This is a suit in equity to restrain the defendants from the infringement of the plaintiffs' copyright by representing a play called "The New Magdalen." The title of the play copyrighted by the plaintiff was in these words: "The New Magdalen, a drama in a prologue and three acts, adapted from Wilkie Collins' celebrated novel of the above title, by Walter Benn, author of sundry dramatic works, and with directions, casts of characters, &c." It appeared in defence that Wilkie Collins, a celebrated English author, had made and published a novel with the title of "The New Magdalen," and it was alleged that at the time of the deposit of title by the plaintiff, Mr. Benn, he had composed a drama under the same title, partly adapted from the novel so far as it was published, and partly anticipating the novel when the novel should be published. It was proved that before the deposit by Mr. Benn of the title, Mr. Collins had gone far in the completion of this drama.

There was a hearing on Thursday afternoon on a motion for a temporary injunction, when the decision was reserved. The judge has now denied the motion. He said that the plaintiff by his copyright secures only the dramatic composition of which he is the author. He could not prevent others from composing or publishing a similar book on the same subject, provided that they did not pirate from his book, but relied on their own intellectual and mental powers. It was clear that Mr. Benn could not be the originator of the title of the drama complained of. It was not original with him as a product of his own mind, nor as the title of a drama, Mr. Collins having applied it to an original drama before the plaintiff deposited it for copyright. The judge referred to the case of Osgood v. Allen, recently decided in the district of Maine (3 Official Gazette of Patent Office, 124). He, however, said that cases might occur in which a title would be protected independant of the contents of the book. But they would not occur under the copyright laws, but under the common law provisions, which protect the stamp put on goods offered for sale, the protection being analogous to that granted in case of trademarks. But no such state of facts existed in this case as that the court would prohibit the use of the title on this ground.

Opinion by SHIPLEY, J., May 17th, 1873.

In this case a bill in equity was brought to enforce rights claimed by the plaintiff, Mr. Benn, under a copyright. On the 28th of February, 1873, he deposited with the Librarian of Congress the title of a drama substantially in these words: "The New Magdalen, a drama in a prologue and three acts, adapted from Wilkie Collins' celebrated novel of the above title, by Walter Benn, author of sundry dramatic works, and with directions, casts of characters, &c." This is the title. It is not "The New Magdalen" alone, but it is the whole title as filed and recorded. By this deposit, undoubtedly Mr. Benn would have secured the dramatic composition bearing the title he had deposited so far as it was original with him, provided he subsequently complied with the other provisions of the statute requisite to be performed to perfect the copyright. But in securing this product of his mind, the dramatic composition of which he is the author, he secures that only. And the rule applied in this court in numerous cases applies here also. He secures only that which was his own. He cannot prevent others from composing or publishing a similar book on the same subject, provided that they do not pirate from his copyrighted book, but rely on their own intellect and mental power.

The rule is familiar, and the present case forms no exception to it. The complaint sets forth that defendant not only acts and represents a drama with the same title, but that it contains the same cast of characters, and that this cast is secured to him by the copyright. There is no evidence of this, for there is no evidence of the cast of characters of the complainant's play, and no evidence that complainant's play has ever been performed at any place where defendant could have seen and copied it.

It appears in defence that Wilkie Collins, a celebrated English author, has made and published a novel under the title of "The New Magdalen." And at the time of the deposit of title by Mr. Benn it is claimed that he had composed a drama under the same title, partly adapted from the novel so far as it was published, and partly anticipating the story of the novel, where the novel was not published. It was proved that before the deposit by Mr. Benn of the title, Mr. Collins had gone very far in the completion of this drama. It is clear, then, that Mr. Benn cannot be the originator of the title of the drama complained of. It was not original with him as a product of his own mind, nor was it original as the title of a drama, for it was applied to an original drama by Mr. Collins before Mr. Benn deposited it for copyright. The case, then, presents this simple question: Can a person who deposits in the copyright office the title of a drama not original with himself, secure to himself such title to the exclusion of others, who have applied such title to a dramatic composition, founded on the same story, before the date of such deposit? The statement of the proposition is its refutation. In Osgood v. Allen, 3 Official Gazette, Patent Office, p. 124 (the case on the proprietorship and use of the words "Young Folks," as a title or part of a title to a magazine or newspaper), this court held as follows, and it sees no reason to change or reverse the doctrine there affirmed. It must not be understood that the court will not protect a title in any case. Cases may occur in which a title would be protected independently of the contents of the book. But they would not occur under the copyright laws. They would occur under the common law provisions, which protect the stamp put on goods offered for sale, and the protection would be analogous to that granted in case of trade marks. In that case it must be shown that the defendant has pirated an original title, the product of the copyrighter's, not a title taken from a composition of the same class or character to which another author had already appropriated it. Now Mr. Collins cannot be charged with piracy of the title in this case, for he had used it as a title for a novel, and a drama before Mr. Benn conceived the idea of depositing it for copyright. No such state of facts as that under which the court would prohibit the use of the title exists here. The dramatic composition of plaintiff has not been represented. It follows from this that the injunction must be denied.

PLUMBER v. CURRIER et al.

Independent admissions may be shown in evidence, though made in the course of negotiations for a reference or compromise of a dispute;—thus: on the trial of a dispute as to whether certain premises were held by the plaintiff or the defendant under an agreement to pay rent, or otherwise, an offer by the defendant to refer the question of how much the plaintiff should pay as rent was properly received.

Whether unthreshed wheat and oats are provisions, within the meaning of the statute exempting property from attachment, is a question of fact for the jury (Ladd, J., dissenting).

Where a good verdict can be concluded by the court from facts specially found by the jury, it will be done, and judgment entered accordingly.

BASCOM v. MANNING et al.

In an action of assumpsit brought to recover damages for a breach of warranty in the sale of a lot of cotton, it appeared that the plaintiff had pleaded the facts upon which his right of action depended in defence, pro tanto, of a suit brought against him for the price of the cotton, by the present defendants in Massachusetts; that he afterwards suffered judgment to go against him by default in that suit, offering no evidence in support of his plea. Held, that he was not estopped by the record and proceedings in Massachusetts from maintaining the present action.

DAVIS v. GILLETT.

As a general rule, a sum of money in gross, stipulated to be paid for the non-performance of an agreement, is considered as a penalty or security for the payment of such damages as the party in whose favor the stipulation is made may have sustained from the breach of contract by the opposite party. It will be incumbent on the party who claims to recover the sum as liquidated damages, to show that they were so considered and intended by the contracting parties.

A., by his bond, acknowledged himself to be "holden and firmly bound" to B. "in the sum of one thousand dollars." The condition of the bond was that A. should not engage in a specified business within a certain time and place.

In the absence of any evidence concerning the intention of the parties, it was held that the sum of one thousand dollars was to be regarded as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages.

WOODWARD et al. v. SHERMAN et al.

A., B., and C. entrusted with D., a dealer in horses, one horse each, belonging to them individually, to be sold. D. sold the three horses together to the defendants, on credit, for $650,—no separate price being made for either of them in the trade. The three individual owners afterwards joined in an action of assumpsit against the purchaser to recover the price. Held, that the action could not be maintained.

LEGAL GAZETTE.

Friday, October 10, 1873.

JOHN H. CAMPBELL,
EDITOR.

L. HORACE PAULY, ESQ.

A large meeting of the members of the bar was held in the Supreme Court, Wednesday, October 8th, 1873, to take action in relation to the death of L. Horace Pauly, a young member of the bar, who died on Sunday evening last.

John B. Gest, Esq., occupied the chair, and John M. Ridings and Wm. Henry Lex, Esqs., were selected as secretaries.

Edwin L. Abbett, Esq., presented the following resolutions:

Whereas, By the hand of Divine Providence we have been bereft of our brother member, Louis Horace Pauly, Esq.

Resolved, That we lament his decease, and sincerely feel that in his death the bar of Philadelphia has sustained the loss of one who, though young, had, by his varied and thorough acquirements in classical and legal learning, united with strict integrity and Christian piety, already won the love and confidence of all who came in contact with him, and who, had he lived, would not only have cast a lustre upon the bar, but served as a worthy example to his brethren.

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to communicate the foregoing resolutions to the bereaved family of our deceased brother.

Appropriate addresses were delivered by F. A. Osborne, Franklin Swayne, Jerome Carty, Alexander R. Cutler, and H. G. Ward, Esqs.

A committee which included the officers of the meeting was appointed to communicate the resolutions to the family.

On motion adjourned.

THE ALDERMANIC SYSTEM IN PHILADELPHIA.

Speeches in the Constitutional Convention of Pennsylvania upon the proposition to abolish the system and introduce minor courts.

Mr. Cuyler. Even if the proposed change involved all that the gentleman from the city (Mr. Hanna) has just said, it would be a wise economy in the city of Philadelphia. Even if it involved the necessity of providing court rooms and all the machinery of courts, in the dollar and cents point of view it would be a large saving to the city; by which I mean simply to say that no effort upon the part of the authorities of this city has ever been able to compel an honest return from the magistracy of this city to the treasury of the city. I mean to say that the money that is withheld from the treasury of the city by the petty magistracy of the city would more than cover all the expenses to which the gentleman alludes, even if he were correct in supposing that it was necessary to incur such expenses; but it is not necessary to incur them. There is no more need that the city should provide court rooms for the magistrates contemplated by this section than there was that it should have provided them in times past for the aldermen, or that it might find it necessary in the future to provide them for the aldermen, supposing the old system to be continued.

But, Mr. President, the honest truth is, that the very name of aldermen has come to be in Philadelphia almost a disgrace. There are a few men of character—a very few—among them; men of integrity and well-deserved and well-earned reputation; but that remark is not true of the mass of the aldermen; and since the Legislature has placed upon those aldermen political duties and given them the control of the registry, the frauds that have been practiced in the exercise of that power has made the whole body so odious that they are a stench in the nostrils of the citizens of Philadelphia to-day.

Now, this section provides for no material change from that which has existed before, save that, first, those who are to exercise the office will receive fixed salaries instead of being paid by fees and by a control over the penalties that are paid in for violations of city ordinances or of acts of Assembly; and, second, in that a class of men learned in the law will discharge the duties that have been heretofore discharged by the aldermen. Why should not this be the case? Their duties are judicial. They ascertain and decide questions which involve the legal rights of the parties brought before them. Can it be an objection that they are to be learned in the law? Can there be an argument made that men who are to decide legal questions, and oftentimes to decide them finally, shall be men who are accomplished in the art that they practice? I cannot conceive of any well-founded objection that could be urged under such circumstances.

As it is now, the decision of an alderman upon a question in civil practice that is brought before him amounts to nothing except simply to increase costs. Who ever heard of a case of late years before an alderman in the city of Philadelphia that was not appealed from him to the Court of Common Pleas? Where, then, was the advantage in the action of the alderman? What benefit has been derived either to the suitor or to the public by reason of the existing system? The expense of the hearing before the alderman is incurred, and uniformly the case is appealed, and then comes up saddled with these additional expenses to be paid by the suitors at last. Why is this? Simply because our aldermen are not competent for the duty they discharge. If our aldermen were men of weight, of character and of learning in the law, the people would abide by their decisions; appeals would become rare; they would more often, far than they do now, finally dispose of questions that come before them. It is therefore to get rid of that difficulty; it is to discourage appeals by providing honest and competent men to decide the cases in the court below, thus relieving the humble suitor who seeks the court of the alderman from the oppression which the costs and expenses of that court constantly involve—it is for that, largely, that this section is devised.

That is my reason for thinking it would not be well to strike from it the words "learned in the law." I think they ought to be lawyers; that there is just the same argument in favor of requiring the petty magistracy to be learned in the law that there is in requiring the superior magistracy to be learned in the law, and in some respects even more important, because the suitors in their courts are in a very large degree people of humble means, to whom costs are a serious consideration: and the fact that they can secure an honest and competent judgment upon the questions that they bring before these magistrates, and thus put an end to the controversy raised, will save them from the costs that constantly roll up if the case is appealed, and save them from the delay which that appeal necessarily involves.

I scarcely supposed, sir, that it was necessary in the city of Philadelphia to urge a reason why the existing petty magistracy of our city should be abolished, and I am most of all astonished that a gentleman like my friend who last addressed this convention, who must know, from the necessities of his position as a member of the councils of this city, how necessary this change is, should be found upon this floor advocating the continuance of the old system. Its ills have been so severe that they have demanded the constant attention of the press of our city and of our citizens at large, calling for this very reform which this section proposes. I might refer to the action of the press upon this very section. There is hardly a journal in the city of Philadelphia that has not taken occasion to commend the wisdom of it and to advocate its final adoption by this convention. So far as I am aware there is not a single newspaper in the city of Philadelphia that has urged the continuance of the old system, or advocated any such view as that which my colleague from Philadelphia has just now expressed.

I hope, therefore, that the convention will not recede from the action which was taken in committee of the whole, and that the section just as written will be adopted.

Mr. Hanna. I should like to ask my colleague one question before he closes, whether nearly all the complaints made against the aldermen of the city of Philadelphia do not originate from the fact that under the registry law they have the right to appoint the election officers?

Mr. Cuyler. No, sir; that has been an aggravation of the ills of our people, but offences quite as serious and quite as numerous were perpetrated on the part of that body before the registry law was passed. The outcry has been persistent and continued for years in our city.

Mr. Biddle. Mr. President: There is undoubtedly in this section a great deal that must commend itself to the intelligent action, and, I hope, adoption of this convention. The change by which these officers are salaried, instead of being, as now, the recipients of fees and thereby incited to foment petty litigation, is a most admirable one. So the mode of their selection, by which a choice is given to the people of the city at large to take out from among their midst officers qualified to act in this department, is, in my judgment, a good one. So, perhaps, although I have more doubt in regard to this point, their longer tenure of office. So far I am in entire accord with the section as it now stands, and were there nothing else in it, I should waive any difference of opinion on minor points and vote for it. But there is one part of it which cannot receive my assent. Undoubtedly it is very desirable to have these men learned in the law, as this section somewhat ostentatiously announces; but would they be learned in the law by being selected exclusively from the ranks of the bar? I was reminded when I read these words in the section, of what Lord Brougham once said on the floor of the House of Lords. He was referring to two dukes, one a royal duke and the other the Duke of Wellington, and he characterized them somewhat thus: "One noble duke illustrious by his great actions, and another noble duke illustrious by the courtesy of this House!" I think these magistrates would be learned in the law by the courtesy of this House, or of this section as it stands. It would be either a hospital and house of refuge for broken down men who could find no rest for the soles of their feet elsewhere, or be a school for unfledged lawyers. I prefer infinitely to take from the body of the people to settle petty disputes which have no intricacy, which require nothing for their solution but a sound, clear head, and an honest heart, men who are commonly called business men. I am satisfied that they would be the class from which these aldermen or justices of the peace should be drawn. I would not exclude a man who had been educated in the profession of the law, because that would be unwise. He might undoubtedly be ranked in the category I have endeavored to describe; but to tell the body of the petty suitors of the city, which this section does in effect tell them, that a man must have at least turned over for four or five years the pages of Blackstone, I never can endorse. I do not believe that in that way you would get the class of men who ought to be the arbitrators and mediators between the suitors who would come into these courts. I believe a little knowledge would rather induce the men so selected to take pleasure rather in the quillets and the quillips of the law than in the real merits of the case. I believe substance would be sacrificed to form. I know, and every Philadelphian knows, that we have had in our midst heretofore a class of men who discharged those functions, who were not technically learned in the law, but who yet administered the law as applicable to the disputes in their forms with great advantage to the suitors, and with credit to themselves. The names of many of them were enumerated here when the debate occurred a couple of months ago and it is not worth while to go over them now. Some of them I believe yet remain to-day to do honor to their positions.

I am for allowing just such men as we had thirty or forty years ago to continue to settle these disputes. My colleague from Philadelphia, who spoke last has detailed, undoubtedly with a great deal of truth, the defects of the present system. But they have been defects engendered by other influences than the want of acquaintance with the technical rudiments of the law. They have been engendered by the system of fees. They have been engendered by casting upon the shoulders of these men political duties. They have been engendered to a very great extent, by the operation of the registry law which has turned into a red hot politician every magistrate in this county. They have not, in my opinion, been engendered by the want of the title of attorney at law after the name of these men.

Why, sir, what is the kind of disputes which come before these magistrates? They are generally questions of meum and tuum. Nine of the cases out of every ten that come under the jurisdiction of these magistrates are whether a petty debt is owed or not, whether a debt is owed upon a book account, or whether a debt is owed upon a due bill, or something of that kind; I say it with all respect to my colleague (Mr. Cuyler), who I know is earnest in this matter, and whose earnestness has great weight in my eyes, that it would not be wise to introduce the technical rules of actions to apply to this class of cases. Of course it is said that it is not proposed to do that, but what is the use of having a man before whom to commence an action on a promissory note who knows that the action is to be commenced by a writ in an action in the case sounding in tort, when all that it is necessary to know is—"did the man make the note? Is this his signature? Did he order the bill of goods? Was the service rendered to him? Is his identity established?" These are the usual questions which these magistrates are called upon to decide, and I submit that it would be a great deal wiser to allow them to be settled by the dictates of plain common sense than to run into anything like a technical system. These men, styled "learned in the law," would think it necessary to earn the title which this convention confers upon them. You would have the most technical refinement introduced where really nothing is necessary but the common judgment of a common ordinary man.

While, therefore, I am willing to retain in the section that which is valuable, I am not willing to give a place in it to that which I am satisfied not only entirely disfigures it, but which would be most unacceptable to the people. I believe, and it certainly is an argument entitled to some consideration, although it is not an argument which should be an overruling one in the consideration of any one of these questions, that by introducing such a section as this, you would array a very large body of the people against the adoption of the constitution. You would certainly array every man who has aspirations to this office who has not the qualifications which the section now repuires. You would array a very large class of people who think it unnecessary to have these disputes settled by men who are technical lawyers. It would be considered an attempt on the part of this convention, the composition of which is, to the extent of four to five, made up of lawyers, to create for themselves a class of petty offices, and while this would undoubtedly be an unjust charge, still it would have its weight in the community.

I hope for these reasons, which all have more or less value in this question, that the amendment of the gentleman from the city will be adopted.

Mr. Armstrong. I am in very strong sympathy with the purpose to be attained by this section. It is unnecessary to review the question in detail; but I will venture to remind the convention that not only the Reform Association, but the Prison Association and the papers of the city, and in fact, all who have given unbiased and unprejudiced consideration to this question, are of opinion that there is great necessity for a change in the aldermanic system in this city. I do not think it wise to limit the selection of these officers to persons who are learned in the law, and I shall therefore vote to strike out that part of the section. I think "a little learning is a dangerous thing," especially at the bar, and that lawyers who would take positions of this kind are not the persons to give dignity to the position, or to give a wise administration to the law within it. The purpose of this kind of magistracy is more analogous to voluntary arbitration, in which the arbitrators are sworn justly and equitably to try the case. Questions of law do not arise before this kind of magistracy. They are questions to be determined upon a fair consideration of facts. To leave the section as it now stands would ensure hostility from sources which the constitution ought not to encounter. With the section amended so as to leave the choice of magistracy to the citizens at large, I regard it as one of exceeding great value. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted, and that thus amended, the section will be agreed to.

TESTIMONIAL TO JUDGE NELSON.

It is already known to our readers that shortly after the retirement of Judge Nelson from the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, the bench and bar of this State, as represented at the time at the capitol, adopted an address to him, prepared by Hon. John V. L. Pruyn; it was signed—as a general thing in open court—by the judges of the Court of Appeals, and the larger body of the judges of the Supreme, the Superior, and some of the county courts, and by the great body of the leading lawyers of the State, nearly all of whom were personally well known to Judge Nelson. Messrs. Pruyn, Wm. M. Evarts, and Dudley Burwell were appointed a committee to present this address to the judge, and were prepared to do so in a more formal manner in June, but an attack of illness from which Judge Nelson was suffering at that time prevented.

On Saturday last the chairman of this committee telegraphed a friend that he would arrive here that evening, and Judge Nelson was prepared to receive him. After a few moments spent in general conversation, Mr. Pruyn took from its case the the elegantly bound testimonial—the address being engrossed with the pen, in a style which closely resembles a fine engraving—and remarked in substance as follows:

It is my very agreeable duty, Judge Nelson, on behalf of a committee appointed by the Court of Appeals, to present to you an address from the bench and bar of your native State, on your retirement from the high judicial station which you have so long occupied to the advancement of justice, to the honor of the bench, and to the satisfaction of the country.

This address, I beg to assure you, when submitted to the Court of Appeals, was very cordially approved, and warmly responded to by Chief Justice Church, for himself and on behalf of his brethren of the bench.

My associates of the committee, Mr. Burwell and Mr. Evarts, have requested me to say how much they regret that they cannot be here at this time, and to convey to you the expression of their high respect.

Our long, and I trust I may add, our cordial relationship, as well at home in our State as at Washington, render this duty a very pleasant one to me, and I regret that circumstances as to which you have been informed, have for som time delayed its discharge. With your permission I will now read the address and the order of the Court of Appeals.

Judge Nelson said he should be happy to listen to it, and Mr. Pruyn read as follows:

To the Honorable Samuel Nelson, late Senior Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

SIR:—Your professional brethren of the bench and the bar of the State of New York, beg leave on your retirement, after nearly fifty years of service in the courts of your native State and the United States, to express to you their warm regard for your personal character and their sense of the integrity, the learning, the usefulness, and the dignity which have marked your entire judicial life.

During this long period, you have been called upon to take part in the decision of points of great interest and delicacy, in international law, and in settling questions of profound importance in our constitutional jurisprudence, many of them under anomalous and exciting circumstances. To these we may add your patient and well directed industry, in expounding our patent laws, in passing upon questions of personal rights, and in disposing of the great mass of litigations growing out of commercial and business transactions, which uniformly pressed upon you for judicial determination. In the discharge of these duties you have at all times enjoyed the confidence of your professional brethren, of the litigants who were before you, and of the public, to an extent never exceeded by any judge who has presided in a court in which our language was spoken, or in which the great principles of constitutional liberty were respected and enforced. You have illustrated by your example that careful and discriminating integrity, and learning joined to common sense, the conceded qualities of a great judge, thoroughly harmonize with courtesy and kindness to the members of the bar, and with fearlessness and firmness in the discharge of a duty. How much you have thus made the practice of the profession in the courts in which you have presided, an agreeable duty, is impressed upon many grateful memories, and it is gratifying to feel assured that after we shall have passed away, history will preserve in its strongest colors the record of your judicial labors, and will pronounce it "well done" in the warmest terms of approval.

Our best wishes are with you in the retirement you have chosen, and our prayer to the Final Judge of all is, that your future days may be as peaceful and as happy as your past life has been useful and honorable.

We are your brethren and friends.

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN COURT OF APPEALS, ALBANY, January 28, 1873.

Ordered, That Messrs. John V. L. Pruyn, William M. Everts and Dudley Burwell be a committee to deliver to Judge Nelson the address from the bench and bar of this State, this day signed by the judges of this court.

COE'S TEN BROECK,
Deputy Clerk.

This having been done, Judge Nelson remarked how deeply he was impressed by the kindness and consideration of his professional brethren, and stated that he would at an early day communicate with the committee in writing. A copy of his letter we have been kindly furnished, in time for publication in this connection:

To Messrs. J. V. L. Pruyn, chairman; William M. Evarts and Dudley Burwell, committee.

The volume presented to me, containing the address of the judges of the Court of Appeals of the State of New York on my retirement from the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, and which has been adopted by the Commission of Appeals, and judges of the Supreme and Superior Courts of the State, and subscribed by about five hundred leading members of the bar, among the most distinguished of the State, confers an amount of honor and regard for which I find it difficult to make any adequate acknowledgment. If I could feel that my nearly fifty years of judicial labor in the State and National Governments had earned the commendations thus bestowed, I could proudly say that every wish and resolution of my life in this respect have been accomplished. But allowance must be made for the well known generosity and magnanimity of the profession, and the affection and friendship growing out of a long official and personal intercourse. Yet this does not lessen my sense of obligation for the unusual and extraordinary tribute of affection and respect, so elaborately prepared, and which I shall preserve with gratitude and care for the remainder of my life, and leave it at last as a precious legacy to my children.

I beg to express my thanks to the committee appointed by the Court of Appeals to present the address of the bench and bar, for the civil and complimentary manner with which that duty has been performed by its chairman.

Yours, respectfully,
S. NELSON.

In the hour of social intercourse which followed the delivery of the testimonial Mr. Pruyn narrated a pleasant incident which occurred at his own house a few years ago, while Chief Justice Chase was his guest, and which, as a compliment to our esteemed "first citizen," and an honor to the late chief, we think will bear publication: Mr. P. said that in the course of conversation in regard to the Supreme Court, he addressed his guest as "Chief Justice," when the latter pleasantly answered: "Oh, I am not 'Chief Justice'—our brother Nelson is the Chief Justice." How deeply the late chief regretted the retirement of Judge Nelson from the bench, were all looked up to him as the leading mind, is well known to the personal friends of both.

Supreme Court of Iowa.

PEORIA AND ROCK ISLAND R. W. CO. v. PRESTON.

1. Where an act of incorporation fixes the amount of capital stock, and the number of shares into which it shall be divided, the corporation cannot make an assessment upon the shares of a stockholder for the purpose of carrying on the general business of the company, until all the capital stock has been subscribed, unless either expressly or by implication a different intent appears in the charter or in the contract of subscription.
2. The charter of a railway company provides that its capital stock should be one million dollars, and be divided into shares of one hundred dollars each; that the persons named as corporators should be authorized to cause books to be opened for receiving subscriptions to said capital stock, to the amount of $100,000; that each subscriber at the time of subscription should pay to said commissioners the sum of five dollars on each share by him subscribed; that the corporate powers of the company should be vested in a board of nine directors, who should elect from among themselves a president and vice president, and have power to appoint a secretary, treasurer, and all other officers necessary for the transaction of the company's business; and to require such officers to give security for faithful performance of their duties; that the first election for directors should be held as soon as might be after $100,000 of stock should have been subscribed; that the directors should have power, and were required to re-open the books to fill up the capital stock, and should continue to receive subscriptions until the whole amount of such capital should have been taken; that all subscriptions to the stock should be paid at such times, and in such amounts and on such conditions as said directors should prescribe: Held, that the company had no power to call upon the subscribers for payments on their subscriptions, in addition to the five per cent required to be paid at the time of subscription, until the entire one million dollars of capital had been subscribed.
3. An act amending the charter of a railway company and authorizing it to construct and maintain a branch or lateral railway from some suitable point on its main line to a point named in such amendatory act, does not so change the original purpose of the incorporation, as to release previous subscribers to the stock from the obligation to pay their subscriptions.

Appeal from Scott Circuit Court.

Action to recover of defendant a subscription of five shares to the capital stock of plaintiff, amounting to five hundred dollars. The answer 1st. Denies each allegation of the petition. 2d. Avers that by the act under which said plaintiff was incorporated, passed by the Legislature of Illinois, March 7th, 1867, and annexed as an exhibit to the answer, the capital stock of said company is fixed at one million dollars, and that the directors are required to receive subscriptions therefore until the whole amount of capital stock shall be taken. That at the time the calls for payments were made by the directors as alleged in the petition, the said amount of one million dollars had not been subscribed for. Wherefore the directors had no authority under such charter to make calls for payments on subscriptions beyond five per cent. required to be paid at the time of subscription, and calls so made were null and void.

3d. That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars had not been subscribed to the stock when the board of directors was elected, nor when the calls for payments were made, therefore said calls were illegal and said election of directors null and void.

4th. Denies that due notice of any of the calls for payments was given thirty days previous to the time when either of such payments was required to be made by publication in such newspapers and for such time as said directors had determined, as required by said act of incorporation.

5th. Avers that on March 10th, 1869, after defendant had subscribed for stock, as alleged in petition, the Legislature of Illinois passed an act, a copy of which is attached to the answer, amending the act of incorporation of said company, thereby essentially changing the purpose and enterprise for which said corporation was originally incorporated, and that said company was authorized to construct a different line of railway, one terminus being fixed by said act at the city of Muscatine, and the other left indefinite. That said alteration of said charter was never assented to by defendant; but that defendant being a citizen of Davenport, was induced to subscribe for stock wholly for the promotion of the trade and prosperity of his said place of residence, by the construction of said railway from Peoria to Rock Island, and that by constructing said road to Muscatine his motive in subscribing would be defeated, &c. The other portions of the answer and the amendments thereto are not necessary to an understanding of the points ruled herein. The plaintiff demurred: "To the second section of the answer, because the subscription of one million dollars is not a condition precedent to calls for payment on stock, and because subscriptions of the entire capital is not necessary before calls can be made, unless so stated in the agreement, or in the act of incorporation. To the fifth section of answer because it shows that the subsequent act passed has only extended the power of the corporation, and not materially altered its object and intent."

The demurrer was sustained and defendant excepted. Jury trial on the remaining issues.

Verdict and judgment for plaintiff.

Defendant appeals.

DAY, J.

I. We regarded as settled by the weight of authority and reason, that where an act of incorporation fixes the amount of capital stock, and the number of shares into which it shall be divided, the corporation cannot make an assessment upon the shares of a stockholder, for the purpose of carrying on the general business of the company, until all the capital stock has been subscribed, unless, either expressly or by implication, a different intent appears in the charter, or in the contract of subscription. The reasons for this rule are to our minds unanswerable. If the capital stock is fixed at one hundred thousand dollars, divided into one thousand shares, the subscriber of one share, agrees to bear the one-thousanth part of the expense incident to the enterprise. If one-half the capital stock shall be found sufficient to accomplish the purpose of the association, then his agreement is upon his share of one hundred dollars to pay fifty. If, however, an assessment can be made upon his share, and the business of the association entered upon when but fifty thousand dollars of stock is subscribed, the stockholder is compelled to bear the five-hundredth part of the expense of the undertaking. Thus a contract is enforced against him which he never executed. And the same is true if an assessment can be made when anything less than the whole amount of stock is subscribed. Besides, it is apparent that some amount of stock must be subscribed before assessments can be made. But if no provision is made in the charter nor in the contract of subscription, there is nothing by which this amount can be fixed, unless it be the amount of capital stock which the corporation is allowed to hold. If an assessment can be made upon any less amount than this, there is just as much warrant of law for entering upon the business of the association and making assessments upon stock when one hundredth, as when ninety-nine-hundredths of the stock is subscribed. Again, a person called upon to take stock in an enterprise considers the things to be done and the amount pledged to their accomplishment.

If the undertaking can be commenced before the amount designated is secured, the means of finishing what is begun may never be obtained, and the amount expended may be lost.

This whole question underwent an exhaustive discussion in Salem Mill Dam Co. v. Rosses, 6 Pick. 23, decided in 1827. We despair of being able to add anything to the reasons there assigned. See also S. C., 9 Pick. 187.

This case was followed in Massachusetts, by Turnpike Co. v. Valentine, 10 Pick. 142, in 1830; by Cabot & West Springfield Bridge Co. v. Chapin, 6 Cushing, 50, in 1850; by Worcester & Nashua Railway Co. v. Hinde, 8 Cush. 110, in 1851; by Stoneham Branch Railway Co. v. Gould, 2 Gray, 277, in 1854; In New Hampshire, in the New Hampshire Railway Co. v. Johnson, 10 Foster, 390, decided in 1855.

In Maine, in Penobscot Railway Co. v. Dummer, 4 Maine, 172, and in Old Town Railway Co. v. Veazie, 39 Maine, 571, both decided in 1855.

See also Littleton Manufacturing Co. v. Parker, 14 N. H. 543, and Contocook Valley Railroad Co. v. Barker, 32 N. H. 363.

These cases all hold the doctrine above announced, and settle the law in the three States named.

We have not been referred to any well considered case holding the contrary view.

In Hamilton & Deansville Plank Road Co. v. Rice, 7 Barbour, 158, cited by appellee, the capital stock was fixed in the charter at $26,000. but the act of incorporation provided that when $500 per mile was in good faith subscribed, and five per cent. paid thereon, the subscribers might elect directors, execute their articles, and file them in the office of the secretary, and that from that time they should be a legally organized incorporation.

The agreement which the defendant signed, obligated him to become a member of the company as soon as the amount of stock required by the act of incorporation should be subscribed, and to pay the amount of subscription when the company should be organized. Under this agreement it was very rightly held that when $500 per mile was subscribed and the company organized, the subscriber should pay the amount of his stock. This was no more than an enforcement of the agreement according to its terms.

In Rensselaer v. Wetzel, 21 Barbour, 56, the facts are somewhat different, but the whole case is based upon that of Hamilton & Deansville Plank Road Co. v. Rice, supra, the whole opinion upon this branch of the case being as follows: "Nor was a subscription to the full amount of the stock named in the articles a condition precedent to the recovery," citing 7 Barbour, 166.

It is apparent that as authority upon the general proposition this case is entitled to but little, if any, weight.

In Waterford, &c., v. Dalbiac, 4 English Law and Equity, 455; S. C., 6 Wilsby, Hurlston & Gordon, 433, the opinion is so meagre that it cannot be ascertained that it conflicts with the views hereinbefore expressed, the whole case being disposed of in an opinion of less than three lines.

In Lexington & West Cambridge Railway Co. v. Chandler, 13 Met. 311, the act of incorporation provided that the capital stock should not exceed two thousand shares; that the number of shares should be determined from time to time by the directors, and that as soon as two hundred and fifty shares should be subscribed the company should proceed to construct and open their road.

After more than two hundred and fifty shares had been subscribed, the directors voted to close their books.

This, it was held, was in effect fixing the number of shares at that already subscribed, and a subscriber to the stock was held liable.

This is fully in accord with the views before expressed, first: Because the articles of incorporation authorized the company to proceed to construct and open the road when two hundred and fifty shares should be subscribed. 2d. Under the authorized vote of the directors fixing the number of shares at that subscribed, the whole stock was taken.

In Fay's Ex. v. Lexington & Big Sandy Railway, 2 Metcalf (Ky.), 314, the capital stock of the company was fixed at one million dollars, but the charter provided that whenever stock to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars was subscribed, the company should organize and go into complete operation.

In an action against a stockholder on an assessment, it was held that the petition must aver the subscription of one hundred thousand dollars. This case also is in harmony with the general views here expressed.

In Kennebec & Portland Railway Co. v. Jarvis, 34 Maine, 360, the amount of stock which the corporation might hold was not fixed in the charter, but by a vote of the corporation, and this is the ground of the holding that a stockholder may be made liable before all the stock is subscribed.

In the Iowa & Minn. Railway Co. v. Perkins, 28 Iowa, 281, the general question of a right of a corporation to collect assessments until all the stock should be subscribed was not decided, the defendant being held liable in view of the terms of his subscription.

The only case to which our attention has been called apparently in conflict with the leading case in 6 Pick. 23, is that of Schenectady Plank Road Co. v. Thatcher, 11 N. Y. 102. The opinion advances no reasoning in opposition to the Massachusetts cases which it seems to misapprehend, and from the facts of which it seeks to distinguish the cases in hand. We feel warranted, therefore, both from authority and reason, in holding that where an act of incorporation fixes the amount of capital stock which a corporation may hold, no assessment can be made upon the share of a stockholder, until all the stock is subscribed, unless a contrary intention appears, expressly or by implication, either in the charter or the contract of subscription.

II. The next question which presents itself is as to the proper construction of the charter. Does it contain anything evincing an intention that assessments may be made upon the shares before the subscription of all the capital stock? Section three of the charter provides that the capital stock of the company shall be one million dollars, and be divided into shares of one hundred dollars each.

Section four of the act provides that the persons named as corporators shall be authorized to cause books to be opened for receiving subscriptions to said capital stock, to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars; that each subscriber, at the time of subscription, shall pay to said commissioners the sum of five dollars on each share by him subscribed; and that when the directors of said corporation shall have been elected, the commissioners shall deliver to them the amount of money received, and the books and papers belonging to the company.

Section five vests the corporate powers of the company in a board of nine directors, and provides that they shall elect from themselves a president and vice president, and shall have power to appoint a secretary, treasury and all other officers deemed necessary for the transaction of the business of said company, and to require such officers to give security for the faithful performance of the duties of their office.

Section six provides that the first election for directors shall be holden as soon as may be after the said one hundred thousand dollars of stock shall have been subscribed.

Section seven of the charter is as follows: "The directors shall have power and are hereby required to re-open the books to fill up the capital stock of said company, and shall continue to receive subscriptions thereof until the whole amount of such capital (not subscribed before said commissioners) shall have been taken; and shall also receive subscriptions to the additional capital stock of said company, should the same be increased by said directors, pursuant to the authority herein given, at such time and places as the directors may deem expedient; and all subscriptions to the stock of said company shall be paid at such times, and in such amounts, and on such conditions as said directors may prescribe, under the penalty of the forfeiture of the stock, and all previous payments thereon; and they shall give notice of the payment thus required, and the place where, and the time when the same are required to be paid, at least thirty days previous to the time when said payment shall be required to be made, by publication in such newspaper, and for such time as said directors shall determine."

These are all the provisions of the charter affecting the question under consideration. They contain nothing, it seems to us, evincing an intention that assessments may be made before all the capital stock is subscribed. The commissioners were authorized to open the books and receive subscriptions to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars, thus taking the initiatory steps towards the organization of the corporation. The charter requires five per cent. of the subscription to be paid at the time of subscribing. It would be manifestly inexpedient to allow these commissioners, without any bond for the faithful performance of their duties, to take the entire subscription of one million dollars, and receive five per cent. thereon, amounting to fifty thousand dollars. Prudence, and even necessity requires some organization of the company before all the capital stock was subscribed. Hence the charter provides that when one hundred thousand dollars shall have been subscribed, directors shall be elected, who shall select from their number a president, and vice president, appoint a secretary and treasurer, and require them to give bonds for the faithful discharge of their duties. The charter requires these directors to re-open the books, and to continue to receive subscriptions until the whole amount of capital stock, not subscribed before the commissioners, shall have been taken. This duty is specifically enjoined upon them." A failure to perform it is a failure to observe the positive requirements of the charter. This section contains nothing authorizing an assessment until all the capital stock is subscribed. True, it provides that the subscription shall be paid at such times, and in such amounts, and on such conditions as the directors may prescribe. But this evidently means that when the company has so far complied with the conditions of its charter as to be entitled to subscriptions, then the directors may prescribe the times and amounts and conditions of payment. It surely does not mean that, notwithstanding the requirement that the directors shall re-open the books and continue to receive subscription until the whole amount of stock is taken, they may nevertheless refuse to do so, enter upon the construction of the road, and assess the shareholders to the full value of their shares. And yet it does mean this or no authority is conferred to assess until all the stock is subscribed. But two limits upon the authority of the board of directors, to do everything necessary to the accomplishment of the objects of the corporation, can legally be deduced from the charter. The one is when one hundred thousand dollars of stock is subscribed. The other is when all the stock is taken. There is no logical ground upon which the authority can be claimed to arise at any intermediate point. The former limit nullifies the provisions of the section requiring the directors to re-open their books and fill up the stock. Such construction is not admissible. It follows, therefore, that the latter is the true limit. There is nothing at all unreasonable in this construction. One million dollars of stock is certainly not a very extravagant sum for the building of ninety miles of railroad, when it is borne in mind that almost, if not quite, that sum would be necessary for the ironing of the road alone. Nor does this instruction place any impediment in the way of corporations. It is quite easy for them to provide that operations shall begin, and assessments shall be made when any given amount of stock shall have been subscribed.

But when the charter is silent upon the subject, the court cannot establish an amount and say that when that is reached, the liability of shareholders shall attach. Such a course would be found to be as impracticable and unsatisfactory in its execution, as oppressive and unjust in its results. Courts enforce contracts, but do not make them. The charter construed in Salem Mill Dam Co. v. Ropes, 6 Pickering, 23, was in all essential respects like the one involved in this case.

Our conclusion is that the charter does not confer authority to make assessments upon the shares of the stockholders until all the stock is subscribed, and that the demurrer to this portion of the answer was improperly sustained.

III. The amendment to plaintiff's charter set up in the fifth section of the answer authorizes plaintiff to construct and maintain a branch or lateral railway, from some suitable point on its main line, to a point on the Mississippi river opposite the city of Muscatine, in Iowa. It does not essentially change the original purposes of the incorporation. The incorporation is not relieved from the necessity of building a railroad from Peoria to Rock Island, as originally contemplated. The amendment merely confers enlarged powers and additional privileges upon plaintiff

That it is not of such a character as to exonerate a subscriber to the stock from his obligation, the authorities cited in the brief of counsel abundantly show. See Barrett v. Alton & Sagamon Railroad Co., 13 Ill., 504; Peoria and Oqualoka Railroad Co. v. Elting, 17 Ill., 429; Sprague v. Illinois Railroad Co., 19 Ill., 17; Illinois Railroad Co. v. Zeinmer, 20 Ill., 654. The demurrer to this portion of the answer was properly sustained.

If under this charter the coporation should undertake the construction of a lateral branch largely increasing the cost of the enterprise, and bearing an undue proportion to the original undertaking, they might be enjoined from so doing at the suit of a stockholder. And if such design should be accomplished, a stockholder might be released from liability. But the mere conferring of authority to build a lateral branch, without more, which is all that appears in this case, should not, in our opinion, have that effect.

Other alleged errors, in the admission of evidence and the giving of instructions, were assigned and argued, but it is believed that the views herein expressed render a separate consideration of them unnecessary.

For the error before alluded to, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

In compliance with the desire of many prominent members of the Bar, the Publishers have endeavored to produce a handsome book, full and complete in its contents. Owing to the sale being limited to the Philadelphia Bar, to whom only it can be of use, and in consequence of the expense attending its publication, the price has been fixed at a figure that may seem apparently high,—but the Publishers, to reimburse themselves for the outlay they have been subject to, have been compelled to decline giving discounts to any one, so as to enable them to give the Bar the advantage of the lowest possible price for which the Book can be made.

The volume has been carefully compiled, and has also been revised by the Judges of the different Courts, and endorsed by Rules of the same. They therefore contain not only the latest, but also the only full publication of those rules, as they now stand on the minutes of the different Courts.

MEYER v. BASSON.

A seaman having shipped under an oral contract, in a German ship, upon his arrival at Philadelphia applied to the defendant, the master of the ship, for his discharge, whereupon he was put in irons and his discharge refused. He then had the defendant arrested for malicious imprisonment. On a rule upon behalf of the latter to quash the capias, the court made it absolute, holding that under the treaties between the United States and Germany, jurisdiction of the subject matter in dispute was in the German consul at Philadelphia, and not in the court.

Sur rule to quash capias.

The plaintiff, a Hollander, set forth in his affidavit, an oral contract to serve as able seaman, on board the German ship "Elena," during a voyage from Liverpool to Philadelphia.

He was put on board ship at Liverpool, by a shipping master of that port, on July 21st, 1873, just as the vessel was about to sail, and did not sign any articles. He made the voyage out, arriving at Philadelphia on the 17th of September, 1873. The following day he demanded of the defendant, the master of the ship "Elena," his discharge, which was refused by the captain, who put him in irons on board ship, and after keeping him in arrest an hour and a half, had him taken before the United States authorities, and subsequently, on the 19th of September, thrown in jail and detained there in custody until the 26th of September, 1873, when he was discharged.

A supplemental affidavit, filed before the hearing, set forth that the plaintiff's arrest was maliciously made by the defendant, who knew that he had no right to imprison the plaintiff, as he had ceased to be a member of the crew, and was entitled to his liberty. The assault was made with the design to kidnap the plaintiff, who was falsely and maliciously imprisoned by the defendant, and damages were laid at $3,000.

Upon these affidavits the application for the writ of capias to arrest the defendant was made to a single judge, whose allocatur was endorsed upon the petition, and by whom bail was fixed at $1,000.

The defendant was arrested on the 29th day of September, 1873, but put in bail on that day for the sum required by court, and was released.

On the 30th of September, 1873, the defendant filed an affidavit setting forth his answer to the plaintiff's accusations, and applied to a single judge for a rule to show cause why the capias upon which the defendant had been arrested should not be quashed. The judge granted the rule, and made it returnable on Saturday, October the 4th, 1873.

Depositions were taken by both parties, to sustain the writ and rule respectively. Upon the argument of the rule, however, the court refused to hear the depositions or the affidavit, which accompanied the rule.

The position taken by the defendant, was that the plaintiff's affidavit disclosed in the first place, a contract between the parties to this action. The agreement was to serve on board a German ship, and subjected the plaintiff to German law and to German regulations and discipline. Being a member of the crew, the plaintiff was bound to submit all disputes which he might have with his captain, or grievances against him, to the provisional adjudication of the German consul, and to abide by his decision. The terms of the agreement itself entered into by the plaintiff could be ascertained and settled only by the consul. The language of the treaty between Germany and the United States entered into on December 11th, 1871, is explicit: "Consuls . . shall have exclusive charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of their nation, and shall have the exclusive power to take cognizance of and to determine differences of every kind which may arise, either at sea or in port, between the captains, officers and crews; and *specially in reference to wages, and the execution of mutual contracts. Neither any court or authority, shall on any pretext, interfere in these differences, except in cases where the differences on board ship are of a nature to disturb the peace and public order in port or on shore, or where persons other than the officers and crew of the vessel are parties to the disturbance," article xiii.

The grievances set forth by the plaintiff in his affidavit, arose out of a disagreement between himself and the defendant as to the terms of the contract entered into by them. This constituted a difference which would have ousted the jurisdiction of the American courts, even under the treaty with Prussia of May 1st, 1828. United States Statute at Large, 382, and the decisions under it, Ex parte Newman, 14 Wall. 152, and certainly under the more comprehensive terms of the present treaty. The putting of the plaintiff in irons for mutiny, was in the enforcement of the discipline on shipboard, and the plaintiff's redress would be by a complaint lodged with the German consul, and not by a resort to this court.

The imprisonment could have been effected only by a consular requisition to the United States authorities, and involved in it the fact that the German consul had exercised the jurisdiction which the treaty had made exclusive.

After consideration, on October 7th, 1873, the court made the rule absolute and quashed the writ.

DERRINGER v. DERRINGER.

1. The court has jurisdiction over the custody of children, and as a consequence it has power to preserve its control over an infant by ordering that a bond be given conditioned that the infant shall not be taken out of the State.
2. Such an order is not ultra vires, nor is it in contravention of sec. 15, of art. ix., of the constitution which declares that emigration from the State shall not be prohibited.
3. Upon a review of the circumstances the court modified the bond so as to require the custodian of the child to produce the child in open court whenever any judge thereof may so order.

Habeas corpus for custody of an infant.

Rule to vacate the order of court requiring security to be entered in the penal sum of $2000 that the infant shall not be taken out of the State.

Opinion by FINLETTER, J. Delivered October 11th, 1873.

The petitioner's counsel contend "that "the bond is void, and the entry requiring it should be vacated because ultra "vires.

"That the question before the court "was one of custody of the child. The "court decided that question in favor of "the relator, and then went further and "ordered her to give security. She was "not a criminal; not even a defendant; "and to secure her child, she gave the "bond. This was the strongest case of "duress we can imagine."

Whilst this may be conclusive against the validity or the enforcement of the bond, it does not touch the question of the authority of the court to require the bond to be entered as a condition precedent, upon which the custody should be given to the relator.

The parties were not, in the ordinary sense, plaintiff and defendant. The one invoked the command of the court to the other, to bring the child within the protection of the court. The rights of the child were the subjects of inquiry. The custody was but an incident, or result, and of legal right belonged to neither party. The learned judge might have disregarded both, and given it to a stranger.

It is not easy to see how an order of court in any case can be such legal duress as would avoid a bond. If the bond under consideration be void for "duress" what becomes of the recognizance in a criminal case; or the security for an appeal, or stay of execution in a civil case?

The industry of counsel has furnished many authorities which may not be questioned, upon the points which they have decided. They are, however, all cases in which the enforcement of the bonds was resisted, because they contained provisions either against the law, or not allowed, or required by the law. In none of them is the authority to demand the bond contested or decided.

It was further agreed "that art. ix., § 15 of the constitution of Pennsylvania, declares that emigration from the State shall not be prohibited, and this is binding on the court; that courts of equity have power to grant writs of 'ne exeat regno' in cases of equitable debts only."

All this may very well be conceded, without advancing the cause of the petitioner, inasmuch as the order of court in no wise interferes with her locomotion whithersoever she listeth.

It is also contended that the divorce of the parties changes their rights. It certainly changes the relations of the parties to each other, and in so far affects their relative rights. It does not however affect the rights of either, in reference to the child. The decree of divorce establishes as judicially ascertained the facts of the libel, and nothing more. As the authority of the court to make the order has been at least questioned by the argument, we propose briefly to examine that matter.

The writ of habeas corpus brings the infant into the custody of the court. Its present and future welfare, is the special concern of the court. The preservation of the rights of the parents is an incident of the proceeding merely, which may not however be disregarded. The order of the court is not res adjudicata est, and is intended only for the condition of things as they existed at the time of hearing. It may be revoked or modified, whenever required by a change of circumstances.

It is therefore the duty of the court to preserve, in some way, its control over the infant, so that it may be able to enforce its future decrees. It would be manifest error to deprive itself of this power, by permitting the infant to be taken beyond the jurisdiction, without some provision, for enforcing its return.

It may therefore, and should, couple with the transfer of custody, the condition either that the infant shall not be taken out of the jurisdiction, or that it should be returned to the jurisdiction, whenever the court shall so order. In either case this may be affected by the requiremen.

of a bond. If this be correct, it would follow that the order of court is strictly within the line of duty and authority.

Upon examination, this view will be sustained by the universal practice of the English courts. In DeMandeville v. DeMandeville, 10 Ves. 52, the Lord Chancellor said. "There is a fair suspicion of real danger that the child may be removed out of this country, and then according to Lord Macclesfield's opinion in the Shaftsbury case, the court must act upon the suspicion. Some method must be taken to secure to the court, that the person of the child shall remain in the country." An order was therefore pronounced, that the defendant and all other persons should be restrained from taking the child out of the kingdom; and he was afterwards ordered to go before the master and give security, not to remove the child out of the kingdom.

Such also is the practice of the American courts. In State v. Nathan, 1 Georgia Decisions, 93, we find the following, "It is further ordered that the said Anna King enter into bond by her friends, in the sum of $500, conditioned, that the child Emily King be not removed without the jurisdiction of this court."

It is however alleged that a condition of things has arisen, since the order was made, which requires a modification of it. The testimony shows that ever since that event, the child and its mother have been supported by the grandmother, whose means are ample, and who now has a permanent residence in Kansas. That the mother has no means of support. That her physical condition is such as to require her to reside in Kansas. That the grandmother has become greatly attached to the child; and in event of her death, without a will, her daughter would be her sole heir. That the father is without means, and dependent upon a small salary as clerk. That he has heretofore failed to provide for the child in any way; and has made no provision for its support hereafter.

The answer of the respondent shows no reason why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, save his affection for the child. It throws obloquy upon the child by averring that its maternal grandfather was a felon, and that its mother has had abortions committed upon herself which were advised by its grandmother. If these averments were true (and there is no evidence thereof), they were wholly needless, because they were passed upon when the order was made. They show, however, a malignity of heart, and a disregard for the future reputation and happiness of the child, entirely inconsistent with his profession of paternal love. In this connection, we may not forget that it is judicially established that his conduct to the mother was "cruel and barbarous," and "endangered her life." This is some indication of the nature and character of him, who now demands the guidance of the morals and culture of the infant.

There can be no doubt from an examination of the whole case, that the best interests of the child, in every respect, would be secured by granting the prayer of the mother.

Is there then any reason, legal or otherwise, which prevents us from promoting this desirable object?

The common law made the father the tyrant of the domestic circle. Whilst it left him free to exercise his will in all things; it made the mother and the child abject slaves to that will. It forbade her to make the simplest contract; and yet permitted her when requested by her husband, to divest herself of all interest in his estate. It is true, with grim irony, it required this to be done "of her own free will and accord, and without any compulsion on the part of her said husband." As if the true wife could have any "will" against the request of a husband, whom duty and affection alike compelled her "to love honor and obey." To still more firmly fix the grasp of the father upon the mother's "free will," the law gave him the custody of the child from the moment of its birth. No matter how low and debased he might become; no matter how notorious his debaucheries; or how openly he lived in avowed adultery, he could by legal force snatch the babe from the mother's breast; and the daughter, in the purity of her budding womanhood, from the sweet and holy councils of the maternal home. And this was called the father's natural right.

It is not to be wondered at, that noble, upright humane judges when compelled to enforce such "natural rights" proclaimed from the bench, that they were "ashamed of the law."

Catching the true inspiration of free institutions, we have enfranchised the mother and her child. We have denied the father's right to enslave either. When he claims the custody of the child, or attempts in any way to control that custody, he must show that it is consistent with the welfare and happiness of the child.

It should be remembered that upon a full hearing of the parties, the court awarded the custody to the petitioner. The order for security against asportation from the jurisdiction, was to preserve our control over the future of the child. It was not a response to the meritorious conduct of the father, or to any demerit in the mother.

Since that order was made, she has obtained a divorce from him, upon the ground of cruel and barbarous treatment. For three years and upwards she has supported her child without any aid from the respondent.

The adoption of mother and child, by the grandmother insures its support and education, and indicates expectations most advantageous to its future welfare. To permit the order to remain, is simply to deprive the mother of her adjudicated right to the custody of the child; and to subject its welfare to the precarious fortunes of a father, without means, and barely able to support himself.

We cannot allow his mere caprice to interfere with the welfare of the child. We are compelled to regard its interests, even against the claims of natural affection. We may not, in the exercise of our discretion, disregard its physical comforts and training; or its just and natural expectations of pecuniary or other advantage from its present position.

Even the sternness of the English law has been made to yield to the humanity of this principle. Lord Eldon said, "The court would not in general permit the father to disappoint the expectations of his children." "The father is not at liberty to say I will alter the course of education of my children by applying more scanty means to the purpose, and I will not permit them to have the benefit of that sort of maintenance and education which they have hitherto had; and in consequence of which their views in life are very different from what they would have been without it." Forsythe's Custody of Children, 24,

Whilst, however, we will revoke so much of the order as requires security that the child shall not be removed from the commonwealth, in order to preserve our control over its future we will require the mother to enter security in the sum of $2.000 to produce the child in open court, whenever any judge thereof may so order. Let a decree be entered accordingly.

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.

GODDARD v. MONITOR MUTUAL FIRE INS. CO.

1. The policy purported to insure the plaintiff "on his frame two-story building, occupied as a machine shop." It contained a provision that "the application for the insurance is a part of the contract," and that "whenever a building hereby insured shall be altered, enlarged, or appropriated to any other purposes than those herein mentioned, or the risk otherwise increased by the act or with the knowledge or consent of the insured, without the consent of the company first obtained in writing, this policy shall be void."
2. The building, at the date of the policy, and up to the time of the fire, was occupied as a manufactory of organs and melodeons, upon which it was agreed the risk was greater than upon a machine shop.
3. The policy was procured by an insurance broker, who had solicited the plaintiff to insure the building, and who without his knowledge prepared an application which he presented to an insurance agent, who acted for several companies and was authorized to receive and transmit applications and deliver policies for the defendants. The broker informed the agent that the building was used as an organ and melodeon factory, and that he believed a small part of it was to be used as a machine shop. The agent, however, in answer to a question in the application as to what was manufactured in the building, wrote "machinery."
4. The broker received the policy from the agent to whom it had been forwarded by the company, and delivered it to the plaintiff, who did not know of the application, or that the broker had taken any steps to procure the insurance. The plaintiff received the policy without objecting to its form or contents.
5. Held, That the representation was material, and that it makes no difference that the misrepresentation was accidental, unintentional, or without fraudulent intent, or that the party insured was ignorant of the fact that such a representation had been made, as in either case the ground of objection is the same; the insurers were misled.
6. Held, That the defendants never insured the plaintiff's organ factory, and that the minds of the parties never met upon it as the subject matter of insurance.
7. Held, That the court cannot alter the contract as expressed in the policy, and that as the plaintiff accepted the policy in its present shape, he cannot complain that he has been misled by it, and that in this view of the case the application becomes unimportant, as does also the question whether the broker was the plaintiff's or the defendants' agent.
8. Held, That it is decisive of the case that the policy which the plaintiff received without objection cannot be applied to the building destroyed. Judgment for the defendants.—Ins. Law Journal.

The policy was issued by the defendants under date of October 1st, 1869, and insured the plaintiff in the sum of $2,500.00, for one year from date, against loss or damage by fire, "on his frame two-story building, occupied as a machine shop, and situated in Worcester." The policy was expressed upon its face to be made and accepted upon the following express conditions, viz.: "That the application for the insurance is a part of the contract;" "that if the risk shall be increased by any means whatever within the control of the assured, this policy shall be void;" and "that whenever a building hereby insured shall be altered, enlarged, or appropriated to any other purposes than those herein mentioned, or the risk otherwise increased by the act or with the knowledge or consent of the insured, without the consent of the company first obtained in writing, this policy shall be void."

The case was submitted to the judgment of the court on a statement of facts, in which it was agreed that the building was destroyed by fire on March 22d, 1870, and that due notice of the loss was given to the defendants; but that at the date of the policy, and up to the time of the fire, it was occupied as a manufactory of organs and melodeons; that wood-shavings were made on the premises; that "the risk of the destruction by fire of an organ and melodeon factory is greater than that of a machine shop;" and that the building was so occupied with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, and without the defendants' knowledge or consent, unless it was to be inferred from the following facts:

David Gleason, an insurance broker, solicited the plaintiff to insure the building, and the plaintiff replied that he would not unless he could procure insurance thereon within a certain rate of premium. Gleason afterward prepared an application to the defendants, in the plaintiff's name, for insurance on the applicant's "frame two-story building" in Worcester, which contained a schedule of questions, and among them the following: "Question 4." What is manufactured, and of what material? Are wood-shavings made on the premises?" This application Gleason took to George J. Mowry, an insurance agent in Worcester, who filled up certain blanks in it, without making any personal examination of the building, from information furnished by Gleason, who had examined it. Among the blanks filled by Mowry, was the date, "October 1st, 1869;" the amount of insurance applied for, "$2,500.00," and the answer to Question 4, "Machinery." Before writing in this answer, Mowry asked Gleason what was done in the building, and Gleason replied that it was used as an organ and melodeon factory, but he believed that a small part of it was sometimes used as a machine shop. Gleason then signed the application, as follows: "Dorrence S. Goddard, applicant by David Gleason;" and Mowry wrote his own name upon the back of it, and forwarded it by mail to the defendants, who wrote the policy and sent it by mail to Mowry, without having any other information about the property than what was furnished by the application. Mowry gave the policy to Gleason, who delivered it to the plaintiff, and received from the plaintiff the stipulated premium of $50 00, out of which he paid $45.00 to Mowry, and Mowry paid $42.50 to the defendants.

The plaintiff did not see the application, gave no information from which it was filled up, and did not know of its existence, except from the reference to it in the policy, until since the commencement of this action. And the first knowledge he had of the insurance was when Gleason brought the policy to him, and he paid the premium. On March 8th, 1870, the plaintiff procured of the defendants, at their office in Boston, an endorsement upon the back of the policy, making it payable, in case of loss, to the Worcester County Institution for Savings, from which he had obtained a loan on the property. He did not at that time disclose to the defendants the purposes for which the building was used, nor was there any circumstance calling or directing the attention of either party to that subject.

Gleason was accustomed to solicit applications for insurance from persons owning buildings, and to procure, either directly from the insurance companies, or through the intervention of agents, policies of insurance; and for so doing he received a certain amount of the premium paid by the insured to the company, as a commission for his services. He did not solicit in behalf of any particular company, but effected insurance in such companies as he saw fit, unless the party to be insured indicated a preference. He had no account with the defendants, his name not being on their books at all, and had never written to or received any letters from them.

Mowry acted as an insurance agent for several companies, and was authorized by the defendants to receive and transmit applications for insurance to them. He had no power to issue or countersign policies, and did not do so; but the policies were issued at the office of the defendants, in Boston, and were sent to him by mail, and by him delivered to the persons insured or those from whom he received the application. The premiums paid by the insured were forwarded by Mowry to the company, his commissions being first deducted. And this was the extent of his authority.

P. E. Aldrich, Esq., for plaintiff.

W. G. Colburn, Esq. (C. Allen Esq., with him), for defendants.

AMES, J.

It is a fatal defect in the plaintiff's case that the policy professes to insure a machine shop, and that the building destroyed by fire was not a machine shop. It would be doing great violence to language to contend that a building in which organs and melodeons are manufactured can be correctly described as a machine shop. It appears by the report of the case, that the risk of destruction by fire is greater in the case of a building in which organs and melodeons are manufactured, than in that of one in which machinery is manufactured. The representation therefore was material, and it was untrue. It makes no difference that the misrepresentation was accidental, unintentional, and without any fraudulent intent, or even that the party insured was ignorant that such a representation had been made. In either case, the ground of objection is the same. The insurers were misled. They were willing to insure a machine shop, and supposed they were so doing; but they had never insured the plaintiff's organ factory, which was a different and more hazardous risk. The misrepresentation takes away the foundation of the policy, and as it was an affirmation of a fact as then existing, it is enough to prevent the policy from taking effect as a contract. The minds of the parties have not met upon the organ factory as the subject matter of insurance. Kimball v. Ætna Insurance Co., 9 Allen, 540; Sillem v. Thornton, 3 El. & Bl. (Am. ed.) 868, 88 9 note; Carpenter v. American Insurance Co., 1 Story, 57; Campbell v. New England Insurance Co., 98 Mass. 381; Wilbur v. Bowditch Insurance Co., 10 Cush. 446. The plaintiff sues upon the policy, and the court cannot alter the contract as therein expressed. Tibbetts v. Hamilton Insurance Co., 3 Allen, 569. However unfortunate this may be for the plaintiff, he accepted the policy in its present shape, and cannot well complain that he has been misled by it. Barrett v. Union Insurance Co., 7 Cush. 175.

In this view of the case the application becomes unimportant, as does also the question whether Gleason was the plaintiff's or the defendants' agent. It is decisive of the case that the policy which the plaintiff accepted without objection, or attempt to have any mistake corrected, cannot be applied to the building which was destroyed by fire.

Judgment for the defendants.

MORGAN et al. v. BROWNE.

1. Browne leased to Morgan a space of twenty-two feet east, &c., to be and remain open as a passage way, to be used by Morgan in common with Browne, and his other lessees, &c. In action for rent, defendants filed an affidavit of defence, and gave notice of special matter, concluding "the facts are more fully set out in copy of the affidavit of defence hereto annexed." A witness being called by defendant, plaintiff asked what was to be proved by him; the defendant answered, the matters contained in the notice and affidavit, but did not, on being asked, say which. The court rejected the testimony: Held, To be correct.

2. The party producing a witness may be asked to state what is to be proved by him, so that if the facts are irrelevant, they may be excluded.

3. It is an evasion of this rule for a party man when thus called on to refer to the affidavit of defence; it would bring before the jury the sworn ex parte statement of defendant without opportunity of cross-examination. Such practice is irregular.

4. On demand for the rent, the defendants wrote to plaintiffs, giving a reason for declining to pay; in the suit the defence was on a different ground: Held, That the letter was evidence to show that he then set up a different ground for not paying.

EVANS et al. v. WALN et al. Executors

1. Waln employed Markoe, a broker in Philadelphia, to sell stock; Evans, a broker in New York, sold the stock by order of Wister, another Philadelphia broker under Markoe, with assent of Waln, without naming the owner; before the proceeds were remitted by Evans, Wister failed, in debt to Evans. Held, that Evans could not retain the debt from the proceeds.

2. After Wister's failure Evans asked Markoe to send certificates and he would remit to Markoe less Wister's debt; Markoe answered, the stock was a customer's; Evans answered, send stock in any event, "will give you net balance to-morrow." Markoe sent the stock. Held, that "net balance" meant proceeds after deducting expenses of sale.

3. Evidence that it was the custom of brokers, in their dealings with brokers of other cities to put all transactions between them into one account and settle for the general balance, was inadmissible.

4. Such custom would not have authorized defendants to credit Wister's account with the proceeds of the stock.

5. The action for the amount retained by Evans, was properly bought in the name of Waln.

6. An action for the proceeds of property sold by one agent by orders of another can be maintained by the owner against seller.

JOHN H. CAMPBELL,
EDITOR.

THE UNITED STATES JURIST.

We regret to see by an announcement on the cover of this periodical that its present editor, Mr. James Schouler, is about to retire from its management. Notwithstanding the professional favor with which Mr. Schouler's efforts in this line have been received, we suppose that the superior remuneration which the success of his efforts in the authorship of text books on the law, and in office practice (to which, rather than to forensic efforts, his inclinations appear to lead him) may be the cause of what is thus stated. We regret the matter because we have thought that we could see in the United States Jurist, of which Mr. Schouler was the founder and sole conducter, the more than "seminal principle" of a thoroughly independent and valuable law journal. It began with no flourish of trumpets and no external exhibitions, perhaps rather unimpressively. But we early observed in it the marks of an original, fearless and thoughtful editorship; and of a pen guided at once by high legal attainments and a very careful consideration and analysis of every subject which it passed upon. The paper on Chief Justice Chase, in the number of last July, impressed us as one of the very best, perhaps the only thoroughly good characterization of the chief justice which has appeared. It was cordial and strong; dictated obviously by a thorough understanding of the chief justice's judicial labors, and by warm intellectual respect for them and for the late magistrate personally, yet marked by discriminations and drawbacks expressed with delicacy indeed, but with clear meaning and with indubitable truth. We had marked the whole paper for extract into these columns; but the proceedings of our Constitutional Convention, embracing the topic of the organization of the courts, so interesting to our readers, excluded it. We still, however, refer to it as worthy of attention.

We wish Mr. Schouler success in whatever new field, if any more new than legal authorship is about to tempt him, he may enter on; though we should be happy to find that the author of the work on the Domestic Relations and on Personal Property is about to follow in this respect, in a former track rather than engage in new ones. Good text books are ever valuable and ever welcome.

We ought to add, that though Mr. Schouler retires from the management of the Jurist, the magazine itself will be continued under the former publishers, and, we can hardly doubt, with credit and usefulness. Every thing that the Morrisons touch in this way, is certain to be well done.

EASTERN DISTRICT OF PENN'A.

United States Circuit Court.

SUMNER et al. v. THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA.

1. Quarantine officers may act wisely in detaining an entirely innocent ship, if for any reason, by permitting her to come up, there would be a chance of a panic arising; but it cannot be doubted, that the municipality, whose servants took this responsibility, would be bound to compensation.
2. The board of health of the city of Philadelphia are ministerial, not judicial officers. The discretion vested in them as quarantine officers, is a reasonable, not an absolute one, and that whether the detention of a vessel was proper or not must be gathered from the facts of the case.
3. The vessel in question having been detained an unreasonable length of time, damages against the city are awarded.

Report of referee, confirmed October 6th, 1873, by McKENNAN, Circuit Judge.

This is an action on the case brought by the owners of the brig Home against The City of Philadelphia, wherein damages are claimed for the alleged illegal detention of said brig by the board of health at quarantine during the summer and fall of 1870, and other alleged injuries growing out of the same matter. Under an agreement made by counsel, May 21st, 1872, the case was referred to me, with the provision that my opinion and judgment in the case should have the same force and effect as a judgment on a special verdict.

No questions arise for my determination in the pleadings, as it was agreed that any possible objection to the form of action on the one side or to the giving in evidence of matters of justification under the general issue on the other, should be waived and the case heard on the merits irrespectively of the pleadings.

Much evidence was produced before me on both sides orally, and depositions taken on behalf of plaintiffs under a commission, were also submitted. The case was ably and carefully argued by Messrs. Henry Flanders, and D. W. Sellers, for plaintiffs; and Messrs. George D. Budd, and C. H. T. Collis, city solicitor, for the city. There was, however, no serious conflict of testimony, though from the necessary circumstances of the case there is some contradiction in the evidence on certain points. Except in one particular, however, these contradictions are unimportant, and I have little difficulty in determining what are the actual facts of the case so far as the history of the transaction is concerned.

The determination of some questions, however, which are quasi matters of fact, has been more difficult, involving, as it does, an examination from the scientific testimony, &c., adduced, an investigation into the cause and nature of the infection of yellow fever, especially in the particular epidemic of that disease at the quarantine station in 1870. In determining these matters I have felt some doubt, from the nature of the case, and from the widely varying opinions of medical men on the subject, but I think that it will be found that my conclusions on this question sufficiently approximate the truth for the special matters involved in this case, even if I be in error in some of the general views reached.

The questions of law arising upon the facts present still more difficulty, but my decision of them will be the subject of review, and will be doubtless corrected should I err.

First. As to the facts.

The brig Home arrived in the Delaware river about the 26th of June, A. D. 1870, and at the Lazaretto, the quarantine station of the port of Philadelphia, on the 29th of June, 1870. She was a vessel of two hundred and sixteen tons register, hailing from New York, but arriving from Black river, Jamaica. Her cargo consisted of logwood, but she had besides on board, but not on her register, thirteen bales of sail clippings. These appear to have been the private property of the master. The vessel was then about thirteen years old, built in Nova Scotia, her class No. 2. She had been refitted some three or four months previously, but was in a very filthy condition at the time of her arrival. She had no bill of health; the master, Thomas H. Phillips, had died on board on the 24th June, 1870. Notwithstanding the denials made by the crew, I am entirely satisfied he died of yellow fever, and so decide. The steward had also been sick of the same disease, but had recovered. The crew, at sailing, consisted of nine men, one colored boy, and a passenger from Kingston, Jamaica.

Of this number, three—Griffiths, second mate, and Elliott and Pierre of the crew—were taken down with the yellow fever within a few days of the arrival of the Home at quarantine.

Griffiths absconded from quarantine June 30th, the day after his arrival, and died at his home, in Philadelphia, on July 6th. Elliott was taken sick at quarantine on July 2d, and recovered. Pierre was taken sick July 8th, after release from quarantine, and died in the municipal hospital in Philadelphia.

Besides, the pilot, Stephen Bennett, who had been five days on the Home (from June 25th to 30th), was taken sick at Wilmington, on his way to the breakwater, July 2d, and died in Philadelphia, whither he came, on July 6th. These cases were, undoubtedly, yellow fever, and were seen and examined by competent physicians, and I cannot see that there can be a possible doubt that in each case the disease was contracted from the Home. This makes it a matter of absolute certainty that she was an infected ship.

By orders of Dr. Thompson, the Lazaretto physician, the vessel was put in quarantine, and, by resolution of the board of health, ordered to be cleaned, fumigated, and disinfected. She took up, at first, a position about four hundred yards from the quarantine landing. The diagrams accompanying the report of the board of health (which was by both sides agreed to be given in evidence) show very satisfactorily the several positions of the vessel. In the disinfection of the vessel, the removal of the cargo was necessary. As the cargo consisted of logwood, which appears to be a substance not capable of retaining or propagating infection, and is so classed in the quarantine laws, hereinafter to be referred to, it was ordered to be unloaded in barges or lighters. About the 11th of July three barges or lighters came down to the Lazaretto, and discharge of cargo commenced. The first lighter (name unknown) received the deck load of logwood, and on July 13th left, without permission, for the city (for the quarantine authorities claimed the right of detaining the lighters also), and came up to the logwood wharf on Windmill island, opposite the city. No sickness seems to have affected her crew, or to be traceable to this lighter or her crew or cargo.

On the 13th or 14th of July the hatches of the vessel were opened for the removal of the cargo, and on the 15th Dr. Thompson permitted her to be brought up to the government wharf, lying somewhat lower down the river than the quarantine wharf, to facilitate unloading. This second position is also well shown by the diagrams attached to the report of the board of health.

This government wharf adjoins a government store house, and about one hundred and forty yards to the northwest of it is a public house known as Pepper's; at about four hundred yards, and further to the west, is the house known as Miller's. The quarantine buildings lie some two hundred yards to the northeast of this second position of the Home, and Dr. Thompson's house some hundred and fifty yards from it in the direct line from the Home to the hospital building. The prevailing wind was from southwest, blowing directly from the Home towards the quarantine buildings.

The Lazaretto had been unhealthy during the spring and early summer; ... low and is surrounded in great measure by marsh. There had been unusual overflows also, and resulting thereform, considerable malaria, and consequently intermittent fever, mostly of a mild type, had prevailed that season in the vicinity of Lazaretto. Up to this time, however, the yellow fever had been confined, as before mentioned, to the crew and pilot of the brig Home. At this time, however, the disease suddenly appeared among the crews of the barges moored alongside of the brig, the inhabitants of Pepper's house, and of the Lazaretto. This outbreak seems clearly not to have been due to any contagion with the crew of the Home; they had mostly scattered before this, and no case can be traced to contact with either those who themselves had or had not yellow fever; besides, the general view of medical experts seems to be that yellow fever is not contagious in any degree whatever, and this view, of which the learned Dr. La Roche, recently deceased, was the celebrated exponent, is entirely borne out by all the facts of this epidemic. Nor can this epidemic, in my opinion, be attributed to local causes at the quarantine grounds.

The overflows had passed, and the persons who had suffered from malarious fever, improved, nor is there any evidence of outbreaks of yellow fever in this latitude from any such indigenous cause, except in a few alleged cases in large cities, where there were other distinct elements of foulness and infection apart from mere malaria; even these cases are somewhat doubtful, but granting, as seems indeed probable, that the outbreak of yellow fever in Swanson street in this city in the end of August, 1870, was owing to local causes, no analogy can be found between the condition of Swanson street and the Lazaretto. The Lazaretto is well and carefully and neatly kept in order and scrupulous cleanliness. The population of the vicinity is in the neighborhood of one hundred souls; and while from the location it is liable to ordinary malaria, there is absolutely nothing to render it a place where yellow fever could be generated. But we do not have to look far for the cause of this outbreak of disease. The hatches of the Home were opened about the 13th or 14th of July; by this, the confined, foul, infected air accumulated in the hold of the vessel since it left the West Indies, was let loose, and slowly blew and spread over the quarantine grounds and vicinity. The evidence is strong of the distinct, powerful and fetid effluvia perceived by the witnesses to proceed from the brig when passing to leeward of her. The first victims were the persons employed in the barges moored alongside the brig, and who were actually employed in unloading the logwood from the hold; five out of six of these persons had the fever. These persons also lived and slept on the lighter until removed to quarantine hospital. Next were the inmates of the Pepper House, situated nearest to the second position of the Home, although not directly in the course of the prevailing wind from the vessel, which blew rather directly over quarantine; the earliest taken of this family, however, had been down to see the vessel at the wharf, or had passed directly across the current of air blowing from her on their way to and from quarantine. Lastly, the inmates of the quarantine grounds were attacked. I am entirely satisfied from the evidence, that this yellow fever epidemic came entirely from the foul, infected air in the hold of the Home, forced by the prevailing winds on the adjacent shores, and I so decide. This is in entire accordance with Dr. La Roche's view of the usual course of yellow fever infection. The discharge of the cargo was finished July 19th, and the disinfection and cleansing of the vessel was proceeded in, under the direction of the authorities of quarantine. The bundles, called "filthy rags," by Dr. Thompson, but which other witnesses speak of as clean sail clippings, were seized by the United States custom house authorities as not in the manifest. They were regarded as dangerous, as having been in the cabin of the captain who had died of yellow fever, and were therefore burned on the government wharf by order of the board of health.

The cargo of the brig, as above mentioned, had been discharged into the three barges or lighters above mentioned. One, name unknown, had gone up into the city, and no ill consequences seem to have prevailed among her crew, probably owing to the portion of cargo taken by her being the deck load, and her having left before the opening of the hatches. The other barges the quarantine authorities assumed the right of detaining there, were the Kirkpatrick and the Madison. Most of their crews had yellow fever; they were treated at the quarantine hospital; the plaintiffs were obliged to pay their board, &c., at the hospital; also demurrage, &c., to the owners of the lighters; to recover these amounts is part of plaintiff's claim.

While this epidemic was running its fatal course at the Lazaretto, the cause of the infection, the Home had been under Dr. Thompson, the Lazaretto physician's directions, cleansed and fumigated. This, of course, could not be done until discharge of cargo. From the nineteenth July, the date of the accomplishment of this, until August 4th, when, by a mistake as to the orders of the board of health, she was permitted to come up to the city, covers therefore a period of some fifteen days for her disinfection.

We now come to the circumstance of the release of the brig Home, and of her being permitted to come up to Philadelphia, and then sent back to Lazaretto by the board of health. This seemed, at the first blush, a very important element in the case; but, as will be seen from the light afterwards thrown upon it, has not materially affected my decision. I am entirely satisfied that this permission of the vessel to come up was an error, on the part of the quarantine officers, based on a supposed order of the board of health which had no real existence. The minutes of the board of health make it clear there was no such order. Both the quarantine master, Gartside, and Dr. Thompson were then sick, and died shortly afterwards of the fever. One of them said, or was understood to say, that an order had come down. From their illness, and the confusion at quarantine caused by the ravages of the fever, no search was made for the order; but Dr. Taylor, who had just come down to take charge, permitted her to go up. Whether an order for the release of one of the barges was mistaken for an order to release the brig, or whether the mistake occurred from the commencement of the delirium of the fever, seems doubtful, but there can be no doubt it was a mere mistake.

When she reached Windmill Island, August 5th, 1870, the board of health ordered her immediate return to quarantine. The consignees and captain of the vessel declined to do this, and the board of health, by John E. Addicks, the health officer took possession of the Home, and took her back to quarantine on August 8th, 1870. Here she was anchored at a point somewhat higher up the river than the Lazaretto, and well out in the stream. The consignees and master threatened and spoke of abandonment in consequence of this seizure, but certainly as a matter of fact no abandonment took place, for somewhat later the consignees sent a watchman down to the vessel, and afterwards a second watchman. After her return to quarantine, the vessel seems to have been again whitewashed, and her pumps cleansed with carbolic acid. The yellow fever prevailed for some short time longer at quarantine, but in its new position no infection can be traced to the Home, except one case, hereafter to be mentioned. No infection seems traceable to her while at Windmill Island, but all the evidence is that the outbreak of yellow fever in Swanson street in the latter part of August was entirely sporadic. When the Home first moved down to her new position above the Lazaretto, she was in charge of two men placed on board by the board of health. Kugler testifies that both these men, Smith and Wilson, were sick, but neither appear to have had distinctively yellow fever. Mr. Addicks attributes this to their not being allowed to go below deck. The watchman sent down by consignees succeeded them about August 18th, when they became sick. About the same time a man named Carpenter, a new nurse at the Lazaretto, was sent aboard to help pump; he was taken with yellow fever; but his disease may have been contracted possibly from a new focus of infection at the Lazaretto, which Dr. Taylor thinks was established there, by the number of cases there treated and not from the Home. While in the charge of the watchman sent by the consignees, the Home was robbed. She had, besides her own ropes, &c., a great deal of extra hawser and some extra canvas. All this was stolen. How the robbery occurred seems doubtful. We have a second-hand account given to Kugler by the watchman, that he had been violently boarded up in the cabin by the robbers. In any event this watchman was promptly discharged by Cook, the captain of the Home, and a new one employed. For this loss the plaintiffs claim damages. As to the condition of the vessel when returned to Lazaretto, there seems some conflict of testimony. Dr. Taylor thinks she had ceased to be an infecting cause, though prudence demanded her longer detention; but Dr. Goodman perceived a peculiar odor from her hold, and considered her not clean. On the whole, I am not satisfied that she was on the 4th or 8th of August properly cleansed and disinfected. In fact there had been up to that time but some fifteen days from the discharge of her cargo to clean her.

The Home was then detained at quarantine in spite of repeated appeals for her release, until November 2d, when her discharge was order, nearly three months. She was at last released, November 7th. When this occurred she was found to have sustained serious damage from opening of seams, &c., from exposure to the sun, which necessitated recaulking. It was in evidence that this might have been prevented by constant washing of the deck or by spreading tarpaulins. There was no evidence before me as to how much of this damage occurred prior to, and how much after, August 4th, the date prior to which plaintiffs admitted the detention to be lawful, and there was no satisfactory evidence as to the condition the vessel in this respect on her arrival. Kugler, the steward, describes her as very rusty when she reached quarantine. During the whole period of the detention the plaintiffs engaged a new master, Captain James Cook, who remained in Philadelphia, urging her release, and making, daily visits to quarantine, to see after the vessel; for his wages and expenses here plaintiffs claim to recover, as also, for Mr. Currier's expenses in a journey to Philadelphia to see after his brig. During her entire detention application seems to have been made almost daily for her release, and no definite refusal given or period fixed, but the plaintiffs seem to have been in constant expectation of an immediate liberation during all this time. During this period an application was made by plaintiffs for permission to take the vessel up to port Richmond, load her with coal, and then take her north, the plaintiffs pledging themselves not to stop at the city or to delay the loading. This application was made formally in writing, and was met with a verbal refusal. Mr. Currier testifies that he then applied for permission to take in coal or ballast from lighters at the Lazaretto and sail north. This request appear to have been verbal and informal, and was informally refused, Mr. Currier says. Mr. Steele, the chairman of Lazaretto committee, does not remember this request, and thinks such an application as the last mentioned would have been granted. But I think the weight of the evidence is that such an application was made, and either refused, or more probably, neglected. As before mentioned before the vessel was finally released the owners were compelled to pay bills for hospital, &c., for lighters, crews, watchmen, provisions, towage of vessel to Windmill Island, &c., for which, as paid under compulsion, plaintiffs claim to recover.

This closes the history of the facts. With regard to the application of the law to them, it may first be premised that it seems undisputed that the board of health are the servants of the city of Philadelphia, entrusted by acts of 1854 and 1855 with the same functions, as by the acts of 1818, &c., the former independent board of health had. The act of 1859, making the board non-elective, makes no change in its relations to the city. There is therefore no question but that the action is well brought against the city of Philadelphia, and if the old board as a body politic would have been liable, the defendants are liable here.

On the other hand, there is no allegation of malice, or corruption, or improper motive, against the board of health, and if they have erred they have done so honestly.

Further a decision in plaintiffs' favor by no means implies that the board of health have not on the whole acted wisely and for the public good. Public officers must often take the responsibility of acting outside of law in cases of emergency, and their action may cause private injuries which rerequire compensation in damages, and yet their action may be highly commendable in a public point of view. The blowing up of buildings to stop conflagrations, and many other takings of private property for public use, are familiar illustrations of this; and it can well be conceived that in view of the excitability of the public mind, and the panic that readily arises on any apprehension of the approach of pestilence, quarantine officers might act wisely in detaining an entirely innocent ship, if for any reason, by permitting her to come up, there would be a chance of panic arising; but it cannot be doubted in any such case, the municipality whose servants took this responsibility would be bound to compensation.

It was contended, however, for the city, that under the act of 1818 (June 29th), City Digest, pp. 19 & 20, the Board of Health have an unlimited discretion in all cases where their jurisdiction attaches (as it cannot be fairly disputed it did to the Home in this case); that the words of the act, "shall be detained such further time as the board of health may deem necessary," gave them an absolute discretion in the matter, for an abuse of which they would be individually liable, but the city in no event responsible. The counsel for defendants also argued, by way of illustration, that the board of health could not be restrained by injunction from detaining a vessel. No authority was cited to sustain this position, and in my view it is untenable. The board of health are ministerial, not judicial officers; and as well argued by counsel for plaintiffs, the analogy to this case is truly found in those cases in which powers are given to municipal bodies with responsibility for its mode of exercise—avoidable damage requiring compensation; such as: Commissioners of Kensington v. Wood, 10 Barr, 95. An action for damages resulting from the grading and paving of Penn street, because the arrangement of level caused a flow of water on plaintiff's premises. Erie City v. Schwingle, 10 Harris, 385; Gas Co. v. N. Liberties, 2 Jones, 318; Pittsburgh v. Grier, 10 Harris, 65.

Were these quarantine authorities the servants of the commonwealth, they would be personally responsible for injuries to private property, but being the servants of a municipality, that body is liable for their acts. If the doctrine of eminent domain or the right of taking property for public use is called in to justify defendants, it requires, in all such cases, compensation; and their being no special method of obtaining redress prescribed, a common law action in the case is appropriate. As counsel for the plaintiff very ably argued, if it is claimed that the act authorizes without compensation, the detention of vessels or taking of property (which such detention clearly amounts to), further than the necessity of quarantine requires, just so far would the act be unconstitutional, as taking private property for public use without compensation. No such construction, however, should be put on the law, for it is clear to me it is intended to authorize detention, so long as it shall reasonably be deemed necessary. See U. S. v. Russell, 13 Wallace, 628. Bishop v. Mayor, 2 U. S. Law Mag. 150.

Quarantine proper, the detention of a foul or infected vessel, and the proper disinfection and cleaning of her, is eminently beneficial for the individual trader, as well as for the public. But if we go beyond this and allow that the quarantine officers should have an absolute discretion not subject to revision or responsibility, save in case of misfeasance there is strong danger of the rights of the individual being sacrificed to an imagined public necessity. The trader would be placed in a most unhappy position, and there would be practically no restraint upon the most arbitrary and unreasonable detentions. Nor would this construction be even beneficial to the defendants: it would certainly be far better for the city's commerce to have it known that though in certain cases where suspicion existed, vessels would be detained at quarantine, yet in all cases where injustice was done, it would be compensated, than for vessel owners to be under apprehension of an arbitrary and unlimited detention by an irresponsible board. I decide therefore, that the discretion vested in the board of health, is a reasonable, not an absolute one, and that we must upon the evidence, judge whether or not the detention was in fact proper, or rather when, if at any time, it ceased to be so. Now to apply my conclusions as to the law, to the facts as I have ascertained them.

First, I am entirely clear that plaintiffs are entitled to recover for the detention of the lighters and every expense resulting to them from this detention. Also, for the board, &c., of the crews of the lighters at the quarantine hospital, which they were compelled to pay. The act of Assembly gives no right whatever to detain lighters, even if infected. The learned counsel for the city endeavored to show that the lighter coming down to Lazeretto from the city, and proposing to return, should be treated as a "vessel from a domestic port," but this is certainly a very strained construction, and by examining the act on the question of discharge of cargo, it is easy to see the meaning. It is provided that if the cargo be of a nature not capable of retaining infection, "it may be conveyed immediately to the city in lighters."

Logwood is included in dye-wood and is defined in the act as non-infectious. Now under this act it was either absolutely the duty of the board of health, if the act be mandatory, to allow the logwood constituting the cargo to be transferred to the city in lighters, or if the words are permissive merely, they might have refused to allow the cargo to be placed in lighters, and ordered it to be unloaded on the dock at the Lazaretto. But when it once was in the lighters, they had lost their entire control of it, and of the lighters, it is hard to see how they ever acquired jurisdiction. I must, therefore, treat the detention as entirely unauthorized, and allow the plaintiffs' claim for demurrage paid by them to the owners of the barges; there is no reason to suppose that this is more than was justly due, and having been actually paid by plaintiffs, the onus was on defendant to show that it was excessive, which has not been done. In deciding that this detention of the lighters was unauthorized. I must not be understood as condemning the action of the board of health in the matter, although the evidence is strongly preponderating that yellow fever is not contagious in any degree, and that the cargo discharged in the lighters was non-infectious, yet in view of the illness and death of so many of the lighter's crew, and of the unreasoning panic which might have prevailed, had these barges with their crews sickening from the infectious wind blowing from the Home, to which they had been exposed, come up to the city; I am not prepared to say that the board did not act wisely in detaining them, but then this must clearly be allowed for as a taking of private property for public use, and compensatory damages given to the plaintiffs. As to the expenses of the crews of the lighters, it is not denied the plaintiffs were compelled to pay these bills before the vessel was released; the case, therefore, stands as if the city were suing the owners of the Home for the board, expenses, &c., of the crews of these lighters at quarantine hospital; this claim would be for damages of the most indirect character. There certainly is no obligation of the kind implied in the chartering a lighter, and if the city can make the owners of the Home pay for the nursing, &c., of these men because they caught yellow fever while unloading her, it is hard to see why an infected vessel should not be bound for every damage or injury which could result to any one whom the disease might attack. This could not be set up unless it was held that owners of vessels who were so unfortunate as to have been attacked by disease, became thereby tort feasors if their ships were brought into port. Even if the men themselves could have sued the owners of the Home for damages, it could not be argued that the action could be maintained by a hotelkeeper, with whom a person who had caught the infection had lodged, and who had not paid his board. I must, therefore, allow this claim as presented by plaintiffs. The sixth section of the act of 1818, allowing claim for expenses clearly only applied to the crew of the vessel.

Of course, the bills plaintiffs were compelled to pay for provisions supplied to the lighters, by the board of health, during the detention, must follow the same rule, the detention being unlawful. Counsel for the city stated also, and one of the witnesses, Mr. Steele, testified that the city had sustained great damage from the epidemic of yellow fever at the Lazaretto, contracted from the Home, but it seemed rather thrown in as a make-weight than intended to be set up as a set-off to plaintiffs' claim, and, in fact, was too indefinite in shape to call for any decision from me upon it. And in no event could such a claim be maintained; disease must, unless under very exceptional circumstances, be viewed in law as the act of God, and when a vessel so unfortunate as to be infected comes to a quarantine station, she comes just where she ought to come. A claim could as well be maintained by a hospital for damages by reason of its nurses, &c., contracting disease from a patient.

I have stated already that from the evidence I am satisfied that the release of the brig Home on August 4th was a mistake merely, and is to be simply treated as such, and ought not to prejudice the defendant's rights. It is clear, however, that as it was a mistake solely of the city's officers, the expenses directly incurred by plaintiffs in consequence thereof, must be refunded. These are the expenses of towage of the vessel to the city paid by plaintiffs, and the expenses of towage back to Lazaretto, which plaintiffs were, to procure the release of the vessel, compelled to refund the city. I therefore allow to the plaintiffs these amounts as claimed.

To return now to the main question, as to the plaintiffs' claim for damages for the detention of their vessel after August 4th, I have stated my view, that this is to be decided on its merits, that the board of health are ministerial not judicial officers, and that their discretion is a reasonable, and not an absolute one, but as to the fact whether the detention of the vessel after August 4th, was reasonable, I cannot go so far as plaintiffs claim., I concede to plaintiffs that the detention of vessels must be for cleansing, and that a detention for a longer period than is required for the proper purification of a vessel and a reasonable period of delay to test the fact of her being clean, would not be justifiable; but I am not prepared to say that a period of three weeks can be laid down as a limit within which vessels must be cleansed, nor will the custom of other ports have any but an indirect bearing on this point. The evidence shows that the time required for purification depends upon the age and condition of the vessel; that a ship as old and filthy as the Home required a long period to clean, and probably could never be pronounced absolutely clean; her purification would be but relative at best. Then there were actually but fifteen days from the discharge of her cargo until her mistaken release on August 4th. There is also positive evidence, Dr. Goodman's, that she was not a clean, unoffending vessel on her return to Lazaretto, August 8th, and there are further several doubtful cases of sickness arising after that time, and one clear case of yellow fever, that of Carpenter, who was taken sick August 18th, but who may have contracted the disease at quarantine. I must, therefore, decline to consider the Home as entitled to be released August 4th, and her detention, thereafter, unlawful. This detention actually lasted, however, up to November 7th. The resolution was passed November 2d, but she was detained until the bills were paid, November 7th, a period of nearly three months. Now, on the same principle, I am bound to decide that the detention of the Home during so long a period was unnecessary as an unreasonable exercise of discretion, and therefore unlawful, and to be compensated in damages. In fact, it does not appear that any real danger could have been apprehended from the Home for so long a period, certainly nothing was done to cleanse her after the whitewashing, &c., done when she first came back to the Lazaretto. Her detention would seem rather to have been a matter of policy, that inasmuch as she was publicly known as infected with yellow fever, it was more prudent not to permit her up until, from the lateness of the season and the disappearance of the Swanson street epidemic (which, as before mentioned, was proved to have arisen from sources unknown, but entirely distinct from any traceable to the home), in the end of September, the public fear of yellow fever had died away. In fact, Dr. La Roche says, in his report on the yellow fever in 1870, p. 23, "she was, though apparently clean and disinfected, as a matter of precaution, ordered back to the quarantine station, where she was taken by the health officers, and remained at a proper distance from the buildings and under strict surveillance till the close of the quarantine season, when she was released."

Now, it must be conceded that, however wise as a matter of public policy, it may have been to detain a clean vessel, yet such a detention cannot, as regards the owners of the vessel, be treated as a reasonable one within quarantine powers, but must be treated as a taking for public use, for which compensation is due. On evidence given before me, I have considered that the detention for a period beyond August 8th was justifiable, and it is somewhat hard to fix a point where, in this view, it ceased to be so. Allowing, however, a week after the return to Lazaretto, for the fresh cleansing, and some two weeks longer for a reasonable delay to test her condition, I think it may fairly be said that on the 2d of September she should have been released. If Charpenter's and the other reputed slight cases were due to infection from the brig, they would seem, from their appearing from 15th to 18th, to have been contracted from 8th to 12th, the time she was being whitewashed and having pumps cleaned. This would make two weeks delay from 18th appear reasonable. I therefore allow the claim for demurrage from September 2d, until her release, November 7th, including the five days during which she was detained, after the order for her release was given, to compel the payment of the bills which I have decided were not justly due. This decision makes it unnecessary for me to discuss at length the question of the liability of defendants for demurrage, &c., during the period from refusal of the board of health to permit her to take in ballast from lighters at Lazaretto; but I am clear that on this ground, also I must award the plaintiffs demurrage, &c., from the date of the application. The words of the act, on this point, are: "Provided, That such ship or vessel, after she shall have been thoroughly cleansed and purified, if no malignant disease appear on board, may be allowed to take in freight at the Lazaretto by means of lighters, and proceed to sea." From their connection, following the clause that the vessel shall be detained to such further time as the board deem necessary, I am disposed to consider this proviso as mandatory, and as giving the vessel this as a privilege or right.

As I have held in my review of the evidence, I am satisfied that Mr. Currier made the request to members of the board verbally, and was verbally refused. There is nothing in the act to require a formal written application. The request which Mr. Currier made formally was informally refused; he was simply told that the board would not consent, and there does not appear any formal entry of this refusal even on their minutes. Mr. Currier does not seem to have received any intimation that to secure this permission he should make formal application in writing. The other application, to go up to Port Richmond to take in coal and go immediately to sea, would seem to have been a sufficiently reasonable one, in view of the "apparently clean condition" of the vessel in the end of August or beginning of September, but was not within the peremptory words of the act; in any event, had a formal reply been made to this letter by the board of health, offering permission for the brig to be loaded from lighters at the Lazaretto, the city would have been freed from liability on this ground. The period of this request and refusal is not definitely ascertained, but it is not far, I think, from September 1st, so that I think I am, on this ground, also right in fixing that as a period for the beginning the allowance of demurrage.

The view I have taken of the detention with regard to the claims for demurrage applies with the same force to expenses necessarily incurred by plaintiffs in care of their vessel during the same period. I therefore allow their claim for the wages and support of watchmen from September 2d. Also for captain's wages and board; some question was made as to the captain's rate of board at Arch street House being too high, but no evidence was offered in support of this point, and it was shown that it is a usual place for masters of vessels to stop. I can see no reason why the expenses of the master's trips to and from Lazaretto to Philadelphia during the same period should not be allowed; it was necessary he should be, from time to time, in both places, to see after the vessel at Lazaretto, and to urge her release with the health officer and board of health here. From much of these charges the board of health could have freed themselves, had they made up their mind how long the vessel was to be detained. Had they told the owners in the end of August, the vessel must remain two months longer, the master's board and wages during those two months, and his travelling expenses might have been saved. The claim for expenses of owners coming to the city in August and November, are not allowed. I have held that in August the vessel was rightly detained, and Mr. Currier's journey in November was induced by her release, not by her detention, and there is no evidence he would not have come on at whatever time she was released. Besides, the city is already charged with a master's wages expressly engaged to look after the vessel. No evidence was given to support the claim for "commission $38," and it is disallowed. Three points remain still open. The claim for value of rags destroyed on the government wharf; the claim for sails, rope, &c., stolen, and the claim for damages to the vessel from exposure to sun.

First, as to the rags, I must disallow this claim on several grounds; first, the rags appear not to have belonged to the owners of the vessel, but to have been the private property of the deceased Captain Phillips. Secondly, they were seized by the United States custom house officers as not on the manifest, and even if they had not been on this ground confiscated, they were subject to a duty of an amount, not shown in evidence, which might have absorbed their value. The evidence is doubtful as to their character; some witnesses called them clean clippings. Dr. Thompson, filthy rags. Rags are materials capable of retaining infection, and almost impossible to disinfect. Dr. Thompson considered their destruction necessary, and although there is no provision in the act of Assembly for the destruction of infected articles, yet I think it cannot be maintained that infected rags would have any value, so that damages could be obtained for their destruction. Dr. Thompson considered them infected, and they had been certainly in the cabin of the captain who had died of yellow fever.

Second, as to the robbery of the sails, hawsers, &c. The plaintiff's claim is for an amount of upwards of twelve hundred dollars expended to replace the lost articles, &c. This amount would seem, in any event, somewhat too large, as not making sufficient allowance for the probably deteriorated condition of the articles stolen; but as I propose to reject the claim, it is unnecessary for me to go into that question.

I am entirely satisfied that there was no abandonment. It is true that the consignees and master threatened to abandon when the board of health sent the brig back to quarantine; but it clearly appears that this intention was reconsidered and never carried into effect, since, at the notification of the board of health, the consignees sent down a watchman to take care of the brig. That the facts on which my conclusion that there was no abandonment is based may clearly appear, I insert, as requested, copies of the resolution of the board of health as to the request to the consignees to send a watchman and of the notice sent to the consignees by Mr. Addicks, the health officer. The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the health officer be directed to notify the consignees of the brig Home that he returned her safely to the Lazaretto on Saturday night; that she is there at their risk, and that they be requested to send a person or persons to take care of and watch her, in lieu of two men stationed on board by the health officer for that purpose."

Passed August 9th, 1870.

The letter of Mr. Addicks is as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, August 9, 1870.

MESSRS. KNIGHT & SON,

No. 120 North Delaware avenue:

GENTLEMEN:—As consignees of brig Home, I hereby inform you, as I told you on Saturday, the 6th inst, at the custom house, that on that day I had received from the board of health instructions to have the brig taken to the Lazaretto forthwith; both you and the captain declined to obey my order to do so. I found the brig at east side of Windmill Island, abandoned. I placed a pilot and four men aboard, and towed her down to the Lazaretto, at which place she was anchored at about 9 o'clock, P. M. I further placed two men aboard as watchmen. All the expenses incurred are charged to you and the owners of the brig Home. I now further notify you, by direction of the board of health, that you send down at once proper persons to take charge of the vessel, as she now remains at the Lazaretto at your risk, or all persons concerned as her owners.

Respectfully,
JOHN E. ADDICKS,
Health Officer.

The watchman was sent down, in compliance with this letter. This act seems to me distinctly a waiver of the threatened abandonment and a resumption of charge of the brig.

It was during the period while the brig was under the care of this man, sent by the consignees, and after the departure of the two men placed on board by the health officer, that the loss occurred. The manner of its occurrence is certainly doubtful; the watchman related that he had been forcibly boarded up in the cabin while the vessel was robbed; the captain engaged by the owners, Cook, however, concluded to remove him and replace him by another immediately upon the loss occurring; this would certainly argue that he thought there had been at least negligence on the part of this watchman. There was no reason to doubt that the owners might have placed additional force on board the vessel for its protection, if they desired; in fact, they were notified to send a person or persons, and it was well argued for the city that as the owners employed a master and one watchman, with whose wages and expenses they charge the city, it was for them to employ also such other servants as to make their property secure. On the other hand, counsel for plaintiffs contended that the rule of quarantine forbidding persons going on board the brig from coming to Philadelphia, rendered it impossible for the consignees or master to visit the brig and ascertain what was necessary; that it was the act of the board of health placing the brig in this situation, and it was their duty therefore to see she was properly protected. They sought also to apply the analogy of tow-boat cases, where the tug, having the guidance and direction, is made responsible to the towed for accidents befalling them. It seems to me this analogy is unsound, because in this case there was not, in fact, an absolute resignation or giving up the management of the brig to the board of health by its owners; on the contrary, a certain care and superintendence of it was still taken by them; to make the analogy apply, the injury to the towed vessel would have to be by robbery or something similar, which its own crew might fairly be expected to provide against. It seems to me, on the whole, a case of concurrent negligence. Without denying that perhaps the negligence of the board of health was greater than that of plaintiffs, since they were acquainted with the state of the river as to police, &c., and should have made proper provision for the protection of vessels detained by them; yet I cannot but impute some negligence to plaintiffs, through their servants and agents, the consignees and master and watchman.

First, in plaintiffs' injudicious choice of a watchman.

Second, in not sending a sufficient number of watchmen to properly protect their vessel, or applying for leave to send them.

Third, in the watchman, in negligently keeping his watch and suffering himself to be boarded up in the cabin while the brig was robbed. In this I may be in error, but the master was certainly of this opinion, since he dismissed the watchman. Were this case in admiralty, the rules of maritime law would compel an apportionment of the damage according to the degree of negligence proved against each party; but as it is in a common law court, contributory negligence shown in the plaintiffs precludes their recovery. I believe the robbery occurred during the period when I have considered the detention justifiable; but that does not alter the position of the parties in this particular, since, though defendants would, if the detention were unjustifiable at the time of loss, be held to a stricter rule of diligence; yet, in either event, in an action on the case, contributory negligence on the part of plaintiffs conducing to the loss would prevent their recovery. The plaintiffs' claim for reimbursement for the loss of the sails and hawsers must, therefore, be disallowed. No proof was given for the item 28, bending sails, and I do not see how it could be allowed if proved.

The remaining claim is for damage to the vessel by the opening of the seams, by reason of exposure to the sun at quarantine, which necessitated recaulking, at an expense of $200. There was a further claim for $47.35 for damage to the boat, which, however, was excluded, as not being shown in any way to be the consequence of the detention. It was contended against the allowance of the claim for caulking, that this damage could have been prevented by frequent washing of the decks or spreading of tarpaulins. The first was impossible, without there had been a larger force on board, and the second became impracticable after the sails were stolen. Besides, the rule of the quarantine, which prevented the master from visiting the vessel, rendered it impossible for him to judge properly what ought to be done to guard against this evil, and a watchman, sent down from the city, would probably be ignorant of what measures were necessary for the purpose; and if a larger force had been employed on board the vessel, the wages and expenses I would have allowed them would probably have been as much as this claim for scraping and caulking. It is more difficult to say how much should be allowed, and to adjust the amount of injury of this kind, due to the detention I have held unlawful. On the whole, I decide to allow half the amount claimed, or $100, treating the rest of the injury as resulting during the voyage and the lawful detention. To sum up, therefore, I award the plaintiffs:

In compliance with the desire of many prominent members of the Bar, the Publishers have endeavored to produce a handsome book, full and complete in its contents. Owing to the sale being limited to the Philadelphia Bar, to whom only it can be of use, and in consequence of the expense attending its publication, the price has been fixed at a figure that may seem apparently high,—but the Publishers, to reimburse themselves for the outlay they have been subject to, have been compelled to decline giving discounts to any one, so as to enable them to give the Bar the advantage of the lowest possible price for which the Book can be made.

The volume has been carefully compiled, and has also been revised by the Judges of the different Courts, and endorsed by Rules of the same. They therefore contain not only the latest, but also the only full publication of those rules, as they now stand on the minutes of the different Courts.

United States District Court.

IN ADMIRALTY.

THE SKYLARK.

1. The District Court in admiralty has the right to exercise equity powers in the distribution of a surplus arising from a sale under decree to the parties entitled to such surplus, whether by Federal or State law; and it is immaterial whether these parties have maritime liens.
2. The reason is, because there is a fund in court which cannot be taken out except by its order, and parties having rights in the vessel can only exercise them by coming into this court.
3. A purchaser under execution from a State court has no rights as against a decree in this court enforcing a maritime lien.
4. If he became the purchaser, the amount which he bid must be applied on his debt, and the balance only can be proved as a claim in this court.
5. It seems, that no claim would be valid as against a mortgage duly recorded under the act of July 29th, 1850, except the lien by bottomry therein excepted.
6. Also, that a State Legislature, by declaring a claim to be a lien upon a vessel, cannot override a mortgage duly recorded according to the law of Congress.

The Skylark belonged to the Lake Michigan Transportation Company in 1868, during which season various claims against the vessel were created. On the 15th of October, John Barker sued out an attachment against her in the State court at Chicago, obtained judgment, and at the sale under execution, bought her in for about $300.

Subsequently a libel for wages of seamen was filed in this court, upon which a decree was obtained, and on the 14th of March, 1869, she was sold for $4,150, the money brought into court and all the maritime claims paid.

Barker then filed a claim to the surplus as owner of the vessel, and other parties filed claims as material men, for supplies, &c.

DRUMMOND, J. These claimants, it is conceded, have not what are termed maritime liens. Their liens are under the laws of the State—either of Illinois or of Michigan. The question of distribution came before the court at a former day, between Barker, the purchaser under the attachment, and the assignee in bankruptcy of the company—the original owner of the vessel. The question arose whether the vessel belonged to Barker or to the assignee. The court held that as between these two parties Barker was the owner, because he had purchased at a sale on a final process, issued before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and that he had acted in good faith so far as the court could see, and, therefore, his right was paramount. The present, however, is not a controversy between two parties claiming to be owners of the vessel, but between two parties claiming a right to the surplus remaining after sale under a decree which overrides all other rights, as well claims under the State law, as under the attachment at the instance of Mr. Barker.

There can be no doubt of the right of this court exercising equity powers, as a court of admiralty always exercises them in a proper case, to distribute the surplus to the parties who are entitled to it, either by Federal or State law, and it is immaterial whether the parties thus claiming the surplus have maritime liens or not. It is not on that account that the court exercises this power as a court of admiralty, but because there is a fund in court which cannot be taken out of court except by its order. Parties having rights to this vessel cannot exercise them, except by coming into this court. The vessel has been sold under a paramount right, and the party who holds under the sale in admiralty, has, of course, a perfect title; therefore, they must come into this court that their rights may be adjudicated.

The point is, what are their claims upon this fund. It is insisted that because the court held as it did, between Barker and the assignee, that it must now hold, these parties having no maritime liens—that Barker's right is superior to theirs. It by no means follows. That was a question between two parties claiming to be owners. This is between creditors; and Barker as against this decree has no right whatever. It is also insisted that as this court decided in the case of the proceeds of the Grace Greenwood, ante, that a mortgagee holding a ship under a mortgage recorded in conformity with the act of Congress of July 29th, 1850, had a prior right as against parties who had claims declared to be liens by the State law, that therefore the court must hold that Barker has a prior right. That is a non sequitur for the reason already stated. The question in that case was whether claims for supplies created after the mortgage was recorded, should override the rights of the mortgagee. In the absence of any special equities in favor of those claimants, it was held that the mortgage was a superior right.

The language of the act of 1850 is, that "no bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation or conveyance of any vessel or part of any vessel of the United States shall be valid as against any person other than the grantor or mortgagor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof, unless such bills of sale, &c., be recorded in the office of the collector of the customs where such vessel is registered or enrolled: Provided, That the lien by bottomry on any vessel created during her voyage by a loan of money, &c., shall not lose its priority, or be in any way affected by the provisions of this act," 9 U. S. Statutes at Large, 440. Bearing in mind the language of the Supreme Court in the Reed case, Pratt v. Reed, 19 Howard, 359, which is familiar to all admiralty lawyers, it is doubtful whether any claim, except in the character mentioned in this proviso, would be valid as against a mortgage properly recorded under this act of Congress.

I wish it distinctly understood that I shall not hold, unless told so to do by the Supreme Court of the United States, that every claim which a State Legislature may declare to be a lien against a vessel, shall override a mortgage properly recorded under the law of Congress. These were the reasons that produced the decision in the Grace Greenwood case, to which decision I adhere.

These parties stand, so far as their claims in equity are concerned, upon an equal footing. Barker bid in the Skylark at his own risk, obtaining no other title than the judgment, execution and sale gave him, and, as against the decree of this court, no title whatever. As a creditor, he has no superior right to these claimants. If the judgments obtained by him were for supplies, so are these claims for supplies. It is simply a question of how this fund is to be distributed, and what are the equities operating upon its distribution. I believe the sum bid for the vessel by Barker was much less than the amount of the judgment. The amount for which he obtained his title, of course, must stand as a satisfaction upon the debt, but the balance, provided it has the same equity that the claim of these other parties have, shall be treated in the same way. The claim of Mr. Stevens will be disallowed altogether. He was a stockholder in the company, and superintendent in the management of its business, and in the running of its boats. I think it would be unjust that he should have the same advantage as third parties, who furnished supplies on the faith of his contracts. I shall allow Barker to come in, and if he is on the same footing as the rest, I shall order the balance to be distributed among them pro rata.

United States Circuit Court.

MARSHALL v. WILLIAMS.

1. A commission merchant is liable to his principal if he sells goods contrary to instructions, or is guilty of negligence in the sale.
2. The receiving without objection accounts of sales made on credit, is a waiver of a previous instruction to sell for cash, and the merchant may afterward presume that he has the right to make further sales on credit.

The defendant, George F. Williams, while acting as the agent of the plaintiffs in selling oil on commission for them, sold on fifteen days' credit, on the 18th of January, 1867, ninety-two barrels to McCormick and Callender, who soon afterwards failed, whereupon plaintiffs brought this action to recover the value of the oil.

On the 16th of August, 1866, the plaintiffs had by letter instructed the defendant in selling oil for them to sell according to the "net cash rule." Nevertheless the oil subsequently sold by the defendant for the plaintiffs was sold not for cash, but on credit, sometimes more than fifteen days, sometimes less—and returns made accordingly.

Case tried before DRUMMOND, J., without a jury.

George Willard, Esq., for plaintiffs.

S. A. Goodwin, Esq., for defendant.

DRUMMOND, J. The defendant is accountable, in the first place, if he has sold the oil contrary to the instructions of the plaintiffs, and secondly, if he has been guilty of any negligence in the sale by which they have been damnified.

The testimony introduced as to the commercial meaning of these words, "net cash rule" is not of such a character that the court can place any stress upon it; the result seems to be that the language is interpreted according to the notion of each particular merchant. Some construed it in one way, and some in anothe There is no general understanding among commercial men applicable to the use of such language, therefore the court must place a legal construction upon it, which is that the oil was to be sold for cash. If the case stood upon that alone, then perhaps there would be no doubt that the plaintiffs could recover. But the subsequent transactions show that if that was the purport of the instructions, it was waived, and the business was done upon a different basis.

The credits given from time to time on sales by the defendant, were known to the plaintiffs, and if it was their intention to hold defendant up to the cash rule, they should have at once notified him that such sales were contrary to their instructions and that they must sell for cash. But having accepted without objection the accounts of sale made from time to time by the defendant, and drawn for and received the balances, it must be considered that their letter of the 16th of August was modified by these subsequent recognitions of the credits given by the defendant. Accordingly the presumption is that defendant had the right to sell to McCormick and Callender on fifteen days' credit in the same way as he had previously sold to other parties.

This is the construction that must be placed on the conduct of the plaintiffs unless it was the understanding and contract that the defendant was selling on a guaranty of the sales made. If that was so, and the plaintiffs were warranted in believing that it was so understood by the defendant, as a matter of course the change from cash to credit would not be objected to; but I doubt whether the plaintiffs could have so understood it. These sales and reports were made from time to time at the usual commissions charged. Now can it be possible that the defendant believed he was selling on a del credere commission and guaranteeing every sale that he made?

I cannot so interpret the conduct of the parties. I do not know what the facts may be in the commercial world. It may be that commission merchants are so anxious to get business that they may guaranty sales if they receive the property, and have the right to sell it, taking the ordinary commissions, but I did not suppose, and certainly it cannot be inferred from the testimony in this case that such practice prevails in Chicago; and therefore I cannot infer that that construction is to be given to the plaintiffs' conduct.

The only remaining question is, did the defendant act with reasonable diligence and good faith in the sales. Some things had occurred, undoubtedly, calculated to throw suspicion upon the commercial standing of McCormick and Callender, but it cannot be claimed in this case that those circumstances were known to the defendant, or to his agent. The agent who transacted the business expressly states that so far as he knew, he believed that McCormick and Callender were in good standing, and a suspicion as to their position seems not to have been known to a large number of the merchants engaged in the same kind of business, and of course may not have been known to the defendant.

It would be hard merely because a whisper is circulated among men affecting the standing of a merchant, that another should be held accountable for the fact, if it has been indicated to others, and not to himself. So that taking all the testimony together, I cannot say the defendant was guilty of any negligence in the sale of this property to McCormick and Callender. The weight of evidence is that their standing in the community was good at the time of this sale.

This is a hard case undoubtedly on plaintiffs, but somebody has to lose his money. It is a question whether it shall be lost by the defendant or plaintiffs. If the sale was at the owner's risk, then the owner should lose; if at the risk of the defendant, he should lose.

Plaintiffs by permission of the court took a nonsuit.

[Notes by the reporter.]

A sale by a factor contrary to the order of his principal, may be afterward affirmed by the receipt of the proceeds. Morse v. Smith, Dudley (S. C.), 248.

Where a commission merchant from time to time sends an account of sales to his principal, who makes no objection and draws for the balance of account rendered, it is a ratification of the sales, and the principal cannot recover for any alleged violation of instructions as to the terms of sale. Woodward v. Snydam, 11 Ohio, 360.

TWENTY-FIRST JUDICIAL DIST.

Court of Common Pleas of Schuylkill County.

THE GOVERNMENT NATIONAL BANK v. LUCAS & CO.

1. Under the provisions of the 57th section of the act of Congress, approved 3d June, 1864, relative to national currency, the State courts have concurrent jurisdiction with the Federal, for suits for penalties incurred for a violation of the said act.
2. Damages sounding in tort, unconnected with the matter in suit, are not admissible as a set-off in an action ex contractu.

Rule to show cause why judgment should not be entered for want of a sufficient affidavit of defence.

Opinion by WALKER, J. Delivered September 1st, 1873.

This is a suit brought for the recovery of two prommissory notes, one dated 15th July, 1872, for $2,500, and the other dated 26th September, 1873, for $4,000, each at four months, and a check for $3,000, dated 8th October, 1872, and payable 1st November, 1873, amounting in all to $9,500, drawn by Geo. J. Richardson to the order of the defendants, who endorsed the same and had them discounted by the plaintiffs, the proceeds of which the defendants received, less some eighteen per cent. discount. In addition, the affidavit alleges that within two years the plaintiff received $3,000 in excess of legal interest on other paper, and the defendants' claim, under the 30th section of the act of Congress of the 3d June, 1864, relative to national banks, double that amou in the nature of a set-off, as a penalty for the violation of the statute.

Two questions are raised:

1. As to the jurisdiction of the State courts under this act of Congress.

2. Whether the penalty given in this act (not growing out of the con act in this suit and which is in the nature of a tort), can be set off against the plaintiffs' claim in an action ex contractu.

Under the 9th section of the act of Congress of 24th September, 1789, called the judiciary act, the District Courts of the United States have exclusive original cognizance of all suits for penalties and forfeitures under the laws of the United States. U. S. Statutes at Large, vol. 3, 245.

By the 1st section of the act of Congress, approved 3d March, 1815, jurisdiction is conferred on the respective State and county courts, within or next adjoining a collection district, to take cognizance of all complaints, suits, and prosecutions for taxes, duties, fines, penalties, and forfeitures under any of the acts of Congress. Troubat & Haly Prac., vol. 1, part 1, 139.

The acts of 8th March, 1806, relative to revenue; of 21st February, 1793, relative to patents; and of 3d March, 1825, regulating the post office department, confer concurrent jurisdiction upon the State courts. Troubat & Haly, vol. 1, part 1, 140, 141; U. S. Statutes at Large, vol. 4, p. 113.

The act of 28th February, 1839, authorizes all pecuniary penalties and forfeitures under the laws of the United States to be sued for in the State or District Court wherein the action arose or the offender may be found. Kent's Com., vol. 1, p. 452 and notes.

The jurisdiction of the State and Federal tribunals, in cases arising under acts of Congress and otherwise, is ably and exhaustively discussed by Chancellor Kent in the first volume of the Commentaries, star page 388 to 405.

The rule seems to be that Congress cannot confer jurisdiction upon any courts but such as exist under the Constitution and laws of the United States, although, the State courts may exercise jurisdiction in cases authorized by the laws of the State, and not prohibited by the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal courts. Kent's Com., vol. 1, 446.

In Priggs v. Comth. of Pa. 16 Peters, 539, the court say that the State magistrates might, if they choose, exercise powers conferred upon them by acts of Congress, unless prohibited by State legislation. That is, the State courts are not bound, in consequence of an act of Congress, to assume and exercise jurisdiction, but may do so. See Wadleigh v. Veser, 3 Sand. 165; Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheaton, 1.

The 57th section of the act of 3d June, 1864, above referred to, provides that suits, actions, and proceedings under the act may be had in any Circuit, District or Territorial court of the United States, or in any State, county or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located. This clearly establishes the jurisdiction of the State courts.

2. The penalty incurred by the act is here sought to be set-off against the plaintiffs' claim. Can this be done? Or, in other words, can a tort not growing out of the transaction, be set-off in an action of assumpsit? The plaintiff admits that $438.75 were received as discounts on the notes and checks in question, and now asks judgment for the claim less this amount. As this excess of legal interest was received in discounting these particular notes and checks the affidavit as to this part is clearly sufficient.

The real question arises upon that part of the affidavit that alleges that $3,000 have been paid within two years in excess of the legal interest, and whether the defendants, under the act of Congress referred to, are entitled to a set-off in double that amount, it being admitted that these discounts were received in other transactions and on different notes.

Under the 2d section of the act of 28th May, 1858 (Purd. Dig. 803, P. L., p. 622), regulating the rate of interest, the excess above six per cent. per annum can be deducted from the debt by the borrower, but no action to recover back such excess of legal interest voluntarily paid can be sustained, unless the same shall have been commenced within six months from and after the time of payment. This act expressly repeals the first and second sections of the act of 2d March, 1723, the penal features of which are entirely omitted in the act of 1858. Under the old statute, as under the English statutes, usury consisted in taking more than the legal interest for a loan of money, and was, in some sort, a public offence, punishable by an action, "qui tam." Fitzsimmons v. Baum, 8 Wr. 32; Campbell v. Sloan, 12 P. F. S. 481. There is no doubt that this act of Congress is a penal statute, and an action of debt is the proper remedy. Harrisburg Bk. v. Comth. 2 Casey, 451. Since our act of 1858, case or assumpsit is the remedy for the excess of interest paid on usurious contracts. Heath v. Page, 12 Wr. 130, per Woodward, C. J.

The excess of interest over six per cent. is evidently the money of the borrower or debtor, which, when received by the creditor, he cannot retain, but holds for the use of the debtor, and for which an action of assumpsit lies. "It has no cast of a penalty." Heath v. Page, 13 P. F. S. 121, per Agnew, J.

If the affidavit alleged that the $3,000 were paid in excess of the legal interest, within six months, then under the authority of Thomas v. Shoemaker, 6 W. & S. 179, it would constitute a good defence. But the act of Assembly authorizing a set-off, does not comprehend matters of a tortuous nature. Kechlein v. Ralston, 1 Y. 571; Kechlein v. Mulhollin, 2 D. 237. And one tort cannot be set-off against another, 4 Tenn. Rep. 74. An action of tort cannot be maintained in connection with a mere contract, unless the misrepresentations be wilful. White v. Merritt, 3 Seld. 356. One trespass cannot be set-off against another consequent upon it. Waterman on Set-off, Deccupment and Counter Claim, 149 to 164. See also as bearing on same subject, and holding the same doctrine. Gibbs v. Mitchell, 2 Bay. 351; Lightner v. Martin, 2 McCord, 214; Slyback v. Jones, 9 Ind. 470; Douahew v. Henry, 4

E. D. Smith, 162; Crum v. Dresser, 2 Sandford, 120; Pattison v. Richards, 22 Barb. 143; Steven v. Blen, 39 Maine Rep. 420; Drake v. Cochroft, 4 E. D. Smith, 34; Wilson v. McElroy, 8 Casey, 82; Gogle v. Jacoby, 5 S. & R. 117; Fairman v. Fluck, 5 Watts, 516; Murry v. Williamson, 3 Binney, 135; Dunlop v. Speers, 3 Binny, 169; Warner v. Caulk, 3 Wharton, 193.

This set-off is for a penalty incurred in another and different transaction. In an action for work and labor, the defendant may defalcate damages for unskilful or careless work,, but he cannot set-off damages which plaintiff may have done to him in another and independent transaction. Charlton v. Alleghany City, 1 Grant, 208.

In an action of assumpsit by a housekeeper for services, the malfeasance of the plaintiff is inadmissible by way of set off, but may be received under a plea of non assumpsit as being connected with the contract. Heck v. Shearer, 4 S. & R. 267; Sleighman v. Jeffries, 1 S. & R. 477. Chief Justice Tilghman says, in Gogel v. Jacoby, 5 S. & R. 121, "No case at common law has been shown where the defendant has been permitted to deduct from the plaintiff, damages on account of an injury done to him by the plaintiff in a matter unconnected with the cause of plaintiff's action."

But a penalty for a breach of a statute is not, when sued for, within the defalcation acts, nor subject in any manner of set-off. Bank of Chambersburg v. Com., 2 Grant, 384.

The conclusion to which we have come is, that evidence of damages sounding in tort, unconnected with the contract in suit, is inadmissible as a set-off in an action ex contractu, but when the damages arise out of the particular contract in dispute, they may be given in evidence under the plea of non assumpsit. The remedy, therefore, of the defendants is an action of debt for the penalty under the act of Congress.

The rule is, therefore, made absolute, and judgment entered for plaintiff's claim, less the sum of $438.75, received by plaintiff.

George R. Kaercher, Esq., for plaintiffs.

David A. Jones, Esq., and Hon. James Ryon, for defendants.

[Head notes of cases to appear in 21 P. F. Smith's Reports. By courtesy of the Reporter.]

THE INSURANCE COMPANY OF PENNSYLVANIA v. THE PHŒNIX INSURANCE COMPANY.

1. An insurance company executed to Trask a marine policy on a ship, "for account of whom it may concern, loss if any payable to assured or order;" no assignment of the policy to be valid "unless the consent of the insurers be first obtained." He mortgaged the ship to Bell, and covenanted to keep her insured, assigned the policy in blank and delivered it to Bell as collateral; a partial loss having occured, Held, that Bell was entitled to recover from the insures in preference to a subsequently attaching creditor of Trask.

2. The transaction was an equitable transfer of the right to receive the money, not an assignment of the policy. Per Hare, P. J.

3. The relation of insurer and insured is one of confidence; a stranger cannot become a party to the agreement without the insurer's consent. Id.

4. The premium note was not paid by Trask, and after the loss the insurer settled with Bell; the amount of the note being allowed to be set off, the condition against assignment which was for the insurer's benefit was thus waived.

5. No exception being taken below to a point reserved, the presumption was that it was assented to as a true statement of the facts.

6. If a judge in a reserved point, state facts without agreement, the objection must be made and exception taken at the time.

SPRINGES, with notice, v. PHILLIPS, Alienee, &c.

1. A ground rent was reserved to Parry, the grantee covenanting, for himself and his assigns, to pay to Parry, his heirs and assigns, the principal after ten years. Held, that an alienee of Parry, after the ten years, might maintain covenant against the alienee of the grantee.

2. After the ten years, the owner of the rent continued to receive it, the right to demand the principal did not thereby lapse and the rent become irredeemable after that time.

3. Such rent will not be held irredeemable unless the intent of the parties to the deed is very clear to make it so.

4. The policy of the law is to unfetter lands and make them freely alienable.

5. Parry covenanted that on the payment of the principal the rent should be extinguished, &c., and that he, his "heirs and assigns," would at the cost of the grantee, "his heirs and assigns execute" a release and discharge of the rent to the grantor, "his heirs and assigns." Held, that the release was to be prepared by the grantee and tendered for execution to the owner of the rent.

6. The action for the principal was a demand; the owner should prepare the release and bring the money into court; his rights would there be protected by a proper order.

7. In this case the Supreme Court, in affirming the judgment below for the principal of the rent, directed that the owner of the land have leave to file in court a release, to be executed by owner of the rent and be delivered to the owner of the land on payment of the principal, and on failure to file the deed in thirty days, execution might issue.

WEIST AND MYERS v. GRANT.

1. Weist without inspection, bought from Hickcox and Coryell, the owners, silver mines, upon their representation that they would yield a certain amount; the contract to be void if Weist should not approve the report of a selected assayer. After his report, Weist paid a large part of the purchase money; on working the mines by Weist, the product was only one-third of the representation Held, that Weist was liable for the remainder of the purchase money, unless the misrepresentation was intentional.

2. Weist having bargained for the report of an assayer before being bound by the contract, and having acted on it, and there being no collusion or fraud, he was estopped from alleging misrepresentation in the inception of the contract.

3. Weist was garnishee in a foreign attachment against Hickcox; in the scire facias on the attachment, there could be a recovery without first ascertaining the specific interest of Hickcox.

4. Prima facie the interest of the vendors was equal.

TAYLOR v. YOUNG.

1. Barnet made a mortgage and died in 1868: in April and May 1869, a scire facias and alias were issued on a mortgage: both were returned "nihil;" in June the death of Barnet was suggested; in July judgment was entered on the two "nihils," the land was sold under a levari without warning the personal representatives of Barnet. Held, that the sale passed a good title to the mortgaged premises.

2. Two returns of "nihil" to successive writs of scire facias on a mortgage are equivalent to "scire feci," whether the mortgagor be living or dead.

3. The death of the mortgagor cannot be averred against the judgment.

4. The maxims "In fictione juris existit æquitas," and "utile per inutile non vitiatur," applied.

5. Under 33d sect. of act of February 24th, 1834 (decedents), notice to the personal representatives of decedent is not necessary after judgment on a mortgage, before issuing execution.

Per PAXSON, J.

2. Distribution is no part of an executor's account. Id.

3. Letters were granted to an executor in 1842; in 1865, a citation was issued under which he filed an account, showing receipts and payments in each year, and that part of the estate remained in specie. Held, that the presumption of settlement was rebutted. Id.

4. Balances remained in the hands of the executor from year to year, the money being deposited in bank to his private account, and used for his private purposes. Held, that he was chargeable with simple interest. Id.

7. An executor invested money of the estate in his own name, in stock at a low rate; the stock rose in price. Held, that he was liable for the dividends received, and the market value of the stock at the time of the decree. Id.

8. The purchase constituted the executor a trustee of the estate, and his possession was that of the cestui que trust. Id.

9. Such possession of the stock by the executor was not adverse, the executor having done no unequivocal act, denying the right of the cestui que trust, and the statute of limitations did not apply directly or by analogy. Id.

PAUL v. REED AND TRUSTEE.

The trustee purchased of the defendant a hog which he took into his possession, some sugar which he mixed with his sugar, and other articles, the prices of all which were agreed upon, and took out his wallet to pay for them, but the writ was served upon him before he could deliver the money, and he did not deliver it; whereupon the defendant reclaimed the property. Held, that this was a sale for cash, and that the title did not pass until paymant, and so no debt was created, and (the articles being exempt from attachment) the trustee was discharged.

LEGAL GAZETTE.

Friday, October 24, 1873.

JOHN H. CAMPBELL,

EDITOR.

THE CHIEF JUSTICESHIP.

We published, in the spring, as a communicated article, a paper signed M., in which the writer presented certain reasons that commended themselves to him, why Judge Samuel F. Miller should be appointed to fill the place made vacant by the death of Chief Justice Chase. Although the article was from a most respectable source, one of our own citizens, well known at the bar, and who to our knowledge was in intimate relations with some of the best constitutional lawyers, and most upright and able statesmen of the country, we gave the article, as we have said, under no responsibility but that of the author himself. We were unwilling, without more information than we then had, to assume an editorial insertion of it. In such a matter we felt an obligation of conscience; and that nothing on so important a subject should come from the editorial chair but what had been well investigated, well pondered on, thoroughly believed, and which could stand all criticism. We had not any personal relations, and were not likely to have any with any individual, whose name had been mentioned or was likely to be mentioned for the vacant place. We had no partialities, no pre-judgments in the matter; and our object and our determination was to examine, inquire and weigh till the time was at hand, and then fully to express our honest opinions. Such examination and inquiry we have made. We have listened to much; we have read, we believe, all that has been publicly said. We have made private inquiry from the best sources, and we have weighed all. We now give our own judgments in the matter.

And first we must admit that the names from which a good selection may be made, are more than in such a case is common. There is Benjamin Robbins Curtis, who has already given proofs of splendid ability on the bench, of very various attainments in the law; great as a constitutional lawyer; equally great as a commercial lawyer; versed as few men at this day are versed in the subtle doctrines of tenures and conveyancing; unsurpassed, unless by a Harding, in those departments of mechanical, chymical, textile and agricultural inventions, which, with other learning contribute to make up the difficult subject of the law of patents; a lawyer totus, teres atque rotundus; a man of education, refinement and reserve. But there are objections to Mr. Curtis. He is not physically what he has been. His time is passed or soon to become past. His promises for the future are not wholly encouraging.

Then there is Hoar, an honest man, and a true judicial mind if ever there was one; who will say on the bench as he always speaks at the bar, and say just as much as he ought and never one word more. But his mind is less distinguished by scope than by acumen. He has been bred too technically, we think, for a chief justice of this great court. He is too purely of New England. Besides, his manners are constitutionally bad. With integrity unimpeachable, and a heart thoroughly good, he will be always hated by a large class of all about him; wherever he may be, and whatever he may do. His appointment we can hardly doubt, would be odious to every member of the bench, where he would preside. As an associate he will do; and when Justice Clifford retires, let him succeed. But we must, to his appointment, as chief justice, say NAY.

Then comes Mr. Evarts. We doubt not that Mr. Evarts is a very practiced advocate, a superior nisi prius lawyer; nay more, we will concede that he is quite an able and a fairly learned lawyer, and perhaps something even above that. Yet in nothing that we have ever read of his or heard from his lips, have we perceived sufficient foundation for the reputation which he probably has. We rather fancy that it is because he has been at the New York bar, and that whatever is now at New York radiates throughout the country, that his reputation stands so very high as, in the estimation of some, we really believe it does. But if he were more confessedly the man for the place than we can quite think him, can President Grant ever appoint him? Can he appoint the attorney general, the confidential adviser, the defender through thick and thin, of Andrew Johnson, the man who stigmatized and sought to destroy the President as a liar? We rather think that Grant's right hand will first "forget its cunning." Certainly, he will have to have a profound conviction that there is no one other man fit for the place, and then rise to a degree of Christian grace not found often upon earth.

To Mr. Williams, the attorney general, we are free to concede a mind of parts sufficiently strong; nothing wonderful however. But since we are speaking for the sake of truth, and under the obligation of duty, we must say that he does not possess that high degree of education, a want of which, parts of great vigor sometimes largely supply, but which if not so supplied, or else given originally by schools, is too great a want to be disregarded in considering the present matter. A chief justice characterized by want of sufficient general education, will not do. As a speaker on the hustings, Mr. Williams was undoubtedly a superior person; as a debater and committee man in the Senate he was valuable; as an attorney general he does well; but the chief justiceship,—"that strain is of a higher mood."

We have as yet said nothing about Mr. Conklin? And why? Because we sincerely believe that it would be simply to secure his own unhappiness for the rest of his life, that he would go into the place we speak of. Mr. Conklin is an able man no dobt; not a bad lawyer either. He has had a large acquaintance with public affairs in the United States, a matter very important for one who is going to be a chief justice of the Supreme Court. But more, a great deal more, than all this is required of the man who presides in that court. Most of the questions in it are, after all, questions of law; many of them of pure law, very difficult law too; not a few of them points of practice. He is to regulate on the spot, arguments before him by acute, practiced, zealous and often angry men. If he is in the least deficient in any one of the departments of law, where is he? He can sit in court indeed, and not open his lips; and though every one of his associates may be saying to himself, "Why don't the chief justice do this?" "Why don't he do that?" and all feel that he is incompetent for his place—a kind of private distinction rather unenviable—still to the public view—in the estimation of gazers, who go in and out of the court room—he may, in a kind of way get along. The late chief justice, with his noble mien, did so, well. But how will such a president be in the conference or consultation room, where the judges after the arguments at the bar, meet to consult, argue and decide? There he must really preside. However complicated the case, in whatever manner counsel have confused it, or his brethren have misunderstood it; whatever heats may arise—and even in the consultation room, great heats sometimes do arise,—he must be morally and intellectually above all. What his associates may tangle, he must disentangle: and however dark, questions may appear to them or to any, he must

"Sit in the centre and enjoy bright day."

To do all this a man must be a great man, great in his faculties, great in his attainments, great in his self-control. Of course, in the consultation room, he is weighed at once, and if found wanting, miserable is his condition! If he is not a real head of the court, he is despised by all the associates. Every associate seeks to control him. The nominal head and the real head will not be the same person. Jealousies spring up on the bench, and everything in the court soon gets at sixes and sevens. Now Mr. Conklin will encounter on the bench, as now constituted, really able men; pretty rough men some of them too. Such men as Field, Miller, Bradley, Strong and others are athletes. He must fight them and must be able to vanquish them unless he means to knock under. The late Chief Justice Chase was deeply blamed for his carrying on to the bench the unchastened fervors of political zeal. Undoubtedly he herein committed a grave fault, as grave as any man in his place could commit. But why did he do so? "Sir," said a friend to him one day talking in free converse, "I wonder that you, who already possess for life the really first office of the government, should disturb yourself about the glittering bauble of the presidency." "Sir," replied the chief justice pathetically, "if I felt myself thoroughly fit to discharge the duties of my place, I should be content with it. But I am not Marshall, I am not Taney. I have been too long in public life now to be a really first-rate lawyer." Yet Chief Justice Chase was a man of massy powers and of splendid gifts, and splendid accomplishments also. Nature had done much for him. Dartmouth College, repaid by his dying benefactions, has sent forth few more finished scholars. He had studied law in earlier life with diligence; he never wholly abandoned its study. And all his other mental training was high and thorough. He was indeed calculated in every way to be a leader among men. Yet he never led his own court; and he was radically unhappy from the time when he went there till the day when sudden death took him from the world. Would Mr. Conklin's fate be different? Is he a better lawyer than Mr. Chase? Does he love the law more? Are his natural parts or his education better than Mr. Chase's? Would he be more able to govern his court? Would he be the head of it? With great respect for his abilities of all kinds, we don't believe that he would. Let him ponder well before he accepts the office of chief justice. The way is "irremeable." Could the shade of Chase address him, it would say to him or to any other man from political life who thinks to succeed him,

"Mark but my fall and that that ruined me."

We can hardly think that such reflections as these will not present themselves to the President; and if they do, he ought surely not to appoint Mr. Conklin, even for Mr. Conklin's own sake, were the sake of the court and the bar and the law of the land nothing.

We speak of the four distinguished gentlemen whom we have spoken of (though in our high respect for all, perhaps too freely), because the Albany Law Journal refers to it as a fact (where or by whom stated it does not say), "that the number of probable nominees had dwindled down to these four." Expressing its high dissatisfaction at this, it still puts Judge Miller at the head of its nominees (four also in number, Judge Miller, Dillon, Woodruff, or Chapman), and says (carrying the matter a little far perhaps), that if the President shall determine "to pass by such tried judges, and select a man unused to the bench, however able as a lawyer, the advocates of an elective judiciary will have a new argument in their favor."

The United States Jurist also says that if the nomination is to be made from the bench, "the voice of the bar is still for Mr. Justice Miller," as it had announced it in July to be.

How then stands the case with regard to Mr Justice Miller? It is a striking fact that though Judge Miller left the country before Chief Justice Chase died, and has been absent till now, every man's thoughts, on the announcement of the sad event, were more or less and at once turned towards him. His name came spontaneously to many mouths as the name of that man, whom the bar from one end of the country to the other would on the whole prefer. There was nobody, that we have heard of, working in Judge Miller's interest. It was the mere case of a man's superiority asserting its natural rights, its proper social place; in other words, the law of social gravitation. Different local regions, particular organizations of the bar, would suggest Evarts, Curtis, Hoar or others. But every one would admit that after his particular friend, he would prefer Miller; while over and above local influences and the preferences of friendship, the name of Miller has been "spreading undivided" and still "operates unspent." We see it now generally stated that he is the "coming man." We are content; and if it is so, we think that we shall have a good chief justice. These are our reasons.

Judge Miller is at this time probably the man of the best natural abilities on the bench. He was so recognized to be from almost the hour that he came there (for Grier soon afterwards began somewhat to decline), and though Judge Strong and Judge Bradley excited and have well fulfilled high public expectation, they have not put Miller from that eminence which he had when they came there. All admit his very superior natural powers; strong, discriminating, steady, sound. Weight does not oppress him; variety does not confuse him. He grasps the comprehensive; he can descend to the minute. And though well learned in pleading and all the techinal parts of the law, his mind is not technical in form or tastes. He never puts things on tecl nical grounds, except such grounds are the plain grounds of justice.

In addition to this he is thoroughly versed in the whole Federal jurisprudence. No one can read his opinions and not see that the first thing that he must have done on coming to the bench twelve years ago, was to profoundly study all the great organizing statutes of the court, and—as explanatory of them, and of other great early statutes—all the decisions of Cranch and Wheaton; reporters now not often systematically studied, though continually looked into to serve occasion.

With very able and upright men beside him on that side of the question, he has been perhaps the head of the republican portion of the court, and, in the face of the plain influence which the venerable Justice Nelson exercised over the late chief justice, it is said that before Strong and Bradley, JJ., came on, Miller kept things from drifting, as otherwise they might have gone. A pretty strong will has doubtless had something to do with all this; but in a chief justice who is right, a pretty strong will is a very requisite quality.

He is an upright man, pecuniarily, personally, politically. His domestic purity and excellence are acknowledged. He is a man, who though free and open in manners, has ever been strictly temperate in every enjoyment; not a distinction universal in the Federal metropolis. He is a thoroughly good business man; methodical, prompt, practical, no one ever found him embarrassed by the claims of interfering duties. He is a popular man in his manners; dignified enough, not stately; and courteous, without appearance of condescension. Everybody likes Judge Miller; and it is an affection of which respect and esteem is the basis; though his mere manners, as we have said, are winning also. Through all this, deep principle,—deep sense of duty—pervades his character; he is a strict man in the business of his court; he takes no holidays; he is ever punctual, steady and attentive. When you see him on the bench, you recall what was said of another judge once there, "His carriage becomes perfectly his station, not by assuming height, or erectness, or breadth, or sternness, but, as if everything was removed from his consciousness but the duty before him, and he was to perform that under the eye and inspection of Justice herself."

His years and physical health are in his favor. He is, we suppose about fifty seven; and obviously a man of vigorous constitution. These are important matters; for changes in the head of the court are, in themselves, undesirable.

He is a thoroughly national man. There is nothing narrow, coarcted or contracted about him. A Kentuckian by birth and early life, identified by eight years' practice of medicine with Kentucky, he seems to have taken much of his politics from the statesmen of New England and New York. A longer devotion to the bar, among the people of the fresh and growing State of Iowa made him, in maturer life, "a man of the West." Fitly to crown domiciles belonging to different regions, he has at last fixed his home in the national metropolis.

Finally, whatever promise others may give, the friends of Judge Miller can point to performance. Others may give hope. He has given fulfilment. He came on the bench twelve years ago. Through the most dreadful war that can be conceived of, when Washington was a beleaguered city, and the court itself seemed to be tumbling to pieces, he has been in the judicial post, calm, steady, able, faithful; a bright ornament to the court and country, invaluable (as we have always heard) in the conference, a teacher and master on the bench, respected by the country, admired and loved by the bar. If any man in the country has better titles than these, our paper is open to hear them asserted.

"Tros Tyriusve nullo discrime agetur."

There are several other names that we have heard and some—like that of Judge Cooley of Michigan, a man certainly of fine judicial powers—that we have not heard, to whom a respectful consideration—a very respectful consideration—is due. But we cannot stop to consider them. No one, in our judgment, combines quite so well all the many requirements, as Mr. Justice Miller.

We need hardly advert to certain points which have been suggesed; one being that the President could not properly elevate Judge Miller, over the heads of Judge Clifford and Judge Swayne, two judges who have been longer on the bench. Why not? In the army and navy there are ranks. But on the bench there is no rank, except that the chief justice is chief justice. He presides in court and in the conference, is the head of the court, and gets $500 more a year than other judges. But as respects the associates, one ranks as does another. They must come into court and sit when they are there in some order, and so the oldest in commission comes first; but they read opinions in just a reverse order; the youngest begins. As respects this particular case, conceding to the two senior justices every other qualification, their years alone would be a bar. Justice Clifford attained his three score years and ten, in August last, and Justice Swayne will do the same (if a biography of him in the law almanac of 1870 is correct), in December of the coming year. This is conclusive; for Congress has fixed the age of seventy, as that in which the members of this bench may reasonably yield to the claims of age and forever retire. The President could not nominate a man in the face of such a law. In this matter, therefore, these excellent judges are as though they were not.

To appoint, indeed, a mere circuit or district judge over judges of the Supreme Court, would be to put a person of inferior rank over one of superior; though if the Circuit or District Courts had a man really superior to every judge on the bench of the Supreme Court, we should be desirous to see him so put up. He would be going into his right place. But there is no such man on the bench of any Circuit or District Court in the country. Some of them may be great men in the places where they are. But the places where they are, are, compared with where they would be, but small places.

Neither is there a good reason in our country. why, if an associate is pre-eminently fit, he shall not be made chief justice. President Washington nominated William Cushing (then an associate) to be chief justice, and the Senate confirmed him; though just before they had rejected John Rutlege, who was not then on the bench at all. And most of our modern State constitutions, expressly provide that the associate justices shall pass in rotation into the office of chief justice. The thing has some advantages. Is it not obvious that a man like Judge Miller, who has been for twelve years on the bench studying the practice of the court (a very important part of the knowledge requisite for a chief justice), will be vastly better qualified to decide the many constantly arising cases of practice, than a man taken from Congress or from any bar, not the bar of the Supreme Court itself?

But independently of this matter of practice, there is, too, considerable foundation for the Albany Law Journal's opposition to the President "passing by such tried judges as Mr. Justice Miller, and selecting a man unused to the bench, however, able as a lawyer." Such an experiment would no doubt be dangerous. It may go right. It may go very wrong. The Supreme Court of the United States itself early gave a signal proof of what we say. One of the most eminent lawyers of the United States in old times, was James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, known over the country both as a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and of the Constitution of the United States. His fame at the bar induced President Washington, on the organization of the Federal judiciary in 1789, to elevate him to the bench. But expectation was disappointed. The late William Rawle, himself, an ornament of the old bar of our country, and well acquainted with both its bar and courts, thus describes him in 1823. (Address to the Associated Members of the Bar.)

"Perhaps few of these now present can recollect Wilson in the splendor of his talents, and fulness of his practice. . . . His views were luminous and comprehensive. His knowledge and information always appeared adequate to the highest subject, and justly administered to the particular aspect in which it was presented. . . . But it must be confes ed that Mr. Wilson on the bench, was not equal to Mr. Wilson at the bar; nor did his law lectures entirely meet the expectations that had been formed."

Many other similar cases could be cited.

In taking Miller, therefore, the President can hardly fail to go right. Miller's true field of distinction is the bench. And we are inclined to think that the view of the Albany Law Journal and others of our contemporaries, that he would shine even more as a chief justice, than he has done as an associate, is a correct one. At any rate such we think is the impression, somewhat generally, of the bar.

NORTHERN DIST. OF ILLINOIS.

United States Circuit Court.

NAT. PARK BANK v. NICHOLS.

1. It is the duty of a shareholder in a company to examine his certificate, and ascertain his actual position and liability.
2. Circumstances which make a shareholder liable for previously contracted debts and effect of misrepresentations by agent.
3. Though a sub criptiou be obtained by fraud, the stockholder may waive it by assuming its advantages.
4. If a shareholder assumes the benefits and advantages of a partner, he cannot, when called upon to respond for the contracts of the corporation, deny his liability.

This was an action at law to charge the defendants, nineteen in number, as partners in a joint stock company known as the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company. The cause of action was an indebtedness of this company, accruing at various times in the year 1865.

The company was organized in March, 1865, under the laws of New York relating to joint stock companies. It was conceded that the legal effect of such organization was to make the associates copartners. In July, 1865, an agent of the company made application to the defendants to take stock, stating that the company was organized for the transportation of material across the western plains under a charter that would exempt the subscribers from personal liability, and that its capital stock was to be $3,000,000, one-half of which was to be paid in cash.

The defendants engaged to take stock amounting in the aggregate to $250,000, and paid to the agents of the company fifty per cent. of the sum subscribed. In September, certificates of stock were forwarded to the agent of the company in Chicago, and delivered to the defendants. These certificates referred to the articles of association in general terms, and, it was claimed by the plaintiff, were sufficient to put the defendants upon inquiry as to the mode of organization of the company. On the other hand, it was claimed by the defendants that, supposing that the certificates were in pursuance of the contract of subscription, they did not, in fact, examine them.

It appeared that on November 3d, 1865, all the defendants except Nichols, whose letters where relied on as equivalent, executed a power of attorney, as associates, authorizing the organization of the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company into a corporation, under the laws of Kansas. It was, however, insisted by the defendants that at this time they supposed the company was organized as a corporation.

In the spring of 1866, the company failed, owing very large sums of money, and transferred its assets to the Holliday Overland Mail and Express Company, and issued circulars to its stockholders announcing that they were legally liable to pay in full, as partners, the debts of the concern, calling an assessment of thirty-three and one-third per cent. on the subscriptions, and giving to the subscribers the alternative of taking stock in the Holliday Overland Mail and Express Company, or paying the assessment. All the defendants except Walker, Faucet, Scammon and Martin subscribed and paid for stock in the Holliday Overland Mail and Express Company, under this circular. All the defendants claimed that they had no knowledge, in fact, of the mode of organization, or that there existed a danger of personal liability, until the receipt of this circular, and declined to pay.

It was claimed by the defendants:

1. That they were induced to subscribe by fraudulent representations.

2. That their subscription was, in any event, upon condition that the company should be organized under a charter, and with a fixed cash capital.

3. That they could not be made liable by relation upon contracts made or debts accruing prior to their coming into the association.

On the part of the plaintiff it was insisted that if there was fraud in procuring the subscriptions, or if conditions were attached to them, yet,

1. The fraud or condition had been waived.

2. That the defendants, by their acts, were estopped from setting up such fraud or breach of conditions.

3. That the defendants, in legal effect, became partners by relation to the date of the articles of association.

The facts relied upon as a waiver or estoppel were:

1. The receipt and retention by the defendants of the certificates with their recitals.

2. The execution of the power of attorney, with its recitals authorizing the organization of the company under the laws of Kansas.

3. The receipt of the stock of the Holliday Overland Mail and Express Company.

4. Various letters from several of the defendants, which, it was claimed, admitted their membership.

S. A. Goodwin and I. N. Arnold, Esqs., for plaintiff.

Charles Hitchcock, Wirt Dexter, Corydon Beckwith, and Geo. C. Bates, Esqs., for defendants.

DRUMMOND, J., charged the jury as follows:

This is an action by the National Park Bank of the city of New York, against the defendants, as partners in a joint stock company called the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company; and the question is, whether as such partners they are liable for the claim of the plaintiff, consisting of moneys advanced to that company during the year 1865. The advances commenced on the 21st of April, and ended in November. It depends upon the fact whether these defendants were members of that company in such a way as to make them liable as partners of the company for the whole or for any part of these advances.

You will remark, that the plaintiff was not a party to many of the transactions which have passed in review before us in the evidence; that has related chiefly to the connection of the defendants with this company, and the manner in which they were induced to give it their names and money. With that it does not appear that the plaintiff as a corporation had anything to do. That was an act, apparently, of some of the members of the company called the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company, and as between them and these defendants it must be admitted that there have been faults on both sides.

The leading fault with those in New York connected with the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company, and one which cannot be excused, was the concealment of the fact that they, on the 20th day of March, 1865, commenced the formation of this joint stock company, and completed it by signing and acknowledging the articles of association, on the 12th day of April, 1865, containing stipulations by which they were bound and by which it appeared it was an association under the sanction of the laws of New York.

Now it was the duty of all these men, or any of them, in seeking for associates, to let them know distinctly what had been done, and what was the compact to be entered into by any one who was to become a party to the association called the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company; and if they sought subscribers to their articles of association in Chicago, it was their duty to make known to these subscribers what their articles of association were. The primary thing to be established was their connection with the association; it was, therefore, indispensable that all who were to be connected with it should know its nature and character. But the various gentlemen who approached these defendants upon the subject of becoming parties to this company, did not communicate to any one of them, so far as we know, that there were articles of association signed, and which became operative by their terms, and which recognized that they were entered into with relation to the laws of New York. These gentlemen, so far as the evidence shows, were Mr. Nichols, Mr. Sturges, and Mr. Butterfield. I believe that no intimation was given by any of them that articles of association had already been subscribed, constituting the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company. On the contrary, the propositions made were entirely inconsistent with this leading fact. If we believe the declaration of the defendants (and they have not been affected by any statements, so far as I know, introduced on the part of the plaintiff), the motives held out to them to induce them to become parties to such an association, were entirely different from those the actual state of facts would warrant.

Here was a company already organized, the parties to which were personally responsible for the debts of the concern, which may have been very large at the time. Of course, the action of the defendants under such a state of facts, if they had been communicated to them, might have been entirely different from what it was.

The first question, therefore, is, whether defendants became parties to this association, as partners, with a knowledge of the circumstances of its existence at the time, and with good faith exercised to them by those who induced them to become parties. If they did, of course they are bound by the position of affairs at the time. But this is not claimed, as I understand, by the plaintiff, for if the testimony which has been given by the defendants can be relied upon, the contract entered into and the money that was paid by these defendants was upon an entirely different supposition from that justified by the actual state of affairs. And, therefore, I think, if this testimony can be relied upon (of course you are to judge of the testimony), there can be no original liability on the part of these defendants on the ground of their knowledge of the condition of the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company at the time that they became parties; and it is certainly a significant fact that Mr. William Sturges, who was the main instrument and agent by which these defendants were induced to subscribe and pay their money, has not been called by the plaintiff to affect in any degree the testimony of the defendants.

If, however, they were not parties in consequence of not understanding the position of affairs, misrepresentations being made to them of facts, it does not follow that they may not have become parties by subsequent acts of their own, with knowledge of the facts. And the next question is, have they so become parties? In order to determine this, you are to take the facts that are applicable to all the defendants, not those applicable to one or more of the defendants less than the whole; because if you find the defendants liable at all, you have to find them all liable, and you have only to apply the facts which have been proved as to all. If there have been facts proved as to some, not as to others, you have only to take those which apply to all, and determine whether they convince you that the defendants have become parties to the articles of association.

The defendants were applied to, I think most of them, and subscribed and advanced their money in the summer of 1865. As I have already said, if we believe their testimony, they did not know at that time that the company had been organized under the laws of New York, and that there were large liabilities against the company which they might be called upon to assume. Have they done so since by any acts of their own? Have they become liable as partners?

In August, or in the early part of the fall of 1865, certificates of stock were made out and forwarded by the officers of the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company to the subscribers and stockholders here, and they were received, as I understand, by the defendants. These certificates of stock (most of them) have been introduced, and it is admitted that they are all similar in character. Now, the certificate of stock which each of the defendants received, bore on its face that the holder was entitled to a certain number of shares of stock in the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company, and also that the holder was subject in the future to the payment of such assessments as might be made in case of loss or other necessity, and to all the obligations and liabilities of the company, and also entitled to all the privileges of a member as fully as if he had signed the articles of association.

We have spoken of the faults of the gentlemen of New York; we must now refer to what must be considered a fault of the defendants.

Many of the defendants say that they received the certificates of stock without examining them. They certainly knew what they were. They purported to represent their interests in a company or organization, for which they had subscibed or paid their money, It is presumable, I think, that if the company had earned profits, they would have claimed the profits under this evidence of their interest in the company.

It certainly was, therefore, their duty to examine the document which they had received, indicating the interest they had in the company and the money they had paid. It may be true that men do not always examine certificates of stock, and yet there never has been known, I believe, an instance of a man who became a member, in this way, of a company, who, if the company realized profits, did not claim them by virtue of such certificate. Then, that being so, there would be a natural inference that, claiming the advantages and profits he must bear the burdens and losses. But the only effect of this, in this case, is as to the conclusion to be drawn against the defendants by the circumstance that the certificates contained certain language that they were shareholders in the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company, and that they were subject to the payment of assessments for losses or from other necessity, and entitled to all the privileges of the association, as if they had actually signed the articles.

Now, if these had been given to the defendants, without any previous representation having been made, the effect of this might have been stronger than it was under the conceded state of facts.

Because it is quite possible that those who did look at the certificates of stock might have regarded them under the influence of the representations which had been made by the agents who applied to them for subscriptions and for their money, and therefore they might not draw the same inference or conclusions from them that they would, had they been uninfluenced by such representations; and all that I can say to you, if you believe this testimony, is simply this: that if he examined these certificates of stock, it would seem to have been the duty of every stockholder to make some inquiry as to his relation with this Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company; to know, in other words, where he stood, what his responsibilities were as a member of the company, and if, in point of fact, he found himself in a different position from what he supposed he was from the representations that were made, to repudiate that connection, to disavow it at once, and have nothing more to do with it. That nothing of this kind was done was, I think, a fault on the part of some of the defendants, and, I must say, one not very creditable to their character as business men. But I cannot say that you can disregard, in connection with this aspect of the case, the bearing and effect of the representations that were made as inducements to them to become parties to the company. Because it is indispensable, I think, in order to make out a liability against these defendants, that they should be possessed of full knowledge of the circumstances of their connection with the company which was then organized; and if they accepted this stock with this full knowledge of the circumstances, then they were bound, as prudent and discreet business men, to follow up the intimation given in this certificate of stock, and to ascertain the position in which they stood, and are to be visited with all the consequences of partners in this association, but not otherwise.

Again, if they did become members of this association with the full knowledge of the circumstances connected with the position of the Butterfield Overland Dispatch Company, what is the measure, under the facts of the case, of their liability to this plaintiff? That is another and distinct question.

It is conceded that no one of these defendants was a member of the association at the time the contract was made between the company—the Dispatch Company—and the plaintiff for a loan of the money, on the 21st of April, 1865, by which it was agreed that the plaintiff should advance to the company $100,000, in sums as they might be wanted; and, in fact, on that day $10,000 were advanced, and on the 1st of May $55,000, and on the 2d of May, $20,000, and on the 3d of June, $5,000—$90,000, advanced before, as I understand, any of these defendants became connected with this company.

Now, to say nothing of the $20,000 advanced in November, are these defendants responsible for the money which was advanced before they became connected with the company? Of course the only ground upon which they are liable is, that they associated themselves with the company, either by express declaration or by acts which admit of no reasonable doubt that they assumed, as members of the company, all the liabilities of the company at that time. It is only in that way, by relation back of the position of the company at the time they connected themselves with it, if they ever did, that they could become liable for the $90,000 advanced to the company before that connection. Of course, if with full knowledge of the facts they did become parties, either expressly or by implication, to this joint stock company, from the beginning, they are as responsible for the debts of the company as those who were original parties to articles of association, but not otherwise. They must have become parties with full knowledge of the facts, understanding their position and relations to the company.

As to the $20,000 advanced on the 15th of November, that would depend, of course first, upon the fact whether they were partners, and secondly, whether, as such partners, they reaped the benefit of the advance that was made, and enjoyed its fruit. If they did, then I think they are estopped from asserting they are not liable. If they, at the time the $20,000 were advanced, were partners of the association, and had as such the full benefit of the advance, they would be liable equally with their associates for the advance. You will see, therefore, there are three questions which the court submits to you.

In the first place, whether these defendants became subscribers, and advanced their money to the company with full knowledge of the circumstances of its existence at the time, and with the exercise of good faith, and true statements and representations made to them by the agents of the company when they subscribed their names and advanced their money. If you shall believe they did not become partners by that act, by anything that was done, then the next question the court submits to you is whether with full knowledge of the facts they have become partners since. It may be true that bad faith was used towards them at the time their subscriptions and money were obtained. It may be true that fraud was practiced; but it was competent for them, with knowledge of all the facts, to waive the fraud, and if they did—if they assumed the advantages of members and partners of the association—they cannot, when they are called upon to respond for the contracts of the association, be heard to deny their liability.

Thirdly, if they were partners and members of the association, what is the measure of their liability, and whether for the whole or only a part of the advance made by the plaintiff?

It is to be observed that this is not an action by the Overland Dispatch Company against these defendants for assessments made against them, as shareholders, by the company. It is not a bill in equity calling upon the defendants to respond to the creditors of the company for advances which have been made; but it is an action at law against these defendants, as members of the association—partners—liable as partners for the debts of the company, and their liability must be measured by the rules which are applicable to a partnership concern, under which one member of a firm is liable for the debts of the firm; and in this aspect of the case, of course, the whole question turns upon the fact whether they were partners and members of the company.

In compliance with the desire of many prominent members of the Bar, the Publishers have endeavored to produce a handsome book, full and complete in its contents. Owing to the sale being limited to the Philadelphia Bar, to whom only it can be of use, and in consequence of the expense attending its publication, the price has been fixed at a figure that may seem apparently high,—but the Publishers, to reimburse themselves for the outlay they have been subject to, have been compelled to decline giving discounts to any one, so as to enable them to give the Bar the advantage of the lowest possible price for which the Book can be made.

The volume has been carefully compiled, and has also been revised by the Judges of the different Courts, and endorsed by Rules of the same. They therefore contain not only the latest, but also the only full publication of those rules, as they now stand on the minutes of the different Courts.

UNITED LIFE, FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE CO. v. FOOTE.

1. A policy of insurance against fire excepted from the risk any loss by an explosion. In an action upon the policy, it appeared that an explosive mixture of whiskey vapor and atmosphere had come in contact with the flame of a gas jet, from which it ignited, and immediately exploded, whereby a fire was set in motion, which destroyed the insured property: Held, That in such case it cannot be said that the destruction was caused by a fire within the meaning of the policy, but, on the contrary, that the loss was by fire occasioned by the explosion.
2. In construing such policy wherein the exception embraces "any loss or damage occasioned by, or resulting from, any explosion whatever," the exception must be taken and held to include all loss and damage occasioned by any fire of which an explosion was the efficient cause.
3. Where such exception provided that the underwriter would not be liable for "any loss or damage occasioned by, or resulting from, any explosion whatever, whether of steam, gunpowder, camphene, coal oil, gas, nitro-glycerine, or any explosive article or substance, unless expressly insured against, and special premium paid therefor," and the property insured is destroyed by fire occasioned by the explosion of one of the explosive substances named, and notwithstanding it is made to appear that at the time of taking the risk, such explosion, from the nature of the property insured, was in the contemplation of the parties, such loss falls within the purview of the exception, unless the particular peril by which the property was destroyed was expressly insured against, and a special premium paid therefor.

Messrs. Lincoln, Smith, Warnock and Stephens, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Matthews, Ramsey and Matthews, for defendants in error.

MCILVAINE, J.

This proceeding is prosecuted to reverse a judgment rendered by the Superior Court of Cincinnati, at General Term, reversing a judgment rendered at Special Term.

The original action was brought, by the defendants in error (who were plaintiffs therein), against the plaintiff in error (defendant therein), to recover its amount of a policy of insurance, issued by the defendant to the plaintiffs, on the 9th of March, 1867, for a year, upon a stock of merchandise contained in a building of the plaintiffs', situate in the city of Cincinnati, which, together with the building, was destroyed by fire on the 11th day of April, 1867.

By the terms of the policy it appears that the plaintiffs were insured against "loss or damage by fire to the amount of five thousand dollars on their stock of merchandise, consisting principally of liquors, fixtures, tools, and office furniture, contained in their brick building, situate on the southwest corner of Congress and Kilgour streets, Cincinnati, Ohio, and occupied by them as a liquor store, with privilege of rectifying and manufacturing fine spirits by steam not generated in the building."

The principal defence arose under one of the conditions of the policy, which is in these words:

"VII. This company is not liable for loss or damage by lightning or tornado, unless expressly mentioned or insured against; but will be responsible for loss or damage to property consumed by fire occasioned by lightning. Nor will this company be responsible for any loss or damage to property consumed by fire happening by reason of, or occasioned by, any invasion, insurrection, riot, or civil commotion, or of any military or usurped power, nor where the loss is occasioned or superinduced by fraud, dishonesty, or criminal conduct of the insured, nor to any loss or damage occasioned by, or resulting from, any explosion whatever, whether of steam, gunpowder, camphene, coal oil, gas, nitro-glycerine, or any explosive article or substance, unless expressly insured against, and special premium paid therefor."

The plaintiffs counted upon the undertaking in the policy, and stated the loss to be by fire.

The answer set up the above condition for a first defence, and averred that the said fire, loss, and damage referred to in the petition, were solely occasioned by, and resulted from, an explosion caused by some explosive substance, and that the same was not expressly insured against, nor was a special premium paid therefor, and it denied any loss within the terms and meaning of the policy.

The answer also set up, for a second defence, that the plaintiffs did, after the issuing of the policy and before the loss, carry on and exercise within the building, up to the time of the fire, the trade and business of distilling and manufacturing spirits by steam generated in the said building, contrary to the provision of the policy which is set out; and by an additional answer, filed by leave of court, the defendants, for a third defence, pleaded that the plaintiffs had in operation in the building, up to the time of the fire, three large stills, which greatly increased the risk, and that these stills were concealed from them, and that they had no knowledge of the same. Replies were filed to these answers, putting the same in issue.

The issues of fact arising upon the defences, set up by the defendant below, were tried, upon submission, by the parties, by the judge at Special Term, who found in favor of the defendant upon the first defence, and in favor of the plaintiffs upon the second and third defences.

A motion to set aside the finding, and for a new trial was made on behalf of the plaintiffs, and overruled. A bill of exceptions was then taken, setting out all the evidence, and judgment was rendered for the defendant.

A petition in error was filed in the General Term, and the judgment was reversed.

To reverse this judgment of reversal, and restore the judgment at Special Term in favor of the defendants below, it prosecutes the present petition in error. If it prevails, the litigation is ended by a final judgment; if it fails, the cause will stand for a new trial.

The main question for decision by this court is, whether the Superior Court in General Term erred in law in reversing the judgment at Special Term.

And that question may be stated in this form: Did the facts proved on the trial at Special Term, when considered in connection with the terms of the eighth condition to the policy fairly construed, clearly sustain the finding of the court in favor of the defendant upon its first defence?

I do not propose to repeat in detail the testimony set out in the record, but will content myself in stating the conclusions of fact, which in our opinion are clearly drawn from the testimony. It is proper to say, however, that the testimony in this case is remarkably free from contradictions. The only doubt that can possibly arise upon the evidence, is as to the proper inferences to be drawn from facts clearly proven; but these inferences, we think, are quite evident.

The testimony shows that, at the time of taking out the policy, and until the time of the fire, the plaintiffs were engaged in the business of rectifying whiskey, and manufacturing fine spirits by the use of steam, in the building occupied by them as a liquor store, and in which the insured stock of merchandise, consisting principally of liquors, &c., was kept. The size of the building was sixty by one hundred and eighty feet, and was four stories high. There was communication between the stories through open stairways and hatches. The business of rectifying was carried on in the basement story, where the stills—large metallic vessels—were located. The upper stories were chiefly used for storage of liquors and cooperage. The process of rectifying was conducted as follows: The raw spirits or liquor was conveyed by means of pipes, called leaders, from tubs situate in the upper stories to the stills below; when the stills were thus charged, the liquor therein was converted into vapor by means of steam which passed through the stills in copper pipes called worms; the vapor thus evolved was conducted by other pipes to a condenser, where it was reduced to a liquid state.

The vapor evolved in the process of rectification is an inflammable substance. It readily mixes with the atmosphere, and when so mixed in certain proportions is explosive, and when such mixture is brought into contact with flame it explodes. On the morning of the fire a large still was being charged through a leader about two inches in diameter, which passed into its still through a vacuum valve (an apperture in the still near its top), the diameter of which was about four inches. At the same time steam was passing through the worm, converting the liquor in the still into vapor, which escaped through the vacuum valve into the still room, and thence no doubt in other parts of the building. The process of thus charging the still, accompanied with the discharge of vapor, had continued for some time—perhaps an hour preceding the fire. During the progress of this process, two jets of gas were burning in the still room, one a distance of three or four feet from the vacuum valve, and the other in another part of the room. There was no other fire or flame in the room or in the building at the time.

Such being the circumstances, and explosion took place in the still room. A sudden and violent combustion of the vapor, accompanied with a noise—described by one witness as being like the crack of a gun; by another as if a bundle of iron had been thrown on the pavement; by another as a crash; and by another as a gush of fire, and at the same instant the flame was driven through a doorway into another building, whereby a witness was badly burned. Immediately after the explosion, a flame was discovered escaping from the still through the vacuum valve, and at the same time the building was discovered to be on fire throughout the several stories.

From these facts and circumstances we think it was clearly shown that the fire, by which the building and stock of merchandise insured were consumed, was occasioned by, and resulted from an explosion of spirit vapor mixed with atmosphere, and that the explosion was caused by the mixture coming in contact with the burning gas jet.

1. The first question which we notice particularly is this: Was the explosion, which in fact occurred, such, in degree of violence, as was contemplated by the parties to the policy?

The word "explosion" is variously used in ordinary speech, and is not one that admits of exact definition. Its general characteristics may be described, but the exact facts which constitute what we call by that name, are not susceptible of such statement as will always distinguish the occurrences. It must be conceded that every combustion of an explosive substance whereby other property is ignited and consumed, would not be an explosion within the ordinary meaning of the term. It is not used as the synonym of combustion. An explosion may be described generally as a sudden and rapid combustion, causing violent expansion of the air, and accompanied by a report. But the rapidity of the combustion, the violence of the expansion, and the vehemence of the report, vary in intensity as often as the occurrences multiply. Hence, an explosion is an idea of degrees, and the true meaning of the word, in each particular case, must be settled, not by any fixed standard or accurate measurement, but by the common experience and notions of men in matters of that sort. In this case, although the building was not rent asunder, or the property therein broken to pieces, there was a sudden flash of flame, a rush of air, and a report like the "crack of a gun," which certainly brings the occurrence within the common meaning of the word as used in many instances. "Any explosion whatever" is the phrase used in the condition to the policy, and it is qualified by the context only to the extent that it must be an "an explosion" of some "explosive substance, and of sufficient force as to result in loss or damage to the property insured." And the characteristics we have found to exist in the occurrence that resulted in the loss of the insured property.

2. It is claimed that the fire which destroyed the property insured did not result from the explosion, but, on the contrary, that the explosion was incident to and caused by the fire, which, if there had been no explosion, would have accomplished the whole loss and damage; or, at least, that such inference may be drawn from the facts in the case as fairly and as legitimately as contrary inferences.

The proof unquestionably shows that the origin of the fire and the explosion was simultaneous. It may be true, in a strictly scientific sense, that all explosions caused by combustion are preceded by a fire. The scientist may demonstrate, in a case where gunpowder is destroyed by fire, or in any case where the explosion is caused by or accompanies combustion, that ignition and combustion precedes the explosion; but the common mind has no conception of such combustion, as a fact independent of the explosion, where they concur in such rapid succession that no appreciable space of time intervenes. The terms of this policy must be taken in their ordinary sense; and we are satisfied that the proofs show, according to the ordinary sense and understanding of men in reference to such matters, that the explosion occasioned the fire which destroyed the property insured; or, in other words, that the loss resulted from an explosion within the true intent and meaning of this policy.

It is true that the explosion was caused by a burning gas jet, but that was not such fire, as contemplated by the parties, as the peril insured against. The gas jet, though burning, was not a destructive force, against the immediate effects of which the policy was intended as a protection; although it was a possible means of putting such destructive force in motion, it was no more the peril insured against than a friction match in the pocket of an incendiary. The conclusions of fact to which we thus arrive, are mere inferences from other facts,—facts, however, about which there was no conflict in the testimony,—yet they are so manifestly true, that we think it was error of law, under our statute, to reverse the judgment rendered thereon at the Special Term of the Superior Court, upon the strength of contrary inferences drawn from the same facts by the reviewing court.

3. The next question arises upon the terms of the policy, and is one of construction purely. Was it intended, by the provisions of the seventh condition, to exempt from the risks assumed by the policy losses by fire occasioned by an explosion?

It is claimed that the clause exempting losses by explosion taken alone, or constructed in connection with other clauses in the condition, does not show such intention. It is true that the words "by fire," or their equivalent, are omitted in this clause, though expressed in some of the former clauses. The foundation point, however, in construing this condition, is found in the general undertaking of the policy. It will be observed that the underwriter undertook to insure against loss and damage by fire only; but, nevertheless, against loss and damage by fire generally, and the maxim, causa proxima, non remota, spectatur, applies. Now, we think, without doubting, that the purpose of inserting this condition was to relax the rigor of this maxim, and exempt from the general risk of the policy certain losses, which would otherwise fall within its scope and meaning. The first clause of the condition provides that "this company is not liable for loss or damage by lightning or tornado, unless expressly mentioned or insured against." If this were the whole of the clause, and it were not understood that the loss and damage referred to were such as might result from fire occasioned by lightning or tornado, it would be utterly meaningless and nugatory, for the reason that the underwriter had not undertaken to insure against lightning or tornado. So far, the construction is plain enough, but a difficulty arises from the conclusion of the clause, to wit: "but will be responsible for loss or damage to property consumed by fire occasioned by lightning." The exception to the rule of exemption from loss by lightning appears to be as broad as the rule itself. But I apprehend that a case might arise in which effect and operation could be given to all of the terms of this clause, including those which are applied as well as those expressed. At all events, it is perfectly clear that loss and damage by lightning and tornado are not within the expressed risks of the policy, unless a fire supervenes; nor is there anything in the policy from which such risks can be implied.

The condition continues: "Nor will the company be responsible for any loss or damage to property consumed by fire happening by reason of, or occasioned by any invasion, insurrection, riot, or civil commotion, or any military or usurped power." The exemptions here provided for are expressly limited to losses within the terms of the general risk of the policy. But if such limitation had not been expressed, it would have been implied.

The next clause is as follows: "Nor when the loss is occasioned or superinduced by the fraud, dishonesty, or criminal conduct of the insured." There is no pretext for holding that the loss here contemplated is other than loss by fire, although no such qualification is expressed. Then follows the clause in question, which to all intents and purposes, is framed like the preceding one: "Nor to any loss or damage occasioned by or resulting from any explosion whatever, whether of steam, gunpowder, camphene, coal oil, gas, nitro-glycerine, or any explosive article or substance, unless expressly insured against, and special premium paid therefor."

Unless there is something in the subject matter of this clause that indicates that the words "by fire" were omitted for the purpose of showing a design and intention to adhere to and continue the general risk in case an explosion should result in a fire, we think that they or their equivalent should be supplied by implication or construction.

Is such purpose indicated by any fair use of the terms employed?

That a loss, other than combustion, results from an explosion, when the explosion itself is caused by a destructive fire already in progress, comes within the general risk of a policy against fire only, is a doctrine not only reasonable in itself, but is sustained by authority. (Waters v. La. Mer. Ins. Co., 11 Pet. 225; Scripture v. Low. Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 10 Cush. 357; Millauden v. N. O. Ins. Co., 4 La. Ann. 15.) And it is quite clear that a loss by fire, which if occasioned by an explosion, is within the like risk. Now, the express terms of this clause are "any loss or damage occasioned by, or resulting from any explosion whatever." These terms are certainly comprehensive enough to include both descriptions of loss, whether lost by the explosive force, or loss by superinduced combustion. And that such is their legal effect has been directly decided in the case of Stanley v. Western Ins. Co., Law Reports, 1868; 3 Exchequer, 71. It is not necessary at this time to either approve or disapprove, to the whole extent, the doctrine in Stanley's case, as in this case no damage was sustained from the explosion without the intervention of a fire, nor, indeed, was the explosion caused by a fire within the meaning of the policy. But we can find no good reason for doubting that loss and damage by fire, resulting from an explosion, was intended to be exempted by this condition from the general risk of the policy, and are of opinion, therefore, that this clause properly construed should read, "nor any loss or damage by fire occasioned by, or resulting from any explosion whatever."

4. It is claimed by defendants in error, that the peril by which the property insured was destroyed was within the exception to the seventh condition; that is, it was "expressly insured against, and special premium paid therefor;" or, in other words, was excepted out of the exception.

The reasoning by which this proposition is sought to be maintained is thus stated:

"The body of the policy covered loss by fire on liquors, &c., with the privilege of rectifying and manufacturing fine spirits by steam not generated in the building. The property insured was whiskey, as well in the process of rectification and manufacture as manufactured—whiskey in the still as well as spirits in the barrel—the whiskey vapor itself, while passing through the colnmns to the cooler, or wherever else it might make its way. If it was in this form an explosive substance or article, such as is intended by the language of the condition, or if, in the process of manufacture allowed by the policy, it was likely to become such by escape and mingling with the air in the building, then the insurance was upon it, as an agent known to be explosive under certain circumstances likely to happen, and with the express assent of the company to the carrying on of that process, in the course of which its explosive nature would naturally and probably be developed."

The principle sought by this argument to be applied is announced in Harper v. New York City Insurance Co., 22 N. Y. 441; Fitton v. Accidental Death Insurance Co., 17 Com. Bench, N. S. 112.

In the case of Harper v. New York Insurance Co., the condition exempted the company from liability for loss occasioned by camphene. The fire was occasioned by a workman's throwing a lighted match into a pan upon the floor containing camphene. The risk was upon a printing stock, privileged for a printing office, camphene not being expressly enumerated. But it was shown that that article was a usual part of such a stock, and its use was therefore authorized. For this reason alone, because it was implicitly insured, it was held that the exception did not apply.

The following extract from the opinion expresses its doctrine:

"A policy can be so framed as to allow the presence of a dangerous article, and even so as to insure its value, while, at the same time, it might exempt the insurer from loss if occasioned by the presence or use of the article. But I think it would need very great precision of language to express such an intention. When camphene or any hazardous fluid is insured, and its use is plainly admitted, the dangers arising from that source are so obviously within the risk undertaken, that effect should be given to the policy accordingly, unless a different intention is very plainly declared."

In answer to this claim, we say:

1. That the spirit vapor, having escaped from its confinement, are passed into the still room, where it became mixed with atmosphere so as to form an explosive substance, under circumstances that preclude all possibility of reclaiming and utilizing it was no longer a part of the stock of merchandise insured, and was not under the protection of the policy.

2. If, from the nature of the property insured, the parties, at the time the risk was taken, might reasonably have anticipated the peril by which it was afterwards destroyed, it is reasonable to suppose that such peril was in contemplation at the time, and that they contracted in reference to it. Hence, if the general risk of the policy was expressed in terms broad enough to include the peril, it must be presumed that they intended to do so; and on the other hand, if an exception to the risk was made in terms which fairly and plainly took such particular peril out of the general risk, it must be presumed that they intended to exempt such particular peril from the risk. Again, if it be claimed that there was an exception to such exemption, whereby the particular peril was saved from the exemption and left under the general risk, it is reasonable that the terms of exemption should be at least as explicit as the terms of exemption. How is it in this case? The risk was against all loss by fire. The exception from the risk was "any loss or damage occasioned by an explosion of steam, gunpowder, &c." The exception to this exemption was "unless expressly insured against, and special premium paid therefor." Therefore, it only remains to be said, that no loss or damage occasioned by an explosion of any of these substances named was expressly insured against, nor was any special premium paid for any such special risk.

It follows, therefore, that the judgment of reversal rendered at general term must be reversed, and the judgment rendered at special term must be affirmed.

EASTERN DISTRICT.

U. S. Circuit Court of Mo.

In re BRENT.

1. A creditor who has consented in writing to the discharge of the bankrupt under the fifty per cent. clause, and whose consent has been acted upon and filed, has no absolute right, to withdraw or cancel it, though such right be claimed on the day fixed for the hearing.
2. Section 29, as to what frauds upon the bankrupt act will disentit e the bankrupt to a discharge, considered.—St. Louis Law News.

Bankrupt act—fraudulent preference; withdrawal of consent to discharge.

In Bankruptcy.—Petition for review, under section 2 of the bankrupt act.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Edmund T. Allen, Esq., for the opposing creditors.

Wm. C. Marshall, Esq., for the bankrupt.

Opinion by DILLON, Cir. J. March Term, 1873.

I. This is a petition to review the action of the District Court in refusing to allow certain creditors to withdraw their assent to the discharge of the bankrupt, and in overruling their specifications of the grounds of their opposition to such discharge.

Due steps were taken by the bankrupt to procure his discharge under section 29 of the act, and a time was appointed for the hearing of the application, and notice given to the creditors to appear and show cause, if any they had, why a discharge should not be granted, The assets not being equal to fifty per cent. of the claims proved against his estate, the bankrupt set about to procure the written assent to his discharge of a majority in number and value of his creditors who had proved their claims. The written assent of the requisite number was procured and filed by the bankrupt at the time fixed for the hearing of the application for discharge. At the time fixed for the hearing two creditors who had signed their assent to the bankrupt's discharge, appeared and objected to the discharge, and filed petitions to withdraw such assent, or have it held for naught. The petition to withdraw their assent was urged upon two grounds: First, as a matter of right, irrespective of any fraud practiced upon them in granting it; second, that the assent was procured by fraud, and given under a mistake of fact.

The second ground is not established by the evidence; and as to the first ground, I am of opinion that when a creditor has once given his assent in writing, and the bankrupt has acted upon it, and other creditors have given theirs and presumptively been influenced by each other's action in this respect, and the assent of the requisite number in value and amount is obtained and filed at the hearing, that a creditor thus assenting has no absolute right even on the day fixed for the hearing, to withdraw or cancel his assent in writing, I see no error in the order of the District Court in refusing the prayer of the opposing creditors in this respect.

II. It is urged by the opposing creditors that the District Court erred under the proofs in overruling their objections to the bankrupt's discharge. The grounds of their objections were certain payments whereby it is alleged a portion of the creditors were preferred.

The bankrupt was a country merchant, usually carrying a stock of several thousand dollars.

The evidence to establish the alleged fraudulent preferences mainly consisted of the examination of the bankrupt before the register. In that he says he first discovered his insolvent condition on the 6th day of March, which was after the payments were made, now claimed to have been fraudulent. It is urged by the opposing creditors that the bankrupt was insolvent before this, and that he knew or had good reason to know it, and that payment made to creditors under such circumstances, though not made in contemplation of becoming a bankrupt, and though there was no actual design to prefer, deprive him of the right to a discharge. Without going into the evidence, it must suffice to state that it does not appear that the payments in question were made by Brent in contemplation of becoming a bankrupt. I think they were made in just the opposite contemplation—when he was carrying on business, and in good faith expecting or hoping to keep along in it. These payments with one exception of the trifling sum of $26, to his nephew, were made from time to time in December, January and February, to his business creditors or on account of his business paper.

On reviewing the bankrupt's examination, it must be admitted that they were made when in point of fact his assets were not worth in cash the amount of his liabilities, and when he could not pay in money or otherwise than by borrowing all of his liabilities as fast as they became due. But in this manner, that is by part payments and by getting extensions, and by borrowing and by the proceeds of sales and collections, he had for some time been keeping afloat; and I find that he made the payments in question to these various creditors in the bona fide, though as it turned out, erroneous expectation that he could keep along, and with no actual design to favor or prefer those to whom such payments were made. Among the very last payments thus made was a payment on account of creditors who are actively opposing the discharge.

There is some difficulty in construing the twenty-ninth section of the bankrupt act in respect to the kind and degree of frauds upon the act which will disentitle the bankrupt to his discharge.

But I am not prepared to hold that merely for taking too hopeful a view of his affairs, and for making payments in the course of his business with the bona fide, though mistaken, expectation that he can keep along without going into bankruptcy, there being no actual design to favor or prefer, the intention of Congress was to deprive the party of the right to his discharge, if otherwise entitled to it. I therefore perceive no error in the action of the District Court.

Affirmed.

CONTRACT.

The construction of a written contract is for the court; therefore when the instrument contains no words requiring interpretation, it is error to leave it to the jury to say what the parties intended as to the scope and effect of their contract at the time of its execution.

The defendant subscribed for shares in the M. Railroad—a corporation then existing in this State—upon a book which contained the condition that the subscribers should not become liable for the payment of their subcriptions until 2,000 shares of said stock should be taken in cash or its equivalent. Afterwards the M. Railroad was chartered in Massachusetts, with power to unite with the M. Railroad in this State; and the town of W., in Massachusetts, was empowered to subscribe for a certain amount of stock in the Massachusetts corporation, which they did, Afterwards a union was formed between the two corporations, thus forming one line from P., in New Hampshire, to W., in Massachusetts; and they have since been operated as one. Without counting in the subscriptions of the town of W., 2,000 shares of stock in the M. Railroad were not taken.

Held, that, inasmuch as the Massachusetts corporation was not in existence at the time of the subscription, there was no latent ambiguity in the contract as to what was meant by the M. Railroad, and parol evidence was therefore not admissible to show that the parties understood and intended by it the united enterprise of a railroad from P. to W.: hence, that the condition upon which the subscription was made had not been performed, and the defendant was not liable to pay for the shares. PROMISSORY NOTE.

It is only the bona fide holder for valuable consideration of a negotiable note, transferred before maturity, that is protected against equities growing out of the note existing between the maker and the payee. The defendant has a right to show all the circumstances attending the transfer of the note, and the subsequent course of dealing respecting it. The Merchants' National Bank v. Amy T. McNutt, Burten, Hill & Co., and Geo. W. Hill. Supreme Court of Iowa, March, 1873.

IN EQUITY.

WOOD et al. v. MAITLAND et al.

1. While shares in a stock company are personal property, they are not, strictly speaking, chattels.
2. There can be no such thing as an actual delivery of the shares. The legal title in them can only be evidenced, and a transfer made in writing.
3. The sale of shares with a receipt of the purchase money and delivery of the certificate, with a power of attorney to transfer, passes the full equitable title and entitles the owner to demand the full title.
4. When one offers for sale the stock of another, the purchaser is bound to see that the former has authority to make the sale.
5. A trustee has no such general power. His office is to hold and safely keep the trust funds in accordance with the terms of the will or other instrument creating the trust.
6. Where there was nothing in a will limiting the general power of sale incident to the office of executor, the executors have a right to sell shares of stock.
7. An executor pledged stock belonging to an estate for his own debt. This was illegal and the parties holding it took no title, and an injunction will lie to prevent a transfer being made of the same on the books of the company by which the stock was issued.

Opinion by PAXSON, J. Delivered October 28th, 1873.

This was a motion to continue a special injunction. The facts of the case, briefly stated, are as follows: Charles S. Wood died on the 27th of May, 1873, leaving a last will and testament, of which R. Francis Wood, George R. Wood, John N. Packard and Charles S. Wurtz were the executors named therein. Letters testamentary were issued to all of the said executors. At the time of his death the said testator was the owner of 20,385 shares of the capital stock of the Cambria Iron Company, the par of which is $12.50. Said stock is said to be worth considerably more than par, and to have paid 12 per cent. dividends for several years. George R. Wood, one of said executors, a defendant in this suit, for the purpose of securing a liability of his own to defendants, Macdowell & Wilkins, who are partners as stock brokers in this city; and of aiding the latter in securing liabilities of their own to E. V. Maitland and William W. Audenried and others, delivered to the said Macdowell & Wilkins divers certificates of the Cambria Iron Company, for stock of said company held by or in the name of the said testator, together with as many powers of attorney signed by him, the said Geo. R. Wood, as "acting executor" of Chas. S. Wood, authorizing the transfer of the same by a person not named in the powers. One of these certificates, to wit, one for 1,905 shares, with the power of attorney to transfer the same, was given by Macdowell & Wilkins to Maitland, Audenreid & Co., on the 1st day of October, 1873, to secure a loan of $9,000, made on that day by the last-named firm to said Macdowell & Wilkins. The said shares have never been transferred on the books of the Cambria Iron Company. It is to prevent said, transfer, and to restrain the said defendants, who are the holders of said certificate and power of attorney, from transferring or parting with the same that this bill has been filed.

The method of acquiring title to shares in incorported joint stock companies is a subject of very grave importance. This species of property has multiplied to such an extent that a very large proportion of the capital of the country is invested in "shares." The daily transactions therein in our large commercial and moneyed centres are of great magnitude. Certificates and powers of attorney, representing immense sums of money, invested in such securities, pass from hand to hand with almost the rapidity and ease of commercial paper, or money itself. It will thus be seen that the manner in which this species of property may be transferred is a matter of no inconsiderable interest.

The character of this kind of investment has been too well settled by legislative enactment and judicial construction to need discussion. While shares in a stock company are personal property, they are not strictly speaking chattels. It has been considered that they bear a greater resemblance to choses in action; or, in other words, that are merely evidence of property. Angell & Ames on Corporations, chapter xvi. section 2. They are, it has been said, mere demands of the dividends as they become due, and differ from movable property, which is capable of possession and manual apprehension. Denton v. Livingston, 9 Johns. R. 96; Wildman v. Wildman, 9 Ves. R. 177. There can be no such thing as an actual delivery of the shares. It is a general rule of law, that when a thing is intangible and incapable of actual delivery, there may be a symbolical delivery. The legal title of shares in a stock company can only be evidenced, and a transfer made in writing. A certificate of stock may, however, be transferred by a blank endorsement, which may be filled up by the holder, by writing an assignment and power of attorney over the signature endorsed. Kortright v. The Buffalo Com. Bank, 20 Wend. (N. Y.) R. 91. Angell & Ames, above cited. It follows that a power of attorney, signed in blank, is sufficient to enable the holder to make the transfer. The delivery of such a power is an implied authority to fill up the blanks. The Building Association v. Sendmeyer, 14 Wr. 67. A person being the owner of stock may sell, give away, or pledge them as he may any other article of personal property. The sale thereof with receipt of the purchase money and delivery of the certificate, with a power of attorney to transfer, passes the full equitable title and entitles the holder to demand the legal title. A person who purchases stock from the owner, or his duly authorized agent, has only to see that the vendor is owner of the same, and is entitled to a transfer by the rules of the company. The rule is different, however, when a person is acting in a fiduciary capacity. The principle may be generally stated that when one offers for sale the stock of another, the purchaser is bound to see that the former has authority to make the sale. A trustee has no such general power. His office is to hold and safely keep the trust funds in accordance with the terms of the will, or other instrument creating the trust. McMurtrie v. the Penna. Co., Legal Intel., vol. 29, p. 108. A trustee may be authorized to sell by the terms of his trust or by order of the court; but the purchaser must see to this at his peril. An executor or administrator stands upon a different footing. His office is to administer the assets. This includes a power of sale; but even in the case of an executor, the stock in question may be specifically bequeathed, or there may be a special trust thereof.

In this case I do not find anything in the will of Charles S. Wood, limiting the general power of sale incident to the office of executor. The executors had an undoubted right to make sale of this particular stock. Nor is there anything in the fact that the power of attorney was signed by but one executor. He signs as "acting executor," a term not unfrequently used, yet difficult of a precise legal meaning. It would seem to apply, if at all, to the case where only one executor has taken out letters testamentary. The law is well settled in this State, that executors may sever, may file separate accounts, and that one executor, separately acting, may convey personal property, as if all had joined. Hall v. Boyd, 6 Barr, 270; Irwin's Appeal, 11 Casey, 206; McNair's Appeal, 4 Rawle, 156; Richardson v. Richardson, 9 Barr, 430; Doebly v. Snavely, 5 Watts, 228; Still's Appeal, 10 Barr, 153. It follows that if George R. Wood, executor, sold the stock in question to Macdowell & Wilkins, and received the consideration therefor, it was a valid sale and passed the title.

In order to determine the rights of the present holders of these shares we must examine, first, the transaction between Mr. Wood and Macdowell & Wilkins, and second between the latter and Maitland, Audenried & Co.

Assuming the facts as before stated, and as they appear upon bill and affidavits, it is clear there was no sale by the executor to Macdowell & Wilkins. It was a mere pledge of the stock for an antecedent debt of the executor. In this age of defalcations and misappropriation of trust money extending through national, State, and municipal affairs, as well as those of private corporations and individuals, carrying in their train losses to public and private interests, as well as widespread distrust and alarm to all classes, I cannot designate this transaction as an indiscretion. It was a fraud; a deliberate attempt to use money held upon a sacred trust for the personal ends of the executor That Macdowell & Wilkins, who received their shares from Wood, knew of this misapplication, is apparent from the face of the papers. The latter disclosed the fact that the stock belonged to the estate of Charles S. Wood. The brokers knew that the executor was pledging the stock for his own debt. As between these parties, the transaction was illegal, and Macdowell & Wilkins took no title to the stock.

It remains to consider the case as between Macdowell & Wilkins and Maitland, Audenried & Co. The latter disclaim all knowledge of any defect in their title.

It is an undoubted principle of equity that the owner of property may follow and reclaim it wherever he can find and identify it, until arrested in the pursuit by the countervailing equity of a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration paid. A purchaser with notice that the sale is a breach of trust, or a fraud upon the rights of the real owner, is particeps criminis with the fraudulent vendor, and his purchase cannot protect him against the owner, because such purchase is not bona fide. Gerrard v. Pittsburg and Connellsville Railroad Company, 5 Casey, 154. Whatever is sufficient to put a party upon inquiry, is in equity held to be good notice to bind him.—Ib. Where a purchaser cannot make out a title but by a deed which leads him to another fact, he shall be presumed to have knowledge of that fact. 2 Fonbl. Eq. 63, Ch. 3, § 1, note b.

The application of these familiar rules of equity to the facts of this case is not difficult. This stock belongs to the estate of Charles S. Wood. Equity will follow and reclaim it until it is arrested in such attempt by the finding of the stock in the hands of a bona fide purchaser without notice. By purchaser is meant one who has in good faith paid the consideration money. Are Maitland, Audenried & Co. such purchasers.

They allege that they took this stock as collateral for a loan made to Macdowell & Wilkins. They do not pretend to have bought it. Having taken but the equitable title, they are affected with notice of all such facts as lie in the line of the legal title. The papers which they hold as evidence of their equitable title, disclose the fact that the stock in question belongs to the said estate of Charles S. Wood. Also the fact that George R. Wood is one of the executors. Further, that the said executor has executed a power of attorney authorizing an attorney, not named, to sell the stock and transfer the same, with a blank for the name of the purchaser. Do these facts furnish conclusive evidence of a sale? On the contrary the non-transfer of the stock to a purchaser and the unfilled blanks are circumstances to put the purchaser upon his guard, and are notice to him that the transaction was in fieri. The power that has never been executed. Such power is subject to revocation, and this notwithstanding present words of bargain and sale. It is true it may not be revoked after an actual sale and payment of the purchase money for this is an execution of the power.

Maitland, Audenreid & Co., being merely the holders of an equitable title, were bound to inform themselves what would be necessary to perfect it, and obtain the legal title. Such inquiry, properly prosecuted, would have led to information of the fact that there never has been a sale of this stock, and that the title thereto remains in the estate of Charles S. Wood.

It was urged upon the argument by the learned and able counsel for the defendants that inasmuch as the interest of George R. Wood in his father's estate would exceed the amount of the stock so misapplied, the equities of the case could be reached by allowing the stock to remain in the hands of the brokers, and setting it off against his share of the estate. The argument is ingenious but unsound. The course indicated would amount to a partial distribution of the estate of Charles S. Wood in advance without sufficient information or proper parties before us. Our decree in such case would not bind absent parties. We can only know what the share of George R. Wood in his father's estate will be when the executors settle their account in the proper office.

The injunction heretofore granted in this case is continued until the further order of the court.

Court of Common Pleas of Schuylkill County.

IN EQUITY.

EMILY T. ECHERT et al. v. VALENTINE FERST et al.

1. Cutting timber on the land of another, without color of title, is destruction to the freehold, and may be denominated destructive trespass.
2. Equity will enjoin against the commission of such acts, when the party is insolvent, and where it is necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits.

Opinion by WALKER, J. Delivered October 23d, 1873.

This bill in equity sets forth that the complainants are the owners of one hundred and fifteen acres of timber land, with allowance, situate in Pinegrove township, Schuylkill county. That the defendants are the owners of the adjoining land, and are knowingly and wilfully engaged in cutting down and removing the timber trees from the land of the complainants. That said land is only valuable and useful for the timber. That the defendants are persons of insufficient means to answer in damages, for the injury already done and which they are still doing, and that a judgment against them would be entirely fruitless.

Upon the presentation of this bill at chamber, a preliminary injunction issued, and the court fixed the 25th July, 1873, for the hearing, which was continued to suit the defendants until the 23d September, 1873, at which time it was ably argued by counsel. The affidavits read support these facts.

The question now is whether upon these facts, the injunction shall remain.

"The writ of injunction is a high prerogative, to be exercised with great caution, and only for the prevention of irreparable injury, and where no legal adequate remedy exists." New Boston C. & M. Co. v. The Pottsville Water Co., 4 P. F. S. 164; Clark's Appeal 12 P. F. S. 447.

If neither of these exist, a court of chancery will not interfere, but will turn the party over to his action at law for his redress.

"Whether the injury complained of be irreparable or not, is a conclusion of law for the chancellor from the peculiar circumstances." Hilliard on Injunction, 322 § 3. And the facts that show the nature of the irreparable injury must appear in the bill, a mere general averment is not enough. Chesapeake and Ohio Co. v. Young, 3 Md. 480; Adams' Equity, 210 and notes. And what is meant by "irreparable damage or mischief, is defined by the Supreme court in Commonwealth v. Pittsburg and Connellsville R. R. Co., 12 Harris, 159. Nor will the relief be withheld because the bill omits to charge the injury as irreparable, if sufficient facts are alleged to satisfy the court that such is the case. Davis v. Reed, 14 Md. 152; High on Injunctions, 464.

On the part of the defendants it is contended.

1. That the damage complained of is not irreparable.

2. That an adequate remedy exists at law.

3. That injunctions to prevent waste only lie at the instance of the remainderman, mortgagee, or one having the ultimate interest in the land.

4. That injunction is not the remedy for a criminal act.

An injury is irreparable where it is not susceptible of any adequate compensation in damages, or where from its continuance a permanent mischief must occasion a constantly recurring grievance, which cannot be otherwise prevented. Hilliard on Injunctions, 25 § 31. The bill sets forth and the affidavits support it, that the land is only valuable for the timber, which the defendants are cutting down and carrying away. The timber is a part of the real estate (9 Wr. 112) and every tree cut diminishes the value of the land. It is so alleged that the defendants are insolvent. If they be insolvent, and are allowed to take the timber away, the conclusion of law necessarily follows that the damage to the plaintiffs is not susceptible of adequate compensation, and the injury irreparable.

2. Is there an adequate legal remedy? An action of trespass can be sustained for every renewed cutting. This would increase litigation and would be insufficient to prevent the wrong complained of. This appears to be the only proper remedy of the complainants.

3. That an injunction to prevent waste is the usual remedy of the remainderman, mortgagee, and one having the ultimate interest in the land (Hilliard on Injunctions, 325, § 3; 2 Blackstone's Com. 281), yet injunctions to prevent destructive trespass have of late years obtained, especially where there have been repeated acts and trespasses. Coulson v. White, 3 Atkins, 20; Scheetz's Appeal, 11 Casey 88; Stewart and Foltz's Appeal, 6 P. F. S. 415.

The interference of equity in cases of waste, is a wholesome jurisdiction, to be liberally exercised in the prevention of irreparable injury, and depends on much latitude of discretion in the court. Kane v. Vanderburgh, 1 John's Ch. 11; Hill on Inj. 324. That injunctions may issue to restrain trespasses under color of right, seems to be at length settled. Mitchell v. Dors, 6 Vesey, 147; Twort v. Twort, 16 V. 130; Earl of Cowper v. Baker, 17 V. 128; Thomas v. Oakley, 18 V. 186; Courthope v. Mappleeden, 10 V. 291; Hanson v. Gardner, 7 V. 309; North Union Railway v. The Bolton and Preston Railway Co., 3 Railway and Canal Cases, 345.

The destruction of timber on complainant's land, where such timber is necessary for the use and enjoyment of property is enjoined in Maryland. Davis v. Reed, 14 Md. 152; High on Injunctions, § 464. In Connecticut, where the title is unquestionable, relief as against a trespasser without color of right will be granted. Falls et al. v. Tibbett, 31 Conn. 165. Equity will interfere to prevent destruction to inheritance even though both title and possession are in dispute. Cornelius v. Post, 1 Stocht, 196; Speer v. Cutter, 5 Barb. 486. Chancery does not treat questions of destructive damage now, exactly as it did forty or fifty years ago. Haig v. Jaggar, 2 Coll. 234. (33 Eng. C. L. Rep.) The change has been marked since the Fleming Case reported in 7 Vesey, 308.

4. There is a difference between an injunction to prevent waste, and one to prevent a trespass. The law is settled that for a criminal act, an injunction will not be granted, Hilliard on Injunction, 2, § 1; Mayor v. Thorne, 7 Page, 264; unless the trespasser be insolvent, or the injury irreparable and destructive to the plaintiff's estate, and such as calls for immediate relief. Morse v. Massini, 10 Min. 590; Hilliard on Injunctions, 319, sec. 1. These objections are therefore not sustained under the authorities cited.

The complainants urge that as these repeated trespasses to their freehold, denominated destructive trespass, can only be prevented by injunction, and that the insolvency of the defendants they urge, is a legal ground for the writ. Destructive trespass is defined to be damage amounting to destruction to the inheritance done by a stranger, whose possession or entry is unlawful (Adams' Equity, 209), and it is a more appropriate term in the present case than waste. Trespass upon real estate in Crookford v. Alexander, 15 Vesey, 138, the lord chancellor terms "destruction." In Smith v. Collyer, 8 Ves. 90, Lord Eldon remarked, "it was always surprising to him, that the jurisdiction by injunction was taken so freely in waste, and not in trespass, for there is a writ at common law after action to restrain waste, but a trespass after one action may be repeated." It does not seem to me that when irreparable damages must ensue, there is more reason for granting an injunction to prevent destructive trespass, than to prevent waste, for the reason of the common law remedy after action.

In case of insolvency an injunction will be granted. So when it is to prevent waste and avoid multiplicity of suits. Speer v. Cullen, 5 Barb. 487; Hilliard on Injunction, 329, sec. 4. Per Page J. See Chief Justice Wright's opinion in Cowles v. Shaw, 2 Iowa, 496; see, also, Hawley v. Clower, 2 John's Ch. 122; Hart v. Mayor, 2 Page, 264; Winnipiseogee Lake Co. v. Worster, 9 Foster N. H. 449; James v. Dixon, 20 Mo. 79 Shepley v. Ritton, 7 Md. 408; Cobb v. Smith, 16 Wis. 661; 2 Story's Equity Jur. § 925, et seq.; Adam's Eq. 425. So an injunction was granted when the defendant was a pauper, although a legal remedy existed. Hodson v. Duer, 2 Jurist, 1014.

Lord Hardwicke held, as early as 1743, that every trespass is not a foundation for an injunction, but repeated trespasses become a nuisance and may be restrained. Coulson v. White, 3 Atk. 20. For such injury is not reparable in an action for damages, besides that it would be required to be followed up by a successive action. "This," Judge Sharswood says, "is a well recognized distinction." Masson's Appeal, 20 P. F. S. 30.

The 13th section of the act of Assembly of 16th June, 1836 (Purdon's Dig. 591), which extends the jurisdiction of equity to "the prevention or restraint of the commission or continuance of acts contrary to law and prejudicial to the interests of the community, or the rights of individuals," applies to wastes by cutting down and removing timber. Denny v. Brimson, 5 C. 382. (See act 14th February, 1857, pl. 39, Purdon's Dig. 592, pl. 8, extending equity powers to the State in general.)

When trespasses are constantly recurring and threaten to be continued, they may be redressed by injunction. Stewart & Foltz's Appeal, 6 P. F. S. 413. See also in Smith & Fleek's Appeal, 19 P. F. S. 479, before cited, Judge Williams decided that cutting down timber to the injury of the inheritance, being waste, may be restrained in equity.

Chancellor Kent held that injunctions will be granted to prevent trespass as well as to stay waste, where the mischief will be irreparable, and to prevent a multitude of suits. Livingstone v. Livingstone, 6 John's Ch. 497; Watson v. Hunter, 5 John's Ch. 168.

Judge Page, in Speer v. Cutter, 5 Barb. 188, remarks, "that courts of equity originally declined to interfere by restraining waste or trespass where the right was doubtful or the defendant was in possession, claiming by an adverse title (4 John's Ch. 22; and Story's Eq. Jurisprud. § 918), but such courts have gradually enlarged their jurisdiction in such cases, and now they interfere to prevent injury to land where the title is in dispute and the right is doubtful, if the waste or trespass will be attended by irreparable mischief, or if, from the responsibility of the defendant or otherwise, the plaintiff cannot obtain relief at law; and to sustain this position he cites Hart v. Mayor, 3 Page, 214; Winship v. Pitts, 3 Page, 261; 2 John's Ch. 121. "Trespass," says Mr. Justice Baldwin in the case of Bonaparte v. The Camden and Amboy R. R. Co., 1 Baldwin, 205, "is destruction in the eye of the law when there is no privity of estate; it (equity) prevents its repetition or continuance, protects the right—arrests the injury and prevents the wrong: this is a more beneficial and complete remedy than the law can give, and, therefore, the proper one for a court of equity to administer." 9 Wheat. 842; 1 Ves. 189; 2 John's Ch. 413; 4 Pet. 215.

The decisions of different States on this question are not in all respects uniform (see Stevens v. Beekman, 1 John's Ch. 318, and others), but from the current of authorities, English and American, we may safely conclude that equity will not lend its aid to restrain a criminal or penal offence.

But where the trespass is destructive to the real estate amounting to irreparable injury; when there is no adequate legal remedy; when the title in the plaintiff to the land is complete and the wrong doer is insolvent; when it is to prevent waste to the inheritance, and when a multiplicity of suits must be the result of legal proceedings; in all such cases equity will enjoin to prevent the injury complained of. It is evident, from the facts, that this case falls within the adjudged cases, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to equitable relief. Even if the offence of cutting timber had not been passed upon, and the remedy by injunction clearly and repeatedly decided by our own courts, and the courts of the several States, I should still be inclined to grant the relief prayed for; for no vested right of the defendant is determined in this application, and no injury can result from their ceasing to cut timber for the present, until the title is established, for, as has been said by a distinguished writer upon equity jurisprudence (Willard Eq. Juris. 408), "the extent to which the jurisdiction may be carried is not marked out by any adjudged case and from the nature of things it must forever remain undefined." Hilliard on Inj. 12, § 13. Under the English practice, with which we are gradually assimilating, the powerful aid of equity may be invoked to redress the variety of recurring acts and never ending grievances of mankind, where the object is the prevention of irreparable damages, and where no legal remedy exists. If it were not so, it would be no more efficient than law, which, by reason of its universality, has long since been found deficient and unequal to the full and complete administration of justice.

And now, to wit: October 20th, 1873, it is, therefore, ordered and decreed, that the special injunction issued in this case, prohibiting the defendans from cutting timber on the land of complainants, remain until further ordered.

In re JOHN W. A. SMITH, a Bankrupt.

1. That the bankrupt act of March 2d, 1867, the amendatory acts and the declaratory act of 1873, make but one system of law, and are therefore to be taken together, and interpreted and construed as one law, and are constitutional.
2. That Congress never claimed the power, under this or any other provision of the Constitution, to annul State exemption laws, or to mould them to a uniformity and equality throughout the United States.
3. That the words "uniform laws," as used in the clause of the Constitution under consideration, have no reference to or in anywise affect the exemption laws of the several States, no matter how variant they may be.
4. That though the States vary in the extent of their exemptions, yet what remains the bankrupt law distributes equally among the creditors.
5. That there is nothing in the Federal Constitution which precludes Congress from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts; the inhibition contained in the first clause of the tenth section of the first article of that instrument is confined to the States respectively.
6. That the exemptions claimed by this bankrupt, supplant the liens of State judgments and decrees. Ed. Legal News.

Certified question from register.

Opinion of the court by ERSKINE, J. Delivered October 3d, 1873.

The assignee, in consideration of the fact that there are judgments of force against the bankrupt—who filed his petition in bankruptcy in this court on the 24th May, 1873—which had been rendered in the State courts prior to July 21st, 1868, refused to set apart other property than that allowed by the exemption laws of force in 1864. The bankrupt claims the exemption allowed by the constitution and laws of Georgia as existing in the year 1871. The register, after argument before him, held that the bankrupt was entitled to the benefit of the exemption laws of this State as they stood in 1871, and made the following order:

"Let the assignee set apart as exempted property: First, the necessary household and kitchen furniture, and such other articles and necessaries of the bankrupt as he shall designate and set apart, having reference in the amount to the family, condition and circumstances of the bankrupt, but altogether not to exceed in value the sum of five hundred dollars.

2d. The necessary wearing apparel of the bankrupt and that of his wife and children without valuation.

3d. The uniform, arms and equipments of a soldier in the militia, if he be such, or if he is in the service of the United States.

4th. Such other property as now is exempt from attachment, or seizure, or levy on execution by the laws of the United States.

5th. Real estate to the value of two thousand dollars in specie, and personal property to the value of one thousand dollars in specie."

The objections of the assignee were confined to this, the fifth item of the register's order. Here, as previously, before Mr. Register Murray, the validity of certain portions of the 14th section of the bankrupt act of March 2d, 1867, and the amendatory act of June 8th, 1872, and that of March 3d, 1873, were questioned. But counsel for the assignee pressed his argument with more directness against the constitutionality of the act of March 3d, 1873, and which is entitled "An act to declare the true intent and meaning of the act approved June 8th, 1872, amendatory of the general bankrupt law." The 14th section of the original act exempts, in addition to certain property of various kinds excepted from the provisions of this section, "such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution or other process or order of any court, by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the com encement of proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-four." The amendment of June 8th, 1872, struck out the words "eighteen hundred and sixty-four," and inserted in lieu thereof "eighteen hundred and seventy-one."

To this followed the amendatory or declaratory act of March 3d, 1873 (just referred to), which declares "that the exemptions allowed the bankrupt by said amendatory act" (of June 8th, 1872), "should, and it is hereby enacted that they shall be the amount allowed by the constitution and laws of each State, respectively, as existing in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-one; and that such exemption be valid against debts contracted before the adoption and passage of such State constitution and laws, as well as those contracted after the same, and against liens by judgment or decree of any State court, any decision of such court rendered since the adoption and passage of such constitution and laws to the contrary, notwithstanding."

The bankrupt act of March 2d, 1867, the amendatory acts, and the declaratory act of 1873, make but one system of law; they are, therefore, to be taken together and interpreted and construed as one entire law or statute. One of the objections taken by counsel for the assignee to the constitutionality of this law, was that it does not, in certain of its provisions, possess the element of uniformity as required by the fourth clause of the eighth section of the first article of the National Constitution—the clause which confers on Congress the power "to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States"—and the main reason presented was that it gave a bankrupt, in one State, property, as exempted from the pursuit of his creditors, to a larger or lesser amount or value than it bestowed upon a bankrupt in another State; and he illustrated his theory by examples: if the bankrupt, he argued, is domiciled in Georgia, he will (at least if the head of a family) be entitled to an exemption to the value of $2,000 in specie in realty, and $1,000 in specie in personalty; if the bankrupt is a resident of Mississippi, he would be entitled to property, as exempted to the value of four thousand dollars; if of California to a still larger exemption, and if of Maine to an exemption far less in value than that allowed in any of the States named. This diversity, as was urged, showed clearly the want of uniformity in the statute, and, consequently its repugnancy to the Constitution of the United States.

The argument is plausible and apparently sound; but when the mind rises from effects to causes, the fallacy of the reasoning is revealed; for Congress has never claimed the power, under this or any other provision of the Constitution, to annul State exemption laws, or to mould them to a uniformity and equality throughout the United States. From this brief statement, it will, I apprehend, be seen that the words "uniform laws," as used in this clause of the Constitution, have no reference to, or in anywise, affect the exemption laws of the several States, no matter how variant they may be. And this view is not without authority to support it: In re Beckerford, 1 Dillon, 45—argued before Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, and Krekel, J., in the Federal Circuit Court for the Western District of Missouri, this question came up for decision, and Justice Krekel, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is insisted that the 14th section, already cited, having adopted the exemption laws of the State in which the bankrupt is domiciled, and these exemptions having no regard to uniformity, violate the constitutional provision authorizing uniform laws throughout the United States to be passed. If Congress saw cause to pass bankrupt laws under the grant of power referred to, the injunction is that they shall be uniform throughout the United States. So far as the distribution of the bankrupt's assets—the point under consideration—is concerned, the law is uniform. * * * * Though the States vary in the extent of their exemptions, yet what remains the bankrupt law distributes equaly among the creditors." A like view of this question was taken by Rives, J., In re Wylie, 5 A. L. T. 330, and In re Kean and White, Pamph. 2. So likewise, by Dick, J., In re Jordan, 8 N. B. R. 180. See also Bump, 6th edition, 135. If the reason which I have advanced is too narrow to show that the bankrupt act of 1867, and the amendments cited, are in harmony with the clause of the Constitution requiring laws on the subject of bankruptcies to be uniform throughout the United States, then I am content to rest satisfied upon the broader reason of the authorities quoted or referred to.

A bankrupt system or law must be regarded as comprehensive, and not partial in its operation; so, too, it should be accompanied with enlightened principles of equity, that honesty may be encouraged and protected, and fraud suppressed. True, it is a general tenet of ethics, that the author of any damage ought in conscience to repair it. But if this rule be extended to the case of a debtor who makes default of payment at the time appointed, by means whereof the creditor sustains some extraordinary detriment, a strict application of the maxim would (in many cases) be unjust; for it must be also recollected that men should not be held accountable for unforeseen contingencies—contingencies proceeding from a concurrence of conflicting circumstances over which the debtor could have had no control.

No one can peruse the declatory act of March 3d, 1873—and which, it may be said, re-enacts the amendatory act of June 8th, 1872—without perceiving the prominence of its retrospective features, also its power to impair the obligation of contracts, and to displace liens created by judgments and decrees rendered in State courts. But if there be no constitutional infirmity in this enactment, it must be taken as absolute and uncontrollable. And there is nothing in the Federal Constitution which precludes Congress from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts; the inhibition contained in the first clause of the tenth section of the first article of that instrument is confined to the States respectively. White v. Hart, 13 Wall. 646; Guan v. Barry, Id. 610. In modern days laws of bankruptcy are considered as laws calculated for the benefit of trade, in its largest sense, and are founded on principles of humanity as well as justice; and being for the good of trade, the thought suggests itself, that if a national bankrupt law did not possess the element of retrospectiveness, and the power to impair, or, if necessary, to discharge the obligation of antecedent contracts, it would but half perform its functions. And, indeed, it does not strike my mind that it would be a purely speculative postulate to say, that if the Constitution had not expressly granted to Congress the power to establish laws on the subject of bankruptcies; still the right of the Legislature to enact laws of this nature—laws so intimately connected with the regulation of commerce at home and abroad, and with manufacturing and agricultural interests—would, it seems to me, be within its legitimate powers, as an attribute of sovereignty in the nation—as essentially so as the paramount right of eminent domain, or the authority to pass embargo laws, or laws for the erection of forts, light houses or public buildings. But notwithstanding the expression of any theoretical ideas, the court has been guided to its conclusion solely by those reasons which were fairly deducible from the language of the Constitution itself. Confining the decision to the issues made, the validity of the general bankrupt law of 1867, the amendatory act of 1872, and also (so far at least as the present matter in controversy is involved) the declaratory act of 1873, is assumed, and cannot, I think, be treated as debatable.

And that I may not fall into the mischievous habit of not indicating the sources of my information, I will name, and, when necessary, quote from the cases and authorities mainly consulted, to sustain the views exhibited.

The 5th section of the act of Congress of March 3d, 1797 (1 Stat. 512), gave a preference to the United States in cases of insolvency, and the Supreme Court, in United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 358, decided the act to be constitutional; and also that it was not confined to persons accountable for public money, but extended to debtors of the government generally.

In Evans v. Eaton, Peters' C. C. R. 323, Mr. Justice Washington said: "There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States which forbids Congress to pass laws violating the obligation of contracts, although such a power is denied to the States individually." Similar language was held by Mr. Justice McLean, in Bloomer v. Statley, 5 McLean, 158; and see Satterlee v. Matthewson, 2 Peters, 330. Chief Justice Chase, in pronouncing the decision of the court in Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wall. 603, remarked that "Congress has express power to enact bankrupt laws, and we do not see that a law made in the execution of any other express power, which, incidentally only, impairs the obligation of a contract, can be held to be unconstitutional for that reason."

Mr. Justice Miller, in his dissenting opinion in the same case (concurred in by Justices Swayne and Davis), said that "while the Constitution forbids the States to pass such laws" [laws impairing the obligation of contracts], "it does not forbid Congress. On the contrary, Congress is expressly authorized to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, the essence of which is to discharge debtors from the obligation of their contracts."

Mr. Justice Field, in his dissenting opinion in the Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall. 457, said: "The only express authority for any legislation affecting the obligation of contracts is found in the power to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, the direct object of which is to release insolvent debtors from their contracts upon the surrender of their property."

And Mr. Justice Strong, in giving the judgment of the court in the Legal Tender Cases, supra, said: "Nor can it be truly asserted that Congress may not, by its action, indirectly impair the obligation of contracts, if by the expression be meant rendering contracts fruitless or partially fruitless. Directly it may, confessedly, by passing a bankrupt act, embracing past as well as future transactions. This is obliterating contracts entirely. * * * * And it is no sufficient answer to this to say it is true only when the powers exerted were expressly granted. There is no around for any such distinction"

Dick, J., In re Jordan; and Rivers, J., In re Kean and White, have held the act of 1873, amendatory of the general bankrupt law, constitutional. And the court is indebted also to Register Murray for his written opinion upholding the validity of the act.

The act of 1873, as previously observed, declares that it was the true intent and meaning of the act of 1872, that the exemptions "as existing in the year eighteen hundred and seventy-one," shall be valid against debts contracted before the adoption and passage of such State constitution and laws, as well as those contracted after the same, and against liens by judgment or decree of any State court," &c. This court, in a series of cases which arose prior to the declaratory act of 1873, ruled that under the general bankrupt act of 1867, and also under the act of 1872, State exemptions were paramount debts pre-existing the passage of these acts; and none of these rulings were ever seriously questioned here. But whether, before the passage of the declaratory act of 1873, a court would have been warranted in so interpreting and construing the acts of 1867 or 1872, as to adjudge exemptions valid against liens by judgment or decree of State courts, it is now too late to discuss. Congress has, however, by the act of 1873, declared the true intent and meaning of the act of the preceding year; and so far as the case now before me is concerned, the bankrupt having filed his petition in bankruptcy nearly two months subsequent to the passage of the act of 1873—the court decides that the exemptions claimed by this bankrupt supplants the liens of State judgments and decrees. See Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 2d edition, 90–94, and the cases cited by that learned and accomplished jurist, and also, In re Kean and White, supra.

The assignee is instructed to carry into effect the order made by Register Murray. Affirmed.

Supreme Court of Pennsylv'a.

PENNSYLVANIA R. R. COMPANY v. CHRISTIAN ACKERMAN.

In the court below, the judge left it to the jury to determine whether, under the circumstances, a prudent man would not have got out of his wagon and approached a railroad track, which he was about crossing, to see if there was any danger, and that if he would have done so, it was the duty of the plaintiff's servant to do so, and if the latter's neglect in this particular contributed to the injury complained of, the plaintiff could not recover: Held, not to be error.

Railroad crossings at grade. Practical suggestions.

Error was assigned in the answer of the court below to plaintiff in error's third point, viz.: "If the jury believe that the driver, by reason of the cars standing on the siding, and in the position described by the witnesses, could not see the approach of the train to the crossing, and that the position of the cars rendered passing over the main track more dangerous than if they had not been there, then he was in law bound to use more care and caution; and if by getting out of his wagon and going on the crossing, he could have discovered the approach of the train, and thereby avoided the collision, and he did not do so, then the plaintiff cannot recover."

Answer of the court:

The first branch of this proposition is affirmed; as to the latter part of it, we submit to the jury to say whether under the circumstances a man of ordinary prudence and caution would not have got out of his wagon and approached the track at the head of the horses, until he was in a position where he could look along the track far enough to see that he was in no danger from an approaching train. If, under the circumstances, an ordinarily prudent and cautious man would, under the circumstances, have done so, it was the duty of the plaintiff's driver to do so, and if his neglect to do so contributed to the injury complained of, the plaintiff cannot recover.

As we have said, it is the duty of a party approaching a railroad crossing to pause, look and listen, in order to satisfy himself that there is no danger from an approaching train.

The point at which he should pause and look and listen will depend on circumstances. If the view is unobstructed, he may exercise these precautions without being very close to the track. If the view from his approach is obstructed, he should place himself in a position where he could satisfy himself that there was no danger.

This is doing nothing more than an ordinarily prudent and cautious man would do. By this rule it must be determined whether the driver did his duty or not.

Opinion of the Court by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered October 20th, 1873.

There is no subject which, in my judgment more loudly calls for legislative regulation, than that of railroad crossings at grade. We are far behind Great Britain and the countries on the continent of Europe, in the precautions required to prevent those fearful accidents to passenger trains from collisions which have produced the loss of so many valuable lives, accompanied with the horrible suffering from mangled limbs and bodies. The judicial decisions of the courts, and of this court in particular, have gone as far as they could in requiring the utmost care on the part of the servants of the railroad companies to give notice of the approach of trains, and the like care and caution to travellers in attempting to cross. More particularly is this true either in approaching or passing through populous towns or cities.

If the evidence given by the plaintiff below was to be believed, the railroad company in the case before us was guilty of very gross negligence. It was a dark, foggy morning—snow on the track which deadened the usual rumbling sound of a moving train. They were going, even according to their own account, at a much greater speed than was allowed by the ordinance of the city of Alleghany, through whose streets they were passing. They sounded no whistle, and if they were ringing a bell, it could only have been at intervals, not continuously. Too many entirely indifferent witnesses testified that they did not hear a bell, to lead the mind to any other conclusion. This particular crossing was at the time so obstructed by cars on a siding, that the view of the track could not be had until the traveller was directly upon it. One witness testified that a person could not see up the track without getting out on the middle of it. This resulted, as he said, from a tannery which stood out in the way, and from the manner in which cars stood on the siding, one car standing out partly on the street.

On the other hand, the driver of the wagon, the horses of which were killed, according to his testimony, did all he could in the way of precaution, without incurring imminent danger of his own life. He stopped within ten steps of the crossing and listened, but heard nothing. If he had got out and lead his horses on the track, the result would have probably been the loss of his own life as well as that of the horses. It is not to such a case that the opinion and decision in Pennsylvania Railroad Company v. Beale, 21 Pittsburg Legal Journal, 11, applied. We adhere to that decision, that the fact that the track cannot be seen from the road is no reason why the traveller should not stop and listen, approach the track at a slow walk, and if he has reason to fear from his horses taking fright, get out of his wagon and lead them by the head until he comes to a point where he can be sure that it is safe to cross. It is negligence in a railroad company to have such a crossing so obstructed as this one appears to have been, but this does not dispense with the necessity of extreme precaution in the traveller, if he was acquainted with the nature of the locality. The same strict rule cannot be held to apply to a stranger to the country. Indeed one of the regulations which ought to be made by legislative authority should be that the usual notice on country roads, "Look out for the locomotive." should be at a point where the approaching train on the track can be seen in either direction; and as to streets in a city, there should be a flagman at every crossing. The point which was put by the defendants below, to the learned judge, was too broad under the evidence of the case, and he would have been guilty of error if he had affirmed it without qualification. He left it to the jury to say whether the servant of the plaintiff had done all that a prudent and cautious man could do. If the view from his approach is obstructed, he should place himself in a position where he could satisfy himself that there was no danger. Whether he could have done this was a question of fact for the jury, and was properly left to them. Judgment affirmed.—P. L. J., Oct. 29th.

BOROUGH OF OIL CITY v. McABOY, for use.

An action against a borough or other municipal corporation can only be maintained in a court having jurisdiction over the territorial limits comprised in such corporation.

Certiorari to the District Court of Alleghany county.

Opinion of the Court by AGNEW, J. Delivered October 20th, 1873.

Counties and townships are the legally recognized municipal divisions of the State. The second section of the act of 15th April, 1834, relating to counties and townships and county and township officers, provides that every city shall be deemed and taken to form part of the county in which it is or may be situate. Much more, then, is a borough to be deemed a part of the county. Indeed, formerly, boroughs were treated as parts of the respective townships to which they belonged, though since the passage of the act of 3d April, 1851, every borough incorporated from within a township is now to be considered a distinct district. These municipal divisions are in their nature local, being within a fixed territory; and the people residing there, no matter how fluctuating in regard to individuals, being the true corporation. Hence it has been held, that actions against counties are not transitory but local, and must be brought in the courts of the proper county. Lehigh County v. Kleckner, 5 W. & S. 181. The reasons are founded in the convenience and policy of the State, and the limited remedy for the payment of debts. The same rule, therefore, applies with equal force to cities and boroughs.

It is thought the case before us differs, inasmuch as the writing upon which judgment was confessed against the borough of Oil City contains a warrant of attorney, empowering "any attorney of any court of record of this commonwealth to confess judgment for the sum due at maturity, with costs of suit, release of errors," &c. But this is a question of jurisdiction in the court, and not an irregularity or error in the confession; and we think the judgment can be confessed only in the courts of the proper county, no other having power to enforce payments. The commissioners to revise the civil code, reporting upon the act of 15th April, 1834, 2 Park & Johnson's Dig. 724, remark that the only remedy to obtain payment of the debt of a county or township, was the tedious and expensive course of an application to the Supreme Court for a mandamus. They therefore reported the remedy by writ of command and attachment, contained in the 6th and 7th sections of the act of 1834. In Wilson v. The Commissioners of Huntingdon County, 7 W. & S. 197, Justice Kennedy said, there can be no seizure, extension or sale of the property of the county, and payment can only be enforced after judgment by issuing a writ commanding the commissioners to pay, &c., and not otherwise. The 72d section of the act of 16th June, 1836, relating to executions, expressly excepts out of the provision for executions against corporations, counties, townships and other public municipal bodies. Hence it was held in Lehigh County v. Kleckner, supra, that the courts of one county could not issue process to compel payment against the commissioners of another county. Had there been no such expression of this court, the reasons for confining the remedy by writ of command and attachment to the courts of the proper county in which the municipality is situate are so strong we could not do otherwise than hold the law to be so. It would be a gross hardship to subject the people of a prescribed territory, who can act only through certain officers, to the multiplied jurisdiction of as many courts as there are counties in the State, to suit the mere convenience of a single person who may be creditor. Different bonds in the hands of different persons might in this instance subject the borough of Oil City to as many different jurisdictions at the same time all over the State. Of necessity the records and papers of a municipality should be kept within its own territory for the use of the people who are governed within it. So the public officers of the municipality should be permitted to remain at home in the performance of duties local in their nature, and not dragged away from their offices and duties to run over the State at the call of individual creditors. In view of these reasons and of the provisions in the 6th and 7th sections of the act of 1834, and 72d section of the act of 1836, we are of opinion that the District Court of Alleghany county has no jurisdiction to compel payment of debts by a municipality existing in Venango county. The reference to the bond suits against counties and cities in the Federal courts furnishes no argument in favor of the jurisdiction of the District Court of Alleghany county in this case. In all such actions the counties sued in the Federal courts, were within their territorial jurisdiction; while the right to entertain jurisdiction was founded on the non-residence of the plaintiff within the State, under the Constitution and laws of the United States. The reference to these bond suits is useful, however, in reminding us of the infinite inconveniences those suits caused to the officers of distant counties. We are, therefore, of opinion that the warrant of attorney did not legally authorize a confession of judgment against the borough of Oil City in the District Court of this county. Consent cannot confer jurisdiction against the laws of the State. The writ of certiorari in this case having been amended under leave granted, and converted into a writ of error, the judgment in this case is reversed, and all proceedings under it are set aside.

The same judgment is rendered in the following cases, viz., Nos 171, 172, 173, 174 of October and November Term, 1873, between the same parties. —P. L. J., Oct. 29th.

District Court of Philada.

CONAWINGO PETROLEUM CO. v. CUNNINGHAM.

Under a contract to deliver oil "from this date to December 31st," a tender was made on December 31st. Held, too late.

CASE STATED.

It is agreed that the following case be stated for the opinion of the court, with the right to either party to sue out a writ of error to the judgment.

On September 9th, 1870, a contract in writing was made, as follows:

OIL CITY, Sept. 9, 1870.

Sold on account of the Conawingo Petroleum Refining Company to Wilson A. Cunningham, one thousand (1,000) barrels good green merchantable crude petroleum, forty (40) gallons to the barrel, gravity forty to forty-six (40 to 46) degrees, at a temperature of 60° Fahrenheit, to be delivered, buyer's option, at any time from this date, to December 31st, 1870, in bulk cars at Venango City. Payment to be made cash on delivery, at the rate of thirteen and one-half (13½) cents per gallon, in lots as gauged and delivered.

S. BOWERS,
Broker.

Brokerage ⅛ by seller.

Accepted, W. A. Cunningham, Sept. 10th, 1870.

OIL CITY, Oct. 24, 1870.

Sold on account of the Conawingo Petroleum Refining Company to Wilson A. Cunningham, one thousand (1,000) barrels good green merchantable crude petroleum, forty (40) gallons to the barrel, gravity forty to forty-six (40 to 46) degrees, at a temperature of 60° Fahrenheit, to be delivered, buyer's option, at any time from date hereof, to December 31st, inclusive, 1870, in bulk cars, at Venango City. Payment to be made cash on delivery, at the rate of eleven (11) cents per gallon, in lots as gauged and delivered. Buyer to give the seller ten (10) day's notice before delivery.

S. BOWERS,
Broker.

Brokerage ⅛ by seller.

Accepted, W. A. Cunningham, Oct. 24th, 1870.

It is agreed that the place of delivery on each of the above contracts was a well known siding of the Alleghany Valley Railroad, between certain termini, at Venango City.

On the 30th day of December, 1870, the defendant was at the place of delivery ready and willing to accept the oil on the contract of September 9th, 1870. The plaintiff made no tender, and on that day had no oil at the place of delivery.

On the morning of the 31st of December, the defendant, having contracts of his own to fill, purchased of other parties the amount of oil named in the first contract of September 9th, 1870, in order to carry out his own contracts.

On the 31st day of December, 1870, about 4 o'clock P. M., the plaintiff, at place of delivery, tendered the specific amount of oil on the contract of September 9th, 1870. The defendant declined to accept it, as being too late, but offered to take the same on the contract of October 24th, 1870, which the plaintiff refused to deliver the oil upon.

Oil on December 31st, 1870, was worth, at Venango City, ten cents a gallon.

If the court is of opinion that the defendant was bound to accept the oil tendered on December 31st, as a performance of the contract of September 9th, 1870, then judgment to be entered for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,400. But if the court are of the opinion that tender of December 31st, 1870, was not such as defendant was bound to accept as a performance on the contract of September 9th, 1870, then judgment for defendant.

July 12th, 1873. Per Curiam. Judgment for defendant on case stated.

Thomas R. Elcock, Esq., for plaintiff.

David W. Sellers, Esq., for defendant

Court of Appeals, Kentucky.

UNITED SOCIETY OF SHAKERS v. UNDERWOOD et al., and DAVENPORT v. SAME.

1 The plaintiffs made a special deposit of bonds in the bank, and alleged that they were wrongfully taken from plaintiffs' package of special deposit by the officers of the bank, and by them converted to the use and emolument of said bank, by sale without authority of plaintiffs, and of such wrongful conversion and appropriation, defendants, who were directors, had or could have had by the most ordinary diligence and investigation ample notice: Held, On demurrer that the defendants were liable.

2. That it is the duty of bank directors to use ordinary diligence to acquaint themselves with the business of the corporation, and whatever information might be acquired by ordinary attention to their duties they must, in controversies with persons doing business with the bank, be presumed to have; that public policy demands they shall not be heard to say that by reason of their gross negligence and wilful inattention they were not appraised of that which the ledgers, books, accounts, correspondence and statements of the bank showed to be true; that in actions like this it is not necessary to bring home to the directors actual knowledge of the fact that the special deposits held by the bank were being sold and converted to its use by the officers having them in custody.

3. That special deposits are mere naked bailments, and that the bank nor its directory undertake to exercise any greater care in their preservation than the depositor has the reasonable right to suppose is exercised in keeping the bank's property of like description; that as the directory is the corporate government of the bank, and in the legal sense is the corporation itself, the negligence or inattention of its members can and ought to be imputed to the bank.—Ed. Legal News.

The opinion of the court was delivered by LINDSAY, J.

The court being sufficiently advised delivered the following opinion herein, to wit:

The first named appeal is prosecuted from the judgment of the Franklin Circuit Court, and the latter from that of the Warren Court of Common Pleas; but as the questions involved are almost identical, they will, for convenience, be considered and determined together.

To each of the petitions a general demurrer was sustained, and the parties failing to plead further, judgments were rendered dismissing them absolutely, and we are now called upon to determine whether said petitions set out facts constituting causes of action.

From them it appears that in the year 1865 the Bank of Bowling Green went into operation under a charter approved June 2d, 1865, and that during the time it continued in business the defendants were members of its board of directors; and further, that before the institution of these actions said bank, upon the petition of the defendants, or some of them, had been declared a bankrupt by proper legal proceeding, and was insolvent.

The Society of Shakers allege that on the 22d of February, 1869, its agent, U. E. Johns, deposited with the bank a special deposit of $72,450 in bonds, fully described in a memorandum incorporated into the petition, and that the bank had failed upon demand to return $55,660.40 of said bonds. Also that it had failed to account for $9,702.63 collected on interest coupons attached thereto.

Davenport alleges that on the 3d of March, 1866, he placed in the bank on special deposit, nine Warren county bonds of $1,000 each, which by reason of the premium for which they would sell in the market, were of the value of $11,500, and that the bank had failed upon demand to return all or any of such bonds. The Society of Shakers charge the conversion of their bonds in the following language:

"Plaintiffs state that all the aforementioned bonds, aggregating in value the sum of $55,660.40, were wrongfully taken from plaintiffs' package of special deposit by the officers of the Bank of Bowling Green, and by them converted to the use and emolument of said bank by sale as aforesaid, without right or authority from these plaintiffs or any of them, and of such wrongful conversion and appropriation, defendants, and each of them had, or could have had, by the most ordinary diligence and investigation, ample notice."

Davenport alleges that his bonds had been "wrongfully appropriated by said Bank of Bowling Green and converted to the use and emolument of said bank, forwarded to its regular correspondents and by them sold, and the proceeds of sale credited to the Bank of Bowling Green and paid on checks or drafts of said bank, of all of which defendants, and each of them, had notice, as well from the ledgers, books and accounts of said bank as from its correspondents, reconcilements and statements."

And further: "That said bonds were wrongfully appropriated as aforesaid to the use and benefit of said bank, and without authority from this plaintiff, and that of such wrongful conversion and appropriation defendants, and each of them, had or could have had, by the most ordinary diligence, ample notice."

It is also substantially charged in each petition that the defendants, acting as directors, "did, on various occasions, declare dividends when the condition of the bank did not justify the same, and so appropriated to themselves, they being the largest stockholders, large sums of money actually realized from the conversion of the plaintiffs' property as aforesaid." Upon the facts as thus stated, this court must determine whether or not appellees, or any of them, are personally bound to make good the losses resulting to appellants from the unauthorized and wrongful conversion by the bank of their special deposits. In the adjudication of these causes, it is not necessary that we shall critically inquire into the duties and obligations resting upon the bank directors to look after and protect the interest of special depositors, from whom the corporation represented by the directory receives no compensation. It is sufficient to say that special deposits are mere naked bailments, and that the bank, nor its directory, undertake to exercise any greater care in their preservation than the depositor has the reasonable right to suppose is exercised in keeping the bank's property of like description. It cannot be doubted, however, that if the deposit is lost by reason of the gross negligence, or the wilful inattention of the directors, the bank is responsible therefor, upon the well-established doctrine that a mere depositary is liable for gross negligence. And as the directory is the corporate government of the bank, and in the legal sense is the corporation itself, the negligence or inatten-tion of its members can, and ought to be imputed to the bank. But the liability of the bank in these actions is not made to turn alone upon the want of fidelity and care upon the part of the directory.

It is distinctly and clearly charged that the deposits were sold by the officers of the bank, and the proceeds of such sales converted to its use and emolument, and that this was done with the knowledge of the directors.

This charge implies a conversion by the bailee of the bailor's goods, for which by the common law rules of pleading the bailors might maintain trover.

The question presenting itself in these actions is, whether the directors, who had knowledge of these alleged wrongful sales, are personally liable for the value of the deposits so converted? It is insisted by the appellees that these actions cannot be maintained because of the want of privity between the depositors and the bank directors. They concede that if they have been guilty of gross mismanagement of the affairs of the bank, and that its insolvency and bankruptcy are the consequence of such mismanagement, they may be held to account to the corporation whose officers and agents they were, but urge that inasmuch as their undertaking was to the bank, they can only be proceeded against by it, the party with whom they contracted, and that these appellants must look to the corporation and not to them.

This assumption is plausible, but it cannot be supported.

Bank directors are not mere agents like cashiers, tellers, and clerks. They are, in a certain sense, trustees for the stockholders; and as to mere dealing with the bank they not only represent it, but for all legal consideration are in fact the bank itself. (Morse on Banking, page 76.)

Their contract is not alone with the bank. They invite the public to deal with the corporation, and when any one accepts their invitation he has the right to expect reasonable diligence and good faith at their hands; and if they fail in either they violate a duty they owe not only to the stockholders but to the creditors and patrons of the corporation. (Hodges v. New England Sacred Company, 1 Rhode Island, 312.)

An honest administration of the affairs of the bank, and slight diligence at least in preventing special deposits from being wrongfully converted to its use, were legal duties which the directors were under obligation to the special depositors to perform; and as these obligations grew out of their implied contract that they would perform such duties, there is a legal privity between the parties This doctrine was recognized by this court in the case of the Lexington and Ohio Road Company v. Bridges, 7 B. Monroe, 556, in which case it was held that the directors of that corporation, by accepting their positions, assumed the discharge of certain duties not only to the company, but to persons dealing with it, and that if they misappropriated the funds entrusted to their control, and a creditor was damaged by the act, he had a right of action against them for the injury resulting from their illegal conduct. Whenever there exists a legal duty to perform or omit to do an act, the law will imply a promise by the person upon whom the duty rests that he will discharge it, and between him and all persons having the legal right to demand its performance a privity of contract exists. (Chitty on Contracts, page 1; Parsons on Contracts.)

These actions, however, are not based upon the contract of bailment to the bank, nor upon the implied contract of the appellants that they would not by gross negligence or tacit acquiescence permit the deposits to be converted to the bank's use. The appellants had the right to elect whether they would avail themselves of the remedies prescribed by law for the breach of contract, either upon the part of the bank or of these appellees, and they have elected to waive their right of action upon these contracts, and sue for the joint tort of the bank and the appellees, committed by the wrongful and unauthorized conversion of their deposits. Treating the bank as the bailee, and the directors as its mere agents, it is perfectly clear that, if they permitted the subordinate officers to sell the special deposits, and then acting for the bank assented to the money arising therefrom being used for the purpose of the bank, they are parties to the tort.

"To maintain trover, the defendant must have converted the property to his own use, or have done some other act with a wrongful intent, expressed or implied." (Hilliard on Torts, section 8, chapter 16, page 284, volume 2.)

"If one person disposes of the goods of another for the benefit of a third person, this is a conversion." (Bacon's Abridgment, title Trover, sub. B.)

"Every unlawful intermeddling with the goods of another is a conversion, it being a disposition pro tanto of the goods of another as if they were the goods of the intermeddler." (Ib., also Young v. Moore, 7 J. J. Marshall, 646.)

In the well considered case of Pool v. Atkission et al., 1 Dana, 110, it was held that the agent who disposed of the slaves of another in obedience to the instructions of his employer, acting in good faith and ignorant of the complainant's rights, was nevertheless liable to the true owner; and in the learned dissenting opinion it was not argued that his liability would have been an open question if he had acted in the matter with knowledge of the fact that the slaves were the property of the party suing and not of his employer.

These appellants allege that their bonds were sold by the officers of the bank and the proceeds paid out in the satisfaction of claims against it, and in the payment of dividends to its stockholders, and that of all this appellees had notice.

Having such notice, it was their duty (and they had full power in the premises) either to prevent the sale of the deposits or to hold the proceeds for the benefit of their owners. Their failure to discharge this duty must be regarded as wilful, and the conclusion cannot be escaped that by permitting the sales to be made, and the proceeds to be paid out as alleged, they made themselves parties to the unauthorized acts constituting the conversion.

This conclusion is strengthened by the averment that they declared dividends when the condition of the bank did not justify it, and thus distributed to themselves portions of the moneys arising from the conversion of appellants' deposits. If such be the case, and they acted with notice of the wrongful sales, they not only participated in, but derived profit from the tortious conduct of the subordinate officers of the bank.

It is objected that the allegation of notice is so far qualified as to destroy the sufficiency of the averment. It is alleged that the appellees, "and each of them, had, or could have had, by the most ordinary diligence and investigation, ample notice."

It is certainly the duty of bank directors to use ordinary diligence to acquaint themselves with the business of the corporation, and whatever information might be acquired by ordinary attention to their duties, they must in controversies with persons doing business with the bank to be presumed to have. Public policy demands that they shall not be heard to say that by reason of their gross negligence and wilful inattention, they were not apprised of that which the ledgers, books, accounts, correspondence, reconcilements and statements of the bank showed to be true. It is not necessary in actions like these to bring home to the directors actual knowledge of the fact that the special deposits held by the bank were being sold and converted to its use by the officers having them in custody. It must suffice to show that the evidences of the practice were such that it must have been brought to their knowledge unless they were grossly or wilfully careless in the performance of their duties.

It is further insisted in the case of the United Shakers, that it is manifest that all the defendants are not liable, and that by reason of the misjoinder of parties defendant, and that the general demurrer was properly sustained.

An examination of section 120 of the Civil Code of Practice will show that the improper joinder of parties defendant is not a ground for general demurrer, and under the 144th section of the New York Code, which is similar to section 120 of our own, the courts of that State have so held. The People v. Mayor of New York, 28 Barbour, 240. The objection may be made available either by a rule requiring the appellant to elect which of the defendants it will proceed against, or by proper instructions by the court, when the cause goes to the jury.

The case of Hawkins v. Phythian, 8 B. Monroe, 515, does not authorize the deduction that, because there is a different and higher degree of diligence required of the president than of the other directors of the bank, they can not be jointly sued in these actions. In the case cited the declaration did not show that the injury complained of resulted from the joint act of the defendants, as is alleged in these cases.

The judgments sustaining the general demurrers and dismissing the two petitions must be reversed.

The special demurrers filed in the Davenport case were not formally passed upon by the Court of Common Pleas because of its action upon the general demurrer, still they are now before this court, and it seems that the best interests of the parties litigant demand that they shall be noticed, in order that the mandate of this court may set out as nearly as possible the principles upon which further proceedings are to be had.

Special demurrer No. 1 should be overruled, as it is not necessary that the officer who sold the bonds shall be named. It is sufficient that they were converted to the use of the bank, and that these appellees participated in the wrongful act.

No. 2 should be overruled, as the petition does sufficiently allege the conversion complained of.

No. 3 should also be overruled, as the petition does not blend a cause of action growing out of a tort, with a cause of action founded on a contract.

No. 4, which goes to the amended petition, should be sustained.

None of the matters of fact set up in that pleading can be regarded as the proximate cause or causes of the injury complained of. It is the conversion of appellant's bonds that gives to him a right of action, and neither the failure of appellees to discharge the duties owing by them to the stockholders and general creditors of the bank, nor the fraudulent representation made by them as to the amount of stock that had been subscribed for or paid in, can in any way affect this right.

No. 5 should also be sustained. It is unnecessary and improper to plead conclusions of law.

No. 6 should be overruled, so far as it is objected that that petition does not sufficiently allege that the appellees had the actual custody of the bonds, as such possession is not necessary to make them liable for the conversion; but it should be sustained as to all those portions of the petition charging acts of omission upon the part of appellees, whereby they violated the duty owing by them to the stockholders and general creditors of the bank.

It is possible that some of the circumstances thus alleged may be admissible as evidence to show that appellees had knowledge of and assented to the conversion of appellant's bonds, but mere circumstances, from which controlling and essential facts may be deduced, ought not to be embodied in the pleadings.

The relevancy of each circumstance should be passed upon by the court, where the parties offer to prove it, and it should be left to the jury to determine as to the weight to which it is entitled when proved, uninfluenced by the previous determination by the court, that the circumstances stated, if proved, do or do not authorize the conclusions drawn by the pleader.

For reasons already given, special demurrers Nos. 7, 8 and 9 should be overruled.

The two causes are remanded with instructions to overrule the general demurrers, and for further proceedings in each case conformable to the principles of this opinion.

No conviction shall be had in any prosecution for the publication of papers relating to the official conduct of officers or men in public capacity, or to any other matter proper for public investigation or information, where the fact that such publication was not maliciously or negligently made shall be established to the satisfaction of the jury; and in all indictments for libels, the jury shall have a right to determine the law and the facts, under the direction of the court as in other cases.

SECT. 8. The people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers and possessions, from unreasonable searches and seizures, and no warrant to search any place or to seize any person or thing, shall issue without describing them as nearly as may be, nor without probable cause supported by oath or affirmation, subscribed to by the affiant.

All courts shall be open; and every man for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person or reputation, shall have remedy by due course of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial or delay. Suits may be brought against the commonwealth in such manner, in such courts and in such cases as the Legislature may by law direct.

SECT. 12. No power of suspending laws shall be exercised unless by the Legislature or by its authority.

SECT. 13. Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel punishments inflicted.

SECT. 14. All prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, unless for capital offences, when the proof is evident or presumption great; and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in case of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.

SCHEDULE.

That no inconvenience may arise from the changes in the constitution of the commonwealth, and in order to carry the same into complete operation, it is hereby declared that:

SECTION 1. This constitution shall take effect on the first day of January, in the year 1874, for all purposes not otherwise provided for therein.

SECT. 2. All laws in force in this commonwealth at the time of the adoption of this constitution not inconsistent therewith, and all rights, actions, prosecutions, and contracts, shall continue as if the constitution had not been adopted.

SECT. 3. At the general elections in the years one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four and one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five, senators shall be elected in all districts where there shall be vacancies. Those elected in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four shall serve for two years, and those elected in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five shall serve for one year. Senators now elected, and those whose terms are unexpired, shall represent the districts in which they reside until the end of the term for which they were elected.

SECT. 4. At the general election in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, senators shall be elected from the even numbered districts to serve for two years, and from odd numbered districts to serve for four years.

SECT. 5. The first election of governor under this constitution shall be at the general election in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five, when a governor shall be elected for three years; and the term of the governor elected in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight and those thereafter elected shall be for four years, according to the provisions of this constitution.

SECT. 6. At the general election in the year 1874, a lieutenant governor shall be elected according to the provisions of this constitution.

SECT. 7. The secretary of internal affairs shall be elected at the first general election after the adoption of this constitution; and when the said officer is duly elected and qualified, the office of surveyor general shall be abolished, and the surveyor general in office at the time of the adoption of this constitution shall continue in office until the expiration of the term for which he was elected.

SECT. 8. When the superintendent of public instruction shall be duly qualified, the office of superindent of common schools shall cease.

SECT. 9. Nothing contained in this constitution shall be construed to render any person now holding any State office for a first official term ineligible for re-election at the end of such term.

SECT. 10. The judges of the Supreme Court in office when this constitution shall take effect, shall continue until their commissions severally expire. Two judges in addition to the number now composing the said court shall be elected at the first general election after the adoption of this constitution.

SECT. 11. All courts of record, and all existing courts which are not specified in this constitution, shall continue in existence until the first day of December, in the year 1875, without abridgment of their present jurisdiction, but no longer. SECT. 15. Judges learned in the law of any court of record holding commissions in force at the adoption of this constitution shall hold their respective offices until the expiration of the terms for which they were commissioned and until their successors shall be duly qualified. The governor shall commission the president judge of the Court of First Criminal Jurisdiction for the counties of Schuylkill, Lebanon, and Dauphin, as a judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Schuylkill county, for the unexpired term of his office.

SECT. 16. After the expiration of the term of any president judge of any Court of Common Pleas in commission at the adoption of this constitution, the judge of such court learned in the law and oldest in commission shall be the president judge thereof, and when two or more judges are elected at the same time in any judicial district, they shall decide by lot which shall be president judge; but when the president judge of a court shall be re-elected he shall continue the president judge of that court. Associate judges, not learned in the law, elected after the adoption of this constitution, shall be commissioned to hold their office for the term of five years from the first day of January after their election.

The additional judges for courts Nos. 2 and 4 shall be voted for and elected at the first general election after the adoption of this constitution in the same manner as the two additional judges of the Supreme Court, and they shall decide by lot to which court they shall belong. Their term of office shall commence on the first Monday of January in the year 1875.

SECT. 19. In the county of Alleghany, for the purpose of first organization under this constitution, the judges of the Court of Common Pleas, at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall be the judges of the court No. 1, and the judges of the District Court at the same date shall be the judges of the Common Pleas No. 2.

Upon the death of C. S. Boker, president of the Girard Bank of Philadelphia, and the filing and reference of an account of his estate by his administrators, various claims were made before the auditor, against the estate, for amounts of money, &c. (nearly a million dollars), which were alleged by claimants to have been received by the decedent in his lifetime, and used and retained by him in his own private business, although the same belonged to the bank. These claims were resisted, and the auditor disallowed them all except five, amounting to about $25,000 with interest, and allowed certain claims for salary of the decedent as president of the bank. After argument upon exceptions filed in the court below, the report of the auditor was substantially confirmed. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the decree of the court below, finding a balance due the bank from the estate of $17,799.72.

Appeal of the Girard Bank et al. from the decree of the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia.

Opinion of the court by READ, C. J. Filed November 6th, 1873, at Pittsburg.

Stephen Girard died in December, 1831, devising his residuary real and personal estate to the city of Philadelphia upon certain trusts of a charitable character. His bank, of course, ceased its operations, and so much banking capital was necessarily withdrawn from the public. To supply this deficiency, the Girard Bank, in the City of Philadelphia, was chartered by an act of Assembly, approved 3d April, 1832, with a capital stock not exceeding one million five hundred thousand dollars, to be divided into shares of fifty dollars each, the said bank paying to the commonwealth the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars in three annual instalments of twenty-five thousand dollars each.

The bill to recharter the Bank of the United States was vetoed by the President on the 10th July, 1832, and in November of the same year General Jackson was re-elected President. In October, 1833, the secretary of the treasury, Mr. Taney, removed the deposits from the Bank of the United States and placed them in State institutions selected by him, one of which was the Girard Bank.

The Bank of the United States, in order to force a recharter, and a return of the deposits, reduced its discount line to a very low limit, and accumulated specie in its vaults, so as to have dollar for dollar of its circulation. The effort proving unsuccessful, in the spring of 1835 the discount line was run up to seventy millions of dollars, and on the 3d March, 1836, when it changed into a State institution, its notes in actual circulation were $20,114,227.56, and its deposits, $3,594,048.25, making a total of immediate liabilities $23,708,275.31, whilst its specie was only $5,595,077.25. The Pennsylvania Bank of the United States was chartered by the act of 18th February, 1836, for which they were to pay the commonwealth $4,500,000, and to subscribe $675,000 to various railroad, navigation and turnpike companies, besides a voluntary subscription to similar works of $978,759, amounting altogether to $6,153,759, out of a nominal capital of $35,000,000, including the $7,000,000 of stock owned by the United States.

By an act passed the 19th March, 1836, the charter of the Girard Bank was extended twenty years from the passage of the act, and its capital stock increased so as to consist of one hundred thousand shares of fifty dollars, for which they were to pay to the commonwealth within one year after the passage of the act, $125,000, and within two years after its passage, $125,000, as a bonus for the privileges granted by the act.

By the act of Congress of 11th April, 1836, the 1st, 2d and 3d sections of the act, transferring the duties of commissioner of loans, to the Bank of the United States, were repealed, and by the act of 15th June, 1836, the 14th section of the bank charter of 10th April, 1816, enacting that all notes or bills of said bank payable on demand shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, was also repealed.

By an act passed 23d June, 1836, the secretary of the treasury was authorized to act as the agent of the United States in all matters relating to their stock in the bank of the United States, in pursuance of which authority the value of the stock was estimated by a committee of the bank, and also by the agent of the secretary. Both valued it above par, but the bank a shade lower than the agent of the secretary.

On the 3d March, 1837, Congress passed a resolution in these words, "That the secretary of the treasury be directed to accept the terms of settlement proposed by the president and directors of the Bank of the United States, under the Pennsylvania charter in their memorial to Congress presented at the present session, for the payment to the United States of the capital stock owned by them in the late Bank of the United States, and the final adjustment and settlement of the claims connected with or arising out of the same, and to take such obligation for the payment of the several instalments in such proposed terms of settlement mentioned as he may think proper."

The bank settled with the United States for their stock in the preceding Bank of the United States, by giving them their four bonds dated 10th of May, 1837, for the payment of four several sums of $1,986,589.04 each, with six per cent. interest on the same, from the 3d March, 1836. The aggregate of these four sums show that the bank settled with the government for their stock at $946,356.16 above its par value, and on the 11th May, the very next day, the bank failed, with $25,592,698.20 of liabilities, and only $1,490,968.01 of specie in their vaults, and their notes in actual circulation, being $7,193,021.04; notwithstanding over eleven millions of dollars had been borrowed in Europe by loans, and the sale of its bonds, and the evil day had been postponed by a large issue of post notes. All the banks in Philadelphia and the State followed the example and suspended specie payments, with the exception of one bank in Pittsburg.

By an act of Congress, passed 7th July, 1838, in all cases of any corporation whose charter has expired, it is made a high misdemeanor for any director or other person therein described, who shall put in circulation any bill or note of such expired corporation, and on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding ten thousand dollars, or by imprisonment and confinement not less than one year, nor exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The second section authorizes the Circuit Courts of the United States to grant injunctions to prevent such issuing.

By an act passed 23d June, 1836, to regulate the deposits of the public money, it was enacted "That no bank shall be selected or continued as a place of deposite of the public money, which shall not redeem its bills and notes on demand in specie," and no bank issuing notes less than five dollars after 4th July, 1836, shall be selected or continued as aforesaid, nor shall notes or bills of any bank issuing notes less than five dollars be received in payment of any debt due to the United States. By the 11th section, whenever the amount of public deposits in any bank shall for a whole quarter of a year exceed one-fourth part of the amount of the capital stock of such bank actually paid in, the bank shall allow and pay to the United States for the use of the excess of the deposits over the one-fourth of its capital, an interest at the rate of two per centum per annum, to be calculated for each quarter upon the average excesses of the quarter. The 13th section enacted that the money in the treasury of the United States on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with the several States, which was carried into effect, but the money was never paid back to the government as was intended and provided for by the act itself. On the 16th October, 1837, an act of Congress was passed for adjusting the remaining claims upon the late deposit banks.

The failure of the Bank of the United States on the 11th May, left that institution a debtor to the United States in the sum of $7,946,356.16, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from 3d March, 1836. The suspension at the same time of the Girard Bank removed the deposits of the government from that institution, and it ceased from that moment, by the act of the 23d June, 1836, to be a deposit bank. This rendered the increase of its capital to five millions of dollars not only unnecessary, but burdensome, for it had been made with the express intention of holding the government deposits, however large they might be. These deposits were discounted upon, and at the same time gave character and firmness to it, as a banking institution of the second largest capital in the State. The suspension also made it a debtor to the amount of its deposits to the United States, and the larger they were, the more inconvenient it was for the bank to pay them. It is more than doubtful whether a large portion of the $3,500,000 was ever actually paid in.

A deep and serious injury was then inflicted upon the bank from which it never recovered during the disastrous financial years which preceded its assignment. It was also the misfortune of all the banks of the city and State, that their policy was regulated by that of an overgrown, insolvent institution.

This suspension was followed by an indiscriminate issue of small notes by individuals and corporations, commonly called shinplasters, and especially by the city of Philadelphia, under the influence of the Bank of the United States. In August, 1838, the Bank of the United States resumed specie payments, having $3[illegible],769,400.61 of liabilities (including $2,254,871.38 still due to the United States), with $7,357,137.72 of specie in their vaults. The specie steadily declined, and on the 1st April, 1839, it was reduced to $3,069,580.21, and on that day the president of the bank resigned. On the 1st July, 1839, the specie was $1,950,186.83, and the liabilities $25,952,357.28, and the bank then declared its last dividend of 4 per cent., amounting to $1,354,997.05, increasing the liabilities on that day to $27,307,354.33. It was a dividend out of capital, and not out of profits.

Its liabilities increasing and its assets decreasing, and its specie being at a low ebb, the bank suspended specie payments on the 9th October, 1839, the day after the general election.

Owing to the city banks using the notes of the bank of the United States instead of paying out their own bills, a debt of over five millions was created, for which they took the post notes of the Bank of the United States, in order to facilitate the resumption of specie payments. The bank resumed for a few days, and then closed its doors forever, and by various assign ents on 1st May, 7th June, 4th and 6th September, 1841, conveyed their property to several sets of trustees for the benefit of their creditors. We have seen that the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States commenced its career as a State bank under liabilities and embarrassments sufficient to endanger a perfectly solvent institution, with all its assets completely in hand for immediate use. The sales of the debts at the offices of the bank, made at different periods, amounted in 1836 to $14,839,034.71, and some of these were not closed until after the 3d of March, 1836, and the credit given on such sales was generally at one, two, three and four years, with five per cent. interest, and in some instances the interest was as low as four and four and a half per cent., and in one case, four, five, six and seven years were given on $250,000, and in another, twenty years on $1,000.000. Long loans for one, two, three, four or more years were made both at the bank and its offices, amounting, in 1836, to $13,785,254.60, making the amount of long loans outstanding in 1836, $28,624,289.91, which could not be collected in order to meet the immediate liabilities of the bank. This state of things is partly described in the memorial of the stockholders of the bank to the Legislature, in 1841: "The system of permanent loans on any species of security, is at war with the first principles of banking, because it deprives the bank of that command over its means which can only enable it to comply with its duty to the public.

"Unfortunately for your petitioners, the administration of the bank, departing from the great principles of the trust that was confided to it, has squandered a part of their property, and locked up a part of the residue in such securities as to render it unavailable for banking purposes."

The result of the operations of this unfortunate and mismanaged institution is told in a few words in Shollenberger v. Brinton, 2 P. F. Smith, p. 81.

On the 4th May, 1841, an act was passed to provide revenue to meet the demands on the State treasury and for other purposes, which provided for an issue of an irredeemable currency of one, two and five dollar notes, commonly called relief notes, to the amount of three millions one hundred thousand dollars, their real immediate value being that they were receivable for debts due the commonwealth.

The history of the Girard Bank shows a gradual weakening and decline of the institution until, on the 3d February, 1840, a resolution was offered by a director. "That it is inexpedient for the bank at this time to make any new loans," coupled with a proposition to place the property of the bank in the hands of trustees, if necessary, and on the 18th May, 1840, Mr. Boker was elected president.

It seems, therefore, clear, that the Girard Bank was actually insolvent on the 9th October, 1839, the day of the suspension of specie payments, two years and five months from the day they lost the deposits of the general government.

On the 27th January, 1842, the Girard Bank closed its doors, and on the 29th a run was made on the Bank of Pennsylvania for current funds, and the governor, through the attorney general, in order to secure the State deposits for the payment of the February interest of the State debt, obtained from the Supreme Court an injunction against the bank; the proceedings in which case are to be found in the two cases of The Commonwealth v. The Bank of Pennsylvania, 3 Watts & Sergeant, pp. 184, 173.

We therefore find that in the spring of 1842, forty millions of banking capital had entirely disappeared, and $5.078,444.29 of the capital of nine of the city banks were locked up in the hands of the trustees, under the assignment of the 1st May, 1841, for the payment of the post notes held by them.

On the 12th March, 1842, an act was passed "to provide for the resumption of specie payments by the banks of this commonwealth and for other purposes," under the provisions of which act the Girard Bank made a general assignment to Charles S. Boker, Henry Horn and Charles Rugan, on the 19th of the same month. Mr. Boker, who had been president since May, 1840, resigned his office on the 16th March, and was again elected president on the 16th June, 1842, and so continued until his death on the 8th February, 1858.

Under an act "to provide for the domestic creditors of this commonwealth, sale of State stocks, and for other purposes," passed 8th April, 1843, the whole of the $1,500,000 owned by the commonwealth in the Bank of Pennsylvania was sold, and produced only $607,753.75, being $40.51 cents and 69 hundredth of a cent per cent. of its par value, and on the 5th April, 1844, an act was passed reducing its capital to $1.562,500, and the par value of the stock from four hundred dollars to two hundred and fifty dollars per share.

On the 14th April, 1842, the appraisers appointed by the Court of Common Pleas, in their general inventory of the appraised value of the assets of the Girard Bank, estimated their total cash value at $738,771.46, whilst the debts were $690,000, the difference being about $46,000; among their assets was a debt of the Commercial and R. R. Bank of Vicksburg of $430,219.60, valued at ten cents on the dollar.

On the 6th August, 1846, the assignees reassigned the surplus which remained, after discharging the debts of the institution to the bank, which on the 10th of the same month commenced operations with a cash capital of $50,128.69, and with other assets valued at $455,000, which could not be used for banking purposes until they were collected. The capital of the bank was $5,000,000, divided into 100,000 shares of $50 each, of which 65,784 shares were outstanding, represented by its capital of $50,000 in cash and appraised assets; 34,216 shares were owned by the bank, a significant fact, showing that a large portion of its increased capital never had been actually paid in.

On the 30th June, 1847, the active capital of the bank was $249,570.69, and on the 20th June, 1849, it was $341,610.23. The capital was reduced by the act of 2d April, 1849, from five millions of dollars to the sum of twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the par value of the stock from fifty dollars to twelve dollars and fifty cents per share. On the 13th June, 1849, the Girard Bank succeeded in obtaining the deposits of the commonwealth, whose account began on the 5th July, with a balance of $44,509.19, running up on 3d January, 1850, to $344,516.54; on the 2d October, 1851, it was $567,381.10, and on the 6th January, 1853, the balance was $332,772.61.

On the 27th January, 1853, an alternative mandamus was issued from the Supreme Court, the Bank of Pennsylvania being the relators, against John M. Bickel, State treasurer, to compel him to make all the deposits of the State in that bank, to which writ the State treasurer made a return, which was filed on the 25th March, 1853, and "on the 25th April, 1853, on motion of G. Mallery and St. George T. Campbell, Esquires, for the relators, leave is given to the relators to discontinue the proceeding in this case." I was employed as additional counsel by the attorney general, and prepared the return of the State treasurer, and beside the legal defence that they were not entitled to the deposits, gave a history of the bank, shewing that their financial condition and former and present conduct to the commonwealth would not justify that officer in entrusting the State funds to their care.

In his return the State treasurer says "that on or about the twenty-seventh day of July, eighteen hundred and fifty, I called at the Bank of Pennsylvania in company with Asa Dimock, chief clerk in the treasury office, for the purpose of making arrangements for the payment of the State interest due on the first day of August, and without giving me an opportunity of making any explanation, I was met by the president and cashier of the bank in a spirit of unkindness. The first words they addressed to me, was the inquiry why I had not been there ten days before, that I ought to have been there and had the money all ready, and in the bank before the day I called, and in a commanding tone of voice declared that the interest could not be paid; that it was now too late to make the arrangements for the payment of the interest. I said that I had money to pay the interest, such as it was; and asked what they could do with the notes of country banks commonly called currency? They positively declared they would look at nothing but the specie or its equivalent. I told them that my money was mostly of country banks, and that I had an arrangement with the cashier of said banks, to redeem their notes for me in city funds, but that it would take a little time to do so. They again refused to take anything but the specie, or its equivalent. I then asked them to settle the State account, and inform me what the amount of the State deposit was, in order to compare it with my account, and that I must see to get sufficient par funds to pay the interest.

"I then called on Mr. Boker, president of the Girard Bank, and told him the circumstance and explained the matter fully to him, and stated to him the amount of money I had on hand, and the kind of money I had in my trunk then in his vault. He then called upon the bank himself, and when he returned he informed me that they had refused to take anything but specie or its equivalent. He then kindly offered to take the kind of money I had, and pay the interest. I then went to the Bank of Pennsylvania and they informed me of the amount of funds to the credit of the State. The amount was about $234,706 27; but they informed me that out of that amount there were 93 or $94,000 special funds, consisting of $80.000 relief notes and the balance country notes, and that they could not take that from me for interest purposes unless I would pay them a discount of $1,500 which I refused to do. I postively declined paying one cent." On the first of August they came down to $1,000, which he again declined. "I then told them that I should draw a check for the amount they had on deposit. They then proposed I should draw two checks, one for the par, and the other for the special funds, which I did, and then left and got the balance (some $750,000) of the Girard Bank, and deposited it in the Bank of Pennsylvania, which was sufficient to pay the interest then due. I then went back to the Girard Bank, and commenced counting out to the different cashiers from the country the notes I had on hand, and they redeemed them for me in city funds, which enabled me to repay the Girard Bank." On the 2d August, having enough money, he redeemed the special funds held by the Bank of Pennsylvania.

At this time the whole active capital of the Girard Bank was but $404.733.47. From the 5th July, 1849, to October 5th, 1854, of twenty-two balances to the credit of the commonwealth on the books of the Girard Bank, the average was $247.227.35, and of thirty-five balances from July, 1849, to January 4th, 1858, the average was $183,519.43.

A little more than a month after the defeat of the Bank of Pennsylvania in their attempt to remove the deposits, on the 28th May, 1853, an act was passed extending the charter of the Girard Bank for twenty years from the expiration of their then charter, in 1856, "and said bank shall immediately after its passage, if the State treasurer shall so direct, pay into the treasury of the State the sum of $125,000, and for such bonus thus paid the said Girard Bank shall be free from any tax or other charge whatever, until the expiration of their extended charter."

It is in evidence that in 1849, Mr. Ball, the State treasurer, applied to the city banks to submit propositions as to the terms on which they would become the depositories of the State funds, and could find no one willing to take them on such terms as he considered reasonable, except the Girard Bank. "The treasurer decided to make his deposits with the Girard Bank, considering the advantages offered superior to those of any other institution. Mr. Boker managed on behalf of the Girard Bank." Still further, he managed to retain them under every change of the official head of the State treasury, a matter of vital importance to th ecredit and profits of the institution. On the 26th June, 1854, by ordinance, the Girard Bank was made one of the depositories of the corporate moneys of the City of Philadelphia, and thus became both a State and city deposit bank.

The active capital of the bank was increased by the gradual collection of its assets, and by the sale of its bank stock.

In 1847, 2,670 shares of stock were sold by the bank at $10 per share, and the remaining shares, 31,546, were sold at $12.50 per share, of which three-fourths were sold, in 1851. In 1853 the bank sold its stock as high as $14.06 net, and in 1853 as high as $14.37½. On the 30th June, 1857, the active capital of the bank was $1,076,023.20, which was composed of $535,882.36 collections of old assets, and $421,025 from the sales of its own stock. By collections from the old assets subsequent to the 30th June, and prior to Mr. Boker's death, the amount of collections of old assets was increased to $893,592.37, making the capital whole, after all deductions, as made in volume 2 of the evidence, p. 474, and leaving a balance of surplus capital of $52,676.74, carried to the credit of profit and loss account.

The bank, in order to utilize the relief notes received by the commonwealth, loaned them at par to manufacturers and others to pay their customers, and to the Reading Railroad to pay their laborers

In January, 1857, a committee was appointed to examine into the condition of the bank, who made a verbal report to the board of directors, which was entirely satisfactory.

The condition of financial affairs was not reassuring in 1856, and I recollect distinctly that in 1857 it was the general feeling of the business community that there was danger of a revulsion, but no one knew how soon or when it would come. It came like a thunder clap, on the 25th of September all the banks of Philadelphia suspended specie payments. The crash is well described in an evening journal:

In 1857 "everything was involved in common ruin. The banks suspended; financial institutions of almost every description toppled over; manufacture was suddenly checked; mercantile establishments tottered; industry was everywhere paralyzed; property found itself without a market, and the intervention of law was necessary to protect society from the operation of the ordinary conditions existing between debtor and creditor. What has now proved only a few days flurry, disastrous enough in its effects, it is true, but still restricted in its limits, was then a wide spread calamity of the sharpest kind, from which recovery was very slow and painful."

On the 17th Feoruary, 1858, the Bank of Pennsylvania made a general assignment for the benefit of its creditors, and finally passed out of existence. The governor called an extra session of the Legislature, who, on the 13th October, 1857, passed an act providing for the resumption of specie payments by the banks, and for the relief of debtors.

The first section enacted "That the provisions of every act of Assembly or of incorporation or re-incorporation heretofore passed declaring or authorizing the forfeiture of the charter of any bank, saving, trust or insurance company, or corporation having banking privileges, or inflicting any penalties, or authorizing any compulsory assignment for or by reason of the non-payment of any of its liabilities, or the issuing or paying out the notes of other banks incorporated under the laws of this commonwealth, though not specie paying, or its loaning or discounting without the requisite amount of specie or specie funds, since the 1st day of September, Anno Domini 1857, be and the same are hereby suspended until the second Monday in April, Anno Domini 1858; and all forfeitures and penalties, or liability thereto heretofore incurred, or that may be hereafter incurred, before the said second Monday in April, under such acts of Assembly, or of incorporation, or reincorporation for or by reason of the causes aforesaid, or any of them, are hereby remitted, and so much thereof as prohibits any bank from making loans and discounts, issuing its own notes, or the notes of other banks, incorporated under the laws of this commonwealth, though not specie paying, or declaring dividends during the suspension of specie payments, or from loaning or discounting without the requisite amount of specie or specie funds as aforesaid, be and the same is hereby suspended until the day and year aforesaid, and any such bank during such suspension of specie payments, may declare dividends to an amount not exceeding six per cent. on its capital."

The fifth section provided "That the deposits by the State treasurer, or to the credit of the commonwealth in the several banks and other corporations, and all bank notes which are now or may hereafter be in the treasury, during the period of suspension aforesaid, shall from time to time, on demand of the said treasurer, be paid by the said banks or other corporations respectively in specie, in such amounts as may be required by said treasurer to enable him to pay the interest accruing on the public loans of the commonwealth."

The sixth section provided for a stay of execution on judgments for one year.

In October, 1857, Mr. John R. White, one of the directors, examined at great length before the auditor, said, "The Girard Bank suspended on the same day with the other city banks, and was more nearly in a condition of liquidation (I mean payment of her debts) than any other bank of the city relative to her business." "Some time after the suspension, which occured about the 25th of September, the stockholders' meeting drew near, and Mr. Boker himself, according to my recollection invited examination. He appointed a committee consisting of myself and Mr. Foster and Mr. Neff."

This committee made a thorough examination of the assets and liabilities and the general condition of the bank.

As some of the bank's property stood in Mr. Boker's name, he executed and deposited in the bank a declaration of trust in the handwriting of Mr. Schaffer, the cashier, as follows:

"PHILADELPHIA, October 31, 1857.

I do hereby declare that all the real estate, mortages and stock standing in my name, now in possession of the Girard Bank, are the property of said bank, and are held by me as trustee of the same.

C. S. BOKER."

The report of the committee was made to the board of directors on the 3d November, 1857, approved by them, and laid before the stockholders, who elected a new board, a majority of whom were new men. It was determined to declare no dividend.

In November the board raised a new committee of the whole board of which Mr. Riché was chairman and Mr. White was secretary, which made another thorough examination and made a report on the 17th December, 1857. In this report there was a passage in these words: "3. The president's salary stands at $500 per annum, and is but a nominal compensation for the duties of the office, and the board would respectfully suggest to the president the propriety of explaining his views as to what annual sum would be satisfactory."

On the 6th August, 1846, four days before the bank reopened, it was resolved, "That the salaries of the officers of the bank shall be as follows, viz.: President, $500 per annum." Mr. Boker had never drawn the salary.

Mr. White says, "The old members had never talked of the salary question, but the new ones considered it a point which in some way ought to be settled and closed; one of them expressed considerable anxiety lest Mr. Boker should bring forward some astounding claim of $50,000 or $60,000 for his past services, and he asked me why he might not do so. To which my reply was, I had always found Mr. Boker a reasonable man, and did not suppose he had any such intention."

Mr. White spoke to Mr. Boker before the report was presented, and told him that his nominal salary opened him to obloquy and misrepresentation, and said, "I thought he owed it to himself to fix a fair compensation; that the public would not believe that he served for a nominal sum, without deriving some incidental advantages from the position. He smiled, and remarked he should like those advantages pointed out. I told him that I did not believe there were such derived by him, but that I was not the public. He smiled again with a fatigued air, for he was quite indisposed at the time, and Mrs. Boker was at death's door."

Another director recollects, "that at a meeting of the board, the subject of officers' salaries was brought up, and some one remarked that they had not paid any attention to the president's salary, and Mr. Boker said if they would consult his feelings, they would let the matter rest."

At this time the capital of the bank, for the first time in its history, was made whole, having divided amongst its stockholders $564,873.24, after paying all the expenses and losses of the institution. Mrs. Boker was dying, and expired towards the close of December. Mr. Boker was overworked and indisposed, and saddened by domestic afflictions, and it was no wonder that he treated the question of salary as he did. But no fair-minded man could say that he was not entitled to a fair and liberal compensation from the owners of an institution he had so long benefited. On the 8th February, 1858, Mr. Boker died, about six weeks after the death of his wife. His two sons administered to his estate, and filed an account, which was referred to an auditor, Furman Sheppard, Esq., a gentleman of great legal ability.

It is proper here to say, that on the first of March another examination took place into the condition of the bank, and an appraisement was made by a committee of the whole board, which resulted in making a reduction in value of the assets representing the capital, of $166,711.74, throwing the profit and loss account on the wrong side to the extent of $114,110.95. Mr. White says: "That appraisement was an estimate of the cash value of the property of the bank, excluding everthing that was doubtful, and leaving only such things as might be considered at the prices of the appraisement, a safe basis for a declaration of dividends." Among these assets, the bank's Crescentville property was valued at naught, which, after realizing a fair profit, was sold in 1864 for $45,000, which, if deducted from the above estimated deficiency, would have reduced it to $69,110.95.

Under an act to consolidate the stock of the Girard Bank of the City of Philadelphia, passed 25th January, 1859, the president and directors of said bank changed "the value of the shares of the said bank from the present par value of $12.50 per share to $50 per share, by cancelling the present certificates of stock and issuing new ones upon the ratio of one to four, so that hereafter the par value of said stock shall be $50 per share," pregnant proof that the directors thought the capital then whole.

I am aware that in 1862 the rebellion made the bonds of the Vicksburg Railroad valueless. They were derived from the old assets of the old Girard Bank, the par value being $225,000.

By an act to reduce the capital stock of the Girard Bank in the City of Philadelphia, passed the eighth of April, 1862, the capital stock of the said bank was reduced to $1,000,000, and the par value of the shares changed from $50 per share to $40 per share, and the par value of said shares shall thereafter be $40 per share.

The claims of the bank against Mr. Boker's estate, as presented by their counsel, amounted, according to the estimate of one of the counsel of the administrators, to a million of dollars. They gradually, in the course of the proceedings, assumed a more definite shape, and resulted in twenty separate claims, which were elaborately discussed by the learned auditor in his report to the Orphans' Court. The directors of the bank had but one regular discount day in the week, and all discounts or loans in the intermediate period must be made by a committee or by the cashier or president. No committee was in existence, and it naturally fell upon the president, as had been the practice in the bank under its former administration. It was known to the directors, one or more of whom availed themselves of it. The cashier and clerks knew of it, and it was done openly through the whole course of Mr. Boker's administration of upwards of eleven years, and was spoken of at the board.

It is proper here to state that in the crisis of 1857, the Bank of Pennsylvania first stopped payment, and it was generally supposed that the Girard Bank would follow, a public journal having pointed out both banks as insecure. The banks had established a temporary clearing house system, and required of each other a deposit of security for any balance which might "in the clearing house" be found against them respectively. Mr. Boker in this emergency deposited with the trustees of the clearing house valuable securies, which were his own private property, as

A STATEMENT AND EXPOSITION OF THE CHANGES CONTAINED IN THE NEW CONSTITUTION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

"The preamble is made to express the gratitude of the people of the commonwealth to Almighty God for the blessings of civil and religious liberty, and is followed by the several articles in their proper order, all the material changes in which are the following:

ARTICLE I.

THE DECLARATION OF RIGHTS.

The corresponding article in the old constitution is but slightly changed, and is made to take its proper place as the first article of the new constitution.

In the seventh section, the provisions securing the freedom of the press, are extended by the insertion of a new clause to the effect that in prosecutions for the publication of papers relating to the official conduct of officers or men in public capacity, or to other matters proper for public investigation or information, there shall be no conviction "when the fact that such publication was not maliciously or negligently made shall be established to the satisfaction of the jury." This provision excludes the legal inference of malice from the mere fact of publication or from the inaccuracy of the matter published, and leaves the question of conviction to depend upon the actual malice or negligence of the author or publisher of an alleged libel. It will simply permit the jury to render a verdict upon the real merits of the case. The provision is confined to criminal prosecutions, and does not modify the existing laws relating to civil remedies in actions of libel and slander.

ARTICLE II.

THE LEGISLATURE.

The principal changes in this article are the following:

Members of the Senate are to be elected for four years instead of three, and of the House for two years instead of one. The regular sessions of the Legislature are to be biennial instead of annual, and no adjourned annual sessions are permitted after the year 1878, but the governor may convene the two Houses upon extraordinary occasions, and the Senate alone, when a meeting of that body shall be necessary for the transaction of executive business. The governor is further required to convene the two Houses upon proclamation to fill any vacancy in the office of United States senator from this State. It is further provided, that whenever the Legislature shall be convened by the governor, the sessions shall be confined to the transaction of business expressly mentioned in the executive proclamation. No senator or representative shall be appointed to any civil office during his term of service, and persons convicted of embezzlement of public moneys, bribery, perjury, or other infamous crime, shall not be eligible to the Legislature or capable of holding any public office. The compensation of members shall be fixed by law, and shall not be increased during any official term. The Senate is empowered to choose a presiding officer, who shall perform the duties of lieutenant governor when necessary. The powers of each House are more definitely expressed, and their sessions more completely guarded against improper influence than by the old constitution. By the sixteenth and seventeenth sections, the numbers of each House are increased, and the apportionment of membership by districts determined and regulated. The Senate is to consist of fifty members, instead of thirty-three, to be chosen from single districts, one-half thereof every second year. The provision in the old constitution forbidding the division of counties is retained, except as to those which shall be entitled to two or more Senators; and the former limitation that no city or county shall elect more than four senators is changed to a provision that no county shall elect more than one-sixth of the whole number in counties divisible into senatorial districts, the districts are to be made equal, and no ward, borough or township is to be divided in their formation. A full senatorial ratio will entitle a county to separate representation, but the Legislature may assign a senator to a county with four-fifths of a ratio, and a special provision is made to meet the case of a county containing more than one-half and less than four-fifths of a ratio, which shall be wholly surrounded by counties entitled of right to separate representation.

For the House of Representatives the population of the State is to be divided by 200, to establish a represenative ratio, and each county is to have at least one representative, and as many additional representatives as it shall have ratios. Counties with less than five ratios will have an additional member for any surplus fraction exceeding one-half a ratio. The separate representation of cities coataining one or more ratios is provided for, and such cities and counties containing more than 100,000 inhabitants are to be divided into representative districts, but no district so formed shall elect more than four representatives. These provisions in regard to the constitution of the Senate and House are wholly new, and are radical changes in the application of the representative principle.

The additional change in this article is, that apportionments are to be made by the Legislature at the session of 1874, and immediately after each decennial census of the United States, and are to be based in each case upon such census, and not as heretofore upon a septennial enumeration of taxables. In brief, the important changes in the legislative article are biennial elections and biennial sessions of the Legislature, an increase of membership in both houses, a mixed system of county and district representation with decennial apportionments, and the presidency of the lieutenant governor in the Senate.

ARTICLE III.

LEGISLATION.

The article upon legislation is mostly new, and is elaborate in its provisions. It contains a large body of limitations upon the Legislature and regulations for its action, the enumeration of all which would be inconvenient in this place; but they are of high importance, and will doubtless produce a decided effect upon the character of future legislation in this commonwealth. Special and local legislation are largely prohibited, and minute and searching provisions are established for the passage and approval of bills. Of the thirty-three sections of this article fully three-fourths contain new matter, and are well calculated to elevate the character and secure the perfection of future laws.

ARTICLE IV.

THE EXECUTIVE.

The conspicuous changes made by the twenty-three sections of the executive article are the following.

1. An increase of the governor's term from three to four years, to correspond with the change made in legislative terms and sessions.

2. The creation of the office of lieutenant governor.

2. The substitution of a secretary of internal affairs and a superintendent of public instruction for the surveyor general and superintendent of common schools.

4. That the governor, lieutenant governor, and auditor general shall not be eligible for a second term.

5. A stringent limitation upon the pardoning power.

6. A requirement that the vote in each House to pass a bill over the governor's veto shall be two-thirds of all the members elected to each House instead of two-thirds of those present.

7. That the governor may veto particular items in appropriation bills and approve others.

Lastly, that the chief justice of the Supreme Court shall preside upon the trial of any contested election of governor or lieutenant governor.

Attention should be particularly directed to two of these changes, to wit: the creation of the office of lieutenant governor and the limitation of the pardoning power. By the first of these a majority decision will always be secured in the Senate by a casting vote when the Senate shall be equally divided, and the prompt organization of the Senate at the commencement of sessions will always be secured. By it, also, the office of governor will be fitly filled in case of a casual vacancy, and a high officer, chosen by popular election, will be provided for the consideration of applications for pardon.

The other provision referred to, requiring the recommendation of the lieutenant governor, secretary of the commonwealth, attorney general, and secretary of internal affairs, or any three of them, given after public notice and full hearing of the case, to authorize the governor to pardon any criminal offence, will introduce a most substantial and much-needed reform in the practice of the government.

Briefly, the changes made by the executive article would seem to be judicious, and altogether fit for popular acceptance.

ARTICLE V.

THE JUDICIARY.

This article does not contain many radical changes. Two judges are added to the bench of the Supreme Court, who will be chosen at the general election in 1874, and they and all judges subsequently elected will hold for twenty-one year terms, and will not be re-electable. Whenever two or three judges are to be elected at the same time to that court they are to be divided between political parties by virtue of the manner of voting provided for in the sixteenth section. The nisi prius jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is abolished, and no duties not judicial are to be imposed upon any of the judges of said court.

These several provisions were intended to secure a full representation of the people in the Supreme Court, to strengthen and increase the usefulness of that court, and to separate its judges from the performance of duties not appropriate to their office.

Special provisions for consolidating the District and Common Pleas Courts of Philadelphia and Alleghany, though possessing little interest in other parts of the State, are of much local importance. All judges will be of the same class and possess the same jurisdiction hereafter in both those populous divisions of the State. They will in turn hold the criminal courts in their respective counties, will be enabled to distribute conveniently the judicial business which they are to transact and execute their duties with greater efficiency and success.

Other local provisions limiting the number of aldermen in the cities, abolishing the office of alderman in Philadelphia and substituting magistrates' courts, the appointment of prothonotary by all the Philadelphia judges, and the provision for separate Orphans' Courts in counties containing more than one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, are notable changes for the more perfect administration of justice in the localities to which they refer. In all counties Registers' Courts are abolished and their jurisdiction conferred upon the Orphans' Courts.

Uniformity of legislation with reference to courts is enjoined, and voluntary waiver of jury trial by parties authorized.

Lastly, counties containing less than 40,000 inhabitants each, are to be formed into judicial districts, while those containing a greater population shall be made separate districts, in which the office of associate judge shall be abolished, saving the commissions of associate judges now in office. No commission of any law judge is disturbed, and the existing provision that no judicial salary shall be decreased during a judicial term is preserved, with the addition that it shall not be increased during such term.

ARTICLE VI.

IMPEACHMENT AND REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

This article, after retaining the provisions of the old constitution that all civil officers may be removed upon impeachment, and that all officers shall hold their offices on condition of good behavior during their terms of service, adds the following new provisions:

That all appointed officers, other than judges and the superintendent of public instruction, may be removed at the pleasure of the power by which they shall be appointed, and that officers elected by the people, except governor, lieutenant governor and law judges, shall be removed for reasonable cause on the address of two-thirds of the Senate, after due notice and full hearing.

ARTICLE VII.

Oath of Office.

In place of the brief general oath to support the constitution and perform official duty with fidelity, prescribed by the old constitution, a searching oath of office is provided to be administered to all senators, representatives and State and county officers. They will be sworn or affirmed to support, obey, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the constitution of this commonwealth: that no money has been paid by them to secure their nomination, election, or appointment, save necessary expenses to be authorized by law; that they have knowingly violated no election law, and that they will not receive any money or valuable thing for the performance or non-performance of official duty, other than lawful compensation.

Provision is made for preserving the oath, and false swearing is punishable as perjury, with disqualification from holding any office in this commonwealth.

ARTICLE VIII.

Suffrage and Elections.

This article is of high importance. The changes made in it are the following:

First. As to the qualification for voting. The word "white" is dropped from its former position in the constitution, and the right to vote is extended to every male citizen twenty-one years of age who shall possess the following qualifications, to wit.: United States citizenship for one month, residence in the election district for two months instead of ten days, and, as in the old constitution, residence in the State for one year, &c., and payment of a State or county tax, which latter must, however, have been assessed two months, and paid one month before an election.

Second. General elections are fixed on the Tuesday next following the first Monday of November, to correspond with the date of presidential and congressional elections, and municipal elections on the third Tuesday in February.

Third. New securities against fraudulent voting are provided by the fourth section. Ballots are to be numbered by election officers, and permission is given to voters to place their names upon their tickets, so that the vote can be followed upon any judicial investigation, and its integrity vindicated or falsity exposed. Very properly, however, election officers will be sworn or affirmed not to divulge how any elector shall have voted, unless required to do so as witnesses in judicial proceedings.

Fourth. District election boards are to be constituted uniformly throughout the State according to the plan of the general election act of 1839; that is, of a judge, two inspectors, and two clerks, the inspectors to be chosen by the limited vote, and no person holding any public office or employment, or who has held such within two months, shall be qualified to serve as an election officer.

Fifth. Overseers of election may be appointed by the Courts of Common Pleas whenever their appointment shall be a reasonable precaution to secure the purity and fairness of elections, and shall possess certain additional powers to those possessed by such overseers under the present laws of the State.

Sixth. No person shall be permitted to withold his testimony as a witness in any election trial or investigation, upon the ground that it will criminate himself, and several careful provisions are made against the corruption of voters or violation of the election laws by candidates.

Seventh. All laws regulating the holding of elections, and for registration of voters, must be uniform throughout the State, but the right of an unregistered voter is carefully preserved.

Lastly. Trials of all contested elections in this State are to be in courts of justice, or before law judges thereof, under regulations to be established by statute, so that the scandal of unjust and party decisions of such cases shall be prevented hereafter.

A few other changes of less importance, but tending to improvement, will be observed upon a careful reading of this article, and, upon the whole, it may be assumed that justice and purity in elections will be greatly promoted thereby, and offenders against election laws curbed and punished.

ARTICLE IX

Taxation and Finance.

This article retains all the salutary provisions of the old constitution against an increase of the State debt, and for a sinking fund, as well as those which forbid subscriptions by the State or by municipalities to the stock or loans of corporations, or the pledging of public credit to such bodies, and makes more secure against manipulation and misuse the moneys and securities of the sinking fund of the State.

Strong limitations upon the creation of debts by municipalities are added to the provisions above mentioned, as well as others in relation to the application and uses of surplus funds in the treasury of the commonwealth, and the making of private profit therefrom is made a criminal offence. Finally, taxation is to be equal upon all property of the same class, and the property which may be exempted from taxation by statute is accurately limited and defined.

ARTICLE X.

Education.

The article upon education has been expanded in the new constitution, from the former provision for the education of the children of the poor gratis, to one for the education of all the children of the State over six years of age, who may require such provision, and a guarantee is given of a liberal annual appropriation for that object. It is also provided that public school moneys shall not be appropriated to the support of sectarian schools, and that women, who supply a majority of the teachers of the State, and are natural protectors and teachers of the young, may be selected for positions of control and management under the school laws of the State.

ARTICLE XI.

Militia

The article in the old constitution on this subject is substantially retained, the only change being in regard to the exemption from military duty of those who have conscientious scruples against bearing arms. The question of exemption, and the form which it may assume are left to the Legislature of the State.

ARTICLE XII.

Public Officers.

This article retains several provisions found in the old constitution which are appropriate and useful.

ARTICLE XIII.

New Counties.

In this article the provision in the old constitution which requires that any new county shall contain at least four hundred square miles, is retained, and to it are added that such new county shall contain at least twenty thousand inhabitants, that none of its lines shall pass within ten miles of the county seat of any county proposed to be divided, and that no old county shall be reduced below the area or population required for a new one. The requirement of the old constitution that a majority of the voters of the county must agree in order to its division, is dropped, but in the article on legislation it is provided that new counties shall be established and county lines changed only under general and uniform laws.

ARTICLE XIV.

County Officers.

The seven sections of this article are almost entirely new, and they introduce important regulations of county government. Commissioners and auditors of counties are to be elected triennially, commencing with the year eighteen hundred and seventy-five, and are to be divided between political parties upon a principle of proportional representation. In counties of large population they are to be paid by salaries, and all fees of office are to be paid into the treasury of the county or State. The strict accountability of all county, township, and borough officers is to be provided for by law. The various county officers are enumerated, and those who shall keep their offices at the county seat specified, and the terms of all county officers fixed at three years, to begin on the first Monday of January next after their election.

ARTICLE XV.

Cities and City Charters.

Provision is made in this article (which is new) for the incorporation of cities containing ten thousand inhabitants, upon demand of the people thereof. Every city must establish a sinking fund for the payment of its debts, and is protected against the creation of any debt by any municipal commission except upon appropriation first made by the government of the city.

ARTICLE XVI.

Private Corporations.

Most of this article is also new and it constitutes one of the important divisions of the new constitution. Many salutary regulations against abuse in corporate management and securities against monopoly and clique management are contained in it. Corporations are to be confined to the business for which they shall be established, and their charters may be repealed when the public interest shall demand it, upon condition that injustice shall not be done to the corporators. All unused charters existing when the constitution shall take effect shall be void.

ARTICLE XVII.

Railroads and Canals.

This article, which covers a comparatively new field of constitutional action, was one of those most earnestly considered by the convention, and almost the whole of it is new matter, and deeply interesting to all the people, and particularly to the business interests of the State. Any synopsis of its contents would give an imperfect view of its importance, and of the varied points of business, and of corporate action and management with which it deals. The regulations which it imposes upon railroad and canal companies are believed to be more judicious and well advised than those which have been established by constitutional provision and by statute in other States, and were adopted by the convention in a spirit of complete fairness to all interests with which they are concerned. The eighth section, which limits the granting of free passes, will doubtless attract general attention and commend itself to those who have not heretofore enjoyed them. But the feature of principal value contained in this article is the stringent limitations imposed upon the railroad and other transportation companies in regard to discriminations and favoritism in the conduct of their works and business. These limitations, which may from time to time be perfected by statute, will, it is believed, correct many abuses and recommend themselves upon trial to the whole people of the State.

ARTICLE XVIII.

Future Amendments.

This, the last of the articles, is taken nearly entire from the old constitution, and provides a reasonable means for securing occasional changes in the fundamental law, as they shall be found necessary in future years.

AN ORDINANCE FOR SUBMITTING THE AMENDED CONSTITUTION OF PENNSYLVANIA TO A VOTE OF THE QUALIFIED ELECTORS THEREOF.

Be it ordained by the Constitutional Convention of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, as follows:

1. That the amended constitution prepared by this convention be submitted to the qualified electors of the commonwealth for their adoption or rejection, at an election to be held on the third Tuesday of December next; except as hereinafter ordered and directed, the said election shall be held and conducted by the regular election officers, in the several election districts throughout the commonwealth, under all the regulations and provisions of existing law relating to general elections; and the sheriffs of the several counties shall give at least twenty days' notice of said election by proclamation.

2. The secretary of the commonwealth shall, at least twenty days before the said election, furnish to the commissioners of each county a sufficient number of properly prepared circulars of instructions. The commissioners of the several counties shall cause to be printed at least three times as many ballots of affirmative votes as there are voters in each county—and the same number of negative votes; and the said commissioners shall, at least five days before said election, cause to be fairly distributed to the several election districts in their respective counties, the said ballots, tally-lists, returns, circulars of instructions, and such other books and papers as may be necessary. The ballots shall be printed or written in the following form: On the outside the words "New Constitution;" in the inside, for all persons giving affirmative votes, the words "For the New Constitution," and for all persons giving negative votes, the words "Against the New Constitution."

3. If it shall appear that a majority of the votes polled are for the new constitution, then it shall be the constitution of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania on and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four; but if it shall appear that a majority of the votes polled were against the new constitution, then it shall be rejected and be null and void.

4. Five commissioners of election, viz.: Edwin H. Fitler, Edward Browning, John P. Verree, Henry S. Hagert, and John O James, are hereby appointed by this convention, who shall have direction of the election upon this amended constitution in the city of Philadelphia. The said commissioners shall be duly sworn or affirmed to perform their duties with impartiality and fidelity. They shall also have power to fill vacancies in their own number. It shall be the duty of said commissioners, or a majority of them, and they shall have authority to make a registration of voters for the several election divisions of said city, and to furnish the lists so made to the election officers of each precinct or division; to distribute the tickets for said city provided for by this ordinance to be used at the election; to appoint a judge and two inspectors for each election division, by whom the election therein shall be held and conducted, and to give all necessary instructions to the election officers regarding their duties in holding the election and in making returns thereof. No person shall serve as an election officer who would be disqualified under section 15, article 8, of the new constitution. The general return of the election in the said city shall be opened, computed, and certified before the said commissioners, and with their approval, which approval shall be endorsed upon the return. They shall make report, directed to the president of this convention, of their official action under this ordinance and concerning the conduct of the said election within the said city.

The judges and inspectors aforesaid shall conduct the election in all respects conformably to the general election laws of this commonwealth, and with like powers and duties to those of ordinary election officers. Each inspector shall appoint one clerk to assist the board in the performance of its duties, and all the election officers shall be duly sworn or affirmed according to law, and shall possess all the qualifications required by law of election officers in this commonwealth. At said election any duly qualified elector who shall be unregistered shall be permitted to vote upon making proof of his right to the election officers, according to the general election laws of this commonwealth. Return inspectors and their clerks, and an hourly count of the votes, shall be dispensed with, but overseers of election may be selected for any precinct by said election commissioners, whose duties and powers shall be the same as those of overseers of election in said city under existing election laws applicable thereto. Returns of the election shall be made in said city, as in the case of an election for governor, but a triplicate general return for said city shall be made out and forwarded to the president of this convention, at Harrisburg, as is hereafter provided in case of county returns.

5. In each of the counties of the commonwealth (except Philadelphia), the returns of the election shall be made as in the case of an election for governor, but the return judges in each county shall make out a triplicate county return and transmit the same, within five days after the election, directed to the president of this convention, at Harrisburg.

Done in convention, this third day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three.

D. L. IMBRIE, Chief Clerk."

security for the Girard Bank, which saved the bank until the next day, when all the banks suspended at the same time. "These securities," as has been well said, "had the effect of supporting the bank's credit, and the deposit of them by Mr. Boker was the strongest evidence of his faith in that institution." Shortly afterwards the "clearing house" arrangement was discontinued, and the certificates were returned by the trustees to the banks which had deposited them. Mr. Boker in the meantime died, and on the application of one of the counsel of the administrators on behalf of his estate for these securities, was informed by one of the trustees that they would be surrendered to the Girard Bank, which was so done. On application to the bank for them by the administrators they were refused, and they remained in the possession of the institution. The administrators received the dividends on the stock, but of $8,100 Camden & Amboy coupon bonds they received nothing, neither the interest on them nor the principal of one of them of $1,700 which fell due in 1864.

The allegation in the claims generally before the auditor was that they were really the private transactions of Mr. Boker, using the funds of the bank for his own private benefit, and that all the profits went into his pocket and never reached the bank.

Through the great skill, industry and sagacity of an expert of the first order, Mr. Burke, these transactions comprised in the claims were traced in the books of the bank, and it was shown clearly that they were regular banking operations conducted for the benefit of the bank, and that all the profits, legal or illegal, went into the coffers of the institution.

The learned auditor, after a most searching and careful examination of the whole subject, in a very able, temperate and exhaustive report, arrived at the same conclusion. "The claims," says the auditor, "against the estate for interest, profits, and other gains, from moneys of the bank, amount to nearly a million of dollars, and yet after minute investigation, the private estate of Mr. Boker, during his presidency, is not shown to have been increased by an amount at all approximating thereto; and on the other hand, the affairs of the bank under his management, the dividends regularly paid, the making whole of its capital, and the percentage of loss sustained, compared with the extent of business done, indicate a financial management profitable to the institution."

"In accordance with the views above expressed, it becomes the duty of the auditor to allow the second, third, fourth, ninth and eighteenth of the claims presented by the bank, and to disallow the remaining claims respectively."

The second, third and fourth claims never were disputed by the administrators, and were included in a tender made to the bank on the 31st May, 1859. The eighteenth claim was not disputed, and the ninth claim was the only one which was disputed by the accountants. The remaining fifteen claims were disallowed.

As to what were termed "the clearing house securities," the auditor said, "there seems to be no reason why these securities should not now be returned to the administrators, and it is accordingly directed to be done," and they were accordingly returned to the administrators by the bank.

Under these findings of the auditor, he was directed by the court to report upon five items specified in the order of the court of the 15th November, 1870. The second item was "that he report the specific amounts allowed on each side as the same stands confirmed by the court, and the amount of interest due on each item."

"Fourth. Interest in all cases where it is allowed, to be calculated to the date of filing supplementary report," which was the 29th November, A. D. 1870.

The report so filed was excepted to by the bank and the accountants, and the court so modified it as to charge the bank with only one-half of the expense of phonographing and printing the testimony, $2,100, and the accountant's exception to the ninth claim was sustained to the amount of $4,540.72, and that their exception "to the disallowance of interest on the salary of the decedent be sustained, and that the sum of $4,412.12, being interest on the said salary from the death of the decedent, February 8th, 1858, to 29th November, 1870, be added thereto."

"That the court do order and decree, that the total sums of principal and interest, as thus corrected, due by the estate of the decedent, resulted on the 29th November, 1870, in a balance of $25,430,11 due to the Girard Bank, and the reports with these modifications are confirmed." This decree is dated December 10th, 1870.

From this decree appeals were taken by the Girard Bank and by the accountants, to the Supreme Court, which were heard at great length in February last, the very able and elaborate arguments of counsel occupying twelve days. The claims of the bank, amounting to sixteen in number, which were disputed, with the twenty-six errors assigned by them, took up a very large portion of the time. Four printed volumes of testimony, with the printed speeches of counsel before the auditor, dealing with the details of bank management during a period of more than eleven years, made the task of sifting out the truth a very laborious one. It is true, we had a most able report from a most intelligent auditor, on whose discrimination and sound judgment we could safely rely, backed by the decision of a very learned tribunal whose peculiar duty it is to investigate cases of this character.

After a deliberate consideration of the whole questions, we have arrived at the conclusion, that the decree of the Orphans' Court was right, and should be affirmed, and both appeals be dismissed, each party paying the costs of his own appeal.

The result is, calculating interest on the decree from 29th November, 1870, that to the decree of the Orphans' Court, as stated above.....$25,430 11 is to be added the interest on it to the 20th October, 1873.... 4.412 11

Making a total on that day of.$29 843 22
From this sum are to be deducted the dividends since declared on the Girard Bank stock, with interest to 20th October, 1873, on each dividend..... 12.043 50

Making the amount due to the Girard Bank of.....$17,799 72
by the accountants on the 20th October, 1873.

And now, October 20th, 1873, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the accountants pay to the Girard Bank in the City of Philadelphia, the sum of seventeen thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine dollars and seventy-two cents, and that the appeals of the bank and of the accountants be dismissed, each party paying the costs of his own appeal.

BANKRUPTCY.

Fifty per cent. clause refers to fair cash value of assets. Is not operative against a bankrupt, if the fair cash value of the assets turned over to the assignees is equal to 50 per cent. of the claims proved, on which he was liable as principal debtor. In re Thompson.

The change made by the amendment of July 27th, 1868, clearly indicates that the discharge is not contingent upon the amount of dividend actually received by creditors. Ib.

The English rule in bankruptcy that where there are both partnership and individual debts, but no partnership assets and no solvent partner, the debts of the firm and of the members can be proved, and the estate is to be distributed pari pas u among the creditors, approved and adopted. In re Knight.

This rule applies even though the total assets consist of property sold by the individual creditors to the bankrupt. Ib.

The Federal courts, in construing the bankrupt law, are not bound by the decisions of a State court on a similar insolvent law. Ib.

A bank having discounted a note made by a firm to one of the partners, and endorsed by him, is entitled to prove the debt against the estate of the firm and of the individual partner. In re Bradley.

The form of the contract or obligation of the maker and endorser should not prejudice the legal rights of a creditor claiming distribution of assets in bankruptcy. Ib.

An involuntary bankrupt may be discharged unless some act specified in the 29th section is proved against him. In re Clark.

His estate having been administered upon, and the object of the law having been fulfilled, if he has acted in good faith there is no reason why he should be compelled to go through the vain ceremony of filing a voluntary petition. Ib.

The 12th section of the bankrupt act does not authorize the granting of a discharge where the bankrupt, dying during the proceedings, has not taken the final oath prescribed by the 29th section. In re Quinike.

Judgment for tort is discharged under the bankrupt law. In re Wiggers.

A bankrupt arrested under a ca. sa. issued upon such a judgment will be released by this court, even though the State court had refused so to do. Ib.

Jurisdiction exclusive. The jurisdiction of the District Court is exclusive, and its authority paramount, and it will protect the bankrupt in the manner contemplated by the law. Ib.

As to arrest, there is no distinction between mesne and final process. Ib.

A discharge may be granted to a bankrupt on an application made more than a year after the adjudication. In re Canady.

The true construction of the 29th section gives the court a discretionary power, and, in a proper case, on explanation of the delay, a discharge will be granted. Ib.

A revisary petition to the Circuit Court, under the second section of the bankrupt act, must show wherein the error in the order or ruling of the District Court complained of consists, and its nature must be distinctly set forth. The case will not be taken up de novo. In re Sutherland.

Municipal Bonds.

Where the statute of a State prescribes the manner in which a special meeting of the board of supervisors of a county shall be called, a special meeting held without observing these requirements is not legal. Goedgen v. Supervisors of Manitowoc Co.

A board thus convened has no authority to initiate a proceeding to subscribe for stock in a railroad company and issue bonds in payment therefor, and proceedings based upon the action of such a meeting will be enjoined. Ib.

Proceedings preparatory to issuing the bonds must as substantially comply with the law, as in levying a tax for the payment of the debt, although in suits brought on such bonds by innocent holders, the court rejects proof of errors in or about the election, or in issuing the bonds. Objections made by taxpayers before the bonds are issued, are in time. Ib.

The fact that the total revenue of a city is used in defraying its current expenses, does not constitute a legal or sufficient excuse for not paying its maturing indebtedness. United States ex rel. v. City of Sterling.

They have no right to spend their income in this way, leaving their bonds and other debts unpaid; but are bound to provide for and pay the latter, and on failure or refusal, this court will, on mandamus, compel them to do so. Ib.

A city, which, by its charter, has certain general powers of taxation, and by consent of a majority of its legal voters at a proper election, can levy and collect a further tax, cannot plead that they have not sufficient power to collect an adequate tax to pay their debts. Under such a charter the authorities should, from their ordinary revenue, discharge their legal indebtedness, and provide for their ordinary expenses by a further tax, according to their charter. Ib.

Patents.

A court of equity, while it may be satisfied the patent is valid, does not feel inclined, where those claiming under the patent have been negligent in enforcing their rights, to interfere in all cases, by an absolute peremptory injunction. Goodyear v. Honsinger.

When granted. If the rights under a patent are clear, and the infringement by the defendant free from doubt, and particularly after use of the invention by the patentee for a considerable time without controversy, the modern practice is not to compel the plaintiff in the first instance to proceed at law. Shelly v. Brannan.

Under such circumstances, it is the general practice to apply to the equitable side of the court for relief, which, in a proper case, is given without hesitation. Ib.

HAWKINS et al. v. WEIGHTMAN.

1. In covenant against H. and D. on ground rent deed, the sheriff returned "served" as to D., and "nihil" as to H.: judgment by default was taken against D. On an alias against H., he returned "served," by posting a copy of the writ on the premises, and advertising, &c., in a daily newspaper, agreeably to the act of Assembly, &c., and "nihil" as to the defendant. Judgment was taken for want of appearance after two "nihils:" Held, A good judgment.

2. Under the act of April 8th, 1840, it is not necessary that the return should state expressly that there was no tenant on the premises.

3. The return by sheriff that he posted a copy of the writ, is an affirmance that there was no tenant on the premises.

4. If there was a tenant in fact on the premises, the sheriff was liable for a false return.

WOOD v. SHERMAN et al.

1. Davis was indebted to Sherman for printing; he refused to do more without a guaranty. Woods agreed to "guaranty to Sherman the contract made by him with Davis to the amount of $10,000." Afterwards, Davis paid money to Sherman, without directing any appropriation. Held, that Sherman might apply it to the debt due before the guaranty.

2. To recover against a guarantor, the creditor must prove due diligence against the debtor or his insolvency, so that pursuit would be fruitless. He need not prove both.

3. An execution was issued against the debtor, suit was brought against the gurantor; two days afterwards the execution was returned "nulla bona." Held, prima facie evidence of due diligence.

4. Reasonable diligence is a question for the jury.

5. Ex vi termini a guaranty of a contract is a concurrent act and part of the original agreement.

In compliance with the desire of many prominent members of the Bar, the Publishers have endeavored to produce a handsome book, full and complete in its contents. Owing to the sale being limited to the Philadelphia Bar, to whom only it can be of use, and in consequence of the expense attending its publication, the price has been fixed at a figure that may seem apparently high,—but the Publishers, to reimburse themselves for the outlay they have been subject to, have been compelled to decline giving discounts to any one, so as to enable them to give the Bar the advantage of the lowest possible price for which the Book can be made.

The volume has been carefully compiled, and has also been revised by the Judges of the different Courts, and endorsed by Rules of the same. They therefore contain not only the latest, but also the only full publication of those rules, as they now stand on the minutes of the different Courts.

Orphans' Court of Phil'a.

ESTATE OF JAMES RAFFERTY, DECEASED.

A petition to vacate a decree of specific performance of a contract made by decedent in his lifetime, was dismissed by the Orphans' Court on the ground of want of jurisdiction. Weyand v. Weller, 3 Wright, 443, followed.

In the matter of the petition of Charles W. Zimmerman to vacate a decree of specific performance.

Opinion by PEIRCE, J. Delivered November 15th, 1873.

James Rafferty died in 1857, leaving issue three children, Sarah, William and James, and his wife Catharine, whom he appointed executrix. He devised one-third of his real estate to his wife and two-thirds to his sons, William and James, and the survivors of them. He provided for his daughter otherwise. The decedent's two sons died in their minority, the oldest and survivor of them on the 16th of January, 1872. In April, 1872, M. A. Kane, as assignee of Patrick Harvey, presented his petition to the Orphans' Court, setting forth that decedent in his lifetime had made a written agreement with the said Harvey on certain conditions therein set forth, for the sale of the said real estate to the said Harvey, and praying the court to decree a specific performance of the said contract.

An answer was put in by the executrix admitting the facts set forth in the said petition, and submitting to the adjudication and decree of the court, and, therefore, on April 20th, 1872, a decree of specific performance was made as prayed for. On the 18th of September, 1871, the petitioner, Charles W Zimmerman, bought at sheriff's sale the property at the southeast corner of South street and Passyunk road, part of the real estate of which the said decedent died seized, as the property of Catharine McIlvaine, formerly Catharine Rafferty, on a judgment against her, which was conveyed to him by sheriff's deed, dated September 21st, 1871. On May 4th, 1872, Charles W. Zimmerman presented his petition to the court praying that the said decree of specific performance be vacated on the ground of want of notice to him, and some alleged inconsistencies referred to in the said petition.

To this petition answers were put in by the executrix and M. A. Kane, in whose favor the decree of specific performance had been made, and the case submitted on answers and proofs. The case seems to be ruled by the case of Weyand v. Weller, 3 Wright, 443; in which Thompson, J., said: "It seems to have been forgotten that the Orphans' Court is a court of limited jurisdiction. Its jurisdiction is well defined; and while it has unquestionable jurisdiction to decree the execution of contracts to decedents, yet it would be difficult to find its authority to entertain bills by strangers to such decrees to rescind its orders for specific execution."

Furthermore, it is not very apparent how the interests of the petitioner have been affected by this decree for a specific performance. Whatever his rights are, they were acquired before the proceeding for the specific performances were commenced. And if he was a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, upon a valid judgment against the devisee, his rights, whatever they may be, would seem to be independent of the proceedings in the Orphans' Court for the decree of specific performance.

The petition is dismissed with costs.

Supreme Court of California.

REED v. CLARK.

1. In an action for breach of promise of marriage, it is the duty of the jury to look beyond the contract itself for the measure of damages, and give to the injured party a full compensation for all loss, in not having the contract fulfilled.
2. This has always been held to embrace the injury to the feelings, affections and wounded pride as well as the loss of marriage.
3. A charge by the judge that the jury have a right to consider in aggravation of damages whether or not the defendant has wantonly come into court and attempted to show the plaintiff guilty of improper conduct of which she was innocent: Held, not to be error.

Appeal from the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District, city and county of San Francisco. October Term, 1873.

Opinion by NILES, J., BELCHER, CROCKETT, JJ. and WALLACE, C. J., concurring.

Action for breach of promise of marriage.

The plaintiff having recovered a verdict, the defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused. The defendant appeals from the order of refusal and from the judgment.

1. At the trial, and after the evidence had been introduced tending to show the proposal of marriage by the defendant, and its acceptance by the plaintiff, the court, against the objection of the defendant, admitted evidence that the plaintiff, within a few days after the proposal and acceptance, had announced the fact of the engagement to a number of ladies with whom she was intimate, and whom she invited to attend the wedding. This evidence upon the express ground that, if the plaintiff was entitled to recover at all, the fact sought to be proven would be an element to be considered in the estimate of damages. This ruling is now urged as one of the principal grounds of error.

The action for breach of promise of marriage is peculiar in its nature, and the elements going to constitute the damages differ materially from those existing in the case of a breach of any other contract. It is the duty of the jury to look beyond the contract itself for the measure of damages and give to the injured party a full compensation for all loss in not having the contract fulfilled. This has always been held to embrace the injury to the feelings, affections and wounded pride as well as the loss of marriage. The difficulty arising from the very nature of the case, of fixing any accurate rule by which to estimate the damages arising from these sources, has rendered it necessary to give a great latitude to the introduction of evidence, and to admit the jury to a full knowledge of all the circumstances attending the transaction, not only in its inception, but during the continuance of the relationship between the parties.

It cannot be doubted that knowledge of the fact of a marriage engagement by the intimate friends and relatives of a party to the contract, with whom she has frequent and familiar intercourse, would increase in a considerable degree the annoyance and mental suffering occasioned by a sudden discontinuance of the relationship. A rule which admits evidence of this character would not have the effect, as suggested in the argument, of allowing a designing person, by premeditation and artifice, to enhance the damages she might receive in case of an anticipated breach of the contract, by a general and immodest publication of the engagement; for such behavior would naturally injuriously affect the complainant in the judgment of the jury, and would tend to diminish, rather than to augment, the damages. But the announcement of the engagement to a few intimate friends may be neither improper nor unbecoming, and certainly requires no express authorization. We think the jury should be permitted to consider this, with the other circumstances of the case, in estimating the injury occasioned to the plaintiff by a breach of the contract.

2. But it is urged by the appellant as a ground of errors, that the court in passing upon the admissibility of the evidence we have considered, remarked in the presence and hearing of the jury, in substance, that as the case then stood, a prima facie promise had been proven; and it is claimed that this amounted to a decided expression of opinion by the court upon the weight of evidence, which could not fail to influence the decision of the jury upon a matter of fact directly in issue.

It frequently happens that the admissibility of a particular piece of evidence depends upon the establishment of some preliminary fact. In such case the court must determine what facts have been shown to exist, in order to determine what further facts may properly be shown. It is not unusual or improper for the judge in passing upon such a question, to announce, for the guidance and benefit of counsel, the reasons which controlled him in the admission or rejection of proferred evidence. This necessarily involves the expression of an opinion upon the evidence already introduced. But this expression is not addressed to the jury, or intended for their guidance, as is an instruction given at the request of counsel, or by the court upon its own motion. and which it is the duty of the jury to follow strictly and without questioning.

In this case the court, before admitting the testimony offered, was bound to determine whether sufficient evidence of the promise had been given to establish a prima facie case. The mere announcement of his ruling would have been equivalent to an expression of his opinion upon this point. While the expression of the learned judge that as the case then stood a prima facie promise had been proven, might be the subject of criticism if presented to the jury as a formal instruction. We think it meant no more, as used, than that evidence had been given tending to show the promise, sufficient to lay the foundation for the introduction of the proposed testimony. Moreover, whatever impression may have been made upon the minds of the jury by the language of the court, must have been removed by its subsequent instructions. They were not only told that they should not be influenced "by any apparent expression of opinion as to the facts made by the court," but were fully instructed that the question whether a promise had been made or not was to be determined by them, from the evidence.

3. The fourth ground for a new trial assigned by the defendant was "error in law in not permitting the defendant's counsel to cross-examine the plaintiff when on the stand as a witness in her own behalf as to matters affecting her character and conduct, and as to matters affecting her credibility."

The statement is defective in the respect that it does not sufficiently particularize the ruling to which it is intended to apply. We are referred, however, by the brief of counsel to the ruling of the court upon the defendant's proposal to show in cross-examination of the plaintiff that she had formerly resided in a certain house, and had been accustomed to visit it from time to time, and that it was kept by a notorious procuress. It appears from the transcript that the witness had already testified fully upon this point before any objection was made by the plaintiff's counsel. No motion to strike out the testimony was made, and it was before the jury for their consideration. While the transcript is very indefinite in this regard, the ruling of the court in refusing to allow a continuance of the examination upon the point seems to have been placed upon the two grounds: that the cross-examination was being protracted to an unreasonable length, and that the alleged bad character of the witness, being a substantial and affirmative defence, could not be inquired into upon cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses.

We do not think it necessary or profitable to discuss the principle embraced in the latter proposition. While a large latitude should be allowed in the cross-examination of a witness, for the purpose of developing the truth, and more especially where the witness is a party in interest, the court has the power, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to confine the examination within reasonable limits, and when we consider that the principal facts proposed to be shown by the witness were already before the jury, and that a searching and minute cross-examination had occupied more than a day, we do not think the court went beyond its discretionary powers in prohibiting its continuance on the line proposed by counsel.

4. It is urged by the defendant in error that the court allowed one of defendant's witnesses "to be recalled and examined by the plaintiff upon important matters, to lay a foundation for discrediting or impeaching her."

We have been referred to no authority, and can find none, which limits the power of the court, in its discretion, to permit a witness to be recalled for examination in chief or cross-examination at any time during the progress of the trial, whether for the purpose of proving or disproving a natural issue, or for the purpose of laying a foundation for impeachment. We cannot say, from anything contained in the transcript, that there was any abuse of this discretion. Nor can we say that the matters offered to be shown were impertinent, for the offer of the letters of the witness, the proof of which appears to have been the sole object of the re-examination, was withdrawn by consent of counsel for reasons which we can only conjecture, but must presume to have been sufficient.

5. The charge that the jury "have a right to consider in aggravation or enhancement of damages, whether or not the defendant has wantonly come into court and attempted to show the plaintiff guilty of improper conduct with other men, of which she was innocent," is claimed by the appellant to have been erroneous.

We think there was no substantial error in this charge. In Southard v. Rexford, 6 Cowen, 260, it was said: "When the defendant attempts to justify his breach of promise of marriage by stating upon the record, as the cause of his desertion of the plaintiff, that she had repeatedly had criminal intercourse with various persons, and fails entirely in proving it, this is a circumstance which ought to aggravate the damages. A verdict for nominal or trifling damages, under such circumstances, would be fatal to the character of the plaintiff, and it would be a matter of regret, indeed, if a check upon a license of this description did not exist in the power of the jury to take it into consideration in aggravation of damages."

We think the doctrine of this decision is correct. It is true the defendant has a right to plead criminal or disgraceful conduct of the plaintiff in justification of his breach of the contract; and this plea may have been interposed in the utmost good faith, notwithstanding he is unable to sustain it by evidence amounting to proof in the estimation of the jury. But it is a question of good or bad faith for the jury to determine. And the failure to offer any evidence whatever in support of the damaging averment, or the introduction of evidence apparently fabricated or so frivolous that it was equivalent to an entire failure of proof, would tend to show that bad faith on the part of the defendant which increases the injury, and ought to enhance the damages.

In the subsequent case of Kniffin v. McConnell, 30 New York, 289, the jury had been instructed, at the request of plaintiff, that "If the defendant had come into court and attempted to prove her guilty of misconduct with other men, of which he knew she was not guilty," it aggravated the injury and damages. There was no allegation in the answer of misconduct upon the part of plaintiff, and in this respect it differed from the case of Southard v. Rexford. But the majority of the court held that the charge was not erroneous, "and that attempting to give such matters in evidence, though not set up in the answer as a defence, if not made out, warrants the charge that it should aggravate the damages."

In the present case the charge of misconduct was distinctly made in the answer, and evidence upon the point was introduced. We think that if the jury should be satisfied, from the whole evidence, that this testimony was offered in bad faith, they should be permitted to consider that fact in enhancement of damages, both as tending to show the animus of the defendant and as being an injury to the feelings and wounded pride of the plaintiff.

It is urged by the appellant that this portion of the charge contains nothing to prevent the jury from inferring that evidence of unchastity would aggravate the damages, although offered in good faith upon the part of the defendant. The word "wantonly," although perhaps not the most apt term that could have been chosen, substantially expressed the idea of bad faith. In the connection in which it was used, it conveyed the idea of a charge made and sought to be maintained carelessly and recklessly and in a manner inconsistent with a sincere and well founded conviction of its truth. We think, taking into view the entire charge upon this subject, that the jury could not have been misled to the prejudice of the defendant by the language used.

8. The court charged the jury that it was their province "to take into consideration on the question of damages the pecuniary condition of the defendant." We do not understand the counsel for defendant to contend now that this charge is erroneous as an abstract proposition, although the only point made in the statement for a new trial was that the charge was an erroneous statement of the law, but it is claimed that it was error to give it in this case, because there was no legal evidence of the defendant's pecuniary condition. But the plaintiff testified fully to the defendant's declarations as to his wealth made to her immediately prior to the engagement. No exception was taken to this testimony at the trial, and this is a sufficient answer to the objection, now made for the first time, that the fact was not established by legal existence.

7. The alleged newly discovered evilence goes entirely to the point of the unchastity and improper conduct of the plaintiff. This was one of the questions in controversy at the trial, and upon which much evidence was introduced. The defendant now asks for a new trial, that he may multiply witnesses to acts upon the part of the plaintiff of the same general character as those proven at the former trial, and differing therefrom only in the times and manner of their commission. This evidence is merely cumulative, and is not good cause for a new trial. Waller v. Graves, 20 Conn. 310; Stoakes v. Monroe, 36 Cal. 388. Moreover, considering the character of the evidence proffered, we cannot say that the court might not have reasonably inferred that the verdict would have been the same if the evidence had been in.

Several other points were made in the case which we do not deem it necessary to discuss. We find no error requiring a reversal.

2. In an action for services of plaintiff in nursing, &c., a feeble man. Held proper to ask a witness whether plaintiff's appearance did not show her constitution broken down by her duties.

KLASE v. BRIGHT.

1. Bright sold out to Klase, who was his partner, took his notes for the purchase money and transferred them, still retaining the ownership, to Dye, who transferred them to Bright. Suit was brought, Bright, to Dye's use, against Klase. Afterwards Dye settled with Klase, allowing Bright's alleged indebtedness on the partnership; a note for the balance from Klase to Dye was put into his attorney's hands; he was notified by Bright not to deliver it to Dye. Held, that the settlement did not prevent a recovery by Bright in the suit against Klase.

2. Klase, having given no value, was not prejudiced by the settlement with Dye, he not owning the note; the suit being to the use of Dye, did not estop Bright from repudiating Dye's settlement.

3. In this action evidence of partnership debts paid by Klase, was not admissible as set-off.

4. Whether Bright was indebted on account of that payment could be ascertained only by account render or bill in equity between the partners; not in assumpsit.

5. Bright sold to Klase his "right, title and interest" in the firm; a mill mentioned in the agreement as part of the firm property, was sold by the sheriff as the property of a third person. Held, that Klase could not defend for a failure of consideration, his knowledge of ownership being the same as Bright's; and Bright sold his right only.

2. B. sold part of a coal lease with the personal property to M., who constituted O. his attorney; orders drawn for goods by B. on a firm, "B. & Co.," in favor of the plaintiffs, accepted by O., and goods furnished accordingly, were evidence of partnership between B. & M.

3. B. when alone kept blank assignments which were filled up by him to the plaintiff, a storekeeper, for the amount due laborers of B., and the laborers received goods to the amount from the plaintiff. There being evidence of partnership between B. and M., such assignments dated afterwards were evidence in a suit against the firm.

I think you will receive your money;" again "I was at Esq.'s for money three times, but did not meet him; I will pay you as soon as the money is obtained. I will see you yet this week." Suit had been brought at the date of last note. Held, 1. That the letters were only a conditional promise to pay on obtaining the money from the justice. 2. If it had been absolute, the consideration of forbearance had not been performed.

The bank paid Spicer. Held, that Bache could recover the amount with interest.

2. The lumber being Bache's, the fund was his, and could be followed through any transmutations so long as it could be identified.

3. Where notice with indemnity is given to a bank not to pay money to a depositor, the payment is at the bank's risk.

1. An insurance was made to T. who gave a mortgage to W. T. assigned his policy to W. as security, and W. assigned to E. T. afterwards conveyed the property insured to C., and assigned him the policy; the insurance company refused to approve the assignment. E. afterwards became the owner of W.'s mortgage, and the company insured his interest as mortgagee. By the policy on payment of a loss the mortgagee was to assign the mortgage to the company; the property was burned, and E. received the amount of his insurance, and assigned the mortgage to the company: Held, that the assignment was properly made, that T. had no claim upon the money paid for the loss, and that the company might recover from T. the amount due on the mortgage.

VAN STORCH v. GRIFFIN.

1. An exemplification of the record of the State of New York was certified by the clerk, and J. W. G. "Justice of the Supreme Court;" it appeared that there were other judges of the same court. J. W. G. did not appear to be Chief Justice. Held, not to be properly authenticated.

2. The record was of proceedings in divorce by the husband, in New York, on the ground of adultery; the respondent at the time of marriage, of the proceedings, and of the decree, resided in Pennsylvania, and there was no actual service on her. In an action by respondent against a person for breach of promise of marriage after a divorce in Pennsylvania on her own libel, Held, that the record was not evidence against her of adultery.

3. The decree in New York was that respondent should not marry again during the life of libellant; the decree as to this had no extra-territorial effect.

4. The plaintiff having been divorced on her own libel in Pennsylvania, it was lawful for her to marry again, and her marriage would be treated as valid everywhere.

5. In an action for breach of promise of marriage, evidence that the general character of the plaintiff for chastity previously, was bad, is admissible in mitigation of damages.

ALDRICH AND WIFE v. BAILEY ET AL.

1. McConnell contracted for land, to pay $2.50 per acre and improve; he took possession and improved; he died without paying any money except the cost of surveying, leaving a widow and children; as between him and his vendor there was no abandonment of the contract. An equitable estate descended to his widow and children.

2. The widow applied to the vendor for a new contract; it was signed by her, and her signature witnessed by vendor's attorney in fact; but not signed by vendor; she paid no purchase money, but continued to live on the land until her death; she obtained no equity in the land.

3. Some of the heirs assigned to the widow their interest in the father's estate by writing not acknowledged nor recorded The plaintiff, one of the heirs, afterwards obtained a deed of their interest from a number of McConnell's heirs, and then paid the whole purchase money to the vendor who gave her a deed, which was duly recorded; she had no notice of the assignment to the widow. Held, that her title was best.

4. The widow divided the land and set off a portion to a son, who took possession of it; the widow gave him a quit-claim deed for it. This gave him no title as against the vendor.

5. The defendants claimed under a deed from the son and intervening deeds. One of the defendants holding the widow's imperfect contract, made payments on the purchase money to an authorized agent, who afterwards leasing plaintiff's claim, held the money, notified the defendant to receive it, and he declining, the deed was made to plaintiff. She acquired the legal title as her father's purchase.

6. The receipt of the money by the agent being by mistake, was not a ratification of the imperfect contract with the widow.

7. The vendor could not abrogate the contract with the father, and sell his land and improvements.

EVERHART v. SEARLE.

1. Flagg employed Searle to sell land, the compensation to be all above $125 per acre. Everhart agreed in writing with Searle to pay him $500 "for services in assisting to negotiate a purchase of the land." Searle brought Everhart and Flagg together, and a contract was made for sale of the land at $150 per acre. Everhart and Flagg afterwards consummated the sale themselves. Held, that Searle acting for both without their consent could not recover the $500 from Everhart.

2. Searle alleged that the understanding was that the $500 was to give Everhart the preference. Held, that this was selling his discretion, was bad faith to Flagg, and being so, no contract would arise out of the transaction.

3. The fact that Flagg suffered no loss, did not vary the effect, the transaction being against public policy.

ARNOLD ET AL., POST No. 13, G. A. R., v. THE MACUNGIE SAVINGS BANK.

1. Hamersly deposited in bank the proceeds of an excursion, to the credit of himself and two others, as "trustees of Post 13, G. A. R.," the bank paid the deposit to Hamersly, after notice by the post not to pay him. In a suit by the post against the bank, the evidence was conflicting on the question of ownership. The court charged that if the plaintiff's did not satisfy them by evidence stronger than the defendants', that the money belonged to them, the verdict should be for the defendants. Held, to be error.

2. The money being deposited to the credit of the post, prima facie belonged to it, and the burden was on the defendant to show that it belonged to Hamersly.

3. Hamersly being on the stand was asked: "did you receive one-half of the profits of this excursion, a portion of which is the amount in dispute, and had you proposed before to the Grand Army of the Republic that they should have one-half of the profits?" Held, that the question was pertinent as bearing upon the question of the ownership of the fund.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

That the new constitution will be adopted by the people seems now to be a foregone conclusion. The opposition which was expected to it in the interior counties of the State has nearly died out, the prominent members of both political parties are joining hands to help it through, and nowhere scarcely, except in the large cities, and in the districts where the "ring" managers and corruptionists have control, is there any seriously organized opposition to it. Even in Philadelphia, where the ring politicians of both parties were confident of their ability to defeat it, the frantic efforts made by them to make the matter a partisan issue, and to render the instrument unpopular by the circulation of one-sided and fictitious statements of its contents, are merely having the effect of determining hundreds of voters to attend the election next month, who otherwise would not take sufficient interest in the matter to vote. Continued agitation will only bring out the vote and increase the majority in favor of the constitution. The futile efforts of the City Solicitor and some other gentlemen occupying prominent official positions, to raise a conflict of jurisdiction between election officers, are exciting but the pity and commiseration of the good citizens of Philadelphia, and raise a smile upon the lips of every well-informed constitutional lawyer. Perhaps if some of these gentlemen are too troublesome, the convention, which reserved to itself that right, might re-assemble prior to the election, abolish their official positions, blot out of existence certain judges and courts alike, and do a number of other unpleasant things that might lead persons to have a little more respect for the great powers of the people confided to the convention. The people would no doubt by their votes heartily appreciate such action, in case it became necessary, and would promptly endorse the action of the convention. We would deprecate such extreme measures, but then when the power of the people is doubted, it might please the people to overcome that doubt, by a practical demonstration of the kind mentioned. However, there is no danger of such an occurrence, as the doubts, etc., of political managers and leaders are not of the slightest importance. The people appreciate their weight and will act accordingly.

We stated when we published the constitution in our issue of the 7th inst, that we were emphatically in favor of its adoption. We propose in brief to give our reasons for such declaration.

First of all. The new constitution provides a remedy for a greater part of the municipal misgovernment, political corruption, bad legislation, and glaring election frauds, under which we have suffered for many years past.

Second. It creates a reform Legislature, an article of prime necessity to the people of a free State.

Third. It does away to a great extent with the interminable delays in judicial proceedings, by the creation of new courts, and the increase in the number of judges throughout the State, and the simplification of the system of courts in Philadelphia.

Fourth. It cuts up by the roots the special legislation so much complained of, general laws on mostly every subject being now necessary.

Fifth. It provides for stringent limitations upon the governor's pardoning power, which everybody admits is a necessity.

Sixth. It throws restrictions around the enormous powers and privileges of gigantic corporations and monopolies, properly bringing those institutions within the control of the State.

Seventh. It guards against extravagance and waste of the public funds.

Eighth. It provides against fraud and connivance in the passage of acts of Assembly.

Ninth. It prohibits the creation of irresponsible commissions empowered to tax the people for special objects without their consent.

Tenth. It provides an easy method of detecting election frauds.

Eleventh. It abolishes special registry laws, and gives the people a fair opportunity to record their votes.

Twelfth. It guards against a stoppage of the State machinery of government by the creation of the office of lieutenant governor.

Thirteenth. It cuts up by the roots the evils of the auditing system in Philadelphia, establishing a separate Orphans' Court for that city, and providing that the judges themselves shall hereafter audit all accounts, without expense to the parties.

Fourteenth. It judiciously allows women to be selected for positions connected with the government of our schools.

Fifteenth. It provides for the proper management of private corporations.

Sixteenth. It is immeasurably superior to the old constitution, which, no matter how perfect that instrument was at the time of its adoption, is now unsuited to the wants of this great commonwealth.

For these reasons, we are emphatically in favor of the new constitution. Can we help it?

INCREASING IMPORTANCE OF A KNOWLEDGE OF THE FEDERAL JURISPRUDENCE.

Our Washington exchanges come freighted with the "lectures" at the opening of the different law schools there. Though we suppose that they are presented immediately on delivery by the work of what is called the "reportorial corps," and therefore with occasional inaccuracies of diction, the merits of all are very discernible. We give, in this issue, the following extract of one by the Hon. S. F. Miller, who is a professor in the Catholic College of Georgetown. We select it, not because we agree or disagree with anything contained in it, but because we think it will be interesting to our readers.

"The time has been until very recently that a lawyer might attain a great practice and a very high reputation in the State courts, and, indeed, some of the first reputations in the country have been so made by men who never practiced at all in the Federal courts, and whose attention, if turned at all to the subjects I have named as being within the course of lectures for this winter, were only so turned incidentally; but that period in the history of a lawyer's progress has passed. The time has come when the Constitution and laws of the United States are not the mere theoretical object of the thoughts of the statesman, of the lawyer, and of the man of business. The time has come when the operations of that government reach to the recesses of every man's business, and force themselves upon every man's thoughts.

The history of the last twelve or fifteen years has taught the people, in a manner which, I trust, will never be again necessary that they shall be taught, that this government within its sphere is supreme, and that its sphere is a very extensive and a very pervading one. Leaving out of the question all that has been brought to our observation and experience by the events of the recent war of the rebellion and the operations of the government under what is called the system of reconstruction, other matters have brought the operations of the Federal government into play in the every-day affairs of business life in a manner almost unknown previous to that time.

As an illustration I refer you to the internal revenue system—a system under which, a few years ago, almost every species of property, every occupation and pursuit, and many things which had scarcely acquired the name of property or occupation, were taxed by the Federal government; taxed, necessarily, to pay the interest and principal of the debt incurred in the war, and the expense of the government largely increased by the operations of that war. Now, these taxes and these statutes—even if you suppose that everybody was willing to submit to them cheerfully—required construction. They were new to the country. When they were put in operation, the officers themselves were very much perplexed as to what they meant in a great many cases; and our government, being a liberal government, and desiring that no person should be injured, was ready, and afforded opportunities to have the laws tested by courts of justice. A man had but to pay his taxes, take an appeal to the commissioner of taxation, and then, if he failed there, he could sue the man who collected them, and recover if illegally assessed. The number of suits growing out of this class of cases was immense and has been in the Federal courts ever since that system of internal revenue was established. Though the list of articles subject to taxation has been very much diminished, it yet seems probable that some eighty, ninety, or perhaps a hundred millions of dollars will always be raised in this country hereafter by the taxation of the Federal government on the articles of spirits, tobacco and malt liquors,

But it is not only when a suit is brought or is to be brought, that the lawyer is called upon to understand these things, this jurisdiction and these laws. He is very often consulted as to what a party should do when no suit originates. And as this system permeates the entire country, the remotest village lawyer may be called upon to advise upon the Constitution, its construction or the construction of the statutes, or the manner in which the laws are enforced by the officers.

The bankrupt law, passed in 1867, has procured an entire modification in the system of enforcing contracts or collecting debts, in the case of persons who fail to pay for want of ability to pay, and all that law has to be administered under a Federal statute, under an act of Congress; and not only under an act of Congress, but under the rule of practice prescribed and adapted for the Federal courts; and the lawyer who does not know when a man has committed an act of bankruptcy and is liable to be punished in a court of bankruptcy, or who does not know how to institute a proceeding in a court of bankruptcy, can hardly expect to receive a full share of practice in any community.

In addition to this, the admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal courts has, within the last few years, by constructions placed upon it by the Federal courts, received an immense increase in its extent. Twenty years ago it was held that jurisdiction in admiralty was limited, in fact, to the sea-board, if not actually to the sea; it extended no further on the rivers than the tide ebbed and flowed in those rivers. It has been held since that time by the Supreme Court of the United States that the admiralty jurisdiction extended to all the navigable streams; that it was a system of laws intended to have operation upon the interests of navigation, and that whether the navigation took place upon salt water or upon fresh water was entirely immaterial, and that the Constitution of the United States, when it declared that the courts of the United States should have jurisdiction in admiralty, meant that they should have jurisdiction in all that class of cases which heretofore had been called admiralty cases, whether they grew out of salt water transactions and contracts or fresh water contracts and transactions. Now that has opened to the great interior of the country, the subject of the carrying trade by steamboats.

Every steamboat becomes, in regard to suits concerning its transaction, its contracts, to torts committed by its officers, subject to the admiralty jurisdiction of the Federal courts. By act of Congress passed in the earliest history of the country, where the case is, strictly speaking, an admiralty case—one known and recognized as belonging to the ancient jurisdiction of admiralty in England and on the Continent—the Federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction, and the State courts cannot exercise jurisdiction. If a lawyer expects to have a large practice in any part of the country now, he must know something of admiralty law and admiralty jurisdiction. Questions of constitutional law, especially of the law of the Constitution of the United States, have become matters of common occurrence in the courts. Whether it is that the Congress of the United States has taken a more liberal view of its powers than formerly, or whether it is that the people are disposed to question the exercise of power by Congress, is not for me to say; but certain it is that hardly any act of Congress in modern times can be brought to bear upon an individual, to which he is reluctant to assent, that he does not attempt to raise the question of constitutional power to pass such an act. Our books of reports, both State and Federal, are filled with the decisions of the courts upon questions of constitutional law, Federal and State.

In the progress of this country in wealth, in its growth, in power and population, and especially in the increase of transportation of persons and property from one point of the country to another — out of this system of transportation arises a vast number of suits which, twenty-five or thirty years ago were almost unknown. The Federal government is exercising to some extent its powers over this subject of transportation, under the clause of the Constitution which declares that Congress shall have the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations, with the Indian tribes and among the several States. State governments and State Legislatures are constantly enacting laws for the promotion of their purposes, for the raising of money, for the protection of what they consider their individual rights, which are supposed to be in conflict with this right of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, and our Supreme Court has been filled of late days with questions upon the powers of the States to pass laws concerning taxation and other matters which are supposed to infringe upon the right of the citizen as a citizen of the Federal government.

By the three recent amendments to the Constitution, adopted since the war of the rebellion ended, new questions of constitutional law and of the relations of the Federal government to the States and the people of the States have been raised and are constantly arising which require attentive consideration. A mass of people, six or eight millions in number, who were not citizens, have been made citizens of the United States by those amendments. That class of people who were declared by the Dred Scott decision of 1854 to have no rights which a white man was bound to respect, have come to have all the legal or civil rights which a white man has; and a fight is going on in this matter in which the lawyer and judge are called upon to construe the law of the Constitution of the United States, and the conflict of State constitutions with that law. I might consume the balance of the evening by detailing to you the innumerable instances in which any lawyer might be called upon to advise about all these questions, and put in operation the machinery of the law of the Federal government for the protection of the rights of his client, but it is useless.

You may consider this matter, and you will find that no branch of law is of more importance to the lawyer, to the statesman and to the citizen, than a thorough acquaintance with the Constitution and laws of the Federal government as they are administered, and as they affect the rights of the people."

And still they come! A. A. Chase, editor, and A. H. Winton, associate editor, have launched upon the sea of journalism the Scranton Law Times, the first number of which lies before us. It gives promise of being a useful and interesting weekly to the legal profession of Luzerne and neighboring counties. Our friend Mr. Kulp of the Luzerne Legal Register will have to look to his laurels—but then a little friendly rivalry between Wilkesbarre and Scranton will do them both good. The new paper has our best wishes.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Washington publishers announce as likely to appear by the second week in December, the 16th volume of Wallace's Supreme Court Reports. This volume comprises, they remark, some cases of great interest, including pre-eminently those from New Orleans, known as the Slaughter House Cases, 36–135, than which none of greater magnitude have yet been decided in this country. Mr. Justice Miller, who gave the opinion of the court, speaking of their importance, said: "No questions, so far-reaching and pervading in their consequences, so profoundly interesting to the people of this country, and so important in their bearing upon the relations of the United States and of the several States to each other, and to the citizens of the States and of the United States, have been before this court during the official lives of any of its present members." The arguments and opinions were worthy of such questions. In the case of the Railroad Company v. Otoe County, and Olcot v. The Supervisors, 667, some important doctrines are laid down as to the subscriptions of municipal corporations to railroads, including the power to make gifts or donations, which is sustained in opposition to some decisions elsewhere made. In Mrs. Myra Bradwell's Case, the question of how far the refusal of a State Court to grant a license to a woman to practice law, was the subject of learned opinions. In Koontz v. Northern Bank, some important doctrines, as to the credit due to judicial proceedings regular on their face, are laid down. In Davis v. Gray, 203, the rights, powers, and duties of receivers in equity are treated of and a liberal view taken of them. Numerous cases, including specially the cases of Voorhees v. Bonesteel, 16; Marshall v. Knox, 551, and Wager v. Hall, 584, settle questions much disputed hitherto, as to what is "a contemplation of bankruptcy" within the meaning of the bankrupt act. In Walker v. Whitehead, 314, what is the impairing of the obligation of a contract? In Railroad Company v. Manufacturing Company, 318, some important doctrines on the law of common carriers, the court expressing itself not inclined to go any further than it has done in absolving them from responsibility. In Ripley v. Insurance Company, 336, a curious case in Life Insurance. In Tailor v. Tailor, 366, an important adjudication as to the liability of bail. In Huntington v. Texas, 102, a statement by the court defining and limiting its decision in the great case of Texas v. Chile & White, 7 Wallace, 700. In Steamboat Company v. Chase, 522, an important judgment as to the nature of admiralty jurisdiction in relation to the State and Federal government.

We shall give to our readers, as our space allows, an abstract of some of these and other cases in the volume.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

We have received from John M. Shirley, Esq., State reporter of New Hampshire, an elaborate brief prepared by himself in the case of Marston et al. v. Durgin, in the Supreme Court of that State. We are also indebted to him for advance reports of cases in the same court.

A TREATISE ON THE AMERICAN LAW OF LANDLORD AND TENANT, embracing the Statutory Provisions and Judicial Decisions of the several States in reference thereto, with a selection of Precedents. Sixth edition, revised and enlarged by John M. Taylor, Counsellor at Law. Boston, Little, Brown & Co., 1873. 8vo., pp. lxiii., 769. Received from the Publishers.

Taylor on Landlord and Tenant has long been accepted as an acknowledged American authority upon the subject of which it treats. One proof of this is the rapidity with which an edition of the work is exhausted. The copy now before us is from the sixth edition, five editions of the work having already been disposed of. The necessity for text books upon special subjects has long been acknowledged; the increase of business in the old courts, and the constant creation of new courts, with the attendant results of innumerable decisions and multiplicity of reports, rendering it absolutely impossible for the general practitioner to keep himself posted in the law, except by means of late text books, prepared by persons familiar with the decisions upon particular branches. Hence works like the one we are speaking of must be published. Mr. John W. Smith in England has done for the British bar, what Mr. Taylor has for the American, produced a book which is the leading authority upon the subject, and while we would recommend to the profession the reading of Mr. Smith's valuable work yet our partiality for publications by American authors leads us to prefer Mr. Taylor's work. Of course the law of landlord and tenant, is regulated in great measure by the various local statutes, and a text book which aims to give the general principles of that law applicable to all parts of the United States, must necessarily fail in some degree, by reason of the great diversity of regulations and practice in the different States. However, the work in question is useful anywhere, and especially to a student. As regards the mechanical execution of the work the names of its publishers are a sufficient guarantee in this regard.

THE SOUTHERN LAW REVIEW. Volume II., Frank T. Reid, editor. Nashville, printed by Roberts & Purvis, 1873.—8vo., pp. xxvi., 740. Received from the Editor.

We have several times noticed the Review, as it appeared in quarterly numbers. We commend the enterprise which has induced Mr. Reid and the publishers to issue a law magazine so creditable to their section of country, and hope that the Review will have a long and prosperous existence. We believe it is the only law periodical, (saving the St. Louis Journal of Law), which is published anywhere in the South and as such it demands a little extra attention, by reason of the position which it seems to occupy. Among the contributors to its columns, are W. F. Cooper, R. McPhail Smith, E. H. East, W. J. Hicks, Edmund S. Mallory, and R. Hutchinson of Tennessee, Henry B. Tompkins, of Georgia, J. W. Brockenbrough and John W. Daniel, of Virginia, Jas. Wyatt Oates, of Alabama, and Wm. H. Jack, of Louisiana. The articles furnished by them are generally well written, and contain much valuable information upon the topics treated of. The digests of recent English and American decisions, the selection of cases in the Tennessee and other State courts and the book notices, which we presume are all the work of the editor, Mr. Reid, are fairly done, credit able alike to himself and the magazine which he edits. We do not like the feature of publishing the chart of a Collection Union, with each number, as it makes the Review look too much like an advertising medium, but perhaps it may be discontinued in the future. Altogether we think the Review an excellant institution, and we thank the editor, for sending us a bound copy of the second volume.

Fifty-fifth Annual Report of the Trustees of the New York State Library, Albany, 1873; The Trial, Confessions and Conviction of Jesse and Stephen Boone, for the murder of Russell Colvin, and the return of the man supposed to have been murdered; by Hon. Leonard Sargeant, Ex-Lieutenant Governor of Vt., 8vo., paper, pp. 48, Manchester, Vt. Journal Office, 1873.

We have also received the following, which we will notice at length in our next issue: Story on the Constitution, fourth edition, 2 vols., Little, Brown & Co., Boston; Rawle on Covenants for Title, fourth edition, same publishers; Angell and Ames on Corporations. Ninth edition, same publishers; Vol. 15 Wallace's U. S. Supreme Court Reports, W. H. & O. H. Morrison, Washington, D. C.; Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws, new edition, 2 vols., Robert Clark & Co., Cincinnati; Taylor's Medical Jurisprudence, 7th American edition, By Dr. John J. Reese, Henry C. Lea, Philadelphia; New York Revised Statutes, Part III.; and sundry pamphlets, reports of cases, advance sheets, &c.

Recent Decisions.

United States Supreme Court.

[Abstract of cases recently decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, and to appear in 16th Wallace.]

ABSENCE.

Under a code which enacts (as does the code of Iowa), that in case of the "absence" of the county judge the county clerk shall supply his place, the said judge is not, when, owing to his absence from the State the county clerk is acting as county judge in the county—holding a term of the county court there, issuing county warrants, and doing other business, in the county, in discharge of his duties as acting county judge—so wholly superseded in his office as that he may not, when beyond the limits of the county, do certain ministerial acts, as ex. gr., execute and issue bonds, whose purpose is to advance the concerns of the county; and for that purpose buy, at the place where he is, a new county seal; the code having authorized the county judge to procure one. Lynde v. The County, 6.

ACTION.

Where an incorporated company undertook to work in the streets of a city, agreeing that it would "protect all persons against damages by reason of excavations made by them in doing it, and to be responsible for all damages which may occur by reason of the neglect of their employees on the premises;" held, on the company's having let the work out to a sub-contractor, through the negligence of whose servants injury accrued to a person passing over a street, that an action lay against the company for damages. Water Company v. Ware, 566.

ADMINISTRATOR DE BONIS NON.

Cannot sue the former administrator or his representatives for a devastavit, or for delinquencies in office; nor can he maintain an action on the former administrator's bond for such cause. The former administrator, or his representatives, are liable directly to creditors and next of kin. The administrator de bonis non has to do only with the goods of the intestate unadministered. If any such remain in the hands of the discharged administrator or his representatives, in specie, he may sue for them either directly or on the bond. Beall v. New Mexico, 535.

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE.

A purchaser at judicial sale by an administrator, does not depend upon a return by the administrator making the sale. of what he has done. If the preliminary proceedings are correct, and he has the order of sale and the deed, this is sufficient for him. McNitt v. Turner, 353.

ADMIRALTY.

A statute of a State giving to the next of kin of a person, crossing upon one of its public highways with reasonable care and killed by a common carrier by means of steamboats, an action on the case for damages for the injury caused by the death of such person, does not interfere with the admiralty jurisdiction of the District Courts of the United States, as conferred by the Constitution and the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789; and this is so, even though no such remedy enforceable through the admiralty existed when the said act was passed, or has existed since. Steamboat Company v. Chase, 522.

ATTORNEY AT LAW.

The power of a State to prescribe the qualifications for admission to the bar of its own courts is unaffected by the 14th amendment of the Constitution, and this court cannot inquire into the reasonableness or propriety of the rules it may prescribe. Bradwell v. The State, 130.

Its refusal, therefore, to admit a woman to practice is not a subject for review here. Ib.

BAIL.

The "act of the law" which will discharge bail from an obligation to surrender their prisoner, must be one which renders the performance impossible, and must be a law operative in the State where the obligation was assumed, and obligatory in its effect upon her authorities. Taylor v. Tainter, 367.

The fact that there has been placed in the hands of the bail, by some one not the person arrested nor any one in his behalf, nor so far as the bail knew, with his knowledge, a sum of money equivalent to that for which the bail and himself were bound, has no effect, in a suit against the bail, on the rights of the parties. Ib.

BANKRUPT ACT.

A creditor has reasonable cause to believe his debtor "insolvent" in the sense of the, when such a state of facts is brought to his notice respecting the affairs and pecuniary condition of his debtor, as would lead a prudent business man to the conclusion that he, the debtor, is unable to meet his obligations as they mature in the ordinary course of business. Buchanan v. Smith, 277.

A debtor "suffers" or "procures" his property to be seized on execution, when, knowing himself to be insolvent, an admitted creditor who has brought suit against him—and who he knows will, unless he applies for the benefit of the, secure a preference over all other creditors—proceeds in the effort to get a judgment until one has been actually got by the perseverance of him the creditor and the default of him the debtor. Ib.

Such effort by the creditor to get a judgment, and such omission by the debtor to "invoke the protecting shield of the," in favor of all his creditors, is a fraud on the, and invalidates any judgments obtained. Ib.

The fact that the debtor, just before the judgments were recovered, may have made a general assignment which he meant for the benefit of all his creditors equally, does not change the case. Such assignment is a nullity. Ib.

The transfer by a debtor who is insolvent, of his property, or a considerable portion of it, to one creditor as a security for a pre-existing debt, without making any provision for an equal distribution of its proceeds to all his creditors, operates as a preference, and must be taken as prima facie evidence that a preference was intended, unless the transferee can show that the debtor was at the time ignorant of his insolvency, and that his affairs were such that he could reasonably expect to pay all his debts. Wager et al. v. Hall, 584.

Such a transfer, if made within four months before the filing by the party of a petition in bankruptcy, is void. Ib.

A sale by a retail country merchant, then insolvent, of his entire stock, suddenly, is a sale "not made in the usual and ordinary course" of his business; and, therefore, prima facie evidence of fraud, within the 35th section of the bankrupt law. Walbrun v. Babbitt, 577.

This presumption of fraud can be overcome only by proof on the part of the buyer that he pursued in good faith all reasonable means to find out the pecuniary condition of the vendor. Ib.

One purchasing in such a case from a vendee who he knows has used no such means, but on the contrary has bought under other suspicious circumstances, takes with full knowledge of the infirmity of the title. And as against either or both purchasers the assignee in bankruptcy may set the sale aside if made within six months before a decree in bankruptcy, even though a fair money consideration have been paid by each. Ib.

The District Courts, sitting in bankruptcy, have no jurisdiction to proceed by rule to take goods seized, before any act of bankruptcy by the lessees, for rent due by them in Louisiana, under "a writ of provisional seizure"—and then in the hands of the sheriff, and held by him as a pledge for the payment of rent due—out of his hands, and to deliver them to the assignee in bankruptcy to be disposed of under the orders of the bankrupt court; neither the sheriff nor the lessor having been parties to the proceedings in bankruptcy nor served with process to make them such. Marshall v. Knox, 551.

Where, under the 41st section of the bankrupt act of 1867, a trial by jury is had in the District Court in a case of application for involuntary bankruptcy, and exceptions are taken in the ordinary and proper way, to the rulings of the court on the subject of evidence and to its charge to the jury, a writ of error lies from the Circuit Court when the debt or damages claimed amount to more than $500; and if that court dismiss or declines to hear the matter, a mandamus will lie to compel it to proceed to final judgment. Insurance Company v. Comstock, 258.

Where the goods of a tenant, seized by a landlord for rent, before any act of bankruptcy, have been taken out of his hands and given to the assignee in bankruptcy, by an order of the District Court acting summarily and without jurisdiction, and sold by such assignee, the Circuit Court, having got possession of the case by bill filed by the lessor, to be regarded as one in an original proceeding, will proceed and decide the whole controversy. Marshall v. Knox, 551.

And where the seizure for rent has been made under a statute like that prevailing in Louisiana, and where the landlord's lien is a perfected one, in the nature of a pledge or execution, it will give the lessor the full value of the goods sold clear of all expenses, whether the assignee obtained that value or not (limited, of course, by the amount of rent which he is entitled to have paid to him), and also to all the taxable costs to which he has been put by the litigation. Damages may be more appropriately claimed at law. Ib.

BOND.

A bond regular on its face cannot be avoided even by sureties (the obligee not having had knowledge thereof) by the fact that they signed it on a condition that other persons were to execute it who did not execute it. Dair v. United States, 1.

BONUS.

A bonus is not a gift or gratuity, but a sum paid for services upon a consideration in addition to or in excess of that which would ordinarily be given. Kennicott v. The Supervisors, 453.

CHARTER.

An amendment to a charter treated as part of the charter, in a subsequent statute giving certain privileges "granted by the charter." Humphrey v. Pegues, 244.

COLLISION.

A steamer condemned for not changing her course when meeting a sailing vessel. The Commerce, 33.

A steamer condemned also for an accident while taking a tow around a dangerous point with a too long hawser. The Cayuga, 177.

Though a sailing vessel having the wind is prima facie bound to adopt such a course as will prevent collision with other sailing vessels not having it, it is still the duty of these last in an emergency to make their courses so as not to render it difficult for the vessel having the wind to do her duty by rendering it doubtful what movement she should make. The Mary Eveline, 384.

COMMERCIAL BROKERS

Who act wholly as buyers, not liable under the internal revenue act of July 13th, 1866, to the tax of one-twentieth of one per cent. on the amount of "sales" made by commercial brokers. The Collector v. Doswell & Co., 156.

COMMON CARRIERS.

When goods are delivered to a common carrier to be transported over his railroad to his depot in a place named, and there to be delivered to a second line of conveyance for transportation further on, the common law liability of common carriers remains on the first carrier until he has delivered the goods for transportation to the next one. His obligation, while the goods are in his depot, does not become that of a warehouseman. Railroad Company v. Manufacturing Company, 318.

Although a common carrier may limit his common law liability by special contract assented to by the consignor of the goods, an unsigned general notice printed on the back of a receipt does not amount to such a contract, though the receipt with such notice on it may have been taken by the consignor without dissent. Ib.

The court expresses itself against any further relaxation of the common law liability of common carriers. Ib.

CONFLICT OF JURISDICTION.

A Circuit Court, in a proper case in equity, may enjoin a State officer from executing a State law in conflict with the Constitution or a statute of the United States. Davis v. Gray, 208.

Where a ship, then at sea, registered in one State (Massachusetts), her owner's place of residence, was on his becoming insolvent passed under statutory law, by an act of the insolvent court of that State to his assignee in insolvency, and on arriving from sea entered the port of another State (New York), where she was immediately attached by one of the owner's creditors in that State, held that the ship while at sea was to be considered as a portion of the territory of Massachusetts, and that the assignee in insolvency under its laws had the prior right, Crapo v. Kelly, 610.

A State statute giving to a person's next of kin a right to sue the owners of a steamboat for the injury done them by killing their relation on the public highways of the State (the same being navigable waters of the United States), does not conflict with the admiralty jurisdiction as conferred on the Federal courts by the constitution and the judiciary act. Steamboat Company v. Chase, 522.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

A license tax by a city of one State, of a business carried on within the city, of an express company chartered by another State, which business so licensed included the making of contracts within the first named State for transportation beyond its limits, is not a tax on interstate commerce, and is constitutional. Osborne v. Mobile, 479.

The thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, and the first clause of the fourteenth amendment, explained and construed, and held not to forbid the grant by a State Legislature of an exclusive right of a power to have and maintain slaughter houses within a considerable district, including a large Southern city, for a limited time, the same being under proper regulations and obligations prescribed, the grant being one of a character, as the court considered, necessary and proper to effect a purpose which had in view the public good. The Slaughter House Cases, 36; see also Bradwell v. The State, 130.

An exemption from taxation granted by one legislative act to a railroad company, as an inducement to it to build its road, cannot by a subsequent one be taken away. Humphrey v. Pegues, 244.

The laws which exist at the time of the making of a contract, and in the place where it is made and to be performed, enter into and make part of it. This embraces those laws alike which affect its validity, construction, discharge and enforcement. The remedy or means of enforcing a contract is a part of that "obligation" of a contract which the Constitution protects against being impaired by any law passed by a State. And so, if a contract when made was valid under the constitution and laws of a State, as they had been previously expounded by its judicial tribunals, and as they were understood at the time, no subsequent action by the Legislature or the judiciary will be regarded by this court as establishing its invalidity. Walker v. Whitehead, 314; Olcott v. The Supervisors, 678.

The statute of February 15th, 1855, of West Virginia (Acts of 1855, p. 20), by which persons having at that time a right to have cases in attachment reheard under particular circumstances, were deprived, for past misconduct and without judicial trial, of such right, was unconstitutional and void. Pierce v. Carskadon, 234.

Construction, Rules of.

An act of Legislature authorizing a municipal corporation to lend its credit to a railroad company specified, and to "any other railroad company duly incorporated and organized for the purpose of constructing railroads," leading in a direction named, "and which in the opinion of Common Council are entitled to such aid from the city," authorizes the lending of the city credit to a railroad company thereafter duly incorporated and organized, as well as the lending of such credit to those in existence when the act was passed. James v. Milwaukee, 159.

Deposit.

The rule that where money has been deposited with a bank, the bank where the deposit is made becomes the owner of the money and consequently a debtor for the amount, and under obligation to pay on demand, not the identical money received, but a sum equal in legal value, does not apply where the thing deposited is not money, but a commodity, such as "Confederate notes," and it was agreed that the collections should be made in like notes. Planter's Bank v. Union Bank, 483.

Enrolment of Vessels.

A temporary enrolment, from year to year, in the port of one State, does so affect the permanent registry of a vessel in the port of another State in which the vessel belongs and has her home, as to subject her to taxation in ports away from the latter State. Morgan v. Parham, 472.

Equity.

Affirmative relief will not be granted in equity upon the ground of fraud unless it be made a distinct allegation in the bill. Voorhees v. Bonesteel and Wife, 16.

Nor will a trust alleged in a bill to exist, be considered as proved when every material allegation of the bill in that behalf is distinctly denied in the answer; and the proofs, instead of being sufficient to overcome the answer, afford satisfactory grounds for holding that there was no trust in the case. Ib.

An "agreement of record," though not made part of the record by the pleadings, received as evidence; the suit being one in equity and not at law. Burke v. Smith, 390.

In a bill to foreclose a mortgage given to secure negotiable railroad bonds, the bonds having been transferred to a bona fide holder for value, no further defences are allowed as against the mortgage than would be allowed were the action brought in a court of law on the bonds. Carpenter v. Longan, 271; Kennicott v. The Supervisors, 452.

Error.

A. brought suit on a policy on vessel and freight, for a total loss. The jury found the whole amount insured with interest and $5,000 besides for damages, and judgment was entered accordingly. Held, that the party could not recover damages beyond legal interest, and that there was error on the face of the record. Insurance Company v. Piaggio, 378.

Under the "act to further the administration of justice," of June 1st, 1872 (17 Stat. at Large, 197), a venire de novo is not required for such error, and the court can reverse the judgment and modify it by disallowing the $5,000, and remanding the case with directions to enter judgment for the residue found by the jury with interest; the case being one where all the facts were apparent in the record. Ib.

It is not error to charge that a party assured has no right to abandon, when the insurers have accepted the abandonment. Ib.

Nor to refuse to charge that an abandonment made through error, and so accepted, is void if not warranted by the policy, when no evidence had been given of error by either side. Ib.

A judgment will not be reversed for want of a charge requested when the record contains no sufficient information that the charge requested was material to the issues. Ib.

Nor because the court charges in a way which, though right in the abstract, may not be so in application when the record does not show that sufficient evidence had not been given to warrant the jury in passing on the question. Ib.

Where on an information in which the party proceeded against was entitled to a trial by jury, his answer has been stricken out, the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to permit the claimants to answer, and to award a venire. Garnharts v. United States, 162.

When on the undisputed parts of a case a verdict is clearly right, an appellate court will not reverse, because on some disputed points the charge may have been technically inaccurate. Walbrun v. Babbitt, 577.

Evidence.

Notices required by statute presumed to have been given by a probate judge, he having made a conveyance of land which could have been properly made only after such notices given. Cofield v. McClelland, 331.

Where improper evidence has been suffered by the court to get before the jury, it is afterwards, properly, withdrawn from them. Specht v. Howard, 564.

On a suit by the indorsee of a negotiable note which has no place of payment specified in it, against the indorser who relied on a confessedly defective demand on the maker, of payment; that is to say, on a fruitless effort at demand, in the place where the note was dated, but in which place the maker did not live, parol evidence that at the time when the note was drawn, it was agreed between the maker and the indorsee that it should be made payable in the place where the effort to demand payment had been made, and that this place of payment had been omitted by the mistake of the draughtsman—being evidence to vary or qualify the absolute terms of the written contract—would be improperly let in to the jury, and, if let in, would be properly withdrawn. In compliance with the desire of many prominent members of the Bar, the Publishers have endeavored to produce a handsome book, full and complete in its contents. Owing to the sale being limited to the Philadelphia Bar, to whom only it can be of use, and in consequence of the expense attending its publication, the price has been fixed at a figure that may seem apparently high,—but the Publishers, to reimburse themselves for the outlay they have been subject to, have been compelled to decline giving discounts to any one, so as to enable them to give the Bar the advantage of the lowest possible price for which the Book can be made.

The volume has been carefully compiled, and has also been revised by the Judges of the different Courts, and endorsed by Rules of the same. They therefore contain not only the latest, but also the only full publication of those rules, as they now stand on the minutes of the different Courts.

ISAAC S. EASTBURN AND HENRY HAINES v. ELIZABETH YARDLEY, EXECUTRIX, et al.

1. An execution creditor having levied upon the personal property of the debtor, by virtue of a fi. fa. issued on a judgment entered more than six months before the levy, and before a petition in bankruptcy is filed, can, upon the debtor filing his petition in bankruptcy, be restrained by injunction on a joint bill in equity of the bankrupt, and a creditor in the Circuit Court of the United States, from selling the personal property of the bankrupt previously levied upon, until an assignee in bankruptcy be chosen or appointed, the lien of the levy remaining.
2. Where an execution creditor has a two fold security on real estate, as well as personal property. An injunction will be issued to prevent a sacrifice by sale of the personal property of bankrupt, at least until an assignee in bankruptcy can be chosen or appointed, or for a sufficient time to enable the unsecured creditors to raise money to pay off or take an assignment of the judgment of the execution creditor, although the judgment was entered more than six months before the fi. fa. issued, and the petition in bankruptcy filed after levy made.

In this case Elizabeth Yardley, executrix of the last will and testament of Mahlon Yardley, deceased. Issued a fi. fa. out of the Court of Common Pleas of Bucks county, and levied upon the real and personal property of Isaac S. Eastburn, her debtor, a levy was made thereon by John M. Purdy, Esq., high sheriff of the county of Bucks, and bills put up November 15th, 1873, advertising the personal property for sale on the 22d day of November, 1873. On the 17th day of November, 1873, the said Isaac S. Eastburn, filed his petition in bankruptcy in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, and afterwards on the 20th day of November, 1873, a joint bill in equity was filed in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, by Isaac S. Eastburn, the then bankrupt, and Henry Haines an unsecured creditor, to the amount of $3000, praying (inter alia) that an injunction be issued to enjoin and restrain the execution creditor and sheriff from proceeding to sell the personal property of bankrupt, in order to prevent a sacrifice of the same, until an assignee in bankruptcy be chosen or appointed. November 21st, 1873, the case came on to be heard, and after hearing, injunction was granted.

Opinion by CADWALADER, J. Delivered November 21st, 1873.

The court as at present advised, does not see sufficient cause to order a temporary injunction except as to the personal effects levied upon. Nor as to those effects for any reason that should prevent them from being ultimately liable to the execution. But for as much as the execution creditor may have a two-fold security on real estate, as well as on the said personal effects, and the creditors in bankruptcy only a single security, to wit: on these effects, a brief period ought therefore to be allowed said creditors to pay the execution creditor and obtain a transfer of her judgment and execution, or to enable them to obtain such other equitable relief as may not impair her rights. Therefore the defendant Elizabeth Yardly, execution creditor, as aforesaid, is restrained until further direction from proceeding under the said execution as to the said personal effects, so, however, as not to impair any security under the levy thereon, which is to stand and avail her against the assignee and estate in bankruptcy as if this order had not been made.

Abram H. Jones, Esq., solicitor for complainants.

George Lear, Esq., solicitor for execution creditor and sheriff.

Court of Common Pleas.

EDDY et al. v. THE BOARD OF HEALTH.

The board of health of Philadelphia is not authorized to remove citizens from their houses, or close their houses up, except in cases of pestilence or contagious disease.

Motion to continue special injunction.

Opinion by PEIRCE, J. Delivered November 22d, 1873.

The plaintiff, Eddy, is the owner, and the other plaintiffs are tenants of the properties Nos. 629 and 631 Bainbridge street, in the city of Philadelphia. The board of health appointed a sanitary committee to inspect the district in which these properties are situate, who reported respecting these properties that the yards were to be cleansed, cellars cleaned, disinfected and closed; also, shanty or frame building in the rear to be thoroughly cleansed, vacated and closed. The board of health, therefore, gave notice to the tenants to remove therefrom or they would be forcibly ejected, and they ordered the said houses and premises to be at once closed. The power of the board of health to abate nuisances and the causes of them, and to enforce sanitary regulations, is very great, and the courts never interfere with the legitimate exercise of their power; but, on the contrary, excuse an exercise of the power in cases where there is great peril to the public health, even when the city of Philadelphia is responsible for damages for the unlawful exercise of their power, as is shown in the recent case of Gwinner v. The City of Philadelphia, vol. 5, page 332, Legal Gazette. But the exercise of a power which is clearly unlawful, and which has no great public necessity to excuse it, will be restrained by the courts, no matter how praiseworthy the motives may be which prompted it. The board of health, in view of the possible approach of cholera to our city last summer, took active and praiseworthy measures to guard the city against pestilence, and so far as relates to the lawful measures adopted by them for the removal of nuisances and all causes of disease, they have the hearty approval of all our citizens. When, however, they claim to remove citizens from their houses, and close up their houses, they must have either the sanction of law for it, or they must be justified by great public necessity, which demands such action, because there is no other way to avert the threatened peril—upon the same principle that buildings may be blown up to prevent the spread of a great conflagration.

This leads me to inquire into the law which would justify such action by the board of health. The powers conferred upon the board of health are statutory, and are to be found in the several acts of Assembly conferring those powers upon them. The constitutions of the United States and the State of Pennsylvania both provide that the people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers and possessions from unreasonable searches and seizures, and that no warrant to search any place, or to seize any person or thing, shall issue without describing them as nearly as may be, nor without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation. The cases in which the board of health may enter private dwellings and remove persons therefrom, or close them up, are confined exclusively to cases of pestilence or contagious disease, by virtue of the 15th, 22d and 23d sections of the act of 29th January, 1818. Their powers to remove nuisances are also well defined, and before they can enter upon occupied or enclosed property to search for nuisances they must obtain a warrant in the manner prescribed by the 27th section of the act of 1818. Kennedy v. Board of Health, 2 Barr, 366; Baugh v. Sheriff, 7 Philadelphia, 82; and then if the owners or occupiers of the premises, on due notice, shall refuse or neglect to remove the nuisances, the board of health shall remove them and charge the expense to the owner of the property. In the cases of the bone-boiling establishments in certain wards of the city, the board of health appears to be empowered by the act of 29th March, 1865, to enter the premises without warrant and abate the nuisance. In this case the power of the board of health was limited to the removal of the alleged nuisance, or cause of nuisance, and did not extend to the removal of the plaintiffs from the houses and closing them up, as there was no existence or allegation of existence of a pestilential disease there to warrant them in so doing. The affidavits of the plaintiffs also exhibit that they were doing what the law required them to do, viz.: removing, or had removed, the alleged nuisances from the premises at the time they were required by the board to remove from and close up their houses. The most that the board of health could do in such a case would be to remove or cause to be removed the nuisances complained of. The law looks with too jealous an eye upon the rights of every man to the peaceful possession of his house, his castle, the dwelling place of himself and family; to permit him to be ejected from it, except in a clear case of right. No such right or authority in law has been shown in this case.

Robert N. Willson, Esq., for defendants.

Under the 25th section of the judiciary act, where, on a suit in one State, between a sheriff of that State and an assignee in insolvency appointed by the court of another State, to determine whether the sheriff acting for an attaching creditor or the assignee, has the prior right to certain personal property attached, the higest court of the State where the suit was brought decides that the right was with the sheriff. (b) It has not jurisdiction—

Of an appeal on a libel in personam for a collision by the owners of a schooner against the owners of a sloop that had been sunk in the collision; where the decree was for but $1,292.84, and, therefore, "not exceeding the sum or value of $2,000." And this, although prior to the libel in personam, the owners of the sloop had filed in another district, a libel in rem against the schooner, laying their damages at $4,781.84, and that in the District and Circuit Courts below, both cases might have been heard as one; the cases never having, however, been brought into the same district or circuit, nor in any manner consolidated. Merrill v. Petty, 338.

Nor under the 25th section of the judiciary act, of a case where neither the record nor the opinion of the Supreme Court, which was in the record, shows any question before that court, except one relating to the interruption of a "prescription" (statute of limitations) set up as a defence, and the opinion shows that this question was decided exclusively upon the principles of the jurisprudence of the State. Marquese v. Bloom, 351.

Nor under that section, nor under the 2d section of the act of February 5th, 1867, amendatory of it, of a case dismissed by a State court for want of jurisdiction in such court. Smith v. Adsit, 185.

II. Of U. S. Circuit Courts.

Where a proceeding in a State court is merely incidental and auxiliary to an original action there—a graft upon it, and not an independent and separate litigation—it cannot be removed into the Federal courts under the act of 2d of March, 1867, authorizing under certain conditions the transfer of "suits" originating in the State courts. Bank v. Turnbull & Co., 190.

The Circuit Court may, under the second section of the Bankrupt Act, entertain on bill, as an original proceeding, a case involving a question of adverse interest in goods seized by the sheriff before any act of bankruptcy by the tenant, for rent due and held by him, the sheriff, as a pledge for the payment thereof, and claimed, on the other hand, by the assignees in bankruptcy of the tenant. Marshall v. Knox, 551.

Laches.

A court of equity will, apparently, not be moved to set aside a fraudulent transaction at the suit of one who has been quiescent during a term longer than that fixed by the statute of limitation, after he had knowledge of the fraud, or after he was put on inquiry with the means of knowledge accessible to him. Burke v. Smith, 401.

Landlord and Tenant.

Under the Civil Code of Louisiana, a lessor has a right to seize, for rent in arrears, goods on the premises, and until he is paid his rent, retain them as against an assignee in bankruptcy subsequently occurring. Marshall v. Knox, 552.

Legislative Act.

Though of a general sort, repealable by another though special. Railroad Co. v. County of Otoe, 667.

Life Insurance.

Walking, for a certain distance at the end of a journey, held, not to be traveling by either public or private conveyance, within the meaning of an accident policy of insurance on life while "traveling by public or private conveyance." Ripley v. Insurance Co., 336.

Married Woman.

Under the laws of New York, may manage her separate property, through the agency of her husband, without subjecting it to the claims of his creditors; and when he has no interest in the business, the application of a portion of the income to his support will not impair her title to the property. Voorhees v. Bonesteel and Wife, 16.

Monopoly.

What does and what does not constitute. The whole matter largely considered, and an exclusive grant by the State to a corporation created by it, to have and maintain slaughter houses within a considerable district, including a large Southern city, for a limited time, and under limitations as to price, and under obligations to provide ample conveniences for all persons, and with permission to all owners of stock to land, and of all butchers to kill their animals at those slaughter houses, held, not to be one, nor to be forbidden by the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, nor the first section of the fourteenth, but to be a police regulation within the powers of the State; as well since the adoption of the said thirteenth and fourteenth amendments of the Constitution as before. The Slaughter House Cases, 36.

Mortgage.

When held as security for the payment of negotiable paper, is not open as against bona fide holders of the paper for value, to defences to which the notes in their hands would not equally be open. Carpenter v. Longan, 271; Kennicott v. The Supervisors, 452.

Municipal Bonds.

The question whether a county shall borrow money for a particular purpose, and which question a statute required should be submitted to the voters of the county before the bonds of the county were issued, may be submitted by implication, as well as directly. Lynde v. The County, 6.

A submission implied in favor of bona fide holders of the instrument. Ib.

A power to issue county bonds carries with it a power to make them payable out of the State where the county is, and to sell them also out of the State. Ib.

As also to cancel bonds previously given to a contractor with the county, but not yet put by him on the market, and to issue new ones in a different form. Ib.

Unless restrained by a constitutional prohibition, the Legislature of a State may authorize a county to aid, by issuing its bonds and giving them as a donation, the construction of a road outside the county, and even outside the State, if the purpose of the road be to give to the county a connection with some other region which is desirable. Railroad Co. v. County of Otoe, 667.

Negotiable Paper.

The assignment of before maturity, raises the presumption of a want of notice of any defence to it; and this presumption stands till it is overcome by sufficient proof. Carpenter v. Longan, 271.

When a mortgage given at the same time with the execution of, and to secure payment of, is subsequently, but before the maturity of the paper, transferred bona fide for value, with it, the holder of the paper when obliged to resort to the mortgagee is unaffected by any equities arising between the mortgagor and mortgagee subsequently to the transfer, and of which he, the assignee, had no notice at the time it was made. He takes the mortgage as he did the paper. Ib.; and see Kennicott v. The Supervisors, 452.

Nudum Pactum.

A promise to pay in "Confederate notes" in consideration of the receipt of such notes and of drafts payable by them, is neither a nudum pactum nor an illegal contract. Planters' Bank v. Union Bank, 483.

Parties.

Where a State is concerned, it should be made a party if it can be so made. If it cannot be, the case may proceed to a decree against its officers. Davis v. Gray, 203.

Making an officer of the State a party does not make the State a party, though a law of the State may prompt the officer's action, and stand behind him as the real party in interest. To make a State a party the bill must be shaped with that view. Ib.

Where a minority of stockholders and bondholders of a railroad company seek to set aside as fraudulent, a sale made through the co-operation of the residue of the stockholders and bondholders with the trustees of a mortgage on the road, and an amicable foreclosure, a bill by the minority to set the sale aside as collusive, must make not only the purchaser a party but also the consenting stockholders and bondholders. Ripon v. Railroad Company, 446.

Patents, Assignments of, &c.

A patentee of certain machines, whose original patent had still between six and seven years to run, conveyed to another person the "right to make and use and to license to others the right to make and use four of the machines" in two States "during the remainder of the original term of the letters patent, provided, that the said grantee shall not in any way or form dispose of, sell, or grant any license to use the said machines beyond the said term." The patent having, towards the expiration of the original term, been extended for seven years, held, that an injunction by a grantee of the extended term would lay to restrain the use of the four machines, they being in use after the term of the original patent had expired. Mitchell v. Hawley, 544.

Practice, in U. S. Supreme Court.

This court cannot review a judgment given in the Circuit Court where, under the act of March 3d, 1865, that court has meant to act in the place of the jury, unless such court makes a special finding; that is to say, unless it states the ultimate facts of the case—i. e., the facts which it finds that the evidence has proved — in some way having the form of a special verdict. Dickenson v. The Planters' Bank, 250.

When on the undisputed parts of a case a verdict is clearly right, so that if a new venire were awarded the same verdict would have to be given, a court will not reverse because on some disputed points a charge may have been technically inaccurate. Walbrun v. Babbitt, 577.

A principal suit having been decided in one way, a proceeding by way of intervention, and involving the same question, of necessity follows it. Tweed's Case, 505.

Where a subordinate court, which had no jurisdiction in the case, has given judgment for the plaintiff or defendant, or improperly decreed affirmative relief to a claimant, an appellate court must reverse. It is not enough to dismiss the suit. United States, Lyon et al. v. Huckabee, 414.

Where after judgment for a certain sum a remittitur is entered as to part, the remittitur does not bind the party making it, if the judgment be vacated and set aside. Planters' Bank v. Union Bank, 483.

Where after judgment for a certain sum, execution is allowed, during a motion for a new trial, to issue for a part of the sum, which part is admitted to be due, this, though anomalous, is not a ground for reversal, where no objection appears to have been made, and where it may fairly be presumed that the defendant assented to what was done; and where a new trial being afterwards granted, it was limited to a trial as to the excess of the claim above the amount for which the execution was issued. Ib.

Presumptions.

Notices required by statute will be presumed to have been given by a probate judge, he having made a conveyance of land which could have been properly made only after such notices given. Cofield v. McClelland, 331.

Where a statute enacted that "in all cases where an intestate shall have been a non-resident, &c., but having property in the State, administration should be granted to the public administrator of the proper county, and to no one else." Held, that where a person to whom letters of administration on the estate of a non-resident applied, under the statute, to have a sale of his property, and the court, having jurisdiction of the subject, ordered the sale, it is not to be presumed that he was not the public administrator. McNitt v. Turner, 352.

Where jurisdiction has attached, whatever errors may occur subsequently in its exercise, the proceeding being coram judice, cannot be impeached collaterally except for fraud. Ib.

Where, on an information for breach of the internal revenue laws, the record shows that an answer of a claimant was striken out by the court, in a case in which he was entitled to a trial by jury, and judgment rendered against him as upon default, this court will not presume that the order was passed for good cause, unless enough is shown in the record to warrant such a conclusion. Garnhart v. United States, 162.

Public Lands.

The principle that lands sold by the United States may be taxed before the government has parted with the legal title by issuing a patent, is to be understood as applicable only to cases where the right to the patent is complete, and the equitable title fully vested without anything more to be paid or any act done going to the foundation of the right. Railway Company v. Prescott, 603.

Public Law.

On a question of conflict of jurisdiction between the courts of two States, a ship on the high seas is to be considered as part of the territory of the State where she is registered, and where her owners reside. Crapo v. Kelly, 610.

Public Policy.

Where an illegal contract has been executed by the parties themselves, and the illegal object has been accomplished, the money or thing which was the price of it, as ex. gr., "Confederate bonds," may be a legal consideration between the parties for a promise express or implied, and the court will not unravel the transaction to discover its origin. Planters' Bank v. Union Bank, 483.

RAILWAYS

Are public highways, and though undertaken by private corporations may, in certain cases, properly be aided by money raised by taxation, and given as a donation to assist the building of the road. Olcott v. The Supervisors, 678.

RECEIVERS IN CHANCERY.

The effect of these reports when affirmed by the court considered, and the doctrine declared that though they may have acted improperly and have deceived the court, yet when the rights of innocent third parties have intervened an injured party cannot vacate what has been done, but must seek his remedy against the receiver personally, or on his official bond. Koontz v. Northern Bank, 196.

Their office and duties stated, and a liberal interpretation given to them in aid of modern chancery jurisdiction. Davis v. Gray, 203.

RES JUDICATA.

Where in ejectment a special verdict has been found and judgment entered on it in the court below for the plaintiff, which judgment, in an appellate court, is set aside with directions to enter judgment for the defendant, the special verdict can not, on the plaintiff's bringing a second ejectment upon a subsequently acquired title, be used to establish a fact found in it, as ex. gr., the heirship of one of the parties under whom the plaintiff claimed. Smith v. McCool, 560.

SERVITUDE INVOLUNTARY.

Meaning of the term as used in the 13th amendment defined. Slaughter House Cases, 36.

SHIPS.

Are subjects, for the purposes of taxation, to the laws of the port where the vessel is regularly registered and belongs. The temporary enrolment of a vessel as a coaster in the port of another State does not give a right to such other State to tax her. Morgan v. Parham, 471.

TAXATION OF SHIPS.

The State in which is the home port of a vessel, that is to say, the port where she is regularly registered and nearest to which her owner, husband, or acting and managing owner usually resides, is the State which has dominion over her for the purposes of taxation. Morgan v. Parham, 471.

TRIAL BY JURY.

Presumptions as to the regularity of proceedings not indulged to deprive a person of. Garnharts v. United States, 162.

PENNSYLVANIA.

BROSS V. THE COMMONWEALTH.

1. The act of December 9th, 1783, does not authorize an appeal from an order of the Quarter Sessions, refusing to moderate or remit a forfeited recognizance.

2. An appeal is given only when the proceedings on a forfeited recognizance are in the Common Pleas.

3. A certiorari not specially allowed by one of the justices of the Supreme Court, under the 33d sect. of act of March 31st, 1860, will not remove an indictment, &c., in the Quarter Sessions.

UEBERROTH V. RIEGEL AND BROTHER.

1. An order was: "Please give the bearer, Henry Fink, the goods which he will select, not exceeding over five hundred and fifty dollars, on my account." Held, not to be an agreement or establishing a contract until assent was given for the delivery of the goods, and it did not require a stamp.

2. Goods having been delivered to Fink on the order, the drawer was liable as principal, not as guarantor.

3. That the goods were charged to Fink was evidence that they had been delivered to him primarily on his own responsibility, but not conclusive.

March 18th, 1872. Before THOMPSON, C. J., SHARSWOOD and WILLIAMS, JJ. AGNEW, J., at Nisi Prius.

LOWER MACUNGIE TOWNSHIP V. MERKHOFFER.

1. Miners had excavated into the side of a road, making a precipitous bank; no guard was put up; a wagoner in driving along the road broke the bank; his wagon and team fell over and were injured. Held, to be negligence by the supervisors for which the township was liable.

2. It was not a defence that the driver by careful driving could have avoided the accident.

3. A highway must be kept in such repair that skittish animals may be employed without risk.

March 18th, 1872. Before THOMPSON, C. J., SHARSWOOD and WILLIAMS, JJ. AGNEW, J., at Nisi Prius.

2. In tort only such damages can be recovered as arose out of the injury.

3. Barnett v. Reed, 1 P. F. Smith, 190, remarked on; Good v. Mylin, 8 Barr, 51, adopted.

HARTMAN V. SHAFFER.

1. A promissory note imports a valuable consideration.

2. In a suit on a note, the defence being want of consideration, without evidence to cast suspicion on the transaction, the pecuniary circumstances of the parties are irrelevant, and calculated to mislead.

3. The evidence in this case sufficient to submit to the jury the question of want of consideration of a note.

March 19th, 1872. Before THOMPSON, C. J., SHARSWOOD and WILLIAMS, JJ. AGNEW, J., at Nisi Prius.

BARRETT'S EXECUTOR'S APPEAL.

1. An assignee for the benefit of creditors, alleging that a judgment of a creditor had been discharged, obtained an issue to determine the fact; all proceedings to stay, &c.; the jury found for the creditor; a motion for a new trial was made and held under advisement till the assignee's account should be settled, which being done it was referred to an auditor. The creditor appeared before him claiming the full amount of his judgment, and insisting on his legal rights. The report of the auditor was referred back to him; the creditor appeared again protesting against evidence being heard against the judgment and claiming its allowance. Held, not to be a waiver of his right to have the facts decided in the issue.

2. The creditor was not bound to demand a new issue, one having been decided in his favor.

3. It seems that the assignee was precluded from a hearing before an auditor until the issue had been finally determined, and that the court below could not allow him to withdraw the issue without the consent of the creditor.

Appeal from the decree of the Court of of Common Pleas of Lehigh county: No. 319, to January Term, 1872.

METZGAR AND GERNERT'S APPEAL.

1. Where land is sold subject to purchase money and interest due a third person, it is a covenant by the vendee to pay such purchase money; it need not appear affirmatively that such encumbrance was payable out of the purchase money.

2. A father conveyed land to a son, subject to a widow's dower, and by his will directed that the annual interest should be paid to the widow out of his estate. This did not relieve the land from the payment of the principal.

March 22d, 1872. Before THOMPSON, C. J., SHARSWOOD and WILLIAMS, JJ. AGNEW, J., at Nisi Prius.

WEILER, ASSIGNEE OF SMITH V. COLEMAN et al.

1. Under the act of April 10th, 1862, for the protection of logs on the Susquehanna, evidence that the stamps were those of a plaintiff in replevin, regularly registered, is not essential to prove that the logs were his property.

2. That the plaintiff was engaged in lumbering on a tributary of the west branch of the Susquehanna, that the logs were stamped with his mark, that no other logs had been known to be so stamped, and no other person had ever claimed from the boom company logs so stamped, was presumptive evidence that the logs were his.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Lycoming county: No. 288, to January Term, 1871.

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD CO. V. THE TITUSVILLE AND PITHOLE PLANK ROAD CO.

1. Whatever an agent does or says in making a contract is evidence against the principal, being part of the contract.

2. The admissions of an agent not made at the time of the transaction but subsequently, are not evidence.

3. Plank to construct a plank road was delivered at a station of a railroad, to be transported to another station; the company did not transport it; if liable in damages the measure would be the difference of value of the plank at the first station and the station to which it was to be carried, deducting cost of transportation; provided such lumber could be obtained at the latter station, and that the carrier should compensate for the delay from his failure.

4. The increased expenses of putting down the plank in consequence of the delay is too remote.

5. The measure is compensation. Such damage as might reasonably have been anticipated and been within view of the parties.

6. Plaintiffs contracted for the purchase of plank and employed defendants to deliver it at a certain point, in an action for failure to deliver, evidence was admissible for the defence that portable mills could have been erected, plank manufactured and delivered at the point within the time and at the price plaintiffs were to pay under their contract.

7. It was the duty of the plaintiffs, when they were notified of the inability of the defendants to deliver the lumber, to adopt every feasible means to supply themselves.

8. Hough v. Doyle, 4 Rawle, 291, adopted.

ARDERY V. ROWLES ET AL.

1. By a parol a vendor agreed to sell 90 acres of land at $3.50 per acre, to begin on one line at a point named, "and go to the creek." Held, that the creek was the boundary, whether there would thus be more than ninety acres or not, and the vendor would have to pay for the actual content at $3.50 per acre.

2. Evidence in this case sufficient to establish a sale of land by parol.

March, 1872. Before THOMPSON, C. J., SHARSWOOD and WILLIAMS, JJ. AGNEW, J., at Nisi Prius.

"INTIMIDATING THE COURTS."

Several persons have put a construction upon our article of last week upon the new Constitution, that to us is rather surprising. They have mistaken a piece of sarcasm for an attempt "to intimidate the judges of our courts." Now, in all seriousness, lest these gentlemen may still labor under a false impression, we would say that we disclaim any such intention. In the first place we believe the judges of our courts have entirely to much good sense to allow themselves for a single moment to be intimidated by newspaper paragraphs, and in the next place we do now, as we have always done, earnestly deprecate any attempt, through the newspapers, or in any other manner whatever, to exercise an improper influence upon the judges. We have thought proper to allude to the subject in order that our motives might not be misconstrued.

We understand also that the city solicitor indignantly denies any intention on his part "to raise a conflict of jurisdiction between election officers," and states that his recent letter was merely indited in response to a request from the city commissioners for legal advice. As we do not wish to impugn any gentleman's motives, (we certainly did not intend to do so,) we hasten therefore to make the amende honorable to that gentleman.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF PENNSYLVANIA.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE ROOMS,
PHILADELPHIA, November, 18, 1873.

TO THE PEOPLE OF PENNSYLVANIA:

The convention assembled by your direction to reform the constitution of the State have finished the work which you gave them to do. In submitting it for your approval we invoke your careful consideration. That it is without fault we dare not affirm, but that it adds new and valuable securities to the rights of person and of property we confidently assert. The mode by which the members of the convention were elected secured a body of men who had neither the opportunity nor the inclination to mould the instrument in the interests of any party, or of any private interest whatever.

It would be maifestly inappropriate to attempt any detailed analysis of the proposed constitution, but it is proper that its leading features should be briefly indicated. It consists of eighteen articles, viz.: Article I. Bill of Rights. Article II. The Legislature. Article III. Legislation. Article IV. The Executive. Article V. The Judiciary. Article VI. Impeachment and Removal from Office. Article VII. Oaths of Office. Article VIII. Suffrage and Elections. Article IX. Taxation and Finance. Article X. Education. Article XI. Militia. Article XII. Public Officers. Article XIII. New Counties. Article XIV. County Officers. Article XV. Cities and City Charters. Article XVI. Private Corporations. Article XVII. Railroads and Canals. Article XVIII. Future Amendments.

To these is added the schedule, which embraces such temporary provisions as are necessary to regulate the changes which have been made, and to put the new constitution, if adopted, in effective operation. Under these heads are embraced all matters which were thought to be appropriate to constitutional provision. It has carefully avoided matters of detail, except in such particulars as it was supposed either from their great importance or the difficulty attending legislative enactment, might render legislation difficult or insufficient.

The committee desires to call attention to the following important particulars, in which the proposed constitution differs from that now in force.

The General Assembly will consist of fifty (50) senators, and such number of members of the House of Representatives as shall be determined by dividing the population of the State, as ascertained by the most recent United States census, by two hundred; but every county shall have at least one representative. Under this apportionment the House will consist of about two hundred members. This change is accompanied by such provisions as will for the most part avoid legislative apportionments, which experience has shown to be made usually in the interest of the dominant party and sometimes at the sacrifice of fair representation.

The regular sessions of the Legislature will be held only every other year, but the governor may, in an emergency, convene it in special session.

The increased number is not equal to the ratio of representation when the existing constitution was adopted, and was deemed important not only as maintaining a ratio of representation approximating to our increase of population, but because it was believed that an increase of members would render improper influences more difficult, and would ensure a more faithful exercise of legislative functions.

The article on legislation requires that every bill shall be read at length on three different days in each House, and no bill shall become a law unless passed by a majority of the members elected to each House; nor unless on its final passage the vote is taken by yeas and nays and the vote of each member entered on the journal. The Legislature is restrained from passing local or special laws upon a number of specified subjects, which it was thought could be much more appropriately embraced within general laws of uniform operation. Among the subjects upon which special laws are prohibited are: Laws regulating the affairs of counties, cities or townships, or prescribing the duties of their officers; changing the laws of descent or succession; granting divorces; regulating the practice or jurisdiction of courts, aldermen or justices of the peace; to change the methods of collecting debts or the lien of judgments; regulating official fees or remitting fines, penalties and forfeitures, or refunding moneys legally paid into the State treasury, or exempting property from taxation; or erecting corporations or granting special or exclusive privileges or immunities to corporations—all of which were fruitful sources of popular suspicion of legislative corruption, and all of which can be more efficiently and justly provided for by general laws, and some of which are peculiarly within the province of judicial determination, and ought not to be open to the shifting and uncertain action of the Legislature.

The Legislature is also restrained from limiting the amount to be recovered for injuries resulting in death, or for injuries to persons or property; or from exchanging or releasing any corporate obligation held by the State, except by payment of the money into the treasury. No local or special bill can be passed unless notice of the intention to apply therefor shall have been published in the locality where the thing to be affected may be situate, at least thirty days prior to the introduction of such bill, and evidence of such publication shall be exhibited to the Legislature before the act shall be passed.

To insure official fidelity, so far as possible, it is provided that any member of the General Assembly who shall solicit, demand or receive, or consent to receive, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value or appointment, or personal advantage, or promise thereof, for his vote or official influence; or for witholding the same, shall be held guilty of bribery, and be disqualified from holding any office or position of profit in the State; and the like punishment is provided for any person who shall influence, or attempt to influence, corruptly, any member of the General Assembly.

Some important changes have been made in the executive department. The governor shall hold his office for four years, but shall not be eligible for the next succeeding term; but this provision does not apply to the term of the present governor. A lieutenant governor shall be chosen at the same time and for the same term, who shall be president of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided, and shall exercise the office of governor in the event of the death or disability of that officer.

Executive appointments are to be made by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, who, in confirming or rejecting nominations, shall sit with open doors, and the vote be taken by yeas and nays and be entered on the journal.

The secretary of internal affairs will take the place of the surveyor general after his term expires, and will have charge of the land office; his department will also embrace a bureau of industrial statistics and such duties relating to corporations, to charitable institutions, the agricultural, manufacturing, mining, mineral, timber and other material interests of the State, as may be by law assigned thereto. The duties which will devolve upon this department, will be of great advantage to the State, in presenting such reliable and valuable information of our natural resources and rapid development as will attract to the State both population and capital.

This article also authorizes the governor to veto any one or more items of any bill making appropriations of money, and to approve the rest. This is to correct an abuse of great magnitude and long standing, by which appropriations introduced into the general bill providing for the expenses of the State, and which of themselves could not be sustained, must be approved, or leave the State without appropriation for its support. It is a most valuable provision. This article also prohibits the governor from granting pardons or commutations of sentence, except upon the recommendation in writing of the lieutenant governor, secretary of the commonwealth, attorney general, secretary of internal affairs, or any three of them, after full hearing, upon due public notice, and in open session; and such recommendation with the reasons therefor at length, shall be recorded and filed in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth.

The judiciary article requires the election of all judges, and continues the term of all present judges, until the expiration of their commissions. The number of judges of the Supreme Court is increased to seven, and judges of that court elected under this constitution, will be commissioned for twenty-one years, and are ineligible to re-election. All patronage by appointment or otherwise is taken from them, and no duties can be imposed upon them except such as are judicial.

Each county having a population of 40,000, is constituted a separate judicial district and entitled to elect a judge. The office of associate judge not learned in the law is abolished in counties forming separate districts, but associate judges in office, when this constitution is accepted, serve for their unexpired terms.

The increase of judges under this provision is not large, and the increased expense not great. While some additional duties imposed upon judges will render this provision of great convenience to the people, more especially of sparsely settled districts, it is to be observed that whilst the provision entitles any county having the requisite population to be constituted a separate judicial district, it does not require that there shall be, as has been erroneously stated, a judge for every 40,000 of population.

The Court of Nisi Prius is abolished, and no court of original jurisdiction, to be presided over by any judge of the Supreme Court, can be established. The great inconvenience to which the appellate business of the Supreme Court was subjected by reason of this court is well known, both to counsel and suitors.

To the end that the judicial system of the State should be harmonized, and the law and practice of the courts brought into unison throughout the commonwealth. District Courts have been abolished, and their jurisdiction merged in that of the Courts of Common Pleas; and their judges will become judges of the Courts of Common Pleas.

The Register's Court is abolished as being supernumerary and useless.

In counties wherein the population exceeds 150,000, the General Assembly shall and in any other county may, establish a separate Orphans' Court, and thereupon the jurisdiction of the Court of Common Pleas in Orphans' Court matters in such county shall cease. The judge of the Orphans' Court, assisted by the register, who will be ex officio clerk of such Orphans' Court, shall audit all accounts which require auditing, without expense to the parties.

In civil cases, the parties may, by agreement filed, dispense with trial by jury, and submit the case to the decision of the court, with right to writ in error, as in other cases.

Justices of the peace continue without any material change.

In Philadelphia the office of alderman is abolished, and, in lieu thereof, there shall be established for each 30,000 inhabitants one court, not of record, of police and civil causes, with jurisdiction not exceeding one hundred dollars. The magistrates are to hold office for five years, and to be elected by general ticket by the qualified voters at large. No voter shall vote for more than two-thirds of the number to be elected. They shall be compensated only by fixed salaries to be paid by said county, and all fines, fees, and penalties are to be paid into the county treasury. Under this system it is believed that competent and reliable aldermen, approved by official experience and integrity, will be retained, and only men of approved fitness will be elected, since the mode of election allows large discrimination in choice, which in so large a constituency will be freely exercised.

The sixth article subjects the governor and all other civil officers of the commonwealth to impeachment for misdemeanor in office, and subjects all appointed officers —other than judges of the courts of record and the superintendent of public instruction—to removal, at the pleasure of the power by which they shall have been appointed.

The seventh article requires senators and representatives, and all judicial, State and county officers, to take and subscribe the usual oath to support the constitution and discharge their duties of office with fidelity; and, in addition, that they have not knowingly violated any election laws of the commonwealth, or procured it to be done by others, and that they will not knowingly receive, directly or indirectly, any money or other valuable thing for the performance or non-performance of any act or duty pertaining to such office other than the compensation allowed by law; and provides that any one convicted of having sworn or affirmed falsely shall be guilty of perjury and forever disqualified for holding any office of trust or profit within this commonwealth.

The article on suffrage and election provides that the general elections shall be held annually on the Tuesday next following the first Monday of November, but the General Assembly may by law fix a different day, two-thirds of all the members of each House consenting thereto. Elections for city, ward, borough and township officers, will be held on the third Tuesday of February. In elections by the citizens, every ballot voted shall be numbered in the order in which it shall be received, and the number recorded on the list of voters opposite the name of the voter. Soldiers in service may vote under such regulations as may be prescribed by law. All laws regulating elections by the citizens shall be uniform throughout the State. Any person who shall give or promise, or offer to give to any elector, or any elector who shall receive any money or other valuable consideration for his vote, or for withholding his vote, shall forfeit his right to vote at such election, and if challenged for such cause, shall be required to swear or affirm that the matter of the challenge is untrue, before his vote shall be received. Any candidate for office guilty of bribery, fraud or wilful violation of any election law, is disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit in this commonwealth, and to be deprived of the right of suffrage for a term of four years.

The Court of Common Pleas of the several counties shall have power upon petition of five citizens, lawful voters of the district, to appoint two overseers of election to supervise the proceedings of the election officers, and to make report to the court, as may be required.

The trial of contested elections of electors of President and Vice President of the United States, members of the General Assembly, and all public officers, judicial, municipal or local, shall be by the courts, as may be prescribed by general law.

The article on taxation and finance requires that all taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects. All property shall be subject to taxation, but the General Assembly may, by general law, exempt public property used for public purposes actual places of religious worship, places of burial not held for private or corporate profit, and institutions of purely public charity.

Neither the State, nor any county, city, borough or township shall loan their credit or become stockholders in any company, association or corporation.

Municipal debts shall not exceed seven per cent. of the assessed value of its taxable property; but any city, the debt of which now exceeds seven per centum of such assessed valuation, may be authorized by law to increase the same three per centum; in the aggregate at any one time, upon such valuation.

The State sinking fund shall be maintained, and the debt reduced by not less than $250,000 per annum; and the money of the sinking fund shall not be invested or loaned upon the security of anything except the bonds of the United States or of this State.

The making of profit out of public money, or using it for any purpose not authorized by law, shall be a misdemeanor punishable by law—and part of the punishment shall be disqualification to hold office for a period not less than five years.

The tenth article requires the maintenance of an efficient system of public schools and an appropriation of one million of dollars each year for this purpose. It forbids the appropriation of any of the school fund to the support of any sectarian school, and renders women eligible to any office of control of the schools.

The eleventh article provides for the organization of the militia.

The twelfth forbids persons holding offices of profit under the United States from holding office of profit under the State, and disqualifies all persons who shall fight a duel, or send a challenge for that purpose, or be aider or abettor of a duel, from holding any office of honor or profit in this State.

The thirteenth article forbids the erection of any new county which shall reduce any county to less than four hundred square miles, or less than 20,000 inhabitants, or the erection of any county of less area or less population, nor shall any line thereof pass within ten miles of the county seat of any county proposed to be divided.

The fourteenth article provides for the election and qualification of county officers. In counties exceeding 150,000 inhabitants, all county officers shall be paid by fixed salaries, and all fees collected shall be paid into the county treasury. In the election of county commissioners in any county, each elector shall not vote for more than two persons, and the three persons having the highest number of votes shall be elected. This is to secure a representative of the minority party in every board of commissioners.

Under the fifteenth article, cities may be chartered whenever any town or borough of not less than 10,000 population shall vote in favor of it. They shall contract no debt except in pursuance of an appropriation previously made, and they shall create a sinking fund pledged for its payment.

By the article on private corporations, the State may, under its rights of eminent domain, take the property and franchise of incorporated companies and subject them to public use, the same as the property of individuals.

Foreign corporations are required to have a place of business and an authorized agent within the State upon whom process may be served. Corporations are confined expressly to the business authorized by their charters. Assessments of damages shall, on demand of either party, be determined by a jury. All fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness is forbidden.

Any association or corporation organized for the purpose, or any individual shall have the right to construct and maintain lines of telegraph within the State, and connect the same with other lines, subject to regulation by law.

The seventeenth article, on railroads and canals, provides for a free railroad law in the fullest and most explicit manner, and gives to every railroad company the right, with its road, to intersect, connect with, or cross any other railroad, and requires them to transport each the other's passengers, tonnage and cars loaded or empty without delay or discrimination. It requires them to maintain an office in the State, where transfers of stock are to be made, and where books shall be kept for inspection by parties in interest.

All persons shall have equal right of transportation, and no unreasonable discrimination shall be made in charges or in facilities for transportation, and persons and property shall be delivered at any station at charges not exceeding the charges for transportation of persons and property of the same class in the same direction to any more distant station.

Railroad companies are forbidden to consolidate with, or own, or control competing lines, or to engage in any other business than that of common carriers, or to own or acquire lands, except such as shall be necessary for carrying on its business; discriminations in charges by drawbacks or otherwise are forbidden. Free passes, except to officers and employees, shall not be issued.

Street passenger railroads shall not be constructed without the consent of local authorities.

The article on future amendments authorizes amendments to the constitution, when proposed by the act of two successive Legislatures and submitted to and approved by the people, but no amendment shall be submitted oftener than once in five years. When two or more amendments are submitted, they shall be voted upon separately.

The schedule provides that the constitution shall take effect on the first day of January, 1874. The first election for governor shall be in 1875, for a term of three years, and thereafter the term shall be four years. The lieutenant governor shall be elected in 1874, for four years. Provision is also made for the first election of senators and members, for judges and county officers and other matters of detail, but it is not deemed necessary to refer to them specifically.

This review of the proposed constitution gives a brief synopsis of its leading features, but it is not intended to supersede the examination of its full text. We confidently believe that the more carefully it is considered, and its dependent bearings understood, the more it will commend itself to public approval. It is the result of careful and impartial deliberation by the convention upon the true relations of the government to the people, and is submitted with full confidence that if adopted it will correct great abuses, ensure a more perfect system of popular elections, greater fidelity in the discharge of legislative and official duties, save vast sums of money to the treasury, reduce taxation and, by the additional securities it will afford to business investments, will insure to our State both population and capital. With hope and confidence that the new constitution will receive your approval, we submit it to your judgment.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE SPIRIT OF LAWS by M. De Secondat Baronde Montesquieu. Translated from the French, by Thomas Nugent, LL. D. A new edition, carefully revised and compared with the best Paris edition, to which are prefixed a memoir of the life and writings of the author and an analysis of the work by M. D'Alembert. 2 vols., 8vo., cloth, xlvii., 381., xii., 455, Cincinnati. Robert Clarke & Co., Publishers, 1873.

"This is Montesquieu's greatest work. It was the mature fruit of all his previous study, and the result of twenty years' labor. So great was its success that, in eighteen months after its first publication, it passed through twenty-two editions, and was translated into most of the European languages, and has ever since held a prominent place in the philosophy of jurisprudence and politics."

The work is so well known to the legal profession that a discussion of its merits would be almost superfluous. The interest which it still excites, the continual quotations from it that appear in the works of other writers. The regard which is still paid to it as an authority, all attest the high value of "Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws."

In regard to the copy now before us, we can say without the slightest hesitation that it is the most handsome, best printed, best gotten up edition of all those that we have ever seen, and we have seen a great many. We believe there has never yet been in the English language what might be called a respectable edition of this great work, and the want of one, has often been seriously felt by the profession. This one of Messrs. Clarke & Co., is everything that the reader can desire. The good taste and judgment displayed in the mechanical execution of the book, reflect credit upon the firm named, and we have no doubt that before many months, this new edition of Montesquieu will be the one preferred by every American and English lawyer. We have been induced to bestow praise, more than is our wont, upon this publication, but it is such a beautiful piece of work that we cannot help it. The low price at which it is published, viz.: $600 for both volumes, is another inducement to purchase it. We hope that it will meet with an extensive sale. Certainly the wonderful activity and enterprise of our western publishers, will be appreciated.

VICK'S FLORAL GUIDE for 1874. Published quarterly by James Vick, Rochester, New York.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE FOR 1874.

The fact is becoming generally recognized that Littell's Living Age affords the best and, all things considered, the cheapest means of keeping well informed in the most valuable current literature; the productions of the best writers in science, fiction, poetry, history, biography, politics, theology, philosophy, criticism and art.

The extra inducements to subscribers for the ensuing year are worth noticing. The amount of the best current literature of the world, thus offered, certainly cannot otherwise be obtained so economically.

The highest critical authorities pronounce The Living Age the "best of all the eclectics," presenting, as it does, with freshness and thoroughness, what is essential to American readers in a great and indispensable literature. In the multiplicity of quarterlies, monthlies and weeklies, all of which it represents with a satisfying completeness not elsewhere attempted, it has become almost a necessity to every person or family of intelligence and taste, and especially so to those who must limit the number of their periodicals, The prospectus should not be overlooked by our readers in making their selections of periodicals for the new year.

COE v. VOGDES.

1. A surety became bound for a tenant's performance of a contract of lease for one year, the rent payable monthly, and if tenant continued after the term, the contract to continue for another year. Held, if the tenant held over the year, the sureties were responsible for the subsequent rent.

2. That the premises were in an untenantable condition was no defence to the surety, the tenant having continued in possession.

3. The surety being informed by the landlord that the tenant was in arrears, gave him notice that he would not be further liable: the tenant paid the arrears to that time; this did not discharge the surety from the subsequent rent

4. A mere notice by surety that he would not be liable was no defence; he could not dissolve the contract at his pleasure.

Certificate from Nisi Prius: No. 33, to January Term, 1871.

BARBER v. RODGERS.

1. B., arrested under act of July 14th, 1842, gave bond to apply to be discharged as an insolvent: he appeared and the hearing was continued from time to time, and whilst pending he was adjudged a bankrupt in United States court. Held, that the condition of his bond was discharged, and the sureties released.

2. The adjudication suspended the operation of the State insolvent laws.

3. Lex neminem cogit ad vana seu inutilia, applied.

March, 1872. Before THOMPSON, C. J., SHARSWOOD and WILLIAMS, JJ. AGNEW, J., at Nisi Prius.

MCCLINTOCK'S APPEAL. STRAWBRIDGE'S ESTATE.

1. S. conveyed land to M. "reserving timber for his own use and advantage: in case M. should want to clear the land, the owner of the timber to take it off by being notified thirty days previous." Held, that the timber was personal property.

2. In reservations of growing timber, whether it be personalty or realty depends on the nature of the contract and the intent of the parties.

3. If an immediate severance is not contemplated, such reservation is an interest in land; if an immediate severance is in view, it is personalty.

4. Costs of an audit charged to the accountant under the circumstances in this case.

5. Pattison's Appeal, 11 P. F. Smith, 294, distinguished and approved.

GRAY v. HENDERSON ET AL.

1. A testator directed his land to be sold as soon as "the times will warrant, either publicly or privately, so as to make the best of it; should it be thought best by my executors to divide it into small lots and sell at public sale, my will is after the lots are tried at public sale * * * the whole property be set up together and the sale made in the best manner." He appointed three executors. By a codicil reciting the distant location of his executors, and difficulty of attention by them, he appointed M. "my acting executor * * * desiring him if convenient to consult the above executors in the sale of the real estate." Held, that a power of sale was expressly conferred on the executors.

2. By the act of February 24th, 1834, sect. 12, it is enough if in any part of the will the intention be expressed to confer a power of sale on executors.

3. The power is implied when the distribution and management of the fund arising from a sale is expressly confided to the executor, or when it is confounded by the testator in one common fund with the personalty, although there be no express direction to the executor to distribute it.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Clinton county: No. 6, to January Term, 1872.

MORELAND TOWNSHIP v. DAVIDSON TOWNSHIP.

1. Under the act of March 16th, 1868, nothing is brought up by writs of error to orders for removal of paupers, but such matters of law and fact as have been excepted to in the court below.

2. Where one who is not a relation and not an object of charity, but able to earn wages, is employed in the service of another for any period of time, the law implies a contract of hiring and a promise to pay.

3. A pauper resided with her father in Davidson township; she left home and hired in Benton township; during many years afterwards she lived in different places without hiring or wages, and was afterwards living with friends in Moreland township, where she became a poor charge: she was taken thence to Davidson, and by an order of removal taken to Moreland. On appeal from this order, Held, that as between Moreland and Davidson, Moreland was liable for her support.

Error to the Court of Quarter Sessions of Sullivan county: No. 153, to January Term, 1872.

COMMONWEALTH EX REL. WINPENNY v. BUNN.

1. A register cannot at discretion dispose of every matter arising in the performance of his function, if objected to by a competent party.

2. Under the 25th sect. of act of March 15th, 1832, where objections are made to probate of a will, and no precept directed to the Common Pleas, or to granting administration, or a question of kindred or "other disputable or difficult matter comes into controversy," the register at the request of a person interested shall proceed no further, but call a Register's Court.

3. Sect. 13 of same act is designed for a caveat, and where a question of fact arises, the register has a discretion as to directing a precept for an issue to the Common Pleas.

4. The duty of the register under the 25th section is enforceable by mandamus.

5. Where there is nothing "disputable or difficult," the court would not interfere upon the refusal of the register.

6. On a question before the register as to the signature to a will, papers in the possession of the executor offering the will were called for and refused; the register not having power to compel the production, the party opposing the will asked him to appoint a Register's Court. Held, that this was a "disputable and difficult matter," the register was bound to appoint a Register's Court, and on refusal was compellable by mandamus.

7. In such matter the act of the register was ministerial: mandamus lies to enforce ministerial acts although to be performed by a judicial officer.

8. A register has no power to compel the attendance of witnesses other than those capable of proving the will: or to compel the production of any paper except the will itself,

9. The acts of a register are judicial where, without objections probate, of a will has been made or administration granted; these cannot be impeached collaterally: the remedy is by appeal.

10. Cozzens' Will, 11 P. F. Smith 196, adopted.

March, 1872. Before THOMPSON, C. J., SHARSWOOD and WILLIAMS, JJ. AGNEW, J., at Nisi Prius.

KELLER v. STOLTZ,

1. Keller declared in a case against Stoltz for backing water on him by erection of a dam on Keller's land, and asked the court to charge that Stoltz had no right to change the location of the dam on the plaintiff's land; the court answered, that the mere change of the dam was not an abandonment of the right to use the location for the purposes of his right; the important inquiry was, did the change increase the flow of water on plaintiff's land or cause new injury? Held, not to be a correct answer.

2. If changing the location was wrongful, it was a direct injury, and Keller's remedy was in trespass.

3. In case, the only question was whether the dam had produced the consequential damage declared on.

March 26th, 1872. Before THOMPSON C. J., SHARSWOOD and WILLIAMS, JJ. AGNEW, J., at Nisi Prius.

BARTHOLOMEW'S APPEAL.

1. In partition in the Orphans' Court at the return of the commissioners, all the heirs but two appeared; the land was offered to those appearing successively; one in open court offered $4 above the valuation, that being the highest bid; on a rule granted, those then absent afterwards appeared, and one offered $8 above the valuation; the heir who had offered $4 then offered $8.01, and the land was adjudged to her: Held, to be error, it should have been adjudged to the heir offering $8.

2. In "all cases of partition in any court," a party having made one bid is not entitled to another.

3. The bid of a party should be made in writing.

4. It is irregular when part only of the heirs are present at the return of an inquest to offer the land to them; a rule should be granted on all to come in before offering to any.

5. Klohs v. Reifsnyder, 11 P. F. Smith, 240, adopted.

March 19th, 1872. Before THOMPSON, C. J., SHARSWOOD and WILLIAMS, JJ. AGNEW, J., at Nisi Prius.

Appeal from the Orphans' Court of Northampton county: No. 193, to January Term, 1872.

KELLER v. COMMONWEALTH.

1. The local act (Lancaster and other counties) of February 27th, 1867, was repealed by the general act of April 13th, 1867 (Desertion), so far at least as the provisions are inconsistent.

2. The act of April 15th, 1869, was intended as a supplement to the act of April 13th, 1867, although entitled a supplement to the act of February; it did not revive the latter act.

3. A resident of one county is amenable to the Quarter Sessions of another in which the charge of desertion is made.

4. Complaints of desertion and decrees in favor of defendant in the Lancaster county sessions in 1867 were not a bar to a complaint in Berks county in 1871.

5. A grandfather sued a father in Lancaster county for maintenance of his children, and obtained an award which was appealed from. This was no bar to proceedings against the father on complaint of the grandfather in the sessions of Berks, for desertion and maintenance of the children.

6. On complaint by a grandfather against the father for desertion and maintenance, a decree could not be made against the defendant in favor of the complainant for a sum of money for past maintenance; the complainant's remedy for that was by action.

7. A defendant willing to take his children and maintain them is entitled to their custody, and should not be compelled to pay another for their support.

8. Demott v. Commonwealth, 14 P. F. Smith, 305, adopted.

March, 1872. Before THOMPSON, C. J., SHARSWOOD and WILLIAMS, JJ. AGNEW, J., at Nisi Prius.

NYMAN'S APPEAL. FICKES' APPEAL.

1. A sheriff returned to an execution, that "at the time of the levy, the defendant demanded" the $300 exemption "out of the real estate which consists of one tract and cannot be divided, and he claimed that amount out of the proceeds when sold." The sheriff also testified that there was no appraisement. Held, that the defendant was not entitled to the $300.

2. Mark's Appeal, 10 Casey, 36, followed.

3. Fickes sold land to Harman, and entered a judgment April 6th, 1861, for purchase money. Harman, March 14th, 1866, sold to Heagy, who then went into possession, and on the 6th of April, at 8 A. M., executed a deed to Heagy: on the same day at 12 M., Fickes entered judgment of revival on his purchase money judgment by amicable sci. fa., against Harman alone. Heagy being a witness to the agreement for the sci. fa, judgments were afterwards entered against Heagy. Held, 1. That the judgments took precedence of Fickes'. 2. Heagy's witnessing the agreement did not make him a party to the sci. fa.

BROUGH'S ESTATE. APPEAL OF GROVES ET AL.

1. Brough being indebted to Hinchman, gave him his own note with endorsers, and the note of Gabley as collateral security; they were discounted and the proceeds passed to Brough's credit. Brough afterwards assigned for the benefit of creditors; the notes were not paid at maturity, afterwards payments were made by the endorsers. In the distribution of Brough's estate, Held, that Hinchman was entitled to a dividend on the amount due at the date of the assignment irrespective of the notes.

2. The endorsers were not entitled to a dividend on the amount of the accomodation note, until Hinchman should be fully paid.

3. By the assignment Hinchman became the equitable owner of the assigned estate, which could not be diminished by the payment of the collaterals.

4. Hinchman had the right to exhaust both Brough's estate and the collaterals in payment of his debt.

5. The endorsers had no equity until Hinchman should be paid, when if any of the assigned estate remained, they would be subrogated to his rights,

BELL'S APPEAL. MUSSLEMAN'S ESTATE.

1. A testator ordered his land to be sold, but named no one to execute the power. The executor sold without authority from the Orphans' Court. Held, that the Orphans' Court had jurisdiction under the 12th section of act of February 24th, 1834, to compel specific performance by the vendee.

2. By the authority to control and direct sales under such powers in a will, the Orphans' Court has power to set aside or enforce a sale, as the court may deem will best serve the interests of the estate.

3. Specific execution enforced in this case against a vendee in favor of an executor not empowered by a will to sell.

2. Evidence of a usage of trade is competent in construing the terms of a contract.

3. A policy in a mutual insurance company was assignable by its terms; its charter provided in case of alienation of the property insured, the policy should be void. Held, that an alienee of the property to whom the policy had been assigned, could not recover on the ground of want of knowledge of the provision.

4. The original party insured was bound to know the provision, and his assignee had no higher right.

DELLINGER'S APPEAL.

1. A husband, about 1825, received his wife's share of her father's estate; there was evidence before the auditor that frequently until his death in 1869, he declared he held the money for her children to be paid after his death. The auditor found that he held the money in trust for the children; the Orphans' Court confirmed the report. There being no "plain mistake" in the finding, Held, that the Supreme Court must accept the trust as the auditor found.

2. The husband of one of the children and the wife of the other were competent witnesses for them.

3. The exception in act of April 15th, 1869, does not embrace husband and wife testifying for each other.

2. A husband conveyed land to his wife; a judgment afterwards recovered against him was purchased by a third person before the deed was recorded; there being no fraud in the conveyance. Held, that her title would prevail against the judgment.

3. Not recording her deed was not such laches as would estop her against a judgment creditor of the husband.

PITTSB'H, VIRGINIA & CHARLESTON R. W. CO. v. ROSE.

On appeal from report of viewers appointed to assess damages under general railroad law, February 19th, 1859, P. L. 83, Held:

1. That the decrease in the rental value of the property, or the impossibility of procuring constant tenants, arising from the inconveniences to which such tenants are subjected by reasons of the construction of the railroad, are proper elements to be submitted to the consideration of the jury.
2. The true test of the value of property is the opinion of witnesses in view of the location, productiveness, and the general selling price in that neighborhood. Market value depends on the judgment of the community.
3. The plan of borough of Birmingham was not evidence that the house of defendant in error was or was not on line of street.
4. The jury may take into consideration ties of the road and the ballasting and filling in between the same, as being part of excavation.
5. If defendant in error had built his house over line of street, he was not precluded from recovering damages for so much as was not on street.
6. Improvements proposed by railroad unconnected with finishing road, not a matter to be considered in determining damages.
7. The burthen of proof on railroads to show that there is no change in grade of street by reason of construction of road, in order to prevent recovery for excavation.—21 P. L. J. 50.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Allegheny County.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered November 10th, 1873.

In the court below this was an appeal from a report of viewers appointed upon the petition of August Rose, to assess the damages to his property arising from the construction of their railroad by the plaintiffs in error. The road did not take any part of the petitioner's land, but was constructed along a public road or street in the (then) borough of Birmingham. The provision of the tenth section of the general railroad law, act of February 19th, 1849, Pamph. L. 83, which relates to this controversy, is, "that whenever any company shall locate its road in and upon any street or alley in any city or borough, ample compensation shall be made to the owners of lots fronting upon such street or alley, for any damages they may sustain by reason of any excavation or embankment made in the construction of such road, to be ascertained as other damages are authorized to be ascertained by this act." That such an embankment was made directly in front of the petitioner's property, is not a fact in dispute, and the jury were confined by the learned judge below to the damages sustained in consequence of such embankment, a ruling which could not be a subject of complaint upon this writ of error. We will proceed to consider the several errors which have been assigned.

The first assignment is to the admission of the learned judge of evidence to show, that since the construction of the road there had been difficulty in renting the plaintiff's property, and that for a portion of the time it had remained uninhabited, it being impossible to procure tenants for the same. The objection raised to this offer was that it tended to the allowance of consequential damages, and because the only true measure of damages in law is the difference between the market value of the property before and after the location of the railroad, and this without reference to the purpose to which the property was applied before the building of the railroad, or the intention of its owners as to its future enjoyment. A further objection was made because the plaintiff was not in law entitled to damages resulting from any excavations or embankments which did not change the established grade of the street, and no offer was made to show that the street in question had any established grade. These objections were overruled by the learned judge and the testimony admitted. In this we think there was no error. Admitting the rule for the measure of damages, as stated, to be the correct one, there are many different ways by which the market value of property may be ascertained. It may be by the opinion of witnesses derived from actual sales in the neighborhood, but this certainly is not the only way. There may be few or no such actual sales before and after the alleged injury upon which to found such opinion. Surely the decrease in the rental of the property, or the impossibility of procuring constant tenants, arising from the inconveniences to which such tenants are subjected from the injury complained of, is an element in determining the difference in the value, very proper to be submitted to the consideration of the jury. How far it had resulted from the embankment, and how far from the other inconveniences caused by the construction of the road, excluded from the consideration of the jury in this case, was to be determined by them under the instruction of the court. The same objection would lie to direct evidence of the difference in market value. It was clearly not necessary for the plaintiff to show an established grade. It would follow that if a plaintiff had built his house upon a street which the borough had neglected or refused to grade, that he could recover no damages. It was for the defendants to show that there was an established grade, to which their road conformed, if the fact was so.

The second assignment of error is to the refusal of the learned judge to affirm the third point submitted by the defendants below. There was no error in this refusal. It asked the judge to charge, that in arriving at the value of plaintiff's property the jury are to inquire simply what the property would sell for at a fair open sale in the market, without reference to its being used for any particular purpose, and that the best evidence of market value is the price actually paid for land in that neighborhood, making due allowance for difference in position and improvement. Passing by the question whether the use to which a property has been applied, when that use is prevented or injured by the embankment, might not properly be considered, it is clear that the judge could not be required to instruct the jury that a sale of land in the neighborhood is the best evidence of market value. The selling price of land in the neighborhood is undoubtedly a test of the value. Searle v. Lackawanna & Bloomsburgh Railroad Company, 9 Casey, 57; East Pennsylvania Railroad Company v. Hiester, 4 Wright, 53. But that is very different from the price paid for any particular property or properties. The true test is the opinion of witnesses in view of location productiveness and the general selling price in the vicinity. Market value depends upon the judgment of the community, and a consideration of particular sales would lead to collateral issues as numerous as the sales.

The third and fourth assignments may be disposed of together. When the plan of the borough of Birmingham was first offered it was rejected by the learned judge, but this error, if it was one, was corrected, and the plan subsequently admitted. It is complained that the admission was restricted to the purpose of showing where the south line of Manor street is and was when the plan was made. It is not easy to perceive for what other purpose it was competent. Whether the plaintiff's property was on or over the line, the plan was incompetent to show. That must be made out by other testimony. There was nothing in this ruling to prevent the defendants from offering such other testimony.

The fifth assignment is that the court affirmed the fourth point of the plaintiff below—that the jury might take into consideration the ties used by the defendants in the construction of their railway in front of the plaintiff's property, and the ballasting or filling in between the same. There was clearly no error in affirming this point. The ties and filling in were surely a part of the embankment, the height of which was just that much increased by them.

Nor was there any error in affirming the plaintiff's sixth point, as complained of in the sixth assignment. What the railway company might propose thereafter to do in the way of improvements, unconnected with the finishing of their railway, was clearly not a matter to be considered in determining the damages. The embankment was made and the railway finished. The company might or might not, according to their pleasure, carry out their proposed improvements, and if the damages were reduced on account of them, and the company should afterwards fail to carry them out, it is manifest that the plaintiff would be remediless.

As to the seventh assignment, it cannot be contended, and has not been here, that the plaintiffs in error were entitled to an affirmance of their fifth point as it was presented. Had the learned judge simply refused to affirm it, no question could have been made about it. The plaintiff by having built his house over the line of the street did not thereby forfeit all claim to recover damages. All that could be claimed was that he was precluded from damages to so much of his building as had encroached upon the public highway. "The true rule," said the court, "is to estimate the damages to the property, houses and lots, taking and considering the houses to be on the proper line of the street." It is impossible that any reasonable jury could have construed this to be an instruction that in point of fact the houses were on the proper line. The main part of the evidence admitted and heard was as to the question of fact, what was the proper line of the street, and whether the houses were over it. The instruction, therefore, evidently was, if you believe that the houses did encroach upon the street, do not, as the defendants' point has stated, allow the plaintiff no damages at all, but only such as he would suffer if his houses were on the proper line.

The eighth assignment of error is in refusing to affirm the sixth point of the defendant below, that the map of Remington was conclusive of the line, and if the jury believed that the plaintiff's houses encroached on Manor street, as defined by said map, the plaintiff could not recover any damages for injuries resulting to houses built on the street. Without inquiring whether the map in question was such an official plan as was sufficient to fix conclusively the line of the street as between the plaintiff and defendants, it is manifest that the point was too broad, as it did not distinguish between so much of the houses as encroached on the street, and so much as were within its line. A house is built on a street when it is built on the line of it, in common as well as legal language. There was no error, therefore, in this refusal.

Judgment affirmed.

WEIR v. KIRK.

1. There are many kinds of business, useful and even necessary in every community, especially where manufacturing is carried on on a large scale, which certainly are not nuisances in themselves, but which nevertheless become so in view of the circumstances of the neighborhood in which it is proposed to establish them.
2. There is a very marked distinction to be observed in reason and equity between the case of a business long established in a particular locality, which has become a nuisance from the growth of population and the erection of dwellings in close proximity to it, and that of a new erection threatened in such a vicinity.
3. As a city extends, nuisances should be removed to the vacant ground beyond the immediate neighborhood of the residences of the citizens.
4. The Legislature has recognized that the storing of gun powder in large quantities in thickly settled places is a nuisance to be guarded against by public authority.
5. The circumstances of the neighborhood in which it is proposed to establish the powder magazine in question are such as to entitle complainants to the injunction prayed in their bill.—P. L. J.

This was a bill in equity praying for an injunction to restrain the defendant from erecting and maintaining a powder house or magazine in Indiana township, Alleghany county, Pa., on the line of the Sharpsburgh and Kittanning turnpike road, about half a mile north of the borough of Sharpsburg, and near the residences of the complainants. The answer admitted the fact that he was engaged in erecting the powder magazine, &c., but denied that there was any reason to apprehend danger to persons or property from an explosion. Charles S. Fetterman, Esq., who was appointed master, submitted the following as his conclusions, viz.:

First. "That the magazine in controversy, if erected and maintained, will not be a common nuisance.

"Second. That the complainants have failed to show, by any means whatever, any grounds upon which to base any reasonable apprehension of danger to themselves, their families and property from the present location of the magazine in controversy, or that they have sustained any real, actual damage to or depreciation in their property; or that there is any reasonable apprehension of an explosion of the magazine while being used with reasonable care for the purpose for which it is intended."

John Barton, A. M. Brown, S. Schoyer, Jr., for appellants, cited Rhodes v. Dunbar, 7 P. F. S. 290, and claimed the rule to be that a powder magazine is a nuisance whenever it is so located as to cause injury to persons and property in case of an explosion.

George Shiras, Jr., J. W. Kirker, Thomas M. Marshall, for appellee, cited The People v. Sands, 1 Johnson, 78; Carpenter v. Cummings, 2 Phila. Rep. 74; Rhodes v. Dunbar, p. 214; Richard's Appeal, 7 P. F. S. 105; Huckenstein's Appeal, 20 P. F. S. 102.

Appeal from the decree of the Court of Common Pleas of Alleghany county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered October 20th, 1873.

The great difficulty in all cases of this character is not in the ascertainment of the true rule of equity, but in the application of that rule to the facts. While it may be easy to draw the line between what is and what is not a nuisance, which equity ought to enjoin, it is by no means so easy to determine whether the circumstances of any particular case ought to place it on one side or the other of that line. It is rare that any number of men will be found to agree in their judgment upon such a question. One remark, however, may be hazarded, as preliminary to a brief consideration of the circumstances of this case, in which I think all will agree. There are many kinds of business, useful and even necessary, in every large community, especially where manufacturing is carried on on a large scale, which certainly are not nuisances in themselves, but which nevertheless become so in view of the circumstances of the neighborhood in which it is proposed to establish them. The present chief justice in his opinion at Nisi Prius in Rhodes v. Dunbar, 7 P. F. Smith, 275, enumerates twenty-nine kinds of such useful establishments which have been declared public nuisances. There is a very marked distinction to be observed in reason and equity between the case of a business long established in a particular locality, which has become a nuisance from the growth of population and the erection of dwellings in proximity to it, and that of a new erection threatened in such a vicinity. Carrying on an offensive trade for any number of years in a place remote from buildings and public roads, does not entitle the owner to continue it in the same place after houses have been built and roads laid out in the neighborhood, to the occupants of which and travellers upon which it is a nuisance. As the city extends, such nuisances should be removed to the vacant grounds beyond the immediate neighborhood of the residences of the citizens. This, public policy, as well as the health and comfort of the population of the city, demand. 7 P. F. Smith, 275. It certainly ought to be a much clearer case, however, to justify a court of equity in stretching forth the strong arm of injunction to compel a man to remove an establishment in which he has invested his capital and been carrying on business for a long period of time, from that of one who comes into a neighborhood proposing to establish such a business for the first time, and who is met at the threshold of his enterprise by a remonstrance and notice that if he persists in his purpose application will be made to a court of equity to prevent him. In the case before us the defendant occupies this position.

It is not contended that a powder magazine—a building for storing large quantities of gun powder—in the midst of a thickly settled neighborhood is not a nuisance. By the act of Assembly of March 20th, 1856, Pamph. L. 157, it is made unlawful for any person or persons to have or keep any quantity of gun powder or gun cotton in any house, store, shop, building, cellar or other place within the city of Philadelphia (except in the public magazines or in a quantity not exceeding two pounds for private use), unless in the manner provided in the act, which provisions in the main are, that no person shall deal in the article without a license, and if licensed shall not keep on hand more than twenty-five pounds, and shall have a painted sign distinctly legible to all passers-by with the words "licensed to sell gun powder," and that every carriage for conveying the article shall have painted on each side, in letters distinctly legible to all passers-by, the word "gun powder." A public magazine has been erected, by the authority of the commonwealth, near the mouth of the Schuylkill, and a State superintendent appointed, whose fees are regulated by law. Act of May 5th, 1864, Pamph. L. 841. One of the general powers conferred upon boroughs by the act of April 3d, 1851, Pamph. L. 320, is "to prohibit within the borough the carrying on of any manufacture, art, trade or business which may be noxious or offensive to the inhabitants; the manufacture, sale or exposure of fire works or other inflammable or dangerous articles, and to limit and prescribe the quantities that may be kept in one place of gun powder, fire works, turpentine or other inflammable articles, and to prescribe such safeguards as may be necessary." Thus the Legislature has recognized that the storing of gun powder in large quantities in thickly settled places, is a nuisance to be guarded against by public authority. But it is not confined to cities and boroughs. This court has acknowledged and declared it as a case clearly within the general rule of equity upon this subject, in the opinion of the majority as pronounced by Mr. Chief Justice Thompson in Rhodes v. Dunbar, 7 P. F. Smith, 274. After remarking upon the particular character and danger of the establishment, which was the subject matter of the complaint in that case; which was a steam planing mill which had long been established in the neighborhood, had been burned down, and the injunction asked for was against its re-erection, and which the majority of the court thought was not within the rule—he proceeds: "These observations give no just grounds to draw the inference that a powder magazine or depot of nitro-glycerine or other like explosive materials, might not possibly be enjoined, even if not prohibited, as they usually are, by ordinance or law. It is not on the ground alone of their liability to fire, primarily or even secondarily, that they may possibly be dealt with as nuisances, but on account of their liability to explosion by contact with the smallest spark of fire, and the utter impossibility to guard against the consequences or set bounds to the injury which, being instantaneous, extends alike to property and persons within its reach. The destructiveness of these agents results from the irrepressible gases once set in motion, infinitely more than from fires which might ensue as a consequence. Persons and property in the neighborhood of a burning building, let it burn ever so fiercely, in most cases have a chance of escaping injury. Not so when explosive forces instantly prostrate everything near them, as in the instances of powder, nitro-glycerine and other chemicals of an explosive or instantly inflammable nature." This reason is so cogent that nothing could be added which would increase its force.

All that remains, then, is to inquire, whether the circumstances of the neighborhood in which it was proposed to establish the magazine in question, are such as to bring it within the rule. Let us remember that it is a new erection which is asked to be enjoined, not the continuance of an old one. Actual irreparable damages, actual depreciation of property, of course, does not exist. It is the prevention of these consequences which is the object of the process. Perhaps the immediate neighborhood is not so densely filled up—as in connection with the evidence in the case of the careful construction and location of the building to guard against the worst probable consequences of an explosion—as would justify the court in ordering its removal. But as we have shown, this is not the case. The neighborhood is not thickly settled, but it is fast filling up. Land is in demand for small buildings, villas and country residences, and its market value before this structure was contemplated was at a high figure. It is evident that it must sensibly affect that value and the growth of the district. This might not, however, be sufficient of itself. The borough of Sharpsburg is a thriving suburban village of this great western metropolis, where already many persons, engaged in professional, mercantile or manufacturing business, have purchased sites, erected houses, and permanently reside, in order to escape from the smoke, soot and noise of the city. The distance of the structure complained of from the line of the borough is about half a mile. An explosion might do serious injury, at least, by breaking glass, even at that distance, and it is not beyond the reach of projectiles. It is all futile to sit down and calculate, as if by a mathematical formula, the force size and direction of such a projectile. The natural laws which govern the direction of such forces as are as yet undiscovered. It must, in the nature of things, be the merest conjecture. The evidence in the cause in regard to the explosion which occurred near Maysville, Kentucky, showed this very clearly. The house of the witness, Isaac Swartzwelder, was counted seven-eighths of a mile from the magazine. He said: "The explosion bursted every window and door in my house right open; it took the windows right out. There was a rock weighed eighty pounds; some one weighed it next morning. It fell right back of where I was sleeping, within eighteen inches of where I was lying." Another witness testified: "At the time the powder house in Brooklyn, containing eight hundred or one thousand kegs of powder—eighteen to twenty tons—exploded, it broke glass at Fly-market, New York city, clear across the sound, about three-fourths of a mile." One of the complainants, Mr. Weir, has his residence within five hundred and ten feet of the magazine, and there are several other residences further off, but still within the reach of the consequences of an explosion, if reliance is to be placed upon such facts as these. Even the witnesses for the defendant—some of them military men of great experience and sound judgment—admit there would be some danger from an explosion if it should occur, but they consider the danger as very slight, and that the location and construction of the building are well calculated to guard against the worst consequences. But besides all this a public turnpike road runs very near the building. As the master reports, "from the centre thereof to the magazine the distance is one hundred and fifteen feet, or ninety-five feet from the inner edge." It is peculiarly exposed to danger, for the magazine is constructed in a ravine, funnel-shaped, opening out towards the road. It presents, with its rocky bed and sides, a huge morter aimed directly at the turnpike. We may take what the master reports upon this subject. "Were the magazine in controversy to explode while four hundred to six hundred kegs of powder were stored in it, the direct effect of the explosive force would be to strike the walls of the excavation, blowing off all the surface and loose rock down to the solid slate rock. This dirt, rock, &c., would be thrown in all directions, and if any of it was large enough, would be converted into projectiles and thrown a considerable distance from the place of explosion, and might do considerable harm; but the main force of the explosion would be directed towards the open side of the excavation on the northwest side of the magazine, converting the excavation and ravine, as it were, into a large mortar, blowing all before it, and destroying everything that might be standing on the turnpike, or on the opposite hillside, within the focus of the mouth of the ravine."

We have come to the conclusion then, that the complainants in the bill in the court below were entitled to the relief for which they prayed.

Decree reversed, and now it is ordered and decreed, that this cause be remitted to the court below, with direction to issue an injunction conformably to the prayer of the bill restraining the defendant, Arthur Kirk, from maintaining a powder house or powder magazine on the premises described in the bill, and from erecting and constructing such a powder house or magazine in that vicinity.

Costs of the appeal to be paid by the appellee.

Upon the finding of the master, we think the bill in this case was properly dismissed, and would affirm the decree of the court below.

COMMON CARRIER.

1. A common carrier of chattels is not bound to insure them against their own fault or the fault of their owner, and is not liable to him for loss or damage caused by an inherent defect in the thing or animal carried without any fault of the carrier, or by the manner of packing or loading, the responsibility of which the owner has assumed, or by any want of care which the owner was to exercise.

2. The liability of a common carrier of cattle is governed by the general legal principles applicable to the common carriage of other property. Rixford v. Smith.

1. At common law, it is the duty of a common carrier, in the performance of his public service of transportation, not to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to or in favor of any person, and not to subject any person to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage, in respect to terms, facilities or accommodations; and such carrier is liable for the damage caused by a violation of this duty.

2. This general rule of the common law is approved and confirmed by Gen. Stats., ch. 149.

3. An action lies in this State for damage caused by an unreasonable discrimination practiced in Maine in violation of the law of that State on this subject. McDuffee v. Railroad.

DOG.

If an action brought under section 8 of chapter 105, Gen. Stats., to recover of the owner or keeper of a dog double damages for an injury inflicted upon the plaintiff by such dog, the court, among other things, told the jury that "if the head of a family, having the possession and control of a house or premises, suffer or permit a dog to be kept on the premises in the way such domestic animals are usually kept—as a member of the family, so to speak (in so far as a house dog may be termed a member of one's family)—such head of a family may be regarded the keeper of a dog, within the meaning of the statute." Held, that these instructions were sufficiently favorable to the defendant. Cummings v. Riley.

EVIDENCE.

The prohibition of the constitution of the State against compelling a subject to accuse or furnish evidence against himself (Bill of Rights, art. XV.) may be waived by him, and is waived by his consenting to be a witness in his own behalf, under the act of 1869, in relation to respondents' testifying in criminal cases (ch. 23, Laws of 1869), and he thereby subjects himself to the rules and tests applicable to other witnesses. State v. Ober.

EXPERTS.

Upon the question whether a long account upon a party's books was written at different times, as it purported to be, or whether it was all written with the same pen and ink and at the same time, a witness testified that he had been in practice as a lawyer some forty years, and had had about the same experience as lawyers in general in the examination and comparison of handwritings; that he had been engaged in one or two cases which led him particularly to examine and compare handwritings, but he did not claim to be able to give an opinion upon which any great reliance could be placed. Held, that the admission of the witness to testify as an expert was erroneous. Killingwood v. Bragg.

MORTGAGE.

The owner of real estate mortgaged it while a builder was in process of erecting a house thereon under a contract previously made with the owner. The mortgage was seasonably recorded, but the builder had no actual notice of its existence. The mortgagee, at the time of taking the mortgage, was chargeable with notice that the builder was erecting the house under a previous contract with the owner. The builder completed the house without objection on the part of the mortgagee. Held, that, under Gen. Stats., chapter 125, the builder had a lien superior to the mortgage for all that he did by virtue of the contract—for what was done after the execution of the mortgage, as well as for what was done before.

Proof that a mortgagee, at the time of taking his mortgage, knew that a house was being built upon the premises by some person, is sufficient to justify a finding of the fact that the mortgagee was put upon inquiry as to the existence of a builder's contract and a builder's lien.

A builder, whose lien was superior to that of a mortgagee, brought an action to enforce his lien, and, without any fraudulent purpose, included in his judgment a claim for a small amount to which no right of lien attached. The builder, having levied an execution on the premises, the mortgagee brought a writ of entry against him, contending that he had forfeited his lien. Held, that the builder's lien could retain precedence over the mortgage, if the building would pay to the mortgagee the amount thus erroneously included in his judgment. Cheshire Provident Institution v. Stone.

PARTNERSHIP.

Under the provisions of chapter 106, General Statutes, upon the death of either partner, the copartnership affairs may be fully adjusted and settled in the probate court, either by the surviving partner, or the representative of the deceased partner, or by arbitration. But if not thus settled, they may be adjusted in a court of equity the same as before such statute was enacted.

Where, upon the death of one partner, his administrator has one-half of the partnership property appraised as belonging to his estate, and disposes of the same knowing that there are company debts outstanding, such administrator will be charged with the whole amount of such property as against creditors of the firm, and with his just proportion of the company debts, not exceeding the whole amount of such property, as against the other member of the firm, before any of such property can be taken to pay the private debts of the deceased partner.

In such case a creditor of the partnership may prove his debt against the estate of the deceased partner, or he may collect it of the surviving partner, and such claim will not be barred, except by the general statute of limitations. Scott v. Buffum et al.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE.

A mortgage of personal property being, under the laws of Wisconsin, ineffectual to pass after acquired property, the assignee in bankruptcy is entitled to such property as against the mortgagee. In re Eldridge.

Though a mortgage be valid as to property then in posession, the authority in a mortgage subsequently given to cover the property afterward acquired, does not enable the mortgagee, by taking possession of such property, to hold it as against the assignee. This would be in effect a preference, and against the spirit of the act. Ib.

A mortgagee in possession being entitled to retain all property upon which his mortgage was valid, on a sale of such property by order of the District Court, he should only be charged with the reasonable expenses of the sale of such property, and not with any portion of the costs in bankruptcy. Ib.

A chattel mortgage "of all the goods and merchandise" in a store, here held not to include fixtures. Ib.

A chattel mortgage, not valid as against creditors, under the State law, and under which the mortgagee had taken possession, having at the time reasonable cause to believe his debtor insolvent, is invalid as against the assignee in bankruptcy. Harvey, assignee, &c. v. Crane.

Though the mortgage be good as between the parties, and given to secure a bona fide debt, yet not having been acknowledged and recorded as required by statute, the mortgagee, having retained it until the insolvency of the debtor cannot, by then taking posession, be remitted to his rights as of the date of the mortgage. Ib.

Though possession was taken, before commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and was in accordance with the provisions of the mortgage, yet, being within the time limited by the bankrupt act, it operated as a preference, void as against creditors, and equally void as against the assignee. Ib.

In Illinois, recording a chattel mortgage in which material changes had been made since its acknowledgment gives it no additional validity. Ib.

COLLISION.

A vessel having lost her signal lights in a storm, and proceeding on her way with the prohibited white light, is not necessarily to be charged with all the damages in case of collision. The Gray Eagle.

The fact that she carried a light prohibited to vessels while sailing does not of itself absolve other vessels from the observance of that degree of caution, care, and nautical skill which the exigencies of the case require. Ib.

Though a white light usually represents a vessel at anchor, the officers of an approaching vessel have no right to conclude that it always does. Ib.

It was their duty, from the moment the light was seen, to watch it carefully in order to ascertain from its bearings whether the vessel was in motion; and if in the exercise of ordinary nautical skill and care this could have been done, and was omitted, and this omission contributed to the accident, then their vessel must share the loss, although the other vessel was in fault in running with a prohibited light. JOHN H. CAMPBELL,
EDITOR.

The new constitution will be adopted. Even its opponents now admit it. Of the newspapers of the State, 208 have pronounced in favor of it, and only 28 against it. The bar of the State is also in favor of it. Men of all parties are uniting in its support and we have no doubt that in a fortnight from this time, we will have the gratifying intelligence to announce, that it has been carried by at least one hundred thousand majority.

BAR ASSOCIATION OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The following circular has been forwarded to us for insertion. As it contains some interesting items of news we willingly give it a place in our columns:

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE BAR IN NEW HAMPSHIRE:

At the last June session of our Legislature an act was passed to incorporate the Bar Association of the State of New Hampshire. And at the subsequent adjourned Law Term of the S. J. Court, in August, a meeting of members of the bar was held to take steps for the proper organization of the association accordingly. At that meeting a committee was appointed to prepare and distribute to the members of the legal profession throughout the State, a suitable memorial with reference to the objects of the proposed association. Hence this communication, which is respectfully submitted to your favorable regard.

The objects of the association are to be, to promote social and professional intercourse among the members of the bar, to provide facilities for professional studies and investigations, and in general to advance the honor and welfare of the legal profession in this State. We presume that it is not necessary for us to offer arguments to prove or illustrate the merit of these objects. Every member of the bar will appreciate them; and we hope that he will encourage and aid them by his participation in the association.

It is a singular fact that while other professions in the State, for many years past, have had general associations of the character proposed, yet the legal profession has not had any beyond local associations in each county and confined to its own limits. And yet, to say the least, no profession is more able to render such an association agreeable and successful in its social and professional relations. And the present arrangement of the law terms of our S. J. Court is very favorable for it. All those terms are held at one place, and thus afford very convenient and suitable opportunities for meetings of all the members of the bar in the State.

In these respects there is sufficient occasion for the Bar Association. But these are not all. It is a well known fact that, valuable and extensive as some of the private law libraries in the State are, yet there are none which afford the means for that extended investigation and research which the occasions of the profession frequently demand. The multiplication of text books, and especially of reports, is too rapid and great for the moderate incomes of the profession to keep pace with in purchases for private libraries. Hence has arisen, to a great extent, the necessity for going out of the State to obtain better advantages.

The State library has the most extensive collection of law reports to be found in this State; but it is greatly defective. It, however, presents a nucleus and opportunity for a law library, which with comparatively small expense could be enlarged to the extent necessary to meet most if not all the requirements of the profession. In fact, a more favorable opportunity could not be found, for the establishment of a library which would soon become an honor as well as a most profitable acquisition for the legal profession. The usual exchanges with the other States of the Union bring into the State library nearly all the reports of the different States as soon as they are published; and a small expense would be sufficient to supply what is desirable in addition. The location of the court, at its law terms, at the same place, render the library very convenient in that respect also.

We presume that suitable arrangements can be made with the State to secure for the association all desirable facilities in the State library. And the aid of the association will be very useful and advantageous for improvements and additions to that library.

We hope that regard for his profession, and pride in its prosperity and honorable standing, will induce all the members of the bar to aid the Bar Association, which has the objects we have mentioned in view. To these will be added the interest of those who have not extensive libraries of their own, to establish an excellent one to which they can have ready access. Besides this, we have no doubt that many members of the bar will be pleased to aid, by contributions of money and books, an institution connected with the profession with which they have been associated. And the Bar Association will present the opportunity, which has been too long delayed, to place the legal profession in this State in that position which it is entitled to and should occupy.

The organization of the association will be completed at the law term in December; and copies of its constitution and by-laws will then be distributed to the members of the bar for their information and participation in the association.

TWENTY-FIRST JUDICIAL DIST.

Court of Common Pleas of Schuylkill County.

IN EQUITY.

PHILADELPHIA & READING COAL & IRON CO. v. TAYLOR et al.

1. Where there are two mining operations—one owner working on the upper level, and one on the lower level of the same vein—the owner of the upper level, operating in the most approved method and with care, is not required to control the natural flow of the water downwards, and may work his coal out down to his line, and the maxim of the common law sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas applies.
2. And the owner of the subjacent level owes a servitude, and must leave a pillar of coal to support the gangway and keep out the water from the level above.
3. Adjoining owners on the same level of the same vein owe no special duty to each other.
4. When, however, the owner of the superjacent land has created a servitude upon his land, in favor of the subjacent owner, such as a right to drive an air-way through his works and to connect with the surface, such owner after he has worked all his coal out and is about to abandon his workings must give reasonable notice of this to the owner of the dominant tenement, and on failure so to do, equity will restrain him from permitting the water to fill up, if by so doing it will destroy the easement, the owner of the dominant tenement to be at the expense of pumping the water until the injury can be remedied. Reasonable notice is relative and depends upon the work to be performed.
5. A party having an easment on the land of another, may go upon the land for the purpose of the enjoyment of such easement to its fullest extent, either to construct or repair—or secure it from danger—doing as little damage as possible and responsible for that damage—for the grant of a privilege carries with it every thing necessary to its enjoyment.

Injunction.

Opinion by WALKER, J. Delivered October 27th, 1873.

This bill in equity was presented at chambers on 1st October, 1873, and a special injunction was asked for, preliminary until hearing, and thereafter to restrain the defendants from permitting their old workings on Little Mine Run Colliery to fill with water, until the plaintiffs can procure machinery of sufficient capacity to pump the same out of their own slope at the Bast Colliery.

The preliminary injunction was granted and the hearing fixed on October 7th, 1873, at which time it was ably argued by counsel.

The injunction is asked to prevent the defendants from allowing their old workings to fill up with water.

The reasons assigned for this writ are:

1. That the plaintiffs' operation at the Bast Colliery will be irreparably injured, and the lives of their men endangered, if the defendants be allowed to flood their old workings with water, and

2. That they will be deprived of the right and privilege of completing their air-way, and their purchase of that right will be rendered valueless and useless.

In the first place I am asked, on account of the great and irreparable injury to the plaintiffs' operation and danger to their workmen, to restrain the defendants from allowing their mines to fill with water, or to permit the plaintiffs to come upon their land and pump out the water.

Before this can be done, the plaintiffs must establish some right upon which to found equitable interposition. If they have no such right they are entitled to no remedy, though they may suffer irreparable injury. Chadwick v. Trower, 6 Bing. N. C. 256; 37 Eng. Com. Law, 255. It is not alleged that the defendants in the working of their operations have been guilty of any trespass, or that they have heretofore done any matter or thing inconsistent with the most approved method of mining.

Have the plaintiffs then a legal right to require the defendants to keep the water out of their levels, in order that they may enjoy and use their own works in the level below? In determining this it will be necessary to consider the relative rights of owners of upper and lower levels, and of adjoining lands to each other under the present system of mining coal.

It often happens that there are two estates in the same land, the surface right and the underground right. One owns the surface and another the minerals below the surface. These estates are well defined and are consistent with each other. (Caldwell v. Fulton, 7 Casey, 483.)

The owner of the surface, if not restricted by his deed, has a perfect right to erect his buildings and make his improvements on any portion of his land, even upon the crop of a coal vein belonging to another person, and which ultimately will be worked.

The owner of the coal has a servient right, and is bound in working it to leave a pillar to support the surface. Baron Parke, in Harris v. Ryding, 5 Meeson & Welsby, Exch. 60, remarks: "I do not mean to say that all the coal does not belong to the defendants but they cannot get it out without leaving proper supports." See also The Earl of Glasgow v. The Alum Co., 8 Eng. Law and Eq. 13.

The upper and underground estate being several they are governed by the same maxim which limits the use of property otherwise situated. "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas." Jones v. Wagner, 16, P. F. S. 429. per Thompson, C. J.

The same doctrine obtains in the working of upper and lower levels on the same vein.

There are certain rights well known and recognized, as to the flow of water upon the surface of the ground. Aqua currit et debet currere is the common law maxim of water courses. The distinction between subterranean and surface rights, is ably discussed in Action v. Blundell, 12 Meeson & Welsby, 324, by Tendall, C. J., and seems to be, that as to the surface flows, parties acquire rights to them, because everybody who has an interest in the matter acquiesces in them, but as to underground percolations no rights are gained, because nobody knows anything about them. There is a marked and substantial difference between them, and it was there held that the owner of land through which waters flows in a subterraneous course, has no right or interest in it, which will enable him to maintain an action against a land owner who, carrying on mining operations in his own land in the usual manner, drains away the water from the land of the first mentioned owner, and lays his well dry.

Under the English decisions the owner of the land, if he be the first who mines, may work his vein up to his line—without leaving a pillar stand—and the owner of the adjoining property is required to leave the pillar, to keep out the water. Clegg v. Drearden, 64 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 575.

"Adjoining owners owe no special duty to each other." The Locust Mountain Coal and Iron Company v. Gorrell, Leg. Int. 29th March, 1872.

Under the rule here laid down, the plaintiffs working on a lower level, were bound to leave a sufficient pillar of coal standing, to prevent the water in the upper level from breaking through. And if they, or those under whom they claim have not done so, it is their own neglect, and becomes damnum absque injuria, for they must have known that the coal in the upper level would ultimately be worked out and be abandoned, and the water following its natufal flow downward, would collect in the old workings, and might break through upon them.

The owner of a higher level may mine all his coal out down to his line, and he is not responsible for water that flows in the lower level by gravitation. Baird v. Williamson, 109 Eng. Com. Law Rep., p. 375. See Smith v. Kenrick, 7 M. G. & S. 514; (62 Eng. Com. Law Rep.) as the leading case on this subject in England. See also The Duke of Beaufort v. Morris, 6 Hare, 340; also as bearing on this subject, see Kaufman v. Griesemer, 2 Casey, 407; Martin v. Riddle, 2 Casey, 415; Bentz v. Armstrong, 8 W. & S. 40; Merrick v. Packer, 1 Coxe, 460; Williams v. Gale, H. John. Rep. 230. If this was the only reason, an injunction certainly could not be granted.

The second point made by the plaintiffs is, that having purchased from two of the defendants, and acquiesced in by the other partner, an easement or right to make an air-way through defendants' mines for ventilation of the Bast Colliery, they cannot be deprived of its use and enjoyment, after expending money in good faith for improvements, which must necessarily be the case, if the defendants allow the breasts in their old workings to fill up with water. This is the strong point of the case.

The plaintiffs claim an easement in the land of the Locust Mountain Coal and Iron Company, worked by and in the occupation of the defendants.

An easement is a right which one proprietor has to some profit, benefit or lawful use out of, or over the estate of another proprietor. Retgan v. Parker, 8 Cush. 145

It is incorporeal and must consist of two distinct tenements, the dominant to which the right belongs, and the servient upon which the obligation rests. Washburne on Easements, 2 Perrin v. Garfield, 37 Vt. 312; Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, § 212 and notes (as to the distinction between easements and servitudes, see Rogers on Mines, 444).

After the owner has created a servitude or burden upon his lands, he cannot restrict the dominant owner in his use and enjoyment of that privilege. It is as much protected as any other vested right, and carries with it every incident to its use and enjoyment. Rogers on Mines, 445; Washburne on Eas. 25, and authorities there cited, 1 William's Saunders, 323 and note 6. "Whoever grants a thing, grants all that may be necessary to the enjoyment of the thing itself. Broom's Leg. Max. 362.

When the plaintiffs bought the Bast Colliery from Bast & Steinhilbert, for $193,000, one of the chief inducements (according to the affidavit of Mr. Pleasants) was to obtain the right to make this air-way, through the workings of the Little Mine Run Colliery.

Mr. Bast obtained that privilege from Taylor & Lindsay, under whom Jeremiah Taylor (who has been made a defendant), claims, and transferred it to the plaintiffs.

The consideration money was one dollar, and both transfers were recorded within the statutory time.

The sale was made by Taylor & Lindsay to Bast on 18th November, 1872, while they were owners of five-sixths of the colliery and in possession. Bast assigned his interest to plaintiffs on 4th December, 1872; both instruments were recorded on 26th February, 1873. Jeremiah Taylor bought out Robert Taylor and Robert M. Lindsay's interest in the colliery 1st January, 1873, and he objects to the exercise of this right on the ground of notice.

Are the instruments within the operation of the recording acts?

The act of 18th March, 1775 (Purdon's Dig. 472, pl. 76), requires all deeds and conveyances made in this State of or concerning any lands, tenements or hereditaments whereby the same may be in any way affected in law or in equity, to be acknowledged and recorded in the county where such land lies, within six months after execution of such deeds and conveyances. This includes any agreement concerning lands, though not under seal. Hellman v. Hellman, 4 R. 440; Shortz v. Unangst, 3 W. & S. 54; Funk v. Haldeman, 3 P. F. S. 244. These instruments were concerning the land, and are clearly within the operation of the recording act.

The sale of this right was good as against R. Taylor and Lindsay, for they, as tenants for years, had authority to grant the easement. Wallace v. Fletcher, 10 Foster, 453.

And as these instruments were placed on record within six months, they were notice to Jeremiah Taylor. The right attaches to the estate, and not to the owner of the dominant tenement; and the easement followed the estate in the hands of the assignee. Taylor on Landlord and Tenant, § 238.

Jeremiah Taylor, therefore, took no greater interest in the colliery than Robert Taylor and Lindsay had at the time of the purchase. He took the operation not only subject to the covenants and conditions of the lease, but to all the restrictions placed upon it by his grantors. He took it subject to the charge, and the servient tenement followed in his hands. Taylor on Landlord and Tenent, § 238.

But Steinhilbert objects that he did not sign the instrument of 18th November, 1872, and should not be affected by it.

But this fact in my opinion cannot avail him under the circumstances of this case, for he was cognizant of the sale at the time; his interest in the Bast Colliery was enhanced by it; and he made no objection to it. Qui non prohibet quod prohibere potest assentire videtur.

It is therefore contended by the plaintiffs, that it was the act of the partners within the scope of the firm's authority, ratified by Steinhilbert, and as such, it is to be regarded as his own act. Story on Partnership, §§ 120, 121, 122; Cady v. Shepperd, 11 Peck, 400; Shinner v. Dayton, et al. 19 John's Rep. 513; Grum v. Seaton, 1 Hall Rep. 262; Lord Lovelace Case, W. Jones, 268; Orr v. Chase, 1 Mer. 729; 4 Term Rep. 313.

I think if he stood by and saw the plaintiffs pay more for the colliery than they otherwise would have paid without that privilege, and made no objection to it, but received the additional profit, it would be a fraud upon the plaintiffs to permit him to object now, and he is estopped from repudiating that contract, upon every principle of equity. Nuss v. Vanswearingen, et al. 10 S. & R. 146; Rerick v. Kern, 14 S. & R. 271; Hill v. Epley, 7 C. 331-334; Commonwealth v. Moltz, 10 Barr, 527, and cases cited; Meason v. Kaine, 17 P. F. S. 126; Miller v. Miller, 10 P. F. S. 16.

The title then of the plaintiffs to this easement or privilege is complete, and the right to exercise and enjoy it, is just as effectual in law as if they had paid a million of dollars for it.

Having this undoubted privilege, can the defendants now allow the mines to be flooded with water, and plaintiffs be deprived of their legal rights, without any default on their part? Before this can be done, it would seem right that reasonable notice should be given by the defendants, of their intention to enable the plaintiffs to put up sufficient machinery to pump out the water, if by allowing the water to fill up, the easement would be destroyed. (37 Eng. Com. Law Rep. 255; 6 Bing. N. C. 256.)

The servitude which the defendants created on their colliery, and the principle of the common law, Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas, require such notice to the owner of the dorminant tenement.

This appears to be recognized by the defendants themselves, for Jeremiah Taylor says in his affidavit, that a written notice of their intention to abandon the mines on the 1st September, was given the plaintiffs on the 14th August last.

This certainly was not reasonable notice for the work required to be done, for the bill alleges that it requires a year with despatch, and the defendants have not denied or controverted that fact.

It is argued that under the act 16th June, 1836 (Purden's Dig. 590, P. L. 789), and its supplements conferring chancery powers on our courts, an injunction is a preventive remedy, and cannot be used preliminarily to enjoin the performance of any act.

It, no doubt, is a restrictive or prohibitory process to compel the party to maintain his status. The Mammoth Vein Coal Co.'s Appeal, 4 P. F. S. 183. Per Thompson, J.; Farmers R. R. Co. v. Reno, 3 P. F. S. 224. Per Strong, J. Except upon a final hearing when the injunction becomes mandatory. Audenreid v. Phila. & Reading R. R. Co., 18 P. F. S. 370. Per Sharswood, J. But when the agreement of parties requires performance, the remedy falls within the terms of the sixth clause of the second specification of the 13th section of said act, P. L. 790, which confers upon the courts jurisdiction to afford "specific relief," when the recovery of damages would be inadequate.

For instances where certain acts upon a preliminary hearing have been required to be done. See Lane v. Newdigate, 10 Vesey, 193. The Baptist Congregation v. Scannel, 3 Grant, 48; Hepburn v. Landner, 2 Hem. & Mil. 321. See also 3 Blackstone's Com. 426, 427 and 428, and notes by Judge Snarswood; Lewis v. Comeford, 1 Vesey, Jr., 235, and notes; Fry on Specific Perf., §§ 765-6-7; Newmarch v. Brandling, 3 Sw. 99; 4 Am. 13; Whittaker v. Howe, 3 Beav. 383; Maxborough v. Bower, 7 Beav. 127.

But this case is different, for the plaintiffs have an easement through the workings of the defendants.

This is established by the bill, affidavits and transfers, and nowhere denied. Jeremiah Taylor says: "that he and his partner never objected to the plaintiffs using the air-hole to ventilate their mine, nor to the plaintiffs pumping the water out of the slope level." This concedes the plaintiffs' right as fully as the written instruments establish it, and places them in a position if this water became a nuisance, to apply for this writ on those grounds. Rhea v. Forsyth, 1 Wr. 507. See Bainbridge on Mines, 509, where mines are in danger of being ruined. See King v. McCully, 2 Wr. 76, where Judge Thompson recognizes this position when the "right is clear and undoubted." It is such a right that upon refusal to comply with the terms a court of equity might decree specific performance. Having this privilege or right, then the law is well settled that the dominant owner may go upon the land and do necessary repairs. Rogers v. Morris, 452; Washburne on Eastments, 25, 265, 566, 557; Taylor on Land. and Ten. § 214. For the express grant of an easement is accomplished by certain secondary easements, necessary for the enjoyment of the principal one. Gale and Whatley on Easements, 231.

By the civil law the right to a servitude drew with it the right to do whatever was required for the fullest enjoyment of the servitude, and a man having that right might enter upon his neighbor's soil for the purpose of doing necessary works, but the owner of the dominant tenement was bound not only to exercise ordinary care and skill, but also to repair as far as he could, whatever damage his labor might have done to the servient tenement. —Ib. 25. Prescott v. Williams, 5 Met. 429; Prescott v. White, 21 Peck, 341. (As to abatement of nuisance, see 6 Wharton, 597.) The plaintiffs having this privilege, these authorities go far to show that they have a right to go on the land for the purpose of enjoying and using this right to its fullest extent, doing as little harm as possible.

In the Mammoth Vein Coal Co.'s Appeal, 4 P. F. S. 189, Judge Thompson held that it would have been proper to enjoin the defendants, had it been made manifest that the consequence of their operations would have the effect of letting water in large quantities in the plaintiffs' mine. These views are strengthened by Judge Agnew's opinion in The Locust Mountain Coal and Iron Co. v. Gorrell et al., Leg. Intel., 29 March, 1872, before referred to, in which he says: "When the miner in his upper mine in carrying forward his gangway strikes into a breast, which has been wrongfully worked by a trespasser up the dip of his coal vein, he is not justified in emptying the water flowing down the drain or gutter of his gangway into the opening thus struck, if by reasonable means he can carry the water into his own sump,"—and he holds that it is the duty of the upper owner to carry off his water even though a trespass had been committed upon him. He adds: "To adopt the principle that an upper owner is liable for no act done within his own mine and no neglect, because it falls within his own proprietary right, would lead to results disastrous to mining in general and could not be tolerated."

If equity, upon a preliminary hearing in such a case, will require the owner of the superjacent mine to keep out his water though a trespass, be committed on his own land, and though he has to do certain acts, how much stronger is the present case, where the owners of the upper mine have sold the right to an air way which cannot be used and enjoyed unless the water is pumped out for a reasonable time.

It will be observed that adjacent owners working the same vein of coal owe no special duty to each other; that subjacent owners have a servient interest and superjacent owners a dominant interest; that a subjacent owner must receive the water in its natural channel downward, and must leave a pillar to support the works of the superjacent owner; while the superjacent owner working his mine with care and in the most approved method, is not required to control the natural flow of the water (the common enemy of the miner), and may work his coal down to his line. When, however, the superjacent owner has created a servitude upon his land in favor of the subjacent owner, such as a right to pass over it, or the right to make up an air-way through his workings, the relative position of the parties changes. The subjacent owner then ceases to be servient and becomes the dominant, and the superjacent owner becomes the servient, so far as the terms of their agreement prescribe the rights to the use of the same under it. This conclusion appears to be undeniable and gives the plaintiffs the advantage of the decisions upon this point; for if they have this right they should have some remedy if it be infringed.

In the absence of any adjudged case like the present one, it may well cause the mind of a chancellor to hesitate, not only on account of the magnitude of the interests involved, but for the principle of law to be established.

Should I, therefore, refuse the injunction, the plaintiffs would have no remedy; as it is an interlocutory order, and no appeal lies (Hilbish v. Catherman, 10 P. F. S. 444), and before a final decree could be made the mines of the plaintiffs would be irreparably destroyed; unless I should dismiss the bill before answer and final hearing, which the equities of the plaintiffs do not warrant. If the works be allowed to fill up, there would accumulate many millions of gallons of water, and with this superincumbent weight, the pillar or rib of coal at the top of the lower works must ultimately sink, and wide-spread ruin to the property of the plaintiffs and destruction to the lives of the men must inevitably follow.

I prefer, therefore to be reversed (if in error), rather than by sustaining myself by an interlocutory order (if the law were otherwise) to cut off the appeal of the plaintiffs. The weightiest reasons show that this is a case for the Supreme Court, in order to ascertain how far a court of equity may preliminarily go in affording specific relief, where a recovery in damages would be inadequate: where the right is clear and undeniable; where the loss would be irreparable and of great magnitude, and where the danger to life is inevitable.

If I allow the injunction to remain in the manner to prevent the water from accumulating, at plaintiff's expense, the defendants have an immediate remedy by appeal, without affidavit or security, and their damages can be readily compensated, for sufficient and approved bail have been entered to indemnify them; and as the Supreme Court have the final decision of this case, let them assume the responsibility.

And now, October 27th, 1873: This cause came on to be heard at this term, and was argued by counsel, and thereupon upon consideration thereof, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed as follows: that the special injunction issued against the defendants, remain until further order.

George deB. Keim, Esq., and James Ellis, Esq., for plaintiffs.

Hon. F. W. Hughes and James Ryon and J. W. Ryon, Esqs., for defendants.

PENNSYLVANIA.

STILES v. GEESEY.

1. A women hitched her horse with a carriage to a tree on the road so that the carriage projected into the road. A wagoner not being with his horses, his wagon struck the carriage, injured it and the horse; there was evidence of negligence in leaving the carriage where it was struck. In a suit against the owner of the wagon, the court affirmed the following point of the plaintiff: "That Thomas Stiles cannot excuse the negligence of William Stiles by showing that the plaintiff's property was placed where it received the injury by want of ordinary care by Mrs. Geesey, if in the opinion of the jury such want is imputable to her, should the jury believe that William Stiles was chargeable with negligence in leaving his team and permitting it to go along the highway unattended." Held, to be error, being, except as to the negligence of the defendant, a binding instruction.

2. For an injury resulting from mutual or concurring negligence, no action will lie, because there can be no apportionment of damages.

NEW HOLLAND TURNPIKE CO. v. LANCASTER COUNTY.

1. Viewers reported in favor of a bridge, suggesting that a turnpike company should pay one-third the cost: the company agreed to do so: the report was confirmed and the bridge erected by the county at a cost of $16,500; inspectors reported the bridge well erected, &c., but valued it at $11,000; the Court of Quarter Sessions disapproved the report. Held, that the company could not take advantage of that proceeding which was res inter alios acta, but was bound for one-third of the bona fide cost of the bridge.

2. The company entered into a bond in the penalty of $4000, to pay "one-third of all reasonable and proper expenses in building the bridge." Held, that the county in covenant could recover one-third of the expenses, although beyond the penalty of the bond.

3. The obligee in such bond may elect to proceed in debt for the penalty, but cannot then go on the covenant; or on the covenant, when he may recover as often as injury arises.

MEILY ET AL., TERRE-TENANTS, v. WOOD.

1. Where land is held by a firm by deed expressing that it is partnership stock, an encumbrance against a member of the firm is not a lien upon any interest in it, so as to prevent the firm conveying to a purchaser clear of the encumbrance.

2. Wood conveyed to Meily & Co., declaring in the deed that the land was for partnership purposes; a judgment was entered by Wood, a few days afterwards, against one of the firm for his proportion of the purchase money; the partner conveyed his interest in the partnership to his fellows and withdrew; they conveyed the whole. Held, that the judgment was not a lien against the terre tenants.

3. The land was personal property to be applied according to the equities between the partners in payment of the partnership debts in the first instance.

4. Each partner's interest was, as in any other property of the firm, what should be due him on a final settlement.

5. An execution by a separate creditor would sell not an interest in realty, but the balance due his debtor, with right by bill in equity to compel a settlement.

6. Where land is agreed to be made partnership stock there is an out-and-out conversion.

GRANT v. THE COMMONWEALTH.

1. Under the act of February 15th, 1870, allowing writ of error as of right in cases of homicide, the Supreme Court will not consider the case as on a motion for a new trial.

2. On a motion for a new trial the court considers the testimony on both sides, and judges whether the jury have given undue weight to either side under all the circumstances of the case as presented to them.

3. The duty of the Supreme Court under the act is to see whether there was evidence which if believed by the jury would furnish the elements of murder in the first degree.

4. If there be in the evidence ingredients to constitute murder in the first degree, the power of the Supreme Court as to awarding a new trial ceases.

5. Under the act of 1870, errors alleged to any portion of the charge or rulings on evidence, can be brought before the Supreme Court only by bill of exception as in civil cases, and the court cannot reverse unless the exception be taken at the trial.

6. In this respect the act of 1870 does not alter or supply the criminal code of March 31st, 1860.

7. The act of 1870 dispenses with a bill of exceptions, only so far as to ascertain whether the facts constitute murder in the first degree.

WILLIAMS AND CONER v. BAKER ET UX.

1. By 2d sect. of act of February 24th, 1770, the official certificate is the only evidence that the wife has acknowledged the deed in the statutory form so as to convey her estate.

2. Except in cases of fraud and duress, the official certificate of acknowledgment is conclusive of every material fact on its face.

3. The certificate is conclusive even in cases of fraud, &c., as to subsequent purchasers for a valuable consideration without notice.

4. The certificate is conclusive only of such facts as the magistrate is bound by the statute to certify.

5. The general rule as to certificates given by officers is that a certificate of fact not coupled with matter of law is not evidence.

6. If the officer is bound to record a fact, the proper evidence is a duly authenticated copy of the record.

7. If an officer's certificate is made evidence of certain facts, he cannot extend its effects to other facts by stating them in it.

8. A wife is not concluded by the certificate of acknowledgment under the act of 1770, that she was of age: she may show she was a minor when she acknowledged the deed.

9. A minor executed a deed, and during her minority gave an order on the grantee in favor of her husband, for the purchase-money; the husband received it. Held, not to be a ratification of the deed.

10. A suit was brought in her name without her knowledge or consent; this was not an estoppel to her in an ejectment for the land.

11. The wife could not ratify the deed exept in the manner prescribed by the act of Assembly.

12. A wife, a minor, owned a remainder in land after the death of a life tenant. During her minority and the particular estate, she joined her husband in conveying the remainder. She came of age after 1848, after which the tenant for life died. Held, that she and her husband could maintain ejectment for the land, the husband not being tenant by the curtesy till the particular estate expired, when he took his curtesy with its qualities under the act of 1848.

13. Her estate could not be taken in execution for his debt on account of his curtesy; he therefore could not alienate it during coverture, and she was not estopped by his deed or warranty from maintaining ejectment.

CALIFORNIA.

The Supreme Court of California, at October Term, 1873, decided the following cases:

ATTORNEY AT LAW.

In an action by an attorney at law for money due on a contract for professional services, a judgment in any sum for the services raises the presumption that the court found there was no breach of the contract by the attorney. Wheeler v. Turner, 6 Pacific L. R. 138.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

1. A municipal corporation cannot tax its own property.

2. A tax deed made in pursuance of a sale for such a tax conveys no title. Low v. Lewis, Ib. 143.

TECHNICAL WORD.

Whenever it is apparent that a grantor has used a technical word to express an idea different from its technical signification, it will be construed accordingly. Pacific Railroad Co. v. Beals, Ib. 142.

NEGLIGENCE.

M., while employed as a sub-porter by H., a merchant, was injured by the falling of a hoisting apparatus. Held, that evidence that the apparatus had fallen before from a similar cause was admissible to show knowledge of defect on the part of defendant.

Where an employee was injured by the falling of a hoisting apparatus, held that the liability of the defendant depended upon three facts: 1. That the method of attaching the hoisting rope was defective and unsafe, and that the injury was caused by the defect. 2. That the defendant knew or ought to have known of the defect. 3. That the plaintiff did not know of it, and had not equal means of knowledge.

It is competent for a jury in fixing damages to an employee, resulting from negligence of the employer, to consider what, before the injury, was the health and physical ability of the plaintiff to maintain himself and family, as compared with his condition in such particulars afterwards; his loss of time, and how far the injury was permanent in its character and results, as well as the physical and mental suffering he sustained by reason of the injury; and they should allow such damages as they think will fairly and justly compensate him for all loss and injury sustained. But the jury cannot consider the plaintiff's "condition in life," whether he is rich or poor. [Shea v. Potrero & B V. R. R. Co., October, 1872, approved.] Malone v. Hawley, Ib. 148.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The Supreme Court of New Hampshire have decided, in Winchester v. Nutter et al., that

1. The common law allowing actions to be maintained upon a wager, in cases not contrary to public policy, or prohibited by statute, has never been adopted in this State.

2. In this State all wager contracts are void; but a bet or wager unconnected with a criminal offence, is no offence against the criminal law.

3. A bet upon the result of a squirrel hunt is not a violation of any law of this State.

4. The plaintiff presided at a meeting at which it was agreed to have a squirrel hunt. The side that should be beaten in the contest was to pay for supper for both sides. It was arranged that each man should pay for his own supper, and for that of one man on the victorious side; but the two captains (the defendants) were to engage and be responsible for the suppers for all the men, and the matter was to be afterwards adjusted between the captains and their men. In pursuance of this arrangement, the plaintiff furnished suppers for all the men, knowing and understanding fully how the suppers were to be paid for in the end. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover of the two defendants the price of all the suppers.

NEW YORK.

The Court of Appeals, per Rapello, J., in Baker v. Drake et al., decided as follows:

The plaintiff and defendants, who were stock brokers, entered into an agreement whereby the plaintiff was to deposit with the defendants such collateral security or margin as they should from time to time require, and they were to purchase certain stocks, and to hold and carry the same, subject to the plaintiff's direction as to the sale and disposition thereof, as long as he should desire, and would not sell or dispose of the same unless plaintiff's margin should be exhausted or insufficient, and not then unless they should demand of him increased security, or require him to take and pay for the stocks. In an action to recover damages for a wrongful sale by defendants of said stocks, the judge instructed the jury that the plaintiff, if entitled to recover, was entitled to the difference between the amount for which the stock was sold by the defendants and the highest market value which it reached at any time after such sale down to the day of trial. Held, error. Markham v. Jaudon, 41 N. Y. 235, overruled as to the rule of damages.—8 A. L. J., 340.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The Orphans' Court of Lancaster county, per LIVINGSTON, J., November 15th, 1873, decided that,

1. Specific legacies and legacies in their nature specific, will not be under the necessity of abating with the general legacies. If the fund provided for the discharge of the legacies, in their nature specific, fail or be deficient, they are so far general as to call upon the general legatees proportionally to contribute towards the loss or deficiency.

2. Where a debtor bequeaths a legacy to his creditor of equal or greater amount than the debt, and of the same character, and payable after the debt becomes due, it is the practice of courts of equity to regard it prima facie as intended to be in satisfaction of the debt. However, where the legacy and the debt are of different natures, as lands and moneys, the former will not be a satisfaction of the latter.

3. One may give a present bond to pay a sum of money at his or her death, and a delivery of it to the obligee renders it perfect as a present obligation, though payable as a subsequent, whether a fixed or uncertain period to be afterwards ascertained and made certain. It is strictly "debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro," and is as irrevocable as any other obligation under seal, which in law imparts consideration.—Hershey's Estate.

ILLINOIS.

The Supreme Court of Illinois, in Yocum v. Smith, 6 Legal News, 51, decided,

The note in suit was purchased in good faith by the holder before maturity, and was duly endorsed to him. When the note was signed, a blank space was left between the words hundred and dollars, which it was claimed was filled by adding the words "and twenty:" Held, under the evidence, if the note has been altered, the maker has acted with too gross carelessness to be entitled to protection; that the maker placed it in the power of another to do an injury, and if any loss result, he must suffer who is the cause of it.

ENGLAND.

LIBEL.

The Court of Common Pleas, England, 28 L. T., N. S. 598, April 25th, 1873, in Gourley v. Phin, decided,

1. As a general rule, in actions for defamation, the ordinary plea that the matters complained of by the declaration are true in substance and in fact, is sufficient, and will be allowed.

2. Therefore, when the plaintiff charged as a libel, and set out in his long declaration passages from a book written by the defendant, imputing to the former that he, being a ship owner, sent vessels to sea overloaded and unseaworthy, and over insured, with a wilful and reckless disregard of the lives on board, and with the object of losing the ships, and a general plea of justification was pleaded, and the court allowed the plea, on the ground that particulars thereof might be obtained, and that such a plea with particulars is in practice preferable to a special plea.

MENTAL CAPACITY.

The Court of Probate, 28 L. T., N. S. 562, June 21st, 1873, in Boughton et al. v. Knight et al., decided, that Mental capacity is a question of degree, but the highest degree of capacity is required to make a testamentary disposition, inasmuch as it involves a larger and wider survey of facts than is needed to enter into the ordinary contracts of life. A sound mind in contemplation of law does not necessarily mean a perfectly balanced mind.

FOURTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Court of Common Pleas of Alleghany County.

IN EQUITY.

WOODS et al. v. HARE et al.

1. The act of Assembly of 1871, providing for a vote of the people upon the question of calling a constitutional convention, and the act of 1872, which provided for calling it, were both constitutional and valid.
2. There is underlying our whole system of government, a principle of acknowledged right, in the people to change their constitutions, except where specially prohibited in a constitution itself, in all cases and at all times, whether there is a way provided in their constitution or not.
3. A convention to amend the constitution without the power passed upon by the people, in determining the question of amendments, has inherently, by the very nature of the case, under the great principle, quasi-revolutionary in its character, above mentioned, absolute power, so far as may be necessary to carry out the purpose for which they were called into existence by the popular will.
4. Unless prohibited or restricted in the manner specified by the people, the convention has a right, untrammeled by mere legislative limitations, to propose to the people for their consideration and adoption any plan they may see fit.

Demurrer to plaintiffs' bill.

Opinion of the court by STOWE, A. L. J. Delivered December 6th, 1873.

Waiving for the present, the minor questions involved in this demurrer with reference to the right of the plaintiffs to have the relief they ask, in case the allegations of the bill regarding the unconstitutionality of the acts of Assembly through which the constitutional convention of 1872 was convened, are correct, we come at once to the great question of the legal force and effect of the several acts of Assembly specified in the bill. It is undoubtedly correct as claimed by counsel for respondents, that the demurrer admits only the truth of the several facts alleged, and not the conclusions of law set out as arising from those facts; and, therefore, we are bound to determine for ourselves, as a constituent part of the cause, whether these conclusions are warranted by the facts, and not to assume that these acts of Assembly are unconstitutional, simply because it so alleged in the bill.

I have no difficulty in concluding that if the acts of Assembly in question are unconstitutional and void, the convention was an illegal body and its acts revolutionary; and that in such case it would be the duty of courts to exercise all their authority to prevent its mandates being carried into effect to the injury of any individual; that the Legislature would be bound to enact such laws as might be necessary to punish any attempt to force upon the people its revolutionary work, and the executive officers of the State to use all their powers, civil and military, to suppress it.

If, however, in the face of all this, such force, moral or physical, was brought to bear as to overawe or compel the submission of the legal authorities of the State, then, indeed, the arm of the law would be paralyzed, and the proposed constitution would become effective, not by the law, but by that higher right of revolution, which is above all law, but is nowhere recognized by it. Courts can know nothing by anticipation. They are bound to determine the law as it is previous to the successful accomplishment of revolution, as though such a fact was impossible; but when accomplished and duly recognized by the political powers of the government, the courts have no alternative but to accept the fact without question, and act accordingly.

While these courts must recognize the powers that be, though the product of revolution, they are bound to use all their legitimate authority to suppress acts actually or ostensibly revolutionary, as though they were simply rebellious, and could never become legitimate.

Coming then to the question of the constitutionality of the act to authorize a popular vote upon the question of calling a convention to amend the constitution, approved June 2d, 1871, and also the act passed subsequent to the election held in pursuance of same, entitled "An act to provide for calling a convention to amend the constitution," approved April 11th, 1872, raised by the 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th and 7th sections of complainants' bill, it is claimed that they are both unconstitutional and invalid, because—

First. There is no power given by the present constitution to the Legislature authorizing such a proceeding.

Second. There is a different method provided by the constitution by which it may be amended, and therefore, upon well recognized principles of law, the legal conclusion arises that no other exists.

It cannot be claimed that the authority for the legislation and proceedings taken in reference to calling this convention are expressly set out in the constitution, but it is argued that the power arises under the second section of the declaration of rights, which declares that "All power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety and happiness. For the advancement of these ends they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform or abolish their government in such manner as they may think proper," all of which is, inter alia, excepted out of the general powers of government, and is to "forever remain inviolate."

It is difficult to see how such a withholding of power from the government can, strictly speaking, create a right in the Legislature from which it is thus withheld, to exercise that power; but if it should appear that such power exists above and before the constitution as a great natural and indefeasible right, and has been so recognized and acted upon frequently as a fundamental principle underlying all free government, this provision will sufficiently appear to be a solemn declaration of the existence of such right, and may in ordinary parlance fairly be said, and without any great breadth of legal accuracy, to confer a power under the constitution.

Before, however, entering into a consideration of this question, it will be necessary to examine whether there is anything in the constitution, as urged in the second proposition, which directly, or by necessary legal implication, takes away such a fundamental right as we have suggested, in case it existed where there was not constitutional restriction.

It is urged, and with much apparent force, that because the constitution, in the tenth article "of amendments," provides a certain and carefully defined way of amending the fundamental law, the well recognized legal maxim ordinarily applied to the construction of deeds and written instruments, as well as acts of legislation —expressio unius est exclusio alterius— leads to the fixed legal presumption that no amendment can, under the constitution, be made to it, except in the way thus specially provided.

The rule enunciates one of the first principles applicable to the construction of deeds and ordinary instruments between parties (Lord Denman, C. J., 5 Bing. N. C. 185); but great caution is requisite in its application (Price v. The Great Western Railway Company, 16 M. & W. 244, Broom's Legal Maxims, 595), and it has long been settled in commercial transactions that custom and usage are allowed to control or rebut the implication arising under the rule.

Mr. Broom says: "While this rule is of important and extensive application, both in the construction of written instruments and verbal contracts, as also in determining the inferences which may be fairly drawn from expressions used or declarations made with reference to particular circumstances, it is by no means of universal conclusive application. For example, it is a familiar doctrine that though where a statute makes unlawful that which was lawful before, and appoints a specific remedy, that remedy must be pursued and no other, yet where the offence was antecedently punished by a common law proceeding, and a statute prescribes a particular remedy in case of disobedience, that such remedy is cumulative, and proceedings may be had either at common law or under the statute."

Custom and usage have also been allowed to aid in interpreting acts of parliament, and that exposition, says Lord Cooke, shall be preferred which is applied by constant use and experience. It is by no means certain that the maxim alluded to should find any favor as a general rule of interpretation of an instrument like a constitution, which must of necessity deal in generalities; but at all events, if so applied, it must in all such cases be considered as overcome by an established or common usage or understanding indicating a different conclusion.

Mr. Jameson, in his work on constitutional conventions, page 572, says with great force upon this question: "Viewed upon principle, were there no authority upon the point, it would be doubtful whether in dealing with great questions of politics and government, the same maxim ought to prevail which regulates the construction of contracts between man and man. As a matter of speculation, it may be admitted that the rule expresses the weight of probability equal in cases of great and small magnitudes. But there is always a doubt, and between the cases indicated there is the wide difference, that in ordinary contracts it is impossible to enforce the construction which the courts shall pronounce the true one, whilst in the case of constitutional provisions regulating great organic movements, to hold such a maxim applicable, would be, by presenting barriers to the attainment of what the people generally desire, to make that revolutionary which perhaps was not so. Where the intention of the framers of a constitution is doubtful, the people assuming power under the broader construction should have the benefit of the doubt; and that all the more because in opposition to them our courts are comparatively powerless. It is infinitely better where no principle is violated, that a constitution should be so construed as to make their action legal rather than illegal."

So far as judicial opinion is concerned, it has been said by the Supreme Court of New York, that the maxim is to be applied to ordinary contracts rather than constitutional provisions. Barto v. Himrod, 4 Selden, 433. While the judges of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts have expressed a different opinion, 6 Cushing, 573, holding that under the constitution of Massachusetts, containing a provision substantially like our own, no power existed to amend, except as provided in the article of amendments. As the matter of history, however, a convention was called by the Legislature in 1853, twenty years after his opinion was given to propose a constitution; and while the question was raised as to the legality of such convention, it was ably vindicated by the best lawyers in the State, among them, Choate, Parker and Morton—the latter one of the judges of the court at the time the opinion was given, and a constitution proposed and submitted to the people.

Turning now to the history of the government of the various States for the purpose of discovering what the usage in such cases has been, we find the practice has been so frequent and uniform as to clearly indicate what the common understanding of the people, lawyers and laymen, has uniformly been in regard to this question.

So far as I am able to learn, there has been until 1865 (throwing out of consideration the rebel States during 1861 and afterwards, while undergoing reconstruction) twenty-five constitutional conventions called by the Legislatures of the various States without any special authorization in their constitutions. In Georgia, January 4th, 1789, May 4th, 1798 and 1838; in South Carolina, 1790; in New Hampshire, 1791; in New York, 1801, 1821 and 1846; in Connecticut, 1813; in Massachusetts, 1829, 1853; in Rhode Island, 1824, 1834, 1841 and 1842; in Virginia, 1829, 1854 and 1864; in North Carolina, 1835; in Pennsylvania, 1837; in New Jersey, 1844; in Missouri, 1845, 1861 and 1865; in Indiana, 1850.

Mr. Webster stated in 1848, in his argument before the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Luther v. Borden, "That of the old thirteen States their constitutions, with but one exception, contained no provision for their own amendment, yet there is hardly one that has not altered its constitution, and it has been done by conventions called by the Legislatures, as an ordinary exercise of power." If this is true, and my own examination, so far as, with the time and opportunity since the argument of this case, I have been able to make it, has verified it, as well as shown the continuation of the same practice to the present day—it would seem as though the question as to whether the calling of a constitutional convention was a legal exercise of power by the Legislature, should now be considered by all judicial tribunals as settled so firmly as a part of the common law of our government, that any attempt to disturb it at this day would savor more of revolution than legitimacy. He would be bold indeed who would now assert that all these conventions were usurpations, and that all the constitutions proposed by them and adopted by the people were revolutionary.

The conclusion that I have drawn from all this is, that there is underlaying our whole system of American government, a principle of acknowledged right in the people to change their constitutions, except where specially prohibited in a constitution itself, in all cases and at all times, whether there is a way provided in eir constitutions or not, by the interposition of the Legislature and the calling of a convention, as was done in the case in hand.

The offspring of revolution originally, but restrained and modified by the necessity arising out of the new principle established in this country by the accomplishment of our national independence, that the people and not the king are the government, and the source of all political power, it has become legitimated, and without mention in our constitution, is as much the law of the land as if specifically set out in them; and that as a solemn recognition of this, and not as a revolutionary right, the second section of our declaration of rights in our own, and similar clauses in other State constitutions, were inserted.

The somewhat similar expression contained in the Declaration of Independence was clearly revolutionary, and so intended to be; but that was a paper published to the world to justify our refusal to longer submit to governmental authority, and spoke of the rights of the people as against the oppression of constituted authorities; but in all instruments established by the people themselves for their own government, the only rational view is to consider it as above stated, the introduction of a constitutional and legal revolution, by the consent of the constituted authorities of the State. This is absolutely indispensable, as is now admitted by all. To give the force and effect of law to the proceeding, it must emanate from the legislative authority, and be the result of its permission or direction. The only way the people can legally act under a constitution such as ours, is through their representatives, and, therefore, no matter how many may favor a convention to change the constitution, if one should be called and convene without proper authority from the existing government, its action would be clearly illegal and the result of illegitimate power. It follows, then, that the action of the Legislature in authorizing a vote of the people on the question of the amendment of their constitution, and subsequently by another act authorizing the election of delegates, was a legal exercise of legislative power, and constitutional, unless something in the acts themselves is in conflict with some constitutional provision.

This is claimed by the plaintiffs in the fourth section of their bill, because they say these acts are in violation of the first section of the third article of the constitution, which gives, as they allege, to every qualified voter the right to vote for as many persons as are to be chosen to fill offices, and of the fifth section of the ninth article, which provides that "elections shall be free and equal."

Suffice it to say as to the first suggestion, that the constitution nowhere provides that every elector shall have a right to vote for as many as are to be chosen; nor do I think it at all necessary that implication in cases of offices which may be created and made elective by the Legislature. In cases of what are called constitutional offices, a different question is presented, which we need not now consider.

The second objection is that it violates the clause requiring elections to be free and equal. A careful consideration of this provision, and a comparison of it with similar and kindred provisions of the constitution of other States, satisfy me that no such limitations as were suggested is contemplated by the provision. I understand it to be nothing more than a declaration that elections shall be public and open to all duly qualified alike, without discrimination as to individuals or classes. From these views it appears that the objections raised to the manner of electing the delegates to the convention are not valid, and both the acts mentioned, are in our opinion constitutional, and the delegates to the convention were legally elected.

The eighth, ninth, and tenth paragraphs of the bill complain of illegal acts done by the convention. First, in refusing a separate submission to a popular vote of the fifth article relating to the judiciary, the contingency having arisen under which, by the act of the Legislature, they were bound to do so; and second, in altering several of the provisions of the bill of rights contrary to the limitations imposed in the fourth section of the act of April 11th, 1872; and third, in disregarding the act of Assembly under which the convention was called, in regard to submitting the amended constitution to a vote of the people and ordaining a different method.

These objections are all consistent with the conclusions already arrived at, and if valid would raise further questions under the bill, notwithstanding what has been already said, and should therefore be considered.

Looking upon general principles at the real questions involved, which is how far, if at all, a constitutional convention, regularly called, may legally disregard limitations upon its action by the Legislature, I have no difficulty in arriving at what seems to me to be the correct rule. A convention to amend the constitution, without the power passed upon by the people in determining the question of amendment, has inherently by the very nature of the case under the great principle peculiar to America, and quasi-revolutionary in its character heretofore mentioned, absolute power, so far as may be necessary to carry out the purpose for which they were called into existence by the popular will, unless prohibited or restricted in the manner specified, by the people, the convention has a right, untrammelled by mere legislative limitations, to propose to the people for their consideration and adoption any plan they may see fit. In saying this we are not to be understood as holding that the convention is in any respect the supreme power of the State. We take it to be simply the attorney for the people, with plenary power to do what is required of it, but nothing beyond, subject to the limitations by the people just mentioned. A constitution's convention, in the language of Mr. Wilson, in the Federal convention of 1787, has the power to conclude nothing, but to propose anything.

Such too is the inevitable result of the views already expressed as to the purpose and effect of the second section of the declaration of rights. If it be taken as a constitutional recognition of the principle of legal revolution (so to speak) and of a popular power as we believe, the obvious result follows, that when once called into operation by the power authority it cannot be subversed nor restrained by the Legislature?

If this is correct the convention was right in disregarding the limitations sought to be imposed upon its power, both as to what it should propose to change in the present constitution and how the proposal should be submitted to the people for their adoption or rejection.

The third point, raising the question of the right of the convention to provide a way by an ordinance differing from and substantially repealing the act of the Legislature, presents a very different question from the one we have just considered. It is, however, immaterial to the determination of the real issue in this case. Assuming it to be an excess of power, the complainants can be in no wise affected by it as taxpayers. It is entirely immaterial to them in that respect whether the ordinance is legal or illegal. Their own interest is that of knowing whether the convention had such a power or not as a mere abstract question, which gives them no standing in court. So far as the county is concerned, there was no attempt by the convention to change the law made by the Legislature. The election which will be held within our jurisdiction, and for which the complainants as taxpayers may be called upon to pay, will be held under what the complainants themselves say is the law, unless the submission of the proposed new constitution is itself, as it stands to-day, illegal and unconstitutional.

There are other questions involved in the case, as to the standing and equity of the plaintiffs under this bill, in view of the relief prayed for, but the conclusions already expressed render it unnecessary to examine them.

The result is, the demurrer must be sustained and plaintiff's bill dismissed.

COLLIER, A. L. J., concurred.

His honor, Judge Stowe, then read the following remarks: "We have no particular apology to offer for the hasty and crude opinion just delivered in this case. The emergency, as well as what was due, not so much to the parties named in the bill as to the public, have induced us not only to decide but to present our views upon the main questions involved at the soonest practicable moment. In this great haste details of date and some minor matters in regard to historical facts may be slightly inaccurate, by reason of want of time and opportunity to obtain absolutely correct data. But however this may be, we have no doubt that the great facts upon which our views are founded are absolutely reliable, and whether we may be able to convince others or not of the correctness of our views, we have been unhesitatingly led to believe them correct ourselves."

AN ACT

To authorize a popular vote on the question of calling a convention to amend the constitution of Pennsylvania.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That the question of calling a convention to amend the constitution of this commonwealth be submitted to a vote of the people at the general election, to be held on the second Tuesday of October next, the said question to be voted upon in manner following, to wit: In counties and cities in which slip-ticket voting is authorized by law, votes for and against a convention may be expressed and given upon the ticket, headed or endorsed with the word "State," and not otherwise; and the words used shall be "constitutional convention," and underneath "for a convention" or "against a convention;" and in counties or districts in which slip-ticket voting shall

AN ACT

To provide for calling a convention to amend the constitution.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That at the general election to be held on the second Tuesday of October next, there shall be elected by the qualified electors of this commonwealth, delegates to a convention to revise and amend the constitution of this State; the said convention shall consist of one hundred and thirty-three members, to be elected in the manner following: twenty-eight members thereof shall be elected in the State at large, as follows: Each voter of the State shall vote for not more than fourteen candidates, and the twenty-eight highest in vote shall be declared elected; ninety-nine delegates shall be apportioned to and elected from the different senatorial districts of the State, three delegates to be elected for each senator therefrom; and in choosing all district delegates, each voter shall be entitled to vote for not more than two of the members to be chosen from his district, and the three candidates highest in vote shall be declared elected, except in the county of Alleghany, forming the twenty-third senatorial district, where no voter shall vote for more than six candidates, and the nine highest in vote shall be elected, and in the counties of Luzerne, Monroe and Pike, forming the thirteenth senatorial district, where no voter shall vote for more than four candidates, and the six highest in vote shall be elected; and six additional delegates shall be chosen from the city of Philadelphia, by a vote at large in said city, and in their election no voter shall vote for more than three candidates, and the six highest in vote shall be declared elected.

SECT. 2. The following regulations shall apply to the aforesaid election to be held on the second Tuesday of October next, and to returns of same:

First. The said election shall be held and conducted by the proper election officers of the several election districts of the commonwealth, and shall be governed and regulated in all respects by the general election laws of the commonwealth, so far as the same shall be applicable thereto, and not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

Second. The tickets to be voted for members at large of the convention shall have on the outside the words, "delegates at large," and on the inside the names of the candidates to be voted for, not exceeding fourteen in number.

Third. The tickets to be voted for district members of the convention shall have on the outside the words, "district delegates," and on the inside the name or names of the candidates voted for, not exceeding the proper number limited as aforesaid; but any ticket which shall contain a greater number of names than the number for which the voter shall be entitled to vote, shall be rejected; and in the case of the delegates, to be chosen at large in Philadelphia, the words "city delegates," shall be on the outside of the ticket.

Fourth. In the city of Philadelphia the return judges shall meet at the State House, at ten o'clock on Thursday next following the election, and make out the returns for said city, of the votes cast therein for delegates at large and city and district delegates, to be members of the convention; the return judges of the several election districts within each county of the State, excluding Philadelphia, shall meet on the Friday next following the election, at the usual place for the meeting of the return judges of their county, and shall make out full and accurate returns for the county, of the votes cast therein for members of the convention and for district members of the same; and the proceedings of the return judges of the said city of Philadelphia, and of the several counties of the commonwealth, in the making of their returns, shall be the same as those prescribed for return judges in the case of an election for governor, except that returns transmitted to the secretary of the commonwealth, shall be addressed to that officer alone and not to the speaker of the Senate.

Fifth. The prothonotary of Philadelphia, and the prothonotaries of the several counties, shall, with reference to such returns, promptly and faithfully perform all the duties enjoined upon them by the eighty-fourth and eighty-fifth sections of the general election act of July second, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine.

Sixth. The secretary of the commonwealth shall as soon as the returns of said election shall be received by him, and at all events within fifteen days after the election, in the presence of the governor and auditor general, open and compute all the returns received of votes given for members of the convention, and the governor shall forthwith issue his proclamation, declaring the names of the persons who have been chosen members of the convention.

SECT. 3. It shall be the duty of the delegates, elected as aforesaid, to assemble in in convention in the hall of the House of Representatives, at the State capitol, in Harrisburg, third Tuesday of November, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, at twelve o'clock M., that day, with general powers of adjournment as to time and place; and it shall be the duty of the secretary of the commonwealth to call the convention to order at that time of its assembling, and to submit all the returns of election in his possession, and to read the aforesaid proclamation of the governor; and thereupon said convention shall proceed to organize by electing one of their number as president, and after the members are sworn in, such other officers as may be needed in the transaction of business.

SECT. 4. Said convention, so elected, assembled and organized, shall have power to propose to the citizens of this commonwealth, for their approval or rejection, a new constitution or amendments to the present one, or specific amendments to be voted for separately, which shall be engrossed and signed by the president and chief clerk, and delivered to the secretary of the commonwealth, by whom and under whose direction it or they shall be entered on record in his office, and published once a week in at least two newspapers in each county where two papers are published, for four weeks next preceding the day of election that shall be held for the adoption or rejection of the constitution or amendments so submitted: Provided, That one-third of all the members of the convention shall have the right to require the separate and distinct submission, to a popular vote, of any change and amendment proposed by the convention: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the said convention to change the language, or to alter in any manner the several provisions of the ninth article of the present constitution, commonly known as the declaration of rights, but the same shall be excepted from the powers given to said convention, and shall be and remain inviolate forever: And provided further, That the said convention shall not create, establish or submit any proposition for the establishment of a court or courts with exclusive equity jurisdiction.

SECT. 5. The convention shall submit the amendments agreed to by it, to the qualified voters of the State for their adoption or rejection, at such time or times, and in such manner as the convention shall prescribe, subject, however, to the limitation as to the separate submission of amendments contained in this act; and all amendments accepted by a majority vote of the electors voting thereon, shall become a part of the constitution.

SECT. 6. The election to decide for or against the adoption of the new constitution or specific amendments, shall be conducted as the general elections of this commonwealth are now by law conducted; and it shall be the duty of the return judges of the respective counties, first having ascertained the number of votes given for or against the new constitution or separate specific amendments, if any, to make out duplicate returns thereof, expressed in words at length, one of which returns so made shall be filed in the office of the prothonotary of the proper county, and the other sealed and directed to the secretary of the commonwealth; which said returns shall be opened, counted and published, as the returns for governor are now by law counted and published; and when the number of votes given for or against the new or revised constitution, or for or against separate and specific amendments, if any, shall have been summed up and ascertained, and the duplicate certificates thereof delivered to the proper officers, the governor shall declare, by proclamation, the result of the election; and if a majority of the votes polled shall be for the new or revised constitution, or for any separate specific amendments, such new or revised constitution and separate specific amendments shall be thenceforth the constitution of this commonwealth

SECT. 7. The entire compensation and allowance to each member of the convention shall be as follows: For salary, one thousand dollars; for mileage, ten cents per mile circular, not to be allowed at more than two sessions; for postage, stationery and contingencies, fifty dollars; the clerks and other officers to be allowed such compensation as the convention shall direct. Warrants for compensation of members and officers, and for all proper expenses of the convention, shall be drawn by the president, and countersigned by the chief clerk, upon the State treasurer for payment.

SECT. 8. That in case of vacancies in the membership of said convention, the same shall be filled as follows: If such vacancy shall be of a member at large of the convention, those members at large who shall have been voted for by the same voters, or by a majority of the same voters who shall have voted for and elected the member whose place is to be filled, shall fill such vacancy; if such vacancy shall be of a district or city member of the convention, those members at large of the convention who shall have been voted for by the same, or by a majority of the same voters who shall have voted for such district or city member, shall fill such vacancy; in either case, the appointment to fill a vacancy shall be made by the members at large aforesaid, or by a majority of them, in writing; and all such written appointments shall be filed among the convention records.

SECT. 9. That the secretary of the commonwealth shall prepare a form of notice of the election to be held for the purpose of choosing members of the aforesaid convention, including such portions of this act as shall be necessary and proper for the information of voters and election officers at the said election, as to their respective rights and duties in relation thereto; which said form, so prepared, shall be transmitted by him to the sheriffs of the several counties, to be observed by them in making proclamation of the holding of said election in their respective jurisdictions.

SECT. 10. That the secretary of the commonwealth be authorized to obtain for said convention, prior to the meeting of the same, such publications relating to constitutional amendments and reform, and cause to be prepared such statistical information as may be convenient and useful to the convention in the performance of its duties; and the proper expense so incurred, not exceeding six hundred dollars, shall be paid at the treasury, upon settlement made in the office of the auditor general.

THE GREAT CASES.

We surrender nearly the whole of our space this week, to the opinions rendered by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, at Nisi Prius, and the Court of Common leas of Alleghany county, in the Convention cases—the most important that have ever occupied the attention of a judicial tribunal in this commonwealth. In the Philadelphia case, the election ordinance passed by the constitutional convention, was declared to be invalid, and an illegal assumption of arbitrary power upon the part of the convention. The Legislature was in effect, declared to be the supreme power of the State, capable in its omnipotence of calling into existence a constitutional convention, of limiting that inferior body to the consideration of such subjects as in its wisdom it might deem proper to permit, and notwithstanding the fact that the people (who heretofore have been considered above the Legislature) by their approval expressed in a legal way—at the polls—signified their desire to have a convention, of still further controlling, and limiting that convention in such manner as it might deem fit.

In the Pittsburg case, an effort was made to have the acts of Assembly of 1871 and 1872, declared unconstitutional, on the ground that the constitution did not allow alterations in it to be made by means of a convention, and also to have certain acts of the convention declared illegal and invalid as contravening the acts of Assembly in question. Both efforts fortunately failed, the court declaring that a constitutional convention, when not limited by the people when they vote upon the question of calling it, has an inherent right to propose such an instrument for the consideration of the people as it may think proper.

We do not wish to be understood as questioning the honesty of the opinion delivered by the Supreme Court, for we undoubtedly believe that it was the decided and honest conviction of every judge upon the bench, but we do think, with all due respect to their judgmen that they are mistaken in their views of the law, and as one of our daily contemporaries remarked, we believe that the day will come when the very court of which they are now members, will declare exactly the reverse. However, it was not our intention to criticize the action of the court, but merely to call the careful attention of our readers to the great questions involved. We are glad to see that the chief justice, who himself delivered the opinion, has published a letter, which we give below, in which he states that he is in favor of the new constitution. We are the more glad of it, because there is no man in the commonwealth, whom we more highly respect.

LETTER OF CHIEF JUSTICE AGNEW.

BEAVER, December 8, 1873.

SIR:—I find that my private opinions of the proposed new constitution, notwithstanding their frequent expression, are misunderstood. Knowing, as I do, how often the opinions of the judges are supposed by the public to reflect their private opinions, outside of the legal question decided, I feel it due to my convictions and to the cause of the new constitution to say I shall support it. My opinion, delivered last week in Philadelphia, was upon the power of the convention, not the merit of its works. That opinion was the result of mature thought upon the powers of the people living under a constitution and a government of their own appointment, and that the rights, interest, and security of the people in a state of tranquility must necessarily forbid the exercise of their original powers, except in an authorized form, to collect the will of the body politic in its entirety.

As to the merits of the new constitution, I purposely avoided making up my mind until I had the whole work before me. A careful consideration of it convinces me it contains serious errors and defects, yet that as a whole its merits outweigh its demerits; that these merits are general, contained in a great body of amendments which cannot be reproduced except by another convention, not likely to assemble in my lifetime, while the demerits are particular and special, and can be removed by the process of legislative amendments. Some of the errors are flagrant, and some of the defects patent, and were there no means of curing them, I might vote against the whole.

General amendment can be had only through a convention. Such a convention is of rare occurrence, and does not arrive until the wrongs or radical defects of the government force the people to call one. From 1790 to 1837 was an interval of forty-seven years. The interval from 1837 till 1872 was thirty-five years. It would be in vain to expect at the hands of two successive Legislatures the article on legislation, the change in the mode of passing bills, the articles on private corporations and on elections, and perhaps some other amendments. To lose these would be a great loss. But errors and defects that need correction are not general, but particular, and will soon display themselves in the practical workings of the new constitution; and these can be remedied. The force of public opinion will compel legislative action, and the necessary changes be adopted.

The principle of my action as a citizen, then, is this: If I do not vote for the new constitution I shall get nothing. If I vote for it I shall obtain the good, and the bad will necessarily bring about future amendment. The good is general, and cannot be had without a new convention; the bad is particular, and can be cured through the Legislature. It requires divine power to create a body and breathe life into it; but the knife of a skilful surgeon can cut off excrescences, or cut out diseased flesh, leaving nature to renew herself by means of her own processes.

Hence, it seems to me to be the part of wisdom to accept the new constitution, and trust to time and public sentiment to cure the errors and supply the defects. The means of so doing can be readily had in a joint commission of the two houses, or a commission of a few of the best men in the State to report amendments to the Legislature for its adoption. In this way a full and perfect body of amendments can be submitted hereafter to the people.

Yours, &c.,
DANIEL AGNEW.

Hon. WM. H. ARMSTRONG, Chairman.

THE BAR AND THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

Throughout the State, the members of the legal profession seem to be generally taking a warm interest in favor of the constitution. One hundred and sixty lawyers of Pittsburg, comprising nearly the whole bar of Alleghany county, have issued a card in its support. In Schuylkill county, the judges and nearly every lawyer of the county, are in favor of it. So it is in many other counties of the State. The lawyers of Berks county recently passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That we recognize in this instrument a combination of wholesome restrictions of corporate and legislative powers, and wise and well considered provisions, for the security of the public moneys, the protection of popular rights, and assurance of individual responsibility, and that we cordially recommend it to the support of the people of this county, irrespective of party predilections, and will use our best endeavors, in common with all friends of good government, to secure its adoption.

That in view of the anticipated opposition to the new constitution from the larger cities, incited by corrupt combinations, we earnestly urge upon our fellow-citizens of all parties the importance, as well as the necessity, of attending the election, so as to insure its ratification beyond peradventure; that the members of the association be requested to append their names hereto upon the minutes, and that the action of this meeting be published in the several newspapers of the city and county.

The lawyers of Lycoming county, have pronounced openly in favor of it. At a meeting held on Tuesday evening last, in Wilkesbarre, Hon. Garrick M. Harding (a republican in politics), president judge of Luzerne, presided, and a paper signed by the judges, and nearly every lawyer of that great county, was read. In almost every county of the State, the bar is largely in favor of the new constitution. In Philadelphia, Horace Binney, the oldest and one of the most talented members of the bar, heads a long list of names in favor of the instrument, and so the bar, which generally represents the wishes of the intelligent part of the community, sets its emphatic seal of approval upon the work of the convention.

Supreme Court of Penna, at Nisi Prius.

IN EQUITY.

FRANCIS WELLS et al. v. JAMES BAIN et al., EDWIN H. FITLER et al.

JOHN H. DONNELLY v. EDWIN H. FITLER et al.

The constitutional convention of Pennsylvania before adjourning, passed an "ordinance," regulating the time and manner of holding the election for voting upon the proposed new constitution prepared by them. The ordinance provided inter alia, for the appointment of election commissioners for the city of Philadelphia, who were to conduct the election in that place, in accordance with the regulations laid down for their guidance in the ordinance. The regulations being contrary to the general election laws of the commonwealth, as applicable to Philadelphia, an injunction was sought for to restrain the commissioners, and the officers appointed by them, from conducting the election, and to restrain the city officials from furnishing blanks, &c., to the commissioners, or otherwise expending the city moneys for the expenses of said commissioners. The Supreme Court at Nisi Prius granted the injunction, holding as follows:

1. The constitutional convention was the off-spring of law, which law was the only form in which the Legislature, the body invested with the powers of government, could act, and thereby its (the Legislature's), own consent be given and revolution avoided.
2. The law being the instrument of delegation, the act of Assembly or warrant to the delegates from the people (i. e., the members of the convention) was the only chart of their powers.
3. The delegates possess no inherent power, and when convened by law at the time and place fixed in it, sit and act under it, as their letter of attorney from the people themselves.
4. The act of Assembly of April 11th, 1872, which provided "for calling of a convention to amend the constitution," gave the convention no power to frame the ordinance in question, which is, therefore, illegal and void.
5. The court has jurisdiction to restrain invasions of right without authority under the existing laws, and therefore has jurisdiction of this case.

Opinion by Agnew, C. J. Delivered December 5th, 1873.

Since the Declaration of Independence in 1776, it has been an axiom of the American people, that all just government is founded in the consent of the people. This is recognized in the second section of the declaration of rights of the constitution of Pennsylvania, which affirms that the people "have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform or abolish their government in such manner as they may think proper." A self-evident corollary is, that an existing lawful government of the people cannot be altered or abolished unless by the consent of the same people, and this consent must be legally gathered or obtained. The people here meant are the whole—those who constitute the entire State, male and female citizens, infants and adults. A mere majority of those persons who are qualified as electors are not the people, though when authorized to do so, they may represent the whole people.

The words "in such manner as they may think proper," in the declaration of rights, embrace but three known recognized modes by which the whole people, the State, can give their consent to an alteration of an existing lawful frame of government, viz.:

1. The mode provided in the existing constitution.

2. A law, as the instrumental process of raising the body for revision and conveying to it the powers of the people.

3. A revolution.

The first two are peaceful means through which the consent of the people to alteration is obtained, and by which the existing government consents to be displaced without revolution. The government gives its consent, either by pursuing the mode provided in the constitution, or by passing a law to call a convention. If consent be not so given by the existing government the remedy of the people is in the third mode—revolution.

When a law becomes the instrumental process of amendment, it is not because the Legislature possesses any inherent power to change the existing constitution through a convention, but because it is the only means through which an authorized consent of the whole people, the entire State, can be lawfully obtained in a state of peace. Irregular action, whereby a certain number of the people assume to act for the whole, is evidently revolutionary. The people, that entire body called the State, can be bound as a whole only by an act of authority proceeding from themselves. In a state of peaceful government they have conferred this authority upon a part to speak for the whole only at an election authorized by law. It is only when an election is authorized by law, the electors, who represent the State or whole people, are bound to attend, and if they do not, can be bound by the expression of the will of those who do attend. The electors who can pronounce the voice of the people are those alone who possess the qualifications sanctioned by the people in order to represent them, otherwised they speak for themselves only, and do not represent the people.

The people, having reserved the right to alter or abolish their form of government, have, in the same declaration of their rights, reserved the means of procuring a law as the instrumental process of so doing. The twentieth section is as follows:

"The citizens have a right, in a peaceable manner, to assemble together for their common good, and to apply to those invested with the powers of government for redress of grievances or other proper purposes, by petition, address or remonstrance."

If the Legislature, possessing these powers of government, be unwilling to pass a law to take the sense of the people, or to delegate to a convention all the powers the people desire to confer upon their delegates, the remedy is still in their own hands; they can elect new representatives that will. If their representatives are still unfaithful, or the government becomes tyrannical, the right of revolution yet remains. To what extent the Constitution of the United States controls this it is unnecessary now to inquire.

It is not pretended that the late convention sat as a revolutionary body, or in defiance of the existing government, and it did not proceed in the mode provided for amendment in the constitution, that being a legislative proceeding only. It was, therefore, the offspring of law. It had no other source of existence. The process was an application or petition to the Legislature to call a convention; the passage of a law to gather the sense of the people on the question whether a convention should be called; an election authorized by this law to take the sense of the whole people on this question, and, finally, the passage of a law to call the convention and define its powers and duties. A law is the only form in which the Legislature, the body invested with the powers of government, can act, and thereby its own consent be given and revolution avoided. The people having adopted a proceeding by law, as the means of executing their will, having acted under it and chosen their delegates by virtue of its authority, submitted themselves to it, as their own selected and approved means of carrying out peacefully their purpose of amendment. The law, being thus the instrument of their own choice to express their will, necessarily became the channel of their authority. Having furnished no other means of arriving at their will, it is the only channel through which it has been conveyed. The law, therefore, being the instrument of delegation, the warrant to the delegates from the people becomes the only chart of their powers. The will of the people has been expressed in no other form, and the powers of the delegates, therefore, come in no other wise.

It will not do to assert that the whole original power of the people was conferred by the election. This election itself was a part of the instrumental process of the law, the means provided by this very law, of selecting the delegates. The law was the warrant for their election, and expressed the very terms chosen and adopted by the people, under which they delegated their power to these agents. The delegates possess no inherent power, and when convened by the law at the time and place fixed in it, sit and act under it, as their letter of attorney from the people themselves, and can know and discover the will of the people only so far as they can discern it through this the only warrant they have ever received to act for the people. If they claim through any other source, they must be able to point to it.

Outside of the law to take the sense of the people whether a convention should be called, and the law to call the convention, no other source has been or can be shown. To make this more distinct, let us suppose a voluntary election unauthorized by law, and delegates elected. It is plain a convention composed of such delegates would possess no power to displace the existing government, and impose a new constitution on the whole people. Those voting at the unauthorized election had no power to represent or to bind those who did not choose to vote. A majority of the adult males having the qualifications of electors can bind the whole people only when they have authority to do so.

To make this still more plain. Suppose a constitution formed by a volunteer convention, assuming to represent the people and an attempt to set it up and displace the existing lawful government. It is clear that neither the people as a whole nor the government having given their assent in any binding form, the executive, judiciary and all officers, sworn to support the existing constitution would be bound, in maintenance of the lawfully existing institutions of the people, to resist the usurpation, even to the whole extent of the force of the State. If overpowered, the new government would be established not by peaceful means, but by actual revolution.

It follows, therefore, that in a state of peace a law is the only means by which the will of the whole people can be collected in an authorized form, and the powers of the people can be delegated to the agents who compose the convention. The form of the law is immaterial in this question of derivative authority. It may be a law to confer general authority or one to confer special authority. It may be an invitation in the first place, as was the act of 1789 under which the convention of 1790 was covened, and an authority to the people to meet in primary assemblies to select delegates, and confer on them unrestricted powers; or it may be a law to take the sense of the people on the question of calling a convention, and then a law to make the call and confer the powers the people intend to confer upon their agents. The power to pass the law carries with it of necessity that to frame and declare the terms of the law. The terms of delegation, which the people themselves declare, when acting under and by virtue of the law which they have called to their aid, is the instrumental process of conferring their authorities and reaching their purpose of amendment, become of necessity the terms of their own will. All outside of this channel is revolutionary, for it has neither the consent of the government nor of the people who have called the government to their aid and acted through it. The process of amendment being through the instrumentality of legislation, these laws must be enacted in the forms of the constitution and be interpreted by the rules which govern in the interpretation of laws.

The next inquiry is—What powers of the people were conferred upon the late convention? A change in the fundamental relations of the people and of that sacred compact which they have instituted to guard and protect their own rights and interests is one of vast, indeed most solemn import: for to impose a new constitution without authority, or to usurp powers not delegated, may lead to bloodshed and ruin. The power to act then should be clearly conferred. The sacred fire from the altar of the people's authority cannot be snatched by unhallowed hands.

The present inquiry is not how much power may be conferred by law, but what power was conferred on this convention? A law must be passed according to the forms of the constitution. One of these is that no bill shall contain "more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in the title." The title of the act of June 2d, 1871, is "An act to authorize a popular vote upon the question of calling a convention to amend the constitution of Pennsylvania." The text of the act is "That the question of calling a convention to amend the constitution of the commonwealth be submitted to a vote o the people at the general election, to be held," &c. The one subject of both title and text is the question of calling a convention. That question was authorized to be submitted to a popular vote. In that election each elector expressed his individual opinion on that question, and that alone, by voting "for a convention" or "against a convention." This question was answered in the affirmative by a majority of votes, and the people, answering the Legislature, said, "You may call a convention." This was all the vote expressed. Each vote expressing the opinion of the elector on that question, the majority expressed no more, for the majority was composed of the sum total of the votes on that side. Thus an analysis of the act, both in its title and its text, demonstrates that the vote was not a delegation of power, except to the Legislature. There is no principle of sound interpretation which can extend the voice of the elector or the sum total of those voices, beyond the question each was called to answer. The result of that vote therefore, was that the Legislature might call a convention. It was not in itself a call, nor did it declare when, how, or on what terms the call should be made. That, the very answer to the question proposed to the electors, necessarily left to those who asked their judgment on the propriety of making the call.

It was not even a mandate, further than the moral force contained in an expressed desire of the people. It is very evident, had the matter dropped there, and the Legislature had made no call, no convention and no terms would ever have existed. Not a line, nor a word, nor a syllable in this act expresses an intent of the people to make the call themselves, or on what terms it shall be made, or what powers should be conferred. Did the people by this act, without an expressed intent, and by mere inference, intend to abdicate all their own power, their rights, their interests, and their duty to each other in favor of a body of mere agents, and to confer upon them, by a blank warrant, the absolute power to dictate their institutions, and to determine finally upon all their most cherished interests? If the argument be admitted for an instant that because nothing was said in this law on the subject of delegation, therefore, greater powers were conferred than were granted in the subsequent act of 1872, then all power belonging to the people passed, and they did grant by it the enormous power stated. Then, by a covert intent, hidden in the folds of this act, the people delegated power to repeal all laws, abolish all institutions, and drive from place the Legislature, the governor, the judges, and every officer of the commonwealth, without submitting the work of the delegates to the ratification of the people. If by an ordinance under a power derived from this act of 1871, the delegates can set aside the lawfully existing election laws for Philadelphia, where shall their power end? Can they draw money from the treasury to pay their own salaries? Can they seize and condemn a hall for their own use under the power of eminent domain? It is not possible, by any sound rule of interpretation, natural or civil, we can attribute to the act of 1871, such an enormous, fearful, portentious delegation of power, founded on a vote upon the mere question of calling a convention. The result of the vote on this question declared the sense of the greater number of electors, that a convention might be called. But how called? It was not itself a call. It left that to those invested with the powers of government. In and of itself it conferred no authority upon the delegates, but left that to a subsequent act. The call proceeding from the Legislature was necessarily by means of a law, for in no other form can the legislative will be expressed. When the people called in legislative aid to procure the call of a convention, they knew, therefore, that a law could be the only instrumental process the Legislature could give; and a law being invoked, they know that the power to legislate carried with it the power to frame the terms of the law. They knew still more, when they accepted the law as the means of making the call, that they adopted its terms by acting under it. When, therefore, they, in 1872, elected delegates under the act of 1872. they elected them under the terms and provisions of that law, and none other, for there was no other law under which an authorized and binding election was or could be had. The people themselves, therefore, ratified and adopted the terms of the act of 1872, as the terms on which they delegated their powers to those elected under it. The delegates so elected are clearly estopped, by the record itself, from denying the terms under which they hold their seats, for they hold them under the act of 1872, and no other. The entire process of raising a convention and conferring upon it the powers of the people, was a matter of law, in a state of peace, under the forms of the constitution, through which the consent both of the people and of the existing government was given to prevent the convention from being, or becoming a revolutionary body.

Accordingly, the act of April 11th, 1872, is entitled "An act to provide for calling a convention to amend the constitution." The text of the act is, "that at the general election to be held, &c., there shall be elected by the qualified voters of the commonwealth, delegates, to a convention to revise and amend the constitution of the State," &c. The act then provides for the election, the assembling of the delegates, their powers and duties, and the submission of the constitution or amendments agreed upon to a vote of the people for adoption or rejection. When the people voted under this law, did they not vote for delegates upon the express terms that they should submit their work to the people for approval? Did not every man who went to the polls do so with the belief in his heart that, by the express condition on which his vote was given, the delegates could not bind him without his subsequent assent to what the delegates had done? On what principle of interpretation of human action can the servant now set himself up against the condition of his master and say the condition is void? Who made it void? Not the electors; they voted upon it. The people required the law, as the act of the existing government, to which they had appealed under the bill of rights, to furnish them legal process to raise a convention for revision of their fundamental compact, and without which legal process the act of no one man could bind another. This law, being unrepealed, and being acted upon by the people, became their own delegation of authority—the chart of the delegates to guide and control them in the duties they were elected to perform as the servants of the people. Without this legislation the convention had not existed; and to exist on terms not found in or contrary to the law, is to seek for a grant of powers to be found nowhere else, except in a state of revolution, and, therefore, do not exist in this peaceful process of amendment.

The absolute necessity of the convention to claim the protection of the act of 1872 is seen in another view. Of the one hundred and thirty-three members of this body, less than one hundred in number were elected by the people. Some never received a single vote, but sat by the appointment of men themselves not elected by the people at large. It is not meant to discuss the wisdom or the merits of the so-called limited system of voting, by which a majority of the electors are prevented from voting against persons seeking to represent them; but the purpose now is to show that without the authority of this very act of 1872, more than thirty-three members of the body had no warrant whatever to represent the people. On what principle of right, dominion or power, had these persons any claim to exercise the power of the people, and by their votes, perhaps, to fix upon a people they do not represent, the most odious features of a proposed constitution? Is it not clear that their whole delegated power to speak and to vote for the people, comes from the force and effort of the statute? They have that, and none other.

In considering this question of delegated power some are apt to forget that the people are already under a constitution and an existing frame of government instituted by themselves, which stand as barriers to the exercise of the original powers of the people, unless in an authorized form. They glide insensibly into the domain of abstract rights, and clothe mere agents with primordial power. But delegated authority is derived, and those who claim it must show where and how they derived it. Three and a half or four millions of people cannot assemble themselves together in their primary capacity—they can act only through constituted agencies. No one is entitled to represent them unless he can show their warrant—how and when he was constituted their agent. The great error of the argument of those who claim to be the people, or the delegates of the people, is in the use of the word people. Who are the people? Not so many as choose to assembly in a county, or city, or a district, of their own mere will, and to say—We, the people. Who gave them power to represent all others who stay away? Not even the press, that wide-spread and most powerful of all subordinate agencies, can speak for them by authority. The voice of the people can be heard only through an authorized form, for, as we have seen, without this authority a part cannot speak for the whole, and this brings us back to a law as the only authority by which the will of the whole people, the body politic called the State, can be collected under an existing lawful government. To wander outside of this channel is to run in search of original powers, which, though possessed by the people, they have conferred in no other form. If the power be delegated, it must be seen in the derivation, otherwise it does not exist. If, then, the delegates elected by the people themselves, under the act of 1872, have greater powers than are contained in it, when, where, and how did they obtain them? It is not in the act of 1871, for that, as we have shown, decided but one question, and conferred but one power, to wit: That a convention might be called, and that the Legislature might call it. There is no other source to which this convention can appeal, and, not being found there it is found nowhere.

This brings us to an examination of the powers conferred by the act of 1872, as the dernier resort. The power claimed for the convention is, by ordinance, to raise a commission to direct the election upon the amended constitution, in the city of Philadelphia, and to confer power on this commission to make a registration of voters, and furnish the lists so made to the election officers of each precinct; to appoint a judge and two inspectors for each division, by whom the election thereon shall be conducted. This ordinance further claims the power to regulate the qualifications of the officers thus appointed to hold the election and to control the general returns of the election. It is clear, therefore, that the ordinance assumes a present power to displace the election officers now in office under the election laws for the city, to substitute officers appointed under the authority of the convention, and to set aside these election laws so far as relates to the qualification of the officers and the manner in which the general returns shall be made, and in other respects not necessary to be noticed. The authority to do this is claimed under the fifth section of the act of 1872, giving the convention power to submit the amendments, at such time or times, and in such manner as the convention shall prescribe, subject, however, to the limitation as to the separate submission of amendments contained in this act. It is argued that the manner of submission confers a power to conduct the election upon the matter submitted. To state the proposition is to refute it, for the manner of submitting the amendments is a totally different thing from conducting the election upon the submitted amendments. But it is argued that the fourth, fifth and sixth sections of the act are contradictory, unless the term manner shall be applied to the conducting of the election as well as to the manner of submitting the amendments. The very reverse is true. Each of the three sections has a different subject, and it is clearly provided for in its respective place. These three different subjects are: First, the power to propose amendments; second, the mode or manner in which these propositions shall be submitted, and third, the regulation of the election itself upon the propositions submitted. To be more specific, the fourth section confers the power to propose to the citizens for approval or rejection a new constitution or amendments to the present one, or specific amendments to be voted on separately. Then comes the fifth section, which deals not with the power to propose, but with the manner of submitting the thing proposed; that is, in whole or in parts. This is proved by the condition immediately annexed to the manner, to wit: Subject, however, to the limitation as to separate submission of amendments contained in this act, which was: "Provided, that one-third of all the members of the convention shall have the right to require the separate submission to a popular vote or any change and amendment proposed by the constitution." The word manner is one of large signification, but one thing is clear—it cannot exceed the subject it qualifies or belongs to. The incident cannot be extended beyond its principal. What then does the word manner qualify or pertain to in this section? Clearly it is the submission—"Shall submit the amendments" "in such manner as the convention shall prescribe, subject to"—subject to what?—the limitation as to the separate submission of amendments. Can language be clearer to express the mode of submitting or placing the amendments before the people for their adoption or rejection?

Now we come to the 6th section, which begins a different subject. "The election to decide for or against the adoption of the new constitution, or specific amendments, shall be conducted as the general elections of this commonwealth are now by law conducted." Thus the Legislature said to the convention in these three sections—You shall have power to propose your work in three forms; you shall have power to determine the time and the manner in which these propositions shall be submitted; but the elections by the citizens shall be conducted as the law itself directs as to general elections. The 6th section, as to how the election on the propositions submitted shall be conducted is mandatory, and is so for the best of reasons—it is the only legally authorized means of taking the sense of the people upon adoption of which can bind the whole people. In this way only can a majority of voters, who are not a majority of the people, bind them as the body politic or State. The Legislature intended that the election should be conducted by known officers legally elected, and should be governed by a known system of laws with which the people are familiar, and thereby that they should both know and respect the authority under which the election should be held. No implication can be drawn from the word "manner" to contradict the plain and positive enactment that the election shall be conducted according to the laws governing general elections. It would violate the plainest rules for the interpretation of statutes to make the merest inference stand higher than an intent expressed in distinct language. It is, therefore, clear to our minds that the ordinance relating to the election in the city of Philadelphia is flatly opposed to the act of 1872, and is therefore illegal and void. The prospective validation in the 52d section of the schedule only betrays the doubt the convention itself had, of the validity of the ordinance in this respect.

The next question is one of great importance, but stands on a very different footing from that upon the ordinance—I mean the alleged refusal of the convention to submit the judiciary article separately to a vote of the people. The convention was clothed with express power to act upon the question of submitting the amendments in whole or in part. It is a deliberative body, having all the necessary authority to make rules for its own procedure, and to decide upon all questions falling within the scope of its authority. The power over the manner of submitting amendments is expressly conferred in the 5th section. It is true the law gives to one-third of all the members a right to require a separate submission of any amendment. But while this right is awarded to a minority of the body, it is one upon which the convention itself must act, and it must act according to its own rules of procedure. The question of a separate submission being one committed to the whole body, of which the requiring third is itself a part, it must be presumed that the decision of the body as a whole was rightly made, and either that the request was not made by a full one-third of all the members, or, if made by one-third, it was not in a regular or orderly way. It would be a violent presumption to suppose that the body would wilfully disregard their own oaths as well as a full and orderly request. And if they did this wrong, no appeal is given to the judiciary, and the error can be corrected only by the people themselves, by rejecting the work of the convention. If the people, notwithstanding, chooses to ratify their work, with them lies the consequence. Mere errors of procedure will then be of no avail. The convention having in that matter acted within the scope of its undoubted power, we must take its decisions as final, and leave correction to the power to which it belongs.

Not to omit to notice the arguments drawn from precedents, we think none referred to throw much light on the general question in these cases—this power of the convention to pass the ordinance setting aside the election laws governing the city of Philadelphia and substituting provisions of its own. Even the proceedings in 1789 in our own State, furnish a precedent of but little service. There the Legislature not only invited the action of the people in primary assemblies, but in advance committed to their hands all the authority legislation can confer to act in those assemblies. The convention was summoned without restriction, and acted without trammel, while the people reserved no power of ratification, and subsequently disposed of all questions of power by living under and acting upon the constitution, thereby ratifying the work of the convention in the most efficacious manner. The question before us is, can the convention, before they either proclaim a constitution themselves, if they have the power, or before any ratification, if they have not, pass an ordinance to repeal an existing system of law on a particular subject. This is a question of power, not of wisdom. However wise the substitution of their own election machinery for that provided by law for this city may be, the question is not for us. We can decide only the question of power. At last, therefore, we must come to the decision on principle and in the light of reason, having a due regard to the rights, interests, welfare and peace of a people living under a recognized government of their own choice, and seeking to amend it in a peaceful way, and to such extent as they may deem salutary and wise.

The question of jurisdiction has been reserved for the conclusion. The first remark to be made is, that all the departments of government are yet in full life and vigor, not being displaced by any authorized act of the people. As a court we are still bound to administer justice as heretofore. If the acts complained of in these bills are invasions of rights without authority, we must exercise our lawful jurisdiction to restrain them. One of our equity powers is the prevention or restraint of the commission or continuance of acts contrary to law, and prejudicial to the interests of the community or the rights of individuals. Page v. Allen, 8 P. F. Smith, and the authorities cited by counsel are precedents sufficient to justify the exercise in this case. Here the court is asked to restrain a body of men attempting to proceed contrary to law — to set aside the lawful election system of the city, and substitute an unlawful system in its place. Their acts are not only contrary to law, but are prejudicial to the interests of the community, by endangering the rights of all the electors, through means of an illegal election held by unauthorized officers. In Patterson v. Barley, 10 P. F. Smith, 54, the aid of the court was asked not to prevent acts contrary to law, but to strike down the only lawful system of election in the city, and thereby to disfranchise all its citizens, for all other election laws had been actually repealed. We said then it was more than doubtful how far private citizens can call for an injunction beyond their own invaded rights, or ask to restrain a great system of law in its public aspects. In this case we are called upon, not to strike down, but to protect a lawful system, and to prevent intrusion by unlawful authority. If this ordinance is invalid, as we have seen, it is as to the city elections, the taxes of the citizens will be diverted to unlawful uses, the electors will be endangered in the exercise of their lawful franchise, and an officer necessary to the lawful execution of the election law be ousted by unlawful usurpation of his functions.

The convention is not a co-ordinate branch of the government. It exercises no governmental power, but is a body raised by law, in aid of the popular desire to discuss and propose amendments, which have no governing force so long as they remain propositions. While it acts within the scope of its delegated powers it is not amenable for its acts, but when it assumes to legislate, to repeal and displace existing institutions before they are displaced by the adoption of its propositions, it acts without authority, and the citizens injured thereby are entitled, under the declaration of rights, to an open court and to redress at our hands.

In conclusion, we regret that the nature of the case requires prompt, instant action, and that the circumstances under which we act demand a written expression of our views. We gladly would have had more time for discussion among ourselves, and for the preparation of the opinion. As it is, we have given to the subject all our most anxious thoughts and labor, and have arrived at the best conclusions honest convictions can reach.

FORMAL DECREE OF THE COURT.

Wells v. Bain et al., Fitler et al. And now, December 5th, 1873, this case having come on to be heard before the Hon. Isaac G. Gordon, sitting at Nisi Prius, with the aid of the chief justice and all the other judges of the Supreme Court, called in to sit with him as assessors, and having been duly considered by all the said judges, it is now ordered and decreed that a special injunction be issued out of the said court to the said defendants, Edwin H. Fitler, Edward Browning, John P. Verree, Henry S. Hagert and John O. James, commissioners appointed in an ordinance made by the convention to propose amendments to the constitution of this commonwealth, and done on the 3d day of November last, enjoining and strictly prohibiting them as such commissioners from directing or in any manner controlling an election to be held under the said ordinance in the said city of Philadelphia, on the 16th day of this December, and especially enjoining and prohibiting them from appointing judges and inspectors to hold the said election in the several districts in the said city, and from making a registration of voters and furnishing the list thereof to the election officers; and a special injunction is issued to the said defendants, James Bain, Alexander McCuen and Thomas Locke, commissioners of the said city of Philadelphia, enjoining and prohibiting them from appropriating, using or expending any money or property of the said city in and about preparing for and conducting the election aforesaid, in so far as the said defendants, E. H. Fitler, Edward Browning, John P. Verree, Henry S. Hagert and John O. James, propose to direct and control the said election and to appoint the officers thereof, or otherwise to manage the same. These injunctions to continue until final hearing or further order of the court. Bail in $5,000 to be given by the complainants before issuing the injunctions.

Donnelly v. Fitler et al. Decree the same as above, so far as relates to Fitler et al. Bail in $2,000.

HAGEMAN et al. v. SALISBERRY et al.

1. The waiver of inquisition in a judgment note or bond is a part of the record of the judgment.
2. Buehler v. Rogers, 18 P. F. S. 9, and Hope v. Everhart, 20 P. F. S. 231, distinguished.—P. L. J.

Error to the District Court of Allegheny county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered November 10th, 1873.

The case has been twice argued. It has received that consideration to which it was entitled. Seven errors have been assigned, but the whole case depends upon whether the waiver of inquisition is a part of the record of the judgment.

The bond contains an express waiver of inquisition, and of condemnation of all real estate which may be taken in execution issued on any judgment obtained thereon. This waiver is a part of the condition. It precedes the warrant which authorizes an attorney to confess judgment. All the terms and conditions are part and parcel of one and the same instrument. The obligation is an entirety. The warrant of attorney is an authority to confess judgment upon the whole instrument. That undoubtedly means according to all of its terms, conditions and stipulations. They clearly express, and with equal force declare the sum to be paid, the waiver of inquisition, and the condemnation of the obligor's real estate.

Upon this instrument, so written, the judgment was recovered, and the inquisition and condemnation were waived. An declaration in the usual form was filed. An attorney appeared for the defendant, and executed a written confession of judgment. He therein declared that he did it by virtue of a warrant of attorney authorizing him thereto. In that confession, he recited substantially all the conditions of the obligation. With it he filed the original bond, showing full authority for his act. The prothonotary entered upon the docket the filing of the narr., the appearance of the attorney, and his confession of judgment with the waiver of inquisition and condemnation. When the fi. fa. issued, the prothonotary endorsed thereon, "inquisition and condemnation waived."

Thus in fact the waiver of inquisition and condemnation was blended and interwoven with the record of the judgment. Was it not so in law?

The waiver was a part of the contract. As such it was as obligatory upon the maker as his agreement to pay the sum therein stipulated. He was bound to the fulfilment of all its terms. Suppose the instrument had not contained any warrant authorizing a confession of judgment, but was otherwise the same, with its waiver of inquisition and condemnation, and suit had been brought upon it; a full copy of the instrument had been set forth in the declaration, the original filed in the case and judgment taken thereon upon a verdict, could it be seriously contended that the waiver was not a part of the record of the judgment? The record of an action, in a court founded on common law, consists of the writ, declaration, pleas and judgment. Erb v. Scott, 2 Harris, 20. In case execution should be issued upon such a judgment, and land be levied upon, I cannot conceive it would be necessary to hold an inquisition thereon. If the legal effect of such a judgment, duly entered upon a verdict regularly obtained, would be to dispense with the holding of an inquisition, then like effect must be given to the record of this judgment, regularly entered upon a warrant of attorney. In contemplation of law, a judgment on warrant of attorney is as much an act of the court as if it were formally pronounced on nil dicet or a cognovet, and till it is reversed or set aside, it has all the qualities and effect of a judgment on verdict. Braddee v. Brownfield, 4 Watts, 474. The judgment by the prothonotary, under a power contained in the instrument, is a judicial act, and may be entered by him under the act of 1806, or may be confessed by an attorney independently of that act. Cook v. Gilbert, 8 S. & R. 568; Flanigen v. City of Philadelphia, 1 P. F. Smith, 491; St. Bartholomew's Church v. Wood, 11 P. F. Smith, 96. The rule may be so qualified by the authority of Banning v. Taylor, 12 Harris, 289, as to require the warrant of attorney to be filed with the appearance, in order to give full effect to the judgment, and to prevent the issuing of a certiorari to bring up the warrant, upon a suggestion of diminution of record. In the case now under consideration that contingency does not arise.

When a judgment is recovered according to the terms and conditions of a written obligation for the payment of money, and these terms and conditions expressly either limit the lien of any judgment that may be recovered upon it, or which waive the benefit of all laws exempting property from levy and sale on any execution; or which waive the right of inquisition upon the delinquent's real estate, and in the entry of the judgment this is set forth upon the docket, it must be held to be a part of the record of the judgment. Hence it was ruled in Stanton v. White, 8 Casey, 358, that effect should be given to a stipulation in bond and warrant of attorney, restricting the lien of the judgment to be entered thereon to certain designated lands. So in a pending suit, if judgment is confessed and entered in pursuance thereof, the terms and conditions of the confession enter into and form a part of the record of the judgments, modifying and qualifying its effect.

In Coleman v. Coleman, 7 Harris, 100, it was held that an agreement, and the entry of judgment thereon, in a pending action of partition, stipulating that certain ore banks and mine hills should remain undivided, became the judgment of the court. By that judgment and decree, said Mr. Justice Woodward, in giving the opinion of the court, the covenant was inwrought into the titles of the parties, so that it should remain firm and stable forever.

The cases of Buehler v. Rogers, 18 P. F. Smith, 9, and Hope v. Everhart, 20 P. F. Smith, 231, have been cited as establishing the doctrine that the inquisition is no part of the record of the judgment. The first of these is clearly distinguishable from the present case, in that there was no agreement either before or at the time of the rendition of the judgment, to waive the inquisition. The allegation was that an inquisition had been held by the sheriff, but the fi. fa. and return thereon could not be found, and it was uncertain upon what land the writ had been levied. The case of Hope v. Everhart also differs. There the judgment was entered by the prothonotary under the act of 1806, without the intervention of an attorney. The reasoning of Mr. Justice Williams is predicated mainly upon that act, and the duty and power of the prothonotary under it. The case wholly lacked the superadded appearance of an attorney for the defendant, and his confession of judgment therefor, expressly waiving the inquisition and condemnation. That the authority of an attorney is more extensive in Pennsylvania than in other countries, and that his act binds the client, is recognized by numerous cases. Coxe et al. v. Nicholls, 2 Yates, 546; Reinholt v. Alberti, 1 Binn. 469; Lynch et al. v. Commonwealth, 16 S. & R. 368; Wilson v. Young, 9 Barr, 101; Cyphert v. McClune, 10 Harris, 195; Flanigen v. City of Philadelphia, 1 P. F. Smith, 491. If a judgment be confessed by an attorney, neither his authority nor the regularity of the judgment can be inquired into in a collateral action. Where he appears without authority and confesses judgment, the remedy is against him, or in a proper case the court in which it was entered may open the judgment. Cyphert v. McClune, supra; Evans v. Meylert, 7 Harris, 402. The prothonotary, who is the maker and keeper of the records, acts under the supervision of the court. His record is the record of the court made by the proper officer, and another court cannot say whether the record made by the proper officer was properly made or not. The court of which he is the officer has the sole jurisdiction to examine this, and to correct it if found wrong. Hoffman v. Coster, 2 Whar. 452.

While it is contended that a sale under this fi. fa. is bad, yet it is conceded if it had been made upon a ven. exp., it would be good. We are unable to see much force in the distinction, as the record shows the waiver. In either case the judgment would have supported the execution, and the record would have shown the authority to sell. There is nothing in the case going to show fraud in the plaintiff in the judgment, nor to impeach the title of the defendants below as good faith purchasers. The very able argument of the counsel for the defendant in error has failed to satisfy us, that the title acquired by a good faith purchaser upon the faith of the records shall not be sustained. We think the learned judge erred in admitting the evidence contained in the first and second assignments of error, as well as in affirming the point presented in the fourth. The court should have affirmed the point covered in the fifth and seventh assignments. We discover no other error in the record.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

PETERS AND WIFE v. ULMER AND WIFE.

The defendant in a slander suit may plead not guilty as well as justification.—P. L. J.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered November 21st, 1873.

The first assignment of error is, that the court below refused to allow the defendant to plead "not guilty," as well as justification, and in ordering the defendant to withdraw the plea of "not guilty." The ground upon which this order was made appears to have been that the pleas were inconsistent. Under the statute of 4 Anne, c. 16, s. 4, Roberts' Digest, 42, which first permitted a defendant, with the leave of the court, to plead as many several matters as he should think necessary for his defence—it was the practice at first for the court to refuse leave when the proposed pleas were inconsistent, but in modern practice such pleas, notwithstanding the apparent repugnancy between them, are permitted. 1 Troubat & Haley, Part 1, p. 470. Thus, to go no further, what seems to be more inconsistent than to an action upon a bond to plead non est factum and payment—to deny the execution of the bond by the defendant, and yet to allege that he had paid it? The only exception which appears to be recognized is the general issue and tender, and there is a good reason perhaps for not allowing these to be pleaded together; for if a verdict were found for the defendant on the general issue, this incongruity would appear upon the record, that nothing was done, though the defendant had admitted on the record, by pleading the tender, that something was done. Maclellan v. Howard, 4 Term Rep. 194. In Kerlin v. Heacock, 3 Binn. 215, the short entry of "not guilty with leave to justify," was considered as in fact several pleas of not guilty and a justification, and no remark was made by the court as to their inconsistency. In truth they are not inconsistent. The defendant in slander may believe and allege that he never used the words imputed to him, but as human testimony is fallible and uncertain, he may well justify himself by adding, if the plaintiff succeeds in proving that I did say the words, they were true. Against an unscrupulous plaintiff of bad character—especially since the act of Assembly allowing him to be a witness in his own behalf—it may be the only safe line of defence. The discretion, vested in the court by the statute of Anne to give or refuse leave to put in more than one plea, is clearly a legal discretion, not to be exercised unless good reason exists. Where, as here, it was refused to allow an amendment of the pleadings, it was error under the act of March 21st, 1806, s. b. 4 Smith, 329. In Smith's Administrator v. Kessler, 8 Wright, 142, where, after a plea of payment, the defendant was refused leave to put in a plea of non-assumpsit, this court reversed the judgment.

Nor can we see that the case is helped by the rule of the court below relied on by the defendant in error. That rule was evidently intended to abolish the loose mode of pleading "not guilty with leave to justify," which had been condemned by this court in Kerlin v. Heacock, and to compel a defendant to set out in a formal plea of justification what matter he intended to rely on as such. That, indeed, was an action of trespass de bonis asportatis; but the same reason applies in libel and slander. The defendant is entitled to have the matter formally spread upon the record—the accusation which he may be called on to meet, if it be of an indictable offence.

Upon the state of the pleadings, after the withdrawal of the plea of not guilty, the second and fourth assignments cannot be sustained. The third assignment is to the refusal of the court to award a peremptory non-suit. If it was an error it is clearly not reviewable here.

W. D. Moore, Esq., for plaintiff in error.

GIVIN v. GREEN.

Sur rule for a new trial upon an issue devisavit vel non, the court held:

1. Where the subscribing witnesses to a will cannot be found after diligent search made, proof of their signatures, or the signature of the testator, will be admitted.
2. It is for the jury to make the comparison of handwriting, not an expert.

Sur rule for new trial.

Opinion by PAXSON, J. Delivered December 13th, 1873.

This was a feigned issue to determine the validity of a paper writing purporting to be the last will and testament of Abigail Storer, deceased.

Upon the trial the case was narrowed down to a mere question of forgery. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, thus sustaining the will.

The third and fifth reasons assigned by the defendant in support of his rule may be considered together. They allege that the court erred in dispensing with the testimony of the subscribing witnesses, and in permitting the signature of the testatrix to the alleged will to be proved by other than the subscribing witnesses.

The general rule undoubtedly is, that in order to establish the validity of a will, the subscribing witnesses must be called, if living and within the jurisdiction of the court. In either of the latter contingencies proof must be made of the handwriting of the deceased, or absent subscribing witness.

In this case the plaintiff was unable to find either of the subscribing witnesses, or to obtain any trace of them. Under such circumstances to exclude proof of the signature of the testratrix would be to shut out all proof of the execution of the will, and to prevent the parties interested therein from taking any benefit under it. This cannot be the law. It is in the daily experience of every professional man that important legal papers are constantly being witnessed by obscure persons who have no fixed residence, and whom it may be next to impossible to trace after a number of years have elapsed.

It would be equally vain to require proof of the handwriting of an absent subscribing witness, whom the parties have been unable to trace, or as to whom they could obtain no information whatever. In Greenleaf on Evidence, § 572, and in Starkie on Evidence, 377, it is held, that when a subscribing witness cannot be found after diligent inquiry, or is a fictitious person, the signature of the maker of the instrument may be proved by witnesses who have knowledge of his handwriting. See also Cunliff v. Sefron, 1 East, 183, where the same principle is expressly decided.

The only remaining question upon this point is, whether due diligence had been used by the plaintiff in her search for the subscribing witnesses.

The rule is thus briefly stated in Greenleaf: "The degree of diligence for the subscribing witnesses is the same which is required in the search for a lost paper, the principle being the same in both cases. It must be a strict, diligent, and honest inquiry and search, satisfactory to the court under the circumstances of the case."

The will of Mrs. Storer is dated in 1861. Inquiry was made upon several occasions in the vicinity where she resided at that time, for the subscribing witnesses, but no one there had ever heard of them. The directory, for several years about that time and later was examined, and every person whose name corresponded with that of either of the subscribing witnesses was called upon, and inquiry made as to whether he had witnessed such a will, without success. The latter mode of search was resorted to upon three different occasions, and appeared to have been thorough. It is difficult to see what more the plaintiff could have done. The proof of diligence was satisfactory to the court at the time, and a re-examination of the law and the facts has not changed my view.

The fourth reason alleged is error in admitting in evidence the will of 1846. In support of the allegation of forgery the defence offered evidence of the declarations of the testatrix at various times prior to her death, that she had never made a will. To rebut this evidence the plaintiffs proved counter-declarations of the testatrix that she had made a will. In addition the plaintiff produced a paper purporting to be a will of Mrs. Storer, dated in 1846, and which plaintiff swore was handed to her by Mrs. Storer herself, with the statement that it was her (Mrs. Storer's) will. I do not see any error in the admission of this paper. It was strictly in rebuttal.

The sixth reason alleges that the court erred in charging the jury that the testimony of the expert called by the defendant "was not to be regarded by the jury, but that comparison of handwriting was the test, and that they were the exclusive judges thereof."

I did not charge precisely as stated in this reason. I did say that it was for the jury to make the comparison of handwriting, and not for an expert; but I also said that as the expert had been allowed without objection to testify to his belief as to the signature from a comparison of it with the test papers, they should regard his testimony so far as it aided them in determining the question referred to, but that they should not allow it to control their own independent judgment. That this ruling was right under the authority of Travis v. Brown, 7 Wright, 9, there can hardly be a question.

The remaining reasons are the usual formal ones. This case involves character as well as property. When that is the case the verdict of the jury upon the facts should not be disturbed without weighty reasons. Such reasons do not exist in this case.

BOYLE v. HAUGHEY.

Stocks attached in the name of the husband was claimed by the wife, who upon the trial, was called as a witness to prove that the stock was paid for out of her own separate earnings. The court excluded her testimony. Held, not to be error.

Sur rule for new trial.

Opinion by PAXSON, J. Delivered December 13th, 1873.

Certain shares of stock in a building association, standing in the name of the defendant, were attached as his property. Subsequently the wife of the defendant was allowed by the court to come in and defend, upon her allegation that the stock referred to was her property, and paid for out of her separate earnings. Upon the trial of the case her counsel called her as a witness, and offered to prove the above facts by her. The court excluded her testimony, and this is now assigned as error.

The act of 15th of April, 1869, which provides that the parties to a civil proceeding may be examined as witnesses, contains the express provision that "said act shall not alter the law as now declared and practiced in the courts of this commonwealth, so as to allow husband and wife to testify against each other."

Musser v. Gardner, 16 P. F. S. 242, and Rowley v. McHugh, Id. 269, were cited in support of the competency of the wife as a witness. In the latter case an action of ejectment had been brought by husband and wife for land sold under a judgment against her husband. It was held that the husband had no interest in maintaining the title of his vendee, and that in such case the wife testifies not against her husband, but in her own behalf. In the case first named the husband sold the personal property of the wife; she brought replevin, to which suit he was not a party, and it was held she was competent to testify for herself under act of Assembly referred to. Thompson, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The husband was no party, and that he might possibly be called on at some time or other to answer on an implied warranty of title to property he had sold, and now claimed by the wife, was too remote and contingent to bring her within the prohibition of the statute from testifying against her husband."

The cases referred to differ materially from the one under consideration. In the latter the husband is a party and may appear and plead to the attachment, in which case an issue must be formed as to him. The shares in the building association, which are the subject of controversy, stand in his name, and are prima facie his property. The wife claims to be the owner thereof, and to withdraw them from the grasp of the execution creditor of the husband. This is setting up an adverse title. She cannot do this by her own testimony as against her husband, or his execution creditor, who claims by and through him. It comes within the direct prohibition of the statute.

Rule discharged.

BARRY v. McAVOY.

Demurrer sustained by reason of essential facts not being averred.

Demurrer to bill.

Opinion by PAXSON, J. Delivered December 13th, 1873.

The defendant demurs to the plaintiff's bill, and assigns as cause of demurrer that "the plaintiff does not aver that he has the right and privilege of the alleged drain or water-course, or that the same is reserved through the premises of the defendant."

This demurrer is well taken. The plaintiff wholly omits to aver that he has any right to the drain which he charges the defendant is about to obstruct. Nor does he state any fact from which such right can necessarily be inferred.

The demurrer is sustained.

TWENTY-SIXTH JUDICIAL DIST.

Court of Common Pleas of Wyoming County.

IN EQUITY.

MEYHART et al. v. SUPERVISORS OF FORKSTON et al.

1. The act of 31st March, 1864, authorizing Courts of Quarter Sessions, after ascertaining the amount of indebtedness of any district or township, "by writ of mandamus to direct the proper officers to collect by special taxation an amount sufficient to pay the same," does not authorize a resort to unseated lands as a proper subject of taxation for such purpose.
2. Nor can such lands be sold for non-payment of poor taxes assessed thereon.

A special injunction was granted by the court, restraining the county treasurer from selling the unseated lands of the plaintiffs for certain special taxes, claimed to have been duly assessed thereon, by the supervisors of Forkston township, in pursuance of a writ of mandamus ordered by the court directing them to collect, by special taxation, an amount sufficient to pay the previously ascertained indebtedness of the said township, and also from selling the same for poor taxes charged thereon. The supervisors were required to answer the plaintiffs' bill complaining of these taxes, and on answer being filed, the case was referred to R. R. Little as master, and was argued upon the bill and answer.

SYNOPSIS OF THE MASTER'S REPORT.

The questions in this case are raised by the bill and answer, and are, 1. Whether resort may be had to the unseated lands of the plaintiffs for the "special taxes" mentioned in the bill.

2. Whether such resort may be had for the poor taxes.

The first question involves a construction of the act of 31st March, 1864, giving power to the Court of Quarter Sessions, "after ascertaining the amount of indebtedness of any particular district or township, by a writ of mandamus, to direct the proper officers to collect by special taxation an amount sufficient to pay the same."

This act is silent both with reference to subjects of taxation, and means, or process of collection, or enforcing payment. These, then, must be implied, and the authority for such implication must be found in pre-existing law, for it is not claimed that any subsequent statute supplies the deficiency, a tax law defining the subjects of taxation, but providing no means or process for enforcing payment, would be of little utility. To make this one available we must find authority for implying both. Undobtedly the Legislature, in employing the words "to collect by special taxation," had in contemplation some subjects of taxation, and some process of collection. What subjects, and what process? I answer, the ordinary subjects of taxation for township purposes, and the ordinary process of collecting the taxes. These are found specified in the act of 15th April, 1834, from sections 25 to 36, both included, Dunlop's Dig. 560, et seq. In reference to the proper subjects of such taxation, if we were required to look no further than the list of such subjects recited in this act, no question of difficulty would be presented, because the words "real estates" in that list are broad enough to include unseated as well as seated lands. But the means provided by the same act for enforcing payment show quite clearly that the former could not have been in legislative contemplation. This process of collection is, 1. A general warrant from the supervisors (or overseers of the poor, as the case may be) to a collector, "therein authorizing him to demand and receive from every person, in such duplicate named, the sum wherewith such person stands charged."

2. In case of neglect or refusal to pay, the collector is required to obtain a warrant from some justice of the peace of the proper county, authorizing him to levey the tax by distress and sale of the goods of the delinquent, or in default of such goods, to take his body, &c. These sections of the act of 1834 make the township taxes a personal charge merely. They afford no recourse to land, seated or unseated. True, "real estate" is named as one of the subjects of taxation, "upon the basis of the last adjusted valuation for county purposes," &c., but the taxes when assessed, are charged to the person, and are collected from the person, or from personal property of the delinquent, or of the occupant, except in the single case mentioned in the subsequent act of 1844, provided that seated land having neither occupant nor personal property upon it sufficient for payment of the tax, may be resorted to as unseated, for such taxes as may be lawfully collected therefrom.

But the process of sale of unseated lands for certain specified taxes, is a special, not an ordinary, or general process for the collection of ordinary taxes. The authority for such process is found in the act of 1802, 3 Smith's Laws, 515-16, and the act of 30th March, 1811, Dunlop's Dig. 238. And the proceedings under these acts have special reference to the collection of road taxes, and these only. The supervisors are required to issue to the county commissioners certified transcripts of the road taxes due on unseated lands; whereupon the commissioners are required to issue their order to the county treasurer for the amount thereof, and also to transmit copies thereof to the said treasurer, who is required to enter them in a book to be kept for that purpose. Thenceforth the proceedings are the same as in cases of sale for county taxes as prescribed by the acts of 1804 and 1815.

The only township taxes that these acts of Assembly charge upon unseated lands are road taxes, eo nomine. By the subsequent act of 8th May, 1854, resort was given to unseated lands for school taxes assessed thereon, but these are not strictly township taxes. It was not enough that these acts made such lands a legitimate subject of taxation for the specified purpose. Being unproductive, and without occupants, no resort could be had to the person, as in cases of assessment of seated or productive lands, and it therefore became necessary to provide some means, or process, by which the land itself might be resorted to for the collection of the taxes. The process so provided is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and it must not be dispensed with, for property must not be taken without "due process of law."

Taxes upon unseated lands are not a personal charge. For the proceedings against these tracts I find no warrant in either of the statutes cited. The taxes in question being other than road taxes, every step in these proceedings has been without legal authority.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the phrase "by special taxation to collect an amount," &c., in the act of 1864, under which the mandamus in this case was awarded, should be construed as if that section formed a part of the general township tax law of 1834, before cited, that the Legislature must be presumed to have had in contemplation the same subjects of taxation and the same process of collection, viz., by general warrant from the supervisor to the collector, and by special warrant against delinquents authorizing the collector to sieze and sell their personal property, or, in default thereof, to take the body. This construction would seem to be a natural and a reasonable one, and fully supported by the langauge of Mr. Justice Agnew in the case of Chalker v. Ives, 5 P F. Smith, 83, giving a construction of the bounty act of the same year. If more than this was intended by the act providing for this special taxation, then, certainly more should have been expressed.

Of the character of the indebtedness, for payment whereof this special tax was ordered, nothing is shown—whether it be in judgment for damages resulting from official negligence, for arrears of expenses incurred in maintaining the poor, or otherwise, does not appear—nor is it believed to be material, for the tax in question is not a road tax, and we have seen that for township purposes resort is given to unseated lands only for such taxes.

We have seen that the proceeding against unseated lands is not a common, or general, but a peculiar and exceptional and limited one, in its application to township affairs, to a single specified tax. In the entire absence of any words in this act of 1864 implying an extension of this peculiar process to taxation for the payment of township indebtedness, a presumption that such was the legislative intention would be a very strained and unnatural one.

These are sufficient reasons why road taxes should be charged upon this species of property; but very cogent reasons are mentioned by Chancellor Kent in his Commentaries, vol. 2, p. 331, et seq., why no other local taxes should be so charged. In the light of this authority it may well be doubted whether the subsequent act of 1854, giving a resort to unseated lands for school taxes, was not an injudicious exercises of legislative power. However this may be, I am of opinion that where such resort is not given either in express terms, or by such necessary implication as to remove the question entirely beyond the domain of mere conjecture, it cannot properly be allowed.

2. The reasons already given apply with equal force to the question in reference to the poor taxes complained of in the plaintiffs' bill.

I therefore recommend a decree making the injunction perpetual, &c.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Just as we are going to press, we find upon our table a pamphlet containing a stenographic report of the proceedings, arguments and decision, in full, in the great convention case of Wells et al v. The Election Commissioners, in the Supreme Court. It is a most valuable publication, and should be in the possession of every lawyer. It is published by Messrs. King & Baird, at the reasonable price of $1.00. We shall take occasion to refer to it at greater length when we have more time.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION ADOPTED.

Never before in the history of this great State, has there been such an emphatic endorsement by the people of any measure, as there was upon last Tuesday, when by over 150,000 majority the new constitution was adopted. The most sanguine friends of the instrument did not even dream that the popular approval would be exhibited in such an unmistakable light. Philadelphia, which was confidently claimed by the opponents of the constitution as the stronghold of their vote, leads off with 34,000 majority in favor of reform. And one of the most cheering signs of all is, that the canvass has been almost entirely divested of a party aspect. The bar, the press, and the people generally throughout the commonwealth, fought side by side, irrespective of party, to bring about the grand reform, and now when the victory is achieved, and when all good citizens are congratulating each other, truly can it be said that neither Republican nor Democrat can boast that his party alone accomplished the good work. Both alike can lay claim to a share in the glory, and point with pride to the fact that in the contest no party was known. Those who doubt the inherent strength of republican institutions, those who despair of the ultimate success of the people in governing themselves, those who dread that this great country will become the prey of Cæsarism, can take a lesson from the spectacle afforded by our constitutional election. A people, apparently bound hand and foot by greedy politicians, corrupt rings and gigantic corporations, burst with one effort all their fetters, and stand forth free and untrammelled, no longer the servants but the masters. Can it be longer doubted that the inherent good sense of the great mass of the people will preserve the republic against all opposition.

To us personally the result of the election is a matter of the highest gratification. Taking part in the convention, voting for nearly all the measures proposed by the new constitution, and earnestly endeavoring with all our humble ability to advocate the adoption of, and to furnish during the canvass all the information possible concerning, the great work submitted to the people, it affords us the greatest delight that the popular vote is such a demonstrative one. Believing as we do that the new constitution, though not absolute perfection, is yet the best instrument of the kind ever yet proposed to any people, we are glad it has been adopted by such an overwhelming vote. Our hope, expressed in our issue of two weeks ago, that we would be able to announce its adoption by over 100,000 majority, has been fully realized, and we are satisfied.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

Owing to the length of the opinions published last week in the convention cases, we were compelled to crowd out a number of interesting items concerning the new constitution. Lest our friends may think we have forgotten them, we hasten to acknowledge the receipt of sundry documents sent to us.

From York we have received a paper containing an able address to the electors of the county, signed by Hons. Thomas E. Cochran, John Gibson and William McClean, members of the convention. We regret we have not the space to reprint it in our columns.

From Schuylkill, we have received a copy of the address delivered by Hon. Joel B. McCamant, a member of the convention from that county. It was delivered at Pottsville, upon the third inst., and reflects great credit upon its author.

From Dauphin, some one forwarded to us a copy of a "letter from Hon. Wayne MacVeagh, to certain citizens of Chester county, expressing his views upon the subject of the new constitution."

From Alleghany, the Hon. T. H. Baird Patterson was kind enough to send us an advance copy of Judge Stowe's opinion, as well as cheering news regarding the adoption of the constitution.

From various other quarters we have received letters, pamphlets, newspapers, etc., for all of which we return thanks to the senders.

DARTMOUTH COLLEGE CASE.

We have received a neat little pamphlet containing an address delivered before the literary societies of Hudson College, by Hon. James A. Garfield, of Ohio. It is entitled "The Future of the Republic; its Dangers and its Hopes," and among other things it treats of the application of the law laid down in the "Dartmouth College Case," to existing railway corporations. As the subject is one of great moment, we have thought it might be interesting to our readers to make the following extract.

"In the famous Dartmouth College Case of 1819, it was decided, by the Supreme Court of the United States, that the charter of Dartmouth College is a contract between the State and the corporation, which the Legislature cannot alter without the consent of the corporation; and that any such alteration is void, being in conflict with that clause of the Constitution of the United States which forbids a State to make any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

This decision has stood for more than half a century as a monument of judicial learning, and the great safeguard of vested rights. But Chief Justice Marshall pronounced this opinion ten years before the steam railway was born; and it is clear he did not contemplate the class of corporations that have since come into being. But, year by year, the doctrine of that case has been extended to the whole class of private corporations, including railroad and telegraph companies. But few of the States, in their early charters to railroads, reserved any effectual control of the operations of the corporations they created. In many instances, like that of the Illinois Central charter, the right to amend was not reserved. In most States, each Legislature has narrowed and abridged the powers of its successors, and enlarged the powers of the corporations; and these by the strong grip of the law, and in the name of private property and vested rights, hold fast all they have received. By these means, not only the corporations, but the vast railroad and telegraph systems have virtually passed from the control of the State. It is painfully evident from the experience of the last few years, that the efforts of the States to regulate their railroads, have amounted to but little more than feeble annoyance. In many cases the corporations have treated such efforts as impertinent intermeddling, and have brushed away legislative restrictions as easily as Gulliver broke the cords with which the Lilliputians attempted to bind him.

In these contests the corporations have become conscious of their strength, and have entered upon the work of controlling the States. Already they have captured several of the oldest and strongest of them; and these discrowned sovereigns now follow in chains the triumphal chariot of their conquerors. And this does not imply that merely the officers and representatives of States have been subjected to the railways, but that the corporations have grasped the sources and fountains of power, and control the choice of both officers and representatives.

The private corporation has another great advantage over the municipal corporation. The jurisdiction of the latter is confined to its own territory; but by the recent constructions and devices of the law, a private corporation, though it has no soul, no conscience, and can commit no crime, yet it is a citizen of the State that creates it, and can make and execute contracts with individuals and corporations of other States.

Thus, the way has been opened to those vast consolidations which have placed the control of the whole system in the hands of a few, and have developed the Charlemagnes and the Cæsars of our internal commerce.

In addition to these external conquests, the great managers have in many cases grasped the private property of the corporations themselves; and the stocks which represent the investment, have become mere counters in the great gambling houses of Wall street, where the daily ebb and flow of the stock market, sweeps and tosses the business and trade of the continent.

If these corporations were in reality private corporations, transacting only private business, the community might perhaps stand by in wonder and amazement at their achievements; but a great and vital public interest is involved in the system, an interest which effects the social and political organization in a thousand ways. Prominent among these is the public necessity for means of transportation.

Mr. Adams says that the estimated average amount transported by rail, had risen from $85 for each inhabitant in 1860, to $300 in 1870, and that the public are now paying to railroads for travel and transportation $450,000,000 per annum, an average of $12 per head for the whole population. The amount for the year 1872, is set down at $473,241,055. Poor's R. R. Manual for 1873, Introd., p. 25.

Two-thirds of this sum, he says, are paid for the actual work of transportation, and the remaining third "for the use of the capital and the risk involved in the business."

This latter sum is the tax on transportation, and is really a tax as though it were paid on the grand duplicate of the State; "in other words," quoting from Mr. Adams, "certain private individuals, responsible to no authority, and subject to no supervision, but looking solely to their own interests, or to those of their immediate constituency, yearly levy upon the American people a tax, as a suitable remuneration of their private capital, equal to one-half of the expenses of the United States Government, including interest on the national debt."

I do not say that this tax is excessive; perhaps it is not; but its rate is determined, and the amount levied and collected, not by the authority of the State, but by private parties, whose chief concern is to serve their own interests.

We have seen that the transportation tax is the amount paid to the companies for their investment. How much they shall invest, where, and under what limitations it shall be invested, has been wholly left to the companies themselves; but, whether they have invested their capital wisely or unwisely, however much the business may be overdone, the investors must be paid for the use of their capital, and that payment is made by the community.

In most of the States, railroads may be built in unlimited numbers, wherever five or ten men, who incorporate themselves under the general law, may choose to build them.

This has probably been allowed in the belief that free competition in building and operating roads would produce economy in the management and cheapness in transportation.

But this expectation has utterly failed. All railroad experience has verified the truth of Geo. Stephenson's aphorism, that "when combination is possible, competition is impossible." Great Britain has gone much farther into the study of this question than we have, and the result of her latest study is thus expressed in the London Quarterly Review of April last:

"By the common consent of all practical men, competition, the ordinary safeguard of the public in matters of trade, has ceased to offer the slightest protection (except in a few unimportant cases of rival sea traffic) against railway monopolies.

"In spite of the efforts of Parliament and parliamentary commissions, combinations and amalgamation have proceeded, at the instance of the companies, without check and almost without regulation. United systems now exist constituting by their magnitude and by their exclusive possession of whole districts, monopolies to which the earlier authorities would have been strongly opposed. Nor is there any reason to suppose that the progress of combination has ceased, or that it will cease until Great Britain is divided between a small number of great companies."

The article concludes with this striking paragraph:

"We have tried the laisez faire policy and it has failed; we have tried a meddlesome policy and it has failed also. We have now to meet the coming day when all the railways, having completed their several systems, may, and probably in their own interests will combine together to take advantage of the public. In the face of this contingency we have simply to make our choice between two alternatives; either to let the State manage the railways, or let the railways manage the State."

It is easy to see that we are repeating the experience of Great Britain on a vast scale. We have doubled our miles of railway in the last eight years. In the last two years we have built and put into operation 14,206 miles of road—more than a quarter of all we had in January, 1871.

The cost of constructing the roads we are now operating was thirty-one hundred and sixty millions of dollars; and, during the year 1872, there were transported by rail more than two hundred million tons of freight. Poor's Manual for 1873, Int. pp. 25–27. The process of consolidation of our leading lines of road has been even more rapid than that of construction; and whatever dangers we may expect from the system are rapidly culminating to the point of full development. In antagonism to these and to similar combinations of capitalists, are the combinations of laborers in trades unions and labor leagues. The indications are abundant that we shall soon see set in full array a conflict between capital and labor—a conflict between forces that ought not to be enemies; for labor is the creator of capital, which is only another name for accumulated labor. It is the duty of statesmanship to study the relation which the government sustains and ought to sustain to this struggle, and to provide that it shall not be the partisan supporter of either combatant, but the just protector of both. The right to labor has not been sufficiently emphasized as one of the rights of man. The right to enjoy the fruits of labor has been better secured.

In view of the facts already set forth, the question returns; what is likely to be the effect of railway and other similar combinations upon our community and our political institutions? Is it true, as asserted by the British writer quoted above, that the State must soon recapture and control the railroads, or be captured and subjugated by them? Or do the phenomena we are witnessing indicate that general breaking up of the social and political order of modern nations, so confidently predicted by a class of philosophers whose opinions have hitherto made but little impression on the public mind? That you may not neglect this broader view of the question, I will quote a few paragraphs, written by Charles Fourier, sixty-six years ago—nearly a quarter of a century before the fire of the first steam-locomotive was lighted.

After tracing the course of civilization through its several phases of development, and declaring that it was then (1807) past the middle of its third phase, and moving towards its own destruction, he said:

"Civilization is tending towards the fourth phase, by the influence of joint stock corporations, which, under the cover of certain legal privileges, dictate terms and conditions to labor, and arbitrarily exclude from it whomever they please. These corporations contain the germ of a vast feudal coalition which is destined soon to invade the whole industrial and financial system, and give birth to a commercial feudalism. * * * These corporations will become dangerous and lead to new out-breaks and convulsions only by being extended to the whole commercial and industrial system. The event is not far distant, and will be brought about all the more easily from the fact that it is not apprehended. * * * Extremes meet; and the greater the extent to which anarchical competition is carried, the nearer is the approach to the reign of universal monopoly, which is the opposite excess. It is the fate of civilization to be always balancing between extremes. Circumstances are tending towards the organization of the commercial classes into federal companies, or affiliated monopolies, which, operating in conjunction with the great landed interest, will reduce the middle and laboring classes to a state of commercial vassalage, and by the influence of combined action, will become master of the productive industry of entire nations. The small operators will be forced indirectly to dispose of their products according to the wishes of these monopolists; they will become mere agents for the coalition. We shall thus see the reappearance of feudalism in an inverse order, founded on mercantile leagues, and answering to the baronial leagues of the middle ages. Everything is concurring to produce this result. * * We are marching with rapid strides towards a commercial feudalism, and to the fourth phase of civilization. Theorie des Quatre Movements et des Destinees Generales, Paris, 1808—Eng. Tr. (New York, 1857) pp. 198 and 207.

These declarations read something like prophecy, so far as they relate to the effects of combined corporations. New mechanical forces have hastened the development of corporations since Fourier wrote. We need not take alarm at his prophecy of the speedy decay of civilization; but the analogy between the industrial condition of society at the present time, and the feudalism of the middle ages, is both striking and instructive.

In the darkness and chaos of that period, the feudal system was the first important step towards the organization of modern nations. Powerful chiefs and barons entrenched themselves in castles, and, in return for submission and service, gave to their vassals rude protection and ruder laws. But as the feudal chiefs grew in power and wealth they became the oppressors of their people, taxed and robbed them at will, and finally in their arrogance, defied the kings and emperors of the mediæval states. From their castles, planted on the great thoroughfares they practiced the most capricious extortions on commerce and travel, and thus gave to modern language the phrase, "levy blackmail."

The consolidation of our great industrial and commercial companies, the power they wield and the relations they sustain to the State and to the industry of the people, do not fall far short of Fourier's definition of commercial or industrial feudalism. The modern barons, more powerful than their military prototypes, own our greatest highways, and levy tribute at will upon all our vast industries. And, as the old feudalism was finally controlled and subordinated, only by the combined efforts of the kings and the people of the free cities and towns, so, our modern feudalism can be subordinated to the public good, only by the great body of the people, acting through their governments by wise and just laws.

My theme does not include, nor will this occasion permit, the discussion of methods by which this great work of adjustment may be accomplished. But I refuse to believe that the genius and energy that have developed these new and tremendous forces, will fail to make them not the masters but the faithful servants of society. It will be a disgrace to our age and to us if we do not discover some method by which the public functions of these organizations may be brought into full subordination to the public, and that too without violence, and without unjust interference with the rights of private individuals. It will be unworthy of our age and of us, if we make the discussion of this subject a mere warfare against men. For in the e great industrial enterprises, have been, and still are engaged some of the noblest and worthiest men of our time. It is the system—its tendencies and its dangers—which society itself has produced, that we are now to confront. And these industries must not be crippled, but promoted. The evils complained of are mainly of our own making. States and communities have willingly and thoughtlessly conferred these great powers upon railways; and they must seek to rectify their own errors without injury to the industries they have encouraged.

Already methods are being suggested. Massachusetts is discussing the proposal to purchase and operate a portion of her railroad system, and thus bring the rest into competition with the State, as the representative of the people. It is claimed that the success of this plan has been proved by the experience of Belgium.

Another proposition is that the State purchase the roads and open them, like other highways to the free use of the public, subject to such regulations and toll as the safety of transportation and the maintenance of the system may require. This, it is claimed, would remove the stocks and bonds from the gambling operations of the markets, and place the levying of the transportation tax in the hands of the State, and under the control of those who pay.

Others again, insist that the system has overgrown the limits and the powers of the separate States, and must be taken in hand by the national government under that provision of the national constitution which empowers Congress "to regulate commerce among the several States." When it is objected that this would be a great and dangerous step towards political centralization—which many think has already been pushed too far—it is responded that as the railway is the greatest centralizing force of modern times, nothing but a kindred force can control it; and it is better to rule it than to be ruled by it. Other solutions have been proposed; but these are sufficient to show how strongly the current of public thought is setting towards the subject. Indications are not wanting that the discussion will be attended by passion, and by a full exhibition of that low, political cunning which plays with the passions and prejudices of men, and measures success by results, and not by the character of the means employed. I have ventured to criticise the judicial application of the Dartmouth College case; and I venture the further opinion that some features of that decision as applied to the railway and similar corporations must give way, under the new elements which time has added to the problem. But this must be done, not by denouncing judges who faithfully administer the law, but by such prudent changes in the law, and perhaps in our constitutions, as will guide the courts in future adjudications. One member of the court, Mr. Justice Duvall, dissented from the opinion of the court in the Dartmouth College case. Even Chief Justice Marshall, in pronouncing the opinion of the court, used expressions which would not at all apply to our railway companies. He said (4 Wheaton, 647): "These eleemosynary institutions do not fill the place which would otherwise be occupied by the government, but that which would otherwise remain vacant." There has been a growing dissent against the enlarged application of this principle. In a recent case—Washington University v. Rouse, 8 Wallace, 439—three justices, including the chief justice, dissented.

It depends upon the wisdom, the culture, the self-control of our people, to determine how wisely and how well this question shall be settled. But that it will be solved, and solved in the interest of liberty and justice, I do not doubt. And its solution will open the way to a solution of a whole chapter of similar questions that relate to the conflict between capital and labor."

United States Supreme Court.

ALLEN et al. v. UNITED STATES.

1. A demand by the United States for the proceeds of Indian trust bonds, unlawfully converted to their own use by persons who had illegally procured and sold them, and had afterwards became wholly insolvent, is a demand arising upon an implied contract, or one which may be so treated by a waiver of the alleged fraud in the conversion of the bonds.
2. It is, therefore, the proper subject of set-off by the United States in a suit by the general assignees in insolvency of the parties who had thus converted the bonds to their own use, for the recovery of the price of certain property which had formerly belonged to the insolvents, and by their said general assignees been sold to the United States.
3. The amount of the proceeds of the bonds, though not determined by judicial proceedings, was sufficiently liquidated to be at any time the subject of set-off, since it could be stated with certainty and interest be computed and added.
4. And even if, prior to the passage of the act of March 3d, 1863, amending the act establishing the Court of Claims, objection to the set-off existed in the fact that the demand of the United States was unliquidated (assuming that to have been the fact), none could exist subsequent to it; the fifth section of that act covering this class of demands.

December Term, 1873.

Appeal from the Court of Claims; the case being thus:

A statute of the United States, passed March 3d, 1797 (1 Stat. at Large, 515), enacts that,

"When any revenue officer or other persons hereafter becoming indebted to the United States, by bond or otherwise, shall become insolvent. . . . The debt due to the United States shall be first satisfied, and the priority hereby established shall be deemed to extend to cases in which a debtor not having sufficient property to pay all his debts, shall make a voluntary assignment thereof . . as to cases in which an act of legal bankruptcy shall be committed."

So, too, a statute of March 3d, 1863, amending the act establishing the Court of Claims enacts:

"Section 3. That said court, in addition to the jurisdiction now conferred by law, shall also have jurisdiction of all set-offs, counter claims, claims for damages, whether liquidated or unliquidated, or other demands whatsoever on the part of the government, against any person making claim against the government in said court; and upon the trial of any such cause, it shall hear and determine such claim or demand both for and against the government and claimant," &c.

These statutes being in force, Russell, Majors and Waddell, partners in business being at the time wholly insolvent, executed and delivered, in January, 1861, to one Allen and a certain Street, two deeds of assignment, conveying all their property in trust for the benefit of their creditors. In November following, the claimants sold to the United States a portion of the property thus conveyed, consisting of wagons and oxen, for a sum exceeding $112,000. And the quarter master of the United States, who acted as agent of the government in the purchase, gave to them certificates that the bills were "correct and just, that the articles had been accounted for on his property return." Of the sum mentioned, only a part was paid; leaving a balance amounting to $71,491, of which payment was refused.

Hereupon Allen and Massey filed their petition in the Court of Claims, to obtain payment of that balance.

It appeared from the findings of the Court of Claims, that at the date of the assignments, Russell, Majors and Waddell were indebted to the United States in the sum of $870,000 or thereabouts, for certain Indian trust bonds belonging to the United States, which they had illegally procured and sold, and the proceeds of which they had applied to their own use, and it was by reason of this indebtedness that the payment to the claimants of the above mentioned balance was refused.

The Court of Claims held that the United States were entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds of the property assigned by Russell, Majors and Waddell, under the trust deeds, and to set off so much of the indebtedness of that firm to them, as would be equal to the amount claimed and proved; and accordingly dismissed the petition. Hence the present appeal.

Mr. James Hughes, for the appellant.

The findings of the Court of Claims show affirmatively that the claim which was set off against the appellants' vouchers, was an unliquidated and disputed claim which the government had never established, nor prosecuted to judgment, against Russell, Majors & Waddell, the peculiar character of which was such, that it could not be paid and adjusted by the claimants acting as trustees under the assignment.

It was competent for the United States to waive its right of priority of payment under the deeds of assignment, and the voluntary purchase of the property and delivery of the formal vouchers sued upon, constitute such waiver.

Mr. C. H. Hill, (with whom were Mr. G. H. Williams, attorney general, and Mr. W. McMichael, assistant attorney general), contra.

Mr. Justice FIELD having stated the case, delivered the opinion of the court as follows:

Among the cases in which the United States are entitled, by act of March 3d, 1797, to priority in the payment of debts due to them over debts to other creditors, is the case where the debtor, not having sufficient property to pay his debts, makes a voluntary assignment of the property he has for their payment. Of the creditors of Russell, Majors and Waddell, the United States are therefore entitled to be preferred in the payment of their demand out of the proceeds of the property in the hands of the claimants, the property not being subject at the date of the assignments to any specific charge or lien. This preference the claimants cannot disregard in the distribution of the proceeds without making themselves personally liable for the amount payable on the demand of the United States. United States v. Clark, 1 Paine, 629. If they could recover the amount claimed in the present suit, they would be required immediately to pay it over to the United States on the debt of the assignors, after deducting the expenses of its collection. This is therefore a case in which the demand of the United States would be allowed as a set-off against the claim of the assignors, independent of the statute of March 3d, 1863, amending the act establishing the Court of Claims. The demand being for the proceeds of certain Indian trust bonds unlawfully converted by Russell, Majors and Waddell, to their own use, is one arising upon an implied contract, or may be so treated by the waiver of the alleged fraud in the conversion of the bonds. Although the amount of the proceeds has not been determined by judicial proceedings, it can be stated with certainty, and the interest can be added by computation. The demand is therefore the proper subject of set-off in a suit for the recovery by the claimants of the amount due upon a sale to the United States of property held by them under the deeds of assignment.

If the objection urged by counsel of the claimants to the allowance of the set-off, that the demand against Russell, Majors, and Waddell is unliquidated, would have been entitled to consideration, supposing such to be the character of the demand, independent of the statute mentioned, it is not entitled to any since the passage of that statute. The third section of the statute is broad enough to authorize the Court of Claims, in suits against the United States, to hear and determine demands of the government of every kind against the claimant, or those whom the claimant represents, whether liquidated or unliquidated, and to set off against the claim in suit the amount found in favor of the United States upon such hearings and determination.

There is nothing in the fact that the quarter master, who acted as agent of the United States in the purchase of the wagons and oxen from the claimants, gave to them certificates of the correctness of their bills, which constitutes in any respect a waiver on the part of the United States of their right of priority of payment, or even looks in that direction.

Decree affirmed.

Supreme Court of Illinois.

CHICAGO & N. W. R. R. Co. v. TAYLOR et al.

The deceased intestate was employed by the railroad company as station agent and switchman, and on a dark night, in going to turn a flying switch, he was run over by a train of cars and killed. The court found that he used proper care, but for the want of proper brakes on the cars, and the absence of necessary lights, which appellants were bound to supply, he came to an untimely death; that the death was caused by the negligence of the company; that appellants impliedly contracted with deceased that they would use due care in providing such machinery, apparatus and appliances, and other necessary means suitable and proper to the prosecution of the business in which their servants were engaged, so as to insure a reasonable degree of safety to life, and security against injury; that appellants not having fulfilled this contract, must be held liable to the consequences.—ED. LEGAL NEWS.

Appeal from Winnebago.

Opinion by BREESE, J. Delivered May 24th, 1873.

This was an action on the case brought to Winnebago Circuit Court by the administrators of Henry B. Taylor, deceased, against the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company, to recover damages for the death of their intestate, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendants.

Under the plea of not guilty and a special plea, the company set up as a defence, the negligence of the deceased as the cause of his death; that the death was caused by the negligence of the fellow-servants of the deceased engaged in the same line of employment, and therefore the company were not responsible.

The jury, under instructions of the court, found for the plaintiffs and assessed the damages at five thousand dollars, on which the court on overruling a motion for a new trial, rendered a judgment.

To reverse this judgment, the defendants appeal.

It appears the deceased was employed by the company as station agent and switchman, at Harlem, a small station on the line of appellants' road, on the night of October 18th, 1870, and had been so employed for five years or more. The switch at that station is connected with the main track at one end only, so that only what is called "a flying switch" could be made by a train coming from the north. It was about ten o'clock at night, of a dark night in October, when the signal was given for the switch. It was so dark that platform cars could not be seen without a light. At this hour, four flat cars, each about four feet high, making a string nearly eight rods in length, were about to be run into Harlem station, by means of a "flying switch." The deceased was in the office, in the station house, listening for signals, when the signal for the "flying switch" was made. He seized his lantern and mail bags, and with alacrity started to his post, on the run, as straight as he could go, for the switch. One Tuthill, a friend of deceased, who was in the office with him when the signal was given, followed him half way from the office to the railroad track, by which time the engine had passed and the brakeman came along with four flat cars and inquired where the agent was. Tuthill replied, he had gone out, or as Easton, another witness says, he had gone up to turn the switch, and asked the brakeman if he had not seen him. The brakeman said he had not. Tuthill then told him he had either run over him or knocked him off the track. Tuthill got the brakeman's lantern to look for the deceased, when he and Easton, another friend, got on the flat cars and rode back to the switch. There they got off and went down five or six rods from where the cars were, and found deceased lying along the side of the track, among the wood, with his face to the north.

We understand the manner of making a "flying switch" to be this: The cars intended to be switched are uncoupled from the main at the proper point by the brakeman, then the locomotive and cars attached start and pass the switch so far in advance of the cars to be switched, that after the engine and cars attached have passed the switch, the switch can be turned in time to receive the remaining cars, which must have momentum sufficient to pass them into the switch. There was wood loosely piled around the switch five or six feet high, and had been there for two or three days, which to get from the station house to the switch it was necessary to pass over, or go along the track. This accounts for deceased being on the track when he was struck, as testified by Tuthill. He died in about one hour after he was struck.

It is in proof there was but one brakeman and one lantern on these four flat cars, and it is further proved that but one of the cars had on a sufficient brake, and that was the car farthest off from the switch, and at the rear end of this car, still farther off, was the lantern and brakeman. It was a kind of night, as one of the witnesses, Disbrow, route agent of the Kenosha & Rockford Railroad, describes it, when smoke and steam settled down about the train, so that a person could not see where the train was, especially if it settled down on the north and west sides of the train.

Appellants make the point that they are not liable to their servants for injuries sustained by the negligence of fellow-servants engaged in the same line of employment.

This principle has been repeatedly recognized by this court, first in Hamer v. Ill. Cent. R. R. Co., 15 Ill. 550, the doctrine of respondeat superior not being applicable to cases of injuries sustained by one servant through the carelessness of another. In Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Cox, 21 Ib. 20, the same ruling was made, and also in Mass v. Johnson, 22 Ib. 633, and in Ch. and Alton R. R. Co. v. Murphy, 53 Ib. 336; Ch. and Alton R. R. Co. v. Keefe, 47 Ib. 108.

Appellants insist the deceased was within the rule stated in these cases. It was his duty to turn the switch whenever cars were to be let from the main track to the side track, and had known for many years previously the manner in which it was done; that he knew he would be obliged to pass from the station house to the switch, and if he went upon the track he might be injured by the carelessness of other servants of the company; that he knew perfectly well the manner in which the wood was piled along the side of the track, and having entire control of the station, could have changed the manner of throwing off the wood, and he must be presumed to have contracted with reference to the danger to which he would be exposed by the carelessness or negligence of those engaged with him in causing the trains to be switched from one track to another at that point.

We concur in much that is said by counsel on this point, but we do not think the case turns upon the principle of the cases cited, or is dependent upon it, but rather upon the doctrine affirmed in Ill. Cent. R. R. Co. v. Jewell, Admx., 46 Ill. 99; Schooner Norway v. Jenson, 52 Ib. 373; Chi. and N.W. R.R. Co. v. Jackson, 55 Ib. 492; and Perry v. Rickets, Ib. 234. The case of Ch. & N. W. R. R. Co. v. Sweet, Adm., 45 Ib. 197, may also be cited, the ruling idea in all which is admitting the principle that a common employer is not responsible to a servant for an injury caused by the negligence of his fellow-servants engaged in the same line of employment. It is nevertheless the duty of the employer to provide safe structures, competent employés, and engines, and all appliances necessary to the safety of the employed, and, as was said in Chi. B. & Q. R. R. Co. v. George, 19 Ib. 519, their duty to adopt such rules and regulations for running their trains as would ensure safety, and having adopted them, conform to them or be responsble for all consequences resulting from a departure from them.

It is in proof in this case, that no rules or regulations had been prescribed by this company, and no directions were given as to the care to be observed in making a "flying switch," an operation when made at night attended with more or less danger. One of the witnesses for the company, the conductor of this train, testified, he never saw any rules about "flying switches," and does not think anybody else ever did. Yet, in the next breath, he said, "We used three whistles as signals for the switch and one for the station." By this we understand it was by force of prescribed rule these signals were made, important to be made certainly, and so important a railroad company would be justly chargeable with negligence in not prescribing them and enforcing them. It is perfectly feasible to prescribe definite rules for making "flying switches," though they may be seldom made.

But, waiving this topic, an examination of the testimony shows that these flat cars, switched off on a dark night in October, were not provided with good and sufficient brakes, that, in fact, there was but one good brake on the four, and that at the far end of the hindmost car, at which point stood the brakeman with a lantern. Post, the brakeman, testifies, one brakeman could control four cars readily. By this he certainly means to be understood, if the cars were all fitted with brakes in good working order, for as it requires but about half a minute to set a brake, he could set all of them in two minutes. From his testimony, we infer he tried all the brakes, and found none to hold until he reached the one on the last car. He says there was a good brake on the second and on the fourth car, but a careful examination made by two of plaintiff's witnesses the next morning after the accident, it appears there was but one. The others seemed to have been out of order for a considerable time. That it was appellant's negligence, the brakes were not in working order, cannot be denied. It was their duty to have sufficient brakes, and a failure in this regard was negligence.

Again, it was negligence of the company in not furnishing sufficient light on these cars. On the whole train, and it was a passenger train, there were but three lamps, possibly the engine driver had one, which would make four in all. Some of the witnesses for appellees familiar with the station where the accident happened, testify that they usually expected to see a brakeman on the front car at the first brake on the car, and a light with him. One of them, Fabrick, testified he did not recollect of ever seeing a "flying switch" made in the night time without the brakeman being on the front car with a light, and Tuthill and Easton testify in the same way, and are not contradicted. That the brakeman was not negligent or careless in taking the position he did on the rear car, is very apparent, for the reason it was the only car which had a good and sufficient brake. He could not in any other position, control the cars. He could, it is true, have left his lantern on the front end of the front car, but he could not safely do that, for in a night so dark as that was, it was absolutely necessary for him, after detaching the forward car, to have a light to get safely back eight rods to the rear car, which alone had a brake. We can come to no other conclusion than this, that it was negligence in the company in not providing sufficient light on these cars. There can scarcely be a doubt, had there been a light on the front car, and a brake in working order, this accident would not have happened.

To make a "flying switch" is attended with danger, which could be obviated by extending the switch to the track at the south end. Constructing it and continuing it in a mode dangerous to those employed about it, imposed upon the company the duty of using every reasonable precaution against accident. In this case, the expenditure of a few dollars would in all probability have prevented this terrible accident.

As to the conduct of deceased, we perceive nothing in the record to charge him with a want of proper care. He had a right to expect the light was on the front car. It was on the rear car, eight rods off, and the front car in thick darkness. This car struck him. He was then in the attempt to perform a duty enjoined upon him. He proceeded with all proper caution, but for want of proper brakes on the car, and absence of necessary light, which appellants were bound to supply, he came to an untimely and violent death. The death was caused by the negligence of the company. Appellants impliedly contracted with deceased that they would use due care in providing such machinery, apparatus and appliances, and other necessary means, suitable and proper to the prosecution of the business in which their servants are engaged, so as to ensure a reasonable degree of safety to life and security against injury. We do not find that appellants have fulfilled this contract, and must be held liable for the consequences. When dangers are created by railroad corporations, it is their bounden duty to provide all reasonable protection against them.

We have examined the instructions given on both sides, and without going into a critical consideration of all of them, are of opinion they are substantially correct, and placed the law of the case fairly before the jury. The third count of the declaration was sustained by the proof, and instruction four complained of was applicable to that count.

On the whole record we think justice has been done, and the judgment should be affirmed.

Crawford & Marshall, attorneys for plaintiffs.

A petition for a rehearing in the above case was presented, and the following opinion filed on the 6th of November, 1873.

Opinion per Curiam.

A rehearing was granted on the petition of appellant, on the suggestion the court had overruled a point made on the hearing, and which would reverse the judgment. That point was the admission of hearsay testimony. We have examined this point and find no such testimony was admitted. The testimony admitted related to something which had occurred long before the accident, and was for the purpose of showing the engine driver was reckless. As all claim on this ground was abandoned by the plaintiff, he resting his case on the third count of the declaration, if there was error in admitting that testimony it did no harm. The opinion heretofore filed must stand as the judgment of the court.

NEW YORK CENTRAL R. R. CO. v. LOCKWOOD.

1. A common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility when such exemption is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law.
2. It is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law for a common carrier to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants.
3. These rules apply both to common carriers of goods and common carriers of passengers, and with especial force to the latter.
4. They apply to the case of a drover travelling on a stock train to look after his cattle, and having a free pass for that purpose.
5. Query: Whether the same rules would apply to a strictly free passenger.
6. Held, arguendo: That a common carrier does not drop his character as such merely by entering into a contract for limiting his responsibility.
7. That carefulness and fidelity are essential duties of his employment, which cannot be abdicated.
8. That these duties are as essential to the public security in his servants as in himself.
9. That a failure to fulfil these duties is "negligence;" the distinction between "gross" and "ordinary" negligence being unnecessary.

October Term, 1873.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

Opinion by BRADLEY, J.

The plaintiff in this case was a drover, injured while travelling on a stock train of the defendants, proceeding from Buffalo to Albany, and the suit was brought to recover damages for the injury. He had cattle in the train, and had been required, at Buffalo, to sign an agreement to attend to the loading, transporting, and unloading of his cattle, and to take all risk of injury to them and of personal injury to himself, or whoever went with the cattle; and received what is called a drover's pass—certifying that he had shipped sufficient stock to pass free to Albany, but declaring that the acceptance of the pass was to be considered a waiver of all claims for damages or injuries received on the train. The agreement stated its consideration to be the carrying of the plaintiff's cattle at less than tariff rates. It was shown on the trial that these rates were about three times the ordinary rates charged, and that no drover had cattle carried on those terms; but all signed similar agreements to that which was signed by the plaintiff, and received similar passes. Evidence was given on the trial tending to show that the injury complained of was sustained in consequence of negligence on the part of the defendants or their servants, but they insisted that they were exempted by the terms of the contract from responsibility for all accidents, including those occurring from negligence, at least the ordinary negligence of their servants; and requested the judge so to charge. This he refused, and charged that if the jury were satisfied that the injury occurred without any negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and that the negligence of the defendants caused the injury, they must find for the plaintiff, which they did.

It is unnecessary to notice the subordinate points made, as we are of opinion that all the questions of fact were fairly left to the jury, and that the whole controversy depended on this main question of law.

It may be assumed in limine that the case was one of carriage for hire; for though the pass certifies that the plaintiff was entitled to pass free, yet his passage was one of the mutual terms of the arrangement for carrying his cattle. The question is, therefore, distinctly raised, whether a railroad company carrying passengers for hire, can lawfully stipulate not to be answerable for their own or their servants' negligence in reference to such carriage.

As the duties and responsibilities of public carriers were prescribed by public policy, it has been seriously doubted whether the courts did wisely in allowing that policy to be departed from without legislative interference, by which needed modifications could have been introduced into the law. But the great hardship on the carrier in certain special cases, where goods of great value or subject to extra risk were delivered to him without notice of their character, and where losses happened by sheer accident without any possibility of fraud or collision on his part—such as by collisions at sea, accidental fire, &c.—led to a relaxation of the rule to the extent of authorizing certain exemptions from liability in such cases to be provided for, either by public notice brought home to the owners of the goods, or by inserting exemptions from liability in the bill of lading, or other contract of carriage. A modification of the strict rule of responsibility, exempting the carrier from liability for accidental losses, where it can be safely done, enables the carrying interest to reduce its rates of compensation; thus proportionally relieving the transportation of produce and merchandise from some of the burdens with which it is loaded.

The question is whether such modification of responsibility, by notice or special contract, may not be carried beyond legitimate bounds, and introduce evils against which it was the direct policy of the law to guard, whether, for example, a modification which gives license and immunity to negligence and carelessness on the part of a public carrier or his servants, is not so evidently repugnant to that policy as to be altogether null and void; or, at least null and void under certain circumstances.

In the case of a seagoing vessels, Congress has, by the act of 1851, relieved ship owners from all responsibility for loss by fire, unless caused by their own design or neglect; and from responsibility for loss of money and other valuables named, unless notified of their character and value; and has limited their liability to the value of ship and freight, where losses happened by the embezzlement or other act of the master, crew, or passengers; or by collision, or any cause occurring without their privity or knowledge; but the master and crew themselves are held responsible to the parties injured by their negligence or misconduct. Similar enactments have been made by State Legislatures. This seems to be the only important modification of previously existing law on the subject, which in this country has been effected by legislative interference; and by this, it is seen, that though intended for the relief of the ship owner, it still leaves him liable to the extent of his ship and freight for the negligence and misconduct of his employees, and liable without limit for his own negligence.

It is true, that the 1st section of the above act relating to loss by fire has a proviso, that nothing in the act contained shall prevent the parties from making such contract as they please, extending or limiting the liability of ship owners. This proviso, however, neither enacts nor affirms anything. It simply expresses the intent of Congress to leave the right of contracting as it stood before the act.

The courts of New York, where this case arose, for a long time resisted the attempts of common carriers to limit their common law liability, except for the purpose of procuring a disclosure of the character and value of articles liable to extra hazard and risk. This they were allowed to enforce by means of a notice of non-liability, if the disclosure was not made. But such announcements as "all baggage at the risk of the owner," and such exceptions in bills of lading as "this company will not be responsible for injuries by fire, nor for goods lost, stolen, or damaged," were held to be unavailing and void, as being against the policy of the law. Cole v. Goodwin, 19 Wend. 257; Gould v. Hill, 2 Hill, 623.

But since the decision in the case of The New Jersey Steam Navigation Company v. Merchants' Bank, by this court, in January term, 1848 (6 How. 344), it has been uniformly held, as well in the courts of New York as in the Federal courts, that a common carrier may, by special contract, limit his common-law liability; although considerable diversity of opinion has existed as to the extent to which such limitation is admissible.

The case of the New Jersey Steam Navigation Company v. Merchants' Bank, above adverted to, grew out of the burning of the steamer Lexington. Certain money belonging to the bank had been entrusted to Harnden's express, to be carried to Boston, and was on board the steamer when she was destroyed. By agreement between the steamboat company and Harnden, the crate of the latter and its contents were to be at his sole risk. The court held this agreement valid, so far as to exonerate the steamboat company from the responsibility imposed by law; but not to excuse them for misconduct or negligence, which the court said it would not presume that the parties intended to include, although the terms of the contract were broad enough for that purpose; and that inasmuch as the company had undertaken to carry the goods from one place to another, they were deemed to have incurred the same degree of responsibility as that which attaches to a private person engaged casually in the like occupation, and were, therefore, bound to use ordinary care in the custody of the goods, and in their delivery, and to provide proper vehicles and means of conveyance for their transportation; and as the court were of opinion that the steamboat company had been guilty of negligence in these particulars, as well as in the management of the steamer during the fire, they held them responsible for the loss.

As this has been regarded as the leading case, we may pause for a moment to observe that the case before us seems almost precisely within the category of that decision. In that case as in this, the contract was general, exempting the carrier from every risk and imposing it all upon the party; but the court would not presume that the parties intended to include the negligence of the carrier or his agents in that exception.

It is strenuously insisted, however, that as negligence is the only ground of liability in the carriage of passengers, and as the contract is absolute in its terms, it must be construed to embrace negligence as well as accident, the former in reference to passengers, and both in reference to the cattle carried in the train. As this argument seems plausible, and the exclusion of a liability embraced in the terms of exemption on the ground that it could not have been in the mind of the parties, is somewhat arbitrary, we will proceed to examine the question before propounded, namely, whether common carriers may excuse themselves from liability for negligence. In doing so we shall first briefly review the course of decisions in New York, on which great stress has been laid, and which are claimed to be decisive of the question. Whilst we cannot concede this, it is, nevertheless, due to the courts of that State to examine carefully the grounds of their decision, and to give them the weight which they justly deserve. We think it will be found, however, that the weight of opinion, even in New York, is not altogether on the side that favors the right of the carrier to stipulate "for exemption from the consequences of his own or his servants' negligence."

The first recorded case that arose in New York after the before-mentioned decision in this court, involving the right of a carrier to limit his liability, was that of Dorr v. The New Jersey Steam Navigation Company, decided in 1850, 4 Sandf. 136. This case also arose out of the burning of the Lexington, under a bill of lading which excepted from the company's risk "danger of fire, water, breakage, leakage, and other accidents." Judge Campbell, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "A common carrier has in truth two distinct liabilities—the one for losses by accident or mistake, where he is liable as an insurer; the other for losses by default or negligence, where he is answerable as an ordinary bailee. It would certainly seem reasonable that he might, by express special contract, restrict his liability as insurer; that he might protect himself against misfortune, even though public policy should require that he should not be permitted to stipulate for impunity where the loss occurs from his own default or neglect of duty. Such we understand to be the doctrine laid down in the case of The New Jersey Steam Navigation Company v. The Merchants' Bank, in 6th Howard, and such we consider to be the law in the present case." And in Stoddard v. The Long Island R. Co., 5 Sandf. 180, another express case, in which it was stipulated that the express company should be alone responsible for all losses, Judge Duer, for the court, says: "Conforming our decision to that of the United States, we must, therefore, hold: 1. That the liability of the defendants as common carriers was restricted by the terms of the special agreement between them and Adams & Co., and that this restriction was valid in law. 2. That by the just interpretation of this agreement the defendants were not to be exonerated from all losses, but remained liable for such as might result from the wrongful acts, or the want of due care and diligence of themselves or their agents and servants. 3. That the plaintiffs, claiming through Adams & Co., are bound by the special agreement." The same view was taken in subsequent cases (Parsons v. Monteath, 13 Barb. 353; Moore v. Evans, 14 Barb. 524), all of which show that no idea was then entertained of sanctioning exemptions of liability for negligence.

It was not until 1858, in the case of Wells v. N. Y. Cent. R. Co., 26 Barb. 635, that the Supreme Court was brought to assent to the proposition that a common carrier may stipulate against responsibility for the negligence of his servants. That was the case of a gratuitous passenger travelling on a free ticket, which exempted the company from liability. In 1862 the Court of Appeals, by a majority, affirmed this judgment (42 N. Y. 181), and in answer to the suggestion that public policy required that railroad companies should not be exonerated from the duty of carefulness in performing their important and hazardous duties, the court held that the case of free passengers could not seriously affect the incentives to carefulness, because there were very few such, compared with the great mass of the travelling public. Perkins v. N. Y. Cent. R. Co., 24 N. Y., 196, was also the case of a free passenger, with a similar ticket, and the court held that the endorsement exempted the company from all kinds of negligence of its agents, gross as well as ordinary; that there is, in truth, no practical distinction in the degrees of negligence.

The next cases of importance that arose in the New York courts were those of drovers' passes, in which the passenger took all responsibility of injury to himself and stock. The first was that of Smith v. N. Y. Cent. R. Co., 29 Barb. 132, decided in March, 1859. The contract was precisely the same as that in the present case. The damage arose from a flattened wheel in the car, which caused it to jump the track. The Supreme Court, by Hogeboom, J., held that the railroad company was liable for any injury happening to the passenger, not only by the gross negligence of the company's servants, but by ordinary negligence on their part. "For my part," says the judge, "I think not only gross negligence is not protected by the terms of the contract, but what is termed ordinary negligence, or the withholding of ordinary care, is not so protected. I think, notwithstanding the contract, the carrier is responsible for what, independent of any peculiar responsibility attached to his calling and employment, would be regarded as fault or misconduct on his part." * * The judge added that he thought the carrier might, by positive stipulation relieve himself to a limited degree from the consequences of his own negligence or that of his servants. But, to accomplish that object, the contract must be clear and specific in its terms, and plainly covering such a case. Of course, this remark was extra judicial. The judgment itself was affirmed by the Court of Appeals in 1862, by a vote of five judges to three. 24 N. Y. 222. Judge Wright strenuously contended that it is against public policy for a carrier of passengers, where human life is at stake, to stipulate for immunity for any want of care. "Contracts in restraint of trade are void," he says, "because they interfere with the welfare and convenience of the State; yet the State has a deep interest in protecting the lives of its citizens." He argued that it was a question affecting the public, and not alone the party who is carried. Judge Sutherland agreed in substance with Judge Wright. Two other judges held that if the party injured had been a gratuitous passenger, the company would have been discharged, but in their views he was not a gratuitous passenger. One judge was for affirmance, on the ground that the negligence was that of the company itself. The remaining three judges held the contract valid to the utmost extent of exonerating the company, notwithstanding the grossest neglect on the part of its servants.

In that case, as in the one before us, the contract was general in its terms, and did not specify negligence of agents as a risk assumed by the passenger, though by its generality it included all risks.

The next case, Bissell v. The N. Y. Cent. R. Co., 29 Barb. 602, first decided in September, 1859, differed from the preceding in that the ticket expressly stipulated that the railroad company should not be liable under any circumstances, "whether of negligence by their agents, or otherwise," for injury to the person or stock of the passenger. The latter was killed by the express train running into the stock train, and the jury found that his death was caused by the gross negligence of the agents and servants of the defendants. The Supreme Court held that gross negligence (whether of servants or principals) cannot be excused by contract in reference to the carriage of passengers for hire, and that such a contract is against the policy of the law, and void. In December, 1862, this judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeals, four judges against three (22 N. Y. Rep., 442). Judge Smith, who concurred in the judgment below, having in the meantime changed his views as to the materiality of the fact that the negligence stipulated against was that of the servants of the company, and not of the company itself. The majority now held that the ticket was a free ticket, as it purported to be, and, therefore, that the case was governed by Wells v. The Central Railroad Co.; but whether so, or not, the contract was founded on a valid consideration, and the passenger was bound to it even to the assumption of the risk arising from the gross negligence of the company's servants. Elaborate opinions were read by Justice Selden in favor, and by Justice Denio against the conclusions reached by the court. The former considered that no rule of public policy forbids such contracts, because the public is amply protected by the right of every one to decline any special contract, on paying the regular fare prescribed by law, that is the highest amount which the law allows the company to charge. In other words, unless a man chooses to pay the highest amount which the company by its charter is authorized to charge, he must submit to their terms, however onerous. Justice Denio, with much force of argument combatted this view, and insisted upon the impolicy and immorality of contracts stipulating immunity for negligence, either of servants or principals, where the lives and safety of passengers are concerned. The late case of Poucher v. N. Y. Cent. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 263, is in all essential respects a similar case to this, and a similar result was reached.

These are the authorities which we are asked to follow. Cases may also be found in some of the other State courts, which, by dicta or decision, either favor or follow more or less closely, the decisions in New York. A reference to the principal of these in the margin, is all that is necessary here. Ashmore v. Penn. R. Co., 4 Dutch. 180; Kinney v. Cent. R. Co., 3 Vroom, 407; Hale v. N. J. St. Nav. Co., 15 Conn. 539; Peck v. Weeks, 34 Conn. 145; Lawrence v. N. Y. R. Co., 35 Conn. 63; Kimball v. Rutland R. Co., 26 Vt. 247; Mann v. Birchard, 40 Vt. 332; Adams Exp. Co. v. Haines, 42 Ill. 89; Id. 458; Ill. Cent. R. Co. v. Adams Exp. Co., Id. 474; Hawkins v. Grt. West. R. Co, 17 Mich. 57; S. C., 18 Mich. 427; Balt. & O. R. Co. v. Brady, 32 Md. 333; 25 Md. 128; Laverny v. Union Transportation Co., 42 Mo. 270.

A review of the cases decided by the courts of New York shows that though they have carried the power of the common carrier to make special contracts to the extent of enabling him to exonerate himself from the effects of even gross negligence, yet that this effect has never been given to a contract general in its terms. So that if we only felt bound by those precedents, we could, perhaps, find no authority for reversing the judgment in this case. But on a question of general commercial law, the Federal courts administering justice in New York have equal and co-ordinate jurisdiction with the courts of that State. And in deciding a case which involves a question of such importance to the whole country; a question on which the courts of New York have expressed such diverse views, and have so recently and with such slight preponderancy of judicial suffrage, come to the conclusion that they have, we should not feel satisfied without being able to place our decision upon grounds satisfactory to ourselves, and resting upon what we consider sound principles of law.

In passing, however, it is opposite to call attention to the testimony of an authoritative witness as to the operation and effect of the recent decisions referred to. "The fruits of this rule," says Justice Davis, "are already being gathered in increasing accidents, through the decreasing care and vigilance on the part of these corporations; and they will continue to be reaped until a just sense of public policy shall lead to legislative restriction upon the power to make this kind of contracts." Stinson v. N. Y. Central R. Co., 32 N. Y. Rep. 337.

We now proceed to notice some cases decided in other States, in which a different view of the subject is taken.

In Pennsylvania, it is settled by a long course of decisions, that a common carrier cannot, by notice or special contract, limit his liability so as to exonerate him from responsibility for his own negligence or misfeasance, or that of his servants and agents. Laing v. Colder, 8 Barr, 479; Camden and Amboy R. Co. v. Baldauf, 16 Penn. 67; Goldey v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 30 Penn. 342; Powell v. Penn. R. Co., 32 Penn. 414; Penn. R. Co. v. Henderson, 51 Penn. 315; Farnham v. Camden and Amboy R. Co., 55 Penn 53; Express Co. v. Sands., Id. 140; Empire Trans. Co. v. Wamsutta Oil Co., 63 Penn. 14. "The doctrine is firmly settled," says Chief Justice Thompson, in Farnham v. C. & A. R. Co., "that a common carrier cannot limit his liability so as to cover his own or his servants' negligence." 55 Penn. 62. This liability is affirmed both when the exemption stipulated for is general, covering all risks, and where it specifically includes damages arising from the negligence of the carrier or his servants. In Penn. R. Co. v. Henderson, a drover's pass stipulated for immunity of the company in case of injury from negligence of its agents, or otherwise. The court, Judge Read delivering the opinion, after a careful review of the Pennsylvania decisions, says: "This endorsement relieves the company from all liability for any cause whatever, for any loss or injury to the person or property, however it may be occasioned; and our doctrine, settled by the above decisions, made upon grave deliberation, declares that such a release is no excuse for negligence."

The Ohio cases are very decided on this subject and reject all attempts of the carrier to excuse his own negligence, or that his servants. Jones v. Voorhees, 10 Ohio. 145; Davidson v. Graham, 2 Ohio St. R. 131; Graham v. Davis, 4 Ohio St. 362; Wilson v. Hamilton, Id. 722; Welsh v. Pittsburg, Ft. W. & Chicago R., 10 Id. 75; Cleveland R. v. Curran, 19 Id. 1; Cincinnati, etc., R. v. Pontius, Id. 221; Knowlton v. Erie R., Id. 260. In Davidson v. Graham, the court after conceding the right of the carrier to make special contracts to a certain extent, says: "He cannot, however, protect himself from losses occasioned by his own fault. He exercises a public employment, and diligence and good faith in the discharge of his duties are essential to the public interests. * * *' And public policy forbids that he should be relieved by special agreement from that degree of diligence and fidelity which the law has exacted in the discharge of his duties." In Welsh v. Pittsb., Ft. W. & Chicago R., the court says: "In this State, at least, railroad companies are rapidly becoming almost the exclusive carriers both of passengers and goods. In consequence of the public character and agency which they have voluntarily assumed, the most important powers and privileges have been granted to them by the State." From these facts the court reasons that it is specially important that railroad companies should be held to the exercise of due diligence at least. And as to the distinction taken by some, that negligence of servants may be stipulated for, the court pertinently says: "This doctrine, when applied to a corporation which can only act through its agents and servants, would secure complete immunity for the neglect of every duty." Pp. 75, 76. And in relation to a drover's pass, substantially the same as that in the present case, the same court, in Cleveland, etc., R. v. Curren, 19 Ohio St. 1, held, 1. That the holder was not a gratuitous passenger. 2. That the contract constituted no defence against the negligence of the company's servants, being against the policy of the law, and void. The court refers to the cases of Bissell v. The New York Central R., 25 N. Y. 442; and of Penn. R. v. Henderson, 51 Penn. St. R. 315; and expresses its concurrence in the Pennsylvania decision. Pp. 12, 13. This was in December term, 1869.

The Pennsylvania and Ohio decisions differ mainly in this, that the former give to a special contract (when the same is admissible) the effect of converting the common carrier into a special bailee for hire, whose duties are governed by his contract, and against whom, if negligence is charged, it must be proved by the party injured; whilst the latter hold that the character of the carrier is not changed by the contract, but that he is a common carrier still, with enlarged exemptions from responsibility, within which the burden of proof is on him to show that an injury occurs. The effect of this difference is to shift the burden of proof from one party to the other. It is unnecessary to adjudicate that point in this case, as the judge on the trial charged the jury, as requested by the defendants, that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff.

In Maine, whilst it is held that a common carrier may, by special contract, be exempted from responsibility for loss occasioned by natural causes, such as the weather, fire heat, frost, etc. Fillbrown v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 55 Maine, 462, yet in a case where it was stipulated that a railroad company should be exonerated from all damages that might happen to any horses or cattle that might be sent over the road, and that the owners should take the risk of all such damages, the court held that the company were not thereby excused from the consequences of their negligence, and that the distinction between negligence and gross negligence in such a case it not tenable. "The very great danger," says the court, "to be anticipated by permitting them" (common carriers) "to enter into contracts to be exempt from losses occasioned by misconduct or negligence, can scarcely be overestimated. It would remove the principal safeguard for the preservation of life and property in such conveyances." Sager v. Portsmouth, 31 Maine, 228, 238.

To the same purport it was held in Massachusetts in the late case of School District v. Boston, etc., Railroad Co., 102 Mass. 552, where the defendant set up a special contract that certain iron castings were taken at the owner's risk of fracture or injury during the course of transportation, loading and unloading, and the court say: "The special contract here set up is not alleged, and could not by law be permitted to exempt the defendants from liability for injuries by their own negligence." P. 556.

To the same purport, likewise, are many other decisions of the State courts, as may be seen by referring to the cases cited in the margin, some of which were argued with great force and are worthy of attentive perusal, but, for want of room, can only be referred to here." Indianapolis R. v. Allen, 31 Ind. 394; Mich. South. R. v. Heaton, 31 Ind. 397, note; Flinn v. Phil., Wilm. & Balt. R., 1 Houston's Del. R. 472; Orndorff v. Edams Exp. Co., 3 Bush (Ky.) R. 194; Swindler v. Hilliard & Brooks, 2 Rich. (So. Car.) 286; Berry v. Cooper, 28 Ga. 543; Steele v. Townsend, 37 Ala. 247; Southern Express Co. v. Crook, 44 Ala. 468; Whitesides v. Thurlkil, 12 Sm. & Mar. 599; Southern Express Co. v. Moon, 39 Miss. 822; N. O. Mutual Ins. Co. v. Railroad Co., 20 La. Ann. 302.

These views as to the impolicy of allowing stipulations against liability for negligence and misconduct are in accordance with the early English authorities. St. Germain, in The Doctor and Student, Dial. 2, c. 38, pointedly says of the common carrier: "If he would per case refuse to carry it" (articles delivered for carriage) "unless promise were made unto him that he shall not be charged for no misdemeanor that should be in him, the promise were void, for it were against reason and against good manners, and so it is in all other cases like."

A century later this passage is quoted by Attorney General Noy in his book of Maxims as unquestioned law. Noy's Max. 92. And so the law undoubtedly stood in England until comparatively a very recent period. Sergeant Steven, in his Commentaries, vol. 2, p. 135, after stating that a common carrier's liability might, at common law be varied by contract, adds that the law still held him responsible for negligence and misconduct.

The question arose in England principally upon public notices given by common carriers that they would not be responsible for valuable goods, unless entered and paid for according to value. The courts held that this was a reasonable condition, and if brought home to the owner, amounted to a special contract, valid in law. But it was also held, that it could not exonerate the carrier if a loss occurred by his actual malfeasance or gross negligence. Or, as Starkie says, "proof of a direct misfeasance or gross negligence, is in effect an answer to proof of notice." Evid., vol. 2, p. 205, 6th Am. ed. But the term "gross negligence" was so vague and uncertain, that it came to represent every instance of actual negligence of the carrier or his servant, or ordinary negligence in the accustomed mode of speaking. Hinton v. Dibbon, 2 A. & E., N. Ser. 649; Wild v. Pickford, 8 M. & W. 460. Justice Story, in his work on bailments, originally published in 1832, says that it is now held, that in cases of such notices, the carrier is liable for losses and injury occasioned not only by gross negligence, but by ordinary negligence, or, in other words, the carrier is bound to ordinary diligence. Story on Bailments, sec. 571.

In estimating the effect of these decisions, it must be remembered that in the cases covered by the notices referred to, the exemption claimed was entire, covering all cases of loss, negligence, as well as others. They are, therefore, directly in point.

In 1863, in the great case of Peake v. The North Staffordshire Railway Co., 10 House of Lords Cases, 473, Mr. Justice Blackburn, in the course of a very clear and able review of the law on the subject, after quoting this passage from Justice Story's work, proceeds to say: "In my opinion, the weight of authority was, in 1832, in favor of this view of the law, but the cases decided in our courts between 1832 and 1854, established that this was not the law, and that a carrier might, by a special notice, make a contract limiting his responsibility even in the cases here mentioned, of gross negligence, misconduct, or fraud on the part of his servants, and, as it seems to me, the reason why the Legislature intervened in the railway and canal traffic act, 1854, was because it thought that the companies took advantage of those decisions (in Story's language) 'to evade altogether the salutary policy of the common law.'"

This quotation is sufficient to show the state of the law in England at the time of the publication of Judge Story's work; and it proves that at that time, common carriers could not stipulate for immunity for their own or their servants' negligence. But in the case of Carr v. Lancashire R. Co., 7 Excheq. R. 707, and other cases decided while the change of opinion alluded to by Justice Blackburn was going on (several of which related to the carriage of horses and cattle), it was held that carriers could stipulate for exemption from liability for even their own gross negligence. Hence the act of 1854 was passed, called the railway and canal traffic act, declaring that railway and canal companies should be liable for negligence of themselves or their servants, notwithstanding any notice or condition, unless the court or judge trying the cause should adjudge the conditions just and reasonable. 1 Fisher's Dig. 1,466. Upon this statute ensued a long list of cases deciding what conditions were or were not just and reasonable. The truth is, that this statute did little more than bring back the law to the original position in which it stood before the English courts took their departure from it. But as we shall have occasion to advert to this subject again, we pass it for the present.

JOHN H. CAMPBELL,

JUDGE NELSON.

Ex-judge Samuel Nelson, late associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, died suddenly at two o'clock Saturday afternoon, December 13th, at his residence in Cooperstown, N. Y. On Monday previous he complained of having taken a slight cold, and was confined to his room up to Friday afternoon, when he went down stairs and spent the evening in the parlor. The next morning he went down to breakfast and appeared as well as usual. While sitting in his chair in the afternoon listening to the reading of a letter by Mrs. Nelson, he made an inquiry in regard to it, and then without a word or sigh suddenly expired. So quiet was his death that it was supposed he had fainted, and not until the physicians pronounced him dead was the truth realized. Judge Nelson had just completed his eighty-first year, having been born on November 10th, 1792, at Hebron, Washington county, N. Y. Both his father, John Rodger Nelson, and his mother, Jane McCarter, were of Irish descent, their ancestors having emigrated from the North of Ireland to Salem, Washington county, about the middle of the eighteenth century. The deceased was sent to the district school at a very early age, and was prepared for college at a classical school in Salem, taught by Rev. Mr. Gross, and afterward at Granville Academy, the principal of which was Salem Towne, of spelling-book fame. He entered Middlebury College, Vermont, in 1811, and was graduated August, 1813. He studied law in Salem, under Messrs. Savage & Woods, both of whom were distinguished lawyers, Savage having been subsequently chief justice of this State, and Woods a judge in Madison county. In the year 1816, Mr. Woods removed to Madison county. Nelson accompanied him, and was admitted to the bar at the January term of the Supreme Court, in 1817. He soon located himself in Cortland village, Cortland county, where he practised his profession with great success. In 1820 he was appointed a presidential elector, and voted for the election of James Monroe for the second term. In 1821, he was appointed postmaster of Cortland village, and in the same year he was a delegate to the State convention for the revision of the constitution, when he advocated the abolition of the property qualification for voters. In April, 1823, he was appointed by Governor Yates, circuit judge, under the new constitution he had helped to frame, and he held this office for a period of eight years. The circuit comprised the counties of Otsego, Delaware, Chenango, Broome, Cortland, Tompkins, Tioga and Sullivan. On February 1st, 1831, he was appointed by Governor Throop, to the Supreme Court, succeeding Judge William L. Marcy, who was elected United States Senator. On August 31st, 1837, Governor Marcy appointed him chief justice of the State of New York, vice Judge Savage (his former preceptor) resigned. He held this position until 1845, when he was appointed by President Tyler, associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, succeeding Judge Thompson. In 1846, he was elected a delegate to the State constitutional convention, but took no active part in its deliberations. He received the degree of LL. D. from Middlebury College, Columbia College and Geneva College. The soundness of his decision against the fugitive slave law in the celebrated Dred Scott case, brought his name prominently and favorably before the public at that time. He was a member of the joint high commission that framed the Treaty of Washington, and was at all times the trusted and esteemed counsellor of different administrations, and on several occasions during the civil war rendered valuable services to the Union by his firmness and patriotism. President Lincoln and Mr. Seward frequently expressed their appreciation of Judge Nelson's services. At one time during the war Mr. Seward, with nearly all the diplomatic corps, visited Judge Nelson at his residence, at Cooperstown, ostensibly for recreation, but in reality it is known that certain important questions of international law and other public questions were submitted to him for his decision. He retired from the bench exactly a year ago, and was succeeded by Judge Ward Hunt. On his retirement all the leading members of the bar passed resolutions, in which high tribute was paid to the efficient services rendered by him during a long and honorable career in the administration of justice. Judge Nelson was twice married. First in 1819 to Miss Pamela Woods, oldest daughter of one of his preceptors, Judge Woods, of Madison county. She died in 1822. In 1825, he married Miss Catharine A. Russell, daughter of Dr. Russell, of Cooperstown, who with four children, two sons; and two daughters, survives him. United States Commissioner Kenneth G. White, is married to one of the daughters, and when in this city the late judge spent most of his time with Mr. White. The other daughter is the wife of Rev. Dr. Beech, of the Episcopal church in Twentieth street. One of his sons, Rensselaer Nelson, is judge of the United States District Court of Minnesota.

The funeral of Judge Nelson was held at Cooperstown, on Tuesday, December 16th. At a meeting of the New York bar, held the day previous in the United States Court room, New York, the following resolutions, presented by Mr. William M. Evarts, were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That in the death of Judge Nelson the judiciary of the State and of the nation, the profession of the law throughout the country, and the people at large, have occasion to deplore a great public loss, while they all feel a profound and grateful sense of the value of his various public services, of the beneficent power and greatness of his life, and of the permanent honor to the country of his illustrious fame and example.

Resolved, That to us, who have been the near witnesses of Judge Nelson's long and constant activity in the highest sphere of judicial duty, and have enjoyed the advantage of close association with him in professional and social intercourse, his death brings the affliction of a personal and private grief, and we lament his loss as that of a father and a friend.

Resolved, That the members of the bar of this circuit desire to take a becoming part in the last offices of affection and respect to the memory of this great judge and eminent public servant by attendance at his funeral, and that a committee of twenty-one be appointed by this meeting to make arrangements to that end, and to invite the members of the State and Federal judiciary of this city and vicinity to join them in this demonstration of affection and reverence.

In pursuance to this resolution, Judge Woodruff made the following nominations: Charles O'Conor, Edward W. Stoughton, William M. Evarts, William L. Shipman, E. Pierrepont, Benjamin D. Silliman, Clarence A. Seward, William Tracy, Charles M. Keller, George Ticknor Curtis, Sidney Webster, Edward H. Owen, Joseph S. Bisworth, George Gifford, Stephen P. Nash, Charles Tracy, James C. Carter, Aaron J. Vanderpool, Thomas T. C. Buckley, James Thompson, Erastus C. Benedict, John K. Porter.

United States Circuit Court, N. D. New York.

COXE v. HALE.

1. A creditor, knowing his debtor to be insolvent, may prosecute his debt to judgment, issue execution, and levy on the property of his debtor, and afterwards have the debtor adjudicated bankrupt for allowing his property to be taken on the execution.
2. Where a bill is filed by an assignee without sufficient cause, yet if the circumstances surrounding the transactions complained of are not sufficiently clear to raise an imputation on the good faith of the assignee in prosecuting the suit, the cost will be charged against the estate of the bankrupt in his hands.

Opinion by WOODRUFF, J.

The bill herein is filed to set aside a deed executed by Eugene Eastman, a bankrupt, to the defendant Hale, his father-in-law, dated January 5th, 1870, conveying certain real estate (upon which Hale held three mortgages, previously given by Eastman to Hale, and to others, who had transferred to Hale), and to compel Hale to convey the premises to the assignee in bankruptcy free and clear of the mortgage encumbrances; also to compel Hale to pay over to the assignee all moneys paid to him by Eastman within six months next preceding the filing of the petition in involuntary bankruptcy, whereon Eastman was adjudged bankrupt; also to vacate, set aside and annul certain judgments recovered by Hale in suits commenced against Eastman on the 14th day of January, 1870, and the executions issued thereon and the levies made by the sheriff upon certain personal property of Eastman; also to exclude said Hale from proving in bankruptcy against the estate of said Eastman, the mortgage debts, or the judgment debts or any other debts whereon said payments were made. The ground upon which relief is prayed, is that the transactions sought to be impeached were done in fraud of the bankrupt law, and with the intent to secure said Hale an illegal preference over other creditors of the said bankrupt.

The bankrupt, in the year 1866, married the daughter of the defendant Hale. He was possessed of but little means, but had a trade consisting of some department of carriage making. In 1867 he commenced the business of carriage making at Oneida, but soon afterwards went to Conastota, where he purchased a carriage manufactory and continued to manufacture until January, 1870. His father-in-law advanced him $500 when he went to Oneida, and afterwards, from time to time advanced him money for his business, and in a few instances endorsed notes for him, which he also paid for him when due. He received a mortgage from him on the carriage manufactory, and also took an assignment of two other mortgages, which were on the same premises when his son-in-law purchased them. The latter met with a small loss of two hundred dollars, by fire, at Oneida, but this was more than made up by gifts from the father-in-law out of generosity or regard for his daughter, and desire to promote the prosperity of both. For the purchase of the factory, tools, material and unfinished work, and for carrying on the business, the advances of the defendant amounted, on the 5th of January, 1870, to a little over five thousand dollars, besides the mortgages and gifts before mentioned, and it is a significant fact, bearing on the question of Hale's belief in his son-in-law's solvency, that he endorsed notes for him in November and December, 1869, and on January 1st, 1870, in the apparent confidence in his solvency, which, in his testimony, he declares he felt. Hale resided at Norwich, forty or fifty miles from Conastota, and was very rarely at the residence of his son-in-law, and had no acquaintance with his business, except such as was derived from his son-in-law, and the apparent enlargement of his business, for which the advances were made by him. In the summer of 1869, he stated to his son-in-law that he had advanced more than he could conveniently spare, and desired him to make some repayment, and on the 9th of July, the son-in-law, having made a sale of cutters, desired the purchaser to pay the price to his father-in-law, which he agreed to do, and subsequently, in August and September, such payment was made, amounting to some three hundred and seven dollars.

On the 5th of January, 1870, Hale went to Conastota on a visit to his daughter, not having been there in over a year before. At that time, as he explicitly testifies, he did not know of any indebtedness of his son-in-law except to himself, and upon obligations endorsed by him, and had no suspicion his son-in-law did not have property sufficient to pay all he owed. While there, his son-in-law gave him a partial statement of his affairs, which showed him to be solvent, and did not show any other indebtedness except as above mentioned; and before he left, his son-in-law, who had expressed a desire to reduce his business and had offered the factory for sale, executed and delivered to him the deed mentioned in the complaint. Hale appears also to have been dissatisfied with the use his son-in-law made of one of the notes advanced to him, and as he says, was desirous of collecting something upon the indebtedness. After he left, and on the 14th of January, 1870, Hale directed suits to be brought for that purpose, and on the 4th of February, two judgments were recovered for him by default, for an aggregate of over five thousand dollars, and executions were issued and levy made on the property of his son-in-law, which judgments, executions and levy are mentioned in the bill of complaint. On one of the executions the sheriff made some sales, but was stopped by an injunction out of the District Court in proceedings in bankruptcy. In fact, Eastman owed other debts to a considerable amount, and one or more judgments were recovered against him on confession, and when this came to the knowledge of Hale, he immediately offered to the other creditors to give up his judgments and any claim of property under the same, and come in with all creditors to share the estate equally; but the judgment creditor proceeded, by petition in the District Court, against Eastman. He was adjudged bankrupt, and the complainants were appointed assignees. Hale, on the demand of the assignees, offered to reconvey the factory, subject to the three mortgages, respecting the bona fides and validity of which no question is made. He presented formal proof of his debts, for which judgments had been recovered, and offered to relinquish the judgments and any claim of priority under them. He had not, in fact, received anything upon the executions, and certain moneys which the sheriff had received under one of the executions, was paid over to the complainants, the assignees, and the assignees proceeded to sell, and did sell, the tools, materials, carriages, stock in trade, and all the property of the bankrupt not exempt by law. The assignees then bring this suit against Hale, and seek to compel him to pay over to them the three hundred and seven dollars received by him the previous summer, to convey to him the factory freed and discharged from the mortgages, and to exclude him from any dividend out of the estate on the mortgage and judgment debts.

The complainants rely mainly upon the testimony of the bankrupt and of Hale, the father-in-law, and circumstances disclosed therein in connection with the facts above enumerated, as showing the transactions between them were a fraud upon the bankrupt law, because they were, on the part of Hale, with intent to procure a preference over other creditors when he believed, or had reasonable cause to believe, his son-in-law insolvent.

Other than the fact that Eastman was insolvent, within the meaning of the term insolvency, as defined in the law, that is, inability to pay his debts in due course of business, there is little, if anything, in the proofs, to overcome the positive testimony of both Hale and Eastman on the subject, and the testimony of both is positive and explicit in denial, that Hale at any time, down to his discovery that other creditors had recovered a judgment against Eastman, had any knowledge of such insolvency, and that Hale intended to secure a preference, or accepted any payment or conveyance or judgment with that purpose, or even with knowledge that they would so operate, is not possible, if it be true that he was not aware Eastman owed any one but himself. I shall not go into the evidence in detail, but its consideration leads me to these conclusions:

First. The payment for the cutters sold, made to the defendant, Hale, by Eastman's direction, was received by Hale in due course of business, without any belief in Eastman's insolvency, and without any reasonable cause for such belief; nor was it paid in contemplation of insolvency, nor paid or received with any intent to give or receive a preference over other creditors. The three hundred and seven dollars was, therefore, lawfully received by Hale, and he was entitled to retain it.

Second. The utmost value set upon the factory and the land whereon it stands, by any witness, is three thousand dollars. The complainants furnish no evidence whatever, that it was worth any more. The principal sum due on the three mortgages thereon, amount to two thousand six hundred dollars, and the unpaid interest at the time of the deed given to Mr. Hale, amounted to upwards of five hundred dollars, making the mortgage liens over three thousand one hundred dollars, which is more than the mortgaged premises were worth. There is no evidence, nor is there any claim, that mortgage debts were not due in good faith, free from any impeachment under the bankrupt law or otherwise; nor that the mortgage lien was not perfect for the amount due. The deed, therefore, gave to Hale, the father-in-law, no preference. It could give none. He was entitled, by virtue of his lien, to the whole property already. Even more; the gratuitous release of the inchoate right of dower by the wife of Eastman, was necessary to make the property worth the price, three thousand dollars, at which Hale received it; and although that right of dower was subordinate to the mortgages, a foreclosure would have been necessary to a compulsory extinguishment of the right. A foreclosure would have involved expense, necessarily reducing the net amount that could be realized on the debt. So that, in fact, the conveyance without foreclosure, operating to release the equity of redemption, so far from resulting in a preference to Hale over other creditors, had the effect of reducing the mortgage debt to a greater extent than was otherwise possible, and in that way tended to the benefit of Eastman and his other creditors. If, therefore, Hale had then known that Eastman was insolvent, it would be impossible to say that an acceptance of a conveyance of the equity of redemption, the property being, confessedly, worth less than the mortgage debt, could be or could have been intended to be a giving or an acceptance of a preference over other creditors. Upon such a state of facts they could derive no benefit from the property in any event, and the estate of the bankrupt would not be enhanced thereby.

The price agreed upon, and at which Hale agreed to take the property, being distinctly proved to be a fair price, it should be charged against the mortgage debt, and the defendant, Hale, allowed to prove against the bankrupt estate on account of that debt, only the balance due at the date of the deed, with interest thereon from that date.

The good faith of the defendant, Hale, was testified to by his response to the demand of the complainants that he give up the property. He offered to convey it to the assignee, reserving and retaining his mortgage lien. Upon the proofs, this would have been of no benefit to the estate, and it was declined, and by the same proofs, it follows, that Hale got no preference by the deed to him. He was only saved the expense of foreclosure. The complainants, or the creditors for whom they act, manifestly thought, that by a harsh application of the doctrine of merger of the lien in the legal title, they could succeed in avoiding the deed as an illegal preference, and then exclude the defendant from any enforcement of his original mortgage lien, and the mortgage debt from any participation in dividends out of the estate in the hands of complainants. On the question, whether, had they succeeded in setting aside the deed, it would have followed that the mortgagee must loose his lien, I do not find it necessary to express any opinion.

Third. As to the debts for which the defendant, Hale, obtained judgments, there is undoubtedly room for suspicion that before the father-in-law commenced the suits on the 14th of January, he doubted either the ability or the willingness of his son-in-law to pay what he owed. But this is not enough to forfeit his right to share in the estate. A creditor is not compelled to forbear suing his debtor on pain of losing his right to prove his debt, if his debtor should be adjudged a bankrupt within six months thereafter. Even where the debtor is known to be insolvent, if he has committed no act of bankruptcy the creditors are not remediless. They are not bound to lie by, instituting no suit, and, as the case may be, see their debtor wasting his property. They may sue, and by proceeding to judgment compel the debtor himself to apply to be decreed a bankrupt, or if he do not, but suffers his property to be taken on legal process in such manner as will operate to give priority, even to themselves, if carried into full execution, they may then allege this as an act of bankruptcy, and themselves demand that he be adjudged a bankrupt. It is by no means every recovery of judgment, even against a known insolvent, that amounts to the acceptance of a preference which will bar the proof of the judgment debt. If it were, then no creditor would be safe in suing his debtor whose solvency he had reason to suspect. He would be compelled to lie by, waiting in hope that his debtor will commit some act of bankruptcy, and be remediless until he does so. It is the prosecution with intent to secure a preference, and the using the judgment with that intent, or in such wise that the preference will be the necessary result, which makes the creditor liable to be barred the right to prove his debt.

True, it has been often said that the creditor must be deemed to intend the necessary result of his act. But where he believes himself to be the sole creditor, or where he prosecutes suit and thereby drives the debtor into an act of bankruptcy, this alone works no prejudice to the estate, and is not of itself the acceptance of a preference.

To sue, recover a judgment and levy an execution may often be the only means a creditor has of forcing his debtor into bankruptcy, and of thereby compelling the equal distribution of all his property among the creditors in the very manner the bankrupt law prescribes; and it would not only be absurd, but grossly unjust, to treat this as a forfeiture of the right to share in the estate, and leave the whole to be divided among others, less diligent to compel the debtor to do what is just, and what the law makes it his reasonable duty to do without such compulsion. Notwithstanding the suspicion, which is warmly insisted upon by the complainants, the proofs establish that Hale was not aware, until after his execution was levied, that Eastman owed other debts. If not, then he was not seeking to procure an advantage over other creditors. When he learned that other creditors were pursuing Eastman, he at once offered to give up any apparent advantage gained by his judgments and executions, and come in on an equal footing with others. He went further. These creditors having compelled Eastman to submit to an adjudication, grounded on the very fact that he had suffered his property to be taken on legal process, thus availing themselves of the very act which Hale, by lawfully prosecuting, had driven the debtor to do, he went to the assignee, and offered to relinquish all claim of advantage or priority under his judgments and executions, and tendered proof of his debts with a view to share pro rata only in the estate.

Even if his prosecution had been from the first with knowledge that Eastman owed others as well as himself, and was wholly insolvent, he had a right to prosecute his suits to judgment and levy. That would have created an act of bankruptcy on the part of Eastman. This being so, had Hale himself become the petitioning creditor, and sought the adjudication, it could not be doubted that he would be entitled to share in the estate. This would not be accepting a preference, or doing anything to defeat or prevent the operation of the bankrupt law, but the contrary. Other creditors having, notwithstanding his offer to give up all advantage by reason of his judgment and levy, made the latter the ground of an adjudication, as he might have done, he at once did all that was possible, to show that gaining a preference was not his purpose, as it was not the necessary result of what he had thus far done, by offering to the assignee the surrender of all such advantage or apparent advantage. To hold, that under such circumstances, he forfeited his right to share in the estate, would be to hold, in substance, that no creditor can safely sue his debtor and recover judgment and levy his execution, although his debtor has not until then committed any act of bankruptcy. He must leave his debtor in the uninterrupted enjoyment of his property, however insolvent he may be, in the hope that, by and by, he will commit some other act of bankruptcy upon which he can be proceeded against in the bankrupt court. Such is not the meaning, intent or effect of the bankrupt law. That law does not discourage vigilance nor activity in forcing debtors to appropriate their property to what they owe. It is when advantage is accepted or obtained with a view to a preference over other creditors, or in circumstances in which such preference is the result of what the creditor does or attempts to do, that the act becomes a fraud upon the law.

Dealing with this case, as I must upon the testimony, I must say, that here the defendant, Hale, has gained no preference over other creditors, and has not sought or attempted to gain one, and has done nothing to deprive him of the right to prove his debts, and share with other creditors in the estate of the bankrupt.

The bill of complaint was filed without sufficient cause, when the defendant had offered to do all and even more than he was bound in equity to do. But the circumstances were not so clear as to require any imputation upon the good faith of the assignees in the prosecution of the suit. The bill must be dismissed with costs, to be paid out of the estate in the hands of the assignees.

It remains to see what has been held by this court on the subject now under consideration.

We have already referred to the leading case of the N. J. Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. 383. On the precise point now under consideration, Justice Nelson said: "If it is competent at all for the carrier to stipulate for the gross negligence of himself and his servants or agents, in the transportation of goods, it should be required to be done, at least in terms that would leave no doubt as to the meaning of the parties."

As to the carriers of passengers, Mr. Justice Grier, in the case of Philadelphia and Reading R. v. Derby, 14 How. 486, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "When carriers undertake to convey persons by the powerful but dangerous agency of steam, public policy and safety require that they be held to the greatest possible care and diligence. And whether the consideration for such a transportation be pecuniary or otherwise, the personal safety of the passengers should not be left to the sport of chance, or the negligence of careless agents. Any negligence in such cases may well deserve the epithet of 'gross.'" That was the case of a free passenger, a stockholder of the company, taken over the road by the president to examine its condition; and it was contended in argument, that as to him, nothing but "gross negligence" would make the company liable. In the subsequent case of The Steamboat New World v. King, 16 How. 469, which was also the case of a free passenger carried on a steamboat, and injured by the explosion of the boiler, Curtis, justice, delivering the judgment, quoted the above proposition of Justice Grier, and said: "We desire to be understood to reaffirm that doctrine, as resting not only on public policy, but on sound principles of law" P. 474.

In York Company v. Central Railroad, 3 Wall. 113, the court, after conceding that the responsibility imposed on the carrier of goods by the common law, may be restricted and qualified by express stipulation, adds: "When such stipulation is made, and it does not cover losses from negligence or misconduct. we can perceive no just reason for refusing its recognition and enforcement." In the case of Walker v. The Transportation Company, decided at the same term (3 Wall. 150), it is true, the owner of a vessel destroyed by fire on the lakes, was held not to be responsible for the negligence of the officers and agents having charge of the vessel; but that was under the act of 1851, which the court held to apply to our great lakes as well as to the sea. And in Express company v. Kountze Brothers, 8 Wall. 342, where the carriers were sued for the loss of gold-dust delivered to them on a bill of lading excluding liability for any loss or damage by fire, act of God, enemies of the government, or dangers incidental to a time of war, they were held liable for a robbery by a predatory band of armed men (one of the excepted risks), because they negligently and needlessly took a route which was exposed to such incursions. The judge, at the trial, charged the jury, that although the contract was legally sufficient to restrict the liability of the defendants as common carriers, yet if they were guilty of actual negligence, they were responsible; and that they were chargeable with negligence unless they exercised the care and prudence of a prudent man in his own affairs. This was held by this court to be a correct statement of the law. P. 353.

Some of the above citations are only expressions of opinion, it is true; but they are the expressions of judges whose opinions are entitled to much weight; and the last cited case is a judgment upon the precise point. Taken in connection with the concurring decisions of State courts before cited, they seem to us decisive of the question, and leave but little to be added to the considerations which they suggest.

It is argued that a common carrier, by entering into a special contract with a party for carrying his goods or person on modified terms, drops his character and becomes an ordinary bailee for hire, and therefore, may make any contract he pleases. That is, he may make any contract whatever, because he is an ordinary bailee; and he is an ordinary bailee because he has made the contract.

We are unable to see the soundess of this reasoning. It seems to us more accurate to say that common carriers are such by virtue of their occupation, not by virtue of the responsibilities under which they rest. Those responsibilities may vary in different countries, and at different times, without changing the character of the employment. The common law subjects the common carrier to insurance of the goods carried, except as against the act of God, or public enemies. The civil law excepts, also, losses by means of any superior force, and any inevitable accident. Yet the employment is the same in both cases. And if by special agreement the carrier is exempted from still other responsibilities, it does not follow that his employment is changed, but only that his responsibilities are changed. The theory occasionally announced, that a special contract as to the terms and responsibilities of carriage changes the nature of the employment, is calculated to mislead. The responsibilities of a common carrier may be reduced to those of an ordinary bailee for hire, whilst the nature of his business renders him a common carrier still. Is there any good sense in holding that a railroad company. whose only business is to carry passengers and goods, and which was created and established for that purpose alone, is changed to a private carrier for hire by a mere contract with a customer, whereby the latter assumes the risks of inevitable accidents in the carriage of his goods? Suppose the contract relates to a single crate of glass or crockery, whilst at the same time the carrier receives from the same person twenty other parcels, respecting which no such contract is made; is the company a public carrier as to the twenty parcels, and a private carrier as to the one?

On this point, there are several authorities which support our view, some of which are noted in the margin. Davidson v. Graham, 2 Ohio St. 131; Graham v. Davis & Co., 4 Ohio St. 362; Swindler v. Hilliard, 2 Rich. 286; Baker v. Brinson, 9 Rich. 201; Steel v. Townsend, 37 Ala. 247.

A common carrier may undoubtedly become a private carrier, or a bailee for hire, when, as a matter of accommodation, or special engagement, he undertakes to carry something which it is not his business to carry. For example, if a carrier of produce, running a truck boat between New York city and Norfolk, should be requested to carry a keg of specie, or a load of expensive furniture, which he could justly refuse to take, such agreement might be made in reference to his taking and carrying the same as the parties chose to make, not involving any stipulation contrary to law or public policy. But when a carrier has a regularly established business for carrying all or certain articles, and especially if that carrier be a corporation created for the purpose of the carrying trade, and the carriage of the articles is embraced within the scope of its chartered powers, it is a common carrier, and a special contract about its responsibility does not divest it of the character.

But it is contended, that though a carrier may not stipulate for his own negligence, there is no good reason why he should not be permitted to stipulate for immunity for the negligence of his servants, over whose actions in his absence, he can exercise no control. If we advert for a moment to the fundamental principles on which the law of common carriers is founded, it will be seen that this objection is inadmissible. In regulating the public establishment of common carriers, the great object of the law was to secure the utmost care and diligence in the performance of their important duties—an object essential to the welfare of every civilized community. Hence the common law rule which charged the common carrier as an insurer. Why charge him as such? Plainly for the purpose of raising the most stringent motive for the exercise of carefulness and fidelity in his trust. In regard to passengers, the highest degree of carefulness and diligence is expressly exacted. In the one case, the securing of the most exact diligence and fidelity underlies the law, and is the reason for it; in the other it is directly and absolutely prescribed by the law. It is obvious, therefore, that if a carrier stipulate not to be bound to the exercise of care and diligence, but to be at liberty to indulge in the contrary, he seeks to put off the essential duties of his employment. And to assert that he may do so seems almost a contradiction in terms.

Now, to what avail does the law attach these essential duties to the employment of the common carrier, if they may be waived in respect to his agents and servants, especially where the carrier is an artificial being, incapable of acting except by agents and servants? It is carefulness and diligence in performing the service which the law demands, not an abstract carefulness and diligence in proprietors and stockholders who take no active part in the business. To admit such a distinction in the law of common carriers, as the business is now carried on, would be subversive of the very object of the law.

It is a favorite argument in the cases which favor the extension of the carrier's right to contract for exemption from liability, that men must be permitted to make their own agreements, and that it is no concern of the public on what terms an individual chooses to have his goods carried. Thus in Dorr v. The N. J. S. Nav. Co., I Kern. 485, the court sums up its judgment thus: "To say the parties have not a right to make their own contract, and to limit the precise extent of their own respective risks and liabilities, in a matter no way affecting the public morals, or conflicting with the public interests, would, in my judgment, be an unwarrantable restriction upon trade and commerce, and a most palpable invasion of personal right."

Is it true that the public interest is not affected by individual contracts of the kind referred to? Is not the whole business community affected by holding such contracts valid? If held valid, the advantageous position of the companies exercising the business of common carriers is such that it places it in their power to change the law of common carriers in effect, by introducing new rules of obligation.

The carrier and his customer do not stand on a footing of equality. The latter is only one individual of a million. He cannot afford to higgle or stand out and seek redress in the courts. His business will not admit such a course. He prefers, rather, to accept any bill of lading, or sign any paper the carrier presents; often, indeed, without knowing what the one or the other contains. In most cases he has no alternative but to do this, or abandon his business. In the present case, for example, the freight agent of the company testified that though they made forty or fifty contracts every week like that under consideration, and had carried on the business for years, no other arrangement than this was ever made with any drover. And this reason is obvious enough—if they did not accept this, they must pay tariff rates. These rates were seventy cents a hundred pounds for carrying from Buffalo to Albany, and each horned animal was rated at 2,000 pounds, making a charge of $14 for every animal carried, instead of the usual charge of $70 for a car load; being a difference of three to one. Of course no drover could afford to pay such tariff rates. This fact is adverted to for the purpose of illustrating how completely in the power of the railroad companies parties are; and how necessary it is to stand firmly by those principles of law by which the public interests are protected.

If the customer had any real freedom of choice, if he had a reasonable and practicable alternative, and if the employment of the carrier were not a public one, charging him with the duty of accommodating the public in the line of his employment; then, if the customer choose to assume the risk of negligence, it could with more reason be said to be his private affair, and no concern of the public. But the condition of things is entirely different, and especially so under the modified arrangements which the carrying trade has assumed. The business is mostly concentrated in a few powerful corporations, whose position in the body politic enables them to control it. They do, in fact, control it, and impose such conditions upon travel and transportation as they see fit, which the public is compelled to accept. These circumstances furnish an additional argument, if any were needed, to show that the conditions imposed by common carriers ought not to be adverse (to say the least) to the dictates of public policy and morality. The status and relative position of the parties render any such conditions void. Contracts of common carriers, like those of persons occupying a fiduciary character, giving them a position in which they can take undue advantage of the persons with whom they contract, must rest upon their fairness and reasonableness. It was for the reason that the limitations of liability first introduced by common carriers into their notices and bills of lading were just and reasonable, that the courts sustained them. It was just and reasonable that they should not be responsible for losses happening by sheer accident, or dangers of navigation that no human skill or vigilance could guard against; it was just and reasonable that they should not be chargeable for money or other valuable articles liable to be stolen or damaged, unless apprised of their character or value; it was just and reasonable that they should not be responsible for articles liable to rapid decay, or for live animals liable to get unruly from fright, and to injure themselves in that state, when such articles or live animals became injured without their fault or negligence. And when any of these just and reasonable excuses were incorporated into notices or special contracts assented to by their customers, the law might well give effect to them without the violation of any important principle, although modifying the strict rules of responsibility imposed by the common law. The improved state of society, and the better administration of the laws had diminished the opportunities of collusion and bad faith on the part of the carrier, and rendered less imperative the application of the iron rule that he must be responsible at all events. Hence the exemptions referred to were deemed reasonable and proper to be allowed. But the proposition to allow a public carrier to abandon altogether his obligations to the public and stipulate for exemptions that are unreasonable and improper, amounting to an abdication of the essential duties of his employment, would never have been entertained by the sages of the law.

Hence, as before remarked, we regard the English statute, called the railway and canal traffic act passed in 1854, which declared void all notices and conditions made by common carriers, except such as the judge, at the trial, or the courts should hold just and reasonable, as substantially a return to the rules of the common law. It would have been more strictly so, perhaps, had the reasonableness of the contract been referred to the law instead of the individual judges. The decisions made for more than half a century before the courts commenced the normal course which led to the necessity of that statute, giving effect to certain classes of exemptions stipulated for by the carrier, may be regarded as authorities on the question as to what exemptions are just and reasonable. So the decisions of our own courts are entitled to like effect when not made under the fallacious notion that every special contract imposed by the common carrier on his customers must be carried into effect, for the simple reason that it was entered into, without regard to the character of the contract and the relative situation of the parties.

Conceding, therefore, that special contracts, made by common carriers with their customers, limiting their liability, are good and valid, so far as they are just and reasonable; to the extent, for example, of excusing them for all losses happening by accident, without any negligence or fraud on their part, when they asked to go still further, and to be excused from negligence—an excuse so repugnant to the law of their foundation and to the public good—they have no longer any plea of justice or reason to support such a stipulation, but the contrary. And then, the inequality of the parties, the compulsion under which the customer is placed, and the obligations of the carrier to the public, operate with full force to divest the transaction of validity.

On this subject, the remarks of Chief Justice Redfield, in his recent collection of American Railway Cases, seem to us eminently just. "It being clearly established then," says he, "that common carriers have public duties which they are bound to discharge with impartiality, we must conclude that they cannot, either by notices or special contracts, release themselves from the performance of these public duties, even by the consent of those who employ them; for all extortion is done by the apparent consent of the victim. A public officer or servant, who has a monopoly in his department, has no just right to impose onerous and unreasonable conditions upon those who are compelled to employ him." And his conclusion is, that notwithstanding some exceptional decisions, the law of to-day stands substantially as follows: "1. That the exemption claimed by carriers must be reasonable and just, otherwise it will be regarded as extorted from the owners of the goods by duress of circumstances, and, therefore, not binding. 2. That every attempt of carriers, by general notices or special contract, to excuse themselves from responsibility for losses or damages resulting in any degree from their own want of care and faithfulness, is against that good faith which the law requires as the basis of all contracts or employments, and, therefore, based upon principles and a policy which the law will not uphold."

The defendants endeavor to make a distinction between gross and ordinary negligence, and insist that the judge ought to have charged that the contract was at least effective for excusing the latter.

We have already adverted to the tendency of judicial opinion adverse to the distinction between gross and ordinary negligence. Strictly speaking, these expressions are indicative rather of the degree of care and diligence which is due from a party, and which he fails to perform, than of the amount of inattention, carelessness or stupidity which he exhibits. If very little care is due from him, and he fails to bestow that little, it is called gross negligence. If very great care is due, and he fails to come up to the mark required, it is called slight negligence. And if ordinary care is due, such as a prudent man would exercise in his own affairs, failure to bestow that amount of care is called ordinary negligence. In each case, the negligence, whatever epithet we give it, is failure to bestow the care and skill which the situation demands; and hence it is more strictly accurate perhaps to call it simply "negligence." And this seems to be the tendency of modern authorities. 1 Smith's Lead. Cases, 6th Amer. ed.; Story on Bailments, § 571; Wyld v. Pickford, 7 M. & W. 460; Hinton v. Dibbin, 2 Q. B. 661; Wilson v. Brett, 11 M. & W. 115; Beal v. South Devon R. Co., 3 Hurlst. & Colt, 337; L. R., 1 C. B. 600; 14 How. 486; 16 How. 474. If they mean more than this, and seek to abolish the distinction of degrees of care, skill and diligence required in the performance of various duties, and the fulfilment of various contracts, we think they go too far; since the requirement of different degrees of care in different situations is too firmly settled and fixed in the law to be ignored or changed. The compilers of the French Civil Code undertook to abolish these distinctions by enacting that "every act whatever of man that causes damage to another, obliges him by whose fault it happened to repair it." Art. 1382. Toullier, in his Commentary on the Code, regards this as a happy thought, and a return to the law of nature. Vol. 6, p. 243. But such an iron rule is too regardless of the foundation principles of human duty, and must often operate with great severity and injustice.

In the case before us, the law, in the absence of special contract, fixes the degree of care and diligence due from the railroad company to the persons carried on its trains. A failure to exercise such care and diligence is negligence. It needs no epithet properly and legally to describe it. If it is against the policy of the law to allow stipulations which will relieve the company from the exercise of that care and diligence, or which, in other words, will excuse them for negligence in the performance of that duty, then the company remains liable for such negligence. The question whether the company was guilty of negligence in this case, which caused the injury sustained by the plaintiff, was fairly left to the jury. It was unnecessary to tell them whether, in the language of law writers, such negligence would be called gross or ordinary.

The conclusions to which we have come are—

First. That a common carrier cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility when such exemption is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law.

Secondly. That it is not just and reasonable in the eye of the law for a common carrier to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants.

Thirdly. That these rules apply both to carriers of goods and carriers of passengers for hire, and with special force to the latter.

Fourthly. That a drover travelling on a pass, such as was given in this case, for the purpose of taking care of his stock on the train, is a passenger for hire.

These conclusions decide the present case, and require a judgment of affirmance. We purposely abstain from expressing any opinion as to what would have been the result of our judgment had we considered the plaintiff a free passenger instead of a passenger for hire.

Judgment affirmed.
