FOREWORD

The Agricultural Conservation Program (ACP) is the principal channel through which the Federal Government shares with farmers and ranchers the cost of carrying out approved soil, water, woodland, and wildlife conservation practices on their land. It is authorized by the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act of February 29, 1936.

About one million farmers and ranchers install conservation measures each year with ACP help, and well over two million participate over a 5-year period. The farmer pays a portion of the cost (an average of about one half) of the conservation practices approved for his farm, and the ACP pays the balance.

The program is administered by the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service of the U. S. Department of Agriculture. Funds authorized annually by the Congress are allocated to States by the Secretary of Agriculture on the basis of the conservation needs. ASC county committees approve these cost-sharing funds for farmers and ranchers who request such assistance to carry out authorized conservation practices. In making such approvals, the committees take into account the relative urgency of the conservation measures to be undertaken and the need for cost-sharing assistance to solve the conservation problem.
