willful defiance of the law; and certainly, in the absence of proof, it is not to be presumed that they so voted. The only effect of the disqualification, in our opinion, is to render void the election of the candidate who is disqualified, and to leave one place in the electoral college unfilled.

That this was purely obiter, that it was wholly unnecessary for the governor to have submitted such a question to the judges, is shown by the following passage from a letter written by that eminent publicist, William Beach Lawrence, to Senator Kernan, published in the New York World, January 27, 1877:

OCHRE POINT, NEWPORT, R. I., January 26, 1877.

DEAR SENATOR KERNAN: When it became known, some weeks since, that one of the republican candidates who had been voted for as an elector was disqualified in consequence of holding an "office of profit or trust," it was supposed that the same question might arise here as is now before you in regard to the Oregon electoral vote. Having been myself at the head of the Rhode Island democratic electoral ticket, I looked into the subject with the intention of claiming the place for the democratic candidate who might have the highest number of votes. The canvass showed, however, that excluding the votes for Mr. Corliss, there had been no election, inasmuch as three of us had the same number of votes, and the fourth man one less than his colleagues—a case for which express provision is made by our State law, which requires the place to be filled by the general assembly "when the votes are divided equally among any of the candidates, or otherwise there shall not be an election of the number of electors to which the State may be entitled." As in the act of Congress of 1845, there is in our law a distinction between a failure to elect and a vacancy arising from the electors chosen declining to serve or failing to attend after the election, in which cases the vacancies are to be filled by the other electors. I note this, because in the Oregon law there is but one provision as to vacancies, and they are to be filled by the electoral college. This provision cannot apply to cases of failure to elect, the term "otherwise" being controlled by the context.

I shall not trouble you with the distinctions between original vacancies and those occurring after an office is filled—a matter so often discussed in connection with the respective powers of the President and Senate in relation to nominations—but I merely allude to the fact that the electoral colleges are in no sense continuous bodies, but that they are created de novo for each presidential election. The powers of the canvassers are in the two States substantially the same. In Rhode Island, "the governor, in the presence of the secretary of state, shall examine and count the votes, and give notice to the electors of their election." In Oregon the votes are to be canvassed by the secretary of state in the presence of the governor. "The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December."

The supreme court of Rhode Island are by the constitution required to "give their written opinion on any question of law whenever requested by the governor or by either house of the general assembly." The governor is not, however, bound by it. I inclose the opinion given by the judges under which the governor and general assembly acted on the recent occasion. So much of it as shows that a person cannot decline or resign an office to which he is ineligible or incapable of being elected, that the disqualification is not removed by the resignation of the office of trust unless the office is resigned before the election, and that under our law the election by the people constitutes the appointment in the sense of the Federal Constitution, is applicable to the case before you. For the reason already mentioned—the equality of the votes between the highest democratic candidates—the discussion whether the disqualification resulted in the election of the candidate next in the vote or in a failure to elect any one was wholly irrelevant, as confessedly under the circumstances there was no minority candidate chosen.

The opinion was not published till it was laid before the legislature, and I was surprised to find that a question depending on the fact of one of the democratic candidates having more votes than his colleagues was passed on by the judges or that it had been submitted to them by the governor, inasmuch as he was well aware that, had there been any occasion for considering it, we should have been asked to have been heard on it. As it is, so far as the "opinion" touches on the effect of Mr. Corliss's disability on the claim of the next eligible candidate, it must be regarded in the nature of obiter dictum.

Another passage from the letter we desire to submit, because it is in the nature of original and very valuable historical testimony, with reference to the cases of Albert Gallatin and Mr. Bailey, referred to in Commonwealth vs. Cluy :

In the debates in Congress as to the effect of the election of a disqualified candidate, the cases of Mr. Gallatin and Mr. Bailey are frequently cited. The one occurred in the Senate, the other in the House; and in neither case did the question arise on the claim of a competing candidate. Mr. Gallatin's case dates back as far as 1793. Owing to the position which I occupied toward him many years afterward in the diplomatic service, I became entirely familiar with it. Arriving in this country fourteen years previously to his election and consequently during the war of the Revolution, and many years before the adoption of the present Constitution, Mr. Gallatin had become identified with the American people in every way known to the laws of that day. He had as early as 1780 acquired a legal domicile in the State of Massachusetts, the only way in which naturalization could then be effected.

The articles of the Confederation, which were the existing Constitution, provided that "the free inhabitants of the different States in the Union shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of all citizens in the several States," thus making the terms "inhabitants" and "citizens" equivalent to one another.

Mr. Gallatin, having invested his patrimony in lands which were then supposed to be in Virginia, but were afterward decided to be in Pennsylvania, as a matter of abundant caution in reference to those lands, went through the form of naturalization according to the laws of the State of Virginia, and nine years had not elapsed from the date of that act, which was the assumed ground of disqualification, before he took his seat in the Senate. Even dating from the period of that naturalization, he had been a citizen some five years before the adoption of the Constitution. That the restrictions in that instrument were not intended to be retrospective, may well be inferred from the fact that for the office of President no one who was then a citizen was disqualified, and Mr. Gallatin at the time that he was unseated as a Senator was eligible to the Presidency. These facts I take from what may be deemed an autobiographical notice of Mr. Gallatin, as the paper, though prepared by me, was submitted to his revision. No competitor, as has been stated, petitioned against his return, nor, as far as I am aware, had he any, for he was elected by a legislature the majority of which were his political opponents. In all probability, had he been an ordinary man, there would have been no objection to his election. The petition was made by federalists, who feared the force of his abilities, and he was declared ineligible by a strict party vote of 14 to 12.

Mr. Bailey's case arose several years later. He was chief clerk of the State Department, and notwithstanding the fact that he was at Washington in the public service, and that no residence there could give him more political rights than would be derived from living in a fort or an arsenal of the United States, he was decided to have lost his Massachusetts citizenship and to be disfranchised so as not to be competent to be elected a Representative from that State.

We have thus cited, and endeavored fairly to represent, every American case of which we have any knowledge, and we submit that while there may be obiter dicta contrary to the proposition for which we contend, in no one American case has it been ruled that the plurality or majority of voters, by voting with knowledge, actual or presumed, for an ineligible candidate, can defeat an election. In most of the cases the observations upon this subject were entirely gratuitous and uncalled for; and others simply adopt the former without any examination whatever. We find, for instance, the significant fact that the opinions of the judges in 38 Maine are repeatedly referred to as sustaining a doctrine contrary to that which we maintain upon this subject, although in Maine the law has been long settled by the concurring and harmonious action of the judicial and executive departments that votes for an ineligible candidate are mere waste paper, and can perform no legal function whatever.

The gospel of American political action, whatever else it may contain, embraces two great commandments: first, thou shalt elect; and, secondly, thou shalt not elect any disqualified person. The disqualification in this case is attached to the grant; the State, availing itself of the power, must take it cum onere, and subject to the disqualification. It is not the voter who appoints the elector; it is the State; and the State cannot plead ignorance; she cannot appoint any disqualified person. Even the voter, although the Constitution secures him no right to partake in the appointment, except through the agency of the State, which does appoint, if he be permitted by the legislature of the State, in its control over the manner of appointment, to cast his ballot for electors, must see to it that they are duly qualified. He cannot plead ignorance of the law, as perhaps he might of some lurking and obscure statutory disqualification, for the disqualification is in the very sentence which contains the grant by force of which the State is enabled to permit him to vote, and, except subject to the disqualification, advantage cannot be taken by him of the grant at all.

Nor can he plead ignorance of the fact in this case. The rulings of the Commission forbid our making the proof, and showing, as we otherwise should endeavor to do, that of those who voted for Watts, far more in number than his excess of votes over Cronin knew of his disqualification; that twice, at numerous attended public meetings in Oregon City and Portland, the fact was made matter of public debate between Watts and Cronin; that it was considered and discussed in a newspaper published at the home of Watts; that Yambill, where Watts was postmaster, is the county-seat of La Fayette County, to which town the people of the county resort for the transaction of their legal business, marriage licenses, the settlement of the estates of their decedents, the record of their deeds and the payment of their taxes, as well as the purchase of their supplies and the marketing of their produce; and that Watts is no insignificant and unknown person, but a public citizen, whose life and character is known of many—a doctor, a preacher, a politician—a physician of body, soul, and state.

But in lieu of this testimony, which we had expected and hoped to give, until the Commission decided it could hear no proofs other than such as might be contained in the certificates opened by the President of the Senate, and proof of ineligibility, we have the certificate of the governor and secretary of state, under the great seal of the State of Oregon, that "William H. Odell received 15,206 votes, John C. Cartwright received 15,214 votes, E. A. Cronin received 14,157 votes for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States. Being the highest number of votes cast at said election for persons eligible under the Constitution of the United States to be appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, they are hereby declared duly elected electors as aforesaid for the State of Oregon." The maxim applies, "Omnia præsumuntur rite et solemniter esse acta donec probetur in contrarium." (Broom's Legal Maxims, 908.)

As Watts was in fact ineligible, and if this were known (both law and fact) to more than 1,049 voters who voted for him, and we take the New York rule for our guide, then it follows that Cronin was elected. This being so, it became the duty of the governor and secretary, in such case, as we shall hereafter more fully show, to declare the result, and give the official lists to Cronin. To have given them to Watts under such circumstances would have been to violate the Constitution of the United States, which the governor and secretary had each taken a solemn oath to support, (Constitution of Oregon, article 15, section 3,) and to adopt a rule of law which the supreme court of Oregon has never announced. Therefore the fair and reasonable presumption, from the act of the governor and secretary, until the contrary is shown, is that the facts existed which justify the official action taken.

This, then, is the established principle of American public law, that the mandate to elect, obedience to which is essential to the perpetuity of republican self-government, is of such paramount importance, that neither by protests against it, by blank votes, nor by votes for disqualified candidates, can it be frustrated. A plurality vote for an eligible candidate is required; this and nothing more. First expounded in Maryland by one of the greatest of the patriotic jurists of the revolutionary period, sanctioned by judicial judgments in Maine, in Indiana, and (with limitations) in New York, and by legislative adoption in Maine and Massachusetts, it served no inconspicuous purpose in the re-organization of the States after the war of the rebellion, when it became part of the constitutional guarantees of Missouri and Mississippi, and by legislative action served the same end in Maryland.

Shall this Commission say that this is not the law of Oregon? The judiciary of Oregon have not said so. The legislature of Oregon have not said so. The executive of Oregon informs you that this is the law of Oregon. Compelled, in the performance of his duty, to act upon one or the other principle, to act as if it were the law of Oregon that ineligible candidates might be elected, or as if the election failed, or as if the next highest competing candidate were chosen, he heard argument, he took time to consider, and he acted. Had he given the certificate to Watts he would have violated the Constitution of the United States, which he had sworn to support. Had he given it to no one he would have given his assent to the view that the next highest competing candidate was not elected. He was compelled to act. He found that in his native State of Maine, where the constitution quite as emphatically required a "majority of votes," as the laws of Oregon require "the highest number of votes," (General Laws of Oregon, chap. 13, title 4, sec. 33, p. 706,) it was held that just construction determines the meaning to be a majority of efficient, available votes, cast for eligible candidates, and that this interpretation received the approval of the first chief-justice of Maine, that eminent magistrate, Prentiss Mellen, and of his successor in that high office, Nathan Weston, as well as of their associate, Albion K. Paris. We submit that he could not have had higher authority; that he could not have acted more wisely.

He had the right—it was his duty—so to act.

"It is argued," said Chief-Justice Parsons in Kendall vs. Inhabitants of Kingston, 5 Mass., 533, "that the legislature cannot give a construction to the constitution, cannot make laws repugnant to it. But every department of government, invested with certain constitutional powers, must in the first instance, but not exclusively, be the judge of its powers, or it could not act."

See also Martin vs. Mott, 12 Wheat., 29; Opinions of Judges, 49 Mo., 216.

"It follows, therefore, that every department of the government, and every official of every department may, at any time, when a duty is to be performed, be required to pass upon a question of constitutional construction." Cooley on Const. Lim., 41.

Taylor vs. The Governor, 1 Arkansas, 21, was a motion for an alternative mandamus against the governor to compel him to show cause why a peremptory mandamus should not issue directing him to deliver to John A. Taylor his commission as sheriff for the county of Pulaski, to which office he had been elected by the majority of the votes of the people of that county. The clerk of the county court had issued him a certificate of election; he demanded his commission of the governor, who refused to deliver it upon the ground that he was ineligible to the office, because, in point of fact, Taylor was a defaulter to the State. The supreme court of Arkansas sustained the governor and disallowed the writ. They say, p. 28:

The executive, in common with every other officer, is bound by oath to support the constitution, and whenever an effort is made to evade or violate it, it is not only his privilege but his duty to interpose and prevent it.

See also Hawkins vs. Conway, 1 Pike, 570.

In State ex rel. Bartley vs. Fletcher, governor, 39 Missouri, 388, a mandamus was prayed for to compel the governor to issue a commission to Bartley as one of the justices of the county court of Calloway County. The court, (Wagner J.,) after reciting (p. 398) that it is by the constitution of the State made the duty of the governor to commission all officers not otherwise provided by law, that this is clearly an exercise of political power of a ministerial character, proceed to say:

The governor is bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and he has taken an oath to support the constitution. In the correct and legitimate performance of his duty he must inevitably have a discretion in regard to granting commissions; for should a person be elected or appointed who was constitutionally ineligible to hold any office of profit or trust, would the executive be bound to commission him when his ineligibility was clearly and positively proven? If he is denied the exercise of any discretion in such case, he is made the violator of the constitution, not its guardian. Of what avail then is his oath of office? Or, if he has positive and satisfactory evidence that no election has been held in a county, shall he be required to violate the law, and issue a commission to a person not elected, because a clerk has certified to the election? In granting a commission the governor may go behind the commission to determine whether an applicant is entitled to receive a commission or not where the objection to the right of the applicant to receive it rests upon the ground that a constitutional prohibition is interposed. Gulick vs. New, 14 Ind., 93.

The issuing of a commission is an act by the executive in his political capacity, and is one of the means employed to enable him to execute the laws and carry on the appropriate functions of the State; and for the manner in which he executes this duty he is in no wise amenable to the judiciary. The court can no more interfere with executive discretion than the legislature or executive can with judicial discretion.

The granting of a commission by the executive is not a mere ministerial duty, but an official act imposed by the Constitution, and is an investiture of authority in the person receiving it. We are of the opinion, therefore, that mandamus will not lie against the governor in a case like this.

To sustain this view, that mandamus will not lie in such case, the court cite also—

The case of George H. Corliss, in Rhode Island, sustains the action taken by Governor Grover and Secretary Chadwick in Oregon. We quote from the letter of Mr. Lawrence, already referred to, the following cogent passage:

In repudiating the votes for Watts, Governor Grover did precisely what Governor Lippitt did in Rhode Island as to Corliss. The latter governor could only have done it by virtue of the power given to him "to examine and count the vote," and it is impossible to discover any authority which he had to reject the ballots cast for Corliss that Governor Grover did not possess as to Watts. The fact of there being three candidates next to him with equal votes, precluded the question as to the right of a minority candidate in that case; but in the case passed on by Governor Grover, the votes for Watts being absolutely void, Cronin had the highest number of votes, and was consequently, under the provision of the constitution of the State of Oregon, which requires that "in all elections held by the people, the person or persons having the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected," legally appointed an elector.

Article 10, section 3, of the constitution of Rhode Island is as follows:

The judges of the supreme court shall, in all trials, instruct the jury in the law. They shall also give their written opinion upon any question of law whenever requested by the governor, or by either house of the general assembly.

Chapter 28, section 4, of the Revised Statutes of Rhode Island reads thus:

The governor, in the presence of the secretary of state, shall examine and count the same, and give notice to the electors of their election.

To the same effect was the action of the governor and council of Maine in 1831.

Gulick vs. New, ut supra, is directly in point.

The governor may determine, even against the decision of a board of canvassers whether an applicant is entitled to receive a commission or not, where the objection to his right to receive it rests upon the ground that the constitutional prohibition is interposed.

If the governor should ascertain that he has commissioned a person who is ineligible to the office, he may issue another commission to the person legally entitled thereto.

But we need not go out of Oregon for authority as to the duty of the governor under these circumstances. Only the death of the judge of the supreme court, charged with the duty of preparing it, (Judge Thayer,) has prevented their opinion from appearing in the volumes of Oregon Reports. We submit the following letter in proof of our assertion: (See testimony taken by subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate, pp. 127, 128.)

SUPREME COURT ROOM,
Salem, Oregon, December 20, 1876.

SIR: Your communication of the 18th instant was duly received, and, in reply thereto, I beg leave to submit the following:

The case of the State of Oregon ex rel. C. B. Bellinger, appellant, vs. A. C. Gibbs, respondent, was heard and determined at the January term, 1873, of the supreme court. The action was instituted in the circuit court of the State of Oregon for the county of Multnomah, and was determined at the March term, 1872, of said court. The complaint alleged in effect that the respondent had been elected to the office of prosecuting attorney in the fourth judicial district in June, 1870, for the term of two years; that he entered upon, held, and exercised the office; that thereafter, and while so holding, he was appointed to the office of United States district attorney for the district of Oregon, and that he qualified and entered upon said office on March 2, 1872. Allegations showing that both offices were lucrative were duly made, and it was further alleged that on March 6, 1872, the governor of Oregon duly appointed the relator to the office of prosecuting attorney for the said fourth judicial district, and that said relator duly qualified on March 8, 1872, and thereupon made demand upon the respondent for the office, which demand was refused.

Respondent demurred to the complaint in the court below, upon the ground, among others, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The court below (Upton, J.) sustained the demurrer and entered a judgment against the relator for costs, &c.

An appeal was thereupon taken to the supreme court at the term mentioned. Upon the argument in the supreme court, the respondent, in support of his demurrer, contended "that the governor could not determine for himself that a vacancy existed in the office of prosecuting attorney in the fourth judicial district so as to authorize the appointment of the relator, for the reason that the determination of that fact involved the exercise of judicial functions by the executive.

This was the principal legal question in the case, and the court unanimously declared that the governor was invested with authority, in cases of the kind, to look into the facts and pass upon the same without awaiting the action of the courts.

The justices of the supreme court were, at the time, Hon. W. W. Upton, chief-justice; Hon. A. J. Thayer, P. P. Prim, B. F. Bonham, and L. L. McArthur, associate justices. As the case was from the fourth district, Upton, chief-justice, did not participate in the hearing and decision in the supreme court. The writing of the opinion was assigned to Hon. A. J. Thayer, who died shortly after the adjournment of the term, leaving the duty unperformed. Ex-Chief-Justice Bonham and Justice McArthur authorize me to say that their recollection of the case and the point decided comports with my own.

I have the honor to be your excellency's obedient servant,

P. P. PRIM,
Chief-Justice of Oregon.

Governor of Oregon.

If it be claimed that this was judicial action of Governor Grover, we reply that until the certificate had been delivered, judicial action could not begin. Ministerial political authority ascertains and certifies the result of an election; judicial authority revises and corrects it. Political authority determines in whom the color of right shall rest, by the delivery of the commission. Judicial authority searches that colorable title, and awards the possession of the office according to the real title.

In addition to the cases already cited upon this point, we refer the Commission to the case of Collins vs. Knoblock et al., 25 La. Ann., 263:

The adjustment and compilation of election returns, determining the number of legal and illegal votes cast for each candidate, declaring the result of an election and furnishing the successful candidate with the proper certificate; in short, superintending and controlling all the details of an election, belong properly to the political department of the government.

To the same effect is State upon the relation of Bonner vs. Lynch, 25 La. Ann., 268.

Except so far as it may have been altered by statute, the common law of England is the law of Oregon.

The following is believed to be a fair statement of the cases which contain the exposition of the common-law doctrine upon this subject. They show that the action of the governor and secretary of Oregon was consistent with the common law. To save labor, we refer for a summary of many of the cases to the opinion of Mr. Justice Blackburn in the case of The Queen vs. Tewksbury.

The statute 13 Charles II, ch. 12, enacted that no person should be elected into any corporation office who had not received the sacrament within a twelvemonth preceding the election; and in default of doing so the election, placing, and choice should be void. And in Harrison vs. Evans, cited in Cowper's Rep., 393, note, and 535, Lord Chief-Justice Wilmot said:

The Stat. 13 Car. II, ch. 12, is not only addressed to the elected and a prohibition upon them, but a prohibition laid down to the electors if they have notice. The legislature has commanded them not to choose a nonconformist, because he ought not to be trusted. * * * Consequently, with respect to any legal effect or operation, it is as if there had been no election.

In Rex vs. Monday, Cowper, 536, (in 1777,) Serjeant Buller laid down the law thus:

Two requisites are necessary to make a good election: First. A capacity in the electors; Second. Capacity in the elected; and unless both concur the election is a nullity. With respect to the capacity of the electors, * * * their right consists in an affirmative, not a negative declaration. Consequently, there is no effectual means of voting against one man but by voting for another; and even then, if such other person be unqualified, and the elector has notice of his incapacity, his vote will be thrown away.

This statement of the law is absolutely accurate.

In Regina vs. Boscawen, cited by Burke, ten voted for Roberts, who was a qualified person, and ten for the defendant, who was incapacitated on account of non-inhabitaney. Lord Chief-Justice Parker and the whole court held "that the votes given for the latter were thrown away, and Roberts duly elected." That was the case of an equal number; but a minority does not vary it.

For in Rex vs. Withers, in the King's Bench, five voters out of eleven voted for the defendant upon a single vacancy of a burgess for the borough of Westbury; six others voted for two persons jointly; and the court held that the double votes were absolutely thrown away.

So in Taylor vs. Mayor of Bath, in the King's Bench, 28 electors being assembled, 14 voted for A, 13 for B, and 1 for C. A, who had the 14 votes, was unqualified, and his incapacity known to the electors at the time. Lee, chief-justice, in his direction to the jury, said that the votes given to A, with notice of his incapacity, were thrown away. It afterward came before the court, when Lee, chief-justice, compared it to the case of voting for a dead man, and held that B was duly elected; and Page, justice, said "that in such a case a minority of two only would have been sufficient to elect the other candidate."

After the argument in Rex vs. Monday, Lord Mansfield agreed that, in the case of an election for member of Parliament, where the electors must proceed to an election, because they cannot stop for that day or defer it to another time, there must be a candidate or candidates, and in that case there is no way of defeating the election of one candidate proposed but by voting for another, and that other, he held, must be a person not incapacitated by law.

In Oldknow vs. Wainwright, or Rex vs. Foxcroft, 2 Burrow, 1017, in 1760, the same great judge had said :

The protesting electors had no way to stop the election, when once entered upon, but by voting for some other person than Seagrave, or at-least against him.

And Mr. Justice Wilmot quoted Regina vs. Boscawen and Taylor vs. Mayor of Bath as establishing that votes given for a non-inhabitant, where inhabitancy was necessary, were thrown away.

In Hawkins vs. Rex, 2 Dou., 124. in the House of Lords, in error from the Court of King's Bench, in 1813, the case being quo warranto, calling on defendant to show by what title he claimed to be an alderman of a borough, notice of ineligibility had been given at the assembly, he not having taken the sacrament within a year. Abbott, for Hawkins, said in argument :

There were not many cases where it had been decided that the votes of the majority were so absolutely thrown away as to give the election to the minority. That was a strong measure in any case, and it was submitted that it could not hold here unless the notice of disqualification had been given before the commencement of the election. The electors ought to have notice and time to speak and deliberate before they were called on to vote.

He admitted that the votes given after notice were thrown away, and he cited Rex vs. Coe, Heywood County Elections, 538, where, after nine had voted for the opponent of Coe, he was declared disqualified. The rest of his voters polled for another, but there were not enough ; and Coe, who would otherwise have been outvoted, was, though he had only a minority, declared elected. But he was ousted by the court. And in Rex vs. Budge, 1 Maule & Selwyn, 76, where Sparling had 91 votes and Budge 11, when notice was given that Sparling was disqualified, and the poll proceeding, the numbers were 123 for him and 22 for Budge, the court held that the 91 votes given before notice were not thrown away.

Mr. Abbott further says :

"In two cases the election by the minority was held sufficient; but there the disqualification was very different from that in the present case. It was one thing to say that votes were thrown away where there was an absolute disqualification, and another to say so where the disqualification was not absolute," as he contended it was not in the case he was arguing.

Our constitutional disqualification is absolute.

Moreover, he argued that a candidate had not taken the sacrament within a year was a matter of no public notoriety, was within his own knowledge alone, was not presumed to be known to an elector or to anybody, and therefore it was right to require notice, actual and personal, to put the voter in the position of throwing his vote away.

On the other side the counsel said :

The general doctrine was clear that after notice of disqualification the votes for the disqualified person were thrown away. There was no necessity for stating particularly the cases where the general doctrine was clearly recognized.

Lord Eldon, giving his opinion to the House of Lords, said that when two persons had voted for each candidate the knowledge of the disqualification appeared. But he said :

The election proceeded, and the great majority voted for Hawkins ; and the election of Hawkins was an absolute nullity by the act. (13 Car., 2, lib. I.) The majority knowingly voted FOR THIS DEAD MAN, and that was to be attended to.

The election was held on the 18th of December, 1806. When two persons had voted for each, Hawkins admitted that he had not taken the sacrament within a year. Receiving a majority of the votes, he was sworn in by the mayor, and Spicer was sworn in by two of the aldermen.

The statute (47 Geo. 3) made valid the election of Hawkins if he took the sacrament within a certain time after the election. He did that on the 4th of October, 1807. But if the office was at the time of passing that act legally filled up and enjoyed by Spicer, then the act did not help Hawkins; and the Court of King's Bench, giving judgment against Hawkins, held that Spicer was legally in the office; and this decision the House of Lords affirmed. (See also Claridge vs. Evelyn, 5 B. & A., 8.)

The result of the English cases was well stated by Lord Denman, in 1847, in deciding the case of Gosling vs. Veley, 7 Adolphus & Ellis, N. S. 437, in these words:

The result of the decisions appears to be this: Where the majority of electors vote for a disqualified person in ignorance of the fact of disqualification, the election may be void or voidable, or in the latter case may be capable of being made good, according to the nature of the disqualification. The objection may require ulterior proceeding to be taken before some competent tribunal in order to make it available; or it may be such as to place the elected candidate on the same footing as if he never had existed, and the votes for him were a nullity. But in no such case are the electors who vote for him deprived of their votes if the fact becomes known and is declared while the election is still incomplete. They may instantly proceed to another nomination and vote for another candidate. (It will be remembered that in England elections are all conducted viva voce.) If it be disclosed afterward, the party elected may be ousted and the election declared void, but the candidate in the minority will not be deemed ipso facto elected. But where an elector, before voting, receives due notice that a particular candidate is disqualified, and yet will do nothing but tender his vote for him, he must be taken voluntarily to abstain from exercising his franchise, and therefore however strongly he may, in fact, dissent, he must be taken in law to assent to the election of the opposing and qualified candidate, for he will not take the only course by which it can be resisted; that is, the helping to the election of some other person. He is present as an elector. His presence counts as such to make up the requisite number of electors, where a certain number is necessary, but he attends only as an elector to perform the duty which is cast on him by the franchise he enjoys as elector; he can speak only in a particular language; he can do only certain acts; any other language means nothing; any other act is merely null; his duty is to assist in making an election. If he dissents from the choice of A, who is qualified, he must say so by voting for some other also qualified. He has no right to employ his franchise merely in preventing an election, and so defeating the object for which he is empowered and bound to attend. And this is a wise and just rule in the law. It is necessary that an election should be duly made and at the lawful time; the electoral meeting is held for that purpose only; and but for this rule, the interest of the public and the purpose of the meeting might both be defeated by the perverseness or the corruption of electors who may seek some unfair advantage by postponement. If, then, the elector will not oppose the election of A in the only legal way, he throws away his vote by directing it where it has no legal force, and in so doing he voluntarily leaves unopposed—i. e., assents to—the voices of the other electors.

Where the disqualification depends on a fact which may be unknown to the elector, he is entitled to notice, for without that the inference of assent could not be fairly drawn, nor would the consequences as to the vote be just. But if the disqualification be of a sort whereof notice is to be presumed, none need expressly be given; no one can doubt that if an elector would nominate and vote only for a woman to fill the office of mayor or burgess in Parliament, his vote would be thrown away; there the fact would be notorious, and every man would be presumed to know the law upon that fact.

It follows from these observations that the true ground of the decision is that stated by Lord Mansfield in the case first cited, Rex vs. Foxcroft, 2 Burr., 21021: "Whenever electors are present who do not vote at all, they virtually acquiesce in the election made by those who do." In that case the numerical majority contented themselves with protesting against the election of him for whom the minority voted. In the case of Taylor against the Mayor of Bath, (3 Lnders, 324,) the counsel in argument took the distinction between not voting at all and voting for a disqualified candidate. They admitted that silence might be held to give consent, but that voting for the other candidate was an express negative; it was the only way, they said, of voting against one to vote for the other. But the court overruled the distinction; to vote for a person not qualified, they said, was the same thing as not to vote at all, which it was admitted would have been a constructive assent."

Lord Campbell held the same doctrine in very vigorous language in the case of The Queen vs. Coaks, 3 Ellis & Blackburn, 249 :

"I must say," said he, "that this appears to me to be a very plain case. It is allowed that it depends on the right of Cundall to act as a councillor on the 9th of November, 1852. If he had a right so to act at that time, the present defendant is not duly elected. Now, as to Cundall's right, who was elected a councillor on the 1st of November, 1851, the case is just the same as if Blake had not been the candidate on that occasion. To be sure, he did stand, but then he was ineligible, and that fact was known to the voters. It is a principle of all election law and of good sense that persons who knowingly throw a vote for an ineligible candidate throw away their votes just as much as if they voted for the man in the moon."

In another report of the same case, namely, 18 Jurist, part 1, page 378, Lord Campbell's language is reported thus :

This is clear; it is allowed that it depends upon whether Cundall had a right to act as city councillor of Norwich on the 9th of November. If he had a right so to act, the present defendant was not duly elected mayor, and is a usurper, and the quo warranto properly issued. Cundall was elected a city councillor on the 4th of November, 1851; it is the same as if Blake had not been a candidate, because he was ineligible, and that fact was known to the electors, and if the voters know that a candidate is ineligible, they throw away their votes when they vote for him. They do not vote.

This is good corporation law, good parliamentary law, and good sense, and there is nothing in Statute 6 and 7 William IV, chapter 76, to alter it. Then, Blake's votes being disregarded, Cundall had the greatest number of votes, and being duly elected, he ought to have been returned as one of the councillors.

In Queen vs. Tewksbury, L. R., 3 Q. B., 636, Blackburn, J., says :

I take this to be the rule of law applicable to this case. I think the knowledge that Blizard was the mayor is clearly brought home to every voter, but the question is not merely whether every vote given for him was thrown away, in the sense that it was given for a disqualified candidate—in that sense it was undoubtedly thrown away; but whether it was thrown away in the same manner as if the vote had been given for a dead man, or had not been given at all. I think that where a voter is informed that a certain circumstance in point of law disqualifies a candidate, even although he may hold a different opinion, yet if he afterward votes for that candidate, his vote is thrown away.

In the present election a voter may possibly have been told by the one party that Blizard being returning-officer could not be elected, by the other party that he could be; if this could be shown the vote would be thrown away; but the case merely shows as a fact that Blizard was returning-officer, from which a lawyer would be aware that he was disqualified, and, in my opinion, the knowledge that Blizard was returning-officer does not, in law, necessarily involve the knowledge that he was disqualified. It must be observed that when a voter is said to have notice of disqualification in a candidate, the word notice is ambiguous.

In Rex vs. Hawkins, 10 East, at p. 217, the question is thus stated: "If the law be that at the election of corporate officers, the votes given for an incapable candidate, after notice of such incapacity, are to be considered as thrown away, i. e., as if the voters had not given any vote at all, then this will be a good election of Spicer; unless the time when notice of his incapacity is given, viz., after two persons had given their votes for each of the candidates, can be considered as making any difference."

The general proposition that votes given for a candidate after notice of his being ineligible are to be considered as the same as if the persons had not voted at all, is supported by the cases of Reg. vs. Boscawen, Easter, 13 Anne; Reg. vs. Withers, Easter, 8 Geo., 2; Taylor vs. Mayor of Bath, M. 15 Geo., 2; all which are cited in Cowper, 537, in Rex vs. Munday. In the first, Boscawen vs. Roberts, the two candidates had an equal number of votes; but because Boscawen was incapable, the votes given for him were considered as thrown away, and the other duly elected.

In the second case Withers had five votes out of eleven; and the other six refusing to vote at all, the court held Withers duly elected, and that the six who refused to vote were virtually consenting to the election of Withers.

In the third case, Taylor, Biggs, and Kingston were candidates, which Biggs had fourteen votes, Taylor thirteen, and Kingston only one. There Lee, C. J., at nisi prius, directed the jury that if they were satisfied that the electors had notice of Biggs's want of qualification they should find for the plaintiff, (that was Taylor, who had only thirteen votes,) because Biggs, not being qualified, was to be considered a person not in esse, and the voting for him a mere nullity. The jury found for the plaintiff, and the court, on motion for a new trial, agreed with the law as laid down by Lee, C. J., and refused a new trial.

The whole of this reasoning goes to show that those who voted for the disqualified candidate, knowing of his disqualification, were to be treated as voting for a person not in esse, so that there must be an actual knowledge of his disqualification in law. And Lord Eldon similarly grounds his decision on the fact that the majority knowingly voted for a disqualified candidate, or, as he terms it, "for a dead man." Rex vs. Hawkins, 2 Don., 124, 148.

Certainly he seems to have thought that the ratio decidendi was the knowledge of the disqualification in law, and that the votes given with that knowledge were mere nullities. In Reg. vs. Coaks, 3 E. and B., at pp. 253-4; 23 L. J., (Q. B.), at p. 136, Lord Campbell, C. J., says: "Blake was, in fact, a candidate, but he was an alderman, and therefore ineligible, and that fact was known to the electors. Now, it is the law, both the common law and the parliamentary law, and it seems to me also common sense, that if an elector will vote for a man who he knows is ineligible, it is as if he did not vote at all, or voted for a non-existent person, as it has been said, as if he gave his vote for the man in the moon." It seems to me that Lord Campbell's opinion was this: The reason why the vote given for a dead man is not to be counted is that the voter knowingly votes for a person whom he knows to be incapable of election, and therefore the result is the same as if he had not voted at all.

Voting for a dead man, or for the man in the moon, are expressions showing that in order to make the vote a nullity there must be willful persistence against actual knowledge. But it does not seem to me consistent with either justice or common sense, or common law, to say that because these voters were aware of a certain circumstance they were necessarily aware of the disqualification arising from that circumstance, and that therefore their votes are to be considered as mere nullities. Upon this ground I do not think that the votes given in ignorance that Blizard was in law disqualified, are made out to have been wholly thrown away, and that Moore is entitled to act as town councillor. Under these circumstances the election ought to be considered as void, and a new election ought to be held.

In the Warwick election petition case, (19 L. T., 616,) Martin, B., said:

The fact that he had forbidden him to bribe is utterly immaterial, if the bribery is committed by him, and the effect would be to destroy his status as a candidate, and render him by law incapable of election; and every vote given for him would be void.

Again:

The moment an act of bribery was committed by himself or a person for whom he was responsible, from that moment his status as a candidate was annihilated.

Lord Westbury, in the case of Cooper vs. Phibbs, L. R., 2 H. L., 170, thus explains the maxim:

It is said ignorantia juris haud excusat; but in that maxim the word "jus" is used in the sense denoting general law, the ordinary law of the country.

Lord Coleridge, C. J., in Drinkwater vs. Deakin (L. R., 9 C. P., 633,) draws the true distinction applicable to disqualification thus:

Was Colonel Deakin then disqualified in point of law at the time of the election? That depends upon the meaning of the word "disqualified," and in this case, as so often happens with regard to the English language, much argument would be prevented by accurately defining the terms to be employed, and always using them in the sense defined. The word "disqualified" may be used in two senses at least—either to signify a person disqualified to be elected, so that, although the great majority of the electors voted for him, his election would be void, or to signify a person disqualified to be a candidate; so that, upon notice of the disqualification, if the great majority of the electors voted for him, his election would be void, with this further consequence, as regards the electors, that they would be held to have intentionally and deliberately abstained from voting, and to have acquiesced in the choice by the other electors of the other candidate, because they would not do what alone could prevent such choice—vote themselves for a candidate duly qualified to be one.

The same principle has been decided in Ireland in the case of Trench vs. Nolan, (Irish Rep., 6 Common Law, 464,) where the court of common pleas held that—

Votes given to a candidate who is disqualified, after notice of that disqualification had been given, are thrown away.

The same rule was followed in 1875 in the celebrated case of the Tipperary election, (Irish Rep., 9 Common Law, 217,) where John Mitchel and Stephen Moore were the only candidates for member of Parliament in the county of Tipperary. Mitchel received 3,114 votes and Moore 746. John Mitchel having been convicted in 1848 of treason-felony and sentenced to transportation for fourteen years, having escaped and been naturalized as a citizen of the United States, it was held that he was disqualified to be elected a member of the House of Commons, and that notice of his disqualification having been brought home to the electors who voted for him, their votes were thrown away, and the rival candidate, though numerically in the minority, was entitled to the seat.

III.

The true and valid electoral college of Oregon is that composed of Cronin, Miller, and Parker, and not that composed of Odell, Cartwright, and Watts.
The Revised Statutes provide that—

SEC. 136. It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required by the preceding section to meet.

SEC. 138. The electors shall make and sign three certificates of all the votes given by them, each of which certificates shall contain two distinct lists, one of the votes for President and the other of the votes for Vice-President, and shall annex to each of the certificates one of the lists of the electors which shall have been furnished to them by direction of the executive of the State.

These lists are attached to the votes given by Cronin, Miller, and Parker. No such lists are attached to the votes given by Odell, Cartwright, and Watts. Therefore, at least prima facie, the de facto electors are Cronin, Miller, and Parker. They had color of title, and, in fact, acted.

If it be said that Odell and Cartwright's names also appear as chosen electors in the certificates annexed to Cronin, Miller, and Parker's votes, we reply:

First. That the statement made by Cronin, Miller, and Parker is, that Odell and Cartwright "refused to act as such electors." This made a case of vacancy under the Oregon statutes; "death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise," being the enumerated contingencies, in each of which cases "the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill by viva voce and plurality of votes such vacancy in the electoral college," &c. Upon the refusal of Odell and Cartwright to act with Cronin, the latter, as was his right, duly proceeded to fill the vacancies by the appointment of Miller and Parker.

Secondly. The certificates filed by Odell, Cartwright, and Watts confirm this statement, as we suppose. For they show that Odell and Cartwright accepted a resignation tendered by Watts, and then elected the latter to fill the vacancy caused by his own resignation, acts which justify the description, "refused to act" with Cronin.

But this is not all. The Commission will notice that section 136 does not require any attestation of the executive lists by the secretary of state, or authentication by the great seal of the State.

Chapter 44, section 3, p. 849, of the General Laws of Oregon, provides that:

SEC. 3. The votes for electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. The Secretary of State shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the time of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

Chapter 13, title 4, section 33, requires the secretary of state, in presence of the governor, to proceed, within thirty days after the election, and sooner, if the returns be all received, "to canvass the votes given for * * * members of Congress."

The two lists prepared by the secretary, and signed, under the great seal of the State, by the governor and secretary of state, and given to the electors, are, therefore, the "official determination and declaration of their appointments by the board of State canvassers." They are here. The lists required by section 136 of the Revised Statutes, signed by the governor, and which by that section only the governor was required to sign, the secretary has made to conform to section 3 of chapter 44, by adding his signature, and the great seal of the State, and thus Cronin, Odell, and Cartwright were furnished at once with the authoritative statement by the secretary of the result of the canvass, and the certificate of the governor.

The case is thus brought directly within the rulings of the Commission in the Florida case. We produce the muniments of title which the secretary, upon completing the canvass, is required to furnish to the "electors elected," and those which the governor is required to cause to be made, certified, and "delivered to the electors." The governor's certificate, based upon the results of the secretary's canvass, as shown by the signature of the secretary and the great seal of the State, vouches for the election of Cronin.

Article 5, section 18, of the constitution of Oregon, provides—

That all commissions shall issue in the name of the State, shall be signed by the governor, sealed with the seal of the State, and attested by the secretary of state.

In Coolidge vs. Brigham, 1 Allen, 335, Bigelow, C. J., pronouncing the opinion of the whole court, said:

The magistrate before whom the action was originally brought was an officer de facto. He was not a mere usurper, undertaking to exercise the duties of an office to which he had no color of title. He had an apparent right to the office. He had a commission under the great seal of the State, bearing the signature of the governor, with his certificate thereon that the oaths of office had been duly administered, and in all respects appearing to have been issued with the formalities required by the constitution and laws of the commonwealth. He was thus invested with the apparent muniments of full title to the office. Although he might not have been an officer de jure, that is, legally appointed and entitled to hold and enjoy the office by a right which could not on due proceedings being had be impeached or invalidated, he was nevertheless in possession, under a commission prima facie regular and legal, and performing the functions of the office under a color and show of right. This made him a justice of the peace de facto.

Cronin was therefore de jure et de facto elector. Odell and Cartwright, although originally de jure electors, were not such de facto, for they were not clothed with the evidences of title, and by refusing to act with Cronin they divested themselves of their de jure right, and made it his duty to appoint others to fill the vacancies.

In Boardman & Perry vs. Halliday et al., 10 Paige, 223, it was held that—

Where there is but one office, there cannot be one officer de jure and another officer de facto in possession of the office at the same time.

To the same effect is Morgan vs. Quackenbush, decided by Mr. Justice Ira Harris, 22 Barb., 79, thus:

Again, the common council having, as a board of canvassers, declared Mr. Perry elected to the office, and their decision, however erroneous, remaining unreversed, what evidence has the defendant Quackenbush—however rightfully he may deem the office to belong to him—even of a color of right? Unless the returns of the inspectors can be successfully attacked, in an action to try the right to the office, he must succeed in such an action. But if, as I have attempted to show, the re-canvassing of the returns by the new board furnished no more evidence of his right to the office than the certificate of any other equal number of respectable men, there is no determination upon which he can rely to give him even the color of right. Indeed I do not understand that two persons can be in possession of the same office at the same time. If the certificate of the canvassers declaring Mr. Perry elected vested him with colorable title to the office, as I think it did, so that he had a right to enter upon the discharge of its duties, another effect of that decision was, to exclude the defendant Quackenbush, as well as everybody else, from the office. They could not hold as tenants in common—each having a legal right to perform its functions. If Mr. Perry became mayor de facto, the defendant Quackenbush, whatever his right, could not be mayor in fact at the same time.

In the absence of proof to the contrary, upon proof that he was an officer de facto, the court will presume that he was also an officer de jure. (Prell vs. McDonald, 7 Kans., 426; see also Willis vs. Sproule, 13 Kans., 257; Diggs vs. State, 49 Ala., 32.)

As to officers de facto :

The authorities all concur in recognizing as such any person who exercises the duties of an office under color of an appointment or election to that office.

See also Bowen vs. Hixon, 45 Mo., 342.

In conclusion, we claim to have established—

1. That Cronin, Miller, and Parker constituted the electoral college of Oregon, and that their votes should be the votes counted for President and Vice-President of the United States. They were the lawful electors de jure et de facto.

2. That if not, at least the vote cast by John W. Watts for Hayes and Wheeler cannot be counted.

First. On the day when by act of Congress electors must be appointed, the State of Oregon could not appoint him, nor could he accept the appointment, because he was then holding an office of profit and trust under the United States.

Secondly. Not having attained to the office de jure, he could not resign it into the hands of Odell and Cartwright.

Thirdly. Odell and Cartwright not having themselves attained to the office de facto, not being in possession, or acting under the muniments of title, nor de jure, having refused to serve with Cronin, who produces the certificates, could not appoint him to fill a vacancy.

Fourthly. Watts could not resign an office which Cronin de facto held.

Fifthly. Watts's original disqualification did not create a vacancy, but a case of failure to make choice, for which the laws of Oregon did not provide.

Sixthly. While Cronin held the office de facto, Watts's disqualification could not make a case of ab initio vacancy. An office cannot be vacant when filled, even if filled non jure. Baird vs. Bank of Washington, 11 S. & R., 414.

Seventhly. Watts was not an elector de facto, for Cronin, who held the muniments of title, the proper certificates, was present and voted, and his vote (sustained by evidence of his title) is presented here for count.

Whether, therefore, the vote of Cronin be counted or not, that of Watts cannot be.

APPENDIX OF OPINIONS.

REMARKS OF MEMBERS OF THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION IN THE CONSULTATIONS THEREOF, AS REDUCED TO WRITING BY THEMSELVES, IN ACCORDANCE WITH A RESOLUTION OF THE COMMISSION.

The remarks of the various members of the Commission, in its consultations, are presented in the order in which they spoke on the Florida case.

[Mr. Commissioner Edmunds, who was the first speaker in the deliberations on the Florida case, was taken ill early in March and obliged to leave the Capital on account of illness, and was unable to write out his remarks by the time limited by the Commission's resolution.]

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER MORTON.

FLORIDA.

The Electoral Commission having under consideration an offer of evidence to impeach the canvass of the November election in Florida for presidential electors made by the State canvassing-board—

Mr. Commissioner MORTON said :

Mr. PRESIDENT: By the statute of Florida enacted in 1872 the secretary of state, attorney-general, comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, were constituted a board of canvassers to canvass the returns of the election, and determine and declare who have been elected State officers and presidential electors. The statute provides that—

If any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration; and the secretary of state shall preserve and file in his office all such returns, together with such other documents and papers as may have been received by him or by said board of canvassers.

Under this statute the secretary of state, the comptroller of public accounts, and the attorney-general acted as a board of State canvassers, and on the morning of the 6th of December, 1876, a majority of them returned and certified that Frederick C. Humphreys, Charles H. Pearce, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long had been chosen as electors. Afterward, on the same day, the governor of the State, M. L. Stearns, issued to them, as electors, his certificate, and they cast their votes in due form of law for Rutherford B. Hayes for President and William A. Wheeler as Vice-President, and certified the same to the President of the Senate.

Afterward, the supreme court of the State issued a mandamus directing the board of canvassers to make another count of the votes for governor and other State officers, rejecting all testimony of irregularity and fraud except such as might appear upon the face of the returns. Under this order of the court the board of canvassers was reconvened and recounted the votes in accordance with the order made by the court, and declared Drew and the other democratic candidates for State offices to have been elected. They at the same time made a recount of the votes for electors, and again declared the Hayes electors to have been chosen. After Drew had been inaugurated governor, and the new secretary of state, attorney-general, and comptroller of public accounts had taken their offices, the legislature being in session, in January, 1877, passed an act requiring the new secretary of state, comptroller of public accounts, the attorney-general, and such other members of the cabinet as they might choose, to reconvene as a board of canvassers to count the votes for electors. This they did on the 19th day of January, and declared Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert Bullock, and Robert B. Hilton to have been chosen as electors. The same persons had assembled on the 6th day of December, and, assuming to have been chosen as electors, voted for Samuel J. Tilden as President and Thomas A. Hendricks as Vice-President, and sealed up their votes and sent them to the President of the Senate, inclosing with them a certificate from William A. Cocke, attorney-general, certifying to their election as electors.

On the morning of the 6th of December an application was made in the circuit court of Florida in the name of the State on the relation of Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert Bullock, and Robert B. Hilton, to which the Hayes electors were made defendants and upon whom process was served at one o'clock on the 6th of December before the said Hayes electors had cast their votes for President and Vice-President. By the terms of the writ they were required to appear in the court on the 18th of January, 1877, to show by what right they claimed to act as electors. This writ was prosecuted to final judgment on the 29th day of January, 1877, and judgment of the court was rendered declaring that the Tilden electors had been chosen as such by the votes of the people on the 7th of November, and that the Hayes electors had no title whatever to the office.

The Constitution provides:

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate; the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President.

Leaving out of view the disputed question who shall count the votes, and assuming that the power belongs to the two Houses, and was by them properly vested in this Commission, the question still remains, what is embraced in the phrase "the votes shall then be counted."

And first, "What votes shall be counted?" I answer, "The votes recorded in the certificates which the President of the Senate is required to open in the presence of the two Houses." May the two Houses inquire whether the certificate is a forgery? Certainly; because the President of the Senate is only required to open in the presence of the two Houses the certificates from the electors. If the certificate is a forgery, it is not from the electors. The thing to be ascertained is that the certificate is from the electors of the State, and if it is, then the votes contained in it are to be counted. If the votes were cast by the electors of the State, is it competent for the two Houses or this Commission to inquire whether such persons had the requisite qualifications to be electors as prescribed by the laws of the State, or were eligible under the Constitution of the United States, and if found in the negative, reject their votes? I answer, "No!" Such inquiry and rejection would be inconsistent with the positive command of the Constitution that the votes contained in the certificates "shall then be counted." There is no time provided for such an inquiry, and it is evident that it was not contemplated. The injunction was placed upon the States that they should not appoint as an elector a member of Congress or any person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States; but if the States disregard the injunction, there is no time or place for trial of the question when the votes are counted. We should do violence to the intelligence of the framers of the Constitution if we supposed they intended the result of a presidential election might be changed by the discovery after the election, or after the votes had been cast by the electors, that an elector was disqualified. It is a matter in which the elector has no other interest than that of the whole body of citizens, and we are not at liberty to suppose that the wishes of a State should be defeated by the fact that an elector was ineligible for some cause of which the mass of the voters, or the appointing power, whatever it might be, had no knowledge. The process of counting the votes was intended to be short and simple. The States were to appoint electors in the manner prescribed by their legislatures, and the electors were to meet in the several States and vote upon the same day; the records of their transactions were to be sent to the President of the Senate in sealed envelopes, and by him to be opened in the presence of the two Houses, and the votes were then to be counted.

Whether it is competent for Congress to pass laws under which the title of a President may be tried in the courts upon a writ of quo warranto, in which the very right and truth of the election may be examined, is not material for the present inquiry. We cannot by logic or imagination enlarge the simple provision of the Constitution, that the certificates of the electors from the various States shall be opened in the presence of the two Houses and the votes therein contained "shall then be counted." If it should appear when the certificates were opened that the requirements of the Constitution had not been complied with, for example, that the electors did not vote by ballot, or that they did not designate in distinct ballots the persons voted for as President and Vice-President, or that the electors were holding offices of trust and profit under the United States and therefore ineligible, it might be the duty of the two Houses—although upon this point I give no opinion—to reject such votes, for there it would appear affirmatively in the certificate, over the signatures of the electors, that they had not conformed to the Constitution or that they were not eligible. To reject such votes would be going to the limit of the power of the two Houses to disobey the express command of the Constitution that "the votes shall then be counted." But if the certificates were silent as to whether the electors voted by ballot or were ineligible, then such votes must be counted, and the two Houses have no power to make an inquiry whether the electors voted by ballot or were eligible.

The word "counted" means enumerated. Had it been intended to give the two Houses, or whoever counted the votes, any judicial or revisory power over them, beyond mere enumeration, the purpose would have been expressed in words. In the several States the canvassing or returning officers are held to a simple ministerial enumeration of the votes, unless enlarged powers are expressly given by the statute. Strange to say, in this very case, those who insist that this Commission has power to go behind the decision of the Florida returning-board, made at the proper time, before the 6th of December, and to receive testimony impeaching its truthfulness and legality, are compelled to reverse the rule and nullify the principle when considering the action of the returning-board itself, acting under a statute much broader than the provision in the Constitution.

The statute under which they acted contains the provision I quoted at the beginning of my remarks, and, by necessary construction gives the board the power to take testimony to show whether a return was "false or fraudulent."

It is insisted that this statute did not permit the board to look beyond the mere face of the papers and take evidence to show that any return from a county or precinct was irregular, false, or fraudulent. This construction does violence to the language and spirit of the statute, and it is hard to see how any court could maintain it; and yet those maintaining it insist, in the next breath, that the constitutional declaration that "the votes shall then be counted" gives to this Commission the most enlarged powers of inquiry, far beyond any attempted to be exercised by the Florida canvassing-board.

If the Florida statute gives no authority to take testimony or to look beyond the mere face of the returns, what shall be said of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that when the certificates are opened "the votes shall then be counted?" The whole case in favor of the Tilden electors consists in the demand that the returns from the various counties and precincts of the State of Florida shall be received and counted, and that no evidence shall be admitted to show fraud or violence; and this demand is made in the face of a statute evidently giving to the returning-officers power to take testimony and to reject any return if it be shown to have been irregular, false, or fraudulent; and then, reversing the principle absolutely, to demand that this Commission, representing the two Houses, under the brief command of the Constitution "to count the votes," shall go behind the decision of the proper officers of Florida and make inquiries, both of law and fact, and exercise the highest judicial powers.

Aside from the consideration of matters which might appear upon the face of the certificate, there is absolutely but one thing to be done, and that is to identify the certificates as coming from the electors of the States. If they come from the electors of the States, the votes are to be counted. How, then, shall it be known that the certificate comes from the electors of the State? There is no requirement in the Constitution that the electors shall be certified by the governors of the States. That is a plan of identification, which was not devised until five years after the adoption of the Constitution and three years after the first presidential election. The positive requirement of the Constitution that the certificates from the electors appointed by the States shall be opened and the votes therein counted cannot be defeated by an act of Congress making the certificate of a governor necessary to the right of the elector to vote and to have his certificate opened and his vote counted. Should the certificate of the governor be withheld arbitrarily or by accident, or be falsely given to another, it could not defeat the express requirement of the Constitution that the certificate from the electors appointed by the State shall be opened and the votes therein counted.

As before stated, the only issue that can be tried is that the certificate is from the electors. The only certificate which the President of the Senate is bound to receive, and to open in the presence of the two Houses, is from the electors, a fact which he has a right, I think, to ascertain in any way that he can; but as this law requires him to open all certificates purporting to contain electoral votes, and he acts under it, it is the duty of this Commission to ascertain which certificate comes from the electors of the State, and when that is done the duty is performed, and the votes contained therein must be counted. The certificate of the governor is no part of the appointment of an elector, nor is its issue in any sense the act of the State. It is issued by virtue of an act of Congress, and Congress might have devolved the duty upon the secretary of state, the judge of the district court of the United States, or upon any other officer it chose to select. The certificate of the governor is the creation of the act of Congress, intended as a convenient form of evidence, but is not made conclusive, and could not be, for Congress has no power to make it a condition-precedent of the right of an elector appointed under the laws of a State that he shall obtain a certificate from the governor before exercising his right to vote. Such a provision would clearly be an infringement of the Constitution by attaching a new condition to the office of an elector. If it shall be made to appear that the certificate of the governor has been given to an elector who was not appointed in the manner prescribed by the legislature of the State, the certificate is null and void, and is to be utterly disregarded. The certificate of the governor issued under the act of Congress is not the act of the State. The return made by the canvassing-officers of the State is the act of the State and cannot be questioned.

How then shall we know whether the electors executing the certificate No. 1 in this case were the electors for the State of Florida? I answer, first, by the certificate of the governor, which is prima facie and sufficient evidence, if unimpeached, but if impeached then by reference to the declarations of those officers who, by the laws of Florida, were authorized to ascertain and certify who have been appointed electors; and when we have found such declarations we are at the end of the inquiry, and must accept them as final and conclusive.

There are some things in government that must depend upon forms, and some kinds of evidence that must be received as conclusive. In those particulars in which the Government deals with States as such, the forms of expression and action adopted by the States must be accepted as final.

It was intended that the States, in the appointment of electors, should be absolutely independent of each other and of the National Government.

The action of the State in the appointment¹ of electors must be declared by officers designated by the legislature for that purpose, and when they have declared it, their declaration must not only be accepted by Congress as final and unquestionable, but be final and conclusive as to themselves and to the State; and they cannot afterward, under the influence of temptation, fear, or any other motive, reconsider their finding and determination.

If it were attempted by an act of Congress to take from the State the determination and ascertainment of the persons appointed electors in the manner prescribed by the legislature, it would be clearly unconstitutional.

The right of a State to appoint electors carries with it necessarily the right to ascertain in form of law who have been appointed. The power of the State to appoint would not be complete without the power to declare finally who have been appointed. If Congress may overrule the State authorities and decide who were elected by the people, the independence of the States in the appointment of electors would be lost, and their power amount to little more than the right to nominate a number of candidates from whom Congress might select. It is the peremptory duty of the governor to give the certificate to those persons who have been decided in the manner prescribed by the law of the State to have been appointed electors; and should he give the certificate to other persons, it would be fraudulent and void.

It is provided in the Constitution that the votes of the electors shall all be cast on the same day, and the history of the clause shows that great importance was attached to it.

The purpose was to prevent fraud, to prevent the electors in one State from waiting until the other States had voted and then so vote as to change or control the result.

How completely would this purpose be defeated if it were in the power of a State, after the electors in all the States had voted, to have a new count of votes in that State, so as to invalidate the votes of the electors and give effect to the votes of another set, who at the time of casting their votes had no title in law and were mere pretenders. This would present the greatest opportunities and temptations to fraud, and reverse the theory and purpose of the framers of the Constitution, who intended that the result of a presidential election should be settled irrevocably in one day, and that no opportunity should be left for intrigue and cabal after that time.

When electors have cast their votes on the 6th of December, and have sealed them up and transmitted them to the President of the Senate, they are functus officio. Their office has expired and their functions are gone forever. The power of the State in the election of a President is then exhausted, and the jurisdiction of the State which was absolute before, is thereafter absolutely extinguished. It is not left in the power of a State to undo or impair what she has done, by subsequently declaring that the electors who had voted had not been appointed, and that by a recount of the votes, real or pretended, other persons were shown to have been appointed. Whether such subsequent action on the part of the State is had through the courts, or by the legislature, or by both combined, can make no difference. Either way, or any way, such action, if allowed to prevail, would be fatal to our system of government. The certainty of political action requires that an act once performed in the election of a President shall be irrevocable.

If it be conceded that an elector at the time of the election in November, and at the time he voted as elector in December, held an office of trust under the United States, and was therefore ineligible, the question arises, what effect would it have upon his vote? Having been declared elected by the State returning-officers, and having received the certificate of the governor as an elector, he certainly had the color of office and was an officer de facto.

The act of an officer de facto is held to be valid so far as it affects the rights of any other person than himself. If his ineligibility had subsequently been established by a court of competent authority, upon a writ of quo warranto, it could not affect the validity of his vote.

The ineligibility of a person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States to be appointed an elector is not self-executing, and remains in abeyance until laws are passed providing method and process for ascertaining judicially such ineligibility.

Where the action of a State legislature is provided for or required by the Constitution of the United States, such action when performed cannot be revoked.

Each State is entitled to two Senators, to be chosen by the legislature thereof.

When a Senator has been chosen in the manner prescribed by law, the power of the legislature is exhausted, and it cannot at a subsequent time, when becoming dissatisfied with its choice, annul the first election and enter into a new one, nor can it accomplish the same purpose by resolving that the votes at the first election had not been properly counted and thereupon order a new election or a new count.

Again, the Constitution provides that amendments to it may be submitted by two-thirds of each House of Congress to the legislatures of the several States for their ratification. When the ratification of an amendment has been made by a legislature, it cannot be afterward reconsidered and undone. The legislatures of New York and Ohio attempted by formal votes to reconsider the ratifications before given to the fifteenth amendment, but their action was generally considered as a nullity by the legal mind of the United States.

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Under this power the House may go behind the returns and count the actual number of votes received by a member, and the Senate may go behind the certificate of the governor and inquire whether a Senator received the number of legislative votes necessary to elect, whether he has the qualifications required by the Constitution, or was guilty of bribery or other misconduct. And here it is claimed that the two Houses, or this Commission in their stead, in the absence of any constitutional provision, have the right to inquire into the election, returns, and qualifications of electors; that together they have the same power over electors that each House has over its own members. How monstrous is this assumption when we remember that the great effort by the framers of the Constitution was to make the executive independent of the legislative, and to place the election of a President beyond the reach or control of Congress. The electors were to be appointed by the States, in such manner as the legislatures might direct, and were thus removed from Congress as far as possible. The only mention of Congress in connection with the subject is, that the President of the Senate shall open the certificates in the presence of the two Houses; and from that is inferred the vast power to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of electors.

The right of each House to judge of the election, return, and qualification of its members was not left to implication but was expressly conferred, notwithstanding it was so necessary and proper that each House should have that power. And can it be supposed that a similar power in regard to electors, so important and controlling in the choice of a President, would be left to implication had it been intended that the two Houses should have it? Not only is the power not given, but there is no provision from which it can be implied, and the history of the Constitution shows conclusively that the purpose was to put the election of a President beyond the control of Congress. The tenth article of amendment to the Constitution declares that—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

The rule of construction adopted from the first is that the Government of the United States possesses no powers except those that are expressly conferred or such as are necessary to the due execution of those expressly conferred. Not only is the power on the part of the two Houses to judge of the election, returns, and qualification of electors not expressly conferred, and no provision from which it can be implied, but to infer it would be to violate the purpose entertained by the framers of the Constitution, and so often expressed by them, to preserve the independence of the executive department from the control and absorption of the legislative.

As the appointment of electors is to be made by the States in such manner as the legislatures may provide, it is clearly within the power of the States to provide for contesting the election of electors by the people, or to correct any errors or frauds in the return or canvass of the vote, provided such contest or correction is made before the 6th day of December, when the votes of the electors are to be cast; but, because the States have failed to make provision for such contest, or the correction of frauds or errors, it is absurd to argue that the two Houses of Congress or this Commission may step in and do that which the States had power but failed to do. The powers of the two Houses upon this or any other subject are not made to depend upon the failure of States to exercise their constitutional power, but depend upon the positive or implied grants of power in the Constitution.

If the States have a distinct and clearly defined right expressed in the Constitution, it is their perfect freedom from all outside interference in the appointment of electors. In this they are as free and independent as in the choice of a governor or any State officer.

In making an application of the principles of law to this case, certain great purposes should be kept in view:

First. That the process of electing a President shall be progressive, so that when the term of one expires there shall be another ready to take his place and no interregnum occur; and to cut off every method or purpose to retard the process and defeat the great result.

Second. That it was a leading purpose of the framers of the Constitution to preserve the independence of each department of Government, and especially to protect and preserve the independence of the Executive as against the absorbing tendencies of the legislative department.

Third. The judicial power of the Government is vested entirely in the courts, except where the same is expressly given, or by necessary implication, to another department, as where each House is authorized to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

In the organization of government the certainty of political action is an indispensable element, so that every step when taken shall be irrevocable.

After the electors have been appointed by the States, and have voted on the day fixed by law, and their votes have been sealed and transmitted to the President of the Senate, the States, as such, have no longer any connection with the matter. They cannot reconsider their action, appoint new electors, and vote for new candidates, nor can they accomplish the same things by declaring that although their electors were appointed in due form of law, yet in fact the appointment was procured by fraud or by a mistake of law or fact on the part of some of the State officers while in the process of appointment. The appointment of electors, when once made, must, for the very highest reasons of public policy, be irrevocable; for if a State should have the power, after the votes have been cast honestly, to undo a fraud, or correct a mistake, it is manifest that parties or conspirators, under that cover, might seek the perpetration of fraud to change or control the result of presidential elections.

For the reasons given, I believe that the votes contained in certificate No. 1 must be counted, and that the evidence offered to impeach them ought not to be received. The electors therein named were certified by M. L. Stearns, the lawful governor of the State at the time, and their election by the people was declared in due form of law by the officers of the State expressly authorized by the laws of the State to perform that duty. That a new governor, a new legislature, and a new returning-board, coming into office after the 6th of December and after the jurisdiction of the State had passed away, with or without the aid of the courts, can recount the vote, or in any way change the result, is a doctrine most dangerous and absurd.

LOUISIANA.

The electoral votes of Louisiana being under consideration—

Mr. Commissioner MORTON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: It is not my purpose to go over the ground which was discussed and decided in the Florida case. An offer is made to impeach the decision of the returning-officers of Louisiana by showing that they threw out votes in violation of law; that their rulings were arbitrary and unjust, and that in point of fact the Tilden electors were appointed. The question as to the right to go behind the returns of the proper officers and inquire what was the actual result of an election in the State, and to examine into the conduct of such officers to find whether they acted within their jurisdiction or upon sufficient evidence, was fully settled in the negative in the Florida case. Without pretending that it is legitimate in this case—for I know it is not—to discuss the actual condition of things in Louisiana, yet I wish here to repel the charge of fraud which has been so persistently made by the objectors and counsel who appeared in favor of the Tilden electors.

If I am correctly advised, I believe that if we were to go behind the action of the returning-board of Louisiana we should find that action based upon sufficient evidence, and that the pretended majorities for the Tilden electors in many parishes had been obtained by intimidation produced by murder, violence, and the most dreadful crimes. It is easy to talk about what could be proven in the way of fraud when it is pretty well understood that there will be no opportunity or time to make the proof, and to bring the parties making the charge to the test. During the last ten years Louisiana has been the theater of the most fearful outrages recorded in the annals of our country. According to the testimony taken by investigating committees, and collected by General Sheridan, thousands of men have been killed and wounded on account of their opinions. The most terrible proscriptions have been practiced, and cruelties inflicted, compared to which the warfare of the American savage is civilized and humane.

But we are here to discuss questions of law, and I refer to these features in the recent history of Louisiana only to repel the constant charge of fraud and to rebut the allegations that resistance is made to going behind the returns and entering into the details of the Louisiana election for fear of the proof of these frauds. The appointment of the Hayes electors was duly certified by the governor of the State, and their appointment by the votes of the people was declared in due form of law by the proper returning-officers of the State, who alone were duly authorized to canvass and determine the persons appointed electors by the votes of the people.

To investigate the question whether these officers exceeded their jurisdiction or acted without proper evidence would concede the whole ground, would overturn the decision made in the Florida case, and lead necessarily to an examination of the details of the election in every parish in Louisiana. If the returning-officers were authorized to canvass the votes and make the declaration of the persons elected, we are concerned only with that declaration and not with the grounds upon which it was made. The declaration made by these officers is the act and declaration of the State, and we cannot, under the brief command of the Constitution, "and the votes shall then be counted," examine into the evidence upon which it was made. But to consider this demand in a practical point of view, we know very well that such an investigation could not be made between this and the 4th day of March. It would take weeks and perhaps months; and to enter upon it would be to defeat the presidential election altogether, create an interregnum, and bring confusion, perhaps anarchy, into the Government.

The length of the investigations which would have to be made, if we went behind the returns of the State officers, is an overwhelming argument against the soundness of the doctrine contended for. Taking the four disputed States, it is not possible that the investigations could be made in months, hardly this year; and it is claimed that all this shall be done under the brief command in the Constitution, "and the votes shall then be counted." Never was so monstrous a burden suspended upon so small a peg. It cannot be that the framers of the Constitution intended to authorize the two Houses of Congress, when the votes for President are being counted, to enter upon investigations in any or all the States which, by means of their length and complexity, would enable cunning conspirators to defeat the result of an election every time.

If it were intended by the fathers of the Republic to plant a rock in the straits directly in the path of the ship of state, and upon which she might be wrecked at any time by the carelessness or wickedness of the crew, it could not be done more effectually than by authorizing the two Houses of Congress to enter upon investigations almost interminable in their character and which through their magnitude and nature could be but imperfectly made, no difference how long the time consumed.

But it is alleged that the returning-board of Louisiana was not a legal body, not being composed according to the law of the State. Section 2 of the act of 1872, which is the latest law upon the subject, contains the following provision :

That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning-officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning-officers. The returning-officers shall, after each election, before entering on their duties, take and subscribe to the following oath before a judge of the supreme or any district court, &c.

It is charged that the board at the time it made the canvass and declaration of votes had but four members, and was not, therefore, a legal body. There is nothing in this objection. The law expressly provides that a majority of the five persons "shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections." Three would constitute a majority and be sufficient by the express terms of the statute "to make the returns of all elections." The law provides that the Supreme Court shall consist of nine judges, but it will not be asserted that the existence of even three vacancies in the court would invalidate its character as a legal body. In every deliberative body which is required to have a quorum, whether of a majority or any other number, its legal character is not destroyed so long as that quorum is maintained. The very object of having a quorum with which any deliberative body may do business is that its legality and capacity for business shall not be destroyed by vacancies or the absence of members so long as the number fixed for a quorum is maintained. It is provided that the Senate of the United States shall consist of two Senators from each State, yet the existence of a dozen vacancies would not impair the legal character of the body.

But it is argued that this rule will not apply in this case, because the remaining members of the board have the power to fill vacancies and it is their duty to do so. While it may be their duty to do so if they can agree upon the person, yet their failure to perform it could no more impair the legality of the body while a quorum remains than if the power to fill the vacancies belonged to the governor or the legislature. It is the duty of the majority to canvass and determine the result of an election when the votes have been placed in their possession, and the failure to perform the duty of filling a vacancy could not discharge them from the performance of the other duty to canvass and determine the result of an election. In point of fact, they may have been unable to agree upon the person, or have failed to fill the vacancy from other cause than a willful disregard of duty; but whether that is so or not is wholly immaterial.

But it is said that the board was illegal because it was not composed of men from all political parties as directed by the statute. The statute in that particular is merely directory and is incapable of rigid enforcement. How many parties or factions there were in the State we are not advised, although we know as a matter of general history that there were two principal parties, and the injunction to make up the board from all political parties is one which rests upon the senate of the State and not upon the board itself, and if the senate, in electing members of the board, disregard the injunction, there is no power lodged anywhere in the government of the State or in the courts to correct the error.

The distinction between mandatory and directory statutes is very broad, and this one clearly belongs to the latter class. It is like the injunction in the statute creating the office of attorney-general, that the person selected for that office "shall be learned in the law." The legality of the appointment of an attorney-general could not be questioned and the validity of his acts set aside by the allegation that he was not learned in the law, as required by the statute. The injunction that the senate in creating this board should take the members from all political parties should have been observed if it were possible, but the pretense that the validity of the acts of the board would be affected by proof that the senate had failed to observe the injunction is quite absurd.

Although the speeches have been very lengthy and able, and the objections filed against the validity of the action of the returning-board voluminous and elaborate, the whole question comes down to this simple proposition: Is it competent for the two Houses of Congress, or for this Commission acting in their stead, when counting the electoral votes for President, to go behind the decision made by the officers appointed by the legislature of the State for the purpose of canvassing and determining the result of the election, to inquire what was the number of votes cast for one set of candidates or for the other, whether the election was fairly conducted, and whether the officers appointed by the State to conduct the election or to determine its results acted within the limits of the law or upon sufficient evidence. A majority of this Commission decided in the Florida case that we had no such power, and I believe that time and the good sense of the American people will justify the decision in every respect.

OREGON.

The electoral votes of Oregon being under consideration—

Mr. Commissioner MORTON said :

Mr. PRESIDENT : At the late presidential election in Oregon Dr. Watts was a candidate for elector on the republican ticket, and received something more than one thousand majority over his highest democratic competitor. He was, at the time of the November election, postmaster in the little town of La Fayette, in which he lived. This office he resigned on the 13th of November, and on the next day a special agent of the Post-Office Department took possession of the office and removed it to another building, and his resignation was accepted by the Postmaster-General. On the 4th day of December the secretary of state of Oregon, in pursuance of law, canvassed the votes for presidential electors in the presence of the governor, and made out a tabulated statement of the returns from the various counties, which he certified under the seal of the State as being a complete and lawful canvass, showing that Dr. Watts and Messrs. Odell and Cartwright had been appointed electors for the State of Oregon.

On the morning of the 6th of December the governor issued three certificates, in each of which he stated that Messrs. Odell and Cartwright and one E. A. Cronin were the three eligible persons who had received the highest number of votes, and were duly appointed electors. These certificates he placed in the hands of Cronin, who refused to deliver them to Odell and Cartwright, but kept them in his possession, and after professing to read their contents, or a part of them, in the hearing of Odell, Cartwright, and Watts, retired to another part of the room in which they were assembled, and appointed two persons to act as electors instead of Odell and Cartwright; and assuming to act as electors, the three voted, Cronin for Tilden and the other two for Hayes. When Odell and Cartwright met at twelve o'clock on the 6th of December, Dr. Watts resigned the office of elector, and was immediately thereafter elected by them to fill the vacancy in the college of electors, and the three then cast their votes for Hayes for President and Wheeler for Vice-President.

The governor refused to give the certificate of election to Watts for the alleged reason that Watts was ineligible to be voted for on the 7th of November because he was a deputy postmaster, and gave it to Cronin upon the ground that he had received the next highest number of votes. He assumed that he had judicial power to judge as to Watts's eligibility, and decided that he was ineligible at the time of the election and that his competitor having the next highest number of votes was elected. This assumption on the part of the governor was entirely erroneous. His business under the statute of the United States was simply to give the certificate of appointment as electors to those persons who had been declared by the proper returning-officers of the State to have been appointed. He had no more power to pass upon the question of the eligibility of an elector, and refuse to give a certificate upon that account, than he had to pass upon the eligibility of a person who had been elected as a member of Congress. His duty was simply ministerial. In the next place, if he had the judicial power and the right to pass upon the question, his decision was directly in conflict with the law. The meaning of the Constitution is that an elector shall not be a member of Congress or an officer under the United States at the time he takes the office and casts his vote. If on the 6th of December, when the electors voted, Dr. Watts was eligible, having before resigned his office as postmaster, it was of no importance that he had been postmaster when voted for in November. This question has often been decided, and it has always been held that members of Congress who were ineligible from any cause, from want of age, of citizenship, or disability under the fourteenth amendment, at the time of their election by the people or by the legislature, but whose disabilities were removed at the time the term of office began and they took their seats, were eligible, and their ineligibility on the day of the election was of no importance. But whatever may be the law upon this subject, it became unimportant from the fact that on the 6th day of December Watts resigned his office of elector to the college of electors and was immediately re-elected to fill the vacancy at a time when he was unquestionably eligible. The power of the college of electors to fill the vacancy occasioned by his resignation appears from the following provision of the Oregon statute :

SEC. 59. The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day, and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill by viva voce and plurality of votes such vacancy in the electoral college, and when all the electors shall appear, or the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled as above provided, such electors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

By this statute the college of electors is expressly authorized to fill "any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise." So that they could fill a vacancy arising from non-election as well as from death or resignation. The object of the statute is remedial, and it should be liberally construed, so as to give the State her full voice in the election of a President and Vice-President. In any view of the case, whether the vacancy in the college of electors arose from non-election by reason of Watts's ineligibility on the 7th of November, or by reason of his resignation on the 6th of December, the college of electors had the right to fill it. The doctrine upon which the governor assumed to act, that where a candidate is ineligible the person having the next highest number of votes is elected, is in conflict with the general current of judicial decisions in the United States. Each House of Congress, after the fullest deliberation, has expressly decided that in such a case the minority candidate is not elected, and that the election is a failure.

In England it has been held that where it was known to the voters that the majority candidate was ineligible at the time they voted for him, the minority candidate was elected. But these decisions were put upon the express ground of actual knowledge upon the part of the voters of the ineligibility, and that the voters not only knew the fact which in law made the candidate ineligible, but knew also that the fact did make him ineligible under the law. The English courts have held that in such a case the voters are not presumed to know the law, but it must be shown affirmatively that they knew not only the fact which made the candidate ineligible, but also knew that under the law the fact made him ineligible. The statute of Oregon provides in section 60 that—

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

Here it is provided that "the votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress." By turning to section 37 we find the provision for canvassing the votes given for Representatives in Congress as follows:

The county clerk, immediately after making the abstract of the votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each of said abstracts, and transmit it by mail to the secretary of state at the seat of government; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, state printer, justices of the supreme court, member of Congress, and district attorneys; and the governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes, and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person.

By the above provision, the secretary of state is made the canvassing and returning officer for member of Congress and all the State officers. He is to canvass the votes in the presence of the governor, but the governor is simply a witness and takes no part whatever in the canvass, and is positively required to issue a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes as certified by the secretary. Upon this subject the governor has no discretion whatever. His duty is purely ministerial, and the certificate of election for member of Congress and every State officer is to be issued to the person having the highest number of votes. All questions of eligibility are taken from him. His duty is imperative to certify to the person having the highest number of votes; and what he is to do as to the member of Congress and the State officers, he is by the other section required to do as to presidential electors.

By section 60, above quoted, the secretary is to canvass and return the persons appointed electors; is to prepare two lists of the names of the persons appointed, and affix to them the seal of the State. The governor is then commanded to sign these lists, and the secretary to deliver them "to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December." When the secretary has canvassed, certified, and returned the votes of electors to his office, their appointment is complete. All that the governor has to do with the matter thereafter under the statute is purely ministerial. He has no judicial power upon the subject. He has no discretion whatever reposed in him by the law. It is his peremptory duty to sign the lists made out by the secretary, and the secretary is to certify to the election of the persons having the highest number of votes. Taking the two sections of the statute together, it is the absolute duty of the secretary to return as appointed those persons having the highest number of votes, and the absolute duty of the governor to give the certificate to the persons thus returned by the secretary.

The title of the persons appointed electors, as shown by the certificate of the secretary made out on the 4th day of December, and deposited in his office, was complete, and could not be impaired or affected in any way by the refusal of the governor thereafter to issue the certificate as he was required to do by law. The secretary of state in Oregon is the canvassing officer, and has the same duties devolved upon him as those which belong to the canvassing-officers in Florida or to the returning-board in Louisiana, except that he has no judicial or discretionary powers given to him as are conferred by the statutes of Florida and Louisiana, his duty in all cases being to return as elected the persons having the highest number of votes. The certificates signed by the governor of the appointment of electors having been withheld from the electoral college, the electors procured from the secretary, under the seal of the State, a copy of the certificate of the vote of the State, as tabulated and prepared by him on the 4th of December, and inclosed it in the certificate containing their votes and the record of their action on the 6th day of December, transmitted by them to the President of the Senate.

I may here repeat what I said in the Florida and Louisiana cases, that the question of eligibility of electors belongs to the States, and if it is disregarded by the States there is no way when the votes are counted in the presence of the two Houses or by this Commission to try and settle such question. In the case of Cæsar Griffin, Chief-Justice Chase decided that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution making certain persons ineligible to office was not self-executing, and could not be carried into effect in the absence of an act of Congress providing for the adjudication and settlement of questions arising under it. There are few provisions of the Constitution that are self-executing, and clearly this is not one; but in any point of view the question of eligibility as it has been raised in this and the Louisiana and Florida cases is wholly unimportant. Here Dr. Watts was re-elected elector by the college, in pursuance of the statute, after the alleged ineligibility had been removed; but if at the time of his re-election on the 6th of December he had still been postmaster it could not have affected the validity of the vote which he cast as an elector. It has been held that the official acts of one who was ineligible to hold the office were valid although after that time a court of law in the proceeding upon quo warranto found the fact of ineligibility and ousted him from the office. In one case the judgment and findings of a court were held to be valid, although it was subsequently decided by the proper tribunal that the judge was ineligible under the fourteenth amendment to hold the office. But this doctrine is so well understood and so universally applied that there ought to be no argument upon this subject.

The very highest interests of society require that the validity of official acts shall not be disturbed because of the ineligibility of the persons performing them to hold the office. And the reasons for this doctrine apply as strongly in this case as in any other. If the vote of an elector can be stricken out by a subsequent decision that he was ineligible, the evil is without remedy, the State has lost the vote, and the spirit of the Constitution has been violated. The theory of the Constitution when it was formed was that the electors were to be an independent body of select men who were to be perfectly free, and without committals or entanglements of any kind, to act as they thought best for the good of the country; and to secure this independence they were to vote by ballot, so that one should not know how the other voted. We all know in practice how completely this purpose upon the part of the framers of the Constitution has been swept away. They are pledged in every case in advance to cast their votes for the candidates of a particular party, and if they should disregard this pledge they would be infamous, and it is a matter of no importance whatever whether they are members of Congress or officers of the United States. Not only are they pledged in advance for whom they shall vote, but under the practical working of our institutions this previous pledge is the greatest security the country has against their corruption and the improper exercise of so great a power.

In the State of Oregon there was no dispute as to the result of the vote by the people on the 7th of November. The action of the governor was clearly illegal and in violation of the plainest provisions of the statutes of the State as well as of the United States. The secretary in the performance of the duty imposed upon him counted the vote and certified to it under the seal of the State, and when he issued his certificate showing who had received the highest number of votes, the law of the State declared that such person was elected, and was entitled to be ministerially certified to by the governor, and no failure or refusal upon the part of the governor could affect his title. The certificate of the governor of the appointment of the electors is prima facie evidence of their appointment, unimpeached, but it may always be impeached by showing that it is in conflict with the canvass and return made by the officers authorized by the law of the State to make such canvass and return, and in this case the certificate of the secretary of state inclosed in the certificate made by the electors and transmitted to the President of the Senate shows clearly that the State of Oregon had appointed Watts, Odell, and Cartwright as electors.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The electoral votes of South Carolina being under consideration—

Mr. Commissioner MORTON said :

Mr. PRESIDENT : In this case it seems hardly necessary to say a word. It is not denied that the Hayes electors received a majority of all the votes at the late election in South Carolina. This fact was found by a democratic investigating committee sent into the State by the House of Representatives. The republicans contend that but for the most monstrous frauds practiced in Edgefield and Laurens Counties and in many other localities in the State, their majority would have been thousands where it is now conceded to be hundreds. There are but two points made in the argument against the validity of the vote of the Hayes electors which I will notice.

First, it is alleged that the election in South Carolina was void because there had been no registry made of the voters as required by the constitution of the State. The provision of the constitution of South Carolina has never been executed by a law passed by the legislature, and repeated elections have been had and the legality of them has never been questioned, notwithstanding the absence of a registry law. If the absence of such a law invalidates all elections in the State, then South Carolina has had no legal government since 1868, and the recent pretended election of Hampton is a fraud.

But whatever might be the legal effect of the absence of a registry law upon the election of State officers, it is absurd to pretend that it could have any upon the appointment of electors. They are to be appointed in the manner prescribed by the legislature of the State and not by the constitution of the State. The manner of the appointment of electors has been placed by the Constitution of the United States in the legislature of each State, and cannot be taken from that body by the provisions of a State constitution. If the constitution of a State should provide that electors should be appointed by the supreme court of the State, that could not prevent the legislature from providing that electors might be appointed by the vote of the people. The Constitution of the United States provides that Senators shall be chosen by the legislature of each State, and it is not competent in the constitution of a State to require that Senators shall be elected by the people at a general election, and thus take from the legislature the right to elect.

The power to appoint electors by a State is conferred by the Constitution of the United States and does not spring from a State constitution, and cannot be impaired or controlled in any respect by a State constitution. It is competent for the constitution of the State to provide that State officers shall be chosen at an election where the voters have been registered, but it is not competent to make any such requisition as to the appointment of electors. If the legislature provides that electors may be appointed by the people at the polls without having been previously registered, it has a clear right to do so.

Second, it is alleged that there is no republican government in the State of South Carolina, and, therefore, no legislature which can provide for the appointment of electors or direct and control an election by the people. My answer to this is, that it is not true.

There is and has been a republican government in the State of South Carolina ever since reconstruction in 1868, and although it has been surrounded with great difficulties and has often been disturbed by violence and threatened with revolution, it has maintained a continued existence since its re-establishment after the rebellion. The Constitution provides that the United States shall guarantee to each State a republican form of government. If there is not a republican form of government in South Carolina it is for the two Houses of Congress acting in a legislative capacity to declare that fact and provide for the establishment of one; but until that takes place I must assume that South Carolina has a republican form of government, and as much right as any other State to appoint electors and participate in the presidential election. It seems to me I should be trifling with the intelligence of the Commission to argue this question further.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER THURMAN.

FLORIDA.

The Commission having under consideration the electoral votes of the State of Florida—

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN addressed the Commission. Ill-health has prevented his writing out his remarks. The following is a synopsis of them :

Mr. President, in the discharge of its duties, this Commission, by the act creating it, is vested with the same powers, in the count of the electoral votes, now possessed by the two Houses of Congress acting separately, or together; and it is required to ascertain and decide whether any and what votes from a State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State. We are thus brought to the question, What are the powers of the two Houses of Congress in counting the electoral vote? It has been contended that we are concluded by the certificate of the governor that A B, &c., were duly appointed electors of the State of Florida, but this proposition cannot be maintained. There is nothing in the act of Congress requiring the governor's certificate, nor in any statute of Florida, that makes his certificate conclusive. It is, therefore, subject to be rebutted, and the question now is upon what grounds can it be contested. I understand it to be asserted by those who claim the election or the appointment of the Hayes electors, that the governor's certificate is not conclusive unless made in accordance with the decision of the canvassing-board; but that, when so made, it is conclusive. This raises the question whether the decision of that board can be impeached. I maintain that it can. I shall not in this case, because it is unnecessary, go into an inquiry as to all the causes for which a decision of a canvassing-board may be impeached. It will be found sufficient for the decision of this case that it is impeachable for want of jurisdiction in the board to do that which it did; and the effect of which was to change the apparent result of the election. I know of no tribunal, high or low, whose acts, without jurisdiction or beyond its jurisdiction, are not absolutely void.

Now, upon the county returns it is not denied, and, indeed, appears by evidence already before us and not controverted, that the Tilden electors received a majority of the votes of the people of Florida; and it also appears that it was only by throwing out the votes of counties or precincts that an apparent majority was shown for the Hayes electors. Had the canvassing-board of Florida any authority to throw out these votes? This question has been decided by the highest judicial tribunal of that State, interpreting the statute creating that board and defining its powers. In the case of Drew against Stearns the supreme court of Florida held that the canvassing-board had no judicial powers whatsoever; that its powers were simply ministerial; that it was bound to count the votes given and could not inquire into the legality or illegality of the votes thus given. Consequently, the decision of the canvassing-board that Stearns was elected governor, which decision was effected in the same manner by which that board declared the Hayes electors to be chosen, was declared by the supreme court of the State to be unauthorized by the statute and a plain usurpation of power. That decision is as applicable to the case of the presidential electors as to the case of Drew and Stearns, the rival candidates for governor. It is perfectly conclusive of the meaning of the statute, as much so as if it were written in the statute in so many words. It follows then that if we are to respect the statute of Florida, which everybody admits must govern the case, the canvassing-board, in throwing out the votes for the Tilden electors and thereby giving an apparent majority to the Hayes electors, acted without jurisdiction, and their act was, therefore, absolutely null and void.

But the above is not the only decision of the Florida courts. In a quo warranto sued out by the Tilden electors against the Hayes electors, the circuit court of Florida, having admitted jurisdiction, has decided that the Tilden electors and not the Hayes electors were duly appointed. Moreover, the legislature of the State has affirmed this view of the State statute and the present governor of the State has given to the Tilden electors certificates of their appointment. So that every department of government in Florida, executive, legislative, and judicial, has decided against the pretension of the Hayes electors. And I think it is impossible for any fair-minded lawyer to carefully examine the Florida statutes without being brought to concur in the correctness of these decisions of her authorities.

And here it is proper to remark that there is nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States, or in the constitution or laws of Florida, that makes the canvassing-board the sole judge of its own jurisdiction. On the contrary, the decisions to which I have referred distinctly hold that it is not the sole judge, and, in Drew against Stearns, the supreme court compelled it to recount the votes and reverse its first decision. And here I would further observe that to remedy the injustice perpetrated by that board in the count of the votes for presidential electors, is not, as has been suggested, to invade the right of the State. It is precisely the reverse. It is to uphold the statute of the State and to protect her from the consequences of a violation of her laws and a usurpation by her officers. The votes cast for Hayes by the Hayes electors have not yet been counted. Effect cannot be given to them until they be counted. The proceeding is, therefore, still in fieri and the two Houses of Congress, to whom it belongs to count the votes, must of necessity determine—as this Commission is required by the act creating it to determine—

Whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State.

In executing these powers the two Houses of Congress cannot, and therefore this Commission cannot, shut their eyes to the fact that the statutes of Florida, as construed by her courts, required the certificate of election to be given to the Tilden electors, and that it was only by a gross usurpation of power that the canvassing-board decided in favor of the Hayes electors.

But if it be said that the remedy can be provided by the State alone, and that if she has not provided a remedy the wrong is remediless, I answer—

First. That the electors being a creation of the Federal Constitution, it is the duty of the two Houses of Congress, who count the votes, to see that they are appointed consistently with the provisions of the Constitution. And, consequently, no State can, by neglecting to provide a remedy, compel the Houses to count votes given by usurping electors who are not appointed in the mode contemplated by the Constitution; that is to say, in the manner prescribed by the State legislature.

Second. That the other States and the whole people of the United States are parties interested in the proceeding, and the question whether there shall be a remedy is not left to the discretion of the State alone.

Third. That if the remedy must be a State remedy, it has been applied in this case, and the decision is adverse to the claim of the Hayes electors.

If I am right in these propositions, it follows that the testimony on the question of jurisdiction ought to be received.

I also think that proof of fraud is admissible. The canvassing-board was neither a legislature nor a judicial court, and I know of no principle of law, or manifest public policy, that shields it from an inquiry into the bona fides or mala fides of its acts.

It is said that if we go behind the decision of the canvassing-board we must go to the bottom, and may thus be led to investigate the doings of hundreds of thousands of election-officers in the United States and the qualification of millions of voters. I reply, non constat. It is not sound logic to say, that because we cannot investigate everything we shall investigate nothing; that because we cannot correct all errors and frauds we shall correct none. The law never requires impossibilities, but it does require what is possible.

But the argument upon which the greatest stress has been laid to sustain the vote for Hayes is that the Hayes electors were, when they cast their votes, electors de facto, and that consequently the doctrine in relation to the acts of officers de facto applies to them. I deny that that doctrine has any application in this case. I am not prepared to admit that presidential electors are officers at all. They are what the Constitution calls them—"electors" who have but a single act to perform, and their existence as electors may be as ephemeral as the life of an insect. In this case it was so. The canvassing-board declared the appointment of the Hayes electors on the very day that the electoral vote was to be cast, and in two or three hours after that declaration the vote was cast. What time was there to institute legal proceedings and carry them into judgment between the decision of the canvassing-board and the casting of the electoral votes? Manifestly none at all. To require, therefore, as the argument does, that these men should have been ousted from their office by judicial proceedings before they cast their votes, and that if not so ousted they were officers de facto, and their acts are valid, is a simple mockery of justice that it is difficult to contemplate without a feeling of contempt. All that could be done in the way of judicial proceedings was done in this case. A writ of quo warranto was issued by a court of competent jurisdiction and served upon the Hayes electors before they cast their votes. Of course no decision could be had upon that writ within the two or three hours that elapsed after its service and before the votes were cast. But the case was prosecuted to final judgment, and the judgment was that the Hayes electors were usurpers who never had any title to be called electors of Florida, and although no judgment of ouster could be pronounced, because the votes had been already cast, yet the decision is a judicial determination that the Hayes electors had no title whatsoever.

The power of the two Houses to go behind the governor's certificates and the decisions of canvassing-boards has been again and again asserted by the Houses and carried into execution. Thus in 1865 Congress resolved that no votes for presidential electors should be received from the States of Florida, Louisiana, Tennessee, Mississippi, North Carolina, Virginia, South Carolina, Alabama, Arkansas, Texas, and Georgia. In 1873 the votes of the States of Arkansas and Louisiana, and certain electoral votes of the State of Georgia, were rejected. But these instances are familiar to the members of the Commission, and it is unnecessary to dwell upon them.

LOUISIANA.

The Commission having under consideration the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana—

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN addressed the Commission. Ill-health has prevented his writing out his remarks in full. The following is a synopsis of them:

Mr. President, it is my opinion—

1. That the votes for presidential electors, cast in the State of Louisiana at the last election, have never been canvassed by any lawful authority. I deny that the returning-board of Louisiana has any lawful existence. I deny that the constitution of that State, or anything in the Federal Constitution, confers upon her legislature the power to create such a board. To understand this proposition we must look at the constitution and powers of that board as defined in the statute creating it. And we must consider them not in an abstract and theoretical manner, but with a clear view of their practical effect. It is not true that every law that might upon its face seem to be unobjectionable is necessarily constitutional. Laws are not mere abstract things. They are meant to be practical, and if the inevitable practical result of a law directly conflicts with the admitted principles or provisions of the Constitution, the law cannot stand.

Let us then see what is the Louisiana returning-board. It is a board consisting of five persons holding their offices without any limitation of time and filling all the vacancies that occur in their own body. It is, therefore, a kind of perpetual, self-preserving and self-perpetuating corporation. Neither its existence nor its powers can be affected except by a repeal or modification of the law creating it. But no such repeal or modification can take place without its permission; for, by conferring upon it, in plain violation of the constitution of the State, the power to canvass the votes for members of the general assembly, the board is enabled to constitute the legislature, whenever it sees fit, so as to contain a majority of its friends. It is of no use to say that it will not corruptly or unlawfully exercise this power. Again and again it has corruptly and unlawfully exercised it. It has so corruptly and unlawfully exercised it after every election that has taken place since the board was created. In 1872, a majority of conservatives, or fusionists as they were then called, were elected to the general assembly. The returning-board threw out large numbers of them and gave their places to men who were notoriously not elected, and thus created a republican majority in both branches of the assembly. In 1874 precisely the same thing occurred. In 1876 it occurred for the third time, and these are the only years since the creation of the board in which elections for members of the assembly have taken place. In the same way the board has defeated the election of State officers by the people in each one of these years, and to cap the climax of its infamy it has thrown out thousands of votes given for the Tilden electors, and thereby changing the vote of the people, has declared the Hayes electors to be duly appointed. And if its power can be sustained, there is obviously no end to its rule over the people of Louisiana. It is made, by the statute creating it, the returning-board for all elections held in the State for all officers from the highest to the very lowest, and it executes its powers in the interest of its party and itself without shame and without remorse. Take a map of Louisiana, mark upon it the democratic precincts whose votes for members of the assembly were thrown out last December, and you will find as many blotches on the map as there are scars upon the face of a victim of the small-pox. Why was this done? Not merely to affect the result of the presidential election, or of the election for officers of the State—for the republican electors and State officers could have been counted in without running all over the State to throw out a democratic precinct here and another one there. It was done to give the republicans the majority in the legislature; and to do it, precinct after precinct was thrown out where there was no pretense whatever that the election was not fair and peaceable; no pretense whatever of bribery, intimidation, or employment of any corrupt means. In short, the powers given to this board are more transcendent in their practical operation than the powers of the whole body of the people of the State. The board is in effect constituted the State—to govern it according to its own arbitrary will and discretion. There is no republican government in Louisiana. There can be no republican government in that State so long as this returning-board is upheld. An oligarchy more corrupt, more odious, more anti-republican, never before existed on this globe.

I repeat, that the constitution of Louisiana confers no authority upon the legislature of that State to create any such board. Nay, more, its power to canvass the votes for members of the general assembly is in direct conflict with that constitution, which makes each house of the assembly the sole judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members. And such was the view taken by the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections in 1873, in the elaborate report presented by Mr. Carpenter, and which was dissented from by but one member of the committee. The returning-board of that day was denounced as unconstitutional; but if that board was unconstitutional, a multo fortiori is the board of to-day, created by a subsequent statute, and with the powers of self-perpetuation to which I have alluded, unconstitutional. Now, it is upon the canvass made by this unconstitutional returning-board, it is upon its assumption of power to throw out from six to ten thousand votes given for the Tilden electors, that the advocates of the Hayes electors claim the vote of the State. I deny that this decision of that board has any legal effect whatsoever. Being unconstitutional, it had no right to canvass those votes, no more than any other four citizens of the State of Louisiana.

Another objection to the constitutionality of the board was made by counsel [Mr. Carpenter] and argued with great force, and seems to me to deserve our serious consideration. It is the objection that the statute clothes the board with power to disfranchise voters—the innocent as well as the guilty—and to do so without any trial or hearing to which the voter is a party. That the power to disfranchise is a judicial power that could not be conferred upon the board; the constitution of Louisiana expressly declaring (article 94) that “No judicial powers, except as committing-magistrates in criminal cases, shall be conferred on any officers other than those mentioned in this title, (title 4,) except such as may be necessary in towns and cities; and the judicial powers of such officers shall not extend further than the cognizance of cases arising under the police regulations of towns and cities in the State.” The officers mentioned in title 4 are judges, justices of the peace, an attorney-general, sheriffs, and coroners.

II. But if the law creating the board is not unconstitutional, yet the board that canvassed the votes in question was not legally constituted. The statute creating it required that the board should consist of five persons taken “from all political parties,” and this provision requiring the different political parties to be thus represented is of the very essence of the law. But the board that canvassed the votes for electors after the late election consisted of but four members, all of the same political party, namely, all republicans. These four were applied to, again and again, to execute the statute by filling the vacancy in the board with a democrat. They utterly refused or neglected to do so, and, without filling the vacancy at all, proceeded to canvass the returns, throw out thousands of votes, and pronounce a decision in favor of the Hayes electors. It has been argued that because a majority of the board constituted a quorum, therefore the board could proceed without filling the vacancy, and it has been said that if a dozen or more members of the Senate of the United States were absent or dead, but a quorum were present, there would be a lawful Senate; or that if four of the judges of the Supreme Court were absent, but five were present, there would be a lawful court. Nobody doubts either of those propositions; but they have not the remotest application to the present case. If the Constitution required that the Senate should consist of different classes of persons and gave to the Senate the power to fill all vacancies in its own body, and there were vacancies, and the members present refused to fill them, there would be some analogy between that case and this. And so of the Supreme Court. But no such requisition or power is contained in the Constitution, and hence the illustrations are of no value whatsoever. Here we have a plain statute that requires the returning-board to be constituted from all political parties. The reason of the requirement is perfectly obvious. It was to secure fairness and justice in the canvass. It was enacted for the same reason that in some of the States the judges or inspectors of election are required to be of different parties, as, for instance, in Louisiana, whose statute requires—

That the election at each poll or polling-place shall be presided over by three commissioners of elections, residents of the parish for at least twelve months next preceding the day of election, who shall be selected from different political parties, and be of good standing in the party to which they belong.

The requirement is, therefore, as I have already said, of the very essence of the statute. As well might it be said that the jury known to the common law as the jury de medietate linguæ could be lawfully constituted of but one nationality and of jurors speaking but one language, as to say that the returning-board of Louisiana could be lawfully constituted of members of but one political party. For this reason, then, even if the law creating the board is constitutional, the board itself that canvassed the votes in question was not legally constituted, and its canvass has no legal effect.

III. But if I am wrong in both these propositions, yet the canvass of that board must be rejected. I need not repeat here what I said in the Florida case, that the doings of any tribunal, however high, acting without jurisdiction, are absolutely null and void. This is elementary law, and I know of no exception whatever to the rule.

This brings us to the inquiry, had the returning-board jurisdiction to cast out the thousands of votes given for the Tilden electors which it did cast out, and by the casting out of which the majority in the State was reversed? To answer this question we must recur to the election law of that State. By section 2 of that law the returning-board is created. Section 26 of that law provides as follows:

That in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town in which, during the time of registration or revision of registration, or on any day of registration, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any place within said parish or at or near any poll or voting-place or place of registration or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences shall prevent or tend to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervision of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified voters deterred by such riots, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences from registering or voting; which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish. When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or a supervisor of registration, he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish, if in the city of New Orleans to the secretary of state, one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning-officers provided for in section 2 in this act, when he makes the returns of election in his parish. His copy of said statement shall be so annexed to his returns of elections, by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance, that the same can be kept together, and the other copy the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish for the use of the district attorney.

Section 8 provides, as I have already shown, that the election at each poll or polling-place shall be presided over by three commissioners of election of different politics.

Section 13 enacts, among other things, that—

The vote shall be counted by the commissioners at each voting-place, immediately after closing the election and without moving the boxes from the place where the votes were received, and the counting must be done in the presence of any bystander or citizen who may be present.

Section 43 is as follows :

That immediately upon the close of the polls on the day of election, the commissioners of the election at each poll or voting-place shall proceed to count the votes as provided in section 13 of this act, and after they shall have so counted the votes and made a list of the names of all the persons voted for, and the offices for which they were voted for, and the number of votes received by each, the number of ballots contained in the box, and the number rejected, and the reasons therefor, duplicates of such lists shall be made out, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election of each poll, and such duplicate lists shall be delivered, one to the supervisor of registration of the parish and one to the clerk of the district court of the parish, and in the parish of Orleans to the secretary of state, by one or all such commissioners in person within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls. It shall be the duty of the supervisor of registration, within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling-places, to consolidate such returns, to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns, with the originals received by him, to the returning-officers provided for in section 2 of this act, the said report and returns to be inclosed in an envelope of strong paper or cloth, securely sealed, and forwarded by mail. He shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be, together with all memoranda and tally-lists used in making the count and statement of the votes.

From these provisions it appears—

1. That if any statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, are made by the commissioners of election, they must be made before the commissioners make their return to the supervisor of registration and must accompany that return, and that return must be made within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls.

2. That the supervisor of registration within twenty-four hours after the receipt of all the returns for the different polling-places shall consolidate such returns, to be certified as correct by the clerk of the district court, and forward the consolidated returns, with the originals received by him, to the returning-board, and therewith “shall forward a copy of any statement as to violence or disturbance, bribery or corruption, or other offenses specified in section 26 of this act, if any there be.”

3. That the statement of violence, &c., shall be so annexed to the returns of the supervisor, by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance, that the same can be kept together.

It is thus apparent that all statements of violence, &c., made by commissioners of election must be made within twenty-four hours after the close of the polls, and that all such statements made by supervisors of registration must be made not later than forty-eight hours after the close of the polls. The reasons for this requirement are very apparent and very weighty. The jurisdiction of the returning-board to throw out votes depends, as I will presently show, upon these statements being made; but it would obviously open a wide door to fraud if such statements could be made after it was ascertained what was the general result of the election in the State, and an inducement thereby created to throw out the votes of particular parishes or precincts in order to change that result. And, therefore, the statute requires the statements, or protests, as they are sometimes called, to be made as soon as possible after the election—by the commissioners within twenty-four hours after the close of the polls, by the supervisors of registration not later than forty-eight hours after such closing. The practical effect of this provision is to require the statements to be made before the general result of the State election can be known, and thus to avoid any inducement to make false and fabricated statements. But not only were the statements of the commissioners or supervisors necessary; the third section of the act also required an affidavit of three or more citizens to the fact of riot, tumult, &c.

We now come to the powers of the returning-board. They are given by sections 2 and 3 of the act, which I will quote in full as follows :

SEC. 2. That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning-officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning-officers. The returning-officers shall after each election, before entering on their duties, take and subscribe to the following oath before a judge of the supreme or any district court :

"I, A. B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of a returning-officer as prescribed by law; that I will carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes, and make a true and correct return of the election: so help me God."

Within ten days after the closing of the election said returning-officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state. They shall continue in session until such returns have been compiled. The presiding officer shall, at such meeting, open in the presence of the said returning-officers the statements of the commissioners of election, and the said returning-officers shall, from said statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate; one copy of such returns they shall file in the office of the secretary of state, and of one copy they shall make public proclamation by printing in the official journal and such other newspapers as they may deem proper, declaring the names of all persons and officers voted for, the number of votes for each person, and the names of the persons who have been duly and lawfully elected. The return of the election thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers, until set aside after contest according to law, of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected. The governor shall, within thirty days thereafter, issue commissions to all officers thus declared elected, who are required by law to be commissioned.

SEC. 3. That in such canvass and compilation the returning-officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile first the statements from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever, from any poll or voting-place, there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 26 of this act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented, or tended to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning-officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statement of votes from such poll or voting-place until the statements from all other polls or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning-officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, at any such poll or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning-officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning-officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If, after such examination, the said returning-officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning-officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns: Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning-officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election.

It is perfectly obvious from the provisions of section 3, above quoted, that the returning board has no power whatever to reject any vote unless a statement of riot, tumult, &c., has been received from the officers of election as provided in the other sections of the law which I have quoted, that is to say, statements made within the time and in the manner, and transmitted in the mode, and supported by the affidavits of three or more citizens, as provided by the law. I do not understand this proposition to be seriously disputed. I have heard no argument against it, and it seems to me that none can be made which would have even a show of plausibility. Now, I have said, and it is not denied, that the returning-board threw out many thousand votes and thereby changed the result of the election. Were there in each of the cases, that is to say, in each of the precincts or parishes whose votes were thus thrown out, statements of violence, &c., made and supported as required by the law? We have an offer to prove that in no instance whatever, that from no parish or precinct whatever, was any such statement transmitted. In other words, that no such statement accompanied any return transmitted to the returning-board or was made or sent from any precinct or parish in the State, within the time and in the mode required by law, to the returning-board. And, further, that if any statements of violence, &c., were laid before the returning-board, they were corruptly fabricated in the city of New Orleans, weeks after the election, and known to be so corruptly fabricated by the board when it received them. If such are the facts, and upon the question of admissibility of proof it must be assumed that they are facts, can there be any doubt of the illegality of the action of the board in throwing out the votes in question? Is it not perfectly plain that the statements and affidavits required by the statute are necessary to give jurisdiction to the board to throw out any votes whatever? They are the very foundation of the jurisdiction, without whose existence no power to throw out votes exists. It is not a question of error of judgment or of bona fides or mala fides on the part of the board. A question of jurisdiction goes far deeper than that. The judgment of the tribunal may be ever so righteous and correct, the tribunal itself may be ever so pure and enlightened, yet if it lack jurisdiction to pronounce the decision which it does pronounce, or to do the act which it does do, its decision and its acts are absolutely null and void. It would be vain to say that the returning-board is the sole judge of its own jurisdiction. There is nothing in the statute that makes it such sole judge. On the contrary, the statute itself declares that its decision shall only be prima facie evidence. But I have said enough on this point, and I proceed to consider another.

IV. The statute, section 2, gives to the returning-board the power and imposes upon it the duty "to canvass and compile the statement of votes made by the commissioners of election and make returns of the election to the secretary of state," and provides that "they shall continue in session until such returns have been compiled." The only things, then, that the board had authority to canvass and compile were the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election, and it was upon them that they were to decide and make returns of the election to the secretary of state. They had no right to make their decision and returns upon the consolidated statements of the supervisors of registration. Nowhere in the statute is any such power given to them. Nowhere are they expressly required to even look at the consolidated returns of the supervisors of registration. Certain it is that in no case are they authorized to found their decision upon any such papers. Now, the objectors to the votes of the so-called Hayes electors offer to prove that the board did not canvass or compile a single return made by the commissioners of election; that the only returns they looked at, the only returns upon which they formed their decision and made their return to the secretary of state, were the consolidated returns sent to them by the supervisors of registration. If this be true, then the board have not canvassed the votes as they were expressly required by the statute to canvass them. They have canvassed nothing which the law required them to canvass. They might as well have canvassed the returns of the election as published in the newspapers and made their decision upon them as to make it upon the supervisors' returns alone. No canvass known to the law of Louisiana has taken place, and the pretended return by the board to the secretary of state is a fabrication and a falsehood. In my opinion, evidence to prove these allegations ought to be admitted, and, if proved, they are in my judgment fatal to the so-called canvass of the board.

V. Testimony is offered to prove that the decision of the returning-board was procured by conspiracy, forgery, fraud, and bribery. I think the testimony admissible for the reasons I stated in the Florida case.

VI. Testimony is also offered that two of the Hayes electors, Brewster and Levissee, were, at the time of the election, officers of the United States, whose appointment as electors is expressly prohibited by the Constitution. I think this testimony should be received. The Constitution makes such officers ineligible to appointment. It is not a mere ineligibility to hold an office or trust, but it is ineligibility to be appointed to the office or trust. Nor, if I am correct in my interpretation of the Louisiana statutes, is the matter helped by the appointment of Brewster and Levissee, by the remaining electors, to fill the supposed vacancies created by the non-attendance of Brewster and Levissee. Upon a careful review of those statutes, I am brought to the conclusion that they nowhere confer upon a portion of the electoral college the power to fill vacancies occurring in that body.

Mr. THURMAN here read the provisions of the statutes relating to this point, and commented upon them at some length.

VII. But it is argued, as it was heretofore argued in the Florida case, that the Hayes electors had color of title and that, unless ousted before they cast their votes, they must be regarded as electors de facto and full effect given to their votes. I shall not repeat what I said upon this proposition in the Florida case. I adhere to the opinion I then expressed, and call attention to the fact that here is another case in which it was impossible to oust the so-called Hayes electors by any judicial proceeding before they cast their votes. They were declared by the returning-board to be appointed on the very day on which they voted, and it was manifestly impossible in the few hours that elapsed between that declaration and the casting of their votes to oust them by judicial proceedings. To hold then that they had color of title, were electors de facto, and that Congress is bound to count their votes, is to declare that no matter by what usurpation of power, fraud, or corruption a man may be declared by a returning-board to be an elector, and no matter how ineligible he may be to receive an appointment as elector, or to be an elector de jure, yet, unless he be ousted before he casts his vote for President, (though to do so is manifestly impossible,) that vote must be counted; and neither the State nor Congress can right the wrong or remedy the evil. I utterly dissent from such a proposition. In my humble judgment, it is destructive of the right of the States, of the powers of Congress, of constitutional provisions, of the principles of justice, of purity in elections, and of popular rule.

In saying this I attribute improper motives to no one; it is not with persons but with judgments that I am dealing. Of them and of what appears to me their probable effect, it is my right and duty to speak; and, thus speaking, I cannot help expressing the fear that if this Commission shall decide in accordance with the above proposition of de facto title, its decision will have the effect of a proclamation to dishonest returning-boards to perpetrate whatever villainies their interest or their inclinations may dictate, with an absolute certainty that they will prove successful.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER FRELINGHUYSEN.

The following are the remarks and opinion of Mr. Commissioner FRELINGHUYSEN:

I. The important question to be decided by the Commission, as both political parties distinctly understood when the bill creating the Commission was passed, is whether the Commission has jurisdiction or right to look behind and reverse the determination of that tribunal which in the several States has by law been established finally to decide who have been elected presidential electors.

This Commission has, in the language of the act creating it, "the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose, [the purpose of counting the electoral vote,] by the two Houses acting separately or together."

The question then is, What powers have the two Houses of Congress, acting separately or together, when counting the electoral vote for President? The Commission has the same; no less, no more.

When the two Houses meet to count the votes of the electors for President, they do not act in their legislative capacity, but as a tribunal upon which is imposed that special duty. The legislative powers of Congress are specified in the Constitution, and counting the electoral votes is not among them. The President of the United States, whose concurrence is essential to all legislative action, has no part in this procedure. The two Houses in counting the vote not only have no legislative power, but also have none of those powers so constantly used, and which only exist as and because they are incident to the legislative power; such as sending committees of Congress to investigate the condition of affairs in different parts of the country, that Congress may possess information on which to base future legislation. Neither has Congress in counting the votes such power to investigate by committees or otherwise the election of presidential electors as it possesses for the purpose of ascertaining whether its members have been fairly elected, because while the Constitution expressly declares that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," it nowhere declares, either expressly or by implication, that Congress shall be such judges as to the election of presidential electors; and this clear provision conferring the power to investigate elections for Senators and Representatives, and the absence of any such provision as to electors, is significant and emphatic of the truth that no such power exists as to electors. Neither do the two Houses possess the judicial power belonging to a court when trying the title to an office, because by the Constitution the judicial, legislative, and executive powers of the Government are carefully kept separate and distinct. The legislative branch possesses no judicial power excepting in the two specified cases of judging of the election of members of Congress and trials of impeachment. The two Houses when they meet to count the votes do not assemble as a joint convention, but as two distinct Houses, and separate to vote on any question that arises; and the very nature of this special tribunal, consisting of two distinct Houses, is inconsistent with having a jury, with having confronting witnesses; there are no parties, and there is nothing about the procedure that is judicial.

What power, then, do the two Houses of Congress possess? Just that power named in the Constitution when it says, "the votes shall then be counted." And what votes are then to be counted? Surely not the votes that have been given for the presidential electors by some seven millions of voters over a vast continent, but the votes cast by the presidential electors for President and Vice-President which the Constitution provides shall be certified to the President of the Senate and by him opened in the presence of the two Houses.

The two Houses in counting the votes of the electors may determine whether the State is in such relations to the Federal Government as to be entitled to vote; whether the votes were cast on the day prescribed by the statutes of the United States; whether the governor's certificate is genuine; whether that certificate is true in its statement as to who have been appointed electors by the State; but the truth of the statement of the governor's certificate in this regard is to be decided only by looking to the determination of the tribunal which the laws of the State say shall finally determine that fact, and not by a canvass of the popular vote of the State. The two Houses may inquire into anything consistent with the nature of the procedure, and which the Constitution has not devolved on the States to regulate.

The reasons why the Constitution does not either expressly or by implication provide or intend that Congress shall inquire into or canvass the election of presidential electors are apparent.

The framers of the Constitution, as its history shows, did first decide that the President and Vice-President should be chosen by Congress; but on full debate and mature deliberation they saw the evil of placing one co-ordinate branch of Government under the control of another—the executive under the control of the legislative branch—and they determined that, except to prevent a failure to elect, (in that event the House voting by States should elect,) Congress should have nothing to do with the choice of President or Vice-President. The Constitution casts that duty on the States. It says that each State, large or small, shall have two votes, and also as many additional votes as it has Representatives, and that each State shall appoint the electors in such manner as the legislature thereof shall direct. Under this power, the legislature might direct that the electors should be appointed by the legislature, by the executive, by the judiciary, or by the people. In the earliest days of the Republic, electors were appointed by the legislatures; in Pennsylvania they were appointed by the judiciary. Now in all States except Colorado they are appointed by the people. And in contemplation of the Constitution the electors were not, as the agent of a party, to elect, but as independent men, responsible to no one, were to select the President and Vice-President.

More completely to separate Congress from all connection with the election of President and Vice-President, the Constitution provides that no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector. And it would be an anomaly indeed if, after the Constitution had thus carefully excluded Congress from any intermeddling with the choice of the Presi dent further than to ascertain whom the State said it had appointed, that yet Congress had absolute control over the whole subject, and could while engaged in this summary proceeding of counting the vote adjudge and determine who should be President. If the claim now put forth was to reverse the decision of New York or Massachusetts as to who had been appointed the electors of those States respectively, the claim would hardly secure a patient hearing; but the public have become so accustomed to disorderly proceedings in some of the Southern States, that the determinations of those States do not challenge full respect, and yet the law is the same as to all the States.

The impracticability of the two Houses when met to count the votes of the presidential electors going behind the final decision of the States, and attempting to find out which set of electors in very truth have received the most votes, is a conclusive argument against the existence of any such power in the two Houses. If Congress enters upon the work of investigating which of two or more sets of electors have been chosen, it must do its work thoroughly, or it does gross injustice. It would not answer for Congress to examine the returns of the county canvassing-boards for the purpose of reversing the decision of the State canvassing-board, and then refuse to examine the returns of the precincts when invited to do so, for the purpose of showing that the county boards were in error. It would not answer for the two Houses to examine the state of the vote of Florida, Louisiana, and South Carolina for the purpose of showing that the Hayes electors were not elected, and then refuse to examine the vote of Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, when so requested, for the purpose of showing that the Tilden electors were not chosen. How, by possibility, could this investigation into the popular vote be effected? There are probably seven millions of popular votes. On the first Wednesday of December the electors give votes as required by the Constitution by ballot, and that imports their secrecy. The list of the votes is then transmitted sealed (secrecy again) to the President of the Senate, and these lists are first to be opened when the two Houses meet to count the votes. According to the theory of the Constitution, no one is to know until the two Houses are thus assembled what has been the action of the electoral college. And to claim that in the February before the 4th of March, when the President is to be inaugurated, the two Houses are to go behind the final determinations of the States and make a canvass to find out the very truth as to which set of electors have the majority of lawful votes, is an absurdity, because an impossibility. An investigation by the two Houses behind the final determination of the States would lead to anarchy and to nothing better.

It is urged that without such investigation by the two Houses the President may be elected by fraud. Then change the laws. It would, however, be found that the opportunity for fraud would be multiplied many fold if the regulation of the election was transferred from the States to the General Government.

It is said that if we take as final the determination of the State board the result may be that, while one citizen has a popular majority, another citizen will be inaugurated President. Our Government is not that of a mob. It is not majorities, but legal majorities that control. Under our system many complex functions are invoked to obtain an expression of the constitutional will. Thus Delaware casts one electoral vote for every 40,000 inhabitants, and New Jersey only one electoral vote for every 110,000 inhabitants. The democratic majority in New York is 50,000, and the State government by the same election is republican.

We have agreed to the Constitution, and if the expression of the will of the people is according to that instrument it is right. The complaint that one possibly, and I do not say probably, having a popular majority will not be inaugurated, seems a pretense.

I conclude that a State is as sovereign in its right finally to determine who have been elected presidential electors as it is to determine who have been elected legislators or governor, or to decide what shall be the punishment of crime within its borders, or what law shall regulate the transfer of property; and as this nation extends and grows the wisdom of making the States the final judges in this and many other things will become year by year more apparent.

I am confirmed in the correctness of my conclusions by the impressions of distinguished public men who differ from me in political views, and even by my own opinion expressed in the Senate when the question had not possibly any partisan significance.

Recently, when this question was before the country, Chief-Justice Church, of the court of appeals of the State of New York, made this expression in a letter which he gave to the public:

I have always expressed the opinion that the authentication of the election of presidential electors according to the laws of each State is final and conclusive, and that there exists no power to go behind them.

And Senator Bayard, on the 25th February, 1875, when the Senate had under consideration the bill to provide for counting the votes for President and Vice-President, after reading the twelfth amendment to the Constitution which makes provision for counting the electoral vote, said:

There is nothing in this language that authorizes either House of Congress or both Houses of Congress to interfere with the decision which has been made by the electors themselves and certified by them and sent to the President of the Senate. There is no pretext that for any cause whatever Congress has any power, or all the other departments of the Government have any power, to refuse to receive and count the result of the action of the voters in the States in that election, as certified by the electors whom they have chosen. That questions may arise whether that choice was made, that questions may arise whether that election was properly held or whether it was a free and fair election, is undoubtedly true; but there is no machinery provided for contest, and no contest seems to have been anticipated on this subject. It is casus omissus, intentionally or otherwise, upon the part of those who framed this Government, and we must take it as it is; and if there be necessity for its amendment, for its supplement, that must be the action of the American people in accordance with the Constitution itself; and I am free to say that some amendment on this subject should be had.

Senator Thurman in the Senate on January 7, 1873, when the resolution authorizing an investigation as to whether the election for President and Vice-President had been conducted in Louisiana and Arkansas in accordance with the laws of the United States, expressed views similar to those above quoted from Mr. Bayard's subsequent speech.

It is proper to state that both of these distinguished Senators stated these views as a matter of first impression, reserving their final judgment on the question; but first impressions with minds as well furnished as theirs are often more valuable than more carefully considered conclusions.

In the debate of January 7, 1873, I had the honor to follow the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. Thurman,] and said:

There seems to be no way provided by Congress, and no way I believe that Congress, as the Constitution stands, can provide to try the title of an elector to his office. * * * I take it that the entire control over the manner of appointing the electors is one of the reserved rights of the States; that they never surrendered the right of determining who should be these electors. The States possess the right of determining who shall be elected and who has been elected as entirely as the United States Government has the right to decide who shall represent the country in England.

These views I had occasion to express again in January last when the bill creating this Electoral Commission was before the Senate, and when I had no idea of being a member of this Commission; and I have seen no reason for changing those views.

And, as still further authority to show that the final decision of the question whether electors have been appointed is with the States, let me call attention to the fact that those who aided in framing and those who lived at the time of the adoption of the Constitution did not consider that Congress, even when acting with the President as a Legislature, had the constitutional power to pass a law under which the two Houses of Congress, or any commission created by the Federal Legislature, could inquire into the number of votes by which electors have been elected.

This whole subject was thoroughly considered in 1800, and a bill passed both Houses of Congress, but amendments not being agreed to, did not become a law. That bill provided that a grand committee, in its organization not unlike this Commission, might make inquiry and decide as to everything relative to the election of President and Vice-President over which the Constitution gave the General Government jurisdiction, but did not provide for any investigation or decision as to the procedure which the Constitution has devolved upon the States.

It provided that the grand committee should examine and decide: (1) as to the qualifications of persons voted for as President and Vice-President; (2) as to the constitutional qualification of electors; (3) whether the appointment of the electors was authorized by the State legislature; (4) whether the mode prescribed by the State legislature had been followed; (5) whether improper means had been used to influence the votes of the electors; (6) as to the truth of the returns of the electors; (7) as to the time and place of giving their votes. And that is all. Congress did not assume that it had any constitutional right to investigate or review the vote on which the electors had been appointed, further than to see that it was according to the mode prescribed by the States. On the contrary, fearing that the very claim which is now set up, of making an investigation as to whether the electors had been duly elected in the States, might be inferred, they guarded against such inference by providing that the grand committee should "not draw in question the number of votes on which any elector should have been appointed."

If Congress when acting in its sovereign legislative capacity had not the constitutional right to confer on the two Houses of Congress when performing the subordinate duty devolved on them of counting the vote, or upon the grand committee, the power "to draw in question the number of votes on which any elector should have been appointed," a fortiori the two Houses of Congress, or this Commission without such legislation, do not possess such power.

Thus authority fortifies the conclusion that the two Houses of Congress, and consequently this Commission, cannot go behind or reverse the determination as to who has been appointed electors as made by the lawful tribunal of the State.

It has been said that although the Constitution does not give to Congress the right to question the determination of the tribunal which by the laws of the State is finally to decide who has been elected an elector, in this case the offer is made to prove fraud in that final decision of the State tribunal; that we must assume that the offer is made in good faith, and that fraud vitiates and renders void everything. It is true that fraud, when proven before a tribunal having jurisdiction over the question in controversy, will vitiate all transactions except such as are judicial or legislative. Without raising the inquiry whether the counting the votes is a procedure that comes within the exceptions, I ask whether it was ever heard that a charge of fraud made before a tribunal that otherwise had no jurisdiction over the question at issue conferred jurisdiction to try the question? Does fraud give power? I knew that it rendered void, but not that it created. Can it be claimed that while under our system of government the determination as to who has been appointed an elector is with the States and not with the Federal Government, the allegation of fraud is potential in changing our system, and transfers the decision of the question as to who has been elected elector from the State to the Federal Government? I think not.

II. The Constitution provides that "no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector," and it is claimed that some holding such offices were appointed electors and were therefore ineligible, and that their votes should not be counted.

The real object of this provision of the Constitution ceased when the electors came to exercise no volition in choosing a President and became the mere agents of a party, but still the Constitution stands and must be enforced if it can be. The provision, I think, is equivalent to saying that no one who holds an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be an elector; and no one has been. In every instance the elector who happened to hold an office of trust or profit under the United States resigned such office before assuming to perform the functions of his office as an elector, or resigned as an elector and another was according to law appointed in his stead.

To my mind it is a sufficient answer to all the charges of ineligibility against electors that the provision of the Constitution on which the charges are based does not execute itself, and no law has been enacted to execute it. It is said that other provisions of the Constitution execute themselves. I think not. Courts are established by law, where the provisions can be vindicated, but this requirement of the Constitution cannot be enforced in the courts after the count before the two Houses has commenced, and after the electors have voted. Neither can the two Houses stop the count for the purpose of ascertaining whether some one or more of the three hundred and sixty-nine electors, thousands of miles away, did or did not thirty years ago accept a commission as a United States commissioner or other unimportant office which he had forgotten he held, and of which his constituency were ignorant. The Houses of Congress have no machinery enabling them to carry on such an investigation, and if a law should be passed to enforce the provision of the Constitution referred to, the penalty for its infraction would not be that the State should be deprived of its vote. And further, the functions of the office of elector are required by law to be performed and in fact were discharged on the first Wednesday of December last, and if the elector were subsequently declared ineligible such decision would not invalidate the act performed on the day fixed. If a State constitution required that a sheriff should have a freehold estate worth $5,000, and if after he had performed the duties of his office for a year he was on quo warranto ousted because of its being proven that he had no estate of any kind at any time, no one would claim that his acts as de facto sheriff were invalid. The acts of the State governments in the States formerly in rebellion, except those acts that were in hostility to the United States Government, have been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States as valid, because they were the acts of de facto governments. I think there is nothing in the objection founded on ineligibility.

III. Should the votes for President and Vice-President, given by what are called the Hayes electors, in Florida, Louisiana, Oregon, and South Carolina, duly authenticated by those States respectively, be counted?

The legislature of Florida, as authorized by the Constitution of the United States, directs that the presidential electors shall be appointed by the lawful voters of that State voting at their respective precincts; that the inspectors of election at those precincts shall report the result to the county board of canvassers; and in the act of February 27, 1872, it is enacted that the board of county canvassers shall report to a board of State canvassers, who "shall proceed to canvass the returns of such election, and determine and declare who shall have been elected, as shown by said returns. If any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration."

This board of State canvassers, which was to that end created, made its final determination and then declared that the Hayes electors had been elected by about nine hundred majority; and these electors on December 6, 1876, cast their vote for Rutherford B. Hayes. All of which is certified to us by the electors and by the undisputed governor of Florida. On this statement, the votes of the electors should be counted for Governor Hayes.

And what reasons are urged against their being so counted? They are these: The attorney-general of Florida was by law a member of the State board of canvassers, and he certifies that the Tilden and not the Hayes electors were duly appointed. But it is clear that his certificate has in law no more validity than a letter from any other citizen of Florida would have, and cannot be recognized by this Commission.

Another reason urged why the vote of the Hayes electors should not be counted is, that after the Hayes electors had cast their votes on December 6, 1876, and about the 1st of January, 1877, Mr. George F. Drew succeeded Governor Stearns as governor of Florida; and on the 26th of January, 1877, fifty days after the electors of Florida had and must, if ever, have cast their votes, Governor Drew certified that the Tilden electors had been elected. It is he who is the governor of Florida when the electors were appointed who must by law certify to their appointment, and not he who is inducted after they have been appointed and have discharged all their duties. Governor Drew bases the declaration of his certificate that the Tilden electors had been appointed on the adjudication of the court of Florida to that effect, given on a proceeding in the nature of a quo warranto on the 25th of January, 1877. If a State court under a quo warranto, fifty days after the electors have according to the Constitution and laws of the United States cast their vote, can invalidate the acts of the electors, then the State courts can control the succession to the Presidency of the United States. It would be strange, indeed, if this Commission should disregard the determination of the State board of canvassers, which the laws of the State say shall determine and declare who have been appointed electors, and should be bound to adopt the conclusions of a State court clothed with no such power. The Commission should, in my opinion, count the vote of Florida for Rutherford B. Hayes.

The laws of the State of Louisiana as to the election of electors are similar to those of Florida. The returning-officers, consisting of five persons appointed by the State senate from all political parties, constitute the tribunal finally to determine who has been elected, and have authority to reject returns from any place in which they are satisfied that by reason of fraud or violence there has not been a fair election.

It has been claimed that these returning-officers have improperly rejected certain returns so as to change the result in the State.

It has been sufficiently shown that neither the two Houses of Congress nor this Commission have jurisdiction to go behind and reverse the determination of the tribunal which the State has said shall finally decide who has been elected, and that the allegation of fraud in the action of the returning-board does not give jurisdiction over the subject to the two Houses of Congress or to this Commission.

It has been questioned whether there were sufficient laws in Louisiana to authorize the election of electors. It has been shown by others that the objection is not well taken. The revision of the laws—the digest of the laws—the courts of the State, and all the people properly treat their election laws as sufficient, and we, while engaged in the summary process of counting the vote, may so accept it.

It is said that affidavits of fraud and violence were not filed within the time fixed by the statutes of the State, and that consequently the returning-officers had no jurisdiction to decide whether certain returns should or should not be rejected. There may have been abundant reasons why the affidavits were not filed within the prescribed time, and of that the returning-officers were to judge. The provision as to time is at best only directory. The affidavits were not jurisdictional; if they were, Louisiana for the want of the affidavits might have been without any determination of the result of the election, and either anarchy must have followed or the result not have been according to the truth as intended by the statute.

It is urged also that the laws of Louisiana require that the final tribunal, called in this State "returning-officers," should consist of five members, and of different political opinions, and that in fact it consisted of only four members, and these all of the same political opinion.

If the provision that the board must consist of those having different political opinions were constitutional, which I much doubt, the requirement is clearly only directory. It can hardly be claimed that if one member changed his opinion in a night, the determination of the board thereby became void, and that the confusion therefrom resulting must be accepted.

If the board should have consisted of five members, the fact that there were only four does not invalidate its decisions; the law says a majority shall be a quorum. The Supreme Court of the United States consists of nine judges, but it does not cease to be a court because by death or resignation there are only eight. It is seldom that a board of directors is full, but no one ever questioned the authority of the board on that account. If the fifth member of the canvassing-board was not appointed from unworthy motives, all will condemn it, but no one would say that the penalty for this impropriety is that the State shall lose its vote.

It has been urged, too, that the votes of Louisiana should not be counted because, as alleged, it had no State government, and Kellogg, who signed the electors' certificates, was not in truth the governor of that State. And yet, in November and December, when the electors were appointed, and when the electoral vote was cast, a State government with Kellogg as governor existed by the consent of both political parties, was represented in both Houses of Congress, had been recognized by every branch of Government, and regulated the public affairs of society in that State.

I see no good reason why the vote of Louisiana, as determined by the State returning-officers and as certified by the recognized governor and as cast by the Hayes electors, should not be counted.

There are returned here from the State of Oregon two sets of electoral votes, one from Cartwright, Odell, and Watts, certifying that they had cast their votes for Governor Hayes; the other from Cronin, Miller, and Parker, certifying that they had cast two votes for Governor Hayes and one vote for Governor Tilden. The question is, which is the true return? I am satisfied the former is, and for these two reasons:

First. By the sixtieth and thirty-seventh sections of the election law of Oregon, it is made the duty of the county clerk to send an abstract of the votes cast in the county for electors to the secretary of state, and it is made his duty, in the presence of the governor, to canvass the votes. The secretary of state is the final and sole canvassing-officer.

To ascertain who are the true presidential electors from Oregon, we must discover whom the tribunal that the laws of Oregon enact shall finally determine that question has adjudged to be such electors; that adjudication may be certified to us by the governor or be made known to us by the record of such final determination. The governor's certificate is only valuable as evidence of what the final tribunal has adjudicated, and may have been forged, or may from design or mistake be untrue. The two Houses of Congress, or this Commission, will be controlled by the State's decision as to who has been elected. In this case the canvass of the secretary of state, which is the final determination of the question as to who have been elected electors, has been sent in the package containing the list of votes cast for President and Vice-President, and the electoral bill has given us authority to consider papers so presented to us, but without such specific authority, we certainly would look to a record that is controlling.

The canvass of the secretary of state, the State's final determination, being thus before us, shows that Cartwright, Odell, and Watts received 15,200 votes, being a thousand more votes than were received by any other candidates for electors. And the fortieth section of the election laws of Oregon provides as follows, namely:

That in all elections in this State the person having the highest number of votes for any office shall be deemed to have been elected.

I am at a loss to see how this Commission can do otherwise than deem Cartwright, Odell, and Watts elected electors.

Second. By the very showing of those who claim one vote from Oregon for Governor Tilden, he is not entitled to it. Watts, one of those who had a majority of votes, was, when elected, a postmaster, and Governor Grover therefore concluded that he was authorized to give a certificate of election to Cronin, who had the next highest vote. The governor will find few to agree with him that, when a majority of the people declare by their ballots that they do not want a citizen to hold one of their offices, such a vote gives him a title to the office. But Watts, though a postmaster, when elected, resigned that office before December 6, 1876. On that day Cartwright and Odell met, and as Oregon was entitled to three votes, there was a vacancy. Cronin met, and he found two vacancies. All three persons whom the governor certified were ected electors, Cartwright, Odell, and Cronin, unite in informing us that there was one vacancy in the college. Cronin says there were two. Under this state of facts Cartwright and Odell filled the vacancy by appointing Watts, who, if ever ineligible, had ceased to be so by resigning the office of postmaster.

Cronin, on the other hand, filled the two vacancies that he found, by appointing Miller and Parker electors; and the only question is whether Cartwright and Odell, or Cronin, had the right to fill vacancies. And that question is solved by deciding whether two or one is a quorum and majority of a college of three.

I think the three electoral votes from the State of Oregon for Governor Hayes should be counted.

The first objection made to the vote of the Hayes electors from South Carolina is that the Constitution of the United States guarantees to that State a republican government, which it is claimed means a government under which the people exercise the supreme power, and that the State did not have such government.

When the Constitution was being framed, Edmund Randolph offered this resolution :

Resolved, That a republican government ought to be guaranteed by the United States to each State.

After the debate this resolution was rejected, and the following adopted :

Resolved, That a republican form of government shall be guaranteed to each State.

Few of the States would consent to change the Constitution so that the Federal Government could constitutionally interfere with the State governments further than to see that their form of government was republican. Such a change would seriously affect the sovereign character of the State. The government of South Carolina was in November, 1876, unquestionably republican in form, and that for us is the only proper inquiry.

Another objection to counting this vote is that the constitution of South Carolina requires that there shall be a registration law, and that there was none, and that consequently the election of electors is void. It is sufficient answer to this objection that the Constitution of the United States provides that the electors of each State shall be appointed "in such manner as the legislature thereof shall direct," and not in such manner as the constitution of the State shall direct. The legislature in this regard acts under the authority of the Constitution of the United States, and is entirely untrammelled by State constitutions.

Another objection is that the Federal troops prevented a free election. The two Houses of Congress and this Commission will not withhold from the Federal Government the presumption that its high officers have acted in accordance with the Constitution, laws, and best interests of the nation, a presumption which in the summary procedure of counting the vote for President and Vice-President will be held to be conclusive.

The two thousand and second section of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides by necessary implication that troops may be detailed to keep the peace at the polls. If troops were present at the polls the presumption is, and for the purpose of this proceeding the conclusive presumption is, that they were so present to keep the peace. We are not required to go into evidence on this point; especially when we know that to do so would be to delay the inauguration of the citizen who has been elected President until after the 4th of March, and thus as the law stands entirely defeat his inauguration.

My opinion is that the votes of the Hayes electors of South Carolina should be counted.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER BAYARD.

The following remarks by Senator BAYARD, of Delaware, in the course of the private consultations of the Electoral Commission, are prepared for publication in accordance with a resolution of the Commission and by the aid of such notes as were made during its sessions. The action of the majority of the Commission prohibited the presence of a stenographer during these debates, and as a consequence but a comparatively imperfect and unsatisfactory report can now be given.

The case of the State of Florida was the first which was transmitted by the two Houses of Congress for the consideration of this tribunal under the electoral act, and two returns purporting to be certificates of electoral votes cast in that State for President and Vice-President having been made to the President of the Senate, and, in accordance with the provisions of the law, submitted by him on the 1st day of February to the Commission,

On the motion of Mr. Justice MILLER, it was resolved that the Commission should hear counsel on the question whether any evidence will be considered by the Commission that was not submitted to the two Houses by the President of the Senate, and, if so, what evidence can properly be considered; and also the question, What is the evidence now before the Commission?

After debate by counsel, Mr. Justice MILLER moved the following order, on the 7th of February:

That no evidence will be received or considered by the Commission which was not submitted to the joint convention of the two Houses by the President of the Senate with the different certificates, except such as relates to the eligibility of F. C. Humphreys, one of the electors.

Which order was determined in the affirmative—yeas 8, nays 7. In the affirmative: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong; in the negative: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman.

On the 9th of February Mr. Representative HUNTON, of Virginia, offered the following resolution:

That the electors named in certificate No. 2, to wit, Wilkinson Call, J. E. Yonge, Robert Bullock, and Robert B. Hilton, are the four persons who were duly appointed electors by the State of Florida on the 7th day of November, 1876, and that their votes as certified in such certificate are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States.

This was decided in the negative—yeas 7, nays 8. In the affirmative: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Hunton, Payne, and Thurman; in the negative: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong.

On the 9th of February the following order was adopted by a vote of 8 yeas to 7 nays:

That the following be adopted as the final decision and report on the matters submitted to the Commission as to the electoral vote of the State of Florida:

ELECTORAL COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 9, A. D. 1877.

To the President of the Senate of the United States, presiding in the meeting of the two Houses of Congress, under the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, A. D. 1877:

The Electoral Commission mentioned in said act having received certain certificates and papers purporting to be certificates, and papers accompanying the same, of the electoral votes from the State of Florida, and the objections thereto submitted to it under said act, now report that it has duly considered the same, pursuant to said act, and has decided, and does hereby decide, that the votes of Frederick C. Humphreys, Charles H. Pearce, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, named in the certificate of M. L. Stearns, governor of said State, which votes are certified by said persons, as appears by the certificate submitted to the Commission, as aforesaid, and marked "number one," by said Commission, and herewith returned, are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are lawfully to be counted as therein certified, namely: Four (4) votes for Rutherford B. Hayes, of the State of Ohio, for President, and four (4) votes for William A. Wheeler, of the State of New York, for Vice-President.

The Commission also has decided, and hereby decides and reports, that the four persons first before named were duly appointed electors in and by said State of Florida.

The brief ground of this decision is, that it appears, upon such evidence as by the Constitution and the law named in said act of Congress is competent and pertinent to the consideration of the subject, that the before-mentioned electors appear to have been lawfully elected such electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, for the term beginning March 4, 1877, of the State of Florida, and that they voted as such at the time and in the manner provided for by the Constitution of the United States and the law.

The Commission has also decided, and does hereby decide and report, that, as a consequence of the foregoing and upon the grounds before stated, neither of the papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of said State of Florida numbered two (2) and three (3) by the committee, and herewith returned, are the certificates or the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and that they ought not to be counted as such.

Done at Washington the day and year first above written.

The question being on the adoption of the report of the committee, it was decided in the affirmative:

|-----------|---|
| Yeas..... | 8 |
| Nays..... | 7 |

Those who voted in the affirmative were: Messrs. Bradley, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Garfield, Hoar, Miller, Morton, and Strong—8.

Those who voted in the negative were: Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Clifford, Field, Huntton, Payne, and Thurman—7.

So the report of the committee was adopted; and said decision and report was thereupon signed by the members agreeing therein, as follows:

SAM. F. MILLER,
W. STRONG,
JOSEPH P. BRADLEY,
GEO. F. EDMUNDS,
O. P. MORTON,
FRED'K T. FRELINGHUYSEN,
JAMES A. GARFIELD,
GEORGE F. HOAR,
Commissioners.

CASE OF FLORIDA.

In the course of the private deliberations of the Commission, Senator BAYARD said:

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, I would not conceal from you, even if I could, the deep anxiety with which I have approached the decision of this question, the difficulties surrounding which have been apparent since the foundation of our Government, and their consideration postponed from generation to generation until we find ourselves now compelled for the first time to make a decision which includes in its consequences the possession of the executive power of the Government of the United States for the ensuing four years; and to the natural and constitutional difficulties surrounding this much debated question is superadded the fact that we are acting not in view of an uncertainty yet veiled by the future, but upon facts exhibited in the clear light of the past, after an exciting and heated controversy between two great political parties, the result of which when established must be full of disappointment to one or the other. I can only say that while I feel a just and natural distrust in my powers to deal competently with such issues, yet I am at least conscious that I approach the duties imposed upon me by the oaths I have taken, both as a Senator of the United States and a member of this Commission, in a spirit deeply solicitous to act worthily in my place.

In order properly to consider the question of receiving evidence other than that contained in the papers submitted by the President of the Senate to the two Houses, and by them sent to this Commission, we must examine the constitution of this tribunal.

I hold that for the purpose of this decision the two Houses of Congress are now present in this tribunal. I am here not only as a member of this Commission but as a Senator, and come here with all the knowledge which I have derived as a member of the Senate from the testimony taken by committees appointed by both the Senate and the House for the investigation of affairs in the State of Florida during the past winter. I cannot divest myself of this knowledge; to do so were impossible and in direct violation of my duty. The knowledge so obtained by me is incidental to the powers and duties of a member of either House; and this Commission and every member of it are by the express language of the second section of the law under which it is organized, invested "with the same powers * * * now possessed * * * by the two Houses acting separately or together." Whatever, therefore, is open to the knowledge or inquiry of one Commissioner, whether Senator, Representative, or judge of the Supreme Court, is open to all. Their functions and powers are equal in all respects. Under the language of the law creating this Commission "all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes" shall be opened by the President of the Senate and by him presented to the two Houses, whose tellers shall read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses.

Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper, when there shall be only one return from a State, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State from which but one return has been received shall be rejected except by the affirmative vote of the two Houses. When the two Houses have voted they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted.

As a member of the Senate, it will be observed, I am thus called upon to vote in cases of single returns from a State upon objections so made. The jurisdiction of the two Houses over the question of receiving or rejecting electoral votes is unmistakably and clearly assumed by the language of the law which I have read. It recognizes the power of the Senate and the House, by the action of a single member of each body, to raise objections to the reception of an electoral vote, and it provides for the decision of the two Houses upon those objections. If there was no jurisdiction and power in the two Houses over the question of reception or rejection of the votes sent up, it would have been worse than an idle form to have enacted this law calling for objections and providing for their decision. When, therefore, members of the Senate or the House are called upon to vote intelligently and conscientiously upon objections to the reception of electoral votes, what are they necessarily "to take into view," and what is to guide them in the decision they are to make? Necessarily everything that is known as evidence in parliamentary law and usage, all public facts of which both Houses must have knowledge, all reports of committees of either House, all depositions accompanying the same, petitions, and such other papers as contain information necessary and proper for the consideration and determination of the question. This course of proceeding and scope and character of information is essential for the performance of the duties assumed by the two Houses of Congress and each member thereof under the first section of the act.

Let us now consider the duty of this Commission under the second section of the act, which provides—

That if more than one return, or paper purporting to be a return from a State, shall have been received by the President of the Senate, purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes given at the last preceding election, * * * all such returns and papers shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses when met as aforesaid, and read by the tellers, and all such returns and papers shall thereupon be submitted to the judgment and decision, as to which is the true and lawful electoral vote of such State, of a Commission constituted as follows.

The composition and formation of this Commission is then set forth. The section provides for the opening and reading by the tellers of all such certificates and papers; and the President of the Senate is directed to call for objections, and the description of the objections so called for is in precisely the same language as is provided in the first section in case of single returns. All such objections, together with the certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same shall forthwith be submitted to this Commission—

Which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers * * * now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and, by a majority of votes, decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

The section also provides that when such decision by a majority of the Commission shall have been read and entered in the Journal of each House, "the counting of the votes shall proceed in conformity therewith, unless, upon objection made thereto in writing by at least five Senators and five members of the House of Representatives, the two Houses shall separately concur in ordering otherwise."

Thus it will be observed that on the part of those who have denied that evidence of any character can be considered by the Commission which was not contained in the certificates submitted to the two Houses by the President of the Senate, the following result would be reached: that members of this Commission being also members of the Senate and the House, shall be at liberty to receive, and in fact must receive and consider, evidence in relation to objections to single returns of electoral votes when voting in their respective Houses which they will not receive or consider when sitting in this Commission in cases of double returns; that evidence of the truth shall be brought home to my mind and bind itself on my conscience in the case of a single return that is to be denied to me in case of a double return. It will scarcely be denied that the extent of inquiry and difficulties of ascertainment as to which is the true return of two returns involves an equal or indeed much greater difficulty in the investigation than where a single return is alone under consideration; and it will also be observed that after the Commission shall have refused to receive any evidence outside of the papers submitted by the President of the Senate, and have thus made their decision in the dark and without information, ten of its members withdrawing to their places in the Senate and the House and being called upon to vote upon the question of concurring or non-concurring in the decision of the Commission, shall have both the power and the duty to receive and consider as Senators and Representatives evidence which as Commissioners they had excluded.

This statement of the case would seem to me to make it apparent that this Commission must necessarily have opened to them all avenues and means of information which were open to either or both Houses of Congress; and that the members cannot, by taking seats in the Commission, denude themselves of the powers and duties and the means of information which belong to them as members of either House of Congress.

It is, therefore, my judgment that when I entered this chamber as a member of the Commission I brought with me all the knowledge concerning the late election in Florida of which I had become possessed as a member of the Senate; and whatever were my powers or duties as a member of the Senate in relation to this subject of counting the electoral votes, they are not diminished or altered by my becoming a member of this Commission; and as a corollary of this proposition, I hold the power and jurisdiction of each and all members of the Commission to be necessarily equal in every respect.

It has been alleged as a reason for not hearing evidence that injustice would follow if every possible topic of inquiry were not pursued and every fact probed to its very bottom. So unqualified a proposition cannot be received without the risk of reducing our proposed duties to impossibility, if not absurdity.

As I have stated, the duty devolved upon the two Houses in relation to single returns in section 1 of the act is in precisely the same frame of words as in section 2 is provided for cases of double returns when submitted to this Commission. In the case of single returns two hours are given for debate, followed by a peremptory order to vote at the termination of that time; and then "immediately" the two Houses are to meet and announce the result. Certain it is the two Houses will not vote in ignorance of the facts upon which their action is to be taken. They have and will certainly "take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers" as are on their files. They will consider the reports of their committees and listen to the debates, before reaching a decision. To this Commission is expressly confided the same means of information, of the same knowledge in extent or character which is possessed by the two Houses, with this addition, that the Commission is not limited as to time for its ascertainment and determination of facts, but more time and infinitely better opportunities, after listening to objectors and counsel on both sides, are allowed to us in coming to our decision.

For what object, let it be asked, was this enlarged opportunity for examination, hearing, and determination given to this Commission? Plainly because the questions submitted to us were of a more complicated nature than cases of single returns. It was because the law and the facts were supposed to be more in controversy in cases of double returns that this Commission was formed for the purposes of justice and convenience deliberately and fully to examine and justly to decide the vexed questions of law and fact raised by the objections called for by the Presiding Officer and made by the members of the Senate and the House. If no evidence was to be received, then argument would be useless, objections would be useless; the two hours given to the two Houses for debate in single returns would have been reasonably sufficient for this Commission, who in the seclusion of this court-room could more rapidly reach a decision than the two Houses in general debate.

What is meant by "objections" and the provision that they are to be "called for" and be "submitted for decision" and "be decided?" Objections must be to the form or the substance of the return. It is difficult to state a valid objection as to the form of a return, because no form is prescribed by the Constitution, and as to "the State" is confided "the manner" of appointment of the electors, it is to a failure to obey her statutes prescribing form of certificate that consideration alone could be given, and an inspection of the State constitution and laws would settle that. To be of substance the objections must arise under the provisions of the Constitution, and be based upon a violation of the requirements of that instrument and the limitations imposed by it upon the State in the selection of persons to vote or to be voted for.

The call for objections is a distinct recognition in the law under which we are now proceeding of the fact that valid objections can exist, and when presented must be decided, and that electoral votes may for just cause be excluded "under the Constitution and existing law."

The Constitution requires in mandatory phrase that—

First. "Each State shall appoint"—

Second. "In such manner as the legislature thereof may direct"—

Third. "A number of electors—equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress."

Fourth. "But no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust under the United States, shall be appointed an elector."

Fifth. The electors shall meet in their respective States.

Sixth. They shall vote by ballot for President and Vice-President—

Seventh. One of whom shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves.

Eighth. They shall make distinct lists of all the persons voted for as President and Vice-President—

Ninth. And of the number of votes for each—

Tenth. Which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate.

Eleventh. The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

Twelfth. The qualifications of the President and Vice-President are prescribed.

Is it not manifest that in calling for "objections" to the count of the electoral votes, constitutional objections, such as a disregard of any of the foregoing requirements, were plainly contemplated?

What votes are to be counted? "The votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States." (See section 2 of electoral bill.) And what votes are to be rejected from the count? Plainly the votes not provided for by the Constitution; and "objections" to such votes and for such reasons are the only objections "called for" by the terms of the act, and are to be decided under its provisions.

It seems to me, therefore, that upon the very face of this act we are called upon to exercise a jurisdiction involving, first inquiry, and next determination of facts and law, which we cannot abdicate or avoid without rendering the law under which we act a sham and a dead letter. Unless the two Houses have the power to decide upon objections, it is an idle waste of time and a mockery of law to call for objections. Unless his Commission has the power and the duty to consider and determine objections in cases of double returns, it was an idle form to refer those returns to us. If limitation upon the time allowed us for investigation, argument, and consideration was not removed for the purpose of giving us full and ample opportunity to inquire, to ascertain the truth both of law and fact involved in these questions of double returns and suggested by the objections filed, then the formation of this Commission and its sessions were worse than a mere waste of time; they were a deception of honest and reasonable public expectation; and the submission of our decision to the two Houses of Congress was an idle preliminary which might as well or better have been dispensed with.

Our duties upon this Commission are those of substance or else of mere form only; and holding them to be of substance, and that substance to consist in the ascertainment of which is "the true and lawful electoral vote of such State," it seems to me impossible that we can reach such a decision without prior inquiry; and inquiry involves the reception and consideration of all that is evidence "competent and pertinent under the Constitution and existing law."

It is plain that the object and intent of this law is to reach a decision, and that this is not to be defeated by delay or prolongation of examination and debate so as to spin out the month allotted to us. The case is not inter partes, in a legal sense. It is a public res. The two Houses have been the known and public tribunal for the consideration and decision of these vexed questions for months past. They have severally recognized and acted upon this assumption, and sent forth their committees during the past winter, who, after laborious sessions, have come back with full reports and testimony of the transactions in question and have reported their conclusions. In the State of Florida the courts of that State have themselves taken jurisdiction of the question now before us, as under the constitution and laws of that State they were empowered, and have reached a decision. The record of those judicial proceedings is before us, and tells its own story. It is true, this fact appears in the papers submitted for our consideration by the two Houses, but it is asked that no other or further evidence be received.

It is plain to me that from the very nature of this proceeding all the testimony, all the information known to parliamentary law and usage which was and is in the possession of either or both Houses of Congress, must necessarily be considered as being to-day before this Commission and subject to its examination; and also that if other and further testimony is needed by us in relation to any fact to satisfy our minds prior to reaching a decision, it is our duty and power to take it, having always in view that it shall be competent and pertinent, and regulating our action so that the law under which we proceed will not be defeated by prolonged delays.

I recognize expedition as a necessary feature in our proceedings. This duty is marked all over the law, curtailing as it does debate in the two Houses, preventing adjournments, limiting the hours of recess, and providing that no separation of the two Houses shall take place during the execution of the law except as expressly provided. Expedition is inherent in the very nature of the act and its objects. Therefore the time allowed by this Commission for taking testimony, hearing counsel and objectors, all will be measured by a due sense of proportion to the great end in view, which is a decision between all the contested returns by the 3d day of March next. It is no answer to say that because we cannot hear everything we must therefore hear nothing; and the hearing in each case will be regulated by reason and a sense of the fitness of things which is supposed to accompany the intelligent execution of every duty.

The very statement of the question submitted in section 2 of the act for the decision of this Commission is, as I have said, indicative of the duty and in great degree of the power which is vested in the Commission for the performance of that duty. We are to decide "how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State." These are the precise facts set forth in the Constitution of the United States, which provides that each State shall appoint a certain number ("how many") of electors, but certain persons holding office ("what persons") shall not be appointed.

By the Constitution so many persons only and such persons only shall be appointed electors, and no more. No other persons than those authorized by the Constitution can be appointed. If a greater number be appointed, the appointment is absolutely void quoad the excess beyond the number prescribed. If persons prohibited be appointed, such appointment is absolutely void. The regulation by the Constitution as to numbers and qualifications of the electors is contained in the same sentence, and by no warrant can its grammatical construction be destroyed or the natural alliance of the words used be severed so as to alter its effect or meaning. Its obligation is equal throughout, and no more force can be ascribed to one of its mandates than to the other. The duty of obedience by the States to these two limitations upon the number and qualification of electors is equally plain and distinct. There is no more power in a State to disregard one limitation than the other. The breach of the Constitution by a State in appointing a person forbidden is equally unwarranted and dangerous as to appoint more persons than the Constitution permits. The action of any State in the appointment of electors is directly of importance to all her sisters of the Union. The offices in view are the chief executive offices of the entire Union. The safety, rights, and welfare of each State are directly affected by the action of every other State. It is the right and it is the duty of all the other States to see that no State shall have a more numerous or different college of electors than the Constitution provides.

It will scarcely be urged that any State can at its will send up to be counted a greater number of electoral votes than the Constitution allows, and that there is no "counting power" in the Senate or House of Representatives to arrest and defeat such an attempt. To admit the power of any State to increase at its will the number of its electoral votes is surely to reduce the Constitution and our system of government to an absurdity. "No Senator or Representative shall be appointed an elector." Can it be that such votes would be counted in the presence and with the aid of the very persons who in defiance of the Constitution have assumed to act as electors? The exclusion of such persons is contained in the very sentence which limits the number of electors; yet if a State can violate the mandate of the Constitution as to the qualifications of electors and appoint persons electors who, holding offices of trust and profit under the United States, have used their official powers as stepping-stones to exalt themselves and the President, who is the fountain of all executive power of the Government, to a renewed lease of authority, it is evident the wound inflicted upon the Constitution and upon free government is equally deep and dangerous.

There can be no safety unless all the avenues to places of power under the Constitution shall be equally well guarded, and the same measure of duty and with it the same measure of power be given to the two Houses over the count of electoral votes to "decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State."

Nothing in this proposition detracts from the just powers of the State, whose voice alone is to be heard and obeyed in the choice of her electors. All interference by the citizens of one State with the elections in another, or by the Government of the United States with the elections or manner of election by a State, is clearly in violation of the letter and spirit of the Federal Constitution. The confusion and dangers which now surround us in connection with the late election have their real origin in the mischievous and utterly unwarranted interference by the President of the United States and his subordinates in office with the process of election in Florida and other Southern States. The official powers and emoluments of the Government have been openly used as an engine of party influence in the late canvass; and finally the military arm of the Government has been sent down upon partisan application to overawe the political opponents of the present administration and abet and encourage its party friends and agents in the commission of violations of the laws of the State. It never was intended that the Federal power should be felt in the State elections, whether for presidential electors or State officers. There never will be peace and safety to the people individually or in their communities as States until the pretensions to the exercise of such power on the part of the Federal administration shall have been abandoned.

I have always voted against inquisition by the Federal Government into the management of their affairs by the States, and would no more do it in case of presidential electors than of State officers. No one can be more averse than I to the invasion of the powers of the State to elect, and then to authenticate according to its own laws the result of its free choice, as provided by the Constitution of the United States. But the very question in the case of Florida is, did the State appoint any and what persons electors? Two sets of votes are before us and only one can be the lawful return. Which shall we accept? Surely that which the State has declared to be true. Both sets certainly cannot be counted and the State has a right to have one set counted.

Florida has by the Constitution the power and duty of appointing four electors, no more. Two certificates are before us, one of Humphreys and his three associates, certifying that as electors they had voted on December 6, 1876, for Hayes and Wheeler, which is accompanied by the certificate of Stearns, the late governor, pursuant to the laws of the United States, that Humphreys and his associates were chosen electors. Certificate No. 2 is by Wilkinson Call and his three associates, that they on the 6th of December, 1876, had voted for Tilden and Hendricks. This is accompanied by the certificate of William Archer Coeke, attorney-general of Florida and one of the board of State canvassers, that by the returns of the votes cast in the State of Florida at the general election held on November 7, 1876, Call and his associates were chosen electors for President and Vice-President. Accompanying the certificates of Call is a duly-authenticated copy of the act of the legislature of Florida, reciting the judicial proceedings in the courts of that State, whereby it appears that upon a canvass of the true votes of the State, made under order of the court, Call and his associates had been duly chosen electors on the 7th day of November, 1876; and these proceedings are accompanied by the certificate of Drew, the present governor of Florida, verifying the same.

This double return is an abnormal fact, and one that has been caused not by the State of Florida or her people, but by the mischievous and unlawful intervention of the exterior power to which I have before alluded. The power of self-government is awarded to the State to hold her elections free from exterior influences. If her citizens and officials shall send up two returns, then they have necessarily sought a decision at the hands of a third party and made it necessary by their own act. The Constitution provides that the electoral votes shall be counted in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, and not otherwise. When this count shall have been completed the result is to be ascertained, and by whom? Necessarily by the two Houses of Congress, because it is made their duty to recognize and declare the persons found by the count of the electoral votes to have been duly elected; and if no such election shall be by them found to have been accomplished, then in the event of a majority of persons appointed electors not having been found to have voted for any candidate, "immediately" upon the House of Representatives is devolved the high duty of doing what the electoral colleges have failed to do, i. e., elect a President, and simultaneously a like duty is devolved upon the Senate to elect a Vice-President, as provided by the twelfth article of amendment to the Constitution. The two Houses of Congress have thus in a certain contingency, of the arrival of which they must inform themselves, the duty of filling the chief executive offices of the Republic. If this shall become their great and high duty, must they not necessarily inquire and ascertain whether events have justified their proceeding? To this end the Constitution provides that—

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

It must be in the presence of the two Houses, who, in order to perform their duty and protect the avenues to the great offices in question, must carefully scrutinize and supervise this "count." To this end the two Houses must see that the count is true; true in all that the word implies; accurate in number and lawful in itself; not more votes than should be counted; not other votes than should be counted; no votes to be counted for a prohibited person; no votes to be counted when cast by persons forbidden by law to cast such votes.

The choice of electors is by the Constitution confided to the State. The language is plain :

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

The two Houses of Congress have no right or power to question the choice of the State, but they have a right and a duty to insist that the Constitution shall be obeyed by the State in the performance of the act of appointment.

I have been unable to discover any better chart of the power which may be and which must be exercised by the two Houses of Congress in scrutinizing the votes which are brought before them to be counted under their supervision, than to hold that the States whose electoral votes are sent up to be counted shall be controlled by the same limitations of the Constitution as control the two Houses themselves when called upon to elect a President and Vice-President in the absence of a majority of the electoral votes having been found to be cast for any candidate. Thus, if the Constitution of the United States forbids Congress to elect any one President except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, or any person "who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years, and been fourteen years a resident within the United States," they surely will not be at liberty to count votes for candidates so rendered ineligible, and for whom they would themselves have been debarred from voting; and their duty in this regard is based upon the inhibitions of the Constitution.

The obligation to support the Constitution is equal as respects all its provisions. No one provision can be selected from its context and supported and held sacred and those which surround it be treated with contempt and disregard. If the qualifications of the persons to be voted for as President and Vice-President are to be respected by the two Houses of Congress when they are called upon to elect them, it is their right and duty to insist that they shall be respected by the electoral colleges. The obligation is not greater to support the provisions of the Constitution which prescribe qualifications for the candidate, than to support those equally express qualifications of the officials who can vote to elect a candidate. If the two Houses cannot vote for a person of foreign birth for President, they have no power to count electoral votes for such a person. Whether the provisions of the Constitution define the qualifications of the person who shall vote or the person who shall be voted for, they are equally obligatory upon those who have the supervision of the ultimate fact of ascertaining and declaring the lawful President and Vice-President of the United States.

In the case before us two voices pretend to speak for the State of Florida. To us is confided the duty of discovering which is the true and which is the false. We cannot avoid this duty, and all that is implied in its performance. The organic act of this Commission expressly provides for a count of the votes by the two Houses, and by no one else. To count means to count truly, and to count truly we must have knowledge of what is the truth.

The question before us is whether we will hear proof tending to show that one and not the other of these returns is the true return. How can we execute this duty without hearing the facts? The Constitution has directed the State to "appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors." If this essential fact be brought in question, then the constitution and the laws of the State must be consulted in order to ascertain what is the "manner directed." This Commission is invested with all the powers of the two Houses of Congress acting separately or together. It is in its essence, therefore, and in the purview of its power and contemplated action, a parliamentary body, with parliamentary powers and methods. We are not sitting as a judicial court of general or statutory jurisdiction, but to exercise judgment undoubtedly, and to that end to prosecute inquiry into the subject-matter, not by technical methods, but by the general methods and usages well known to the history of parliamentary proceeding, to take such views as are a fit basis for legislation, and to be governed in our judgments here by the same kind of proofs as would enlighten legislative discretion and judgment. The very language of the section of the act creating this Commission commands that we shall proceed to consider and decide "what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers * * * as shall, by the Constitution and now-existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration." Where, except in legislative bodies, are "petitions" used as evidence? Where are "other papers" received as means of information? The technical rules of evidence would exclude all such, and yet this law clearly contemplates their reception and use. The very word "law" is advisedly in the singular, because it is used in its broadest and most embracing sense, which would not be extended if the additional words "parliamentary, common, or statutory" had been annexed.

It will be observed that I have omitted in my citations the words "it any," which are to be found in many places throughout the act. I have done so because in proceedings such as this no one will gravely contend that such words are to have the slightest force in giving or excluding jurisdiction. No one has said, here or elsewhere, that such words would impair or assist the operation of law. If, in the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace over the property in a shilling, such words would be without force to control jurisdiction, surely their furtive and petty presence will hardly be recognized in the consideration of such issues as confront us now and upon which the executive power over a nation of forty millions of people may be said to depend. This Commission stands admittedly in the place of, and armed with all the powers and discretion over this subject which are vested in, the Senate of the United States representing the people in their organized politics called States, and in the Representatives in Congress representing every individual person in the United States.

I say nothing here of the new-fangled claim for power in the President of the Senate to count the electoral votes. Such a pretension had late birth and a speedy death. It was advanced in opposition to the unbroken line of precedent of the history of the Government from its foundation. It had no warrant in the express or implied meanings of the Constitution. It was in opposition to the nature and the spirit of our popular government. Discussion and public opinion soon settled its fate. It no longer exists as a subject for consideration.

An examination of the history of congressional precedent over this subject of the count of the votes has given me more knowledge than I had when the discussions took place in the Senate two years ago. Since that time the proceedings of the two Houses in the year 1800 in relation to "a bill prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President of the United States" have been disinterred from the archives of the Senate. The bill in question originated in the Senate, and proposed that either House of Congress should have power to reject an electoral vote. It provided for the creation of an electoral commission of which the elements were the same as the present, consisting of members of the House and Senate and presided over by the Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court. This "grand committee," as it was then called, in the eighth section of the bill was invested with "power to inquire, examine, decide, and report upon the constitutional qualifications of the persons voted for as President and Vice-President of the United States, upon the constitutional qualifications of the electors appointed by the different States, and whether their appointment was authorized by the State legislature or not; upon all petitions and exceptions against corrupt, illegal conduct of the electors, or force, menaces, or improper means used to influence their votes; or against the truth of their returns, or the time, place, or manner of giving their votes; provided, always, that no petition or exception shall be granted or allowed by the grand committee which shall have for its object to draw into question the number of votes on which any elector in any of the States shall have been declared appointed."

And the preceding section, 6, was as follows :

That the grand committee shall have power to send for persons, papers, and records, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths or affirmations to all persons examined before them, and to punish contempts of witnesses refusing to answer as fully and absolutely as the Supreme Court of the United States may or can do in cases depending therein; and the testimony of all witnesses examined before the committee shall be reduced to writing by the secretary of the committee, and shall be signed by the witness after his examination is closed. And if any person, sworn and examined before this committee, shall swear or affirm falsely, such person thereof convicted shall incur the pains, penalties, and disabilities inflicted by the laws of the United States upon willful and corrupt perjury.

At the close of the seventh section is a proviso that the number of votes on which any elector in any of the States shall have been declared appointed should not be inquired into. By the ordinary rules of construction, it would appear that the power of inquiry would have embraced this subject but for the express exception.

The bill passed the Senate and was reported to the House of Representatives, by which body it was also passed with an amendment requiring the concurrence of the two Houses to reject a vote. It was upon this point of difference, to wit, whether the Houses acting separately should have power to reject a vote or whether it required their concurrent action to reject a vote, that the disagreement took place and became final. But the claim of power over the counting of the votes and of instituting inquiry as to the lawfulness of the electoral votes was upheld in both Houses of Congress by large majorities. Among those so voting to exercise the jurisdiction by Congress over this question were found many persons who had sat in the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States. Among the chief actors was Mr. John Marshall, soon after the Chief-Justice of the United States; and the record of the vote discloses the names of well-known characters in American history who as constitutional lawyers are entitled to great weight. It is proper to say that the argument of Mr. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney was strongly in opposition to the exercise of such power by Congress, and his speech is more fully reported than any other, to which may be added that it is the only speech in the same direction. The concession of power in Congress to control the count of the electoral votes according to the Constitution, and to institute such inquiries and take such evidence as would be necessary to secure the end in view, was apparently affirmed by a great majority of both House.

In 1824 a bill was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Van Buren, of New York, to regulate the count of the votes, and providing that the concurrence of both Houses should be necessary for the rejection of a vote. No provision dealing with double returns is made in the bill. The bill introduced by Mr. Van Buren passed the Senate without amendment, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, and reported back without amendment by Mr. Webster, but no further action was ever taken on it, and it never became a law.

February 8, 1865, President Lincoln sent the following message to Congress, which is to be found on page 229 of the compilation, of the action of Congress on this subject:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives :

The joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the electoral college" has been signed by the Executive in deference to the view of Congress implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution, have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal; and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto, as would be the case if his action were at all essential in the matter.

He disclaims all right of the Executive to interfere in any way in the matter of canvassing or counting electoral votes, and he also disclaims that, by signing said resolution, he has expressed any opinion on the recitals of the preamble or any judgment of his own upon the subject of the resolution.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1865.

The joint twenty-second rule, adopted on the 6th of February, 1865, by the two Houses without division, assumed in either House the existence of the power to reject at will and without debate any electoral vote; in other words, the concurrent vote of the two Houses was necessary for the counting of any electoral vote. This rule continued in force until February, 1875, and was then rescinded by the action of the Senate. Under it the count of electoral votes had been thrice made, in 1865, in 1869, and in 1873; and the power of excluding electoral votes was claimed and exercised by each House acting separately on these three occasions.

On the 6th of January, 1873, on the motion of Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections is directed to inquire and report to the Senate whether the recent election of electors for President and Vice-President has been conducted in the States of Louisiana and Arkansas in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States and with the laws of said States, and what contests, if any, have arisen as to who were elected as electors in either of said States, and what measures are necessary to provide for the determination of such contests and to guard against and determine like contests in the future election of electors for President and Vice-President. That for the purpose of speedily executing this resolution the said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers, to take testimony, and at their discretion to send a subcommittee of their own number to either of said States with authority to take testimony; and, if the exigency of this service demands, the said committee may appoint and employ suitable disinterested and unprejudiced persons not resident in either of such States, with authority to take such testimony as may be material in determining any pending contest growing out of the election of electors in either of said States.

Under this resolution the committee, presided over by Mr. Morton, of Indiana, one of the present Commission, made investigation, and on the 10th of February following made a report accompanied by voluminous testimony on the subjects embraced in the resolution, in the course of which report it is said:

The certificate of the secretary of state is not required, and the certificate of the governor, as provided for in this section, seems to be the only evidence contemplated by the law of the election of electors and their right to cast the electoral vote of the State. If Congress chooses to go behind the governor's certificate, and inquire who has been chosen as electors, it is not violating any principle of the right of the States to prescribe what shall be the evidence of the election of electors, but it is simply going behind the evidence as prescribed by an act of Congress; and, thus going behind the certificate of the governor, we find that the official returns of the election of electors, from the various parishes of Louisiana, had never been counted by anybody having authority to count them.

Under the twenty-second joint rule and this report the electoral vote of the State of Louisiana was not counted, there being two returns from said State.

On December 6, 1876, the following resolutions, introduced by Mr. Edmunds, of Vermont, a member of this Commission, passed the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, when appointed, be, and it hereby is, instructed to inquire and report as soon as may be—

1. Whether in any of the elections named in said amendment, in said States, in the years 1875 or 1876, the right of any portion of such inhabitants and citizens to vote as aforesaid has been in any wise denied or abridged.

2. To what extent such denial or abridgment has been carried.

3. By what means such denial or abridgment has been accomplished.

4. By whom has such denial or abridgment been effected.
5. With what motives and for what purposes has such denial or abridgment been carried on.
6. By what authority or pretended authority has such denial or abridgment been exercised.

Resolved further, That the said committee have power to employ such number of stenographers as shall be needful, and to send for persons and papers, and have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate, and to appoint subcommittees with full power to make the inquiries aforesaid, and report the same to the committee.

Resolved further, That said committee, in order to the more speedy performance of its duties, have power to provide for the taking of affidavits on the subjects aforesaid before any officer authorized by the laws of the United States to take affidavits; and to receive and consider the same.

Resolved further, That the said committee be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the eligibility to office under the Constitution of the United States of any persons alleged to have been ineligible on the 7th day of November last, or to be ineligible as electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, to whom certificates of election have been or shall be issued by the executive authority of any State as such electors, and whether the appointment of electors, or those claiming to be such in any of the States, has been made either by force, fraud, or other means otherwise than in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the respective States; and whether any such appointment or action of any such elector has been in any wise unconstitutionally or unlawfully interfered with; and to inquire and report whether Congress has any constitutional power, and, if so, what and the extent thereof, in respect of the appointment of, or action of, electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, or over returns or certificates of votes of such electors; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a stenographer, and have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

These resolutions are embodied in report No. 611 of the Forty-fourth Congress, second session, made by Mr. Sargent, of California, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and which (a significant commentary upon the argument of those who have denied the right or power of this Commission to hear any evidence not contained in the papers presented by the President of the Senate to the two Houses) has been used as a paper-book in the course of the debates before this Commission, and copies of which are now and have been throughout the consideration of this case in the hands of every member of the Commission. Mr. Sargent's report, made to the Senate on the 29th of January, 1877, contains thirty printed pages, which embody abundant extracts from the testimony in relation to the election of electors in the State of Florida in November last. Mr. Sargent reports, on page 2, that, in pursuance of these resolutions introduced by Mr. Edmunds, the committee had "thoroughly examined all returns of the election, the evidence received and considered by the State canvassing-board, having especially investigated the contested cases before the board, and having taken the testimony of four hundred and forty-two witnesses concerning the election, the canvassing of the votes thereof, the denial or abridgment of the right of any portion of the inhabitants of Florida to vote, by force or fraud, and the other objects named in the resolution of the Senate."

No action was ever taken by the Senate upon this report, but the report of the committee of the House of Representatives was accompanied by a resolution declaring that the actual returns substantiated by evidence showed that Wilkinson Call and his three associates had been duly chosen electors, and had duly cast their votes for Tilden and Hendricks on December 6, 1876, which resolution was adopted by the House by a vote of 142 yeas to 82 nays.

The resolution of December 6, 1876, from the hands of Mr. Edmunds, of Vermont, contained these words:

That the said committee be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the eligibility to office under the Constitution of the United States of any persons alleged to have been ineligible on the 7th day of November last, or to be ineligible as electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, to whom certificates of election have been or shall be issued by the executive authority of any State, and whether the appointment of electors has been made otherwise than in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the respective States.

Compare these last words with the language of the present act :

SEC. 2. * * * decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State.

The inquiry under the Senate resolution and under the present law is precisely the same, and the exercise of the same measure of power is required for a decision under either.

In the face of this history of congressional precedent, disapproving of much of it as I do, especially as to the claim of power in the two Houses under the late twenty-second joint rule, I cannot but be amazed at the present attitude of members of the Commission and others in denying all power, in the name of State rights, to investigate the facts of an election sufficiently to ascertain what were its true results, to enable this Commission to come to a decision as to which of these two returns before us now was the true and lawful electoral vote of the State of Florida, as settled by the election on the 7th of November last, according to the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Florida.

The introduction of the Senate document to which I have referred, being the report of one of its committees and containing part of the testimony taken before it, and its natural and apparently unconscious use by counsel, by objectors, and members of the Commission, all confirm to me the correctness of my opinion that all the evidence of every nature which was in the possession of the two Houses of Congress, or either of them, was, ipso facto, in the possession of this Commission, who are bound to give due weight and consideration to the same. Some of the facts testified to before these committees, both of the Senate and the House, in relation to the Florida election, came to my knowledge before I was appointed a member of this Commission. It dwells still in my memory and cannot be dismissed. At my table in the Senate I have several volumes of this printed testimony. It was furnished to me by order of the Senate, that I might intelligently and conscientiously vote upon the subjects to which it related. When I shall return to the Senate and vote upon any objection which may be offered in cases of single returns from any State, I must cast that vote in the full light of all the knowledge and information within my power. When I leave this Commission, after its decision shall have been made, and vote upon the question of concurrence or non-concurrence in that decision, I shall cast my vote in the full light of all the information of every nature which as a Senator I have derived from every paper and from every source competent and pertinent for the decision of the case. If everything thus properly laid open to me as a member of the Senate, and which binds me as a Senator, is to be shut out from my mind as a Commissioner, how anomalous and absurd, how illogical must be my position in one capacity or the other: as a member of the Senate bound to receive evidence and information; as a member of the Commission to shut my eyes to all evidence except that which the papers presented by the President of the Senate shall contain!

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Commission, I cannot so comprehend my duty nor yours. The law under which we act plainly throws upon us the duty of decision. Inquiry and ascertainment necessarily must precede that decision. We cannot justly decide without evidence and we cannot lawfully refuse to hear evidence.

I not only consider the weight and influence of this decision as important in defining the jurisdiction of the two Houses of Congress and the rights of the candidates to exercise the functions for which they have been lawfully chosen, but I feel there is a moral weight attending the decisions of this Commission which is to sink deeper into the hearts and consciences of the American people. The question is one of law, but it is a question of law sustained by sound morals. It is justice and truth under the law which is the object for which this tribunal was created; and therefore I would open wide every door and window of this case through which light and truth may enter, in order that justice and law may be recognized as the same thing in the minds of the people of this country, who will respect and love their Government only when they are satisfied that it is just.

I can scarcely suppose that this Commission would refuse to hear evidence that the certificates of a governor and of a college of electors were in fact forgeries, or that the governor and electors had been compelled under duress and coercion to sign their names to those certificates. Why would we receive such evidence? Because the proof would be that the papers presented were not in truth those which upon their face they professed to be. Go a little further. Suppose the governor had signed willingly and in good faith and without force, but was himself the victim of fraud and deception under which only his signature had been obtained, or that the board of canvassers whose actions he certified had also been induced by the fraud and forgery of others to make a certificate of facts which were afterward discovered to be false, is it to be said that either or both of these things cannot be corrected and that we have no power to do so; that there is no power in the State to do so? Now, if the fraud shall be the fraud of the governor and the board of canvassers combined, does that make it any more binding on us than if they had been the innocent victims themselves of the fraud or force of others?

I understand that proof is offered to this Commission to show that the certificate of Humphreys and his three associates, the Hayes electors, is not the true and lawful vote of the State of Florida; that it is the result of the action of a State board of canvass, ministerial only in its powers, acting beyond its jurisdiction, in fraud and in error certifying an untruth; and, on the other hand, that evidence is offered to show that the State of Florida at the election held November 7, 1876, did elect Wilkinson Call and his three associates, all duly qualified under the Constitution of the United States, and elected in accordance with the constitution and laws of the State of Florida; and that being so elected they did, on the day appointed by act of Congress, in pursuance of the Constitution, meet as an electoral college and cast the votes of that State for Tilden and Hendricks. This, it seems to me, is the question which this tribunal was created to decide, and that in the power and duty of the decision are necessarily embraced the power and duty of inquiring and hearing before determination.

The order of this Commission has been made to hear testimony in the case of Mr. Humphreys, who was alleged to be ineligible to be appointed an elector because on the day of election he held an office of trust and profit under the United States. I do not comprehend, as I have said before, why one provision of the Constitution relating to this subject should be more obligatory upon us than another. I concur that it is our right and duty to hear testimony on this subject, and equally so in all other questions where the true performance of the requirements of the Constitution are brought in question.

FLORIDA.

The Commission having resolved on the 7th of February "that no evidence will be received or considered by the Commission which was not submitted to the joint convention of the two Houses by the President of the Senate, with the different certificates, except such as relates to the eligibility of F. C. Humphreys, one of the electors," the case was argued by counsel, and the order heretofore stated was adopted on the 9th of February. Before the vote was taken on the adoption of this order Senator BAYARD said:

After hearing the testimony of witnesses admitted by the Commission and reading the documents produced by them, I am satisfied that Mr. Humphreys was not ineligible to the office of elector on the 7th of November, 1876. The office of shipping-commissioner formerly held by him had, in my judgment, been resigned early in the month of October preceding. This resignation was not required by law to be in any particular form, but I believe that he did in fact divest himself of all official power and emolument in connection with the said office, and that under the laws of the United States the duties of the said office were assumed on the 5th of October, 1876, by the collector of customs at the port of Pensacola, in Florida, after which time the said Humphreys did not perform or attempt to perform any of its duties. The technicality suggested, of want of form in his resignation, or that it was not made to the court by whom he was appointed, but only to the presiding judge of that court, does not seem to me sufficient to disqualify him from being appointed an elector for President and Vice-President, as I do not consider that he held the office of shipping-commissioner after the 5th of October, 1876.

The Commission having refused to admit any evidence aliunde the certificates, I proceed to consider the law and the facts of the case as so presented. The power of choosing electors is vested in the State, who, "in such manner as her legislature may direct," is to appoint them. The fact of the election is not required to be established by any form of proof. The electors themselves are required to "make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate."

On the 7th of November an election was held in the State of Florida for four persons as electors for President and Vice-President. Two sets of candidates were voted for, one headed by Humphreys and one headed by Call. The fact which was elected will determine which was entitled to cast the vote of that State for President and Vice-President on December 6, 1876.

We have heard the argument that because the board of State canvassers, whether in disregard and defiance of duty or no, saw fit to certify to Governor Stearns that Humphreys and his associates had been chosen electors, these last-named persons were thereby invested "with the insignia of office," and that they became officers de facto, if not de jure, and that their acts as such officers de facto are valid as to all third parties under the common rule. An important qualification of this rule, however, is that it stops with preventing mischief such as confided in their power, and it is simply adopted to that extent as a matter of public policy, for the protection of innocent third persons; but the reasoning applicable to officers de facto is entitled to no place in the present consideration, no such facts existing here.

The office of elector is confined to a single function, that of casting a vote on a certain day. In Florida there was no such thing as an elector de facto as distinguished from an elector de jure. Two separate bodies of men assumed the office and executed the function of voting for President and Vice-President on the same day under alleged color of law. One body only were the rightful electors de jure and de facto; the other were neither de facto nor de jure electors. If the certificate and the possession of a certificate can be substituted for the fact of election, then we may hear something of the "insignia of office." It is the election that determines the right to the office, and not the certificate, which is merely one form of evidence of the election. The principle of de facto action and the necessity of protecting the public who have confided in the acts of the de facto officer has no place whatever in a proper consideration of the case of the State of Florida and the two sets of rival electors, both of whom assumed equally to execute the office at the same time; and the only question now is which set was elected.

It is manifestly the duty of the two Houses to secure to the State of Florida her right of choice, as established by the Constitution. It is a case of State action in relation to a Federal or national object. The State of Florida is not alone concerned, but all the other States are concerned, and the two Houses of Congress have been made the verifying witnesses of the truth of this national transaction. The meaning and the nature of our Government must not be forgotten, and we must adopt no construction inconsistent with either. If we propose to secure to each State the right to appoint its electors, do we do it by accepting the action of a set of conspiring and faithless officials who, on the eve of losing office, falsify their duty and deliver over the insignia of the office of electors to persons not entitled to receive them, and who, being thus fraudulently clothed with robes of office, proceed to defeat the real will of the people? It seems to me that with as much justice could it be said that if Colonel Blood had gotten safely away with the scepter-crown, and jewels of England and the coronation robes, he was there, fore the king of England, he who was merely a robber of her regalia, as to say that McLin, the secretary of state, and Cowgill, the comptroller, conspiring with Stearns, the governor, could, by falsifying the returns of the election, and breaking the law under which they made the canvass, thereby say that they spoke the voice of Florida in such manner as her legislature had directed. It is observed in the certificate, No. 2, of Call and his associates that they did notify Governor Stearns, the executive of the State, of their appointment as electors, and did apply and demand of him to cause to be delivered to them three lists of the names of the electors of said State according to law, and the said governor did refuse to deliver the same to them.

There is no doubt that by the conspiracy of McLin, Cowgill, and Stearns the customary certificate of the election of Call and his three associates was withheld from them, but did the withholding of the certificate destroy the fact of the election? Suppose no board of canvass had met and no certificates had been issued, but, nevertheless, the two sets of electors had met on December 6, 1876, and each set assumed to discharge the functions of the office by balloting for President and Vice-President, and each had sealed and certified and sent on to Washington the results of their action. If it was made subsequently to appear to the satisfaction of the two Houses of Congress, or to the satisfaction of a court of competent jurisdiction in the State of Florida, that one of these sets of electors had in fact been lawfully elected, and was entitled to vote on the day they did vote, would not such vote and such vote alone be valid, whether accompanied by certificates or not ?

The fact of election and who were really chosen by the citizens of Florida as electors for President and Vice-President on the 7th of November, 1876, is certified to this Commission in a manner conclusive under the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Florida. The power of appointment given to the State involves necessarily the power to determine the manner in which the act is to be done and also the power to verify its own act, and showing that it was done in a proper manner. The State is its own best authority. To adopt the language used in argument before the Commission, the State is a political community organized and existing under a system of law by which the declaration of the courts in matters submitted to their jurisdiction becomes the declaration of the State itself. The law of a State is the statute of a State as construed and applied by its courts. The public laws of a State promulgated by its authority, bind with absolute notice all persons within the State, and form the very highest means of proof of the action of the State. By the constitution of the State of Florida, the circuit court and the judges thereof shall have power to issue writs of quo warranto. The election in Florida was held under the laws of the State, controlled and managed by officers of the State; the canvass of the votes of the State was under the laws of the State performed by officers of the State. Over those officers and under those laws, the courts of the State had by its constitution jurisdiction to examine and determine whether those laws had been construed and executed properly by its executive and ministerial officers.

To use the definition of these powers of the State board of canvass as given by the supreme court of Florida in the case of The State ex rel. Drew, in December, 1876:

They are authorized to enter no judgment, and their power is limited by the express words of the statute, which gives them being, to the signing of a certificate containing the whole number of votes given for each person for each office, and therein declaring the result as shown by the returns.

The action of the board of canvassers in certifying that Humphreys and his associates had been chosen electors was brought under review in the circuit court for the second judicial circuit of the State of Florida by information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, wherein Wilkinson Call and his three associates were relators, and Humphreys and his three associates were respondents, and the circuit court, after full consideration and proofs produced on behalf of the parties, including a careful and accurate recanvass of all the votes cast, determined that the said relators were in fact and in law elected said electors as against the said respondents and all other persons.

By the record of the judicial proceedings in the courts of Florida having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and having all these parties claiming to have been chosen electors for President and Vice-President before them, it is made known to this Commission that the certificate of a majority of the State board of canvass of Florida that Humphreys and his three associates had been chosen electors was not true; but by the circuit court of said State it was—

Therefore considered and adjudged that said respondents, Frederick C. Humphreys, Charles H. Pearce, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long, were not, nor was any one of them elected, chosen, or appointed, or entitled to be declared elected, chosen, or appointed as such electors or elector, or to receive certificates or certificate of election or appointment as such electors or elector, and that the said respondents were not, upon the said 6th day of December, or at any other time, entitled to assume or exercise any of the powers and functions of such electors or elector; but that they were, upon the said day and date, mere usurpers, and that all and singular their acts and doings, as such, were and are illegal, null, and void.

And it is further considered and adjudged that the said relators, Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge, all and singular, were at said election duly elected, chosen, and appointed electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and were, on the said 6th day of December, 1876, entitled to be declared elected, chosen, and appointed as such electors, and to have and receive certificates thereof, and upon the said day and date, and at all times since, to exercise and perform all and singular the powers and duties of such electors, and to have and enjoy the pay and emoluments thereof.

It is further adjudged that said respondents do pay to the relators their costs by them in this behalf expended.

By the Constitution of the United States, article 4, section 1, it is provided that :

Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

In section 905 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, it is provided that :

The said records and judicial proceedings so authenticated shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the State from which they are taken.

The courts of the United States have, from the origin of the Government, regarded as final all judgments of the highest State courts over matters and persons within their jurisdiction. It is not necessary for me in this presence to review the authorities in the Supreme Court decisions from Mills vs. Duryee, 7 Cranch, 481, to Township of Elmwood vs. Macy, 2 Otto, 289, in their unbroken effect.

The opinion of the court in the last-named case was delivered by Mr. Justice Davis, who said :

We are not called upon to vindicate the decisions of the supreme court of Illinois in these cases, or approve the reasoning by which it reached its conclusions. If the questions before us had never been passed upon by it, some of my brethren who agree to this opinion might take a different view of them. But are not these decisions binding upon us in the present controversy? * * * We have always followed the highest court of the State in its construction of its own constitution and laws.

Striking out the name of "Illinois" and inserting the name of "Florida" in this last citation, what effect must be given by this Commission to the judgments of the courts of that State to which I have referred, and the record of which attached to the certificate is now before us? How can the laws of a State be expounded with more authority than by its courts of law? The judiciary of the State is one of the co-ordinate branches of its government. The interpretation of the statutes of a State by its superior court is binding everywhere, if the judgment is conclusive in the State where it was pronounced.

Did the jurisdiction attach in Florida in the proceeding against Humphreys and others? There can be no doubt that under the constitution and laws of Florida the court had jurisdiction, had the parties before it, and entered judgment in accordance with the law and the facts. This proceeding was commenced on the day on which both sets of electors assumed to act, on which day the board of canvass rendered a decision which was declared by the courts to be erroneous and fraudulent, but which did not prevent the true electors from acting upon the fact of their election and casting the votes according to the Constitution and laws of the United States. There was in this case no retroactive force of law. The fact had been determined on the 7th of November, 1876, by the citizens of Florida at the polls, who were the electors; the function of elector was discharged by those whom that election has proven to have been elected, on the 6th of December. It is no case, as has been suggested, of reconsideration by the tribunals and legislature of a State, changing the result of an election; it is no question of violation of the requirement of the Constitution that the votes should all be cast upon the same day throughout the United States. The votes were cast on the day named by act of Congress, and shall it be because some false votes were cast by pretended electors on the same day that the true votes were cast by the real electors, that, therefore, the action of the latter is to be nugatory? There is no want of performance of every constitutional and legal requirement by Call and his three associates. By the judgment of the courts of Florida the fact is conclusively fastened upon the knowledge of this tribunal, and its effect is binding upon them, that on the 7th day of November, 1876, Wilkinson Call and his three associates were duly and truly chosen, in the manner prescribed by the legislature of the State of Florida, electors for President and Vice-President, and that on December 6, 1876, they lawfully performed the functions of their said office, which they certified duly to the two Houses of Congress.

The subsequent action of the legislature of Florida in ordering a re-canvass of the votes and confirming the action of the board of canvass under the decree of the court does not change in any degree the result of the election held on the 7th of November, nor is it claimed that the result of that election could be in any respect changed by the subsequent action of the judiciary or the legislature; but it is plain that by the certificates and records before this Commission the State of Florida has done all in her power to rid herself of the fraud perpetrated by a board of ministerial officers in falsely canvassing and certifying the votes cast at the election held on November 7, 1876. By proceedings in her courts the same board of canvass in Florida, under the order of the supreme court in the case of the State of Florida ex rel. George F. Drew, were compelled to return the true vote showing the election of George F. Drew as governor and the other State officers. Prior to the action of the supreme court, this canvassing-board had erroneously and fraudulently returned Stearns as governor, two republican members of Congress, and a republican legislature. The re-canvass being ordered by the supreme court has resulted in seating Drew, the governor, a majority of the legislature, and the entire board of State officers, who are now regularly and peaceably in the control of that State. The construction given by the supreme court of the State to the statute under which the State board of canvass has assumed to act has defined their duties and their powers, and declared in substance that they were ministerial and not judicial, and that in the rejection of the "true" votes returned to them they had exceeded their authority, and their action was consequently void. It is not necessary here to recite the decision of the court in respect to all the powers of this board, except to say that they had assumed powers not given to them by the statute under which they acted, and in regard to which their action was absolutely void; and upon review of their action, under the statute as construed and interpreted by the court, the certificate made by them of the election of Humphreys and his associates (the Hayes electors) was found to be unwarranted in law and false in fact.

If the State of Florida is to be held to have the power to choose these electors, how shall the voice of that State be expressed? It was expressed by the election on the 7th of November and the votes of her citizens cast thereat. What that vote was, and who were elected, are proven to this Commission by the judgment of the judicial branch of the government of Florida. They have reached conclusions of law and of fact in relation to that election which bind this tribunal as much as they bind every citizen of the State of Florida. In confirmation of the truths disclosed by an honest examination of the votes actually cast at the late election for presidential electors in the State of Florida, comes the public law of the legislature of Florida, not assuming to change the result of that election, but to declare, after careful canvass made, what the result was when the polls closed on the 7th of November, 1876.

Thus this State has struggled to have its own voice heard. Her people have spoken through the ballot-box; the State has spoken through her courts; the State has spoken through the legislature, and the present governor has joined his certificate of regularity as to all these proceedings. The electors, declared by the courts to have been the true electors on the 6th day of December, 1876, Wilkinson Call and his three associates, have certified to you the result of their votes for President and Vice-President. I know not how a State can speak save as Florida has spoken. Her laws have been construed by her courts. The facts of the election of November 7, 1876, have been adjudicated according to that interpretation of her laws. The record of those judicial proceedings in due form is now before this Commission and appended to the certificates of the Tilden electors. Shall they be received or shall they be rejected? Will this Commission take heed of the true fact of election, or will they hold themselves bound by a certificate of ministerial officers, which has been proven in the judicial courts of the State to be erroneous, if not fraudulent, and which by the laws of the State is declared to be prima facie evidence only? Whatever of force that certificate would have had prima facie has disappeared forever under the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, in which the facts set forth in that certificate were brought into controversy and have been determined according to the laws of the State of Florida.

It seems to me that in deciding which of these two returns is the true and lawful return, there cannot be in the mind of lawyer or layman any reasonable doubt. If a State cannot succeed by the united voices of its three branches, executive, legislative, and judicial, in establishing a fact transacted under its own laws and within its own limits, it is idle to talk of State existence or State rights. By the three departments of her government Florida has essayed to make her will known. Those mute witnesses of the truth of the late election in Florida, those silent pieces of paper upon which were written or printed the names of the persons voted for, are in existence. They have been canvassed and compiled, and the result is before this tribunal; and that result proclaims that in fact and in law Call and his three associates did receive a majority of the true votes cast on November 7, 1876, for the office of electors of President and Vice-President. The question is whether the State of Florida shall have her vote received or not. At any rate I would ask if this Commission will not suffer Florida to be represented by those votes which by every department of her government she has certified to you to be true; will you not at least spare her the additional wrong of misrepresentation? If her true voice is to be smothered, do not, I beg of you, permit the false voice to be heard.

CASE OF LOUISIANA.

On Tuesday, February 13, the Commission met at eleven o'clock to consider the case of the electoral votes of the State of Louisiana, two certificates purporting to be the certificates of electoral votes having been opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses, certificate No. 1 of William Pitt Kellogg and his seven associates claiming to have been duly chosen electors for President and Vice-President for that State, certified by the said Kellogg as governor of the State, and certificate No. 2 of Robert C. Wickliffe and his seven associates, certified by John McEnery as governor of the State of Louisiana. Objections to the Kellogg certificate were duly made by members of the Senate and House of Representatives, stating in substance that there was on the 7th day of November, 1876, no law or joint resolution of the legislature of Louisiana in force directing the manner in which the electors for said State should be appointed, because if any law was in existence directing the appointment of electors it was an act of the legislature which directed that the electors should be appointed by the people of the State in their primary capacity at an election held on a day certain at particular places and in a certain way; that the people of the State, in accordance with the legislative direction, had elected Robert C. Wickliffe and his seven associates by a very large majority of the votes; that the said William Pitt Kellogg and his seven associates were not in fact and in law chosen electors, but that the said certificate of their election by the said Kellogg was false in fact and fraudulently made by him with the full knowledge of his seven associates claiming to be electors; that the pretended canvass of the votes of the people of the State of Louisiana, made by Madison Wells, Anderson, Casanave, and Kenner, as returning-officers of said election, was without jurisdiction and void; that the statutes under which the said returning-officers claimed to have derived their authority gave them no jurisdiction whatever to make the returns or canvass and compile the statements of votes cast for electors for President and Vice-President; that even if the statutes should be construed as conferring such jurisdiction upon the returning-officers to appoint electors, they are in conflict with the constitution of the State of Louisiana, which requires the electors to be appointed by the State; that the said returning-board was not constituted according to law, because it did not contain the elements required by law; that the action of the said returning-officers was false and fraudulent; that perjury was committed with their knowledge, and at their instance, by which the lawful vote of the people of Louisiana was overthrown and disregarded; that the lawful returns of votes were subtracted and suppressed and their places supplied by forged returns made at the instance and request of the said members of the returning-board; that two of the persons claiming to have been appointed electors, A. B. Levissee and O. H. Brewster, were at the time of their alleged election, on the 7th of November and subsequently, persons holding offices of trust and profit under the United States; that there was no canvass of votes of the State of Louisiana made in accordance with the constitution and laws of that State on which certificates of election were issued unto the said Kellogg and his seven associates; and that the alleged canvass on which the certificates were issued to said Kellogg was founded on an act of usurpation by the board of returning-officers, and was fraudulent and void.

Senator BAYARD said:

The Constitution of the United States provides that "each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors." The same Constitution requires that each State of this Union shall have a government republican in form, which is guaranteed by the United States. The power to appoint electors is thus plainly vested in that political entity of our system called a republican State, a government popular in form and representative in its character, and which can speak only by its agents and through its laws. The fundamental law of a State exists, under our system, in a written constitution, which is created by the sovereign power of the people acting in their primary capacity of self-government, and represented under our republican theory by a majority of the citizens. Until the fundamental law represented in the written constitution of a State shall have been repealed, it must be accepted as the highest expression of the will of the State upon the subjects to which it relates. The limitations it contains over the powers of the various departments and officers of the State are all to be maintained and respected.

In this view the execution of the power and duty of the State to appoint electors for President and Vice-President is the substantial fact, and the action of the State's legislature is the mere modus or manner of the State's performance. I do not hold that the Constitution of the United States contemplated the deposit in the "legislature" of a State of the control of the appointment of electors as a body distinct from the State itself, with power to act independently and regardless of the arrangements of the constitution of the State. All power vested in the legislature of a State is defined and limited by the State constitution, and all laws passed by any State legislature in violation of the constitution of the State are as absolutely void as if passed in violation of the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of the land. The legislature of a State, being therefore merely one department of the State government, and clearly subordinate to the will of the State, as expressed in its constitution, cannot give validity to any statute which violates the principles of republican government in the State or deprives the people of that State of their rights intended to be secured against encroachment by any of their rulers or officials by the terms of their written constitution and charter of powers.

The constitution of the State of Louisiana, in article 98, prescribes that—

Every male person, of the age of twenty-one years or upward, born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, and a resident of this State one year next preceding an election, and the last ten days within the parish in which he offers to vote, shall be deemed an elector, except those disfranchised by this constitution, and persons under interdiction.

Article 103 prescribes that—

The privilege of free suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections, prohibiting under adequate penalties all undue influence thereon from bribery, tumult, or other improper practice.

Under these safeguards and qualifications the right of suffrage in Louisiana is intended to be exercised, and cannot lawfully be diminished or destroyed by the action of the legislature or its agents. The right to vote would be an empty and idle form if not accompanied by the right to have such vote counted; and yet the result of the arguments to which we have listened, and the examination of the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana which it has induced me to make, has been to satisfy me that the provisions of the constitution of Louisiana intended to secure and promote the privilege of free suffrage in that State are utterly nugatory if the law of November 20, 1872, entitled "An act to regulate the conduct and to maintain the freedom and purity of elections," &c., shall be executed as it evidently has been by the State board of canvass created by the second section, simply because it is shown by the offers of evidence made in this case to this Commission, and which,

for the purpose of the present argument, must be considered as proven, that, notwithstanding upward of five thousand State officials, registrars, and commissioners of election were appointed, being an average of nearly one official for every thirty voters in the State, all selected under the authority of the governor of the State and removable at his will, all selected to obey and represent the will of one only of the political parties in the State, notwithstanding that in addition to this force nearly twenty-five hundred United States marshals were selected from the same party and for the same political interest, notwithstanding the presence of large detachments of troops of the United States under the same control; having thus entire control of the registration of all the voters of the State, in which no interference by the courts was permitted, having every voting-place, every registration-list, and all police authority exclusively in the hands of their own party, a returning-board, imperfect in its numbers and still more imperfect in its political composition under the law was enabled not only to obstruct but wholly to overthrow the results of the exercise of that free suffrage which the constitution of the State was intended to secure to its citizens, and to convert a majority of nearly ten thousand votes in favor of the candidates of one of the political parties, as clearly established by the ballots cast and still in existence, as well as by the duplicate returns of the elections which did not reach the hands of the State returning-board of canvass, into a majority of three thousand and upward for the defeated candidates. In such a state of facts, which, let me ask, shall be held to represent the State of Louisiana; her constitution, commanding "that the privilege of free suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections, and prohibiting under adequate penalties all undue influence thereon from power, bribery, tumult, or other improper practices," or an act of the legislature, practically overthrowing the constitution and placing the whole power and result of elections in the hands of a board of returning-officers, whose duty is succinctly defined and expressed in their oath of office to "carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes," and from whom the constitution expressly withheld judicial powers?

What is the "manner" in which the State of Louisiana has directed her electors for President and Vice-President to be chosen? By the popular vote according to the provisions of her constitution; and if it shall appear that the legislature have disregarded and violated this provision of the constitution, is it not our plain duty to respect the constitution and not the law passed in violation thereof?

But in the case before us we are not called upon by the facts offered to be proven to us to decide between a law and the constitution under which it is assumed to have been passed, because we are asked by those who propose that we should receive the certificate of William Pitt Kellogg and his seven associates as being the true and lawful electoral votes of the State of Louisiana to shut our eyes to the plainest violations and overthrow, not only of the constitution of the State, and the system of free popular government it was intended to secure, but also of the statute under which the returning-board profess to find warrant for their action.

It has been admitted that the election of November 7, 1876, in Louisiana was held under the law of November 20, 1872, and I propose briefly to consider the powers and duties of the State returning-board of canvassers under that act. In the first place, as to the quorum who assumed to act. The general object of the law (see section 103 of the constitution) is alleged to be "to support the privilege of free suffrage." Section 2 provides that the number of the board shall be five persons, and that it shall be composed of "all political parties." A majority of the board "shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all electors."

In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning-officers.

It is a public fact and embraced in the offers of proof to this Commission that four persons only for two years and upward have composed the board, which, by the language of the act, shall consist of five persons; that all of these four were members of the republican party; and that although 86,000 registered voters and citizens of the democratic party are in the State of Louisiana, not one of them has ever been elected to fill the vacancy, although it is also shown the demand has been made frequently, and always in vain, on the part of the democratic party to have the vacancy on the board filled by one of their members.

In thus requiring the board to consist of "all political parties," there was a recognition of the usage and actual state of affairs throughout the United States as to party lines. No one denies that this country is potentially governed by political parties, and that party organization is usually necessary for the success of any public object. The laws of every State in the Union, in response to the American demand for fair play and justice, and in recognition of the existence of political parties, provide that all parties shall be represented upon a political board of canvass or of election. The laws of the United States appointing supervisors by the circuit courts of the United States provide that they shall be of different political parties. It is therefore reasonably argued by the objectors to the action of the Louisiana returning-board that their refusal to obey the mandate of the law to fill the vacancy so that all parties should be represented in the board is of itself proof of fraud. The law upon this subject was well laid down by Mr. Justice Miller, a member of this Commission, in the case of Schenck vs. Peay, 1 Woolworth's Circuit Court Reports, 175 :

We understand it to be well settled that where authority of this kind is conferred on three or more persons in order to make its exercise valid, all must be present and participate, or have an opportunity to participate, in the proceedings, although some may dissent from the action determined on. The action of two out of three commissioners, to all of whom was confided a power to be exercised, cannot be upheld when the third party took no part in the transaction and was ignorant of what was done, gave no implied consent to the action of the others, and was neither consulted by them nor had any opportunity to exert his legitimate influence in the determination of the course to be pursued. Such is the uncontradicted course of the authorities, so far as we are advised, where the power conferring the authority has not prescribed a different rule.

In order to constitute a valid quorum of the returning-board, which, under the act, may consist of three persons, such quorum shall contain the different and integral parts necessary for the composition of the original board; in other words, that the quorum of three in order to act in accordance with the law shall contain "all parties" in its composition, and for want of such composition its action would be invalid. All four of the members of the board being republicans and no democrat being allowed to take part in its action, it was defective in an element essential to its lawful existence, and which was equally demanded by common decency as well as the law.

The duty of the board when duly organized is "carefully and honestly to compile the statements of the votes, and make a true and correct return of the election," as is set forth in their official oath. They are to meet within ten days after the closing of the election to canvass and compile "the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election, and make returns to the secretary of state. The canvass and compile tion shall be made from the statements of the commissioners of election, whose returns are to be opened by the presiding officer of the board in its presence. From such statements the canvass is to be made; and no authority is given for any compilation excepting from the statements of the commissioners of election. They shall canvass and compile the returns of election from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, and free, and peaceable registration and election; and no jurisdiction is given to them to question the statements of the commissioners of election as returned, except as provided by section 26 of the same act. By section 26 it is provided that if riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences shall occur and prevent or tend to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such occurrences shall take place on the day of election, or of the supervisor of registration of the parish, if they have occurred during the time of registration, (which is sixty days prior to the day of election,) to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating to such riot, tumult, &c., and state the effect produced by such riot, tumult, &c., and the number of qualified voters who were deterred by such acts of riot and tumult from registering or voting; and such statements shall be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish, and shall be forwarded by the commissioner of election or supervisor of registration in duplicate to the supervisor of registration in the parish, and if in the city of New Orleans, to the secretary of state, one copy of which shall be forwarded to "the returning-officers provided for in section 2 of this act." The commissioner of election shall annex his copy of such statement "to his returns of election, by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance," so that the same can be kept together; and the other copy shall be delivered to the clerk of the court of the parish for the use of the district attorney.

It will therefore be observed that, in order to institute any question by the returning-board or to give them any pretense for the exercise of any other than the ministerial power to canvass and compile the votes from the statements before them under the hand of the commissioners of election, it is essential that they shall have such statements corroborated under oath, as is provided by the law; and in the absence of such statements made and returned according to law they are wholly without authority or jurisdiction to examine into or determine any facts that occur on the day of the election in any part of the State, or to exercise any power whatever in changing the result of the votes as sealed and certified under the statements of the commissioners of the election.

A commissioner of election, it will be observed, can make no statement of riot, &c., unless it occurs on the day of the election, and he must make it at the time and in the manner provided by law. It must be made while the facts are fresh upon his mind, and his statement must accompany his return of the vote, which shall be within twenty-four hours after the closing of the polls. His return shall be forwarded to the supervisor. The supervisor shall consolidate and forward the said report and returns to the returning-board within twenty-four hours; giving therefore forty-eight hours after the close of the election for the returns to be forwarded to the board of canvass, accompanied by the statements of the commissioners of election, the presence of which affidavits and statements of riot and disorder can alone create any jurisdiction or warrant for any examination into the facts attending the election by the board of State canvassers.

The statements of the registrars of election must relate to occurrences within the sixty days preceding the day of the election; and such statements must be forwarded within forty-eight hours after the polls have closed, as is prescribed for the statements of the commissioners of election, and likewise a copy filed in the office of the county clerk for the use of the district attorney, and, it may here be remarked, not only for the use of the district attorney, but as a notification to any person, being a candidate for office and interested in the election, who shall, under the provisions of section 3, be allowed a hearing before the returning-officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election, that is, within forty-eight hours after the close of the election.

It is therefore obvious that in order to warrant any examination as is provided by section 3 into allegations of riot, tumult, violence, &c., at the different voting-places by the board of returning-officers, and justify the slightest alteration of the returns or rejection of votes, it is essential for the protection of the citizens, of the rights of the candidates, for the purpose of public justice, that such statements shall be made in substance, and within the time, and authenticated in the manner provided by the law, and not otherwise.

Chief-Justice Marshall, in Thatcher vs. Powell, 6 Wheaton, 119, lays down the rule for the execution of statutory power, even when exercised by a judicial court:

In summary proceedings, where a court exercises an extraordinary power under a special statute prescribing its course, we think that course ought to be exactly observed and those facts which give jurisdiction ought to appear in order to show that its proceedings are coram judice. Without this act of assembly the order for sale would have been totally void. This act gives the power only on a report to be made by the sheriff. This report gives the court jurisdiction, and without it the court is as powerless as if the act had never been passed.

The offer of proof to this Commission goes to the extent that not a single jurisdictional fact existed to authorize the action of the returning-board in excluding votes in the several parishes.

In the case before the supreme court, above cited, the power of sale could only be exercised upon a "report made by the sheriff."

In the case of Louisiana the investigation by the returning-board of alleged riot, &c., at the polls could only be made upon the sworn and corroborated statements sent up within forty-eight hours after the closing of the polls by the commissioners of election, or the registrars.

No such sworn statement as is provided by law accompanied the returns in a single instance, and no jurisdiction consequently existed to investigate and exclude polls or votes except "in the course exactly" provided by the statute.

The proceedings of the returning-board show that they disregarded the statute under which they pretended to act and under which alone they had any claim to jurisdiction, in almost every particular; not only did they refuse to elect any member of the democratic party, representing more than one-half of the voters of the State, to fill the vacancy existing for two years in the board; but they did not in a single case canvass and compile the returns of election from the "statements of the commissioners of election" as prescribed by law; in the case of every poll and voting-precinct they compiled their returns from the consolidated statements of the supervisors of registration, which they had no right to consider, disregarding entirely the statements of the commissioners of election which alone they were warranted to consider. The powers of investigation given them in section 3 of the act could only be exercised in such cases in which the returns of the commissioners had been accompanied by statements under oath from the commissioners of election or the supervisors of registration; yet it is proven that in not a single case were the returns accompanied by such statements as alone could warrant the returning-board in instituting investigation into the facts of alleged riot and disorder at the voting-places; that in fact the returning-board in making its pretended canvass did not receive from any poll, voting-place, or parish in the State, nor have before them any statement as required by section 26 of the law and which was an essential prerequisite to the assumption or exercise of any jurisdiction whatever by the board in the investigation or consideration of any alleged disorders at the polls. Not only so, but in the prosecution of their unwarranted investigations they refused to receive or consider evidence which is now offered to this Commission to show that the supervisors of registration fraudulently omitted from their consolidated statements any mention of votes given at certain polls and voting-places within their respective parishes, so that in canvassing and compiling the returns of election from the consolidated statements of the supervisors of registration, (for which they had no legal warrant,) the returning-board carried into their canvass and compilation the numerous and glaring frauds committed by the supervisors of registration in making their consolidated statements.

It is clear that the law of Louisiana required the canvass and compilation of the returns of election to be made from the returns of the commissioners of election, and which only could be questioned by the returning-board when they were accompanied by statements of violence, riot, &c., made and forwarded in accordance with the law; but by unlawfully adopting the consolidated statements of the supervisors of registration the returning-board willfully adopted the known frauds of omission of votes cast in several parishes committed by the supervisors; and when such frauds, contained in the consolidated statements, were exposed and shown to the returning-board, and compared with the statements of the commissioners of election, they willfully and fraudulently refused to make any canvass of the true majorities shown by the statements of the commissioners of election; that not having any statements by supervisors of registration or commissioners of election, supported by affidavit as required by law, the returning-board, without pretense of authority, threw out the entire vote cast at different voting-places, and sometimes that of an entire parish; and that in fact the only returns being those of the commissioners of election, which by the laws of Louisiana should have been canvassed and compiled, never were canvassed or compiled by the returning-board at all.

The offers of proof contain a catalogue of specified crimes, embracing perjury, forgery, subornation of perjury, and conspiracy, resorted to by this returning-board for the purpose and with the result of defeating the constitution and the laws of the State of Louisiana and of depriving that State of her right under the Constitution to appoint electors for President and Vice-President.

The case presented for our consideration is whether we will sustain the Constitution and the right of the State of Louisiana under it to have the voice of her people, as proclaimed at the election held on November 7, 1876, hearkened unto and obeyed, or whether we will permit this false personation of the State, a band of infamous men and treacherous officials, to palm off upon the State of Louisiana and upon every State in this Union eight false electoral votes, and by such votes determine the possession of the executive power of this Government for the next four years, and whether we as men sworn to examine and consider all questions submitted to this Commission agreeably to the Constitution and the law, shall in the full view of such a condition of law and fact as I have described set our hands to the statement that the electoral votes of Kellogg and his seven associates, so manufactured by this usurping and lawless returning-board, are "the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States," and that these eight persons were "duly appointed electors in such State."

It is beyond my comprehension how, in the name of the State of Louisiana and the rights of her people, such a decision can be reached, or how in the name of the people of all the States of this Union, under the Constitution of the United States we can say, as members of this Commission or in our respective places in either House of Congress, that such votes are the lawful votes provided for by the Constitution and laws, and that they should be counted. Such a decision, I must frankly say, will shock the moral sense of the country and startle all men who believe in law and justice as controlling influences in this Republic.

It has been stated by counsel who appeared before this Commission on behalf of the Kellogg electors that the gross and fraudulent disfranchisement of many thousands of citizens of Louisiana by the returning-board has been equaled or surpassed in its effect upon the popular vote in Louisiana by the bloody hands of the democratic party. Without pausing to comment upon this allegation of facts, of which no evidence has been offered—and certainly none is attached to the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses and transmitted to this Commission—without doing more than merely to note the strange inconsistency of nearly every speaker, whether counsel or objector, whether Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, who has appeared before us, whose arguments or speeches have invariably closed with the most wholesale assertions of violence and intimidation throughout the State of Louisiana, always alleged to have been committed by one party, the democratic, as against the other party, the republican, and who, while protesting against the admission of any evidence, whether of fraud or violence within that State, yet have lost no opportunity to assert and re-assert the existence of extreme violence and intimidation within that State as an excuse, in the nature of a set-off and compensating influence to the admitted frauds of the State officers of election and the returning-board acting in collusion with them—it seems to me that the necessary logic of all such statements and arguments, admitting them to be true, should not be permitted in any way to strengthen the claim of those whose title is imbedded in fraud as against those whose title is said to have been created only by violence, because if the facts of fraud which are offered to be proven, and which for the purposes of this argument are to be taken as established, are to be considered, and in connection with them a wholesale system of riot, violence, and bloody intimidation, the result of these charges combined, if established, would be to prove that there was no such thing as a State government existing in Louisiana; that there was no State, in the American sense of the word, existing there to choose, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors; but a community in which there is no government of law, republican in form or otherwise, which is in a condition of anarchy, and cannot with safety to the remainder of this Union be treated as a State or suffered to be represented by electors in the choice of a President. Such electors, if these facts be true, are the offspring and representatives of anarchy, and not of republican government; and the argument of the counsel and the objectors who have here appeared for the Kellogg electors, if it is to prevail, must necessarily exclude from the count of electoral votes both of the certificates and votes certified from the State of Louisiana by the respective claimants.

But it is also offered to be proven, and for the purpose of this argument must be considered as proven, that two of the Kellogg electors, O. H. Brewster and A. B. Levissee, held offices at the time of the election on the 7th day of November, 1876, of profit and trust under the United States, the said Levissee being a commissioner of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, and the said Brewster being the surveyor-general of the land office of the United States for the district of Louisiana. By the certificate of the Kellogg electors it appears that on calling the roll at the State-house in the city of New Orleans on the 6th day of December, 1876, Levissee and Brewster were found not to be present, and—

At the hour of four p. m. the said Aaron B. Levissee and Orlando H. Brewster, having failed to attend, the electors present proceeded to supply such vacancies by ballot, in accordance with the statute of the State of Louisiana in such case made and provided, which is in words and figures as follows:

“If any one or more of the electors chosen by the people shall fail, from any cause whatever, to attend at the appointed place at the hour of four p. m. of the day prescribed for their meeting, it shall be duty of the other electors immediately to proceed by ballot to supply such vacancy or vacancies.”

The six then proceeded to fill the vacancies occasioned by the failure of Levissee and Brewster to attend, and the said Levissee and Brewster were declared unanimously elected to fill such vacancy, and being sent for, soon after appeared, and were in attendance as electors.

The statute of the State of Louisiana under which the alleged “vacancies” were thus attempted to be filled was the act of 1868, which was re-enacted in the precise words on the 14th of March, 1870, the date of the act of revision, which by its terms was to go into effect on the 1st day of April, 1870. Two days after the passage of the act of revision and on the 16th day of March, 1870, a general election law of the State of Louisiana was passed, to take effect from and after its passage. There can be no doubt that the later act repealed the former wherever the provisions of the two were inconsistent or where the repeal shall be found to have been effected in express terms. It cannot be doubted that it was not competent for the legislature by passing a law to take effect at a future day to prevent its repeal by subsequent legislation. The provisions of the act of 1868 and of the revised statutes respecting the election of electors and the filling of vacancies have been read. The law of the 16th of March, 1870, in section 26, provides—

That all elections held in this State to fill any vacancies shall be conducted and managed, and the returns thereof shall be made, in the same manner as is provided for general elections.

And section 35 provides that the election for electors of President and Vice-President—

Shall be held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November, in accordance with an act of the Congress of the United States, approved January 23, 1845, entitled “An act to establish a uniform time for holding elections for electors of President and Vice-President in all States of the Union;” and such elections shall be held and conducted, and returns made thereof, in the manner and form prescribed by law for the general elections.

These are the only two provisions respecting vacancies or the election of presidential electors contained in the act. The final section of the act, section 85, provides:

That all laws or parts of laws contrary to the provisions of this act, and all laws relating to the same subject-matter, are hereby repealed, and that this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

It appears, therefore, that the act of March 16, 1870, was in pari materia with the act of 1868, and the act of revision of March 14, 1870. It provided for the filling of vacancies by election. It provided for the election of electors for President and Vice-President. Whether as fully as prior acts or not is not the question; but the law controlled the subject, and by the terms of section 85 repealed expressly "all laws relating to the same subject-matter."

But on November 20, 1872, was passed the general election law under which the election of November, 1876, was held. The provisions of this last act which relate to the subject of the election of presidential electors, or to the subject of filling vacancies in office, are to be found in sections 24, 28, 29, 30, and 32.

Section 28 provides only for a new election to be held in case of vacancy caused by death or otherwise in the office of Representative in Congress.

Section 30 provides for filling by election vacancies in the seat of any senator or representative in the general assembly.

Section 29 provides—

That in every year in which an election shall be held for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States, such election shall be held at the time fixed by act of Congress.

Section 32 provides—

That the provisions of this act, except as to the time of holding elections, shall apply in the election of all officers whose election is not otherwise provided for.

Section 24 provides—

That all elections to be held in this State to fill any vacancies shall be conducted and managed, and returns thereof shall be made, in the same manner as is provided for general elections.

Section 71 provides—

That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

It cannot be denied that the election of electors for President and Vice-President was provided for in the act of 1872, and that by section 32 the provisions of that law, except as to the time of holding elections, were made applicable to all officers whose election was not otherwise provided for. There is no other provision, whether for original election or filling vacancies, than those to which I have referred. It is therefore subsequent legislation in relation to the same subject as to the acts of 1868 and 1870 and the act of revision of 1870; and hence it would appear by the ordinary rules of construction that a repeal had been effected of all the provisions of the earlier acts which related to the same subject. But how can we escape the force of the repealing clause of section 71 (which provides that all other acts on the subject of election laws shall be and hereby are repealed) construed in connection with sections 24, 29, and 32?

If this view of the statutes of Louisiana be correct and the act of November 20, 1872, is to be considered the sole and complete regulation of the subject of the appointment of electors and filling vacancies, should any exist, an inspection of its terms will show that it contains no provisions whatever on the subject of filling vacancies in the post of elector except by new elections, and no authority whatever for the remaining electors to fill vacancies in their college.

But the Constitution of the United States, as I have before stated when considering the case of the State of Florida, in authorizing the appointment by each State of its number of electors, inhibits the appointment of either more or different persons than is there described.

The State of Louisiana shall appoint eight electors, "but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed." The inhibition is plain and unmistakable. If an appointment be made by the State in violation of this provision of the Constitution, such appointment is absolutely void. The State can no more appoint a disqualified person an elector than she can appoint a person in excess of her constitutional number of electors; and those who count the electoral votes can no more disregard the provisions of the Constitution in respect of qualification than they can in regard to number. The votes of Levissee and Brewster, both being holders of offices of trust and profit under the United States on the 7th of November, the time of their appointment, can no more be counted than if they had both died the week previous. They are not eligible. The Constitution of the United States in affixing the qualification of Senators and Representatives distinguishes between ineligibility at the time of election and ineligibility at the time of filling the office. Thus:

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

And so of a Senator:

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

Frequent decisions by either House of Congress have shown that if when the person elected comes forward "to be" a Representative or Senator he shall then, by that time, have attained the constitutional age, he is considered as qualified; but if it should be shown that when elected he was not an inhabitant of that State for which he was chosen he could not be admitted.

So, in the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution:

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

We find an absolute prohibition of the appointment during the time in question. Therefore it is plain that as Levissee and Brewster both held offices of trust and profit under the United States on the 7th of November, 1876, and for some days subsequently, the State of Louisiana was inhibited by the Constitution from making such appointment.

As to the suggestion that these inhibitory clauses of the Constitution are not self-enforcing, it would be very difficult to imagine how legislation can add to the force of the inhibition. Its repetition in a different frame of words would not make it clearer or more powerful. In the clause under consideration it is a limitation upon the power of the State to do a certain act. Each State shall appoint a number of electors, but she shall not appoint certain classes of persons. It has been held too often by the Supreme Court of the United States that the inhibitory clauses of the Constitution are all mandatory and self-executing, to make it necessary to produce the various cases affirmative of this doctrine. Perhaps it may be said that by far the greater number of the clauses of the Constitution are self-executing, such as the power of the two Houses over their respective members, the power of impeachment, and the inhibitions upon States:

No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility.

All these inhibitory clauses and many others have been held self-executing, and are recognized by every court in the land, State and Federal, as controlling legislation. It can scarcely be treated as an invasion of the rights of the State of Louisiana in the count of the electoral votes to see that the Constitution, which controls the subject, has not been violated. There is no difference in the result of voting for an ineligible man, or voting for a dead man, or voting in blank. The result in all such cases is the same, to wit, a failure to elect. It has been lately determined in a case growing out of the late election in the State of Rhode Island, in which a centennial commissioner of the United States received a majority of the votes cast in the State of Rhode Island for the office of presidential elector, and in response to the inquiry of the governor the judges of the supreme court of the State advised him that, having held an office of trust under the United States, Mr. Corliss was ineligible to be appointed on November 7, and that the failure to elect had not created a vacancy, but that, under the provisions of section 134 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the legislature of such State may direct; and under this authority the legislature of the State of Rhode Island was convened by the governor and an eligible person appointed elector to supply the failure to elect on the 7th of November.

Section 133 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

Each State may, by law, provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

From the review just made of the statutes of Louisiana, I am of opinion that no statute exists authorizing the filling of a vacancy in the office of elector; and even should it be held that the statute of 1868 is still in force as respects the office of presidential elector, yet it is manifest that there were no vacancies in the case of Levissee and Brewster, who being ineligible at the time of their original appointment such attempted appointment was utterly void; and that if the failure to elect which had thus occurred in these two cases was to be remedied, it was under the authority of section 134, and not otherwise.

The constitutional limitation upon the power of the State to appoint as electors such office-holders as Levissee and Brewster is equally binding upon this Commission in exercising the powers of the two Houses of Congress over the count of the electoral vote. I do not see how we can decide that these votes are to be counted "agreeably to the Constitution and laws," when they are so plainly forbidden by both.

In full view therefore of the combined and separate exercise of powers by the Senate and House of Representatives over the acceptance or the rejection of electoral votes, I cannot comprehend the abdication of all power whatever by a commission so plainly and expressly endowed with powers over this subject, and the issues plainly framed and submitted for their consideration and decision under the terms of their organic law and under the Constitution and existing law. To "take into view" petitions, not petitions to this Commission, but petitions to either or both Houses of Congress; to "take into view" depositions, not merely depositions taken under the order of this Commission, but depositions, which include affidavits (held by both Houses to be synonymous therewith) taken under the order of either or both Houses of Congress; "and other papers," such papers as parliamentary bodies create and receive and consider, which may "be competent and pertinent," for what and to what? To the decision of parliamentary and legislative subjects; for it is with the powers and duties of two parliamentary bodies that this Commission is invested. To circumscribe these methods of broad and substantial examination to the proportions of mere technical proceedings in courts of common pleas, would be simply to ignore the law and to refuse to exercise our plain duties and powers under it. I will not assume that this Commission will commit so grave an offense.

I have felt very deeply the necessity of not only deciding this case according to law and justice, but also of satisfying the moral sense of our fellow-countrymen. Montesquieu has told us that, as honor is of vital essence to a monarchy, so is morality to a republic. I am perfectly aware of the real condition of the State of Louisiana. I am aware that what they are pleased to term "the rights of the State of Louisiana" have been most loudly proclaimed and sought to be protected in argument before this Commission against the slightest invasion by many who view with complacency her government and her people to-day in absolute subjection to the Army of the United States and its official head. I recognize fully the abnormal condition of affairs that grew out of and has succeeded a period of civil war and wide-spread revolution. I have had no object so near to my heart, and none which has drawn from me more of my energies, than the restoration of all parts and sections of this country to their former harmonious and normal relations to each other and to their common government. I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that the disorder and crime of all grades which mark the history of the last few years in Louisiana, and yet which I believe have been shockingly and shamelessly exaggerated for political purposes, has been chiefly, almost wholly, the result of the destruction of local self-government in that State by the constant interference of Federal power, invariably in favor of that one of the political parties of that State whose interest it has thus been made to produce disorder in order to procure that armed assistance without the aid of which it would long since have disappeared. The eyes of the American people must not be closed to the fact that if the voting material of a community is corruptible, it will be corrupted; if it is purchasable, it will be bought; if ignorant, it will be deceived; and if timid, it will be intimidated; if elections are put up at auction by placing their control in vile hands, whom will you blame? Those who have created such an order of things; surely not those who seek to abolish it. On the one hand you see property seeking protection from plunder in the garb of law, and on the other plunderers in the garb of law offering to sell their official powers; and thus property seeks to buy immunity from plunder by bribing men in office, or, impoverished and despairing, strikes down the robbers with fierce blow.

Tribute was paid to the Moors on the rock of Tarifa, and was only held disgraceful on the part of the merchant or trader who paid it because it implied want of manhood in him to submit. If the men of Louisiana rise up and overthrow Kellogg and his crew, thrust them out of their places, as they did in September, 1874, they are instantly to be denounced and suppressed with a strong hand. If they undertake to buy their peace and protect the remnant of their property by paying part of it to their plunderers, they are denounced as corrupt, and the results of their purchase are taken away from them in the name and for the sake of honesty in elections!

The people of the United States have witnessed this for years. They have desired to test the real will of the people of that State and give it an opportunity for fair exhibition in public election according to the rules of honest republican government.

The election has been held; and under every disadvantage which the official power of the State and the United States combined could create to overcome the public sentiment, the result is known to have been a clear and undoubted majority of from six to ten thousand votes in favor of the entire democratic or conservative ticket, including the electors for President and Vice-President. And in the face of this fact the contrary is formally certified by Kellogg and his associates. The frauds—open, glaring, and astounding—which have been committed by this returning-board and other officials into whose hands the entire control of the election has been delivered, stink in the nostrils of the public. The election in Louisiana no longer is confined in its effects to the people of the State. It has become a national scandal and shame. The prolonged interference by the Federal Government in the affairs of that State has been all on one side and always with the same bad results; and now the people of the United States demand that the question shall be decided by the two Houses of Congress according to law and justice.

In this case I believe that the certificates of Kellogg and of the returning-board are absolutely and thoroughly false and fraudulent. I believe that the will of the State of Louisiana has been misrepresented and falsified by the action of her officials, and that the means of proof as to what was the choice of that State in the election of November 7 are attainable, capable of production, capable of reduction to a certainty, and that we have no right in law or morals to declare that electoral votes in such palpable defiance of the constitution and laws of the State, in defiance of the express and proven will of the lawful voters of the State, in defiance of the plain inhibitions of the Constitution of the United States, should be counted in the choice for President and Vice-President of the United States.

THE CASE OF OREGON.

On Wednesday, the 21st of February, the case of Oregon came before the Commission. There were two certificates, one signed by Odell, Watts, and Cartwright, certified by themselves alone as presidential electors; the other return signed by Cronin, Miller, and Parker as electors, accompanied by the certificate of La Fayette Grover, the governor of Oregon, stating that William H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and E. A. Cronin had received the highest number of votes cast at the general election held in Oregon on the 7th day of November, 1876, for persons eligible under the Constitution of the United States to be appointed electors of President and Vice-President of the United States. This certificate was attested by S. F. Chadwick, secretary of state of Oregon, and to it was affixed the great seal of the State.

Senator BAYARD said:

The facts of the case are that J. W. Watts, who was voted for as one of the Hayes electors, received 15,206 votes, W. H. Odell received 15,206 votes, J. C. Cartwright received 15,206 votes, E. A. Cronin received 14,157 votes. These facts do not appear in either the governor's certificate of electors provided by act of Congress or the certificate of the electors themselves required by the Constitution of the United States, but are derived from papers and evidence on file in the office of the secretary of state of Oregon, who by law is made the custodian of the same, and has certified to their existence and correctness in the usual manner, having been applied to by Odell, Cartwright, and Watts for copies of the same, and the same having been furnished by him in accordance with their request.

In the cases of Florida and Louisiana, this Commission, by a vote of 8 to 7, refused to receive any evidence aliunde the certificates of the officials of the State containing what has been characterized as "the final determination" of the State by its board of canvassing-officers of the result of the election. Therefore, after argument and deliberation in the cases of Florida and Louisiana, it was decided that the certificate of a State board of canvass must be taken as conclusive of the facts it alleged, and could not be in any way impeached either for fraud or error, nor would they permit investigation and proof to be made of the tabulated returns from the various precincts of the State upon which the compilation and canvass by the board had been made. Offers of proof were made to this Commission to show that the board of canvass in Florida had reached an erroneous result by exceeding their jurisdiction, and that the courts of Florida having competent jurisdiction had decided this fact; but this Commission refused to hear or consider any evidence tending to show the erroneous basis upon which the board of canvass in Florida had proceeded.

In the case of Louisiana this Commission refused to hear or consider evidence showing that the board of canvass in that State had proceeded wholly outside of their statutory jurisdiction, had made their pretended canvass without any regard whatever to the law under which they should have acted, had been guilty of the grossest frauds in making their returns, and that the result of their action was wholly fraudulent and unjust, completely defeating the will of the people of the State of Louisiana as expressed by them at the polls. This refusal to consider evidence aliunde the certificates was based by the majority of the Commission upon the ground that the rights of the State should be sedulously guarded and protected against the counting power of the two Houses of Congress, and that even were it to be admitted that certificates were falsely and fraudulently furnished to persons not in law and in fact chosen as electors, this being done by the official organs of the State for certifying the result of elections, such persons so furnished with false certificates became nevertheless de facto if not de jure the possessors of the insignia of office, and not being dispossessed of such insignia until after the functions of the office had been executed on the 6th day of December, 1876, their acts as electors de facto must on the ground of public policy be sustained, and that the remedy must be found elsewhere than in the two Houses of Congress to punish them for their misconduct and repair the injury they had committed.

The State board of canvass in Florida consisted of three persons, the attorney-general, the secretary of state, and the comptroller of public accounts, whose duty it is "to canvass the returns of election and declare who shall have been elected, * * * as shown by such returns." The supreme court of the State of Florida have given a construction to the statute under which the State board of canvass acts, and held the powers of that board to be ministerial in their nature, and that they were not invested with such discretion as enabled them to make a declaration of "the legal vote" as distinguished from "the true vote actually cast."

Yet this Commission held itself bound by the certificate of the State board of canvass of Florida, and, refusing to regard or consider the judicial proceedings in that State deciding the very question and fact of the true election of electors, refused to go behind the said certificate or suffer the same to be questioned or in any way impeached, because they alleged that the action of the officers of the State of Florida to whom the duty of canvassing and certifying the result had been committed by the laws could not be questioned, however erroneous or fraudulent or unwarranted by the laws of the State the same may have been.

In the State of Louisiana the board of canvass consists, under the law, of five persons. This Commission refused to hear or consider evidence showing that four men, unlawfully assuming to exercise the powers of the said board, had falsely certified the results of said election, and that their action in pretending to canvass and compile the returns from the State of Louisiana was, in fact, a wicked conspiracy against the rights of the people of that State, her constitution, and her laws; and this refusal to allow the certificate of the returning-board of Louisiana to be impeached for fraud and other illegality was based upon the fact that it was not competent for this Commission to impeach or question the final determination of the officials to whom had been committed the canvass of the returns of the election in the State.

Let us now apply these decisions of the Commission to the case of Oregon.

In section 37 of the election laws of Oregon it is provided that—

The county clerk, immediately after making the abstract of the votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each of said abstracts, and transmit it by mail to the secretary of state at the seat of government; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and sooner, if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, State printer, justices of the supreme court, member of Congress, and district attorneys.

Section 58 of the same law provides:

On the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1864, and every four years thereafter, there shall be elected by the qualified electors of this State as many electors of President and Vice-President as this State may be entitled to elect of Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Section 60 provides that—

The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

Thus it will be observed that the secretary of state in Oregon is the canvassing-officer, whose duties are in substance the same as those imposed upon the boards of canvass in Florida and Louisiana. It is provided that the governor is to be present at the canvass, but the canvass itself is to be made by the secretary of state; and when he has canvassed the votes he is to prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected and affix the seal of the State to the same. Whatever powers of judgment and discretion are incident to the power to canvass returns and certify the result are, therefore, as plainly committed to the secretary of state of Oregon, under the laws of that State, as to the boards of canvass of either Florida or Louisiana, under the laws of those States respectively.

“The secretary of state shall prepare,” not lists of votes such as are on file in his office, but “lists of the names of the electors elected.” Therefore in the preparation of those lists, in ascertaining the names of the electors elected, the secretary of state necessarily determines and declares what persons were, by the laws of Oregon and by the returns which he has canvassed, chosen the true electors of that State. Such lists so prepared by him shall be signed by the governor and by the secretary, have the seal of the State affixed thereto, and be delivered by the secretary to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on the first Wednesday in December.

The only certificate thus made in accordance with the laws of Oregon by the board of canvass of that State, authorized to express the final determination of the State of Oregon, is certificate No. 2, by which it appears that William H. Odell, John C. Cartwright, and E. A. Cronin had received the highest number of votes cast at said election for persons eligible under the Constitution of the United States to be appointed electors. Criticism has been made upon the insertion of the words "for persons eligible." These words certainly would be mere surplusage, and the certificate would be as true without them as with them, for if it read that they had been "duly elected" it would have stated the same fact in a different form of words.

Persons not eligible cannot be elected; but the presence of these words, "for persons eligible," is mere surplusage, not affecting the form or the substance of the fact of election certified. Suppose the words "for persons eligible" to have been omitted, and suppose the number of votes stated to have been cast for Cronin and the other candidates had been wholly omitted (and no law requires them to be stated) or had been falsely stated, then according to the rule laid down by this Commission in the cases of Florida and Louisiana we would have been without power to hear evidence aliunde the certificate or to exclude the votes so falsely certified. The decision of the Commission was to the effect that no error, intentional or unintentional, on the part of the board of canvass, no excess of jurisdiction, no fraud, however glaring, could be questioned or redressed; yet it is now proposed to examine the powers and proceedings of the canvassing-officer of final determination of the State of Oregon, after having refused to do the same thing in regard to the States of Louisiana and Florida.

To the secretary of state of Oregon are confided the duty and power to make out the lists of electors elected. To enable him to ascertain who are elected, he must canvass and decide. The proof of his decision is to be found in the names of the persons contained in the lists so prepared by him, and to whom, as the college of electors, he delivers such lists. No persons other than those whose names appear on such lists are by the laws of Oregon armed with the insignia of the office of elector. If by fraud or mistake the secretary of state should insert the wrong names upon the lists or deliver the lists to the wrong parties, yet it is done by him under the discretion necessarily involved in the execution of his duties, and according to the decisions of this Commission his action cannot be impeached for error in law or fraud or mistake in fact. Thus if the secretary of state had altered the abstracts of votes sent up to him by the clerks of the various counties, this Commission, according to their decisions in the Louisiana and Florida cases, would have refused to hear evidence to prove it. If the clerks in the various counties had sent up forged and false abstracts, this Commission, according to their decisions, would have refused to allow it to be proven.

The case may be stated thus: The secretary of state of Oregon, seated at his desk and having before him the abstracts of votes from the various counties, may tabulate and compile them upon a sheet of paper, and having finished this canvass and compilation he can transfer the results of his arithmetical calculation to the "lists of electors elected," also prepared by him. If in his canvass of the abstracts of votes he shall commit the most serious errors in adding up the columns of figures representing the votes cast, or if he shall fraudulently alter and misstate the abstracts of the votes before him in his canvass, his certificates, which if allowed to stand will completely overthrow the will of the people of Oregon as expressed at the polls, are, according to the decisions of this Commission in Louisiana and Florida, unimpeachable and impregnable. But it is said his fraud or error in the canvass, however gross, having been completed, cannot be inquired into, but when he comes to make out his lists of electors elected upon the basis of his fraudulent canvass, the accuracy of his transfer of figures from one paper to the other may be inquired into; in other words, a canvassing-officer having a consecutive series of acts to perform under a statute, all of which lead to and form a single result, can be impeached as to one of these acts and not as to any that precede it.

As a matter of fact the canvass and compilation of the votes of Oregon and the preparation of the lists of electors elected are performed by the same official at the same time, and probably within the space of a single hour; and yet if we adopt the reasoning of the majority in the Louisiana and Florida cases, we may scrutinize his returns to see that he has correctly transferred, from his canvass of the votes to the lists of electors elected, certain arithmetical results, but we have no power to scrutinize the features of the transaction which immediately preceded the statement of those results, and his final certificate is a shield that completely protects and covers any and all fraud that lurks behind it.

I cannot bring my mind to assent to such a proposition.

In the case of Louisiana offers were made to this Commission to produce the final canvass of the returns of the election, but they were refused. The certificate of that board of canvass was held to be impenetrable to the rays of truth. I cannot comprehend why the last act of a canvass should be more open to impeachment than equally essential acts which immediately preceded it. Such a decision implies that the fraud of the same individual committed at different stages of his duty is subject to different rules, although those stages are immediately annexed to each other; that you can impeach one act but not its associates.

The certificate of the State of Oregon, under the seal of the State, and signed by the secretary of state and the governor, is as complete and accurate in form and in as substantial accord with the laws of that State as that of Louisiana or Florida which this Commission has refused to permit to be inquired into or impeached; and yet it is now proposed to impeach it and overthrow it because other records of the election of the State of Oregon are produced and certified in opposition to the regular certificate. This evidence is in my judgment admissible. It is both competent and pertinent for us to know the true facts attending the Oregon election, and I shall vote in the case of Oregon, as I did in the cases of Louisiana and Florida, for the admission and consideration of all evidence tending to show which are the true and lawful electoral votes of that State provided for by the Constitution of the United States.

One feature of difference between the cases of Florida and Louisiana and that of Oregon is that no allegation from any quarter is made of fraud in the canvassing officers. It is admitted on all sides, and contradicted nowhere, that the election was fair and free in that State, and that a majority of more than one thousand votes was cast by the people of that State for Odell, Watts, and Cartwright as presidential electors; but it is proven to us that John W. Watts, one of the persons so voted and for whom the highest number of votes were cast, was on the 7th of November, 1876, and until the 13th day of the same month, a postmaster of the United States at the town of La Fayette, in Oregon. Holding, therefore, an office of trust and profit under the United States, he could not under the provision of the Constitution be appointed an elector. Having already considered this question in the cases of ineligible electors in Louisiana, I shall not repeat my remarks on that subject.

I have not yet been able to comprehend the force of the argument that the provisions of the Constitution prohibiting the appointment as electors of certain official classes can be held self-executing on the 6th of December but not self-executing on the 7th of November; and this in the teeth of the plain words affixing the disqualification upon the person and the limitation upon the power of the State. It has seemed, however, satisfactory to some minds to hold that this provision of the Constitution grows in power and changes in nature within the thirty days which lie between the appointment of the elector and the time fixed for the performance of his single function; that the Constitution executes itself on the 6th of December, but cannot do so without aid of legislation in the month of November.

What was the result of a majority of the people of Oregon casting their votes for a person thus holding office under the United States? We find in the papers annexed to the certificate of Watts and his associates that on the 6th day of December, at the meeting of Cartwright and Odell as electors, the resignation of Watts as an elector for President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Oregon was presented by Odell, and after being duly read was "unanimously" accepted; that by this resignation and the acceptance thereof a vacancy in the electoral college was said to have been created, which vacancy, under the provisions of section 59 of the election laws of Oregon, the said Odell and Cartwright assumed the power to fill; that they proceeded to fill such "vacancy" by electing the said John W. Watts, and the college being so filled the three proceeded to cast their votes by ballot for Hayes and Wheeler as President and Vice-President of the United States.

According to my views of the Constitution and laws as heretofore expressed, the failure of the people of Oregon to elect an eligible person to the office of elector did not create a vacancy; but they having failed to elect on the day appointed by law, it was requisite, if the failure was intended to be remedied, to resort to the means prescribed by the one hundred and thirty-fourth section of the Revised Statutes of the United States. There has been no legislation by the State of Oregon on this subject, nor did her legislature on any subsequent day appoint an elector to fill her electoral college.

Section 48 of the election laws of Oregon provides for vacancies in office, and is in the words following:

Every office shall become vacant on the occurring of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office:

1. The death of the incumbent;
2. His resignation;
3. His removal;
4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village for which he shall have been elected, or appointed, or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged;
5. His conviction of an infamous crime, or of any offense involving a violation of his oath;
6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office, or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law;
7. The decision of a competent tribunal, declaring void his election or appointment.

None of the vacancies above described is the case now under consideration. It is true that Mr. Watts tendered his resignation of the office of elector claiming to have been elected on the 7th of November; but in opposition to that view is the plain mandate of the Constitution of the United States that he should not be appointed, consequently he could not resign an office he had never held, nor by any act of his could he create a vacancy in such office.

Therefore, I hold that the State of Oregon had no power to appoint John W. Watts, holding then an office of trust and profit under the United States, one of her electors; that his attempted election was absolutely void; and that the failure to elect a third elector has not been remedied according to the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the State of Oregon.

The question then arises as to the right of E. A. Cronin, who by the certificate of the secretary of state and governor, attested by the seal of the State, is certified to have been one of the persons who received the highest number of votes cast at the said election for persons eligible to be appointed electors. The certificate of Governor Grover and the secretary of state is honest and true according to the facts. The number of votes stated in this certificate as having been received by Cronin was 14,157; but it is also made known to us by evidence aliunde the certificate, and in this case received by the Commission, that a greater number of votes were cast for John W. Watts. Governor Grover has been assailed in terms of unmeasured violence and reprobation for issuing the certificate which is before us, in which he has adopted a construction of the sixteenth section of article 2 of the constitution of Oregon, which provides that—

In all elections held by the people under this constitution the person or persons who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared duly elected.

Following the unbroken current of decision in the courts of the country from which our institutions have chiefly been derived, and the repeated decisions of courts of the highest jurisdiction in many of the States of this Union, Governor Grover decided, in the execution of the discretion reposed in him as the executive branch of the government of Oregon, that he was bound to issue the certificate of election to the next highest competing candidate in a case like the present, where the candidate who had received the highest number of votes was ineligible to be appointed; and it is very difficult to answer the authorities and arguments by which this position has been supported before us.

The very able arguments which we have heard upon this subject and the elaborate briefs of authorities submitted for our instruction, if they are not adequate to control us in the adoption of the view taken by Governor Grover in this case, are more than sufficient to place his action upon a high plane of conscientious discretion, which lifts him to a level with as sound and reputable jurists as have adorned the bench of England or of the United States. If he has erred in his decision, his error has been justified by learned and able decisions and reasoning which must appeal strongly to the judgment of any who have considered the subject; and yet I have not been able to find, under the laws of Oregon or in my conception of the general American law relating to popular elections, grounds which will enable me to concur in the decision reached by him.

The underlying theory of our republican rule is the residence of power in the majority. That minority candidates should fill places by popular election is contrary to our American theory, although sometimes by constitutional arrangements such a result is reached. But the meaning, nevertheless, of our popular elections is simple and clear, and a vote by one thousand men for A and a vote by five hundred men for B, his opponent, proves not only that the majority desire that A shall fill the office, but also that B should not fill it. Where election is free, it is plainly in the power of the popular will to express favor or condemnation, and if it should turn out that the candidate receiving the majority has been ineligible the popular will is sufficiently defeated without the addition of a still further defeat by seating the person against whom they have cast their votes.

It is evident to my mind that the statutes of the various States, providing as they do for the filling of vacancies and sometimes for failures to elect, were all intended to prevent the seating of minority candidates; that the policy and intent of our systems of government, both State and Federal, is in substance that none but those who represent the will of the majority are to hold office under a popular rule. If two men are running for the same office and the successful candidate dies on the day after the election, a vacancy would be thus created, and it would have to be filled in some manner provided by law, but the defeated candidate could gain nothing by the death of his opponent. If a candidate receives a majority of the votes, and upon inspection turns out to be ineligible, the rule under the United States statute and by the statutes of the States is to provide for the failure to elect, but not to seat the minority candidate.

Therefore, to give effect to the will of the people fairly expressed according to law at the polls, I would not be willing to vote to seat a minority candidate because of the ineligibility of his opponent, unless the laws of the State should expressly provide that, in the event of the ineligibility of the successful candidate, the person who had received the next highest number of votes should be considered as elected. I do not understand that this is provided for by the laws of Oregon or that any construction of her constitution to this effect has been given by her courts. I repeat that there are strong authorities the other way, in view of which Governor Grover can readily be understood to have felt himself justified in believing that Mr. Cronin was entitled to the place, and certain it is that his certificate that Cronin was one of the three eligible candidates for the office who received the highest number of votes is precisely true and is sustained by all the facts in the case.

The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of the land, and Governor Grover's official oath bound him to sustain it; and it was his duty to refuse to certify the fact of an election of a United States official to the office of elector when the same was distinctly prohibited by the Constitution. As the governor of the State he represents in his own person the executive branch of the State government, and is bound in all respects to see that the laws are faithfully executed; and I therefore consider that, having personal and official knowledge that Watts was a postmaster of the United States, it was his duty to refuse to certify that he had been duly elected presidential elector. It is, therefore, my judgment that but two votes of the State of Oregon can be counted, and that they are the votes of Odell and Cartwright, the Hayes electors.

CASE OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

On the 26th of February the case of the State of South Carolina was reached, there being two certificates, No. 1, of C. C. Bowen and his six associates, certified by D. H. Chamberlain as governor; No. 2, of Theodore R. Barker and his six associates, the Tilden electors, not having any gubernatorial certificate attached. Objections were made under the law to both of the certificates. It was offered to be proven before this Commission that the free election and power of appointment by the State of her electors was interfered with and controlled by the Army of the United States to the number of several thousand men, and by the employment and presence at the polls of an army of United States deputy marshals.

Senator BAYARD said :

It is a public fact of which this Commission will take notice that the executive power of the State of South Carolina was wholly in the hands of Governor D. H. Chamberlain, who was himself a candidate for re-election and had by law the power of appointment and removal of every officer of election throughout the State ; and that it was at his instance and in the absence of such a state of facts as under the Constitution of the United States alone would have warranted it, that the State of South Carolina was filled with troops of the United States for months prior to the election, which military occupation continues until this day. The presence and influence of the troops were wholly lent to the support of the political party to which Chamberlain belongs, and were in aid of his re-election and the success of the presidential electors who have obtained his certificate.

The Constitution provides that the electors shall be appointed by the State ; and in the present case it is offered to be proven to this Commission that the actual power which influenced the appointment of the electors was extraneous to the State, and that in truth and fact the result of the election of electors in the State of South Carolina, on the 7th of November, 1876, was caused and controlled by the unlawful presence of the agents and officials of the Government of the United States ; so that the choice was not that of the State or its people, but of Federal officers who had neither right nor color of right to interfere in the election of that State.

It appears that the Tilden electors, Mr. Barker and his six associates, did endeavor by a writ of quo warranto to dispute the election of Bowen and his six associates, claiming that the board of State canvassers had made an erroneous, imperfect, false, and fraudulent statement of the result of the election ; but the said suit is now pending in the court and undecided. They had previously made application in the supreme court of the State for a writ of mandamus to compel the board of State canvassers to correct the count according to the true vote of the people as cast at the election ; but pending that proceeding the board determined and certified the persons elected upon their fraudulent and erroneous count, and after making a return to the court, and just before the decision thereof, they secretly and unlawfully adjourned in defiance and contempt of the authority of the supreme court.

This Commission will also take notice of the illegal and unwarranted interference by Judge Bond, of the circuit court of the United States, who by the most flagrant usurpation and outrage, without having any jurisdiction over the subject-matter or the persons, discharged from custody the board of canvass while they were imprisoned for contempt of the supreme court of the State of South Carolina, having disregarded and disobeyed its mandates in respect of the lawful and regular canvass of the votes cast at said election.

While I am making these remarks Senator Frelinghuysen lays before me and invites my present commentary upon certain expressions made by me in the course of debate in the Senate two years ago when the question of the jurisdiction and powers of the two Houses of Congress over the count of the electoral votes came up for consideration. The passage he has marked is in the Congressional Record, February 25, 1875, page 160, volume 3, part 3:

Mr. President, from the foundation of the Government up to the year 1865 the American people had managed to conduct the count of the electoral votes for President and Vice-President of the United States without any other aid than the constitutional provision and a single statute that had been passed during the first presidential term of George Washington. In 1792, on the 1st of March, an act was passed "relative to the election of a President and Vice-President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the office both of President and Vice-President." One thing is observable in this act of Congress, as in all acts of that period of our country's history, that great care was taken to assume no power not distinctly granted or necessarily implied by the terms of the Federal Constitution.

Therefore in this law (which is to be found on pages 305, 306, 307, and 308 of the last compilation of the Constitution, Rules, and Manual provided by the Senate) there will be found no attempt to transcend the grant of power of the Constitution as to the reception and count of the electoral votes. It provided the method of certification of the results; and it will be observed that not only was the manner of the election of the electoral college confided to each State, and to the discretion of the legislature of each State, but that the certification, the authentication of the electoral vote was confided wholly and unreservedly by the Constitution to the States. And nowhere is power given to either House of Congress to pass upon the election, either the manner or the fact, of electors for President and Vice-President; and if the Congress of the United States, either one or both Houses, shall assume, under the guise or pretext of telling or counting a vote, to decide the fact of the election of electors who are to form the college by whom the President and Vice-President are to be chosen, then they will have taken upon themselves an authority for which I, for one, can find no warrant in this charter of limited powers.

I am very glad that this extract from my former speech has been thus brought to my attention, because I am aware that it has been furnished before now to members of this Commission, although I will not suggest that the object in bringing it now to my notice is to impale me upon a supposed inconsistency between my views as expressed in 1875 and now. To the doctrine, however, contained in these remarks I can only give my renewed approval and assent, although I must frankly admit that within the two years which have elapsed I have had a better opportunity for the study and attention of this subject, which had been denied me then, and which has given to my mind information and light not obtained before. I trust the time will never come when I shall cling obstinately to an error which can only grow into a wrong by becoming willful, nor do I believe that I shall be found to lack the courage to retract an opinion when I am convinced that it is erroneous.

No one believes more than I in the necessity of preserving the rights of the State from invasion by the authority of the General Government, and this it is not necessary for me now to repeat. I consider the election of electors to be the act of the States, who are the sole judges of the manner and the fact of such election, and that Congress has no right to interfere with such choice either by military power or by coercion of swarms of deputy marshals or of the official influence in any shape of any branch of the Federal Government. What I now contend for is that the act of election, which I am called upon thus to respect as the act of the State, shall be the act of the State, and not the act of a false personation of a State. Thus, when in the case of Florida that State, by the voice of every department of her government, legislative, judicial, and executive, came here before us to entreat us to hear her voice, and to prove to us that the electoral votes sent up here for Hayes and Wheeler under the certificate of Governor Stearns were in violation of the State's constitution and laws and in opposition to the will of her people declared at the polls, I felt it to be my duty to that State to hear her complaint, and not allow her rights to be usurped by false men.

In 1875, in the debate in question, I was considering a case where "the State" had chosen her electors in fact, and I was endeavoring to protest against congressional interference with the exercise of her free will in making such choice under the Constitution of the United States. I was not then considering a dual government or dual claims to represent that government. When two South Carolinas appear, each claiming to cast votes for President and Vice-President, one must be false, and that question must be decided or the vote of the State rejected.

Again, such a proposition as was stated by me in the debate referred to, was applicable only to the admitted election of a State. The presence of fraud and its effect in qualifying every proposition was not then considered. The most solemn judgments and decrees of courts; pardons by kings and rulers; every treaty or compact between nations or individuals, alike lose every quality of obligation when touched by fraud. I know of no human contract more irrevocable and binding upon the parties than that of Christian marriage, in which civil and religious obligation combine to secure its performance. The sanction under which marriage is entered into is the most solemn known to civilized men; yet who ever denied that the tie could be and ought to be dissolved upon proof of fraud by one of the parties in obtaining the marriage? Fraud is a universal solvent and destroys whatever it touches, and it ought to be hunted down and crushed whenever possible, in order to protect human society. Every proposition as to legal or moral obligation must be considered as made in the absence of fraud, because fraud admitted as an element displaces all the reasoning which guides men in the ordinary conduct of life or in the administration of human laws and justice.

Thus while I hold that the State of South Carolina had the sole power of choosing her electors and of certifying her choice in her own manner, and that no other power can lawfully obstruct and interfere with her choice, when two voices attempt to speak for that State we must ascertain which is the false voice and which is the true. The power to decide which is the true voice has been assumed by Congress to be vested in the two Houses, and by the law under which we are now proceeding this Commission is invested with "the same powers now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together."

The power and duty of decision thus being imposed upon us, the only remaining question is whether we shall execute that power intelligently or blindly; whether we shall receive and consider such evidence as in the nature of things will enlighten our decision or whether it shall be excluded, and the false certificates and usurpations of power be suffered to stand between us and the real State and people whom they falsely assume to represent.

I will admit, whatever may be my personal belief on the subject, that the fact is not established before us by competent testimony that Mr. Barker and his six associates (the Tilden electors) did receive a majority of the votes actually cast at the election in November last in South Carolina, and therefore I shall not vote in favor of such votes being counted; but, on the other hand, the fact is before me as a matter of public knowledge coupled with specific tenders of evidence to establish it, and which must be accepted as true in the consideration of this case, that between the State of South Carolina and her free choice of electors for President and Vice-President was interposed a will and a physical power stronger than her own, and that the election of Bowen and his six associates as certified by Chamberlain, the governor, was not the election of the State of South Carolina and her people, but the election controlled by the President of the United States and the official and political agents of the party in favor of whom he unlawfully lent the great powers intrusted to his control, in disregard of the Constitution, of the law, and the spirit of free government.

The voice which comes up to us in the certificate of Bowen and his associates is the voice of the United States Army, of swarms of deputy United States marshals, aided and abetted by the profligate abuse of judicial power by Judge Bond of the United States circuit court. It is because I am a true friend and defender of the rights of the State of South Carolina that I object to this false expression of her will, and this military mockery of free republican government which is imposed upon her unfortunate people.

We have been urged to reject the vote of this State upon the ground that no registration of her electors has ever been made or provided for by the legislature in conformity with section 3 of article 8 of the constitution of that State, which provides that—

It shall be the duty of the general assembly to provide from time to time for the registration of all electors.

It is contended that by reason of the failure of the legislature to provide such registration no valid election has been held in that State since the time of the formation of its constitution in 1868. To this proposition I am unable to agree. The second section of the same article fixes the qualifications of all persons who "shall be entitled to vote for all officers that are now, or hereafter may be, elected by the people, and upon all questions submitted to the electors at any election;" and among these registration as a voter is not enumerated. It may be doubted whether any new and additional qualification could be imposed by the legislature upon the voters in that State, the section of the constitution to which I have just referred having enumerated the qualifications, and by two provisos having enumerated all classes and persons who are excluded from the right of suffrage.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER HUNTON.

FLORIDA.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON said :

MR. PRESIDENT: I approach the consideration of the questions involved in this case with profound diffidence. We are sitting as a court, the highest and most august in the history of the world. Dynasty is the subject-matter of the suit to be tried; forty-four millions of people are the parties, and the civilized people of the world are the spectators.

We are to try a disputed presidential election in which it is alleged that fraud and force strangled the true voice of several States of this Union.

We are to determine, when two or more parties have spoken for a State, which is the true voice of that State. In the case of the State of Florida now before us, three papers purporting to be certificates of electoral votes of that State have been sent to the President of the Senate, and under the law they have been by him opened, objected to, and referred to this Commission. One gives the votes of the State to Hayes, the other two to Tilden; which shall be counted?

In order to determine how we shall proceed and what are our powers, it is necessary to examine the law under which we are acting.

In the second section it is provided that—

All the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of each State shall be opened, in the alphabetical order of the States, as provided in section 1 of this act; and when there shall be more than one such certificate or paper, as the certificates and papers from such State shall be so opened, (excepting duplicates of the same return,) they shall be read by the tellers, and thereupon the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read, all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said Commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together, and by a majority of votes decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons are duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

This Commission has all the powers now possessed for this purpose by the two Houses of Congress or either one. If the two Houses or either one has any power to look into and decide these matters, then that power is conferred on this Commission.

This Commission is to decide whether any and what votes from this State are the votes provided for by the Constitution, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in this State, and shall take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing law be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

What are the powers of the two Houses, or either one?

This law was enacted on the theory and concession that the President of the Senate has no power to count the electoral vote, and that power in case of double returns was committed to this Commission.

What is this power to count? Is it merely to add up and declare the number of votes from a State? This cannot be, because we should be stopped at the beginning by the appearance of two or more returns. We must determine which of these returns is the true return, which of these votes "are the votes provided for by the Constitution," and "how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State." To do this demands examination, scrutiny, and consideration of all the facts on which the several sets of electors proceeded to cast their votes. The law gives the powers possessed by the two Houses or either one of them, and makes a legislative declaration of the right and imposes the duty to decide whether any and what votes are the votes provided by the Constitution. The two Houses of Congress possess this power or they have been on many occasions guilty of gross usurpation of power. Doubts arose in 1817 about the right of the electors of Indiana to cast their vote, in 1821 in Missouri, and in 1837 in Michigan. (See House Document 13, pages 46, 51, and 72.) In each of these cases the votes of the States were counted in the alternative. In 1865 the electoral votes of the eleven seceded States were rejected by both Houses in the electoral count. (Page 229.) In 1869 the vote of Louisiana was objected to on the ground of fraud, and the same was considered and counted. (Page 238.) In 1873 there were two certificates and seven objections raised to the vote of Louisiana. The vote of that State was not counted. (Page 391.) In 1873 the vote of Georgia was not counted because it was cast for a dead man. (Page 407.)

The action of the two Houses of Congress on these several occasions shows that this power in the opinion of these Houses did exist. They were precedents in existence when the law framing this Commission was enacted and must be considered in construing the law. But what are the constitutional provisions on this subject?

ARTICLE II.

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives, to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

ARTICLE XII.

The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President, and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each; which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the seat of Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates and the votes shall then be counted—the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers not exceeding three on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately, by ballot, the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by States, the representation from each State having one vote; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the States, and a majority of all the States shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the 4th day of March, next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of death or other constitutional disability of the President.

The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

These are the constitutional provisions on this subject, and by them the power to appoint electors is given to the States to be exercised in such manner as the legislature may direct, and the only limitation on this power to appoint is that "no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed."

It is conceded that the power to appoint belongs to the State, but it is our power and duty under this law to decide who has been appointed by the State. The State appointed, if at all, on the 7th of November, 1876. The question for us to decide is whom did she appoint or who were duly appointed electors and which are the votes provided for by the Constitution.

I cannot doubt our power to go into the inquiry which set of electors uttered the true voice of the State of Florida.

It is offered in proof by counsel for objectors to the certificate of the Hayes electors as follows:

First. On December 6, 1876, being the regular law day, both the Tilden and the Hayes electors, respectively, met and cast their votes and transmitted the same to the seat of Government. Every form prescribed by the Constitution, or by any law bearing on the subject, was equally complied with by each of the rival electoral colleges, unless there be a material difference between them in this respect: The certified lists provided for in section 136 of the Revised Statutes were, as to the Tilden electors, certified by the attorney-general, and were, as to the Hayes electors, certified by Mr. Stearns, then governor.

All this appears of record; and no additional evidence is needed in respect to any part of it.

Secondly. A quo warranto was commenced against the Hayes electors in the proper court of Florida on the said 6th of December, 1876, before they had cast their votes, which eventuated in a judgment against them on January 25, 1877, a determination that the Tilden electors were duly appointed. The validity and effect of this judgment is determinable by the record, and no extrinsic evidence seems to be desirable on either side, unless it be thought—

1. That the Tilden electors should give some supplemental proof of the precise fact that the writ of quo warranto was served before the Hayes electors cast their votes, or

2. It be desired on the other side to show the entry and pendency of an appeal from the judgment in the quo warranto.

With these two possible and very slight exceptions, the whole case in this branch of it depends upon the record.

Thirdly. To show what is the common law of Florida, and to show also the true construction of Florida statutes, the Tilden electors desire to place before the Commission the record of a judgment of the supreme court in that State on a mandamus prosecuted on the relation of Mr. Drew, the present governor of that State, by force of which Mr. Stearns was ousted and Mr. Drew was admitted as governor. This judgment, together with the court's opinion, are matters of record and they require no other proofs, nor is there any technical rule as to the manner in which this Commission may inform itself concerning the law of Florida.

Fourthly. The legislation of Florida authorizing a new canvass of the electoral vote and the fact of such new canvass, the casting anew of the electoral votes and the due formal transmission thereof to the seat of Government, in perfect conformity with the Constitution and laws, (except that they were subsequent in point of time to December 6, 1876,) are all matters of record and are already regularly before the Commission.

Fifthly. The only matters which the Tilden electors desire to lay before the Commission by evidence actually extrinsic will now be stated:

1. The board of State canvassers, acting on certain erroneous views when making their canvass, by which the Hayes electors appeared to be chosen, rejected wholly the returns from the county of Manatee and part of returns from each of the following counties, to wit: Hamilton, Jackson, and Monroe.

In so doing the said State board acted without jurisdiction, as the circuit and supreme courts in Florida decided. It was by overruling and setting aside as not warranted by law these rejections that the courts of Florida reached their respective conclusions that Mr. Drew was elected governor, that the Hayes electors were usurpers, and that the Tilden electors were duly chosen.

No evidence that in any view could be called extrinsic is believed to be needful in order to establish the conclusions relied upon by the Tilden electors, except duly-authenticated copies of the State canvass and of the returns from the above-named four counties, one wholly and the others in part rejected by said State canvassers.

2. Evidence that Mr. Humphreys, a Hayes elector, held office under the United States.

Sixthly. Judging from the objections taken by those supporting the Hayes electors, and the opening arguments here offered in their behalf, it is believed that no evidence is needed or intended to be offered by the supporters of the Hayes electors, unless it be—

1. That the above-mentioned appeal was taken.

2. That Mr. Humphreys, one of the Hayes electors, had resigned his office under the United States before his appointment as an elector.

This is the proof they offer to us. They say they can make good this offer by the production of evidence, and they propose to satisfy the minds of this tribunal, if allowed, that the State of Florida, on the 7th day of November, 1876, appointed Tilden electors, and that they, and they alone, are "the duly-appointed electors of the State."

One would suppose, when the past action of Congress on this subject and the provisions of the electoral bill are considered, that there would be no voice raised here against hearing this evidence; but it was maintained by counsel, and is insisted on here, that the Hayes electors, having the governor's certificate, based on the certificate of the returning-board, we cannot go behind these certificates to inquire whether they contain the truth or are false and fraudulent.

It must be conceded that there may be cases which will force an examination into the truth of these certificates.

Suppose it were alleged that these certificates are forged, it will hardly be maintained that they would present a conclusive case. Can a forged certificate be less powerful than a fraudulent one? Would any one desire to uphold a fraud any more than a forgery?

By the laws of Congress it is provided:

SEC. 136. It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required, by the preceding section, to meet. (1 Mar., 1792, c. 8, s. 3, v. 1, p. 240.)

The laws of Florida also provide for certificates from the returning-board and from the governor to the electors. I deny under the precedents (already cited) of the action of the two Houses and under the authorities that these certificates are conclusive. I maintain that they furnish evidence of the action of the State in the appointment of electors not conclusive but prima facie, and that we have the right to go behind them to ascertain whether they speak the truth or are fraudulent and false.

Chief-Justice Whiton, in 4 Wisconsin, 792, commenting on the effect of certificates of canvassers, says:

Before proceeding to state our views in regard to the law regulating the canvass of votes by the State canvassers, we propose to consider how far the right of a person to an office is affected by the determination of the canvassers of the votes cast at the election held to choose the officer. Under our constitution, almost all our officers are elected by the people. Thus the governor is chosen, the constitution providing that the person having the highest number of votes for that office shall be elected. But the constitution is silent as to the mode in which the election shall be conducted, and the votes cast for governor shall be canvassed, and the result of the election ascertained. The duty of prescribing the mode of conducting the election and of canvassing the votes was, therefore, devolved upon the legislature. They have accordingly made provision for both, and the question is, whether the canvass, or the election, establishes the right of a person to an office. It seems clear that it cannot be the former, because by our constitution and laws it is expressly provided that the election by the qualified voters shall determine the question. To hold that the canvass shall control would subvert the foundations upon which our government rests. But it has been repeatedly contended in the course of this proceeding that although the election by the electors determines the right to the office, yet the decision of the persons appointed to canvass the votes cast at the election settles finally and completely the question as to the persons elected, and that, therefore, no court can have jurisdiction to inquire into the matter. It will be seen that this view of the question, while it recognizes the principle that the election is the foundation of the right to the office, assumes that the canvassers have authority to decide the matter finally, and conclusively. We do not deem it necessary to say anything on the present occasion upon the subject of the jurisdiction of this court, as that question has already been decided and the reasons for the decision given. Bearing it in mind, then, that under our constitution and laws it is the election to an office, and not the canvass of the votes, which determines the right to the office, we will proceed to inquire into the proceedings of the State canvassers by which they determined that the respondent was duly elected.

The title to an elective office is derived from the people through the ballot-box. Somebody must declare the will of the electors as thus expressed. Canvassers are provided for that purpose. The certificate of a board of canvassers is evidence of the person upon whom the office has been conferred. Upon all questions arising collaterally, or between a party holding the certificate and a stranger, it is conclusive evidence; but, in a proceeding to try the right to the office it is only prima facie evidence. In such a proceeding, now regarded as a civil action, it is competent for the court to go behind the adjudication of the canvassers. The whole question is thrown open, and extrinsic evidence is allowed to show which was the true state of the votes. In such an action, where the right to the office is the very thing in issue, the court will allow nothing to stand in the way between it and the ballot-box. It will put in requisition all the means within its reach to ascertain the expressed will of the electors, and will conform its judgment to such ascertained will. (Morgan vs. Quackenbush, 22 Barb., 72.)

In deciding the question as to which candidate has received the greater number of votes cast by the electors for a particular office, the court and jury will go behind the canvass to ascertain the intention of the voters, and when ascertained, will give effect to that intension by giving to each candidate the votes the voters gave him. (People vs. Ferguson, 8 Cow., 102; People vs. Cook, 8 N. Y., 67, 83; People vs. Pease, 27 N. Y., 45; People vs. Love, 63 Barb., 535; People vs. Wilson, 62 N. Y., 186; People vs. Vail, 20 Wend., 12.)

These authorities and many more that might be cited prove that the certificates are not the election. They only form evidence in one form of the result of it.

It is further submitted that no law that could be enacted in Florida could make these certificates conclusive and absolutely binding on the two Houses or this Commission in the electoral count. That State could by law make a certificate binding and conclusive between her own citizens, but cannot give it this effect out of the State between persons not her citizens.

It has been declared that to go behind these certificates and to find contrary to them would be a violation of State rights. I am an advocate for State rights of the strictest sect. I did not, I do not expect to learn a lesson in that direction from those who have proclaimed it in this case. Indeed, it is feared that it is used here to cover up a great wrong to a State. But in this case these new-made converts to the doctrine need have no apprehension, because the State of Florida, through the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of her State government, has labored to convince us and the country that the Hayes electors are not the duly-appointed electors of that State. She has done what she could to correct this great wrong, and she relies on us to do the balance.

When the Hayes electors met and before their vote was cast, the Tilden electors commenced a quo warranto proceeding against them, which it is offered to prove was served before the vote was cast. On the 25th of January, 1877, judgment was rendered in the case, declaring that the Hayes electors were usurpers and that the Tilden electors were duly appointed. From this judgment there was an appeal, but it has never been reversed. The vote for the Tilden electors was about the same as the vote for Drew, the democratic candidate for governor. If one was duly elected the others were. This same returning-board that gave certificates to the Hayes electors also gave certificates to Stearns, the opponent of Drew.

On a mandamus prosecuted by Drew against Stearns in the highest court of Florida, Mr. Stearns was ousted and Mr. Drew installed as governor.

The effect of these two decisions is to declare by the courts of Florida what the laws of Florida are, and when so declared these decisions bind all other courts as fully as if the decisions had been incorporated into the law.

But it is said that the electors became functus officio before the judgment in quo warranto. Although the electors had voted before the judgment in quo warranto, yet that judgment was rendered in time to instruct us on the point which we are to decide and determine, to wit, which set of electors has been duly appointed.

The court had jurisdiction to proceed to judgment after December 6, according to the current of authorities both in England and this country. When the office shall expire before judgment, the court may in its discretion refuse the writ; but when once granted it must go on to judgment.

In The People vs. Sweeting, 2 Johns., 184, the supreme court of New York, in denying a similar application, said:

This court has a discretion to grant motions of this kind or to refuse them, if no sufficient reasons appear for allowing this mode of proceeding.

That this was the sole effect of this decision appears from the subsequent case of The People vs. Tibbetts, 4 Cow., 358, 381, bottom. Here the same court granted such a motion for leave to file an information, notwithstanding the former case, which was cited and considered. They say :

Here the motion was brought before us at the term next after the election. We cannot refuse it upon the mere chance that a trial may fail. To do this would be equivalent to a refusal in all cases where the office is annual; a length to which we presume the court did not intend to go, and to which it was not necessary they should go, in The People vs. Sweeting. On the whole, we are clear upon the nature of the case as to our right of allowing the information to be filed; and that the lapse of time is not such as to require us in the exercise of a sound discretion to deny it.

Says Chief-Justice Ames, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court of Rhode Island, State vs. Brown, 5 Rhode Island, 1 :

When the information is filed all the discretionary power of the court is expended, and the issues of law or fact raised by the pleadings must be tried and decided under the law and in the same manner and with the same strictness as in any other case, civil or criminal. (P. 4.)

According to these decisions the court in Florida had jurisdiction to issue and try this quo warranto, and the judgment that the Tilden electors were the duly appointed electors of Florida until reversed binds all courts in the United States.

This judgment and that in mandamus settle the question that according to the laws of Florida the canvassing-board committed an error (to use no stronger term) in granting certificates to the Hayes electors and that their certificate and that of the governor founded on it gave the said Hayes electors no valid title to their office, and that the Tilden electors were duly appointed.

But the State of Florida did not stop here. Upon the decision of the mandamus Governor Drew was installed into office with his democratic associates on the State ticket, and also a democratic legislature. The old returning-board, consisting of the secretary of state, attorney-general, and comptroller of public accounts, died, and the new board under mandamus came into office.

Under a law of the new legislature passed in January, 1877, a new canvass was held and the Tilden electors declared elected; this was followed by the certificate of the governor. About the same time another act was passed declaring that the Tilden electors were the duly appointed electors of that State. Thus the State of Florida has, through all of its three several departments, declared that according to her laws the Tilden electors were duly chosen. In the face of all this accumulated evidence of the truth shall we shut our eyes and say we will hear nothing on the subject? We are acting under a law which requires us to decide "what persons were duly appointed electors" in Florida, and yet we are urged to decide this grave question in favor of one set of electors on the governor's certificate and that of the returning-board, when before our eyes stands evidence which must be satisfying to all that the other set was duly elected. They also offer to produce for our consideration the actual vote of the State that we may revise the canvass for ourselves and decide according to the laws of Florida and the very right of the case. If this offer of proof be rejected, let it not be on the affectation of regard for the rights of the State of Florida. She is suffering under a grievous State wrong, and through all her departments has tried to correct it, and is now stretching out her hands to us for relief. I cannot believe this Commission will refuse to hear this testimony, and (if it comes up to the offer of proof) to correct this foul wrong.

But it has been maintained that though the Hayes electors may not have been duly appointed and though the Tilden electors may have been duly appointed on the 7th of November, yet as the Hayes electors had some color of authority under the governor's certificate, they became electors de facto, and their action in casting the vote of the State for Hayes was binding on all persons. What a monstrous doctrine! It must shock the moral sense of every member of this Commission.

It will be recollected that both sets of electors, each claiming to be the duly appointed electors of Florida, met according to law at the same time and with the same forms cast their votes—the one for Hayes, the other for Tilden. We are told we cannot inquire which was the true set of electors, because one set had the governor's certificate, and because they were the de facto electors. This seems an entirely new application of the doctrine, and common sense will answer and repudiate it. Where two persons both claiming to hold an office attempt to discharge the duties of the office at the same time, there can be no claim on the part of either that he is a de facto officer. One or the other is de jure, and his acts must be respected and those of the other repudiated.

The doctrine of the authorities on this subject seems to be this: If the act of the de facto officer has not operated to accomplish some change in the relation of parties to each other or to property or to the public, such acts will not be regarded, especially if a like act was performed by the officer de jure at the same time. (Wilcox vs. Smith, 5 Wend., 231. Hildreth vs. McIntire, 1 J. J. Marshall, 206. Green vs. Burke, 23 Wend., 490.)

It cannot be that the fact that the Hayes electors acted can give validity to their acts when there could be no inquiry here unless they had acted and the very question to decide is which of the two parties acting had the right to act, and before the act of either was accomplished by the count here this action on the part of the Hayes electors was declared void by the court of Florida.

But the proof is also offered that one of the Hayes electors, Mr. Humphreys, held an office of trust and profit under the United States Government at the time of his appointment.

Surely we cannot refuse to hear this proof.

The Constitution says in article 2, section 1:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and together with the Vice-President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

The right and power to appoint electors is not an original State right, not one of those rights reserved to the State in the formation of the Constitution. Without the Constitution and the Union it formed, there would have been no such thing as presidential electors. It was a power and a right secured by the compact to each State and owed its existence to the compact. The power, then, must be exercised in conformity to the compact. If there is a limitation on this right or an inhibition on its exercise, this limitation or inhibition must be respected or the exercise of the right is void. The power to appoint electors in the Constitution is subject to the limitation on that power in these words: "But no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector." This is an express limitation on the right to appoint electors, and if the State does appoint any of the prohibited class, it is void. She has under the Constitution no more right to appoint such than she would have to appoint any if this section of the Constitution had not been adopted.

The States can now fail or refuse to appoint electors. If so, then they decline to take part in electing a President. If Florida appoints three eligible electors and one who is ineligible, then she can only give three votes for President instead of four.

It is plain that the object of this prohibition or limitation of the power of appointment was wise. It was to prevent the interference of Federal officers in the presidential election—to make the electoral colleges independent of the existing President and prevent him from re-electing himself or naming his successor.

It has always been considered a wise and salutary provision which should be rigidly adhered to.

In the presidential count of 1837 it was suggested that several postmasters had been appointed electors. A committee was raised to ascertain and report on this matter. Felix Grundy, Henry Clay, and Silas Wright were members of this committee on the part of the Senate, and the following is an extract from the report, submitted by Mr. Grundy :

The committee are of opinion that the second section of the second article of the Constitution, which declares that "no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector," ought to be carried, in its whole spirit, into rigid execution, in order to prevent officers of the General Government from bringing their official power to influence the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States. This provision of the Constitution, it is believed, excludes and disqualifies deputy postmasters from the appointment of electors; and the disqualification relates to the time of the appointments, and that a resignation of the office of deputy postmaster, after his appointment as elector, would not entitle him to vote as elector under the Constitution.

In the debate ensuing in the House of Representatives upon the report of the joint committee, Mr. Francis Thomas, chairman of the House committee, said that "the committee came unanimously to the conclusion that they (the postmasters in question) were not eligible at the time they were elected, and therefore the whole proceeding was vitiated ab initio."

These great men, considering it most important that this provision should be strictly adhered to, gave strong and convincing reasons for it, and declared that the appointment of such was a void act; that the disqualification relates to the time of appointment, and that subsequent resignation of Federal office before voting in the electoral college did not entitle one to vote as elector. Unfortunately, the votes of those ineligible electors did not affect the presidential count of 1837, and no legislation followed; but the principle then declared is as true to-day as it was when declared. Ever since the Wilkes case in the British Parliament, it has been held in a long and almost harmonious current of decisions, both in this country and in England, that the election or appointment of an ineligible person is a void act. Authorities differ as to whether the next highest candidate is elected, but I know of no case in which the ineligible candidate was held to be elected.

I beg leave to refer to some of the leading cases in which this doctrine was held.

The doctrine was held in the case of Searcy vs. Grow, 15 Cal., 118⁴ where the opinion was pronounced by Baldwin, J., Cope, J., and Field, C. J., concurring. It was a contest for the office of sheriff of Siskiyou County. Grow had been returned as elected to the office. At the time of the election he was postmaster in the town of Yreka, the compensation of which exceeded $500 per annum. The court below found for Searcy, and Grow appealed. The constitution of California provides that "no person holding any lucrative office under the United States or in their power shall be eligible to any civil office of profit under this State, provided that officers in the militia to which there is attached no annual salary, or local officers and postmasters whose compensation does not exceed $500 per annum, shall not be deemed lucrative." Grow was postmaster at the time of his election, but had resigned at the time of his qualifications. The supreme court unanimously affirmed the judgment of the court below.

In the opinion, Justice Baldwin says, (page 121:)

The people in this case were clothed with this power of choice. Their selection of a candidate gave him all the claim to the office which he has. His title to the office comes from their designation of him as sheriff. But they could not designate or choose a man not eligible—that is, not capable of being selected. They might select any man they chose, subject only to this exception: that the man they selected was capable of taking what they had the power to give. We do not see how the fact that he became capable of taking office after they had exercised their power can avail the appellant. If he was not eligible at the time the votes were cast for him, the election failed. We do not see how it can be assumed that by the act of the candidate the votes which, when cast, were ineffectual, because not given for a qualified candidate, became effectual to elect him to office. (Price vs. Baker, 41 Ind., 572; Stewart vs. Hayes, 3 Chicago Legal News, 117; State vs. Giles, 1 Chand., Wis., 112; State vs. Boal, 46 Mo., 426; Saunders vs. Haynes, 13 Cal., 145.)

The electors must be all appointed on the same day under the act of Congress, Revised Statutes—

SEC. 131. Except in case of a presidential election, prior to the ordinary period, as specified in sections 147 to 149 inclusive, when the offices of President and Vice-President both become vacant, the electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed in each State on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November in every fourth year succeeding every election of a President and Vice-President.

The appointment must be complete on that day. The canvass and certificate made after are only evidence of appointment, and cannot be said in any sense to be an appointment. These questions were well considered in a case in Rhode Island growing out of the appointment on the 7th of November, 1876, of George H. Corliss as an elector. Corliss was at the date of election (the day of appointment) a Centennial commissioner. The question of his eligibility was submitted by the governor to the supreme court.

The following is a history of the action of the court in the matter of George H. Corliss, (16 American Law Register, N. S., 15, number for January, 1877.) Corliss was a Centennial commissioner on November 7, 1876, when the qualified voters of Rhode Island cast a majority of their votes for him for the office of presidential elector. The governor, under the laws of Rhode Island, submitted to the supreme court five questions, the answers to which were to guide his actions in making the required executive list of electors appointed. Of these the third, upon the assumption that the court should answer that the office was one of trust and profit under the Constitution of the United States, was: "Is the disqualification removed by the resignation of said office of trust and profit?" There was a dissenting opinion of one judge out of five in answer to the first question, but all agreed in answering the third question as follows:

We think the disqualification is not removed by the resignation of the office of trust unless the office is resigned before the election. The language of the Constitution is that "no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector." Under our law, (General Statutes, chapter 11, sections 1 and 2,) the election by the people constitutes the appointment. The duty of the governor is to examine and count the votes, and give notice to the elector. He merely ascertains—he does not complete—the appointment. A resignation therefore, after the election is too late to be effectual.

Upon reason and authority both, Humphreys, if a Federal officer on the day of election, could not act as elector, even though he resigned his Federal office before the 6th of December, when he attempted to vote.

Shall we then refuse to hear evidence to show that he held Federal office on the 7th November, 1876?

An attempt is made to liken this provision of the Constitution to the third clause of the third section of article 1:

No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

This provision it is claimed has never prevented a person from being Senator who is at the time he is sworn in thirty years of age and who has then been nine years a citizen of the United States.

But how different is the language of these two provisions. In the former the language is, "no person shall be appointed." In the latter, "no person shall be a Senator." He is not a Senator until he is sworn in, and then the qualifications apply. He cannot be called Senator until he assumes the duties of that high position. He is only a Senator-elect and may never become a Senator. There is much more similarity in the last prohibition as to Senator, to wit, "and who shall not when elected be an inhabitant of the State for which he shall be chosen." No case can be found where this ineligibility of non-residence at date of election has been removed by afterward becoming an inhabitant. He must at the date of election be an inhabitant, or he is forever disqualified. Nothing occurring subsequently can remove this ineligibility. So with an elector—he must not when appointed be a Federal officer. If he is, no resignation can make him eligible.

Suppose the State of Florida had attempted to appoint her two Senators and two Representatives her four electors, and they had met, formed an electoral college, and cast their votes for President and Vice-President, will any one maintain that such votes could be counted or that we could not go behind the certificates to ascertain if those four men were her Senators and Representatives? Could we, who have sworn to support the Constitution, and have also sworn to decide what are the votes of the State of Florida provided for by the Constitution of the United States, decide that these Senators and Representatives had cast the votes provided for by the Constitution, which in terms prohibits them from being electors?

The statement of the case is the answer to the proposition.

Mr. President, when I consider the past action of the two Houses of Congress, the phraseology of the law under which we are acting, the offers of proof, and the authorities which I have examined, I have no doubt left on my mind that it is not only our right but our duty to hear the proof offered and to decide which certificate contains the true and lawful electoral vote of Florida. Any other course would disappoint the expectations of the country, looking to us to solve this vexed presidential election according to the very right of the case. Any other course dwarfs this high Commission into a tribunal to ascertain merely whether the four votes of Florida have been correctly added up or not, and whether the governor's certificate accompanies the votes. This duty might as well have been performed by a page of either House. The business of the two Houses would not then have been interrupted by withdrawing five members from each House, and waiting for days for us to arrive at the most difficult decision that Florida had really cast four votes and that the electors who cast the four votes had the governor's certificate. The business of the Supreme Court would not then have been entirely suspended by the withdrawal of five of its associate justices, to form this Commission, and play the rôle of boys in primary arithmetic. No, sir, this Electoral Commission was designed (as the law creating it directs) to "decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State." To do this and to discharge our duties under the bill and satisfy our consciences under the oaths we have taken, we must go behind these certificates and ascertain whether they represent the persons duly appointed electors.

LOUISIANA.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON said :

Mr. PRESIDENT: We have reached the second State in the history of this Commission, and it remains to be seen whether the frauds, forgeries, and perjuries by which the certificate of the returning-board of Louisiana was sustained are to be upheld by this Commission; whether the vote of this State is to be counted for Hayes on the certificate of the governor, based on the certificate of the returning-board, when proof is offered that these certificates are founded on fraud, forgery, and perjury; whether the vote of Louisiana is to be counted for Hayes when the proof is offered that she voted for Tilden by from six to nine thousand majority.

There are features in this case that distinguish it from that of Florida, and I shall address myself to these points, in the hopes that the Commission will undertake in this case to arrive at the true vote of Louisiana, without regard to the certificates of governor and canvassing-board, except so far as they may afford one character of evidence as to how the State voted.

Three papers purporting to be certificates of the votes of this State were opened and referred to this Commission. Two are votes for Hayes and Wheeler and the other for Tilden and Hendricks. The electors who certified in the first two certificates have the certificate of W. P. Kellogg, who certified as governor of Louisiana that the Hayes electors were chosen according to law. The electors who certified in the third certificate have the certificate of John McEnery, who signs himself governor of Louisiana, that they, the Tilden electors, were duly and legally appointed, &c. We have to determine between these which set has been duly appointed.

Objections have been filed to each of these certificates, and on behalf of the objectors to the certificates of the Hayes votes it is offered to prove as follows:

I.

We offer to prove that William P. Kellogg, who certifies, as governor of the State of Louisiana, to the appointment of electors of that State, which certificate is now before this Commission, is the same William P. Kellogg who, by said certificate, was certified to have been appointed one of said electors. In other words, that Kellogg certified his own appointment as such elector.

2. That said Kellogg was governor de facto of said State during all the months of November and December, A. D. 1876.

CONSTITUTION OF LOUISIANA.

"ART. 117. No person shall hold or exercise at the same time more than one office of trust or profit, except that of justice of the peace or notary public."

II.

We offer to prove that said William P. Kellogg was not duly appointed one of the electors of said State in A. D. 1876, and that the certificate is untrue in fact.

To show this we offer to prove—

(1.) By certified copies of the lists made out, signed, and sworn to by the commissioners of election in each poll and voting-place in the State, and delivered by said commissioners to the clerk of the district court wherein said polls were established, except in the parish of Orleans, and in that parish delivered to the secretary of state, that at the election for electors in the State of Louisiana on the 7th day of November last, the said William P. Kellogg received for elector 6,300 votes less than were at said election cast for each and every of the following-named persons, that is to say: John McEnery, R. C. Wickliffe, L. St. Martin, E. P. Poché, A. De Blanc, W. A. Seay, R. G. Cobb, K. A. Cross. (Sec. 43, act 1872.)

(2.) In connection with the certified copies of said lists we offer to prove that the returning-board, which pretended to canvass the said election under the act approved November 20, 1872, did not receive from any poll, voting-place, or parish in said State, nor have before them, any statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election in form as required by section 26 of said act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences which prevented or tended to prevent a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place.

(3.) We further offer to show that in many instances the supervisors of registration of the several parishes willfully and fraudulently omitted from their consolidated statement, returned by them to the State returning-board, the result and all mention of the votes given at certain polls or voting-places within their respective parishes, as shown to them by the returns and papers returned to said supervisors by the commissioners of election, as required by law; and that in consequence of this omission the said consolidated statements, on their face, omitted majorities against the said Kellogg, and in favor of each and every the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross, amounting to 2,267, but that said supervisors of registration did, as by law required, return to the said returning-board, with their consolidated statements, the lists, papers, and returns received by them, according to law, from the commissioners of election at the several polls and voting-places omitted as aforesaid from said consolidated statements of said supervisors.

And that the said returning-board willfully and fraudulently neglected and refused to make any canvass of the majorities so omitted, or estimate them in any way, in their pretended determination that the said Kellogg was duly elected an elector at the election aforesaid.

(4.) We offer to show that by the consolidated statements returned to said returning-board by the supervisors of registration of the several parishes of the State of the result of the voting at the several polls or voting-places within their parishes respectively, it appeared that said Kellogg received at said election 3,459 less votes for electors than the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross, and each and every of them.

(5.) We further offer to show that the said returning-board willfully and fraudulently estimated and counted as votes in favor of said Kellogg 234 votes which were not shown to have been given at any poll or voting-place in said State, either by any consolidated statement returned to said returning-board by any of the said supervisors, nor by the statements, lists, tally-sheets, or returns made by any commissioners of election to any of said supervisors, or which were before said returning-board.

(6.) We offer to prove that the votes cast and given at said election on the 7th November last for the election of electors, as shown by the returns made by the commissioners of election from the several polls or voting-places in said State, have never been compiled nor canvassed; and that the said returning-board never even pretended to compile or canvass the returns made by said commissioners of election, but that said returning-board only pretended to canvass the returns made by the said supervisors. (Act of 1872, section 43: "Supervisor must forward." Act of 1872, section 2: "Board must canvass.")

(7.) We offer to prove that the votes given for electors at the election of November 7 last at the several voting-places or polls in said State have never been opened by the governor of the said State in presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, and a district judge of the district in which the seat of government was established, nor in the presence of any of them; nor has the governor of said State ever, in the presence as aforesaid, examined the returns of the commissioners of election for said election to ascertain therefrom, nor has he ever, in such presence, ascertained therefrom, the persons who were, or whether any one was, duly elected electors, or elector, at said election; nor has he ever pretended so to do. (Revised Statutes, section 2826.)

(8.) We further offer to prove—

That the said William P. Kellogg, governor as aforesaid, when he made, executed, and delivered the said certificate, by which he certified that himself and others had been duly appointed electors as aforesaid, well knew that said certificate was untrue in fact in that behalf, and that he, the said Kellogg, then well knew that he, the said Kellogg, had not received, of the legal votes cast at the election of November 7, 1876, for electors, within five thousand of as many of such votes as had at said election been cast and given for each and every of the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross; and that he, the said Kellogg, when he made and executed the aforesaid certificate, well knew that of the legal votes cast at the popular election held in the State of Louisiana on the 7th day of November last, for the election of electors in said state, as shown by the lists, returns, and papers sent, according to law, by the commissioners of election, who presided over and conducted the said election at the several polls and voting-places in said State, to the supervisors of registration, and as shown by the said lists, returns, papers, and ballots deposited by said commissioners of election in the office of the clerks of the district courts, except the parish of Orleans, and deposited for the parish of Orleans in the office of secretary of state, according to law, that each and every the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had received more than five thousand of the legal votes cast at said election for electors, more than had been cast and given at said election for the said Kellogg as elector, and that the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had been thus and thereby duly appointed electors for said State in the manner directed by the legislature of said State.

(9.) We further offer to prove—

That at the city of New Orleans in the State of Louisiana, in the month of October, A. D. 1876, the said William P. Kellogg, J. H. Burch, Peter Joseph, L. A. Sheldon, Morris Marks, A. B. Levissee, O. H. Brewster, Oscar Joffrion, S. B. Packard, John Ray, Frank Morey, Hugh J. Campbell, D. J. M. A. Jewett, H. C. Dibble, Michael Hahn, B. P. Blanchard, J. R. G. Pitkin, J. Madison Wells, Thomas C. Anderson, G. Casanave, L. M. Kenner, George P. Davis, W. L. Catlin, C. C. Nash, George L. Smith, Isadore McCormick, and others, entered into an unlawful and criminal combination and conspiracy to and with each other, and each to and with each of the others, to cause it to be certified and returned to the secretary of state by the returning-board of said State, upon their pretended compilation and canvass of the election for electors, to be thereafter held on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, that the said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion, had received a majority of all votes given and cast at said election for electors, whether such should be the fact or not; and

That afterwards, to wit, on the 17th day of November, A. D. 1876, after said election had been held, and it was well known to all of said conspirators that said Kellogg and others had not been elected at said election, but had been defeated, and their opponents had been elected at said election, the said returning-board assembled at the city of New Orleans, the seat of government of said State, to pretend to compile and canvass the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election from the several polls and voting-places in said State for presidential electors, and make returns of said election to the secretary of state, as required by an act of the legislature of that State, approved November 20, 1872; that when said returning-board so assembled, said Wells, said Anderson, said Kenner, and said Casanave, who are all members of one political party, to wit, the republican party, were the only members of said board; there being one vacancy in said board, which vacancy it was the duty of said Wells, said Anderson, said Kenner, and said Casanave, as members of said board, to fill, then and there, by the election or appointment of some person belonging to some other political party than the republican party; but that the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave then and there, in pursuance of said unlawful and criminal combination aforesaid, then and there neglected and refused to fill said vacancy, for the reason, as assigned by them, that they did not wish to have a democrat to watch the proceedings of said board; and that although frequently during the session of said board, assembled for the purpose aforesaid, they, the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, were duly, and in writing, requested by said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross to fill said vacancy, they refused to do so, and never did fill the same, but proceeded as such board, in pursuance of said combination and conspiracy, to make a pretended compilation and canvass of said election without filling the vacancy in said returning-board; and

That said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, while pretending to be in session as a returning-board for the purpose of compiling and canvassing the said election, and in pursuance of said combination and conspiracy, employed persons of notoriously bad character to act as their clerks and assistants, to wit, one Davis, a man of notoriously bad character, who was then under indictment in the criminal courts of Louisiana, and said Catlin, and said Blanchard, and said Jewett, three of said conspirators, who were then under indictment for subornation of perjury in the criminal courts of Louisiana; the said Jewett being also under indictment in one of the criminal courts of Louisiana for obtaining money under false pretenses; and Isadore McCormick, who was then under indictment in the criminal court of said State charged with murder.

And that, in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy aforesaid, the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting in said returning-board, confided to their said clerks and employés, said co-conspirators, the duty of compiling and canvassing all returns which were by said returning-board ordered to be canvassed and compiled; and, although thereto particularly requested by a communication, as follows—

“ To the honorable returning-board of the State of Louisiana:

“ GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, acting as counsel for the various candidates upon the democratic-conservative ticket, State, national, and municipal, with respect show:

“ That the returns from various polls and parishes are inspected by this board, and the vote announced by it is merely that for governors and electors;

“ That the tabulation of all other votes is turned over to a corps of clerks, to be done outside of the presence of this board;

“ That all of said clerks are republicans, and that the democratic-conservative candidates have no check upon them, and no means to detect errors and fraudulent tabulation, or to call the attention of this board to any such wrongs, if any exist;

“ That by this system the fate of all other candidates but governor and electors is placed in the hands of a body of republican clerks with no check against erroneous or dishonest action on their part;

“ That fair play requires that some check should be placed upon said clerks and some protection afforded to the said candidates against error or dishonest action on the part of said clerks;

“ Wherefore they respectfully ask that they be permitted to name three respectable persons, and that to such parties be accorded the privilege of being present in the room or rooms where said tabulation is progressing, and of inspecting the tabulation and comparing the same with the returns, and also of fully inspecting the returns, and previous to the adoption by this board of said tabulation, with a view to satisfy all parties that there has been no tampering or unfair practice in connection therewith.

“ Very respectfully,

“ F. C. ZACHARIE.

“ CHARLES CAVANAC.

“ E. A. BURKE.

“ J. R. ALCÉE GAUTHREAUX.

“ HENRY C. BROWN.

“ FRANK MCGLOIN.

“ I concur herein.

“ H. M. SPOFFORD.

they, the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting as said board, expressly refused to permit any democrat, or any person selected by democrats, to be present with said clerks and assistants while they were engaged in the compilation and canvass aforesaid, or to examine into the correctness of the compilation and canvass made by said clerks and assistants as aforesaid.

And that said returning-board, in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy aforesaid, and for the purpose of concealing the animus of said board and inspiring confidence in the public mind in the integrity of their proceedings, on the 18th day of November, A. D. 1876, adopted and passed a preamble and resolution, as follows:

“ Whereas this board has learned with satisfaction that distinguished gentlemen of national reputation, from other States, some at the request of the President of the United States and some at the request of the national executive committee of the democratic party, are present in this city, with the view to witness the proceedings of this board in canvassing and compiling the returns of the recent election in this State for presidential electors, in order that the public opinion of the country may be satisfied as to the truth of the result and the fairness of the means by which it may have been attained;

“ And whereas this board recognizes the importance which may attach to the result of their proceedings, and that the public mind should be convinced of its justice by a knowledge of the facts on which it may be based: Therefore,

“ Be it resolved, That this board does hereby cordially invite and request five gentlemen from each of the two bodies named, to be selected by themselves respectively, to attend and be present at the meetings of this board while engaged in the discharge of its duties under the law, in canvassing and compiling the returns and ascertaining and declaring the result of said election for presidential electors, in their capacity as private citizens of eminent reputation and high character, and as spectators and witnesses of the proceedings in that behalf, of this board.”

But that said returning-board, being convinced that a compilation and canvass of votes given at said election for presidential electors, made fairly and openly, would result in defeating the object of said conspiracy, and compelling said returning-board to certify that said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had been at said election duly chosen, elected, and appointed electors by the said State of Louisiana, and in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did afterward, to wit, on the 20th day of November, A. D. 1876, adopt and pass the following rules for the better execution and carrying into effect said combination and conspiracy; that is to say:

“The returning-officers, [if they think it advisable, may go into secret session to consider any motion, argument, or proposition which may be presented to them; any member shall have the right to call for secret session for the above purpose.”

“X.

“That the evidence for each contested poll in any parish, when concluded, shall be laid aside until all the evidence is in from all the contested polls in the several parishes where there may be contests, and after the evidence is all in, these turning-officers will decide the several contests in secret session; the parties, or their attorneys, to be allowed to submit briefs or written arguments up to the time fixed for the returning-officers going into secret session, after which no additional argument to be received unless by special consent.”

That the proceedings thus directed to be had in secret were protested against by the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross; but said board thereafter proceeded and pretended to complete their duties as such returning-board; and did perform, execute, and carry out the most important duties devolving upon said board in secret, with closed doors, and in the absence of any member of their board belonging to the democratic party or any person whatever not a member of said board not belonging to the republican party.

That the said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting as said returning-board, while engaged in the compilation and canvass aforesaid, were applied to to permit the United States supervisors of election, duly-appointed and qualified as such, to be present at and witness such compilation or canvass.

That application was made to said returning-board in that behalf, as follows:

“To the president and members of the returning-board of the State of Louisiana:

“GENTLEMEN: The undersigned, of counsel for United States supervisors of election, duly appointed and qualified as such, do hereby except, protest, and object to any ruling made this 20th day of November, 1876, or that hereafter may be made, whereby they are deprived of the right of being present during the entire canvass and compilation of the results of the election lately held in the State of Louisiana, wherein electors for President and Vice-President and members of the Forty-fifth Congress were balloted for, and the result of which said board are now canvassing.

“That under the fifth section of the United States act of February 28, 1871, they are ‘to be and remain where the ballot-boxes are kept, at all times after the polls are open, until each and every vote cast at said time and place shall be counted, and the canvass of all votes polled be wholly completed, and the proper and requisite certificate or returns made, whether said certificate or returns be required under any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law.’

“That under said law of the United States, District Attorney J. R. Beckwith, under date of October 30, 1872, gave his written official opinion for the instruction and guidance of persons holding the office now held by protestants, wherein said United States district attorney said:

“‘It cannot be doubted that the duty of the supervisors extends to the inspection of the entire election from its commencement until the decision of its result. If the United States statutes were less explicit, there still could be no doubt of the duty and authority of the supervisors to inspect and canvass every vote cast for each and every candidate, State, parochial, and Federal, as the law of the State neither provides nor allows any separation of the election for Representatives in Congress, &c., from the election of State and parish officers. The election is in law a single election, and the power of inspection vested in law in the supervisors appointed by the court extends to the entire election, a full knowledge of which may well become necessary to defeat fraud.’

“In which opinion the attorney-general of the State of Louisiana coincided. Whereupon protestants claim admittance of board to amend their rules by making them all open sessions, with leave to a reasonable number of citizens of the State directly interested, or their counsel, and of press reporters to attend, which would furnish the best guarantee possible against the consummation of fraud and the perversion of the popular will.

"The undersigned respectfully asks that the foregoing protest be entered upon the minutes of the board.

"HENRY M. SPOFFORD,
"Of Counsel."

But that said Wells, Anderson, Kenner, and Casanave, acting as such returning-board, in further pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, then and there refused to permit said United States commissioners of election to be present for the purpose aforesaid, but proceeded in their absence to the pretended compilation and canvass aforesaid.

That the said returning-board, while in session as aforesaid, for the purpose aforesaid, to wit, on the 20th day of November, 1876, adopted the following rule to govern their proceedings; that is to say:

"IX.

"No ex parte affidavits or statements shall be received in evidence, except as a basis to show that such fraud, intimidation, or other illegal practice had at some poll requires investigation; but the returns and affidavits authorized by law, made by officers of election, or in verification of statements as required by law, shall be received in evidence as prima facie."

But that said board subsequently, while sitting as aforesaid, for the purposes aforesaid, having become convinced that they could not, upon other than ex parte testimony, so manipulate the said compilation and canvass as to declare that said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion were elected electors at said election, and in further pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did subsequently modify said rule, and declare and decide that, as such returning-board, they would receive ex parte affidavits, under which last decision of said board over two hundred printed pages of ex parte testimony was received by said board in favor of said Kellogg and others; and afterward, when the said McEnery and others offered ex parte evidence to contradict the ex parte evidence aforesaid, the said returning-board reversed its last decision, and refused to receive ex parte affidavits in contradiction as aforesaid.

And that in pursuance of said unlawful combination and conspiracy the said returning-board, in violation of a law of said State, approved November 20, 1872, neglected and refused to compile and canvass the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election which were before them according to law for canvass and compilation as aforesaid in regard to the election of presidential electors, but that said board did, in pursuance and further execution of said combination and conspiracy, canvass and compile only the consolidated statements and returns made to them by the supervisors of registration of the several parishes of said State.

And that said returning-board, in pursuance and further execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently refuse to compile and canvass the votes given for electors at said election in more than twenty parishes of said State, as was shown and appeared by and upon the consolidated statements and returns made to them by said supervisors of said parishes.

And that said returning-board did, in said canvass and compilation, count and estimate, as a foundation for their determination in the premises, hundreds of votes which had not been returned and certified to them either by the commissioners of election in said State or by the supervisors of registration in said State, they, the said members of said board, then and there well knowing that they had no right or authority to estimate the same for the purpose aforesaid.

And that said returning-board, in further pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, knowingly, willfully, falsely, and fraudulently did make a certificate and return to the secretary of state that said Kellogg, Burch, Joseph, Sheldon, Marks, Levissee, Brewster, and Joffrion had received majorities of all the legal votes cast at said election of November 7, 1876, for presidential electors, they then and there well knowing that the said McEnery, Wickliffe, St. Martin, Poché, De Blanc, Seay, Cobb, and Cross had received majorities of all the votes cast at said election for presidential electors, and were duly elected as the presidential electors of said State.

And that the said returning-board, in making said statement, certificate, and return to the secretary of state, were not deceived nor mistaken in the premises, but knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently made what they well knew when they made it was a false and fraudulent statement, certificate, and return, and that the said false and fraudulent statement, certificate, and return, made by said returning-board to the secretary of state in that behalf, was made by the members of said returning-board in pursuance and execution of, and only in pursuance and execution of, said unlawful combination and conspiracy.

And that said returning-board, while in session as aforesaid for the purpose aforesaid, in further pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did alter, change, and forge, or cause to be altered, changed, and forged, the consolidated statement and return of the supervisor of registration for the parish of Vernon, in said State, in the manner following, to wit: The said consolidated statement, as made and returned to said board, showed that of the legal votes given in said parish for electors at said election of November 7, 1876, said McEnery received 647, said Wickliffe received 647, said St. Martin received 647, said Poché received 647, said De Blanc received 647, said Seay received 647, said Cobb received 647, said Cross received 647; and that said Kellogg received none, said Burch received none, said Joseph received 2, said Brewster received 2, said Marks received 2, said Levissee received 2, said Joffrion received 2, said Sheldon received 2; and said board altered, changed, and forged, or caused to be altered, changed, and forged, said consolidated statement so as to make the same falsely and fraudulently show that the said McEnery received 469, said Wickliffe received 469, said St. Martin received 469, said Poché received 469, said De Blanc received 469, said Seay received 469, said Cobb received 469, said Cross received 469; and that said Kellogg received 178, said Burch received 178, said Joseph received 178, said Sheldon received 180, said Marks received 180, said Levissee received 180, said Brewster, received 180, said Joffrion received 180; and that said returning-board, while in session as aforesaid for the purpose aforesaid, to pretend to justify the alteration and forgery of said consolidated statement, procured and pretended to act upon three forged affidavits, purporting to have been made and sworn to by Samuel Carter, Thomas Brown, and Samuel Collins, they, the said members of said returning-board, then and there well knowing that said pretended affidavits were false and forged, and that no such persons were in existence as purported to make said affidavits. And that said members of said returning-board, acting as said board, in pursuance and execution of said unlawful combination and conspiracy, did, in their pretended canvass and compilation of the legal votes given at said election on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, for presidential electors in said State of Louisiana, as shown to them by the statements, papers, and returns made according to law by the commissioners of election presiding over and conducting said election at the several polls and voting-places in said State, all of which votes were legally cast by legal voters in said State at said election, knowingly, willfully, and fraudulently, and without any authority of law whatever, exclude and refuse to count and estimate, or compile or canvass, votes given at said election for electors, as follows, which papers, statements, and returns were before them, and which it was their duty by law to compile and canvass, that is to say: for said John McEnery, 10,280; for said R. C. Wickliffe, 10,293; for said L. St. Martin, 10,291; for said F. P. Poché, 10,280; for said A. De Blanc, 10,289; for said W. A. Seay, 10,291; for said R. A. Cobb, 10,261; for said K. A. Cross, 10,281; they, the said members of said returning-board, then and there well knowing that all of said votes which they neglected and refused to canvass and compile had been duly and legally cast at said election for presidential electors by legal voters of said State; and then and there well knowing that had they considered, estimated, and counted, compiled and canvassed, said votes, as they then and there well knew it was their duty to do, it would have appeared, and they would have been compelled to certify and return to the secretary of state, that said Kellogg had not been duly elected or appointed an elector for said State, but that at said election the said McEnery, the said Wickliffe, the said St. Martin, the said Poché, the said De Blanc, the said Seay, the said Cobb, and the said Cross had been duly elected and appointed presidential electors in said State.

And that by false, fraudulent, willful, and corrupt acts and omissions to act by said returning-board as aforesaid, in the matter aforesaid, and by said nonfeasance, misfeasance, and malfeasance of said returning-board, as hereinbefore mentioned, the said returning-board made to the secretary of state of said State the statement, certificate, and return upon which the said Kellogg, as de facto governor of said State, pretended to make his said false certificate, certifying that himself and others had been duly appointed electors for said State, as hereinbefore mentioned; and that said statement, certificate, and return made by said returning-board, and that the said certificate made by the said Kellogg, as de facto governor, each, every, and all were made in pursuance and execution of said unlawful and criminal combination and conspiracy, as was well known to and intended by each and every of the members of said returning-board when they made their said false statement, certificate, and return to the secretary of state of said State, and by the said Kellogg when, as governor de facto of said State, he made his said false certificate hereinbefore mentioned.

We further offer to prove—

That Oscar Joffrion was on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, supervisor of registration of the parish of Pointe Coupee, and that he acted and officiated as such supervisor of registration for said parish at the said election for presidential electors on that day; and that he is the same person who acted as one of the electors for said State, and on the 6th day of December, A. D. 1876, as an elector, cast a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States.

IV.

We further offer to prove—

That on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, A. B. Levissee, who was one of the pretended college of electors of the State of Louisiana, and who in said college gave a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was at the time of such election a court commissioner of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, which is an office of honor, profit, and trust under the Government of the United States.

V.

We further offer to prove—

That on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, O. H. Brewster, who was one of the pretended electors in the pretended college of electors of the State of Louisiana, and who in said college gave a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was at the time of such election as aforesaid holding an office of honor, profit, and trust under the Government of the United States, to wit, the office of surveyor-general of the land office for the district of Louisiana.

VI.

We further offer to prove—

That on the 7th day of November, 1876, Morris Marks, one of the pretended electors who in said college of electors cast a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and a vote for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was, ever since has been, and now is, holding and exercising the office of district attorney of the fourth judicial district of said State, and receiving the salary by law attached to said office.

VII.

We further offer to prove—

That on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, J. Henri Burch, who was one of the pretended electors who in said pretended electoral college gave a vote for Rutherford B. Hayes for President of the United States and a vote for William A. Wheeler for Vice-President of the United States, was holding the following offices under the constitution and laws of said State, that is to say: member of the board of control of the State penitentiary, also administrator of deaf and dumb asylum of said State, to both of which offices he had been appointed by the governor with the advice and consent of the senate of said State, both being offices with salaries fixed by law, and also the office of treasurer of the parish school board for the parish of East Baton Rouge; and that said Burch, ever since the said 7th day of November, (and prior thereto,) has exercised and still is exercising the functions of all said offices and receiving the emoluments thereof.

VIII.

We further offer to prove the canvass and compilation actually made by said returning-board, showing what parishes and voting-places and polls were compiled and canvassed, and what polls or voting-places were excluded by said returning board from their canvass and compilation of votes given for presidential electors; and we also offer to show what statements and returns of the commissioners of election and of the supervisors of registration were duly before said returning-board.

IX.

We further offer to prove—

That the affidavits on which the allegations of tumult were made were forged and false.

XI.

That they agreed to and did receive, as follows, votes never cast for any elector.

In the first place, there seems to be some confusion as to what election laws were in force in Louisiana on the day of election, and I desire to ascertain what laws the canvassing-board acted under, so as to be able to judge of their conduct under the law.

In 1868 there was a general election law passed in the State, which provided for all elections, including State and presidential.

In 1870 the laws of Louisiana were revised, and the election law of 1868 was embraced in these revised statutes under two heads, or chapters, each making a distinct and separate act. One provided for State and the other for presidential elections.

In 1872, November 20, an act was passed on the subject of both State and presidential election, the seventy-first section of which is in these words:

SEC. 71. Be it further enacted, &c., That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Approved November 20, 1872.

Under this repealing clause all other acts on the subject of election were repealed, and this left the act of 1872 the only election law of Louisiana.

The following provisions will be found in this law of 1872:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana in general assembly convened, That all elections for State, parish, and judicial officers, members of the general assembly, and for members of Congress, shall be held on the first Monday in November; and said elections shall be styled the general elections. They shall be held in the manner and form and subject to the regulations hereinafter prescribed, and in no other.

SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, &c., That five persons, to be elected by the senate from all political parties, shall be the returning-officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning-officers. The returning-officers shall, after each election, before entering on their duties, take and subscribe to the following oath before a judge of the supreme or any district court:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of a returning-officer as prescribed by law; that I will carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes, and make a true and correct return of the election: so help me God."

Within ten days after the closing of the election said returning-officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statement of votes made by the commissioners of election, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state. They shall continue in session until such returns have been compiled. The presiding officer shall, at such meeting, open, in the presence of the said returning-officers, the statements of the commissioners of election, and the said returning-officers shall, from said statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate; one copy of such returns they shall file in the office of the secretary of state, and of one copy they shall make public proclamation, by printing in the official journal and such other newspapers as they may deem proper, declaring the names of all persons and officers voted for, the number of votes for each person, and the names of the persons who have been duly and lawfully elected. The return of the election thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers, until set aside after contest according to law, of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected. The governor shall, within thirty days thereafter, issue commissions to all officers thus declared elected, who are required by law to be commissioned.

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, &c., That in such canvass and compilation the returning-officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile first the statements from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever, from any poll or voting-place, there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 26 of this act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented, or tended to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning-officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statement of votes from such poll or voting-place until the statements from all other polls or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning-officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll, or voting-place; and if from the evidence of such statement they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning-officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting-place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning-officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If, after such examination, the said returning-officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning-officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns: Provided, That any person interested in said election by reason of being a candidate for office shall be allowed a hearing before said returning-officers upon making application within the time allowed for the forwarding of the returns of said election.

In the first place, it is offered to prove that this canvassing-board was not legal because it should have consisted of five whereas it only consisted of four; that these four persistently refused to fill the board and give the democrats a representation in said board; and that such refusal was for the purpose of concealing from the opposite party the fraudulent acts of said board by which they gave the returns to the Hayes electors.

Was it a legal board?

The general doctrine seems to be that when authority of a public nature has been delegated to a certain number the authority cannot be exercised by less than the full number, and although a quorum shall consist of a majority, yet all of the five must have the opportunity to attend if they please.

This is especially true when the board is to consist of the representatives of the different political parties and only one of them is represented in an incomplete board.

This question was well considered in the case of Wentworth vs. Farmington, 49 N. Hamp., 120.

The case is directly in point on the proposition submitted, and the court, in its opinion, says:

Even if the statute goes no further than the common-law rule, a report signed by the majority, under the circumstances of this case, would have been good. According to the case of Grindley et al. vs. Barker, 1 B. & P., 228, before cited, it would have been deemed to be the report of the whole. The real point of the objection is that at the time when the report was signed there was a vacancy in the board of commissioners caused by the removal of the chairman from the county; and the general doctrine that in case there be a vacancy in the board the remaining members cannot act seems to be unquestionable. (Palmer vs. Conway, 22 N. H., 148; Mitchell vs. Holderness, 34 N. H., 209, 214.)

The question here, then, is whether this doctrine applies where, at the time the vacancy occurred, nothing remained to be done but to reduce to writing and make the formal report of what had already been determined by the whole board.

In Palmer vs. Conway, before cited, it was held that as there were not three members of the board in office at the time, there was no such board as the statute requires, and therefore there could be no action of the majority.

In that case a report laying out a highway had been recommitted to the same board, and a hearing notified, and before the time appointed one of the commissioners died, but the others went on with the hearing and made several changes in the report, and upon the report being again recommitted, the same two commissioners made further changes, and the report, upon full consideration, was set aside for want of authority in those commissioners to act.

Reference is also made to Pell vs. Ullman, 21 Barb., 500; Pulaski Co. vs. Lincoln, 9 Ark., 320; People vs. Coghill, 47 Cal., 361.

I desire on this point also to refer to an able opinion pronounced on this question by Associate Justice Miller, a member of this Commission, which has been furnished me by Mr. Representative Abbott. It will be found in 1 Woolworth's Circuit Court Reports, 175, and was pronounced in the case of Schenck vs. Peay. Mr. Justice Miller says:

We understand it to be well settled that where authority of this kind is conferred on three or more persons, in order to make its exercise valid all must be present and participate, or have an opportunity to participate, in the proceedings, although some may dissent from the action determined on. The action of two out of three commissioners, to all of whom was confided a power to be exercised, cannot be upheld when the third party took no part in the transaction and was ignorant of what was done, gave no implied consent to the action of the others, and was neither consulted by them nor had any opportunity to exert his legitimate influence in the determination of the course to be pursued. Such is the uncontradicted course of the authorities, so far as we are advised, where the power conferring the authority has not prescribed a different rule. (2 Kent's Commentaries, 293, note a, 633, and authorities cited there, note b; Commonwealth vs. Canal Commissioners, 9 Watts, 466; Green vs. Miller, 6 Johnson, 39; Kirk vs. Ball, 12 Eng. L. & E., 385; Crocker vs. Crane, 21 Wendell, 211; Dougherty vs. Hope, 1 Comstock, 79, 252; ib., 3 Denio, 252, 259.)

The case before us goes even beyond this, for, according to the statement of the bill, there never was a board of commissioners in existence until after the proceedings in regard to his title were completed. The law required three commissioners. A less number was not a board and could do nothing. The third commissioner for Arkansas, although nominated and confirmed, did not qualify or enter upon the duties of his office until after the sale of the lots to the defendants. There was, therefore, no board of commissioners in existence authorized to assess the tax, to receive the money, or to sell the property. If Congress had intended to confide these important functions to two persons, it would not have required the appointment of the third. If it had been willing that two out of the three should act, the statute could easily have made provision for that contingency, as has since been done by the act of 1865.

This reasoning seems perfectly conclusive, and I take it for granted will satisfy the mind of at least one of this Commission that this board of four had no right to canvass the Louisiana returns, and that their determination amounts to nothing—absolutely nothing.

But this is not all. By the law of 1872, above quoted, in the third section the order to be observed by the returning-officers is specifically laid down. They shall compile first the statements from all polls where the election was fair, free, and peaceable. This is a mere addition or summarizing of the results of each poll, and shall be continued through the entire list of polls or parishes in the State, unless there shall be received from some poll or polls a statement required by section 26, and then these last polls are not to be canvassed until all the others are compiled.

Section 26 is as follows:

SEC. 26. Be it further enacted, &c., That in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town in which during the time of registration, or revision of registration, or on any day of election, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting-place, or place of registration, or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences shall prevent or tend to prevent a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervisor of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make in duplicate and under oath a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified voters deterred by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, and disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, from registering or voting, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish. When such statement is made by a commissioner of election or a supervisor of registration, he shall forward it in duplicate to the supervisor of registration of the parish; if in the city of New Orleans to the secretary of state; one copy of which, if made to the supervisor of registration, shall be forwarded by him to the returning-officers provided for in section two of this act, when he makes the returns of election in his parish. His copy of said statement shall be so annexed to his returns of elections, by paste, wax, or some adhesive substance, that the same can be kept together, and the other copy the supervisor of registration shall deliver to the clerk of the court of his parish for the use of the district attorney.

Now, unless this twenty-sixth section is complied with and the affidavit therein prescribed is made within twenty-four hours after the election and shall accompany the returns from the polls attached to the certificate, the returning-officers are absolutely without jurisdiction to inquire into any alleged riot, tumult, or acts of violence. It is offered to be proved that the returning-officers did inquire into and throw out polls when no such affidavits accompanied the returns, and that by thus throwing out polls and parishes, the majority for the Tilden electors was overcome and a majority made to appear for the Hayes electors. We must act on this offer to prove in a motion to admit the evidence as if the proof would come up to the offer. If this be so, then the returning-officers—granting for the sake of the argument that they had the right to proceed without filling the board—proceeded without jurisdiction and had no more right to throw out parishes than any other persons had to act in the premises. If the offer of proof is made good, these returning-officers did not commit an error of judgment in a matter committed to their discretion, but proceeded without jurisdiction and were mere usurpers. It is alleged in the offers of proof that the affidavits provided for by the twenty-sixth section did not accompany the returns from the polls, but were supplied in New Orleans long after the time prescribed by that section, and were made by persons who knew nothing about the facts they were swearing to; that fraud and perjury were resorted to to afford these returning-officers a chance or pretext for throwing out these returns.

To confirm my view of the powers and duties of these returning-officers, under the third and twenty-sixth sections, I quote from a report of a House committee dated February 23, 1875, and signed by George F. Hoar, William A. Wheeler, and W. P. Frye.

After quoting said sections the report proceeds to state :

Upon this statute we are clearly of opinion that the returning-board had no right to do anything except to canvass and compile the returns which were lawfully made to them by the local officers, except in cases where they were accompanied by the certificate of the supervisor or commissioner provided in the third section. In such cases the last sentence of that section shows that it was expected that they would ordinarily exercise the grave and delicate duty of investigating charges of riot, tumult, bribery or corruption, on a hearing of the parties interested in the office. It never could have been meant that this board of its own motion, sitting in New Orleans, at a distance from the place of voting, and without notice, could decide the rights of persons claiming to be elected.

This construction of the powers of the returning-board of Louisiana has been acquiesced in by both Houses of Congress, and the electoral vote of Louisiana cast in 1872 was rejected by the concurrent action of the Senate and House of Representatives, because the laws of said State had not been complied with in the canvass and return of the votes cast for the appointment of the electors. See pages 396-407 Compilation of Proceedings of Counting the Electoral Votes.

Of the votes actually cast at the late election for the appointment of electors in Louisiana, the democratic electors received majorities ranging from 5,300 to 8,990; on the face of the returns as made by the supervisors of registration to the board of returning-officers their majorities ranged from 3,459 to 6,405, but by the canvass and the return made by the returning-officers majorities were certified in favor of the republican electors, ranging from 3,437 to 4,800. To produce this result, sixty-nine polls were rejected, embracing twenty-two parishes in whole or in part.

It is believed that in no single instance did the returning-officers have this foundation laid for inquiring into and rejecting the returns from any parish. This board was of special jurisdiction, and its action, according to well-settled principles, must show on its face jurisdiction. In Thatcher vs. Powell, 6 Wheaton, 119, the court, by Marshall, C. J., say:

In summary proceedings, when a court exercises an extraordinary power under a special statute prescribing its course, we think that course ought to be exactly observed, and those facts especially which give jurisdiction ought to appear in order to show that its proceedings are coram judice. Without this act of assembly, the order for sale would have been totally void. This act gives the power only on a report to be made by the sheriff. This report gives the court jurisdiction, and without it the court is as powerless as if the act had never passed. (Walker vs. Turner, 9 Wheat., 541; Atkins vs. Brewer, 3 Cowen, 306; 2 Lord Raymond, 1144.)

I have endeavored to show that this board of returning-officers had no right to act because it did not consist of the statutory number and because they refused to fill the vacancy in it from fraud; that if empowered to act they had no jurisdiction to throw out parishes, and that their action was a mere usurpation. In addition to all this, it is proposed to prove that this board was corrupt, that its action was fraudulent, that they proceeded upon forged papers and affidavits knowing them to be forged, that they encouraged and promoted perjury and forgery in their criminal attempt to rob the State of her true electoral vote, that they offered to sell their services to one of the political parties contending for the vote. This fraudulent and most wicked conduct of the returning-officers reflects a flood of light on their refusal to fill the vacancy in the board with a political opponent, who would have exposed and denounced their conduct on the spot and prevented the consummation of their hellish purpose. It also reflects light on their assumption of jurisdiction to throw out parishes when by the law under which they were acting they had no such jurisdiction.

Taken altogether, the offer of proof shows that there was a damnable conspiracy to cheat the people of this State out of their vote and to elect a President against the wishes of the people by the most disreputable and fraudulent means. This, too, in a State where the whole election machinery was in the hands of republicans, and not the remotest chance given to their opponents to use unfair means to carry the State if they had been disposed to use them. Now, how shall we discharge our duty under this bill if we shut our eyes to these monstrous acts of fraud, perjury, and forgery, by which the votes of this State have been certified for Hayes? Can we say the Hayes votes are the true votes of the State and such as are provided for by the Constitution, in the face of these facts offered to be proved? Heaven forbid that this Commission shall by its action legalize and confirm these outrageous acts, and make fraud respectable and potent in shaping the political destinies of the American people.

Under pretense that we cannot interfere with State action, for God's sake do not let us inflict this grievous wrong on the already down-trodden people of that State. Let us not by our action make these despicable and corrupt returning-officers a power in the land, and give to returning-boards in future elections, instead of to the people, the power to elect a President.

This is a question that does not concern the people of Louisiana alone. It affects the political destiny of the whole American people. Thirty-seven States besides Louisiana are looking to our action and are interested in our decision. If a corrupt returning-board can cheat that State of her vote, the same fate may await any other State in this Union.

But they also offer to prove that two of the pretended electors who cast their votes for Hayes, to wit, A. B. Levissee and O. H. Brewster, were holding offices of trust and profit under the United States when they were appointed. They did not attend the meeting at first, and were elected by the others to fill the vacancy. I will not repeat here the remarks I made on this subject in the Florida case. They commend themselves to my judgment the more I reflect on them. I will only add a few remarks which seem peculiarly applicable to this case. It seems that these two persons felt that they had not been legally appointed, and that the Constitution prohibited their appointment. They therefore failed to attend, and the college proceeded to fill the vacancies caused by their failure to attend. If I am right that the only election law in force in Louisiana is the law of 1872, which repealed all other acts on the subject of election, then there is no law of that State which provides for filling these vacancies in that way. The only provision on the subject of filling vacancies will be found in the twenty-fourth section, as follows :

SEC. 24. Be it further enacted, &c., That all elections to be held in this State to fill any vacancies shall be conducted and managed, and returns thereof shall be made, in the same manner as is provided for general elections.

This is a provision to fill vacancies by a popular election, and confers no power on the board to fill vacancies.

Nor does any law of Congress confer this power. All the provisions on this subject will be found in the following sections of the Revised Statutes :

SEC. 133. Each State may, by law, provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

SEC. 134. Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day, in such a manner as the legislature of such State may direct.

I beg leave to conclude what I have to say on this subject by quoting from the brilliant and able speech of Hon. Matt Carpenter :

After quoting the two sections from the Revised Statutes as above, he says :

Two cases are here provided for: one, the case of a vacancy occurring after the election; the other, a failure to make an election. Waiving at present the question whether as between two candidates, the one receiving the greater number of votes being ineligible, his opponent is elected, in virtue of a smaller number of legal votes, and assuming that he is not, then it is unquestionable that the election is void.

In the case of the contested seat in the Senate between Vance and Abbott from North Carolina, there was a very full discussion upon this subject. Vance, who received the largest number of votes, was ineligible under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and Abbott, who received the next highest number of votes and was eligible, claimed the seat. The Senate decided that Abbott was not entitled to the seat, and, of course, that the State had failed to make an election of Senator.

The Constitution of the United States, article 2, section 1, authorizes each State to appoint an elector, but provides that no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed.

This provision of the Constitution applied to the case in hand is this: The State of Louisiana may appoint eight electors; but A. B. Levissee and O. H. Brewster shall not be appointed. Hence any attempt to appoint Levissee and Brewster is unconstitutional and void. And hence it follows that the State appointed but six electors; in other words, they failed to elect the full number to which the State was entitled. This is the case provided for by the last section quoted from the Revised Statutes of Congress, which declares that the State may by law provide for subsequent appointment. If the act of 1868 was not in force, the only provision in relation to filling such a vacancy was by subsequent popular election. (Election law of 1872, section 24.) If the act of 1868 was in force, it only provided for filling a vacancy occurring after the officer had been elected. So then, whether the act of 1868 was or was not in force, there was no law of the State which authorized the appointment in place of Levissee and Brewster, as to whom there had been a failure to elect.

And therefore, in any event, two of the votes given by the Hayes electors must be rejected.

The case of the United States vs. The Amistad, 15 Peters, 518, is instructive on this point. The court say it is argued "that the ship and cargo and negroes were duly documented as belonging to Spanish subjects, and this court has no right to look behind these documents; that full faith and credit is to be given to them, and that they are to be held conclusive evidence in this cause, even although it should be established by the most satisfactory proofs that they have been obtained by the grossest frauds and impositions upon the constituted authorities of Spain. To this argument we can in no wise assent. There is nothing in the treaty which justifies or sustains the argument. We do not here meddle with the point whether there has been any connivance in this illegal traffic on the part of any of the colonial authorities or subordinate officers of Cuba; because, in our view, such an examination is unnecessary and ought not to be pursued, unless it were indispensable to public justice, although it has been strongly pressed at the bar. What we proceed upon is this: that, although public documents of the Government accompanying property found on board of the private ships of a foreign nation, certainly are to be deemed prima-facie evidence of the facts which they propose to state, yet they are always open to be impugned for fraud; and whether that fraud be in the original obtaining of these documents, or in the subsequent fraudulent and illegal use of them, when once it is satisfactorily established, it overthrows all their sanctity and destroys them as proof. Fraud will vitiate any, even the most solemn, transactions; and an asserted title to property founded upon it is utterly void. The very language of the ninth article of the treaty of 1795 requires the proprietor to make due and sufficient proof of his property. And how can that proof be deemed either due or sufficient, which is but a connected and stained tissue of fraud? This is not a mere rule of municipal jurisprudence. Nothing is more clear in the law of nations as an established rule to regulate their rights and duties and intercourse than the doctrine that the ship's papers are but prima-facie evidence, and that if they are shown to be fraudulent they are not to be held proof of any valid title. This rule is familiarly applied, and indeed is of every-day occurrence in cases of prize, in the contests between belligerents and neutrals, as is apparent from numerous cases to be found in the reports of this court; and it is just as applicable to the transactions of civil intercourse between nations in times of peace. If a private ship clothed with Spanish papers should enter the ports of the United States claiming the privileges and immunities and rights belonging to bona-fide subjects of Spain under our treaties or laws, and she should in reality belong to the subjects of another nation which was not entitled to any such privileges, immunities, or rights, and the proprietors were seeking by fraud to cover their own illegal acts under the flag of Spain, there can be no doubt that it would be the duty of our courts to strip off the disguise and to look at the case according to its naked realities. In the solemn treaties between nations it can never be presumed that either State intends to provide the means of perpetrating or protecting frauds, but all the provisions are to be construed as intended to be applied to bona-fide transactions."

OREGON.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The Commission has decided the cases of Florida and Louisiana. The votes of those States have been given for Hayes under the decision of this Commission sworn to decide what persons were duly appointed electors. This requirement of the law and this obligation of the oath have been met by a decision that this Commission could not go behind the governor's certificates, based on the certificates of returning-boards, although the proof was offered that these certificates were, in Florida, in violation of the law of the State; that the three departments of that State government had declared in solemn form that these certificates were illegal and void; that the people of the State of Florida in the mode prescribed by the legislature had by a decided majority appointed Tilden electors.

In Louisiana the votes of that State have been given to Hayes on the same ground of the conclusive effect of the governor's certificate based on the certificate of returning-board, notwithstanding the evidence was at hand and offered that these certificates were the result of a most fraudulent conspiracy to count the vote for Hayes; that counsel were ready to prove that these certificates were procured by perjury and forgery; that the returning-board illegally discarded many thousand votes cast for the Tilden electors, without even the color of authority; that the board offered to sell the return of the State to one of the political parties; that the State had, by about eight thousand majority, appointed the Tilden electors in the mode prescribed by her legislature.

Notwithstanding all this, a majority of this Commission shut their eyes to these monstrous facts and decided that they must count according to certificates, and that they, representing the powers of the two Houses of Congress, were yet powerless to examine into and correct these gross wrongs, in deciding what persons were duly appointed electors in such States. These decisions must shock the minds of the legal profession and paralyze the love of the American citizens for their institutions when these acts of fraud, forgery, and perjury can be committed with impunity, the Constitution violated and the guardians of the people's rights declared impotent to defend and correct!

In this case of Oregon the technical advantages seem to be on the Tilden side of the case, and I am curious to see whether they are as potential in that direction as the other. It seems that a majority of votes were cast for Odell, Watts, and Cartwright on 7th November, 1876. One of these, Mr. Watts, was on the day of election a postmaster, and the governor, acting under the best legal counsel, decided that Watts was not, and that Cronin, the next highest, was, appointed, and gave the certificates required by law to Odell, Cartwright, and Cronin, the last having possession of them.

On December 6, according to the offer of proof, Cronin proposed to act with Odell and Cartwright in the formation of the electoral college. They refused. He then proceeded to act alone; filled the vacancies by the appointment of Miller and Parker, and they cast two votes for Hayes and one for Tilden. Odell and Cartwright proceeded by themselves to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Watts by the election of Watts, and they cast the three votes for Hayes.

Which are the constitutional votes and who are the duly-appointed electors of Oregon? If the strict technical rule applied to Florida and Louisiana be applied to Oregon, then the vote of the Cronin college must be recognized as the constitutional vote of Oregon. By the election law, it is provided:

SEC. 37. The county clerk, immediately after making the abstract of the votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each of said abstracts, and transmit it by mail to the secretary of state at the seat of government; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, State printer, justices of the supreme court, member of Congress, and district attorneys; and the governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes, and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person. In case there shall be no choice, by reason of any two or more persons having an equal and the highest number of votes for either of such offices, the governor shall by proclamation order a new election to fill said offices.

SEC. 60. The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

These provisions make the governor and secretary of state the returning-board of Oregon, and the certificates held by Odell, Cartwright, and Cronin will be found on examination to comply strictly with the above provisions of law. The secretary of state in presence of the governor did canvass the votes according to section 37. He did prepare two lists of the persons elected and affixed the seal of the State to the same, and the governor and secretary did sign the same, as required by section 60, and all of this will be found in the governor's certificate, attested by the secretary of state, which accompanies the Cronin certificate No. 2.

It seems to me, therefore, that the votes in the Cronin certificate, according to the ruling of the majority in Florida and Louisiana, are the constitutional votes of Oregon. If the ruling in Florida and Louisiana was right, I demand at the hands of the majority of this Commission a similar ruling in this Oregon case. But, sir, I do not believe that ruling was right. I am more convinced it is wrong the more I think of and study it. I do not believe it is right to smother the voice of a State in a presidential election on such technical quibbles. I do not believe we are discharging our duty to the country and to the law creating this Commission, in refusing to hear evidence to determine the constitutional and duly-appointed electors of a State. I believe that the State of Oregon by a decided, though not large majority, voted for Hayes, and I am not willing to have any part of her vote cast for Tilden. I shall not, therefore, maintain that the vote cast by the Cronin college is the constitutional vote of Oregon.

In taking this position I do not mean to reflect on the conduct of the governor in giving a certificate of election to Cronin instead of Watts, who by concession was a Federal officer on the day of election.

I think the governor was bound by his oath to refuse a certificate to Watts. The votes cast for him were absolute nullities, and according to many of the best-considered authorities these votes for Watts were thrown away—considered as not given to anybody—and Cronin, the next highest candidate or the highest eligible candidate, was duly elected.

While I feel it would not be proper to give one vote in Oregon to Tilden, the oath I have taken as a member of this Commission will prevent me from giving more than two of the three votes to Hayes.

Watts was by concession a Federal officer on the day of election and was ineligible, could not be appointed. See authorities cited in Florida case. Watts, Odell, and Cartwright all seemed to have felt and acknowledged this ineligibility by Watts's resignation and its acceptance. The other two at once proceeded to fill the vacancy by the election or appointment of this same Watts. Now, was there a vacancy? I will not repeat the argument made or attempted in the Florida case, but content myself with referring to it and to some of the authorities, most of which are familiar to the members of this Commission. Clark & Hall, 871. Story on the Constitution, sec. 1559. Sergeant's Const. Law, (2d ed.,) 373. Schenck vs. Peay, 1 Dillon, 267. State vs. Benedict, 15 Minn., 199. Battle vs. McIver, 68 N. C., 469. Stratton vs. Oulton, 28-

Cal., 51. People vs. Stratton, 28 Cal., 382. People vs. Parker, 37 Cal., 639. Dodd Ex parte, 6 Eng., (Ark.), 152. State vs. Jenkins, 43 Mo., 261.

These authorities establish to my mind that there was no vacancy, but failure to elect if Cronin was not elected. These authorities are greatly strengthened by the statutory definition of a vacancy in Oregon.

The laws of Oregon bearing on this subject are as follows:

TITLE VI—OF VACANCIES.

SEC. 48. Every office shall become vacant on the occurring of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office:

1. The death of the incumbent;
2. His resignation;
3. His removal;
4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village for which he shall have been elected or appointed or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged;
5. His conviction of an infamous crime, or of any offense involving a violation of his oath;
6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office, or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law;
7. The decision of a competent tribunal, declaring void his election or appointment.

SEC. 49. The governor shall also declare vacant the office of every officer required by law to execute an official bond, whenever a judgment shall be obtained against such officer for a breach of the conditions of such bond.

TITLE IX—OF THE ELECTION OF PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS.

SEC. 53. On the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1864, and every four years thereafter, there shall be elected by the qualified electors of this State as many electors of President and Vice-President as this State may be entitled to elect of Senators and Representatives in Congress.

SEC. 59. The electors of President and Vice-President shall convene at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of December next after their election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day, and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college, and when all the electors shall appear, or the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled as above provided, such electors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

In all cases of vacancy under this law there must first have been a legal and eligible incumbent; and no vacancy can exist, then, in an office unless the office has first been duly filled.

So also the authority given to the electors to fill vacancies by the fifty-ninth section looks merely to a vacancy caused by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, that is, by any other like cause.

I am constrained to believe that Odell and Cartwright had no authority to elect Watts or any other person as an elector, and consequently that Watts had no right to cast his vote for President.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. Commissioner HUNTON said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: We have now reached the last case to be submitted to this Commission. That it has disappointed public expectation in its decisions, I need not declare. By a vote of eight to seven, this Commission has decided on purely technical grounds that Florida and Louisiana voted for Hayes, and by the same vote of the same members have, as I think, discarded these same technical grounds to give the one disputed vote of Oregon to Hayes. I say this Commission has disappointed public expectation, because the country expected of it that it would decide who had been elected President and Vice-President by the people. They did not expect of us that we would merely confirm the judgment of corrupt and illegal returning-boards, who were ready to put the Presidency up to the highest bidder in the public market.

But our action in the three cases has become a part of the history of the country, and we must stand or fall by the judgment of the forty-four millions of people who have been anxious, interested, and discontented witnesses of our conduct.

In the case of South Carolina different facts are presented from any heretofore offered. We have heretofore been called on to protect States from corrupt returning-boards who have stifled the voice of the people on election-day, and to protect the Constitution of the United States from 'infracton by the attempt to appoint persons electors when the States are expressly inhibited by the Constitution from making such appointments.

The South Carolina case will be better understood by reference to the offer of proof, as follows :

In support of the objections to certificate No. 1, it is proposed to prove by competent evidence the following facts, which said facts are offered separately and as a whole:

First. That by reason of the failure and refusal of the legislature of South Carolina to provide for a registration of electors, as required by article 8, section 3, of the constitution of said State, and by reason of the acts passed by said legislature in violation of the spirit of such constitutional provision, great frauds were perpetrated by colored republican voters; that at least 3,000 illegal votes were cast for the Hayes electors, which said votes being excluded would give a large majority to the Tilden electors.

Second. That immediately after the adjournment of Congress, to wit, in the month of August, A. D. 1876, a large number of United States soldiers, under command of General Ruger, were sent by the President into said State; that on October 16, General Ruger telegraphed to the authorities at Washington that all was quiet; that there was no need for further troops; that if he (Ruger) deemed a further force necessary he would call for the same; that he never did call for more troops; but that on October 17 the President issued a proclamation declaring that the people of said State were in a condition of insurrection, and that immediately thereafter large numbers of United States soldiers were sent into said State; that at no time prior to the last-mentioned date was there a condition of violence or insurrection which the authorities of the State were unable to control; that at no time during the year 1876 did such a state of affairs exist in South Carolina as justified the intervention of the Federal Government.

Third. That the troops were sent into said State without any action of the legislature thereof, although the same could have been readily convened.

Fourth. That the troops were sent into said State, not for the purpose of quelling insurrection and preserving peace and good order, but for the purpose and with the design of overawing the voters of said State; that said troops were stationed at and near the polls on election-day, and that their presence before and on the day of the election did obstruct and interfere with an expression of the popular will and prevent a free election.

Fifth. That the presence of said troops served to embolden the more desperate of the negroes. Being assured by their party leaders that said troops were there for the purpose of protecting them in any act of violence, the blacks throughout the counties of Beaufort and Charleston inaugurated a condition of riot and lawlessness; that public officials incited them to the commission of every character of crime; that murder was committed, and the perpetrators allowed to escape punishment; that justices refused to issue warrants for the arrest of criminals charged even with the crime of murder, and sheriffs refused to execute such warrants if issued; that the police force of the city of Charleston, composed almost entirely of republican negroes, employed its time in shooting down upon the public streets quiet and inoffensive white men, members of said force being in many instances leaders in the riots which occurred.

That upon election-day the negroes assembled at the polls armed with rifles, shot-guns, and other weapons, and prevented negroes who desired so to do from voting the democratic ticket. That the State militia, composed of the worst element of the negro population, and supplied with State arms, was also at the polls aiding and abetting in the violation of law and in the intimidation of voters. That the sheriff of Charleston County, one of the republican electors, without warrant or authority of law, appointed hundreds of so-called "deputy sheriffs," all negroes and republicans, investing them with the power to make arrests at their pleasure. That these deputy sheriffs swarmed about the various polls on election-day, and by their threats and violence did hinder and prevent many citizens from voting, and did arrest and imprison, without information or warrant, many of those who attempted to vote the democratic ticket. That persons styled "United States deputy marshals" were also stationed at the polls aiding and assisting said "deputy sheriffs." That throughout the State the negroes believed that the United States soldiers had been sent to shoot them if they did not vote the republican ticket.

Sixth. That such violence and lawlessness existed throughout the counties of Charleston and Beaufort shortly before and on the day of the election, which said lawlessness was primarily attributable to the occupation of said State by United States soldiers, that no free election could be or was held in said counties, but that, upon the contrary, the popular will found no expression at the polls; that by reason of the lawlessness which existed in the county of Charleston alone the republican electors secured a majority of about 7,000 votes.

The well-understood rule must be applied. In passing upon the admissibility of evidence we must assume that all that is offered to be proved can be proved.

Applying this rule, I ask, What was the condition of South Carolina on the day of election and for several weeks preceding?

There was no condition of violence or insurrection which the State authorities were unable to control. There was nothing to justify the intervention of the Federal Government in the affairs of South Carolina. On the 16th October General Ruger, commanding the Federal troops in that State, reported all quiet and that there was no need for further troops.

Notwithstanding, on the very next day the President, without authority, declared by proclamation that the people of the State were in a condition of insurrection, and forced Federal troops into that State.

These troops were sent into the State, not for the purpose, as avowed, of preserving the peace and quelling insurrection, but to over-awe the voters. The troops were stationed near the polls on the day of election, and did obstruct the free expression of the popular will.

The presence of troops emboldened the desperate colored men, who, incited to deeds of violence by party leaders, committed all sorts of acts of intimidation on colored men who wished to vote the democratic ticket.

The police force of Charleston, composed mainly of republican negroes, shot down on the public streets quiet white men.

Scenes of violence and bloodshed occurred at many of the polls.

All this and much more was done by the public authorities and protected by the troops of the Federal Government with the design to deter men, and especially colored men, from voting the democratic ticket.

If the half of this is true and can be proved as they offer to do, can it be said there was a free election in that State? Can it be said that the apparent small majority for Hayes expressed the true voice of the State of South Carolina?

Can the electors thus chosen be said by us to be duly appointed? Can we say their votes are the votes provided for by the Constitution?

It is very certain if this state of affairs existed in South Carolina on and before the day of election, that the Hayes electors were chosen by force brought to bear by the Federal Government for the purpose of compelling the result; that a state of anarchy and lawlessness prevailed which absolutely prevented, as it was designed to do, a free and fair expression of the political preferences of the voters of the State; that this condition of affairs in that unhappy State was deliberately planned and persistently and wickedly carried out to coerce the voters of that State for Hayes.

We should be most culpable, nay criminal, if we allowed this wicked design to culminate here by counting the vote of the State for Hayes.

There was such a state of affairs existing there that there could not be said there was on the day of election a republican government in the State.

I am, therefore, for admitting the evidence, and, if the proof comes up to the offer, for deciding that no persons were duly appointed electors in that State, and that no votes have been cast for President and Vice-President which are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER ABBOTT.

FLORIDA.

The Commission having under consideration the electoral vote of Florida—

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT said substantially :

Mr. PRESIDENT: I understand the Senator from Vermont claims that it is not within the power of this Commission to take evidence to contradict the governor's return made in pursuance of the act of Congress, while the Senator from Indiana is of the opinion that the governor's return under the act of Congress may be inquired into, but that any return, whether of the governor or any other State officer, required by State laws is conclusive and cannot be controlled or in any way contradicted, varied, or explained. I readily understand the position of the latter Senator; it is taken not only for this case, but for one that may be before us in the future, for in so deciding as to get the vote of Florida, it would not do to render it impossible to count the vote of Oregon. I agree with the Senator from Indiana that the return of the governor under the act of Congress may be controlled, indeed set aside and disregarded, by proving it to be false in fact. The act of Congress does not make that return either conclusive or prima facie evidence, or even evidence at all, in express terms. If it had undertaken to make it conclusive evidence, it certainly would have been unconstitutional. Clearly, Congress has no authority to prescribe what shall be conclusive evidence in such a case, and, probably, it would be held, had no right to impose such a duty upon the chief executive of a State.

But upon the Senator's second proposition I by no means agree with him. He claims, as I understand him, that in no event can a return made under the laws of a State be controlled, inquired into, varied, or shown to be wrong, not according to the fact, whether this falsity arise from innocent mistakes—a mere error in the addition of figures, for example—or from fraud and corruption; nay, further, if the return is once made by the officers appointed under the State law to count the votes and determine the persons elected, it cannot be shown that such officers have exceeded the jurisdiction given them by that law, have done what the law forbade them to do, so that in fact their return is not an execution of the State law, but a direct violation of it.

Under this claim we are told that both Houses of Congress must count the votes given by electors from any State who are certified to be elected by State officers appointed by the law of the State to count the votes and determine the persons elected, although it may be proven beyond all question that the return is untrue in fact, either because the officers making it had made an innocent mistake in adding up a column of figures, or because, actuated by the grossest and most fraudulent of motives, even to the extent of having been paid so to do, they deliberately and willfully made an utterly false return, even certifying persons to be elected who never had been voted for.

I understand the claim goes even further than this, which would seem to be going far enough in all conscience. We are told that if this return is once made, the certificate of election once given, there is no power to recall it, to show that it is false either from fraud or mistake; that it must stand; that the persons in whose favor it is made must cast the vote of the State for President; and that such votes must be counted by the two Houses of Congress, although known to every man, woman, and child in the land to be false and wrong, and although it may have been declared false and wrong by the parties making it, by the highest courts, by the legislature and the executive of the State! Such a claim is most extraordinary and startling. It is abhorrent to the sense of justice and right of every fair-minded man in the land. Nothing but the strongest, clearest, and most incontrovertible reasons can ever compel the public conscience and judgment to assent to it.

We are told that the two Houses of Congress, for it is admitted that this Commission has all their powers in the premises, have no power to do anything more than simply to perform an arithmetical operation in ascertaining the persons voted for as President; that they are to count the votes and nothing more. I agree that they are to count the votes; but, in order to count the votes, they must first determine whether there are any votes to count, and whether those votes have been cast by duly-appointed electors, or by impostors. They not only have the power, but it is a duty imposed upon them, to inquire into and to authenticate the votes, and, where there are several returns claiming to be votes, to determine which are the true votes and which truly declare the real will of the State according to the State law.

Each and every State has the greatest interest not only in its own vote for President but in the vote of each of the other States. No greater wrong could be done to the people of all the other States than to have a President imposed upon them, not by the honest, real vote of a single State, but by a fraudulent and wicked misrepresentation of that vote, so that the high office should be filled by one never elected by the people or the States.

The Constitution meant to give the power of determining the greatest political question that could ever arise, namely, who should be Chief Magistrate, to some persons or bodies of persons; it was not intended to be left unprovided for; it must be determined every four years; and it is absurd to claim that no provision was made by the organic law for so doing. It is a question which does not determine itself; it must be done by human means; and if provision had not been made, the Government would not have survived the first election, for it could never have been decided who had been elected. Nor is this determination confined merely to the arithmetical duty of counting what are claimed to be votes. Each and every State, as I have said, has the same interest in the vote of every other State as in its own; each State has the highest interest, nay, right, that the vote of every other State should be the real vote of that State according to its law, and should not misrepresent its true voice. Without the power somewhere to determine this question, to decide which are the true votes to be counted, both the spirit and letter of the Constitution could be violated with impunity, and both the States and the people grossly defrauded and deprived of the rights guaranteed to them by their organic law. There was no meeting together of all the electors from the different States provided for, so that all could pass on the question who were entitled to cast the vote of each State. No power was given to the electoral college of each State to pass upon or determine the election of its members. And still that question must be determined or the Government could never have got itself even launched. And to whom should that most vital power be granted but to the two great legislative bodies to which are intrusted most of the powers to be exercised under the Constitution; upon one of which is imposed the great duty of choosing the President, if none has been chosen by the States and the people, and upon the other the like duty of choosing a Vice-President in the same contingency? The language of the Constitution is amply sufficient to impose this duty of determining who has been elected President upon the two Houses of Congress. If those two Houses refuse to perform this duty, confine themselves merely to the arithmetic of the count instead of discharging their great obligation to the people and to the States of determining what is the real, honest vote of each State according to the law of that State, then they are unworthy of the great trust confided to them. This trust can only be discharged by ascertaining whether the vote offered from each State is the vote of that State according to its law; nothing more, nothing less is the measure and requirement of that trust.

Let me not be misunderstood. It is claimed by the Senator from Indiana and those agreeing with him, that the doctrine of State rights bars the way to any inquiry into the question whether the persons from any State claiming to cast its vote are the true electors, and compels Congress to confine itself merely to counting. I have always been a true and faithful disciple of the great doctrine of State rights. I have always believed in it, and always expect and hope to remain steadfast in my faith. From day to day I am the more assured that there is no way known to man by which our Government can be preserved except by the strictest and firmest maintenance of all the rights of the States. I yield to no one in my fidelity to the doctrine of State rights, but I am not willing to carry it to the extent of doing in its name the greatest wrongs to States, instead of upholding their rights. There never was a clearer case of stealing "the livery of the court of Heaven to serve the devil in," than in thus attempting to wrest the doctrine of State rights to excuse and justify this great wrong to States.

Those with whom I agree do not desire to interfere in the slightest degree with the smallest right of a State. We agree that each State by its legislature can prescribe the manner of the appointment of its electors, and that Congress can in no way interfere. We agree, further, that the State legislature may prescribe the manner of voting for the electors, the method of counting the vote and of ascertaining and determining who has been elected, and Congress cannot interfere. We agree that, if the law of the State has been followed out and complied with, and a return made according to and complying with its provisions, Congress must take and give full effect to such a return.

Much has been said here by those opposed to us about "going behind the returns," and the terrible consequences of such an act. You would suppose that if it was once established that so terrible a crime as to go for a moment "behind the returns" could be perpetrated, we should wander in the great wilderness which the imagination of our friends on the other side has conjured up as lying beyond that mysterious limit for as many years as did the Israelites in the deserts of arid and burning sands before they entered into the promised land. It is a chimera conjured up not to enlighten but rather to darken and mislead counsel.

In no real, proper, true sense is it proposed to go "behind the returns." On the contrary, it is only proposed to go to the returns, not behind them; to go to them, I say, and near enough to them to ascertain whether they are real, true, honest returns; whether they are made ac-ording to and in conformity with the laws of the State, or in conflict with and in violation of such laws; whether they are true and honest, or the mere results and creations of fraud and bribery and corruption on the part of those making them; for if in making them the makers were simply endeavoring to perpetrate a fraud, to establish a lie, instead of certifying to the facts and the truth, then they are no returns by any law ever recognized by any civilized people who ever lived on the earth.

Is it not as clear as the sun in the heavens that, if we do not inquire whether the returns are the returns in truth and fact, whether they are in accordance with the law of the State instead of in conflict with it, whether they certify the truth or a lie, whether they are honest or steeped in fraud, we are not only doing a great wrong to all the other States, but a greater to the State whose vote is the subject of inquiry, depriving it indeed of one of its greatest rights?

Let it not be said, then, that we propose "to go behind the returns" in the popular acceptation of the words, or in the sense here claimed. We have no occasion to go behind them, but we can go to them. We can examine them, whether they are returns in fact and in truth, whether they are made in accordance with and not in violation of law, whether the makers of them executed the law under which they acted and certified the truth; or whether, being corrupt and fraudulent, they not only refused to execute it and certify the truth, but on the contrary put a lie in its place.

Take the case under consideration. What is proposed? Fraud is not directly and in terms alleged, I agree; but it is alleged that the return is not made in accordance with, but in direct violation of the law of the State of Florida, and that the persons making it exceeded and went beyond any jurisdiction given them by law in the premises.

What are the facts offered to be proved—indeed proved by the copies of records and papers before us? Why, by the law of Florida the secretary of state, the attorney-general, and the comptroller-general are made a board of State canvassers to canvass the county returns and to determine and declare who have been elected. They are to make a certificate of such determination, which is to be filed in the office of the secretary of state, and that officer is to send to each person elected a certificate of his election, which is made prima facie evidence, nothing more. This board, if the return from any county is so irregular or fraudulent that the truth cannot be ascertained from it, have power to reject the whole return, nothing more. Two only of the canvassers joined in the certificate of the Hayes electors; the third refused to do so on the ground that the statements in the certificate were not true.

It is offered to be proved that the two canvassers did not execute the law which gave them their only jurisdiction to act, but violated that law, exceeded their jurisdiction, and in and by their return stated not the truth but a lie. Here is no attempt to go behind the return, only to go to it, to see if it is a return under and by virtue of the State law, or whether it is in fact no return. To show that it is no return by which any one could be bound, it is offered to be proved that the supreme court of Florida has passed upon and decided the question—in fact, decided that in making the return the canvassers went outside of and beyond their jurisdiction. It is also offered to be proved that a circuit court, having jurisdiction under the State constitution, in a process of quo warranto instituted by the Tilden electors against the Hayes electors and served upon the latter before they had cast their votes, has given judgment that the Hayes electors were not, but that the Tilden electors were legally elected, and has also given judgment of ouster against the former. It is further offered to be proved, and we have the proof before us, that by judgment of the supreme court of Florida all the State officers, from governor down, who were voted for at the same election and on the same ticket with the Tilden electors, and who received substantially the same number of votes, have been declared legally elected, and been put in possession of their respective offices, although the candidates upon the Hayes ticket for State officers had been declared elected by the State canvassers at the same time they had declared the Hayes electors to be elected.

It is offered to be proved, and here again we have the proof before us, that the legislature of the State of Florida has passed an act requiring the board of canvassers to make a new canvass of the votes cast for electors in conformity with the principles laid down by the supreme court; that such canvass has been made, by which it appears that the Tilden electors were elected; that in consequence of such new canvass the legislature has passed another act declaring that the Tilden electors were duly elected and were the only persons authorized to cast the vote of the State, that the Hayes electors had no authority to cast such vote, and ratifying and adopting the vote of the Tilden electors, and directing the governor to certify to the President of the Senate the election of the last-named electors, together with the act itself, which the governor has done.

Thus it is offered to be proved that the certificate of the State canvassers is false in fact; that in making it they exceeded their jurisdiction and authority; that this has been so decided by the supreme court of the State; that the Hayes electors have been ousted from office by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction; that the legislature of the State has intervened and declared that the Hayes electors do not represent the true voice of the State; that the governor has so declared; and that in fact the Hayes electors never were elected, or declared to be elected, in accordance with the laws of the State. And still we are told that this false certificate, made by two men with purely ministerial functions—the appointees of a governor who was himself a candidate for re-election—and which is by law made prima facie evidence only, must stand and cannot be in any way controlled. All powers, all rights, all persons, and bodies of persons, courts, legislature, governor, people, the State itself, pale and stand powerless before this false certificate of two men. No power on earth, we are told, is broad and high and great and strong enough to cope with these two men and their false certificate. They have the power to make a President of a person who confessedly was never elected, while two and forty millions of people and their representatives in Congress and all the States have no power to prevent it. Such a proposition is monstrous. It is abhorrent to all sense of right and justice. It is shocking to the conscience of the whole people and ought not to be entertained. It is a scandal upon all law and would bring it into deserved contempt. By it law would be made to uphold wrong and fraud, instead of right and honesty. The establishing of such a doctrine would offer a premium to fraud; it would tell the world that fraud may be perpetrated with impunity, and that there is no help for it, no way of preventing it, and that the guilty persons may enjoy the fruits of their guilt.

Consider for a moment this claim. The Hayes electors have voted; and we are asked to declare their vote the true vote of Florida, because two irresponsible ministerial officers, keeping back their decision till the day the vote was to be cast, have so declared; and this although the court having jurisdiction of the case has adjudged that they had no right to cast the vote and were not electors either in fact or in law; although the supreme court of the State has in fact so declared; although the legislature and the governor have joined in so finding and declaring; and although these men have never been in fact elected by the voters of Florida. We are told that neither the two Houses of Congress, nor, if I understand it rightly, any other authority on earth, have power against this simple certificate signed by two ministerial officers—the creatures of the governor—and made by law prima facie evidence only; that we must sanction it, declare it sacred, although we know it to be a lie, and thus, in fact, permit two obscure men to elect a person to the high office of President. This is not only to encourage fraud—it is to sanctify it. Instead of declaring, as heretofore we have been taught to believe—foolishly it would seem—that fraud vitiates everything it touches, it is proclaiming that the greater the fraud the more sacred is the act.

Here in Florida we have this strange spectacle: The governor and all the State officers having been voted for on the same ticket with the Tilden electors, having received substantially the same vote, and having been counted out by the same board of canvassers, have been declared elected by the highest judicial authority of the State, and are now exercising the powers of their respective offices peaceably and to the general contentment of the whole people, while the Tilden electors, we are told—although they too have been declared elected by the courts—have no power to act, and their vote must not be counted. What greater scandal upon the law could be imagined?

Why have not the State courts full authority and right to construe the State statutes? Is there any doubt that such is the law? It is so admitted everywhere. I appeal to the members of the Supreme Court upon this board if such is not the inflexible rule which governs the action of that court in construing any statute of a State? Is not the construction put upon a statute of a State by the supreme court of that State as controlling as if such construction had been in express words incorporated into and made a part of the law?

Apply, then, this rule to the Florida case. The supreme court of that State have construed the statute under which the State canvassers act and which alone gives them any authority to act. By their construction the canvassers in giving a certificate to the Hayes electors exceeded and went beyond any jurisdiction and power conferred upon them, and their action is therefore void and of no effect. Tell me why we, why all the world are not bound by that construction. Where do we get the right to set up our construction, or rather the construction of the board of canvassers, of a statute of Florida against the judgment of the supreme court of Florida? Yet, by giving effect to their certificate, we do in fact declare that the judgment of the two canvassers as to what the law is shall prevail over that of the highest judicial authority of the State.

But it is claimed that these Hayes electors having received certificates of election and having voted are de facto officers, and that therefore their acts must be held to be legal and valid. Indeed! But how are the Hayes more than the Tilden electors de facto officers? Both voted at the same time. The vote of neither has been followed by any consequences affecting the rights of any person. The effect of the votes is to be determined in the future, and it is to determine it that we are now here.

The doctrine of de facto officers in no way applies to presidential electors or to their votes. The act of voting affects nobody; it has no power or vitality until they are given by the votes being counted by the Houses of Congress.

A strange perversion is it of the equitable rule that the acts of a de facto officer shall be considered valid as to third persons, to apply it in this case. That rule was established for the protection of innocent third persons who have trusted to and acted upon the fact that an officer was in open and apparently peaceable possession of an office, and to whom great injustice would be done by permitting the acts of such a person to be held void because of a subsequent determination that he was not a legal officer. This rule, that official acts are valid although performed by one having no legal right in that regard, is, however, but an exception, and is applied only in favor of those who have trusted to and acted upon such acts as official, and in order to prevent great wrong to innocent third persons. But in the case of the vote of these electors nobody has trusted to or acted upon it; nobody's rights have been affected by it; nobody's condition has been changed by it; it is inoperative until counted; its whole force and effect is derived from the act and determination of other authorities. We are to give it effect now for the first time.

Besides, this doctrine of the validity of the acts of de facto officers and authorities has never been applied or extended to their political action. While very many of the acts of the governments of the States while in rebellion, and of their officers, have been held valid on the ground that they were de facto, if not de jure, entitled to act in the premises, none of their political action has ever been recognized as binding on any one. And this has been the rule adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I submit that there is no ground upon which the votes of the Hayes electors can be counted. They were, in fact, never elected. To count their votes would be to set aside the judgment of the supreme court, the legislature, and the governor of the State of Florida; it would be to give to the certificate of two ministerial officers, made by law merely prima facie evidence, a power and effect and conclusiveness not given to the judgments of the highest courts of law; a result never before heard of in the administration of justice. To count those votes would be to declare elected to the high office of President a person who never received the votes of the people as required by the Constitution, but whose title would depend simply on the illegal, fraudulent action of two State canvassers in Florida. If it were intended to encourage fraud and to show that there was no way known to the law to prevent its perpetration, no better way to do it could be devised.

To count the votes of the Hayes electors would be the grossest outrage, equally upon the dearest rights of the State and people of Florida, and upon those of all the other States. By it wrong and injustice would be put in the place of right and justice.

If this attempt to authorize these two irresponsible officers, not the State or people of Florida, to appoint presidential electors for that State, is by the judgment of this Commission to be crowned with success, we shall in effect proclaim to all the world that the whole armory of the law and the Constitution contains no weapon of offense or defense by which the high office of Chief Magistrate of the greatest civilized nation on earth can be successfully protected and defended against being seized upon and held by means of the grossest fraud. Such a judgment would proclaim to the world that, to obtain and enjoy the office of President of the United States, it is not now, as in the olden time, necessary to be constitutionally elected by the States and the people, but that a candidate and party, as lacking in principle as they are rich in money, can, by buying a few weak, wicked, and irresponsible State canvassers, gain possession of and hold that high office; and that such an act will be justified and sanctified by the two Houses of Congress. In fine, such a judgment would proclaim that this Government is no longer one of the people, under the Constitution and law, but that it is a Government of returning-boards and their creatures.

LOUISIANA.

The Commission having under consideration the electoral vote of Louisiana—

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT said substantially:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I desire to correct a mistake which Mr. Justice Miller has made in reference to the grounds and effect of the decision of the court in Schenck vs. Peay, 1 Woolworth, C. C. Rep., 175, just referred to.

That decision settles the question that the Louisiana returning-board was not a legally constituted board; that it was, in fact, no board at all; and that its acts are not entitled to respect, and are of no force and effect.

That judgment was by no means put solely or mainly upon the ground that, where three persons are made a board or commission, and two undertake to act without notice to the third, or without the third knowing of or having any opportunity to participate in their doings, the action of the two cannot be sustained. That was not the chief reason for the decision.

The question at issue was the validity of the action of a board of tax-commissioners in Arkansas, I think. The law of Congress provided that three persons should be appointed such commissioners by the President; and three had been appointed, but only two had qualified under the appointment. The two had acted, and under their action certain lands had been taken for the payment of taxes; and the question to be decided was the validity of the action of the two.

The court, Mr. Justice Miller, rightfully, I think, and in accordance with principle and the authorities, held that, where the law provides that three shall constitute a board, a less number cannot make a legal board at all, and that the law having required three commissioners, there was no board until the three were appointed and qualified. Hear what he says on page 188:

The case before us goes even beyond this, for, according to the statement of the bill, there never was a board of commissioners in existence until after the proceedings in regard to this title were completed. The law required three commissioners. A less number was not a board and could do nothing. The third commissioner for Arkansas, though nominated and confirmed, did not qualify or enter upon the duties of his office until after the sale of the lots to the defendant. There was, therefore, no board of commissioners in existence authorized to assess the tax, to receive the money, or to sell the land. If Congress had intended to confide these important functions to two persons it would not have required the appointment of a third. If it had been willing that two out of the three should act, the statute could easily have made provision for that contingency as has since been done by the act of 1865.

After the passage of the law creating the tax-commissioners another act was passed by Congress giving power to a majority of the board to do any and all acts which could be done by the whole board. This, it was claimed, legalized the action of the two commissioners; but Mr. Justice Miller held that, if the last act was retroactive, it did not affect the case, for the clear and plain reason that it applied only to cases where there was a legal board in existence, and that, where the law provided for a board of three, two did not constitute a board at all, and so the act did not apply. If there had been three commissioners in existence, then the act might take effect and confirm the action of the two; but not otherwise. Hear what Mr. Justice Miller says on this point, at page 190:

But if the section we have cited could be held to have a retrospective effect, the case before us does not come within its purview, for it requires a board of tax-commissioners to be in existence, and then provides that a majority of that board can act. We have already shown that, according to the allegations of the bill, no such board was in existence; that none had ever been organized when the two commissioners assessed the tax and sold the defendant's property. The act of 1865 does not pretend to hold that the sale shall be valid when there is no board in existence, where one of the commissioners never qualified, and where, consequently, no authority was ever vested in three which might be exercised by two.

In the case of Schenck vs. Peay, Mr. Justice Miller decides another matter to which I wish to call the careful attention of the Commission, because his decision is so admirably expressed and applies with such directness and force to this case of the constitution of the Louisiana returning-board. It is holden that whenever the rights of property are to be affected by proceedings in pais, i. e., by any board of ministerial officers, their proceedings must be proved to be exactly and strictly in accordance with the law authorizing them. In the case before him the title to a parcel of land was to be affected by the action of the tax-commissioners. I read what he says, at page 188:

Nothing is better settled in the law of this country than that proceedings in pais, for the purpose of divesting one person of his title to real estate, and conferring it upon another, must be shown to have been in exact pursuance of the statute authorizing them, and that no presumption will be indulged in favor of their correctness. This principle has been more frequently applied to tax-titles than to any other class of cases. We cannot presume, therefore, that Congress intended that less than three commissioners could conduct these proceedings, and still less that they intended that, in regard to the important matters confided to the board, any action should be taken when there was no legally organized board in existence.

Apply the rule, thus so well and so forcibly laid down, to the case of the Louisiana returning-board. It is not a court; its action is in pais; it is a ministerial, not a judicial body. The law constituting it requires five members taken from different political parties, the functions of the board being political and to affect parties. As constituted, it consisted of four, not five members, all of the same, not different parties. Upon the action of this board depended the highest rights of the State and of the United States; nay, the very liberties of the people! Shall greater strictness be required in the case of the title to a parcel of land than when the highest rights and dearest liberties of a whole people are concerned?

But the whole decision is applicable to this case of the constitution of the returning-board of Louisiana; and if it is law—and no one doubts it—it forever settles the question that there was no legally-constituted board in that State with any power to act. The Louisiana case is, by all odds, the strongest; for not only is the law fixing the number of members violated, but the much more important provision requiring the board, in order to protect the rights of all, to be made up of different political parties, is utterly disregarded, apparently that the grossest frauds might be committed.

The fact that in the Schenck vs. Peay case the third tax-commissioner, though appointed, had never qualified, makes no difference in principle. The decision is put solely on the ground that when the law requires one number to constitute a board, a less number will not make a legal body. And so it is held in other cases of the highest authority, especially in that of Wentworth vs. Farmington, 49 N. H. Rep., 120.

I commend to the Commission this decision of Mr. Justice Miller for their careful examination.

OREGON.

The Commission having under consideration the electoral vote of Oregon—

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT said substantially :

Mr. PRESIDENT: I wish to call the attention of the Commission to the position of this case in reference and relation to the decisions heretofore made by the majority in the two cases of Louisiana and Florida. In both those cases it has been holden that the certificate of the officers appointed and acting under the State law for the purpose of canvassing the returns and determining who have been elected as presidential electors cannot be questioned, controlled, or contradicted for any cause whatever; that it is final and conclusive, and must be so taken and considered by the two Houses of Congress; in fact that it imports absolute verity.

With that doctrine I did not and do not agree. I protested against it when it was under consideration, and I shall always protest against it. But by its adoption and maintenance by a majority of this Commission the votes of two States have been counted for a person who never received the true and honest votes of those States, but only false certificates from corrupt and fraudulent returning-boards. Unless the majority are prepared in this case to reverse their former action—to change their judgments as the necessities of the case may require—certificate No. 2, given by the governor to Cronin and his associates, must prevail and be declared to be the only conclusive evidence of the appointment of electors for the State of Oregon. There is no escape from such a decision, if consistency is to govern and the same rules which were established in the former cases are to be applied now. In those cases it was held and determined by the majority beyond all peradventure that the certificate of officers appointed under the State law to canvass returns and determine who were elected could, under no circumstances, be controlled, contradicted, or varied; but that it must stand as the conclusive evidence of the appointment of electors against any and all objections. Let us apply this rule to the Oregon certificates numbered 1 and 2, the former being in favor of Watts and his associates, and the latter in favor of Cronin and his associates. In the first place, let us see what is the law of Oregon on the subject of determining the persons chosen as presidential electors. It, in substance, provides that the secretary of state, upon receiving the returns from the different voting-precincts, shall proceed to canvass the votes given for State officers and members of Congress in the presence of the governor; and that the governor shall grant certificates of election to the persons having the highest number of votes, and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such persons. Another section provides that votes for presidential electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed in the same manner as those for members of Congress are given, returned, and canvassed; and that the secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, shall affix thereto the seal of the State, and that such lists shall be signed by the governor and the secretary of state, and delivered to the college of electors.

The certificate of election to be given to members of Congress and State officers is not to be given to the electors; but it is well to consider this provision in determining who are the canvassing-officers for that State. Upon any fair construction of the law the canvassing-officers are the governor and the secretary of state. Neither of them alone has this power, but it resides in both, acting together. As to members of Congress and State officers, the secretary is to canvass the votes in presence of the governor, who alone, from this canvassing, is to certify and proclaim the result. The secretary is subordinate; he is to do the mechanical work, but in the presence of the highest officer of the State, the governor, who alone is to act on the canvass. Where the governor was to make one of the canvassing-board this would be the natural form of expression. It would hardly be provided that the governor should do the work while his secretary was present; but that would be done by the latter in the presence and under the supervision of the governor. The presence of the governor could be required only as canvasser, one who was to be responsible, to see that the work was rightly done. To make him a member, it is by no means necessary that he should do any of the manual or arithmetical work of the canvass; it is sufficient that he is there to see that the right results are reached. Can it with any show of reason be claimed that, if in his presence the secretary should make a mistake or should attempt to commit a fraud, the governor would have no power to set it right, but must make his certificate according to the fraudulent or erroneous canvass by the secretary? His presence is provided for that he may prevent any fraud or mistake in the canvass, and it would be preposterous to claim that he could not correct any such fraud or mistake and make his certificate according to the fact. Indeed, as to Congressmen and State officers he is vested with the sole authority to act. The canvass is made in his presence by the secretary; but the governor alone gives a certificate; he alone determines and proclaims the persons elected.

Now, although the governor is not to make proclamation or alone to give the certificate in the case of electors, his duty with respect to State officers ought to be considered in determining who compose the board of canvassers. In the case of electors the votes are to be canvassed as in the case of State officers, by the secretary of state in the presence of the governor. The canvass can be made by neither without the other; for its validity the governor is just as necessary as the secretary. A canvass made by the secretary alone would be just as illegal, just as void as it would be if made by the governor without the secretary. Both officers are absolutely necessary to make a complete legal canvass. It is of no consequence what part each is to take in the canvass. One may do the mechanical and arithmetical work; the other may be present to see that it is rightly done; both together compose the board of canvassers, not one alone. The test is that both are required to be present when the canvass is made, and that it cannot be made in the absence of either.

Here the canvass is to be made by the secretary and the governor; the secretary is to prepare two lists of the persons elected, to which he is to affix the great seal of the State, and which are to be signed by the governor and himself and delivered to the electors. Can there be any stronger evidence that the governor and secretary are the canvassers of the votes for electors?

The secretary is to canvass the votes in the presence of the governor; both are to ascertain and determine the result—that is, who are elected; and both are to sign a certificate of that result. Both ascertain and determine the fact of election, and both must agree in that ascertainment and determination, for both are required to sign a certificate of it. Both must be present at the canvass, and the absence of either would vitiate it. Both must certify to the result of the canvass, and the refusal of either to do so would destroy the certificate. Can anything show more conclusively that the two—not one—are to canvass the votes, determine who are elected by the canvass, and certify that determination? No certificate of election under the law of Oregon is sufficient unless it is signed by the secretary of state and the governor, and, if it is so signed and the great seal is affixed, it is full and complete—the precise evidence required by law to prove the vote of the State for President. And that certificate must give the result of a canvass of the votes made by both, not one, of the officers signing it.

The certificate of Cronin and his associates fully and exactly answers the requirements of the laws of Oregon. It certifies that Cronin and his associates were elected. It is under the great seal of the State, and is signed by the governor and the secretary of state.

These are all the requirements of the law of Oregon. It is of no consequence what else the certificate may contain; the form of expression is immaterial, for no particular form is prescribed. All that is necessary is that there should appear in it the names of the persons elected as electors; that it should be under the great seal, and be signed by the governor and the secretary of state. All this appears fully and clearly in the Cronin certificate.

The governor certifies that Cronin and his associates are elected, and the secretary of state signs in attestation and affixes the great seal of the State. This is all that is necessary. The fact that it is stated in the certificate that the persons named received the highest number of votes cast for persons eligible under the Constitution of the United States to be appointed electors, and are duly elected, does not affect the validity of the certificate. To be sure, all that was required was to certify the persons duly elected; but because the certificate contains another statement, certainly not contradictory of the first, it does not vitiate it or destroy its effect. This certificate fully meets, too, the requirements of the act of Congress, which directs the governor to cause three lists of the names of the electors of the State to be made, certified, and delivered to the electors; it is certified by the governor under the great seal, and attested by the secretary of state. We have here, then, a certificate of election which in itself fully and exactly complies with and fulfills all the requirements of the law of Oregon and of the act of Congress.

If the Senator from Vermont still adheres to the opinion he expressed in the Florida case, that the certificate of the governor under the act of Congress is final and conclusive, he has such a certificate here. If the Senator from Indiana and the rest of the majority of the Commission propose still to adhere to their decision that the determination of the persons elected as electors and the certificate thereof under and by virtue of the State laws is final and conclusive and cannot be controlled, contradicted, or varied, they have here such a certificate, and it must stand and determine the persons elected unless it is proposed to change that rule of construction. I maintain that, if the decisions of the majority in the Florida and Louisiana cases are to stand and serve as guides in this case to govern it in fact, then Cronin must be declared a duly-appointed elector for Oregon.

To be sure, if you look behind the returns, another person appears to have received some 1,100 more votes than did Cronin; but what of that? If you had looked behind the returns in the Louisiana case you would have found that eight persons received from six to ten thousand votes more than did the persons whom you decided to be elected. Why be troubled at a paltry 1,100 votes, when you have faced without blenching 10,000 votes? When the camel of Louisiana has been swallowed, why strain at the gnat of Oregon?

But let us now examine the certificate of Watts and his associates and see if it comes up to the requirements of any law, State or Federal. Clearly it does not. It contains no certificate of election; it is not signed by the governor, both of which are necessary under the State law; and, not being signed or made by the executive, it in no respect complies with the act of Congress. There is, as I have said, no certificate of election, signed by any one, produced by Watts and his associates. There is, however, a certified statement of the votes cast for electors at the election, from which it is claimed that we, not the secretary of state and governor of Oregon as required by law, are to ascertain and determine who had been elected. That is to say, we are to make ourselves into a returning-board and do the duty of the State officers. The certificate does not state, nor does it appear, that all the votes were legally cast or legally returned. Indeed, no facts are stated from which we can determine who were elected, even were it competent for us to usurp the duties of the State canvassers. It is clear that this is not, and was never intended by the secretary of state to be, a certificate of election under the law of Oregon, and that the one signed by the governor and secretary was so intended. By looking at the affidavit of Watts and his associates, which is attached to Certificate No. 1, you will find them swearing as follows: That they demanded "of the governor and of the secretary of state certified lists of the electors for President and Vice-President of the United States for the State of Oregon, but both L. F. Grover, governor of the State of Oregon, and S. F. Chadwick, secretary of state of said State, then and there refused to deliver to us or either of us any such certified lists or any certificate of election whatever. And being informed that such lists had been delivered to one E. A. Cronin by said secretary of state, we each and all demanded such certified lists of said Cronin, but he then and there refused to deliver or to exhibit such certified lists to us or either of us. Whereupon we have procured from the secretary of state certified copies of the abstract of the vote of the State of Oregon for electors of President and Vice-President at the presidential election held in said State November 7, A. D. 1876, and have attached them to the certified lists of the persons voted for by us and of the votes cast by us for President and Vice-President of the United States, in lieu of a more formal certificate."

Here, then, several things are clear from this sworn statement: First, that the secretary of state and the governor never intended, but always refused, to give any certificate of election to Watts; and that both of these officers did intend to give, and in pursuance of that intent did give, to Cronin a certificate of election in accordance with both State and national law. Second, that all parties interested understood it to be the only legal certificate given. It is claimed here now that the secretary of state, and the governor of Oregon, and all parties interested, together with the citizens of that State, did not know and understand their own law, and that it is left for this Commission to discover that the certificate of election given by the secretary of state and the governor under the great seal, and intended and supposed to be the legal and rightful certificate under State and Federal law, was, in fact, no certificate at all and must be set aside and held of no effect; while a mere abstract of votes, containing no certificate of election and signed only by the secretary of state, and not intended to be given or received as such certificate, answers fully the requirements of the State law, which requires such certificate to certify to the election and to be signed by the governor and the secretary of state.

If the certificate of Cronin is rejected, it is simply reversing the decisions in the Florida and Louisiana cases, and adopting a rule exactly opposite to the one governing those cases.

But even if it is held that the secretary of state alone is the person to canvass the votes and determine who are elected, the Cronin certificate is the only one that meets the requirements of the law. That is the only certificate of election. There is no other. It is under the great seal of the State and is signed by the secretary of state. That it is also signed by the governor does not in any way detract from its legality or effect. So that, whatever construction is put upon the State law, whether it is holden that the secretary of state alone or the governor and secretary together constitute the board of canvassers of votes, that certificate is the only one made in conformity with law—in fact, the only certificate of election at all.

But do not misunderstand me. I do not believe that Cronin was duly elected an elector for the State of Oregon, and I shall so vote. I agree that the weight of American authorities, including especially those of my own State, are in his favor; but I believe the true, the fair, the just rule to be this: When a person ineligible for election is voted for and receives the largest number of votes, it must be held that there is no election, unless it can be proved that the electors knew of his ineligibility when they voted for him, and in that case their votes are to be treated as mere blanks, not votes at all. In this case I am not satisfied that the people of Oregon can be fairly said to have known that Watts held the office of postmaster. Some of them did undoubtedly know it; but in a State so large territorially as is Oregon, it is not reasonable to suppose that any considerable number of the citizens of that State knew that he was postmaster in a small town, and I therefore think it must be held that, Watts being ineligible, there was no election of one elector.

That Watts held an office of profit under the United States at the time he was voted for is not denied. It has been held here that if such a person receives the certificate of election from the proper authorities his vote must be counted, and that the two Houses of Congress have no power to inquire whether he is by the Constitution prohibited from being elected or not. This seems to me a most monstrous proposition, one equally strange and dangerous. The prohibition of the Constitution is absolute.

No person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector.

Nothing could be stronger. The voting for President is a right created solely by the Constitution; before that was adopted it had no existence; it depends therefore entirely on the terms of the grant, and must be exercised according to its mandates and provisions. If a reason for this prohibition was sought for, it could be easily found. It was not intended that Federal officers should be candidates for appointment, so that they might not be tempted to use their power and influence as such officers to affect or control an election. The Constitution must be construed as saying in terms to the people of Oregon, "You shall not vote for J. W. Watts." It, in effect, so says to the people of any State in reference to any candidate who holds an office of trust or profit under the United States. To claim that this prohibition upon the States is left to them, the very parties prohibited, and to them only, to enforce, is against all logic and reason. It amounts to this: a party is prohibited by a superior authority from doing a particular act which affects that superior authority, and still the party prohibited is alone to determine whether it will regard the prohibition, and if it does not regard it, the superior authority, although affected by such determination, has no right or power to enforce the prohibition. The statement of the claim is a sufficient refutation of it. Until the hearing before this Commission began, it was never heard or even dreamed that a State could against the prohibition of the Constitution appoint a person elector and have his vote counted, there being no power in Congress to prevent it.

Why, look for a moment at the provisions of the law under which we are acting. Consider them, and then say, who can, that we are compelled to count the vote of a person whom the Constitution prohibits the State from appointing as an elector! By that law the duties of this Commission are expressly and carefully defined. This Commission is to "decide whether any and what votes from such States are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States"—mark it, and consider it well—"whether they are the votes provided for by the Constitution." Could anything be plainer? Again, the Commission is to "decide how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State." We have each taken an oath that "we will impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to the Commission of which we are members, and a true judgment give therein."

It is proven to us that a person who was by the Constitution absolutely prohibited and forbidden to be elected has voted as an elector. Can we find and determine under the law and our oaths that his vote is the one "provided for by the Constitution of the United States" when he is by that instrument expressly prohibited from casting a vote? Can we say that such a person "was duly appointed an elector" when the Constitution expressly declares that he shall not be so appointed?

Speaking for myself alone, I can only say that if I, as a member of this Commission and having in mind the oath I have taken to honestly discharge the duties imposed upon me by the law creating it, decided in favor, as a presidential elector, of the vote of a person who held an office of trust or profit under the United States at the time of his election, I should be morally, if not legally, guilty of perjury. I should be doing precisely that which I had solemnly sworn I would not do.

But it is claimed that Watts, although holding an office of profit under the United States when he was appointed and for some time after, resigned that office and also the office of elector before casting his vote, and that he was subsequently by the other electors chosen to fill his own vacancy. At the best, this is but a gross evasion both of the spirit and the letter of the Constitution. But let us examine and see if the prohibition of the Constitution can be gotten rid of so easily.

The act of Congress, Revised Statutes, section 133, provides that—

Each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

Section 134 provides—

That whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the legislature of such State may direct.

The law of Oregon provides that "the electors shall convene at the seat of government on the first Monday of December next after the election, at the hour of twelve of the clock at noon of that day, and if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill by viva voce and plurality of votes such vacancy in the electoral college." It is claimed that under these provisions of the law Watts could resign, thus create a vacancy, be immediately elected to fill it, and cast one vote of the State for President.

An examination of the affidavits and returns of this Watts and his associates shows a queer state of facts—something, indeed, almost mysterious. The affidavit of Watts and his associates, Odell and Cartwright, to which they all make oath, says that—

At the hour of twelve o'clock m. of the 6th day of December, A. D. 1876, we duly assembled at the State capital, in a room in the capitol building at Salem, Oregon, which was assigned to us by the secretary of state; that we duly on said day and hour demanded of the governor and secretary of state "certain certified lists of electors, which were then and there refused."

Now, in the certificate of their vote for President and Vice-President two of these same gentlemen, Odell and Cartwright, say that at precisely twelve o'clock noon on the same 6th day of December they two, alone, met at the seat of government; that they organized by the choice of one as chairman and the other as secretary; that one of them presented the resignation of Watts, which was read and accepted; that there were but two electors present, namely, said Odell and Cartwright; that the two thereupon declared one vacancy to exist in the college, and elected Watts to fill the vacancy occasioned by his own resignation. Put together the affidavit of the three and the certificate of the two, and this is the result: the three swear that at twelve o'clock m. they were all three present at a certain place and there did certain acts; but two of the three certify that at the same hour and place the third was not present, and on account of his absence the two performed certain other and different acts. This is like a game of "thimble-rig," and Watts is the "little joker;" "now you see him and now you don't." When required at a certain point of time to be in a certain place, he is sworn to be present; when not wanted he is certified to be absent at precisely the same place and time. A very convenient personage this, who can thus make himself visible and invisible whenever the necessities of the case require it.

This seems to me to be clear: Section 133 of the law of Congress has reference only to a college of electors which has been once filled and a vacancy has occurred subsequently. The words indicate that the intent was to provide for such a case only. This is rendered certain by the fact that the next section provides for the case of no election having been had, clearly showing that the word "vacancy" when used in the preceding section applied simply to the case where there had been an election and the place of a person elected had subsequently become vacant. Without this, indeed, it might be claimed, with much show of reason for the construction, that a vacancy could only happen when the office had been once occupied.

The statute of Oregon clearly meant to deal with the "vacancy" indicated in section 133 of the act of Congress, and not with the case of the office never having been filled, provided for in the next section. The phraseology shows this clearly and excludes any other construction. "If there shall be any vacancy occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise" by no means refers to a case of the office never having been filled at all. "Or otherwise" must be taken with its surroundings, and construed in the light of those surroundings and of the whole statute taken together. The old maxim "noscitur a sociis," if it could ever apply in any case, applies here. The "other causes" creating a vacancy must be like causes; for no one can, without violating all the rules of construction applicable to statutes, hold that the intent was to provide by these two words in the connection in which they are used for the case of a failure to elect—a case so entirely different from that of a vacancy occurring after election by reason of death or any other cause. This construction is fortified by the opinion of the supreme court of Rhode Island, a most respectable tribunal, upon a case almost exactly like this both in spirit and letter, and by the action of the legislature upon that opinion. That court held that where there had been no election because the person voted for at the time held an "office of trust under the United States" there was no "vacancy," and that the place must be filled by the legislature as in the case of a failure to elect.

It seems clear to me that, inasmuch as Watts held an office of trust and profit under the United States at the time of the election, he was "ineligible" to be elected; that there was no election of one elector; that he could not resign an office which he had never held; that there was no "vacancy" within the meaning of the law of Oregon; and that, consequently, but two votes from Oregon can be counted for President and Vice-President. To me it seems clear and beyond all question that to count more than two votes would be a direct violation of the Constitution and a violation of the oath we have here taken "to decide whether the votes are those provided for by the Constitution and what persons were duly appointed electors."

It seems to me certain beyond all controversy that to set aside the certificate of the governor and the secretary of state under the great seal, and to accept in its stead a mere certified statement of votes with no certificate of election, is to openly and directly reverse and overrule the decisions pronounced by the majority of this Commission in the cases of Florida and Louisiana; thus establishing different rules, applicable to the same facts, in different cases.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

The Commission having under consideration the electoral vote of South Carolina—

Mr. Commissioner ABBOTT said substantially:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I desire to say something, after what has been said here, upon the questions raised in this case of South Carolina.

Of course no one claims that the vote of the Tilden electors should be counted. The Hayes electors undoubtedly received a majority of the votes as they were actually cast. There were, no doubt, many irregularities in conducting the election and making returns of votes from the many different precincts, which, if they had been insisted upon, might have altered the result; but ascertaining as nearly as could be done the number of votes as actually cast and disregarding all irregularities connected with the conduct of the elections and the returns thereof, a majority of the votes cast, was for the Hayes electors; therefore, of course, no question can fairly arise in reference to counting the vote of the Tilden electors.

But such a conclusion by no means settles the case. There still remains to be determined the question, shall the vote of the Hayes electors be counted?

The settlement of it involves several considerations and issues quite as important and interesting as any which have been examined and decided in either of the other cases before the Commission.

And first let me consider an objection to counting these votes raised by my friend from Virginia, Mr. Hunton. The objection is this:

The Constitution expressly requires that the electors shall vote for President and Vice-President by ballot; that they shall name in their ballots the persons voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the persons voted for as Vice-President; and that they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit to the President of the Senate. The acts of Congress merely provide the details for carrying this requirement of the Constitution into effect. It is clear that, if the Constitution is to be regarded, no vote for President not by ballot is legal or can be counted. No matter what may have been the reason for this requirement, certain it is that it was considered important enough to put it into the Constitution, and we must regard it, unless we are prepared to say this Commission is not bound by that antiquated instrument. I think the majority have practically set aside, nullified in fact, the mandate that no person holding an office under the United States shall be appointed an elector, and it may be considered that we can with equal right disregard the mandate that all votes shall be by ballot. If the Constitution is to prevail, however, not only must the voting be by ballot, but lists must be made of the persons thus voted for, and sent to the President of the Senate. By fair construction these lists must show that the votes were by ballot, because by the Constitution nothing but ballots are recognized as votes. By the law establishing the Commission we are to decide what votes "are the votes provided for by the Constitution," and as no vote is recognized by that instrument as a vote for President except it be by ballot, it seems clear that we must be satisfied whether the votes under consideration were, as required by the Constitution, by ballot or otherwise.

It is clear beyond any question that it does not appear from the certificate of the Hayes electors that they voted by ballot; there is nothing in it from the first to the last word which in any manner indicates that the voting was viva voce or by ballot. We therefore have not even a scintilla of evidence before us upon which we can decide as required by law "which are the votes provided for by the Constitution;" that is, whether the votes were by ballot or otherwise. That is a question that must be settled by evidence; we cannot know it by instinct or intuition, and there is no evidence at all bearing upon it.

We are told by Mr. Justice Bradley that this objection is not even plausible; certainly a somewhat strong word to apply to an objection made by a member of this Commission upon his official responsibility. Not "plausible," forsooth, to inquire whether the votes have been cast in the manner commanded by the Constitution! Perhaps by some it may not be considered sensible, "plausible" even, to permit the requirements of the Constitution to be regarded at all in this matter of determining who is to be President, but then there are others of us who do consider that some evidence should be furnished to show that the provisions and requirements of the organic law have been complied with before we give judgment in so important an issue. Therefore, at the expense of not being considered even "plausible" by the learned justice, I venture to discuss and consider this question.

When it is considered important, vital enough to make it a constitutional mandate, that the vote for President should be cast in a particular manner, why must we not in some way, by some evidence, be satisfied that this requirement has been complied with? Certainly when we are appointed by law to decide "which are the votes provided for by the Constitution" some evidence should be furnished on the point at issue, so that we may be able to decide that question. As I have said, when the Constitution requires that the electors shall make and certify lists of the persons voted for as President and Vice-President and of the number of votes for each, a fair construction would require the certificate to state that the votes were by ballot, they being the only votes that could be legally cast. I do not claim that the certificate should contain any set form of words, but that it is necessary that in some form of expression it should set forth the fact that the votes were cast as required by the Constitution.

Now, by looking at the return by the Hayes electors of their acts, there is nothing in it even to indicate that they voted by ballot; on the contrary, the inference from it would be that they did not so vote. It is not even stated that the vote was duly cast, or according to law, which might be sufficient in the absence of anything to control such a statement. Again, the list purports to be of "those voted for by the electoral college of the State of South Carolina," rather indicating the result of action by the college as a board than that of each individual member of it. Certainly there is nothing in the return which gives me the slightest intimation that the votes were cast by ballot and nothing from which I can fairly infer that such was the fact, and if I decide they were so cast, I do it absolutely without evidence. Indeed, from the wording of the certificate, I should be strongly inclined to believe that the voting was not by ballot.

Having had some opportunity to know how affairs are conducted by the party in power in South Carolina, that knowledge by no means leads me to believe that any regard would be paid by these electors to either law or Constitution. Several of them I saw when in South Carolina this winter as a member of the committee of investigation on the part of the House of Representatives, and one at least came before that committee and was examined as a witness, and in his examination disclosed facts which would prevent any fair mind from putting the slightest faith in his honesty, integrity, or intelligence. From the certificate itself, from what I know of the persons who signed it, and their disregard of all law, right, and even decency, I am strongly inclined to believe that the voting in this case was not by ballot; certainly no member of the Commission can say there is the slightest evidence that the votes were so cast. Although it may please Mr. Justice Bradley to say of the objection of my friend from Virginia that it is not even "plausible," I defy him to give, not merely a plausible, but any reason, for finding that the votes of the South Carolina electors were cast in the manner required by the Constitution.

How then can we find they were cast by ballot? We must so find in order to determine that they "are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States," which we are bound to do by our official oaths.

By one Commissioner it is said this objection is not even "plausible," by another that it is merely technical and so ought not to weigh in the consideration of questions so great and important as are here at issue. The answer is plain. The objection is founded on the Constitution itself, and its only purpose is to require a compliance with its express mandates. If the objection is not plausible, if it is technical, it is the fault of the Constitution in being technical and not even plausible in its requirements.

But there are other objections to the votes of the Hayes electors which involve some of the most important questions and issues that can ever present themselves for consideration and determination where the government is constituted as is ours—questions and issues fundamental, and involving the very existence of our institutions in their present form. If you decide to reject the proofs offered in this case, and count the vote, you will establish a principle by which, if acted on in the future, there may never be another free election of President of the United States by the people thereof; a precedent by which any person or party in power may forever perpetuate that power by the use of the Army of the United States.

Consider the proofs which are offered here, and which we are told by the majority we must reject, and count the vote of South Carolina, notwithstanding the facts offered to be proved.

In the first place it is alleged, and proof of the allegation is proffered, that although the constitution of the State which was adopted in 1868 commands the legislature to establish a registration of voters, the legislature has persistently refused to obey this mandate, it being largely republican, for the sole purpose of keeping possession of the government by a resort to repeating and double voting. Certainly the laws of that State regulating voting, if intended expressly to encourage repeating and frauds at elections, could not be better contrived to accomplish such a purpose. The counties are each divided into many voting-precincts, one into over fifty, and every citizen of the county can vote in any precinct without regard to the parish, precinct, or town in which he resides. But although this is reprehensible in the highest degree, and shows the fraudulent intent of the party in power, I agree that it does not furnish sufficient reason to reject the vote of the State. The law certainly is mandatory upon the legislature; but if that body refuses to obey, to do its duty and execute the mandate by making a law to provide registration, such refusal, however wicked and fraudulent, cannot deprive the State and its people of the right to vote. Any other construction would put an end to the government and prevent the people from electing any officers, State or national.

The next offer of proof is, that the troops of the United States were sent to South Carolina before and stationed near the polls at the election, by the President of the United States, solely for the purpose of overawing a portion of the people, and compelling them to vote to sustain the republican party, and that this purpose for so sending and stationing the troops was accomplished; that the people were overawed and compelled to vote to sustain the party so using the troops, and that there was in consequence thereof no free election, no such election as is required by the law and Constitution of both the State and United States.

It is further offered to be proved that the State militia, composed almost entirely of ignorant negroes, was stationed at many of the polls, in fact surrounding them, to prevent a portion of the people from voting the democratic ticket, and by violence did succeed in so doing; that armed bands of negroes also surrounded the voting-places in some counties, and by violence and force prevented thousands of persons from voting with the democrats—a much larger number, in fact, than the majority claimed for the Hayes electors.

The only answer made to all this is that the two Houses of Congress have no right to inquire into these allegations, no right to ascertain whether these offers of proof can be substantiated.

In the Florida and Louisiana cases we were told, and a majority of this Commission has so decided, that by the Constitution, by our organic law, neither the two Houses of Congress, the States, nor their legislatures, nor their courts, nor their executives, had any power to inquire whether the votes of any State had been cast by persons never in fact elected, but who obtained a certificate of election by the grossest frauds and bribery of the State returning-boards; and that Congress, the whole country indeed, must look on in quiet and contentment, able to do nothing to prevent their Chief Magistrate being seated in office not by law and the voice of the people, but by fraud and corrupt practices.

Those decisions, by which fraud is justified and sanctified, are bad enough, but the proposed resolutions are even worse. By the first, the Presidency can be bought and sold, even put up at auction, openly and in the face of the world, and so weak and powerless are our Constitution and laws that it cannot be prevented or remedied.

Some one has said—Gibbon, I think—that when the imperial purple at Rome was sold by the pretorian guard, it was conclusive evidence that all reason for the Roman empire continuing to exist had ceased. No people who submit to have their chief magistracy bought and sold have any right to exist as a nation. What shall we say, then, of our own condition? In the Louisiana case it was offered to be proved, and the offer being rejected it must be taken as true, that the vote of that State for the republican candidate was obtained by bribery, perjury, and forgery, and this Commission decided that a vote so obtained was as good as one absolutely pure and honest, and that the people must submit to a President, though he might owe his election to such crimes. By that decision we are told that a candidate may openly buy the vote of any State from such a returning-board as has been established in perpetuity in Louisiana, and agree that the money therefor shall be paid when the sale is consummated by the count of the two Houses of Congress; and, for aught I can see, he can deposit the money to be paid on the Speaker's desk, to be delivered when the count is complete, and call upon the assembled Senators and Representatives to witness the payment. All this we are told would be constitutional and right under the law. And now, as if it was not quite enough of infamy and disgrace to the country to have it established that the Presidency can be bought without hinderance or objection, we are told that the President, to perpetuate himself or his party in power, may use the military forces of the United States to compel the people of a State to vote as he desires; that the militia of a State may be used to the same end; and that votes so obtained by an election controlled and dominated by military force must be counted precisely as pure and honest votes are counted; and again, that there is no power in Congress, or in any other person or bodies of persons, to prevent such a consummation of wrong and wickedness. If any doctrine more utterly destructive to a free government and free institutions—to a government of the people, for the people, and by the people—could be devised and put forth to the world, I certainly cannot conceive of it. The doctrine is utterly and entirely damnable. It will bear the palm for unmitigated wickedness for all time to come. By it a free government may be turned into the worst of despotisms. By it the people may be deprived of all their rights and liberties, and military force and power be made to usurp the place of law and justice. It is a high crime against liberty and good government. It proclaims to the world that our system of government is a failure; that it has ceased to be one regulated by law, and administered according to the will of the people expressed under and according to the law, and has become a despotism, where law has given place to force and the will of the people exists only in name, not as a controlling factor, not in verity and fact.

Indeed, this doctrine, if established, caps the climax of wrong. We have had bribery, forgery, perjury, and all manner of corrupt practices justified by the decision of a majority of this Commission as a proper means to obtain the Presidency. We are now told that the Army of the United States may be used to force the people to vote, not as they wish, but as others wish. If this doctrine is adopted and established, the measure of our woes, and disgrace as well, is full to the brim.

Its greatest foes never before claimed that our Constitution was so miserably weak and defective, such a piece of bungled, botched work, as we are now told it is by a majority of this Commission.

In a free government, professing to be a government of the people by the people, whose boast is that the rights and liberties of all are equally protected by and under the law and that all wrongs and abuses are to be righted peaceably by an appeal to the ballot-box, how strange, indeed how criminal it is to claim and act upon the claim that the military arm may be used with impunity, against all law and right, for the very object and purpose of putting an end to free elections—which means nothing more nor less than putting an end to the government of the people; and that there is no way of preventing it, known to man, that the Constitution and law furnish no defense against so great an offense against freedom and free government.

Such a doctrine would not and ought not to be tolerated for a moment where even the smallest show is kept up of a regard for the will of the people in governmental affairs. A doctrine like this put forth and acted on by the King of Great Britain would change the reigning dynasty as effectually as did no worse attempt to establish despotism change it in 1688.

In addition to this employment of the Army of the United States, we have the offer of proof that the State militia were used for the same purpose, that armed bands of negroes surrounded the polls, preventing people of their own race from voting as they wished to do, and resorting to all manner of violence to accomplish such a result; in fact, the offer of proof is such that, if substantiated, an election holden under such circumstances is worse than a farce, it is a disgrace to any civilization however imperfect, and would bring our form of government into most justly merited contempt. Indeed, if it be true that such an election is to be tolerated and its results are to be established and prevail, it furnishes conclusive proof that our institutions, of which so much is boasted, have failed; and it might, with a show of reason, be claimed they ought to give way to some other form of government which will at least give peace and protection to persons and property.

From all I could learn while in South Carolina, the allegations in the offers of proof are substantially true, certainly as to parts of the State, and I am sure no such election was holden the results of which ought to affect in any way the rights of the people of the other States.

The colored people were told and believed that the United States troops were sent into the State to compel them to vote the republican ticket and shoot all who attempted to vote with the democrats. This belief I have no doubt was general among the blacks. Of course there were many too intelligent to give it credit, but the great mass gave it full faith and credence. Any negro who manifested a desire to act with the democrats was completely ostracized, and in addition assaulted and beaten by those of his own race whenever the opportunity to do it occurred. Negro wives left their husbands if the husbands left the republican party. Negro men attempting to vote the democratic ticket were attacked at the polls by negro women, beaten, stripped naked, and driven off. In many places the polls were surrounded by organized bands of armed blacks, who assaulted, beat, and forcibly drove off all of their own race who attempted to vote against the republicans, or compelled them to vote that ticket. I have no doubt that many thousands of colored voters would have voted the democratic ticket had they not been either driven off or compelled by violence and fear to vote for the republicans, and but for that lawlessness and violence the Hayes electors, instead of receiving a majority of some eight hundred, would have been defeated by some thousands.

But one answer suggested to this is, that the democrats, too, resorted to force, violence, threats, and intimidation to compel the blacks to vote their ticket.

Does not this tend, if the charge be true, to prove conclusively the proposition we support, that the vote of the State should not be counted, because by the illegal and unjustifiable acts of both political parties a free election was rendered impossible?

The answer is no answer. Its reason and logic is the reason and logic of the boy charged by his fellow with wrong-doing, who replies to it, "You are another."

I have no doubt the charge, to some extent, is well founded. It would be strange if it was not so. The provocations were so great, the evils to be remedied were so terrible, the wrongs to be righted so subversive of all governments, that no doubt many things were done by the democrats that would not be tolerated in a different condition of affairs, and cannot be justified. But I believe ten negroes were compelled to vote for the republicans by the violence and lawlessness of their own race for one who was compelled to vote against his will for the democrats by their unlawful practices.

But while I admit that there was to some extent a resort to unjustifiable means by democrats to control the colored vote, beyond all question this was not sanctioned by their candidates for office or by any of the leading, influential men of that party. Governor Hampton, Colonel Haskell, the chairman of the State committee, and every other candidate and leading man of the party, I am satisfied, exerted all their power and influence in favor of peace and a perfectly free election. But such was the condition of things in the State, what with the United States troops and the State militia, composed mainly of the most ignorant blacks, what with armed bands of negroes in many precincts, dominating and abusing all their own race who dared even to try to act independently, urged on by bands of carpet-baggers, thieves, and native "scalawags," as they are called, who knew if they were defeated flight or the penitentiary was their only safety, a free election was an utter impossibility. Certainly no election holden under such circumstances and with such surroundings ought ever to affect the rights of a single human being outside the limits of the State; to impose on the other States a Chief Magistrate by the means and appliances there resorted to would bring our whole system of elections into merited contempt and disgrace.

Let me say a few words in reference to another justification put forth for the presence of the Federal troops in South Carolina. It is said that the people of South Carolina were in a state of insurrection against the Government, that the governor was powerless to suppress it, and called on the President for aid under the provisions of the Constitution. This is offered to be proved to be false; but for the purpose of considering the justification, and its effect on the election, let it be taken to be true. The State, then, was not only controlled by turbulence and violence, but an insurrection against the Government and the execution of the laws prevailed over the constituted authorities, which was beyond their power to quell and suppress. Such is the justification for sending the troops. The governor, it is said, asked for them, for he, with all the authority of the State and its laws, was powerless.

Is an election holden when the people of the State are in open insurrection against its authorities, so general and wide-spread that they are powerless and the United States are called on to suppress it, an election at all, in any sense known to our law? How can it be claimed with any show of reason that when the people of a State are in actual insurrection against its authorities they can hold a valid election, by which the rights of not only their own State, but of all the other States, are to be affected, nay, possibly controlled? To hold such an election valid to affect the rights of the people of the whole country is against the whole spirit and theory of our Government.

Therefore, whether the troops were rightfully sent to South Carolina because there existed there an insurrection too strong to be put down by the State authorities, or whether no such insurrection existed, and the troops were wrongfully sent there to overawe a part of the voters and compel them to support the party in power, is perhaps unimportant to determine, for in either case the reason is equally strong against giving effect to an election holden under such circumstances and with such surroundings.

In whatever light, then, you look upon the election in South Carolina for presidential electors on the 7th of last November, and its result, with the allegations and offers of proof before you, to count the vote of the Hayes electors would be a crime against freedom and free governments—as great an offense, if possible, as that committed by counting the votes of Louisiana.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER HOAR.

FLORIDA.

The Electoral Commission having under consideration the question of counting the electoral vote of the State of Florida—

Mr. Commissioner HOAR said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The question before the Commission is not who have been lawfully elected President and Vice-President of the United States. We are to decide who were appointed electors by the State of Florida; and are now to consider one only of the steps required in arriving at that decision.

The election of President is accomplished by a mechanism wholly created by the Constitution, unlike anything else in the world, by which the executive power of the country is to be continued without interruption, and rendered perpetual, by elections to take place once in four years by persons appointed by thirty-eight other sovereignties; the appointment, election, ascertainment of the result, and induction into office of the person elected being all required to be completed within the space of a few weeks. Whatever aid we may derive from the common or parliamentary law, or from the practice of courts, it is obvious that the best test of the question whether a particular process belongs in this complicated machine is the inquiry whether if it be introduced the machine will work; whether it will help or prevent the accomplishment of the result.

The Constitution provides that the electors of President and Vice-President shall be appointed by the States in such manner as their legislatures may direct. These electors, when appointed, become clothed with a right of suffrage which they are to exercise on the same day in all the States. There must enter into the act of appointment the exercise of the power of determining who is appointed. This power is also lodged in the State and must be exercised as it provides and before the casting the vote. The vote cannot be cast first and the appointment consummated afterward.

The law of the State of Florida provides that the due appointment of electors shall be ascertained and determined by a board composed of certain designated State officers, who, having made a canvass, "shall determine the result of the election as shown by the returns;" * * * "shall make and sign a certificate and declare who shall have been elected, which certificate shall be recorded." * * * "When any person shall be elected to the office of elector of President and Vice-President, the governor shall make out, sign, and cause to be sealed with the seal of the State and transmit to such person a certificate of his election." It seems to me that this determination of the canvassing-board is in the nature of a judgment. It must be performed before the electors receive their authority or cast their votes. It is the conclusive evidence of their authority. When the tribunal on whom the State has imposed the duty has ascertained and declared who have been lawfully appointed electors, and such electors have cast their votes and duly certified the result, the State has performed its whole constitutional office, and is functus officio in that regard.

I do not think that any evidence can be received to overcome the effect of this determination of the State authority as to who were lawfully appointed, made before the electors cast their vote on the 6th of December. Further, I do not think that the evidence offered or suggested by the counsel or objectors tends to overcome it.

It is true that votes are to be counted. But it is the votes of those persons whom the proper authority has determined and certified were entitled to cast them, and not the votes of those persons whom the two Houses of Congress or either of them may think were so entitled.

It seems to me clear that the power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of presidential electors is not given by the Constitution to the two Houses of Congress, or either of them. The power which it was deemed necessary carefully to express in regard to their own members, it could hardly have been intended to bestow by implication from the right to be present when the certificates are opened, or even from the right to count the votes. It is a power which it is utterly impracticable for Congress to exercise between the time when the certificates are brought officially to its knowledge and the time when it must be determined who has been chosen President. Indeed, the distinguished counsel who closed for the Tilden electors conceded this difficulty, to which his only answer is the suggestion that such an inquiry, like the right to the writ of quo warranto, must be limited by discretion; in other words, that the two Houses may go as far into the inquiry, who were duly chosen electors in any State, as they in their discretion think fit, or as time will permit.

The statement of this position seems to be its refutation. We are now discussing a question of jurisdiction. In whom is the power to determine who have been appointed electors—in Congress or in the State? It is gravely answered that it is in Congress when the State to be investigated is near the seat of Government, or the inquiry relates to a few election-precincts only, but is to be left to the State in other cases; that Congress may exert a power of inquiry into an election in Delaware which is impossible as to California, or may inquire into one election-district in New York, but cannot into twenty or a hundred. This claim would never have arisen in any man's mind before the days of railroads and telegraphs. Such investigations, possible only in the most limited degree now, would have been wholly impossible as to most of the States when the Constitution was adopted.

It is asked, is there no remedy if the officers to whom the States intrust the power of ascertaining and declaring the result of the election act fraudulently or make mistakes? The answer is that the Constitution of the United States gives no jurisdiction to Congress, when the certificates are opened and the votes are to be counted, to correct such mistakes or frauds. A like question may be put as to every public authority in which a final power of decision is lodged. The danger of mistake or fraud is surely quite as great if the final power be lodged in Congress, and the framers of the Constitution acted in nothing more wisely than in removing from Congress all power over the election of President.

But it is said that the State board of canvassers had no jurisdiction to reject the votes of certain precincts, and that their decision is only binding when they acted within their jurisdiction. This is an erroneous application of the term "jurisdiction." The jurisdiction of that board is to determine and declare who were chosen electors. The rejection or computation of certain votes, whether right or wrong, was but a determination what evidence or elements they would take into account in the exercise of their jurisdiction.

Some of the arguments have proceeded on the supposition that the question is whether evidence that the certificate of the governor was fraudulent might be received. But the certificate of the governor was, on the admission of both sides, exactly what his duty required of him. It will not be claimed that the governor in his single capacity could re-examine the action of the canvassing-board and certify to anything other than the effect of its record. The offer in substance is that stated by Mr. O'Connor under his fifth head, "that the board of State canvassers, acting on certain erroneous views in making their canvass, rejected certain returns." But this seems to me immaterial, first, because the question whether those views were sound or erroneous, must be determined by the judgment of that board and not of Congress; and second, because the evidence would not affect the count of the vote unless it were further shown that the actual result of the election was declared otherwise than truly, to show which must open to both sides the whole question as to the votes actually cast for electors in Florida, a question which the two Houses of Congress cannot investigate or determine.

The suggestion made by the counsel is that the canvassing-board "acted on certain erroneous views." The counsel in their oral argument propose to show that the action of the State canvassers was fraudulent, by which I suppose they mean that they knew that these views were erroneous when they acted on them.

It is vehemently urged that to refuse to go behind the decision of the State authority, however affected by mistake or fraud, and inquire into the truth, may lead to the establishment of the most flagrant injustice and wrong. But the position of our opponents leads them to a like result. Commissioners Clifford and Field, in their written opinions, each distinctly assert that they hold that the judgment of the supreme court of Florida rendered long after the votes for President were cast by the electors, is conclusive as to who were duly chosen such electors, and that no evidence whatever can be received against such judgment. Mr. Commissioner Bayard, in answer to my question put to him in the presence of the Commission, frankly answered that he deemed such judgment conclusive. Both sides, then, agree in this, that the decision of a State tribunal upon this matter is conclusive and binding upon all mankind, and that Congress has no power to go behind it. The difference between these gentlemen and myself is this: they attribute that conclusive effect to the judgment rendered afterward, when all the electors had cast their votes, of a court deriving its authority only by implication from the general power to issue writs of quo warranto, while I attribute it to the determination made before the electors discharged their office, at the time when the State law expressly required it to be made, and by the persons in whom the State had expressly reposed that authority.

It does not seem to me that the proceedings of the State legislature or of the State court which have been offered in evidence are of any validity whatever; and this without reference to the question whether the judgment of the court has been vacated by an appeal, or whether the statute of Florida confines the effect of judgment on quo warranto, to which the attorney-general is not a party, to private rights. I think the function of elector, under the Constitution of the United States, must be performed and ended on a day certain, and that when the act has been performed its validity cannot be affected by anything which occurs afterward. The right of a State to withdraw the vote of its electors for President in obedience to the decree of a court entered afterward will not bear discussion.

I do not rely upon the doctrine which recognizes as valid in law the acts of public or corporate officers who without rightful title perform the functions of an office with which they are in part clothed. Unless the decision of the canvassing-board and the certificate of Governor Stearns to them thereupon issued made the persons so found and certified to be chosen the de jure electors of Florida on the 6th of December, I do not see that they were any more fully clothed with the office than their competitors. Each of the sets of electors who claim to have cast their votes in Florida did everything which was necessary to the entire execution of the office of presidential elector.

The presidential electors of a State are required by the Constitution to meet, and were doubtless in the beginning expected to consult. They are required by the Constitution jointly to make, sign, and certify lists, and jointly to seal and transmit them; they are required by the act of Congress jointly to make certain certificates on the back of their lists and a majority of them jointly to appoint a messenger. It may well be that one person or more, less than the majority of the whole number, meeting with the others, recognized by the others as entitled to take part with them in their consultations and in these joint acts and actually so taking part, may be held to be an elector or electors de facto. But where two boards, contesting for an office whose functions by law expire when one act has been performed and certified, each at the lawful time and place does everything which is necessary to the entire execution of the office, there being no corporate or official property or seal or function from which either excludes the other, it seems to me that that board or college which is the board or college de jure is also the board or college de facto.

Upon the whole matter, therefore, I am of opinion that the appointment of electors and the ascertaining who has been appointed is the sole and exclusive prerogative of the State. The State acts by such agencies as it selects. The powers conferred by the State upon these agencies cannot be exercised by Congress. To usurp them for the purpose of righting alleged wrongs would be for this Commission, which has only the powers of Congress, to commit the very wrong which is imputed to the returning-boards in some of the States. When the agencies which the State has selected have acted, the State has acted; no power can reverse its action for mistake in law or fact, for fraud, or for any cause whatever, unless it be a power higher than the State, on whom the Constitution has expressly conferred such authority. But there is for this purpose no such power higher than the State, and the President of the Senate and Congress are but the mere servants of the State's will and registers of its action, with power only to open the certificates and count the votes of the electors whom the State authority has appointed and certified.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER GARFIELD.

FLORIDA.

The Commission having under consideration the request of counsel to present evidence to prove that the State board of canvassers of Florida acted upon erroneous views in canvassing the returns of votes from the several counties—

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: We are called upon to determine a rule of evidence upon a proffer of testimony by counsel. This is purely a question of law, to be decided within the limitations of the statute which created this Commission. We cannot go beyond those limitations for any purpose whatever. We are bound by our oaths to search the meaning of the statute and make our answer to the proffer on its merits under the law, without regard to the consequences which may result from the decision.

Such being my view of our duty, I have been pained to notice that, running through all the arguments of the counsel who offered this testimony, and through the remarks of those members of the Commission who favor its reception, has appeared the assumption that those who offer the testimony are able to prove great and manifold frauds, and that those who oppose its reception do so because they do not wish to expose fraud. I wish to repel this assumption as being not only outside of the law we are seeking to administer, but as being gratuitous and wholly unfounded in fact. It may not be out of place to call the attention of the Commission to the fact that four counts of the electoral vote of Florida have been made, as appears in the several congressional reports on that subject. Without vouching for the correctness of any of them, I will state by whom they were made and what is the alleged result of each.

First. On the 28th day of November, the secretary of the State of Florida laid before the canvassing-board the returns of the votes for electors from all the counties of the State; and a count of this gross vote, before any canvass was made by the board, before any vote was rejected or any correction was made, is declared to have shown that the Hayes electors had 43 majority over the Tilden electors.

Second. On the 6th day of December, the board of State canvassers made their official report of the vote as canvassed and compiled by themselves according to law; and that report declared that the Hayes electors had received 925 majority.

Third. On the 10th of January, in obedience to the order of the supreme court, which had issued to the board of canvassers a peremptory writ of mandamus, ordering them to recanvass the votes for governor and to include in the count some polls which they had thrown out, the board reconvened and recanvassed the vote for governor. That canvass resulted in the declaration that Drew was elected governor and Stearns was not. Although the order of the court did not disturb the former canvass, so far as related to the presidential electors, yet if the order had applied to the presidential electors the result would have been 211 majority for the Hayes electors.

Fourth. After Governor Drew was inaugurated and the new legislature had assembled, proceedings in quo warranto before the district court were had, which resulted, late in January, in an order for the new board of State canvassers, which had been appointed by Governor Drew, to recanvass the votes for presidential electors. That canvass was made, and the result was forwarded to the President of the Senate, and was received by him less than two weeks ago. According to that count the Tilden electors received a popular majority of 87. But this count was made long after the electoral college had met, given its votes, and dissolved. Some discredit is attached to this result from the allegation that this count was made by a board specially appointed to achieve a special result, after its importance became known. The confirmation of this count by the legislature of Florida has the same post hoc character.

Here then we have four real or pretended counts of the popular vote of Florida for electors; and three of them give the Hayes electors a majority ranging from 43 to 925; and the fourth, which was made nearly two months after the electoral college had voted and had become functus officio, showed for the Tilden electors less than 90 majority. I do not vouch for the accuracy of any of these counts; but they are sufficient to show how unfounded and unjust is the pretension that virtue and right are on the side of the Tilden electors, and that frauds and false counting are to be attributed to the other side. The extremest claim made on behalf of the Tilden electors is but a majority of 90; and that is set up against three counts on the other side, as prima facie evidence of the truth.

I have referred to these facts only for the purpose of repelling the assumption that those who deny the authority of this Commission to canvass the popular votes of a State do so because of any desire or willingness to cover up fraud or prevent its exposure. I will add that while one political party charges errors and frauds on the part of the State board of canvassers in declaring the result of the election, the other party charges fraud, violence, and intimidation at the polls to prevent a full and fair vote at the popular election. We must resolutely turn away from the passionate outcries of both parties, and from every consideration except the law which we have sworn to obey, and in the light of that law determine what evidence, if any, we can consider in reaching a decision of the case.

But first let us consider what class of evidence is offered and what allegations are sought to be established that we may more intelligently measure the offer by the provisions of the law under which we are acting.

Let us survey the boundaries of the field which we are invited to enter.

First. In the opening of his speech before us, one of the objectors, Mr. Field, said he "should have occasion to mention canvassers in only one county," and "that county was decisive of the result." He asked us to hear evidence that the county canvassers of Baker County threw out the votes of two polls, one in the Darbyville precinct and another in the Johnsonville precinct. (See Congressional Record, February 3, page 46.)

Thus, at the first step of the contest, we are asked not only to go behind the certificate of the governor and behind the determination of the State board of canvassers, but we are asked to review and correct the alleged errors and wrong-doings of a county judge, a county clerk, and a county sheriff, in making up their returns of votes to the secretary of state. How shall we do this? Certainly no member of this Commission will deny that if we enter the door opened by Mr. Field, we must hear both sides. We must summon the judge, the clerk, and the sheriff, to learn precisely what they did and the reason for it, and must have before us the returns from Johnsonville and Darbyville in order to ascertain whether they were lawful and regular returns, such as the county officers were required by law to include in the general returns of Baker County. Probably, in order to get at the very truth, we should be compelled to summon the election-officers of Darbyville and Johnsonville and examine the ballots and poll-lists, and any contest arising in reference to them.

Second. But while Mr. Objector Field is willing to rest his case upon the polls in one county, Mr. O'Connor, the leading counsel for the Tilden electors, asks us to enter a much larger field. He offers evidence to show that the State board of canvassers, acting "on certain erroneous views in making their canvass, by which the Hayes electors appeared to be chosen, rejected wholly the returns from the county of Manatee and part of the returns of each of the following counties: Hamilton, Jackson, and Monroe." Mr. O'Connor adds that he trusts he has omitted none, but has had no consultation. This extends the area over which evidence is offered to election-precincts in five counties.

Third. Mr. Evarts, at the close of his speech, refers to the votes of five counties, one of which was not named by Mr. Field or Mr. O'Connor.

Fourth. From the reports of the committees of the Senate and House on the subject of the Florida election, I observe that testimony has been taken in reference to polls in seventeen different counties of the State. A portion of that testimony I have no doubt is contained in the large packages brought before us, but not yet opened. Much of the testimony referred to in the Senate report, relates to the proceedings at polling-places, to alleged frauds on the part of voters, and to errors on the part of officers who conducted the election.

This summary of the evidences proffered is sufficient to show that we cannot take one step beyond the final determination which the State itself has made without going to the bottom of the poll; in brief, this Commission must assume to be the canvassing and returning board of Florida. A bare statement of the proposition shows that its accomplishment by us is not merely inconvenient; it is utterly impossible. But if the law under which we are acting commands us to undertake it, we must obey. Though I opposed the bill in the House, and regarded it, as I still do, in conflict with the constitutional plan of counting the electoral vote, my opinion was overruled by the two Houses; and I shall do all in my power to carry out the provisions of the act in its letter and spirit. And this brings me to search the act itself to ascertain our powers and duties under it.

This law is based on the assumption that it is the right and the duty of the two Houses of Congress, meeting together, to count the votes for President and Vice-President. It prescribes the order of proceeding to perform that duty. When the certificates of any State are opened, if no objection be made, the votes of that State shall at once be counted. If objection be made two modes of procedure are provided, one for a single return, and another for a double return. The two Houses pass upon objections to a single return; this Commission is required to act in cases of double returns. In either case the action is to be according to the Constitution and the law. In each the object to be reached is to count the lawful votes of the State. The provisions of the act which regulate the conduct of the two Houses in cases of single returns will throw light upon the duty of the Commission in cases of double returns. The first section of the act provides that in cases where there is but one return from a State and an objection is made to the count, the two Houses shall separate and each shall act upon such objection. The fourth section provides that—

When the two Houses separate to decide upon an objection that may have been made to the counting of any electoral vote or votes from any State, or upon an objection to a report of the Commission, or other question arising under this act, each Senator or Representative may speak to such objection or question ten minutes, and not oftener than once; but after such debate shall have lasted two hours, it shall be the duty of each House to put the main question without further debate.

Can it be claimed that this provision implies the hearing of testimony and the trial of a contest? The whole time allowed to the two Houses to decide the gravest objections that may be raised to the counting of the vote of any State or of any elector is but two hours; and that brief period is devoted, not to the hearing of evidence, but to debate. There is no provision in the section for taking testimony or trying disputed questions of fact. The reasonable construction of the section is that the two Houses decide any questions of law or any matter of informality which may appear on the face of the certificates opened by the President of the Senate. It has been said by an honorable member of the Commission that, in deciding upon an objection to a single return, the two Houses may exercise their acknowledged power of inquiry by sending for persons and papers, and may use testimony already taken by their committees; but it must be remembered that the contents of the certificate on which the objection is based can be known by neither House nor by any member of either House until it is opened in their presence; for the objection provided for in the act is "to any vote or paper from a State." Certainly it will not be claimed that any testimony taken, before the contents of the sealed package are made known, can be valid and lawful testimony to sustain an objection made afterward. Such testimony might be ex parte, misleading, and false; and yet in the two hours allowed by the bill it might be wholly impossible to procure evidence to overcome it.

If, then, we take the proceedings of the two Houses, under the first and fourth sections of the act, as a precedent for our action here, we find no warrant for receiving the evidence offered. Again, if we take the proceedings of the two Houses under the first and fourth sections as a precedent, we should compare the time granted to the two Houses with the time we have already consumed on this case. We are far into the sixth day of our proceedings. This is the first of four cases to be submitted; and we are now debating, not the merits of the case, but a preliminary question of procedure. It is not too much to say that the admission of the evidence proffered will wholly defeat the object of the bill.

But the learned Commissioner [Mr. Bayard] who has just spoken calls attention to the clause of the act which confers upon us our powers. It is in these words:

All such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said Commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses, acting separately or together, and by a majority of votes decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration.

This clause declares what questions we are to decide, and prescribes the rule of evidence by which the decision is to be reached. The rule of evidence is that we "may take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall, by the Constitution and now existing law, be competent and pertinent in such consideration." In applying this rule we have "the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together." That is, the Commission is clothed with the powers of the two Houses in reference to counting the votes of electors, but in nothing else.

The act speaks of "petitions and depositions;" but it does not permit us to consider them unless we find that the Constitution and the law, as it existed before the passage of this act, authorized the two Houses to employ them in counting the votes.

This act confers no new powers upon the two Houses; but it makes this Commission the interpreter of the powers which they possessed before its passage. It is well known that the framers of the act were unable to agree upon the question whether the Constitution confers upon the two Houses authority to challenge, for any purpose, the determination of the State authorities in reference to the appointment of electors; and, because they could not agree, they purposely left it an open question to be decided by the Commission. For one, I did not consider it an open question; and I was unwilling to place it in the power of any commission to declare that the two Houses possess such authority. But the act permits us to decide and pass upon the question; and we are bound to decide it in accordance with the Constitution and existing law. Let us fully understand the precise question which we are to decide.

The law of Florida provides that the secretary of state, the attorney-general, the comptroller of public accounts, together with any member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall "form a board of State canvassers, and proceed to canvass the returns of the election and determine and declare who shall have been elected as shown by such returns. If any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration." (Section 4 of act of February 27, 1872.)

This board, thus authorized to "determine and declare" what persons have been chosen by the State, did determine and declare that four persons had been appointed electors of President and Vice-President; and the certificate of the governor, now before us, is acknowledged to be in accordance with the determination. On this state of the law and the facts, assuming that the Constitution empowers the two Houses, or either of them, to count the electoral votes, does this authority to count carry with it the authority to take testimony or to consider evidence to show that the State board of canvassers acted upon erroneous views of the law of the State, or made errors and mistakes in determining and declaring who were elected?

This is the main question we are now called upon to decide. If the two Houses possess such authority, we may hear the testimony. If they do not, we could not consider it if it were here in our hands.

The distinguished Commissioner [Mr. Bayard] who has just spoken, claims this authority for the Commission, on the ground that the words "existing law" include the lex parlamentaria under which each House may send for persons and papers, and may take testimony upon any subject it pleases; and that, as a matter of fact, each House has already taken testimony in reference to the election in Florida and in other States.

This authority to take testimony is not expressly conferred upon either House by the Constitution. It belongs to the class of implied powers. It is incidental to the power to make laws. Because Congress has authority to enact laws, it is a necessary incident to that power that each House may procure such information as will enable it to act with intelligence. Incidental authority cannot exceed the express authority from which it is derived. Where the authority to legislate ends, there the incidental authority to take testimony also ends.

The testimony taken for purposes of legislation is not testimony in the judicial sense. It is not taken in accordance with the rules of evidence which regulate a trial before a jury or court; but it is rather the information obtained by a special inquiry made for the purpose of ascertaining the opinions and wishes of intelligent citizens upon questions requiring the action of Congress. I doubt if one deposition in ten, taken by the committees sent to Florida, would be admissible in any judicial inquiry.

Besides the testimony taken in aid of legislation, each House may also take testimony in the case of a contested election of a member, in proceedings to censure or expel a member, or in the still more strictly judicial proceeding in impeachment. But these are authorized by the clauses of the Constitution which provide for the trial of impeachments, and those which empower each House to "be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members," and to punish or expel its members for disorderly behavior. These clauses confer no authority whatever upon this Commission. They do not relate to the subject-matter which has been referred to us.

It will not do for us to claim the same powers which we should possess if the Constitution made the two Houses the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of electors of the President and Vice-President. The fact that no such power is expressed in the Constitution, is strongly against our right to infer it, and virtually amounts to the denial of such a power.

But I base my opinion on the rule of evidence upon other clauses of the Constitution which seem to me conclusive of the question. I cannot better state my position than to summarize the argument which I made in the House of Representatives three weeks ago.

I will read the only two clauses from which it is claimed that Congress derives any power whatever to inquire into the action of the States in appointing electors of the President and Vice-President. The second clause of the first section of article 2 provides as follows:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

And the third clause of the same section provides—

The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes; which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

These two clauses contain all the powers conferred upon the States in appointing electors, and contain also all the limitations upon these powers. There are five expressed or implied limitations upon the power of the States, and only five. The limitations are either absolute in the Constitution itself, or such as authorize Congress to fix limitations. And if Congress has any authority whatever to interfere with the action of the States in the appointment of electors, that authority must be found in some one or more of the five limitations.

Now what are these limitations?

First. It must be a State that elects the electors; and, as Congress alone has the authority to admit new States into the Union, if there should be any political organization, not a State, that shall cast a vote for presidential electors, and if such pretended electors send a certificate of their vote for President and Vice-President, the Congress would undoubtedly have the right to inquire into the authority of such political organization to participate in the election.

Second. No State can have more electors than the number of Senators and Representatives to which that State is entitled in Congress at the time of the presidential election. If any State presumes to elect more, no doubt that can be inquired into. The surplus votes cannot be counted. That is the second limitation.

Third. The Constitution provides that no person shall be appointed an elector for President and Vice-President who is either a Senator or Representative in Congress, or holds any office of trust or profit under the United States. Without doubt, a violation of this provision may be inquired into; for it is distinctly declared as a limitation of the authority of the State. Whether that inquiry can be made without special legislation prescribing a mode of procedure, is a question aside from the topic I am now discussing.

Fourth. Congress is empowered by the Constitution to fix the day when the States shall vote for electors; and as Congress has fixed a day, the Tuesday after the first Monday in November, the State has no right to vote for electors on any other day, except that, in case a State, having held an election on that day, has failed to make a choice, its legislature may provide for holding an election on a subsequent day, in accordance with the act of Congress approved January 23, 1845. Doubtless the inquiry may be made whether the election was held on the day fixed by law.

Fifth. The Constitution provides that Congress may determine the day on which the electors in all the States shall give their votes for President and Vice-President. By the act of March 1, 1792, that fixed day is the first Wednesday of December—within thirty-four days of the date of the general election. From this it follows that all the steps which are necessary to complete the appointment of the electors must have been taken by the first Wednesday in December, when the electors are to vote for President and Vice-President. For the purposes of my argument, I do not follow the process of electing a President beyond the appointment of the electors.

To sum up these limitations in brief, Congress, in obedience to the Constitution, fixes the day for choosing the electors, and the day when they must vote. The Constitution prescribes that States only shall choose electors. It prescribes the number of electors for each State, and limits their qualifications. These are the only limitations upon the authority of the States in the appointment of electors of the President. Every other act and fact relating to their appointment is placed as absolutely and exclusively in the power of the States, as it is within their power to elect their governors or their justices of the peace. Across the line of these limitations Congress has no more right to interfere with the States than it has to interfere with the election of officers in England. To speak more accurately, I should say that the power is placed in the legislatures of the States; for if the constitution of any State were silent upon the subject, its legislature is none the less armed with plenary authority, conferred upon it directly by the national Constitution.

It is insisted by those who oppose the view I am taking, that, though the Constitution authorizes the States to appoint electors in such manner as the legislatures thereof may direct, yet the two Houses of Congress, in counting the electoral votes, may inquire whether the State authorities proceeded in accordance with their own laws, and may correct any errors in the process, or any violation of the State law. To this I answer that the power to appoint includes the power to do all those things necessary to complete the appointment, and to determine and declare who have been appointed. In pursuance of its authority to appoint electors, the State may not only provide for holding a popular election, as the mode of choosing them, but it may also provide by what means the result of such election may be verified and declared; and we have already seen that the legislature of Florida has made such provision. The laws of that State prescribe all the steps, from the casting and counting of the ballots at the several polling-places to the final determination and declaration of the result by the board of State canvassers. If any revision of that result be possible, it is the right of the legislature of Florida to provide for it, not the right of the two Houses of Congress or either of them.

The final determination of the result of the election having been declared by the authority empowered to determine and declare it, that act becomes the act of the State; and the two Houses of Congress can no more question such declaration than they can question the primary right of appointment by the State.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I shall vote against receiving the evidence offered. In conclusion, I will add that the preservation of the right of the States under the Constitution to appoint electors and declare who have been appointed, is, in my judgment, a matter of much greater importance than the accession of any one man to the Presidency.

LOUISIANA.

On Friday, February 16, the Commission having under consideration the electoral vote of Louisiana—

Mr. Commissioner GARFIELD said:

MR. PRESIDENT: The rule of evidence adopted by the Commission in reference to Florida was in fact decisive of that case. The same will doubtless be true in the case before us. The discussion has disclosed the fact that the rule of evidence and the merits of the case stand together, and I shall proceed upon that understanding in my remarks.

There can be no difference in principle between the Florida and the Louisiana cases, so far as the rule of evidence is concerned, unless it be that the allegation of fraud and the offer to prove fraud on the part of the returning-board brings this case under principles different from those which the Commission applied to the Florida certificate. In that case, the counsel proffered evidence to show that the State board of canvassers had proceeded upon an erroneous view of the law. In this case, they allege not only error on the part of the returning board in the construction of the law under which they acted, but they offer to prove actual fraud.

I have listened with great pleasure to the clear and able argument of the distinguished Commissioner [Senator Thurman] who has just spoken. He has aided us in the discussion by making the strongest possible presentation of the argument in favor of admitting the evidence. I will follow the order he has adopted, and will offer some suggestions in reply.

He holds:

First. That, assuming the law of Louisiana which created the returning-board to be constitutional, the board was itself not lawfully organized, because the vacancy was not filled as required by the act of November 20, 1872, which provides that "in case of vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board." Authorities have been cited to sustain this view. It is no doubt true that where the law creates a board, unless otherwise specially provided, its membership must be full before it can become a legal board. But the rule is otherwise where it has once been full and a vacancy has subsequently happened. In the case before us, however, it is not necessary to go into the general doctrine; for we are able to determine the point in the controversy by the laws of Louisiana, as construed by the courts of that State. I remind the Commission of the point so well made a few days since by Mr. Commissioner Field, in the Florida discussion, that the construction given to a statute of a State by its supreme court is binding upon all other States and upon the United States; and that, for all practical purposes, the construction so given becomes as much a part of the statute as though the language of the court were incorporated into the text of the law. There can be no doubt of the correctness of this position.

In Bank of Hamilton vs. Dudley, 2 Peters, 492, Chief-Justice Marshall, delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, said:

The judicial department of every government is the rightful expositor of its laws, and emphatically of its supreme law.

Again, in Elmdorf vs. Taylor, 10 Wheaton, the same great judge says, at page 159:

This court has uniformly professed its disposition, in cases depending on the laws of a particular State, to adopt the construction which the courts of the State have given to those laws. This course is founded on the principle, supposed to be universally recognized, that the judicial department of every government is the appropriate organ for construing the legislative acts of that government. * * * We receive the construction given by the courts of a nation as the true sense of the law, and feel ourselves no more at liberty to depart from that construction than to depart from the words of the statute. * * * On the same principle, the construction given by the courts of the several States is received as true, unless they come in conflict with the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States.

The later decisions of the Supreme Court are all in accordance with this doctrine. (See 12 Wheaton, 167, 168; 6 Peters, 291; 7 Howard, 818; 8 Howard, 558, 559; 11 Howard, 318; 14 Howard, 504; 2 Black, 599; 1 Wallace, 175.)

Now apply this doctrine to the point under consideration. The supreme court of Louisiana has decided that the returning-board of 1872, created under the act of March 16, 1870, and consisting of but four members, (there being one vacancy,) was the lawful returning-board of the State. The court also decided that the clause of the act of 1870 requiring vacancies to be filled, which is precisely the same as in the act of 1872, is not mandatory, and a failure to fill the vacancy does not render unlawful the acts of a remaining quorum. I refer to the case of Bonner vs. Lynch, 25 Louisiana Annual Reports, 267, and to the cases therein cited. At page 268 the court say :

We decided in the case of Kennard vs. Morgan, and again in the case of Hughes vs. Pitkin, that the board of returning officers, composed of John Lynch, George E. Bovee, James Longstreet, and Jacob Hawkins, was the legal returning-board of the State at the late November election. That board, it appears, returned the defendant, Lynch, as elected judge of the fourth district court of New Orleans; and upon that return the acting governor issued a commission to him according to law.

The court held the returns of the election by that board valid; and upon the principle so long and so well settled by the Supreme Court of the United States we are concluded on the question. As a matter of right and fairness, the board ought to have filled the vacancy by appointing a democrat; but their failure to do so did not invalidate their acts done in pursuance of the law.

Second. The distinguished Commissioner [Mr. Thurman] holds that if the board had been full, and organized in accordance with the law, yet the law itself and the board created by it are unconstitutional and unrepubli- can.

Here again I appeal for my answer to the authority of the supreme court of Louisiana, which is conclusive upon this Commission and upon all courts. I quote again from Bonner vs. Lynch, 25 Louisiana Annual Reports, 268, where the court says :

The legislature has seen proper to lodge the power to decide who has or has not been elected in the returning-board. It might have conferred that power upon the courts, but it did not. Whether the law be good or bad, it is our duty to obey its provisions and not to legislate. * * * Having no power to revise the action of the board of returning-officers, we have nothing to do with the reasons or grounds upon which they arrived at their conclusion.

The court declares the law valid; and that alone ends the controversy. But I submit that it is not necessary to have recourse to the constitution of the State to find authority for the legislature to prescribe the mode of appointing electors of President and Vice-President. The national Constitution confers that power directly upon the legislature of the State. In 1796, at the time of the presidential election, there was no provision in the constitution or laws of Vermont for choosing electors. But the legislature of that State, of its own motion, appointed the electors; and Congress did not question the validity of the transaction.

Whether the acts of the returning-board were in conflict with the constitution of Louisiana or not, they were in accordance with the mode of procedure prescribed by the legislature; and the national Constitution confers upon the State legislature the sole and exclusive authority to prescribe the mode of appointment.

In view of the other clause of the objection, that the law is unrepubli- can, it may be worth while to consider the causes which led to its enactment.

If I were framing a body of election laws for Ohio, I certainly should not adopt the Louisiana law as my model. But it is difficult to see how the election laws that prevail in most of the States could be made effective to repress the evils that have afflicted Louisiana. No State of the Union has passed through an experience so sad and so calamitous.

It is not necessary to repeat the history of the tragic events which for several years threatened to dissolve the bonds of society and to destroy both liberty and law in that State. It is sufficient for my present purpose to call the attention of the Commission to article 103 of her present constitution adopted in 1868. It is in these words :

The privilege of free suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections and prohibiting under adequate penalties all undue influence thereon from power, bribery, tumult, or other improper practice.

I doubt if a similar provision can be found in the constitution of any other State in the Union. It is probable that no other State has found, by terrible experience, that such a provision was necessary to its peace. Will any one say that it is unrepubli- can for a State to require its legislature to protect its voters against "bribery and tumult" at elections ?

The law under which the returning-board acted at the late election was passed in pursuance of this provision of the constitution. In its title it is declared to be "An act to regulate the conduct and to main- tain the freedom and purity of elections ; to prescribe the mode of mak- ing the returns thereof ; to provide for the election of returning-officers- to define their powers and duties, and to enforce article 103 of the con- stitution."

It is a general law, applicable to all elections held within the State. If its provisions are unrepubli- can, then the State itself is unrepubli- can ; for all the officers which the State has elected during the last seven years have been chosen and declared elected in pursuance of this or a law substantially like this. We are told that the powers granted to the returning-board are unrepubli- can. It should not be forgotten that the power to canvass, determine, and declare the result of elections must be lodged somewhere ; that some authority or authorities of a State must finally determine who have been elected.

In Ohio, for example, the duties of the state board of canvassers are wholly ministerial. They can do nothing but add up the returns sent from the counties and announce the result. The actual work of can- vassing and judging is left, not to one board, but to four or five thou- sand boards, called judges of election, who sit behind the ballot-boxes, clothed with power to administer oaths* and prevent the casting of un- lawful ballots. When the polls are closed, each of these local return- ing-boards proceeds to determine and declare the result. But they do not count as lawful votes "all the ballots actually cast." If they find two votes so folded together that in their judgment both were cast by the same voter, such ballots are thrown out and constitute no part of the lawful vote. If they find a printed name pasted over another name on the ticket, they reject the name on the paster. If they find, on com- pleting the count, that the number of ballots in the box exceeds the number of names on the poll-lists, they draw out, by lot, a number of ballots equal to the excess, and reject them wholly from the count. It may be that every fraudulent ballot was put in by one political party, and that every vote drawn out and rejected by the judges was lawfully cast by the other party. But the judges are ministers of the law ; and they purge the poll before declaring the result. It is not the count of ballots actually cast, but the result as declared by these judges, which constitutes the lawful vote of the precinct. The declarations made and certified to, at the four thousand ballot-boxes of Ohio, are forwarded through the county officers to the designated State officers, and there remains only the ministerial work of addition and declaration.

In Louisiana it was found impossible to preserve peace and order at all the polls of the State, if the local officers of elections were intrusted with the quasi-judicial powers which are exercised by such officers in Ohio. And hence, in the matter of counting votes, the Louisiana statute enjoins only ministerial duties upon the local election officers. They must count what they find in the ballot-boxes, and must forward the result, together with the poll-lists, through the parish officers, to the State returning-board. In that board the law has vested the quasi-judicial powers, without which no popular election can be conducted. To that board are delivered the unpurged polls of the State, and the law requires them—

To canvass and compile the returns of the election and declare the names of all persons and officers who have been duly and lawfully elected.

In making that canvass and compilation the board must proceed in the order laid down in the statute :

They shall compile, first, the statements from all polls or voting-places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election.

And whenever proof is made to the board as required by the statute—

Of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, which prevented, or tended to prevent, a fair, free, and peaceable vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting-place, such returning-officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statement of votes from such poll or voting-place until the statements from all other polls or voting-places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning-officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, at any such poll or voting-place.

And for that purpose they have power to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses.

The statute then declares that—

If, after such examination, the said returning-officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery or corrupt influences, did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting-place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning-officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting-place, but shall exclude it from their returns.

Here, then, is a board upon whom the State of Louisiana has conferred those quasi-judicial powers which, in other States, are usually conferred upon the judges of election in the several voting-precincts. Who shall say that it is unrepugnant for a State of the Union to adopt the Louisiana mode of conducting elections rather than the Ohio mode? Certainly each State has the right to choose that method which it deems best for its own protection.

Third. The distinguished Commissioner [Mr. Thurman] holds that if the returning-board, in making their returns, exceeded the jurisdiction conferred upon them by law, all their acts in excess of such jurisdiction are void; and that this Commission may examine and decide whether the board did in fact exceed its jurisdiction.

He does not insist, as some have done, that the two Houses of Congress have authority to question the real voice of a State in declaring who have been chosen as electors; but he holds that they may inquire whether the returning-board did utter the true voice of the State. This proposition is strongly put, but I believe it to be unsound. Its real meaning is obscured by the use of the word "jurisdiction." If, under cover of inquiring into the jurisdiction of the returning-board, Congress may go behind the determination of that board, it follows that the power of Congress is not limited to the counting of the electoral votes, but extends to the counting of the popular vote by which the electors themselves were chosen.

The authority of the State to appoint electors, as I tried to show in the Florida case, carries with it the authority to do every act necessary to complete the appointment, and to determine and declare who has been appointed. It must also carry with it the authority to decide whether the board, created for the purpose of determining and declaring the result, has acted within its jurisdiction.

If the State has made no complaint of excess of jurisdiction on the part of the board, it is difficult to see how the two Houses of Congress can do so. Jurisdiction in general may depend upon territory, upon time, or upon subject-matter. In this case the only question relates to subject-matter. But the very subject-matter upon which the board is authorized to act is summed up in a single sentence: "They are to determine what persons have been elected according to law." That they did determine and declare. But the learned Commissioner says they made an unjust decision, they excluded votes which ought to have been counted, and, in arriving at the result, adopted methods which were beyond their jurisdiction. But, like every other tribunal, they were the judges of their own jurisdiction, unless the law itself provided another tribunal to determine that question.

It will not do to say that because a judgment is erroneous, it is therefore beyond the jurisdiction of the tribunal that declares it. Jurisdiction to decide a case implies jurisdiction to decide it wrong. Hundreds of cases before the Supreme Court have turned on the question of jurisdiction, and that question has often been decided by a divided court. The distinguished members of this Commission who are justices of that court will probably admit that that great tribunal may sometimes have passed upon the merits of a case of which it was erroneously held that they had jurisdiction. But as their judgments are final, even such erroneous decision was valid.

Now, it is not denied that the law of Louisiana confers upon the returning-board the power "to determine and declare" who have been appointed its electors. That duty is their jurisdiction. In the case of the governor and other State officers, the legislature may revise the finding of the board; but in determining who have been appointed electors, no such power of revision is conferred upon the legislature. It follows that the determination of the board, if not overruled by the courts of that State, is the final and conclusive decree of the State itself. That decree we have no power to question or review. The State appoints electors and declares who have been appointed. The utmost that can be claimed for the two Houses of Congress is the authority to count the votes cast by the electors. In doing that they may inquire whether the certificates of votes are genuine; whether they are signed by the recognized officers of the State; in short, may inquire if the certificates do, in fact, represent the determination of the State. But beyond that determination Congress cannot go. In issuing the certificates, the governor does not represent the State. He acts at the request of Congress. The act of 1792 makes it his duty to certify to the President of the Senate what the State has done in reference to the appointment of electors. If his certificate does not testify truly, the authority which counts may go behind the certificate until the actual declaration of the State is found; but there the inquiry ends. To go one step further, is to evade the exclusive domain of State authority.

I am no champion of State sovereignty as that doctrine has sometimes been taught in our political history. But there are rights so clearly and exclusively conferred upon the States, that to invade them is to break up the solid foundation of our institutions; and if one act can be more sovereign than another, it may fairly be said that the most sovereign act which a State of this Union can perform is the act of choosing the men who shall cast its vote for President and Vice-President. Against the theory now urged upon us, that we may review all the processes by which Louisiana has given her vote for President at the late election, I oppose this highest and most unquestioned right of each State of the Union.

It has been said, in the course of our deliberations, that this view of the case is technical; that what is asked on the other side is to ascertain the very right and truth of this matter; to ascertain who was in fact really voted for by the people of Louisiana. I might respond by saying that the objections to the finding of the returning-board are themselves in the highest degree technical. We are asked to go behind the decree of the returning-board; but for what purpose? For the purpose of adding to the count some votes actually cast but which were rejected by the board as unlawful. We are told that some of these polls were improperly rejected; and why improperly? Because it is alleged that, in rejecting these polls, certain technical formalities were not complied with. For example, it is alleged that the protests against the validity of these rejected ballots were not filed within forty-eight hours after the closing of the ballot-boxes; and if protests were not filed within that time, the board could not consider them, no matter how corrupt and fraudulent the ballots might be. They say we stand upon a technicality; but they ask us to break through one only to rest upon another.

If this Commission has authority to go behind the decree of the returning-board for any purpose, it must have the power to go behind it for all the purposes of ascertaining the truth; and if we enter upon such an inquiry, if we open the testimony that both sides will proffer, we shall find a group of allegations like these: that in forty-two parishes of Louisiana, where both sides agreed that there was a fair and free election, the Hayes electors received an aggregate of 6,000 majority; that in two groups of parishes where the validity of the returns was contested, there existed such a state of intimidation and terror, violence and murder, that the voice of the republican party was almost wholly suppressed; that, for example, in the parish of East Feliciana, which for years had cast a large republican majority, not one republican vote was cast at the late election; that in many precincts within the disturbed districts, hundreds of negroes were forced by the coercion of threats and intimidation to vote the democratic ticket against their will; and that on the whole, within the terrorized districts, the voice of the republican voters was so effectually stifled as to produce an apparent majority for the democratic electors, sufficient to overcome the 6,000 republican majority in the undisturbed portions of the State.

If we take one step behind the determination of the State authorities, we must go to the bottom of the case. It will not do to go just far enough to find votes actually cast, and shut our eyes to the violence and outrage that put such votes in the boxes. The duty of purging the polls, and finding the real result of the election, was, by law, enjoined upon the returning-board of the State. That duty they performed. Whether wisely or unwisely, justly or unjustly in every instance, I am not prepared to say; but I take the liberty to remark that after a careful study of the history of that election, and considering the turbulence and irregularities which have long prevailed in that State, I am of the opinion that, on the whole, the decree of the returning-board is in accordance with substantial justice. I have no doubt that thousands of voters were prevented from the exercise of their suffrage. For that evil the laws of Louisiana provide no remedy. But they do command the rejection of polls that are tainted by violence, intimidation, and fraud. And, in doing that, the State has, in part, repaired the wrong sought to be committed upon her people.

Before concluding, I must refer to the single feature in which the Louisiana case is said to differ from the case of Florida. There counsel offered evidence to show that the board of canvassers had acted upon an erroneous view of the law, and had made errors and mistakes in determining the result of the election. Here they offer evidence to show that the returning-board acted fraudulently in determining the result. On the doctrine that fraud vitiates everything, we are told that if fraud be proved in this case, it vitiates the determination of the board.

But the allegation of fraud does not confer jurisdiction of a subject which the law does not authorize a tribunal to consider. The real question is whether the allegation of fraud in the processes of the returning-board confers upon the two Houses of Congress, or upon this Commission acting in their stead, the jurisdiction to inquire into those processes and hear evidence to prove fraud.

A case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1870, and which has already been referred to by one of the commissioners for another purpose, applies so strikingly to the point under consideration that I will cite its leading feature. I refer to the case of Virginia vs. West Virginia, 11 Wall., 39.

In adjusting the boundary between the States of Virginia and West Virginia an agreement was made that the counties of Jefferson and Berkeley might become a part of West Virginia, on condition that a majority of the votes cast on that question in the two counties should be found in favor of annexation. A special statute regulated the mode of conducting the election and determining the question, and provided, among other things, that—

The governor of this State, if of opinion that the said vote has been opened and held, and the result ascertained and certified pursuant to law, shall certify the result of the same, under the seal of this State, to the governor of the said State of West Virginia.

The election was held and the result declared by the governor. But subsequently the State of Virginia filed a bill in chancery against West Virginia to recover back the jurisdiction of those counties, upon the ground that the vote was not fairly taken, and that the returns upon which the governor issued his certificate were false and fraudulent. The bill alleged, in terms, "that the vote taken was not a fair and full expression of the people of those counties, and that the officers who made their returns to the governor falsely and fraudulently suggested and falsely and untruly made it to appear to the governor of the commonwealth that a large majority of the votes was given in favor of annexation; and that his determination of the result, being based upon such false and fraudulent returns, was illegal and void."

These allegations are strikingly analogous to the offers of proof now pending before this Commission. In reference to the allegations of fraud, Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

But waiving these defects in the bill, we are of opinion that the action of the governor is conclusive of the vote as between the States of Virginia and West Virginia. He was, in legal effect, the State of Virginia in this matter. In addition to his position as executive head of the State, the legislature delegated to him all its own power in the premises. It vested him with large control as to the time of taking the vote, and it made his opinion of the result the condition of final action.

Even upon an allegation of fraud the court would not go behind the determination of the officer on whom the State had conferred the authority to declare the result of the election. This is precisely the case before us. The State of Louisiana had empowered the returning-board to determine and declare who had been appointed electors, and having provided no appeal from its decision, its action became the final and conclusive determination of the State; and neither Congress nor this Commission has any authority to inquire whether there was fraud or error in the process by which the determination was reached.

To sum up the points already made:

In appointing her electors, the State of Louisiana has followed the method prescribed by her legislature. That method has been reviewed by her supreme judicial tribunal, and has been declared to be in accordance with her constitution. It is also in accordance with the Constitution of the United States. Of all the steps leading to that appointment, the State, through her chosen organs, is the sole determining power. She has determined and declared that the persons named in certificate No. 1 were duly and lawfully appointed her electors of President and Vice-President.

Those persons met at the time required by law; finding vacancies in their number they filled such vacancies in the manner prescribed by the law of the State; and, in pursuance of the national Constitution, they cast their votes and certified the same to the President of the Senate. These certificates have been opened in the presence of the two Houses of Congress; and there remains but one duty more: that is, to obey the imperial command of the Constitution, which declares, "the vote shall then be counted."

Certificate No. 2 comes with no semblance of authority. It is signed by a man who for three years has not even pretended to be governor. It is based upon no finding or declaration of any officer or pretended officer of the State. It has no validity whatever. It carries upon its face all the indications of worthlessness.

I shall vote against receiving the proffered evidence, and in favor of counting the votes reported in the first certificate.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER FIELD.

FLORIDA.

On the 7th of February the Commission having under consideration the electoral vote of Florida—

Mr. Justice FIELD said:

MR. PRESIDENT: After the elaborate arguments made yesterday by the members of the Commission from the Senate and House of Representatives, I cannot hope to throw much light on the subject under discussion. I shall, therefore, confine myself, in the brief observations I propose to make, to a statement of what I deem to be the law applicable to the case before us.

The main question submitted to us, the one to which all other inquiries are subordinate, is, whom has the State of Florida appointed as electors to cast her vote for President and Vice-President. The electoral act, under which we are sitting, makes it our duty to decide "how many and what persons were duly appointed electors" in that State.

The Constitution declares that each State shall appoint electors

“in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct.” It fixes the number to be appointed, which is to be equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress. It declares who shall not be appointed; that is, no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States. With the exception of these provisions as to the number of electors and the ineligibility of certain persons, the power of choice on the part of the State is unrestricted. The manner of appointment is left entirely to its legislature.

What, then, was the manner of appointment directed by the legislature of Florida? This is manifestly a proper subject for our inquiry, for if another and different manner from that directed by the legislature has been followed in the appointment of persons as electors, such persons are not “duly appointed” in the State, and we must so decide. Any substantial departure from the manner prescribed must necessarily vitiate the whole proceeding. If, for example, the appointment of electors should be made by the governor of a State, when its legislature had directed that they should be chosen by the qualified voters at a general election, the appointment would be clearly invalid and have to be rejected. So, too, if the legislature should prescribe that the appointment should be made by a majority of the votes cast at such election, and the canvassers, or other officers of election, should declare as elected those who had received only a plurality or a minority of the votes, or the votes of a portion only of the State, the declaration would be equally invalid as not conforming to the legislative direction; and the appointment of the parties thus declared elected could only be treated as a nullity.

In inquiring whether the manner prescribed by the State has been followed, we do not trench upon any authority of the State, or question in any respect her absolute right over the subject, but, on the contrary, we seek only to give effect to her will and ascertain the appointment she has actually made.

What, then, was the manner directed by the legislature of Florida? It was by popular election. It was by the choice of a majority of the qualified voters of the State. When their votes were cast on the 7th of November, the electors were appointed, and all that remained was to ascertain and declare the result. The appointment was then completed and could not afterward be changed. What subsequently was required of the officers of election and canvassing-boards was an authentic declaration of the result. For this purpose the votes in each county were to be canvassed by certain designated officers of the county within a prescribed period after the election, and duplicate certificates were to be made and signed by them, containing the whole number of votes given for each officer, the names of the persons for whom they were given, and the number of votes given to each person. A record was to be made of the certificate, and one of the duplicates was to be forwarded to the secretary of state, and the other to the governor. On the thirty-fifth day after the election, or sooner, if the returns from the several counties were received, the secretary of state, the attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who might be designated by them, were required to meet at the office of the secretary of state, pursuant to notice to be given by him, and form a board of State canvassers, and proceed to canvass the returns of the election and determine and declare who were elected "as shown by such returns."* The duty of the canvassers under the law of the State was ministerial, involving only the exercise of such judgment as was required to determine whether the papers returned were genuine, and were executed in conformity with the requirements of the law. Such was the construction given to the statute by the supreme court of the State in the proceeding against the canvassers taken on the relation of Mr. Drew, who was a candidate for governor at the same election, at which the electors for President and Vice-President were chosen, and votes for whom were thrown out by the canvassers upon the same assumed power that votes for the Tilden electors were thrown out by them. In giving its decision in that case, the supreme court said :

The view that the board of State canvassers is a tribunal having power strictly judicial, such as is involved in the determination of the legality of a particular vote or election, cannot be sustained. All of the acts which this board can do under the statute must be based upon the returns; and while in some cases the officers composing the board may, like all ministerial officers of similar character, exclude what purports to be a return for irregularity, still everything they are authorized to do is limited to what is sanctioned by authentic and true returns before them. Their final act and determination must be such as appears from and is shown by the returns from the several counties to be correct. They have no general power to issue subpoenas, to summon parties, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to grant a trial by jury, or to do any act but determine and declare who has been elected as shown by the returns. They are authorized to enter no judgment, and their power is limited by the express words of the statute, which gives them being, to the signing of a certificate containing the whole number of votes given for each person for each office, and therein declaring the result as shown by the returns. This certificate thus signed is not a judicial judgment, and the determination and declaration which they make is not a judicial declaration, that is, a determination of a right after notice, according to the general law of the land as to the rights of parties, but it is a declaration of a conclusion limited and restricted by the letter of the statute. Such limited declaration and determination by a board of State canvassers has been declared by a large majority of the courts to be a ministerial function, power, and duty, as distinct from a judicial power and jurisdiction. Indeed, with the exception of the courts in Louisiana, and perhaps another State, no judicial sanction can be found for the view that these officers are judicial in their character, or that they have any discretion, either executive, legislative, or judicial, which is not bound and fixed by the returns before them. The duty to count these returns has been enforced by mandamus so repeatedly in the courts of the several States of the Union, that the power of the courts in this respect has long since ceased to be an open question.

The only clause of the statute, which would seem to invest the canvassers with something more than mere ministerial authority, is the one

* The following is the text of the law, being section 4 of the act of February 27, 1872 :
 "SEC. 4. On the thirty-fifth day after the holding of any general or special election for any State officer, member of the legislature, or Representative in Congress, or sooner if the returns shall have been received from the several counties wherein elections shall have been held, the secretary of state, attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall meet at the office of the secretary of state, pursuant to notice to be given by the secretary of state, and form a board of State canvassers, and proceed to canvass the returns of said election and determine and declare who shall have been elected to any such office or as such member, as shown by such returns. If any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration; and the secretary of state shall preserve and file in his office all such returns, together with such other documents and papers as may have been received by him or by said board of canvassers. The said board shall make and sign a certificate containing, in words written at full length, the whole number of votes given for each office, the number of votes given for each person for each office and for member of the legislature, and therein declare the result, which certificate shall be recorded in the office of the secretary of state in a book to be kept for that purpose; and the secretary of state shall cause a certified copy of such certificate to be published once in one or more newspapers printed at the seat of government."

which provides that, "if any such returns shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent, that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration." Great stress was placed by counsel, in the argument before the Commission, and by Mr. Commissioner Morton yesterday, upon this clause, as though it gave unlimited discretion and power to the canvassers to exclude, in their count, such votes as they might judge from any cause to have been illegally or irregularly cast. But it is evident from the language used and its context, that the clause never contemplated the exercise of any such undefined and arbitrary power over the returns, but only intended to authorize the exclusion from the count of a return whenever, from evidence, intrinsic or extrinsic, of its irregularity, falsity, or fraudulent character, the canvassers were unable to determine the actual vote cast for any officer. It gave no authority to reject the votes actually given, except when the canvassers were unable to ascertain for whom they were intended, much less to enter upon any judicial investigation into the legality of the votes. In considering this clause the supreme court of the State, in the case of Drew, already cited, held that the words true vote meant the vote actually cast as distinct from the legal vote; and that this followed from the clear general duty of the canvassers to ascertain and certify the "votes given" for each person for each office; and because to determine whether a vote cast was a legal vote, was beyond the power of the board.

We have, then, a decision of the supreme court of Florida giving an authoritative construction to the act under which the electors for President and Vice-President were chosen, to the effect that the powers of the canvassers under the act were purely ministerial, and that their whole duty consisted, whenever they were enabled to determine the actual vote given for any officer, in simply computing arithmetically the number of votes cast, as shown by the returns, and declaring the result by a certificate of the fact over their signatures. Whatever beyond this was done by them was in excess of their authority and void. And I hardly need add, in this presence, that whatever was done by them in excess of their authority was not done in any manner directed by the legislature of the State.

The construction given to a statute of a State by its supreme court is, as we all know, considered as part of the statute itself, as much so as if embodied in its very text. Such is the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in all its decisions. Thus, in Leffingwell vs. Warren, reported in 2d Black, the court said:

The construction given to a statute of a State by the highest judicial tribunal of such State is regarded as a part of the statute and is as binding upon the courts of the United States as the text.

And again, in Christy vs. Pridgeon, reported in 4th Wallace, the court said:

The interpretation within the jurisdiction of one State becomes a part of the law of that State, as much so as if incorporated into the body of it by the legislature.

Having thus briefly stated the requirements of the law of Florida, providing for the appointment of electors, and thus shown the manner of appointment directed by its legislature, I will proceed to state the course actually pursued by the canvassers, from which it will appear whether there was any departure by them, and, if any, how great a departure, from the direction given.

The returns sent from the several counties to the State canvassers all disclosed for whom the votes were cast. It is not pretended that any of them appeared, or was shown to be, either so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the canvassers were unable to determine the actual votes given for any officer. The pretense is that some of the votes returned were illegally or irregularly given, not that there was any doubt for whom they were intended. Under these circumstances the duty of the canvassers, according to the decision of the supreme court, and according to the express language of the statute, was simply to add together the votes and declare, under their certificate, the result as shown by the returns. In so doing they would have carried out the direction of the legislature. Being added together, the returns would have shown that the Tilden electors were chosen. But the canvassers, instead of discharging the simple ministerial duty devolved upon them, undertook to exercise judicial functions and pass upon the legality of votes cast at various precincts in different counties, hearing evidence and counter-evidence upon the subject, consisting partly of oral testimony, but principally of ex-parte affidavits, and in numerous instances, upon one pretense or another, throwing out votes given for the Tilden electors, thereby changing the result. In this way a majority of the canvassers came to the conclusion that the Hayes electors were chosen. In no other way could such a result have been reached.

Now, it matters not, for the purpose of my argument, whether, in taking these proceedings and in exercising judicial functions, the canvassers were actuated by honest or by corrupt motives; whether their conduct was the result of a mistaken conception of their powers, or, as is alleged, of a conspiracy to defraud the State of her choice. In any view that may be taken, it is clear that in deciding upon the legality of votes embraced in the returns, and in rejecting votes from their count on the ground of their asserted illegality or upon any other ground, they exceeded their jurisdiction, and their action in that particular was without any validity whatever.

A result declared, after the returns were altered by the elimination of votes embraced therein, was not a result obtained in the manner directed by the legislature of the State. It was not a result which gave the offices to those who had received the highest number of votes, as required by the law of the State, but to those who had received only a minority of the votes. The whole proceeding, instead of being in accordance with, was in direct contravention of the will of the legislature. Surely it would not be pretended that, if a portion of the returns had been feloniously abstracted from the office of the secretary of state, a canvass founded upon the returns remaining would show an appointment of electors in the manner prescribed by the legislature of the State. A felonious abstraction and an unauthorized exclusion of votes are in legal effect the same thing.

By the act of Congress the electoral colleges were required to meet on the first Wednesday in December, which was the 6th of the month. The canvassers commenced their labors on the 27th of November, the returns from the several counties being at that time all received, but did not complete the count until the morning of the day appointed for the meeting of the electoral college. Two of them then certified to the election of the Hayes electors; and the governor issued to them a certificate of their election. One of the canvassers, the attorney-general, certified that by the authentic returns of the votes in the several counties on file in the office of the secretary of state, and seen by him as a member of the board, the Tilden electors were chosen. The two sets of electors met on the same day, and at the same time, and in the same building, and both sets voted, and transmitted their respective certificates of their proceedings in duplicate to the President of the Senate at Washington, one copy by a special messenger and one by mail. Which of these two sets of electors was duly appointed by the State? Both were not thus appointed. After the statement I have made of the character of the returns, and the manner in which they were altered, there can be no reasonable doubt that the Tilden electors were thus appointed. They received a majority of the votes cast, as shown by the returns, and the law of the State declares that parties receiving the highest number of votes for any office shall be elected to such office.

Mr. President, I have spoken of the matters appearing by the returns, and of the proceedings of the canvassers, as facts in proof before us. I have done so because the evidence contained in the documents transmitted to us with the papers received and opened by the President of the Senate, if we are allowed to look into them, establishes beyond controversy the facts which I have stated. Why, then, should we not consider that evidence and act upon it? We are answered that the certificate of the governor is the only evidence which the Commission can receive of the appointment of the electors. The Constitution does not prescribe the evidence which shall be received of the appointment. That only provides for the voting of the electors, and the transmission by them of a list of the persons voted for to the seat of Government, directed to the President of the Senate. Congress has, therefore, enacted that the governor shall issue a certified list of the electors to them before the time fixed for their meeting. The language of the act is that—

It shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified, and to be delivered to the electors of such State on or before the day on which they are required by the previous section to meet.—Revised Statutes, section 136.

There is nothing in this act which declares that the certificate thus issued shall be conclusive of the appointment. It does not say that the evidence thus furnished is indispensable, or that other evidence of the appointment may not be received. Its only object was simply to provide convenient evidence of the appointment for the consideration of the two Houses of Congress when called upon to count the votes. It was not its purpose to control their judgment in deciding between different sets of papers purporting to contain the votes of the State. A compliance with the act is not obligatory upon the executive of the State. He is not in that respect subject to the control of Congress. He could not be compelled to give the certificate, nor could he be subject to any punishment for refusal to act in the matter. And certainly, when Congress can furnish no means to control the action of a State officer, it cannot render his action either indispensable or conclusive of the rights of the State. Instances may be readily imagined where, from accident, disability, or sickness of the governor, the certified lists could not be obtained, or be obtained and delivered in time, or, if obtained, might be lost or destroyed before delivery. In such cases would there be no remedy? Would the State in such cases lose its vote? Surely, no one will seriously contend for such a result. Suppose, further, that the governor, by mistake or fraud, should deliver certified lists in favor of persons not appointed electors; for instance, to persons who had not received a majority of the votes cast for those officers, (the persons having such majority of votes being eligible to the office under the constitution;) would it be pretended that the will of the State should be thwarted through the force of his certificate? I feel confident that no lawyer in the country would hold that the truth could not be shown in such case against the face of the certificate; and I will never believe in the possibility of this Commission so holding until I see its decision to that effect.

The truth is, a certificate is only prima-facie evidence of the fact certified. Indeed, I venture to assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that in the absence of positive law declaring its effect to be otherwise, a certificate of any officer to a fact is never held conclusive on any question between third parties; it is always open to rebuttal. There are, indeed, cases where a party who has been induced to act upon the certificate of a fact may insist that the truth of the certificate shall not be denied to his injury, but those cases proceed upon the doctrine of estoppel, which has no application here. The fact here to be ascertained is, who have been duly appointed electors of the State of Florida, not who have the certificates of appointment. It is the election, and not the certificate, which gives the right to the office. The certificate being only evidence, can be overcome by any evidence which is in its nature superior. And this is equally true of the certificate issued under the law of the State as of the certificate issued under the act of Congress. And it is equally true of the certificate of the board of canvassers. Those officers exercised mere ministerial functions; they possessed no judicial power; their determination had none of the characteristics or conclusiveness of a judicial proceeding; it has been so decided by the supreme court of the State. And yet, in the opinion of the distinguished Commissioner from Indiana, [Senator Morton,] and some other Commissioners from the Senate and House appear to concur with him, the determination of those canvassers, as expressed by their certificate, is more sacred and binding than the judgment of the highest court of the land, incapable of successful attack on any ground whatever.

I put, yesterday, to these gentlemen this question: Supposing the canvassers had made a mistake in addition in footing up the returns, a mistake that changed the result of the election, and acting upon the supposed correctness of the addition they had issued a certificate to persons as electors who were not in fact chosen, and such persons had met and voted for President and Vice-President and transmitted the certificate of their votes to Washington; and afterwards, before the vote was counted by the two Houses of Congress, the mistake was discovered—was there no remedy? The gentlemen answered that there was none; that whatever mistakes of the kind may have been committed must be corrected before the vote was cast by the electors or they could not be corrected at all. If this be sound doctrine, then it follows that by a clerical mistake in arithmetical computation a person may be placed in the Chief Magistracy of the nation against the will of the people, and the two Houses of Congress are powerless to prevent the wrong.

But the gentlemen do not stop here. I put the further question to them: Supposing the canvassers were bribed to alter the returns, and thus change the result, or they had entered into a conspiracy to commit a fraud of this kind, and in pursuance of the bribery or conspiracy they did in fact tamper with and alter the returns, and declare as elected persons not chosen by the voters, and such persons had voted and transmitted their vote to the President of the Senate, but before the vote was counted the fraud was detected and exposed—was there no remedy? The gentlemen answered, as before, that there was none; that whatever fraud may have existed must be proceeded against and its success defeated before the electors voted; that whatever related to their action was then a closed book. If this be sound doctrine, it is the only instance in the world where fraud becomes enshrined and sanctified behind a certificate of its authors. It is elementary knowledge that fraud vitiates all proceedings, even the most solemn; that no form of words, no amount of ceremony, and no solemnity of procedure can shield it from exposure and protect its structure from assault and destruction. The doctrine asserted here would not be applied to uphold the pettiest business transaction, and I can never believe that the Commission will give to it any greater weight in a transaction affecting the Chief Magistracy of the nation.

But the gentlemen do not stop here. I put the further question to them: Supposing the canvassers were coerced by physical force, by pistols presented to their heads, to certify to the election of persons not chosen by the people, and the persons thus declared elected cast the vote of the State—was there no remedy? and the answer was the same as that given before. For any wrong, mistake, fraud, or coercion in the action of the canvassers, say these gentlemen, the remedy must be applied before the electors have voted; the work of the electors is done when they have acted, and there is no power under existing law by which the wrong can be subsequently righted.

The canvass of the votes in Florida was not completed until the morning of the day of the meeting of the electoral college, and within a few hours afterward its vote was cast. To have corrected any mistake or fraud during these hours, by any proceeding known to the law, would have been impossible. The position of these gentlemen is, therefore, that there is no remedy, however great the mistake or crime committed. If this be sound doctrine, if the representatives in Congress of forty-two millions of people possess no power to protect the country from the installation of a Chief Magistrate through mistake, fraud, or force, we are the only self-governing people in the world held in hopeless bondage at the mercy of political jugglers and tricksters.

This doctrine, which seems to me to be as unsound in law as it is shocking in morals, is supported upon the notion that if we are permitted to look behind the certificate of the governor, and of the canvassing-board upon which that certificate is founded, we shall open the door to an investigation which may not be brought to a close before the 4th of March. The argument is that as the new President is to be installed on that day, and the votes of the electoral colleges are to be counted in February, all inquiry as to the truth of that certificate is forbidden, because it may be impracticable to carry the inquiry to a termination in time for the installation. This position was taken by counsel before the Commission, and presented in every possible form, and was repeated yesterday by Commissioners Hoar and Garfield, and dwelt upon by them as though it were conclusive of the question. The argument amounts only to this, that the difficulty of exposing in time a mistake or fraud of the canvassing-board is a sufficient reason for not attempting the exposure at all, and for quietly submitting to the consequent perpetration of a monstrous wrong.

It is true that the machinery for the election of President, devised by the framers of the twelfth amendment to the Constitution, contemplates the induction of the successful candidate into office on the 4th of March, and that the office shall not on that day be either vacant or disputed. I admit, therefore, to the fullest extent claimed by gentlemen, that no proceedings can be permitted which will postpone the counting of the votes so as to prevent a declaration within that period of the person elected, or a reference of the election to the House of Representatives.

But this limitation of time, so far from being a reason for submitting to a mistake or to a fraud, is a reason for immediate action to correct the one and expose the other. Whatever is done to overthrow the prima-facie evidence presented by the certificate of the governor must be commenced, carried forward, and completed, so that the result of the proceeding can be considered by the two Houses of Congress when the certificates are opened in their presence and the votes are counted. The countervailing evidence must be presented in some authentic form, like the judgment of a competent tribunal, or the legislative declaration of a State, or the finding of an appropriate committee approved by the House appointing it; and then it will constitute a basis for the action of the Houses without delaying their proceedings. If, for example, the certificate of the governor were forged, or designated as electors persons for whom no votes were cast, the fact, if it were desired to ask the action of the two Houses upon it in counting the vote, should be presented in such a conclusive form as to be the subject of consideration as a fact found. If an investigation is then required to establish the fact alleged, I admit that the proceeding cannot be had, except by permission of the two Houses, by reason of the delay it would occasion. The two Houses cannot be required to stop the count to take testimony and investigate the truth of mere allegations; but if the fact of forgery or falsity has already been found by competent authority, and the finding is laid before the two Houses, the finding would not only be a proper subject of consideration by them, but it would be their manifest duty to act upon the finding, in order that the nation might not be defrauded in its choice of a Chief Magistrate.

In the view which I take of this subject there would be no great delay in the counting of the electoral votes if Congress were permitted to look behind the action of the governor or of the canvassing-board; for the facts to be brought to the attention of the two Houses would have to be presented in the manner indicated before they could be received and acted upon, unless the two Houses should consent that testimony be taken at the time. If the fact alleged could be readily established without seriously delaying the count, it is not probable that testimony upon the subject would be refused. For example, testimony would hardly be refused as to the ineligibility of an elector, or the constitution of a canvassing-board, or the condition of a State as under military rule at the time of the election. But where the fact alleged is one of conflicting evidence, and is not susceptible of proof within reasonable limits, then, I think, the fact must be presented properly authenticated, as I have stated.

Evidence in this form, impeaching the correctness of the certificate of the governor and canvassing-board, can be furnished by the State or by either House of Congress; by the State, which is interested that it shall not be defrauded of its vote in the election; and by either House of Congress, which is interested that the forty-two millions of people composing the nation shall not be deprived of the President of their choice.

In this case the State of Florida has furnished evidence in an authentic form and conclusive in its character, that the Hayes electors were never appointed and that the certificate of the governor and of the canvassing-board in that respect is false; and that the Tilden electors were duly appointed. It has furnished the declaration of its legislature in a statute affirming such to be the fact, and it has furnished a judicial determination of its courts to the same effect.

Soon after the canvass of the State board was closed, and its certificate of the result was filed, Mr. Drew, who had been a candidate for the office of governor at the same election, against Stearns, the incumbent, and had been declared defeated by the action of the canvassers in excluding votes for him, instituted proceedings by mandamus in the supreme court of the State to compel the canvassers to count the votes given, as shown by the returns. In his petition for the writ he averred that, according to the returns received at the office of the secretary of state, and on file there, a majority of the votes for the office of governor were cast for him; and charged against the canvassers the same disregard of the law of the State which is alleged against them in the count for the electors. Indeed, their action affected equally the candidates for governor and for electors. The canvassers appeared to the writ, and proceedings were conducted to a judgment on the merits. The supreme court adjudged that the canvassers had no authority to exclude the votes, by which exclusion alone Stearns had been declared elected, and directed them to restore the votes. In obedience to this judgment they restored the excluded votes, and certified a majority for Drew, who went into office and has ever since been the accepted governor of the State. It was the exclusion of the same votes for electors that enabled the canvassers to declare the Hayes electors chosen. In deciding this case the court gave a construction to the statute under which the canvassers acted, and delivered the opinion from which I have already quoted.

As soon as it was known that the canvassers had certified to the election of the Hayes electors, the Tilden electors filed an information in the nature of a quo warranto against them in one of the circuit courts of the State, to determine the validity of their respective claims to the office of electors. This proceeding was commenced upon the day on which the canvass was completed, and process was served on the Hayes electors before they had cast their votes. The circuit court had jurisdiction of the proceeding by the constitution of the State, the eighth section of which provides in terms that the circuit court and the judges thereof shall have power to issue writs of quo warranto. In the information the Tilden electors alleged that they were lawfully elected to the office of electors, and that the Hayes electors were not thus elected, but were usurpers. The Hayes electors appeared to the writ, and, first upon demurrer, and afterward upon an investigation of the facts, their right to act as electors was determined. And it was adjudged that the Hayes electors were never appointed, and were never entitled to assume and exercise the functions of that office, and were usurpers; but that the Tilden electors were duly appointed at the election on the 7th of November, and were entitled on the 6th of December to receive certificates of election, and on that day and ever since to exercise the powers and perform the duties of that office. It matters not that this judgment was not reached until after the Hayes electors had voted; it was an adjudication by a competent court upon the validity of their title as electors at the time they assumed to cast the vote of the State. That judgment remains in full force; the appeal from it neither suspends its operation nor affects its validity. It is certainly entitled to great, if not conclusive, weight upon the subject before us, especially when considered in connection with the action of the legislature of the State. That action seems to me to be conclusive of the case.

After the supreme court in the Drew proceeding had given a construction to the election law, and decided that the canvassers had disregarded its plain provisions, exercised judicial functions which they never possessed, and unlawfully rejected votes, the legislature took steps to have their count corrected with respect to the electors, as it had been with respect to the governor. And on the 17th of January last it passed "an act to provide for a recanvass according to the laws of the State of Florida, as interpreted by the supreme court, of the votes for electors of President and Vice-President cast at the election held November 7, 1876." This act required that the secretary of state, the attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who might be designated by them, should meet forthwith at the office of the secretary, pursuant to a notice from him, and form a board of State canvassers, and proceed to canvass the returns of election of electors of President and Vice-President held on the 7th of November, and determine and declare who were elected and appointed electors at that election, as shown by the returns on file. The act directed the canvassers to follow the construction of the law given by the supreme court defining the powers and duties of State canvassers. It directed that their certificate of the result should be recorded in the office of the secretary of state, and a copy be published in one or more newspapers printed at the seat of government. The canvassers accordingly met and made the canvass directed, and certified that the Tilden electors, naming them, had received a majority of the votes and were duly elected.

Subsequent to this, and on the 26th of January, the legislature passed another act in relation to the Tilden electors. That act recited, among other things, that—

Whereas the board of State canvassers constituted under the act approved February 27, 1872, did interpret the laws of this State defining the powers and duties of the said board in such manner as to give them power to exclude certain regular returns, and did in fact under such interpretation exclude certain of such regular returns, which said interpretation has been adjudged by the supreme court to be erroneous and illegal;

And whereas the late governor, Marcellus L. Stearns, by reason of said illegal action and erroneous and illegal canvass of the said board of State canvassers, did erroneously cause to be made and certified lists of the names of electors of this State, containing the names of said Charles H. Pearce, Frederick C. Humphreys, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long—and did deliver such lists to said persons, when in fact the said persons had not received the highest number of votes, and, on a canvass conducted according to the rules prescribed and adjudged as legal by the supreme court, were not appointed as electors or entitled to receive such lists from the governor, but Robert Bullock, Robert B. Hilton, Wilkinson Call, and James E. Yonge—were duly appointed electors, and were entitled to have their names compose the lists made and certified by the governor, and to have such lists delivered to them:

The Tilden electors—

Now, therefore, the people of the State of Florida, represented in senate and assembly, do enact, &c.

The act then proceeded to declare that the Tilden electors, naming them, were on the 7th of November duly chosen and appointed by and on behalf of the State of Florida in such manner as the legislature thereof had directed, and were from that day entitled to exercise all the powers and duties of the office of electors and had full power and authority on the 6th of December, 1876, to vote as such electors for President and Vice-President, and to certify and transmit their votes as provided by law. The statute then ratified, confirmed, and declared as valid, to all intents and purposes, the acts of such electors. It also authorized and directed the governor to make and certify in due form and under the seal of the State three lists of the names of the electors, and to transmit the same, with an authentic copy of the act, to the President of the Senate, and declared that such lists and certificates should be as valid and effectual to authenticate in behalf of the State the appointment of such electors by the State as if they had been made and delivered on or before the 6th of December, 1876, and had been transmitted immediately thereafter, and that the lists and certificates containing the names of the Hayes electors were illegal and void. The act further authorized and directed the governor to cause three other lists of the names of the Tilden electors to be made and certified and forthwith delivered to them, and required those electors to meet at the capitol of the State and to make and sign three additional certificates of the votes given by them on the 6th of December, to each of which should be annexed one of the lists of the electors furnished by the governor, and that one of the certificates should be transmitted by messenger, and one by mail, to the President of the Senate, and the third delivered to the judge of the district, as required by law.

Pursuant to this act, the governor of the State made and certified three lists of the Tilden electors and delivered the same to them, and the said electors assembled and certified that they had met on the 6th day of December at the capitol and given their votes as electors for President and Vice-President by distinct ballots, the votes for President being for Mr. Tilden and the votes for Vice-President being for Mr. Hendricks, and signed three certificates of their action, which were forwarded as required by law. These certificates were accompanied by the certified lists of the governor, by a certified copy of the two acts of the State, and by a certified copy of the returns on file in the office of the secretary of state, with a tabulated statement annexed showing the result of the votes. The third certificate, which is before us, embraces all these proceedings.

Here, then, we have the highest possible evidence of the action of the State of Florida. The two sets of electors both conformed to every requirement of the law in their proceedings. One set, the Hayes electors, have the certificate of Governor Stearns of their election, based upon a certificate of the canvassing-board, which in its nature is mere prima facie evidence; the other set, the Tilden electors, have an adjudication of a State court of competent jurisdiction, that they alone were the legally-appointed electors. They have the authoritative declaration of the legislature of the State that they alone were entitled to act as electors and vote for President on the 6th of December; and they have a certificate of Governor Drew, based upon a recanvass of the votes, that they were duly appointed. And accompanying this evidence they have a certified copy of the returns, showing that they received a majority of the votes cast at the election.

Under these circumstances can it be possible that there is any serious question as to which of the two sets of electors was duly appointed? As the legislature was alone authorized to determine the manner in which the electors should be appointed, it could furnish in its own way evidence of their acts as agents of the State, whatever may be the power of Congress for its convenience in requiring a certificate of the governor. Were this transaction one that involved merely questions of property, instead of a matter of great public and political interest, I do not think there is a lawyer on this Commission who could hesitate a moment as to the conclusive character of the evidence in favor of the Tilden electors.

In addition to this action of the State, Congress has moved in the matter, and very properly so; for the entire people are interested in the election of their Chief Magistrate. No other officer can exercise so great an influence for good or for evil upon the whole country. He is not only the Commander-in-Chief of our Army and Navy, but he is the executor of our laws, the organ of intercourse with foreign nations, the bestower of offices of honor and trust, and is charged with the duty of maintaining and defending the Constitution. Of all the obligations resting upon the representatives of the people none is greater than that of seeing that no one takes that high office with a defective and tainted title. Acting upon this obligation the House of Representatives early in the session, when it was rumored that irregular and fraudulent proceedings had characterized the election in some of the States, and in Florida among others, appointed committees of investigation to ascertain the facts and report who in truth had been appointed electors by those States. One of those committees proceeded to Florida and took there a large amount of testimony on the subject, which it has returned to the House with its conclusions as to the result. This committee has reported that the Tilden electors were duly appointed, concurring in that respect with the action of the State tribunals and the State legislature. Their report and its conclusions, if adopted by the House, would undoubtedly have a controlling influence upon its action in counting the vote of the State, if this Commission had not been created, and for that reason they should be received, and if not accepted as final, at least be considered by us.*

We are invested with all the powers of the two Houses of Congress to ascertain and decide what persons were "duly appointed" electors of Florida. By the law which has governed legislative bodies from their earliest existence, matters upon which they may be called to act can be investigated by committees appointed for that purpose. And either House may receive the testimony taken by its committee and proceed upon that, or accept the finding of its committee as its judgment, and act upon that as conclusive. And not until now has it ever been questioned that the power of each House to take testimony in that way was not as extensive as the subjects upon which it could act. One of the gentlemen on this Commission [Mr. Edmunds] introduced into the Senate during the present session resolutions for the appointment of committees to inquire into the matters which we are now considering, and Senators Morton and Frelinghuysen voted for them. One of the resolutions authorized the committees to inquire, among other things, "whether the appointment of electors, or those claiming to be such, in any of the States has been made by force, fraud, or other means otherwise than in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the laws of the respective States;" and in compliance with the resolutions the committees have passed weeks in their investigations. It certainly provokes surprise and comment to hear these gentlemen now deny that either House of Congress has any power to go behind the certificate of

* The committee presented to the House their report on the 31st of January, in which they declared that the evidence was perfectly conclusive that the State of Florida had cast her vote for the Tilden electors, and they closed with recommending the passage of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That at the election held on November 7th, A. D. 1876, in the State of Florida, Wilkinson Call, J. E. Yonge, R. B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock were fairly and duly chosen as presidential electors, and that this is shown by the face of the returns and fully substantiated by the evidence of the actual votes cast; and that the said electors having, on the first Wednesday of December, A. D. 1876, cast their votes for Samuel J. Tilden for President and for Thomas A. Hendricks for Vice-President, they are the legal votes of the State of Florida, and must be counted as such."

This resolution was subsequently adopted by the House by a vote of 142 yeas to 82 nays.

The Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate also made an investigation of the Florida case, and a report which was adverse in its conclusions to those of the House committee, but the report was never adopted by the Senate.

the governor and that of the canvassing-board of the State, and to inquire into the matters for which those committees were appointed.

It is said that the Hayes electors were de facto officers, and, therefore, that their action is to be deemed valid until they were adjudged usurpers. But they were no more de facto officers than the Tilden electors. Both sets of electors acted at the same time and in the same building. The doctrine that the validity of the acts of de facto officers cannot be collaterally assailed, and that they are binding until the officers are ousted, is usually applied where there is a continuing office, and then only on grounds of public policy. Private individuals are not called upon, and in most cases are not permitted, to inquire into the title of persons clothed with the insignia of public office and in apparent possession of its powers and functions. They are required, for the due order and peace of society, to respect the acts of such officers, and yield obedience to their authority, until in some regular mode provided by law their title is determined and they are ousted. As a consequence of the respect and obedience thus given, private individuals can claim, in all that concerns themselves and the public, for the acts of such officers, the same efficacy as though the officers were rightfully clothed with authority. The doctrine may be applied even to a single act of an officer where the office is a continuing one, but it may be doubted whether it is applicable to the case of a person simply charged with the performance of a single act. In such performance it would seem that the person could properly be regarded only as the official agent of the State, and if, therefore, he was without authority, his acts would be void. If the doctrine is ever applicable to such a case, it cannot be applied where the act performed has not accomplished its purpose before the want of right in the officer to do the act in question is determined. None of the reasons upon which the doctrine rests, of policy, convenience, or protection to private parties, has any application to a case of this kind. It does not seem, therefore, to me that there is any force in the position.

Nor is there anything in the language used in the petition in the quo warranto case which can affect the status of the Tilden electors, as is supposed by one of the counsel on the other side, [Mr. Matthews.] Of the two sets of electors each claimed to be lawfully entitled to act, and for the purpose of having a judicial determination of the question in controversy, one set brought the writ. Any allegations they may have made cannot alter their right or title; that depended upon the vote of the people, and no consent or language of theirs could change their position to the State or to the United States.

Mr. President, I desire that this Commission should succeed and give by its judgment peace to the country. But such a result can only be attained by disposing of the questions submitted to us on their merits. It cannot be attained by a resort to technical subtleties and ingenious devices to avoid looking at the evidence. It is our duty to ascertain if possible the truth, and decide who were in fact duly appointed electors in Florida, not merely who received certificates of such appointment. That State has spoken to us through her courts, through her legislature, and through her executive, and has told us in no ambiguous terms what was her will and whom she appointed to express it. If we shut our ears to her utterances, and closing our eyes to the evidence decide this case upon the mere inspection of the certificates of the governor and canvassing-board, we shall abdicate our powers, defeat the demands of justice, and disappoint the just expectations of the people. The country may submit to the result, but it will never cease to regard our action as unjust in itself, and as calculated to sap the foundations of public morality.

After the Electoral Commission had decided to exclude all testimony respecting the vote of Florida except that furnished by the papers opened by the President of the Senate, the following memorial from the legislature of the State was presented to the Houses of Congress :

Concurrent resolution embodying a memorial to Congress relative to the counting of the electoral vote.

Resolved by the assembly, (the senate concurring,) That Hon. Charles W. Jones be requested to present the following memorial to the Senate of the United States, and that Hon. Jesse J. Finley be requested to present the same to the House of Representatives of the United States :

The people of the State of Florida, represented in the senate and assembly, memorializing the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, respectfully represent that the final counting of the four electoral votes of Florida for Rutherford B. Hayes and William A. Wheeler, when the said votes had been actually and honestly cast for Samuel J. Tilden and Thomas A. Hendricks, is a grievance of such magnitude to your memorialists that in their view this appeal is not only fully warranted, but cogently demanded by the voice of duty. Your memorialists hold themselves to be justified in treating as established and unquestionable the fact that the said electoral votes were diverted from their true course and employed to defeat the end which they had been set forth to accomplish, because the knowledge of this fact has been communicated to your honorable bodies by solemn acts of all departments of the government of Florida. While it is true that the executive branch of said government had previously averred the contrary, it has been made known to your honorable bodies, and is rapidly becoming known throughout the civilized world, that according to the highest judicial authority of the State that averment is false.

Your memorialists may be forced to admit that there is no remedy for the specific wrong of which they herein complain, but they implore the early and earnest attention of your honorable bodies to the vices or defects in the Constitution or laws of the United States by reason of which such a wrong became possible. If it is true that under the Federal Constitution an exigency may arise in which one fraudulent act performed, or one mistake committed by a majority of a canvassing-board, must necessarily defeat the will of the American people and determine the occupancy of the highest position open to human ambition, your memorialists fear that the great instrument which they have been accustomed to regard as the unapproachable master-piece of statesmanship will become an object of derision and scorn.

Your memorialists venture to express the hope that the wisdom which characterizes your honorable bodies will be speedily applied to the devising of some expedient whereby it shall be made certain that the nation will never again prove utterly impotent to protect itself against the illegal action of a board of canvassers. And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

Adopted by the assembly, February 12, 1877.

Adopted by the senate, February 13, 1877.

STATE OF FLORIDA,

Office of Secretary of State, ss :

I, William D. Bloxham, secretary of state, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a correct transcript of the original now on file in this office.

OREGON.

On the 23d of February, the Commission having under consideration the electoral vote of Oregon—

Mr. Justice FIELD said :

MR. PRESIDENT: I have but a few words to say in this case, and they will be said, not in the expectation of affecting the judgment of any one of the Commission, but in order to explain the reasons which will govern my action.

It appears that Odell, Watts, and Cartwright received at the election in Oregon, in November last, a higher number of votes for electors of President and Vice-President than the candidates against them. Odell and Cartwright were accordingly elected; of that there is no question. Watts would also have been elected had he been at the time eligible to the office. He was then and for some time afterward a postmaster at La Fayette, in the State. The office he held was one of trust and profit under the United States; it imposed trusts, and was one to which a pecuniary compensation was attached. He was, therefore, ineligible to the office of an elector; he was at the time incapable of being appointed to that office. Such is the language of the Constitution, which declares that "No Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector." The prohibition here made is unqualified and absolute. All the power of appointment possessed by the State comes from the Constitution. The office of elector is created by that instrument. Her power of selection is, therefore, necessarily limited by its terms; and from her choice the class designated is excluded. The object of the exclusion was to prevent the use of the patronage of the Government to prolong the official life of those in power.

The clause in question is one that operates by its own force. Like the prohibition against passing an ex post facto law, or a bill of attainder, or a law impairing the obligation of contracts, it executes itself; it requires no legislation to carry it into effect. As applied to Watts, it must be read as if his name were inserted in the text, and was as follows: "The State of Oregon shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but Watts shall not be appointed one of them." The power to appoint him not existing in the State, the votes cast for him availed nothing; he was incapable of receiving them. He was not, therefore, appointed the third elector.

The provision of the Constitution excluding from the choice of the State as electors certain classes of officers is very different from those provisions which create a mere personal disqualification to hold particular offices. Thus the clause declaring that "No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years," and the clause that "No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years," do not forbid an election of persons thus disqualified; they only prohibit them from holding the office so long as the disqualification exists. They can take the office whenever that ceases. But with respect to electors the case is different; there is an incapacity on the part of the State to appoint as electors certain classes of officers. This distinction between ineligibility to an office and disqualification to hold the office is well marked. The one has reference to the time of election or appointment; the other to the time of taking possession of the office. The ineligibility existing at the date of the election is incurable afterwards; the disqualification to hold may be removed at any time before induction into office. If, therefore, at the time of the election persons are within the classes designated, their appointment is impossible. The Constitution prohibits it, and unless the prohibition is to be frittered away whenever conflicting with the wishes of political partisans, it should be enforced equally with the provision fixing the number of electors. One clause of the same section cannot be disregarded any more than the other, and surely the appointment of a greater number of electors than the State was entitled to have would be a vain proceeding.

The ineligibility of Watts was a fact known to the governor. He had held the office of postmaster for years, and was in its possession and exercise at the time of the election. This was a fact of public notoriety, and was not denied by any one. It was asserted by parties who protested against the issue of a certificate of election to him, and it was abundantly proved. Besides this, the rule of law is that, whenever the ineligibility of a candidate arises from his holding a public office within the State, the people are chargeable with notice of the fact. The governor is, of course, bound by the Constitution, and whenever the performance of a duty devolved upon him is affected by the existence of public offices under the United States, he may take notice officially of such offices and ascertain who are their incumbents. This is a doctrine which I had not supposed open to question. But I find that I am mistaken; and I am told by some gentlemen on this Commission that it was not competent for the governor to consider the question of the ineligibility of the candidate, though made known to him in every possible way; and that its determination involved the exercise of judicial functions, with which he was not invested. The general position advanced by them is that the duty of the governor, as a commissioning officer, is to issue his certificate of election to any one who may obtain, according to the determination of the canvassers, the highest number of votes, however ineligible the person and however imperative the prohibition may be against his taking the office.

To test this doctrine I put this question to these gentlemen: Supposing the law declared that only white persons should be eligible to an office, and the highest number of votes, according to the canvassers, should be cast for a colored man, would the governor be bound to issue a commission to him? The gentlemen answered that he would be thus bound; that the governor could not in such case decide the question of the colored man's ineligibility. Mr. Senator Thurman put this further question: Supposing the law of the State declared that only males should be elected to an office, and the highest number of votes were cast, according to the report of the canvassers, for a female, would the governor be bound to issue a commission to her? The gentlemen replied, as before, that he would be thus bound; that the governor could not determine the ineligibility of the party on the ground of her sex. There is something refreshing in these days of sham and pretense to find men who will thus accept the logic of their principles, to whatever result they may lead.

A different doctrine, I think, prevails in this country. Every department of Government, when called upon to apply a provision of the Constitution, must, in the first instance, pass upon its construction and determine the extent of its obligation. A just man empowered to issue a certificate of election will, it is true, hesitate to decide on the question of the ineligibility of a candidate, where there is any serious doubt on the subject, and for that reason to refuse his certificate. He will in such a case leave the matter to the determination of the judicial tribunals. But where there is no doubt on the subject, and the language of the Constitution forbidding the appointment is clear and imperative, he cannot, without violating his oath of office, disregard its mandate.

The law is laid down in numerous adjudications in conformity with these views. In the case of the State of Missouri on the relation of Bartley against the governor, which is cited by counsel, (39 Missouri, 399,) the doctrine for which I contend is stated with great clearness and precision. There a mandamus was prayed against the governor to compel him to issue a commission to the relator as one of the justices of the county court. The supreme court refused the writ on the ground that the issuing of a commission was the exercise of political power, and not a mere ministerial act. After reciting that by the constitution the duty devolved upon the governor to commission all officers not otherwise provided by law, the court said :

The governor is bound to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and he has taken an oath to support the constitution. In the correct and legitimate performance of his duty he must inevitably have a discretion in regard to granting commissions; for should a person be elected or appointed who was constitutionally ineligible to hold any office of profit or trust, would the executive be bound to commission him when his ineligibility was clearly and positively proven? If he is denied the exercise of any discretion in such case, he is made the violator of the constitution, not its guardian. Of what avail then is his oath of office? Or, if he has positive and satisfactory evidence that no election has been held in a county, shall he be required to violate the law and issue a commission to a person not elected, because a clerk has certified to the election? In granting a commission the governor may go behind the certificate to determine whether an applicant is entitled to receive a commission or not, where the objection to the right of the applicant to receive it rests upon the ground that a constitutional prohibition is interposed.

In Gulick against New, also cited by counsel, (14 Indiana, 93,) the supreme court of Indiana used language substantially to the same effect, holding that the governor, who was authorized to commission officers, might determine even against the decision of a board of canvassers whether an applicant was entitled to receive a commission or not, where the objection to his right to receive it rested upon a constitutional prohibition.

Other adjudications might be cited, but I believe these express the law as recognized generally throughout the country.* The question then arises, Watts being ineligible, whether the person receiving the next highest number of votes, he being eligible, was elected. Governor Grover held that such person was elected and issued a certificate of election to him. In his action in this respect he followed the rule which obtains in England, where, if the voters having knowledge of the ineligibility of a candidate persist in voting for him, their votes are considered as thrown away, and the eligible candidate receiving the next highest number of votes is declared elected. There are numerous decisions by courts of the highest character in this country to the same effect. They have been cited to us by counsel in their elaborate arguments, and in view of them an honorable and conscientious man might well have acted as the governor did. But I do not yield my assent to them; they are not in harmony with the spirit of our system of elections. The theory of our institutions is that the majority must govern; and their will can only be carried out by giving the offices to those for whom they have voted. In accordance with this view, the weight of judicial opinion in this country is, that votes given for an ineligible candidate are merely ineffectual to elect him, and that they are not to be thrown out as blanks, and the election given to the eligible candidate having the next highest number of votes. It is fairer and more just to thus limit the operation of votes for an ineligible candidate than to give them, as said in the California case, "the effect of disappointing the popular will and electing to office a man whose pretensions the people had designed to reject." (Saunders vs. Haynes, 13 California, 154.)

* In the debate which took place in the Senate on the 16th of December, 1876, on the electoral vote of Oregon, Senator Thurman replied to some remarks of Senator Morton upon the action of Governor Grover, as follows :

"The Senator from Indiana says that the question whether Watts was eligible or not was a judicial question, and that the sole duty of the governor was a ministerial duty, that he had no judicial function whatever, that it was therefore his duty simply to certify to the person who received the highest number of votes. He states that in the most absolute manner. If his statement be correct, then, if, instead of voting for Watts, the voters who cast their votes for him had voted for Queen Victoria, it would have been the duty of the governor to issue a certificate of election to Her Majesty the Queen that she was chosen elector of President and Vice-President for the State of Oregon. * * * It is very true in Oregon, as in every State in the Union and in the Federal Government, that there is a department of government which is called the judiciary, and another department called the executive, and another the legislative, and the constitutions endeavor to partition out the great powers of government between these three departments; but does it follow from that that no power to judge in any case can be devolved either upon the legislative department or upon the executive department of the government or an executive officer? We could not get along with the government one day on such an idea as that. The judicial power which the governor of Oregon cannot exercise, which the legislature cannot exercise; the judicial power that Congress cannot exercise, that the President cannot exercise, is the power of deciding litigated cases that arise in jurisprudence, and is a wholly different thing from the exercise of that quasi-judicial power which executive officers are called upon every day to exercise and which they must exercise."

I cannot, therefore, vote that Cronin, the candidate having the next highest number of votes to Watts, "was duly appointed" an elector of the State at the election in November. As there was, in my opinion, a failure to appoint a third elector, the question arises whether a vacancy was thus produced which the other electors could fill. In a general sense, an office may be said to be vacant when it is not filled, though this condition arise from non-election, or the death, resignation, or removal of an incumbent. Cases have been cited before us where the term "vacancy" is used in both these senses. But the question for us to decide is whether there was a vacancy within the meaning of the legislation of Congress. That legislation distinguishes between cases of non-election and cases of vacancy, evidently treating the latter as only occurring after the office has been once filled. I refer to sections 133 and 134 of the Revised Statutes, which are as follows:

SEC. 133. Each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote.

SEC. 134. Whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the legislature of such State may direct.*

Under this legislation the State of Oregon has provided for filling vacancies in its electoral college, treating, as does Congress, a vacancy as arising only after the office has once been filled. Its code of general laws declares when vacancies in any office shall be deemed to have occurred, as follows:

Every office shall become vacant on the occurring of either of the following events before the expiration of the term of such office:

1. The death of the incumbent;
2. His resignation;
3. His removal;
4. His ceasing to be an inhabitant of the district, county, town, or village for which he shall have been elected or appointed, or within which the duties of his office are required to be discharged;
5. His conviction of an infamous crime, or of any offense involving a violation of his oath;

* These provisions are taken from the act of January 23, 1845, which is as follows:

An act to establish a uniform time for holding elections for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the electors of the President and Vice-President shall be appointed in each State on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in the month of November of the year in which they are to be appointed: Provided, That each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancy or vacancies which may occur in its college of electors, when such college meets to give its electoral vote: And provided also, When any State shall have held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and shall fail to make a choice on the day aforesaid, then the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day, in such manner as the State shall by law provide.

Approved January 23, 1845.

6. His refusal or neglect to take his oath of office, or to give or renew his official bond, or to deposit such oath or bond within the time prescribed by law ;

7. The decision of a competent tribunal declaring void his election or appointment.—General Laws of Oregon, page 576, section 48.

On the subject of vacancies in the electoral college, the same code of general laws provides that when the electors convene—

If there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college.—General Laws of Oregon, page 578, section 59.

It seems evident from these provisions that there could be no vacancy in the office of elector unless the office had once been filled. The events, upon the occurrence of which the statute declares that a vacancy shall occur in any office, all imply the existence of a previous incumbent.

The word "otherwise," used with respect to a vacancy in the electoral college, does not enlarge the scope of that term. The code having enumerated under one title the events upon which a vacancy may arise, including death, resignation, and other causes, proceeds to declare, under another title of the same chapter, that when a vacancy occurs in the office of elector by death, refusal to act, or otherwise, meaning thereby any other cause which would remove an incumbent, the electors present may fill the vacancy. As here there never had been an incumbent, there could be no vacancy in the sense of the statute by death or otherwise.

The two electors, Odell and Cartwright, undertook to appoint Watts as the third elector upon the assumption that he had resigned the office, and that a vacancy was thereby created. But inasmuch as he had never been elected, he had nothing to resign. The case was not one of a vacancy, but of a failure to elect; and the legislature of the State had made no provision for a subsequent election in case of such failure, as it might have done under the legislation of Congress.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I shall vote in this case as follows :

First. That, as Watts held on the day of election an office of trust and profit under the United States, he was then ineligible as an elector within the express terms of the Constitution ;

Second. That, as of the three persons who received the highest number of votes for electors at the election, only two of them, Odell and Cartwright, were then eligible, they were the only persons "duly appointed" electors, and there was a failure on the part of the State to appoint a third elector ; and Third. That, as the legislature has made no provision for the appointment of an elector under the act of Congress where there is a failure to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the attempted election of a third elector by the two persons chosen, as in case of a vacancy, was inoperative and void.

I have prepared resolutions expressive of these views which I shall in proper time present to the Commission for its action.

Upon the question whether Watts, by his appointment to fill a supposed vacancy, or by virtue of the election in November, was a de facto officer, whose act is to be treated as valid, I have only a word or two to say :

First. There could be no filling of a vacancy if no vacancy within the meaning of the statute existed. As already said, Watts could not create such a vacancy by assuming to resign an office which he had never held. There could be no de facto officer where there was no office.

Second. The doctrine that the acts of officers de facto are to be held as valid is usually applied to cases where the office filled is a continuing one, like that of a judgeship of a court, or a directorship of a corporation, or a commissionership of a county; and is properly applicable only to such cases, and to cases where the functions of the office consist in supervising or recording the acts of numerous parties, like an inspectorship or clerkship of an election, or a registership of deeds; and then is applied simply on grounds of public policy, for the protection of the public and parties who have relied upon such acts. It is not properly applicable to cases where the entire function of the office consists in the performance of a single act; although there are dicta that it has been so applied. The only instances mentioned of such application are those where there was colorable appointment of a deputy, or other under-officer, to do a particular act for his principal; and the acts of the subordinate officers in those instances were sustained on other grounds. In the case of a continuing office, a single act of the officer may be upheld, as for instance the order of a judge de facto, though he should exercise his authority in no other instance. But where there is no continuing office, and an isolated act is to be performed, the person undertaking the execution of the act as agent of the State must be legally invested with authority, or his action will be void. All the authorities cited in the argument of one of the objectors [Mr. Mitchell] relate to cases of the former kind, and have no application to a case like the one before us.

Third. If Watts can be considered as having acted by virtue of the election in November, a position which is not claimed for him in the certificate transmitted to the President of the Senate, then the doctrine asserted is not applicable to his acts, for the further reason that such application would nullify an express provision of the Constitution. The doctrine invoked is that if a person whose appointment is prohibited is, nevertheless, permitted to act upon a certificate of election, the prohibition as to him is abrogated, and his acts are as valid as though the prohibition had never existed. He shall not be appointed, says the Constitution; but if he is appointed, says this doctrine, that fact will make no difference; the prohibition will not impair the validity of his action; the prohibition is a dead letter.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER STRONG.

FLORIDA.

The Electoral Commission having under consideration an offer of evidence to impeach the canvass of the November election in Florida for presidential electors made by the State canvassing-board—

Mr. Commissioner STRONG said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: If the evidence offered can have any legitimate and constitutional bearing upon the decision of the questions sent to this Commission by the act of Congress which has conferred upon us our powers, it is pertinent within the meaning of the act, and it ought to be received. But if, on the other hand, it has no such bearing—if, when received, it could not lawfully affect the decision we are empowered to make, it is impertinent, and it should not be admitted. It is, therefore, a vital inquiry for what precise purpose the evidence is offered. Without undertaking to call attention to it in detail, it may be said that, primarily and substantially, the attempt of those who offer it is to show that the persons who, for convenience, are called the Hayes electors were not in fact elected by the people of Florida; that the return of their election, and the governor's certificate founded on the return, were not a true representation of the votes cast, but that the Tilden electors were elected, and that the canvass and decision of the board of State canvassers should have so declared. What we are asked to do, then, is to recanvass a State election for State agents or officers, or, rather, to try a contested election for presidential electors, such a contested election as is provided for in most of the States by established tribunals created for the purpose of determining election contests, on which courts of law frequently decide in cases of quo warranto.

Hence, the question that meets us at the outset is: Has this Commission power to try a case of contested election in a State? It has, by virtue of the act which created it, all the powers over the Florida election for electors which Congress itself has, and all which either House has, as well as all which the two Houses in convention have. It can have no more. Congress could have conferred no more, and it has made no attempt to confer more. The statute directs us to consider all certificates, votes, and papers from a State objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, with the objections, and directs us to consider them "with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses, acting separately or together, and by a majority of votes decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State, and [we] may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing law be competent and pertinent in such consideration." We are, therefore, to have whatever powers Congress has, if any, under the Constitution for the purpose of considering the papers laid before us, and the same powers for deciding what are the votes provided for by the Constitution. In making our decision and report, as well as in receiving extrinsic evidence, we can only act within the limits of the constitutional power conferred upon Congress. This is plain from the language of the act, as I have quoted it.

The question, then, restated and carried back one step, is this: Has Congress power to recanvass the votes and returns of votes given in a State for presidential electors, or has it power to try a contested election in a State? The answer to this must be sought in the Constitution. Congress, confessedly, has no powers which the Constitution has not conferred upon it, either expressly or by fair implication from the grant of some express power. This will not be questioned by any one.

Now, if it be that Congress, or either House of Congress, has any power to canvass the votes cast for electors, or the returns of such votes, that power must be found in the clause of the Constitution which ordains that the President of the Senate "shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates "[of the lists of persons voted for for President and Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each,]" and the votes shall then be counted." The opening of the certificates and the counting of the votes is not the election. Nor is the voting done on the second Tuesday in November the presidential election. It is only preparatory to such election. The presidential election takes place on the first Wednesday of December, when the appointed electors meet and cast their votes, and all that the President of the Senate and the two Houses of Congress have to do after that time is to ascertain the result. And it is worthy of notice that in this constitutional provision, which alone is the basis of all claim set up for congressional power to canvass the votes and returns of the November State election, there is no reference to that election, or to anything antecedent to the act of voting by the electors. The reference is exclusively to matters that must occur after they have performed their duties.

Now, certainly no one can contend that the direction that the votes (that is, the votes of the appointed electors) shall be counted in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives is an express bestowal of power upon any body to inquire and determine whether a State canvass of the election of electors was correct or not. The framers of the Constitution well understood what was necessary to confer upon Congress, or upon either House, power to canvass elections or returns, and the subject did not escape their attention. When such power was intended to be granted, it was given in plain language. Each House was made a judge "of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." No such language was used respecting electors, and for what appears to me to be the plainest reason. The scheme of the Constitution was to make the appointment of electors exclusively a State affair, free from interference of the legislative department of the Government, excepting only that Congress was permitted to determine the time for choosing electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes, with this limitation, that the day shall be the same throughout the United States. And it was ordained that no Senator or Representative shall be appointed an elector.

The States, as such, were required to appoint, in such manner as their legislatures might direct; the plain object of which was to make State governments, in the matter of choosing a President, as independent as possible of any possible action by the General Government.

It will, then, I think, be admitted that the power claimed for Congress, and of course for this Commission, by the proponents of the evidence offered, has not been expressly granted. Is there any implication of such a grant? I am unable to find it in the Constitution. I have already remarked that when the grant of such a power was intended to be made it was given in unmistakable language, expressly making each House a judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members. The express gift in that case tends to repel the idea of an implied grant of the same power in any other. I think it may safely be said that no powers were granted to Congress by the Constitution, either expressly or impliedly, that were not intended to be granted, and it is difficult to believe there was an intention to grant to Congress by implication power to canvass and judge of elections and returns of elections of State electors when it was thought necessary to grant that power expressly in cases of elections of Senators and Representatives.

An implication of power must have something upon which it can rest, and certainly there is in the Constitution no basis for an implication such as is sought to be made here, except it be found in the required presence of the two Houses when the electoral votes are to be opened and counted. I know of no other implication of congressional power which rests on so shadowy a foundation, and I find it impossible to infer from that any grant of power of canvassing elections in the States. Yet if we receive the evidence offered we shall be claiming and exerting the exact power which Congress would have possessed if the Constitution had expressly declared that Congress shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of presidential electors.

The truth is, the framers of the Constitution seem never to have contemplated the possibility of disputes respecting the appointment of electors, and hence they made no provision for the decision of such controversies. They were wise men, but they did not foresee everything. They would have been more than human if they had. I doubt whether they had in mind at all the idea of a popular election as a mode of appointing State electors. They used the word "appoint," doubtless thinking that the legislatures of the States would themselves select the electors, or empower the governor or some other State officer to select them. The word "appoint" is not the most appropriate word for describing the result of a popular election. Such a mode of appointment, I submit, is allowable, but there is little reason to think it was contemplated, and still less reason to suppose that the idea of a contested popular election for electors had any existence in the minds of its framers when the Constitution was formed. It was not until years afterward that the electors were chosen by popular vote. It is altogether improbable, therefore, that any necessity was felt in the constitutional convention for giving to Congress, or any other branch of the new Government, the decision of contests over the results of such elections, and hence it is not surprising that we find no provision made for determining them.

And it seems to me, if such contest had been foreseen, that it is by no means clear the convention would have provided for their decision by any Federal tribunal. There are inherent difficulties in the way. As I have said, the appointment of electors, however it may be made, is peculiarly and exclusively a State affair. The action of electors after their appointment has relation to the General Government, but the appointment itself is a different matter. Before the first Wednesday of December, when the electors cast their votes, neither Congress nor any Department of the General Government has anything to do with them, or with the proceeding for appointing them. The State confessedly has. She has entire control over the elections, over the returns, and over the canvass. And so, after the votes of the electors have been cast, if there be any power over the election, the returns, or the canvass, confessedly the State has it. Now, if Congress had power also to enter upon a recanvass, or to try a contest over the results, its exercise might lead to untold confusion and difficulty. Congress might decide that one set of electors had been appointed, while the State, which has undoubted authority, might decide another set were the true appointees. If the decision of Congress is to prevail, where then is the right of the State to appoint in its own manner? I cannot believe the Constitution justifies any such possible conflict, or any such invasion of the domain of a State. The implication of such a power ought to be clear, if it exists at all. It ought not to rest on any other than a substantial foundation. Somebody ought to be able to put his finger on some clause in the Constitution that justifies it. No such clause has been pointed out, and I can find none. The present juncture sometimes tempts me to wish I could find some power in Congress and in this Commission to explore to the bottom the election and returns in Florida; and could I find anything upon which to build a fair implication of such a power, I would exert it. But I cannot construe the Constitution as I may wish it to be; I must construe it as I find it.

If, then, Congress has not the power to enter into the consideration of the evidence offered, it would be idle to admit it.

But we are asked, Is there no way of avoiding the possibility of having electoral votes cast on the faith of false returns of elections? Can no inquiry be made into the correctness of such returns? To such questions I reply, there is ample power in the State. She may provide in any way to purify her elections, and may devise means to correct an erroneous canvass, or rectify false returns, or throw out illegal votes.

She may do this in the most summary way. She may accomplish it completely before the day for casting the electoral vote arrives. But I find no power in Congress, either express or implied, to do this work which the State may do.

There may be a necessity for its lodgment somewhere outside of the State, but when Congress undertakes to act it must find a warrant for its action in some provision of the Constitution. There are many things the experience of ninety years has taught us it would be desirable to have, some things that seem to be necessary, which the Constitution has not given.

In all elections there are and there must be finalities. There must be an ultimate canvass and ascertainment of the result. That must be final and conclusive until reversed, though it may not be in exact accordance with the actual facts.

The statute of Florida provides that its presidential electors shall be appointed by a popular vote, and it directs that the result of that vote shall be determined and declared by a State board of canvassers constituted as directed. That board is made by the statute the ultimate determinant and declarant of what the vote was and of its result, and it has power in certain cases to exclude county returns. The board is to determine and declare. Such is the plain direction of the act. Determination is a quasi-judicial act; the declaration which is to follow is an announcement of the determination; and after the determination and declaration the governor is required to give a certificate to the persons elected electors. But how is he to know who has been elected, except from the determination and declaration of the board? He has no authority to canvass the returns, and he cannot overrule the action of the board. He must be governed by that action if he obeys the law and certifies as required.

I admit the declaration and determination of the board may be set aside by any authority the State may designate to try contested elections. It may be shown to be erroneous on the trial of a quo warranto. But until thus reversed, it is and must be final, obligatory upon the governor as upon all others. The certificate he is required by law to give is a certificate of a fact, and of a fact which can appear only in that determination of the State board of canvassers, which is in existence unreversed when the certificate is to be given. Surely, he cannot certify that a person has been elected who, at the time of his certificate, is shown by the determination of the State board not to have been elected. Such a certificate would be a palpable falsehood and fraud.

Now, in this case, it is not offered to be shown that Governor Stearns's certificate of the election of what are called the Hayes electors did not truly represent the conclusions and determination of the State board; and if it did truly conform to that determination, it was such a certificate as he was authorized and required to make. It was neither untrue nor fraudulent.

I admit the governor's certificate is not unimpeachable. It may be shown to be untrue by proof that it does not correspond with the determination of the canvassing-board. It may be proved to be a forgery. But in the present case these things are not alleged. The certificate must be, therefore, at least prima-facie evidence that the persons certified to be elected were in fact elected, and, therefore, that they were the State's appointees. They derived their title from the election, and what was the result of the election was determined by the State canvassing-board. The determination, I have said, may have been subject to revision by process of State law, but until annulled it was the pronounced action of the State.

Are, then, persons who have received a governor's certificate that they have been appointed electors, a certificate which the governor is required by law to give, and which is founded on a quasi-judicial determination of the results of the election, incapable of acting until it shall be decided by another tribunal, in some proceeding which may or may not afterward be commenced, whether the determined and declared result of the election was erroneous or not?

Must every person who has received a commission to fill an office, the duties of which are to be performed immediately, if at all, decline acting under the commission because subsequent investigation may have shown that he was not entitled to it? No such doctrine, I think, has ever been asserted by any tribunal.

Now, then, the persons who voted for Hayes on the 6th day of December had all the insignia of title when they voted. They had the governor's certificate of their right. They had the judicial determination and declaration of the State canvassing-board that they had been elected. No other persons had even a prima-facie right. The Tilden electors had no decision in their favor of any board or tribunal authorized by law to ascertain and declare the results of the election. They had no certificate from anybody empowered to certify that they were electors. They were not even electors de facto.

I do not care to discuss the question how far the acts of officers de facto are effective. It is admitted that they generally are valid as against, or for, others than themselves. But I maintain that the acts of such officers are de jure. When they have at the time of their action all the evidences of right known to the law, their right is absolute and perfect until annulled or revoked. I do not see how anybody can contend that acts of officers who have received certificates of their election from the authority empowered and directed to issue such certificates—certificates truly representing the final returns of the election, as determined and declared by the ultimate board constituted by law for making such determination—are not de jure. How can it be maintained that such officers are personally responsible for acts done in pursuance of their apparent right, even though it may subsequently be shown that they were not in fact elected? Could the Hayes electors have been sued for intrusion? If they had been, would not the governor's certificate and the determination of the State canvassing-board have been a complete protection? If a sheriff has a commission from a governor, are his acts, while he holds the commission, rendered invalid by a subsequent judicial decree that he was not entitled to the office? Surely this will not be claimed. And if it cannot be, it is because the acts of such officers are rightful, or de jure.

In my judgment, it follows inevitably that what was done in Florida after the 6th of December is immaterial. Neither the action of the legislature, nor a post hac decision of a court, can affect an act rightfully done, when it was done and completed before the legislature and the court attempted to annul the authority for it.

Mr. Commissioner THURMAN. - Are we not now counting the vote? Is it not a matter in fieri?

Mr. Commissioner STRONG. We are now counting the electoral vote. But the offer of evidence assumes that we may count the State vote for electors, an antecedent matter. I have already attempted to show that there is no constitutional power in Congress, and consequently none in us, to count the votes of States, or to review a State canvass.

But to return to the subject I was considering. There must be a finality in ascertaining the results of an election, and when the election is a mode of appointment of persons to cast a vote for a State on an appointed day, the finality must be on or before that day, else nothing can be settled. The electors of the State of New York cast the votes of the State on the 6th of December last. Can those votes now be nullified by any subsequent action of the New York legislature declaring that the persons who voted were not elected, or creating a new board to make a new canvass, or by the judgment of an inferior court, or any other court, that other persons were entitled to cast the votes of the State? If that is possible, the new President to be installed on the 4th of March next can be ousted by the declaration of a State legislature or the judgment of a State court. There is no statute of limitations to bar such action by any State. If the votes of electors can be destroyed by State action after they have been cast, it may be done next July as well as it can be now.

But I have detained the Commission too long. I will only add some references to a few decisions that bear directly on the question before us, and show the conclusive effect of the decision of a statutory canvassing-board.

In 25 Maine Reports, 567, may be found a unanimous opinion of the supreme judicial court in answer to a question propounded to the court by the governor. The question was, "Is it competent for the governor and council, in counting votes for county officers, under the provisions of the act providing for the election of county officers, approved February 22, 1842, to receive from the town clerk and selectmen evidence to show that the return made by them does not correspond with the records?" The constitution and statutes of the State required, in the choice of county officers, that the votes of towns and plantations should be received by their selectmen and assessors respectively, in the presence of their respective town and plantation clerks, and that the clerks should make a list of the persons voted for with the number of votes for each against his name, and that the same should be recorded in the presence of the selectmen and assessors respectively, in the open town and plantation meetings, and that fair copies of the lists should be attested by the selectmen and assessors of their respective towns and plantations, and by the clerks of each, and sealed up in open town and plantation meetings. The votes so sealed up are required to be transmitted to the governor and council within thirty days thereafter, who are to "open and count the votes returned." Open and count the votes—such is the language of the law. The court was of opinion that the governor and council had no authority to receive any other evidence in relation to the votes than what the certificates so prepared, transmitted, and received, may contain—not even evidence that the township records differ from the return-lists. A similar decision was made in Bacon vs. The York Commissions, 26 Maine, 494; and a like opinion was given in 1867, reported in 54 Maine, 602.

In The People ex rel. Bailey vs. The Supervisors of Greene, 17 Barb., 217, it was held that after a board of county canvassers has met and organized according to law, and proceeded to estimate the votes of the county, and to make the statement prescribed by the statute, and to determine who have been elected county officers, and a copy of their determination has been published and filed and become a matter of record, and the board has dissolved, a mandamus will not lie requiring them to reorganize and correct the estimate of votes of the county, by allowing counting, canvassing, and estimating the votes of an election-district alleged to have been improperly omitted by the board at its former meeting.

In Hadley vs. The Mayor of Albany, 33 New York (Court of Appeals), 603, it was ruled that when the law has committed to the common council of a city the duty of canvassing the returns and determining the result of an election from them, and the council have performed that duty and made their determination from them, they have exhausted their power and cannot afterward reverse their decision by making a different determination. It was also held that the question as to the effect of the returns is not open for determination by a jury in an action to which the title to the office comes up collaterally. In that case an offer was made to show that the returns in fact showed (as is alleged in the case now before us) that the person determined and declared elected was not elected. But the evidence was ruled inadmissible, and Denio, the eminent judge who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

If the question had arisen upon an action in the nature of a quo warranto information, the evidence would have been competent. But it would be intolerable to allow a party affected by the acts of a person claiming to be an officer to go behind the official determination to prove that such official determination arose out of mistake or fraud.

So in Clark vs. Buchanan, 2 Minnesota, 346, it was held that a canvassing-board, having made a canvass and adjourned sine die, was functus officio and had no right to reconvene and correct errors in its decisions. I know of no authorities in conflict with these. There are very many that assert the same doctrine.

My conclusions, then, are that neither Congress nor this Commission has authority under the Constitution to re-canvass the vote of Florida for State electors; that the first determination of the State canvassing-board was conclusive until it was reversed by State authority; that while it remained unreversed it conferred upon the persons declared by it to have been chosen electors rightful authority to cast the vote of the State; and that the act which those electors were appointed to do having been done, it was not in the power even of the State afterward to undo the act and call in question the authority by which it was done.

It follows, in my judgment, that the evidence now offered is impertinent to any question we can decide, and, therefore, that it ought not to be admitted.

OREGON.

The electoral votes of Oregon being under consideration—

Mr. Commissioner STRONG said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I do not propose to present an extended argument in support of the opinions I have respecting this case. The condition of my health forbids that; but I wish to state very briefly what my opinions are, together with the conclusions at which I have arrived. I still think, as I thought when we had the Florida and Louisiana cases under consideration, that when the laws of a State have appointed a tribunal, either a board, a council, an officer, or any authority, to ascertain, decide, or determine what have been the results of an election for presidential electors, the decision of that board, officer, or authority is conclusive, so long as it remains unreversed by a judicial tribunal empowered by State law to reverse it. If I could have had any doubts upon this subject they would have been removed by the very able argument of Judge Hoadly, submitted to us night before last, and by the numerous authorities he cited. Those authorities show that it is everywhere held that the decision or ascertainment of the result of an election by the appointed canvassing authority is final, and that it must be accepted as such. Not a single authority has been adduced which asserts any other doctrine. The right of a person claiming to have been elected is to be tested, then, by the results of the State canvass, not by what preceded it, and not by what followed it. The State canvass is the determination by the State, acting through its appointed agents, of the question who was elected. I have never doubted that when the legal profession of the country shall come to examine the subject coolly, as they will after the present excitement has passed, they will agree that this is a perfectly sound doctrine. But I had not expected the doctrine would, at this early period, in the midst of an excited party struggle, receive the assent and complete vindication it has received from the counsel who have addressed us on behalf of the Tilden electors.

In view of this principle, to which there appears to be universal assent, let us examine the statutes of Oregon and see what provision that State has made for ascertaining and determining the results of elections for presidential electors. The sixtieth section of its election laws enacts that "the votes for electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress," and former sections of the act prescribe how the returns and canvass of votes for members of Congress shall be made. In each county the county clerk is required to make an abstract of the votes cast in the county and send it to the secretary of state; and the thirty-seventh section of the law directs as follows:

It shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed, within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for * * * members of Congress.

This provision plainly makes the secretary of state the sole canvassing officer. It may not be proper to call him a board, but he is the sole officer designated and appointed by the law to make the canvass and ascertain the result of the election. It is true he must make the canvass in the presence of the governor, but no duties in regard to the canvass are assigned by the law to the governor. His presence is required to insure an open canvass, and for no other apparent reason. Had it been intended he should take part in the canvass, the language of the act would have been, it shall be the duty of the secretary of state and of the governor to proceed to canvass the votes, &c. But the words actually used have no such meaning. It is worthy of notice that in the thirty-fifth section, where provision is made for a county canvass, and for making up the abstract of votes to be sent to the secretary of state, it is enacted that the county clerk, "taking to his assistance two justices of the peace of the county, shall proceed to open the [returns received] and make abstracts of the votes." There the two justices selected are made part of the county canvassing-board, because they are to be active participants therein, but the provision in regard to the State canvass is widely different, and the different language employed respecting that indicates clearly a difference of intention. I think, therefore, that it is beyond any reasonable doubt that by the law of Oregon the secretary of state is made the sole canvassing-officer to ascertain, from the county abstracts sent to him, and to determine the results of an election for member of Congress, and also for presidential electors.

This canvass was made in the present case, and we have it before us. The secretary of state has certified and affixed the seal of the State to his certificate that the tabulated statement to which he certifies is the result of the vote cast for presidential electors at a general election held in and for the State of Oregon on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, as opened and canvassed in the presence of his excellency L. F. Grover, governor of the State, according to law, on the 4th day of December, A. D. 1876, at two o'clock of that day, by the secretary of state. That certificate shows that each of the three Hayes electors received over 15,200 votes, and that each of the Tilden electors received less than 14,200. The secretary has also made out and certified, over the seal of the State, a list of the names of the three persons who received the highest number of votes, as it appears by the returns of the election on file in his office, and those three persons are the three Hayes electors.

This result of the canvass, thus made to appear, was the final determination of the officer appointed by the State to make such a determination. I agree with the honorable Senator from Delaware that there is no essential difference in the authority of the State canvassing-boards of Florida and that of the State canvassing-officer of Oregon. The duty of each is to ascertain, as a finality, who have been elected by the popular votes. But in Oregon there is a most important statutory provision. It is found in the fortieth section of the law regulating elections, as follows:

In all elections in this State, the person having the highest number of votes for any office shall be deemed to have been elected.

When, therefore, the secretary of state, on the 4th day of December, 1876, canvassed the vote of the State, and ascertained, as he did, that Odell, Cartwright, and Watts had received the highest number of votes for presidential electors, the law declared them to be elected. It required that they should be deemed elected. Deemed by whom? Deemed elected by the secretary of state, by the governor, and by everybody else. Apart, then, from the question respecting the alleged ineligibility of Watts, of which I shall speak hereafter, the appointment of those three electors was complete on that day, so soon as the secretary of state had completed his canvass. Now, had nothing more been done; had no certificate of their election ever been given by the secretary or by the governor, the three electors, having been ascertained by the State's appointed officer to have received the highest number of votes and having been required by law to be deemed elected, would have had a complete and unquestionable right to cast the vote of the State for President and Vice-President. No one doubts or denies this. Their right was founded upon the election as determined by the law, and not upon any certificate of their having been elected or of their being electors.

But the sixtieth section of the statute imposes upon the secretary of state an additional duty, to be performed after he has completed the canvass. He is required to prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. These lists are required to be signed by the secretary and the governor, and to be delivered by the secretary to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on the first Wednesday of December. This, I say, is no part of the canvass. It is a simple ministerial act, which may be performed, and which was performed in the present case, days after the canvass and determination of the question who had the highest number of votes, and days after the time when, by force of law, the persons ascertained to have received the highest number were deemed to have been elected. These lists, then, are in no sense the commission of the electors and their warrant for action. Their authority is complete before the lists are made out. Nor can there be any pretense for saying that the lists are the decision of the canvassing-officer. Nobody claims that. What, then, are they, and what purpose were they designed to subserve? They are not required to give notice to the electors that they have been appointed. This is clear, for they are not to be delivered to the college of electors until the hour of their meeting. As notices, therefore, they would be nugatory. The chosen electors might reside hundreds of miles from the capital. Had the lists been intended for notice of appointment, service of them must have been required before the hour of meeting. It is evident they are intended to be evidence, on the count here, of a previous appointment, and they are made out in duplicate that they may accompany the two certificates of votes required by the act of Congress of 1792 to be sent to the President of the Senate. These lists, it is true, are required to be signed by the governor as well as by the secretary of state. They are not to be made out by the governor or delivered by him. He, as well as the secretary, signs to furnish evidence required at Washington to show here that the State had previously appointed the persons electors whose votes have been sent.

The truth is, the law of Oregon confers on the governor no authority to canvass the returns of votes for presidential electors, or to commission those who by the ascertainment and decision of this canvassing authority are to be deemed elected, or to certify who have been appointed. He may grant such a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes for certain other offices and may issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person. This power is conferred by the thirty-seventh section. But the provisions in regard to presidential electors are entirely different. His certificate of their election is wholly unauthorized. When, therefore, he certified that Odell received 15,206 votes, Cartwright 15,214 votes, E. A. Cronin 14,157 votes for electors, being the highest number of votes cast at the election for persons eligible to be appointed electors, and declared them duly elected electors for the State of Oregon, he did an act which the law conferred upon him no power to do, and he certified what was untrue, for the law declared that the persons who had the highest number of votes should be deemed elected.

This unauthorized certificate, which alone is the foundation of all claim the Tilden electors set up, was the act of the governor. It was attested, it is true, by the secretary of state, and the seal of the State is attached, but it is not the certificate of the secretary any more than the attestation of Mr. Secretary Fish to a presidential proclamation of a thanksgiving day makes it Mr. Fish's proclamation. The attestation is to the fact that the governor signed the certificate. It is not an assertion that the certificate is true. The secretary of state of Oregon has never certified that Cronin was an elector, or that any persons were other than Odell, Cartwright, and Watts.

Even where the law of the State directs the governor to give to electors certificates of their election, as the law of Florida does, I have never contended, and no one has contended, that the certificate is conclusive. I said distinctly, more than once, when remarking upon the Florida case, that the governor's certificate is not unimpeachable. It may be shown to be untrue, and it is so shown when it is proved to be different from the conclusions of the State canvassing authority or board. I say so now. Unless the decisions of all courts are to be disregarded, the result of an election for electors is that ascertained and determined by the State canvassing-board or officer designated by law for that duty. That is what we held in both the Florida and Louisiana cases, and that I hold now. But if such were not the law, an unauthorized certificate of the governor can be evidence of no fact asserted in it.

A few words in regard to the ineligibility of Watts. I believe that neither this Commission nor Congress has any power under the Constitution to judge of the qualifications of a State elector, no more than we have to judge of the State election and returns. Ineligibility is a disqualification. But I will not discuss the question of our power; I have sufficiently discussed it heretofore. If it be conceded that Watts was ineligible on the 7th of November, the day of the election, his disqualification for appointment ceased on the 14th of that month, and there was nothing in the way of his appointment on the 6th of December. Concede, for the sake of the argument, that he was ineligible on the 7th of November, and, therefore, was not elected, though he received a higher number of votes than any competitor, then there were two chosen, and the college consisting of three was not full. One elector was wanting. There was a vacancy, and that vacancy was filled on December 6, by the action of the two electors who were chosen, who then appointed Watts to fill it. Our friends, however, whose opinions do not concur with mine, earnestly insist that the deficiency in the college having been caused by a failure to elect more than the two electors, there was no vacancy within the meaning of the law which the two electors could fill. A vacancy, they say, can only exist when the office has had an incumbent. Rather technical, I think! The statute of Oregon declares that if, at the hour of twelve o'clock at noon on the first Wednesday of December after their election, "there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college, and when all the electors shall appear, or the vacancies, if any, shall have been filled, as above provided, such electors shall proceed to perform the duties required of them by the Constitution and laws of the United States." The language is very broad—as comprehensive as possible. It is not only vacancies occasioned in specified ways that may be filled, but vacancies occasioned otherwise. The statute is plainly remedial, and the mischief or evil it was intended to remedy was a college of electors only partly filled when the time for voting came. If there was a vacancy then, if there were not in being the entire number of electors to which the State was entitled, the State would lose her just share in the choice of a President and Vice-President. This was the mischief the statute proposed to remedy, and the mischief was precisely the same, whether the incompleteness of the college was caused by the death, refusal to act, or neglect to attend of one of the persons elected, or whether it was caused by a failure to elect a sufficient number of electors.

Now, if there be any rule of construction which no one doubts, it is that remedial statutes are to be liberally construed, and that such effect is to be given to them, if possible, as to remove the whole mischief they are intended to cure. In view of this principle, I cannot see how it can be maintained that Odell and Cartwright were not authorized to appoint a third elector, as they did, and thus complete the college. The argument that they had no such right is based, if it has any basis, upon the most refined technicality. Together with those who act with me, I have been charged with standing on technicalities to defeat justice. If to stand on the Constitution of the United States and the decisions of all the courts, as I have done, is to be technical, what is to be said of the argument that under the Oregon statute two admittedly chosen electors had no right to fill the electoral college, if its incompleteness was occasioned by a failure of the people to elect more than two electors?

Mr. President, such are my opinions respecting the principal questions in this case. They lead inevitably to the conclusion that, under the law of Oregon, Odell, Cartwright, and Watts were the duly-appointed electors of the State, and that the votes cast by them should be counted.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER MILLER.

FLORIDA.

The Commission having under consideration the electoral vote of Florida—

Mr. Commissioner MILLER said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: As all the members of the Commission have spoken to the matter before us but you, my brother Bradley, and myself, and as I am aware that before the vote is taken both you and he desire to give expression to your views, it seems appropriate and it is probably expected that I shall do the same.

The only question which I consider to be properly before the Commission is the one propounded by us to counsel, namely, whether any other evidence can be received and considered by the Commission than that which was submitted by the President of the Senate to the two Houses of Congress, being the different certificates and the papers accompanying the same. The other members of the Commission who have taken part in this discussion have not limited themselves to this, but have inquired into the effect of the action of the State courts of Florida, and of her legislature, and the certificates of Attorney-General Cocke, and Governor Drew, as found in those papers; and in considering the effect of the certificate of Governor Stearns and the action of the returning-board of the State, in excluding other evidence of the appointment of electors, it was not easy to keep wholly out of view the papers I have mentioned.

I shall therefore give them a few moments' consideration. But as they, with another matter much insisted on, lie outside of the general and what I believe to be the more legitimate course of reasoning, on which the true solution of the question must rest, I will dispose of them first.

It is strongly urged upon us that a large pile of papers, a half-bushel perhaps in quantity, of the contents of which both this Commission and the two Houses of Congress are profoundly ignorant, has become legitimate evidence and must necessarily be considered by us, because they are in a very general way referred to in the paper filed by certain members of the two Houses as their objection to what has been familiarly referred to as certificate No. 1, by which I understand the certificate of Governor Stearns that the electors who have since cast their votes for Hayes and Wheeler were the duly-appointed electors for the State of Florida. This proposition has been defended by Mr. Commissioner Hunton on the ground that by analogy to the exhibits accompanying a bill or answer in chancery, these, being exhibits to the objections which the statute requires to be made in writing, become part of those objections. But if the principle were sound the analogy wholly fails, because every exhibit referred to in a bill in chancery must not only have its pertinency shown by describing its nature or character in the bill, but the exhibit itself must be identified by a mark or reference, as a number, a letter, or some other mode by which that identity is clearly established. Nothing of the kind is done here. No statement of the character, or nature, or source of a single paper, out of perhaps a hundred, is made. No reference is made to anything by which these papers can be identified. There is nothing to hinder alterations or substitutions among them. They may be ex parte affidavits taken in the morasses of Florida, the slums of New York, or the private office of retained counsel in this city. It would be very strange indeed if the act of Congress, under which we sit, intended to furnish in this manner the materials on which our decisions must be founded. Such, however, is the argument of Mr. Commissioner Thurman, who, construing, as I venture to say erroneously, an important phrase in that act, insists that all the papers accompanying the objections must be considered by us. The language he relies on is this :

When all such objections so made to any certificate, vote, or paper from a State shall have been received and read—all such certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying the same, together with said objections, shall be forthwith submitted to said Commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, &c.

In the joint meeting of the two Houses—

The good sense of the framers of this bill is vindicated by the critical accuracy with which they have clearly expressed that the certificates, votes, and papers so objected to, and all papers accompanying them, are to be considered, and the objections also, the latter only on their merits, with no directions to consider any papers filed with them, even if fully described and identified. This seems so clear to me that I shall pass from the consideration of the point without further remark.

Another matter, much relied on by counsel and urged again in the Commission, is the action of the courts of Florida in two cases which are supposed to affect the right of the electors mentioned in the first certificate.

The first of these was the suit between Stearns and Drew, rival candidates for the office of governor at the same general election in which the electors are said to have been chosen. It is not claimed that this suit of itself determined who were the lawfully-appointed electors, but that the opinion of the supreme court of the State settles principles of law, binding on us, which show that the action of the returning-board is not conclusive. I am not satisfied that the principles laid down in that opinion, if applied to the action of that board in the case of the electors, would have the effect claimed for it now. But whether this be so or not, I am very clear that the opinion of the court in that case is not of the class which binds this body in construing the statute of Florida on that subject. It is the well-settled doctrine of the Supreme Court in case of writs of error to the decisions of the State courts, that where the matter to be considered is the constitutionality or validity of a State law, the Supreme Court must for itself determine that question, and that to follow implicitly the State decision on the construction of the statute is to abdicate the power and refuse to perform the duty devolved on it in that case. (Bridge Proprietors vs. Hoboken Company, 2 Wallace, 116.) Such is precisely the case here. If Congress or the two Houses, whose power, neither more nor less, we exercise to-day, had a right to determine on the validity and effect of the certificate of the returning-board to these electors, it was a power called into existence before any action of the State court of Florida, and could not be forestalled, nor could the principles on which it must be decided be concluded by any anticipatory action of the courts of Florida, whether had with that view or not. The effect of that opinion on our action must, therefore, be limited to the force of its reasoning and the weight of character which the court brings to its support.

I confess that if the opinion is fairly construed to hold that the returning-board of elections of that State had no other than the mere ministerial function of adding up and comparing the columns of votes, and could exercise no judgment on questions of fraud or other matters, and was wholly without power in reviewing and rejecting the poll of any voting-precinct, it is so much at variance with the language and spirit of the statute it was construing as to have little weight with me in forming a judgment on the same subject.

The other case in the State courts was a proceeding in quo warranto, brought in person by those whom I shall, to avoid circumlocution, call the Tilden electors against the Hayes electors, in the local circuit court of Leon County, to test the title to said office.

Of this suit no record is before us. We know nothing of it except a very short statement in a certificate given by Governor Drew that such a suit had been instituted in the circuit court of the State for the second judicial district, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the relators. It is not stated when the suit was commenced, or when the judgment was rendered. It seems to have been conceded in argument that service of the writ or notice of the suit was made on the 6th day of December, the day on which by act of Congress the electors everywhere must cast their vote, and the day on which the electors declared by the returning-board and by Governor Stearns—the governor then in power by undisputed right—did cast the electoral vote of the State of Florida; but whether the notice was before or after they had voted is not shown. Can the right to cast one of the electoral votes of a State for President be thus tried in a court of law? It is not asserted that any such right is found in any act of Congress or in any statute of Florida.

The single function of an elector is to give one of the votes to which the State is entitled for President and Vice-President. His powers begin there and end there. He has no permanent office with continuing functions, in which he may repeatedly perform acts of authority unless prevented by the courts. There is, therefore, no necessity for the application of such a writ. An injunction would be much more appropriate, if any judicial remedy existed at all, for by that writ the single act which he can perform might be prohibited. If a county which had taken stock in a railroad company should attempt to appoint an agent to cast its vote in the election of directors, would a quo warranto lie to test his authority? Yet he is exercising a function precisely similar to an elector, except that one represents a State and the other a county.

It is perhaps not the most satisfactory test of the soundness of a principle to look to its consequences, but where the principle rests on no statute, but on some general common-law doctrine, this is usually a very fair test of its correctness. If the doctrine be true of Florida, it must be equally so of other States. In New York there are thirty-two judges of the supreme court of that State, a court which exercises original jurisdiction all over the State. Under the principle asserted any one of these thirty-two judges may issue his writ of quo warranto, or of injunction, or other appropriate writ, the day before the votes must by law be cast for President and Vice-President, and by this exercise of his power prevent the 35 votes of the State from being given or counted in the election. And if you say it is only the final judgment which is effectual, that may be delayed until after the 4th of March, when it will be of no avail to give any judgment, whether it be right or whether it be wrong. It is safe to say that no such power exists in any man or in any tribunal, unless it is placed there by the expressed will of the law-making power.

The Constitution declares that no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector, and the objectors to certificate No. 1 propose to give evidence to show that Mr. Humphreys, one of the electors named in that certificate, was at the date of his election holding the office of shipping-commissioner under the appointment of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Florida. There are two reasons why I do not think such evidence admissible. The first is that the inquiry comes too late, because Mr. Humphreys, acting under the credentials which the law prescribes as his authority, has already cast his vote for President and Vice-President. That vote being a fact accomplished, cannot be annulled by any subsequent proceeding to question his eligibility. The second is, that like many other provisions of the Constitution, it is not self-executing; and as no means of enforcing it have been provided it remains ineffectual, save as its directions shall be observed by those who appoint the electors. In this regard the provision of the Constitution in question is not singular. A very large residuum of the powers conferred by the Federal Constitution has never been called into action by appropriate legislation. As regards the grant of judicial power by that instrument, it has been the frequent subject of comment that a large—perhaps until very recently the largest—part of this power has never been called into exercise because Congress has not conferred the necessary jurisdiction on any court or other judicial tribunal. It was early decided that the provision for the rendition of persons held to service in one State escaping into another was inoperative because no statute to enforce it had been enacted. And after the fugitive-slave law had been supposed to provide ample means to secure the object of the constitutional provision, it was decided in the case of Kentucky vs. Dennison, governor of Ohio, 24 Howard, 66, Chief-Justice Taney delivering the opinion of the court, that while the party might arrest his slave or recover damages for his detention or for aiding in his escape or concealment, the duty of the governor of the State to cause his rendition was not capable of enforcement by any judicial proceeding, and had only the sanction of a moral and political obligation.

In the case before us, neither the Constitution of the United States, nor any act of Congress, nor any statute of the State of Florida has created a tribunal or provided a mode of procedure by which the question of the eligibility of an elector may be inquired into and determined.

Having disposed of these extraneous matters, I now proceed to the consideration of others which, from their essential nature, are, in my judgment, conclusive of the questions before us.

The business of electing a President and Vice-President, as it is laid down in the Constitution, may be divided into three distinct acts or stages of the grand drama. They are the appointment of electors, the voting of those electors, and the counting of their votes. The first of these acts or functions belongs by the Constitution wholly to the States, "who shall appoint in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct" the number of electors to which each respective State is entitled. The casting of this vote must be by the persons so appointed, and can be cast by no one else.

These propositions are very clear; but who is to count the votes after they are given is matter of grave dispute, into which I do not propose to enter. But the power of counting does not reside with the States nor with the electors, but somewhere within the domain of Federal power, as represented by the President of the Senate and the two Houses of Congress—

What we are mainly concerned to ascertain just now is the proper evidence to be furnished of the appointment of electors by the appointing power, the nature and effect of that evidence, and the nature and extent of the inquiry which the counting power can make into the fact of appointment.

It is manifestly the duty, and therefore the right, of the State, which is the appointing power, to decide upon the means by which the act of appointment shall be authenticated and certified to the counting power and to the electors who are to act on that authority. To this proposition I have heard no dissent from any quarter. This evidence of appointment must in its nature vary according to the manner in which the electors are appointed. If elected by the legislature, as they may be, an appropriate mode would be the signatures of the presiding officers of the two Houses to the fact of such appointment, or a certified copy of the act by which they were elected. If appointed by the governor, his official certificate with the seal of the State would be an appropriate mode. If elected by popular suffrage, that election should be ascertained and authenticated in the mode which the law of the State prescribes for that purpose.

In the case before us they were elected by popular suffrage, and the statute of Florida prescribes a well-defined mode of ascertaining the result of that election, and of giving official expression to that result.

By the fourth section of the act of February 27, 1872—

The secretary of state, the attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall constitute a board of State canvassers for any general or special election of State officers, who shall canvass the returns of said election, and determine and declare who shall have been elected to any such office, or as such member, as shown by such returns. If any such return shall be shown, or shall appear to be, so irregular, false, or fraudulent, that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration.

The board shall make and sign a certificate * * * and therein declare the result, which certificate shall be recorded in the office of the secretary of state in a book to be kept for that purpose.

By another act the governor is required to make out, sign, and cause to be sealed with the seal of the State, and transmit to each person so elected elector or Representative in Congress, a certificate of his election.

These two provisions prescribe the manner in which the result of an election for electors shall be "determined and declared" and how that result shall be duly authenticated. When the canvassing-board herein mentioned has canvassed the returns of the election, has determined who is elected, and has declared that fact by signing the certificate, which is to be deposited with the secretary of state, the person named in that certificate is from that moment a duly appointed elector. The fact of his appointment, that is, his election, has been ascertained and declared by the tribunal, and the only tribunal, to which the duty and power of so declaring has been confided by law. I have already shown that this power belonged to the State of Florida—to its legislature. It cannot be vested in two independent and distinct bodies. It rests with the State of Florida. The law is clear, perspicuous, methodical.

It is said by way of impeachment of this certificate that the board of canvassers exceeded its jurisdiction by rejecting returns which were neither irregular, false, nor fraudulent; and that this can now be shown by proof before this Commission. But what is the jurisdiction of this board? It is not merely to count up and compare the returns, but upon all the facts submitted to them to determine, that is, to decide, who is elected. This is its duty, and its jurisdiction is commensurate with its duty. If it mistakes the law, or does not properly weigh the facts, these do not affect the jurisdiction, or invalidate the judgment which it renders.

Jurisdiction is the power to examine and decide, to hear and determine, the subject-matter submitted to the tribunal by which the jurisdiction is to be exercised. When jurisdiction is given over the whole subject, as in this case, to decide who are elected, it cannot be limited to that which is directory in the mode of proceeding. It may not follow that mode, yet its decision be valid. Its decision may be erroneous, but it is nevertheless the decision of the only tribunal having jurisdiction, and it must be conclusive. I say it must be conclusive, because there is no other tribunal which is by law authorized to review this decision or to correct its errors if any exist. I shall presently consider the claim here set up that this Commission, in the exercise of powers belonging to the two Houses of Congress, can do this, and I lay out of view the right of the State to oust an officer declared by this board to be elected, by a writ of quo warranto, because that writ by its very nature admits that the party against whom it is directed is in office, and is exercising its functions, and demands of him by what authority he does so.

In all governments where rights are secured by law, it has been found necessary where those rights, whether public or private, depend upon the existence of certain facts, to appoint an officer, a commission, a tribunal, by whatever name it may be called, to ascertain these facts and declare the rights which they give. This is a necessity of civil society, and on it courts of justice are founded. It is also a principle necessary to the existence of law and order and to the security of these rights, that the decision of this tribunal should be respected, whether those rights be public or private. And except where there is a provision in the law for an appeal from such decision, or a review of it in some recognized legal mode, it must be conclusive. As regards courts of justice, this principle is everywhere recognized and is acted on every day. There is no reason why it should not be equally applicable to all other tribunals acting within the scope of their authority, and it is so. As illustrations I will cite a few instances from the highest judicial authority in this country with whose decisions I am familiar. We have had in that court a vast number of suits founded on bonds issued by counties, cities, towns, and townships, in which the defense was that the bonds were issued without authority of law, and by frauds practiced by the officers who issued them. In most of these cases the authority to issue the bonds could only be given by the vote of the majority of the citizens of the municipality. In the case of Knox County vs. Aspinwall, 21 Wallace, 539, when this question first came up, the court decided that inasmuch as the commissioners who issued the bonds were also authorized to ascertain and determine whether there had been such a vote and whether the election had been lawfully held, their action in issuing the bonds was conclusive on both these questions, and could not be afterward questioned in any action to recover the amount of the bonds against the counties.

Perhaps no decision has been more controverted than this. At every term of the court, for now nearly twenty years, similar cases have come up and been so decided from the date of that case to the case of The Town of Coloma vs. Eaves, 92 Supreme Court R., 484, at the recent term of the court; and by those decisions millions of dollars of debt have been fastened upon the citizens of these municipalities to the ruin of many of them, which they were denied the privilege of showing were created without authority and by fraud and chicanery. These decisions are all based upon the principle that the decision of the tribunal created for that purpose, on the existence of the facts necessary to make valid the issue of bonds, is final and conclusive as to the existence of those facts.

Again, in the administration of the system of public lands of the United States, questions of conflicting rights are perpetually arising which by the acts of Congress are to be decided by the officers of the Land Department of the Government. Many applications have been made to the courts to control the action of these officers by writs of mandamus to compel them to do something, or of injunction to restrain them; but the Supreme Court has uniformly held that in the performance of their functions, which required the exercise of judgment or discretion, they were beyond the control of the courts, because to them, and to them alone, had the law confided the exercise of that judgment, and, except as by appeal from one officer of that department to another, no right of reviewing that judgment had been provided. (Gaines vs. Thompson, 7 Wallace, 347; Litchfield vs. Register and Receiver, 9 Wallace, 575; Secretary vs. McGarrahan, 9 Wallace, 248.)

The same principle has been repeatedly asserted when contests for titles to lands derived from the Government have arisen after the action of these officers has been ended, and the title passed from the Government to a private claimant. A very recent case of that kind instructive in the matter before us is that of French vs. Fyan, decided at the present term of the Supreme Court.

A contest for a quarter-section of land in Missouri arose between a party claiming title under the swamp-land grant of 1850 and another who claimed under a grant to railroads of 1852. Both parties had regular evidence of title, each under his own grant, and as the swamp-land grant was the elder, it must, if valid, prevail. To show that it was not valid the plaintiff offered to prove by parol evidence that the land was not in fact and never had been "overflowed and swamp land, made thereby unfit for cultivation," which is the description of the lands granted by the act of 1850. But the circuit court first, and the Supreme Court on writ of error, held that this could not be done. The swamp-land act made it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to make out accurate lists of these swamp-lands and certify them to the States and issue patents therefor when required, and the Supreme Court held that his action in so doing was final and conclusive and could not be impeached by parol testimony. And this it founds, as it says, on "the general doctrine that where the law has confided to a special tribunal the authority to hear and determine certain matters arising in the course of its duties, the decision of that tribunal, within the scope of its authority, is conclusive upon all others," and it cites the previous case of Johnson vs. Towsley, 13 Wallace, 72, from which the extract is taken. That the same principle applies to affairs of more public character is shown by the cases of Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard, 1, and the Commonwealth of Virginia vs. West Virginia, 11 Wallace, 39.

In the former case where the issue in an action of trespass depended upon which was the true government of the State of Rhode Island, that set up and known as the Dorr government, which was alleged as in the case before us to have the support of a majority of the popular vote, or the ancient government which was resisting overthrow by the Dorr movement, this court shut its eyes resolutely to any inquiry into the facts on which either government claimed to be the right one, and said that the Constitution of the United States had confided to the political department of the Government the right to determine that question, and that though the private rights before the court were judicial in character, the court was bound by the action of President Tyler, who in issuing a proclamation requiring the supporters of the so-called Dorr government to disperse had treated them as insurgents and had recognized the ancient government as the true one. Behind this action the court could not inquire, but must accept it as decisive of the question.

In the latter case, in the process of constructing the State of West Virginia out of certain counties of the commonwealth of Virginia, it had been determined to refer the question of which State should include the counties of Berkeley and Jefferson to the popular vote of these counties. By a statute of the commonwealth the governor of that State was authorized to call such an election by proclamation to ascertain the result, and, if carried, to certify the same to the governor of West Virginia, whereupon those counties became part of the new State. All this was done. But a few years after the commonwealth filed her bill in chancery in the Supreme Court of the United States against West Virginia, claiming to recover back jurisdiction of those counties upon the grounds, among others, that no fair vote had been taken, that the majority was the other way, and that the governor was imposed upon by false and fraudulent returns. The case was heard on demurrer, and on this subject the court said :

We are of the opinion that the action of the governor is conclusive of the vote as between the States of Virginia and West Virginia. He was in legal effect the State of Virginia in this matter. In addition to his position as executive head of the State, the legislature had delegated to him all its own power in the premises. It vested him with large control as to the time of taking the vote, and it made his opinion of the result the condition of final action.

This language is eminently applicable to the case before us. The legislature of Florida has vested in her board of canvassers the authority to determine who are elected electors. It has conferred no power on any tribunal to revise that decision. The board in this respect represents the State. Its judgment is her judgment and its official certificate is her authorized expression of what she has done in the matter, and it is conclusive.

Mr. President, I might well rest here, but as I have said that I would consider the question of the right of this Commission exercising the powers of the two Houses of Congress to review or inquire into the truth of the certificate of the board of canvassers, I will say a few words on that point. It has, however, been so clearly presented by my brother Strong, and I concur so entirely in what he has said, that it is hardly necessary that I should do so.

Conceding for the present, for that is the theory on which is framed the bill creating this Commission, that by the Constitution to the two Houses of Congress has been confided the duty of counting the votes of the presidential electors and declaring the result, it is difficult to see what right this duty of counting gives those bodies to inquire into the means by which the electors whose votes they are to count obtained their appointment. The whole basis on which this right of the two Houses to inquire into the fraudulent or honest character of the vote, the conduct or misconduct, the mistakes, errors, or corruption of the judges of election at every polling-place in an entire State is this short and single sentence of the Constitution :

The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.

The votes here mentioned are the votes of the electors of President and Vice-President, and not the votes by which these electors were appointed, and the certificates are the evidence of their appointment.

I have endeavored to show, and I think successfully, that this latter counting belongs solely to the State authorities, as well as the mode of authenticating the result.

It is not asserted by any one that express power to make this inquiry is conferred on the two Houses by the language quoted or by any other. The argument is founded on two implications, both of which are very remote and very unnecessary.

The first of these, and the one which I think is mainly relied on, is that in order to count the votes it is necessary to know who are the electors. Before you can make a correct count of the votes for President you must ascertain who are authorized to vote for President. Undoubtedly the reasoning thus far is sound. But since the Constitution says that those who can cast such votes are those who are appointed by the State in such manner as the legislature thereof shall direct, it amounts to nothing more than ascertaining who are appointed electors.

Congress has nothing to do with this appointment,—neither with the manner of appointment nor the manner of authenticating the appointment.

If, then, a body of electors present with the vote which they cast for President and Vice-President the evidence which the State has prescribed of their appointment, the inquiry of the two Houses is answered. They have been legally and officially informed who are entitled to vote as electors for that State. There exists neither in the nature of the duty they are to perform nor in any language of the Constitution the right to inquire into the validity of that appointment, the means by which it was brought about, the fairness of the election by which it was determined, or the misconduct of the tribunal which the State had created to determine the result. Much has been said of the danger of the device of returning-boards, and it may be that they have exercised their power in a manner not always worthy of commendation. But I take the liberty of saying that such a power lodged in one or in both Houses of Congress would be a far more permanent menace to the liberty of the people, to the legitimate result of the popular vote, than any device for counting these votes which has as yet been adopted by the States.

Neither at the time of the adoption of the Constitution nor at any time since would the people of the States have placed in the hands of Congress the power to constitute itself a returning-board as to the votes for presidential electors, and then upon the vote cast by those whom they declare to be electors, decide who are to be President and Vice-President of the United States; but that is precisely the power claimed for the two Houses of Congress and for this Commission representing them.

The other implication is that because the House of Representatives is authorized, in the event of a failure to elect a President by the prescribed method, to proceed itself to make such an election, it must therefore have the power of deciding all questions relating to the appointment of electors. I confess I do not see the force of the implication or of the argument. If it had any force otherwise, it is liable to the serious objection that it makes that body the sole judge of its right to exercise the most important power residing in the domain of the Federal Government. The Senate would have a corresponding power in regard to the Vice-President, and thus each House for itself, and not the two Houses, would count the vote. I do not consider the argument worth further attention, and therefore dismiss it.

These are the reasons, Mr. President, which have determined me to vote that none of the testimony offered in this case outside of that submitted to the two Houses of Congress by the President of the Senate, can be lawfully received or considered by the Commission.

OREGON.

The electoral votes of Oregon being under consideration—

Mr. Commissioner MILLER said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Having on the occasion of the papers referred to this Commission in the Florida case, upon the question of the admissibility of any testimony outside of the certificates and accompanying papers as they were laid before the two Houses of Congress by the President of the Senate, expressed the views which governed my action on that question, as well as on the final vote, I took no part in the discussion of the Louisiana case in conference, because I was of opinion that the principles laid down by me in the former, and which received the approval of the Commission, must govern its action in the latter. In this I was not mistaken, as will be seen by an examination of the brief grounds of the decisions of those cases, as reported to the two Houses of Congress under the statute.

It is the purpose of the few remarks which I propose to make now to show that the same principles, when applied to the one before us, must govern this as it did the two former cases.

We have, however, now as then, an extraneous question of the eligibility of one of the electors, rendered more important because it was made the ground of a refusal by the governor of the State to certify to the election of J. W. Watts, whose election was otherwise beyond controversy, and of the substitution in his certificate of the name of E. A. Cronin, who certainly was not elected.

On this subject I remain of opinion, as I expressed it in the Florida case, that the fact that Watts held an office of trust and profit under the United States at the date of his election did not render that election void. I concede, as I did then, that his title to the office could have been avoided, if there had been any tribunal competent to try the question of his ineligibility and it had been so tried and found before he gave his vote for President and Vice-President. In this case it is said that the governor of the State was such a tribunal, and that he did decide that Watts was ineligible, and therefore his refusal to certify him as an elector is justified. But I look in vain in the Constitution of the United States, in the laws of Congress, and in the constitution and laws of Oregon, for any support for such authority in the governor. In the absence of such authority in one or the other of these places, the action of the governor in that respect was the merest assumption of power without any legal right. If he had such authority, by what mode of procedure was he to be governed? Under what rules of law or of evidence did he act? Was Watts notified of the trial? Had he opportunity to be heard? How were the facts ascertained? There is not a shadow of pretense that any such trial or hearing was had.

The question of the disqualification to hold an office has almost always arisen in courts of justice after the party has been commissioned or has entered upon the duties of his office. Even in cases of members of legislative bodies, which are by express constitutional provision judges of the qualification of their own members, it is nearly always tried after admission to a seat. This concurrent course of proceeding, whether in courts or in the legislature, is strong evidence that the title is recognized until the disability is established. And this is logically just. There can be no presumption of law that a person elected is disqualified. The disqualification is a fact to be averred and established before some tribunal legally authorized to inquire into that fact. I am therefore clearly of opinion, notwithstanding the cases cited from the courts of Indiana, that Governor Grover had no more right to determine the ineligibility of an elector who has the required popular vote than any other citizen of the State of Oregon. I have already discussed the right of this Commission to do so.

If Watts's election was not void, his subsequent resignation and failure to attend made a vacancy in the electoral college which the other members were by statute authorized to fill, and his appointment by them to fill that vacancy was valid, because he had then ceased to hold the office of postmaster, which had been the source of the controversy.

It is urged, however, in opposition to counting the vote of Watts for President and Vice-President, that he has no certificate of his appointment by the governor, and that in the only certificate given by that officer his name is omitted and that of Cronin is substituted, and it is contended that this certificate of the governor, under the seal of the State, attested by the secretary of state, is the official and conclusive evidence of the right to act as electors for the State. In support of this proposition it is strongly asserted that such was the effect given to the governor's certificates in the Florida and Louisiana cases.

This is a strange misconception, if it be honestly believed by those who assert it, as to the grounds of the decision in those cases. Neither by any of the counsel who argued the case on both sides nor any member of the Commission in conference was any such sanctity claimed for the certificate of the governor. The counsel for the Tilden electors insisted, as it was necessary they should insist, that these certificates interposed no legal barrier to an investigation of the facts on which the certificates were or ought to have been founded. The other side agreed to this, and the only difference of opinion was where that inquiry should end. The majority of the Commission, both in argument and in the reasons attached to their decision, as required by the statute, said this inquiry could go so far as to see what officer or tribunal was by the laws of the State authorized to ascertain and declare who were elected electors by the popular vote and what declaration they had made on the subject, and could go no further. The minority of the Commission, and the counsel with whom they agreed, made their principal assault upon this position, and argued manfully for the right to go behind the action of that tribunal, to reconsider the evidence on which it had acted, and to review and reverse its decision. The majority were of opinion that the tribunal authorized to determine finally and conclusively who were appointed to act as electors was the board which in Florida is called the board of State canvassers, and in Louisiana the returning-officers; and it was against what was charged to be the mistakes, the usurpations, the frauds, and corruption of these officers that arguments of counsel and of the minority of this Commission were mainly directed. Over the question of their power and the finality of their decisions, the battle was fought, and it is idle now to assert that it was over the effect of the governor's certificate.

But, Mr. President, while I am not willing to have my position in the Florida case perverted or misrepresented and in this perverted shape thrust upon me as a rule of action in this case, I can have no right to complain and do not complain if those who in that case regarded the governor's certificate as of no weight shall in the present case insist upon it as a document against which nothing is to be said, and which must conclude this Commission. If the statute of Florida had made the governor the officer to canvass the returns of the elections and declare the result, I am not able to see how we could go behind his official certificate of that result. If the statutes of Oregon, which all must concede differ from those of Florida, give him that power, then, according to my view, his certificate must prevail here and with me, whatever may be the change of front, if there be such a change, in others.

I proceed to that inquiry.

The first clause of section 60 of title IX, concerning the election of presidential electors, declares that "the votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress." The remainder of this section directs what is to be done after this canvass, and will be considered further on. But I turn now to section 37 of title III, which governs the canvassing of the returns for members of Congress:

The county clerk—

immediately after the abstract of votes given in his county, shall make a copy of each of said abstracts and transmit it by mail to the secretary of state, at the seat of government; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, to proceed, within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes.

This is all of that section which has any applicability to the electors. Returning then to the sixtieth section of the law, concerning electors, we find that after making this canvass—

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected and affix the seal of State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

When we have added to these extracts the last sentence of section 40 of the general election law of the State, we have all that I deem essential to this inquiry. It is as follows:

In all elections in this State, the person having the highest number of votes for any office shall be deemed to have been elected.

I am of opinion that these statutory provisions of the law of Oregon make it the duty of the secretary of state, and of no one else, to canvass the returns of all the votes given for electors, to ascertain the result, and to deliver to the persons elected a certificate of that fact. It follows from what I said in the Florida case, and which I do not desire to repeat, that his action in the matter, within the scope of his authority, that authority being commensurate with the duties I have mentioned, is binding and conclusive. If he has made a canvass of the votes, and ascertained who was elected, no other canvass can be made and no other person is elected. If that canvass shows who had the highest number of votes, so many as the State is entitled to, and who had that number of votes the law declares them to be elected; that is, appointed.

If, in addition to this, he has filed a full and official statement of this canvass in his office, as the law requires, and has delivered to the persons thus found to be duly elected a certificate under the seal of the State and his official signature showing this statement and this result, their title to the office and the right to exercise its functions are complete.

The argument in opposition to this view is, that the governor is the person who must do all this; or if he alone cannot do it, that he and the secretary of state must do it jointly; that the provision that the returns must be canvassed in his presence, and that he must sign the certificate to be delivered to the person elected, establish this proposition.

Let us examine into this a little more critically. If we separate what the governor is to do in the matter of canvassing the vote from what he is to do afterward, we shall see that his duty in the former, if indeed it be a duty at all, is merely that of being present as a witness to the canvass made by the secretary. The returns are to be transmitted to the secretary by mail. They are to be received by him at his office; to be opened by him. The time of making the canvass is to be determined by him as soon as all the returns are received, but in no event later than thirty days after the election. The canvass is to be made by him. The returns on which this canvass is to be made, the canvass itself, the result, are all to remain in his office under his official control. When this is done, the law applies to the result the declaration that the persons possessing the highest number of votes are elected. That is, their election is then determined. No one has a right to review this canvass or to declare a different result. The right of the successful candidate is established and is perfect. And it is here on this action I rest, as I did on the action of the board of canvassers of Florida, the decision of the question submitted to us, Who are the lawful electors of Oregon, and whose votes are the constitutional votes of that State for President and Vice-President?

Now, in all this matter what part has the governor of the State to play? He receives no returns, he counts no votes, he has custody of no papers, he controls no one in the matter; and if it were true, as maintained by some, that he alone can execute the official certificate mentioned hereafter, it would still remain, as I have already said, that such a certificate is not conclusive nor its absence fatal, but, as in the cases of Florida and Louisiana, this tribunal can go behind it and inquire if it is in conformity to the action of the board or officer who has the right to decide on the result of the votes as returned to him.

It may be asked, Why is he required to be present at the canvass? I answer, as a witness to the transaction, as a protection to its fairness, by having some one to watch the secretary. He may have a right to make objections, suggestions, to file a protest, to institute proceedings against the secretary, to furnish evidence of his mistake or grosser injustice, but no right to dictate, to control, or assist in the process.

The canvass being made, the next step is to certify the result to the persons elected. And what part does the governor perform in this? "The secretary shall prepare two lists of the names of the persons elected electors, and affix the seal of the State to the same." In doing this the governor takes no part. "Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors." The making out this certificate, the affixing to it the seal of the State, its delivery to the electoral college, are all acts of the same officer who received and canvassed the returns and in whose custody and control they remained. The governor is required to place his signature to this paper, prepared to his hand, as a mere official attestation of the result arrived at—a formal act, adding to the paper prepared by the secretary, in addition to his own name and the seal of the State, the dignity of the governor's verification.

Though lacking the governor's name, the persons who received the highest number of votes, and whom the statute declares to be elected, present to the President of the Senate and the two Houses of Congress a certificate from the secretary of state, under the seal of the State, and signed by him in his official capacity, showing that, in pursuance of the statute, he did, on the 4th day of December last, in the presence of the governor, canvass the votes given for electors; that the result of that canvass was that Odell, Cartwright, and Watts having received the three highest numbers of votes were elected electors; that all this appears from the canvass so made by him and on file in his office on the 6th day of December, the date of this certificate. This certificate he delivered as directed by law to the electors on the first Wednesday in December, and thereupon they proceeded to give their votes for President and Vice-President. What is wanting to their authority to do so? They had a majority of votes. They were duly elected. This fact was ascertained in the mode and by the officer intrusted with that duty by law. They have his official certificate of that fact under the seal of the State.

I cannot believe that the willful refusal of the governor to sign that certificate is sufficient to nullify everything else that was done, and make it of no effect. No such force has been attributed to it in the other cases, and I do not see how it can be here.

As to the certificate of the governor given to Cronin, Odell, and Cartwright, if it was perfect on its face, no one has yet held that it was conclusive. No one in the Commission has asserted that it is valid as to Cronin, and this is a full admission that it is not conclusive in any case.

I will only add that on its face this certificate shows that the governor undertook to decide the question of some person's eligibility to the office, and when taken in connection with the certificate of the secretary it establishes the fact that he refused to certify Watts because he held him ineligible, and did certify Cronin who was never elected. Of this paper no more need be said, nor is it necessary for me to detain the Commission longer.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER BRADLEY.

[The following opinions and remarks have been somewhat abbreviated, and repetition of similar arguments in the different cases has been omitted.]

THE FLORIDA CASE.

Statement.

In this case the objectors to the certificate No. 1 (which was authenticated by Governor Stearns, and contained the votes of the Hayes electors) proposed to prove by the papers accompanying the certificates that a writ of quo warranto had been issued from a district court in Florida against the Hayes electors on the 6th day of December, 1876, before they gave their votes for President and Vice-President, which on January 26, 1877, resulted in a judgment against them, and in favor of the Tilden electors; also an act of the legislature passed in January, in favor of the Tilden electors; and also certain extrinsic evidence described by the counsel of the objectors as follows:

"Fifthly. The only matters which the Tilden electors desire to lay before the Commission by evidence actually extrinsic will now be stated:

"I. The board of State canvassers, acting on certain erroneous views when making their canvass, by which the Hayes electors appeared to be chosen, rejected wholly the returns from the county of Manatee and parts of returns from each of the following counties: Hamilton, Jackson, and Monroe.

"In so doing the said State board acted without jurisdiction, as the circuit and supreme courts in Florida decided. It was by overruling and setting aside as not warranted by law these rejections, that the courts of Florida reached their respective conclusions that Mr. Drew was elected governor, that the Hayes electors were usurpers, and that the Tilden electors were duly chosen.

"II. Evidence that Mr. Humphreys, a Hayes elector, held office under the United States."

The question was argued as to the admissibility of this evidence.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY said :

I assume that the powers of the Commission are precisely those, and no other, which the two Houses of Congress possess in the matter submitted to our consideration; and that the extent of those powers is one of the questions submitted. This is my interpretation of the act under which we are organized.

The first question, therefore, is, whether, and how far, the two Houses, in the exercise of the special jurisdiction conferred on them in the matter of counting the electoral votes, have power to inquire into the validity of the votes transmitted to the President of the Senate. Their power to make any inquiry at all is disputed by, or on behalf of, the President of the Senate himself. But I think the practice of the Government, as well as the true construction of the Constitution, has settled that the powers of the President of the Senate are merely ministerial, conferred upon him as a matter of convenience, as being the presiding officer of one of the two bodies which are to meet for the counting of the votes and determining the election. He is not invested with any authority for making any investigation outside of the joint meeting of the two Houses. He cannot send for persons or papers. He is utterly without the means or the power to do anything more than to inspect the documents sent to him; and he cannot inspect them until he opens them in the presence of the two Houses. It would seem to be clear, therefore, that, if any examination at all is to be gone into, or any judgment is to be exercised in relation to the votes received, it must be performed and exercised by the two Houses.

Then arises the question, How far can the two Houses go in questioning the votes received, without trenching upon the power reserved to the States themselves?

The extreme reticence of the Constitution on the subject leaves wide room for inference. Each State has a just right to have the entire and exclusive control of its own vote for the Chief Magistrate and head of the republic, without any interference on the part of any other State, acting either separately or in Congress with others. If there is any State right of which it is and should be more jealous than of any other, it is this. And such seems to have been the spirit manifested by the framers of the Constitution. This is evidenced by the terms in which the mode of choosing the President and Vice-President is expressed: "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector. The electors shall meet in their respective States and vote by ballot," &c. Almost every clause here cited is fraught with the sentiment to which I have alluded. The appointment and mode of appointment belong exclusively to the State. Congress has nothing to do with it, and no control over it, except that, in a subsequent clause, Congress is empowered to determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes, which is required to be the same day throughout the United States. In all other respects the jurisdiction and power of the State is controlling and exclusive until the functions of the electors have been performed. So completely is congressional and Federal influence excluded, that not a member of Congress nor an officer of the General Government is allowed to be an elector. Of course, this exclusive power and control of the State is ended and determined when the day fixed by Congress for voting has arrived, and the electors have deposited their votes and made out the lists and certificates required by the Constitution. Up to that time the whole proceeding (except the time of election) is conducted under State law and State authority. All machinery, whether of police, examining boards, or judicial tribunals, deemed requisite and necessary for securing and preserving the true voice of the State in the appointment of electors, is prescribed and provided for by the State itself and not by Congress. All rules and regulations for the employment of this machinery are also within the exclusive province of the State. Over all this field of jurisdiction the State must be deemed to have ordained, enacted, and provided all that it considers necessary and proper to be done.

This being so, can Congress or the two Houses institute a scrutiny into the action of the State authorities and sit in judgment on what they have done? Are not the findings and recorded determinations of the State board or constituted authorities binding and conclusive since the State can only act through its constituted authorities?

But it is asked, must the two Houses of Congress submit to outrageous frauds and permit them to prevail without any effort to circumvent them? Certainly not, if it is within their jurisdiction to inquire into such frauds. But there is the very question to be solved. Where is such jurisdiction to be found? If it does not exist, how are the two Houses constitutionally to know that frauds have been committed? It is the business and the jurisdiction of the State to prevent frauds from being perpetrated in the appointment of its electors, and not the business or jurisdiction of the Congress. The State is a sovereign power within its own jurisdiction, and Congress can no more control or review the exercise of that jurisdiction than it can that of a foreign government. That which exclusively belongs to one tribunal or government cannot be passed upon by another. The determination of each is conclusive within its own sphere.

It seems to me to be clear, therefore, that Congress cannot institute a scrutiny into the appointment of electors by a State. It would be taking it out of the hands of the State, to which it properly belongs. This never could have been contemplated by the people of the States when they agreed to the Constitution. It would be going one step farther back than that instrument allows. While the two Houses of Congress are authorized to canvass the electoral votes, no authority is given to them to canvass the election of the electors themselves. To revise the canvass of that election, as made by the State authorities, on the suggestion of fraud, or for any other cause, would be tantamount to a recanvass.

The case of elections of Senators and Representatives is different. The Constitution expressly declares that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." No such power is given, and none ever would have been given if proposed, over the election or appointment of the presidential electors. Again, while the Constitution declares that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections of Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof," it adds, "but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." No such power is given to Congress to regulate the election or appointment of presidential electors. Their appointment, and all regulations for making it, and the manner of making it, are left exclusively with the States.

This want of jurisdiction over the subject makes it clear to my mind that the two Houses of Congress cannot institute any scrutiny into the appointment of presidential electors, as they may and do in reference to the election of their own members. The utmost they can do is to ascertain whether the State has made an appointment according to the form prescribed by its laws.

This view receives corroboration from the form of a bill introduced into Congress in 1800 for prescribing the mode of deciding disputed elections of President and Vice-President, and which was passed by the Senate. It proposed a grand committee to inquire into the constitutional qualifications of the persons voted for as President and Vice-President, and of the electors appointed by the States, and various other matters with regard to their appointment and transactions; but it contained a proviso, in which both Houses seem to have concurred, that no petition or exception should be granted or allowed which should have for its object to draw into question the number of votes on which any elector had been elected.

This bill was the proposition of the federal party of that day, which, as is well known, entertained strong views with regard to the power of the Federal Government as related to the State governments. It was defeated by the opposition of the republican side, as being too great an interference with the independence of the States in reference to the election of President and Vice-President. And taken even as the federal view of the subject, it only shows what matters were regarded as subject to examination under the regulation of law, and not that the two Houses of Congress, when assembled to count the votes, could do the same without the aid of legislation. The bill was rather an admission that legislation was necessary in order to provide the proper machinery for making extrinsic inquiries.

It is unnecessary to enlarge upon the danger of Congress assuming powers in this behalf that do not clearly belong to it. The appetite for power in that body, if indulged in without great prudence, would have a strong tendency to interfere with that freedom and independence which it was intended the States should enjoy in the choice of the national Chief Magistrate, and to give Congress a control over the subject which it was intended it should not have.

As the power of Congress, therefore, does not extend to the making of a general scrutiny into the appointment of electors, inasmuch as it would thereby invade the right of the States, so neither can it draw in question, nor sit in judgment upon, the determination and conclusion of the regularly constituted authorities or tribunals appointed by the laws of the States for ascertaining and certifying such appointment.

And here the inquiry naturally arises, as to the manner in which the electors appointed by a State are to be accredited. What are the proper credentials by which it is to be made known who have been appointed? Obviously, if no provision of law existed on the subject, the proper mode would be for the governor of the State, as its political head and chief, through whom its acts are made known and by whom its external intercourse is conducted, to issue such credentials. But we are not without law on the subject. The Constitution, it is true, is silent; but Congress by the act of 1792 directed that "it shall be the duty of the executive of each State to cause three lists of the names of the electors of such State to be made and certified and to be delivered to the electors on or before the day on which they are required to meet ;” and one of these certificates is directed to be annexed to each of the certificates of the votes given by the electors. And if it should be contended that this enactment of Congress is not binding upon the State executive, the laws of Florida, in the case before us, impose upon the governor of that State the same duty. I think, therefore, that it cannot be denied that the certificate of the governor is the proper and regular credential of the appointment and official character of the electors. Certainly it is at least prima-facie evidence of a very high character.

But the Houses of Congress may undoubtedly inquire whether the supposed certificate of the executive is genuine ; and I think they may also inquire whether it is plainly false, or whether it contains a clear mistake of fact, inasmuch as it is not itself the appointment, nor the ascertainment thereof, but only a certificate of the fact of appointment. While it must be held as a document of high nature, not to be lightly questioned, it seems to me that a State ought not to be deprived of its vote by a clear mistake of fact inadvertently contained in the governor’s certificate, or (if such a case may be supposed) by a willfully false statement. It has not the full sanctity which belongs to a court of record, or which, in my judgment, belongs to the proceedings and recorded acts of the final board of canvassers.

In this case, it is not claimed that the certificate of the governor contains any mistake of fact, or that it is willfully false and fraudulent. It truly represents the result of the State canvass, and if erroneous at all, it is erroneous because the proceedings of the canvassing-board were erroneous or based on erroneous principles and findings.

It seems to me that the two Houses of Congress, in proceeding with the count, are bound to recognize the determination of the State board of canvassers as the act of the State, and as the most authentic evidence of the appointment made by the State ; and that while they may go behind the governor’s certificate, if necessary, they can only do so for the purpose of ascertaining whether he has truly certified the results to which the board arrived. They cannot sit as a court of appeals on the action of that board.

The law of Florida declares as follows :

On the thirty-fifth day after the holding of any general or special election for any State officer, member of the legislature, or Representative in Congress, or sooner if the returns shall have been received from the several counties wherein the elections shall have been held, the secretary of state, attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall meet at the office of the secretary of state, pursuant to notice to be given by the secretary of state, and form a board of State canvassers, and proceed to canvass the returns of said election and determine and declare who shall have been elected to any such office or as such member, as shown by such returns.

The governor’s certificate is prima-facie evidence that the State canvassers performed their duty. Indeed, it is conceded by the objectors that they made a canvass and certified or declared the same. It is not the failure of the board to act, or to certify and declare the result of their action, but an illegal canvass, of which they complain. To review that canvass, in my judgment, the Houses of Congress have no jurisdiction or power.

The question then arises, whether the subsequent action of the courts or legislature of Florida can change the result arrived at and declared by the board of State canvassers, and consummated by the vote of the electors and the complete execution of their functions ?

If the action of the State board of canvassers were a mere statement of a fact, like the certificate of the governor, and did not involve the exercise of decision and judgment, perhaps it might be controverted by evidence of an equally high character; like the return to a habeas corpus, which could not, in former times, be contradicted by parol proof, but might be contradicted by a verdict or judgment in an action for a false return.

Looking at the subject in this point of view, I was at one time inclined to think that the proceedings on quo warranto in the circuit court of Florida, if still in force and effect, might be sufficient to contradict the finding and determination of the board of canvassers—supposing that the court had jurisdiction of the case. But the action of the board involved more than a mere statement of fact. It was a determination, a decision quasi-judicial. The powers of the board as defined by the statute which created it are expressed in the following terms: "They shall proceed to canvass the returns of said election and determine and declare who shall have been elected to any office;" and "if any such returns shall be shown, or shall appear to be, so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration." This clearly requires quasi-judicial action. To controvert the finding of the board, therefore, would not be to correct a mere statement of fact, but to reverse the decision and determination of a tribunal. The judgment on the quo warranto was an attempted reversal of this decision and the rendering of another decision. If the court had had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and had rendered its decision before the votes of the electors were cast, its judgment, instead of that of the returning-board, would have been the final declaration of the result of the election. But its decision being rendered after the votes were given, it cannot have the operation to change or affect the vote, whatever effect it might have in a future judicial proceeding in relation to the presidential election. The judicial acts of officers de facto, until they are ousted by judicial process or otherwise, are valid and binding.

But it is a grave question whether any courts can thus interfere with the course of the election for President and Vice-President. The remarks of Mr. Justice Miller on this subject are of great force and weight.

The State may, undoubtedly, provide by law for reviewing the action of the board of canvassers at any time before the electors have executed their functions. It may provide any safeguard it pleases to prevent or counteract fraud, mistake, or illegality on the part of the canvassers. The legislature may pass a law requiring the attendance of the supreme court or any other tribunal to supervise the action of the board, and to reverse it, if wrong. But no such provision being made, the final action of the board must be accepted as the action of the State. No tampering with the result can be admitted after the day fixed by Congress for casting the electoral votes, and after it has become manifest where the pinch of the contest for the Presidency lies, and how it may be manipulated.

I am entirely clear that the judicial proceedings in this case were destitute of validity to affect the votes given by the electors. Declared by the board of canvassers to have been elected, they were entitled, by virtue of that declaration, to act as such against all the world until ousted of their office. They proceeded to perform the entire functions of that office. They deposited their votes in a regular manner, and on the proper and only day designated for that purpose, and their act could not be annulled by the subsequent proceedings on the quo warranto, however valid these might be for other purposes. When their votes were given, they were the legally-constituted electors for the State of Florida.

The supreme court of Florida said in the Drew case, it is true, that the board of canvassers exceeded their jurisdiction, and that their acts were absolutely void. In this assertion I do not concur; and it was not necessary to the judgment, which merely set aside the finding of the board and directed a new canvass. Under the Florida statute, the board had power to cast out returns. They did so. The court thought they ought to have cast out on a different principle from that which they adopted. This was at most error, not want or excess of jurisdiction. They certainly acted within the scope of their power, though they may have acted erroneously. This is the most that can be said in any event; and of this the Houses of Congress cannot sit in judgment as a court of appeal.

The question is asked, whether for no cause whatever the declaration and certificate of the board of canvassers can be disregarded? as if they should certify an election when no election had been held, and other extreme cases of that sort. I do not say that a clear and evident mistake of fact, inadvertently made, and admitted to have been made by the canvassers themselves, or that such a gross fraud and violation of duty as that supposed, might not be corrected, or that it might not affect the validity of the vote. On that subject, as it is not necessary in this case, I express no opinion. Such extreme cases, when they occur, generally suggest some special rule for themselves without unsettling those general rules and principles which are the only safe guides in ordinary cases. The difficulty is that the two Houses are not made the judges of the election and return of the presidential electors.

I think no importance is to be attached to the acts performed by the board of canvassers after the 6th day of December, nor to the acts of the Florida legislature in reference to the canvass. In my judgment, they are all unconstitutional and void. To allow a State legislature in any way to change the appointment of electors after they have been elected and given their votes, would be extremely dangerous. It would, in effect, make the legislature for the time being the electors, and would subvert the design of the Constitution in requiring all the electoral votes to be given on the same day.

My conclusion is that the validity of the first certificate cannot be controverted by evidence of the proceedings had in the courts of Florida by quo warranto, and that said evidence should not be received.

It is further objected that Humphreys, one of the Hayes electors, held an office of trust and profit under the Government of the United States at the time of the general election, and at the time of giving his vote. I think the evidence of this fact should be admitted. Such an office is a constitutional disqualification. I do not think it requires legislation to make it binding. What may be the effect of the evidence now produced, I am not prepared to say. I should like to hear further argument on the subject before deciding the question.

[It being shown that Humphreys resigned his office before the election, the question of ineligibility became unimportant. Justice Bradley held, however, that the constitutional prohibition, that no member of Congress or officer of the Government should be appointed an elector, is only a form of declaring a disqualification for the electoral office, and does not have the effect of annulling the vote given by one who, though disqualified, is regularly elected, and acts as an elector; likening it to the case of other officers de facto.

THE LOUISIANA CASE.

Statement.

The objections to the votes of the electors certified by Kellogg as governor of Louisiana, being condensed, are in substance as follows :

First. That the government of Louisiana is not republican in form.

Second. That Kellogg was not governor.

Third. That at the time of the election, in November last, there was no law of the State directing the appointment of electors.

Fourth. That so much of the election law which was in force as relates to the returning-board was unconstitutional and void.

Fifth. That the board was not constituted according to the law; having only four members of one political party, when there should have been five members of different political parties.

Sixth. That they acted fraudulently and without jurisdiction in casting out and rejecting the returns or statements of various commissioners of election, without having before them any statement or affidavit of violence or intimidation as required by law to give them jurisdiction to reject returns; that they neglected to canvass the returns of the commissioners and canvassed those of the supervisors of registration—that is, the parish abstracts instead of the precinct returns; that they did not canvass all of these, (which would have elected the Tilden electors,) but falsely and fraudulently counted in the Hayes electors, knowing the count to be false; and that they offered to give the votes the other way for a bribe; and that the certificate given by Kellogg to the Hayes electors was the result of a conspiracy between Kellogg and the returning-board and others to defraud their opponents of their election and the State of her right to vote; and that the Hayes electors were not elected, but their opponents were.

Seventh. That two of the electors certified by Kellogg were ineligible at the time of the election by holding office under the Government of the United States; and that others were ineligible by holding State offices, and that Kellogg could not legally certify himself as an elector.

FEBRUARY 16, 1877.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY said :

The first two objections, that the State is without a republican form of government, and that Kellogg was not governor, are not seriously insisted upon.

The question whether the State had any law directing the appointment of electors of President and Vice-President, and regulating their proceedings, depends upon whether the presidential electoral law of 1868 was or was not repealed by the general election-law of 1872, which is admitted to have been in force at the time of the last election.

The repealing clause relied on is in the last section of the act, and is in these words :

That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The question is, whether the act relating to presidential electors is an act "on the subject of election laws" within the meaning of this repealing clause. I am entirely satisfied that it is not, and that no part of it is repealed by the act of 1872, except one section which relates to the mode of returning and ascertaining the votes for electors. My reasons are these :

In the session of 1863, an act was passed, approved October 19, 1868, which professed to be a general election law, regulating the mode of holding and ascertaining the result of all elections in the State, making provision for preserving order thereat, and for executing generally the one hundred and third article of the constitution, which declares that "the privilege of free suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections and prohibiting under adequate penalties all undue influence thereon from power, bribery, tumult, or other improper practice." A distinct act was passed at the same session, approved October 30, 1868, which is the act relating to presidential electors, before referred to. It certainly was not supposed that one of these acts conflicted with the other. The one regulated the manner of holding and ascertaining the results of elections generally; the other prescribed the mode of appointing the presidential electors to which the State was entitled, namely, that they should be elected on the day fixed by Congress, two for the State at large, and one for each congressional district; prescribed their qualifications, and the time and place of their meeting to perform their duties; authorized them when met to fill any vacancies caused by the failure of any members to attend; and regulated their pay. One section, it is true, directed the manner in which the returns should be canvassed, namely, by the governor in presence of the secretary of state, the attorney-general, and a district judge; and the first section directed that the election for electors should be held on the day appointed by the act of Congress, and that it should be held and conducted in the manner and form provided by law for general State elections.

At the same session (1868) provision was made for revising all the general statutes of the State under the direction of a committee appointed for that purpose. This committee appointed Mr. John Ray to make the revision. It was duly reported and adopted during the session of 1870. It contained, under the title of "Elections," the act of October 19, 1868; and under the title "Presidential Electors," the act of October 30, 1868, showing conclusively that at that time the two acts were not deemed incompatible with each other.

A new election law was passed at the same session as a substitute for that of October 19, 1868, repealing all conflicting laws; but it was not inserted in the revised statutes, because they did not contain any of the laws of that session. A law was passed, however, authorizing the reviser (Mr. Ray) to publish a new edition, under the name of a digest, which should embrace the acts of 1870. This was done, and the new election law was inserted under the title "Elections" in the place of the old law. The act relating to presidential electors was untouched, except to insert in it the new method of making the returns of the elections by the returning-board, which was the only part of the new law which conflicted with it. It is apparent, therefore, that the election law of 1870 was not deemed repugnant to the law relating to "Presidential Electors," except in the one particular mentioned.

Now, the act of 1872, which it is alleged does repeal the law relating to presidential electors, is simply a substitute for the general election law of 1870, going over and occupying exactly the same ground, and no more, and making very slight alterations. The principal of these is the reconstruction of the returning-board. With this exception it does not in the least conflict, any more than did the act of 1870, with the provisions of the law relating to "presidential electors." And as the repealing clause therein (before referred to) is expressly confined to "acts on the subject of election laws," it seems to me most manifest that the intent was to repeal the election law only, and not that relating to "presidential electors." This view is corroborated by the sixty-ninth section, which has this expression: "The violation of any provision of the act, or section of the act repealed by this act, shall be considered," &c. Repealing clauses should not be extended so as to repeal laws not in conflict with the new law, unless absolutely necessary to give effect to the words. And when we consider the consequences which a repeal of the law relating to presidential electors would have in depriving the State of its power to have vacancies in its electoral college filled, in introducing confusion and uncertainty as to the districts they should be chosen from, and by leaving no directions as to the time and place of their meeting, it seems clear that it could never have been in the mind of the legislature to repeal that law.

There is a section in the act of 1872 relating to vacancies which it has been suggested is repugnant to the authority of the electoral college to fill vacancies in that body. It is section 24 which enacts, "that all elections to be held in this State to fill any vacancies shall be conducted and managed, and returns thereof shall be made, in the same manner as is provided for general elections." But this is explained by the fact that both the constitution and the election law itself direct vacancies in certain offices named (including that of members of the legislature) to be filled by a new election. The twenty-fourth section means only, that where elections are to be held to fill vacancies, they shall be held in the usual manner. It cannot mean that all vacancies shall be filled by another election; because the constitution expressly gives to the governor the power to fill vacancies in certain cases.

I am clearly of opinion, therefore, that the law relating to presidential electors has not been repealed, except as to the mode of canvassing the returns; and that that is to be performed by the returning-board created by the act of 1872, in lieu of the Lynch returning-board created by the act of 1870, and in lieu of the method originally prescribed in the law relating to presidential electors.

This disposes of the objection, that the electoral college has no power to fill vacancies in its own body, since the electoral law has a section which expressly authorizes the college to fill any vacancy that may occur by the non-attendance of any of the electors by four o'clock in the afternoon of the day for giving their votes.

But it is insisted that that part of the election law of 1872 which re-establishes the returning-board, and gives it its powers, is unconstitutional. The act declares "that five persons, to be elected by the Senate from all political parties, shall be the returning-officers for all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning-officers."

The powers and duties of the board are, to meet in New Orleans within ten days after the election, canvass and compile the statements of votes made by the commissioners of election, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state, and publish a copy in the public journals, declaring the names of all persons and officers voted for, the number of votes for each person, and the names of the persons who have been duly and lawfully elected. It is declared that the returns thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers, until set aside after contest according to law, of the right of any person declared elected. On receiving notice from any supervisor of election, supported by affidavits, and being convinced by examination and testimony that by reason of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, the purity and freedom of election at any voting-place were materially interfered with, or a sufficient number of qualified voters to change the result were prevented from registering and voting, it is made the duty of the board to exclude from their returns the votes given at such voting-place.

Why this law is unconstitutional, I cannot perceive. The powers given may be abused, it is true, but that is the case with all powers. The constitutionality of the board has been considered by the supreme court of Louisiana, and has been fully sustained. It is said that the term of office is indefinite, and might continue for life. But where no period is fixed for the tenure of an office, it is held at the will of the appointing power, which may at any time make a new appointment. So that no evil consequences can ensue from this cause. If the members of the board were appointed for a term, the senate could re-appoint them. Allowing them to remain when power exists to remove them at will, is substantially the same thing.

The objection that there were only four members constituting the board at the canvass in December last is met by the general rule of law in regard to public bodies, that the happening of a vacancy does not destroy the body if a quorum still remains. The Supreme Court consists of nine justices; but the court may be legally held though there are three vacancies, only six being required for a quorum. A vacancy in a branch of the legislature, in the board of supervisors of a county, in the commissioners or selectmen of a town, in the trustees of a school district, does not destroy the body nor vitiate its action, unless there be an express law to make it do so.

But it is said that the power given to the board to fill vacancies in its own body is mandatory. It is in exactly the same terms as those contained in the election law of 1870 on the same subject. In several cases arising under that act, the supreme court of Louisiana decided that this language was not compulsory, or at least did not affect the legal constitution of the board if not complied with; but that the board was a legal board though only four members remained in it. Had the board never been filled at all, it might be urged with more plausibility that it was never legally constituted. If a court be created to consist of five judges, although if once legally organized a single judge might hold the court in the absence of the others, yet if only one judge were ever appointed, it might very properly be said that no legal organization had ever taken place. In this case the vacancy in the board occurred after it had been duly constituted by the appointment of the full number of members. Afterward the vacancy occurred. And if it be the correct view, as was decided by the supreme court of Louisiana in regard to the Lynch board, that the power given to the remaining members to fill the vacancy is not mandatory, a neglect on their part to fill it does not, it seems to me, destroy the existence of the board or deprive it of power to act. If it be true, as alleged, that members of only one political party remained on it, it may have been an impropriety in proceeding without filling the vacancy, and the motives of the members may have been bad motives, corrupt, fraudulent, what not; but with improprieties and with the motives of the members we have nothing to do. We are not the judges of their motives. The question with which we have to do is a question of power, of legal authority in four members to act. And of this I have no doubt. The board was directed "to be elected by the senate from all political parties," it is true. It does not appear that this was not done. Can it be contended that the resignation or death of one of the members, who happened to be alone in his party connections, deprives the remainder of the power to act? I think not. If the four members remaining were all of different politics, the objection would lose all its force. So that it is resolved to this: that the power to fill a vacancy is mandatory when any political party ceases to be represented by the death or resignation of a member, and is not mandatory in any other case. Suppose, instead of dying or resigning, the member changes his party affiliations; is there a vacancy then? Can the other members oust him, or can he oust them? The senate, with whom resides the power of appointing a new board whenever it sees fit, might be in duty bound to act; but the same cannot be said of the board itself. If this were not Louisiana, but some State in which no charges of fraud and disorder were made, the objection would hardly be thought of as having any legal validity.

The next question relates to the alleged illegality and fraud in the proceedings of the returning-board. Can the two Houses of Congress go behind their returns and certificate and examine into their conduct? I have already discussed this subject to some extent in the Florida case. I shall now only state briefly the conclusions to which I have come in this case:

First. I consider the governor's certificate of the result of the canvass as prima facie evidence of the fact, but subject to examination and contradiction. This point has already been considered in the Florida case.

Secondly. The finding and return of the State canvassers of the election are, in their nature, of greater force and effect than the governor's certificate, being that on which his certificate is founded and being the final result of the political machinery established by the State to ascertain and determine the very fact in question. "Each State shall appoint," is the language of the Constitution. Of course the two Houses must be satisfied that the State has appointed and that the votes presented were given by its appointees. The primary proof of this, as prescribed by the laws of the United States, is the certificate of the governor. But, as before stated, I do not deem that conclusive. It may be shown to be false or erroneous in fact, or based upon the canvass and return of a board or tribunal that had no authority to act. This was conceded in the proceedings which took place with regard to the votes of Louisiana in 1873.

Was the returning-board of Louisiana a tribunal, or body, constituted by the laws of the State, with power to ascertain and declare the result of the election, and did that board, in the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon it, ascertain and declare that result? This, it seems to me, is the point to be ascertained.

This involves an examination of the laws of the State to ascertain what that tribunal is and what general powers it is invested with, not for the purpose of seeing whether all the proceedings of the board, or of the election-officers whose action preceded theirs, were in strict compliance with the law, but for the purpose of seeing whether the result comes from the authorities provided by the State, acting substantially within the scope of their appointment. This is necessary to be done in order to see whether (whatever irregularities may have occurred) it was the State which made the appointment or some usurping body not authorized by the State at all.

The examination to be made is somewhat analogous to that made into the jurisdiction of a court when its judgment is collaterally assailed. If the board declared the result of the election, and in so doing acted within the general scope of its powers, it seems to me that the inquiry should there end. The constitutional power of the two Houses of Congress does not go further.

On the question of jurisdiction, I think it competent for the Houses to take notice of the fact (if such was the fact) that the returning-board had no returns before it at all, and, in effect, (to speak as we do of judicial proceedings,) without having a case before it to act on; or of the fact (if such was the fact) that the board which pretended to act was not a legal board. This view was taken by both Houses, if I understand their action aright, in the count of 1873 in rejecting the electoral votes from Louisiana on that occasion. (Document on Electoral Counts, 407.)

Anything which shows a clear want of jurisdiction in the returning-board divests its acts of authority, and makes it cease to be the representative of the will of the State. But it must appear that there was a clear and most manifest want of authority; for, otherwise, the State might be deprived of its franchise by mere inadvertence of its agents or an honest mistake made by them as to the law.

In the case before us, the board had ample powers, as we have seen. These powers have frequently been sustained by the supreme court of the State. The law of Louisiana not only gives the board power to canvass the returns, but to reject returns whenever in their opinion, upon due examination had, they are satisfied that the vote was affected by violence and intimidation. They did no more in this case, supposing them to have done all that is alleged. It is said that they proceeded without jurisdiction, because they did not canvass the statements of the commissioners of election, but only the abstracts of the parish supervisors of registration. It is not denied that they had both and all of these statements before them. If they acted wrongfully in relying on the abstracts and not examining the original statements, it may have been misconduct on their part, but it cannot be said that they were acting beyond the scope of their jurisdiction. If, in a single case, and without coming to an erroneous result, they took the abstracts instead of the original returns, it would be just as fatal as a matter of jurisdiction (and no more so) as if they relied on the abstracts in all cases. It would only be error or misconduct, and not want of jurisdiction. And the Houses of Congress, as before said, are not a court of errors and appeals, for the purpose of examining regularity of proceedings.

It is also said that they acted without jurisdiction in rejecting returns without having before them certificates of violence or intimidation. It is admitted that they took a large quantity of evidence themselves on the subject; but it is contended that they had no jurisdiction to enter upon the inquiry without a supervisor's certificate first had. Is this certain? The one hundred and third article of the constitution made it the duty of the legislature to pass laws regulating elections, to support the privilege of free suffrage, and to prohibit undue influence thereon from power, bribery, tumults, or other improper influences. The election law was passed to carry out this article. As one means of carrying it out in spirit, the returning-board were prohibited from counting a return, if it was accompanied by a certificate of violence, until they had investigated the matter by examination and proof. Receiving such a certificate, they could not count a return if they wanted to. Now, is it certain that under such a law, if the board had knowledge from other sources than a certificate that violence and intimidation had been exercised and had produced the result, they could not inquire into it? And more, is their whole canvass to be set aside, because they made an investigation under such circumstances? There is no other tribunal in Louisiana for making it. The supreme court has decided that the courts cannot go behind these returns. In my judgment, we have no more authority to reject their canvass for this cause than for that of not using the original statements. It is as if a court having jurisdiction of a cause used a piece of evidence on the trial which it had no jurisdiction to take. It would be mere irregularity at most, and would not render its judgment void in any collateral proceeding.

I cannot bring my mind to believe that fraud and misconduct on the part of the State authorities, constituted for the very purpose of declaring the final will of the State, is a subject over which the two Houses of Congress have jurisdiction to institute an examination. The question is not whether frauds ought to be tolerated, or whether they ought not to be circumvented; but whether the Houses of Congress, in exercising their power of counting the electoral votes, are intrusted by the Constitution with authority to investigate them. If in any case it should clearly and manifestly appear, in an unmistakable manner, that a direct fraud had been committed by a returning-board in returning the electors they did, and if it did not require an investigation on the part of the two Houses to ascertain by the taking of evidence the truth of the case, I have no doubt that the Houses might rightfully reject the vote—as not being the vote of the State. But where no such manifest fraud appears, and fraud is only charged, how are the two Houses to enter upon a career of investigation? If the field of inquiry were once opened, where is its boundary? Evidently no such proceeding was in the mind of the framers of the Constitution. The short and explicit directions there given, that the votes shall be first produced before the Houses when met for that purpose, and that “the votes shall then be counted,” is at variance with any such idea. An investigation beforehand is not authorized and was not contemplated, and would be repugnant to the limited and special power given. What jurisdiction have the Houses on the subject, until they have met under the Constitution, except to provide by law for facilitating the performance of their duties? An investigation afterward, such as the question raised might and frequently would lead to, would be utterly incompatible with the performance of the duty imposed.

At all events, on one or two points I am perfectly clear. First, that the two Houses do not constitute a canvassing-board for the purpose of investigating and deciding on the results of the election for electors in a State. The proposed act of 1800 carefully excluded any inquiry into the number of votes on which an elector was elected; and I think it cannot well be pretended that the Houses have power to go further into the inquiry than was proposed by that bill. Secondly, that the two Houses are not a tribunal, or court, for trying the validity of the election-returns and sitting in judgment on the legality of the proceedings in the course of the election. The two Houses, with only their constitutional jurisdiction, are neither of these things; though as to the elections, qualifications, and returns of their own members, they are certainly the latter, having the right to judge and decide.

I have thus far spoken of the power of the two Houses of Congress as derived from the Constitution. Whether the legislative power of the Government might not, by law, make provision for an investigation into frauds and illegalities, I do not undertake to decide. It cannot be done, in my judgment, by any agency of the Federal Government without legislative regulation. The necessity of an orderly mode of taking evidence and giving opportunity to cross-examine witnesses would require the interposition of law. The ordinary power of the two Houses as legislative bodies, by which they investigate facts through the agency of committees, is ill adapted to such an inquiry.

It seems to me, however, the better conclusion, that the jurisdiction of the whole matter belongs exclusively to the States. Let them take care to protect themselves from the perpetration of frauds. They need no guardians. They are able, and better able than Congress, to create every kind of political machinery which human prudence can contrive, for circumventing fraud, and preserving their true voice and vote in the presidential election.

In my judgment, the evidence proposed cannot be received.

Then, as to the alleged ineligibility of the candidates. First, their alleged ineligibility under the laws of the State, I think we have nothing to do with. It has been imposed for local reasons of State policy, but if the State sees fit to waive its own regulations on this subject, it is its own concern. If the State declares that no person shall hold two offices, or that all officers shall possess an estate of the value of $1,000, or imposes any other qualification, or disqualification, it is for the State to execute its own laws in this behalf. At all events, if persons are appointed electors without having the qualifications, or having the disqualifications, and they execute the function of casting their votes, their acts cannot be revised here.

Two of the electors, however, Levissee and Brewster, are alleged to have held offices of trust and profit under the United States, when the election was held on the 7th of November. It is not alleged that they did so on the 6th of December, when they gave their votes. Being absent when the electoral college met, their places were declared vacant, and the college itself proceeded to re-appoint them under the law, and sent for them. They then appeared and took their seats. So that, in point of fact, the objection does not meet the case, unless their being Federal office-holders at the time of the election affects it.

Though not necessary to the decision of this case, I have re-examined the question of constitutional ineligibility since the Florida case was disposed of, and must say that I am not entirely satisfied with the conclusion to which I then came, namely, that if a disqualified elector casts his vote when disqualified, the objection cannot be taken. I still think that this disqualification at the time of his election is not material, if such disqualification ceases before he acts as an elector. But, as at present advised, I am inclined to the opinion that if constitutionally disqualified when he casts his vote, such vote ought not to be counted.

I still think, as I thought in discussing the Florida case, that the form of the constitutional prohibition is not material; that it is all one, whether the prohibition is that a Federal officer shall not be an elector, or, that he shall not be appointed an elector. The spirit and object of the prohibition is to make office-holding under the Federal Government a disqualification. That is all. And this is the more apparent when we recollect the reasons for it. When the Constitution was framed, the great object of creating the office of electors to elect the President and Vice-President was to remove this great duty as far as possible from the influence of popular passion and prejudice, and to place it in the hands of men of wisdom and discretion, having a knowledge of public affairs and public men. The idea was that they were to act with freedom and independence. The jealousy which was manifested in the convention against the apprehended influence and power of the General Government, and especially of the legislative branch, induced the prohibition in question. It was feared that the members of the Houses of Congress and persons holding office under the Government would be peculiarly subject to these influences in exercising the power of voting for Chief Magistrate. It was not in the process of appointment that this influence was dreaded, but in the effect it would have on the elector himself in giving his vote.

It seems to me, therefore, that if a person appointed an elector has no official connection with the Federal Government when he gives his vote, such vote cannot be justly excepted to; and that substantial effect is given to the constitutional disqualification if the electoral vote given by such officer is rejected. And my present impression is that it should be rejected.

Circumstances, it is true, have greatly changed since the Constitution was adopted. Instead of electors being, as it was supposed they would be, invested with power to act on the dictates of their own judgment and discretion in choosing a President, they have come to be mere puppets, elected to express the preordained will of the political party that elects them. The matter of ineligibility has come to be really a matter of no importance, except as it still stands in the Constitution, and is to be interpreted as it was understood when the Constitution was adopted. Hence we must ascertain, if we can, what was its original design and meaning, without attempting to stretch or enlarge its force.

[It may be proper that I should here add that I concede that there is great force in what is urged by other members of the Commission respecting the difficulty which still remains, of the two Houses, when assembled to count the votes, undertaking an investigation of facts to determine a question of ineligibility, which might be extended in such a manner as materially to interfere with the main duty for which they assemble. This was probably seen when the law of 1800 was proposed for the purpose of having such matters determined by a grand committee preparatory to the meeting of the two Houses in joint convention. The passage of some law regulating the matter is on all accounts desirable.]

THE OREGON CASE.

Statement.

The laws of Oregon do not provide for a board of State canvassers, but direct as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in presence of the governor, to proceed within thirty days after the election, and sooner if the returns be all received, to canvass the votes given for secretary and treasurer of state, State printer, justices of the supreme court, members of Congress, and district attorneys."

And then, with regard to State officers, directs: "The governor shall grant a certificate of election to the person having the highest number of votes, and shall also issue a proclamation declaring the election of such person."

But with regard to presidential electors, it directs: "The votes for the electors shall be given, received, returned, and canvassed as the same are given, returned, and canvassed for members of Congress. The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December."

When the electors are met on the day for casting their votes, the law directs: "If there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill, by viva voce and plurality of votes, such vacancy in the electoral college."

Watts, one of the electors having the highest number of votes, was a postmaster at the time of the election, November 7, 1876, but resigned that office during the month.

On the 4th of December, the secretary of state, in presence of the governor, canvassed the votes for presidential electors, made a statement of the result, authenticated it under the seal of the State, and filed it in his office. The following is a copy of this document:

SALEM, STATE OF OREGON:

I hereby certify that the foregoing tabulated statement is the result of the vote cast for presidential electors at a general election held in and for the State of Oregon on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, as opened and canvassed in the presence of his excellency L. F. Grover, governor of said State, according to law, on the 4th day of December, A. D. 1876, at two o'clock p. m. of that day, by the secretary of state.

[SEAL.]

S. F. CHADWICK,
Secretary of State of Oregon.

The statute of Oregon declares, "in all elections in this State the person having the highest number of votes for any office shall be deemed to be elected."

On the 6th of December, when the electors met to give their votes for President and Vice-President, Watts resigned as elector, and was re-appointed by Odell and Cartwright to fill the vacancy. The governor refused them the usual certificate, but certified that Odell, Cartwright, and Cronin received the highest number of votes cast for persons eligible under the Constitution of the United States, and declared them duly elected. As Odell and Cartwright refused to meet with Cronin, he assumed to fill two vacancies. This proceeding of the governor and of Cronin raised the principal question in the Oregon case.

FEBRUARY 23, 1877.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY said:

This case differs from the two cases already heard in this: By the laws both of Florida and Louisiana, the final determination of the result of the election was to be made by a board of canvassers invested with power to judge of the local returns and to reject them for certain causes assigned. In Oregon, no such board exists. The general canvass for the State is directed to be made by the secretary of state, in presence of the governor, from the abstracts sent to him by the county clerks. This canvass having been made, the result is declared by the law. The canvass is the last act by which the election is decided and determined. This canvass was made in the present case on the 4th day of December, 1876; the result was recorded in a statement in writing made by the secretary and filed by him in his office. This statement or abstract thus became the record evidence of the canvass. It remains in the secretary's office to-day as the final evidence and determination of the result. We have before us, under the great seal of the State, a copy of this statement, which shows the result to have been a clear plurality of over a thousand votes in favor of the three electors, Odell, Cartwright, and Watts; and there is added thereto a list of the votes.

This document, after exhibiting a tabulated statement of the votes given for each candidate in each county of the State, footing up for Odell, 15,206; Watts, 15,206; Cartwright, 15,214; Klippel, 14,136; Cronin, 14,157; Laswell, 14,149, and a few scattering votes, was certified and authenticated at the end, as follows :

SALEM, STATE OF OREGON :

I hereby certify that the foregoing tabulated statement is the result of the vote cast for presidential electors at a general election held in and for the State of Oregon, on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1876, as opened and canvassed in the presence of his excellency L. F. Grover, governor of said State, according to law, on the 4th day of December, A. D. 1876, at two o'clock p. m. of that day, by the secretary of state.

[SEAL.]

S. F. CHADWICK,

Secretary of State of Oregon.

This document, with this certificate and authentication upon it, was filed by the secretary in his office on the 4th day of December.

To the exemplified copy of it, which was sent to the President of the Senate, (and which we have before us,) is added another document, entitled "List of votes cast at an election for electors of President and Vice-President of the United States in the State of Oregon, held on the 7th day of November, 1876," which contains the votes given for each candidate, (the same as in the canvass,) written out in words at length, and certified by the secretary of state, also under the great seal of the State, to be the entire vote cast for each and all persons for the office of electors as appears by the returns of said election on file in his office.

Having made this canvass, recorded it, and filed it in his office, the secretary of state was functus officio with regard to the duty of ascertaining the result of the election. He could not change it; he could not tamper with it in any way. By his act and by this record of his act, the ascertainment of the election in Oregon was closed. Its laws give no revisory power to any other functionary and give none to the secretary himself. And this, as we have seen, was done and completed on the 4th day of December, at two o'clock in the afternoon, in the presence of the governor, according to the law of Oregon.

Now, what is the decree of the law on this transaction? It is clear and unmistakable:

In all elections in this State the person having the highest number of votes for any office shall be deemed to be elected.

It is not left for any functionary to say that any other person shall be deemed to be elected. No discretion, no power of revision is given to any one, except as the general law of the State has given to the judicial department power to investigate the right of persons elected to hold the offices to which they have been elected.

Now, what is the next step to be performed? It is this:

The secretary of state shall prepare two lists of the names of the electors elected, and affix the seal of the State to the same. Such lists shall be signed by the governor and secretary, and by the latter delivered to the college of electors at the hour of their meeting on such first Wednesday of December.

This direction seems to be intended as a compliance with the act of Congress of 1792. It is true that this act requires three lists instead of two to be delivered to the electors ; but the number required by the State law was probably an inadvertence. Be this, however, as it may, what names was the secretary required by law to insert in his certificate ?

He made out his certificate on the 6th day of December, two days after his canvass had been completed, recorded, and deposited in the public archives. In making this certificate he was performing a mere ministerial duty. It was his clear duty to insert in his certificate the names of the persons whom the law declared to be elected. Doing otherwise was not only a clear violation of duty, but he made a statement untrue in fact ; and the governor putting his name to the certificate joined in that misrepresentation. It may not have been an intended misrepresentation, and the use of the word "eligible" may have been thought a sufficient qualification ; nevertheless it was a misrepresentation in fact and in law, and it all appears from the record itself. It needs no extrinsic evidence.

But it is said that the governor has the power to disregard the canvass and to reject an elector who he is satisfied is ineligible. There is no law in Oregon which gives him this power. In my judgment, it was a clear act of usurpation. It was tampering with an election which the law had declared to be closed and ascertained.

It is said, however, that he may refuse a commission to an ineligible person elected to a State office. If so, it does not decide this case. And it seems to me that such an act, even with regard to State officers, would be an encroachment on the judicial power. A case is referred to as having been decided in Oregon in which the appointment by the governor to fill a vacancy in a State office caused by the incumbent being appointed to a United States office was sustained. But surely the judgment in that case must have been based on the fact that there was a vacancy, and not on the fact that the governor assumed to judge whether there was a vacancy or not. His executive act, whether in determining his own action he had the right to decide the question of eligibility or not, was valid or not according as the very truth of the fact was.

But in the case before us he had a mere ministerial act to perform. He had no discretionary power.

If any one could have taken notice of the question of supposed ineligibility, it was the secretary of state when making his canvass. Had he taken it upon himself to throw out the votes given for Watts, he would have had a much more plausible ground of justification for his act than the governor had, to whom no power is given on the subject.

But it is said, no matter whether the governor and secretary acted right or wrong, they were the functionaries designated for giving final expression to the will of the State, and their certificate must be received as such, under the decision in the cases of Florida and Louisiana. To this view, however, there is a conclusive answer. As I said before, the certificate to be given by the secretary and governor to these electors was not intended as any part of the machinery for ascertaining the result of the election, but as a mere certificate of the fact of election, as a credential to be used by the electors in acting as such and transmitting their votes to the President of the Senate of the United States, as required by the act of Congress of 1792. As such it is prima facie evidence, it is true ; but no person has contended that it cannot be contradicted and shown to be untrue, especially by evidence of equal dignity. We did not so decide in the other cases. We held that the final decision of the canvass by the tribunal or authority constituted for that purpose could not be revoked by the two Houses of Congress, by going into evidence behind their action and return.

The only remaining question is, whether there was a vacancy in the college at the time when Odell and Cartwright assumed to fill a vacancy on the 6th day of December, 1876. It seems to me that there was, whether there was a failure to elect on account of the ineligibility of Watts or on account of his resignation afterward.

It is agreed by a large majority of the Commission that Cronin was not elected. Some of this majority take the ground that Watts was duly elected, whatever effect his ineligibility, had it continued, might have had on his vote. Others take the ground that there was no election of a third elector. It seems to me that it makes no difference in this case which of these views is the correct one; there was a clear vacancy in either case.

The act of Congress of 1845 declares that "each State may by law provide for the filling of any vacancies which may occur in its college of electors when such college meets to give its electoral vote;" and also, "that whenever any State has held an election for the purpose of choosing electors, and has failed to make a choice on the day prescribed by law, the electors may be appointed on a subsequent day in such manner as the legislature of such State may direct."

The first contingency would occur when some of the electors were elected and could meet and fill any vacancy in their number. The second contingency would occur when no electors were appointed, and therefore no meeting could be held. It is evident that these are two very different cases, and that the one before us does not belong to the latter, but to the former. It is the difference between a college which is not full and no college at all. In Oregon, according to the exigency supposed, the case belonged to that of a vacancy under the act of 1845.

The act of Oregon in relation to vacancies in the electoral college was evidently passed in view of the act of Congress upon which it was based; and its terms are so broad and comprehensive that I cannot doubt that it was intended to apply to every case of vacancy. The words are that "if there shall be any vacancy in the office of an elector, occasioned by death, refusal to act, neglect to attend, or otherwise, the electors present shall immediately proceed to fill," &c. This clearly covers every supposable case, and must be intended to be as broad as the corresponding section of the act of Congress. It is more general in its terms than the act relating to vacancies in State offices, which specifies only certain classes of cases.

As the electors Odell and Cartwright filled the vacancy in a regular manner, I cannot avoid the conclusion that they, together with Watts, were the true electors for the State of Oregon on the 6th day of December, and that their votes ought to be counted.

Their credentials are not signed by the governor, it is true; but that is not an essential thing and was not their fault. They have presented the records of the State, found in its archives; and these show that the act of the governor was grossly wrong; and they have also presented the certificate of the secretary of state, under the great seal of the State, conclusively showing their election. They have also shown by their own affidavit that they applied to the governor for his certificate and that he refused it. I think their credentials, under the circumstances, are sufficient.

It is urged that the distinction made between this case and that of Florida and Louisiana is technical and will not give public satisfaction. My belief is that when the public come to understand (as they will do in time) that the decision come to is founded on the Constitution and the laws, they will be better satisfied than if we should attempt to follow the clamor of the hour. The sober second thought of the people of this country is in general correct. But while the public satisfaction is always desirable, it is a poor method of ascertaining the law and the truth to be alert in ascertaining what are the supposed wishes of the public. And as to deciding the case on technicalities, I do not know that technicalities are invoked on the one side more than on the other. In drawing the true boundary-line between conflicting jurisdictions and establishing certain rules for just decision in such cases as these, it is impossible to avoid a close and searching scrutiny of written constitutions and laws. The weight due to words and phrases has to be observed, as well as the general spirit and policy of public documents. Careful and exact inquiry becomes a necessity. And in such a close political canvass as this, in which the decision of a presidential election may depend not only on a single electoral, but a single individual vote, the greatest strain is brought to bear on every part of our constitutional machinery, and it is impossible to avoid a close examination of every part. There is a natural fondness for solving every doubt on some "broad and general view" of the subject in hand. "Broad and general views," when entirely sound and clearly applicable, are undoubtedly to be preferred; but it is extremely easy to adopt broad and general views that will, if adhered to, carry us into regions of error and absurdity. The only rule that is always and under all circumstances reliable is to ascertain, at whatever cost of care and pains, the true and exact commands of the Constitution and the laws, and implicitly to obey them.

THE SOUTH CAROLINA CASE.

Mr. Commissioner BRADLEY said:

It is not pretended that the votes of the Tilden electors, as presented in certificate No. 2, in this case, are legal. The entire controversy arises upon the objections to certificate No. 1, containing the votes for Hayes and Wheeler.

These objections are—

First. That the November election in South Carolina was void because the legislature of that State has never passed a registration law as required by the constitution of the State, article 8, section 3, which is as follows:

It shall be the duty of the general assembly to provide from time to time for the registration of all electors.

This constitution was passed in 1868, and from that time to this elections have been held, and the various elective officers of the State, as well as the office of Representative in Congress, have been filled without a registration law having been passed. If the effect of the omission has been to render all these elections absolutely void, South Carolina has for some years been without any lawful government. But if the effect has only been to render the elections voidable, without affecting the validity of the acts of the government in its various departments, as a government de facto, then the election of presidential electors and their giving their votes have the same validity as all other political acts of that body-politic. But, in my opinion, the clause of the constitution in question is only directory, and cannot affect the validity of elections in the State, much less the official acts of the officers elected. The passage of a registration law was a legislative duty which the members on their oaths were bound to perform. But their neglect to perform it ought not to prejudice the people or the State.

The objection that it does not appear by the certificate that the electors voted by ballot, or that they took an oath of office as required of all officers in South Carolina, are so formal and manifestly frivolous that I shall not discuss them. The presumption is that all due formalities were complied with.

The only objections of any weight are those which charge that there was such anarchy and disturbance in the State during the election, and such interference of United States troops and others therewith, that no valid election was held in the State, and it is impossible to know what the will of the State was. This is placing the objections and the offer of proof to support them, in their strongest light.

I think it unquestionably true that such a state of things as this objection contemplates ought to exclude any vote purporting to come from the State, for no such vote can be regarded as expressing the will of the State. But that is not the only question to be considered.

The first and great question is as to the constitutional power of the two Houses of Congress, when assembled to count the votes for President and Vice-President, to institute an investigation by evidence such as is necessary to determine the facts to be proved. This power of canvassing the electoral votes is constantly confounded with that of canvassing the votes by which the electors themselves were elected—a canvass with which Congress has nothing to do. This belongs to the jurisdiction of the States themselves, and not to Congress. All that Congress has to do with the subject is to ascertain whether the State has or has not appointed electors—an act of the State which can only be performed by and through its own constituted authorities.

It seems to be also constantly overlooked or forgotten that the two Houses, in their capacity of a convention for counting the electoral votes, have only a special and limited jurisdiction. They are not at all invested with that vast and indefinite power of inquisition which they enjoy as legislative bodies. Until met for the specific purpose of the count, they have no power over the subject, except to pass such laws as it is competent for the legislative branch of the Government to pass. The electoral votes are in sealed packages, over which the two Houses have no control. They have not, constitutionally, any knowledge of these until they are opened in their presence. Their jurisdiction over the subject of the count, and the votes, and the appointment of electors, commences at that moment. They have no power before this to make investigations affecting the count. Could it have been in the contemplation of the Constitution that the two Houses, after commencing the count, should institute such an investigation as the objectors propose, involving (as it would be likely to do) many weeks in the process? It seems to me impossible to come to such a conclusion.

When the state of things in a State is of such a public character as to be within the judicial knowledge of the two Houses, of course they may take notice of it and act accordingly, as was done in the times of secession and the late civil war, or as might have been done at any time, so long as the seceding States were not in harmonious relations with the General Government. But when a State is in the enjoyment of all those relations, when it is represented in both Houses of Congress, is recognized by the other departments of the Government, and is known to have a government republican in form—in other words, when all the public relations of the State are the same as those of all other States, how can the two Houses in convention assembled (and assembled for such a special purpose) go into an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining the exact state of things within the State, so as to decide the question (perhaps a very nice question to be decided) whether the tumults and disorders existing therein at the time of the election, or the presence of the troops sent there by the President for the preservation of the public peace, had such an influence as to deprive the State of its autonomy and the power of expressing its will in the appointment of electors? Such an investigation, or one of any such character and extent, was surely never contemplated to be made while the votes were being counted.

That South Carolina is a State and that she has a republican form of government are public facts of which the two Houses (and we in their stead) must take judicial notice. We know that she is such a State. That she is capable of preserving the public order, either with or without the aid of the Federal authority, and that the executive interference, if made at all, was made in the exercise of his proper authority for the reasons set forth in his public proclamations and orders, are facts to be presumed. At all events the two Houses, under their special authority to count the electoral votes, are not competent to take evidence to prove the contrary.

I do not doubt that Congress, in its legislative capacity, with the President concurring, or by a two-thirds vote after his veto, could pass a law by which investigation might be had in advance, under proper regulations as to notice and evidence and the cross-examination of witnesses; the results of which could be laid before the two Houses at their meeting for the count of votes, and could be used by them as a basis for deciding whether such a condition of anarchy, disturbance, and intimidation existed in a State at a time of the election of its electors as to render its vote nugatory and liable to be rejected. But without the existence of a law of this sort, it is, in my judgment, impracticable and unconstitutional for the two Houses to enter upon such an inquiry. The investigations made by legislative committees, in the loose manner in which they are usually made, are not only not adapted to the proper ascertainment of the truth for such a purpose, but are totally unauthorized by the Constitution. As methods of inquiry for ordinary legislative purposes or for the purpose of laying the foundation of resolutions for bringing in an impeachment of the President for unconstitutional interference, of course they are competent; but not for the purpose of receiving or rejecting the vote of a State for the presidential office. They are not made such by any constitutional provision or by any law. Legislation may be based on the private knowledge of members, and a resolution to bring in an impeachment may rest on ex parte affidavits or on general information; and, therefore, the evidence taken by a committee cannot be deemed incompetent for such a purpose, but is often of great service in giving information to the Houses as legislative bodies, and to the House of Representatives as the grand inquest of the nation. But the decision to receive or reject the vote of a State is a final decision on the right of the State in that behalf, and one of a most solemn and delicate nature, and cannot properly be based on the depositions of witnesses gathered in the drag-net of a congressional committee.

For these reasons I am clear that the evidence offered in support of the objections made to the electoral votes of South Carolina cannot be received.

These are, in brief, the views which I entertain in reference to this case; and under them I am forced to the conclusion that the objections made to the votes given by the electors certified by the governor of the State, and the evidence offered in support of the same, are insufficient, and that the said votes ought to be counted.

REMARKS OF MR. COMMISSIONER CLIFFORD.

INTRODUCTORY EXPLANATIONS.

More than one return, purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes of the State of Florida, having been received by the President of the Senate and opened by that officer in the presence of the two Houses, and objections thereto having been filed in the manner required by law, the certificates, votes, and all papers accompanying the same, together with such objections, were duly submitted to the judgment and decision of the Electoral Commission to decide which, if either, was the true and lawful vote of the State from which the returns were received.

Prior to the commencement of the hearing the Commission adopted certain rules to regulate the course of its proceedings, to two of which it is proper to refer in order to a better understanding of what took place. They are in substance and effect as follows: (1) Objectors to a certificate may select two of their number to support their objections and to advocate the validity of any one or more of the other certificates, under the prescribed limitations. (2) Counsel, not exceeding two on each side, may afterward be heard on the merits of the case.

Pursuant to the rule first named, the objectors to the Hayes certificate, called certificate No. 1, were fully heard, and the objectors to the Tilden certificates, called certificates Nos. 2 and 3, were also fully heard. Special leave was given by the Commission that three counsel might speak on each side, and the time allowed by the rule was enlarged.

Pending the argument it was suggested to counsel that if they proposed to introduce evidence to support their objections, it would facilitate the hearing if they should make known to the Commission in some proper form what the evidence was that they proposed to introduce. Offers of proof were accordingly made by the counsel supporting the objections to certificate No. 1, as appears in the published proceedings of the Commission. No offer of proof was submitted to the Commission by the counsel supporting the objections to the other two certificates, at that stage of the hearing.

Without entering into details, suffice it say that a portion of the time allowed under the rule for the discussion of the merits of the case having been spent before the offer of proof was made, it was moved by Mr. Justice Miller "that counsel be allowed two hours on each side to discuss the question whether any evidence will be considered by the Commission that was not submitted to the two Houses by the President of the Senate, and, if so, what evidence can properly be considered, and also what is the evidence now before the Commission." Debate ensued, but the motion was adopted and the argument proceeded under that regulation and restriction.

Both sides were heard, and at the close of the arguments all persons present, except the members of the Commission and the officers thereof, retired and the Commission went into consultation with closed doors. Opportunity for debate was extended to every member of the Commission and all participated in the discussion before the final votes were taken. Certain remarks were made at the close of the debate by Mr. Justice Clifford, in substance and effect as follows:

REMARKS.

Since the case was submitted to the Commission, pursuant to the recent act of Congress, I have carefully examined the several certificates in question and all the written objections to the same transmitted here by the President of the Senate, in order to ascertain what the matters in controversy are and what questions are presented to the judgment and decision of the Commission. Beyond doubt, those documents, with the accompanying papers, were intended by the act of Congress to present the matters in contestation to be submitted to the judgment and decision of the tribunal created for the purpose of hearing and determining such controversies. Fifteen commissioners have been appointed for the purpose, and they, as required by the act of Congress, have severally been sworn impartially to examine and consider all questions submitted to the tribunal, and to render a true judgment in the premises, agreeably to the Constitution and the laws.

Sitting under that act of Congress I shall assume that it is a constitutional act and that it correctly describes and defines the duties and the jurisdiction of the Commission.

Differences of opinion existed upon that subject before the act of Congress creating the Commission was passed. Two theories were advanced: one that the power to decide what persons were duly appointed electors in a State is vested in the President of the Senate, and the other that the sole power in that regard is vested in the two Houses of Congress. Discussion upon that topic is closed by the act of Congress, which makes it the duty of the Commission, in a case submitted to it under the second section of the act, to "decide whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors in such State."

Appointed, as the members of the Commission have been, under that act, they are bound by its provisions, and it is the duty of the tribunal to perform in good faith the duties which it prescribes.

Three returns or certificates are submitted to the Commission from the State of Florida, and the tribunal is required to decide what persons are duly appointed electors from that State. Certificate No. 1, if unexplained, shows that the Hayes electors are duly appointed, and certificates Nos. 2 and 3 show that the Tilden electors were duly elected by a majority of the votes cast at the election.

Such an issue must be decided by the Commission, and all just and intelligent persons must admit that it cannot be properly decided without an inquiry into the facts and a hearing of the parties. Inquiry to a very limited extent, it is admitted, may be made, but the amazing proposition is advanced that the inquiry cannot extend beyond the examination of the papers presented by the President of the Senate to the two Houses and which were subsequently submitted to the Commission. Attempt is made to support that proposition chiefly by the argument of inconvenience. Should the inquiry be opened to a wider investigation the argument is that the Commission would not be able to close its duties in season to render the electoral votes effectual for the purpose prescribed by the Constitution.

Support to that view is attempted to be drawn from the most extravagant suppositions that ingenious minds can devise or imagine. If the suggestions were well founded, they would be entitled to weight; but a few observations, I think, will be sufficient to show that the supposed dangers are merely imaginary and without any foundation whatever.

Arguments unsupported by fact are entitled to no weight and may be dismissed without consideration as mere sound and fury, signifying nothing. Judging from the issues presented by the certificates and the objections thereto filed in behalf of the contestants, I assume that the Commission is not expected to enter into any scrutiny of the votes cast at the general election of the State, nor of the qualifications of the voters who voted for President and Vice-President at that election. Nothing of the kind is suggested in any one of the written objections and no such extravagant proposition has been advanced by any member of the Commission. Matters of that sort may, therefore, be dismissed without further remark; and it is equally clear that no attack is made upon the local officers who presided in the precincts, nor does any one of the objections filed in the case impeach their conduct in receiving, sorting, or counting the votes, or in declaring the result. Questions of the kind sometimes arise in other forums, which give rise to difficult and protracted investigations, but no question of that character is involved in this investigation, nor can it be without a willful departure from the issues presented in the written objections filed in the case.

Impartial men everywhere must admit that the act of Congress makes it the duty of the Commission to decide "what persons were duly appointed electors" in that State; and if so, it may be assumed that no member of the Commission is willing to be deterred from performing the prescribed duty by any imaginary dangers, which have no real foundation in fact.

Sufficient has already been remarked to show that none of the objections to the certificates requires any scrutiny into the votes cast at the primary election or calls in question the returns made by the officers who presided in the precincts. Throughout, the controversy has respect to the conduct of the State board of canvassers in dealing with the returns made by the county canvassers to the secretary of state.

Precinct inspectors are required to make duplicate certificates of the result and deliver one of the same, with the poll-lists, to the clerk of the circuit court, and the other to the county judge. Six days later the county canvassers are required to meet and to make and sign duplicate certificates containing in words and figures, written in full length, the whole number of votes, the names of the persons voted for, and the number of votes given to each person for each office. Duplicate returns must be made and recorded, and the requirement also is that one of the duplicates shall be transmitted by mail to the secretary of state and the other to the governor. Provision is also made for a board of State canvassers, whose duty it is, within a prescribed period, to canvass the returns of election received from the several counties, and to determine and declare who shall have been elected to such office or as such member, as shown by such returns.

The State canvassers are to determine and declare who have been elected, as shown by the county returns received from the county canvassers.

Unless these views can be successfully controverted—and I submit with entire confidence that they cannot—then it follows that there are but three questions involved in the main feature of the resolution adopted by the Commission on motion of Mr. Justice Miller, which I assume is the proper guide of the Commission in the present consultation.

1. Whether the certificate No. 1 is absolutely conclusive of the election of the Hayes electors and has the effect to exclude all evidence to prove the matters charged in the written objections submitted to the Commission at the same time with the certificate?

Charges of the kind involve the imputation of fraud, perjury, and forgery; and if evidence to sustain such imputations cannot be admitted, then the Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court have been misled and deceived.

2. Whether the action of the board of State canvassers is conclusive that the Hayes electors were duly appointed, and has the effect to shut out evidence to show error, fraud, perjury, or willful forgery?

3. Whether certificates Nos. 2 and 3 are valid, supported as they are by the action of all the branches of the State government, which, if admissible in evidence, show to a demonstration that the Hayes electors were never duly appointed, and that they are mere usurpers.

When a person is elected to the office of elector, the requirement of the State statute is that the governor shall make out and sign a certificate of his election, cause the same to be sealed with the seal of the State, and transmit the same to the person elected to such office. Certificates of the kind to persons chosen to any State office are made out by the secretary of state, whose duty it is to transmit the same to the person having the highest number of votes cast, and the provision is that the "certificate shall be prima facie evidence of his election to such office."

Votes cast for electors are canvassed for the same purpose as votes cast for State officers, and the certificate given by the governor to an elector is given for the same purpose that the certificate of the secretary of state is given to a person supposed to be elected to a State office, and there is no reason for holding that the certificate of the governor was intended to have any other or different effect than the certificate of the secretary of state when given to a State officer, as required by the same statute.

Truth and justice, it is admitted, ought to prevail, but the argument is that such an investigation is impracticable for the want of time to complete it, and in order to give plausibility to that theory it is assumed that the objectors to certificate No. 1 propose to enter into a scrutiny of the qualification of the voters, and of the votes cast at the primary election, and of the conduct of the officers who presided in the precincts, and of their returns. Assumptions of the kind are entirely without foundation, as sufficiently appears from the certificates and the written objections filed to the same, which clearly present the issues to be tried and determined by the Commission.

1. Certificate No. 1, dated December 6, 1876, signed by M. L. Stearns, governor, certifies that Frederick C. Humphreys, Charles H. Pearce, William H. Holden, and Thomas W. Long have been chosen electors of the State, agreeably to the laws of the State and in conformity to the Constitution of the United States.

Six specifications of objections were duly filed to that certificate, which in substance and effect are as follows: (1) That the persons therein named as electors were not appointed as such in the manner directed by the legislature of the State. (2) That they were not appointed electors of President and Vice-President in such manner as the legislature of the State directed. (3) That the qualified voters of the State did, on the 7th of November, 1876, execute the power of appointing such electors, and did appoint Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock to be such electors. (4) That certificate No. 1 is untrue, and was corruptly procured, and made in pursuance of a conspiracy therein more particularly described. (5) That the papers falsely purporting to be votes are fictitious and unreal, and were made out and executed in pursuance of the same fraudulent conspiracy. (6) That the printed certificate has been annulled and declared void by the executive and by the legislature and judiciary of the State.

Apart from that, the objectors also allege that certificate No. 1 was annulled by the subsequent certificate to the Tilden electors, by which the latter were declared duly appointed in the manner provided by the legislature of the State and the Constitution, the legislature having declared that the title of the persons named as electors in the last-named certificate is good and valid. Nor do the objectors rest the case entirely upon the certificate of the governor and the legislative act, but they also set up the judgment of the circuit court rendered in the suit in the nature of quo warranto, and allege that it was adjudged by the court in that case that the four persons named in certificate No. 1 were not elected, chosen, or appointed electors for the State, and that the court also decided that they were mere usurpers, and were not entitled to assume or exercise any of the powers or functions of electors of President and Vice-President.

Superadded to these general specifications, they also file a special objection to one of the four persons named in certificate No. 1, to wit, that Frederick C. Humphreys was ineligible as an elector because he held at the time of the election the office of shipping-commissioner, which, under the act of Congress of the 7th of June, 1872, is an office of trust and profit within the meaning of the Constitution.

II. On December 6, 1876, the attorney-general of the State, one of the board of State canvassers, executed a certificate to Wilkinson Call, James E. Yonge, Robert B. Hilton, and Robert Bullock, called certificate No. 2, that it appears by the authentic returns on file in the office of the secretary of state that they, on the 7th of November, 1876, were chosen the four electors of the State, and that the law of the State makes no provision whereby the result shown by those returns can be certified to the executive of the State. Under that certificate the persons therein named as electors on the same day met and cast their votes for Samuel J. Tilden for President and Thomas A. Hendricks for Vice-President.

Two objections are filed to that certificate: (1) That it is not authenticated according to the Constitution and laws of the United States, so as to enable the votes given by those four persons to be counted. (2) That the package inclosing that certificate, when opened in the presence of the two Houses, did not contain any paper from the executive of the State showing that the persons therein named were the electors appointed by the State, nor is said certificate accompanied by any lawful authentication that they were appointed to cast the electoral vote of the State.

Florida, on the 17th of January, 1877, enacted a statute creating a board of State canvassers, and by the same statute directed that board to proceed to canvass the returns of the election of electors held on the 7th of November, 1876, and to determine and declare who were elected and appointed electors at said election, as shown by such returns on file in the office of the secretary of state. By the second section of the statute the new State board was required to canvass those returns according to the fourth section of the election law which was in force at the time the election was held for the choice of electors, as construed by the supreme court of the State. Pursuant thereto, the said State board was duly constituted, consisting of the secretary of state, the governor of the State, the comptroller of public accounts, and the treasurer of the State, and they met at the capital of the State on the 19th of January in the same year, and made the canvass of the said returns on file in the office of the secretary of state, by which it appears that the four persons designated as the Tilden electors received a majority of all the votes cast for electors in the several precincts of the State, and that they were duly appointed such electors.

Enough also appears to show that those persons claimed title as electors duly appointed under certificate No. 2, and that they, on the 6th of December, 1876, instituted a suit in the circuit court of the second judicial circuit, in the nature of quo warranto, against the Hayes electors, alleging that the respondents were not entitled to those offices, and praying judgment of ouster against them as wrongfully in possession of the same. Service was made and the respondents appeared and filed an answer. Proofs were subsequently taken, and the court rendered judgment in favor of the relators.

Contemporaneous action upon the subject was also taken by the legislature. On the 26th of the same month the legislature passed a statute declaring that the four persons called the Tilden electors were, on the 7th of November preceding, duly chosen and appointed electors, and that they were from that time entitled to exercise all the powers and duties of the office of electors, and had, on the 6th of December then next, full power and authority to vote as such electors and to certify and transmit their votes as provided by law.

Explicit recognition of their power and authority is there declared, and the statute proceeds to ratify, confirm, and declare valid all their acts as such electors to all intents and purposes, and to declare that they are thereby appointed electors as of the day of the prior general election.

Section 2 of the same act authorizes and directs the governor to make and certify in due form and under the great seal of the State three lists of the names of those persons as such electors, and to transmit the same, with an authenticated copy of that act, to the President of the Senate of the United States. Three lists of like character were also directed to be certified by the governor, and he was directed forthwith to deliver the same to the said electors.

III. These directions were obeyed by the governor, and on the same day he made and delivered to the said electors the certificates designated in the proceedings before the Commission as certificate No. 3, which, as well as No. 2, was given to the Tilden electors.

Three grounds of objection are stated in the paper filed in opposition to that certificate: (1) That it is not duly certified by any one holding the office of governor at the time the electors were appointed, nor at the time when they exercised their functions, nor until after their duties had been fully discharged. (2) Because the alleged proceedings are ex post facto and do not confer any right to those persons to cast the electoral vote of the State. (3) Because the proceedings, being retroactive, are null and void and of no effect.

Mention should also be made that an objection was also filed in the case applicable to both of the two preceding certificates, in which the objectors deny the validity of those certificates upon the ground that certificate No. 1 is in all respects regular, valid, and sufficient, and that the electors therein named were duly appointed to cast the electoral vote of the State.

Properly analyzed and construed, it is clear, from the several objections filed to the certificates, that the returns of the State canvassers, including that made by the attorney-general, are the only returns called in question, the charge being that the return of the State board, which is the basis of the Hayes certificate, is false, forged, and counterfeit.

Exception is also taken by the other side to certificates Nos. 2 and 3, but it is not alleged that they are false or forged, nor that the returns on which they are based are false or manufactured, nor that the election to which they refer was not lawfully held and properly conducted.

Intelligent inquirers will see at a glance that all of the certificates refer to the same election, to wit, to the election held on the 7th of November, and that no one of the objections calls in question either the validity or the regularity or fairness of that election. Neither side proposes to institute any scrutiny into the votes cast or to require any investigation as to the qualification of the voters who cast the votes, nor do they attack the conduct of the officers who presided in the precincts, nor the returns which the precinct officers made to the county canvassers. Everything of that sort may be dismissed from consideration as not within the jurisdiction of the Commission, because not submitted to its judgment and decision, and the remarks apply with equal force to the returns made by the county canvassers, for the reason that none of the objections attack either the truthfulness or fairness of those returns, nor do they propose any inquiry into the conduct of the officers who made those returns.

Strenuous opposition is made to certificate No. 1, and those who object to it insist that the return of the State canvassers on which it is founded is false, and the offers of proof point out more particularly the specific grounds of the charge. Decided opposition is also made to the other two certificates, chiefly that the officers who made the instruments were unauthorized to give any such certification, and that the certificates are of no legal validity.

Viewed in the light of these suggestions, it is clear that the argument of inconvenience is a mere hollow pretense, and that it is entitled to no weight.

Precinct returns were duly made to the county canvassers and the county canvassers made due returns to the secretary of state, where they still remain on file, as appears by the certified copies of the same among the papers submitted to the Commission by the two Houses. What the objectors to certificate No. 1 charge, when expounded in the light of the offers of proof, is that the State canvassers unlawfully rejected the entire return from the county of Manatee and parts of the respective returns from the counties of Hamilton, Jackson, and Monroe; that the State board by those unlawful acts changed the result of the election, and created the unlawful basis on which certificate No. 1 is founded.

Both the certificate of Governor Stearns and the certificate of the attorney-general are founded upon the same county returns, except the returns from the county of Manatee, and parts of the respective returns from the counties of Hamilton, Jackson, and Monroe, which were excluded from the basis on which Governor Stearns issued his certificate. He adopted the basis formed by the State canvassers, excluding the whole of the return from one county and parts of the returns from the three other counties.

All the county returns, as before remarked, are on file in the office of the secretary of state, and the attorney-general, who was one of the State canvassing-board, denying the right of the board to reject a county return without good cause shown, or to mutilate or tamper with such returns under any circumstances, dissented from the acts of the other two members of the board. Apparently, his conduct was open and frank, and he, on the same day, canvassed the entire county returns, and finding that the returns when honestly counted elected the Tilden electors, he executed certificate No. 2, and it appears that the four persons therein named met on the same day in the same building with the persons named in certificate No. 1, and cast their votes for President and Vice-President.

None of these facts can be successfully controverted, as all the returns are on file in the office of the secretary of state, and duly certified copies of the same, together with the original certificates, are now before the Commission, having been submitted by the order of the two Houses in the regular course of their action.

Few, I presume, will deny that it is competent for the Commission to take notice of the statutes of the State relating to the matter in controversy without any formal proof of their legal authenticity. Suppose that is so, then there are no matters involved in the issues presented which may not be thoroughly examined in a very few hours. Differences of opinion may exist as to the legal effect of the evidence if admitted, but I have yet to learn that any one denies that the alleged facts are capable of being proved by authentic documents in the archives of the State. Certified copies of the record and judgment of the court in the quo warranto proceedings are also here, ready to be introduced, and no one, I suppose, will deny that a duly exemplified copy of a record and judgment between the same parties would be admissible in this case, unless it be held that the action of the State canvassers or the certificate of the governor closes the door to all investigations and is sufficient to show that this Commission is so high that it has no power to investigate either fraud, perjury, or forgery.

Extended argument to show that the certificate of the governor is not conclusive seems to be unnecessary, as the opening counsel supporting certificate No. 1 disclaims that proposition, and very properly admits that it is only prima facie evidence of what it certifies to be true. Such a certificate made by an officer charged with the duty of making it imports verity, and it is doubtless true that it affords a prima facie right in the holder in the absence of any showing whatever to the contrary.

Grant that, but I suppose it was never heard that evidence of a mere prima facie right could have the effect to exclude all opposing testimony to show that the right did not exist, or that it had no other foundation than fraud and forgery. Fraud, it is said, will vitiate everything, and it is a maxim which has fewer exceptions than any other known to the common law.

Evidence of error is sufficient to overcome a prima facie presumption, but it was never heard that such a presumption is sufficient to shut out all proof of fraud. With all respect to those who advocate that proposition, I must be allowed to say that such a decision was never made, and it is presumed never will be, by any just and intelligent tribunal. Considerable time was spent in argument by counsel who support the Hayes certificate to convince the Commission that they do not maintain any such proposition, and I am convinced that if they do, it cannot properly be adopted by the Commission.

Concede that, and it follows that evidence in a proper case may be admitted to prove fraud or forgery in the certificate given in such a case by the governor of the State. Credentials of the kind are founded upon a prescribed basis, regulated by law, which is usually dependent for its accuracy not upon the doings of the governor, but upon the acts of other public agents. Whether that basis is truth or error, he does not know, and consequently the legal effect of his certificate is, whatever may be its form, that it appears to him, in view of that prescribed basis, that the party interested is duly elected to the particular office in question, which is sufficient to show that it would be monstrous to hold that such a certificate is a muniment of title which cannot be contradicted.

Even suppose that is so, still it is insisted by the same counsel that the action of the State canvassers, pursuant to the fourth section of the State act of the 27th of February, 1872, is conclusive, and that this Commission, in view of the action of that board and of the provision of the State law, is not authorized to admit evidence of any kind to show that their return is not true or that it is fraudulent, nor even that it is a forgery. Startling as the proposition is, it will require careful examination in view of that statute.

Certain persons are designated in the introductory part of the fourth section of the statute to meet at a prescribed time, at the office of the secretary of state, to form a board of State canvassers, and that board is required to canvass the returns of the election—meaning the county returns filed in the office of the secretary of state—and to determine and declare who shall have been elected * * * as shown by such returns.

Obviously, they are required to canvass the county returns filed in the office of the secretary of state and to determine who are elected, as shown by such returns. If the provision stopped there, it would be clear that the sole duty of that board would be to canvass and declare the result shown by those returns; but it does not stop there, and consequently it becomes necessary to examine the residue of the section.

They are required to examine those returns and no others, and the further provision is that if any such return shall be shown, or shall appear to be "so irregular, false, or fraudulent" that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration. Unless the return shall be shown or shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board is unable to determine the true vote, they have no authority to reject such a return, and they have no jurisdiction to mutilate or alter it under any circumstances. Where the return is so irregular, false, or fraudulent that they cannot determine the result without rejecting such a return, they shall not include it in their return, but they must certify that fact. It is difficult to see why they are required to certify the fact unless their action is subject to review. Confirmation of that view is also derived from the fact that the secretary of state is required to preserve and file in his office all such returns, with such other documents and papers as he may receive.

Proof that any such irregular, false, or fraudulent return from a county was filed in the office of the secretary of state is entirely wanting, and nothing of the kind is suggested in the objections filed by either party; nor would it afford any argument to exclude investigation if it were otherwise, as the case shows that all the evidence is preserved in the office of the secretary of state, and certified copies of the same are among the papers transmitted to the Commission.

Beyond question, the provision assumes that a county return may be so irregular, false, and fraudulent that the board will be unable to determine the true result unless such defective return be rejected; and, if so, they shall so certify and shall not include such return, but the return is to be filed and preserved in the office of the secretary of state.

None of the objections set up any such state of things, nor does any one pretend, I think, that any of the returns filed in the office of the secretary of state come within the category of that provision. Should it be said that the presumption is that the board performed its duty, the answer to that is that such a presumption is merely a prima facie one, which may be overcome by competent proof, and that a brief examination of the documents will be sufficient to enable the Commission to determine whether the board, in order to change the result of the election, were or were not guilty of fraud, perjury, or forgery. Opportunity to introduce evidence is asked, and the proper response to the request, in my judgment, is, let the evidence determine the issue between the parties.

Candid men everywhere will agree, I think, that the board were directed to include regular returns, and that they had no right to exclude any one unless it was so irregular, false, or fraudulent that if included they would be unable to ascertain and determine the true vote or result. Those supporting the objections to certificate No. 1 allege and propose to prove that the board threw out returns which were neither irregular, false, nor fraudulent, in order to change the result of the election, and in my opinion they are entitled to that privilege if the evidence offered is competent and tends to prove the charge.

Imputations of the kind are explicitly made, and the main question, under the order adopted by the Commission, is whether evidence is admissible to prove the accusation. No one here, I suppose, will deny that in general such evidence in an issue between party and party is admissible, but the argument is that in the case under consideration neither Congress nor the Commission has jurisdiction to try such an issue.

Electoral votes are to be transmitted to the President of the Senate, and the provision of the Constitution is that the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and the House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and that "the votes shall then be counted."

Wide differences of opinion prevailed, pending the passage of the act creating the Commission, as to the meaning of that clause; one side maintaining that the votes should be counted by the President of the Senate, and the other that it was both the right and the duty of the two Houses to inquire and determine whether the votes returned and opened in the presence of the two Houses are the true votes given by "the duly appointed electors" of the State. Discussion, rarely ever surpassed, followed. Suffice it to say, the bill became a law almost by general consent. Parties and counsel seem indisposed to open that discussion, nor is it my purpose to enter that field, except to say that in my judgment the verdict of posterity will be that it is the duty of Congress to count the votes and to solve every question involved in the performance of that duty.

Under the act creating the Commission, the provision is that where more than one return from a State has been received by the President of the Senate, the same shall be opened by him in the presence of the two Houses, and shall be submitted to the Commission to determine which is the true and lawful electoral vote of the State. Written objection may be made to such certificates, and when made, if there be more than one, the requirement is that all such certificates, votes, and papers, and all papers accompanying the same, together with the objections, shall be forthwith submitted to the Commission, which shall proceed to consider the same, with the same powers, if any, now possessed for that purpose by the two Houses acting separately or together.

Important duties are required of the Commission, as follows: (1)

they are required to consider all such certificates, votes, and papers objected to, and all papers accompanying the same; (2) they are required to decide by a majority of votes whether any and what votes from such State are the votes provided for by the Constitution of the United States, and how many and what persons were duly appointed electors by such State.

Express requirement is made that the Commission shall perform those duties, and the act further provides that they "may therein take into view such petitions, depositions, and other papers, if any, as shall by the Constitution and now existing law be competent and pertinent in such consideration."

Duties such as those required cannot be properly performed without evidence nor without hearing the parties interested. By the express words of the act the Commission may take into view such petitions and depositions, if admissible by the Constitution and the existing laws, provided they are pertinent to the matter under consideration, which shows to a demonstration that Congress never intended that the Commission should determine the questions submitted without evidence, any more than without giving the parties an opportunity to be heard.

Conclusive support to that view is also derived from the form of the oath the Commissioners are required to take and subscribe before entering upon the duties prescribed by the act. Every member of the Commission solemnly engaged by that oath that he would impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to the Commission and a true judgment give thereon, agreeably to the Constitution and the laws.

Two of the questions submitted are as follows: (1) What votes from the State are the true votes? (2) What persons were duly appointed electors in such State? You are all sworn to impartially examine and consider those questions and a true judgment give thereon, agreeably to the Constitution and the laws. How can you comply with that requirement unless you admit in evidence the documentary evidence from the office of the secretary of state and an exemplified copy of the record and judgment in the suit between these contestants?

Jurisdiction is the power to hear and determine, and it is to me past comprehension how any person accustomed to legal investigation can read the act of Congress creating the Commission and still entertain a doubt that the Congress intended that the Commission should examine and consider those two questions and give a true judgment thereon agreeably to the Constitution and the laws. Common experience is sufficient to convince every person of ordinary intelligence that a true judgment cannot be given without evidence nor without a hearing. Tribunals of justice are not expected to shut their eyes to evidence and decide blindly without hearing the parties.

Unless parties are allowed to give evidence they are not benefited by being heard upon the merits of the controversy. By the terms of the order under which they have been heard the merits are excluded, and if the Tilden electors are not permitted to give evidence the merits must be decided in favor of the other party without any hearing. Worse than that; the case was practically decided before it was submitted to the Commission, and it must be sent back without any one of the questions presented in the objections having been examined or considered by the Commission.

Congress never would have passed the law if those who favored its passage had supposed that the only duty the Commission had to perform was to certify to the two Houses the enumeration made by the State board of canvassers. Nor would the President of the United States have considered it his duty to send a special message to Congress commending the measure if he had supposed that the jurisdiction of the Commission was limited to a mere clerical enumeration of the votes certified and transmitted to the President of the Senate.

Two branches of the Government were stopped to enable the members of the Commission to sit and hear these cases, and now it is gravely contended by members of the tribunal that the Commission can neither hear evidence nor decide the questions presented in the written objections submitted to the Commission by the two Houses, beyond the mere enumeration of the votes. Duties of the kind are usually performed by a county judge upon the desk before him, without referring the cause to a master. Others may argue such a question if they see fit, but I cannot, as it seems to me that the proposition calls in question the wisdom of Congress and involves a theory which is past belief.

Both Houses of Congress knew full well that there were in the contested cases charges of fraud, perjury, and forgery, and it is clear to a demonstration, in my judgment, that those charges in respect to the returns made by the State board should be examined, considered, and decided by this tribunal, so far as the charges are involved in the objections filed to the certificates submitted to the Commission by the two Houses of Congress.

When the Commission was organized the whole country expected that those charges would be heard and that a true judgment would be given thereon, and sound discretion and a due regard to the words of the act of Congress forbid the conclusion that the action of the State board in rejecting the county returns from the county of Manatee and parts of the returns from the three other counties named is a matter the Commission cannot examine, consider, and decide, the charges, as alleged, involving fraud, perjury, and forgery. Such a decision, in my judgment, is forbidden by every consideration of law and justice, and if made, I fear that it will shock the public sense, and when the knowledge of it reaches other lands I shall be greatly disappointed if it does not shock the wise and just throughout the civilized world.

Without the right to introduce evidence, a trial in any case is a mockery, and in this case the refusal to hear evidence is the height of injustice, as it amounts to an ex parte decision in favor of the persons claiming title under certificate No. 1, without having examined or considered any one of the objections filed to that supposed muniment of title.

Explanations to sustain that proposition are unnecessary, as it is obvious that they claim title under the certificate of Governor Stearns founded upon the return of the board of State canvassers. Unlike that, the Tilden electors allege that the return which constitutes the basis of that certificate is false and fraudulent and that the canvassers tortiously and unlawfully excluded from the count the votes of one county and part of the votes from three other counties, for the express purpose of changing the result and of defeating the well-known choice of the people at the general election.

Formal charges of the kind are made in the objections, and are also contained in the offers of proof, and the counsel opposing the certificate in question allege that authentic documents are at hand to prove those charges, and to show that the certificate signed by the attorney-general, which is also based upon the county returns filed in the office of the secretary of state, expresses the true result of the election, the sole difference being that the attorney-general in his computation included the return from the county of Manatee and the votes from the other three counties which were excluded by the board of State canvassers, and assertions of the kind may be investigated without difficulty and in a brief period.

Contest arose at the same time between the rival candidates for governor, in consequence of which a suit was commenced in the supreme court of the State on the relation of George F. Drew, one of the candidates, against Samuel B. McLin and others, which was decided on the 25th day of December, 1876, the court holding to the effect that the State canvassers had no authority to reject a county return or the votes given, except when the canvassers were unable to ascertain for whom they were cast, for the reason specified in the fourth section of the act prescribing their duties.

Acquiescence in that decision was universal, and the legislature, on the 17th of January following, passed a law creating a new board of State canvassers, and directed that a new canvass should be made of the county returns of the election held on the 7th of November in the preceding year. Agreeably to that law the board was organized, and they recanvassed the same returns and came to the same result as that previously reached by the attorney-general of the State.

By the third section of the act they were required to make and sign a certificate containing the whole number of votes given at the election and to declare the result, and the further requirement is that the certificate shall be recorded in the office of the secretary of state. Requirements of the kind were all fulfilled and the certificate was duly made and signed, which is the basis of certificate No. 3, executed by the present governor of the State.

Viewed in any light, it must be admitted that it is "confirmation strong as proofs of Holy Writ" that certificate No. 2, signed by the attorney-general, is true, and that it gave the true and honest result of the election. Investigations made by the legislature induced that body to come to the same conclusion, and on the 26th of January following the legislature passed a statute, in which it is enacted that the Tilden electors, on the 7th of November previous, were duly chosen and appointed electors by and on behalf of the State and in the manner directed by the legislature. "Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct," the number of electors to which the State is entitled, subject to the exception therein contained.

None of these proceedings were intended to choose new electors, but merely to ascertain who were elected at the antecedent general election, and they show beyond peradventure that the return of the first board of State canvassers was false and fraudulent, and that the result could only have been reached by perjury and forgery.

Power is certainly vested in a State to appoint electors in such manner as her legislature shall direct, and all agree that the statute of the State required that the electors should be chosen by the qualified voters of the State; nor is it controverted by any one that the election held on the 7th of November, 1876, was duly notified and regularly conducted, nor that the returns of the local officers were regularly and in due form of law made to the county canvassers.

Prescribed duties are to be performed by the county canvassers, and they are required to transmit their returns to the secretary of state, and it is certain that the objections filed to the respective certificates do not impugn the county returns, nor is there any evidence before the Commission to justify any one in calling those returns in question as irregular, false, or fraudulent. Imputations of the kind are explicitly made against the returns of the board of State canvassers, as before fully explained.

Electors are to be appointed by the State, and the State very properly claimed the right to inquire and ascertain who had been chosen at the election held for that purpose. Charges of fraud, perjury, and forgery hanging over the old board, the legislature, by a public law approved by the governor, made provision for a new board, and directed the new board to canvass the same county returns on file in the office of the secretary of state, and to report the result of their doings. They performed that duty, and the legislature by a public act ratified their doings, and enacted that the Tilden electors were duly chosen on the 7th of November previous, and that they are the electors duly appointed by the State.

Opposed to this there is nothing to support the pretensions of the Hayes electors except the certificate of Governor Stearns, founded upon the return of the old board of State canvassers.

These proceedings constitute the basis of certificate No. 3, and they show that the proceedings and the certificate were intended to confirm as true what is certified in the certificate of the attorney-general, and it is clear, in my judgment, that they are properly admissible and amply sufficient for that purpose.

Matters of the sort may be readily investigated in a very brief space of time, as every impartial person must see from the very nature of the transactions.

States may appoint electors in such manner as their legislatures may direct, and the judiciary of the State may interpret such laws, and the decision of the State court in such a case must be regarded as the rule of decision, as appears by the express enactment of Congress (1 Stat. at Large, 92; McKeen vs. Delancy, 5 Cranch, 22.) Circuit courts in that State have power to issue writs of quo warranto and all other writs proper and necessary to the complete exercise of their jurisdiction. (State Const., art. 6, sec. 8.)

Proof of the most satisfactory character is exhibited in the papers transmitted to the Commission, that the old board of State canvassers did not complete their canvass until the 6th of December, 1876, and that the certificate given to the supposed Hayes electors bears date on that day. It appears, also, that the certificate given to the Tilden electors and signed by the attorney-general bears the same date as exhibited in the documents printed by order of the Commission. Both sets of electors met at the capital of the State on that day, as required by law, for the purpose of executing the functions of electors, but the Hayes electors, before they voted, were served with process in quo warranto sued out from the circuit court of the second judicial circuit of the State by the Tilden electors. They sued in their own behalf as well as in behalf of the people of the State, as they had a right to do under the law of the State, inasmuch as the attorney-general refused to institute the proper proceeding.

Service being made, the respondents appeared and filed an answer. Subsequently proofs were taken on both sides, and the parties having been fully heard, the court, on the 25th of January following, entered a decree in favor of the relators.

By that decree the court adjudged: (1) That the Hayes electors were not, nor was any one of them, elected, chosen, or appointed electors. (2) That they were not, on the said 6th of December, or any other time, entitled to assume or exercise any of the powers and functions of such electors. (3) That they were upon the said day and date mere usurpers, and that all and singular their acts and doings as such were and are illegal and void. (4) That the Tilden electors all and singular were at said election duly elected, chosen, and appointed electors of the State, and were, on the said 6th of December, entitled to be declared elected, chosen, and appointed as such electors, and to have and receive certificates to that effect, and at all times since to exercise and perform all and singular the powers and duties of such electors.

Prior to the rendering of the decree in this case, the new board of State canvassers had made their report, and on the following day the legislature passed the act to delare and establish the appointment of electors, by which it is enacted that the Tilden electors were, on the 7th of November previous, duly chosen and appointed as such, with all the powers incident to such offices.

Repeated admissions have been made during the discussion that a State may determine what persons the qualified voters have chosen and appointed electors of President and Vice-President, but the proposition is advanced that the determination must be made before the electors meet and cast their votes, and that it cannot be made at any subsequent time. Antecedent investigation could not be made in this case before the electors voted, for the reason that the old board of State canvassers did not make their return until the day when the votes were cast, nor were the Hayes electors furnished with the certificate of the governor until that day. All that could be done by the way of investigation before that time was done, as appears by the certificate of the attorney-general, which was also given to the Tilden electors on the same 6th of December. Without a moment's delay the Tilden electors sued out a writ of quo warranto against the usurpers, and by extreme diligence caused it to be served on them one hour before they cast their votes.

Weighed in the light of these suggestions, the proposition that subsequent investigation cannot be made is monstrous, as it shows a mockery of justice. You may investigate before the votes are cast when it is impossible for want of time, but you shall not after that, as you would then have an opportunity to ascertain the truth!

Canvassers may, if they see fit, keep back their report until the day appointed for the electors to meet, and if they do so, the effect of the proposition is that there can be no investigation, no matter how enormous the fraud has been. Forgery and fraud ought not to go unexposed; but if the proposition submitted is correct, it necessarily follows that the State is powerless to protect itself from the consequences of such crimes.

Whatever could be done by every branch of the State government to establish the truth was done, and if it now be decided that their efforts are fruitless, the effect must be to offer impunity in the future to all scheming officers who may tamper with subordinate returns in order to change the result of an election.

Opposing candidates for governor of the State were in the field at the same election, and it appears that the board of State canvassers threw out sufficient of the county returns to elect the incumbent who gave the certificate to the Hayes electors. His opponent, the present governor, (Drew,) brought mandamus against the members of the canvassing-board, praying that they might be decreed to correct their return. Process was served, and the respondents appeared and filed an answer. Both sides took proofs, and the parties went to trial.

Authority to issue mandamus is vested in all the courts of the State. The proceedings in this case was in the supreme court, and that court decreed that all that the State board of canvassers can do in such a case under the statute creating it must be based upon the returns; that everything they are authorized to do is limited to what is sanctioned by the authentic and true returns before them; that their final act and determination must be such as appears from and is shown by the returns from the several counties to be correct; that they have no general power to issue subpoenas, to summon parties, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to grant a trial by jury, or to do any act but determine and declare who has been elected as shown by the returns. (State ex rel. George F. Drew vs. Samuel B. McLin et al., 15 Florida R.)

Special reference is made in that case to the return from the county of Manatee and to those from the three counties of Hamilton, Jackson, and Monroe. By that opinion, it appears that the answer set up that there was such irregularity and fraud in the conduct of the election that the board could not ascertain the true vote. Responsive to that defense, the court say that—

The facts stated in the answer present a judicial question beyond the power and jurisdiction of the board; that a return of votes cast in a county at such a general election, duly signed by the proper officers, and regular in form, * * * is a return which the State officers must count, as it is neither irregular, false, nor fraudulent within the meaning of the statute.

Comment is also made in the same opinion upon the action of the State board in respect to the other three counties, and the decision is to the effect that if the return is genuine and in due form, the question whether the irregularities shown to have existed at the election are sufficient to reject the same is a question of law, not within the power of the board to determine; that what is fraud in such an inspector is a question of law, so also is the question whether such a fraud by inspectors can vitiate an election. Both are judicial questions, beyond the power of the board to determine.

Unless it be denied that the construction of a State statute given to it by the supreme court of the State furnishes the rule of decision, it would seem to follow that the board of State canvassers exceeded their jurisdiction; and, if so, all must concede that their acts are null and void.

Five years before that, the supreme court of the State decided that the object of the statute in question is to ascertain the whole number of votes cast and who had received the highest number of votes, so that the choice of the majority of the voters might be ascertained and respected; that if the facts stated by the relator were correct, that returns made had not been included in the canvass, then the board of State canvassers had not performed their duty; that their duties are ministerial beyond that of determining that the papers received by them as returns are genuine authentic returns of the election; that they are required by law to meet on a given day for the purpose, and may adjourn from day to day until their duties are accomplished, and in case legal returns are received by them at any time before they complete the canvass which would have been counted if received before the canvass was commenced, it is their duty to include such in the canvass and certificate, and if they refuse they may be compelled by the writ of mandamus to complete the canvass of all the returns received, and to certify the result according to law. (State ex rel. Bloxham vs. The Board of State Canvassers, 13 Florida, 73.)

Proper opportunity to investigate such charges ought to be permitted at some time, and if it is not possible to accomplish that object before the day appointed for the meeting of the electors, justice and necessity demand that it shall be allowed subsequent to that time, for it would be too great a triumph for injustice to hold that it must be postponed forever because the outrage was committed so near to the time designated for the performance of the duty that it was impossible to institute and close the scrutiny before the accessories in guilt have actually enjoyed the stolen privilege which belonged to the complaining party. (Queen vs. Vestrymen of Pancras, 11 Ad. & Ell., 25.)

Three points were decided by the exchequer chamber in Rochester vs. The Queen, (1 Ell., Bl. & Ell., 1031,) which support the proposition that it was not too late to make the investigation: (1) That the court ought to compel the performance of a public duty by a public officer although the time prescribed by statute for the performance of the same has passed. (2) That if the public officer to whom belongs the performance of such a duty has in the mean time quitted his office and has been succeeded by another, it is the duty of the successor to obey the commands of the court. (3) That all statutes are to be construed with reference to the known, acknowledged, recognized, and established power of the proper court to superintend and control inferior jurisdictions and authorities of every kind.

Due service of process in the quo warranto suit was made at the earliest possible moment, and it is not even suggested that any greater diligence could have been employed in bringing the litigation to a close. Prompt investigation was made by the new board of State canvassers, and the legislature enacted the statute declaring that the Tilden electors were duly chosen and appointed the next day after the decree was entered in the quo warranto suit. Neither the public nor the citizens have any power to defeat the machinations of fraud, perjury, and forgery if the measures adopted for that purpose in this case are held to be ineffectual and insufficient.

For these reasons I am of the opinion that the evidence offered should be admitted and that the other side should be permitted to give evidence in reply.

Debate being closed, the Commission adopted the following order, moved by Mr. Justice Miller:

Ordered, That no evidence will be received or considered by the Commission which was not submitted to the joint convention of the two Houses by the President of the Senate with the different certificates, except such as relates to the eligibility of F. C. Humphreys, one of the electors.

Adopted—yeas 8, nays 7.

Commissioner Abbott moved the following:

Ordered, That in the case of Florida the Commission will receive evidence relating to the eligibility of Frederick C. Humphreys, one of the persons named in certificate No. 1, as elector.

Adopted—yeas 8, nays 7.

Notice was given to counsel of the result, and that the Commission was ready to proceed with the case. Witnesses were examined on both sides in respect to the eligibility of Frederick C. Humphreys as an elector, and their testimony is fully reported in the record of the proceedings. The testimony being closed, counsel were heard upon the merits under the third rule prescribed by the Commission, and at the conclusion of the argument the spectators retired and the Commission went into consultation with closed doors. Discussion ensued, in which several of the members of the Commission participated. During the discussion as to the eligibility of Frederick C. Humphreys, Mr. Justice CLIFFORD stated his conclusions on the matter, as follows:

1. That no person is eligible as an elector, or can be lawfully appointed as such, who holds an office of trust or profit under the United States at the time of the election or appointment.

2. That the office of shipping-commissioner is an office of trust and profit under the United States.

3. That Frederick C. Humphreys was legally appointed to that office.

4. That the evidence introduced fails to show a complete legal resignation of the office by the incumbent before the 7th of November, 1876.

5. That if he had performed official acts after the date of the correspondence between him and the judge of the circuit court, his acts would have been legal.

6. That if the incumbent had subsequently decided, with the consent of the judge, to retain the office, he might have done so without a new appointment, because his letter to the judge had never been filed.

7. That inasmuch as the evidence shows that both the judge and the incumbent regarded the resignation as complete, and it appears that the incumbent never did perform any subsequent official act, I am of the opinion that, in an equitable view, the person named ought to be regarded as having been eligible as an elector on the day when the election was held.

Other members of the Commission discussed the whole case in view of the papers submitted to the Commission by the President of the Senate, but Mr. Justice CLIFFORD, believing that discussion would be unavailing and useless, took no further part in the debate.

Commissioner Hunton moved an order to the effect that the Tilden electors were duly appointed by the State, and their votes as certified in certificate No. 2 are the votes provided for by the Constitution. Rejected—yeas 7, nays 8.

When that result was announced, Commissioner Garfield moved that the Hayes electors were duly appointed and that the votes cast by them are the votes provided for by the Constitution; also, that Commissioner Edmunds, Mr. Justice Bradley, and Mr. Justice Miller be appointed a committee to draught a report of the action of the Commission, as required by law. Adopted—yeas 8, nays 7.

None of the subsequent proceedings in the case need be reproduced, as they are given in full in the Congressional Record.

Like submissions were made to the Commission in the cases of Louisiana, Oregon, and South Carolina, the proceedings in which cases are also published in the same Record, but Mr. Justice CLIFFORD did not participate in those discussions, having become thoroughly convinced that nothing he could say would be of any public benefit.
