PHILADELPHIA LIBRARY COMPANY v. HENRY J. WILLIAMS.

1. The taking by a court from the hands of a testamentary trustee, the execution of a power submitted to his sole discretion, would violate the right of private property and the spirit and purpose of the bill of rights, and could not be justified except upon the clearest evidence of his fraud or incapacity.

2. To hold that by reason of his promise to the testator, the mind of a trustee of admitted integrity, was under a constraint of which he was unconscious, and which made him incapable of exercising his judgment, notwithstanding he swears that he did act upon his own judgment, and because it accorded with his promise, would be to deny the power of self-knowledge and the capability of self-examination, upon which rests the doctrine of man's accountability for his thoughts and purposes.

3. Though a verbal direction of a testator in conflict with a power contained in his will, cannot alter the written terms of the power, yet a court of equity may compel a trustee to comply with a promise to follow a verbal direction and act of the testator, in the line of the power.

4. A chancellor will so control a trustee that he shall not disappoint the true intent and purpose of the donor, as gathered from the instrument containing the power; and an innocent motive will not save the exercise of the power if it violate the true purpose of the trust: broader than this there can be no conception of chancery power in Pennsylvania.

5. By the terms of a will, a trustee was to act under a broad and thoughtful foresight in the selection of a lot whereon to erect a building for a public library. The testator prior to his death, engaged the trustee upon his solemn promise to select a certain lot. The trustee, a man of admitted integrity, did select that lot. Upon a bill in equity filed against him, he both in his answer and whilst under examination, declared that he selected the lot because he thought it the best for the purpose that could be obtained, and assigned good reasons therefor. Held, that he had properly exercised the power.

Certificate from Nisi Prius.

Opinion by AGNEW, J. Delivered May 19th, 1873.

This is not an ordinary proceeding. It is an endeavor to set aside a man's solemn act, done in the exercise of his right of property, in his life-time, when he had absolute power over his own estate. It is an effort also to declare his friend, the chosen agent to execute his purpose, invested with absolute discretion to this end, disqualified to perform his will, because at his earnest request this friend has adopted and followed the testator's act. As a consequence, the bill seeks, on the ground of entire disqualification, to take the actual execution of the will into the hands of the court, and to declare how much of the corpus of the estate shall be used for that purpose. As a further consequence, the will must be executed by a stranger—a master acting under decrees procured from time to time by plaintiffs; for, by the total disqualification of the executor, the testator is no longer represented. This is the frame and purpose of this bill. Such a proceeding violates the right of private property and the spirit and purpose of the bill of rights, and cannot be justified except upon the clearest evidence of the incapacity of the executor, or that he is acting in fraud of his powers.

The case, briefly stated, is this: Dr. Jas. Rush, a gentleman of education and fortune, though somewhat peculiar, conceived the thought of founding a noble charity, at once a public benefit to his native city, Philadelphia, and a monument to those from whom he derived his wealth. He pondered on the subject and then made his will. At first he restricted the site of the building to certain central limits; but the rapid progress of the city during the eventful period of 1860 to 1867, altered his views of location. Fearful, if his charities were placed near the centre of the city, where property was rising rapidly, that the building might be swept away by the tide of speculation, he made a codicil, revoked the restriction, and enabled his executor to go beyond the limits stated in his will. Still reflecting upon his scheme for about two years more, and anxious to locate his charity to suit his own thoughts, he had careful examinations made by his friend and executor, and finding no other site suitable, either from price or size, he finally chose a spacious square on the great central avenue of the city, a few squares south of the original limit, and bought it at a cost of $130,000, or about one eighth of his entire estate. Upon this ground he directed his executor to build, and, to secure his co-operation, obtained his promise to do so. This promise was given, the executor swears most positively, not only out of regard to the testator's wishes, but because the lot and site were approved by his own judgment, founded on a previous examination of all the known eligible sites. Within a month after the death of Dr. Rush, Henry J. Williams, the executor, consulted eminent counsel as to the obligation of the contract of purchase upon the estate and upon his own duties in making the selection, and was advised by Judge Strong that the purchase was binding, that his power of selection was absolute, and was to be exercised upon his own judgment.

Dr. Rush died on the 26th of May, 1869. Mr. Williams made the selection under the will, and communicated it to the library company on the 29th of June, 1869, having previously stated it to individual members. Mr. Williams, the executor, a member himself of the library company, having no selfish or hostile interest, an old and skilful lawyer, well informed of his duties, a gentleman of intelligence and refinement, one whose integrity and purity of character are conceded by the plaintiffs to the fullest extent, is admitted to have acted in perfect good faith, and he, on his oath, attests that he acted upon his own judgment. It is alleged that the selection of the site at Broad and Christian streets, chosen and purchased by the testator, and adopted by the executor, must be set aside, not because of any intent to disappoint the trust, or of the slightest mala fides, but because the mind of the trustee, was, by reason of a promise to the testator, under a constraint, of which he was unconscious, when he made the selection, which made him incapable of exercising his judgment, notwithstanding he swears that he did act upon his own judgment, and because it accorded with his promise. The proposition, instead of being so plain and clearly established that a court of equity can act upon it to set aside the testator's choice and oust his trustee, is simply incredible, and is destructive of the right of private property. It denies the power of self-knowledge and the capability of self-examination, upon which the doctrine of accountability for the thoughts and purposes of the heart rests. It asserts a want of power to introspect our consciousness and motives of action under the responsibility of an oath, and our ability to distinguish between the obligation of a promise and the determination of the judgment in doing an act of importance pondered for weeks. The case is brought directly to this point, for the positive, distinct and reiterated assertions of Mr. Williams, in his answer and his testimony, that he did act upon his own judgment, compel us to decide either that he does not know the operations of his own mind, or that he is foresworn. The latter alternative is conceded on all hands to be untrue. Can it be possible that a court, in such a case and on such ground, will depose the executor, cast the property purchased by the testator back upon the estate, wrest the power from his hands, and place it in the hands of others? There is no such case to be found in the books here or elsewhere; and if any can be found abroad, it cannot be imported into this free State. Before examining the law let me state the bearing of the facts.

Was the selection in the line of Dr. Rush's written will? The will is dated in 1860. Dr. Rush devises to Mr. Williams all his estate, in trust, to select a lot not less than 150 feet square, between Fourth and Fifteenth, and Spruce and Race streets; and to erect a fire-proof building sufficiently large, not only for the present wants of the library company; but for future extension, according to his own plans and directions; and if he should have none, then according to Dr. Williams' best judgment and to the views he had confessed to him.

Thus, by the terms of the will, the testator reserved to himself the right to leave written instructions; and if he did not, that the executor should act upon his verbal directions. His verbal instructions to his executor are therefore within the very line of the written will. It is a matter of history that the war of the rebellion changed the whole surface of affairs in this city as well as elsewhere, by the inflation of the currency, the rise of prices, and increase of business.

These had a strong influence on Dr. Rush's mind. Let the language of the first codicil express his own thought. Paragraph 26—"Events and circumstances occurring within the last six years have obliged me to make several changes in my will." Then he proceeds to state the risk of making a new will, lest his death within thirty days afterwards might void it. "To void the possibility of such a result (he proceeds), I must let it stand as it is, and add other provisions as they may occur to me."

The codicil is dated May 16th, 1866. No better exposition of the testator's thoughts can be made than thus given to us in his own words, to exhibit the state of his mind when he made the second codicil, of the 18th of April, 1867. Remembering this, the testator's change of views since 1860, when the original will was made, is clearly expressed in the language of the second codicil.

SECT. 2. "I have in my will limited the extent of the lot to be purchased for the library building, as well as its localities; but as I desire that it shall have not only strength, durability and accommodation, but also be of sufficient magnitude for any future or contingent, but not ambitious or competing increase of the library, in order to prevent, if possible, it being torn down in twenty years, and the lot sold at a speculative profit to suit the hyperbole of the times. I authorize and allow my executor under a broad and thoughtful foresight to increase the size of the lot, and select any situation he may deem most expedient, without regard to any provisions of my will or codicils." I have italicized the language to bring out its meaning.

Now what was the testator's own idea as contained in this very provision (the power in question) of a broad and thoughtful foresight?

He tells us himself to increase the size of the lot, and to go out of the original limit to select anywhere. In a broad and thoughtful foresight he foresaw that the centre of the city would not suit his purpose or his means. He said to his executor, go out and choose elsewhere, so that the magnitude of the building will suit all future time, and that the edifice itself shall not be swept away by the irresistible tide of speculation, to suit, as he termed it, the hyperbole of the times; a figure to express the superalative fancy and spirit of an inordinate inflation of prices.

In the next place, did the testator follow the line of his own thought, as expressed in the will itself? The proof of this is very clear, and is not contradicted. He made inquiries for eligible lots—new examinations made were both within the original limits and without. Mr. Williams himself explored, but found nothing suited to Dr. Rush's purpose. Finally, the lot at Broad and Christian streets presented itself, and here the testator found a site suited to his thought—a large, open square, on the main great avenue of the city, 299½ feet on Broad street, and running back 527 feet on Christian; containabout three acres and a half; at a price of $130,000—a large sum, indeed, but still leaving enough, as he believed, to put up the extensive building which filled his thought, as expressed in the codicil itself. In view of the rapid extension of the city within the last thirteen years, what right have we to say this selection was not made under a broad and thoughtful foresight, and does not meet the views and purposes expressed in the written will and codicils? The views and wishes of the library committee are outside of the true question, which must be decided upon the will itself.

Next, what were the grounds on which Mr. Williams exercised his discretion. These are best stated in his own words in his answer and sworn testimony.

"I have chosen this site for these, among other reasons:

"1. It is on the finest street of our city.

"2. It is, so far as I know, the only lot on that street sufficiently large for the building I must erect, which I can obtain at a reasonable cost.

"3. If compelled to purchase a lot elsewhere, I will not be able to erect the building ordered by the testator.

"4. I know of no suitable lot on any other street which can be had at the same cost.

"5. It is but a little distance from the centre of the city, and is within easy reach, by car, of all portions of it.

"6. It will not be necessary to have the library building torn down in twenty years, and the lot sold because of its limited dimensions.

"7. Its size insures for all time light, air, retirement, quiet, and safety from external dangers.

"8. It already belongs to the estate.

"9. It is exactly suited to the kind of library Dr. Rush proposed to endow—not a reading-room, nor one containing the light and ephemeral literature of the day, but one for readers and students of a higher grade.

"10. It will carry out the cardinal intent of the testator, as he understood it, because it is the one he selected himself.

"I adhere to this choice and to my determination to build thereon, notwithstanding the opposition which has been raised, because it was to my judgment, and not that of others, Dr. Rush confided the performance of his testamentary dispositions."

Certainly these are good reasons, and aside from all other evidence, vindicate Mr. Williams' assertion that he acted on his own judgment, for they are processes of thought, or steps which lead to his conclusion. Now, let us see what he says on oath as to the exercise of his own judgment; and first in his answer in direct response to the bill: "I selected the Broad and Christian street lot when I had assumed the executorship, after calm, careful and deliberate consideration, having thought of it in every shape, favorable and unfavorable, in which it had been presented, because it was in my judgment, the best I could obtain for the object and purposes of Dr. Rush's will, and because it combined adequate dimensions with cheapness and position." In regard to his promise to Dr. Rush—the alleged ground of disqualification—after stating his efforts to find a suitable lot, he says: "It was after this that the promise stated in my letter of the 30th December, 1870, was made to him. This was given with a knowledge of almost every circumstance which lead subsequently to my decision, when, as his executor, it became my duty to determine the site of the library." Again: "I aver that at the time I made said promise I thought it the best lot for the purpose which could be obtained, and I aver that after careful reflection and subsequent examination I still entertain this opinion." There is much more in the answer to the same effect.

His testimony is given as strong as his answer. When asked whether his judgment was not influenced by his promise, he replied: "Not that I am conscious of at all. I believe if I had made no promise, and had not known the wishes of Dr. Rush, my judgment would have been the same." Again he said: "If my promise to Dr. Rush, and my oath as executor had been at all in conflict, I would have resigned my executorship at once, and left some other person to put up the building."

Much more he said to the point, but this will suffice to know the strong and positive convictions of his mind. In these assertions he is also strongly corroborated by the testimony of many witnesses as to what took place just before Dr. Rush's death, and the communication of the selection of the lot to Mr. Wharton, Mr. Biddle and others. He consulted counsel, as proved by Judge Strong's letter of the 15th of June, 1869, before the meeting of the library company, on the 29th of June, when his selection was formally made known. A committee of conference was appointed at this meeting. To Mr. Fraley, one of the committee, who suggested other lots, he replied that they had all been examined, and that the prices were so high they did not suit Dr. Rush, and that the lot at Broad and Christian streets had been selected because, in the judgment of both Dr. Rush and himself, it combined all the advantages which he wished to secure. He again consulted Judge Strong, who replied July 19th, 1869, saying: "As executor, you are guided by the written will. In the exercise of the discretion reposed in you by that instrument, you may regard Dr. Rush's views and wishes orally expressed; but after all your judgment, however it may be made up, must be your guide in matters left to your discretion." Again urged by Mr. Fraley to change the selection on the 6th of August, 1869, he replied: "I deem that situation (the Broad and Christian lot) most expedient under all the circumstances of the case, for I consider its distance from the centre of the city as far outweighed by its other advantages, and I have the consolation of knowing that this decision is in entire accordance with the wishes of the testator, who selected and purchased this lot for this very purpose in his lifetime." The library company themselves knew he had exercised his own judgment in the matter. A meeting was called for the 19th of October, 1869, to vote on the acceptance or rejection of the provisions of Dr. Rush's will. Committees were raised pro and con to influence the opinions of the members when the meeting should take place, and circulars were issued.

On one side it was said: "But the executor of Dr. Rush, both from the expressed wishes of the testator during his life, as well as from his own judgment of the suitableness of the selected site, is indisposed to change it." The other side said: "The will gives to the executor the absolute right to select the location, and to construct the building, and this discretion has been exercised by selecting Broad and Christian streets as the most suitable spot in the city for the purpose." Against this overwhelming evidence, the positive oath of Mr. Williams, the contemporary circumstances, and the understanding of the library company, how can the conclusion be drawn that Mr. Williams did not exercise his own judgment?

It was after all these things had occurred, and nineteen months after the death of Dr. Rush, the letter of December 30th, 1870, was written, the stronghold and fortress of the plaintiff's bill. The object and purpose of this letter are made obvious by the circumstances which have evoked it. Controversy had arisen, and the library company had made several efforts to induce Mr. Williams to revoke his selection, and finally, at a meeting of the company, on the 10th of December, 1870, resolutions were passed, one of which expressed the "earnest hope and request that Mr. Williams would reconsider his intention to build on the site chosen." Dr. Willing, Judge Hare and Mr. Lea, were appointed a committee to confer with Mr. Williams, and a correspondence ensued, in which Mr. Williams adhered to his selection. The letter of December 30th, 1870, was then written, at the invitation of Dr. Willing, as a formal expression of Mr. Williams' intentions. He restates his convictions, and expresses his surprise that he should be again asked to change his intentions, and proceeds to defend himself against censure for refusing to change his mind. Then he pleads the sacred character of his promise. He cannot yield his judgment, but pressed hard to do so, he appeals to the well known sensibility of the gentlemen composing the committee, to all honorable engagements, if the case were their own. He repeats, also, what he has always said, that to change would be in opposition to his own deliberate judgment; and "I mean this (he adds) in its fullest sense." This letter, written at the close of the year 1870, long after the controversy had existed, in defence of his motives and his reputation, evoked by the direct action of the library company, instead of proving that Mr. Williams acted without judgment, and from unconscious restraint, proves the convictions of a mind thoroughly convinced, and a heart that was fixed upon a just purpose. Admit that he was also influenced by his promise to his friend. So he ought to be, when, as he swears, it was an approving judgment. This is a proper influence, and does not show a man void of discretion, and so bound by conscience that his judgment is lost in the obligation of a foolish pledge.

How far, then, will a court of equity go in regarding a promise to a testator, as in fraud of his written will? Here I think the plaintiffs do not discriminate well. That a verbal direction of a testator in conflict with a power contained in his will, cannot alter the written terms of the power, is beyond contradiction, and to this extent this argument may fairly go.

But that a court of equity can pronounce the verbal direction, and, still stronger, the act of this testator, in the very line of his own power, and a promise to conform to it, ipso facto, a fraud on the power, is contrary to reason and the plainest principles of equity. The reverse is true, for it is the province of equity to follow the mind of the testator. So clear is this principle, that a court of equity will sometimes convert the devisee, even of an absolute estate into a trustee, in order to compel him to perform a solemn promise given to his testator to dispose of the property according to his verbal direction. In doing this the written will is struck down to reach the equity that lies in the verbal direction. Such was the case of Hoge v. Hoge, 1 Watts, 163, where the testator devised an estate to his brother absolutely, under a verbal direction that it should be for the benefit of his illegitimate son. Chief Justice Gibson cites in his opinion a number of cases where the verbal direction was sustained against the text of the will—one, for instance, where a testator having devised his lands to a nephew, desired his heir-at-law not to disturb the nephew in possession of certain lands acquired after the execution of the will, and it was so decreed. Now if a court of equity, to prevent a fraud upon the testator's actual intention, will disregard the written text, how much more consonant to equity is it to regard the solemn act of a testator who has involved his estate in the obligation of a contract in the line of a will, and to carry out its very intent; and how can it regard the promise of the executor to follow the wishes of the testator in this respect, as ipso facto, a fraud upon the testator's power.

On what principle of sound reason, conscience, or equity can the selection of this lot by the executor be pronounced a fraud on the power, or a disappointment of the power, or as an undue and improper execution of the purpose of the testator as contained in his written will? How has the promise to the testator vitiated the selection? What provision of the will does it offend? How can we say the selection is not made with a broad and thoughtful foresight? On the contrary, it conforms both to the will and the purpose of the testator. In following the testator's own act of purchase, nothing but the clearest evidence of incapacity in the testator to select, or of folly in the selection, and of blind and unreasonable obedience in the executor, can set it aside. I am willing to concede the authority of all the cases cited for the plaintiff, including Duke of Portland's case. They may be summed up in a single view—that a chancellor will so control a trustee that he shall not disappoint the true intent and purpose of the donor, as gathered from the instrument containing the power. To execute it otherwise is a fraud on the power. Hence, it is said, "he must execute it bona fide for the end designed." It may be a corollary, also, that an innocent motive will not save the exercise of the power, if it violate the true purpose of the trust. Broader than this there can be no conception of chancery power in Pennsylvania, where the citizen is secured by the constitution in his rights of property. When a testator, to fulfil his own purpose, confers an absolute discretion as to his property, it is his right to have the boon executed by his own trustees; and no court can without clear and adequate cause displace the trustee without violating the right of property.

This is well expressed in the letter of advice of 15th June, 1869, from Judge Strong, under which Mr. Williams acted. "A court of equity does not interfere with a discretion reposed, except in cases of clear abuse, when the court can conclude that the donee of a power is acting in fraud of it. But when, as in your case, the trustee acts in accordance with his own best judgment, and in so doing, follows the positive directions of his testator, it would be altogether unprecedented for a court to interfere and substitute its discretion for that invoked by the will. In this statement he is most distinctly supported by two recent cases decided by this court. Pulpress v. African Church, 12 Wright, 204, and Nagle's Estate, 2 P. F. Smith, 154. To these may be added a few citations from elementary writers. In the recent work of Mr. Perry on Trusts, the modern decisions are brought up. On page 455, section 508, he says, when the discretion to be exercised is a matter of personal judgment—"the trustees alone can exercise these powers, and courts cannot generally interfere to control mere personal judgments in personal matters." For this, numerous cases are cited. Again, on page 457, section 511, —"If the trustees exercise their discretionary power in good faith, and without fraud or collusion, the court cannot review or control their discretion." For this, twenty-four cases are cited. "Nor will a bill be entertained to compel the execution of a mere discretionary power." Ibid. Mr. Hill, in his work on Trustees, ed. 1846, p. 482, says, "as a court of equity will not, in general, assume the exercise of a discretionary power vested in trustees, so it will not interfere to control the trustees acting bona fide in the exercise of their discretion." He cites many cases for this statement.

In conclusion, there is no ground in fact or in law, on which the prayers of this bill can be supported.

The decree of the Court at Nisi Prius is, therefore, reversed, and the bill is ordered to be dismissed at the cost of the plaintiffs.

THE CHIEF JUSTICESHIP — MR. JUSTICE MILLER.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—The death of Chief Justice Chase leaves vacant the highest seat of honor in the judiciary of our land. It seems to be understood that the President has concluded to make no appointment till the next term of the Supreme Court of the United States in October, or perhaps, till the meeting of the Senate in December. This will give time to consider calmly the merits of those whose names may be presented for the Chief Justiceship; and, perhaps, enable the professional mind of the country to indicate whom it prefers for this exalted station. And, surely, exalted it is, whether we consider the nature of the tribunal, the various and far reaching jurisdiction it possesses, or the distinguished men who have presided in this great Hall of Justice. Any country might well be proud of such an illustrious galaxy of names as Jay, Ellsworth, Marshall, Taney, and Chase.

In most cases, when a vacancy happens in the place of the chief or presiding justice of a court, the eye is apt to scan the bench to perceive whether there is not, among the associates, one eminently fitted by his learning, his ability, and his manners (for all are important), to occupy the vacated seat. In the present instance, why should it not be so? As one who has been in the habit of reading carefully the reported decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and has had occasion to notice the conduct of most of the justices of that tribunal on the bench, I venture to suggest to the consideration of the profession, the desirability of securing the nomination of MR. JUSTICE MILLER for promotion to the head of that tribunal, of which he has so long been an ornament.

Among the earliest of President Lincoln's appointees to the Supreme Bench, Mr. Justice MILLER came to the court almost unknown to his eastern brethren. He had no national reputation; he had never been engaged in politics; he had never held a political office; he was known in the West as a learned, laborious, careful lawyer. Born in Kentucky, in the days when she gave orators and statesmen to the public service, he grew up and was educated in the school which furnished such lawyers as Bibb and Crittenden; and migrating in early manhood to the new State of Iowa, his mind grew with the greatness of the mighty West; and when the circuit of his residence came for the first time to be represented on the Supreme Bench, the attention of the profession in the States comprising it, was at once fixed on Samuel F. Miller. Taking his seat on the Bench of the Supreme Court at Washington, in 1862, when questions growing out of the civil war were constantly arising, it very soon became apparent to the Bar that his was a master mind, capable of grappling with the most intricate questions of the law in all its varied departments and countless ramifications. His opinions bear evidence to his industry and ability, and are remarkable for clearness of statement, purity of diction, and evident mastery of any subject which they touch. Quod non tetigit, quod non ornavit. It is unnecessary to specify the opinions, to be found in all the volumes of Wallace's Reports, which attest his ability and skill in the law; but his dissenting opinion in Cummings v. The State of Missouri (4 Wall. 382), his dissenting opinion in Hepburn v. Griswold (8 Wall. 626), his great opinion in Watson v. Jones (13 Wall. 713), which will be the guide of American lawyers hereafter on questions of church property law, and his recent opinion in the Louisiana cases, involving the construction of the 13th and 14th articles of amendment to the Federal Constitution, will forever remain as imperishable landmarks in the history of our jurisprudence.

To those who have had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Justice Miller on the Bench, it need not be said that his manner is the combination of the suaviter in modo with the fortiter in re; and all those who know him in the private relations of life, will be satisfied that, as Chief Justice, he would be exactly the right man in the right place, and that the ermine worn by Marshall and by Taney would be borne aloft with an integrity which would receive no stain from him, but would be handed over to his successor pure and unsullied as he received it. The Supreme Court has been, throughout all our history as a nation, presided over by men of such great ability, purity, and learning, as to command respect, not only at home, but abroad. Let the profession on this occasion indicate whom they think best fitted to maintain for it this high standard; and, as a contribution to the formation of this opinion, I have ventured to suggest the name of Mr. Justice MILLER, who was on the ocean with his brother Strong, when the late Chief Justice was called away, on his way to minister to the sufferings of an invalid wife on the other continent; and who would deprecate, if he knew it, any attempt to present anything like a claim in his behalf. But in such a matter the interest of the Republic is alone to be consulted. M.

We would desire to call attention to the able opinion of Judge Agnew, in the Rush Will Case, published on our first page. The doctrine there announced of the power of courts of equity in interfering with the administration of decedents' estates, though perhaps not satisfactory to disappointed devisees, is surely most accordant to common sense and justice.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The Court of Common Pleas of the Berks county district, on the 12th inst., decided in the case of the Philads. & Reading R. R. Co. v. Berks County R. R. Co., that the legislative grant of a right to build railroads along a certain street of a city, is not a contract to authorize the railroad company to occupy the whole of the street, to the exclusion of other railroad companies, or of individuals. LAWRENCE CONNERY v. GEORGE G. BROOKE.

1. Whether a gate is an obstruction to the free use of a passage-way, is a question of fact for the jury.
2. The maxim contemporanea expositio applied in the construction of the grant of a right of way.

Error to the District Court of Philadelphia.

Opinion by WILLIAMS, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

We are of the opinion that the court below erred in holding, that by "the free use, right and privilege of a passage-way," we can only understand a way unimpeded by any means whatever; and, that, as a necessary consequence, a gate, hung across such way at its intersection with the turnpike, is a wrongful obstruction, for which an action will lie. Undoubtedly, as a general rule, the words of a grant are to be understood in their ordinary and natural sense, and if there is any doubt as to their meaning, they are to be taken most strongly against the grantor. But they are to receive a reasonable construction, and one that will accord with the intention of the parties; and in order to ascertain their intention, the court must look at the circumstances under which the grant was made; Cox v. Freedly, 9 Casey, 124. At the time of the grant in this case, February 26th, 1858, there was a gate across the passage-way at its intersection with the turnpike, and it continued there with the exception of the short interval it was out of repair, until the institution of this action in September, 1869. What, then, was the intention of the parties, and what did they mean by "the free use, right and privilege of a passage-way ten feet in width?" Did they mean that it should be an open passage-way into the turnpike, without any gate at its intersection? If so, why was not the gate removed as soon as the grant was made? Why was it allowed to remain? The fact that the gate was there at the date of the grant, and that it was allowed to remain, cannot change the plain meaning of the words of the grant, but it may help us to ascertain the intention of the parties, if there be any doubt as to their meaning. Contemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege. Undoubtedly, the plaintiff was entitled to the free use, right and privilege of a passage-way ten feet in width, with free ingress and egress at all times, for this is the language of the grant. But what is meant by the free use of a passage-way? Does it necessarily mean that there shall be no gate or door hung across it, or if there is, that it shall always be kept open? Has not the owner of a passage-way its free use, if he hangs a gate across it at its intersection with the street? If I grant the free use, right and privilege of the hall of my house, with free ingress and egress at all times, must I take off the door leading into it, or keep it wide open in order that the grantee may have the free use of it? Or can he not have its free use, if he can enter it by opening the door whenever he chooses? Without doubt, I cannot unreasonably obstruct his use of it, but if the door amounts practically to little or no inconvenience, it seems to me that it is not necessarily a wrongful obstruction. Free is a relative term when applied to the use of a thing. It does not follow that I have not the free use of a room, because I have to open a door in order to get into it; nor does it follow that I have not the free use of an alley, because I have to open a gate to go in and out of it. A gate may be so placed as to be a practical and unreasonable obstruction to the free use of a passage-way; and it may be so constructed and placed as not to amount to any practical obstruction to its use.

Whether the gate in this case amounted to a wrongful obstruction, was, therefore, a question of fact for the jury. If it was not a practical hindrance, and, under the circumstances, an unreasonable obstruction to the plaintiff's use of the passage-way, then it was not a wrongful or illegal obstruction, for which an action will lie.

But the court was right in holding, that the judgment in the action of trespass, brought by the defendant against the plaintiff, for tearing down and breaking the gate, is no bar to the present action. It was for a different course of action, and did not necessarily involve the defendant's right to keep up the gate. The plaintiff may have been guilty of trespass in breaking it down, though it is an obstruction to his free use of the passage-way.

Judgment reversed, and a venire fac as de novo awarded.

HENRY C. HAWKINS v. THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA ex rel.

1. The act of January 29th, 1873, providing inter alia that no member of the present councils of Philadelphia, should be removed by reason of his holding at the same time the office of notary public, is constitutional.
2. It simply deals with a part of the charter of a municipal corporation over which the Legislature has entire control, and does not interfere with any vested right of any individual.
3. It can be pleaded to an action instituted before it was enacted.

Error to Common Pleas of Philadelphia county.

Per Curiam. Delivered May 19th, 1873.

To the suggestion filed by the two private relators, that the defendant being a notary public, holding office under the State, was not eligible to the common council, the defendant, on the 18th of February, 1873, pleaded an act of Assembly of the 29th January, 1873, entitled "An act relating to the office of notary public in the city of Philadelphia," in which it was declared, that the true intent and meaning of the act of Assembly, entitled "An act to incorporate the city of Philadelphia," approved the 2d day of February, 1854, is not to prevent any member of the select and common councils of the city of Philadelphia from holding at the same time the office of notary public, and which further enacted, that the holding of the office of notary public shall not be incompatible with holding at the same time the office of member of either branch of the councils of the city of Philadelphia; and no member of the present councils of said city shall be held to be disqualified on account of the holding or having held at the same time the office of notary public, nor shall he be removed from the office of member of councils by reason of any such disqualification.

To this plea the relators demurred, assigning among other causes of demurrer, that the said act was unconstitutional, and on the 5th April, 1873, the court sustained the demurrer, and the court entered judgment of ouster against the defendant.

In this, we think the learned judge was clearly in error, for the act of 29th January, 1873, was a perfectly constitutional law, and if the attorney general had been the relator, he would have discontinued the suit as soon as the act was brought to his notice, as would have been his duty.

This act deals simply with a part of the charter of a municipal corporation, over which the Legislature had entire control, and did not interfere with any vested right of any individual, and certainly not of the two relators. It was a matter concerning the public, and was strictly within the province of the Legislature, and was not an interference with the proper functions of the court, and did not "override the judiciary."

Judgment of ouster reversed, and judgment for the defendant.

LORENZ v. LEHIGH NAV. CO.

A treasurer of a corporation cannot under a subpœna duces tecum be compelled to produce, before a commissioner to take depositions, the books and papers of the corporation, even though he have the actual custody of them.

Saturday, May 17th, 1873.

This was an action of trover and conversion for five certificates of stock in defendants' company, belonging to plaintiff. After issue, but before trial, a rule was entered to take depositions of witnesses under section 35, rule 10, of District Court (court rule p. 29). The treasurer of defendants was served with a subpœna duces tecum to appear before the commissioner and bring with him certain books and papers, among which were the certificates of stock in question, and an alleged power of attorney of plaintiff to transfer said certificates. On the hearing before the commissioner, the witness attended and was examined. From his testimony it appeared that he was the officer of the company who had charge and actual custody of the books and papers called for, which he declined to produce before the commissioner. Plaintiff filed an affidavit that the alleged power of attorney was a forgery, and that an inspection of it was necessary to enable him to prove this fact. A rule was then taken for an attachment on witness for disobeying the subpœna.

R. H. McGrath and John Samuel, Esqs., for the rule.

As to plaintiff's right to inspect before trial—It was his alleged deed, of which he had no copy. It was material to enable him to maintain his action. Black v. Gompertz, 7 Exch. 67; Tebbutt v. Ambler, 7 Dowl. 674; Doe dem. Child v. Roe, 1 Ell. & Bl. 279; Scott v. Walker, 2 Ell. & Bl. 555; London Gas Light Co. v. Vestry of Chelsea, 6 C. B., N. S.; Pennark Harbor Dock Co. v. Cardiff Water Works, 7 C. B., N. S.

The witness was bound to produce the papers; act of 1865 had made parties witnesses. Corsen v. Dubois, 1 Holt, 239; Arndy v. Long, 9 East. 473; 1 Camp, 14.

The act of 1789 did not apply, this being a tort; Morgan v. Watson, 2 Wh. 10; and the object being inspection before trial.

Charles Gibbons, Esq., contra: Witness being a servant of the company, could not, without their authority, produce their books and papers. 1 Gr. 453; Rose v. King, 5 S. & R. 241. A subpœna duces tecum will not go against officers of a company to produce its books. 5 Cowen, 27-419. He argued as to the opportunity for abuse, which the practice sought to be enforced would allow.

Orphans' Court of Philad'a.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM J. MOORE, a minor.

The court revoked an order for the sale of the real estate of a minor, upon the ground that a serious question of title might be raised, which would deter bidders.

Opinion by PAXSON, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

This was a citation upon the guardian to show cause why he should not be dismissed, and why the order of sale heretofore granted should not be revoked. The dismissal of the guardian was not pressed at the argument, and may be regarded as abandoned. We are asked to revoke the order of sale upon the ground that the interest of said minor in the real estate described in said petition, is contingent upon his arriving at 21 years of age. The devise to said minor is in the following words, viz.:

"I give and bequeath unto my wife Maria, all the property which I may die possessed of (except the articles hereinafter mentioned), so long as she shall remain my widow, and upon her decease or marriage, whichever may first happen, then I give and bequeath my said property to my son, William James Moore, his heirs and assigns forever, and if he, my son William James Moore, should depart this life before he is 21 years of age, the said property I give and bequeath to my brother W. J. Moore's son, Alexander Moore, his heirs and assigns forever."

The widow died December 24th, 1872. The person now objecting to the sale is Alexander Moore, guardian of Alexander Moore, Jr., a minor, and devisee above named.

It is clear that under this will, William takes an estate in fee. Is it absolute, or is it contingent upon his arriving at 21 years of age, with an executory devise to Alexander? "By executory devise, a fee, or other less estate may be limited after a fee, and this happens when a devisor devises his whole estate in fee, but limits a remainder thereon to commence on a future contingency. As if a man devises land to A. and his heirs, but if he dies before the age of twenty-one, then to B. and his heirs; this remainder, though void in a deed, is good by way of executory devise." Black. Com., Book 2, 173. I am not aware that this rule so clearly laid down by Blackstone, has been modified in Pennsylvania. Justice Sharswood, in his very full and complete notes to the last edition, does not refer to any change. It was urged by the learned counsel for the guardian, that by reason of the death of the first taker (the widow) before the arrival of William at full age, the estate vested in the latter absolutely; and Parker's Appeal, 10 P. F. S. 141, was cited in support of this view. No such question arose in that case. The point was whether under the will, Joseph Rex took an estate in fee or in tail. Here the question is whether William took a vested estate in fee, subject to be divested, in case of his death before 21 years of age. This will manifestly limits a fee after a fee, which can only be done by executory devise. The doctrine of executory devises, as existing in Pennsylvania, is recognized in Dunwoodie v. Reed, 3 S. & R. 441, and a number of subsequent cases.

I do not now propose to decide more than is necessary for the purposes of this motion. No judgment of this court upon this proceeding would be conclusive upon the question of title. It would settle no one's right. It is enough to say that it would be unwise to sell the real estate of a minor in a case where a serious question of title may be raised. It might deter bidders, and result in a sacrifice of the property. We think there is such doubt as to this title, and, therefore, revoke the order of sale.

THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA v. KEYSER.

1. An objection to discovery of a fraud on the mere ground that it might be indictable, will not hold. It is necessary that an indictment be actually pending, or at all events a reasonable probability that one will be preferred.
2. The register of water rents for the city of Philadelphia can be compelled by bill to make discovery of frauds committed by him.
3. He is within section 116 of the act of March 31st, 1860, and cannot therefore set up that his answer will criminate him.
4. A court of equity having acquired jurisdiction for the purpose of discovery, will entertain it for the purpose of relief, in most cases of fraud, account, accident and mistake.

Opinion by ALLISON, P. J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The defendant was register of water rents for the city of Philadelphia, from February 28th, 1867, to February 1st, 1872. The plaintiff charges that, during all of this period he neglected to pay in daily to the city treasury, as required by ordinance, all moneys received by him for water rents, and did not make daily returns, under oath, of all moneys so received, to the controller of the city.

It is further charged that during all the time he was in office, the defendant deposited the moneys of the city in his own name, with individuals and with certain banking institutions, and received interest upon the same, for his own use and benefit, and that he has never paid the said interest or profit to the city.

The plaintiff prays for discovery by defendant of the several matters charged against him, and that he be compelled to account for and pay over to the city all interest or profit on moneys received in violation of his obligation and duty of office which in any way accrued to him from detention and use of the moneys of the city.

There is also a prayer for general relief.

The defendant demurs generally to the bill, and specially to the prayers for discovery and release.

The chief ground of demurrer is, that if compelled to make answer of the matters mentioned in the bill, the answers might be evidence tending to subject the defendant to punishment, penalties and disabilities, under the laws of Pennsylvania.

It is an elementary principle of equity jurisprudence, that no man need discover matters tending to criminate himself, or to expose him to a penalty or forfeiture. He may refuse to answer not only the leading fact, but as to every incidental fact which may form a link in the chain of evidence, if any person should choose to indict him. Adams Eq., section 3, and authorities cited in note. In Story's Eq. Juris., section 1494, it is laid down that discovery will not be enforced in aid of a criminal prosecution, or of a penal action, no one being compelled to accuse himself. Wigram's Law of Discovery, 82. It has also been held that a married woman will not be compelled to answer a bill which would subject her husband to a charge of felony. 8th Vesey, 405. Same principle sustained by this court, in Bank v. Biddle, 2 Parsons, 58. The protection thus afforded to a defendant, against being compelled to prove himself guilty of a criminal act, is subject to modification, in respect to frauds; but objection to discovery of a fraud will not hold, on the mere ground that it might be indictable; it is necessary that an indictment shall be actually pending, or, at all events, a reasonable probability that one will be preferred. Adams, section 4, 8th Conn. 528; 3 Barb. Ch. Rep. 358. In O'Connor v. Tack et al., 3 Brew. 407, the majority of this court held that where a bill charged fraud, and the possession by defendants of memoranda relating to the transaction, and the defendants' answer denying the fraud, and referring to the memoranda, that they could not object to an order for their production, on the ground that an indictment was pending against them. Judge Ludlow dissented, and supported his dissent upon the general principle that no one can be compelled to criminate himself so as to subject him to prosecution, and that under the 9th article of the constitution of this State, section 9, "no citizen can be compelled to give evidence against himself." He also held that the 123d section of the act of the 31st of March, 1860, did not cover the case of the defendant. It is asserted by the defendant in this suit, that it is equally inapplicable to his case, as a protection to him; that the use of the moneys of the city by an officer of the corporation for his own personal gain, is made punishable by fine and imprisonment. The section referred to is as follows: "No such trustee, merchant, attorney, broker, agent, director, officer, or member, as aforesaid, shall be enabled or entitled to refuse to make a complete discovery, by answer, to any bill in equity, or to answer any question or interrogatory, in any civil proceeding, in any court of law or equity. But no such answer to any such bill, question, or interrogatory, shall be admissible in evidence against such person charged with any such misdemeanors." An examination of the preceding sections to which the 123d section refers, will show that trustees are mentioned in 113; bankers, brokers, attorneys, merchants and agents, in the 114th section; and in the 116th it is made an offence for an officer, director, or member of any bank, or other body corporate, or public company, to fraudulently take, convert, or apply to his own use, or to the use of any other person, any money, or other property of such bank, body corporate or company.

This, it seems to us, covers the case of the defendant; he was an officer of the city of Philadelphia, and therefore an officer of a body corporate, and is within the letter of the clause of section 123, which requires answer to be made by an officer of a corporation, other than an officer of a bank. The 116th section, it will be seen, treats the very subject matter mentioned in the bill, the fraudulent use and application of the moneys of a body corporate. The defendant is within the protection of the 123d section, and for this reason he cannot successfully plead the general principle, so well established, and which might otherwise enable him to avoid making the discovery sought to be reached by the bill.

It is further set out as a ground of demurrer, that the plaintiff has a full, adequate and complete remedy at law for the alleged wrongs, and is therefore not entitled to the discovery and relief prayed for.

But this general principle has its qualifications, and to some extent its exceptions; there are cases in which the jurisdiction of courts of law and equity may be said to be concurrent. It has been successfully maintained in many instances, that where a party has a just title to come into equity for discovery, and obtains it, the court will go on and give him the proper relief, and not turn him round to the expense and inconvenience of a double suit at law.

The jurisdiction having once rightfully attached, it can be made effectual for the purposes of complete relief. Story's Eq., section 64. The court having acquired jurisdiction of the suit for the purpose of discovery, will entertain it for the purpose of relief, in most cases of fraud, account, accident and mistake. 1 Fonb. Eq., B. 1, ch. 1, section 3. Coop. Eq., introduction, page 31, and Middletown Bank v. Russ, 3 Conn. R. 135. The exercise of this jurisdiction is rested in Fonblanque mainly on the ground of preventing multiplicity of suits. In Aldey v. Whitstable Company, 17 Ves. 329, Lord Eldon says, there is no mode of ascertaining what is due, except by an account in a court of equity. But it is said the party may have discovery, and then go to law. The answer to that is, that the right to the discovery carries with it the right to relief in equity. In Ryle v. Haggie, 1. Jac. & Walk. 236, it is said when it is admitted that a party comes properly into equity for discovery, the court is never disposed to occasion a multiplicity of suits by making him go to the court of law for relief; and in Makenzie v. Johnson, 4 Madd. 373, Sir John Lech says, speaking of the case before him, the plaintiff can only learn from this discovery of the defendants, how they have acted in the execution of their agency, and it would be most unreasonable that he should pay them if it turned out that they had abused his confidence, yet such must be the case if a bill for relief will not lie. There was here a cautious admission of the right to relief, in special cases, by Sir John Leech, founded on the right to discovery, as there was also by Vice Chancellor Wigram, in Pearce v. Creswick, 2 Hare, 293. But Judge Story remarks, at section 65, Eq. Jurisp., that the guarded language used is "in most cases," although he says it is certainly difficult to perceive any solid ground why jurisdiction should not extend to all cases embraced by the general principle.

So also in cases of account there is a distinct ground upon which the jurisdiction for discovery should incidentally carry the jurisdiction for relief. The several reasons upon which this principle is maintained are stated in Story's Equity, section 67: In inadequate remedy at law; discovery in most cases obtained only by reference to a master; compelling production of vouchers and documents, and suppressing multiplicity of suits.

We think the present case is clearly within the rule, upon the grounds of fraud and account, and is not affected by the fact of defendant having given an official bond to the city. A suit may be maintained without regard to the bond; for the claim of the plaintiff may far exceed the penalty of the bond. The demurrers are overruled, and the defendant is directed to make answer to the bill.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted &c., That the sum of one million dollars be and the same is hereby appropriated for the erection of a permanent centennial exposition building for the people of this commonwealth, and for the use of the centennial anniversary of American Independence, under the direction of the United States centennial board of finance, incorporated by act of Congress, to be paid, however, only as hereinafter provided. No larger sum than shall be received into the State treasury on account of the centennial anniversary fund hereinafter provided for, shall be paid by the State treasurer on account of the permanent centennial exposition building, during the present year, and not exceeding three hundred thousand dollars, shall be paid of the amount hereby appropriated during the year Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, and not more than three hundred thousand dollars, during the year Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five, and the residue of one million dollars shall be paid on or before the fourth day of July, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six: Provided, That the moneys herein appropriated, are in no event to be drawn from or out of the revenue of the commonwealth, which under the constitution and laws of the State, are set apart for payment of the State debt; and if, from any cause, the revenue especially provided as a centennial anniversary fund, by the fifth section of this act, shall be insufficient to provide the whole moneys hereinbefore appropriated, no more money than the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be paid from the State treasury to the purposes aforesaid.

SECT. 2. Before any part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid, satisfactory evidence shall be furnished to the State centennial supervisors hereinafter named, that at least one million dollars of bona fide responsible private subscriptions shall have been made, within the city of Philadelphia, to the capital stock of the said United States centennial board of finance, which shall be officially certified to the governor by the said supervisors, and a sum not less than five hundred thousand dollars shall have been appropriated by the municipal authorities of the city of Philadelphia, to be applied to the erection of the permanent centennial exposition building hereinafter provided for and a contract shall have been executed by the said centennial board of finance, and the centennial board of finance incorporated by act of Congress, with the State centennial supervisors hereinafter named, the commissioners of Fairmount Park, and the representatives of the city of Philadelphia, as the authorities of said city shall appoint for the purpose, stipulating that a permanent fire-proof building shall be erected in Fairmount Park, as part of the centennial exposition buildings, to cost not less than one million five hundred thousand dollars, which building shall remain in Fairmount Park perpetually, as the property of the people of this commonwealth, for the preservation and exhibition of national and State relics and works of art, industry, mechanism and products of the soil, mines, etc., of this State, and that it shall be kept open perpetually after the year Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-six, for the improvement and enjoyment of the people of this commonwealth, under such regulations as the Fairmount Park commissioners and the State centennial supervisors, and the proper representatives of the city of Philadelphia, shall from time to time prescribe, but such regulations shall at all times afford equal facilities and privileges to all the people of this commonwealth, without regard to locality, condition or race, which contract shall be approved by the governor of the State before it shall be deemed valid; after the centennial anniversary exposition shall have closed, the said park commissioners and State supervisors, and the proper representatives of the city of Philadelphia, may admit into said building the works of art, products of industry, etc., from any other State or government, under such regulations as may be deemed just and proper, but there shall be no discrimination between the several States of this Union nor between the governments of the world.

SECT. 3. Alexander Henry, J. Gillingham Fell, and John O. James, of the city of Philadelphia, William M. Lyon and John H. Shoenberger, of the county of Allegheny, George R. Messersmith, of Franklin county, William Bigler, of the county of Clearfield, Ario Pardee, Sr., of the county of Luzerne, and John H. Ewing, of the county of Washington, be and they are hereby appointed State centennial supervisors, who shall, in addition to the powers and duties hereinbefore prescribed, formally approve the design, plans, and specifications for said permanent centennial exposition building, and report the same, with their approval, to the governor, and they shall formally approve any contract or contracts for the erection of said building, and for materials for the same, and also report such contract or contracts, with their approval, to the governor; and no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid until such designs, plans, specifications and contract or contracts shall have been officially approved by said supervisors, and so certified to and approved by the governor. When said supervisors shall certify to the governor that the labor done and materials furnished for said building amount to the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, the governor shall draw his warrant on the State treasurer, in favor of the treasurer of the centennial board of finance, for fifty thousand dollars, and thereafter whenever the said supervisors shall certify to the governor that the additional work done and materials furnished amount to the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, and that the money previously paid has been fully and properly applied, he shall draw his warrant in like manner for fifty thousand dollars, if so much shall remain unpaid, in accordance with the stipulation for the annual payments contained in the first section of this act; and when said supervisors shall certify that said centennial exposition building is complete, that the full sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars has been expended on the same, and that the previous payments have been fully and properly applied, the residue of one million dollars shall be paid as hereinbefore directed, but no larger amount shall be paid during any one year than is provided in the first section of this act.

SECT. 4. Said board of State centennial supervisors shall elect one of their number as president, and shall appoint a secretary, who shall keep a record of the proceedings of the board, and file a duplicate of the same with the governor at the close of each year; any vacancy occurring in the board shall be filled by the said board, but no person shall be chosen to fill any such vacancy without receiving five votes, and any of said supervisors may be removed at any time by the governor on address of a majority of both branches of the Legislature; said board shall not exercise any authority or control over the centennial exposition building during the centennial anniversary exposition, but said permanent building shall, during such exposition, be under the same control and direction of the United States centennial commission as the other buildings erected by said centennial board of finance.

SECT. 5. That in order to provide revenue to enable the State to meet the appropriation hereinbefore made, on or before the first day of July, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, all street passenger railway companies now incorporated in the city of Philadelphia shall make return to the State treasurer under oath of the proper officers, stating the gross receipts of each of said companies from the passage of this act until said return is made, and like quarterly returns shall be made by said companies, thereafter, until the first day of April, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven inclusive; and with each report there shall be paid by said street passenger railway companies to the State treasurer three per centum of such gross receipts, which revenue shall be placed by the State treasurer to the credit of the centennial anniversary fund; and all moneys paid by said State treasurer, on acccount of the appropriations hereinbefore made, shall be paid out of said centennial anniversary fund until the same is exhausted, and the residue, if any, required to be paid during any one year, shall be paid out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated. On the first day of April, Annno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven, the tax upon the gross receipts of said railroad companies shall cease and determine. Any of said street passenger railway companies which shall, within thirty days after the passage of this act, file with the State treasurer an official acceptance of its provisions, shall thereupon, each and every of them, be released from any penalty or penalties to which they or any of them might be liable under any proceeding in law or equity for any violation of the provisions of their charters respectively, prior to the passage of this act, and the faith of the State is hereby pledged to such accepting companies, that the legal rate of fares said companies are now authorized to collect shall not be reduced by legislative enactment, before the first day of April, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven. Any street passenger railway companies incorporated after the passage of this act, shall also report their gross receipts, and pay the tax on the same from and after they commence to carry passengers, as hereinbefore provided.

Approved March 27th, A. D. 1873.

HESS v. HERRINGTON.

1. An omission by an assessor to return a valuation of unseated lands, is a mere irregularity, and does not invalidate a tax assessed upon them by the commissioners.
2. The act of 1842 makes the record of the county commissioners evidence of an assessment in fact, and the act of 1815, to support the title of the purchaser, cures all irregularities in it.
3. In an ejectment for land purchased at a tax sale, there must be evidence to identify the tract assessed, with that sold and described in the writ.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Lycoming county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The twelve assignments of error may be disposed of by the consideration of three questions.

The first relates to the assessment of the tax upon which the land alleged to be that described in the writ, was sold by the treasurer to the county commissioners, and conveyed by deed dated November 10th, 1860. The plaintiff in error contends that valuation is essential to an assessment; and that the only officers competent by law to make a valuation are the assessors. It appearing that the tract in question was not returned by the assessors for the year, for the taxes for which it was sold, the commissioners, it is said, had no right to put a valuation upon it, and that as a consequence there was in law no assessment, and the sale by the treasurer was invalid. It seems that there is a usage of long standing in Lycoming county, to put a uniform valuation of one dollar per acre upon all unseated lands, in consequence of which the assessors have fallen into the practice of making no return of valuation in such cases. It is certainly malus usus et abolendus. How the assessors can reconcile it with the terms of their official oaths, it is not easy to comprehend. But because they have failed in the performance of their duties, it does not follow that the land was not subject to taxation, and the title of the commissioners, by the treasurer's sale, a perfectly good one. The learned judge below instructed the jury that "the return of the assessor without a valuation, or his omission to return them at all, should not exempt the lands from taxation, and cannot, in our judgment, render invalid a lawful tax, assessed upon them by the commissioners. It is, at most, a mere irregularity, which falls within the curative provisions of the act of 1815." In this instruction we think that he was entirely right.

There was evidence by a record from the office of the county commissioner that the taxes in question were assessed by them. The twenty-first section of the act of April 12th, 1842, Pamph. L. 266, enacts that "all records of the county commissioner charging lands as unseated with arrears of taxes, shall be evidence of an assessment." By the fourth section of the act of March 13th, 1815, 6 Smith, 301, it is declared that "no alleged irregularity in the assessment, or in the process, or otherwise, shall be construed or taken to affect the title of the purchaser; but the same shall be declared to be good and legal." The act of 1842 makes the record of the county commissioners evidence of an assessment in fact, and the act of 1815, to support the title of the purchaser, cures all irregularities in it. The county commissioners were the officers competent to assess the tax. That no valuation was made or returned, was a mere irregularity. The county commissioners are the board of revision, with power to revise, correct and equalize the valuation of all property taxable by law. Act of July 27th, 1842, Pamph. L. 445; Act of April 29th, 1844, Pamph. L. 501. It would be no violent presumption, if it were necessary to resort to it, that the valuation upon which the assessment was made, was settled by them in their capacity as a board of revision. But it is not necessary. In Hubley v. Keyser, 2 Penna. R. 502, Mr. Justice Huston, speaking of the act of 1815, says: "The object was to make the sale and deed confer a title, without proof of any one prerequisite, except that the land was unseated, and that a tax was charged by the commissioners, regularly or irregularly; that this tax was unpaid, and the land sold and not redeemed within two years." In that case, the objection to the sale was that there was proof that the assessors had not valued or returned the land as unseated for assessment. It was argued there as here that the valuation by the commissioners was unauthorized, and the assessment a nullity; but it was held otherwise by the court. Indeed, in citing this case afterwards, in Fager v. Campbell, 5 Watts, 288, Chief Justice Gibson said: "The tax book was an official document, and according to Hubley v. Keyser, it was both competent and sufficient to show that the land had been assessed." Both these cases were prior to the act of 1842. It was, indeed, expressly decided in Devinney v. Reynolds, 1 W. & S. 328, that a tract of unseated land may be sold by the treasurer, for the non-payment of taxes upon an assessment made by the commissioners, without the intervention of the assessors. "The assessors," said Mr. Justice Rogers, "valued the lands, but the commissioners make the assessment; from which it follows that you cannot avoid a sale for taxes, merely because you are unable to prove that the assessors has performed this ministerial duty."

The second question is, as to the validity of the commissioner's sale. It has been decided that the curative provisions of the act of 1815, does not apply to these sales. Jenks v. Wright, 11 P. F. Smith, 410. It is objected to the validity of the commissioner's sale in this case, that they did not follow the provisions of the fifth section of the act of March 13th, 1815, 6 Smith, 301, which declares that "it shall be the duty of the commissioners to provide a book, wherein shall be entered the name of the person as whose estate the same shall have been sold, the quantity of land, and the amount of taxes it was sold for, and every such tract of land shall not thereafter, so long as the same shall remain the property of the county, be charged in the duplicate of the proper collector; but for five years next following such sale, if it shall so long remain unredeemed, the commissioners shall in separate columns in the same book, charge every such tract of land with reasonable county and road tax, according to the quality of the said land, not exceeding in any case the sum of six dollars for every hundred acres," without stopping to inquire whether a failure on the part of the commissioners to observe these directions, ought to invalidate the sale, as it forms no part of the process, but is a mere direction as to bookkeeping. We are of opinion with the learned judge below, that "the account, if kept as testified by the clerk of the commissioners, was substantially as required by law." The clerk stated: "This assessment book is kept the same after a sale to the commissioners as before, the assessments are continued against the lands after the sale just as before, and there is no book for keeping such account other than this. After a sale to the commissioners, it is noted in this book after the warrantee's name, by the word "commissioners." The entry denotes that the tract thus marked, is sold to the commissioners." The act does not in terms require that the book shall be a separate book, containing no other entries. It is enough if there is a record of the entries as required by the act made in some book.

The remaining question is, whether the case was properly submitted to the jury as to the identity of the tract assessed and sold with that described in the writ of ejectment. The plaintiff in ejectment must show at least a prima facie title—by prior possession or papers—in himself, for the land described in the writ, whether the claim be a tax sale or otherwise; whether against a mere intruder, or one setting up some right of possession. No man can be lawfully ejected from lands by less than this. In this case, on the assessment books of the commissioners of unseated lands, there were three separate tracts assessed in the warrantee name of J. Coleman, one of sixty, and two of forty acres each. One of these tracts of forty acres was that assessed and sold and conveyed in the treasurer's deed by the general and vague description, "a tract of land containing forty acres, situate in the township of Clinton, in the county of Lycoming, surveyed to J. Coleman." The title from the commonwealth produced by the plaintiff, showed a warrant to John Coleman, for one hundred acres, and a return of survey for one hundred and eleven and three-quarter acres and allowance. We may assume that the three assessed tracts made up this survey, though they overrun it in quantity. How the whole tract came to be divided into three parcels did not appear. There were, indeed, some pencil marks on the assessment that two of the tracts were seated, by whom or when made was unknown, except that they were not there at the time of the commissioner's sale. They were therefore properly disregarded. Had there been evidence that the other two tracts were seated at the time of the sale, it would certainly have been sufficient to have identified the remaining one as the subject of the sale. There was no evidence whatever to show which of the two tracts was the one assessed and sold, nor of their relative position, nor any other part which could possibly lead to identification. The learned judge then left the question of identity to the jury without evidence, which, we think, was an error. He accompanied it, however, with an instruction which throws light upon the ground upon which he made this submission. "Under such circumstances we think, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover the possession of any forty acres, part of John Coleman, in Clinton township, which was unseated, and upon which the taxes were unpaid for either of the years for which it was sold."

It is contended that this instruction of the learned judge may be sustained by the ruling of this court in Coxe v. Blanden, 1 Watts, 533, in which it was held that a treasurer's sale for taxes of part of a tract, and a conveyance of that part designating the quantity but not the locality, is good; and an unrestricted choice of locality to the purchaser, is a necessary incident of the sale and a consequence of a reasonable interpretation of the statute. But in that case there was an assessment upon an entire tract of four hundred and thirty-seven acres, and a sale of three hundred and eighteen acres of it for a sum sufficient to pay the taxes and costs on the whole. It is clearly distinguishable from this case. There was no doubt there that the assessment upon which the sale was made fastened upon every part of the tract, and a foundation for the sale of every part existed. But not so here, where the parts were severally assessed. This case abundantlyshows that there must be evidence to identify the tract assessed with that sold and described in the writ. Russell v. Werntz, 12 Harris, 337; City of Philadelphia v. Miller, 13 Wright, 440; Lyman v. City of Philadelphia, 6 P. F. Smith, 488; Glass v. Gilbert, 8 Ibid, 266; Brotherline v. Hammond, 19 Ibid, 128.

Judgment reversed, and venire facias de novo awarded.

SAEGER AND WIFE v. KISTLER.

1. A parol agreement made by a purchaser at a sheriff's sale to reconvey the property to the defendant in the execution, is within the statute of frauds, and cannot be enforced.
2. The breach of such an agreement will not make the purchaser a trustee ex maleficio.

Appeal from the decree of the Court of Common Pleas of Lehigh county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The finding of the master, who had also been the examiner in this case, was against the plaintiffs upon every material fact alleged in their bill, and his clear conclusion was that there was no trust on part of the defendant, on any ground. Exceptions being taken to these findings of fact, the court below rejecting the report, found the facts for themselves. The opinion of the judge, evinces a mind favorably impressed by the evidence in behalf of the plaintiffs. His statement may be regarded, therefore, as exhibiting the entire strength of their case. It is as follows: "That in December, 1858, the real estate in question was to be sold at sheriff's sale; that Joseph Saeger, a deaf mute, one of the defendants in the execution, and now one of the plaintiffs to this bill, was desirous, prior to the sale, to secure the purchase of it, so that it might eventually enure to the benefit of his wife; and in order to effectuate his desire, he called on Mr. German, Christian Pretz and Samuel J. Kistler, and that as the result of his conferences, it was understood that the defendant would so purchase, and that Mrs. John Saeger, an aunt of the plaintiff to this bill, would also assist by furnishing some money. German attended the sale, fully believing that an arrangement existed by which Kistler was to buy; but not finding Kistler at the sheriff's sale, he bought for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and so informed A. L. Ruke, who was also bidding on the property. German became the purchaser, and signed the conditions of sale; but before the down money was paid, at the instance of Joseph Saeger, Kistler was substituted, by an agreement between him and German, at the sheriff's office, by which Kistler should take and hold the property for the plaintiffs, so that they should have a home; that if Kistler had not agreed to hold for the plaintiffs' use, German would not have allowed him to succeed to his purchase; that the property brought its market value at the sheriff's sale, and has since greatly appreciated; and that after Kistler received the deed, Joseph Saeger and wife continued in the possession of the property, and made important repairs and alterations; that the property was assessed in the name of Maria Saeger, and continued to be assessed in her name until 1864, and that the taxes were paid by the plaintiffs, and that interest on the amount of the purchase money paid by Kistler, and the interest on the liens were paid by the plaintiffs until the year 1862, which, in some receipts, is called rent, and the others, interest; that about January, 1864, the plaintiff, Joseph Saeger, was notified by Kistler to leave the premises, there having been served a landlord's notice to quit. The plaintiff surrendered the possession, and subsequently made several demands, by presentation of bills to the defendant, as a compensation for repairs made. "These facts (says the judge), clearly establish a resulting trust, and the defendant, Samuel J. Kistler, will be treated as a trustee ex maleficio of the plaintiffs. We cannot assent to this conclusion. These facts establish only a judicial sale in invitum as to Saeger, struck down to German, who paid no money, and that Kistler stepped into his place, paid the bid, and took the deed upon a parol agreement to hold the property for the benefit of the plaintiffs, so that they might have a home. It is wholly unlike those cases where one receives a conveyance, without consideration or purchase, in confidence that he will hold it for another. A sheriff's sale is made against the will of the defendant, and he has no control over the direction the title is to take. If no fraud at the sale be practiced by the bidder, the defendant in the writ can obtain a restoration of his title only by a contract of repurchase. That such an agreement to repurchase or to redeem, as is found by the judge, is within the statute of frauds and perjuries, and could not be enforced even before the passage of the act of 22d April, 1856, is attested by abundant authority. The case of Fox v. Heffner, 1 W. & S. 372, is a counterpart of this in every respect, if, indeed, it is not stronger, as Morris, who took the place of Patterson at the sheriff's sale, repeatedly acknowledged the right of Heffner to redeem his land on payment of the money. "The plaintiff below (said Judge Sergeant) claims the land under a parol agreement between him and Morris, one of the defendants, made at the time when the sheriff's deed conveyed the land to Morris." After stating that such an agreement is within the statute of frauds and perjuries of 1772, he says: "It is now settled by repeated decisions of this court, that if one buys the defendant's property at sheriff's sale, and verbally agrees to hold it in trust for the defendant, with a right of redemption in the defendant within a limited period, it is a contract resting in parol merely, and not transferring any title in the land. In Kisler v. Kisler, 2 Watts, 327, and Robertson v. Robertson, 9 Watts, 42, it was determined that unless there is in the transaction more than is implied from the mere violation of a parol agreement, equity will not decree the purchaser to be a trustee. In Haines v. O'Connor, 10 Watts, 320, these cases are recognized, and it is laid down, that a purchaser at sheriff's sale, who has paid his own money, can only be held a trustee ex maleficio on account of the existence of fraud, and when that is the case, he is a trustee for the creditors and the debtor also, unless the debtor be particeps criminis. In the case before us, there is no evidence of any collusion or act of fraud on the part of Morris, in the purchase of the property, which could make him a trustee ex maleficio, and the fraud which may be alleged to exist in the mere violation of an agreement, is no more than that which attends every violation of an agreement." This language is so applicable to the case of Kistler, I have transcribed it in lieu of my own. Here Kistler was not present at the sheriff's sale, and committed no act of fraud, but merely took German's place at the instance of Saeger, and paid his own money upon an agreement to suffer Saeger to redeem. The following cases are to the same effect. Leshey v. Gardner, 3 Watts & S. 314; Jackman v. Ringland, 4 W. & S. 149; Sample v. Coulson, 9 W. & S. 62. The case is made still stronger against the plaintiffs by the act of 22d April, 1856, the 4th section of which provides that "all declarations or creations of trust or confidences of any lands, tenements or hereditaments, and all grants and assignments thereof, shall be manifested by writing, signed by the party holding the title thereof, or by his last will in writing, or be void." This case is ruled by Barnet v. Dougherty, 8 Casey, 371, and Kellum v. Smith, 9 Casey, 158. Both in the court below and here, it has been said the trust arose ex maleficio, though nothing of the kind is found in the evidence; yet, as this has led to an inquiry into the conduct of German, who bid off the property at the sale, it will be proper to refer to this aspect of the case. But how can that question arise? The bill is filed against Kistler alone, and is founded wholly on his agreement to hold the property for the plaintiffs. No averment is made of fraud in the purchase at sheriff's sale, by German or Kistler, or that the property was bought at an undervalue. Neither the judge below, nor the solicitors of the plaintiffs, in their statements of the case, place it on the ground of fraud in the sale. The facts as proved disclose no fraud. German was under no promise to buy for Saeger, and did not go to the sale for that purpose. He went as a lien creditor, to protect his own interests, but finding neither Kistler, nor Saeger or his friends there, he bid himself, with the intention of securing the property for Saeger, an intention communicated to Saeger immediately after the sale, and fairly carried out. Ruke, a bidder, also, asked him when bidding, whether he wanted the property for himself. He replied, he wanted it for Joseph Saeger. Then, said Ruke, I won't bid any more. This is German's own account of the matter. Elisha Forest testifies, that before the property was knocked down, German said he was bidding, and wanted to buy the property for the benefit of Joseph Saeger. This was all he said. No unfairness is imputed to German, and none is alleged against the sale, or is found by the master or the court. The evidence shows, and the court found as one of the facts, that the property brought its market value at the sheriff's sale. There is nothing in the case, therefore, which would authorize us to shift the position the plaintiffs have assumed in their bill, and to treat this as a trust ex maleficio, arising out of German's conduct. Clearly, no fraud was intended; his purpose was fair; and no injury was done either to creditors or to the defendant. Whatever supposed benefit he might have derived from the sale, he suffered to pass over to Kistler without consideration, and for Saeger's benefit. The evidence to establish a resulting trust, especially one arising ex maleficio, which is an imputation of fraud, should be clear, explicit and unequivocal. McGinity v. McGinity, 13 P. F. Smith, 38; Nixon's Appeal, Ibid, 279; Lingenfelter v. Richey, 12 P. F. Smith, 123.

Nor is there anything in the conduct of Joseph Saeger, which invokes equity in his behalf. He admits he was insolvent at the time of the sale, and unable to refund the money, and has so continued. Mrs. John Saeger, who was to have assisted him, soon after the sale refused to do so, and Kistler was obliged to give his own bond, with surety, to pay off her mortgage. Joseph Saeger occupied the property for years, and failed to pay all his rent. When notified by Kistler, as his landlord, to quit possession, he did so, and then presented to him a large bill for repairs, materials and taxes, and finally, did not file this bill for more than three years after he had surrendered possession, and more than nine years after the sheriff's sale.

Upon a full review of the case, we can discover no equity to support the plaintiffs' bill. The decree of the Court of Common Pleas is, therefore, reversed, and the bill of the plaintiffs is dismissed, and they are ordered to pay the costs.

PATRICK CANNON v. JOHN BOYD.

In the absence of an express reservation or agreement, the purchaser of real estate, at private or judicial sale, takes it subject to a continuous and apparent easement.

Error to the District Court of Philadelphia.

Opinion by WILLIAMS, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

Where a continuous and apparent easement or servitude is imposed by the owner on one portion of his real estate, for the benefit of another, the law is well settled, that a purchaser at private or judicial sale, in the absence of an express reservation or agreement on the subject, takes the property subject to the easement or servitude. Seibert v. Levan, 8 Barr, 183; Vancleeve v. Updegraff, 19 P. F. Smith, 110, and cases there cited. The sheriff sold and conveyed the lots to the parties in this case, without reference to the existence of the alley on the lots purchased by the defendant; but the evidence shows that the alley was open and apparent at the time of the sale, and that there was a gate leading into it from the lot purchased by the plaintiff, clearly indicating that it was used in common by the tenants of both lots. It also appears from the evidence, that the alley was laid out and opened by McCabe, the former owner of the lots, and that it was used in common by the occupants thereof for a period of more than ten years prior to the sheriff's sale. The court below was, therefore, clearly right in declining to charge that the sheriff's sale and deed vested the soil of the alleged alley in the defendant, clear of the easement claimed by the plaintiff; and in charging that the only question in the case is, what was the condition of these two properties at the time of the sheriff's sale? If the condition of the properties at the sheriff's sale, was such as to indicate that the occupants of the property now owned by the plaintiff, used the alley in question, and had a right to do so, the verdict should be for the plaintiff.

There was no error in refusing leave to ask the plaintiff's agent whether he purchased the property, expecting or believing that he got a title to the alley. The expectation or belief of the agent could not affect the plaintiff's title.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHN KAUL et al. v. J. J. LAWRENCE, et al.

1. The plaintiffs below offered in evidence the record in the prothonotary's docket, of the acknowledgment of a lost treasurer's deed, to prove its existence and contents, they having first proved a diligent and fruitless search for the deed. The court admitted the record in evidence. Held, not to be error.
2. The plaintiffs brought ejectment for the whole of a tract of land as an entirety. Upon discovering that the title to one undivided part was in another person, they moved to amend by adding the other person's name. The court allowed the amendment. Held, not to be error.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Elk county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

After having given evidence of a treasurer's sale and laid the usual ground by proof of a diligent and fruitless search for the treasurer's deed, the plaintiffs offered the record in the prothonotary's docket, of the acknowledgment of the deed, to prove its existence and contents. To this the defendants excepted, but we think without sufficient reason. This is the usual and proper mode of proving the existence of the deed, and identity of the land sold and conveyed by the treasurer. The case has been argued in this court, on the question of the delivery of the deed, but this was a fact to be submitted to the jury. The defendants made no point on the delivery. Doubtless the court would have submitted this question with proper instructions, had a request been made. There was evidence of a strongly presumptive kind to go to the jury. The sale was made and acknowledgment of the deed entered of record in 1842, a period of thirty years before the trial. A claim of title has since been made under the sale, and sales and conveyances made accordingly. These facts, together with the act of 13th March, 1817, requiring the purchasers at treasurer's sale, so soon as the property is struck down, to pay the purchase money, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to pay the taxes and costs, and also one dollar, the fee of the prothonotary for entering the acknowledgment of the deed, in connection with the fact that the acknowledgment was so entered, were ample evidence from which the jury might have inferred a delivery of the deed. We discover no error in this bill of exception. Nor do we think the court erred in permitting the name of Alfred L. Tyler to be added as a plaintiff, and part owner of the land. The plaintiffs brought their ejectment for the whole tract of 500 acres, as an entirety. They did not claim an undivided interest. On discovering that the title to one undivided twentieth was in Tyler, the motion to amend was made on the ground of an omission of his name. The Legislature has gone far to prevent the loss of a trial and delay, by allowing amendments, even to the form of action, and the courts have seconded the effort to reach the merits of the cases and prevent a failure of justice through technicalities. Trego v. Lewis, 8 P. F. Smith, 46; Heidelberg School District v. Hunt, 12 P. F. Smith, 307; Election Cases, 15 P. F. Smith, 35; Leonard and Wife v. Parker et al., Pittsburgh Legal Journal, 18th December, 1872, p. 65; In doing this, it is our duty, however, to see that amendments are not made in a manner to deprive the opposite party of any valuable right. As remarked in Trego v. Lewis, supra, the court will not permit a party to shift his ground or enlarge its surface, by introducing an entirely new and different cause of action, especially, when by reason of the statute of limitations, or an award of arbitrators, or from other good reason, it would work an injury to the opposite party. It is claimed in this case, that at the time Tyler's name was added to the record, his title was barred by the statute of limitations. But it is very evident that when it concerns title to real estate, a defence under the statute of limitations must necessarily go to the jury. Such a defence is affected by such a variety of circumstances, as to the extent and nature of the possession, condition of the parties, length of time, &c., it must be left to the jury on all the facts. It is the right of the parties to have proper instructions to the jury, and the defendants in this case might have asked the court to say, that if Tyler's title was barred by the statutes when his name was added, there could be no recovery in the action of his proportion of the land. Substantially, all these questions were determined in Leonard and Wife v. Parker et al., supra. It was right, therefore, to allow the amendment, leaving the defendants to their prayer for proper instructions, according to the nature of the case, as developed in the evidence.

In regard to the question of estoppel, we think the state of the case is not different from that which was presented when it was here before, and is governed by the opinion then delivered. See 15th P. F. Smith, 236. The mistake of Payne, as a surveyor, in locating tract No. 4886 on tract No. 4883, was an innocent act. This is evident from the testimony, and also from the fact that when he bought 4883 afterwards, he located it north of its true location, and adjoining No. 4886. He also sold 4883, according to this mistaken location, to Matson, a non-resident, and, like himself, ignorant of the mistake. In buying 4883, there was no want of good faith to the owners of 4886, either on Payne's part or Matson's. It was long after Matson bought 4883 from Payne before he, or his vendees, became aware of the fact that the true location of 4883 was that occupied by the owners of 4886. It was impossible, therefore, when Matson bought 4883, that he could make inquiries of the occupants of the tract, supposed to be 4886, to know by what title they held the land they were thus occupying. It was then unknown that there was a conflict of title. The same mistake which misled the vendors of the defendants, misled Matson, and he was equally innocent with them. Each claimed a different tract, as known by the original number, and held by a different title. The common presumption applicable to every owner that he knows the identity of his own land, applied equally to each, and yet each was innocently mistaken, and neither was the cause of the mistake in the other.

If he was bound to know the location of 4883 on the ground, so were they to know where 4886 lay. If they were misled by Payne, he was likewise. Payne, though the innocent cause of the mistake, might be estopped when he became the owner of No. 4883, from claiming it from those whom his mistake had injured; on the principle, that as between insolvent persons, one of whom must suffer a loss, he shall bear it who was the cause of it. Matson, however, is not only an innocent party, but was not instrumental in causing the loss, and was incapable of avoiding the position he fell into, by any inquiry he could be led to make. The subsequent discovery of the error of location not only shifts them, but also shifts him. He has the title to 4886; they have not; both are equally innocent, and therefore he must prevail. The argument so strongly pressed upon us, and the authority cited upon the notice which actual possession furnishes, and the duty to follow up the challenge it gives, fails in this case, owing to its peculiar circumstances.

Judgment affirmed.

GREEN v. BRENNESHOLTZ.

1. It need not be shown that an executor has no authority as such to convey land. He must have express power by the will or by an order of the Orphans' Court, before he can sell.
2. The rule that a right, arising prior to a patent from the commonwealth, cannot be affected by a recital in such patent, is true also as to a liability incurred prior to it.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Warren county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

Admitting the application to this case of the rule, that the recitals of title in a patent are prima facie evidence, not only against one claiming by subsequent grant from the commonwealth, but also against one who relies on possession alone, and shows no title, the learned judge was not warranted by the recital itself in the position that at the time of the alleged conversion, the plaintiff below was the owner of the land. In his answer to the second point of the defendant, he referred to his general charge, and in that he had instructed the jury that the patent recited substantially inter alia, that Robert McNair was dead, and Robert M. McNair was his executor, with power to sell, but there was not a word in the recital about any power to sell. It recites merely a conveyance by Robert M. McNair, executor of Robert McNair, deceased. It requires no authority to show that an executor has no authority as such to convey land. He must have power by the will, or by an order of the Orphans' Court. Such a power surely is not to be inferred by the mere fact of a conveyance by the executor. There was error, therefore, in the answer, that the plaintiff had shown sufficient title to enable him to recover.

But we are of opinion that the rule in regard to recitals in patents from the commonwealth, as we have just stated, had no application in this case. It was an action of trover for timber trees, cut and taken off by the defendant's intestate, Joseph Green, from land which the plaintiff claimed to own. It was undoubtedly necessary that the plaintiff should show that he was the owner of the land at the time of the conversion, which was when the trees were cut and taken off in the winter of 1867–8. Act of March 29th, 1824, 8. Smith, 283. That was prior to the date of the patent to plaintiff. The liability of defendant's intestate was fixed at the time of the conversion to the then owner. If at that time the plaintiff had tried his action, he must have produced the title from the warrantees. The patent was not then in existence. If Joseph Green had then a right originating by warrant or settlement at that time, it is agreed that the recital in the subsequent patent would not be admissible in evidence against him to prove the warrant or its devolution to the patentees. Penrose v. Griffith, 4 Binn. 231; Gingrich v. Folts, 7 Harris, 38. If then, a right arising prior to a patent, cannot be affected by a recital in such patent, surely it is a logical consequence, that neither can a liability. When the controversy relates either to a right or a liability, which are in their nature correlative, we must adjudge it by evidence then existing, not by evidence subsequently created; unless, indeed, it be the judgment of a competent court. Brennesholtz certainly would not subsequently make evidence for himself, neither were the officers of the land office a competent tribunal to pronounce judgment upon his title, so as to affect the liability of Green to an action for trespasses, prior in date to the patent. If the heirs or devisees of Robert McNair had brought an action, claiming to have been owners of the land at the time of the conversion, Green certainly could not have availed himself of the recital in the patent, to show that their title had passed to Brennesholtz, neither ought Brennesholtz to be allowed to do so.

Judgment reversed, and venire facias de novo awarded.

Supreme Court of Pennsylv'a.

ESTATE OF JAMES DUNDAS, dec'd.

1. The Orphans' Court in a proceeding to distribute an estate among legatees, next of kin, and heirs, has ample power to inquire into and determine all questions standing directly in the way of a distribution to the parties.
2. Every legatee has a personal remedy in the Orphans' Court for the recovery of his own legacy.
3. The court has power, in a distribution proceeding, to determine the title of contesting claimants to the same fund, as an incident to distribution.

Appeal of Wm. Oswald Dundas from the decree of the Orphans' Court of Philadelphia.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The decision of the Orphans' Court in this case, was against its own jurisdiction, and in this there was error. It was said by Black, C. J., in Whiteside v. Whiteside, 8 Harris, 473: "If there be anything besides death, which is not to be doubted, it is that the Orphans' Court alone has authority to ascertain the amount of a decedent's property, and order its distribution among those entitled to it." The exclusiveness of this jurisdiction is sustained by numerous modern decisions, to a few of which I may refer. Shollenberger's Appeal, 9 Harris, 341; Ashford v. Ewing, 1 Casey, 213; Black's Ex'r v. Black's Ex'r, 10 Casey, 354; Musselman's Appeal, 15 P. F. Smith, 480. The contest between the courts and the egislature, spoken of by Lewis, C. J., in Bell's Appeal, 12 Harris, 286, as to the extent of this jurisdiction, was settled by the act of 13th April, 1840. Brightly's Purdon, 300, pl. 167. That act authorized the Orphans' Court to appoint auditors, on the application of creditors, as well as of executors and administrators, and on the application of legatees, heirs or other persons interested to make distribution of the estate in the hands of executors and administrators, to and among the persons entitled to the same. In Kittelar's Estate, 5 Harris, 416, it was said this embraced creditors, next of kin, and legatees. "The right of each (says Judge Lewis) to be heard in support of his claim, and in opposition to every claimant who interferes with it, is necessarily involved in the right to demand payment," Further on he says: "The power to decide all questions necessary to a proper distribution of the fund, follows the power of distribution, and vests in the Orphans' Court as a necessary incident to the jurisdiction. That court is as competent as the Common Pleas, to determine all questions of law, as the judges of both courts are the same, and the Orphans' Court has ample authority to send an issue to the Common Pleas for the trial of facts by a jury." Sec. 45, act 29th March, 1832; Brightly's Purdon, p. 768, pl. 44. This language is repeated with emphasis in Ball's Appeal, supra; and in Black's Ex'r v. Black's Ex'r, supra; Thompson, J., repeats the remark of Woodward, J., in Shollenberger's Appeal, supra, that the jurisdiction of the Orphans' Court, "within its appointed orbit, is exclusive, and therefore necessarily as co-extensive as the demands of justice." It is very clear therefore that the Orphans' Court, in a proceeding to distribute an estate among legatees, next of kin, and heirs, has ample power to inquire into and determine all questions standing directly in the way of a distribution to these parties.

The specific remedy given to a legatee to recover his legacy, comes in here to strengthen the general jurisdiction, and puts an end to all questions. It is said in a very excellent treatise on the intestate system of Pennsylvania, by E. G. Scott, Esq., page 450, that the Orphans' Court has no jurisdiction for the recovery of a legacy, unless the same is charged upon, or is payable out of real estate. But the learned author has overlooked laws directly conferring jurisdiction. The 47th section of the act of 24th February, 1834, relating to executors and administrators, provides that, "Executors, after one year elapsed from the granting of administration of the estate, upon the requisition of any legatee, or any other person interested, shall pay and deliver, under the direction of the Orphans' Court, having jurisdiction of their accounts, all such legacies as are due and payable by them, &c., &c., and if there shall be a residue distributable under the intestate laws of this commonwealth, they shall also distribute the same; and the proceedings in any such case shall in all respects, whether of security or otherwise, be the same as hereinbefore provided in the cases of distribution by administrators of the estates of decedent's intestate, so far as the nature of the case will admit." Vide sections 39, 40, 41, act 24th, February 1834; Purdon, by Brightly, 302, pl. 176, 177, 178. This act is followed by the act of 16th June, 1836, relating to the jurisdictions and powers of the courts which in the 7th clause of the 19th section confers upon the Orphans' Court express jurisdiction in "Proceedings for the recovering of legacies." Bright. Purd., p. 765. The jurisdiction being thus beyond doubt, the manner of proceeding is equally clear; and is specifically set forth in the 57th section of the act of 29th March, 1832. Bright. Purd., 766, pl. 17, 18, et seq. This is by the petition of any person interested, whether such interest be immediate or remote, setting forth facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction, the specific cause of complaint, and the relief desired; and supported by oath or affirmation. The acts cited were reported by the commissioners to revise the laws, and are to be viewed together as constituting a harmonious system for the settlement of the estates of decedents, and the government of the Orphans' Court.

Thus, it is very clear that every legatee has a personal remedy in the Orphans' Court for the recovery of his own legacy, and the act of 29th March, 1832, also furnishes ample means of reaping the fruit of a recovery by execution, attachment and sequestration. Upon this petition, if necessary, the Orphans' Court would be bound to appoint one or more auditors under the act of 13th April, 1840, supra, to make distribution, or if a proceeding is already in progress, a decree upon the incoming petition of the legatee would await the report. Each legatee or distributee is entitled to proceed for the recovery of his own legacy or share. It is true that legatees have an additional remedy by action of debt, detinue, account render, or on the case, against executors having sufficient assets to pay the debts and legacies. Act 24th February, 1834, s. 50. But the common law form of action is inconvenient, and carries the remedy into a court having no jurisdiction to settle the executor's account, and hence the act provides that on a plea of a want of assets the action must be suspended, until an amount is settled in the Orphans' Court, and the amount of the legacy or its pro rata ascertained. Sect. 53, Purdon, by Brightly, 303, pl. 188.

It remains now to inquire whether this petition conforms to the 57th section of the act of 29th March, 1832, by setting forth facts necessary to give the Orphans' Court jurisdiction. It plainly does. It sets forth the will of the late James Dundas, duly proved and registered, the bequest to the children of W. H. Dundas in equal shares, their number, and that the petitioner is one of them, and his proportional share; the issuing of letters testamentary to the executors, the filing of an inventory, and settlement of two accounts, showing large assets, to a share of which the petitioner is entitled; and prays that the surviving executors shall pay over to the petitioner the full amount of his share and interest in the estate, as soon as the same shall be ascertained, after allowing for, and deducting all sums of money that the petitioner has received. These facts give jurisdiction to the Orphans' Court to compel distribution by the executors, and payment of the petitioner's share to him. Had the petition set forth nothing more, the consequence would have been plain. The executors, to protect themselves, would have set forth the assignment in their answer, and cited the assignee to defend pro inter esse suo. This would have brought from the petitioner a replication of fraud and deceit in procuring the assignment. The paper thus standing in the way of distribution, there being two claimants to the same legacy or share of it, the jurisdiction of the Orphans' Court necessarily attached, in order to remove the barrier to the payment of the legacy. The language of Judge Lewis in Ketterlar's Estate directly applies; that each one must be heard in support of his claim and in opposition to every claimant who interferes with it, and that the power to decide all questions essential to distribution follows the power to distribute.

The Orphans' Court having power to determine whether the petitioner or his alleged assignee is entitled to payment of the legacy, it is evident the court is not deprived of its jurisdiction, by the setting forth of the alleged fraudulent assignment in the first instance, followed by appropriate prayers to have it set aside, and for a citation to the assignee. Indeed, the proceeding in this form is better adapted to decide the controversy at once, preliminary to final distribution. The parties are all brought in at once, and the decree will finally dispose of the whole controversy, leaving the executors free from doubt as to the person to receive payment. Nor are we wanting in authority as to the power of a court in a distribution proceeding, to determine the title of contesting claimants to the same fund, as an incident of the distribution. In Souder's Appeal, 7 P. F. Smith, 498, it was held that the auditor making distribution of money arising from a sheriff's sale, had power to determine the ownership of a "judgment between contesting claimants, and that the defeated claimant, under the act of 1836, relating to execution, was entitled to demand an issue. See the cases cited therein. The petition in this case, is unnecessarily prolix, and sets forth matters of evidence merely. But substantial facts are set forth, sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to determine the ownership of the legacy, and decree payment to the plaintiff, if he be entitled to it. The decree of the Orphans' Court sustaining the demurrer is therefore reversed, the demurrer overruled, and a procedendo awarded; and the defendants are ordered to pay the costs of this appeal, the costs below to abide the event of the proceeding.

THE SEVENTH NATIONAL BANK v. DAVID COOK.

1. Where the servant of one to whose order a check was drawn, endorsed it without authority in his master's name, obtained the money therefor, and the bank charged the drawer therewith on the settlement of his bank book: Held, the payee could recover from the bank the amount of the check.
2. When a bank charges a drawer of a check with the amount thereof, it is an appropriation of so much money to the use of the payee.

Error to the District Court for the city and county of Philadelphia.

Opinion by READ, C. J. Delivered May 17th. 1873.

James Greenwood was indebted to David Cook for oil sold, and in payment, gave a check on the defendants, the Seventh National Bank, for $174.50, to J. C. Barnes, a clerk of the plaintiff, payable to the order of D. Cook. Mr. Barnes endorsed it with the name of D. Cook, and his own name, drew the money, and appropriated it to pay an amount due him by his employer, and made the proper entries on the books of D. Cook. The plaintiff refused to recognize the acts of his clerk, and obtained the cancelled check from Greenwood, presented it to the bank, was refused payment, and then commenced this suit. The court charged the jury that "the only question is whether Barnes had authority to endorse the check for Cook, and upon that, I leave the case with you," and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff Cook, for the amount of the check. Upon the argument the counsel for the bank cited but one case, Bank of Republic v. Millard, 10 Wallace, 152, and contended the holder of the check could not recover against the bank. It was in evidence that the bank had paid the check when presented by Barnes, and that upon settlement of Greenwood's bank book, the check was returned with other checks, cancelled, and of course charged against the depositor. This brings it within the exception stated by the Supreme Court of the United States towards the close of their opinion in 10 Wallace. "It may be if it could be shown that the bank had charged the check on its books against the drawer, and settled with him on that basis, that the plaintiff could recover on the count for money had and received, on the ground that the rule ex aquo et bono should be applicable, as the bank having assented to the order, and communicated its assent to the paymaster (the drawer), would be considered as holding the money thus appropriated for the plaintiff's use, and, therefore, under an implied promise to him to pay it on demand."

On the merits, therefore, the case was for the plaintiff.

It is in fact an acceptance, and binds the bank as a certified check does. "It is tantamount to an acceptance of the draft."

There is nothing in the other assignments of error.

Judgment affirmed.

THE IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY v. WILLIAM MURRAY, RICHARD WINLACK AND WALTER RANDALL.

AND THE NORTH BRITISH MERCANTILE AND INSURANCE COMPANY v. SAME.

1. A lessee who covenants to return the property at the expiration of the lease in good order and condition, has an insurable interest equal to the whole value of the property.
2. "This insurance to cover their working interest in the above insured property," Held: to cover the entire insurable interest.

Error to the Common Pleas of Columbia county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

These two cases were argued together. The facts and principles of law involved, are substantially the same in each. The same property is covered by each policy; each is for one year, from the 17th September, 1869. The loss occurred January 19th, 1870.

The plaintiffs have filed twenty-three assignments of error. We will not consider them separately. The twenty-second and twenty-third assignments are based upon an alleged false representation in the application. As we are not furnished with a copy of the application, we are unable to determine with certainty how far the facts go towards sustaining the allegation. As we understand the whole evidence bearing upon that branch of the case, we cannot see that the court committed any error in holding, that if the applicants fairly represented what they honestly believed, it would not defeat the action, and that it was not such a statement of a material fact as amounted to a warranty.

All the other assignments, except the first, sixth, and seventh, may be considered together. They relate to the value of the interest insured. That the property was of much greater value than the amount of the insurance, does not admit of a question under the evidence; besides, the jury has so found. It is urged, however, by the plaintiffs, that the interest of the lessees therein was of much less value, and that that lesser value only was covered by the insurance. They claim that the value of the lessees' interest therein was measured by the value of the use thereof, from the time of the loss until the expiration of their term. In this view we cannot concur. The use of the property for the remainder of the term, by no means fixed or defined its value as to them. They had not only a right to its use and enjoyment, but had also assumed an obligation to return and redeliver it in good order and condition at the expiration of the term. If they failed so to do, they were liable to their lessors for its full value. If they redeliver according to the requirements of their lease, they would be discharged from that obligation. They then had a large value in the property superadded to that of its use. Hence the court was correct in charging that the insurable interest of the lessees was to the extent of the value of the property which they were bound to replace.

The right of the insured and the liability of the companies, were fixed at the time of the loss, provided the requisite notices and proofs were furnished. Such being the case, the evidence referred to in the fifth assignment of error is wholly irrelevant. No arrangement made between the Locust Mountain Coal and Iron Company of the one part, and Goddard & Draper, of the other part, after the expiration of the term of the defendants in error, relieved them from their obligations to return the leased property to Goddard & Draper, or pay them its value. The coal breaker, engines, boilers, pumping and hoisting machinery, apparatus and improvements, leased to the defendants in error, were the property of Goddard & Draper, and not the property of the Locust Mountain Coal and Iron Company. If the latter took possession of the leased premises, and released the former from all liability, it was for a valuable consideration paid by Goddard & Draper. It in no wise showed the determination of the estate which the assured had in the land at the time of the loss; nor of their release from liability for failing to restore the property upon which they had the insurance.

The language of the policy after describing the property, avers, "this insurance to cover their working interest in the above insured property." The court correctly held this was sufficiently comprehensive to cover the entire insurable interest which the assured had in the property.

The first and sixth assignments relate to the notice and proofs of loss.

We have looked in vain through the testimony to find any evidence of the extent of the powers which the companies gave to their agent Bodey. We find, however, that he was in fact exercising extensive powers. The companies were both foreign corporations, with officers and directors abroad. They also had an office in New York, and this agency in Pottsville. Bodey countersigned those policies; he filled them up; the applications were filed in his office; he kept them as references; were not sent abroad; he paid losses when they occurred.

There is no evidence that the companies ever questioned his rightful exercise of all those powers. So there was sufficient evidence to submit to the jury as to the extent of his agency, within the general scope of the business intrusted to his care. Union Mutual Life Insurance Co. of Maine v. Wilkinson, Insurance Reporter, 18th April, 1872, No. 16. The question of waiver as to time and particulars of loss, was correctly submitted to the jury. Franklin Fire Ins. Co. v. Updegraff et al., 7 Wright, 350; 5 Wright, 162; 6 Wright, 188; 11 Wright, 205.

The seventh assignment was not pressed, and has no merit. We discover no error in the bills of exception, nor in the charge of the learned judge.

Judgment affirmed in each case.

SALLER v. RIESZ.

Specific performance of an agreement to sell real estate will not be decreed against a vendor who is a married man, and whose wife refuses to join in the conveyance, so as to bar her dower, unless the vendee is willing to pay the full purchase money, and accept the deed of the vendor without his wife joining.

Appeal by defendant Riesz from the decree of the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

It is not proposed to enter upon an examination and review of the cases which have been decided in England and our sister States upon the question presented upon this appeal. Great industry and ability have been exhibited by the learned counsel on both sides, in their printed and oral arguments, and it is but just to say that no suggestion or authority appears to have escaped them. But we consider the point as definitely settled in this State in the opinion of Chief Justice Gibson, in Clarke v. Seiser, 7 Watts, 107, recognized and affirmed as it has been in many subsequent cases. Riddlesberger v. Mentzer, 7 Watts, 141; Shurtz v. Thomas, 8 Barr, 363; Bitner v. Brough, 1 Jones, 138; Hanna v. Phillips, 1 Grant, 256; Weller v. Weyand, 2 Ibid, 102, These cases settle, if any amount of authority can settle anything, that in Pennsylvania, specific performance of an agreement to sell real estate will not be decreed against a vendor who is a married man, and whose wife refuses to join in the conveyance so as to bar her dower, unless, indeed, the vendee is willing to pay the full purchase money, and accept the deed of the vendor without his wife joining. The policy of these decisions is very manifest. The wife is not to be wrought upon by her love for her husband, and sympathy in his situation, to do that which her judgment disapproves as contrary to her interest; nor is he to be tempted to use undue means to procure her consent. The vendor must be left in such cases to his action at law to recover damages. The principles upon which damages are recovered, and the measure of them, under different circumstances in such an action, are well explained in Bitner v. Brough, 1 Jones, 127.

The same sound policy which forbids a decree for the execution of a deed by the husband—to be enforced by his imprisonment if he cannot obey, prevents any decree looking to compensation, abatement or indemnity. The case does not fall within the principle of those decisions, where the vendor who cannot make title to all he has contracted to convey, is held to be not thereby relieved from specific performance as far as in his power; but shall be compelled to execute his contract with a reasonable abatement in the price. The right of dower of the widow is of such a contingent nature, depending as it does as well upon her surviving her husband, as on her continuance in life after his death, that no abatement in the price can be made which will be just to both parties, without in effect making a new contract for them; a contract, which, perhaps, in the first instance, neither party would have come into, certainly not the vendor. Receipt of the purchase money in full may have been the main object of the sale to enable him to pay debts or carry out other plans. If he is to be subjected to serious pecuniary loss by his wife's refusal to join, it will operate almost as powerfully as the peril of his imprisonment, as a moral coersion and compulsion upon her to yield her consent, instead of that free will and accord which the law jealously requires her to declare by an acknowledgment upon an examination before a magistrate, separate and apart from her husband. The learned master, Mr. Clay, to whom it was referred to report what amount of the purchase money should be retained by the vendee upon mortgage, as a compensation for him for any claim the wife might thereafter make against the premises for dower, reported that in his opinion not less than forty per cent. of the price should be left in his hands for that purpose; a result no doubt just as to him, but how as to the vendor, who was personally in no default? No stronger argument could be adduced to show the impolicy of making any decree. Specific performance is a matter of grace, and these are considerations which address themselves powerfully to the conscience of the chancellor.

Decree reversed. And now it is ordered and decreed that the bill be dismissed without prejudice; the costs in the court below and in this court to be paid by the complainant.

MEITZLER v. HELFRICH.

An auditor declined to find the fact whether the wife of a defendant in an execution had made the claim of exemption on the day of the levy, on the ground that a written claim made afterwards by the husband came too late: Held, to be error.

Appeal by Wm. Meitzler from the decree of the Common Pleas of Lehigh county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

It has been held repeatedly by this court that the wife, or a member of the family, of the defendant in an execution, who is absent from home at the time of a levy on his property, may claim his exemption for him. Waugh v. Buckel et al., 3 Grant, 319; Wilson v. McIlroy, 8 Casey, 82; McCarthy's Appeal, 18 P. F. Smith, 217. The reason of this is said to be a presumption of agency in such case for the debtor, who is absent, and incapable of protecting his interest, until it might be too late, and interfere with the execution of the writ and the interest which the family of a debtor has in retaining the property that the law intends to secure to the family, as well as to the debtor himself. Indeed, there are cases where the exemption has been denied to him, when it was manifest the interests of his family would fail to be promoted by its allowance. Hammer v. Friese, 7 Harris, 255; Weaver's Appeal, 6 Harris, 307.

In the present case, the demand of the benefit of the exemption made by the wife at the time of the levy, is proved clearly by two witnesses. This was denied by the sheriff, who testified that not finding the defendant at home, he went after him, found him, and explained the object of his visit, and that the defendant made no claim of his exemption. After the ven. ex. had been issued, and the property advertised, the defendant made a written request for the benefit of the exemption law, on the 25th of April, and an appraisement was made on the 1st day of May, four days before the sale, the appraisers having appraised personal property to the value of $18.25, found that the real estate was worth more than the remainder, $281.75, but that the land could not be divided without prejudice. The auditor declined to find the fact whether the wife of the defendant had made the claim of exemption on the day of the levy, on the ground that the written claim came too late, being governed, as he states, by the decision of the court below in the case of Kreebal v. Seibert. That decision has been reversed in an opinion just read. We think the auditor, acting under this stress, erred in refusing to decide the question of claim. Had he done so, and found the claim of the exemption had been properly made by the wife on the day of levy, it would have brought the case within the principle of the decision just made in Seibert v. Kreebal et al.

The decree of the court is therefore reversed, and the record remanded, with an order that the case be referred to an auditor to determine the facts necessary to make a final distribution of the fund, and the costs of this appeal are directed to be paid by the appellee.

CITY OF ALLENTOWN v. HENRY.

1. The Legislature has the constitutional right to confer upon municipal corporations the power of assessing the cost of local improvements upon the properties benefited.
2. A city ordinance, made under an authority of an act of Assembly, must conform to the letter and spirit of the act.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Lehigh county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

We think the learned judge correctly held that although the act of 14th April, 1868, might be unconstitutional, so far as it sought to authorize a private corporation to levy and collect a tax upon a citizen, yet it does not follow that that power may not be conferred upon a municipal corporation. The manifest intent and meaning of the act of 22d March, 1870, are to give to the plaintiff all the rights, privileges, powers and franchises which previous acts had declared to be given to the Allentown Water Company, as fully as the language used therein, professed to give the same, so that the plaintiff now holds and possesses them as fully as if they had been re-enacted in the same words.

We, however, are unable to concur in his conclusion that the said acts are unconstitutional. We do not understand this act of 14th April to impose an assessment for a general public benefit. Upon the contrary, it is a local tax, substantially for a local benefit. The tax is local, as it is imposed upon those dwelling houses only, situate upon the lines of the water pipes. The benefits are local, as the use of the water must necessarily be mostly restricted to the benefit of the property on those lines, both for domestic purposes and the extinguishment of fires. The effect of supplying those streets with water is to enhance the value of the dwelling houses thereon. The maintenance of the pipes, and the supplying of water, are necessarily a continuing expense, and this tax is evidently designed to defray those expenses. It is well settled, that the Legislature has the constitutional right to confer upon municipal corporations the power of assessing the cost of local improvements upon the properties benefited. Hammett v. Philadelphia, 15 P. F. Smith, 146; Kirby v. Shaw, 7 Harris, 258.

We concur that the verdict was correctly taken. The ordinance did not follow the act of Assembly. The act authorized the assessment to be levied upon "every dwelling house situated in any of the streets, lanes and alleys of the said city, in, through and along which, and as far as, the water pipes are now laid, and shall hereafter be laid." The ordinance imposes the tax upon such dwelling houses only as are "not supplied with hydrants."

This is an unwarranted departure from the letter and spirit of the law.

Judgment affirmed.

LORENZ v. LEHIGH NAV. CO.

1. Where the production of the books or papers of a corporation, before a commissioner to take depositions, is necessary and proper, a subpœna duces tecum will be issued to the officer having the custody of them, and he will be compelled to produce them, whether he has authority from the board of directors or not.
2. But a party cannot, upon an eight day rule to take depositions, subpœna the other party, and compel a disclosure of his case, or the production of evidence in his possession.

Saturday, May 17th, 1873.

This was an action of trover and conversion for five certificates of stock in defendants' company, belonging to plaintiff. After issue, but before trial, a rule was entered to take depositions of witnesses under section 35, rule 10th, of District Court (Court Rules, p. 29). The treasurer of defendants was served with a subpœna duces tecum to appear before the commissioner and bring with him certain books and papers, among which were the certificates of stock in question, and an alleged power of attorney of plaintiff to transfer said certificates. On the hearing before the commissioner, the witness attended and was examined. From his testimony it appeared that he was the officer of the company who had charge and actual custody of the books and papers called for, which he declined to produce before the commissioner. Plaintiff filed an affidavit that the alleged power of attorney was a forgery, and that an inspection of it was necessary to enable him to prove this fact. A rule was then taken for an attachment on witness for disobeying the subpœna.

R. H. McGrath and John Samuel, Esqs., for the rule.

As to plaintiff's right to inspect before trial—It was his alleged deed, of which he had no copy. It was material to enable him to maintain his action. Black v. Gompertz, 7 Exch. 67; Tebbutt v. Ambler, 7 Dowl. 674; Doe dem. Child v. Roe, 1 Ell. & Bl. 279; Scott v. Walker, 2 Ell. & Bl. 555; London Gas Light Co. v. Vestry of Chelsea, 6 C. B., N. S.; Pennark Harbor Dock Co. v. Cardiff Water Works, 7 C B., N. S.

The witness was bound to produce the papers; act of 1865 had made parties witnesses. Corsen v. Dubois, 1 Holt, 239; Arndy v. Long, 9 East, 473; 1 Camp, 14.

The act of 1798 did not apply, this being a tort; Morgan v. Watson, 2 Wh. 10; and the object being inspection before trial.

Charles Gibbons, Esq., contra: Witness being a servant of the company, could not, without their authority, produce their books and papers. 1 Gr. 453; Rose v. King, 5 S. & R. 241. A subpœna duces tecum will not go against officers of a company to produce its books. 5 Cowen, 27–419. He argued as to the opportunity for abuse, which the practice sought to be enforced would allow.

HARE, P. J., said he had no doubt that in a proper case the subpœna duces tecum would be enforced against the officer of a corporation having actual custody of the books or papers. A servant could not ordinarily be compelled to produce his master's books, because his custody of them was, in law, the master's custody, and the latter was the person amenable to process for their production. But if the master were out of the jurisdiction, or were, as in the present case, a mere legal entity, which could be acted on only through its officers or servants, then the subpœna would properly go against the person having the actual custody, and this, without regard to the master's orders.

There was, however, a more formidable objection to this rule. The plaintiff sought to compel the defendant in this summary way to disclose his defence, or, at least, to exhibit a material part of his evidence, and this he could not be permitted to do.

The regular proceedings in equity for discovery, and the perpetuation of evidence, guarded the rights of parties with great care, and it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the court to give them equal protection in these summary and less formal proceedings. It was a novelty, and neither the act of 1865, nor the rule of court required its sanction. The majority of the court, therefore, were of opinion that the rule must be discharged.

THAYER and MITCHELL, JJ., dissented.

WAGNER v. PETERSON.

1. Where a broker is employed to purchase and carry stock on a margin, if on a settlement of his account, there be any dispute between him and his principal as to the amount of margin remaining, the action should be account render, and not assumpsit.
2. An account rendered, and not excepted to within a reasonable time, becomes an account stated, unless there be fraud or mistake not apparent on the face of the account, and not known to the recipient at the time of its receipt.

Opinion by LYND, J. Delivered May 24th, 1873.

Plaintiff employed the defendant, a banker and stock broker in Philadelphia, to purchase and carry for him a number of shares of the stock of the Fort Wayne and Chicago R. R. Co., and deposited with the defendant certain U. S. 5-20's as margin. He alleged that the defendant was to charge interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum only, for the carrying of said stock. Several purchases in pursuance of several orders were made—in all three hundred shares—between August 13th, and September 7th, 1869. The defendant commenced to make "extra" charges as early as the 9th September, and continued the same at an increasing rate till the 27th September, when the "extra" charge for that day amounted to $442. This was shortly after black Friday.

The plaintiff had had no acquaintance or business with the defendant prior to this transaction. His friend George W. Hewes, to whom he had expressed his desire to buy the Fort Wayne stock, undertook to make the necessary arrangements with defendant, and did make the alleged arrangement with him, without the presence of the plaintiff.

Hewes also accompanied the plaintiff to the defendant's office upon the occasion of each order and deposit of margin for the purchase of stock, and was always the spokesman for the plaintiff.

The defendant communicated the fact that he was making the said charges to Hewes, and on September 7th, consulted him as to the propriety of selling a part of the stock. He, "knowing that the margin would be eaten up," directed a sale of two hundred shares. This direction and the occasion for it were fully stated and explained by Hewes to the plaintiff the same evening. The plaintiff did not repudiate the direction; he did not even "complain" of it.

The next day the defendant sent for the plaintiff and told him that he must furnish an additional margin, or the balance of the stock must be sold. Plaintiff said he had no more margin, and assented to a sale of the remaining shares.

They were accordingly sold, and an account rendered by defendant about the 8th October, showing a balance due plaintiff of $395.27. About October 12th, plaintiff directed defendant to buy fifty shares of Fort Wayne stock, the said balance to be used as margin. This venture was closed out in November, and the plaintiff received from the defendant a small balance then due him.

He made no complaint of or to defendant for some seven months, when he commenced this suit.

The majority of the court are of opinion that the non-suit must be sustained.

I. The primary duty of the defendant was to account to the plaintiff, and that the action should therefore have been account render.

Reeside's Executor v. Reeside, 13 Wr. 322. On page 332, his Honor Justice Agnew states the ground of distinction between assumpsit and account in clear and unmistakable terms.

II. But even if the action had been account render, the plaintiff should have been non-suited, because the evidence was clear that an account had been rendered by the defendant, in which the plaintiff, with full knowledge and comprehension of its items, and after full time for reflection and professional advice, acquiesced. He does not allege that there was any fraud or mistake in the statement of the account. He says: "I presumed they had a right to make these extra charges, and that I was helpless; I had no knowledge of their right to do so. I afterwards saw a newspaper report of a suit against a broker for such charges, and went to counsel and brought suit."

Even if courts were intended for the relief of those who act upon mistaken views of their legal rights, certainly the laches of those who lie by until their errors are revealed in the court columns of the daily press, would not be tolerated. Vigilantibus non dormientibus leges subveniunt.

The doctrine that an account rendered becomes an account stated, unless excepted to in a reasonable time, and that it is absolutely binding, unless as to mistake or fraud not apparent upon the face of the account, or not known by the recipient at the time of its receipt, is clearly and exhaustively stated by his Honor Justice Sharswood (then the President Judge of this court) in Bevan v. Cullen, 7 Barr, 28.

In Thompson v. Fisher, 1 Harris, it is said: "Rendering an account of itself, does not make it an account stated, but it becomes so by the consent of the consignors to whom it is sent. Their assent is inferred from a silence unnecessarily long. It is a presumption juris et de jure; for an account current must be objected to without unnecessary delay, or it is considered on well settled principles an account stated, and as such obligatory on the adverse party." * * * "Nor is there more solidity in the objection that the rule does not hold when the parties live in the same place. Indeed, the presumption derived from acquiescence would seem to apply with more force in such a case, than where they live in another country and another State."

If this be the rule applied to those who fail to indicate within a reasonable time their dissent to an account rendered, how can the plaintiff, who expressly assented to the account submitted, to him by the defendant, hope to escape its operation?

HARE and THAYER, J J., do not concur.

MITCHELL, J., concurs in the result.

"I have examined the Legal Gazette Reports which you did me the favor to send me, with great satisfaction. It is well gotten up, and neatly printed and bound. The variety of matter contained in it, emanating indiscriminately from courts in every portion of the State, renders the volume useful in every section to both lawyers and judges, and to them I cheerfully commend it." March 1st, 1872.

From HON. WM. S. PEIRCE,
Court of Com. Pleas, and Orphans' Court, Phila.

"It is presented to the public in good style, and so far as I have had opportunity to examine my own decisions, they are accurately reported, and the syllabi are concise and correct, and I am sure from the known ability of the Reporter, that they are so with respect to the other decisions."
Philada., March 1st, 1872.

From HON. JAMES LYND,
District Court, Phila.

"I have received and examined with interest and pleasure the first volume of Legal Gazette Reports. It contains much valuable matter, carefully edited and handsomely published. As multitudinous as the decisions of the Supreme Court seem to be, the number of quite important points that never reach that tribunal is very large; and the early publication, therefore, of cases disposed of in the courts of first resort is greatly to be commended. Permit me to express a hope that the Legal Gazette Reports will prove as profitable to the publishers as it will be serviceable to the bar and judiciary of our State." Philada., March 2d, 1872.

From HON. JOSEPH ALLISON,
President Judge 1st Judicial District, Pa.

"The work is in all respects most creditable to its Editor and Publishers, not only as to its external merit, but as a valuable addition to the reports of decided cases. The work affords abundant evidence of great care in its preparation, and is every way worthy of a favorable reception by the legal profession." Philadelphia, Feb. 23d, 1872.

From HON. THOS. K. FINLETTER,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts, Phila.

"I have examined volume one, Legal Gazette Reports, and am much pleased with the execution of the work. Many of the cases contained therein are familiar to me, as being argued and determined in the courts in which I sit, and I can testify to the fidelity and accuracy with which they are reported. I think that the volume will be a valuable addition to the Pennsylvania Reports." Philadelphia, March 21st, 1872

From HON. JAMES T. MITCHELL,
District Court, Phila

"The volume is handsomely got up, and to those who have not a full set of the Legal Gazette will be necessary to complete the Pennsylvania series and the bar will buy it with a good grace even in this day of multiplied reports, as it contains only cases that have not been elsewhere reported." Feb. 23d, 1872.

From HON. B. F. JUNKIN,
President Judge 9th Judicial District, Pa.

"I am convinced of its great value to the profession. It contains many decisions, involving questions which seldom reach the regular State Reports. You have done much for the bar and bench and they owe you a reward. The volume is neat and accurate." Bloomfield, Pa., April 2d, 1872.

From HON. A. W. ACHESON,
President Judge 27th Judicial District, Pa.

"It is replete with valuable information, and I think must be favorably received by the profession." Washington, Pa., April 6th, 1872.

From HON. J. B. LIVINGSTON,
President Judge 2d Judicial District, Pa.

"I have carefully examined the 1st vol., "Legal Gazette Reports." The matter contained therein, taken as it is from the decisions and practice of different courts throughout the State, will render this work indispensable to the practicing attorney as well as the judiciary. The book is well gotten up, neat in appearance, the syllabi accurate and index complete. I have no doubt it will soon find a place in the library of every practising attorney in the Commonwealth." Lancaster, Pa., April 8th, 1872.

From HON. J. C. BUCHER,
President Judge 20th Judicial District, Pa.

"From the examination I have made, I am convinced that they (the Reports) will be of great value to the practitioner and indispensable to all who desire a complete record of all the Pennsylvania cases." Lewisburg, Pa., March 10th, 1872.

From HON. HENRY P. ROSS,
President Judge 7th Judicial District, Pa.

"The volume has so much to commend it, both in its external appearance as a book, with regard to paper, type and general typographical execution, and in the great practical utility of its contents, that any expression of individual opinion as to its merits seems to be superfluous. I hope it will be the first of a series, and that its successors will present as many valuable cases as carefully edited as this initial volume. Such a series will be an indispensable element in the library of every lawyer." Norristown, Pa., March 22d, 1872.

From HON. JAMES RYON.
President Judge 21st Judicial District, Pa.

"I have examined this volume with great pleasure. The volume is neatly gotten up and the other work executed in fine style. It contains a large number of legal decisions both of the Common Pleas and Supreme Courts which can be found in no other work, and is essential to every law library." Pottsville, Pa., March 4th, 1872.

From HON. A. B. LONGAKER,
President Judge 3d Judicial District, Pa.

"The cases are well selected and important. It is a most valuable volume for the bench and bar, and very deservedly so as regards various points of practice. Every practitioner ought to have it." Allentown, Pa., April 20th, 1872.

LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY v. TERRY.

1. In the case of a policy of life assurance, where there is a condition in the instrument that if the assured shall "die by his own hand," the policy shall be void, the rules to be applied in case of the death of the party by such means, are these, that is to say:
2. If the assured, being in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties, from anger, pride, jealousy, or desire to escape from the ills of life, intentionally takes his own life, the proviso attaches, and there can be no recovery.
3. If the death is caused by the voluntary act of the assured, he knowing and intending that his death shall be the result of his act, but when his reasoning faculties are so far impaired that he is not able to understand the moral character, the general nature, consequences, and effect of the act he is about to commit, or when he is impelled thereto by an insane impulse, which he has not the power to resist, such death is not within the contemplation of the parties to the contract, and the insurer is liable.

Error to the Circuit Court, for the District of Kansas.

Mary Terry brought an action in the court below against the Mutual Life Insurance Company, of New York, to recover the sum of $2,000, claimed by her as due upon a policy of insurance on the life of her husband, George Terry, made and issued to her, as his wife.

The policy contained a condition, of which a portion was in these words, viz.: "If the said person, whose life is hereby insured, . . . shall die by his own hand, . . . this policy shall be null and void."

Within the terms of the policy, George Terry died from the effects of poison taken by him.

Evidence was given tending to show that at the time he took the poison he was insane. Evidence was also given, tending to show that at that time he was sane, and capable of knowing the consequences of the act he was about to commit.

Thereupon the counsel for the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury thus:

"First. If the jury believe from the evidence in the case, that the said George Terry destroyed his own life, and that, at the time of self-destruction, he had sufficient capacity to understand the nature of the act which he was about to commit, and the consequences which would result from it, then, and in that case, the plaintiff cannot recover on the policy declared on in this case.

"Second. That if the jury believe from the evidence that the self-destruction of the said George Terry was intended by him, he having sufficient capacity at the time to understand the nature of the act which he was about to commit, and the consequences which would result from it, then, and in that case, it is wholly immaterial in the present case that he was impelled thereto by insanity, which impaired his sense of moral responsibility, and rendered him, to a certain extent, irresponsible for his action." The court refused to give either of these instructions, and charged as follows:

"It being agreed that deceased destroyed his life by taking poison, it is claimed by defendant that he 'died by his own hand,' within the meaning of the policy, and that they are, therefore, not liable.

"This is so far true that it devolves on the plaintiff to prove such insanity on the part of the decedent, existing at the time he took the poison, as will relieve the act of taking his own life from the effect which, by the general terms used in the policy, self-destruction was to have, namely, to avoid the policy.

"It is not every kind or degree of insanity which will so far excuse the party taking his own life as to make the company insuring liable.

"To do this, the act of self-destruction must have been the consequence of the insanity, and the mind of the decedent must have been so far deranged as to have made him incapable of using a rational judgment in regard to the act which he was committing.

"If he was impelled to the act by an insane impulse, which the reason that was left him did not enable him to resist, or if his reasoning powers were so far overthrown by his mental condition, that he could not exercise his reasoning faculties on the act he was about to do, the company is liable. On the other hand, there is no presumption of law, prima facie or otherwise, that self-destruction arises from insanity, and if you believe from the evidence that the decedent, although excited or angry, or distressed in mind, formed the determination to take his own life, because, in the exercise of his usual reasoning faculties, he preferred death to life, then the company is not liable, because he died by his own hand within the meaning of the policy."

The cause came to this court on exceptions to the refusal of the court to give the instructions requested by the insurance company, and to the charge which was actually given.

The case was submitted on briefs; where it was elaborately argued on principle and precedents by Messrs. H. E. and J. T. Davies, for the plaintiff in error; the English case of Borradaile v. Hunter, 5 Manning & Granger, 639, being referred to as the leading one, where the rule, it was said, was early settled in England against the pretensions of cases like the present, and settled in accord with what the counsel maintained was a just construction of the words of the contract; a case, it was urged, which had been supported by the weight of authorities both in England and with us; as Clift et al. v. Schwabe, 3 Manning, Granger and Scott, 437; Dufaur v. Professional Life Insurance Co., 25 Bevan, 602; Cooper v. The Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co., 102 Massachusetts, 257; Nimick et al. v. Mutual Life Insurance Co., 10 American Law Register, New Series, 101; and Gay v. Union Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, 9 Blatchford, 142.

Mr. W. W. Nevison, contra, relied on Breasted v. The Farmers' Loan and Trust Co., 4 Hill, 73, S. C. on appeal, 4 Seldon, 299; Branch v. Baxter, 2 Aitken, 167; State v. Felter, 25 Iowa, 67; and submitted that the charge of the court below was in truth sustained by the Circuit Court for Connecticut, in Gay v. Union Mutual Life Insurance Co., relied on by the other side.

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the court.

The request for instructions made by the counsel of the insurance company, proceeds upon the theory that if the deceased had sufficient mental capacity to understand the nature and consequences of his act, that is, that he was about to take poison, and that his death would be the result, he was responsible for his conduct, and the defendant is not liable; and the fact that his sense of moral responsibility was impaired by insanity, does not affect the case.

The charge proceeds upon the theory that a higher degree of mental and moral power must exist; that although the deceased had the capacity to know that he was about to take poison, and that his death would be the result, yet, if his reasoning powers were so far gone that he could not exercise them on the act he was about to commit, its nature and effect, or if he was impelled by an insane impulse which his impaired capacity did not enable him to resist, he was not responsible for his conduct, and the defendant is liable.

It may not be amiss to notice that the case does not present the point of what is called emotional insanity, or mania transitorial; that is, the case of one in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties, who allows his passions to convert him into a temporary maniac, and while in this condition commits the act in question. This case is expressly excluded by the last clause of the charge, in which it is said that anger, distress, or excitement does not bring the case within the rule, if the insured possesses his ordinary reasoning faculties.

The case of Borradaile v. Hunter, reported in 5th Manning & Granger, p 639, is cited by the insurance company. The case is found also in 2 Bigelow's Life & Accident Insurance Cases, p. 280, and in a note appended are found the most of the cases upon the subject before us. The jury found, in that case, that the deceased voluntarily took his own life, and intended so to do, but that at the time of committing the act he was not capable of judging between right and wrong. Judgment went for the defendant, which was sustained upon appeal to the full bench. The counsel for the company argued that where the act causing death was intentional on the part of the deceased, the fact that his mind was so far impaired that he was incapable of judging between right and wrong, did not prevent the proviso from attaching; that moral or legal responsibility was irrelevant to the issue. The court adds: "It may very well be conceded that the case would not have fallen within the meaning of the condition, had the death of the assured resulted from an act committed under the influence of delirium, or if he had, in a paroxysm of fever, precipitated himself from a window, or, having been bled, removed the bandages, and death, in either case, had ensued. In these and many other cases that might be put, though strictly speaking the assured may be said to have died by his own hands, the circumstances clearly would not be such as the parties contemplated when the contract was entered into." In delivering the opinion of the court, Erskine, J., says all that the "contract requires is, that the act of self-destruction should be the voluntary and wilful act of a man having, at the time, sufficient powers of mind and reason to understand the physical nature and consequences of such act, and having, at the time, a purpose and intention to cause his own death by that act, and the question, whether at the time he was capable of understanding the moral nature and quality of his purpose, is not relevant to the inquiry, further than as it might help to illustrate the extent of his capacity to understand the physical character of the act itself." Chief Justice Tindal dissented from the judgment. In speaking of the verdict, he says: "It is not, perhaps, to be taken strictly as a verdict, that the deceased was non compos mentis at the time the act was committed, for if this latter is the meaning of the jury, the case would then fall within that description mentioned in the argument to be without the reach of the proviso, namely, the case of death inflicted on himself by the party whilst under the influence of frenzy, delusion or insanity." This authority was followed in Clift

v. Swable, 3 Common Bench, 437, where it was substantially held that the terms of the condition included all acts of voluntary self-destruction, and that whether the party is a voluntary moral agent, is not in issue.

These decisions expressly exclude the question of mental soundness. They are in hostility to the tests of liability or responsibility adopted by the English courts in other cases from Coke and Hale onwards. Coke said "a little madness deprives the lunatic of civil rights or dominion over property, and annuls wills." But to exempt from responsibility for crime, he says, "complete ignorance of the knowledge of right and wrong must exist." Lord Mansfield holds the legal test of a sound mind to be the knowledge of right and wrong, of good and evil; of which the converse is ignorance of knowledge of right and wrong, of good and evil. Lord Lyttleton held the test to be the state called compos mentis or sound mind. Lord Erskine, Defence of Hadfield, defined it to be the absence of any practicable delusion traceable to a criminal or immoral act. In Pritchard, on the Different Forms of Insanity, p. 16; and see 1 Shelford on Lunatics, 46, will be found the somewhat lengthy definition of insanity by Lord Lyndhurst.

The English judges refuse to apply to the act of the insured in causing his death the principles of legal and moral responsibility recognized in cases where the contract, the last will, or the alleged crimes of such person may be in issue.

In Hartman v. Keystone Insurance Company, Vol. 1, 21 Pennsylvania State, 466, the doctrine of Borradaile v. Hunter was adopted with the confessedly unsound addition that suicide would avoid a policy, although there were no conditions to that effect in the policy.

In Dean v. Mutual Life Insurance Company, 4 Allen, 96, the courts of Massachusetts held substantially the doctrine of Borradaile v. Hunter. In Kentucky, in St. Louis Life Insurance Company v. Graves, 6 Bushnell, 268, the court were divided upon the question of the soundness of Borradaile v. Hunter, but held unanimously that where the suicide was committed during an uncontrollable passion caused by intoxication, the condition was broken and the policy avoided. In Cooper v. Massachusetts Life Insurance Company, 102 Massachusetts, 227, the doctrine of Dean v. American Life Insurance Company was reaffirmed, the plaintiff offering to prove that the deceased was insane at the time he committed the act; that he acted under the influence and impulse of insanity, and that his act of self-destruction was the direct result of his insanity.

In Mimick v. Insurance Company 10 American Law Register, New Series, 102, McKennon, Circuit Judge of the United States, for the Western District of Pennsylvania, held that if the assured comprehended the physical nature and consequences of the act, and intended to destroy his life, the policy was void, although he did not comprehend the moral nature of the act.

On the other hand, in Eastabrook v. Union Insurance Company, 54 Maine, 224, the judge at the trial instructed the jury, "that if the insured was governed by irresistible or blind impulse in committing the act of suicide, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover." This decision was sustained by the Supreme Court of the State of Maine.

In the State of New York, the question arose in Breastead v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, 4 Hill, 73. In an action upon the policy, the defendants pleaded that the deceased committed suicide by drowning himself in the Hudson river, and died by his own hand. To this the plaintiff replied that the assured was "of unsound mind and wholly unconscious of the act." The defendants demurred. The Supreme Court overruled the demurrer, holding that the reply afforded a sufficient answer to the plea.

The case afterward came before the Court of Appeals of that State, 4 Selden, 299, when it was held that the provision in the policy had reference to a criminal act of self-destruction; that the self-destruction of the insured while insane, and incapable of discerning between right and wrong, was not within the provision.

In the case of Gay v. The Union Mutual Life Insurance Company, cited in 2 Bigelow, Life and Accident Insurance Cases, 4, it was held that if the deceased was conscious of the act he was committing, if he intended to take his own life, and was capable of understanding the nature and consequences of it, the policy was void; but if the insured destroyed himself while acting under an insane delusion, which overpowered his understanding and will, or if he was impelled to the act by uncontrollable impulse, the case did not fall within the proviso of the policy. This decision, it is stated by Bigelow, supra, was the result of careful deliberation between Judges Woodruff and Shipman at a Circuit Court of the United States, held by them jointly.

In his work on Insurance, section 894, Mr. Phillips, after citing the cases, closes thus: "And I take our law to be, that any mental derangement which would be sufficient to exonerate a party from a contract, would render a person incapable of occasioning the forfeiture of a policy under this condition."

There is a conflict in the authorities which cannot be reconciled. The propositions embodied in the charge before us are in some respects different from each other, but in principle they are identical. They rest upon the same basis, the moral and intellectual incapacity of the deceased. In each case the physical act of self-destruction was that of George Terry. In neither was it truly his act. In the one supposition he did it when his reasoning powers were overthrown, and he had not power or capacity to exercise them upon the act he was about to do. It was in effect as if his intellect and reason were blotted out or had never existed. In the other, if he understood and appreciated the effect of his act, an uncontrollable impulse caused by insanity compelled its commission. He had not the power to refrain from its commission, or to resist the impulse. Each of the principles put forth by the judge rests upon the same basis—that the act was not the voluntary intelligent act of the deceased.

The causes of insanity are as varied as the varying circumstances of man.

> "Some for love, some for jealousy,
> For grim religion some, and some for pride,
> Have lost their reason; some for fear of want,
> Want all their lives; and others every day,
> For fear of dying, suffer worse than death."

Armstrong on Health, book 4, vol. 84, cited, in Shelford on Lunatics In. 1, 43.

When we speak of the "mental" condition of a person, we refer to his senses, his perceptions, his consciousness, his ideas. If his mental condition is perfect, his will, his memory, his understanding are perfect, and connected with a healthy bodily organization. If these do not concur, his mental condition is diseased or defective.

Excessive action of the brain whereby the faculties become exhausted, a want of proper action whereby the functions become impaired and diminished, the visions, delusions, and mania, which accompany irritability, or the weakness which results from an excess of vital functions, indigestion and sleeplessness, are all the result of a disturbance of the physical system. The intellect and intelligence of man are manifested through the organs of the brain, and from these consciousness, will, memory, judgment, thought, volition, and passion, the functions of the mind, do proceed. Without the brain, these cannot exist. With an injured or diseased brain, their powers are impaired or diminished.

We have not before us the particular facts on which the questions of the sanity of Terry were presented. We may assume that proof was given upon which the propositions of the charge were based. We do not know whether he was sleepless, unduly excited, or unnaturally depressed; whether he had abandoned his accustomed habits and pursuits and adopted new and unusual ones; from a quiet, orderly man, had become disorderly, vicious or licentious; that his fondness for his wife and children changed to dislike and abuse. That jealousy, pride, the fear of want, the fear of death, had overtaken him. He may have realized the state supposed by the counsel in arguing Borradaile v. Hunter, viz., that his death might have resulted from an act committed under the influence of delirium, or that, in a paroxysm of fever, he might have precipitated himself from a window, or having been bled, he might have torn away the bandages. Whether he swallowed poison or did the other insane acts, might result from the same condition of body and mind.

Delirium, fever, tearing away the bandages for preserving the life, the taking of poison, in a case like that before us, are all results of bodily disease. If bodily disease in these or other forms overthrew Terry's reasoning faculties; in other words, destroyed his consciousness, his judgment, his volition, his will, he remained the form of the man only. The reflecting, responsible being did not exist. In the language of the successful counsel in Borradaile v. Hunter, "in these and many other cases, though strictly speaking the assured may be said to have died by his own hand, the circumstances clearly would not be such as the parties contemplated when the contract was entered into."

That form of insanity called impulsive insanity, by which the person is irresistibly impelled to the commission of an act, is recognized by writers on this subject. See Blandford on Insanity—"Impulsive Insanity." It is sometimes accompanied by delusions, and sometimes exists without them. The insanity may be patent in many ways, or it may be concealed. We speak of the impulses of persons of unsound mind. They are manifested in every form—breaking of windows, destruction of furniture, tearing of clothes, firing of houses, assaults, murders, and suicides. The cases are to be carefully distinguished from those where persons in the possession of their reasoning faculties are impelled by passion merely in the same direction.

Dr. Ray, cited by Fisher, Fisher on Insanity, p. 83, approves the charge of the judge in Haskell's case, where he says: "The true test lies in the word power. Has the defendant in a criminal case the power to distinguish right from wrong, and the power to adhere to the right and avoid the wrong?"

The question of sanity has usually been presented upon the validity of an agreement, the capacity to make a will, or upon responsibility for crime. If Terry had made an agreement under the circumstances stated in the charge, a jury or a court would have been justified in pronouncing it invalid. A will, then, made by him would have been rejected by the surrogate if offered for probate. If upon trial for a criminal offence, upon all the authorities, he would have been entitled to a charge that upon proof of the facts assumed, the jury must acquit him. Freeman v. People, 4 Denio, 9; Willis v. The People, 32 New York 719: Seaman Society v. Hopper, 33 Id. 619; The Marquis of Winchester's Case, 6 Reports, 23; Combe's Case, Moore, 759.

We think a similar principle must control the present case, although the standard may be different.

We hold the rule on the question before us to be this: If the assured, being in the possession of his ordinary reasoning faculties, from anger, pride, jealousy, or a desire to escape from the ills of life, intentionally takes his own life, the proviso attaches, and there can be no recovery. If the death is caused by the voluntary act of the assured, he knowing and intending that his death shall be the result of his act, but when his reasoning faculties are so far impaired that he is not able to understand the moral character, the general nature, consequences, and effect of the act he is about to commit, or when he is impelled thereto by an insane impulse, which he has not the power to resist, such death is not within the contemplation of the parties to the contract, and the insurer is liable.

In the present instance, the contract of insurance was made between Mrs. Terry and the company, the insured not being, in form, a party to the contract. Such contracts are frequently made by the insured himself, the policy stating that it is for the benefit of the wife, and that in the event of death the money is to be paid to her. We see no difference in the cases. In each it is the case of a contract, and is to be so rendered as to give effect to the intention of the parties. Nor do we see any difference for this purpose in the meaning of the expressions, commit suicide, take his own life, or die by his own hands. With either expression, it is not claimed that accidental self-destruction, death in endeavoring to escape from the flames, or the like, is within the proviso. The judgment affirmed.

READING v. FINNEY.

1. An assessor is required to assess and return the lands in his township in single tracts, according to their ownership.
2. Though by reason of an apparent severance of unseated lands, not acquiesced in by the owner, the assessment against him be for a less number of acres than his tract contains, and the balance be separately assessed, his title to the entire tract can not be divested by a tax sale so long as all the taxes assessed against him are paid.
3. Biddle v. Noble, 18 P. F. S. 279, explained.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Elk county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

It is certainly true, that under the acts of the General Assembly, providing for the sales of unseated lands for taxes, the land is the debtor, and is subject to sale without regard to the ownership; no matter in whose name it may be assessed. Strauck v. Shoemaker, 1 W. & S. 166. But it is also true that these acts, and the decisions of this court in the construction of them, have not neglected to look to the protection of the rights of the owner, so that if he is not in default in the payment of the taxes on the land demanded of him, his title cannot be divested. Hence, proof of the actual payment of the tax avoids the sale. Nay, if the tax be paid, though not by him, it will avail him; for if two men have surveys which interfere with each other, and he whose warrant and survey are junior, pays the tax on all the land included in his survey, and he who has the senior warrant and survey, does not, and the land surveyed to him is sold for taxes, such sale will pass no title to the interference on which the tax has been paid by the other. Hunter v. Cochran, 3 Barr, 105. Hence, also, it is not in the power of the assessors—much less of a mere stranger or trespasser—by the division of an entire tract without his knowledge and consent, to jeopard his title. "The acts relating to the assessment of lands, say Mr. Justice Agnew, "are plain, and require the assessor to assess and return the lands in his township in single tracts, according to their ownership. He may follow the sale or division of the tract by the owner; but he has no power himself to cut up the property of a single owner and return it in parcels. The acts on the subject are collated by Huston, J., in Morton v. Harris, 9 Watts, 326, showing conclusively that the entire process of assessment, from the beginning to the end, contemplates taxation and sale by single tracts, following the title of the owner." Brown v. Hays, 16 P. F. Smith, 235. Where an entire tract is divided and retained without the act or consent of the proprietor, and both parcels are charged with taxes, either by the number of the warrant or the name of the original warrantee or subsequent owner, it is a case of double assessment; for nothing is better settled than that a misstatement of the number of acres contained in a tract will not vitiate a sale of the whole. In Williston v. Colhett, 9 Barr, 78, a tract was originally assessed in the name of the warrantee for nine hundred and ninety-nine acres. During subsequent years the amount was reduced as sales were made. It was finally assessed as two hundred acres, when in fact it contained six hundred. A treasurer's sale, made under such an assessment, was held to pass the title to the whole six hundred. Brown v. Hays, already cited, is a remarkable illustration of the same doctrine. There was an assessment of a tract of one thousand and twenty-six acres by the number of the original warrant, and the name of the warrantee in Polk township, Jefferson county. By the division of the township, a part of it was thrown into a new township, named Heath, and there separately assessed as three hundred acres. The taxes on the entire tract in Polk township, though assessed as only seven hundred and twenty-six acres, were paid by the owner. It was held that the purchaser, at a tax sale of the three hundred acres assessed in Heath township, took no title. "The number of acres," says Mr. Justice Agnew, is simply descriptive, and would not overturn the number of the tract, the name of the warrantee, and the duty of the assessor." It seems to follow logically, from these premises, that the return and assessment of warrant No. 4896, in this case, without the knowledge and consent of the owner to such division, was wholly without warrant of law. The tract was assessed at first in the name of Wilhelm William, for nine hundred and ninety acres. From 1826, it appears on the book in two parcels; one of one hundred and fifty acres, in the name of Joel Woodworth, and the other of five hundred and fifty-nine, in the name of Gilliam Demorest. Demorest paid the taxes for 1826–7–8. In 1829 and 1830, it was assessed in the name of Alexander Boyd. In 1832, the treasurer sold it to the commissioners of the county for unpaid taxes of 1830 and 1831, and a deed was duly made to them for the said tract as five hundred and fifty-nine acres. The entire tract, including both parcels, was omitted from the assessment list from 1832 until 1838, that is, during the period of time that the title was in the county. The cases cited, I think, show that the commissioners, by the treasurer's deed, acquired title to the whole tract No. 4896. They so considered, and when in 1838 they sold to Josiah W. Smith, they conveyed to him by metes and bounds the entire tract, as it was claimed by the owner. It was less, indeed, than the amount returned in the original survey, because there were older warrants and surveys, which cut off a part of it by interference. Hence, the deed to Josiah W. Smith, after describing the land by metes and bound, recites it as "being part of a larger tract of land which was surveyed July 18th, 1794, in pursuance of a warrant dated 3d February, 1794, granted to Wilhelm William and others, and known by No. 4896, containing nine hundred and ninety acres." There is certainly nothing in this recital which limits the previous description of the land. Subsequent to 1838, Smith and his assigns paid the taxes on the whole tract as five hundred and fifty-nine acres, including the taxes of 1850 and 1851, for non-payment of which the parcel assessed as one hundred and fifty acres was sold to Qua, under whom the plaintiff below claimed. Upon this evidence, the instruction of the learned judge to the jury was right. "If you believe that Woodworth had the boundaries of his claim of one hundred and fifty acres actually marked on the ground, and returned to the assessor as his land, with the knowledge of the real owner, a sale of it for taxes would give the purchaser a good title. But an intruder, such as Woodworth appears to have been, cannot by such separate claim and assessment acquire a title against the real owner, who does not assent to such division, and who pays taxes on the whole tract." We think the plaintiff in error has no right to complain of the charge of the learned judge.

It has been strongly urged, however, that an actual line run on the ground by any claimant, with or without title, was sufficient authority to the assessor to return such survey as a separate tract. The assessor, it is said, has nothing to do with the title. He returns the tracts as he finds them on the ground. Perilous, indeed, would be the condition of the owner if such were the law. The assessor finds a line marked by trees in the wilderness, and is told that somebody claims that part of what he knows to be one entire tract, under an original survey. He returns it as a separate tract for taxation. The owner, ignorant of this transaction, pays all that he is charged with for the tract he holds. He assesses the number of acres described in his deed to be the true content of his survey. He sleeps in security, but wakes up to find that, perhaps, the most valuable part of his property has been swept from him, without his default. It is supposed that Biddle v. Noble, 18 P. F. Smith, 279, supports the contention, that all that is required to sever a tract of unseated land for taxation, is a line actually marked on the ground. But this is a misapprehension of that case. The entire tract then was seated, in consequence of a settlement upon part. The owner sold to the settler two hundred acres where the improvement was, so as not to interfere with the claim of any other settler. It was held that in the absence of a line on the ground, made with notice to the vendor, that there was no severance, and that a sale of the remainder of the tract as unseated was void.

Judgment affirmed.

HANNA v. HOLTON.

A., owning a judgment against a solvent defendant, marked it to the use of B. as a collateral security, the latter neglected to collect it, and the defendant becoming insolvent, it was held that B. must account to A. for the loss of the judgment.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Chester county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The cases cited for the plaintiff in error, are chiefly those of sureties, where the indulgence of the creditor was purely permissive, and the surety was therefore held not to be discharged. A creditor who holds a collateral security for the protection of his debt, stands in a different relation to the assignor of the collateral, though the latter be his debtor. By the assignment, a privity in contract is established, which invests the assignee with the ownership of the collateral for all purposes of dominion over the debt assigned. He alone is empowered to receive the money to be paid upon it, and to control it in order to protect his right under the assignment. This is the ground of the creditor's liability for the collateral, as stated by Tilghman, C. J., in Lyon v. Huntingdon Bank, 12 S. & R. 68; and, also, by the court in Beale v. The Bank, 5 Watts, 530. It is therefore settled in this State, that where the collateral is lost by the insolvency of the debtor in the collateral instrument, through the supine negligence of the creditor, he must account for the loss to his own debtor, who invested him with its entire control. Miller v. Gettysburg Bank, 8 Watts, 192; Bank U. S. v. Peabody, 8 Harris, 454; Dyott's Estate, 2 W. & S. 490; Chambersburg Ins. Co. v. Smith, 1 Iowa, 120; Sellers et al. v. Jones, 10 Harris, 423; Lisky v. O'Brien, 4 Watts, 141; Morehead v. Kirkpatrick, 9 Harris, 237; Ins. Co. v. Marr, 10 Wright, 507. We perceive no error therefore in the decision of the court below, that William Hanna must account to Alexander Holton for the loss of the judgment againt Jackson Holton, by reason of his omitting to keep up its lien, and afterwards failing to proceed to collect it, until Jackson became insolvent.

This action is not founded on the loss of lien alone. That is but a circumstance, or one of the facts constituting negligence. Had the failure to revive the judgment been the only cause of the loss of the debt, as under some circumstances it might be; the six years having then elapsed, before suit, the statute of limitations would have been a bar. But the loss of the lien was not in this instance the sole cause of the loss of the debt. Jackson Holton continued solvent, and the judgment remained collectable until 1866, when Jackson sold his property, and actually received a large part of the purchase money himself. Alexander Holton's debt to Hanna was contracted in October, 1860, and he then assigned to Hanna the judgment against Jackson Holton as collateral security. The lien of the judgment expired in September, 1863. Jackson sold his farm in July, 1866, and died insolvent in 1867; Hanna, in the meantime, taking no steps to secure or to collect the judgment, which all this time stood marked to his use on the docket. It is very clear that the real injury to Alexander Holton was not consummated until Jackson sold his farm, and put the proceeds in his pocket. The cause of action then arose, and the statute then began to run. At least, this was the earliest period it could arise, and this was only four years before the commencement of the action. The statute was no bar therefore, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

BAR MEETING.

DEATH OF Z. POULSON DOBSON, ESQ.

A meeting of the bar was held on Wednesday, in the Supreme Court room, at 12 o'clock, to take appropriate action in regard to the death of Z. Poulson Dobson, Esq.

The meeting was organized by calling Judge Sharswood, of the Supreme Bench, to the chair, and the appointment of Thomas J. Ashton, Esq., as secretary.

Judge Sharswood said he had known Mr. Dobson from his earliest admittance to the bar. He had been very fond of literary pursuits, and this to a certain extent had kept him in the background in legal business, yet he was known as a man of talent and intellectual culture.

James Parsons, Esq., said Mr. Dobson, almost in the heart of a great city, was a hermit. For ten years he had led the life of a literary gentleman; was of singular refinement, cultivated in the classics, with a subtle and ingenious mind. He was a storehouse of knowledge on the common law, and thoroughly posted in the most recondite points of it. He had died without having the opportunity of showing to the world the erudition and powers which were in him. Mr. Parsons offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the bar of Philadelphia on this solemn occasion desire to offer their testimony to the learning and worth of the deceased. His was no vulgar ambition; he aspired to identify not his name merely, but himself with the science and literature of his business. His research into the recondite part of the law exhibits the versatility of his intellect and the variety of his accomplishments. The bar, but not the student, would have reaped the reward of his labors. His fame, like his character, must rest in the memory of his contemporaries, who recall with pleasure the association which they have had with a scholar at once unpretending and erudite.

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed by the chair to communicate to those who stand nearest to the deceased a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution.

They were seconded in a feeling address by Thomas J. Ashton, Esq., who said Mr. Dobson was an accomplished linguist and a thorough student in the black letter law. His was a shrinking and sensitive nature, and came but little in contact with the younger members of the bar.

Addresses were made by Charles W. Beresford, Robert W. Ryerss, Samuel Dickson, and J. Warren Coulston, Esqs.

The resolutions were adopted, and a committee was appointed to convey the same to the family of the deceased, consisting of Messrs. Parsons, Campbell, and Ryerss, to which the officers of the meeting were added.

The proceedings were ordered to be published, and the meeting adjourned.

THE MANHATTAN COAL CO. v. JOHN GREEN.

1. An older survey can not be changed or contradicted by the lines of a junior survey, and the latter must give way to the former.
2. If the description in a warrant be loose and vague, a survey is necessary to identify the land; the title takes effect only from the time of the survey, and a junior warrant, containing an explicit description, issued before such survey is made, has precedence.
3. A survey without a warrant is void, except the surveys allowed actual settlers under the act of April 3d, 1792.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Schuylkill county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

John Green, the plaintiff below, claimed title under a warrant in the name of Philip Myer, to one of a block of thirteen surveys made by Henry Vanderslice, D. S., on the 18th to the 25th of May, 1794. The Myer survey, as claimed to be located, embraces parts of two surveys claimed by the defendants, contained in a block of fourteen surveys made by Henry Vanderslice, D. S., on the 11th to the 18th of February, 1794; and also parts of two surveys claimed by the defendants, made by Wm. Wheeler, D. S., on the 22d of January, 1794. Neither the Myer survey, nor the four surveys claimed by the defendants, can be located by marks on the ground, applicable to them individually, but in each case the location is ascertained by the places they occupy in their respective blocks. The block surveys, however, are readily ascertained and identified by original marks, and older surveys found on the ground on the north side of the block of thirteen surveys, and on the south side of the block of fourteen surveys. As thus ascertained, there is not room between the older surveys for the whole number of surveys in each block. In this state of the case, that portion of the block of thirteen surveys, on its south side, which interferes with the northern portion of the block of fourteen surveys, must give way, the thirteen being younger in date than the fourteen. The instruction of the judge on this part of the case given in answer to the 8th, 9th and 11th points of the defendants, was correct, except in the qualification of the answer to the 8th point, as to the supposed mistake in the call upon the south side of the block of thirteen surveys. The qualification was, in effect, contradictory; for the block of thirteen being younger than the block of fourteen surveys, no mistake in the call of the former could affect the location of the latter. An older survey cannot be changed or contradicted by the lines of a junior survey. The calls of the latter, whether mistaken or true, do not limit the lines of the former. Carbon Run Improvement Co. v. Rockefeller, 1 Casey, 49; Belon v. Cleaver, 4 Wright, 260. In affirming the defandant's 11th point, the court correctly informed the jury that the proper way to locate the block of thirteen, was first to run out the older blocks for which it called, and if there was not a sufficient vacancy left to contain the whole thirteen, those of the thirteen first surveyed would be entitled to the vacant land, but in no event could any of the younger blocks exclude any of the older blocks. The fact that the Philip Myer survey called for vacant land on the south and west, or that the call of the block of thirteen for the surveys in the block of fourteen, was owing to a mistake in some way by Vanderslice, the D. S., could not affect the older block of fourteen, or carry the Myer survey within its lines. The call of Philip Myer for vacant land south and west, makes it probable the surveyor thought it extended westward past the block of fourteen, as shown in a connected draft of three blocks, (these two and the block on the north of both) but this would not justify an interference with the older surveys. The defendants were therefore entitled to an unqualified instruction that the block of fourteen surveys being previously located, none of the surveys in the younger block of thirteen could interfere with any of the former, and no mistake of the surveyor in locating, or in the calls of the thirteen, could affect the surveys in the block of fourteen. In this attitude of the case, the plaintiff was drawn to another position. He claimed that the warrant of Philip Myer was precisely descriptive of the land in controversy, and on this ground, if found in its proper location, it antedated the defendant's title, even though the location fell within the block of fourteen. This raises the question as to the description in the Myer's warrant. Descriptive warrants are of two kinds, those which are precisely descriptive, and those which are only vaguely or loosely descriptive. The former are such as to clearly describe the land that it can be readily identified and the warrant applied. These take title from their date, the subject of the purchase being defined with sufficient certainty at the time of the application. On the other hand, a vague or loose description, only ascertains propinquity, and the land must still be defined by a survey, in order to ide tify by the subject of the purchase, and render it certain. In the latter case the title takes date only from the time of survey. Hubbey v. Van Horne, 7 S. & R. 185; Norris v. Monin, 3 Watts, 469; Patterson v. Ross, 10 Harris, 340. In Patterson v. Ross, the warrant was for 400 acres of land north and west of the rivers Ohio and Allegheny, and Conewango creek, on the west bank of Big Beaver creek, and to include the walnut bottom lying on the run that falls into said creek, nearly opposite an island between the big and little falls, by estimation one mile above the block house. The evidence on the ground readily identified the big and little falls, the island, the site of the block house and the run falling into the creek on the west side, nearly opposite the island; but the identity of the walnut bottom lying on the bottom was not clearly ascertained, the bottom along the run being large enough to admit of several tracts of 400 acres. It was held that the warrant was not precisely descriptive, and the title took date only from the time of the survey. In regard to that particular description, I think the idea of vagueness was carried to an extreme, and that probably that part of the description which required the tract to lie on the west bank of the creek, was not given in its full force. But this does not change the principles on which the case was decided, that a vague or loose description gives title only from the survey, nor does it open the force of the illustration the case affords, in determining what is a vague description.

The description contained in the Philip Myer warrant is as follows: "400 acres of land on a branch of Big Schuylkill," called "Big run," adjoining lands surveyed on a warrant granted to John Hartman, down the said creek one mile, near the Tory path in Berks county. Excepting so much of this description as locates the tract "adjoining lands surveyed on a warrant granted to John Hartman;" the entire description is very loose and vague. No land is precisely ascertained by its being on Big run. It is not said on what side of the run it lies, or whether across it. Nor is it said how near, or on what side of the Tory path it lies. "Down the creek one mile," must mean, if it mean anything, one mile down the creek from the survey of John Hartman; otherwise the fact of adjoining that survey would be, in itself, a vague description, for it is not said on what side of the Hartman survey the Myer land is to lie. The Hartman survey is, therefore, the key to the description. In Fox v. Lyon, 9 Casey, 479, it was held that a warrant to John Fox for land adjoining a survey in the name of Mordecai Massey, on the north, and land of Fowler & Co., surveyed to adjoin Mordecai Massey on the north, but lying 150 perches from the Fowler & Co. lands, was a shifted location. So in De Haas v. De Haas, 2 Yates, 317, a survey including a path, and a chief part of the land lying westward of it, was viewed as deviating from the call in the warrant, which was for land "adjoining the path from Mahoning to Muncy creek, eastward of the said path." It is evident, therefore, that the description in the Myer warrant depends for its precision wholly on that part which calls for its "adjoining lands surveyed on a warrant granted to John Hartman." Without that, "down the creek one mile" is meaningless, and the Big run and the Tory path afford no evidence of precise locality. It will be noticed that the call is not for a survey merely, which might send the inquirer in the land office, as the ground to search for such a monument; but it is for land surveyed on a warrant granted to John Hartman. This description sends the inquirer directly to the files of the land office, and there to discover no trace of such a warrant and survey existing at the date of the Philip Myer warrant, on the 27th of February, 1793. The only warrant to be found in the office, according to the evidence, in the name of John Hartman, bears date afterwards on the 3d day of August, 1793, and the survey made under it was on the 21st of August, 1793. It is very clear, therefore, that this portion of the description in the Myer warrant was notice of nothing to those who desired to take up lands in this vicinity, and was void for uncertainty. When an applicant for land is informed of an office right, and survey under it, he has the means at once, by resorting to the files of the office, of ascertaining its location, and thus of avoiding an interference with it, in making his own survey. This is all important to him, for the State does not guarantee against loss where a previous warrant holder surveys the land appropriated to an older warrant. Hence, when no search he can make will lead to information, it is clear he cannot have legal notice of the former appropriation, by such a false description. In such a case he must suffer by his false description, which leads away from notice. Nor is the fact that a survey is mentioned, to be disconnected from the statement that it was made on a warrant. A survey without warrant is void, since the proprietary government and custom have ceased to exist, excepting surveys allowed to actual settlers under the act of 3d April, 1792. Under the Penns, surveys were sometimes made without a precept, and the custom to receive them has been permitted to be proved. Woods v. Galbraith, 2 Yates, 306. But since the divesting act of 27th November, 1779, the practice has not been allowed. Burton v. Smith, 1 Rawle, 403.

The importance of notice of pre-existing rights to those who take up lands from the commonwealth, cannot be overrated, and is strongly set forth by Judge Rogers, in Roland v. Long, 1 Harris, 464, and by Judge Woodward, in Emery v. Spencer, 11 Harris, 271. Judge Rogers said that an applicant is not bound to look beyond the land office, and although a warrant may be issued and money paid, yet if there be no return of survey in the office, the title, under the previous warrant, will be good. This is not to be taken in an unqualified sense, yet it is evidence of the importance attached to the records of the land office. Any one, therefore, reading the description in the Philip Myer warrant, and then finding in the land office no such warrant as that of John Hartman referred to in it, would not be bound to look further; for there is no other place than the land office where such warrants are legally to be found. And knowing that a survey without a warrant is void, he would not be led to believe that such a survey could be meant, when the description asserts that it was made on a warrant. The result is that the description in the Philip Myer warrant, that the tract adjoined lands surveyed on a warrant to John Hartman, is nugatory, and gives the warrant no precedence over junior claimants, and the remainder of the description being vague and uncertain, the title under the warrant takes date from the time of survey. This disposes of the case, and renders it unnecessary to pass upon the other assignments of error. The question becomes one of location merely, and if, as the evidence appears to show, the block surveys are identified by marks on the ground clearly indicating their location, the block of thirteen, being younger than the block of fourteen, must give way to the latter, and the Philip Myer warrant, not being precisely descriptive, must give way, so far as it interferes with any of the surveys of the block of fourteen.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

In re ROAD IN SPRINGFIELD TOWNSHIP.

All that is required in a report of road viewers, is reasonable certainty where the road shall begin and end, and that the road as laid out shall begin and end substantially at the points designated in the petition.

Certiorari to the Court of Quarter Sessions of Montgomery county.

Opinion of the court by WILLIAMS, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The petition in this case defines with reasonable certainty, the points of beginning and ending of the proposed road; and in laying it out, the viewers complied substantially, if not literally, with the petition and order of view. The petition prays for a road "to begin in the Germantown and Perkiomen turnpike road, at a point where the public road leading from the Flourtown and Norristown road intersects the said turnpike road, and to and in the Wissahickon road, at a point between the corner of lands of Samuel W. Paul and Peter Struper, and the angle or curve in the said last named road, opposite the dwelling house of the said Peter Struper." The viewers laid out a road "beginning at point in the middle of the Germantown and Perkiomen turnpike road, where the same is intersected by the middle line of the road leading from the Flourtown and Norristown road," and ending at the point designated in the petition. There is no substantial variance in the point of beginning, as described in the petition and the report of the viewers. Even if the point of intersection is, as the learned judge of the Court of Quarter Sessions suggested, the outside and not the middle line of the turnpike road, the variance is immaterial. De minimis non curat lex. All that the law requires is reasonable certainty in defining the points where the road shall begin and end; and that the road as laid out by the viewers shall begin and end substantially at the points designated in the petition. But if mathematical exactness were required, it is by no means certain that there is any variance in the point of beginning. The viewers in laying out a road do not fix its width; nor run and mark the outside lines of the road on the ground. They run and mark but one line; the centre line of the road. The point of intersection of two roads, as laid out and marked on the ground by the viewers, is then the point where the middle or centre lines of the two roads intersects; the very point at which the viewers in this case commenced. But if this be not so, it is wholly immaterial whether they commenced at the intersection of the outside, or the middle line of the turnpike and public road.

Order setting aside the report for informality is reversed. The report is reinstated, and a procedendo awarded.

IN EQUITY.

BUTLER et al. v. THE CITY OF WILKESBARRE.

1. The Legislature may delegate its power of taxation to a municipal government, to be legitimately exercised within its corporate limits.
2. An act authorized a municipality to require a license for carriages kept for pleasure or hire, from auctioneers, from the owners, &c., of bowling alleys and billiard tables, for the use of which pay is demanded. "And also all other places of business and amusement conducted for profit:" Held, the general words were to be limited to places similar to bowling alleys and billiard rooms.
3. Such an act would not authorize the imposition of a tax upon a merchant, banker, broker, druggist, or persons following like businesses.
4. An ordinance under such an act, can inflict only such penalties as the act provides.

Appeal from the Common Pleas of Luzerne county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

We cannot review the wisdom or the expediency of legislative enactments. They must violate some prohibition, expressly declared or clearly implied, of the constitution of this State or of the United States, before we can pronounce them to be unconstitutional.

Whatever power of taxation the Legislature possesses, it may delegate to a municipal government, to be legitimately exercised within its corporate limits.

The right of the Legislature to exempt certain classes of property, as well as classes of persons, from taxation, has always been recognized in this State. Thus, churches, meeting-houses, burial grounds, universities, colleges, academies, school houses, court houses and jails, have been exempted "from all and every county, road, city, borough, poor and school tax." Act of 16th April, 1838, Pur. Dig. 1368, pl. 77. So all lands granted to officers and soldiers of this State, for services in the armies of the Revolution, were exempted during the lifetime and ownership of the grantee. Act of 1st March, 1780, 1 Sm. Laws, 479. So during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, volunteers who were in service, or who had been honorably discharged therefrom, were in many cases exempted from taxes laid to pay bounties to volunteers. Act of 14th April, 1863, P. L. 443, § 4; also, from a per capita tax. Act of 25th August, 1864, P. L. 987. In the exercise of the power of taxation, persons and things may be classified. Some classes may be taxed, other classes may be exempted. Thus, the act of April 29th, 1844, P. L. 497, imposed a State tax upon "all professions, trades and occupations, except the occupation of farmers." Again, some species of property may be taxed for one purpose and not for another. "If the taxation is upon all of a class, either of persons or things," said Justice Sharswood, in Durach's Appeal, 12 P. F. Smith, 494, "it matters not whether those included in it be one or many." We are unable to see anything in the act of 2d April, 1872, which conflicts with the prohibitory clauses in the constitution, and the learned judge was correct in so holding.

The remaining question is, does the act of 2d April, 1872, support the ordinance of September 2d, 1872? We think it does not, for two reasons:.

First. The act authorizes the city authorities to require the payment, by ordinance or other general regulation, of license fees, for police purposes, from the owners or lessees of certain vehicles of burden or pleasure let for hire, or used in carrying goods or persons for pay; also, from auctioneers or other vendors of merchandise, or articles by outcry or bidding; also, from the owners, occupants or lessees of bowling alleys and billiard tables, for the use of which pay is demanded; and also of all other places of business or amusement conducted for profit. We have changed the relative position of some of the paragraphs, in order to present more clearly the different classes of persons and things subject to the payment of licenses. It will be seen they are: 1st. Persons using vehicles for certain purposes. 2d. Persons pursuing their occupation in a particuliar manner. 3d. Persons keeping for pay, certain places of amusement. The act specifically designating "bowling alleys and billiard tables" only. Then follows the clause: also, all other places of business or amusement conducted for profit" under this, the ordinance in question, has imposed license fees or taxes upon merchants, bankers, brewers, druggists, hotel keepers, and upon persons engaged in many other branches of industry, some of whom have filed this bill. We do not think the act is broad enough to cover these clauses. They are not within its scope and spirit. If the design of the law had been to impose this tax upon every person engaged in carrying on any branch of industry in the city, more certain and specific language would have been used. The fair import of the words used, taken in connection with the kind of property specifically designated and charged is, that "the other places of business or amusements," should be of purpose and character similar to bowling alleys and billiard tables. The ordinance therefore should have been so limited. Such we conceive being the true intent and meaning of the act, the ordinance has no basis upon which to rest, and is necessarily invalid.

Secondly. The penalties imposed by section six of said ordinance, for a failure to pay the license fee, cannot be sustained by authority, nor by sound reason. The ordinance makes no provision for the collection thereof, either by the recovery of a judgment and execution thereon, or by warrant of distress. It gives no authority to levy upon, seize or sell the property of the delinquent for its collection. In case of a failure or neglect to pay, and to procure the proper license within ten days after notice from the mayor, of the amount of the license fee required, it provides only for the imposition of a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, and of imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, or either, at the discretion of the mayor. Thus, not only without any effort to collect the license fee out of the property of the delinquent, but, also, without the issuing of any process to collect the fine imposed, he may be incarcerated in prison. If the unfortunate citizen has permitted the ten days to run past without paying his license, the ordinance closes upon him; no alternative writ issues against him; his offence has been consummated; no payment will save him from prison.

There is nothing in the act of Assembly authorizing the imposition of such a sentence, without an indictment, and without a trial by jury. No authority was cited, no precedent has been found to warrant such action, or to sustain such a proceeding under any similar grant of power. Except for contempt, a trial by jury should precede a sentence to imprisonment.

Holding, then, that the ordinance is unwarranted by the statute, its enforcement should be enjoined; the decree must be reversed, and the relief asked for in the bill be granted.

And now, to wit: May 17th, 1873, this cause having come up by appeal from the decree of the Court of Common Pleas of Luzerne county, dissolving the injunction which it had previously granted, and dismissing the appellant's bill, and having been argued by counsel at Philadelphia; after due consideration thereof, it was ordered adjudged, and decreed as follows, to wit: That the said decree of the Common Pleas be reversed and set aside; and that the said defendant be restrained from proceeding to enforce the payment of the sums of money claimed to have been assessed upon said plaintiffs respectively, as a special tax or license fee, to enable them to prosecute their business in the city of Wilkesbarre; and it is further ordered, that the appellee pay the costs.

BOWER v. McCORMICK.

1. When a plaintiff's demand is over one hundred dollars, he cannot remit a portion, and bring his case within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace.
2. If the plaintiff's demand has been reduced to a sum under one hundred dollars by actual payments, or dealings amounting thereto, a justice has jurisdiction.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Lycoming county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The cases upon the subject of the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, under the act of 1810, when the demand of the plaintiff is reduced by his own abatement below $100, are not wholly free from inconsistency. It seems to be taken for granted in the earlier cases, that a plaintiff can remit a part of his claim, and thereby confer jurisdiction. In Darragh v. Warnock, 1 Penn'a, 21, where a verdict was rendered for $114.99, within six months after the judgment by the justice, this court said: "A plaintiff may, undoubtedly, remit a part of his demand to bring the residue within the jurisdiction of a justice." The counsel, on hearing the opinion, remitted the excess of the verdict at bar, and the court affirmed the judgment. In Cleaden v. Yeates, 5 Wharton, 94, it was said per curiam: "It never has been doubted that a plaintiff may reduce his demand to the standard of a limited jurisdiction by lopping off the excess." A stronger case, perhaps, is Hoffman v. Dawson, 1 Jones, 280. The plaintiff's book account was for $410, on which there were credits to the sum of $310.50, and the demand before the justice was $99.50, This court supported the jurisdiction, on the ground that the actual demand was under $100.

On the other hand, in Stroh v. Ulrich, 1 W. & S. 57, it was decided in very strong terms, that a party cannot confer jurisdiction by giving a credit of $170, of which $100 was on a note or counter-claim. To the same effect is Collins v. Collins, 1 Wright, 387. Woodward, J., there remarked: "If it appear that the plaintiff's demand really exceeded $100, and that he involved the justice in litigation beyond his jurisdiction, by omitting the excess, it is of importance to declare against the jurisdiction, else the defendant's rights may be sacrificed before he is aware of it, as was shown by Judge Rogers, in Stroh v. Ulrich." Perhaps the best statement of the result of the authorities is that made by Justice Woodward in that case, that when the plaintiff's claim is reduced below $100, by direct payments, or dealings which amount to or are admitted to be actual payments, the justice has jurisdiction, but where the claim is not thus reduced by payment, jurisdiction cannot be given by merely remitting a part. And in Evans v. Hall, 9 Wright, 235, Justice Thompson, while holding that interest may be waived, because it is a mere incident, states that no part of the principal can be thrown away in order to give jurisdiction.

Reliance was placed upon these cases in the argument, yet while some analogies may be drawn from them, it is not very clear that they are conclusive as precedents for the case now before us. Here the action was trover for logs claimed by the plaintiff. The act of 1814, giving jurisdiction to justices in trespass and trover, confers it "in all cases where the value of the property claimed, or the damages alleged to be sustained, shall not exceed $100. As the value of goods is a thing having no fixed standard, and depending on circumstances and opinion, it is not easy to see why a plaintiff may not generally fix the value upon his own belief, and ask to recover thereby. If he claim less than others would say is the value, no one is injured but himself. He does not thereby involve the justice in the settlement of demands beyond his jurisdiction, as in Collins v. Collins. Had the plaintiff in this case stated his claim absolutely at the sum of $99.86, without a deduction, it would be difficult to convict the learned judge of error in leaving it to the jury to say whether the plaintiff's demand was made in good faith, and not merely to give jurisdiction. Though the value might seem to be greater, yet an absolute demand, without deduction, for less than $100, may be really in good faith, allowing for the state of the property, the attending circumstances, and the difference of opinions, or other causes influencing the question of value. But in this case the demand was stated on the docket of the justice in these words: "Plaintiff claims the value of one hundred and seven saw logs, measuring twenty thousand three hundred and ten feet, board measure, at $6 per thousand, from which he deducts $22, leaving a balance now claimed of $99.86." Certainly on its face this wears the appearance of a premeditated remission to give jurisdiction. It is not an actual credit, but a mere deduction, without a reason given at the time, or on the trial, why the deduction was made. So far as the evidence discloses, it was a mere throwing off of a part of the value. The logs, at the rate stated by the plaintiff, would have brought $121.86. What makes the case stronger against the plaintiff is, that he testified at the trial that the logs were worth more than he claimed before the justice. In a question of value depending on good faith, we might hesitate to reverse, after a finding of the jury of a sum within the justice's jurisdiction. But we are precluded from even this concession to good faith by the binding instruction of the judge to the jury, that they could not allow more than $100. This left the jury in uncertainty. They could not find a sum over $100, for the instruction not to do so was absolute and unqualified; and they could not find for the defendant, if the evidence showed that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Their only escape was a special verdict, had their ingenuity taught them to perceive it, in which they should find the plaintiff's demand over $100; but for that reason they find for the defendant, on the ground of a want of jurisdiction. In view of the statement of the demand in the transcript, and of the evidence in the case, it seems to us the plaintiff's true demand, as measured by the value of the logs, exceeded $100, and, therefore, that the court erred in submitting the question of jurisdiction in the manner it was submitted to the jury. The verdict itself, shows plainly that the jury, to escape a finding according to actual value, and to keep within the jurisdiction, found precisely the $99.86 stated in the transcript, with interest to the time of the verdict.

Judgment reversed.

WORMAN et al. v. KRAMER.

1. A sale of personal property in the hands of a bailee is good against an execution creditor, though there be no actual delivery, if the vendor do not retake the possession.
2. The mere subsequent employment of the vendor to use the goods, will not in itself stamp the character of a legal fraud upon the sale, if the property were really kept in an open and notorious manner by a third party as bailee.
3. Such an employment of the vendor may raise a question of fact whether or not his possession be concurrent with the bailee, and therefore a fraud in law.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Lehigh county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

This case was tried below on the grounds of fraud in law and fraud in fact, and in the argument the facts bearing on each branch have been somewhat blended. Fraud in law in this case, had relation to a retainer, or a concurrent possession, and not to the intent to hinder and delay creditors, which enters into the question of fraud in fact. It is only by separating the evidence bearing distinctly upon each ground, that we can judge properly of the correctness of the judge's charge. Looking at his charge in this light, we do not discover any good reason to complain of it, except in two respects, which shall be noticed.

On the question of fraud in law, one fact of importance must not be overlooked, to wit, that the actual possession of the property appears to have been in the bailee of Kramer. The coach and horses were kept at Keim and Einstein's livery stable, and on the day of the sale to Kramer he bargained with Einstein to keep the coach, and the horses at hay, at $1.50 per week. In Linton v. Batz, 7 Barr, 89, it was held that a sale of personal property in the hands of a bailee is good against an execution creditor, though there be no actual delivery, if the vendor do not retake the possession. We cannot say, therefore, that there was error in that part of the charge set out in the first assignment of error; read as it must be, with the sentences immediately preceding and succeeding, in which it was left to the jury to say whether there had been an open, visible and notorious transfer of the possession. The mere employment of Beckenstock afterwards as a driver, would not, in itself, stamp the character of a legal fraud upon the sale, if the property was really kept by a third party, as bailee of Kramer, in an open and notorious manner. The facts were for the jury, as to how the coach and horses were kept and for whom; and whether Beckenstock returned into such an immediate and visible possession, as deprived the transaction of that open and notorious character, which would fairly indicate to the public an actual transfer of the possession at the time, and following the sale.

The evidence in this case did raise a serious question as to the openness and the visible character of the possession. The intimate relations Beckenstock sustained to the property, after the sale, raised a question of fact, whether his possession was not, at least, concurrent with that of Kramer, and the defendants were, therefore, entitled to full and clear instructions on that point. In this part of the case the learned judge fell into an error, by his qualification of the instruction, that a concurrent possession exists only where the person in actual possession of the property has some interest in it as a part owner. There was no question as to a part ownership, either as tenants in common or as partners. The sale was out and out, and the question was only upon the possession. The defendants alleged that the possession of the coach and horses, was, at least, mixed or concurrent between Kramer and Beckenstock, and if so, it was insufficient to indicate an open and complete transfer of the possession, and in this view they were entitled to an answer which would not mislead. The concurrent possession alleged, was such as that spoken of by Judge Strong in Brown v. Keller, 7 Wright, 104, where the control and use of the property by the vendor and vendee, were so confused and mixed, as to leave the question of possession uncertain. If that were the kind here, the defendants were entitled to an instruction that the transfer of possession was not such as to protect the sale, no matter how honest and fair. But when the judge defined, a concurrent possession to be one only where there is a part ownership of the property, he narrowed the instruction to the prejudice of the defendants. There was no evidence of a tenancy, either joint or in common, and the jury were, therefore, led away from what was meant by a concurrent possession; that is to say, a mixed or uncertain possession, apparently as much in one as in the other.

We think he erred, also, in refusing to give the defendants any benefit from the offered return of the brown horse, bought by Kramer of Snyder. If, as the evidence tended to show, the constable, after he found he had made a mistake in levying on the horse, as the property of Beckenstock, offered to return him to Kramer, who refused to take him, and the former then returned him to the stable, whence he took him, with notice to, or the knowledge of Kramer, it went in mitigation of damages. It might not atone for the trespass, in the taking, but if the horse were offered back, in as good plight as when taken, and in a reasonable time, clearly it was the duty of Kramer to receive him, unless he could show a good reason for not doing so. For these reasons the judgment is reversed, and a venire facias de novo is awarded.

BUTCHERS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION OF NEW ORLEANS, v. THE CRESCENT CITY LIVE-STOCK LANDING AND SLAUGHTER-HOUSE COMPANY.

RUCH et al., THE LIVE STOCK DEALERS' AND BUTCHERS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW ORLEANS, and CHARLES CAVAROC v. THE STATE OF LOUISIANA.

THE BUTCHERS' BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION OF NEW ORLEANS v. THE CRESCENT CITY LIVE-STOCK LANDING, AND SLAUGHTER-HOUSE COMPANY.

1. The jurisdiction and duty of the Supreme Court of the United States to review a judgment of the highest court of a State violating the thirteenth or fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, is clear and imperative.
2. Matters of police regulation are within the exclusive control of the States respectively.
3. Wherever a Legislature has the right to accomplish a certain result, it has a right to create a corporation and endow it with the powers necessary to effect the purpose desired.
4. The Supreme Court of the United States cannot review a decision of a State Court as to the construction of the constitution of that State.
5. The only design of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution of the United States, was the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him. They forbid slavery in any form, or of any race, but have no immediate relation to the rights of property.
6. By the fourteenth amendment, a person may be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State. He must reside within the State to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born in the United States and under its jurisdiction, or to be naturalized, to be a citizen of the Union. He can of his own volition, by a bona fide residence therein, become a citizen of any State of the Union, with the same rights as other citizens of that State
7. Privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, distinguished from those of citizens of a State.
8. An act of a Legislature conferring a monopoly upon a corporation, for the better effecting a police regulation, and to which all the citizens of the State are subject, is not contrary to the United States Constitution, or its amendments.

In error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

These cases are brought here by writs of error to the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana.

They arise out of the efforts of the butchers of New Orleans to resist the Crescent City Live-Stock Landing and Slaughter-house Company in the exercise of certain powers conferred by the charter which created it, and which was granted by the Legislature of that State.

The cases named above, with others which have been brought here and dismissed by agreement, were all decided by the Supreme Court of Louisiana in favor of the slaughter-house company, as we shall hereafter call it, for the sake of brevity, and these writs are brought to reverse those decisions.

The records were filed in this court in 1870, and were argued before it at length on a motion made by plaintiffs in error for an order in the nature of an injunction or supersedeas, pending the action of the court on the merits. The opinion on that motion is reported in 10 Wallace, 273.

On account of the importance of the questions involved in these cases, they were, by permission of the court, taken up out of their order on the docket, and argued in January, 1872. At that hearing one of the justices was absent, and it was found, on consultation, that there was a diversity of views among those who were present. Impressed with the gravity of the questions raised in the argument, the court, under these circumstances, ordered that the cases be placed on the calendar and reargued before a full bench. This argument was had early in February last.

Preliminary to the consideration of those questions is a motion by the defendant to dismiss the cases, on the ground that the contest between the parties has been adjusted by an agreement made since the records came into this court, and that part of that agreement is that these writs should be dismissed. This motion was heard with the argument on the merits, and was much pressed by counsel. It is supported by affidavits and by copies of the written agreement relied on. It is sufficient to say of these that we do not find in them satisfactory evidence that the agreement is binding upon all the parties to the record who are named as plaintiffs in the several writs of error, and that there are parties now before the court, in each of the three cases at the head of this opinion, who have not consented to their dismissal, and who are not bound by the action of those who have so consented. They have a right to be heard, and the motion to dismiss cannot prevail.

The records show that the plaintiffs in error relied upon, and asserted throughout the entire course of the litigation in the State courts that the grant of privileges in the charter of defendant, which they were contesting, was a violation of the most important provisions of the thirteenth and fourteenth articles of amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The jurisdiction and the duty of this court to review the judgment of the State court on those questions is clear and is imperative.

The statute thus assailed as unconstitutional was passed March 8th, 1869, and is entitled "An act to protect the health of the city of New Orleans, to locate the stock-landings and slaughter-houses, and to incorporate the Crescent City Live-stock Landing and Slaughter-house Company."

The first section forbids the landing or slaughtering of animals whose flesh is intended for food within the city of New Orleans and other parishes and boundaries named and defined, or the keeping or establishing any slaughter-houses or abbatoirs within those limits except by the corporation thereby created, which is also limited to certain places afterwards mentioned. Suitable penalties are enacted for violations of this prohibition.

The second section designates the corporators, gives the name to the corporation, and confers on it the usual corporate powers.

The third and fourth sections authorize the company to establish and erect within certain territorial limits, therein defined, one or more stock-yards, stock-landings, and slaughter-houses, and imposes upon it the duty of erecting, on or before the first day of June, 1869, one grand slaughter-house of sufficient capacity for slaughtering five hundred animals per day.

It declares that the company, after it shall have prepared all the necessary buildings, yards, and other conveniences for that purpose, shall have the sole and exclusive privilege of conducting and carrying on the live-stock, landing, and slaughter-house business within the limits and privileges granted by the act, and that all such animals shall be landed at the stock-landings, and slaughtered at the slaughter-houses of the company, and nowhere else. Penalties are enacted for infractions of this provision, and prices fixed for the maximum charges of the company for each steamboat and for each animal landed.

Section five orders the closing up of all other stock-landings and slaughter-houses after the first day of June, in the parishes of Orleans, Jefferson, and St. Bernard, and makes it the duty of the company to permit any person to slaughter animals in their slaughter-houses, under a heavy penalty for each refusal. Another section fixes a limit to the charges to be made by the company for each animal so slaughtered in their building, and another provides for an inspection of all animals intended to be so slaughtered, by an officer appointed by the governor of the State for that purpose.

These are the principal features of the statute, and are all that have any bearing upon the questions to be decided by us.

This statute is denounced not only as creating a monopoly and conferring odious and exclusive privileges upon a small number of persons at the expense of the great body of the community of New Orleans, but it is asserted that it deprives a large and meritorious class of citizens—the whole of the butchers of the city—of the right to exercise their trade, the business to which they have been trained and on which they depend for the support of themselves and their families; and that the unrestricted exercise of the business of butchering is necessary to the daily subsistence of the population of the city.

But a critical examination of the act hardly justifies these assertions.

It is true that it grants, for a period of twenty-five years, exclusive privileges. And whether those privileges are at the expense of the community in the sense of a curtailment of any of their fundamental rights, or even in the sense of doing them an injury, is a question open to considerations to be hereafter stated. But it is not true that it deprives the butchers of the right to exercise their trade, or imposes upon them any restriction incompatible with its successful pursuit, or furnishing the people of the city with the necessary daily supply of animal food.

The act divides itself into two main grants of privilege—the one in reference to stock-landings and stock-yards, and the other to slaughter-houses. That the landing of live-stock in large droves, from steamboats on the bank of the river, and from railroad trains, should, for the safety and comfort of the people and care of the animals, be limited to proper places, and those not numerous, needs no argument to prove it. Nor can it be injurious to the general community that while the duty of making ample preparation for this is imposed upon a few men, or a corporation, they should, to enable them to do it successfully, have the exclusive right of providing such landing places, and receiving a fair compensation for the service.

It is, however, the slaughter-house privilege which is mainly relied on to justify the charge of gross injustice to the public, and invasion of private right.

It is not, and it cannot be successfully controverted, that it is both the right and the duty of the legislative body—the supreme power of the State or the municipality—to prescribe and determine the localities where the business of slaughtering for a great city may be conducted. To do this effectively it is indispensable that all persons who slaughter animals for food shall do it in those places and nowhere else.

The statute under consideration defines these localities, and forbids slaughtering in any other. It does not, as has been asserted, prevent the butcher from doing his own slaughtering. On the contrary, the slaughter-house company is required, under a heavy penalty, to permit any person who wishes to do so, to slaughter in their houses; and they are bound to make ample provision for the convenience of all the slaughtering for the entire city. The butcher, then, is still permitted to slaughter, to prepare, and to sell his own meats; but he is required to slaughter at a specified place, and to pay a reasonable compensation for the use of the accommodations furnished him at that place.

The wisdom of the monopoly granted by the Legislature may be open to question, but it is difficult to see a justification for the assertion that the butchers are deprived of the right to labor in their occupation, or the people of their daily service in preparing food, or how this statute, with the duties and guards imposed upon the company, can be said to destroy the business of the butcher, or seriously interfere with its pursuit.

The power here exercised by the Legislature of Louisiana is, in its essential nature, one which has been, up to the present period in the constitutional history of this country, always conceded to belong to the States, however it may now be questioned in some of its details.

"Unwholesome trades, slaughter-houses, operations offensive to the senses, the deposit of powder, the application of steam power to propel cars, the building with combustible materials, and the burial of the dead, may all," says Chancellor Kent 2 Commentaries, 340, "be interdicted by law in the midst of dense masses of population, on the general and rational principle that every person ought so to use his property as not to injure his neighbor's; and that private interests must be made subservient to the general interests of the community." This is called the police power, and it is declared by Chief Justice Shaw, that it is much easier to perceive and realize the existence and sources of it than to mark its boundaries, or prescribe limits to its exercise. Commonwealth v. Alger, 7 Cushing, 84.

This power is, and must be, from its very nature, incapable of any very exact definition or limitation. Upon it depends the security of social order, the life and health of the citizen, the comfort of an existence in a thickly populated community, the enjoyment of private and social life, and the beneficial use of property. "It extends," says another eminent judge, "to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the State; * * * and persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the State. Of the perfect right of the Legislature to do this no question ever was, or, upon acknowledged general principles, ever can be made, so far as natural persons are concerned." Thorpe v. Rutland and Burlington R. R. Co., 27 Vermont R. 149.

The regulation of the place and manner of conducting the slaughtering of animals, and the business of butchering within a city, and the inspection of the animals to be killed for meat, and of the meat afterwards, are among the most necessary and frequent exercises of this power. It is not, therefore, needed that we should seek for a comprehensive definition, but rather look for the proper source of its exercise.

In Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 203, Chief Justice Marshall, speaking of the inspection laws passed by the States, says: "They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which controls everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the general government—all which can be most advantageously administered by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, etc., are component parts. No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress; and consequently they remain subject to State legislation."

The exclusive authority of State legislation over this subject is strikingly illustrated in the case of the City of New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. 102. In that case the defendant was prosecuted for failing to comply with the statute of New York, which required of every master of a vessel arriving from a foreign port, in that of New York city, to report the names of all his passengers, with certain particulars of their age, occupation, last place of settlement, and place of their birth. It was argued that this act was an invasion of the exclusive right of Congress to regulate commerce. And it cannot be denied that such a statute operated at least indirectly upon the commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and of foreign countries. But notwithstanding this, it was held to be an exercise of the police power, properly within the control of the State, and unaffected by the clause of the Constitution, which conferred on Congress the right to regulate commerce.

To the same purpose are the recent cases of The License Tax, 5 Wall. 741, and United States v. DeWitt, 9 Wall. 41. In the latter case, an act of Congress which undertook as a part of the internal revenue laws, to make it a misdemeanor to mix for sale naptha and illuminating oils, or to sell oil of petroleum inflammable at less than a prescribed temperature, was held to be void, because, as a police regulation, the power to make such a law belonged to the States, and did not belong to Congress.

It cannot be denied that the statute under consideration is aptly framed to remove from the more densely populated part of the city, the noxious slaughter-houses, and large and offensive collection of animals necessarily incident to the slaughtering business of a large city, and to locate them where the convenience, health, and comfort of the people require they shall be located. And it must be conceded that the means adopted by the act for this purpose are appropriate, are stringent, and effectual. But it is said that in creating a corporation for this purpose, and conferring upon it exclusive privileges—privileges which it is said constitute a monopoly—the Legislature has exceeded its power. If this statute had imposed on the city of New Orleans precisely the same duties, accompanied by the same privileges, which it has on the corporation which it created, it is believed that no question would have been raised as to its constitutionality. In that case the effect on the butchers in pursuit of their occupation and on the public would have been the same as it is now. Why cannot the Legislature confer the same powers on another corporation, created for a lawful and useful public object, that it can on the municipal corporation already existing? That wherever a Legislature has the right to accomplish a certain result, and that result is best attained by means of a corporation, it has the right to create such a corporation, and to endow it with the powers necessary to effect the desired and lawful purpose, seems hardly to admit of debate. The position is ably discussed and affirmed in the case of McCulloch v. The State of Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 316, in relation to the power of Congress to organize the Bank of the United States to aid in the fiscal operations of the government.

It can readily be seen that the interested vigilance of the corporation created by the Louisiana Legislature will be more efficient in enforcing the limitation prescribed for the stock-landing and slaughtering business for the good of the city, than the ordinary efforts of the officers of the law.

Unless, therefore, it can be maintained that the exclusive privilege granted by this charter to the corporation is beyond the power of the Legislature of Louisiana, there can be no just exception to the validity of the statute. And in this respect we are not able to see that these privileges are especially odious or objectionable. The duty imposed as a consideration for the privilege is well defined, and its enforcement well guarded. The prices or charges to be made by the company are limited by the statute, and we are not advised that they are on the whole exorbitant or unjust.

The proposition is, therefore, reduced to these terms: Can any exclusive privileges be granted to any of its citizens, or to a corporation, by the Legislature of a State?

The eminent and learned counsel who has twice argued the negative of this question, has displayed a research into the history of monopolies in England, and the European continent, only equalled by the eloquence with which they are denounced.

But it is to be observed that all such references are to monopolies established by the monarch in derogation of the rights of his subjects, or arise out of transactions in which the people were unrepresented, and their interests uncared for. The great case of The Monopolies, reported by Coke, and so fully stated in the brief, was undoubtedly a contest of the commons against the monarch. The decision is based upon the ground that it was against common law, and the argument was aimed at the unlawful assumption of power by the crown; for whoever doubted the authority of Parliament to change or modify the common law? The discussion in the House of Commons cited from Macaulay clearly establishes that the contest was between the crown and the people represented in Parliament.

But we think it may be safely affirmed, that the Parliament of Great Britain, representing the people in their legislative functions, and the legislative bodies of this country, have from time immemorial to the present day, continued to grant to persons and corporations exclusive privileges—privileges denied to other citizens—privileges which come within any just definition of the word monopoly, as much as those now under consideration; and that the power to do this has never been questioned or denied. Nor can it be truthfully denied, that some of the most useful and beneficial enterprises set on foot for the general good, have been made successful by means of these exclusive rights, and could only have been conducted to success in that way.

It may, therefore, be considered as established, that the authority of the Legislature of Louisiana to pass the present statute is ample, unless some restraint in the exercise of that power be found in the constitution of that State or in the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, adopted since the date of the decisions we have already cited.

If any such restraint is supposed to exist in the constitution of the State, the Supreme Court of Louisiana having necessarily passed on that question, it would not be open to review in this court.

Plaintiffs in error accepting this issue, allege that the statute is a violation of the Constitution of the United States in these several particulars:

That it creates an involuntary servitude forbidden by the thirteenth article of amendment.

That it abridges the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States.

That it denies to the plaintiffs the equal protection of the laws; and

That it deprives them of their property without due process of law; contrary to the provisions of the first section of the fourteenth article of amendment.

This court is thus called upon for the first time to give construction to these articles.

We do not conceal from ourselves the great responsibility which this duty devolves upon us. No questions so far-reaching and pervading in their consequences, so profoundly interesting to the people of this country, and so important in their bearing upon the relations of the United States and of the several States to each other and to the citizens of the States and of the United States, have been before this court during the official life of any of its present members. We have given every opportunity for a full hearing at the bar; we have discussed it freely and compared views among ourselves; we have taken ample time for careful deliberation, and we now propose to announce the judgments which we have formed in the construction of those articles, so far as we have found them necessary to the decision of the cases before us, and beyond that we have neither the inclination nor the right to go.

Twelve articles of amendment were added to the Federal Constitution soon after the original organization of the government under it in 1789. Of these all but the last were adopted so soon afterwards as to justify the statement that they were practically cotemporaneous with the adoption of the original; and the twelfth, adopted in 1803, was so nearly so as to have become, like all the others, historical and of another age. But within the last eight years three other articles of amendment of vast importance have been added, by the voice of the people to that now venerable instrument. The most cursory glance at these articles discloses a unity of purpose, when taken in connection with the history of the times, which cannot fail to have an important bearing on any question of doubt concerning their true meaning. Nor can such doubts, when any reasonably exist, be safely and rationally solved without a reference to that history; for in it is found the occasion and the necessity for recurring again to the great source of power in this country, the people of the States, for additional guarantees of human rights; additional powers to the Federal Government; additional restraints upon those of the States. Fortunately that history is fresh within the memory of us all, and its leading features, as they bear upon the matter before us, free from doubt.

The institution of African slavery, as it existed in about half the States of the Union, and the contests pervading the public mind for many years, between those who desired its curtailment and ultimate extinction, and those who desired additional safeguards for its security and perpetuation, culminated in the effort, on the part of most of the States in which slavery existed, to separate from the Federal Government, and to resist its authority. This constituted the war of the rebellion, and whatever auxiliary causes may have contributed to bring about this war, undoubtedly the overshadowing and efficient cause was African slavery.

In that struggle, slavery, as a legalized social relation, perished. It perished as a necessity of the bitterness and force of the conflict. When the armies of freedom found themselves upon the soil of slavery, they could do nothing less than free the poor victims whose enforced servitude was the foundation of the quarrel. And when hard pressed in the contest, these men (for they proved themselves men in that terrible crisis) offered their services, and were accepted by thousands to aid in suppressing the unlawful rebellion, slavery was at an end wherever the Federal Government succeeded in that purpose. The proclamation of President Lincoln expressed an accomplished fact as to a large portion of the insurrectionary districts, when he declared slavery abolished in them all. But the war being over, those who had succeeded in re-establishing the authority of the Federal Government were not content to permit this great act of emancipation to rest on the actual results of the contest or the proclamation of the Executive, both of which might have been questioned in after times, and they determined to place this main and most valuable result in the Constitution of the restored Union as one of its fundamental articles. Hence the thirteenth article of amendment of that instrument. Its two short sections seem hardly to admit of construction, so vigorous is their expression and so appropriate to the purpose we have indicated.

1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

To withdraw the mind from the contemplation of this grand yet simple declaration of the personal freedom of all the human race within the jurisdiction of this government—a declaration designed to establish the freedom of four millions of slaves—and with a microscopic search endeavor to find in it a reference to servitudes which may have been attached to property in certain localities, requires an effort, to say the least of it.

That a personal servitude was meant is proved by the use of the word "involuntary," which can only apply to human beings. The exception of servitude as a punishment for crime gives an idea of the class of servitude that is meant. The word servitude is of larger meaning than slavery, as the latter is popularly understood in this country, and the obvious purpose was to forbid all shades and conditions of African slavery. It was very well understood that in the form of apprenticeship for long terms, as it had been practiced in the West India Islands, on the abolition of slavery by the English Government, or by reducing the slaves to the condition of serfs attached to the plantation, the purpose of the article might have been evaded if only the word slavery had been used. The case of the apprentice slave, held under a law of Maryland, liberated by Chief Justice Chase, on a writ of habeas corpus under this article, illustrates this course of observation. Matter of Turner, 1 Abbott U. S. R. 84. And it is all that we deem necessary to say on the application of that article to the statute of Louisiana now under consideration.

The process of restoring to their proper relations with the Federal Government and with the other States those which had sided with the rebellion, undertaken under the proclamation of President Johnson in 1865, and before the assembling of Congress, developed the fact that, notwithstanding the formal recognition by those States of the abolition of slavery, the condition of the slave race would, without further protection of the Federal Government, be almost as bad as it was before. Among the first acts of legislation adopted by several of the States in the legislative bodies which claimed to be in their normal relations with the Federal Government, were laws which imposed upon the colored race onerous disabilities and burdens, and curtailed their rights in the pursuit of life, liberty and property to such an extent that their freedom was of little value, while they had lost the protection which they had received from their former owners from motives both of interest and humanity.

They were in some States forbidden to appear in the towns in any other character than menial servants. They were required to reside on and cultivate the soil without the right to purchase or own it. They were excluded from many occupations of gain, and were not permitted to give testimony in the courts in any case where a white man was a party. It was said that their lives were at the mercy of bad men, either because the laws for their protection were insufficient or were not enforced.

These circumstances, whatever of false hood or misconception may have been mingled with their presentation, forced upon the statesmen who had conducted the Federal Government in safety through the crisis of the rebellion, and who supposed that by the thirteenth article of amendment they had secured the result of their labors, the conviction that something more was necessary in the way of constitutional protection to the unfortunate race who had suffered so much. They accordingly passed through Congress the proposition for the fourteenth amendment, and they declined to treat as restored to their full participation in the government of the Union the States which had been in insurrection until they ratified that article by a formal vote of their legislative bodies.

Before we proceed to examine more critically the provisions of this amendment, on which the plaintiffs in error rely, let us complete and dismiss the history of the recent amendments, as that history relates to the general purpose which pervades them all. A few years' experience satisfied the thoughtful men who had been the authors of the other two amendments that, notwithstanding the restraints of those articles on the States, and the laws passed under the additional powers granted to Congress, these were inadequate for the protection of life, liberty, and property, without which freedom to the slave was no boon. They were in all those States denied the right of suffrage. The laws were administered by the white man alone. It was urged that a race of men distinctively marked as was the negro, living in the midst of another and dominant race, could never be fully secured in their person and their property without the right of suffrage.

Hence the fifteenth amendment, which declares that "the right of a citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." The negro having, by the fourteenth amendment, been declared to be a citizen of the United States, is thus made a voter in every State of the Union.

We repeat, then, in the light of this recapitulation of events, almost too recent to be called history, but which are familiar to us all; and on the most casual examination of the language of these amendments, no one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in them all, lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have been even suggested; we mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly-made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him. It is true that only the fifteenth amendment, in terms, mentions the negro by speaking of his color and his slavery. But it is just as true that each of the other articles was addressed to the grievances of that race, and designed to remedy them, as the fifteenth.

We do not say that no one else but the negro can share in this protection. Both the language and spirit of these articles are to have their fair and just weight in any question of construction. Undoubtedly while negro slavery alone was in the mind of the Congress which proposed the thirteenth article, it forbids any other kind of slavery, now or hereafter. If Mexican peonage or the Chinese cooley labor system shall develop slavery of the Mexican or Chinese race within our territory, this amendment may safely be trusted to make it void. And so if other rights are assailed by the States, which properly and necessarily fall within the protection of these articles, that protection will apply, though the party interested may not be of African descent. But what we do say and what we wish to be understood is, that in any fair and just construction of any section or phrase of these amendments, it is necessary to look to the purpose which we have said was the pervading spirit of them all, the evil which they were designed to remedy, and the process of continued addition to the constitution, until that purpose was supposed to be accomplished, as far as constitutional law can accomplish it.

The first section of the fourteenth article, to which our attention is more specially invited, opens with a definition of citizenship; not only citizenship of the United States, but citizenship of the States. No such definition was previously found in the Constitution, nor had any attempt been made to define it by act of Congress. It had been the occasion of much discussion in the courts, by the executive departments, and in the public journals. It had been said by eminent judges that no man was a citizen of the United States, except as he was a citizen of one of the States composing the Union. Those, therefore, who had been born and resided always in the District of Columbia or in the territories, though within the United States, were not citizens. Whether this proposition was sound or not, had never been judicially decided. But it had been held by this court, in the celebrated Dred Scott case only a few years before the outbreak of the civil war, that a man of African descent, whether a slave or not, was not and could not be a citizen of a State or of the United States. This decision, while it met the condemnation of some of the ablest statesmen and constitutional lawyers of the country, had never been overruled, and if it was to be accepted as a constitutional limitation of the right of citizenship, then all the negro race who had recently been made freemen, were still not only not citizens, but were incapable of becoming so by anything short of an amendment to the Constitution.

To remove this difficulty primarily, and to establish a clear and comprehensive definition of citizenship, which should declare what should constitute citizenship of the United States, and also citizenship of a State, the first clause of the first section was framed.

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside."

The first observation that we have to make on this clause, is that it puts at rest both the questions which we stated to have been the subject of differences of opinion. It declares that persons may be citizens of the United States, without regard to their citizenship of a particular State, and it overturns the Dred Scott

THEODORE F. JENKINS,
ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

Colonel Edward Campbell, who was appointed president judge of the fourteenth judicial district, composed of the counties of Fayette and Greene, was born in Uniontown, on the 24thof July, 1838; read law with Hon. Nathaniel Ewing, and was admitted to the Fayette county bar in September, 1859. He enlisted as a private soldier in the "three months service," in April 1861, re-enlisted in September, 1861; remained in the service during three years; was promoted to the lieutenant colonelcy of the 85th Regiment Penna. Volunteers, and was honorably discharged December, 1864. He resumed the practice of law in June, 1865, since which time he has given his entire attention to his profession. His appointment was made by Governor Hartranft on Friday, May 30th, 1873, and will continue in force until next December. We hope to have the pleasure of publishing some of Judge Campbell's opinions, so that our readers may judge for themselves as to the legal ability of the new incumbent.

Immediately after the opening of the court at Uniontown, upon the 2d inst. and the reading of Judge Campbell's commission, C. E. Boyle, Esq., read the resolutions lately passed by the members of the bar, in relation to the death of Judge Gilmore, and asked that they be spread upon the minutes of the court. A. E. Wilson, Esq., then delivered an eulogy on the character of Judge Gilmore as an upright and moral man, and a learned, honest, impartial and faithful judicial officer. All was summed up in this comprehensive sentence: "Judge Gilmore's aim was to find out the right, and do it." Mr. Wilson was followed in a few pertinent remarks by G. W. K. Minor, Daniel Downer and Wm. Parshall, Esqs., all of whom bore testimony to the honesty, ability and integrity of the deceased judge. All agreed with Mr. Downer in the happy expression that "Judge Gilmore's honesty, ability, and impartiality were known, admitted, and admired by all who knew him."

Chief Justice Read's term expires this year, and already there are numerous persons talked of as his probable successor, it being understood that the Chief Justice declines a nomination. On the Republican side, Judge Paxson, of Philadelphia, Judge Butler, of Chester, and Judge Williams, of Tioga, are named; and on the Democratic side, we hear of Judge Ross, of Montgomery, Judge Elwell, of Columbia, Judge Trunkey, of Mercer, Ex-Chief Justice Thompson, and Hon. Silas Clarke, of Indiana.

THE BOROUGH OF WARREN v. DAUM.

1. A resolution by borough authorities to levy a tax to pay bounties for volunteers, is not an offer to pay bounties.
2. The mere fact of a volunteer upon re-enlistment declaring himself to be a resident of a certain county, is no evidence that he intended to help fill the quota of that county and will not support an action for bounty.
3. When one seeks to establish a contract predicated upon a general proposal, he must show that the party making the proposal received notice of his acceptance.

Error to the Common Pleas of Warren county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The learned judge put this case upon the true ground when he said to the jury, "the right of the plaintiff to recover depends entirely upon whether or not a valid contract exists between him and the defendant." Such being the law of the case, the well recognized rules of evidence necessary to establish a contract, must be applied.

We are unable to discover in the resolution of 11th February, 1864, any evidence that the Borough of Warren offered a bounty to volunteers. It merely declared that the authorities would levy a tax sufficient for that general purpose. It was an act between the borough authorities and the tax-payers only. It was no offer to volunteers. It is true, it contemplated that the fund should subsequently be used in procuring volunteers at such prices as might be agreed upon, not exceeding three hundred dollars. It gave no one any right to say, I will enlist, and you shall pay me three hundred dollars. That the authorities so understood it, is shown by the fact that upon each, the 13th and 22d February, 1864, they passed a resolution to issue bonds for the same purpose. The passage of these resolutions was the first step towards putting the borough in a condition to justify it in offering bounties. It was providing the funds in advance of their appropriation. The making of contracts with persons to enlist, is entirely a different matter. To hold that this resolution offered a bounty to volunteers, is to extend it beyond its true scope and meaning. It did not, as was said in Foulke v. West Bethlehem Township, 3 P. F. Smith, 221, ex proprio vigore, it did not impose a liability upon the borough to pay any bounty. The first assignment of error is therefore sustained.

The other assignments of error may be considered together.

It appears by the muster roll that when Daum was mustered into service on the 29th February, 1864, at Martinsburg, Va., he declared his residence to be "Warren, Warren county, Pennsylvania." There is no evidence that he, at the time of his re-enlistment, said or did anything indicating an intention to enlist to help fill the quota of the plaintiff, or to be credited thereto. The evidence is that he first gave notice of any such claim a short time before the commencement of this suit; which was in January, 1871. It is true, the second section of the act of May 1st, 1866, P. L. 114, provides that "the place of residence named in the re-enlistment and muster-in-rolls shall, in the absence of other evidence, be considered the place of credit." This act, passed more than two years after his re-enlistment, throws no light upon his actual intention at the time of said re-enlistment. If the transaction, at the time, lacked the ingredients essentially necessary to create the contract relation, this subsequent act of Assembly could not create one which would be obligatory upon the parties.

The learned judge thought the jury, judging of Daum's human nature by that of other human beings, might infer that he re-enlisted for a bounty, to be paid by some locality, and in the absence of any evidence that he re-enlisted for any other place, they might infer he enlisted to the credit of the Borough of Warren. This is carrying the doctrine of presumption too far. It is building upon a too uncertain foundation. The result is, that the superstructure is as shadowy as the base upon which it rests. With much stronger probability, it might be said, that the reasonable and ordinary workings of the human mind would have induced him to have informed the defendant within less than six years, of some fact indicating a real or pretended claim.

The evidence shows that the borough authorities never made any contract with Daum personally; that he did not notify them that he would accept, or had accepted the general offer which they had made; they had no notice of his enlistment; they filled their quotas with other men, and never received any credit or allowance for Daum. The act of his re-enlistment, remote from the defendant below, did not carry any notice of itself. Upon general principles, when one seeks to establish a contract predicated upon a general proposal made by the other party, he must show that the one making the proposal was duly notified of the acceptance thereof. Notice of this acceptance is necessary, even when a distinct proposition is made by one to another. Emerson v. Graff, 5 Casey, 358. We see nothing in this case to take it out of the general rule. Washington County v. Berwick, 6 P. F. Smith, 466; Brecknock School District v. Frankhouser, 8 P. F. Smith, 380. The errors are sustained.

Judgment reversed.

HAFFEY v. CAREY.

1. A married woman may mortgage her real estate to secure a future indebtedness of her husband.
2. It is not necessary that such a mortgage should be acknowledged according to the act of April 11th, 1848. An acknowledgment in conformity to the law enabling a married woman to pass her estate before that, is sufficient.
3. Moon v. Conell, 18 P. F. Smith, 320, explained.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of McKean county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

It is well settled that a married woman may mortgage her estate for her husband's benefit, or to secure the payment of his debts. Hoover v. The Samaritan Society, 4 Whar. 445; Black v. Galway, 12 Harris, 18; Miner v. Graham, Ibid, 491; Lytle's Appeal, 12 Casey, 131. This being so, there is no reason why she may not do so to secure future as well as existing indebtedness. Lyle v. Ducomb, 5 Binn. 585. Indeed, in point of policy, there are considerations in favor of the latter which cannot be urged for the former. The wife's property being thus pledged to secure credit for her husband. may enable him to engage in business, and by his enterprise and industry make a good living both for him and her, and their family. Nor is it necessary that the provision of the act of April 11th, 1848, Pamp. L. 533, as to the acknowledgment of the mortgage, should be observed. An acknowledgment in conformity to the law, before that, to enable a married woman to pass her estate, is sufficient, as has been more than once decided and confirmed by the act of Assembly of April 9th, 1849, Pamp. L. 526; April 18th, 1853, Pamp. L. 573; April 11th, 1856, Pamp. L. 315; Miner v. Graham, 12 Harris, 491; Shinn v. Holmes, 1 Casey. 142; Stoops v. Blackford, 3 Ibid, 213. It was not intended in Moore v. Cornell, 18 P. F. Smith, 320, to depart in the least from these authorities, or to hold that in an assignment of a wife's mortgage, by husband and wife, it was necessary that the acknowledgment should be in any other form, or before any other officer than is required in any other case where the contract of a married woman in realty is to be bound or transferred. The act of April 11th, 1848, provides that the property of a married woman shall not be sold, conveyed, mortgaged, transferred, or in any other manner encumbered by her husband, without her written consent first had and obtained, and duly acknowledged before one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas of this commonwealth, that such consent was not the result of coercion on the part of her said husband, but that the same was voluntarily given, and of her own free will. This provision has no application, whether in the transfer of real and personal estate of the wife, when the husband and wife unite in the execution of the transfer, but the law remains as it stood before the passage of the act of 1848.

Judgment affirmed.

CONWAY v. HALSTEAD.

1. The act of February 24th, 1806, authorizes a prothonotary to enter judgment on a warrant of confession, only for the amount which from the face of the instrument may appear to be due, or which may be ascertained by calculation from the face of the writing.
2. If it is necessary to ascertain a fact dehors the instrument, the prothonotary cannot enter judgment.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Susquehanna county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

By the act of 24th February, 1806, Brightly's Purdon, 577, pl. 32, it is made the duty of the prothonotary upon the application of the holder of a bond or other instrument containing a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, "to enter judgment against the person or persons who executed the same, for the amount, which on the face of the instrument may appear to be due," &c. This act does not confer upon the prothonotary all the power of an attorney at law to confess a judgment, but only authorizes him without the agency of an attorney, to enter a judgment in the way specified in the act, to wit: for the amount which from the face of the instrument may appear to be due. This would probably embrace a case where the sum due can be ascertained by calculation from the face of the writing, upon the maxim, id certum est quod certum reddi potest." But in this case the sum or amount due could by no possible calculation be made to appear from the face of the instrument. It was an agreement for the sale of a tract of land by loosely stated boundaries, and no quantity stated. The price was to be at the rate of ten dollars an acre, and the number of acres was to be ascertained by a survey. Until the number should be thus determined, a matter wholly outside of the face of the paper, the amount of the purchase money could not be known. The prothonotary had no guide, therefore, in entering the judgment. In fixing the sum, he must rely upon evidence outside of the writing; and this would not be according to the letter or spirit of the act, which intended that a judgment should be entered only on the acknowledgment of the party himself contained in the writing. It is evident the law did not intend to make the prothonotary an arbitrator or umpire to determine uncertain things, and to conclude the party by his act; for by entering the judgment the party is brought into court, and the judgment is final and concludes him, unless set aside or reversed. The filing of a survey and the affidavit of the plaintiff, as permitted by the court on hearing the rule to set the judgment aside, did not mend the matter; for at the bottom lay the want of authority in the prothonotary to bring the defendant into court on this writing. His act must be strictly according to the law, and is not like the general authority of an attorney at law, who may appear and confess judgment and arrange the details of the judgment.

Judgment reversed, and the writing ordered to be stricken off the file.

BOLEN v. CONNELLY.

A recovery by the plaintiff in ejectment, upon an equitable title, is good against a vendee of the defendant purchasing lis pendens.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Luzerne county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

Michael Bolen, the plaintiff, bought lis pendens, and therefore with notice; the ejectment of Connelly against Whitmore, to November term, 1865, being indexed according to the requirement of the act of 22d April, 1856. The difficulty he encountered in this action was the fact that Connelly, the plaintiff in that action, and as assignee of Barnard Burns, the vendee of Terrance Timmons, held an equitable title only upon which he recovered, the parol evidence showing that it was the only title he set up. No evidence was given to show that Whitmore, the defendant in that action, and grantor of Bolen, the plaintiff in this, set up any defence, other than non-payment of the purchase money. In this state of the case, the recovery of Connelly in the ejectment of 1865, was final, according to the doctrine of Seitzinger v. Ridgway, 9 Watts, 496, and Peterman v. Hulings, 7 Casey, 432. Had Whitmore in that trial set up the deed from Terrance Timmons to himself as a purchaser for a valuable consideration, and without notice of the sale of Timmons to Barnard Burns, and that he had duly recorded his deed, a different question might have arisen in the trial of this case. But as no such issue was presented and tried in the former ejectment we must presume now that Whitmore failed to set up the defence, because he knew then it would not avail him, and therefore defended against the plaintiff's equity alone.

Bolen, the present plaintiff, standing in privity with Whitmore, and having notice of the pendency of the former ejectment when he bought, stands now in no better situation than Whitmore.

The verdict and judgment in the former ejectment were therefore final, and now estop the plaintiff from setting up a new issue.

Judgment affirmed.

SEIBERT v. KREIBEL et al.

A defendant in an execution claimed an appraisement. The sheriff did not allow it. Before the day of sale the term of the sheriff expired. His successor, upon a new request of the defendant, caused an appraisement to be made on the day of sale, and set apart certain property as exempted. Held, The defendant was not in default. He was therefore entitled to the exemption allowed him.

Appeal from the decree of the Common Pleas of Lehigh county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The auditor making the distribution of the proceeds of the sheriff's sale, found the fact distinctly, that on the day of the levy by the deputy sheriff, Daniel Seibert properly claimed the benefit of the exemption law. The sheriff, from some unexplained cause, omitted to make an appraisement; but on the day of sale, the new sheriff, on the application of the defendant, made the day before, set apart $30.25 of the personal property, and $269.75, to come out of the proceeds of sale of the real estate, the appraisers finding that the real estate could not be divided without prejudice. The auditor allowed the exemption, but the court below set it aside on the ground that the request to appraise came too late. In this, we think the court erred. The fact that Daniel Seibert made claim to the exemption on the day of the levy, is not disputed. The sheriff failed to perform his duty in time, but this was no fault of the defendant in the writ. He could do no more than he did. True, if the sheriff had entirely omitted to allow the exemption, the defendant had his remedy against the sheriff: Marks' Appeal, 10 Casey, 36; Nueman v. Smith, 6 Casey, 264; Wilson v. Ellis, 4 Casey, 238. But when the sheriff finally complied with the claim, and had an appraisement made, why should we encourage litigation, and suffer the officer to be harassed with a suit, when justice can be so easily done, by allowing the defendant his right in this proceeding. It does no injury to the plaintiff in the execution, for the defendant had entitled himself to the exemption by his prompt claim. It would be doing a wrong to the defendant and to the officer to turn the defendant round to his action against the sheriff. Where the sheriff mistakenly or wrongfully allows an appraisement, the plaintiff has an easy remedy by moving the court to set aside the appraisement. But here the defendant has entitled himself to an appraisement, and the sheriff had actually had it made, and there is no reason to withhold the money from the defendant. The decree of the court is, therefore, reversed, the defendant is allowed his exemption, to be paid out of the fund in court, and final distribution is ordered to be made, in accordance with this opinion, and the costs of the appeal are ordered to be paid by the executors of the plaintiff in the execution, out of his estate.

Our thanks are due to P. F. Smith, Esq., State Reporter, for advance sheets of Vol. 20, of his reports. (Vol. 70 Pa. State Reports) We make the following selections from them.]

NAPIER et al. v. DARLINGTON.

1. A lease contained a stipulation that the lessee at the end of the time might have a conveyance of the premises at a specified price; he assigned the lease. Held, that the assignee was entitled to a conveyance.

2. Such stipulation is not merely a personal covenant but a right, which may be transferred to his vendee, and enforced at his election, as if the contract had been absolute.

3. The stipulation was a continuing offer to sell, and when accepted by the lessee, a contract of sale was completed.

4. In an ejectment, the plaintiffs recovered a verdict to be released on the defendant paying into court the sum found as purchase money of the whole tract, to be taken out by the plaintiffs on their filing a deed to the defendant of the premises. The defendant paid in the sum, and the plaintiffs filed a deed purporting to convey the whole tract. It being ascertained that the plaintiffs were the owners but of 2-5, the defendant was allowed to take out 3-5 of the money paid in, and the plaintiffs to file a deed conveying but 2-5.

1. A deed to persons as tenants in common, who are partners, must, as to purchasers of the title and creditors having liens on it, stand as the foundation of their rights and govern in distributing the proceeds of a sale of the title.

2. As to creditors, the effect of such deed cannot be changed by parol evidence, and the land converted into partnership assets; so as to affect the liens of otherwise preferred creditors.

3. As between the partners, a trust may result to the firm and the proceeds of the land be assets of the partnership, when they so treated the title and paid for it from partnership funds.

MATHIAS v. THE SUPERIOR IRON COMPANY.

An iron company made coupon bonds, amounting in all to $300,000, interest payable semi-annually at 8 per cent., and secured them by mortgage to trustees on their real estate; they issued $280,000 of the bonds, $20,000 remaining in their hands. They offered their property for sale by sealed proposals; the sale to be subject to the mortgage of $300,000, due May 1st, 1889, payment of the bid in excess of the mortgage to be made ¼ cash, the remainder in 4 equal annual payments, no bid to be received for less than $566,000, "including the amount of the mortgage." The defendant bid $605,000, and agreed "to pay $300,000 of the company's mortgage-bonds and interest, as and when the same mature," and the balance as stipulated in the offer. His bid was accepted. The company sued defendant for six months' interest on $20,000 of bonds remaining in their hands. Held, that he was liable for interest at 8 per cent., notwithstanding the bonds had not been issued by the company, $300,000 being part of the consideration, and being represented by all the bonds.

decision by making all persons born within the United States, and subject to its jurisdiction, citizens of the United States. That its main purpose was to establish the citizenship of the negro can admit of no doubt. The phrase "subject to its jurisdiction," was intended to exclude from its operation children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign States born within the United States.

The next observation is more important, in view of the arguments of counsel in the present case. It is that the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established. Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the State, to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union.

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States, and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other, and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

We think these distinctions and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those citizens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of plaintiff, rests wholly on the assumption that the citizenship is the same, and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State, that the words citizen of the State should be left out when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to citizens of the United States, in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the State, and what they respectively are we will presently consider, but we wish to state here that it is only the former, which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States, as such, and those belonging to the citizen of the State, as such, the latter must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

The first occurrence of the words privileges and immunities in our constitutional history, is to be found in the fourth of the articles of the old confederation.

It declares "that the better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in this Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States, and the people of each State shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other State, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions and restrictions, as the inhabitants thereof respectively."

In the Constitution of the United States, which superseded the articles of confederation, the corresponding provision is found in section two of the fourth article, in the following words: The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.

There can be but little question that the purpose of both these provisions is the same, and that the privileges and immunities intended are the same in each. In the article of the confederation we have some of these specifically mentioned, and enough perhaps to give some general idea of the class of civil rights meant by the phrase.

Fortunately we are not without judicial construction of this clause of the Constitution. The first and the leading case on the subject is that of Corfield v. Coryel, decided by Mr. Justice Washington in the Circuit Court for the District of Pennsylvania, in 1823. 4 Wash. C. C. R. 371.

"The inquiry," he says, "is what are the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are fundamental; which belong of right to the citizens of all free governments, and which have at all times been enjoyed by citizens of the several States which compose this Union, from the time of their becoming free, independent and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are, it would be more tedious than difficult to enumerate.

"They may all, however, be comprehended under the following general heads: protection by the government, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety, subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the government may prescribe for the general good of the whole."

This definition of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States is adopted in the main by this court in the recent case of Ward v. The State of Maryland, 12 Wallace, 430, while it declines to undertake an authoritative definition beyond what was necessary to that decision. The description, when taken to include others not named, but which are of the same general character, embraces nearly every civil right for the establishment and protection of which organized government is instituted. They are, in the language of Judge Washington, those rights which are fundamental. Throughout his opinion they are spoken of as rights belonging to the individual as a citizen of a State. They are so spoken of in the constitutional provision which he was construing. And they have always been held to be the class of rights which the State governments were created to establish and secure.

In the case of Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wallace, 180, the court, in expounding this clause of the Constitution, says that "the privileges and immunities secured to citizens of each State in the several States, by the provision in question, are those privileges and immunities which are common to the citizens in the latter States under their constitution and laws by virtue of their being citizens."

The constitutional provision there alluded to did not create those rights, which it called privileges and immunities of citizens of the States. It threw around them in that clause no security for the citizen of the State in which they were claimed or exercised. Nor did it profess to control the power of the State governments over the rights of its own citizens.

Its sole purpose was to declare to the several States that whatever those rights, as you grant or establish them to your own citizens, or as you limit or qualify, or impose restrictions on their exercise, the same, neither more nor less, shall be the measure of the rights of citizens of other States within your jurisdiction.

It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority, that up to the adoption of the recent amendments, no claim or pretence was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States and without that of the Federal Government. Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned, from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

All this and more must follow, if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States, in their most ordinary and useful functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction followed by the reversal of the judgments of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in these cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States, on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights, as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument, we admit, is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress, in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when, in fact, it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other, and of both these governments to the people; the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the Legislatures of the States which ratified them.

Having shown that the privileges and immunities relied on in the argument are those which belong to citizens of the States as such, and that they are left to the State governments for security and protection, and not by this article placed under the special care of the Federal Government, we may hold ourselves excused from defining the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States which no State can abridge, until some case involving those privileges may make it necessary to do so.

But lest it should be said that no such privileges and immunities are to be found, if those we have been considering are excluded, we venture to suggest some which owe their existence to the Federal Government, its national character, its Constitution, or its laws.

One of these is well described in the case of Crandell v. Nevada, 6 Wallace, 36. It is said to be the right of the citizen of this great country, protected by implied guarantees of its Constitution, "to come to the seat of government to assert any claim he may have upon that government, to transact any business he may have with it, to seek its protection, to share its offices, to engage in administering its functions. He has the right of free access to its sea-ports, through which all operations of foreign commerce are conducted, to the sub-treasuries, land offices, and courts of justice in the several States." And quoting from the language of Chief Justice Taney in another case, it is said "that for all the great purposes for which the Federal Government was established, we are one people, with one common country, we are all citizens of the United States;" and it is, as such citizens, that their rights are supported in this court in Crandall v. Nevada.

Another privilege of a citizen of the United States is to demand the care and protection of the Federal Government over his life, liberty and property when on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of a foreign government. Of this there can be no doubt, nor that the right depends upon his character as a citizen of the United States. The right to peaceably assemole and petition for redress of grievances, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, are rights of the citizen guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. The right to use the navigable waters of the United States, however they may penetrate the territory of the several States, all rights secured to our citizens by treaties with foreign nations, are dependent upon citizenship of the United States, and not citizenship of a State. One of these privileges is conferred by the very article under consideration. It is that a citizen of the United States can, of his own volition, become a citizen of any State of the Union by a bona fide residence therein, with the same rights as other citizens of that State. To these may be added the rights secured by the thirteenth and fifteenth articles of amendment, and by the other clause of the fourteenth, next to be considered.

But it is useless to pursue this branch of the inquiry, since we are of opinion that the rights claimed by these plaintiffs in error, if they have any existence, are not privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States within the meaning of the clause of the fourteenth amendment under consideration.

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws."

The argument has not been much pressed in these cases that the defendant's charter deprives the plaintiffs of their property without due process of law, or that it denies to them the equal protection of the law. The first of these paragraphs has been in the Constitution since the adoption of the fifth amendment, as a restraint upon the Federal power. It is also to be found in some form of expression in the constitutions of nearly all the States, as a restraint upon the power of the States. This law, then, has practically been the same as it now is during the existence of the government, except so far as the present amendment may place the restraining power over the States in this matter in the hands of the Federal Government.

We are not without judicial interpretation, therefore, both State and national, of the meaning of this clause. And it is sufficient to say that under no construction of that provision that we have ever seen, or any that we deem admissible, can the restraint imposed by the State of Louisiana upon the exercise of their trade by the butchers of New Orleans, be held to be a deprivation of property within the meaning of that provision.

"Nor shall any State deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

In the light of the history of these amendments and the pervading purpose, of them, which we have already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause. The existence of laws in the States where the newly emancipated negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden.

If, however, the States did not conform their laws to its requirements, then, by the fifth section of the article of amendment, Congress was authorized to enforce it by suitable legislation. We doubt very much whether any action of a State not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision. It is so clearly a provision for that race and that emergency, that a strong case would be necessary for its application to any other. But as it is a State that is to be dealt with, and not alone the validity of its laws, we may safely leave that matter until Congress shall have exercised its power, or some case of State oppression, by denial of equal justice in its courts, shall have claimed a decision at our hands. We find no such case in the one before us, and do not deem it necessary to go over the argument again, as it may have relation to this particular clause of the amendment.

In the early history of the organization of the government, its statesmen seem to have divided on the line which should separate the powers of the national government from those of the State governments, and though this line has never been very well defined in public opinion, such a division has continued from that day to this.

The adoption of the first eleven amendments to the Constitution so soon after the original instrument was accepted, shows a prevailing sense of danger at that time from the Federal power. And it cannot be denied that such a jealousy continued to exist with many patriotic men until the breaking out of the late civil war. It was then discovered that the true danger to the perpetuity of the Union was in the capacity of the State organizations to combine and concentrate all the powers of the State, and of contiguous States, for a determined resistance to the general government.

Unquestionably this has given great force to the argument, and added largely to the number of those who believed in the necessity of a strong national government.

But, however pervading this sentiment, and however it may have contributed to the adoption of the amendments we have been considering, we do not see in those amendments any purpose to destroy the main features of the general system. Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war, our statesmen have still believed that the existence of the States with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights—the rights of persons and of property—was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government, though they have thought proper to impose additional limitations on the States and to confer additional power on that of the nation.

But whatever fluctuations may be seen in the history of public opinion on this subject during the period of our national existence, we think it will be found that this court, so far as its functions required, has always held with a steady and an even hand the balance between State and Federal power, and we trust that such may continue to be the history of its relation to that subject so long as it shall have duties to perform which demand of it a construction of the Constitution or of any of its parts.

The judgments of the Supreme Court of Louisiana in these cases are affirmed.

Supreme Court United States.

GUNN v. BARRY.

An exemption law of Georgia, passed several years ago, exempted from execution in favor of each head of a family, "fifty acres of land, and five additional ones for each of his children under the age of 16 years, the land to include the dwelling house and improvements, if the same do not exceed $200," and exempted many other things, chiefly household furniture, wearing apparel, books, family portraits, &c.; the value of which was not limited, and which might vary with different debtors and their families. With that law in force A. obtained a judgment for $531 against B., who had 272½ acres of land, worth $1,300, and had no other property but land worth $100, from which the judgment could be satisfied. In this state of things Georgia having passed an "ordinance of secession," withdrew her senators and representatives from the Congress of the United States, and went into the rebellion. The rebellion being suppressed, but Georgia not being allowed by Congress yet to send senators and representatives to its sessions, Congress passed what was known as the reconstruction act. This act reciting that "no legal State government or adequate protection for life or property now existed in the rebel State of Georgia," authorized the said State to make a constitution, which being submitted to Congress and approved by it, the State should be entitled to representation. The people of the State did accordingly make a new constitution and submit it to Congress. This new constitution provided that "each head of a family should be entitled to a homestead of realty to the value of $2,000 in specie, and personal property to the value of $1,000 in specie, to be valued at the time they are set apart;" and ordained further that—

"No court or ministerial officer in the State shall ever have jurisdiction or authority to enforce any judgment, decree, or execution against said property so set apart, including such improvement as may be made thereon from time to time, except for taxes, money borrowed or expended in the improvement of the homestead, or for the purchase money of the same, and for labor done thereon, or material furnished therefor, or removal of incumbrances thereon."

The constitution with this exemption and these provisions in it was submitted to Congress, which approved part of it and disapproved of other parts; enacting only that after certain changes were made, the State should be entitled to representation. No objection was made to the clauses of exemption or the provisions above quoted. The State of Georgia complied with the requirements of Congress, and a constitution satisfactory to that body being made—these clauses of exemption and the accompanying provisions being in it—the State was declared entitled to representation. Held,

1. That as respected a creditor who had obtained by his judgment a lien on the land which the old exemption secured to him while the new one destroyed it, the law creating the new exemption impaired the obligation of a contract, and was unconstitutional and void.
2. That the fact that the constitution had been made under the special circumstances and in the special way above mentioned, and under the eye of Congress, did not change the case.

Error to the Supreme Court of Georgia; the case being thus:

By a statute of Georgia, passed many years ago, it was enacted that the following property, belonging to a debtor who was the head of a family, should be exempt from levy and sale.

"Fifty acres of land, and five additional ones for each of his children under the age of 16 years, the land to include the dwelling house, if the same and improvements do not exceed $200.

"One farm horse or mule.

"One cow and calf.

"Ten head of hogs.

"Fifty dollars' worth of provision, and five dollars' worth for each additional child.

"Beds, bedding, and common bedsteads sufficient for the family.

"One loom, one spinning-wheel, two pair of cards, and one hundred pounds of lint cotton.

"Common tools of trade for himself and his wife.

"Equipments and arms of a militia soldier and trooper's horse.

"Ordinary cooking utensils and table crockery.

"Wearing apparel of himself and family.

"Family Bible.

"Religious works and school books.

"Family portraits.

"The library of a professionul man not exceeding $300 in value, to be selected by himself."

In 1861, with this statute in existence, the State of Georgia passed what was called "an ordinance of secession" from the United States; and joined in the treason and rebellion against the Federal government into which the slaveholding States, for the most part, entered. Her senators and representatives withdrew from Congress; her State government passed into the hands of persons at war with the United States; and she became one of the States styled "The Confederate States of America;" a confederacy which waged war for several years on the government, and whose insurrection and rebellion the government, on the other hand, sought by force of arms to suppress. The arms of the United States having proved triumphant, the so-called government of the confederate States fell to pieces, and the State of Georgia was left where she had put herself; that is to say, in the hands of traitors and rebels. No senators or represenatives were allowed by the Congress of the United States to come back to its chambers as of old.

In this state of things, in May, 1866, Gunn obtained judgment in one of the courts of the State for $402.30 principal, and $125.60 interest (in all $527.90), against a certain Hart. For what the judgment had been obtained did not appear. Hart had at this time 272½ acres of land, worth $1,300, and the judgment bound it as a lien. He had no other land but one piece worth about $100.

On the 2d of March, 1867, the rebellion being suppressed, but the ancient relation of Georgia to the general government being still, in point of fact, not restored by representation, the Congress of the United States passed "an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States;" the act commonly called the reconstruction act. 14 Stat. at Large, 428. This act—reciting that "no legal State governments or adequate protection for life or property now existed in the rebel States of Virginia, Georgia, North Carolina," &c., and that it was "necessary that peace and good order should be enforced in the said State till loyal republican State governments could be legally established," and putting these said States under military rule—enacted that when the people of any one of the said rebel States should have formed a constitution of government in conformity with the Constitution of the United States in all respects... and "when such constitution shall have been submitted to Congress for examination and approval, and Congress shall have approved the same... &c., said State shall be declared entitled to representation in Congress, and senators and representatives shall be admitted therefrom."

In pursuance of what was contemplated by this act, and of certain amendments to it, the people of Georgia did make a constitution. This constitution by the first section of its seventh article ordained that—

"Each head of a family, or guardian, or trustee of a family of minor children, shall be entitled to a homestead of realty to the value of $2,000 in specie, and personal property to the value of $1,000 in specie, to be valued at the time they are set apart."

It went on further to declare:

"And no court or ministerial officer in this State shall ever have jurisdiction or authority to enforce any judgment, decree, or execution against said property so set apart, including such improvement as may be made thereon from time to time, except for taxes, money borrowed or expended in the improvement of the homestead, or for the purchase money of the same, and for labor done thereon, or material furnished therefor, or removal of incumbrances thereon."

The constitution having been thus adopted in form by the people of Georgia, was sent with this article included to the Congress of the United States, which by an act of June 25th, 1868, 15 Id. 73, "to admit the States of Georgia, &c., to representation in Congress," reciting that, whereas, the people of Georgia, North Carolina, &c., had in pursuance of the already quoted act of March 2d, 1867, "framed constitutions of State government, which are republican, and have adopted said constitutions," enacted that each of the States of North Carolina, Georgia, &c., shall be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as a State of the Union, when the Legislature of such State shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States..... known as "article fourteen:" Provided, That the State of Georgia shall only be entitled and admitted to representation upon this further fundamental condition, that the first and third subdivisions of section seventeen of the fifth article of the constitution of said State, except, &c., shall be null and void, and that the General Assembly of said State, by solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the State to the foregoing provision.

The State having afterwards ratified the fourteenth amendment, and complied with other requirements, was by an act of Congress, passed July 15th, 1870, 16 Stat. at Large, 363, declared entitled to representation in Congress.

The constitution of Georgia being thus approved by Congress, and operative, the Legislature of Georgia, on the 3d of October, 1868, passed "An act to provide for setting apart a homestead of realty and personalty, and for the valuation of said property, and for the full and complete protection and security of the same, to the sole use and benefit of families, as required by section first of article seventh of the constitution, and for other purposes."

The language of this act was the same as the provision of the constitution. Under this act all the land of Hart, which altogether, it will have been observed, was worth about $1,400, was set apart to him and his family as a homestead.

On a requirement by Gunn, to the sheriff of the county, one Barry, that he should levy on the two hundred and seventy-seven and a half acres, Barry refused to do so, upon the ground that they had been set off to Hart and his family under the act of 1868, and on a petition for mandamus against Barry to compel him to make the levy, the courts of Georgia, including the Supreme Court, having decided that the refusal of the sheriff was right, the case was brought here.

The question involved was, of course, the constitutionalty as against Gunn, who had got his judgment before its passage, of the new exemption.

Mr. P. Phillips, for the plaintiff in error.

Hart having had two hundred and seventy-two and a half acres of land, worth $1,300, of which land fifty acres, or at very most say a half, was exempt under the old law, obtained a judgment for $527.90. His debt is thus perfectly secure. He has an interest in the land to the extent of the judgment, an interest which binds it in the hands of the debtor, and to whomsoever the debtor may transfer it. Then come the new constitution and law which withdraw the whole of the land from the lien, and for all practical purposes dissolve or destroy the lien. The remedy which was before complete, is now annihilated. And the creditor who, before would have been paid in full, is deprived of getting anything. If this is not impairing the obligation of a contract, if it is not destroying vested rights, what is?

There was, no doubt, great inducement in the Southern States, arising out of the disasters of the war, to legislation in favor of debtors. But while much may be said in extenuation of such legislation, nothing when it is like that here, can be judicially said in justification of it. In Arkansas an exemption of $7,000 has been made In Mississippi of $4,000. In other Southern States exemptions more or less large. With the operation of these exemptions on contracts made subsequently to them, we do not deal. But when applied to contracts made when no such exemptions were allowed or thought of, the illegality is obvious.

Some singular results follow as respects the State of Georgia. The population of the State is estimated at one million five hundred thousand. Under the new exemption every head of a family is entitled to $2,000 in land. Assuming that five persons constitute a family, we have three hundred thousand heads of families, and if each "head" obtained the $2,000 in land, the law appropriates land to the amount of $600,000,000. This is three times more than all the land in the State is estimated at.

No counsel appeared on the other side; but the court was referred to arguments made in Georgia, where the validity of the laws making the new exemption had been sought to be maintained. So far as our special reporter understood them, the grounds were somewhat thus:

The old law, so far as it operated on contracts made after its date, was confessedly valid. Practically from the time of its passage, no court or ministerial officer of the State had jurisdiction or authority to enforce any judgment, decree, or execution against property set aside under it.

The old law being valid, what made the exemption of 1868 invalid? It was not invalid.

I. In Von Hoffman v. Quincy, 4 Wallace, 553, this court said:

"It is competent for the States to change the form of the remedy, or to modify it otherwise as they may see fit, provided no substantial right secured by the contract is thereby impaired. No attempt has been made to fix definitely the line between alterations of the remedy which are deemed legitimate, and those which under the form of modifying the remedy, impair substantial rights. Every case must be determined upon its own circumstances."

So, in that same case, this court referring to an observation made in an earlier case, that "one of the tests that a contract has been impaired, is that its value has by legislation been diminished; say, page 553:

"This has reference to legislation which affects the contract directly, and not incidentally or only by consequence. The right to imprison for debt is not a part of the contract. It is regarded as penal rather than remedial. The States may abolish it whenever they think proper. They may also exempt from sale under execution, the necessary implements of agriculture, the tools of a mechanic, and articles of necessity in household furniture. It is said, Beers v. Houghton, 9 Peters, 359; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheaton, 230; Mason v. Haile, 12 Id. 273; Sturges v. Crownenshield, 4 Id. 200, 'regulations of this description have always been considered in every civilized community, as properly belonging to the remedy to be exercise by every sovereignty according to its own views of policy and humanity.'"

This court, then, here admitted that though a contract was in existence, the Legislature might legislate upon it so as to diminish its value, provided the legislation were indirect. And the very sort of legislation which was in question in this case is given as an illustration of the means through which a diminution, lawful in character, may be made. The reason of the lawfulness, though the legislation be retroactive, was also plainly adumbrated. It was that the principles of humanity having in all civilized countries, time out of mind, induced Legislatures to intervene between the creditor and his debtor to prevent the former from stripping the latter and his family of those articles which are necessary to their existence, and this sort of legislation being exercised by every sovereign "according to his own views of policy and humanity," every person entering into a contract enters into it with a full recognition of the right of the Legislature to act on the subject according to such, its own views —views which, of course, must vary according to times and exigencies.

Hence, if the right of the Legislature was legitimately exercised; if, in other words, the particular law did not transcend the limits of fair legislation, the "obligation of contracts" was not impaired even though the legislation were retroactive, and though by a change in the character of the articles exempted, the remedy might, in particular cases, be less visibly efficacious, as in others it might be more so.

Now, was the argument this? to wit, that the act of 1868 is unlawful, because abstractly and in itself considered it made an exemption too great in amount. That fact was denied. An exemption of a house and lot worth $2,000, and of personalty worth $1,000, was not so plainly an excessive exemption as to be certainly void; void whether considered prospectively or retrospectively. Such a thing cannot be affirmed; the Legislature of Georgia having had a right within fair limits to act according to "its own views of policy and humanity."

Then, was it void because by it a greater amount was exempted than by the former act? If the fact were so, still, if the increase were made by the Legislature of the State in a fair exercise of the Legislature's "views of humanity and policy," it would be hard to say, under the language of this court above quoted from Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, that from this cause merely—the increase not being really great—it was void in toto. But the increase in the magnitude of the exemption was denied by the argument in Georgia. On the contrary, looking at the number of items exempted under the old law, and their character, it was asserted that in some cases of land in some families the exemption would be much less. A homestead of at least fifty acres, worth any sum, and if a man had ten children, of 100 acres, was exempted. Then the "bedsteads," "tools," and "cooking utensils" exempted must all be "common" or "ordinary." But nothing else was so required to be. All wearing apparel of the debtor and of all his family, however numerous the family or valuable the apparel, was exempted; so would a theological library be, however extensive and valuable, and family portraits which, if by certain artists, would have great value. In a case where the fifty acres were near a city, or where the family was of any quality and with members at all numerous, the articles exempted by the old law could hardly fail far to exceed $3,000 in value. The new provision was but an equalization to all the people of the State of what was meant to be given by the old law, but was not really given.

II. Then was the case affected by the fact that the constitution and statute changing the character of the exemption declare that no court or ministerial officer in the State shall ever have authority to enforce any judgment, decree, or execution against said property so set apart? &c. How did that affect the matter? Under the old exemption no court or ministerial officer of the State could ever have had jurisdiction or authority to enforce any judgment, decree, or execution against the property set apart. Assuming that the exemption itself was valid, any prohibition by words was useless, and any words of prohibition were but surplusage. The prohibition followed from the validity of the exemption, and followed as much without words of prohibition as with them.

The case, then, was this: The Legislature, acting on "its own views of policy and humanity," has so far modified an old exemption that, instead of some real estate, the value of which varied, and might be worth much more than $2,000, and a great number of articles of personalty nominatim, whose value also varied, and which, of themselves, might be worth much more than $1,000, and might be found in some families, and not at all in others; now exempts realty worth $2,000, and personalty worth $1,000; so as to make the law operate for all as equally and equitable as possible. Is the legislative power constitutionally incapable of making such a change?

Then it could not be contended, that by the mere contract, whatever it was on which this judgment had been obtained, any lien was acquired. The new constitution withdrew nothing from the operation of the contract. And though a lien was acquired by the judgment, yet, if the new exemption did withdraw the land from the operation of it, the obligation of no contract was impaired.

But the strongest view, it was said, remained. In 1865 a revolution had swept over the land. The old State government had gone to wreck. The people had no civil government, and were in anarchy. The Congress of the United States invited them to make a government, and undertook to guarantee to the State one of a republican form. The constitution of 1868 was the result. It was made through the power and agency of Congress, under its laws, and under its eye. It was more the work of Congress than of the State. Congress insisted that a portion of the proposed constitution, which it disliked, should be fundamentally rejected; and that no place should be given to new propositions which it thought good. The people of the State wanted neither change. But all that Congress prescribed to be done was done. Congress then assented that the instrument should go into effect, and it is in virtue of that assent that it it did go into effect. The constitution of Georgia is, therefore, an act of Congress, and it has, accordingly, all the validity of such an act. Now there is no doubt that Congress may, if it please, pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts; Evans v. Evans, Peter's Circuit Court, 322; though the States may not.

No one can cast his eyes over the former and later exemptions without being struck by the greatly increased magnitude of the latter.

SWAYNE, J., having quoted the old exemption law, and the more modern provisions and stated facts of the case, gave the opinion of the court to the following effect:

Section 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, declares that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts."

If the remedy is a part of the obligation of the contract, a clearer case of impairment can hardly occur than is presented in the record before us. The effect of the act in question, under the circumstances of this judgment, does not, indeed, merely impair, it annihilates the remedy. There is none left.

But the act reaches still further. It withdraws the land from the lien of the judgment, and thus destroys a vested right of property which the creditor had acquired in the pursuit of the remedy to which he was entitled by the law as it stood when the judgment was recovered. It is in effect taking one person's property, and giving it to another without compensation. This is contrary to reason and justice, and to the fundamental principles of the social compact. Calder v. Bull, 3 Dallas, 388. But we must confine ourselves to the constitutional aspect of the case. A few further remarks will be sufficient to dispose of it. It involves no question which has not been more than once fully considered by this court.

Georgia, since she came into the Union as one of the original thirteen States, has never been a State out of the Union. Her constitutional rights were, for a time, necessarily put in abeyance, but her constitutional disabilities and obligations were in nowise affected by her rebellion. The same view is to be taken of the provision in her organic law, and of the statute in question, as if she had been in full communion with her sister States when she gave them being. Though her constitution was sanctioned by Congress, this provision can in no sense be considered an act of that body. The sanction was only permissive as a part of the process of her rehabilitation, and involved nothing affirmative or negative beyond that event. If it were express and unequivocal, the result would be the same. Congress cannot, by authorization or ratification, give the slightest effect to a State law or constitution in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. That instrument is above and beyond the power of Congress and the States, and is alike obligatory upon both. A State can no more impair an existing contract by a constitutional provision, than by a legislative act; both are within the probibition of the National Constitution.

The legal remedies for the enforcement of a contract, which belong to it at the time and place where it is made, are a part of its obligation. A State may change them, provided the change involve no impairment of a substantial right. If the provision of the constitution, or the legislative act of a State, fall within the category last mentioned, they are to that extent utterly void. They are, for all the purposes of the contract which they impair, as if they had never existed. The constitutional provision and statute here in question, are clearly within that category, and are, therefore, void. The jurisdictional prohibition which they contain with respect to the courts of the State, can, therefore, form no impediment to the plaintiff in error in the enforcement of his rights touching this judgment, as those rights are recognized by this court. White v. Hart, 13 Wallace, 646; Von Hoffman v. The City of Quincy, 4 Id. 535.

The judgment of the Supreme Court of Georgia is reversed, and the cause will be remanded to that court, with directions to enter a judgment of reversal. to reverse the judgment of the Superior Court of Randolph county, and thereafter to proceed in conformity to this opinion.

BRIGHAM YOUNG v. GODBE.

1. When a suit turns on the question whether money claimed in it by the plaintiff has been advanced to the defendant, in one capacity or in another, evidence of what a person who had settled an account on the subject with the defendant said that the defendant told him, is not evidence.
2. The fact that the court in allowing the evidence to go to the jury, told them that they might consider it for what it was worth, does not alter the case.
3. In a case where interest, as a general thing, is due (as ex. gr., in the case of an account stated), the fact that there may be no statute in the place where the account is settled and the transaction takes place, does not prevent the recovery of interest. In such a case, interest, at a reasonable rate, and conforming to the custom which obtains in the community in dealings of the same character, will be allowed by way of damages for unreasonably withholding an overdue account.

In error to the Supreme Court of the territory of Utah.

Godbe filed a complaint in the court below against Brigham Young, "as trustee in trust of the Church of Jesus Christ, a religious association in the territory of Utah," alleging an account stated by "said defendant," prior to February 12th, 1866, and upon such statement a balance of $10,020 "due from said defendant;" a payment of $5,000, May 30th, 1868, and praying judgment with interest at 10 per cent.. "by way of damages."

The defendant demurred, assigning for cause that it did not sufficiently appear from the complaint whether the suit was against the defendant "in his individual capacity or in his capacity as trustee in trust for the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints." The demurrer was overruled. The defendant then pleaded that no account had ever been settled by him as "trustee in trust," as alleged in the complaint, and that neither the sum stated in the complaint, nor any other sum had been found due to the plaintiff from "said defendant as said trustee."

On the trial, evidence was given tending to show that the money alleged to have been advanced by the plaintiff had been advanced to Young in some capacity, and an account stated and credit given as alleged. In what capacity was the question on which the controversy turned; whether, as alleged in the complaint, to him "as trustee in trust of the church," &c., or whether as agent of a company known as the "Deseret Irrigation and Canal Company;" a company which one of the witnesses swore was "so mixed up with the church, that he did not know the difference between them." The plaintiff sought to prove that it had been advanced to Young as "trustee in trust to the church," &c. Letters from Young sought to cast the debt on the Irrigation and Canal Company.

The defendant having given evidence tending to show that the Irrigation and Canal Company had an office in what was known as the council house, and that the "trustee in trust," &c., had his at what was known as the president's office, and that these departments were separate and distinct from each other, and had a separate set of clerks—the plaintiff brought one Armstrong, who testified that he was in 1857, and had been ever since, the bookkeeper of a firm known as Kimball & Lawrence, merchants in Salt Lake City; that they had an account of some $10,000 against the Deseret Irrigation and Canal Company; that Mr. Lawrence, one of the firm, took the account and went away with it, and in a short time returned "stating to this witness that it had been settled by the 'trustees in trust,' by giving credit to a certain person on tithing, and that the transaction appeared on the books of Kimball & Lawrence." The defendant objected to all this evidence, for the reason "that it was not in rebuttal, and, therefore, illegal." The court overruled the objection (the defendant excepting), "and the testimony was permitted to go to the jury for what it was worth."

In charging, the court charged that if the jury should find for the plaintiff, they would find $5,020, with interest on $10,020 from the day the account was rendered until the day of the payment of $5,000, and from that date to the day of trial on the amount remaining due.

Verdict and judgment having gone for the plaintiff, the admission of the evidence above mentioned, and the instruction to the jury were, among other matters, assigned for error.

Messrs. C. J. Hillier and Thomas Fitch, for the plaintiff in error; no opposing counsel.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

The testimony of Armstrong, the bookkeeper of Kimball & Lawrence, was objected to by the defendant, for the reason that it was not in rebuttal, and, therefore, illegal, but the court overruled the objection, and permitted the testimony to go to the jury for what it was worth.

We are not prepared to say that Godbe could not rebut the case made by Young, by showing that the affairs of the company were so connected with the church, that, as one of the witnesses said, "he did not know the difference between them." But the evidence on this subject should not have been the declaration by one person of what another said. The fact that Young had settled the account of Kimball & Lawrence in the way he did, was proper evidence to go to the jury, if Lawrence had testified to it, but Armstrong's statement of what Lawrence told him was pure hearsay. Besides, the court on its own motion enlarged the scope of the evidence, by directing the jury to consider it for what it was worth. This direction enabled the jury to take a wider range of the subject than they otherwise would, and naturally inclined them to consider the evidence as fixing the right of the plaintff to recover from the defendant in the capacity in which he was sued.

On account of the error in admitting the testimony of Armstrong, and in indicating the effect which the jury should give to it, the judgment will have to be reversed.

But as the case goes back for a new trial, it is proper to say a word upon the subject of interest, which seems more than anything else to be the chief point of difference between the parties. We can see no objection to the charge of the court on this subject. If a debt ought to be paid at a particular time, and is not, owing to the default of the debtor, the creditor is entitled to interest from that time by way of compensation for the delay in payment. And if the account be stated, as the evidence went to show was the case here, interest begins to run at once. 1 American Leading Cases, 5th edition, pp. 626 and 514.

It is said there is no law in the territory of Utah prescribing a rate of interest in transactions like the one in controversy in this suit, and that, therefore, no interest can be recovered. But this result does not follow. If there is no statute on the subject, interest will be allowed by way of damages for unreasonably withholding payment of an overdue account. The rate must be reasonable, and conform to the custom which obtains in the community in dealings of this character.

Judgment reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia.

PYLE v. PYLE.

1. If a man arrested under a bastardy process, marry the woman pregnant with the child of which he is the putative father, the marriage is good, unless it clearly appear that the charge was false.
2. The mere unsupported denial of the man of the truth of the charge, is not sufficient in proceedings for divorce to establish its falsity.
3. The court after discharging a rule for divorce, on motion referred the case back to the examiner to take additional testimony.

Opinion by ALLISON, P. J. Delivered June 14th, 1873.

The proceedings for divorce, instituted by the husband, are grounded upon the allegation of force or duress. The testimony shows that he was arrested upon the oath of the respondent, which charged seduction, under promise of marriage. When brought together in the office of the alderman, the libellant promised to marry the respondent in two weeks from that time, whereupon, the proceedings were dismissed, and the defendant discharged: this was on the 6th of May, 1872. Four days thereafter, the respondent again made oath against the libellant, charging that he was about to abscond; he was again arrested, taken before the alderman, who states in his testimony: "I told Mr. Pyle, before he offered to marry the respondent, that as she had sworn that he had seduced her under promise of marriage, I would have to hold him to bail, to answer the charge. He then said, 'I will marry her now.' I then married them, and after the ceremony, I discharged the libellant." This is confirmed by the testimony of the constable.

The libellant was examined as a witness. His statement is, that "the respondent, her brother and the alderman, told me that if I did not marry the respondent, I would be imprisoned The respondent and her brother threatened to send me to the penitentiary for three years, if I did not marry her. Under these threats, and fearing they would send me to the penitentiary, I consented to the marriage. I never seduced the respondent, and never promised to marry her, until after she had me arrested."

The material facts denied by the libellant, stand unsupported by any other testimony in this cause, and we think of no value. As shown by the testimony, he put in no denial of the seduction under promise of marriage, upon either arrest, upon both occasions promising to marry the respondent. Nor is his statement of threats of imprisonment corroborated; negatively, it is contradicted. The testimony of both the alderman and the constable is, that he was informed that he would be required to enter bail to answer the charge.

It has been held in Jackson v. Winne, 7 Wendell, 47, that if a man is arrested under a bastardy process, as the putative father of the child, of which the woman procuring the arrest is pregnant, marry her, even though being unable to procure bail, he do it purely to avoid being imprisoned, and though it afterwards appear he could have made a successful defence, still the marriage is good. Scott v. Shufeldt, 5 Paige 43, is to the same effect. The doctrine seems to be qualified that it would, perhaps, be different if the arrest was under a void process, or upon a false charge. Story on Contracts, sections 88, 89

In Collins v. Collins, 2 Brewster 515, it was decided by this court, that the falsity of the charge is essential, and Judge Brewster, who delivered the opinion in that case, found as a fact established by the testimony, that the charge was false, and the threat to imprison was upon process sued out maliciously and without probable cause.

In this case, we do not feel ourselves justified in reaching a similar conclusion upon the unsupported testimony of the libellant, and, therefore, discharge the rule, and refuse the divorce prayed for.

And now, to wit, June 14th, 1873, on motion of T. W. Arundel, Esq., the report of the examiner is referred back to him to take additional evidence.

T. W. Arundle, Esq., for libellant.

Edgar M. Chipman, for respondent.

We give place to the following notice with the greatest of pleasure. The recipient of the testimonial is so well known to the bar of this city, for his uniform kindness, courtesy and obliging disposition, that it is unnecessary for us to urge upon every one of its members to have a part in making the testimonial one worthy of the occasion. Already over 400 names have been obtained and we have been asked to draw the attention of those who have not yet been made aware of it, to the fact that the subscription list has been opened. We would like to see upon that list the whole of the Philadelphia bar, from the oldest to the youngest.

TESTIMONIAL

To MR. BENJAMIN E. FLETCHER, FROM THE MEMBERS OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR.

In view of the approaching departure of Mr. Fletcher, from the post he has so ably and faithfully occupied during the past seventeen years in the District Court office, it is believed to be the general desire of the members of the Philadelphia bar, who have profited by his large experience and thorough acquaintance with his official duties, and who are grateful for his uniform courtesy and assiduous exertions in their behalf, to manifest their friendship for Mr. Fletcher in some fitting form.

To accomplish this, the following gentlemen have consented to act as a committee to receive subscriptions of two dollars each from the members of our bar, in order to procure a suitable testimonial to be tendered with the names of the donors, to Mr. Fletcher. The amount has been fixed at this low figure, in order that the youngest donor may have an equal interest with the oldest in the gift.

The Constitutional Convention expect to get through with their work and adjourn by the 3d or the 10th of July, at the latest. It is to be hoped that this expectation will be realized, as the public is becoming impatient with the long sessions of that body. Some unwise members wish to adjourn over the hot weather.

DIGEST OF ALL THE REPORTED CASES ADJUDGED IN THE SEVERAL COURTS OF PENNSYLVANIA, FROM THE EARLIEST TIME. By Hon. James T. Mitchell, one of the judges of the District Court of Philadelphia.

A thorough and complete digest of the decisions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has long been desired. This want has been only in a measure supplied by those of Wharton and Brewster. The latter of which, for its compass, containing seventeen volumes of reports, is by far the best. Since Brewster's was published, fourteen additional volumes of Supreme Court reports have been issued, and another volume will shortly make its appearance. Apart from these are the various law periodicals, containing many cases not in the reports. The bench and the bar are beginning to feel that a digest from Brewster to the present time is needed. The purpose, however, of a digest, is to have all the adjudications upon a particular branch of the law, collected and arranged together. If the number of digests be increased, they will be hardly more useful than the index to the reports, and will almost fail to effect their purpose. The want is one book, edited by a learned jurist, who has a discriminating mind, capable of both analyzing and generalizing. This, we think, is about to be obtained. Judge Mitchell has for several years been diligently laboring at the production of a digest of the decisions of the courts of Pennsylvania. We have before us specimen sheets of his work. They evidence care and discernment, and give promise that upon its completion, a great want will be amply supplied. It is to be published by T. & J. W. Johnson & Co., in two octavo volumes.

KNICKERBOCKER LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY v. GORBACH.

1. A widow brought suit on policies on the life of her husband, against an insurance company of New York. The defendants, alleging that the plaintiff was a citizen of Pennsylvania, applied for the removal of the case into an United States court. The defendant answered, that she was not a citizen of Pennsylvania, but of Austria; not being a citizen of Pennsylvania, her case was not subject to removal under the Acts of Congress of July 27th, 1866, and March 2d, 1867.

2. If the husband of a foreigner be a citizen, she will be a citizen.

3. The court below having decided the question of fact, the matter is concluded by that action, and is not reviewable in the Supreme Court.

4. The defendants should have made good their averment of the plaintiff's citizenship; her answer stood for proof until overturned by proof from the defendants.

November 11th, 1871. Before THOMPSON, C. J., READ, AGNEW, SHARSWOOD and WILLIAMS, JJ.

1. A testator gave to his wife "the rents and profits of all my property during her life for her support and the support and education of my children under the direction of my executors." This did not create a trust for the children either in the widow or executors, nor give the Orphans' Court jurisdiction to call them to account, or to decree in favor of the children for the future administration of the estate.

2. In the support of herself and children the widow was not under the direction of the executors; as long as the family lived together she was to have the control.

3. As to the management, renting and other disposition of the property, she was to be under the direction of the executors.

4. The children had no present interest, in any particular shares; the main object was to benefit the widow.

The words "survivors or survivor of them forever," did not apply to "heirs." 2. A survivorship between John and Jacob would be a devise over after a fee, and therefore could not stand as a remainder nor as an executory devise, being contrary to the rule against perpetuities. 3. The devisees took in severalty in fee.

3. Jacob at the time of the devise had no children or issue: if "heirs" could be construed "children," he took an estate tail—which would be destroyed by a deed, made by Jacob, to bar the tail.

EASTERN DISTRICT.

Supreme Court of Pennsylv'a.

ROBERT J. JONES and EDMUND C. SWIFT, executors of ELIZABETH S. SWIFT, deceased, v. THE BENEFICIAL SOCIETY of the BOROUGH OF EASTON.

A beneficial society which is sustained by weekly dues paid by its members, and which pays benefits only to such of them as are in good standing, is not an association for charitable uses within the act of April 20th, 1855, and a legacy to it would not be subject to said act.

Error to Common Pleas of Northampton county.

Opinion by READ, C. J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The plaintiffs in this case are a beneficial society, both in name, and by the provisions of their charter, and their benevolence and benefits are exclusively confined to contributory members of the association. The members must be regularly admitted, must not be infirm, must be citizens, and between the ages of twenty-one and forty-five years of age; and no person shall be entitled to any benefits from this society, until he shall have been one year a member. Each person on being admitted a member of their society, shall pay such entrance money and monthly dues, and contributions, as the society may by their by-laws from time to time declare. A member is not in full standing, if in arrears for fines, contributions, or monthly dues; and not entitled to benefits in sickness, if in arrears for dues, contributions, or fines for three successive stated meetings, and may be expelled for arrears of dues or fines. The amount to be paid in case of death of a member or his wife, is fixed. There are other provisions showing that the benevolence is strictly a matter of contract, and may be enforced in a court of justice. The object of this society shall be the relief of its respective members, when sick, or disabled by bodily infirmities, to pursue their ordinary avocations. Its benevolence begins and ends at home. In Babb v. Reed, 5 Rawle, 151, it was held, that an association for the purposes of mutual benevolence among its members only, is not an association for charitable uses. This was a lodge of Odd Fellows. In Blenon's Estate, Brightly's Reports, 338, the beneficial societies who were claimants under the will of the testator, as "institutions of charity and benevolence," were so considered by the auditors, which decision was reversed by the Orphans' Court, who decreed, "That no friendly or beneficial society is entitled to any share in the bequest of the testator," which decree was affirmed by the Supreme Court. These decision are the settled law of this court.

The 11th section of the act of 20th April, 1855, P. L. 332, provides that "no estate, real or personal, shall hereafter be bequeathed, devised or conveyed to any body politic, or to any person in trust for religious or charitable uses, except the same be done by deed or will, attested by two credible, and at the time, disinterested witnesses, at least one calendar month before the decease of the testator or alienor, and all disposition of property contrary hereto, shall be void and go to the residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin, or heirs according to law: Provided, That any disposition of property within said period, bona fide made for a fair valuable consideration, shall not be hereby avoided."

No case comes within the English statute, of which this section is a copy in principle, unless the gift be for a charitable use, and the three cases which have been decided in this State under our act, were all charitable uses, and one of them also a religious use. Charitable uses are well understood in Pennsylvania, and the general subject has been largely discussed by Mr. Justice Strong in the Domestic and Foreign Missions' Appeal, 6 Casey, 433; Cresson's Appeal, Id. 437, and The Evangelical Association's Appeal, 11 Casey, 316, and clearly fix the meaning of charitable uses in the 11th section of the act of 1855.

Mrs. Elizabeth S. Swift made her will on the 22d May, 1872, evincing great care in distributing her property, and recollecting friends by various gifts, and towards the close of it, gives the legacy of "one thousand dollars to go to the old Easton Beneficial Society, of which my late husband was a member," and died on the 27th of the same month of May.

It is clear this is not a religious use, and it seems equally clear it is not a charitable use; and if so, it is a perfectly valid legacy, and must be paid by the defendants.

BOYNTON v. HOUSLER et al.

A vendee of a purchaser at sheriff's sale, knowing that the latter had promised a party in interest to bid in the property upon his account, is a trustee ex maleficio for him to whom the promise was made.

Error to the Common Pleas of Cameron county.

Opinion of the court by MERCUR, J Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The plaintiff claims to recover this land under title acquired at a sheriff's sale, when it was sold as the property of the estate of Merrick Housler, deceased. The defendant, who is the widow of said Housler, made defence to a portion of said land, called "the homestead," containing about eighteen acres. Prior to and at the time of the sheriff's sale, the defendant and her minor children were in the actual possession of the whole property. She had entered into a contract to purchase it from Aden Housler, who held a deed for it subject to the judgments. While thus holding whatever interest passed to her under this contract, as well as her right of dower, she made the arrangement with Simpson, under which he purchased at sheriff's sale.

The evidence given by the defendants, which the jury found to be true, was substantially this, to wit: Prior to the sheriff's sale the defendant had agreed with Aden Housler to bid off the whole land, provided it was not run up higher than $1,200 or $1,250, which was the value of the property, and if he became the purchaser he was to deed "the homestead" to her. Upon the day next preceding the sheriff's sale, Simpson, who was the plaintiff in the execution, was informed of this arrangement between Aden and the defendant. He then said to them if they would not interfere or bid at the sale, and have it bid off as low as possible, that she should have the homestead; she should not get any bidders, and he would get some one to bid it off; that would be better than for her to bid it off. The defendant and Aden agreed to this proposition. Relying upon it, they did not interfere or bid at the sale, nor did she get any other person to bid for her. Simpson bid it off for $110. The plaintiff bought of him with full knowledge of this arrangement.

Under these facts the court below held that a trust ex maleficio arose in favor of the defendant as to the homestead.

All the errors assigned are substantially to this conclusion.

Where a parol contract for the purchase of land has been carried on mala fide, there is a resulting trust implied by law, and equity will decree a conveyance according to the terms of the contract. McCulloch v. Cowher, 5 W. & S. 427. Equity will not permit one to hold a benefit which he has derived through the fraud even of another, and much less will it do so, if he has acquired it by means of his own fraud. Sheriff v. Neal, 6 Watts, 540. In Morey v. Herrick, 6 Harris, 128, Justice Bell said: "It is equally well settled that if one be induced to confide in the promise of another that he will hold in trust, or that he will so purchase for one or both, and is thus led to do what otherwise he would have forborne, or to forbear what he contemplated to do, in the acquisition of an estate, whereby the promissor becomes the holder of the legal title, an attempted denial of the confidence is such a fraud as will operate to convert the purchaser into a trustee ex maleficio." Where one holding an article of agreement for one hundred and sixteen acres of land, upon which he had paid five dollars only, and was liable to be turned off, surrendered his title under a parol contract that ten acres thereof should be conveyed to him so soon as the persons for whose benefit he gave up his title acquired a deed for the legal title, it was held to create a trust ex maleficio in his favor as to the ten acres. Plumer & Crary v. Reed, 2 Wright, 46. Nor does it make any difference that the title was acquired by Simpson through a judicial sale. Beagle v. Wentz, 5 P. F. Smith, 369, and cases there cited. This case of Beagle v. Wentz was one in which a debtor was induced to relinquish his claim to the $300 exemption and consent that the whole of his land be sold, under an agreement that the plaintiff was to take a sheriff's deed for the same, and make to the debtor a deed for the part agreed upon. It was held that if the debtor was induced to surrender his right on the false assurance that the part should be left to him, the plaintiff refusing, was a trustee ex maleficio. This was since the act of April 22d, 1856, and was held to be such a trust or confidence as was not affected by that act. The same principle is affirmed in Seichrist's Appeal, 16 P. F. Smith, 237.

It is contended, however, that inasmuch as the agreement between the defendant and Simpson was that she and her agent and friends should not bid at the sale, it was contrary to public policy, and therefore void. In support of this principle the case of Slingluff v. Eckel, 12 Harris, 472, is cited. We assent to the correctness of the law there declared, as applied to the facts in that case. That was an agreement between two persons, neither of whom had any possession of or interest in the land. The court there said "What we do decree is that one bidder cannot legally buy off another with money, or the promise of money."

The distinction in this case is that the defendant had an interest in the land in reference to which the contract was made, and she was to retain a portion of that land. This is a distinction clearly taken and recognized in Beagle v. Wentz, and in Seichrist's Appeal, supra.

BAUR & MILLER et al v. WILLIAMS.

1. A levy is not necessarily, as between debtor and creditor, a satisfaction of the debt. Up to the time of sale there is still a debt due by defendant to plaintiff, which may be attached in defendant's hands by a judgment creditor of the plaintiff.
2. B. & M. obtained judgment against W., and assigned it to S., who issued execution. Before sale, an attachment aur judgment against B. & M. was issued, in which W. was garnishee. The plaintiff in the attachment alleging the assignment to S was fraudulent, the court ordered a sale under the levy, and that the money should be paid into court to await the determination of the attachment suit: Held, There was no error.

Error to the Mayor's Court of the city of Scranton.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

Baur & Miller, for the use of Miller, obtained a judgment against Williams. Miller assigned it to Shoemaker, who issued execution thereon. After levy upon personal property, but before sale, Baillie commenced a suit by attachment, under the act of 17th March, 1869, against Baur & Miller, and served Williams as garnishee. The same day, a rule was granted to show cause why the execution issued on the judgment should not be stayed until the attachment suit was determined. Upon the hearing, Shoemaker claimed the money; but the defendant answered that the plaintiff in the attachment alleged the assignment to him to be fraudulent. The court refused to make the rule absolute, but ordered the marshal to proceed and collect, and to pay the money into court; and that distribution should await the final determination of the attachment suit, and directed the clerk to deposit the money in bank, subject to the further order of the court.

Shoemaker assigned this for error.

It is argued, that a levy upon personal property of the value of the debt, is a satisfaction thereof, and, therefore, no debt was due from Williams, to be attached.

The doctrine, however, that a seizure of goods in execution, to the value of the debt, whether they be sold or not, works a discharge of all responsibility on the part of the debtor, is subject to several exceptions. In Porter v. Boone, 1 W. & S. 252, it was held, that if the property be released by the plaintiff, at the instance and request of the defendant, it did not amount to a satisfaction of the judgment. In Cummins' Appeal, 9 W. & S. 73, the goods were suffered to remain after levy in the possession of the defendant in the execution, by whom they were used and disposed of. It was held to be no satisfaction of the judgment even as against a subsequent lien creditor of the defendant. This was affirmed in Davids v. Harris, 9 Barr, 501, and in Chathcart's Appeal, 1 Har. 416.

It is true, in Fretz v. Heller, 2 W. & S. 397, it was said, that money levied by the sheriff upon a fieri facias, and either actually or potentially in his hands, cannot be attached. In that case, however, the attachment issued after the sheriff's sale, and sought to reach a portion of the money which the purchaser had agreed to pay. The attachment was not against the defendant in the execution, but against the purchaser at the sheriff's sale. The court then correctly held, that they would not suffer the distribution to be interfered with.

A levy is not necessarily, as between the debtor and creditor, a satisfaction of the debt. Up to the time of the sale, there is still a debt due from the defendant in the execution to the plaintiff. Being due and unpaid, it is liable to an attachment at the suit of the plaintiffs' creditors. Winternitz's Appeal, 4 Wright, 490.

It was a just exercise of the equitable powers of the court, to require the money to be collected, and to be held for future distribution. The defendant in the execution, is thereby protected from expensive litigation. The rights of the respective claimants to the fund can be determined by the trial of an issue framed for that purpose. We see no error in the decision of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

McCAFFERTY v. CUMMINGS.

In an action for purchase money, the court below refused to allow evidence of; 1. Judgments entered against the vendor subsequent to the sale. 2 An action of ejectment brought by the plaintiff's vendor. The court entered judgment for plaintiff, but that he should not collect it till he had delivered a deed to defendant. Held, there was no error.

Error to the District Court of Philadelphia.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The first assignment of error is not in conformity with the rules. Rule 9, § 41 [8.] It should, therefore, be considered as no assignment. The evidence, however, as offered, was properly rejected. Upon the first of April, 1865, McCafferty had purchased, paid for, and taken possession of the land. This suit was commenced in September, 1869, and was tried in February, 1871. The lien of all judgments entered prior to McCafferty's purchase, had expired. After April, 1865, Cummings had no interest in the land to be bound by subsequent judgments. The offer was of judgments "entered from the thirteenth of March, 1869, to the seventeenth of February, 1870." There was no offer to show that any one of them was a lien upon the land.

The second error assigned has no merit. It is merely an offer to show the pendency of an action of ejectment for the land. Cummings had previously given in evidence, a deed from the plaintiff in the ejectment, to himself for the same land. There was no offer to connect or follow the record with any evidence of an outstanding title still existing in the plaintiff in the ejectment.

This action was brought to recover the money placed in McCafferty's hands for the use of Cummings. He was entitled to retain it until Cummings made him a good title to the land which he had previously sold to him. Before suit brought, Cummings several times notified McCafferty, that he was ready to make him the deed if he would pay over the money. He refused to pay. The jury have found the title of Cummings to the land to be good. The judgment is substantially that the plaintiff below shall not, collect the judgment until he shall have delivered the deed to the defendant. The plaintiff in error has no cause to complain of this.

Judgment affirmed.

KNAPP v. HARTUNG.

1. A liberal construction should be given to the Acts of Assembly, allowing amendments in pleading.
2. Plaintiff was allowed to amend his narr. the new matter being the same cause of action originally declared for. The defendant pleaded to the amendment, and subsequently moved to strike it off. The court did strike off the amendment: Held, To be error.

Error to the Common Pleas of Schuylkill county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

This was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit et de bonis asportatis.

The original declaration filed, charged the defendant with entering the plaintiff's close, and with cutting down, taking away and converting oak, ash, beach and chestnut trees. After the jury was sworn, by leave of the court, upon the payment of the costs by the plaintiff, and without any exception on the part of the defendant, two separate, additional counts were filed. The one charging the defendant with entering another close of plaintiff's, and taking therefrom, and converting the cord wood and railroad sills. The other with taking and converting white oak, hickory, and black oak logs. The defendant alleged surprise, and the case was continued. To these amended counts the defendant plead not guilty, and the statute of limitations.

More than a year thereafter, another jury was called. After they were sworn, upon motion of defendant's counsel, the court struck off the first amended count, and hickory logs from the second amended count. To this the first assignment of error is made.

The substance of the plaintiff's cause of action was, that the defendant had entered the close of the plaintiff, and had cut thereon, and removed therefrom, and converted, his trees and lumber. They had all been cut upon a piece of land to which the plaintiff had acquired title from the father of the defendant. The plaintiff charged the defendant with a series of trespasses upon it.

The act of 21st March, 1806, permitting amendments, has received a liberal construction. Under it the power of the courts extends to every informality which will "affect the merits of the case" in controversy, except they cannot permit an entirely new cause of action to be introduced. If the plaintiff adheres to the original cause of action, he may add a count substantially different from the declaration. Carsell v. Cooke, 8 S. & R. 268; Yohe v. Robertson, 2 Whar. 155. This right is mandatory upon the courts. Mau's Lessee v. Montgomery et al., 10 S. & R. 192; Sandback v. Quigley, 8 Watts, 460.

In actions ex contractu, so long as the plaintiff adheres to the original instrument or contract on which the declaration is formed, an alteration of the grounds of recovery upon that instrument or contract, or of the modes in which the defendant has violated it, is not an alteration of the cause of action. Coxe v. Tilghman, 1 Whar. 287; Yost v. Eby, 11 Har. 327.

This rule is not restricted to actions ex contractu. In an action of slander, where the words spoken were so defectively set forth as not to be actionable, the declaration may be amended by setting out a good cause of action, provided the words substituted import a charge generally the same. 3 Penn. Rep. 65. In actions ex delicto, the rule is the same; the foundation of the complaint laid in the declaration must be adhered to; but the mode of stating that complaint may be varied by the amendment. Clymer et al. v. Thomas et al., 7 S. & R. 178; Coxe v Tilghman, 1 Whar. 290. Amendments should be liberally allowed; and the test of their propriety is whether they introduced a new cause of action. Steffy v. Carpenter, 1 Wright, 41.

Here the cause of action was for breaking the plaintiff's close, and taking therefrom the timber and lumber. Whether it was taken in the form of trees, or in that of wood, railroad sills or logs, all taken from, and originally forming a part of the trees cut upon the land in question. Whatever the kind of tree might have been, did not substantially change the cause of action. The amendments merely pointed out the additional modes, and more fully described the manner in which the defendant had committed the trespasses and aggravated the damages.

The court, however, had permitted these amendments to be filed, and imposed costs upon the plaintiff in consequence thereof. The defendant made no objections; but received those counts, and plead to the amendments. More than a year thereafter, and after another jury had been sworn in the case, he moved to strike them off. We think the learned judge erred in granting his motion. This view of the case will necessarily make the evidence admissible, which is set forth in the fourth assignment of error. We discover no other errors in the record.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

[Since the act of May 10th, 1871, the court can permit amendments even though the form of action be changed. ED.]

BOWEN v. GOVANFLOW.

An executor who is also a devisee, is a competent witness in an issue devisavit vel non.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lehigh county.

Opinion of the court by MERCUR, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

The first error assigned is as to the competency of the party to testify. He was both a devisee and the executor. It was admitted upon the argument, that if he had been the executor only, he would have been competent under the exception to the proviso of the act of 15th April, 1869, P. L. 30; but inasmuch as he was a devisee also, it was argued that he was incompetent. We are not able to see the force of the reasoning, nor to adopt the conclusion. The language of the exception to the act is to make parties competent "in issues and inquiries devisavit vel non, and others, respecting the right of such deceased owner, between parties claiming such right by devolution, on the death of such owner."

This is an issue devisavit vel non. It is between parties claiming a right by devolution, on the death of the former owner. The subject matter is respecting the right so acquired. Thus, the form of the suit, the parties thereto, and the subject matter bring it within the exception. We see nothing in it to exclude a party who is either a devisee or executor only. A union of two conditions of competency, each unquestioned by itself, will not create incompetency, as its joint product. It follows that both parties, claiming an estate under the same decedent, which has devolved on them by descent or succession, are competent witnesses in the trial of an issue to settle their respective rights thereto. Karns v. Tanner, 16 P. F. Smith, 297.

No error is assigned to the general charge, but the answers of the court to the specific points submitted are assigned for error.

We have carefully examined the whole testimony. All the points submitted are substantially answered in the general charge. It contains a clear and correct statement of the law, as applied to the evidence in the case.

The errors are not sustained.

PALMER v. WILKINSON.

1. Under a plea of nul tiel record to a sci. fa. sur recognizance in an appeal from arbitrators, the defendant cannot show that the costs in the original suit were not paid,
2. If no objection is made to the irregularity of the appeal, and the party appealing effects his object of obtaining another trial, it is too late for his surety to interpose such an irregularity as a bar to a recovery upon the forfeited recognizance.

Error to the Common Pleas of Bucks county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered May 17th, 1873.

This was a sci. fa. sur recognizance. The plaintiff pleaded nul tiel record, and assigned eight reasons therefor. The court sustained the sixth reason, and entered judgment in favor of the defendant. A prior suit had been pending between the plaintiff and one Emerick, in which the plaintiff obtained an award before arbitrators. Upon the twentieth day thereafter, Emerick paid to the prothonotary all the costs except the plaintiff's bill, appealed from the award, and with Wilkinson, the present defendant, entered into a recognizance. That case was subsequently tried, and the plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment for a larger sum than the award. Thereupon, the plaintiff issued this sci. fa. upon the recognizance.

The ground upon which the court sustained the plea was, "That the recognizance was illegal, as was the appeal, because the former was taken, and the latter entered, without the payment of accrued costs."

It is true, one of the requirements of the statute to perfect an appeal from the award of arbitrators is, that all the costs that may have accrued in the suit shall be paid. This fact, however, cannot be inquired into under the plea of nul tiel record. The writ of scire facias is not set forth in the paper book; yet, it is no part of the writ to recite the amount of costs that had accrued prior to the appeal, nor to aver anything in regard to their payment or non-payment. This plea merely puts in issue the existence of the record, as recited in the writ, and therefore is proper only where there is either no record at all, or one different from that upon which the plaintiff has declared. 1 Chit. Plead. 485; Burkholder v. Keller, 2 Barr, 51. The non-payment of a part of the costs was not admissible in evidence under the pleadings. It did not contradict the existence of the record as recited, nor that it differed therefrom This plea puts in issue nothing but the recognizance, the rest being merely inducement, and if the variance is material, it should be specially pleaded. Cooper v. Gray, 10 Watts, 442.

When the taxed costs have not all been paid, through the fault or negligence of the party appealing, the appeal may be stricken off upon the application of the opposite party; but where their non-payment is caused by the exclusive fault of the officer in withholding the knowledge of the existence of a portion of them, the payment of the omitted portion should be enforced by attachment. Fraley v. Nelson, 5 S. & R. 234; Carr v. McGovern, 16 P. F. Smith, 457.

If, however, no objection is made to the irregularity of the appeal, and the party appealing effects his object of securing another trial, it is then too late for him or his surety to interpose such an irregularity as a bar to a recovery upon the forfeited recognizance.

The ground upon which the learned judge predicated his action being untenable, and being unable to discover, in the other reasons assigned to sustain the plea, any cause to sustain the judgment, it must be reversed.

Judgment reversed, and judgment is entered in favor of the plaintiff.

NEW ORLEANS v. GAINES.

1. Where a master on reference has followed the order of the judgment and enforced its directions, no objection can be taken, on appeal, to what he has done, when the appeal arises upon exceptions to his report, and not on objection to the original judgment under which the reference to him was made.
2. Though by the law of Louisiana, a defendant ordered by judicial decree to restore possession of real estate which it has been adjudged that he has held mala fide during his whole term of possession, have a right if the party recovering as true owner desire to retain improvements which the possessor mala fide has put on them, to demand the value of the materials and price of workmanship of such improvements; yet, where in a peculiar and complicated case, in which specific amounts and estimates were not possible to be made, and the case had to be adjusted largely on a system of equitable compensations—if the party finally dispossessed, have, by the decree, received in fact and good conscience, the value of his improvements, the court will not allow him to call for another and more specific payment.
3. The possessor in continuous bad faith, of real estate which the owner at last recovers, is chargeable, under the claim of mesne profits, with what the premises are reasonably worth annually, and interest on them to the time of the trial. An allowance of five per cent. interest in a Louisiana case, held to have been proper. On a claim for mesne profits by the owner against a possessor in continous bad faith, there is nothing in the civil code of Louisiana which limits the claim to profits for three years. On the contrary, the rule of English equity there prevails; and the decree is properly made of profits from the time that the complainant's title accrued. In the present case, the profits of fifteen years were given, with interest on them at five per cent.

Appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court, for the District of Louisiana, the case being thus:

In the year 1856 Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines filed a bill in the court below against the city of New Orleans, in which she sought to recover valuable real estate in New Orleans owned by one Daniel Clark, including a certain block or square described, on which a draining-house and out buildings, with a draining-machine for draining the city, was now and had been for many years situated.

The bill alleged that she was the only and legitimate child of Clark; that Clark had left a valid will, made in 1813, by which he devised all his estate to her; that this will having been lost or destroyed, and she a minor till 1827, and ignorant of her parentage and rights, a provisional will dated in 1811, of which Richard Relf and Beverly Chew were executors, and Clark's mother, Mary Clark, was universal legatee, was admitted to probate and ordered to be executed; that the will of 1813, which revoked the will of 1811, was subsequently found, and in 1856, established; that Relf and Chew, under pretended authority as executors of Clark and as attorneys in fact of his mother, had, in 1821, without right or authority, and in bad faith, sold this lot and others at public auction to one Evariste Blanc; that Blanc, equally without right or authority, and in bad faith, had sold it and others, by act of sale, on the 26th of September, 1834, to the city of New Orleans; that the city had notice of the fraudulent character of the proceedings of Relf and Chew, &c., and of the worthlessness of the title, &c., which they acquired. The bill payed a delivery of the property and an account of the rents and profits.

After a long and expensive litigation, including an appeal to this court; Mrs. Gaines succeeded in her case. See Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wallace, 642; and in pursuance of a mandate from this court, the court below, in June, 1870, entered a decree in her favor; decreeing that she was Clark's only legitimate child, and as his universal legatee was entitled to the lots in question; that the sale by Relf and Chew, and that also by Evariste Blanc was wholly unauthorized and illegal, and utterly null and void; and that the city of New Orleans at the time it purchased the property was bound to take notice of the circumstances which rendered the actings and doings of Chew and Relf in the premises utterly null and void, and "ought to be deemed and held, and was thereby deemed and held, to have purchased the property in question with full notice that the sale at auction, under the pretended authority of the said Richard Relf and Beverly Chew, and the said act of sale to the said Evariste Blanc were unauthorized, illegal, null, and void, and in derogation and fraud of the persons entitled to the succession of Daniel Clark. The court further decreed that Mrs. Gaines, as Clark's only and legitimate child and universal legatee, was entitled to the property with all the yearly rents and profits accruing from it since it came into possession of the city, on the 26th of September, 1834, and decreeing an account accordingly, referred it to the master to take the same.

The master reported that the city had never rented the lot on which the draining-house and machinery was built, nor received from it any rents or profits, except by an increase of the city revenue, brought about by the fact that the draining-machine had drained a large part of the city, and by making it of use, had largely augmented the property in the city that was taxed. While, therefore, he "found it difficult to fix the amounts of rents and profits for which the city was liable on this lot," he presented certain facts and figures from which the court could reach an equitable result. These were thus: The city, it was estimated, had received from increased taxation of other property, during the term embraced by the order (including interest), $208,825.

Now, this particular lot of land, it was testified, was originally worth $200. The buildings erected by the city, independent of the machinery, cost $18,000. The putting up of the machinery was finished July 1st, 1835 or 1836 (some witnesses testifying to the one year and some to the other), and it was testified that a fair rental of the land and building was $2,400 a year. The expense of repairs was $500.

The master, accordingly—disallowing to the city the benefit of the "prescription of three years," which it set up against the claim for rents—charged the city on this basis:

Rental value from July 1st 1835, to Nov. 1st, 1870....	$84,800 00
Interest on the rents at five per cent.....	72,800 00	$157,600 00
And allowed the city:
Expenses of repairs.....	$17,166 66
Interest on repairs.....	15,166 55	32,333 21
And thus made the City chargeable with the difference.....		$125,266 79

On exceptions to his report, one of them was that as the draining-machine and buildings necessary therefor were made and erected by the city, with materials belonging to it, the only right of Mrs. Gaines as to them was, either to keep the same, and reimburse to the city their value and the price of workmanship, or to require the city to take away or demolish them; that the obligation, under the law of Louisiana, rested upon Mrs. Gaines to elect which she would do; and that the city had demanded of her, through the master, that she should make such election, and that the master refused to direct or require her so to do, and thus denied the city its rights under the law.

The master to this reported that the city, by its counsel, had cited article 500 of the civil code of Louisiana before him, and stated that it would call upon the complainant (then present) to elect whether she would keep said works, and improvements placed upon the land by the city, or pay the city for the same; and the master added that he had "regarded this as a mere notice of what the defendant intended to do at some future time, but as the point was not presented in writing, nor subsequently alluded to, he had assumed that it had been abandoned."

In this state of things, and after the disallowance of some other exceptions, the report came before the Circuit Court, Bradly, J. After examining those exceptions, the learned justice came to the main matter, the allowance of the $125,266.76. On that subject he said:

"The case of the city is a peculiar one. The estimation of the rents and profits in that case is so uncertain and speculative, that I do not feel entirely satisfied as to the decision that should be made. The master evidently felt the same embarrassment."

And after referring to the different estimates made by the master, and specially to the one above given, the learned justice said:

"As the master has not signified his adoption of either of these estimates, but has stated the facts to the court for its equitable determination, I have come to the conclusion that it would be equitable and just to set off the profits derived by the city from the draining-machine for the past thirty-five years against the cost of constructions and repairs, and to charge the city with the rents of the building and lands, less the ordinary repairs of the buildings, amounting, as shown by the report, to the sum of $125,266.76. Whilst the profits and advantages of the drainage-machine were indefinite and uncertain in amount, there is no doubt of their reality, nor, if we can place any reliance upon the estimates, is there any doubt of their being amply sufficient to reimburse the city for all its expenditures, including even the rent with which it is charged."

The learned justice of the Circuit Court accordingly ordered a confirmation of the report. From that decree this appeal came.

Messrs. Miles Taylor and J. McConnell for the appellant (suggesting that whereas the draining-machine was finished July 1st, in 1836, and that alone gave the land a value for rent, a charge for one year too much had in any view, been made), insisted upon certain exceptions, as follows:

1st. That the decree was erroneous in that it had the effect of giving to the complainant the buildings and machinery erected by the city, with the materials, and at the expense of the city, without paying the value of the materials and the cost of the workmanship, or any other price whatever.

2d. That the sum of the rents and profits above stated, was made up in part by the allowance of interest, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, on each year's rent, from the end of the year. This, it was argued, was in violation of the doctrines of the code of Louisiana, of 1825, as shown in its articles 1939 and 1905.

3d. That the refusal to allow the plea of prescription in bar of all rents or profits for the use of the square, which were received by the city more than three years anterior to the institution of the suit on the 26th of December, 1856, was an error.

Messrs. J. Emott and J. Q. A. Fellowes, contra.

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the court.

The appeal before the court arises upon exceptions to the master's report only, and not to the original judgment.

1st. It is only where the master or the judge in acting upon his report, has departed from the order of the judgment, or has omitted to enforce its provisions, that a just objection can arise. The judgment has decided that the plaintiff was the owner of this property in question in 1834, when the defendant entered into its possession; that then and at all times since the defendant has illegally kept the plaintiff out of its possession, and has itself been in its possession during the same period, and that it obtained and during all this time held such possession wrongfully and in bad faith.

This statement furnishes an answer to the suggestion that the rents and profits were allowed for one year, during which the city was not in possession. This is not an open question. It is settled by the judgment, and the allowance is in accordance with the decision.

It is also decided, "that the city of New Orleans ought to be deemed and held, and is hereby deemed and held, to have purchased the property in question with full notice that the said sale at auction, under the pretended authority of the said Richard Relf and Beverly Chew, and the said act of sale to the said Evariste Blanc, were unauthorized, illegal, null, and void, and in derogation and fraud of the rights of the person or persons entitled to the succession of the said Daniel Clark." This sale to Evariste Blanc was the source from which the city derived its title to the property in question. During the whole time of its holding, the city was a possessor in bad faith of the property of the plaintiff. The civil code of Louisiana declares as follows:

"ARTICLE 3414. The possessor in good faith is he who has just reason to believe himself the master of the thing which he possesses, although he may not be in fact, as happens to him who buys a thing which he supposes to belong to the person selling it to him, but which in fact belongs to another.

"ARTICLE 3415. The possessor in bad faith is he who possesses as master, but who assumes this quality, when he well knows that he has no title to the thing, or that his title is vicious and defective."

By the same code, a possessor in good faith may enjoy the fruits of the property until it is claimed by the owner, and is bound to account only from the time of a demand for restitution. He is also entitled, when evicted, to be reimbursed for the expenses he may have incurred on it. Article 3416.

To the same purport are articles 500 and 501.

"When plantations, constructions, and works have been made by a third person, and with such person's own materials, the owner of the soil has a right to keep them, or compel this third person to take away or demolish the same. If the owner requires the demolition of such works, they shall be demolished at the expense of the person who erected them, without any compensation; such person may even be sentenced to pay damages, if the case require it, for the prejudice which the owner of the soil may have sustained. If the owner keeps the works, he owes to the owner of the materials nothing but the reimbursement of their value, and of the price of workmanship, without any regard to the greater or less value which the soil may have acquired thereby.

"Nevertheless, if the plantations, edifices, or works have been done by a third person evicted, but not sentenced to make restitution of the fruits, because such person possessed bona fide, the owner shall not have a right to demand the demolition of the works, plantation, or edifices, but he shall have his choice either to reimburse the value of the materials, and the price of the workmanship, or to reimburse a sum equal to the enhanced value of the soil."

The case of the present defendant is an instance where the works were done, not by one not sentenced to make restitution because such person possessed bona fide, but by one who was sentenced to make restitution, and who was expressly adjudged to possess mala fide.

Mrs. Gaines, therefore, had the right to keep the improvements upon reimbursing their value and the price of the workmanship, or to compel the city to demolish and remove them. She has not been called upon legally to elect which course she would adopt. On the hearing an oral notice was given that she would be called upon to elect, which the master understood to be in the future, and not a present notice. The matter was never again presented, and the master considered the subject as abandoned. She may now properly rest upon her right to have the works demolished and removed. This would give the city the value of the materials only as taken down at its own expense and when separated from their position upon the land. This allowance has, however, already been made to the city. In the opinion of the judge at the circuit he uses this language: "I have come to the conclusion that it would be equitable and just to set off the profits derived by the city from the drainage-machine for the past thirty-five years against the cost of construction and repairs. . . . Whilst the profits and advantages (he says) of the drainage-machine are uncertain and indefinite in amount, there is no doubt of their reality, nor, if we can place any reliance upon the estimates, is there any doubt of their being amply sufficient to reimburse the city for all its expenditures, including even the rent with which it is charged."

It is evident from this statement that there has been already allowed to the city a sum not only equal to the value of the materials of the improvements, if they were demolished, but of their actual cost. The city has, therefore, no cause of complaint on this score, and the point under consideration must be held against it.

2. The question of the allowance of interest on the items of rent was not made before the master or before the judge at the circuit, and is not properly before us. Interest was allowed at the rate of five per cent., the rate fixed by the code of Louisiana. In Vandevoort v. Gould, 36 New York, 639, 647, it was adjudged that mesne profits consist of what the premises are reasonably worth annually, with the interest to the time of the trial. "Less than this," it is said, "would not give the plaintiff full and complete indemnity for the injury to his rights." Such is also the express declaration of article 1939 of the civil code of Louisiana.

The articles of the code, 1939 and 1905, are not, as it is urged, in hostility to this principle. The latter by its terms relates to contracts. By the former, liens which are due for the restitution of profits bear interest from the day the debtor was in default. By the judgment it is found that the city held this property wrongfully from the outset, and thus (which is the only sense in which the word can here be used) was in default continually.

The remaining question to be considered is upon the allowance of the plea of prescription. It is alleged as error that the plea of prescription was not allowed in bar of the claim for all the rents and profits which had accrued more than three years prior to the commencement of the action. The civil code enumerates as causes of action which are the subject of the prescription of three years—"the action for arrearages of rent charge, annuities and alimony, or of the hire of movables or immovables." Article 3503. "In general all personal actions except those above enumerated are prescribed by ten years, if the creditor be present, and by twenty years if he be absent." Article 3508.

These articles do not govern the present case. They prescribe actions which the party had the legal right to bring. They do not apply to rights like the present, which result from the determination of another action. Until the decree in the main suit there was here no existing cause of action to recover the mesne profits. No special action could be maintained for them until the title to the property should be judicially determined. It is controlled rather by the title "Of the Right of Accession to what is produced by the thing." Civil Code, 490–494.

"Fruits of the earth, whether spontaneous or cultivated, belong to the proprietor by right of accession." Article 490.

"The fruits of the thing belong to its owner, although they may have been produced by the work and labor of a third person, or from seeds sown by him, on the owner's reimbursing such person for his expenses." Ib. 493.

"The produce of the thing does not belong to the simple possessor, and must be returned with the thing to the owner who claims the same, unless the possessor held it bona fide." Ib. 494.

Speaking strictly, there was not only no cause of action, but no right to the mesne profits until the judgment in the original suit.

There is no article of the code to which our attention is called which limits this claim to the profits for three years. On the contrary, the rules of the civil law and the general principles of equity jurisprudence hold that there is no such limit. It will be observed that this question does not involve the allowance for improvements or to its extent. That point has been already disposed of, and the defendant has been allowed for the improvements and beneficial structures made by it during the term. We are now endeavoring to ascertain whether the recovery for the rents and profits which have been adjudged to be paid shall be limited as required by the defendant.

The rule is thus laid down in Justinian:

"If any man shall have purchased or by any other means honestly acquired lands from another whom he believed to be the true owner, when in fact he was not, it is agreeable to natural reason that the fruits which he shall have gathered shall become his own on account of his care in the culture; and therefore if the true owner afterwards appear and claim his lands he can have no action against the bona fide possessor for produce consumed. But this exemption is not granted to him who knowingly keeps possession of another's estate, and therefore he is compellable to account for all the mense profits, together with the land." Justinian Inst., lib. 2, tit. 1, § 35.

The chancery rule is thus laid down in Peere Williams: Bennet v. Whitehead, 2 Peere Williams, 645.

"Where one is in possession of lands belonging to an infant, if the infant when of age makes out his title, he shall recover the profits in equity from the first accruing of his title, and not from the filing of the bill only. So the defendant shall account for the profits from the time the plaintiff's title accrued, and not from the filing of the bill only, if the defendant has concealed the deeds and writings making out the plaintiff's title."

In Dormer v. Fortescue, 3 Atkyns, 128, Lord Hardwicke says:

"There are several cases where the court does decree an account of rents and profits, and that from the time the title accrued, as where there is a trust and an equitable title merely, or where a widow claims dower merely, but needs the aid of chancery to find out the lands, the court will give her the profits not only from the time of the demand, but from the time of her title accrued."

In the case before him he decreed an account upon these principles, for a period of fifteen years.

The present action was commenced by Mrs. Gaines nearly seventeen years ago. It was a bill in equity praying for a discovery, for an accounting for rents and profits, and for general relief. After much tribulation she has reached the point of an accounting, which the defendant has brought before us on appeal. We think there is no prescription of the rents and profits, but that the allowance in this respect was properly made.

Upon the whole case we are of the opinion that the decree or order upon the master's report must be affirmed, and the exceptions thereto disallowed.

CALDWELL v. HARTUPEE & CO., for use.

A trust-mortgage was made to Caldwell to secure, amongst others, a debt of Hartupee, who owed a firm of which Caldwell was a partner. Hartupee gave an order on Caldwell in favor of Cuthbert; on presentation Caldwell refused to pay Cuthbert, saying he would pay Hartupee's debt to his firm from what he was entitled to under the mortgage. At the trial Caldwell's partner consented that the firm's claim might be set off to Hartupee's claim against Caldwell. Held, that the order was an equitable assignment to Cuthbert, and he might recover from Caldwell.

VAN OHLEN'S APPEAL.

1. B., the owner of a tract of land, conveyed part of it to H. by metes and bounds, a parenthesis in the deed, saying the north "line to be the centre of a public road not more than 40 feet wide to be laid out and opened, diverging towards the valley of Snyder's run, or to run on said line as a centre up the hill as far, &c., provided, required by said B., his heirs or assigns." Held, that this was not a fixed and certain reservation, nor absolute in its nature.

2. The reservation was a power preserved by B. to himself to lay out a road along or near the line.

3. B. afterwards conveyed to C. part of the same tract on the north of the line and adjoining it; and to M. another part east of the first tract and of the end of the line: Held, 1. That M. could not enforce the opening of the road. 2. That H. could not enforce the opening on the north side of the line.

4. The reservation is governed by the property described in it as the property of B.; not by the fact that he was at the time owner of other property outside of that thus described.

NEEL'S APPEAL.

1. In partition, there being an executor the court appointed a stranger, trustee, to make sale of the premises. It being within the discretion of the court to determine whether the executor had neglected or refused to execute the order of sale, it was to be presumed that he had, notwithstanding his subsequent allegation that he had not.

2. The Supreme Court will not review the exercise of such discretion, unless it appear on the face of the record that there was a palpable and gross abuse of the discretion.

3. A widow refused to take under her husband's will, and in 1867 petitioned for proceedings in partition to set out her dower; an inquest was awarded, but the proceedings were stayed on the application of the executor, so that he might sell for the payment of debts. Orders were granted to him for that purpose, but he failed to sell. In 1870, the widow presented a petition reciting all the former proceedings, and praying the court to revoke the stay of the proceedings in partition, &c. Held, that the act of April 20th, 1869, gave the court jurisdiction to proceed, notwithstanding there was no assent of the parties interested; her petition of 1870 being treated as a new petition.

2. The agreement, reciting that it had been made on the basis of a draft, then before the parties, stated the location of the tracts within the blocks, and was offered as an admission of Barton, under whom the plaintiff claimed, of the location of the land in dispute, the draft not being produced or accounted for: Held, inadmissible without the draft.

3. The defendants offered in evidence the record of an ejectment by Barton against other parties for other lands—the record containing a bill of exceptions—on the ground that the testimony in that case was evidence of the admissions of Barton as to the location of the lands: Held, to be inadmissible; the testimony of a party's witnesses in one suit not being evidence against him in another suit for a different subject.

Supreme Court United States.

OLCOTT v. SUPERVISORS OF FOND DU LAC CO.

1. The Supreme Court of the United States will follow the decisions of the State courts only in local questions peculiar to themselves, or respecting the construction of their own constitution and laws.
2. Whether a use is public or private is not such a question. It is one of general law.
3. If a contract when made, was valid under the constitution and laws of a State, as they had been previously expounded by its judicial tribunals, and as they were understood at the time, no subsequent action by the Legislature or the judiciary will be regarded by this court as establishing its invalidity.
4. A railroad is a public highway. A State may impose a tax to build a railroad, even though it be owned by a private corporation.
5. An act of the Legislature of Illinois, authorizing the issue of county orders for money to aid in the building of a railroad, was a proper exercise of legislative authority, and the county is liable on such orders issued by it.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States, for the Eastern District of Wisconsin.

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

The county orders or promissory notes of the county, which are the foundation of this suit, were all issued on the 18th day of February, 1869, and were made payable to the Sheboygan and Fond du Lac Railroad Company, or bearer. They were issued in pursuance to an act of Assembly of the State, approved April 10th, 1867, entitled "An act to authorize the county of Fond du Lac to aid the completion of the Sheboygan and Fond du Lac Railroad, and aid the building of a railroad from the city of Fond du Lac to the city of Ripon." By that act the officers of the county were authorized to issue the orders to the railroad company, in case a popular vote, therein directed, should be in favor of railroad aid, and whether this act was a lawful exercise of constitutional power is the only question in the case. In the court below the jury was instructed, in substance, that the issue of the orders was unauthorized and void, and that the act of Assembly above referred to, was an unconstitutional exercise of legislative power. No other question was made at the trial, and no other is presented to us for our determination.

At the outset we are met by the fact that the Supreme Court of the State has decided the act was unauthorized by the constitution. It was thus ruled in Whiting v. Fond du Lac County, reported in 25 Wiscon. 188. If that decision is binding upon the Federal courts, if it has established a rule which we are under obligations to follow, the matter is settled. It is undoubtedly true in general, that this court does follow the decisions of the highest courts of the States respecting local questions peculiar to themselves, or respecting the construction of their own constitutions and laws. But it must be kept in mind that it is only decisions upon local questions, those which are peculiar to the several States, or adjudications upon the meaning of the constitution or statutes of a State, which the Federal courts adopt as rules for their own judgment.

That Whiting v. Fond du Lac County was not a determination of any question of local law, is manifest. It is not claimed to have been that. But it is relied upon as having given a construction to the constitution of the State. Very plainly, however, such was not its character or effect. The question considered by the court was not one of interpretation or construction. The meaning of no provision of the State constitution was considered or declared. What was considered was the uses for which taxation generally, taxation by any government, might be authorized, and particularly whether the construction and maintenance of a railroad, owned by a corporation is a matter of public concern. It was asserted (what nobody doubts) 'that the taxing power of a State extends no farther than to raise money for a public use, as distinguished from private, or to accomplish some end, public in its nature; and it was decided that building a railroad, if it be constructed and owned by a corporation, though built by authority of the State, is not a matter in which the public has any interest of such a nature as to warrant taxation in its aid. For this reason it was held that the State had no power to authorize the imposition of taxes to aid in the construction of such a railroad, and therefore that the statute giving Fond du Lac county power to extend such aid was invalid. This was a determination of no local question, or question of statutory or constitutional construction. It was not decided that the Legislature had not general legislative power; or that it might not impose or authorize the imposition of taxes for any public use. Now, whether an use is public or private, is not a question of constitutional construction. It is a question of general law. It has as much reference to the constitution of any other State as it has to the State of Wisconsin. Its solution must be sought, not in the decisions of any single State tribunal, but in general principles common to all courts. The nature of taxation, what uses are public and what are private, and the extent of unrestricted legislative power, are matters which, like questions of commercial law, no State court can conclusively determine for us. This consideration alone satisfies our minds that Whiting v. Fond du Lac County furnishes no rule which should control our judgment, though the case is undoubtedly entitled to great respect.

There is another consideration that leads directly to the same conclusion. This court has always ruled that if a contract, when made, was valid under the constitution and laws of a State, as they had been previously expounded by its judicial tribunals, and as they were understood at the time, no subsequent action by the Legislature or the judiciary will be regarded by this court as establishing its invalidity. Havemeyer v. Iowa City, 3 Wallace, 294; Gelpcke v. The City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175; Ohio Life and Trust Company v. Detroit, 16 How. 432. Such a rule is based upon the highest principles of justice. Parties have a right to contract, and they do contract, in view of the law as declared to them when their engagements are formed. Nothing can justify us in holding them to any other rule. If, then, the doctrine asserted in Whiting v. Fond du Lac County is inconsistent with what was the recognized law of the State when the county orders were issued, we are under no obligation to accept it and apply it to this case. The orders were issued in February, 1869, and it was not until 1870 that the Supreme Court of the State decided that the uses for which taxation was authorized by the statute of April 10th, 1867, were not public uses, and, therefore, that the statute was invalid. Prior to 1870 it seems to have been as well settled in Wisconsin as elsewhere that the construction of a railway was a matter of public concern, and not the less so because done by a private corporation. That the State might authorize such an improvement, and exercise its right of eminent domain, therefore, was beyond question. Yet, confessedly, it could neither take property, or tax for such a purpose, unless the use for which the property was taken, or the tax collected, was a public one. And it was also the undoubted law of the State that building a railroad or a canal, by any incorporated company, was an act done for a public use, and thus the power of the Legislature to delegate to such a company, the State right of eminent domain, was justified. In Pratt v. Bowen, 3 Wis. 612, it was said by the Supreme Court of the State that the incorporation of companies for the purpose of constructing railroads or canals, affords the best illustration of the delegation of power to exercise the right of eminent domain by the condemnation and seizure of private property for public use upon making just compensation therefor. It is admitted that the only principle upon which such delegation of power can be justified, is that the property taken by these companies is taken for the public use. Similar language was used, and a decision to the same effect was made in Robins v. The Railroad Company, 6 Wis. 641. In Hasbrook v. Milwaukee, 13 Wis. 13, a case where the right to tax for the improvement of a harbor was under consideration, the court used this significant language:

The power of municipal corporations, when authorized by the Legislature to engage in works of internal improvement, such as the building of railroads, canals, harbors, and the like, or to loan their credit in aid thereof, and to defray the expenses of such improvements, make good their pledges by an exercise of the power of taxing the persons and property of their citizens, has always been sustained on the ground that such works, although they are in general operated and controlled by private corporations, are, nevertheless, by reason of the facilities which they afford for trade, commerce, and intercommunication between different and distant portions of the country, indispensable to the public interests and public functions. It was originally supposed that they would add, and subsequent experience demonstrated that they have added vastly, and almost immeasurably, to the general business, the commercial prosperity, and the pecuniary resources of the inhabitants of cities, towns, villages, and rural districts through which they pass, and with which they are connected. It is, in iew of these results, the public good thus produced, and the benefits thus conferred upon the persons and property of all the individuals composing the community, that courts have been able to pronounce them matters of public concern, for the accomplishment of which the taxing power might lawfully be called into action. It is in this sense that they are said to fall so far within the purposes for which municipal corporations are created, that such corporations may engage in, or pledge their credit for their construction.

So also in Soens v. Racine, 10 Wis. 280, where the validity of a law, authorizing a local tax to secure the lake shore was in question, the court discussed at length the nature of a public use for which taxation was lawful, and ruled that the use was a public one, though only the property of some inhabitants of the city was saved, remarking that to determine whether a matter is a public or merely private concern, we have not to determine whether or not the interests of some individuals will be directly promoted, but whether those of the whole or the greater part of the community will be. And again, in Brodhead v. Milwaukee, 19 Wisconsin, 652, the court said:

The Legislature cannot create a public debt, or levy a tax, or authorize a municipal corporation to do so, in order to raise funds for a mere private purpose. It cannot, in the form of a tax, take the money of a citizen and give it to an individual, the public interest or welfare being in no way connected with the transaction. The objects for which the money is raised by taxation must be public, and such as subserve the common interest and well-being of the community required to contribute. * * * *

To justify the court in arresting the proceedings and declaring the tax void, the absence of all possible public interest in the purpose for which the funds are raised must be clear and palpable; so clear and palpable as to be perceptible by every mind at the first blush.

See also Clark v. Janesville, 10 Wis. 136, and Bushnell v. Beloit, Ib. 195.

All these expositions of the law of the State were made by the highest court before the county orders now in suit were issued. They certainly did assert that building a railroad, whether built by the State or by a corporation created by the State for that purpose, was a matter of public concern, and that, because it was a public use, the right of eminent domain might be exerted or delegated for it, and taxation might be authorized for its aid. It was the declared law of the State, therefore, when the bonds now in suit were issued, that the use of railroads, though built by private corporations, were public uses, such as warranted the exercise of the public right of eminent domain in their aid, and also the power of taxation. We are not then, concluded by a decision, made in 1870, that such public uses are not of a nature to justify the imposition of taxes. We are at liberty to inquire what are public uses, and what restrictions, if any, are imposed upon the State's taxing power.

It is not claimed that the constitution of Wisconsin contains any express denial of power in the Legislature to authorize municipal corporations to aid in the construction of railroads, or to impose taxes for that purpose. The entire legislative power of the State is confessedly vested in the General Assembly. An implied inhibition only is asserted. It is insisted that as the State cannot itself impose taxes for any other than a public use, so the Legislature cannot empower a municipal division of the State to levy and collect taxes for any other than such an use, and it is denied that taxation to enable the county of Fond du Lac to aid in the completion of the Sheboygan and Fond du Lac Railroad, is taxation for a public use. No one contends that the power of a State to tax, or to authorize taxation, is not limited by the uses to which the proceeds may be devoted. Undoubtedly, taxes may not be laid for a private use. But is the construction of a railroad by a company incorporated by a State for the purpose of building it, and endowed with the State's right of eminent domain, a thing in which the State has, as such, no interest? That the Legislature of Wisconsin may alter or repeal the charter granted to the Sheboygan and Fond du Lac Railroad Company, is certain. This is a power reserved by the constitution. The railroad can, therefore, be controlled and regulated by the State. Its use can be defined; its tolls and rates for transportation may be limited. Is a work made by authority of the State, subject thus to its regulation, and having for its object an increase of public convenience, to be regarded as ordinary private property?

That railroads, though constructed by private corporations and owned by them, are public highways, has been the doctrine of nearly all the courts ever since such conveniences for passage and transportation have had any existence. Very early the question arose whether a State's right of eminent domain could be exercised by a private corporation created for the purpose of constructing a railroad. Clearly it could not, unless taking land for such a purpose by such an agency is taking land for public use. The right of eminent domain nowhere justifies taking property for a private use. Yet it is a doctrine universally accepted that a State Legislature may authorize a private corporation to take land for the construction of such a road, making compensation to the owner. What else does this doctrine mean, if not that building a railroad, though it be built by a private corporation, is an act done for a public use? And the reason why the use has always been held a public one, is that such a road is an highway, whether made by the government itself, or by the agency of corporate bodies, or even individuals when they obtain their power to construct it from legislative grant. It would be useless to cite the numerous decisions to this effect which have been made in the State courts. We may, however, refer to two or three which exhibit fully not only the doctrine itself, but the reasons upon which it rests. Beekman v. The Saratoga and Schenectady R. R. Co., 3 Paige, 45; Blodgett v. Mohawk and Hudson R. R. Co., 18 Wendell, 1; Worcester v. R. R. Co., Met. 556.

Whether the use of a railroad is a public or a private one, depends in no measure upon the question who constructed it, or who owns it. It has never been considered a matter of any importance that the road was built by the agency of a private corporation. No matter who is the agent, the function performed is that of the State. Though the ownership is private, the use is public. So turnpikes, bridges, ferries, and canals, although made by individuals, under public grants, or by companies, are regarded as publici juris. The right to exact tolls or charge freights is granted for a service to the public. The owners may be private companies, but they are compellable to permit the public to use their works in the manner in which such works can be used. Charles River Bridge Company v. Warren, 7 Pick. 495. That all persons may not put their own cars upon the road, and use their own motive power, has no bearing upon the question whether the road is a public highway. It bears only upon the mode of use, of which the Legislature is the exclusive judge. Cooley's Const. Lim.

It is unnecessary, however, to pursue this branch of the inquiry further, for it is not seriously denied that a railroad, though constructed and owned by a private corporation, is a matter of public concern, and that its uses are so far public that the right of eminent domain of the State may be exerted to facilitate its construction. But it is contended that though the purpose and use may be public, sufficiently to justify taking private property, they are not public when the right to impose taxes is asserted. It is argued that there are differences between the power of taxation and the power of taking private property for a public use, and that because of these differences it does not follow that wherever the one power may be exerted the other can. We do not care to inquire whether this is so or not. The question now is whether if a railroad, built and owned by a private corporation, is for a public use, because it is an highway, taxes may not be imposed in furtherance of that use. If there be any purpose for which taxation would seem to be legitimate, it is the making and maintenance of highways. They have always been governmental affairs, and it has ever been recognized as one of the most important duties of the State to provide and care for them. Taxation for such uses has been immemorially imposed. When, therefore, it is settled that a railroad is an highway for public uses, there can be no substantial reason why the power of the State to tax may not be exerted in its behalf. It is said that railroads are not public highways per se; that they are only declared such by the decisions of the courts, and that they have been declared public only with respect to the power of eminent domain. This is a mistake. In their very nature they are public highways. It needed no decision of courts to make them such. True they must be used in a peculiar manner, and under certain restrictions, but they are facilities for passage and transportation, afforded to the public, of which the public has a right to avail itself. As well might it be said a turnpike is an highway, only because declared such by judicial decision. A railroad built by a State, no one claims, would be anything else than a public highway, justifying taxation for its construction and maintenance, though it could be no more open to public use than is a road built and owned by a corporation. Yet it is the purpose and the uses of a work which determine its character. And if the purpose is one for which the State may properly levy a tax upon its citizens at large, its Legislature has the power to apportion and impose the duty, or confer the power of assuming it upon the municipal divisions of the State. Cooley's Const. Limitations, 226. And surely, it cannot be maintained that ownership by the public, or by the State of the thing in behalf of which taxation is imposed, is necessary to justify the imposition. There are many acknowledged public uses that have no relation to ownership. Indeed, most public expenditures are for purposes apart from any proprietorship of the State. A public use may, indeed, consist in the possession, occupation, and enjoyment of property by the public, or agents of the public, but it is not necessarily so. Even in regard to common roads, generally, the public has no ownership of the soil, no right of possession or occupation. It has a mere right of passage. While, then, it may be true that ownership of property may sometimes bear upon the question whether the uses of the property are public, it is not the test.

The argument most earnestly urged against the constitutionalty of the act is that it attempted to authorize Fond du Lac county to assist the railroad company by a donation. It stoutly contended that the Legislature could not authorize the county to impose taxes to enable it to make a donation in aid of the construction of the railroad, even if its ultimate uses are public. But why not? If the county can be empowered to aid the work because it is a public use, what difference can it make in what mode the aid be extended? It is conceded that in Wisconsin, municipal corporations may be authorized to become subscribers to the stock of private railroad companies, and to raise money by taxation to meet bonds given in payment of the subscriptions. This has been decided by the highest court of the State. Clark v. Janesville, 10 Wis. 136; Bushnell v. Beloit, Ib. 195. And the reasons given for the decision are, not that the municipal bodies acquired property rights by their subscriptions, or that they thereby obtained partial control of the railroad companies, but that subscriptions to the stock were a mode of aiding a work in which the public had an interest, a work of such a nature that it might properly be aided by taxation. Never was the right to tax supposed to rest in any degree upon anything else. Whether the stock had value or not was not even considered. Equally with the taxation, the municipal subscription could be justified only because it was for a public use. If taxation is invalid because laid for a private use, the nature of the use cannot be changed by receiving stock for the money raised. There is no substantial difference in principle between aid given to a railroad company by subscription to its stock, and aid given by donations of money or land. The burden upon the country may be the same in whichever mode the aid is given, and the uses promoted are precisely the same. And the courts have never attempted to make any distinction in the cases; certainly not until the case of Whiting v. Fond du Lac, and even then no real difference is shown. On the other hand, the power to tax for the purpose of making donations in aid of railroads built by private corporations has been affirmed. Gibbons v. Mobile and Great Northern R. R. Co., 36 Ala. 410; Davidson et al. v. Commissioners of Ramsey County, Minn. We have, however, considered this subject in the case of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy R. R. v. The County of Otoe, and nothing more need be said. What we have already remarked is sufficient to show that in our opinion the act of the Legislature of Wisconsin, approved April 10th, 1867, was a constitutional exercise of legislative power, and consequently that the Circuit Court erred in instructing the jury that it was unconstitutional and void, and in directing a verdict for the defendants.

The judgment is reversed, and the record is remitted, with instructions to award a venire de novo.

PARTRIDGE v. THE INSURANCE COMPANY.

1. An agent of an insurance company who had been engaged in a State different from that where it was situated, in soliciting business for it, and getting fixed commissions on all premiums which actually came into his hands—his right to all which was not questioned in the suit—being a little put out at other agents being sent into the same State, inquired of the company by letter what his "status" was, "if the State agency is open to the trial of candidates?" To this the company replied in writing: "Your status is simply this—you are working up a business for yourself, and are paid the highest commissions which we pay." Held, the agent being afterwards discharged from the company's service, that he could not prove by witnesses that the phrase in the company's letter had a technical meaning, and that there was an usage between insurance companies and their agents in the place where the agency was, that all agents should have the right to solicit and cause policies to be issued according to the published rules of the company, and to collect all premiums on renewal thereof during the time the policy was in force, and that if the agent was discharged without sufficient cause, and against his will, he was entitled to be paid immediately the present value of his commissions, calculated by the actuarial rule used to value policies. The ground of the holding was that the language of the letter was neither ambiguous nor technical, and that to suffer such evidence to go in would have established by a parol a new term to a written contract.
2. Where, in proceedings in State courts, the laws of a State allow a set-off pleaded to be interposed and tried in the same suit with the claim against which it is pleaded, the same thing may be done when the suit is brought or transferred into the Federal courts from them.

Error to the Circuit Court for the District of Missouri; the case apparently having been thus:

In January, 1867, one Winslow being agent for the State of Missouri of the Phœnix Mutual Life Insurance Company of Hartford, Connecticut, in the business of soliciting persons to insure and keep insured in that company, Partridge made an arrangement with him to go into partnership with him in the agency; and Winslow having written to the company accordingly, the company in reply tell him that there was a Mr. Jones—"now the company's agent for Minnesota, and a man second to none in the West for energy and sound judgment"—who was very sanguine that he could make arrangements with him, Winslow, for a systematic and thorough "working" of the two States, which would prove mutually beneficial. And that "without meaning to be understood as saying one word against Mr. Partridge—on the contrary, not seeing why matters cannot be arranged so as to have him also as one of the workers for the company—the company would advise Winslow to hold on and wait a little before making any permanent arrangement."

Jones coming to St. Louis soon after this, he, Winslow, and Partridge entered into an arrangement by which Winslow retired, leaving Jones and Partridge partners in the State agency. Jones in a short time went to Hartford, and was sent by the company on business in Iowa, &c., leaving Partridge alone in Missouri. Partridge went on as he had been going on from his first arrangement with Winslow, in soliciting people who had not previously been insured to insure themselves in the company and in getting renewals of such policies as had been made previous to his coming in and had now run out.

On all first insurances he received 20 per cent. of the premium, and on all renewals 7½ per cent. About his right to these, or to his having actually received them, there was no dispute.

In September, 1867, the company having written to Partridge about persons who had applied for an agency in Missouri, he writes to the company, responding civilly to some inquiries, but says—

"I am free to confess a little surprise at your remarks, coupling the persons you speak of with the general agency of the State of Missouri. I supposed it was settled that Mr. Jones and myself were to occupy the position of State agents. And just here permit me to inquire what my status is, if the State agency is open to the trial of candidates."

To this the company, by a letter dated September 7th, 1867, reply:

"Concerning your status in Missouri, it is simply this: You are there working up a business for yourself, and are paid the highest commissions which we pay, and in any arrangements which we may make for the State, will not overlook your interests, but we had no idea of giving you the exclusive control of a State which it will require a most experienced agent to take charge of and work up."

"After I received this letter of the 7th of September," said Partridge, in speaking of it, "I understood it, and was satisfied with it, and continued on as agent, soliciting policies, collecting premiums and renewals, and reporting as required by the rules of the company."

In December, 1867, the company sent out a Mr. Dye to St. Louis, telling Partridge that it is with a view to his procuring the company a greater amount of business out of the State; that Dye's efforts would not conflict with his, and that he, Partridge, "can proceed in his own way on his own account."

Difficulties, however, soon occurred in consequence of Dye's coming out, and on the 15th of February, 1868, a little more than a year after his agency began, Partridge was discharged by the company, he having at this time a sum of $1772 in his hands, collected for premiums. He now brought suit in one of the State courts of Missouri against the company. The company removed the case into the Federal court, under the act of Congress of 1866, and that of 1867, amendatory thereof. These enact that after a suit removed from a State court has been entered in the Federal court, it shall proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process, and the pleadings have "the same force and effect, in every respect, and for every purpose, as the original pleadings would have had by the laws and practice of such State, if the cause had remained in the State court."

On the trial the plaintiff admitted that he had received 20 per cent. commission on all first premiums, and 7½ per cent. commissions on all renewal premiums that had been actually collected by him, and that there was in his hands at the time of his discharge, $1772 in money, the property of the company, if they were not liable to him for the value of future commissions to accrue on the policies.

It was then announced by him that the real point of dispute in the cause was this, viz.: That, under the facts and circumstances of his employment and service, the letters and correspondence had with him by the company, and particularly by the terms of the aforesaid letter of September 7th, 1867, and by force and virtue of a general usage existing in St. Louis at that time, in regard to the business of life insurance companies and their agents, he was entitled to retain the agency, and, in case of his removal against his will, and without sufficient cause, was entitled to be paid a commutation equal to the present value of his commissions, computed by the actuarial rule for computing the present value of policies.

The defendant maintained that they were not bound by any usage except that of their own company; that the plaintiff was their agent only, at the will of the company, and might be discharged at any time without cause, and was not entitled to any payment or commutation on policies solicited during his agency, except his commission actually accruing during his agency, which, as he admitted, he had received.

They pleaded further their set-off; to their pleading which no objection was made by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff then propounded to a witness the following question, the witness having first qualified himself as an expert in insurance matters, terms, and language:

"Is there in the phrase contained in the letter of defendant of September 7th, 1867, to wit:

"'Concerning your status in Missouri, it is simply this: You are there working up a business for yourself, and are paid the highest commissions which we pay—

"Any peculiar or technical meaning as used by men engaged in life insurance, and as applied to the business of life insurance, different from the ordinary meaning of these terms?"

In answer to which question the plaintiff offered to prove by this witness, and by many others experienced in life insurance, that the said phrase did have a peculiar meaning in that regard, well understood by men in the business of life insurance, and not well understood by those not familiar with the business, that its meaning, as understood in that business, was that the agent should have the right to solicit and cause policies to be issued according to the published rules and rates of the company, and should have the right during the life and force of such policies to collect all renewal premiums thereon, and have commissions on such renewals, and that if he was discharged by the company without sufficient cause, he was entitled to be paid immediately, the present value of his commissions, to be computed by the actuarial rule used by such companies to value policies.

The question offered to be put was objected to by the defendant, and the objection was sustained by the court, on the ground that the language referred to was plain and intelligible, and required no explanation, and that such evidence as was offered would vary the contract between the parties. To this ruling the plaintiff excepted.

The jury found a verdict for the company, $1772 on the counter claim, and judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff now brought the case here.

Messrs. T. W. B. Crew, and J. F. Hardin, for the plaintiff in error.

1. The question was what an agent's "working up" the business of life insurance means? Now, on their face, have those words in connection with that business, a full, plain, unquestionable meaning, known to all who hear them? We offered to prove by persons in the business that they had not such a meaning, but contrariwise had a technical and peculiar meaning, understood only by persons in the business, and we offered, moreover, to show exactly what that meaning was. Yet, thus to show the true meaning of the contract, the court held would vary its true meaning, and that though we offered to prove it on its face ambiguous, it was on that same face without the possibility of two meanings.

2. The court erred in entering judgment for the $1772. Even if by the laws of the State and practice of its courts, such a thing had been allowable (which we do not concede), when the company elected to remove the cause to the Federal court it abandoned all rights under the State laws and practice, and was bound to conform to the rules of practice in the Federal courts. These are common law rules, and set-off does not prevail.

Mr. N. P. Chipman, contra.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

The question did not arise whether the custom which the plaintiff offered to prove could have been proved as the measure of his compensation, in the absence of any express contract, because the plaintiff had introduced in evidence a letter from the defendant in reference to this compensation, under which he said he had acted in taking the policies for which he now claimed the additional commission. There was no question as to the amount of percentage, or premium which was to be paid under this letter. The plaintiff stated that he had retained a certain percentage, which was that allowed by the company.

The testimony was not offered to show what was the highest commission paid by the company.

It appears to us, as it did to the Circuit Court, that the testimony offered would have established a new and distinct term to the contract. It would have established a contract very different from the written one introduced by plaintiff. The language of the letter was neither ambiguous nor technical. It required and needed no expert, no usage to discover its meaning. To have admitted the usage offered in evidence in this case, would have been to make a contract for the parties differing materially from the written one under which they had both acted for some time.

The tendency to establish local and limited usages and customs in the contracts of parties, who had no reference to them when the transactions took place, has gone quite as far as sound policy can justify.

It places in the hands of corporations, such as banks, insurance companies, and others, by compelling individuals to comply with rules established for the interests alone of the former, a power of establishing those rules as usage or custom with the force of law. When this is confined to establishing an implied contract, and the knowledge of the usage is brought home to the other party, the evil is not so great. But when it is sought to extend the doctrine beyond this, and incorporate the custom into an express contract whose terms are reduced to writing, and are expressed in language neither technical nor ambiguous, and, therefore, needing no such aid in its construction, it amounts to establishing the principle that a custom may add to, or vary, or contradict the well expressed intention of the parties made in writing. No such extension of the doctrine is consistent either with authority or with the principles which govern the law of contracts.

A question is raised in this court not raised in the Circuit Court as to the right of the defendant to recover, by way of set-off or cross-action against the plaintiff, a sum of money in his hands as agent of the plaintiff, which was admitted to be due, if plaintiff's claim was not established. The amount was admitted by plaintiff, and no objection was made to pleading it as a set-off. Therefore, none can be made here. But if the point were open to inquiry, it is settled by the case of West v. Aurora City, 6 Wallace, 139, that defendants in the Circuit Courts of the United States can avail themselves of the laws which prevail in the State concerning the right of set-off generally. It would be a most pernicious doctrine to allow a citizen of a distant State to institute in these courts, a suit against a citizen of the State where the court is held, and escape the liability which the laws of the State have attached to all plaintiffs of allowing just and legal set-offs and counter claims to be interposed and tried in the same suit and in the same form.

Judgment affirmed.

VOL. 1. JUST ISSUED.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Chief Justice, Supreme Court, Pa.

"I have examined the Legal Gazette Reports which you did me the favor to send me, with great satisfaction. It is well gotten up, and neatly printed and bound. The variety of matter contained in it, emanating indiscriminately from courts in every portion of the State, renders the volume useful in every section to both lawyers and judges, and to them I cheerfully commend it." March 1st, 1872.

From HON. WM. S. PEIRCE,
Court of Com. Pleas, and Orphans' Court, Phila.

"It is presented to the public in good style, and so far as I have had opportunity to examine my own decisions, they are accurately reported, and the syllabi are concise and correct, and I am sure from the known ability of the Reporter, that they are so with respect to the other decisions."
Philada., March 1st, 1872.

From HON. JAMES LYND,
District Court, Phila.

"I have received and examined with interest and pleasure the first volume of Legal Gazette Reports. It contains much valuable matter, carefully edited and handsomely published. As multitudinous as the decisions of the Supreme Court seem to be, the number of quite important points that never reach that tribunal is very large; and the early publication, therefore, of cases disposed of in the courts of first resort is greatly to be commended. Permit me to express a hope that the Legal Gazette Reports will prove as profitable to the publishers as it will be serviceable to the bar and judiciary of our State." Philada., March 2d, 1872.

From HON. JOSEPH ALLISON,
President Judge 1st Judicial District, Pa.

"The work is in all respects most creditable to its Editor and Publishers, not only as to its external merit, but as a valuable addition to the reports of decided cases. The work affords abundant evidence of great care in its preparation, and is every way worthy of a favorable reception by the legal profession." Philadelphia, Feb. 23d, 1872.

From HON. THOS. K. FINLETTER,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts, Phila.

"I have examined volume one, Legal Gazette Reports, and am much pleased with the execution of the work. Many of the cases contained therein are familiar to me, as being argued and determined in the courts in which I sit, and I can testify to the fidelity and accuracy with which they are reported. I think that the volume will be a valuable addition to the Pennsylvania Reports." Philadelphia, March 21st, 1872

From HON. E. M. PAXSON,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts, Phila

"Its mechanical execution reflects much credit upon Messrs. King & Baird, the printers, whilst your own industry and care in the arrangement and report of the cases are equally apparent. I regard your book as a valuable addition to the library of every lawyer, and trust it will meet with such success as to make its continuation a certainty." Philadelphia, May 1st, 1872.

From HON. SAML. A. GILMORE,
President Judge 14th Judicial District, Pa.

"I was so well satisfied of the value of the cases reported in the Legal Gazette, that I took care to file away that paper as it came to hand. This was inconvenient for reference, but is now obviated by the Legal Gazette Reports. Most of the cases are important and so well elaborated as to make them quite satisfactory. To a judge who has something to do with all the jurisdictions, the book is very convenient and to the bar we would suppose almost indispensable." Uniontown, Pa., March 27th, 1872.

From HON. WM. ELWELL,
President Judge 26th Judicial District, Pa.

"Your plan of preserving cases originally appearing in the Legal Gazette, by the publication of them in book form, will I have no doubt be very acceptable to the profession. The first volume of the Legal Gazette Reports is well executed, and will be found to be an indispensable adjunct to the library of every practicing lawyer in the State." Bloomsburg, Pa., March 7th, 1872.

From HON. A. B. LONGAKER,
President Judge 3d Judicial District, Pa.

"The cases are well selected and important. It is a most valuable volume for the bench and bar, and very deservedly so as regards various points of practice. Every practitioner ought to have it." Allentown, Pa., April 20th, 1872.

From HON. HENRY W. WILLIAMS,
President Judge 4th Judicial District, Pa.

"I have given some time to an examination of it, and am of opinion that in variety of matter and general interest to the profession, it is fully equal to any volume of our authorized reports. This is due in great degree to the exercise of judgment in the selection of cases." Wellsboro, Pa., April 25th, 1872.

From HON. JAMES RYON.
President Judge 21st Judicial District, Pa.

"I have examined this volume with great pleasure. The volume is neatly gotten up and the other work executed in fine style. It contains a large number of legal decisions both of the Common Pleas and Supreme Courts which can be found in no other work, and is essential to every law library." Pottsville, Pa., March 4th, 1872.

The cases selected embrace a great variety of topics, concerning matters of law and practice in the Pennsylvania Courts.

The titles, City of Philadelphia, Equity, Equity Practice, Guardians, Orphans' Court Practice, Practice, Patents, are particularly full; while upon the titles Criminal Law, Criminal Practice, Husband and Wife, Construction of Wills, Admiralty, Wills, Landlord and Tenant, Executors and Administrators, Railroad Companies, Tax and many others, there is much valuable information.

These reports can now be obtained from no other source, as many of them were exclusively published in the Legal Gazette, a complete file of which cannot now be furnished.

The exhaustion of many of the numbers of the Gazette, and the repeated requests to publish the Philadelphia Cases separate in book form, have led the publishers to issue this volume of the LEGAL GAZETTE REPORTS.

The cases of Commonwealth v. Schoeppe, Otterson et al. v. Middleton (with fac simile of testator's signatures in dispute) several cases relating to Philadelphia Fire Companies, and Passenger Railways, and numerous important and valuable decisions upon other subjects are reported in full with complete syllabuses, index, etc.

The volume contains upwards of 600 octavo pages, printed in KING & BAIRD'S best style and bound in the best law sheep.

In compliance with the desire of many prominent members of the Bar, the Publishers have endeavored to produce a handsome book, full and complete in its contents. Owing to the sale being limited to the Philadelphia Bar, to whom only it can be of use, and in consequence of the expense attending its publication, the price has been fixed at a figure that may seem apparently high,—but the Publishers, to reimburse themselves for the outlay they have been subject to, have been compelled to decline giving discounts to any one, so as to enable them to give the Bar the advantage of the lowest possible price for which the Book can be made.

The volume has been carefully compiled, and has also been revised by the Judges of the different Courts, and endorsed by Rules of the same. They therefore contain not only the latest, but also the only full publication of those rules, as they now stand on the minutes of the different Courts.

In re SALE OF REAL ESTATE OF A. P. ERB.

Three adjoining brick houses were sold by the sheriff, subject to one mortgage, which was a lien on one house and half of the adjoining one, and subject to another mortgage, which from its description was uncertain as to its being a lien. The sheriff offered the houses for sale separately, and failed, on account of the uncertainty of the mortgages, and the fact that they were liens on portions of the houses, to obtain a fair price for any of them. He then offered them together or in a lump, and obtained a much larger price. On exception to the confirmation of the sheriff's deed to the purchaser, Held, to be a valid sale, and the court confirmed the deed.

Exceptions to confirmation of sheriff's deed.

Opinion by PEARSON, J. Delivered June, 1873.

On the 15th day of September, 1864, Mr. Erb purchased two lots in this city, and took one deed therefor. There was at the time of his purchase three brick houses erected on the lots. Judgments were subsequently recovered against Erb, which were liens on all three of the houses. Prior to entering the judgments, a mortgage was recorded, which bound one and a half house, and another mortgage intended, and which was expected to cover the residue of the property, but from misdescription failed, most probably, to bind any portion of it. A fi. fa. issued on one of the judgments, which was levied on the three houses and two lots as an entirety, inquisition and condemnation. A ven. ex. was afterwards issued following the description in the fi. fa. and levy. A fi. fa. was also issued, on another judgment, levy made on each house separately, describing the ground on which it was erected, inquisition and condemnation, followed by a ven. ex. in like form. The sheriff had both writs in his hands at the same time. The property was advertised as three houses, and the lots described. The sheriff set up the houses separately. After several trials the highest bid for the houses separately was $700 for the one, and $750 for each of the others. They were also set up in the lump, and had bidden for them $2,900. The highest sum in all bidden the first time, separately, was $2,000, and when put up jointly $2,800. On the second trial the bidding was as already stated. It would thus appear, that on full trial, the property brought more by $700 or $800 when offered jointly, than when separately. This probably arose from the situation of the mortgages, the one covering a house and part of another, and it being uncertain what was bound by the other, or whether it covered any part of either. The person to whom the property was struck down, who has paid his bid, and now demands a deed from the sheriff, had no connection with the sales either as attorney or owner of any of the liens. Exceptions have been filed to the sheriff's deed, the most of which are unsupported by proof, but the only ones of any substance are: 1. The inadequacy of price. 2. The sale by the lump. 3. The imperfect notice of the character of the mortgages as attached to the writ, or given by the sheriff; and 4. Bidders did not attend, because Mr. Erb considered he could get the debts arranged, and thus avoid a sale.

Nothing is better settled than the principle that inadequacy of price is no ground whatever for setting aside a sheriff's sale, if fairly and legally made. If authority is wanted for this, we need only refer to 6 Watts, 146, and the cases there cited; see also 3 Y. 405; 3 M. C. C. R. 557; 4 Dal. 218.

It is not the business or duty of the sheriff to give any notice whatever of the mortgages, their nature or character. The purchasers must examine for themselves, and if the defendant knows of any payments or peculiarities in the mortgage, it is his business, or that of the lien creditors to make it known. The rule as to the purchaser is caveat emptor. The plaintiff in the judgment is not bound to give any such information. 6 Watts, 140, 144. Notice to the sheriff is not notice to bidders; he is not their agent. 8 S. & R. 327.

The mistake of Mr. Erb as to getting his debts arranged, and therefore avoiding the sale, is no the slightest ground for the court's interference. The bidder is not to be affected by such acts on his part. As the witnesses prove, it is but a weak and lame excuse. He was there until after the property had been set up and cried, knew as well as any one the situation of the mortgages, what was due on them, and what they bound, yet said nothing. His own mistake in keeping away bidders, cannot now be taken advantage of by himself. Nor can the creditor, for whom the counsel say they appear in part, as well as for Erb, urge the matter with much better grace, as they gave the business no attention whatever. The property was duly advertised, yet they did not appear in person or by counsel on the ground. That point has no merit in law or in fact. It is conceded that the other exceptions are not proved, and probably have no existence. It comes, then, to consider the second exception, which has been passed over to the last, as the only one of any legal import.

That a lumped sale of several pieces of real estate is entirely irregular, is decided in 1 Philadelphia Reports, top p. 136; also same book, top p. 3, bottom 133; unless it clearly appear that it is for the interest of all that it should be so sold. 3 Philadelphia Reports, top page 34; vol. 1, part 2, Pennsylvania Practice. The same doctrine is clearly held in 7 Wright, 219. In Klopp v. Witmayer I was of the opinion that such a sale was entirely irregular, but not void, and could not be treated as a nullity. The Supreme Court declared it utterly void, although in an after case they held it capable of confirmation. Same case and book, p. 226. It is pretty evident that they would apply this rule to real estate.

In 6 Watts, 144, already cited, it is doubted whether either the sheriff or creditor can direct property to be sold in a different manner from that prescribed by law. In Rowley v. Webb, 1 Binn. 61, it was held, that even a joint ground rent existing against several pieces of land, was no good reason for a lumped sale, which was set aside as tending to sacrifice the property of unfortunate debtors. It is there said, that there may be good reasons for deviating from the general rule, but they must be satisfactorily shown. On the other hand, it is provided by statute, that in making sales the land shall not be divided, and not less than a whole tract can be levied on and sold. Where several tracts of land are purchased at different times, yet held by the owner for a joint purpose, as in case of water power, iron works, and even a farm, it should be sold as an entirety, else its value would be destroyed. In the present case this property, consisting of two lots, and containing three houses, was purchased at the same time by one deed. The houses were apparently built to rent separately, and had always been so rented. A difficulty existed as to one of the mortgages covering one house, and the half of the other. The other mortgage probably being intended to embrace the other house and a half. This per se we would say was not sufficient reason for selling separately, as held in 1 Binney, already cited. But the reason of the law here ceases. All of the cases say that the danger is that the property will be sacrificed. Here it was first offered separately. The highest price bidden for the three houses when added together, amounted to $2,000. When offered together a bid of $2,800 was procured. After some interval the houses were again set up separately, when the bids were somewhat increased, amounting in all to $2,200, but when offered jointly, $2,900 was offered, and the property struck down at that bid.

We are of the opinion that when real estate is purchased and held as in this case by a joint deed, and after a full trial it is proved that it will command a higher price when sold together than separately, it is lawful to so sell it. Nothing short of a fair trial and full proof that it will so sell to more advantage, will justify the officer in thus making sale.

The effort so made takes it out of the general rule which then ceases. We are of the opinion that this sale is regular, under the circumstances. Has the court a discretionary power to set aside the sale on account of inadequacy of price, on a larger offer being made? The cases decided pretty conclusively show that the purchaser has a vested interest in the property, which cannot be disturbed or overlooked. See 3 Yates, 405. This is repeated in 2 Pennsylvania R., 382. And even the payment of the debt before sheriff's deed acknowledged, which was held good in many counties, will not justify the court in setting aside the sale. Idem per Ross, J. A judgment against the purchaser before deed made, binds the estate. As he has a vested interest therein, so he must be the loser, if the property is destroyed by fire or flood. 1 Id. 304. The court is therefore obliged to receive the acknowledgment of the sheriff's deed, and has no legal discretion.

POLICE JURY v. BRITTON.

The trustees or representative officers of a parish, county, or other local jurisdiction, invested with the usual powers of administration in specific matters, and the power of levying taxes to defray the necessary expenditures of the jurisdiction, have no implied authority to issue negotiable securities, payable in future, of such a character as to be unimpeachable in the hands of bona fide holders, for the purpose of raising money or funding a previous debt.

Error to the Circuit Court for the District of Louisiana.

Messrs. E. T. Merrick and G. W. Race, for the plaintiff in error.

Messrs. T. J. Semmes and W. A. Meloy, contra.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY stated the case, and delivered the opinion of the court.

Britton and Koontz brought an action in the court below against the police jury of the parish of Tensas, Louisiana, to recover the amount of four hundred and sixty coupons, for $6 each, due on the 1st of July, 1870, for one year's interest on four hundred and sixty bonds of $100 each. The following is a copy of one of the bonds, and they were all of the same date and form, differing only in number:

$100. STATE OF LOUISIANA. No. 423.

ST. JOSEPH, July 1, 1869.

THE PARISH OF TENSAS will pay to bearer, six years after date or sooner, at the pleasure of the parish, one hundred dollars, with six per cent. interest thereon, payable annually at the office of the parish treasurer, as per coupons attached. This obligation is issued to fund the debt of the parish, in accordance with an ordinance passed by the police jury, on the 18th day of January, 1869.

ELI TULLIS,
President Police Jury.

REEVE LEWIS,
Clerk Police Jury.

The defendants put in an answer denying the validity of the bonds, of the ordinance under which they were issued, and of the drafts or orders for which they were substituted.

The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict found for the plaintiffs. The case came here upon a number of exceptions taken at the trial, which, under the view we have taken of the case, it is not necessary to examine in detail.

The substantial facts of the case were, that in December, 1860, and January, 1861, the levee inspector of the parish of Tensas issued to certain persons by the name of Kennedy and Maxwell, five "levee warrants" (as they are called) for work done on the levees in ward No. 3 of said parish, amounting in the aggregate to over fifteen thousand dollars. They were all sight drafts drawn by Charles B. Tenny, as levee inspector of the parish, on one Snyder, treasurer of the levee fund of the parish, in favor of Kennedy and Maxwell, or order, and expressed as "being for amount due them for and on account of work done on levees in ward No. 3 this day."

These warrants seem to have been issued in regular course, according to the laws then in force on the subject. Originally the levees were made by the riparian owners, who received their lands upon this condition; and, if they neglected their duty, the police juries of the several parishes (who are the local boards representing them) were required to have the work done, and to collect the expense from the delinquent landowner. Modifications of this system have from time to time been made by various acts of the Legislature. The law under which the levee warrants above referred to were issued was passed in 1848, with amendments, passed in 1850 and 1852. It related to the parish of Tensas alone; and the substance of it, so far as is necessary for our purpose, was, that the police jury of that parish should appoint a levee inspector, whose duty was to direct and superintend the construction and repairs of all levees in the parish in accordance with the requisition of the police jury; to survey the levees, and where work was required to let it out to the lowest bidder; and, after the work was finished on any particular section, the statute directed as follows:

"Then the inspector shall issue a warrant, payable to the contractor which shall be a legal order upon the treasurer of the levee fund for the amount therein specified."

The statute then provided for the levee fund, as follows:

"The police jury are authorized to levy and collect, in the same manner that the State and parish taxes are now collected, an annual tax upon the assessed value of real estate, as returned by the assessors of the State taxes. Said tax, when collected, shall form a special fund for levee purposes alone."

We have quoted these specific directions for the purpose of showing how carefully the Legislature has prescribed the duties of all parties in relation to this matter. Not a word is anywhere said authorizing the parish jury to issue any bonds, or create any other evidences of debt, for work on the levees.

The general powers of the police juries of the State are carefully and particularly laid down in a statute on that subject, passed in 1813, with some amendments in subsequent years. They are enumerated under eighteen distinct heads. Revised Statutes of Louisiana, title "Police Jury." The section conferring powers commences as follows:

"The police juries shall have power to make all such regulations as they may deem expedient:

"1st. For the police of slaves in their respective parishes, and the pursuit of runaways, &c.

"2d. As to the proportion and direction, the making and repairing of the roads, bridges, causeways, dikes, levees and other highways

"3d. To lay such taxes as they may judge necessary to defray the expenses of their several parishes."

Other heads relate to clearing the Mississippi and other streams from obstruction, to the height of fences, the marking of cattle, the regulating of taverns, the establishment of ferries and toll bridges, &c., &c.

In restraint of the power of police juries and all other municipal bodies of the State to incur expenditures, the Legislature in 1853 passed the following act:

"The police juries of the several parishes, and the constituted authorities of incorporated towns and cities in this State, shall not hereafter have power to contract any debt or pecuniary liability without fully providing in the ordinance creating the debt, the means of paying the principal and interest of the debt so contracted."

And it is declared that such ordinance shall remain in force until the debt and interest is paid. Revised Statutes of 1856, p. 345. Nothing of the kind was done in this case, and the defendants insist that the bonds are void on this account. But this provision can hardly be said to apply to the proceedings of the inspector of levees, acting under the special statutes above mentioned; though we do not see why it is not applicable to the police jury, when that body attempts to charge the parish with a new set of securities payable at a distant day, with regular interest warrants, and negotiable from hand to hand; even though such securities were issued to fund a previous liability. But waiving this point, we proceed to other aspects of the case.

As bearing on the question of authority, it is pertinent to notice that, in 1860, the Legislature passed an act expressly authorizing the police jury of the parish of Tensas "to issue their bonds for a sum not to exceed $200,000, not having more than five years to run, and payable at one of the banks of the city of New Orleans, and not to be for less than one thousand dollars each." Other specific directions and conditions are contained in the law. It is not pretended that the bonds in question were issued in accordance with this act, and no other act is referred to giving any such power. This instance, however, goes to show that special legislative authority was deemed requisite to enable the police jury to issue bonds when such securities were required for raising money to meet the necessities of the parish.

It thus appears that the police jury had no express authority to issue the bonds in question, and that if they had any authority it must be implied from the general powers of administration with which they were invested. We have, therefore, the question directly presented in this case, whether trustees or representative officers of a parish, county, or other local jurisdiction, invested with the usual powers of administration in specific matters, and the power of levying taxes to defray the necessary expenditures of the jurisdiction, have an implied authority to issue negotiable securities, payable in future, of such a character as to be unimpeachable in the hands of bona fide holders, for the purpose of raising money or funding a previous indebtedness?

This subject as applied to various municipal bodies has been much discussed in the courts of this country, and various conclusions have been reached, depending sometimes upon the peculiar character and statutory powers of the corporation, sometimes upon the character of the objects to be attained, and sometimes upon the naked implication of power supposed to arise from the express power to make expenditures. A collection of the cases may be found in Dillon on Municipal Corporations, section 407, note. That a municipal corporation, which is expressly authorized to make expenditures for certain purposes, may, unless prohibited by law, make contracts for the accomplishment of the authorized purposes, and thereby incur indebtedness, and issue proper vouchers therefor, is not disputed. This is a necessary incident to the express power granted. But such contracts, as long as they remain executory, are always liable to any equitable considerations that may exist or arise between the parties, and to any modification, abatement, or rescission in whole or in part that may be just and proper in consequences of illegalities, or disregard or betrayal of the public interests. Such contracts are very different from those which are in controversy in this case. The bonds and coupons on which a recovery is now sought, are commercial instruments, payable at a future day, and transferable from hand to hand. Such instruments, transferred before maturity to a bona fide purchaser, leave behind them all equities and inquiries into consideration and the conduct of parties; and become, in the hands of an innocent holder, clean obligations to pay, without any power on the part of the municipality to demand any inquiry as to the justice or legality of the original claim, or to plead any corrupt practice of the parties in obtaining the security. This characteristic of commercial paper, which no court has more faithfully enforced than this, raises the doubt whether the power to issue it can be implied from the ordinary powers of local administration and police, which are conferred upon the boards and trustees of political districts. The power to issue such paper has been the means in several cases, which have recently been brought to our notice, of imposing upon counties and other local jurisdictions burdens of a most fraudulent and iniquitous character, and of which they would have been summarily relieved, had not the obligations been such as to protect them from question in the hands of bona fide holders. As such, we have been reluctantly compelled to sustain them, but only on the ground that the power to issue them had been expressly, or by necessary implication, conferred by the Legislature. The power to issue such obligations, and thus irretrievably to entail upon counties, parishes, and townships a burthen for which perhaps they have received no just consideration, opens the door to immense frauds on the part of petty officials and scheming speculators. It seems to us to be a power quite distinct from that of incurring indebtedness for improvements actually authorized and undertaken, the justness and validity of which may always be inquired into. It is a power which ought not to be implied from the mere authority to make such improvements. It is one thing for county or parish trustees to have the power to incur obligations for work actually done in behalf of the county or parish, and to give proper vouchers therefor, and a totally different thing to have the power of issuing unimpeachable paper obligations which may be multiplied to an indefinite extent. If it be once conceded that the trustees or other local representatives of townships, counties, and parishes have the implied power to issue coupon bonds, payable at a future day, which may be valid and binding obligations in the hands of innocent purchasers, there will be no end to the frauds that will be perpetrated.

We do not mean to be understood, that it requires, in all cases, express authority for such bodies to issue negotiable paper. The power has frequently been implied from other express powers granted. Thus, it has been held that the power to borrow money, implies the power to issue the ordinary securities for its repayment, whether in the form of notes, or bonds payable in future. So, the power to subscribe for stock in a railroad, or to purchase property for a market house, and other like powers, which cannot be carried into execution without borrowing money, or giving obligations payable in the future, have been held sufficient to raise the implied power to issue such obligations. But in our judgment these implications should not be encouraged, or extended beyond the fair inferences to be gathered from the circumstances of each case. It would be an anomaly, justly to be deprecated, for all our limited territorial boards, charged with certain objects of necessary local administration, to become the fountains of commercial issues, capable of floating about in the financial whirlpools of our large cities.

In the case before us, where was the necessity of funding the levee warrants held by the contractors? If it was desired to avoid the danger of prescription, an acknowledgment authorized by the police jury would have had all the effect which a new security could give. Where, among all the powers given to the police jury, can the power be found or fairly inferred, of funding the indebtedness of the parish, by issuing six or ten year bonds, payable to bearer, with the regular apparatus of coupons—securities specially framed and contrived for distant and diffusive circulation? When the Legislature deemed it desirable for the parish to issue such paper to enable it to raise money, the power was expressly given, with proper safeguards and limitations. This very fact indicates the legislative understanding, that no general and indefinite power of the kind had any existence.

In our opinion, the police jury had no authority to issue the bonds and coupons in question; and, therefore, the judgment must be reversed.

McABOY v. JOHNS and Wife.

1. A purchaser agreed to pay a wife $500 if she would execute a deed for land sold by her husband; she executed the deed. Held, that she could recover the money from the purchaser.

2. The contract between the purchaser and the wife was that he was to give her a writing for the payment of the money. He gave her a paper which she could not read, and represented that it contained the contract; she thereupon executed the deed. The paper did not contain the verbal agreement. Held, that she might recover on the verbal promise.

COOK et al. v. MACKRELL et al.

1. Johnson, wishing to be appointed a sequestrator, employed Mackrell, a lawyer, to conduct the proceedings in the Common Pleas. The petition was signed by a number of others, some of whom spoke to Mackrell and urged him to press the proceeding. Held, that this was not evidence of a promise on the others to pay.

2. Mackrell declared against seven on a joint contract; there was no evidence in relation to three. Held, that the action could not be maintained.

3. In answer to a point that under the pleadings the plaintiffs could not recover, the court charged, "We leave the liability or non-liability of these defendants to be discovered and determined by the jury from all the facts of the case." Held, that this left to the jury to determine both the law and the facts, and therefore was error.

1. The drafts were dishonored; the company refused to deliver the oil to Steele, because Saxton owed them freight. Held, in a suit by Steele against the company, evidence that the oil was Saxton's was admissible.

2. 3. The plaintiff having finished the wall under the agreement, it was his own until paid for, and the threatened act of defendant of breaking into the wall might be restrained.

VANCE v. NOGLE.

1. Nogle contracted to sell land to a married daughter, with the consent of her husband, for $2,500 in instalments, and a portion of the products during his own and his wife's life; the daughter made the first payment, and entered into possession; the father died, bequeathing all his estate to his wife, who for some years received the products from the daughter, who also tendered the instalments as they became due. Held, that the contract was binding on the vendor, notwithstanding the coverture of the vendee, she having performed the conditions.

2. A wife may acquire separate property in equity, by agreement with her husband, without the intervention of trustees.

3. A contract between a vendor and feme covert, cannot be rescinded by him, except by her refusal to perform the conditions.

SOUTH'S ADMINISTRATORS v. SOUTH.

R. and A. agreed "to submit the settlement of our accounts" to three referees, who awarded that they found W. indebted to R. "$500, including two notes, &c., and W. to deliver up to R. and A. the eighteen head of cattle that divided and fell to their share," &c. R. declared on an award for $500. Held, that the award, as far as sued on, was within the submission. The remainder not being covered by the submission, the award was void only pro tanto.

STALL v. MEEK.

1. Stall, in 1857, about leaving home, left claims due him, with Meek for collection, and from the proceeds to pay a debt due Braden, and the remainder to Stall's wife. This constituted the wife Stall's agent.

2. During Stall's absence Braden brought suit; the wife asked Meek for money to pay; he said it should not trouble her; he would pay Braden; he afterwards told her he had paid. Braden recovered judgment, which Stall, on his return in 1867, was compelled to pay. In 1869 he sued Meek, who pleaded the statute. The court charged: "Unless there was fraud on plaintiff in concealing the receipt of money, the statute would be a bar; anything said to the wife not communicated to plaintiff, would not be such fraud as would prevent the bar; the concealment must be practiced on the husband, or his constituted agent." Held, to be error, being calculated to mislead the jury as to the agency of the wife.

THE JUDICIARY ARTICLE ON SECOND READING.

The Constitutional Convention upon Monday last resumed the consideration of the judiciary article of the new constitution, passing it upon second reading in the following shape. The sections in reference to the Philadelphia courts will be of interest to our city readers. We think they are improvements on the present provisions.

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The judicial power of this commonwealth shall be vested in a Supreme Court, in Courts of Common Pleas, in Courts of Oyer and Terminer and General Jail Delivery, in Courts of Quarter Sessions of the Peace, in Orphans' Courts, in justices of the peace, and in such other courts as the Legislature may from time to time establish.

SECT. 2. The Supreme Court shall consist of seven judges, who shall be elected by the qualified voters of the State at large. They shall hold their offices for the term of twenty-one years, if they so long behave themselves well, but shall not be eligible to re-election. The judge whose commission will first expire, shall be chief justice, and thereafter each judge whose commission shall first expire, shall in turn be chief justice.

SECT. 3. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall extend over the State, and the judges thereof shall by virtue of their offices be justices of oyer and terminer and general jail delivery in the several counties. They shall have original jurisdiction in cases of injunction where a corporation is a party defendant, of habeas corpus, and of mandamus to courts of inferior jurisdiction, and in case of quo warranto as to all officers of the commonwealth whose jurisdiction extends over the State, but shall not exercise any other original jurisdiction. They shall have appellate jurisdiction by appeal, certiorari, or writ of error, in all cases, as is now or may hereafter be provided by law.

SECT. 4. Until otherwise directed by law, the Courts of Common Pleas shall continue as at present established, except as herein changed. Not more than four counties shall at any time be included in one judicial district organized for said courts.

SECT. 5. In the city of Philadelphia, and in the county of Alleghany, all the jurisdiction and powers now vested in the District Courts, and the Courts of Common Pleas, or either of them, in said city and county, subject to such changes as may be made by this constitution or by law, shall be in the city of Philadelphia vested in four, and in the county of Alleghany, in two distinct and separate courts of equal and co-ordinate jurisdiction, composed of three judges each, and in such additional courts of the same number of judges and of like jurisdiction as may from time to time be by law added thereto. The said courts in the city of Philadelphia shall be designated respectively as the Court of Common Pleas, number one, number two, number three and number four, and in the county of Alleghany as the Court of Common Pleas, number one and number two; but the number of said courts may be by law increased from time to time, and shall be in like manner designated by successive numbers. And the Legislature is hereby prohibited from creating other courts to exercise the power vested by this constitution in said Courts of Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts. The number of judges in any of said courts, or in any county where the establishment of an additional court may be authorized by law, may be increased from time to time, and whenever such increase shall amount in the whole to three, such three judges shall compose a distinct and separate court as aforesaid, which shall be numbered as aforesaid.

SECT. 6. Each court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all proceedings at law and in equity, commenced therein, subject to change of venue, as may be provided by law.

SECT. 7. For the city of Philadelphia, there shall be one prothonotary's office, and one prothonotary for all said courts, to be appointed by the judges of said courts, and to hold office for three years, subject to removal by a majority of the said judges. The said prothonotary shall appoint such assistants as may be necessary and authorized by said courts, and he and his assistants shall receive fixed salaries, to be determined by law and paid by said city; and all fees collected in said office, except such as may be by law due to the commonwealth, shall be paid by such prothonotary into the city treasury. Each court shall have its separate dockets, except the judgment docket, which shall contain the judgments and liens of all the said courts as are or may be directed by law.

SECT. 8. The said courts in the city of Philadelphia and county of Alleghany, respectively shall from time to time in turn detail one or more of its judges to hold the criminal courts of said district, in such manner as may be directed by law.

SECT. 9. Every judge of the Court of Common Pleas shall by virtue of his office and within his district, be a judge of oyer and terminer and general jail delivery, for the trial of capital and other offenders therein, and shall be a justice of the peace therein as far as relates to criminal matters, and shall be competent to hold the Court of Quarter Sessions of the Peace, and the Orphans' Court thereof.

SECT. 10. The judges of the Court of Common Pleas within their respective counties, shall have power to issue writs of certiorari to the justices of the peace, and other inferior courts not of record, and to cause their proceedings to be brought before them, and right and justice be done.

SECT. 11. Justices of the peace or aldermen shall be elected in the several wards, districts, boroughs and townships, at the time of the election of constables, by the qualified voters thereof, in such manner as shall be directed by law, and shall be commissioned by the governor for a term of five years. No township, ward, district or borough, shall elect more than two justices of the peace or aldermen, without the consent of a majority of the qualified electors within such township, ward or borough. No person shall be elected to such office unless he shall have resided within the township, borough, ward or district, for one year next preceding his election.

SECT. 12. In the city of Philadelphia for each thirty thousand inhabitants, there shall be established in lieu of the office of alderman and justice of the peace, as the same now exists, one court not of record, of police and civil causes, with jurisdiction not exceeding one hundred dollars. Such court shall be held by magistrates, whose term of office shall be five years, and they shall be elected on a general ticket by all the qualified voters of said city; and in the election of the said magistrates, no voter shall vote for more than two-thirds of the number of persons to be elected, where more than one are to be chosen. They shall be compensated only by fixed salaries to be paid by said city, and shall exercise such jurisdiction, civil and criminal, except as herein modified, as is now exercised by aldermen and justices of the peace, subject to such changes, not involving an increase of civil jurisdiction, or conferring political duties, as may be made by law. All fees on the business of such courts, and all fines and penalties, shall be paid into the city treasury.

SECT. 13. In all cases of summary conviction, or of judgment in suit for a penalty before a magistrate or court not of record, either party shall have the right to appeal to such court of record as may be prescribed by law.

SECT. 14. All judges required to be learned in the law, except the judges of the Supreme Court, shall be elected by the qualified electors of the respective districts over which they are to preside, and shall hold their offices for the period of ten years, if they shall so long behave themselves well; but for any reasonable cause which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor may remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature.

SECT. 15. Whenever two judges of the Supreme Court are to be chosen for the same term of service, each voter shall vote for one only, and when three are to be chosen, he shall vote for no more than two, and candidates highest in vote shall be declared elected.

SECT. 16. Should any two or more judges of the Supreme Court, or any two or more judges of the Court of Common Pleas for the same district, be elected at the same time, they shall as soon after the election as convenient, cast lots for priority of commission, and certify the result to the governor, who shall issue their commissions in accordance therewith.

SECT. 17. The judges of the Supreme Court and the judges of the several Courts of Common Pleas, and all other judges required to be learned in the law, shall at stated times receive for their services an adequate compensation, which shall be fixed by law and paid by the State, and which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. They shall not receive any other compensation for their services from any source, nor any fees or perquisites of office, nor hold any other office of profit under this commonwealth, nor under the United States or any other State.

SECT. 18. The judges of the Supreme Court during their continuance in office, shall reside within this commonwealth, and the other judges during their continuance in office, shall reside within the district or county for which they shall be respectively elected.

SECT. 19. The several Courts of Common Pleas, besides the powers herein conferred, shall have and exercise within their respective districts such powers of a court of chancery as are now vested by law in the several Courts of Common Pleas of this commonwealth, or as may hereafter be conferred upon them by law.

(The remaining sections we will print in our next issue.)

JULY 1776—JULY 1876.

Everything we suppose for three years to come will partake of Centennialism, if, indeed, all things will not become absolutely and quite "Centennial." We see centennial hats and centennial coats advertised already. Centennial breeches will follow of course, and we suppose that before long the reproach which has hitherto attended old fashioned affairs, will become their greatest glory. Centennial beauties may even come in fashion. We feel bound to imbibe the infection, and shall at least from time to time, until 1876, give a little revolutionary stuff. We do not mean stuff savoring of revolution against the government that now is, but stuff that savors of the men and things of 1776. We give to-day two very interesting letters of the well known Judge Richard Peters, than whom no man was better able to speak on topics connected with those times.

One is a letter in connection with the authorship of the Declaration of Independence. It is addressed in July, 1826, to his son, the late Richard Peters, long the reporter of the Supreme Court of Washington, who had asked him to go with him to a fashionable watering place hotel. The other is a letter to the late Robert Walsh, Esquire, then editor of the National Gazette, who it would seem had printed in his paper a letter of the venerable judge speaking (as many of the best judges of the day also did) of Peale's portrait of Washington (the pater patriæ portrait), painted chiefly from memory. The judge in writing to Peale had said as follows, though apparently he did not design to have what he wrote printed:

"I have seen all or most of the portraits of this venerated father of our country. The painters of several were respectable as artists, but they have failed in the likeness, and I have never been satisfied with any of them. I was therefore most sensibly impressed with the superiority in this regard of your portrait, which I think places all others in the shade."

Upon seeing his letter blazoned forth in the newspaper, he sent apparently to

Mr. Walsh, and asked for the original, or a copy from which the thing had been printed. It, perhaps, had, in some part, a latin quotation which the judge supposed had been incorrectly given.

In sending to Judge Peters the copy of his letter, Mr. Walsh, it would seem, had rather indiscreetly asked the judge his opinion as to whether Washington was really a great man, and how he compared with certain other persons. But the old farmer of Belmont was not to be trapped by master Bob in that way. He gives him the neatest reply which we remember to have seen to a question more free than delicate.

The remaining paper is a biographical sketch of a gallant old soldier, whose name was long connected with this city, a man deserving "centennial" place for merits all his own, and possessing some relation even to the bar, as the father of one of the purest and most accomplished men of the days of Washington. The Bradford of whom we give the memoir was father to the second attorney general of the United States, who died A. D. 1795.

BELMONT, 12th July, 1826.

DEAR RICHARD:

I have a complaint which would forbid exposure at this hot season in any conveyance, but would be highly inconvenient in a crowded passage boat. But were I perfectly well, I should decline the jaunt you propose, very kindly, but against all the prejudices of my life. I never relished the assemblages of heterogenous people at a watering place. I think such promiscuous society a nuisance, and if I were compelled to choose one or the other, I would prefer the musquitoes of Cape May to the company generally frequenting an insipid coast, as this certainly is.

The deaths of Adams and Jefferson on the day of our birth as a nation, to which they so eminently contributed, is really a most extraordinary coincidence. It would take much time and trouble to set down the thousands of circumstances and sentiments immediately preceding and following that illustrious day. Some of them would prove what I do not wish to show, that Jefferson was the penman, and not the sole author of the celebrated declaration, attributed to him solely. I know the materials were collected by a caucus of friends to the measure, and he held the pen, contributing at the same time no small proportion of the materials. I have often wondered that it has been so generally taken for granted, that Mr. J. was the author and every body else the idle witnesses of a measure which cost us many an anxious day and sleepless night, and many an investigation as to the grounds and reasons which we should assign for abandoning our allegiance. I was in the confidence of the leaders in the measure, and know that every one of at least a dozen patriotic and eminent men contributed to the declaration, whereof Mr. J. has the exclusive merit. I do not mean to deduct from his merit, but I think it unjust in relation to sharers in the measure, to attribute to him all the merit. Such a State paper most justly reflects with brilliant credit on all who contributed to its formation.

Adams was the most distinguished promoter of the measure, sometimes spoke as if inspired. Jefferson had no faculty of speaking in public, but was most highly meritorious in his public, as well as private character. No men ever lived or died to whom a country is more indebted for the blessings we enjoy. I knew them both intimately, and can attest their claims to disinterested patriotism, unmixed with sordid pursuits, which are much in fashion at this period.

Yours affectionately,

RICHARD PETERS.

R. PETERS, JR., ESQ.

BELMONT, July 10th, 1824.

DEAR SIR:

I return the copy of my letter to Mr. Peale. I had no doubt of your latinity, or accuracy; but compositors are a kind of animated machines, and proof readers often racers. I was unwise not to foresee that Peale would publish my very warm, but very sincere testimony. I do not retract a word of it, as to my real feeling and sentiment; but I should in prudence have omitted what I have marked in the margin.*

It will, undesignedly by me, give offence to worthy but sensitive artists; and draw down on me the anathemas of connoisseurs, amateurs, and picture-holders. I will, however, force from them an unanimous vote, by acknowledging that I have but a moderate (if any) taste in painting. In this they will not differ with me. Many of them have more pretensions than reality, in their profundity of judgment. I shall not gainsay anything they opine or say.

R. Peale, many years ago, was engaged in drawing a portrait of me. He was deeply mortified, and I excited to a burst of laughter when two of these tyros exclaimed: "Well, Mr. Peale, this a most wonderful likeness, indeed! Old Doctor Shippen, in every line and feature!!" Now old Dr. Shippen had no more resemblance to me, than I to Hercules. They may apply this occurrence to me or to themselves, as, in their great wisdom, seemeth best unto them.

Your question, as to General Washington, is one appearing to me, very unnecessary at this time of day to be brought into discussion. All the happiness we enjoy, and every prosperity our country possesses, are testimonies of his virtues and talents. To judge of military talents, a critic must erect himself into a superior military character. I admired and witnessed a wonderful share of the talents, without which our revolution could not have been achieved, and this was enough for me, and enough for a grateful country. Without the many and most worthy patriots who bore the difficulties and dangers we encountered, he could have performed little, and without him (for he had not—take him for all in all—his equal) they would have done nothing. I enter into no controversies; having no animosities, political, or personal, to gratify on the subjects you allude to. General Washington seemed to be formed by a kind of providence, for the great purpose in which he was employed. I make no comparisons with other military characters,—and whensoever any such comparisons (seldom, indeed) are made, I recollect the passage in Moore's "View of Society, and Manners;" where Moore asked the French ambassador, Laval, in the gardens of Eterhasie, how they stood in his opinion, compared with those of Versailles. "Monsieur, Versailles etait fait expres pour n'être comparé á rien." So, I think, Washington "etait fait expres pour n'etre comparé á rien."

Always very sincerely and faithfully yours, R. P.

COL. WILLIAM BRADFORD.

William Bradford the 3d, or "Col. William Bradford," as in his day he was commonly called, was the son of William Bradford of the City of New York, and grandson of that William Bradford by whom the art of printing was introduced, A. D. 1684, into the middle colonies of America. Of his more remote ancestors, as well as of his wife Elizabeth, the daughter of Andrew Sowle, our knowledge is sufficiently full. But of the more immediate parentage of Colonel Bradford, the details are scanty. His father was born probably towards the close of the 17th century. His death we know was not earlier than 1755.*

He was extensively engaged in navigation, and owned at one time a vessel named the Droitwich. Of the mother of Colonel Bradford we know even less than this. Some indications lead to the idea that her family name was Van Horne; with which ancient Dutch family a relationship, through some source not otherwise discovered, is understood to have existed on the part of her descendants. Other indications would suggest that it may have been Schuyler, or Stafford. The residence of the family was in Hanover square, New York, not then as now abandoned to depots and storing houses; and both parents it is supposed were parishioners of Trinity Church. Here our knowledge ends. How little record, this, of the lives—perhaps the long and busy lives of two people once well known. But who shall rescue from "dumb oblivion" its prey?

William Bradford, the subject of our notice, was born in New York, on the 19th of January, 1720, 21, but came to Philadelphia at an early age, in order to be instructed in his ancestral profession by an uncle, Andrew Bradford, resident here; who being without any son had expressed an intention to provide with liberality for him. He remained in the office of his kinsman during the customary term, and in December, 1739, was taken into partnership with him. This connection lasted but a year, being dissolved in December, 1740. On arriving in 1741, at his majority, he went to England, where he visited his relations and spent some time in travelling through the country and making himself acquainted with its institutions and men, and particularly with the mechanism of his profession. Having purchased in England, and transmitted to America, all the improved forms then known of the apparatus of a printing office, he returned after an absence of a year. On the 15th July, he announced in his uncle's paper, the establishment of his "new printing office in the house where Mr. Andrew Bradford formerly lived, in Second street:" and having subsequently on the 18th of August, 1742, united himself by marriage to Rachel, the daughter of Thomas and Deborah Budd, a lady of good family in New Jersey, and of uncommon refinement, education and domestic worth, he issued on the second of December following, on the death of his uncle, the first number of his own newspaper, "The Pennsylvania Journal," one of the best printed papers of that time. This paper was continued by himself and his successors for nearly sixty years. The editorial duties during his connection with it were discharged entirely, it is believed, under his own eye; and he is also styled by the critical typographer, Mr. Thomas, "a very respectable printer." This Pennsylvania Journal, of which a copy is still preserved in the public Library of Philadelphia, exercised a most effective influence upon all the colonial interests from the date of its establishment to the close of the war of our Revolution. It was the channel through which the best minds of this region of country were brought to bear upon the common welfare; and in its columns were found the earliest authentic intelligence of everything at home or abroad which concerned the American policy and interests. In it were early announced the true principles of English constitutional liberty in their application to the concerns of the colony; and on them, as settled at the epoch of 1688, by Somers and Talbot, and the "old Whigs" of England, the cause of American rights was steadfastly maintained throughout the war of our Revolution.

"There breathed throughout it," says an intelligent writer of the present day,* "a sentiment of patriotism, a detestation of oppression, an hostility to tyranny, and a love of liberty and freedom of the press, as deep and fervid as exists anywhere at the present day." And he justly says that "it is to that sentiment, to that unconquerable spirit of freedom and independence, we owe our present nationality and liberal institutions."

Though the concerns of his journal, united with other operations of his office—which for a long time was very extensively engaged in all departments of typographical industry—might have well exhausted his powers and attention, Bradford found time in 1757 to put into execution a design which his uncle had formed in 1741, of a periodical journal more permanent in its character, and more select in its combinations than was suited to the nature of a popular sheet. In the month of October, 1757, he issued the first number of "The American Magazine and Monthly Chronicle for the British Colonies," one of the earliest literary and philosophical journals of our country. The work here deserves a record, both in respect of its liberal design, its judicious arrangement and its literary contents. And in connection with the subject of our notice, it is no small praise to add that the exterior execution was considerably beyond what was then common in America. The journal, during its continuance, was conducted with great order, accuracy,

* This is certain, since his grandson, the Honorable William Bradford, born A. D. 1755, by a will made in 1778, when twenty-three years old, makes a bequest of his, "gold sleeve buttons which were bequeathed to me, by my grandfather, William Bradford." comprehension and spirit. It is probable, however, that the day of American magazines was not yet at hand, and that Bradford, in 1757, was somewhat in advance of the education and sympathies of his time. A hundred years ago, when "a whisper was almost sufficient to have negotiated all our internal concerns," the population of Pennsylvania was unable to sustain of itself any journal not essentially useful; and ephemeral literature was not then scattered as now, a thousand miles from its place of issue. The work having been conducted to a handsome volume of 556 pages, and to the close of a year, brought itself to a graceful termination before its interests began to flag with its readers, or its cessation became matter of necessity to its author. The work may yet be seen in a few select libraries, and the value of its contents is well attested by references yet occasionally made to them at the distance of a century after their date of publication.

In 1754, Bradford established in Philadelphia, at the southwest corner of Front and Market streets, the well known "London coffee house, for merchants and traders." From a series of sketches by Mr. J. A. McAllister, entitled the "Historic Houses of Philadelphia," we are enabled to give an account of this ancient exchange, and we doubt not that our readers will welcome from such a pen the narrative, though it includes as much the history of the old exchange itself, as of Col. Bradford's immediate connection with it. Thus Mr. McAllister proceeds:

"The earliest history of this curious edifice rests in obscurity. From the most authentic information we can obtain upon the subject, it appears, that the old building was built by Charles Read, eminent as judge of the vice admiralty in Pennsylvania, and for other honors, about the year 1702. The lot was a section from a good part of a square of ground which had, not long before, been given by William Penn to his daughter Letitia, in connection with her handsome mansion, still standing in a very dilapidated condition, on the west side of Letitia court. About the year 1701, this ground was cut up into building lots, and Mr. Read became the purchaser of the corner one, on which the celebrated edifice stands.

The building was doubtless used as a private residence until the year 1754, in which year Col. Bradford, who probably was then occupying it as his residence, turned it into a 'coffee house for the benefit of merchants and traders.' The printing office and book store of Col. Bradford —both on a considerable scale—being close to it on the rear, in Market street, it is probable that his object was rather to increase his connections in business, than to derive much profit from the place as an independent establishment. The main house, in its best estate, consisted, as is obvious from looking at it, of but two rooms; one below, which was used, probably, for more common resort, the other above, for more secret consultations. Still it became a historic spot in the annals of the colony, and especially of the Revolution.

In this place a century ago, was conducted all manner of commercial negotiations and public sales. Here was received the earliest and most authentic intelligence of every sort, from every quarter, military and civil, foreign and domestic. Here were to be found the names and references of all strangers of distinction.

Here, too, in the days of the Revolution, and during the period of intense anxiety which preceded the actual commencement of hostilities, the various committees of safety, and other public bodies, which were called into existence by the emergencies of the crisis, held most of their official meetings. It was here the leading men of the day assembled to talk over the momentous concerns of the times. Here the stamp act, and its repeal—the Boston port bill — and other acts of the British ministry—were discussed. Here, too, the assembling of the Continental Congress, and its patriotic resolves, were the subject of much debate—while it was in this place also that the first gun from Lexington, the din of the struggle at Bunker Hill, and the adoption of the Declaration of Independence found a response in the hearts of the patriots who daily met here to talk anxiously over events which made brave men turn pale with apprehension for the result.

It was in the hands of its originator, at the London coffee house, that subscription papers were left for the signatures of those who were disposed to aid by their means in the establishment of manufactories in the united colonies, at a time when it was so desirable that they should be independent, in all things, of their unreasonable parent. It was here that in 1771 the first piece of broadcloth ever made in America was triumphantly exhibited as the product of the only loom then in existence in the colonies. The old edifice was the great headquarters of the leading men of the day, and many of the important measures which made their mark upon the period were first put in shape within its walls.

Its great superiority, as an architectural effort, to the buildings of that day, is attested by the fact, that while in every direction around it the edifices of all sorts have given away to the demands of improvement, the London coffee house still remains — in 1870 — untouched; a well-built and venerable, but now solitary monument of a style and strength of edifice which has defied alike the corrosions of time and the levelling hand of trade.

It is a matter of history, that in the early days of the Revolution the sister colonies of Pennsylvania were fearful that the non-resistant principles of the Society of Friends, and that the interests of the merchants of the then great commercial emporium, would prevent co-operation in the war which was evidently inevitable. Some of the leading men of the time concerted a scheme to bring out the feelings of our quiet citizens. A meeting was called, and addressed by several eloquent speakers. Mr. Charles Thomson was so earnest and vehement in his advocacy of the popular cause, that he fainted, and was carried out of the room. This meeting was held in the old edifice that we now describe. Its effect was what was desired; the public heart leaped in response to the pulse which had made itself manifest at the meeting. The sequel is too well known to require comment.

We could fill pages, with extracts from the newspapers which were published during the Revolution, to show the important figure made by the London coffee house at that time; but we have, we fancy, furnished sufficient to weary if not fully to instruct our readers upon this point.

It is an incident which, in connection with the history of the edifice, and not less so with the history of its founder—one of the earliest vindicators of American liberty, and an officer of the Revolutionary army, distinguished by personal bravery —that Bradford's announcement of his intention to open this establishment, bears the date of 4th July, 1754.

How long Col. Bradford remained in connection with this ancient exchange of Philadelphia, does not appear. He left it probably before the close of the war. In February, 1783, as is evident by an advertisement of the 25th of that month, it had passed into the hands of Col. Eleazer Oswald, the well-known editor of the Pennsylvania Gazetteer, and a man of character and influence. Col. Oswald rescued the consecrated spot from the hands of a person named Dally (an Irishman probably), who had proposed to re-open it, setting forth as the ground of his claim to 'public favor,' that he had 'laid in a good stock of beer, wine, and other liquors of the best quality,' and would provide 'oyster and other suppers at shortest notice!' Col. Oswald brought it back to 'its original plan and regulations;' which are set forth in his own advertisement, as follows:

'ELEAZER OSWALD

Having rented The Coffee House (Front and Market), which for some time past has been shut up, purposes opening it again on Thursday next, for the accommodation of the citizens in general, on its original plan and regulations. He therefore thus publicly entreats that those gentlemen who have hitherto, from its first establishment, considered it a change for commercial transactions, &c., will return to their old accustomed place of resort, without the least regard to any party distinctions whatever. It will be his study to give general satisfaction, and to render it a repository of useful intelligence. All the various, newspapers, magazines, &c., both foreign and domestic, will be regularly filed in the public rooms for the information and amusement of the curious, and every attention paid that will have the greatest tendency to promote the happiness and welfare of the community.'

Col. Oswald redeemed his promise, and made the coffee house what it had been originally, a place of resort for the merchants and literary men of the city.

This famous old edifice continued to be a popular place of resort for the leading men of its time, until the growing city and the change of fashion made it inconvenient in point of size and accommodation. Its situation, too, became antique. It gradually sank into oblivion, until finally, the chosen resort of public characters, of men of fashion, of men of learning and taste, has become a mere assemblage of paltry shops. Alas! that we must make the record: one-half—the lower—is turned into a Jew's clothing store; the other half —the upper—into a barber's shop! To such base uses we return: 'The noble dust of Alexander' is found to stop 'a bung-hole.'

The merchants' coffee house was removed near the beginning of this century to Second street near Walnut. The very name, indicative of the simplicity of our English ancestors, and fragrant with memories of the Spectator, has now, more Americano, disappeared in the grander title and more imposing form of the Merchants' Exchange.

From an early date Bradford appears to have found time to indulge a natural taste which he possessed for military science. In the end of 1747, the French, who were then at war with England, had taken their station in Delaware Bay, and were about to make their attack on the city. 'It is past a doubt,' declares the Provincial Assembly in great alarm, 'that the city must be given up to the plunder of a cruel enemy, and the inhabitants left to the exercise of the brutal passions of a set of banditti, usually employed in the enemy's privateers, and to complete our misfortunes, the burning of our city will probably be the last act of the enemy.' The Society of Friends was 'principled against defence,' and would do nothing. The whole protection of the city and its inhabitants was left to others, on whom the burthen of it fell. These associated themselves into companies, and on the 1st of January, 1747-8, 'William Bradford, Gent,' was elected a lieutenant, 'William Bingham, Gent,' being ensign of his company. Their promptness, courage, and self possession were of infinite importance in such a moment, and with their well organized measures of defence, probably saved the city from capture and devastation. Minutes of the Provincial Council, vol. v, pp. 161, 173, 174. In 1756, our colonies being still at war, in behalf of Great Britain, with France, Bradford was promoted to the captaincy.

The return of peace leaving some leisure to a man of his active turn of mind, he opened, in 1762, along with Mr. Kydd, a marine insurance company, where it is recorded that 'much business was done' Events, however, were now approaching which gave more scope to his energetic and fearless temper. The policy of Great Britain was rapidly calling into life the military spirit of the country, and the subject of our notice partook actively in the conflict. An original letter from John Hancock, recently found among papers in the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, and well deserving to be framed and hung upon the walls of that noble institution, as a specimen of the handwriting of the great President of Congress, attests the very high confidence had in every way by our early patriots, in the virtues and intelligence of the subject of our memoir. Thus it reads:

'PHILADELPHIA, 7th June, 1776.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM BRADFORD:

Having delivered to your charge six boxes of money for the use of the army in Canada, I am to desire you will proceed with the guard under your command, and the wagons of money, with all possible despatch, to the city of New York, and wait upon General Washington, to whom you will deliver your charge, or take his orders respecting it. I must recommend you to have particular care of the money by night and day. I rely on your vigilance, and am

Your very humble servant,

JOHN HANCOCK, Pres't.

Army Canada.

No. 1 to 3. 3 boxes silver money.

No. 4 to 6. 3 do. paper dollars'

'Bradford,' says Mr. Thomas, History of Printers, vol. 2 p. 50 'was a warm advocate for and a stanch defender of the rights of his country. He was one of the first in the city to oppose the British stamp act, in 1765, upon the formation of the sons of liberty, in 1766, to resist the stamp act . . . an association which comprised the names of William Paca, Samuel Chase and other eminent citizens. William Bradford and Isaac Howell, were the correspondents at Philadelphia.' Bradford's name is found, also, among the subscribers of the celebrated 'non-importation resolutions' of Philadelphia, in October, 1765, and as one of the 'committee (of safety probably) for the city and liberties of Philadelphia,' elected at the State House, in that city, August 16th, 1775. In 1765, he was a contributor to the building of the Pennsylvania Hospital, and he was equally hostile to the succeeding offensive measures of the British ministry. He took arms in an early stage of the Revolutionary war, and although he had reached the age at which the law exempts men from military service, he encountered the fatigues of a winter's campaign, and did duty as a major of militia in the memorable battle of Trenton. He shared the honors of the day at Princeton, and returned colonel of the regiment of which he went out major. He was at Fort Mifflin when it was attacked by the Hessians, and commanded at Billingsport, Red Bank and other engagements. A few days before the British troops took possession of Philadelphia, Bradford was entrusted by Governor Wharton with the command of the city, and the superintendence of removing the stores. Having performed this duty, he left the city as the enemy was entering it, and repaired to Fort Mifflin, where he remained until that fortress was evacuated. During this same time he discharged the responsible offices of chairman of the committee of safety, and president of the State navy board. He returned from the hazards of public service, with a broken constitution and shattered fortune. He soon lost his affectionate wife. Her death is announced in the Pennsylvania Packet of July 4th, 1780, as having taken place June 2?th, in the 60th year of her age. She is spoken of as 'a pious and amiable woman, exemplary in her discharge of every social and relative duty, beloved by her aquaintances, and blessed by the poor.' Age advanced upon him with hasty steps, and a paralytic stroke warned him of his approaching dissolution. After a few more feeble attacks, he calmly yielded to the king of terrors. Bradford literally complied with a resolve of the early revolutionists to risk his life and fortune for the preservation of the liberty of his country. After peace was established, he consoled himself under his misfortunes, and in his most solitary hours reflected with pleasure, that he had done all in his power to secure for his country a name among independent nations, and he frequently said to his children, 'though I bequeath you no fortune, I leave you in the enjoyment of liberty.' He died September 25th, 1791, aged 72. His body was interred (beside that of his wife,) in the Presbyterian church yard in Arch street, and his obsequies were attended by a large number of citizens, and particularly by those who were the early and steady friends of the Revolution. See Thomas' History of Printing, vol. ii, p. 50. The grave yard referred to by Mr. Thomas, was that of the Second Presbyterian Church. Arch above Fifth street.* A heavy oblong monument in those grounds bears the following inscription, derived apparently from the extract which precedes :

IN MEMORY OF

COLONEL WILLIAM BRADFORD,

Who died September 25th, 1791,

Aged 72 years.

He was born in New York
And came to this city at an early age,
Where he established a press,
And published a newspaper as early as the year 1742.
He was among the first to oppose the British stamp act in this city.
And though
At an age which exempted him from military service,
He endured a winter's campaign
And was at the battles of Trenton and Princeton,
In the last of which he was colonel of the regiment.
He was in command at Fort Mifflin
When it was attacked by the Hessians,
And throughout the whole war,
Maintained the character of
A brave man and a firm patriot.

The following obituary notice is found in the Gazette of the United States, of Saturday, October 1st, 1791. Some indications have led to the suggestion that it was from the pen of Alexander Hamilton.

'On Saturday morning, departed this life, in the 73d year of his age, Mr. William Bradford, many years the editor of the Pennsylvania Journal, and colonel of a regiment of militia during the late war. He was descended from one of the first settlers in Pennsylvania, and was one of four generations of printers, who have universally distinguished themselves by devoting the press to the preservation and extension of the liberties of their country. This venerable patriot took an early and active part in every scene of difficulty and danger which recurred during the American Revolution. Fear had no place in his breast. Nor did he ever in a single instance betray or even disappoint the confidence which his fellow citizens placed in him, whether in the secret enterprises of the cabinet, or in the open dangers of the field. His remains were interred on Monday afternoon, in the Presbyterian grave yard, in Arch street, attended by a large concourse of the inhabitants of the city, and particularly by the early and steady friends of the Revolution, who can never recollect the important events of the years 1774, 1775 and 1776, without connecting them with the name of this patriotic citizen.'"

* The place has been recently demortuarised; and the remains of Bradford removed, we believe, to Laurel Hill

INSURANCE COMPANY v. LYMAN.

A knowing that his vessel had been lost on the 8th of January, 1870, but concealing his knowledge of the fact, applied for, on the 15th following, and got a written policy of insurance dated on that day, on her, "lost or not lost," from the 1st of January, to the 1st of April, 1870, following. The insurance company, discovering afterwards that when he applied for this policy he knew of the loss, refused to pay. He brought suit, setting out his written policy, but declaring on it in such a way as was meant to show that the execution of it was but "a compliance with, and a formal statement" of an agreement to make the insurance, which he alleged had been entered into between himself and the insurers on the 31st of December, 1869, and before the loss: Held,

1. That parol proof was not admissible to show that the contract of insurance was actually made before the loss occurred, though executed and delivered, and paid for afterward, for that to allow such proof would be to contradict and vary the terms of the policy in a matter material to the contract.
2. That the terms of the contract having been reduced to writing, signed by one party and accepted by the other at the time the premium of insurance was paid, neither party could abandon that instrument, as of no value in ascertaining what the contract was, and resort to the verbal negotiations which were preliminary to its execution, for that purpose.
3. That the fact the plaintiff went to the insurance office about half-past three o'clock in the afternoon, saw a clerk or person (whom he was not able afterwards to identify) standing at the desk, to whom he applied to have the vessel insured, who told him that "the secretary had gone home, and that there was no one in the office who could do it, but said he would speak to the secretary when he came in the morning, and have it attended to the first thing," is not sufficient evidence of a completed contract—an agreement assented to by both parties at any one time—to be submitted to a jury in a suit as on a verbal contract for insurance, and assuming that the case was one where no written contract had ever been executed.

Error to the Circuit Court for the District of Louisiana.

Lyman & Co. brought their action in the court below against the Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans, for the sum of $12,000, the value of the brig "Sailor Boy," lost at sea on the 8th of January, 1870, and which was insured, as they allege, by the said company. Their petition set forth that on the 30th of October, 1869, the company had issued a policy to them on the brig for the sum named, which insured her until January 1st, 1870.

That on the 15th December, 1869, they applied to the company to insure them in the same sum, upon the same vessel for three months, from the said 1st January, 1870.

That after taking time to consider, the company, on December 24th, 1869, proposed to renew the insurance for the premium of $600, and that on December 31st, the plaintiffs accepted this proposition for renewal, and that the company on that day agreed with them that it would issue the policy, and make it out and send it to them, and receive the premium.

That on the 15th January, 1870, the plaintiffs sent for the policy and paid the premium, and the company issued to plaintiffs the policy annexed to the petition; that the said policy was but a compliance with and a formal statement of the agreement to renew the insurance, made December 31st, 1869.

That on the 8th of January, 1870, the brig was lost, &c.

Along with their petition the plaintiffs filed two policies of insurance, on their face such as above stated; that is to say, one dated October 30th, 1869, for two months, expiring January 1st, 1870, and one dated January 15th, 1870, and which, by its terms, purported to make an insurance "from the 1st January, 1870, to the 1st of April, 1870."

On the trial it appeared that the plaintiffs, when they renewed the policy of the 15th January, and paid the premium for insurance, knew that the vessel was lost, and that the defendants had no such knowledge or information.

As on this state of facts it would be obvious that no action could be sustained on the policy—and, indeed, that, in point of fact, the taking of such a policy and causing the defendant to sign it would have been a fraud—the plaintiffs framed their petition on the assumption, and directed their evidence to the showing that the execution of the policy was but carrying into effect an agreement made before the loss of the vessel.

In order to sustain this their case, they offered in evidence the deposition of their agent, which gave an account of conversations had by him in reference to a renewal of the insurance, with some one in the defendants' office. The defendants objected to this testimony, on the ground that there was a written application for and contract of insurance between the parties for the same amount of insurance and same amount of premium on the same object insured, the vessel called "Sailor Boy," by the same plaintiffs as insured and the same defendants as insurers, for the same space of time, to wit, from the 1st day of January, 1871, to the 31st March, 1871; that the plaintiffs had no right to contradict the written application aforesaid by proof of a previous verbal contract; that the plaintiffs' right of action, if any, was on the written application and contract aforesaid, and that they could not ignore the said written contract to fall back on an alleged previous verbal contract of the same tenor and purport; that the evidence showing that when the said written contract was executed the plaintiffs and their agents were aware of the fact of the previous loss and abandonment of the "Sailor Boy," the said written application and policy were not binding in law, but were, nevertheless, the contract of the parties, subject to be gainsaid by proper allegations and proof of fraud; that the plaintiffs could not ignore the written contract.

But the court ruled as follows:

"The plaintiffs put their entire case upon a verbal contract to renew the insurance made, as they allege, on the 31st day of December, eight days before the loss. They admit that when they sent for the written policy, on the 15th of January, they knew of the loss, and that they could not recover on the written policy standing by itself, but they say that the real contract was made on the 31st of December, and that they had a right to go to the jury on that issue."

The court accordingly overruled the objection and admitted the testimony.

The testimony admitted was that of a single witness. It went to show that on the 15th December, 1869, he was directed by the agent of the plaintiffs "to go to the company's office and see if they would renew the policy, and to get the rate; that he saw the secretary, who said that the company would renew, but that he could not then give the rate, but would let the agent know; that the witness had himself done nothing further in the matter till December 31st, though he heard that the company had informed the agent of the rate, five per cent, and that it was satisfactory; that on the 31st he was again told by the agent to go and renew the policy; that about half-past three in the afternoon of that day he went to the company's office, and asked to have the policy renewed; that a clerk, or person standing at the desk, to whom he applied, told him that the secretary had gone home, and that there was no one in the office who could do it, but that he would speak to the secretary, when he came in, in the morning, and have it attended to the first thing; that the witness did nothing further until the 15th January, when the agent of the plaintiffs sent him to the company for policy."

The witness stated the transaction of that day as follows:

"I went to the office of the defendants, and asked the man at the corner of the desk for the policy on the 'Sailor Boy.' He turned over his book, but could not find it; said he would go and see the secretary. He went into the back office and returned with the secretary. The secretary said that he did not know that a policy had been ordered. I told him that I had ordered it the 31st of December. He said there had been no application made out. I told him I did not know anything about that; that no one said anything about an application to me. He said there should be one, and told the clerk to make one out for me to sign. The clerk made it out, and I signed it, and paid the premium, $510. The secretary asked me if anything had been heard from the vessel; I said, not that I knew of."

Upon cross-examination, the witness testified that he was requested by the president of the company, after payment of the insurance money had been demanded, to come to the office and identify the person to whom he had made application on 31st December, but that he was not able to recognize or identify any one as the person.

A verdict was given, and judgment entered for the plaintiffs, for the sum insured, and interest.

The case being now here on error.

Mr. W. M. Evarts for the insurance company, plaintiff in error, argued that there was error:

1st. In admitting evidence of a parol contract of insurance of the same subject, and for the same risk between the same parties, as the written policy given in evidence by the plaintiffs. For that the plaintiff had a complete written contract made on the 15th of January, upon a written application made on that day; and by a policy on that day dated. And that the fact that it was void from a fraud of his part, did not make it less the written contract of the parties, or a contract of that date, nor affect its efficacy under the rule of evidence, to exclude parol evidence of a written contract.

2d. In submitting to the jury the evidence offered as showing or tending to show a contract of insurance by the defendant, made on the 31st of December, when the said evidence showed no such contract, but on the contrary, showed a failure to make any contract, or to treat concerning such a contract. For that the proof showed that all that happened on that day, was that the messenger of the plaintiffs went to the insurance office, after business hours, and failed to find any one with whom to treat concerning the insurance.

Mr. T. J. Durant, contra:

1st. The evidence was not offered to contradict the written contract, but to show the circumstances under which it was made, and to show to what state of facts it really referred, by explaining that the instrument, made on the 15th January, only put in writing what had been agreed to between the parties on the 31st December previous, to which date and fact the policy related back. In other words, it was offered to show that the policy was but the expression, in a written form, of the verbal contract previously made.

2d. But we had a right to abandon our written contract altogether, and recover on our parol contract, not relying on the written policy, except as evidence, if we chose so to use it, and as giving part of the history of the transaction.

Thus viewing the case, the fact that the vessel was lost on the 8th of January, and that the loss was known to the assured is unimportant.

Corporations may contract by parol, and a verbal contract to issue a policy may be as binding as any contract in writing.

The evidence did tend in some degree certainly, to show the exact thing which it was offered to show, and was proper to go to the jury for what it was worth.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the judgment of the court.

Undoubtedly a valid verbal contract for insurance may be made, and when it is relied on, and is unembarrassed by any written contract for the same insurance, it can be proved and become the foundation of a recovery, as in all other cases where contracts may be made either by parol or in writing. But it is also true that when there is a written contract of insurance, it must have the same effect as the adopted mode of expressing what the contract is, that it has in other classes of contract, and must have the same effect in excluding parol testimony in its application to it, that other written instruments have.

Counsel for the defendants in error here, relies on two propositions; namely, that the policy, though executed January 15th, is really but the expression of a verbal contract made the 31st day of December previous, and that the loss of the vessel between those two dates does not invalidate the contract, though known to the insured and kept secret from the insurers; and secondly, that they can abandon the written contract altogether and recover on the parol contract.

We do not think that either of these propositions is sound.

Whatever may have been the precise facts concerning the negotiations for a renewal of the insurance, previous to the execution of the policy, they evidently had reference to a written contract, to be made by the company.

When the company came to make this instrument, they were entitled to the information which the plaintiffs had of the loss of the vessel. If then they had made the policy, it would have bound them, and no question would have been raised of the validity of the instrument, or of fraud practiced by the insured.

On the other hand, if they had refused to make a policy, no injury would have been done to the plaintiffs, and they would then have stood on their parol contract, if they had one, and did not need a policy procured by fraudulent concealment of a material fact at the time it was executed and the premium paid.

To permit the plaintiffs, therefore, to prove by parol, that the contract of insurance was actually made before the loss occurred, though executed and delivered, and paid for afterward, is to contradict and vary the terms of the policy in a matter material to the contract, which we understand to be opposed to the rule on that subject in the law of Louisiana, as well as at the common law.

We think it equally clear, that the terms of the contract having been reduced to writing, signed by one party and accepted by the other at the time the premium of insurance was paid, neither party can abandon that instrument, as of no value in ascertaining what the contract was, and resort to the verbal negotiations which were preliminary to its execution, for that purpose. The doctrine is too well settled, that all previous negotiations and verbal statements are merged and excluded when the parties assent to a written instrument as expressing the agreement. And it is hardly necessary to say, that the party who has destroyed the validity of that contract by his own fraud, cannot for that reason treat it as if it had never been made, and recover on the verbal statements made before its execution.

We may add that, as the only testimony offered to prove this parol contract, was the deposition of a single witness, made part of the bill of exceptions, we do not see in that deposition sufficient evidence of a completed contract, of an agreement assented to by both parties at any one time, to be submitted to a jury, even if the written contract had never been executed,

Judgment reversed, with directions to grant a new trial.

No. 12.—DECEMBER TERM, 1872.

MYRA BRADWELL, Plaintiff in Error,
v. THE STATE OF ILLINOIS.

1. The Supreme Court of Illinois having refused to grant to plaintiff a license to practice law in the courts of that State, on the ground that females are not eligible under the laws of that State, such a decision violates no provision of the Federal Constitution.
2. The second section of the fourth article is inapplicable, because plaintiff is a citizen of the State of whose action she complains, and that section only guarantees privileges and immunities to citizens of other States, in that State.
3. Nor is the right to practice law in the State courts a privilege or immunity of a citizen of the United States, within the meaning of the first section of the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution of the United States.
4. The power of a State to prescribe the qualifications for admission to the bar of its own courts is unaffected by the fourteenth amendment, and this court cannot inquire into the reasonableness or propriety of the rules it may prescribe.—Legal News.

In error to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff in error, residing in the State of Illinois, made application to the judges of the Supreme Court of that State for a license to practice law. She accompanied her petition with the usual certificate from an inferior court of her good character, and that on due examination she had been found to possess the requisite qualifications. Pending this application she also filed an affidavit, to the effect "that she was born in the State of Vermont; that she was (had been) a citizen of that State; that she is now a citizen of the United States, and has been for many years past a resident of the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois." And with this affidavit she also filed a paper claiming that, under the foregoing facts, she was entitled to the license prayed for by virtue of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, and of the fourteenth article of amendment of that instrument.

The statute of Illinois on this subject enacts that no person shall be permitted to practice as an attorney or counsellor-at-law, or to commence, conduct, or defend any action, suit, or plaint, in which he is not a party concerned, in any court of record within this State, either by using or subscribing his own name or the name of any other person, without having previously obtained a license for that purpose from some two of the justices of the Supreme Court, which license shall constitute the person receiving the same an attorney and counsellor-at-law, and shall authorize him to appear in all the courts of record within this State, and there to practice as an attorney and counsellor-at-law, according to the laws and customs thereof.

The Supreme Court denied the application, apparently upon the ground that it was a woman who made it.

The record is not very perfect, but it may be fairly taken that the plaintiff asserted her right to a license on the grounds, among others, that she was a citizen of the United States, and that having been a citizen of Vermont at one time, she was, in the State of Illinois, entitled to any right granted to citizens of the latter State.

The court having overruled these claims of right, founded on the clauses of the Federal Constitution before referred, those propositions may be considered as properly before this court.

As regards the provision of the Constitution that citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, the plaintiff in her affidavit has stated very clearly a case to which it is inapplicable.

The protection designed by that clause, as has been repeatedly held, has no application to a citizen of the State whose laws are complained of. If the plaintiff was a citizen of the State of Illinois, that provision of the Constitution gave her no protection against its courts or its legislation.

The plaintiff seems to have seen this difficulty, and attempts to avoid it by stating that she was born in Vermont.

While she remained in Vermont that circumstance made her a citizen of that State. But she states, at the same time, that she is a citizen of the United States, and that she is now, and has been for many years past, a resident of Chicago, in the State of Illinois.

The fourteenth amendment declares that citizens of the United States are citizens of the State within which they reside; therefore plaintiff was, at the time of making her application, a citizen of the United States and a citizen of the State of Illinois.

We do not here mean to say that there may not be a temporary residence in one State, with intent to return to another, which will not create citizenship in the former. But plaintiff states nothing to take her case out of the definition of citizenship of a State, as defined by the first section of the fourteenth amendment.

In regard to that amendment counsel for plaintiff in this court truly say, that there are certain privileges and immunities which belong to a citizen of the United States as such; otherwise it would be nonsense for the fourteenth amendment to prohibit a State from abridging them, and he proceeds to argue that admission to the bar of a State of a person who possesses the requisite learning and character, is one of those which a State may not deny.

In this latter proposition we are not able to concur with counsel. We agree with him that there are privileges and immunities belonging to citizens of the United States, in that relation and character, and that it is these, and these alone, which a State is forbidden to abridge. But the right to admission to practice in the courts of a State is not one of them. This right in no sense depends on citizenship of the United States. It has not, as far as we know, ever been made in any State, or in any case, to depend on citizenship at all. Certainly many prominent and distinguished lawyers have been admitted to practice, both in the State and Federal courts, who were not citizens of the United States, or of any State. But, on whatever basis this right may be placed, so far as it can have any relation to citizenship at all, it would seem that, as to the courts of a State, it would relate to citizenship of the State, and as to Federal courts, it would relate to citizenship of the United States.

The opinion just delivered in the slaughter-house cases from Louisiana, renders elaborate argument in the present case unnecessary; for, unless we are wholly and radically mistaken in the principles on which those cases are decided, the right to control and regulate the granting of license to practice law in the courts of a State is one of those powers which are not transferred for its protection to the Federal government, and its exercise is in no manner governed or controlled by citizenship of the United States in the party seeking such license.

It is unnecessary to repeat the argument on which the judgment in those cases is founded. It is sufficient to say they are conclusive of the present case.

The judgment of the State court is, therefore, affirmed.

Mr. Chief Justice Chase dissenting.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY.

I concur in the judgment of the court in this case by which the judgment of the Supreme Court of Illinois is affirmed, but not for the reasons specified in the opinion just read.

The claim of the plaintiff, who is a married woman, to be admitted to practice as an attorney and counsellor at law, is based upon the supposed right of every person, man or woman, to engage in any lawful employment for a livelihood. The Supreme Court of Illinois denied the application, on the ground that, by the common law, which is the basis of the laws of Illinois, only men were admitted to the bar, and the Legislature had not made any change in this respect, but had simply provided that no person should be admitted to practice as attorney or counsellor without having previously obtained a license for that purpose from two justices of the Supreme Court, and that no person should receive a license without first obtaining a certificate from the court of some county of his good moral character. In other respects it was left to the discretion of the court to establish the rules by which admission to the profession should be determined. The court, however, regarded itself as bound by at least two limitations. One was that it should establish such terms of admission as would promote the proper administration of justice, and the other that it should not admit any persons, or class of persons, not intended by the Legislature to be admitted, even though not expressly excluded by statute. In view of this latter limitation the court felt compelled to deny the application of females to be admitted as members of the bar. Being contrary to the rules of common law and the usages of Westminster Hall from time immemorial, it could not be supposed that the Legislature had intended to adopt any different rule.

The claim that, under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, which declares that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, the statute law of Illinois, or the common law prevailing in that State, can no longer be set up as a barrier against the right of females to pursue any lawful employment for a livelihood (the practice of law included), assumes that it is one of the privileges and immunities of women as citizens to engage in any and every profession, occupation, or employment in civil life.

It certainly cannot be affirmed, as a historical fact, that this has ever been established as one of the fundamental privileges and immunities of the sex. On the contrary, the civil law, as well as nature herself, has always recognized a wide difference in the respective spheres and destinies of man and woman. Man is, or should be, woman's protector and defender. The natural and proper timidity and delicacy which belongs to the female sex evidently unfits it for many of the occupations of civil life. The constitution of the family organization, which is founded in the divine ordinance, as well as in the nature of things, indicates the domestic sphere as that which properly belongs to the domain and functions of womanhood. The harmony, not to say, identity, of interests and views which belong, or should belong, to the family institution, is repugnant to the idea of a woman adopting a distinct and independent career from that of her husband. So firmly fixed was this sentiment in the founders of the common law, that it became a maxim of that system of jurisprudence that a woman had no legal existence separate from her husband, who was regarded as her head and representative in the social state; and, notwithstanding some recent modifications of this civil status, many of the special rules of law flowing from and dependent upon this cardinal principle still exist in full force in most States. One of these is, that a married woman is incapable, without her husband's consent, of making contracts which shall be binding on her or him. This very incapacity was one circumstance which the Supreme Court of Illinois deemed important in rendering a married woman incompetent fully to perform the duties and trusts that belong to the office of an attorney and counsellor.

It is true that many women are unmarried and not affected by any of the duties, complications, and incapacities arising out of the married state, but these are exceptions to the general rule. The paramount destiny and mission of woman are to fulfil the noble and benign offices of wife and mother. This is the law of the Creator. And the rules of civil society must be adapted to the general constitution of things, and cannot be based upon exceptional cases.

The humane movements of modern society, which have for their object the multiplication of avenues for woman's advancement, and of occupations adapted to her condition and sex, have my heartiest concurrence. But I am not prepared to say that it is one of her fundamental rights and privileges to be admitted into every office and position, including those which require highly special qualifications and demanding special responsibilities. In the nature of things it is not every citizen of every age, sex, and condition that is qualified for every calling and position. It is the prerogative of the legislator to prescribe regulations founded on nature, reason, and experience for the due admission of qualified persons to professions and callings demanding special skill and confidence. This fairly belongs to the police power of the State; and, in my opinion, in view of the peculiar characteristics, destiny, and mission of woman, it is within the province of the Legislature to ordain what offices, positions, and callings shall be filled and discharged by men, and shall receive the benefit of those energies and responsibilities, and that decision and firmness which are presumed to predominate in the sterner sex.

For these reasons I think that the laws of Illinois now complained of are not obnoxious to the charge of abridging any of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States.

I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley.—FIELD, J.

Hon. Matt. H. Carpenter, for plaintiff in error.

Court of Common Pleas.

IN EQUITY.

SIMSON v. BATES.

1. Equity will interfere by injunction to prevent the sale of a wife's property under an execution against her husband, only when her title is undisputed, and it appears that the creditor is using the process of the law to her injury.
2. It will not aid the wife when she has been guilty of fraud or collusion with her husband, whereby his creditors have been held at bay.

Opinion of the court by PAXSON, J. Delivered July 5th, 1873.

The plaintiff, who is a married woman, obtained a special (ex parte) injunction against the defendant, who is an execution creditor of her husband, to restrain him from selling her separate real estate. The defendant having filed an answer, now moves to dissolve said injunction.

The bill sets out the plaintiff's title to the real estate in question, and alleges that it was bought by her—the deed taken in her own name, and the property paid for out of moneys received by her from the estate of her mother, who was a resident of the kingdom of Bavaria, in which country she died in the year 1870.

The answer of defendant, Bates, sets forth that he has no knowledge as to the facts above stated, but that, "from the best of his information," he believes them to be untrue, so far as they relate to the purchase money of said premises.

It also avers that the judgment under which the property of the plaintiff had been levied upon was recovered in the District Court of this city against Zachariah Simson, the husband of plaintiff, and one William N. Dewees, trading as Simson & Dewees, in an action brought to recover the value of certain goods sold to said firm, and delivered to them at their store, No. 429 Race street; that the said Zachariah Simson filed in said suit an affidavit of defence, in which he alleged inter alia. "that he is not a partner in the firm of Simson & Dewees, but that the said firm is composed of Nannie Simson (plaintiff) and William N. Dewees." Said answer further alleges that the defendant issued an execution upon said judgment, under which the goods in said store were levied upon; whereupon the said Nannie Simpson claimed to be the owner of said goods, and gave the sheriff notice to that effect. Further, that upon a pluries writ of fieri facias issued upon said judgment, he caused a levy to be made upon the goods in said store, as well as upon the household furniture at the residence of the said Zachariah Simson, No. 1828 North Seventh street, and that the said Nannie Simson claimed that she was the owner of said household goods, and also joint owner with one Charles Badenfield, of the goods and chattels in said store, of which the sheriff was duly notified.

Hunter's Appeal, 4 Wr. 194, decided that "under the act of 11th of April, 1848, and 12th of April, 1850, the levy and sale of a wife's real estate by a creditor of her husband's, on execution against him, is contrary to law, and may be restrained by injunction," with the qualification that "In order to authorize the interference of a court of equity, a clear case of title in the wife under the acts of 1848 and 1850 must be made out; otherwise the court will not interfere, but leave the parties to their remedy at law." In the case above cited the title of the wife was not disputed by plea, answer or demurrer. In a later case, Winch's Appeal, 11 P. F. S. 424, the Supreme Court held that "when the title of a wife is disputed, and when a creditor has a right to proceed against the property to test the title, it is error to assume jurisdiction in equity and enjoin against the creditor's execution, and thus withdraw the facts from a jury;" and that "equity will restrain a creditor only when he is clearly and indisputably proceeding against right and justice to use the process of the law to the injury of another."

A creditor of the husband has a right to levy upon and sell whatever interest he may believe the latter has in the real estate of his wife. It is only when the process of the court is used against admitted right, to the injury of the wife, that equity will interfere. Nor will it aid the wife when she has been guilty of fraud or collusion with her husband, whereby his creditors are kept at bay. We are not prepared to say in this case that the plaintiff has been guilty of such fraud or collusion; but the allegations in the answer certainly show that she has been active in defeating the creditors of the firm of which her husband was a member. She may have been right in all this. We cannot say she is not, without prejudging her case; but it is sufficient to indicate that the defendant is not using his execution for the purpose of oppression, or of inflicting wrong or injury upon the plaintiff. He is merely pursuing his legal remedies under considerable difficulties. I do not think the case one in which equity ought to interfere. If the property should be sold, the title can be tested in an action of ejectment and the facts passed upon by a jury. The plaintiff should be left to her remedy at law.

Injunction dissolved.

ASH v. BOWEN.

Where a bill was filed by a cestui que trust and her husband, alleging that the trust was invalid, to which the defendant, the trustee, refused to plead, answer or demur, and his counsel withdrew his appearance, whereby a judgment pro confesso by default was entered, on motion of the plaintiff for a decree in his favor, the motion was refused, the court holding, that the record clearly showed collusion; that the judgment pro confesso should be opened, the defendant's answer and proofs taken, if necessary.

Opinion of the court by PAXSON, J. Delivered July 5th, 1873.

We are asked in this case to decree that the trust created by one of the plaintiffs, Ellen Margaretta Ash, nee Harland, by her indenture of 11th of April, 1856, is invalid, for the reason, as alleged in the bill, that at the time of the execution of said deed, and the creation of said trust, she was neither married, nor in immediate contemplation of marriage. The bill avers that at that time she did not know Thomas Reeves Ash, with whom she has since intermarried, and who is joined with her as plaintiff.

To the said bill, the defendants, who are the trustees named in the deed, have not filed either a plea, answer, or demurrer. The learned counsel who at one time represented them, for reasons which were no doubt satisfactory, by leave of court withdrew his appearance for said defendants; after which a judgment pro confesso was entered against them. Upon this state of the record the plaintiff moves the court for a decree in her favor.

We cannot close our eyes to the fact that there is collusion in this case. We are asked to strike down this trust, and order a reconveyance of the trust estate to the cestui que trust upon her mere statement, and to take what we cannot but regard as a collusive judgment by default as establishing the averments of the bill. This, notwithstanding the fact, which appears of record, that the plaintiff, Ellen Margaretta Harland, was married to her husband, Thomas Reeves Ash, in less than one year from the execution of her deed of trust. It may be, as she alleges in the bill, that she did not know him at the time she executed said deed; yet a due regard for the proper administration of equity prevents our entering any decree in the present state of this record.

Under all the peculiar circumstances of the case, let the judgment pro confesso be opened, an answer put in by the defendants, and proofs taken, if necessary. The cause will then be ripe for a hearing upon the merits.

District Court of Philad'a.

KRAUSE et al. v. STILES.

1. A landlord, as against an execution creditor, is entitled to accruing rent apportioned to the time of the levy.
2. Rent may issue out of lands and tenements corporeal, or out of them and their furniture.
3. The sheriff's return to a fi. fa. is conclusive against the plaintiff, in the distribution of the fund arising therefrom.
4. An attachment under the act of 1869 has precedence to a levy made subject thereto under a fi. fa. subsequently issued.
5. The prothonotary of the District Court is entitled to a fee for recording auditors' reports.
6. The practice, where an auditor desires an increase of the statutory fee, laid down.

[As the auditor's report on the material points in this case was confirmed for the reasons stated by him, we publish his opinion in full.]

Exceptions to auditor's report.

Opinion by the auditor, P. F. ROTHERMEL, JR., Esq.

From all the evidence produced before the auditor in this matter, he reports to the court the following as the facts pertinent to the present inquiry:

1. That by lease, dated August 7th, 1868, J. Francis Fisher, owner, let to Edward Stiles, defendant in the execution, from proceeds of which the fund in court arises, the premises situated at the northeast corner of Eleventh and Spring Garden streets, "for the term of one year (and so on, from year to year) from the 8th day of August, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, at a rent of one thousand dollars per annum, to be paid in quarterly payments of two hundred and fifty dollars each." That the defendant was in possession under the above lease, when, by virtue of the said execution, his personal property there found was levied upon and sold. That rent was in arrear since May 8th, 1872. That the use of shelving, counters, bins, and those things which thus belonged to the premises leased (a grocery store), passed to the lessee with the same. That by lease, executed the 8th day of August, 1872, the same premises were let by the said J. Francis Fisher, to a certain Robert Stiles, "from the 8th day of August, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two;" and that on the same date, Edward Stiles, the defendant and previous lessee, became surety for the lessee in the last lease.

2. That on June 28th, 1872, an attachment, under the provisions of the act of March 17th, 1869, issued out of the Court of Common Pleas of the city and county of Philadelphia (No. 272, June T., 1872), in which James A. Aull and John Mellsop, trading as James A. Aull & Co., were plaintiffs, and the said Edward Stiles, defendant. To which the sheriff made the following return:

"Attached as within commanded, June 28th, 1872, certain stock and fixtures of the grocery store, northeast corner of Spring Garden and Eleventh streets, and summoned the defendant, by giving to him a true and attested copy of the within writ, and making known to him the contents thereof, June 28th, 1872, at 1 o'clock 15 minutes P. M."

That on September 21st, 1872, plaintiffs in the above attachment obtained judgment, and on the twenty-fourth of the same month, damages were assessed at $228.08. Upon which a fi. fa. issued September 27th, to September Term, 1872, No. 105, to which the sheriff made the following return:

"No goods not exempt, except those attached under the attachment upon which the within writ issued, which goods were levied upon July 2d, 1872, under a certain other writ of fieri facias, issued out of the District Court for the city and county of Philadelphia, to June Term, 1872, No. 863, subject to said attachment, and another attachment issued out of your honorable court as of June Term, 1872, No. 352, and said goods were sold July 8th, 1872, for the sum of five hundred and twenty-one dollars; and $504.67 thereof was paid into the District Court for distribution."

3. That upon judgment obtained in your honorable court, by Jno. H. Krause, Henry M. Ingram and John T. Totten, trading as John H. Krause & Co., against the said Edward Stiles (Sept. T., 1871, No. 1144), for $430, a writ of fieri facias was issued July 2d, 1872, to June Term, 1872, No. 863, to which the sheriff made the following return:

"Levied upon the personal property of the defendant, July 2d, 1872, subject to a certain attachment issued out of the Court of Common Pleas, to June Term, 1872, No. 272; and after setting aside property, viz., household furniture, to the value of $300, I sold the residue of said property July 8th, 1872, for the sum of five hundred and twenty-one dollars."

That the following notice was sent to the sheriff on behalf of J. Francis Fisher, landlord.

PHILADA., July 8, 1872.

You are notified, that there is due me this day, by Mr. Edward Stiles, for rent of premises at the northeast corner of Eleventh and Spring Garden streets, for two months (at the rate of $83.33⅓ per month), one hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-six and two-thirds cents, which amount you will please recover for me from the proceeds of the sale of the goods, &c., taken in execution upon said premises by you.

The preference given to the landlord's claim in the distribution of the fund in court is due to the provisions of the 83d section of the act of June 16th, 1836, which are as follows: "The goods and chattels being in or upon any messuage, lands or tenements, which are or shall be demised for life, or years, or otherwise, taken by virtue of an execution, and liable to the distress of the landlord, shall be liable for the payment of any sum of money due for rent at the time of taking such goods in execution: Provided, That such rent shall not exceed one year's rent."

To this position, the plaintiff in the execution raised the following points of objection:

1st. It was contended, that as the above section was intended to make amends to the landlord for taking away his power of distress by a judicial sale of the tenant's goods, it did not apply in the present case, the levy upon and sale of the goods having been made a month prior to "quarter day," when the rent became due, and the right of distress accrued. That the rent could not, under the statute, be apportioned to the time of the levy.

There can be no doubt that the objection is founded upon principle. That the Legislature meant by this section to give the right in question only when the goods were liable to distress, not only appears from the use of those words in the act, and the further requirement that the rent claimed shall be "due," but is a recognized groundwork of many decisions upon the subject; and as the nature of rent, it being payable out of the profits of the land, and the consideration for its payment being the enjoyment of the thing demised, requires that it should be complete before any obligation to pay can arise; it would seem that apportioning the rent to the time of the levy, would be in direct violation of the terms of the act, there being no power of distress until rent is due, and in law, rent never being considered to be due or existing as a tangible interest until it has become actually payable; thus in Dun's Case, 10

Co. 128, where it is laid down, that "rent reserved is to be paid out of the profits of the land, and is not due until the profits be taken by the lessee." It was (for this reason) held, that "if the tenant of the land is evicted, or if the lease be determined before the legal time of payment, no rent shall be paid, for there never shall be an apportionment with respect to part of the time as there shall be on an eviction of part of the lands;" and Collings v. Harding, Cro. Eliz. 606; Trevail v. Ingraham, 2 Mod. 282, and Henn v. Hanson, 1 Lev. 99, are all authorities which show that so little does accruing rent partake of the character of a present debt or duty, that a release of all demands from the lessor to the lessee will not discharge it; for, as Littleton says, "it was neither debitum or solvendum at the time of the release made."

The provision of the statute, that the rent claimed shall be due, has, however, been altogether disregarded by the courts in construing the same, while, on the other hand, a most liberal interpretation has been given to the words "liable to the distress." Thus in Wickey v. Eyster, 8 P. F. Smith, 501, it was held, "the words 'liable to the distress of the landlord,' do not mean that the rent must be ripe for distress, but they refer to the liability of the goods themselves as subjects of distress."

And upon this principle, "the settled interpretation of the 83d section of the act of 1836 has been that the rent for the current quarter or year, at the time of the levy on the tenant's goods on the demised premises, although not then due, will be apportioned to the time of the levy." Moody v. Morgan, 6 W. & S. 333; Case v. Davis, 3 Harris, 80; Anderson's Appeal, 3 Barr, 218, and Collins' Appeal, 11 Casey, 83, following West v. Sink, 2 Yeate's Reports, 274, and Binns v. Hudson, 5 Binn. 505, decisions under the act of 1772, of which that of 1836 is a transcript, are authorities to the same effect. And while the falsity of the reasoning of the earlier cases is admitted, the doctrine of stare decisis is applied and their ruling adhered to. The objection cannot, therefore, be sustained.

2. Again it was contended, that as the second lease of the premises upon which the goods were taken in execution was made before the term under the first lease had expired, and with the consent of the lessee under the first lease (evidenced by his becoming surety for the lessee in the second), the same amounted to a surrender of the premises before the rent fell due, and, therefore, there never was any right to distrain for the rent claimed, and hence, upon the ground stated in the first objection, no equivalent for it under the statute. In support of the position, Greider's Appeal, 5 Barr, 425, was relied upon.

This objection is clearly based upon a misapprehension of the facts. The second lease was not made until after the tenancy under the first was at an end, and the right of distress for rent due, complete. The lease to the defendant in the execution was, "for the term of one year from the 8th day of August, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight." The subsequent one, "from the 8th day of August, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two." Now, though there is not entire uniformity in the rule laid down by courts with reference to the computation of time, when the expression is "from" any given date, the day of the date being sometimes included, and at others excluded, it is clear, that in a lease for one year from a given date, if one terminus is included, the other must be excluded, or the lease would, contrary to its terms, be for a year and a day; thus, Duffy v. Ogden, 14 P. F. Smith, 240, and Myers v. Anderson, 12 Harris, 252, hold that, "leases beginning on the 1st of April, expire on the 31st of March of the following year." Hence, as the form of the expression is identical in both the instruments in question, it is apparent, whether they be regarded as terminating on the 7th or 8th of August, as the same rule of computation must apply in each case, the second lease could not take effect until the first had expired, and the rent under it become due and payable. In Greider's Appeal (cited supra) the lease was surrendered by the tenant between the time of levy and sale of his goods, and when no rent was due and payable to the landlord. The effort was to apportion the rent, and thus claim it against the execution creditor; but the court held, that those adjudged cases which permitted landlord's to apportion rent and claim up to the time of the sheriff's levy, though adhered to upon the rule of stare decisis, were founded upon illogical reasoning, and were not, therefore, to be extended to cases differently characterized, and did not apply to cases where there had been an express and voluntary surrender of the term. It was argued on authority, that the surrender drowned and extinguished the lesser estate of the tenant, and that rent reserved and issuing out of that estate, but not due at the time of surrender, was also extinguished.

As, however, in the present case, the second lease, as shown above, was not made until the tenancy under the first was at an end, and the rent reserved due and payable, the principle of the exception established in Greider's Appeal, to the general rule allowing rent to be apportioned to the time of the levy can have no application.

3d. Again it was claimed that as shelving, bins, counters, &c., passed with the premises leased to the defendant in the execution, the rent reserved was in consideration of the use of both personal and real estate, which destroyed the right of distress, and, therefore, upon the principle forming the basis of the previous objections, the right under the statute.

Commonwealth v. Coutner, 6 Harris, 439, was cited as an authority in point. This contains the following dictum, the court having sustained the right of distress, so far as the entire essential merits of the case were concerned: "Rent must issue out of lands, and if the real and personal property leased are so mixed together in the lease, that it cannot be determined how much of the consideration is to be paid for the use of the chattels, and how much for the use of the real estate, there can be no distress for the non-payment of it." It is apparent the confusion contemplated in the above does not exist in the present case, the rent reserved in the lease under consideration is exclusively for the use of the premises, no mention being made of chattels, but presuming that the lease had in terms included shelving, bins, &c., as the doctrine advanced in Commonwealth v. Coutner, was expressly repudiated in the subsequent case of Mickle's Administrator v. Mills, 1 Grant's Cases, 320, the objection is without support. It was there held: "A rent may issue out of lands and tenements corporeal, or out of them and their furniture," and the court in reviewing the dictum in Commonwealth v. Coutner, which was the result of a too strict adherence to the definition of rent, as "a certain profit issuing yearly out of lands and tenements corporeal," said, "not having noticed the inadequacy of the induction upon which the definition rests, we did not suspect any danger in drawing the very obvious deduction we did in Commonwealth v. Coutner, * * * We are glad the learned judge who tried this case was not misled by our mistake. He tried the question rightly. A rent may issue out of lands and tenements corporeal, or out of them and their furniture."

That this case is law, is clear beyond doubt, such and similar leases have prevailed time out of mind, and yet the right of distress never been questioned, except perhaps by inference from the dictum found in Commonwealth v. Coutner. Opposed to this incidental dictum, we find in addition to the case cited, the same point adjudicated in England, in Newman v. Anderton, 5 Bos. & Pul. 224. In replevin, defendant avowed the taking by distress for rent of a house "with certain furniture and effects" therein, under a lease or demise. A verdict was rendered for the defendant, and application was made by plaintiff to set it aside on the ground that there was no right of distress under such a lease. The same course of argument was adopted there as here; and the court after holding the question under advisement said, the right of distress in such cases had never before been questioned, although of frequent occurrence; and the chief justice cites cases where the principal inducement to the lease is the personal property or utensils accompanying the premises, and yet, he says, he never heard it doubted that the landlord might distrain for the rent. The rent is construed to issue out of the realty, and not the goods, although the value of the former is greatly enhanced by the latter. These authorities clearly determine the point.

The right of the attachment creditor to priority in the distribution over the execution creditors was also disputed by the latter.

The sheriff's return to the fi. fa., under which the execution creditors claim, is, however, decisive of the point against them. It was as follows:

"Levied upon personal property of defendant, July 2d, 1872, subject to a certain attachment issued out of the Court of Common Pleas, of June Term, 1872, No. 272, &c. A return which places the case directly within the principle of the ruling in Prather v. Chase, 3 Brewster, 206, and Paxson's Appeal, 13 Wright, 195, in the former of which it was held, that "a sheriff's return to a fi. fa. is conclusive as to whether a prior writ of foreign attachment was lawfully executed upon the goods and chattels levied upon under the fi. fa, so as to establish a priority of seizure over subsequent executions." And in the latter, where the plaintiff in certain executions claimed priority in the distribution of the proceeds, on the ground that the levies on two executions previously issued, subject to which levies his own were returned by the sheriff, were mere paper levies, it was held, that "the plaintiff, in the subsequent executions, could not contradict the returns to them, his remedy was by action, if false returns had been made." The principle upon which the decision was founded is thus stated by the learned judge, who delivered the opinion of the court. "The appellant's difficulty lies in the necessity, in order to arrive at what he claims, to contradict the returns on his own writs. He insists upon striking out in effect, by testimony aliunde, what is not extrinsic matter in his returns, namely, that the levies are subject to prior levies. If it were foreign or intrinsic matter, it would legally be no part of a proper return, and would prove nothing; but it is not so; it is the regular mode of stating the facts of the levy. Upon the principle of the authorities conceded by the appellant's counsel, and which could not have been denied, viz.: that the return on an execution is conclusive in the case, I see not what possible escape there is for the appellant from its force. May he contradict them? If he may, the principle does not exist; but we know that it does, and as it does, he cannot evade it by any theory made apparent in these cases;" language which might with equal propriety have been applied to the case before us.

The auditor, after deducting the costs of the audit, awarded and directed payment of the balance as follows:

To the landlord, rent from May 8th, 1872, to July 2d, 1872.

To the plaintiffs in the attachment, the amount of their judgment and costs.

And the balance to the plaintiffs in the execution, on account of their judgment.

The plaintiffs in the execution excepted to the order of distribution, to the auditor's fee and to the costs allowed the prothonotary.

Opinion by MITCHELL, J. Delivered June 27th, 1873.

The first three exceptions are not sustained, and are sufficiently answered by the authorities cited by the auditor. There remain, however, exceptions to the auditor's fee, and to the prothonotary's claim for costs, which are proper to be noticed.

1. By the act of April 14th, 1870, a regular schedule of fees is established for auditors in this county, but the court is authorized "in important cases on cause shown," to allow "such additional compensation as they may deem proper."

In the opinion of this court, the proper practice to be pursued under this act by an auditor who desires the allowance of such additional compensation, is to complete his report as far as the table of distribution, and then to submit the report with a statement of his fee, calculated on the regular charges of the act, and a suggestion of what further allowance is deemed reasonable by himself or by the counsel before him. Having thus before it the facts by which to judge of the extent and difficulty of the auditor's labors, the court will be enabled to comply with the spirit as well as the letter of the act of Assembly.

The regular fee in this case would be $17.50. But one meeting was held, as the facts were nearly all proved by record, or other written evidence. But on the facts, four or five questions of law, some of them of considerable nicety, arose, and had to be decided by the auditor. To these questions the auditor gave not only time and labor, but professional skill, which, as the result of past labor, is also a subject of compensation. We think, therefore, that this is a proper case for the exercise of the discretion given to the court by the act of 1870, and though it would have been preferable to have submitted the question of the fee to the court in the first instance, yet as the amount charged, $50, is not unreasonable for the services performed, we will not now change it.

2. The remaining exception is to the sum of $9:12, awarded by the auditor to the prothonotary for his commissions and costs.

A careful examination has failed to show any ground for this exception. The only item of any importance about which a doubt could exist, is the charge of $2.10 for recording the auditor's report.

By the act of April 25th, 1850, the prothonotaries of the various Courts of Common Pleas and District Courts are required to record in books provided for that purpose, "all accounts of assignees, trustees, sequestrators and committees, and all reports of auditors thereon. * * * And all reports of distributions or appropriations made by the various sheriffs of the commonwealth, and filed in their offices respectively." It will be seen that this act does not in terms include reports of auditors upon the distribution of moneys paid into court as the proceeds of execution; but a fair and liberal construction of the act would seem to make it necessary that such reports should be included. The scope of the act would seem to be that all accounts of the administration and distribution of money, and also all auditors' reports, should be recorded. Sect. 18 provides for the recording of all auditors' reports in the Orphans' Courts; and sect. 19 follows in the language I have already quoted. If the words "reports of distributions or appropriations made by the sheriff," meant to require a record of every distribution made by the sheriff of the proceeds of a writ, it is impossible to suppose the Legisture meant to leave unrecorded the most important cases of all—those, namely, in which there was a contest for the fund. The fair construction of these words, therefore, is, that they were meant to describe just such cases as this, and to require the recording of this auditor's report. Such has been the uniform practice in this court since the passage of the act.

Assuming then, that the charge for recording is legally made, is the amount charged correct? By the act of 1850, the prothonotary is to charge one-half the fees allowed to the recorder of deeds. Since the argument of this case, the words of the auditor's report have been counted three separate times—once by the prothonotary's counsel, once by myself, and once by another person by my direction, and the maximum discrepancy in the prothonotary's fee by the three counts is 13 cents—a discrepancy easily accounted for by the variation in counting dates and amounts as words, when expressed in Arabic numerals. As the prothonotary's count was the intermediate one of the three, it was probably the most correct.

By the act of April 2d, 1868, section 3 (P. L. 5), "the fees to be received by the several prothonotaries of the Courts of Common Pleas and of the District Courts of this commonwealth," were materially raised, for some of the services performed by the prothonotary in this case. When that act was passed there were no District Courts in existence in the commonwealth, except those of Philadelphia and Allegheny counties, yet at the end of the act is a proviso, that it shall not apply to certain counties named, including Allegheny and Philadelphia. There is thus a latent repugnancy or incompatibility in the parts of the act, and probably the true intent would be best reached by limiting the operation of the proviso to the sheriff, recorder and other officers named in the act, and holding that the express mention of the District Courts must override the proviso as to the prothonotary. But it is not necessary to do this, as the prothonotary of this court has never claimed to charge by the rates fixed in this act, and I have referred to it only to show the carefulness and accuracy of that officer, who, in a case of doubt, has charged the smaller fee, and to observe in this connection that it is very much to be regretted, for the interests of the prothonotary, and of those who have business with him, that the Legislature does not make a simple, intelligent, and intelligible fee bill.

Exceptions dismissed.

In re Complaint against the President, Managers and Company of the FRANKFORD AND BRISTOL TURNPIKE ROAD.

1. A return by a constable to a precept under the act of 24th March, 1803, that he had summoned "three disinterested persons," will not support an inquisition; and all proceedings founded thereon should be set aside.
2. The constable should summon "three disinterested freeholders," and should so return.
3. Though a juror occasionally uses a turnpike road, and pays toll, he is not thereby disqualified.
4. The jurors should not be sworn to inquire as to anything save the condition of the road.

Opinion by PAXSON, J. Delivered July 5th, 1873.

This was a certiorari directed to Alderman Thaddeus Stearne, and inquest, to send up the record in the above case.

The proceeding was instituted under the act of 24th of March, 1803, P. L. 418, incorporating said company, and the object of it was to compel the company to open its toll gates, upon the allegation that the road was not in such "good and perfect order" as required by the act of Assembly as aforesaid.

By section 16 of said act it is provided "that if the said company shall neglect to keep the said road in good and perfect order for the space of five days, and information thereof shall be given to any justice of the peace of the neighborhood, such justice shall issue a precept to be directed to any constable, commanding him to summon three disinterested freeholders to meet at a certain time in the said precept to be mentioned at the place in the said road which shall be complained of, of which meeting notice shall be given to the keeper of the gate or turnpike nearest thereto, and the said justice shall, at such time and place, by the oaths or affirmations of the said freeholders, inquire whether the said road or any part thereof is in such good and perfect order and repair as aforesaid, and shall cause an inquisition to be made under the hands of himself and a majority of said freeholders; and if the said road shall be found by said inquisition to be out of order and repair, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, the said justice shall certify and send one copy of the said inquisition to each of the keepers of the turnpikes or gates between which such defective places shall be, and from thenceforth the toll hereby granted to be collected at such turnpikes or gates, for passing the interval of road between them, shall cease to be demanded, paid or collected, until the said defective part or parts of the said road shall be put in good and perfect order and repair as aforesaid," &c.

The inquisition sets forth a complaint made before Alderman Stearne, on the 15th day of May last, by Wm. J. Fries, Lewis P. Allen, and John F. Kinsey, in which, it is alleged, that certain portions of said turnpike road, specified in said complaint, were in very bad condition and out of repair, &c., and had been so for more than five days prior to the making of said complaint.

Then follows the precept of said alderman directed to the constable of the twenty-third ward, commanding him to summon "three disinterested persons" to view said road, &c. To the said precept the constable made the following return: "In obedience to the within precept, I have summoned three disinterested citizens, good and lawful men of my bailiwick, to be and appear at the time and place within mentioned, May 16th, 1873, as by this precept I am commanded."

The inquest met on the ground on the 22d day of May, the time designated in the precept, and proceeded to view the road, and hear testimony, and upon the same day condemned the road as being out of order and repair, contrary to the act of Assembly aforesaid.

A number of exceptions were filed on behalf of the turnpike company to these proceedings. The first exception is, that the alderman had no jurisdiction; the act of 1803, before cited, conferring the jurisdiction upon justices of the peace. That the act in question does not confer this jurisdiction upon aldermen is clear. At the time of its passage there were no aldermen within the territorial limits of this road, and the power conferred by the act could only have been exercised at that time by justices of the peace. But it is provided by the 23d section of the act of 20th March, 1810 (Purdon, 847, pl. 26), that "the like jurisdiction and authorities vested by this act in the justices of the peace within this commonwealth, shall be and they are hereby vested in each and every of the aldermen appointed within the city of Philadelphia, who shall, in all cases, exercise all such powers within the said city, which any justice of the peace may exercise within any courts in this State, and shall be entitled to like fees; and in all cases shall be under and subject to such limitations, restrictions and provisions, as justices of the peace are, in like circumstances, subjected to by this act." It was contended by the learned counsel for the company, that this section only conferred upon aldermen the powers which had been by said act therein conferred upon justices of the peace, and was not a grant of general powers, or of any power not specified in said act. But we think the section referred to is entitled to a broader interpretation, and that in addition to conferring upon the aldermen all the jurisdiction given to justices of the peace by the act of 20th March, 1810, it confers upon the former in all cases, all such powers within the said city which any justice of the peace may exercise within any county in this State. That this interpretation of the section referred to is the correct one, is apparent from the language of the act itself, and as it has been acted upon, and acquiesced in by the bar and the public for over sixty years, it is too late now to disturb it.

The 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th exceptions may be considered together. They are all directed to the fact, that it does not properly appear upon the face of the proceedings that the three persons summoned by the constable were freeholders. It is hardly necessary to say, that as this qualification is imposed by the act of Assembly, it cannot be dispensed with; on the contrary, the record must show affirmatively that it has been complied with. The statute under which this complaint was instituted, is highly penal in its nature; the proceedings themselves are of a summary character, and in derogation of common law rights.

The precept of the alderman and the return of the constable are both defective in this respect. The precept requires the constable to summon "three disinterested persons." The constable makes return that he has summoned "three disinterested citizens," without naming them. Not a word here about "freeholders." Nothing even to designate the citizens whom he summoned, or to show that the three citizens who acted upon the inquest were the persons referred to by the constable in his return. Standing alone, these defects would be fatal, but it was strenuously argued by the learned counsel for the complainants, that said defects have been cured by the inquisition; that it appears therein that the three persons referred to were freeholders respectively, and were summoned by the constable. It is true that said inquisition does set forth that by virtue of the said precept the constable made return to said alderman and jury that he had "summoned Christian H. Geisse, John Holden, and Jeremiah Quickshall, three disinterested persons," &c. What the constable did return, is in writing, is attached to the inquisition, and contradicts the finding thereof. It also appears that objection was made to one or more of the inquest by the company, whereupon they were respectively examined on their voir dire, and each juror stated that he was a freeholder. I quote from the proceedings: "Defendants ask for an adjournment; objected to by complainants; objection sustained; jurors sworn and examined on their voir dire, and answer severally that they are freeholders in this county." There is nothing here but the statement of each juror that he was a freeholder. There is no finding of that fact by a tribunal competent to pass upon it. At most it is only evidence tending to establish a fact. The inquest, even if competent to pass upon the qualification of its own members, in no place finds the fact that the members thereof were freeholders. The inquisition nowhere refers to them as such. It speaks of them as "said alderman and jurors."

In this case we have no record made up by the alderman. We have only the inquisition made by that officer and the three persons summoned by the constable. The finding of facts by the inquisition is conclusive as to all matters properly submitted to it, and as to which the inquest was charged to inquire. In landlord and tenant cases such finding has been held to cure certain defects or omissions in the proceedings. It may be stated generally that the finding of a fact by the inquisition in such cases, as to which it was the province of the inquest to inquire, cures the omission to set out such fact in the preliminary proceedings. But the rule to be applied to this case is more strict than in cases of landlord and tenant, for the reason that in the latter, the proceedings, though summary, are not penal; they rest entirely upon contract,

I do not think the inquisition cures the defect referred to. The objection was made at the earliest moment, and the defendants are entitled to avail themselves of it here.

The precept should have commanded the constable to summon "freeholders;" the return of the constable should have set forth the fact that the persons summoned, naming them, were freeholders. The omission to do so leaves the proceedings without any proper evidence of this necessary qualification, and would have been a sufficient ground to quash the array, if there had been any mode by which such a proceeding could have been instituted, or any tribunal before which it could have been properly heard. While we would not exact unnecessary strictness in matters of form in such cases, we cannot dispense with matters of substance. Here form and substance are alike omitted. The constable in the first instance determines the qualifications of the inquest. He is to summon "three disinterested freeholders." This return, if properly made, is prima facie evidence that they are such, and conclusive unless challenged for cause, and the contrary shown. In the latter case it would rest with the alderman to decide the challenge and pass upon the question of their qualifications. If they were not such persons as the precept commanded the constable to summon, it might, perhaps, be his duty to issue another precept, and have other persons who did possess the qualifications summoned. In no event could the inquest sit in judgment upon the qualifications of its own members; and as neither the constable nor the alderman have officially certified to the fact that either of the three persons referred to was a freeholder, we think the proceedings are radically defective.

I might pause here, but as our decision may result in the commencement of the suit de novo, I will briefly refer to some of the remaining exceptions as bearing upon the law of the case.

The 7th and 8th exceptions allege that two of the inquest were not "disinterested;" and the ground of this allegation is, that they sometimes travelled the road and paid toll. This, if so, would not amount to a legal disqualification. The objection might be urged against any citizen of the commonwealth who may have occasion to use their road. I do not think the fact that a man has used the road and paid toll in the past, or may do so in the future, renders him legally incompetent to serve on the inquest. I am, however, free to say, that the constable ought, in such case, to obey the command of the alderman's precept in its spirit as well as its letter, and if not possible to summon freeholders who did not use the road at all, to at least summon such as by their location and business have occasion to do so but seldom. If it should appear to the court in any future proceeding, that the members of the inquest were large toll-payers of the road, it might materially lessen the weight we would otherwise feel disposed to give to their verdict upon the facts.

It was also alleged by the ninth exception that the parties who made the judgment were improperly sworn. The inquisition shows that they were sworn not only to inquire into the condition of the road, as required by the law, but also "of such other matters and things as shall be lawfully required of them in the premises." The latter part of the oath should have been omitted. The inquest had nothing to do with any "other matters."

The remaining exceptions are not important, and any discussion of them is unnecessary.

The 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th exceptions are sustained, the inquisition set aside, and all proceedings subsequent to the complaint are quashed.

United States Supreme Court.

MARSHALL v. KNOX et al., Assignees.

A lessor obtained a writ of provisional seizure of goods on the premises leased, to enforce his claim for rent. The sheriff took possession. The lessee then filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy. The bankrupt court upon rule to show cause, directed the sheriff to deliver the goods to the assignee in bankruptcy. The lessor was not allowed to appeal from the decree. The lessor then filed a bill in equity in the Circuit Court, praying that the assignee might be restrained from proceeding under said order, and from taking said goods, and for general relief. The Circuit Court refused to entertain the bill. The assignee took the goods and sold them. Held, on appeal to the Supreme Court:

1. The bill was an original proceeding, and the Circuit Court should have entertained it.
2. An appeal would lie from the action of the Circuit Court dismissing the bill.
3. The sheriff's right to the possession of the goods being founded on the lessor's lien thereon for his rent, was superior to the right of the assignee.
4. The lessor was entitled to the full value of the goods, to the amount of his rent clear of expenses, whether the assignee received such value or not.
5. An attachment by mesne process, referred to in the bankrupt act, is an original process of attachment, which becomes a perfected lien by the judgments which may ensue.
6. The District Court had no jurisdiction, upon rule to show cause, to direct the sheriff to deliver the goods to the assignee.

DECEMBER TERM, 1872.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the court.

Thomas D. Marshall, the appellant, was the owner of a plantation in the parish of Avoyelles, in Louisiana, known as the Walnut Grove Plantation, and on the 7th day of February, 1867, leased it to Nathan G. Smith and Henry Fuller for three years, from January 1st, 1867, at three thousand dollars a year, payable in two equal payments. At the end of the first year the tenants were in arrears $1,600, and on the fourth day of January, 1868, Marshall commenced an action therefor, in the District Court of the parish, and applied for and obtained a writ of provisional seizure (as it is called), being the usual process by which a lessor takes possession of his lessee's property found on the premises, for the purpose of enforcing his lien thereon. The writ was served by the sheriff on the sixth day of January, 1868, by serving a copy on the lessees, and by a seizure of their property in land, consisting of mules, wagons, farming implements and stock, grain, furniture, etc., appraised at $1,744.

On the 15th of January, 1868, Smith, one of the lessees, filed in the District Court of the United States for Louisiana, a petition to be declared a bankrupt, and was declared such accordingly; and on the 12th of February, 1868, the defendants were appointed the assignees to take the property aforesaid out of the hands of the sheriff, and to dispose of it under the orders of the bankrupt court. They first obtained from the court a rule upon the lessor (the complainant), and the sheriff to show cause why they should not deliver up the property to the assignees, alleging that various creditors of the bankrupt claimed to have a privilege on the property, and that it was necessary for a proper adjustment of all claims, privileges and liens, that the possession should be surrendered to the assignees, to be subject to the bankrupt court. The lessor contested the rule, stated his own rights and proceedings, and claimed possession of the property through the sheriff, for the purpose of selling the same to raise the amount by his rent. The rule, however, was made absolute, without, so far as appears, any other proof on the subject. The lessor appealed, but the district judge would not allow the appeal, and there was no justice of this court at that time (April, 1868) assigned to that circuit, to whom applications could be made. The lessor thereupon filed the present bill for an injunction to prohibit the assignees from proceeding under the said order of the bankrupt court, and from taking possession of said property, and for a decree that they be directed to pursue any residuary interest of the bankrupt in the lessor's suit, in the detaining and subjecting the property to the payment of his rent, and for further relief. Failing to obtain a preliminary injunction, and the property being taken and sold by the assignees, the lessor filed a supplemental bill, complaining of the illegality of the proceedings, asking for a review of the same, and for an account and damages. The bill and supplemental bill set out the lease, the provisional seizure, the proceedings in the bankrupt court and the acts of the assignees; and complained that the lessor was injured by a sacrifice of the property; and stated that before filing the original bill he had offered the assignees a bond, with sufficient sureties, to protect any persons claiming any superior liens to his on the property, if any such there were, which, however, he denied.

The defendants in their answer alleged that the lessees had a counter claim for repairs and permanent improvements, and that a number of hands employed on the plantation had a privilege for their wages superior to that of the lessor; but no proof of these facts was offered in the case.

The principal allegations of the complainant were proved and the defendants, on their part, adduced proof to show that they had acted in good faith under the orders of the bankrupt court, and that they had sold the property fairly, and held the proceeds for distribution, according to the rights of the parties in due course of the bankruptcy proceedings.

On hearing, the bill was dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

The first question is, whether this decree was rightly made, and is to be solved by reference to the second section of the bankrupt act. By this section it is declared that the Circuit Courts "shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all cases and questions arising under this act; and, except when special provision is otherwise made, may, upon bill, petition, or other proper process, of any party aggrieved, hear and determine the case as in a court of equity." By a subsequent clause of the same section it is declared that said courts "shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts, * * * * of all suits at law or in equity, * * * * by the assignee against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property, or rights of property, of said bankrupt, transferable to, or vested in such assignee."

The first clause confers upon the Circuit Courts that supervisory jurisdiction which may be exercised in a summary manner, in term or vacation, in court or at chambers, and upon the exercise of which this court has decided that it has no appellate jurisdiction. Morgan v. Thornhill, 11 Wall. 65.

The second clause confers jurisdiction by regular suit, either at law or in equity, in the cases specified; that is, in controversies between the assignee and persons claiming an adverse interest touching any property of the bankrupt.

The present case is in form a regular bill in equity, but it also asks a revision of the action of the District Court in the premises. As an original bill in equity it cannot stand if the District Court had no jurisdiction to proceed as it did, for the matter was already decided in that court. As a bill to review the proceedings and decision of the District Court, it was a very proper proceeding, and ought to have been entertained by the Circuit Court. The revisory jurisdiction of the Circuit Court may be exercised by bill as well as by petition, and as this bill complains of the action of the District Court and asks for a review and reversal thereof, the Circuit Court erred in dismissing it for want of jurisdiction. But regarded as a bill of review, we could not, according to our decision in Morgan v. Thornhill, entertain an appeal from the decision of the Circuit Court in the case.

The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed, unless it can be shown that the District Court proceeded without jurisdiction. If this were the case, then the bill may be regarded as an original bill, of which the Circuit Court clearly had jurisdiction, and the appeal to this court was properly taken.

The case here, then, depends on the question whether the District Court had jurisdiction to proceed by rule as it did. The goods, it has been seen, were in the custody of the sheriff, under a writ of provisional seizure, and held as a pledge for the suit of the lessor. The seizure had been made before the bankruptcy. The landlord claimed the right thus to hold possession of them until his claim for rent was satisfied. This claim was adverse to that of the assignee's. The case presented was one of conflicting claims to the possession of the goods; and the sheriff had present possession for the benefit of the lessor. Neither the sheriff nor the lessor was a party to the proceedings in bankruptcy. No process had been served upon them to make them such. They were not before the court; and the court had no control or jurisdiction over them.

Under these circumstances the assignees applied for, and obtained from the District Court, a rule on the lessor and sheriff to deliver the goods to them. Had the court authority to make such a rule? Could such a rule be characterized as due process of law?

The bankrupt law does not distinguish in what cases the District Court may proceed summarily, and in what cases by plenary suit; and we are left to decide the question on the general principles that affect the case. The second section, however, in conferring jurisdiction on the Circuit Courts, uses this language: "Said Circuit Courts shall also have concurrent jurisdiction with the District Courts of the same district of all suits at law or in equity, which may or shall be brought by the assignee in bankruptcy, against any person claiming an adverse interest, or by such person against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt." This language seems to indicate that where there is a claim to an adverse interest in the property, a suit at law or in equity will be the mode of redress properly resorted to. The eighth section, in granting appeals and writs of error from the District to the Circuit Court, only does so in cases in equity and at law, and in cases where the claim of a creditor is allowed or rejected. If, therefore, adverse claims to property could be decided by the summary action of the District Court, not only would the party claiming adversely to the assignees be deprived by trial by due process of law, but he would be without appeal. An appeal was, in fact, denied in this case.

We think that it could not have been the intention of Congress thus to deprive parties claiming property, of which they were in possession, of the usual processes of the law in defence of their rights.

The subject, in one of its aspects, came before this court in the case of Smith v. Mason, reported in 14 Wall. 419. In that case the adverse claim was to the absolute property of the fund in dispute; not, as in this, to a mere lien, and to possession by way of pledge under the lien; and we held that the bankrupt court could not, by a mere rule, make the adverse claimant a party to the bankruptcy proceedings and adjudge his right in a runaway boy, but that the assignees must litigate the claim in a plenary suit, either at law or in equity. But it may, with some plausibility, be said that as the property in this case is conceded to be in the bankrupt, and the question has respect only to the right of possession under the lien, the District Court, which has express jurisdiction of the "ascertainment and liquidation of the liens, and other specific claims," on the bankrupt's property, might assume control of the property itself. The claim, however, is to the right of possession, and that right may be just as absolute and just as essential to the interest of the claimant as the right of property in the thing itself, and is, in fact, a species of property in the thing, just as much the subject of litigation as the thing itself. It is the opinion of the court, therefore, that the case is not substantially different from that of Smith v. Mason. Besides, it has another point, in common with that case, upon which a direct adjudication was made thereon. The lessor in this case was not a party to the bankrupt proceeding; and in Smith v. Mason we held expressly that "strangers to the proceedings in bankruptcy, not served with process, and who have not voluntarily appeared and become parties to such litigation, cannot be compelled to come into court under a petition for a rule to show cause."

The court is of opinion, therefore, that the District Court proceeded without jurisdiction in compelling the lessor and the sheriff, under a rule, to show cause to deliver up possession of the goods in question to the assignees. It results that the bill in this case was properly filed as an original bill, and on that account should not have been dismissed as for want of jurisdiction. The case should have been heard and decided upon the merits.

We are, then, brought to the question of merits. If the complainant had no right to hold the goods, notwithstanding his claims to hold them, in an action at law against the assignees, he could have recovered only nominal damage; and, coming into a court of equity for redress and praying for an account of the value of the goods, and for damages, if it turn out that he had no right to withhold the goods from the possession of the assignee, the court would be very reluctant to compel the latter to place the value of goods in his hands to be relitigated in another suit. A court of equity having got possession of the case by the lessor's own act, must proceed to decide the whole merits of the controversy.

But we think it very clear that the complainant had a right to the possession which he claimed. The fourteenth section of the bankrupt act, it is true, vests in the assignees all the property and estate of the bankrupt, "although the same is then attached in mesne process as the property of the debtor, and shall dissolve any such attachment made within four months next preceding the commencement of such proceedings." But this clause evidently refers to those cases of original process of attachment which may become perfected liens by the judgment which may ensue. The lessor's lien for rent on the goods of his tenant situated on the premises, is one of the strongest and most favored in the law of Louisiana. The articles of the civil code use the following language:

"The lessor has for the payment of his rent and other obligations of his lease, a right of pledge on the movable effects of the lessor, which are found on the property leased." Art. 2675.

"In the exercise of this right the lessor may seize the objects which are the subject of it, before the lessee takes them away, or within fifteen days after they are taken away, if they continue to be the property of the lessee, and can be identified." Art. 2679.

"The right which the lessor has over the products of the estate, and on the movables which are found on the place leased, for his rent, is of a higher nature than mere privilege. The latter is only enforced on the price arising from the sale of the movables to which it applies. It does not enable the creditor to take or keep the effects themselves specially. The lessor, on the contrary, may take the effects themselves and retain them until he is paid." Art. 3185.

When the rent accrues, or even before it is due, if the lessor apprehends that the goods may be removed, he may have a writ of provisional seizure to the sheriff, who by virtue thereof, takes possession of the goods and sells them in due course as soon as the court has recognized the amount of rent for which they are liable. Such a case is similar to that of an execution, in reference to which it has been properly held that where the levy is made before the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, the possession of the officer cannot be disturbed by the assignees. The latter, in such case, is only entitled to such residue as may remain in the sheriff's hands after the debt for which the execution issued has been satisfied. Such, we think, were the relative rights of the parties in this case. If the assignee apprehended that the sheriff would, by delay or negligence, waste goods in his hands, he could either apply to the District Court of the parish for redress or aid in the premises, or perhaps file a bill in equity in the Circuit or District Court of the United States.

The next question is, what relief ought to be given to the complainant? The goods have been sold by the assignees. They cannot be returned in specie. The supplemental bill prays that the assignees be decreed to account to the complainant for the full value of the property, and also such sum of money as he might be entitled to receive by reason of the wrongful acts of the assignees in the premises, and for further relief. The bill, it must be remembered, was originally filed for an injunction to prevent the assignees from disturbing the complainant in his possession of the goods. He was not in laches in defending his rights. He is clearly entitled, under the circumstances of the case, to the full value of these goods, clear of all expenses, whether the assignees realized that full value or not (limited, of course, by the amount of rent which he is entitled to be paid), and also to all the taxable costs to which he has been put by this litigation. As to any damages beyond that, if he has suffered any, we think that he ought not to recover them in this suit, as he, or the sheriff for his benefit, had an option to bring an action of trespass for damages, instead of resorting to a court of equity for relief. Damages are allowed, it is true, in certain cases, as incidental to other relief; but even if they could in strictness be awarded in this suit, we do not think that the case is such as to call for the interpretation of the court in directing an inquiry as to damages.

The decree must be reversed, with directions to the court below to proceed in the cause in conformity with this opinion.

McNITT and TAINTOR v. TURNER.

1. The statute of Illinois, providing that as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser, a deed, &c., will take effect only from the time of its being recorded, includes a purchaser at a judicial sale.
2. The decree of a court having jurisdiction of the cause, cannot be impeached collaterally except for fraud.

DECEMBER TERM, 1872.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois.

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a writ of error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Illinois.

The defendant in error brought two separate actions of ejectment in the court below, one against each of the plaintiffs in error. They were landlord and tenant, and by consent of the parties the actions were consolidated. The plaintiff recovered the premises in controversy. The defendants thereupon brought this writ of error.

The chain of title relied upon by the respective parties was as follows:

Turner gave in evidence a patent from the United States to Louis F. Lefay, dated October 23d, 1818; a deed from Lefay to Samuel Spotts, dated December 19th, 1818, and recorded in the proper county, March 22d, 1820; the proceedings of the Circuit Court of Adams county, in Illinois, touching a decree of sale made by that court upon the application of Archibald Williams as the administrator of Spotts, and a sale made accordingly; a deed by the administrator to Duncan N. Hennen, the purchaser, dated June 17th, 1839, recorded April 3d, 1841; and a chain of mesne conveyances extending from the heirs-at-law of Hennen down to Turner, the plaintiff in the court below.

The defendant gave in evidence a deed from Spotts to John Lucas, dated September 12th, 1820, recorded January 2d, 1864, and a sequence of deeds from Lucas down to McNitt, one of the plaintiffs in error. McNitt was in possession of the premises.

The court instructed the jury that Turner had shown title, and was entitled to recover. To this the defendants excepted.

The defendants then asked the court to instruct the jury.

That the deed from Spotts to Lucas and the subsequent deeds in that chain of title, conveyed the fee of the premises to McNitt:

That the deed from Spotts to Lucas having conveyed the premises to Lucas, Spotts did not die seized of them; that they were, therefore, not liable to be sold by his administrator for the payment of his debts, and that the decree of sale was void:

That Spotts having conveyed to Lucas before the proceeding in the Circuit Court of Adams county was instituted by Williams, no title passed by the deed of Williams to Hennen, and hence none by the subsequent mesne conveyances to Turner.

These instructions the court refused to give, and the defendants excepted.

A few remarks will be sufficient to dispose of this exception. All the instructions relate to the deed of Spotts to Lucas.

The decree of sale was made by the court at the September term, 1838. The sale to Hennen was made on the 17th of June, 1839. The deed of Williams to him was made on the 17th of June, 1839, and recorded April 3d, 1841. The deed from Spotts to Lucas, though made on the 12th of September, 1820, was not recorded until January 2d, 1864. The 22d section of statute of Illinois, in force at both these periods, and still in force, provides that "deeds and other instruments relating to or affecting title to real estate, shall be recorded in the county where such real estate is situated." The next section is as follows: "Sec. 23. All deeds, mortgages, or other instruments of writing, which are required to be recorded, shall take effect and be in force after the time of filing the same for record, and not before as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers, without notice, and all such deeds and title papers shall be adjudged void as to all such creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice, until the same shall be filed for record."

The term "purchasers" as used in this statute, includes purchasers at judicial sales. A deed not filed for record is as to them wholly without effect. It is in all respects, so far as they are concerned, as if it did not exist. The maxim applies, De non apparentibus et de non existentibus eadem est ratio. Martin v. Dryden, 1 Gil. 187; Center v. Root, 28 Ill. 367; Cooke v. Hall, 1 Gil. 575; see also Choteau v. Jones, 11 Ill. 300; Kennedy v. Northrup, 15 Ill. 148; Brookfield v. Goodrich, 32 Ill. 363.

Seisin was originally the completion of the feudal investiture. In American jurisprudence it means generally, ownership. The covenant of seisin and the covenant of right to convey are synonymous. Rawle on Covenants for Title, 34; Browning v. Wright, 2 Bos. & P. 14; 1 Wash. on Real Prop., 35.

The deed from Spotts to Lucas cannot affect any question arising in the case, and must be excluded from consideration. All the instructions asked by the plaintiffs in error assumed its efficacy for the purposes to which they referred.

The instructions were therefore properly refused.

It is assumed in the assignment of errors, and in the printed arguments of the learned counsel for the plaintiffs in error, that the admission in evidence of the record from the Circuit Court of Adams county, was objected to, the objection overruled, and exception taken. No such exception appears in the record.

In an action of ejectment the plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the strength of his own title. The weakness of his adversary's cannot avail him.

The only exception which remains to be considered is to the charge of the court, that the plaintiff had shown title in fee and was entitled to recover. That exception is thus set out in the record: "To which opinion and decision of the court the defendant then and there excepted, at the time of the said charge." The chain of the plaintiff's title, as exhibited on the trial, consisted of many links. The exception should have pointed out specifically the link or links deemed defective, and in what the defect was supposed to consist, in order that the court might be duly notified, and have an opportunity to correct the error, if any, into which it had fallen. The exception is insufficient. But this objection has not been insisted upon by the counsel for the defendant in error. We shall, therefore, consider the case as if the exception were sufficiently full and specific to meet the requirements of the rule upon the subject.

The objections taken to the title of the defendant in error are all confined to the judicial proceedings touching the sale by the administrator. Those objections, so far as it is necessary to consider them, are—

That the seisin of Spotts, at the time of his decease, is neither averred nor shown; and that the contrary appears.

That the authority to sell was given to Williams, the administrator, specially appointed, when the general administrator for the county should have been appointed, and the authority given to him; and that the description of the premises in the petition of the administrator is insufficient and a nullity.

It is insisted that these defects are jurisdictional, and that the proceeding was coram non judice and void.

The petition sets forth "that the said Samuel Spotts heretofore, to wit, before the first day of January, A. D. 1836, died, leaving in this State the real property described in the copy of the inventory marked Exhibit 'A,' filed herewith." The term leaving used in this connection is the synonym of owning. It is idiomatic rather than dialectic, and is believed to obtain in this sense throughout the country where so applied. This is sufficient. Such a petition need not follow the language of the statute and be drawn with the accuracy of an indictment. Nothing is required but the substance of what is necessary to be stated, intelligibly expressed. The deed of Spotts to Lucas is relied upon to disprove the seisin. That deed we have shown can have no such effect. The record of deeds in the proper office as it stood, showed the seisin of the decedent, and that was sufficient. No one was bound to look further, and it was conclusive upon all concerned.

It does not appear that Williams was not the public administrator, and if he were not, that there was any such officer for Adams county at that time. If there was not, the appointment of Williams was proper. Error must be shown. It is not to be inferred except where the inference is inevitable. Everything consistent with the record which would have warranted the appointment, will be presumed to have existed and to have been found and acted upon by the court. Conrad Schnell et al. v. The City of Chicago, 38 Illinois, 382. Acts done which presuppose the existence of other acts, to make them legally operative, are presumptive proofs of the latter. Bank U. S. v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. 70. These views render it unnecessary to consider the construction of the statute contended for by the counsel for the defendant in error, whereby in effect, and would be substituted for "or;" and also the question whether the statute, not declaring an appointment made contrary to its provisions void, is not merely directory. Sedgwick on Stat. & Com. Law, 368. It was certainly within the jurisdiction of the court to decide both these points. The form of the letters issued to the general administrator, and to other persons when appointed, is the same. Gales' Stat., 702, sec. 62.

It is insisted that the description contained in the petition is so defective by reason of the omission to name the meridian east or west of which the land is situated, that its terms are equally applicable to another tract in another county. Admitting this to be so, it is averred in the petition, and shown by the evidence, that the tract in question belonged to Spotts, while no such fact appears as to the other tract, and it is not pretended that it exists. This is sufficient. The decree finds all the allegations of the petition to be true. Proof of the ownership by Spotts of the tract sold was admissible to locate the description upon the proper premises, and to remove the ambiguity which was found to exist. Doagher v. Purdy, 18 Illinois, 207. In that case, as in this, the meridian was omitted in the description, and the ambiguity was the same as here.

The land is correctly described in the schedule attached to the notice of the intended application to the court for authority to sell. This might be resorted to, if necessary, to supply the defect in the petition subsequently filed. Schnell v. Chicago, 38 Illinois, 383. It will be presumed that the land described in the petition is the same with that described in the notice, as the descriptions harmonize as far as the former extends. Under certain circumstances an averment fatally defective in a declaration may be remedied by a fuller averment in the replication. Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, 18 How. 405.

It was proved upon the trial of this case that the premises are situated in the military bounty tract. We take judicial notice of the fact that this entire tract is situated between the Illinois and Mississippi rivers, and all of it west of the fourth principal meridian. This, also, identifies the land in question. White v. Herman, 51 Illinois, 245. The judicial proceedings are not defective in the particular under consideration.

The deed of the administrator to Hennen, made pursuant to the sale, is correct. No exception was taken to it. The fact that the report of the sale by the administrator, found in the clerk's office after his death, was not filed, approved, and recorded until the 30th of May, 1851, is unimportant. In Wheaton v. Sexton, 4 Wheat. 503, there had been a sale under execution and a deed by the marshal. The execution was never returned. This court said: "The purchaser depends upon the judgment, the levy and the deed. All other questions are between the parties to the judgment and the marshal. Whether the marshal sells before or after the return, whether he makes a correct return, or any return at all, to the writ, is immaterial to the purchaser, provided the writ was duly issued and the levy made before the return."

The notice was correct. Goudy v. Hall, 36 Ill. 313. This has not been seriously questioned. The word "recorded," in the sentence at the foot of the list of lands, is evidently a misprint for situated. It may be so read or regarded as surplusage. In either case the effect will be the same.

But there is a comprehensive and more conclusive answer to all the objections to the sale which have been considered, and to others suggested, which have not been adverted to.

Upon the filing of the notice with the proof of publication, and the subsequent filing of the petition of the administrator for authority to sell, the circuit court had jurisdiction of the case. No presumption on that subject is necessary. Jurisdiction is authority to hear and determine. It is an axiomatic proposition that when jurisdiction has attached, whatever errors may subsequently occur in its exercise, the proceeding being coram judice, can be impeached collaterally only for fraud. In all other respects it is as conclusive as if it were irreversible in a proceeding for error. The order of sale before us is within this rule. Grignon's Lessor v. Astor et al., 2 How. 319 was, like this, a case of a sale by an administrator. In that case (pp. 341, 342) this court said: "The purchaser under it is not bound to look beyond the decree. If there is error in it of the most palpable kind, if the court which rendered it have, in the exercise of jurisdiction, disregarded, misconstrued, or disobeyed the plain provisions of the law which gave them the power to hear and determine the case before them, the title of the purchaser is as much protected as if the adjudication would stand the test of a writ of error; and so where an appeal is given, but not taken, in the time allowed by law."

This case and the case of The Bank of the United States v. Vorhees, 10 Peters, 449, are the leading authorities in this court upon the subject. Other and later cases have followed and been controlled by them. Stow v. Kimball, 28 Ill. 93, affirms the same doctrine.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

THE JUDICIARY ARTICLE.

The following are the remaining sections of the judiciary article as passed by the Constitutional Convention on second reading:

SECT. 27. In the cities of Pittsburgh and Allegheny, there shall be but one alderman to every 10,000 inhabitants. Districts of as nearly equal population as may be, and formed of compact and contiguous territory, shall be established in a manner to be prescribed by law, in each of which districts but one alderman shall be elected, reside and hold office. Their term of office shall be five years. They shall be compensated only by fixed salaries, to be determined and paid by the city in which they shall hold office. They shall exercise such jurisdiction and powers as are now exercised by aldermen in said cities, excepting as the same may be changed or modified by law: Provided, That their civil jurisdiction shall not be increased to amounts exceeding one hundred dollars.

All fees and perquisites received by said aldermen shall be paid by them into the treasury of the city in which they hold office, and be accounted for in such manner as may be provided by law.

SECT. 28. All laws relating to courts shall be general, and of uniform operation, and the organization, jurisdiction and powers of all courts of the same class or grade, so far as regulated by law, and the force and effect of the process and judgments of such courts shall be uniform, and the Legislature is hereby prohibited from creating other courts to exercise the powers vested by this constitution in the judges of the Courts of Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts.

SECT. 29. It shall be the duty of the Supreme Court, as soon as practicable, and within one year after this constitution shall take effect, and from time to time thereafter, as may be necessary, to provide rules and regulations for a general system of practice in all the courts of record of the State, which shall be uniform in all courts of the same class or grade, and shall not be changed except by the Supreme Court: Provided, That special rules may be provided for cities exceeding one hundred thousand inhabitants, and special rules may be added thereto by the presiding judge in any judicial district, with the consent and approval of the Supreme Court.

SECT. 30. The parties by agreement filed, may in any civil case dispense with the trial by jury, and submit the decision of such case to the court having jurisdiction thereof, and such court shall hear and determine the same. The evidence taken, and the law as declared, shall be filed of record, with right of appeal from the final judgment, as in other cases, and with like effect as appeals in equity.

SECT. 31. The Legislature shall have authority to abolish the office of associate judge, after the term of office of the present incumbents shall have expired.

SECT. 32. Whenever a county shall contain 40,500 inhabitants, it shall constitute a separate judicial district, and shall elect one judge, learned in the law, and the Legislature shall provide for additional judges, as the business of the said districts may require. Counties containing a population less than is sufficient to constitute separate districts, shall be formed into convenient single districts, or if necessary, may be attached to contiguous districts, as the Legislature may provide. The office of associate judge not learned in the law, is abolished excepting in counties not forming separate districts, but the several associate judges in office when this constitution shall be adopted, shall serve for their unexpired terms.

New York.

THE UNITED STATES v. SUSAN B. ANTHONY.

1. The thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States were designed mainly for the protection of the newly emancipated negroes, but full effect must be given to the language employed.
2. The fourteenth amendment created and defined citizens of the United States, and provided that no State should abridge their privileges or immunities.
3. The rights of citizens of the States as such, are not affected by either of the said amendments.
4. Each State has the right to enact what shall be the qualifications of its voters, provided, that electors of representatives in Congress shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, and that the right of a citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude.
5. The statute of New York limiting the right to vote to the male sex, is constitutional.
6. Though to constitute a crime there must be a criminal intent, knowledge of the facts of the case supplies the intent.
7. On the trial of a criminal case, the facts being undisputed and the case clearly proved, the court may direct the jury to find a verdict of guilty.

Opinion by Mr. Justice HUNT.

The defendant is indicted under the act of Congress of 1870, for having voted for representatives in Congress in November, 1872. Among other things that act makes it an offence for any person knowingly to vote for such representatives without having a right to vote. It is charged that the defendant thus voted, she not having a right to vote, because she is a woman. The defendant insists that she has a right to vote; that the provision of the constitution of this State limiting the right to vote to persons of the male sex is in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and is void.

The thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were designed mainly for the protection of the newly emancipated negroes, but full effect must, nevertheless, be given to the language employed. The thirteenth amendment provided that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude should longer exist in the United States. If honestly received and fairly applied, this provision would have been enough to guard the rights of the colored race. In some States it was attempted to be evaded by enactments cruel and oppressive in their nature; as that colored persons were forbidden to appear in the towns except in a menial capacity; that they should reside on and cultivate the soil without being allowed to own it; that they were not permitted to give testimony in cases where a white man was a party. They were excluded from performing particular kinds of business, profitable and reputable, and they were denied the right of suffrage. To meet the difficulties arising from this state of things, the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were enacted.

The fourteenth amendment created and defined citizenship of the United States. It had long been contended and had been held by many learned authorities, and had never been judicially decided to the contrary, that there was no such thing as a citizen of the United States, except as that condition arose from citizenship of some State. No mode existed, it was said, of obtaining a citizenship of the United States except by first becoming a citizen of some State. This question is now at rest. The fourteenth amendment defines and declares who shall be citizens of the United States, to wit: All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof. The latter qualification was intended to exclude the children of foreign representatives and the like. With this qualification every person born in the United States or naturalized, is declared to be a citizen of the United States and of the State wherein he resides.

After creating and defining citizenship of the United States, the amendment provides that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States. This clause is intended to be a protection, not to all our rights, but to our rights as citizens of the United States only; that is, to rights existing or belonging to that condition or capacity. [The words "or citizen of a State," used in the previous paragraph, are carefully omitted here.]

In article 4, paragraph 2, of the Constitution of the United States, it had been already provided in this language, viz., "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens in the several States." The rights of citizens of the States and of citizens of the United States are each guarded by these different provisions. That these rights are separate and distinct was held in the "slaughter-house cases," recently decided by the United States Supreme Court at Washington.

The rights of citizens of the State as such are not under consideration in the fourteenth amendment. They stand as they did before the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, and are fully guaranteed by other provisions. The rights of citizens of the States have been the subject of judicial decision on more than one occasion. Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. R. 371; Ward v. Maryland, 12 Wall. 430; Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 140. These are the fundamental privileges and immunities belonging of right to the citizens of all free governments, such as the right of life and liberty; the right to acquire and possess property, to transact business, to pursue happiness in his own manner, subject to such restraint as the government may adjudge to be necessary for the general good. In Cromwell v. Nevada, 6 Wallace, 36, is found a statement of some of the rights of a citizen of the United States, viz.: "To come to the seat of the government to assert any claim he may have upon the government; to transact any business he may have with it; to seek its protection; to share its offices; to engage in administering its functions. He has the right of free access to its seaports through which all operations of foreign commerce are conducted; to the sub-treasuries, land offices and courts of justice in the several States." Another privilege of a citizen of the United States, says Miller, Justice, in the "slaughter-house cases," is to demand the care and protection of the Federal government over his life, liberty, and property, when on the high seas or within the jurisdiction of a foreign government. The right to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, he says, are rights of the citizen guaranteed by the Federal Constitution.

The right of voting, or the privilege of voting, is a right or privilege arising under the constitution of the State, and not of the United States. The qualifications are different in the different States. Citizenship, age, sex, residence, are variously required in the different States, or may be so. If the right belongs to any particular person, it is because such person is entitled to it by the laws of the State where he offers to exercise it, and not because of citizenship of the United States. If the State of New York should provide that no person should vote until he had reached the age of 31 years, or after he had reached the age of 50, or that no person having gray hair or who had not the use of all his limbs, should be entitled to vote, I do not see how it could be held to be a violation of any right derived or held under the Constitution of the United States. We might say that such regulations were unjust, tyrannical, unfit for the regulation of an intelligent State; but if the rights of a citizen are thereby violated, they are of that fundamental class, derived from his position as a citizen of the State, and not those limited rights belonging to him as a citizen of the United States, and such was the decision in Corfield v. Coryell, supra.

The United States rights appertaining to this subject are those first under article 1, paragraph 2, of United States Constitution, which provides that electors of representatives in Congress shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature; and second, under the fifteenth amendment, which provides that the right of a citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. If the Legislature of the State of New York should require a higher qualification in a voter for a representative in Congress than is required for a voter for a member of Assembly, this would, I conceive, be a violation of a right belonging to one as citizen of the United States. That right is in relation to a Federal subject or interest, and is guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. The inability of a State to abridge the right of voting on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, arises from a Federal guaranty. Its violation would be the denial of a Federal right; that is, a right belonging to the claimant as a citizen of the United States.

This right, however, exists by virtue of the fifteenth amendment. If the fifteenth amendment had contained the word "sex," the argument of the defendant would have been potent. She would have said an attempt by a State to deny the right to vote because one is of a particular sex, is expressly prohibited by that amendment. The amendment, however, does not contain that word. It is limited to race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The Legislature of the State of New York has seen fit to say that the franchise of voting shall be limited to the male sex.

In saying this, there is, in my judgment, no violation of the letter or of the spirit of the fourteenth or of the fifteenth amendment.

This view is assumed in the second section of the fourteenth amendment, which enacts that if the right to vote for Federal officers is denied by any State to any of the male inhabitants of such State, except for crime, the basis of representation of such State shall be reduced in a proportion specified. Not only does this section assume that the right of male inhabitants to vote was the special object of its protection, but it assumes and admits the right of a State, notwithstanding the existence of that clause under which the defendant claims to the contrary, to deny to classes or portions of the male inhabitants the right to vote, which is allowed to other male inhabitants. The regulations of the suffrage is thereby conceded to the States as a State's right.

The case of Myra Bradwell, decided at the recent term of the Supreme Court of the United States, sustains both of the positions above put forth, viz.: First, that the rights referred to in the fourteenth amendment are those belonging to a person as a citizen of the United States and not as a citizen of a State; and second, that a right of the character here involved is not one connected with citizenship of the United States. Mrs. Bradwell made application to be admitted to practice as an attorney and counsellor at law, in the courts of Illinois. Her application was denied, and upon appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, it was there held that to give jurisdiction under the fourteenth amendment, the claim must be of a right pertaining to citizenship of the United States, and that the claim made by her did not come within that class of cases. Mr. Justice Bradley and Mr. Justice Field held that a woman was not entitled to a license to practice law. It does not appear that the other judges passed upon that question. The fourteenth amendment gives no right to a woman to vote, and the voting by Miss Anthony was in violation of law.

If she believed she had a right to vote, and voted in reliance upon that belief, does that relieve her from the penalty? It is argued that the knowledge referred to in the act relates to her knowledge of the illegality of the act, and not to the act of voting; for it is said that she must know that she voted. Two principles apply here: First, ignorance of the law excuses no one; second, every person is presumed to understand and to intend the necessary effects of his own acts. Miss Anthony knew that she was a woman, and that the constitution of this State prohibits her from voting. She intended to violate that provision—intended to test it, perhaps, but certainly intended to violate it. The necessary effect of her act was to violate it, and this she is presumed to have intended. There was no ignorance of any fact, but all the facts being known, she undertook to settle a principle in her own person. She takes the risk, and she cannot escape the consequences. It is said, and authorities are cited to sustain the position, that there can be no crime unless there is a culpable intent; to render one criminally responsible, a vicious will must be present. A. commits a trespass on the land of B., and B., thinking and believing that he has a right to shoot an intruder upon his premises, kills A. on the spot. Does B.'s misapprehensions of his rights justify his act? Would a judge be justified in charging the jury that if satisfied that B. supposed he had a right to shoot A., he was justified, and they should find a verdict of not guilty? No judge would make such a charge. To constitute a crime, it is true, that there must be a criminal intent, but it is equally true that knowledge of the facts of the case is always held to supply this intent. An intentional killing bears with it evidence of malice in law. Whoever, without justifiable cause, intentionally kills his neighbor, is guilty of a crime. The principle is the same in the case before us, and in all criminal cases. The precise question now before me has been several times decided, viz.: that one, illegally voting was bound and was assumed to know the law, and that a belief that he had a right to vote, gave no defence, if there was no mistake of fact Hamilton v. The People, 57th of Barbour, p. 625; State v. Boyet, 10th of Iredell, p. 336; State v. Hart, 6th Jones, 389; McGuire v. State, 7 Humphrey, 54; 15th of Iowa Reports, 404. No system of criminal jurisprudence can be sustained upon any other principle. Assuming that Miss Anthony believed she had a right to vote, that fact constitutes no defence if in truth she had not the right. She voluntarily gave a vote which was illegal, and thus is subject to the penalty of the law.

The judge directed the jury to find a verdict of guilty.

On the second day thereafter a motion for a new trial was made, and argued by Henry R. Selden, Esq., the counsel for Miss Anthony. In deciding this motion, Judge Hunt further said:

The whole law of the case has been reargued, and I have given the best consideration in my power to the arguments presented. But for the evident earnestness of the learned counsel for the defendant, for whose ability and integrity I have the highest respect, I should have no hesitation. Still I can entertain no doubt upon any point in the case. I do not doubt the correctness of my decision, that the defendant had no right to vote, and that her belief that she had a right to vote, she knowing all the facts, and being presumed and bound to know the law, did not relieve her from the penalty for voting, when in truth she had no right to vote.

The learned counsel, however, insists that an error was committed in directing the jury to render a verdict of guilty. This direction, he argues, makes the verdict that of the court and not of the jury, and it is contended that the provisions of the constitution looking to and securing a trial by jury in criminal cases have been violated.

The right of trial by jury in civil as well as in criminal cases, is a constitutional right. The first article of the constitution of the State of New York provides that "the trial by jury in all cases, in which it has been heretofore used, shall remain inviolate forever." Article 7 of the Constitution of the United States contains a similar provision. Yet in cases when the facts are all conceded, or when they are proved and uncontradicted by evidence, it has always been the practice of the courts to take the case from the jury, and decide it as a question of law. No counsel has ever disputed the right of the court so to do. No respectable counsel will venture to doubt the correctness of such practice, and this in cases of the character which are usually submitted to a jury. People v. Cook, 4 Seld. 67; Godwin v. Bk. of Com., 6 Duer. 76. The right of a trial by jury in a criminal case is not more distinctly secured than it is in a civil case. In each class of cases this right exists only in respect of a disputed fact. To questions of fact the jury respond. Upon question of law the decision of the court is conclusive, and the jury are bound to receive the law, as declared by the court. The People v. Bennett, 49 N. Y. R. 141.

Such is the established practice in criminal as well as in civil cases, and this practice is recognized by the highest authorities. It has been so held by the old Supreme Court and by the present Court of Appeals of this State.

At a Circuit Court of the United States, recently held by Judges Woodruff and Blatchford, upon deliberation and consultation it was decided that in a criminal case the court was not bound to submit the case to the jury, there being no sufficient evidence to justify a conviction, and the court accordingly instructed the jury to find a verdict of not guilty. See the case of Fullerton.

The district attorney now states that on several occasions, since he has been in office, Judge Hall, being of opinion that the evidence did not warrant a conviction, has directed the jury to find a verdict of not guilty.

In the recent case of The People v. Bennett, 49 N. Y. R. 137, the Court of Appeals of the State of New York, through its chief justice, uses the following language: "Contrary to an opinion formerly prevailing, it has been settled that the juries are not judges of the law, as well as the facts, in criminal cases, but that they must take the law from the court. All questions of law during the trial are to be determined by the court, and it is the duty of the jury to regard and abide by such determination. * * * I can see no reason, therefore, why the court may not, in a case presenting a question of law only, instruct the jury to acquit the prisoner, or to direct an acquittal and enforce the direction, nor why it is not the duty of the court to do so. This results from the rule that the jury must take the law as adjudged by the court, and I think it is a necessary result." See pp. 141, 142.

In these cases the direction of the court in each instance was, not as in this case against the defendant, but that a verdict of not guilty be rendered. But the counsel for defendant expressly admits that the authority which justifies a direction to acquit will, in a proper case, justify a direction to convict; that it is a question of power, and if the power may be exercised in favor of the defendant, it may be exercised against him. As I now state this proposition, the counsel again signifies his assent. The reason given by Chief Justice Church in the case just cited, shows that there is no distinction between the cases in this respect. He says the rule results from the principle "that the jury must take the law from the court." P. 142. The duty of the jury to take the law from the court is the same, whether it is favorable to the defendant, or unfavorable to him.

It is laid down in "Colby on Criminal Law," § 125, that no jury shall in any case be compelled to give a general verdict, so that they find the facts and request the court to give judgment thereon. 2 R. S. 421, § 135.

"A special verdict is given when the jury find certain facts to exist, and leave the court to determine whether, according to law, the prisoner is guilty."

"It is not necessary that the jury should, after stating the facts, draw any legal conclusion. If they do so, the court will reject the conclusion as superfluous, and pronounce such judgment as they think warranted by the facts." Ib. Colby, § 125.

All the authorities tend to the same result. It is the duty of the jury to act upon the facts. It is the duty of the court to decide the law. The facts being specially found by the jury, it is the duty of the court, and not of the jury, to pronounce the judgment of guilty or not guilty. The facts being fully conceded, it is the duty of the court to announce and direct what the verdict shall be, whether guilty or not guilty.

I cannot, therefore, doubt the power and the duty of the court, to direct a verdict of guilty, whenever the facts constituting guilt are undisputed.

In the present case, the court had decided as matter of law, that Miss Anthony was not a legal voter. It had also decided as matter of law, that knowing every fact in the case, and intending to do just what she did, she had knowingly voted, not having a right to vote, and that her belief did not affect the question. Every fact in the case was undisputed. There was no inference to be drawn or point made on the facts, that could by possibility alter the result. It was therefore not only the right, but it seems to me upon the authorities, the plain duty of the judge to direct a verdict of guilty. The motion for a new trial is denied.

The defendant was thereupon sentenced to pay a fine of $100 and the costs of the prosecution.

District Court of Philad'a.

SPENCE v. WALLACE.

1. Goods purchased by a married woman having no separate estate, with money loaned to her, are subject to levy by her husband's creditors.
2. The act of April 3d, 1872, includes only the "earnings" of a married woman, it can not be construed to include borrowed money.

Opinion by LYND, J. Delivered July 12th, 1873.

This was a feigned issue upon a sheriff's interpleader. The plaintiff was the wife of the defendant in the execution. She borrowed money and bought therewith the goods levied upon. She had no separate estate. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following reserved question: Whether goods purchased by a married woman who has no separate estate, with money loaned to her, are subject to levy by the creditors of her husband.

Bucher v. Rean, 18 P. F. S. 421, seems to settle this question against the plaintiff. But her counsel points to the act of April 3d, 1872, Brightley's Dig. 1010, §§ 38, 39. "The separate earnings of any married woman of the State of Pennsylvania."

He contends that money borrowed by a married woman, though not upon the credit of her separate estate, is protected from her husband's creditors, by the letter of this legislation. But by the letter of the act "separate earnings" alone are protected. Unless "separate earnings" and "borrowed money" are identical, the letter of the act does not help the plaintiff. That which one earns is entirely different from that which one borrows, is too clear for ratiocination. The clause "whether said earnings shall be as wages for labor, salary, property, business or otherwise," even if much less inelegant and obscure than it is, does not enlarge the operation or scope of the main sentence. The thing comprehended is still "earnings." nothing else. To amplify here would be to waste time.

But again, he contends that the purpose of the act was to still further break down the common law disabilities of married women, and to make her separate earnings, her separate property, free from the control of her husband and of his creditors, and that moneys advanced to her by her friends, to enable her to go into business, and to thus acquire profits or earnings, are as well entitled to protection as are such profits or earnings.

But this view overlooks the fact that a wife, can have no separate credit. For what she borrows, with the concurrence of her husband, he is liable. Personally she is not liable for money loaned to her, although her separate estate, if any, and if properly pledged, may be liable. Robinson v. Wallace, 3 Wr. 129. Why should she have an independent control of that which she acquires at his expense? Why should his other creditors be shut out from such property, when this creditor can come in upon his general property? It was probably because of this that the Legislature did not frame the act, so that "moneys loaned" to a married woman would be clearly within the letter of it.

This would be holding the door for fraud so wide as to imply invitation to enter. Should the law lead its subject into temptation?

It may be, too, that public policy dictated the omission. A failing debtor could contrive many indirect modes of getting his money into the hands of a friend, if that money could be loaned to his wife and be used in business by her, free from the reach of his creditors. Detection by the latter would be almost impracticable.

But even though no reason could be assigned why moneys loaned to a feme covert should not become her separate property, as absolutely as her separate earnings become so under the act in question, we should still deem it our duty, inasmuch as the two things are distinct and independent, to refuse to adopt the construction contended for by the plaintiff. Legislative and judicial functions must not be confounded. If it was the intent of the lawmakers to protect moneys loaned to a wife, let them cause it to be so written.

BEDFORD v. JONES.

A lease contained a covenant that the lessee should "not assign the lease." The lessee with the consent of the lessor, did assign it. Held, a surety to the lease was thereby discharged.

Opinion by LYND, J. Delivered July 12th, 1873.

This was an action of covenant against a surety in a lease. The lease contained the following covenant: "The lessee promises the lessor to pay the rent punctually, as above provided for, and during the term to keep, and at the end thereof, or sooner determination of this lease, peaceably deliver up the premises in good order and repair, reasonable wear and tear and damage by accidental fire excepted, and not to assign this lease, nor underlet the premises, or any part thereof.

It was not disputed on the trial that the lessee had assigned the lease; that the lessor had approved of said assignment; that the defendant had never consented to it. The breach was non-payment of rent, accrued after the abandonment of the premises, by the assignee of the lessee.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court, upon the following reserved question: "Whether the approval by the lessor of the assignment of the lease by the lessee, discharged the surety of the latter?"

That any change by the primary parties to a contract of the terms thereof, without the consent of the surety, is presumed to be injurious to and operate as a discharge of the latter, is the settled law of England. Bonar v. McDonald, 3 H. of L. Cas. 226; and of the United States, Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. 680.

We think too that this is the law of Pennsylvania. Hibbs v. Rue, 4 Barr, 348; Corson v. McAfee, 8 Wr. 289.

By the terms of the lease, it was not to be assigned by the lessee. The lessor and lessee subsequently altered this provision, that is, the latter assigned the lease and the former approved of the assignment. This may not have impaired the capacity of the lessee to pay the rent as it fell due; it may in fact have contributed to his capacity to do so; but the law enters into no such investigation; if by any possibility the change in the contract might be prejudicial to the surety the latter is discharged.

It is certainly easier to pay one dollar than to pay two dollars—it requires greater resources to pay the rent of two buildings than of one building. And in this more difficult of these predicaments, a lessee who assigns his lease is very likely to stand. But is it the law that his surety must nolens volens stand with him? We have not been able to reach such a conclusion.

But plaintiff's counsel refers us to Gilbert v. Henck, 6 C. 205. In this case the lease contained a provision that the lessee should not assign without the consent of the landlord; and an assignment by the lessee with his consent was held not to discharge the surety. His honor, Justice, Agnew, Reigert v. White, 2 P. F. S. 441, says of Gilbert v. Henck, it may be remarked it stands upon the very confines, if at all within the contract of guarantee as commercially and legally understood. * * *

The opinion of the learned judge in that case refers to no authorities and gives no reasons, simply stating that the writing was a guarantee. The case of Sherman v. Roberts, 1 Grant 261, decided only three years before, is almost in direct antagonism; while in Allen v. Hubert, 13 Wr. 259, Gilbert v. Henck, is directly referred to as unnecessarily deciding the question of guarantee, and as leaving Marburger v. Potts, 4 H. 9, unshaken.

Whether as the learned judge "refers to no authorities, and gives no reasons, but simply states" that the assignment there in question did not discharge the guarantee, his conclusion upon that branch of the case may not be open to exception, it is not necessary here to consider.

It is enough to say that the lease under consideration provided there should be no assignment of it. That an assignment of it was an alteration of the contract by the lessor and lessee is too clear for argument. It required that both their minds should come together, just as in the making of the original contract. It let a different person into possession of the premises; it gave the lessor a right of action against the latter; and the goods of the lessee were not liable to distress for the rent thereafter accruing.

That it was in fact prejudicial to the surety, it is not necessary for him to establish; it is very plain, however, that the assignee of the lessee assumed the duty of occupying the premises and paying rent therefor till the end of the term; that his failure to do so, left the liability for said rent upon the lessee, and it may be assumed that upon the faith of his assignee's undertaking, he involved himself in additional liability elsewhere for house rent. The surety may very well say to the lessor, when I became surety, I trusted that your lessee would continue to occupy your premises as long as he should not be permitted to assign his lease, and that he could and would pay the rent as long as he should continue to occupy them; but I did not contemplate that he should assume the liability for the rent of another house, or that practically he should become surety for another occupant of your premises, nor that his resources were sufficient to justify his incurring such additional obligations. The terms of your contract with the lessee justified the trust and contemplation just expressed. Without your becoming a party to the assignment, this trust and contemplation would not have been defeated. You did not consult me, and for the result you have yourself only to blame.

We are not able to see any sufficient answer to this.

STEWART v. AUSTIN.

1. A defendant in ejectment is not barred from contesting the validity of a will admitted to probate more than five years, he having by action, notwithstanding the will, obtained the property in dispute within the five years.
2. A will devising real estate may be contested either by an issue devisavit vel non or by ejectment

Rule for a new trial.

Opinion by BRIGGS, J. Delivered July 12th, 1873.

There will have to be a new trial in this case. It was thought at the trial, that the act of April 22d, 1856, gave conclusive effect to the will of Susan Beam, bearing date December 9th, 1863, and admitted to probate the fifteenth of the same month, because it had not been contested by caveat within five years, as provided by the act, notwithstanding the defendant had, within five years, recovered the premises in an action of ejectment, of the defendant's grantor, who claimed the same under another will of the said Susan Beam, bearing date April 2d, 1863, though not admitted to probate.

The usual office of a caveat is to stop the proof of the will. But the word "caveat," as used in this act, cannot mean that, for the act does not require the caveat to be filed till after the probate of the will. The words are: "That the probate by the register of the proper county, of any will devising real estate, shall be conclusive as to such realty, unless, within five years from the date of such probate, those interested to controvert it, shall, by caveat and action at law duly pursued, contest the validity of such will as to such realty," &c.

What, then, does it mean? It seems to us, the proper construction is this, that when a person means to claim the devised land through the devisor, and in order to do so must contest the will, he will have to do so within five years from the time of its probate, or be forever thereafter debarred. If the devisee is not in possession, then by an issue devisavit vel non, and proceedings thereon duly prosecuted within five years. If, however, the devisee is in possession, the act does not prohibit the adverse party from contesting the devisee's title by an action in ejectment. Indeed, the act takes away none of the remedies existing at the time of its passage. It merely limits a period within which those remedies should be invoked. The defendant having recovered the land within the five years, notwithstanding the will, he is clearly not within the prohibition of the statute, and being in possession at the time the plaintiff acquired title, such possession was at least constructive notice to the plaintiff of the defendant's title, which affected him alike with his grantor.

Nor can the position assumed by the plaintiff, that it is now too late for the defendant to question the will, avail him. The defendant is not doing so. He stands and defends upon his title as established by his verdict and judgment. That verdict and judgment gave him the possession of the land, and will protect him till they shall be impeached by the plaintiff. The defendant having succeeded, notwithstanding the will, the burden is now cast upon the plaintiff to sustain it, and until he do so, the defendant will be protected by the triumph he has gained.

Rule absolute.

COMMONWEALTH et al. v. KEIL et al.

An administrator filed his account in which he had confused the funds arising from the sale of the real and personal estate. The Orphans' Court adjudged what balance remained after allowing expenses and the payment of decedent's debts. In a suit against the sureties on the bond given by the administrator for the proper distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the real estate, Held:

1. It would be presumed in absence of evidence to the contrary that the personal estate was first exhausted before the fund arising from the real estate was used.
2. The sureties were liable to the distributees for the balance found due by the administrator.

Rule for a new trial.

Opinion by BRIGGS, J. Delivered July 12th, 1873.

It is alleged by the counsel for the sureties of the administrator, upon the authority of the case of the Commonwealth v. Hilgert, 5 P. F. Smith, 236, that the admission of the record of the Orphans' Court, showing an adjudication in the plaintiffs' favor, was erroneous, because the record showed a confusion of the proceeds arising from the sale of the real and personal astate.

The auditor, however, restated the account, by charging the administrator with the amount of the proceeds of the real and personal property, and credits him with the debts he proved he had paid; and a further credit of the debts proved and allowed to divers creditors who had not then been paid. He then awards the balance to the residuary distributees of the estate, among whom were the plaintiffs. The amount awarded to them is the exact balance after exhausting the entire proceeds of the personalty, and so much of the realty as were required to pay the balance of the decedent's debts.

But it is argued, that the record does not show that the money appropriated in payment of the debts, was not taken entirely from the proceeds of the real estate.

That is true, nor does it show that it was, or any part of it, until the personalty had been exhausted for that purpose. And the law casts the duty upon the administrator to exhaust the proceeds of the personalty before having recourse to those of the realty, and where debts are shown to be paid (as was the case here), greater than the amount of the personal proceeds, the presumption is, that they were paid in the order, and out of the specific fund first liable for their payment. This presumption continues till overcome by evidence to the contrary. There was no evidence, or offer of evidence on the part of the defendants, that such was not the case.

Nor can we see how it can benefit the defendants to concede that the administrator took the proceeds of the real estate for the payment of debts, when he had in his hands personal proceeds for that purpose. Such would be a violation of his duty to the plaintiffs, for he held that money, as was said by the court in McCoy v. Scott, 2 R. 222, "not absolutely, but submodo" for the payment of debts. He held so much of this money not required to pay debts expressly for the plaintiffs. And it surely was no answer to the plaintiffs to allege, "true, the administrator had personal assets in his hands with which to pay the debts; but he has embezzled them, and has taken the money which otherwise would come to you to replace them."

The reply to such an allegation is, "that is none the less a wrong to the plaintiffs, and is just such a breach of duty on the part of the administrator as renders him and his sureties liable to them." The error which the sureties have fallen into, is in supposing that because the real estate may be taken to pay debts even when the administrator had sufficient personal assets to pay them, but which he had embezzled, that, therefore, the sureties are relieved upon showing their actual payment out of the real assets. Not at all, for the equity of the decedent's creditors is superior to that of his heirs, and they must be paid, though the heirs get nothing.

But, as against the administrator, who wrongfully takes the money to pay them, which would otherwise come to the heirs, such default is just as glowing and inexcusable as if he had appropriated it to his own use, when there were no debts. In such case, it would be relieving himself of the first wrongful appropriation by perpetrating the second. It would, nevertheless, be a wrong for which both he and his sureties would be liable to the injured parties.

In the case of Commonwealth v. Hilgert, there was an item in the rejected account, for "rents and profits of real estate." And non constat that the balance reported by the auditor in that case, was not made up in whole or in part of those profits. If so, clearly the sureties were in no way liable for them. But, without elaborating, we think this verdict is so manifestly just, that we are loth to disturb it, unless required to do so by some decisions in all respects analogous, or some rule of policy. And not knowing of such requirement, the rule for a new trial is discharged.

MICHIGAN CENTRAL RAILROAD CO. v. MINERAL SPRINGS MANUFACTURING CO.

A. delivered to plaintiff goods to be carried to a point beyond its line. Plain iff carried them to the terminus of its road, but the carrier that should have completed the transit not being ready, and that it would not be, plaintiff knew at the receipt of the goods, they were stored in the plaintiff's warehouse. They remained there six days, when they were accidentally destroyed by fire. Plaintiff, by its charter, was to be "liab e for goods on deposit in any of its depots, awaiting delivery, as warehousemen." On the back of the receipt given the shipper, was a general notice, that all goods, &c., while in the plaintiff's warehouse should be at the risk of the owner, except as to the negligence of its servants. Held:

1. While property is in process of transportation it is the duty of the carrier, in the absence of any special contract, to carry safely to the end of his line, and to deliver to the next carrier in the route beyond.
2. If there be a necessity for storage, it will generally be considered a mere accessory to the transportation, and not as changing the nature of the bailment.
3. It may be that circumstances may arise justifying the carrier in warehousing goods, but if he had reasonable grounds to anticipate such adverse circumstances when he received the goods, and did not notify the shipper, he cannot by storing them change his liability.
4. The exception in plaintiff's charter, referred only to goods that had reached their final destination.
5. A carrier cannot restrict his liability by a general notice printed on the back of his receipt for goods.
6. A carrier has no right to assume, in discharge of his obligation, that an offer to deliver will be met with a refusal to receive.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

If the plaintiffs in error are to be considered as warehousemen at the time the wool in question was burned, they are not liable in this action, because the fire which caused its destruction was not the result of any negligence on their part. If, on the contrary, their duty as carriers had not ceased at the time of the accident, and there are no circumstances connected with the transaction which lessen the rule applicable to that employment, they are responsible, for carriers are substantially insurers of the property entrusted to their care. The controversy is as to the nature of the bailment when the fire took place.

The jury, under the instructions of the court, found that the railroad company were chargeable as carriers, and this writ of error is prosecuted to reverse that decision. The case, as contained in the bill of exceptions, is, in substance, this:

In October, 1865, at Jackson, a station on the Michigan Central Railroad, about seventy-five miles west of Detroit, one Bostwick, delivered to the agent of the company, for transportation, a quantity of wool consigned to the defendant in error, at Stafford, Connecticut, and took a receipt for its carriage, on the back of which was a notice that all goods and merchandise are at the risk of the owners while in the warehouses of the company, unless the loss or injury to them should happen through the negligence of the agents of the company. Verbal instructions were given by Bostwick that the wool should be sent from Detroit to Buffalo, by lake, in steamboats, which instructions were embodied in a bill of lading sent with the wool. Although there were several lines of transportation from Detroit eastward by which the wool could have been sent, there was only one transportation line propelled by steam on the lakes, and this line was and had been for some time, unable, in their regular course of business, to receive and transport the freight which had accumulated in large quantities at the railroad depot in Detroit. This accumulation of freight there, and the limited ability of the line of propellors to receive and transport it, were well known to the officers of the road, but neither the consignor, consignee or the station master at Jackson, were informed on this subject. The wool was carried over the road to the depot in Detroit, and remained there for a period of six days, when it was destroyed by an accidental fire. During all the time it was in the depot it was ready to be delivered for further transportation to the carrier upon the route indicated. The charter of the company, which was pleaded and offered in evidence, contains a clause that in all cases the company shall be responsible for goods on deposit, in any of their depots awaiting delivery, as warehousemen, and not as common carriers.

On this state of facts the Circuit Court refused to charge the jury that the liability of the plaintiffs in error was the limited one of a warehouseman, importing only ordinary care, but on the contrary, charged that they were liable for the wool as common carriers, during its transportation from Jackson to Detroit, and after its arrival there, for such reasonable time as, according to their usual course of business, under the actual circumstances in which they held the wool, would enable them to deliver it to the next carrier in the line, but that the defendant in error took the risk of the next carrier line not being ready and willing to take said wool, and submitted to the jury to say whether, under all the circumstances of the case in evidence before them, such reasonable time had elapsed before the occurrence of the fire.

It is not necessary in the state of this record to go into the general subject of the duty of the carriers in respect to goods in their custody which have arrived at their final destination. Different views have been entertained by different jurists of what the carrier is required to do when the transit is ended in order to terminate his liability, but there is not this difference of opinion in relation to the rule which is applicable while the property is in process of transportation from the place of its receipt to the place of its destination.

In such cases it is the duty of the carrier, in the absence of any special contract, to carry safely to the end of his line and to deliver to the next carrier in the route beyond. This rule of liability is adopted generally by the courts in this country, although in England at the present time, and in some of the States of the Union, the disposition is to treat the obligation of the carrier who first receives the goods as continuing throughout the entire route. It is unfortunate for the interests of commerce that there is any diversity of opinion on such a subject, especially in this country, but the rule that holds the carrier only liable to the extent of his own route, and for the safe storage and delivery to the next carrier, is in itself so just and reasonable that we do not hesitate to give it our sanction. Public policy, however, requires that the rule should be enforced, and will not allow the carrier to escape responsibility on storing the goods at the end of his route, without delivery or an attempt to deliver to the connecting carrier. If there be a necessity for storage it will be considered a mere accessory to the transportation, and not as changing the nature of the bailment. It is very clear that the simple deposit of the goods by the carrier in his depot, unaccompanied by an act indicating an intention to renounce the obligation of a carrier, will not change or modify even his liability. It may be that circumstances may arise after the goods have reached the depot which would justify the carrier in warehousing them, but if he had reasonable grounds to anticipate the occurrence of these adverse circumstances when he received the goods, he cannot by storing them change his relation towards them.

Testing the case in hand by these well-settled principles, it is apparent that the plaintiffs in error are not relieved of their proper responsibility, unless through the provisions of their charter, or by the terms of the receipt which was given when they received the wool. They neither delivered nor offered to deliver the wool to the propeller company. Nor did they do any act manifesting an intention to divest themselves of the character of carrier and assume that of forwarder.

It is insisted that the offer to deliver would have been a useless act, because of the inability of the line of propellers, with their means of transportation, to receive and transport the freight which had already accumulated at the Michigan Central depot for shipment by lake. One answer to this proposition is, that the company had no right to assume, in discharge of its obligation to this defendant, that an offer to deliver this particular shipment would have been met by a refusal to receive. Apart from this, how can the company set up, by way of defence, this limited ability of the propeller line when the officers of the road knew of it at the time the contract of carriage was entered into, and the other party to the contract, had no information on the subject?

It is said, in reply to this objection, that the company could not have refused to receive the wool, having ample means of carriage, although it knew the line beyond Detroit selected by the shipper was not at the time in a situation to receive and transport it. It is true the company were obliged to carry for all persons, without favor, in the regular course of business, but this obligation did not dispense with a corresponding obligation on its part to inform the shipper of any unavoidable circumstances existing at the termination of its own route in the way of a prompt delivery to the carrier next in line. This is especially so when, as in this case, there were other lines of transportation from Detroit eastward by which the wool, without delay, could have been forwarded to its place of destination. Had the shipper at Jackson been informed, at the time, of the serious hindrances at Detroit, to the speedy transit of goods by the lake, it is fair to infer, as a reasonable man, he would have given a different direction to his property. Common fairness requires that at least he should have been told of the condition of things there, and thus left free to choose, if he saw fit, another mode of conveyance. If this had been done there would be some plausibility in the position that six days was an unreasonable time to require the railroad company to hold the wool as a common carrier for delivery. But under the circumstances of this case the company had no right to expect an earlier period for delivery, and cannot, therefore, complain of the response of the jury to the inquiry on this subject submitted to them by the Circuit Court.

It is earnestly argued that the plaintiffs in error are relieved from liability under the provisions of their charter, if not by the rules of the common law. Is this so?

The whole section of the charter from which the exemption from liability is claimed is as follows: "The said company may charge and collect a reasonable sum for storage upon all property which shall have been transported by them upon delivery thereof at any of their depots, and which shall have remained at any of their depots more than four days: Provided, That elsewhere than at their Detroit depot, the consignee shall have been notified if known, either personally or by notice left at his place of business or residence, or by notice sent by mail, of the receipt of such property at least four days before any storage shall be charged, and at the Detroit depot such notice shall be given twenty-four hours (Sundays excepted) before any storage shall be charged; but such storage may be charged after the expiration of said twenty-four hours upon goods not taken away: Provided. That in all cases the said company shall be responsible for goods on deposit in any of their depots awaiting delivery, as warehousemen, and not as common carriers."

It is quite clear that this section refers to property which has reached its final destination, and is there awaiting delivery to its owner. If so, how can the proviso in question be made to apply to another and distinct class of property? To perform this office it must act independently of the rest of the section, and enlarge rather than limit, the operation of it. This it cannot do, unless words are used which leave no doubt the Legislature intended such an effect to be given to it.

It is argued, however, that there is no difference between goods to be delivered to the owner at their final destination and goods deliverable to the owner, or his agent, for further carriage. That in both cases, as soon as they are "ready to be delivered" over, they are "awaiting delivery." This position, although plausible, is not sound. There is a clear distinction, in our opinion, between property in a situation to be delivered over to the consignee on demand, and property on its way to a distant point to be taken thence by a connecting carrier. In the former case it may be said to be awaiting delivery; in the latter, to be awaiting transportation. And this distinction is recognized by the Supreme Court of Michigan in the case of the present plaintiffs in error v. Hale. 6th Michigan, 243. The court in speaking on this subject say, "that goods are on deposit in the depots of the company either awaiting transportation or delivery, and that the section (now under consideration) has reference only to goods which have been transported and placed in the company's depots for delivery to the consignee." To the same effect is a recent decision of the Court of Appeals of New York, Mills v. Michigan Central R. R. Co., 45 New York, 626, in a suit brought to recover for the loss of goods by the same fire that consumed the wool in this case, and which were marked for conveyance by the same line of propellers on Lake Erie.

It is insisted, however, by the plaintiffs in error, if they are not relieved from liability as carriers by the provisions of their charter, that the receipt taken by the consignor, without dissent, at the time the wool was received, discharges them. The position is, that the unsigned notice printed on the back of the receipt is a part of it, and that, taken together, they amount to a contract binding on the defendants in error.

This notice is general, and not confined, as in the section of the charter we have considered, to goods on deposit in the depots of the company awaiting delivery. It is a distinct announcement that all goods and merchandise are at the risk of the owners thereof while in the company's warehouses, except for such loss or injury as may arise from the negligence of the agents of the company. The notice was doubtless, intended to secure immunity for all losses not caused by negligence or misconduct during the time the property remained in the depots of the company, whether for transportation on their own line or beyond, or for delivery to consignees. And such will be its effect if the party taking the receipt for his property is concluded by it. The question is, therefore, presented for decision whether such a notice is effectual to accomplish the purpose for which it was issued.

Whether a carrier when charged upon his common law responsibility can discharge himself from it by special contract, assented to by the owner, is not an open question in this court, since the cases of the New Jersey Steam Navigation Company v. The Merchants' Bank, 6th Howard, and York Company v. Central Railroad, 3 Wallace. In both these cases the right of the carrier to restrict or diminish his general liability by special contract, which does not cover losses by negligence or misconduct, received the sanction of this court. In the case in Howard the effect of a general notice by the carrier seeking to extinguish his peculiar liability was also considered, and although the remarks of the judge on the point were not necessary to the decision of the case, they furnish a correct exposition of the law on this much controverted subject.

In speaking of the right of the carrier to restrict his obligation by a special agreement, the judge said: "It by no means follows that this can be done by any act of his own. The carrier is in the exercise of a sort of public office, from which he should not be permitted to exonerate himself without the assent of the parties concerned. And this is not to be implied or inferred from a general notice to the public, limiting his obligation, which may, or may not, be assented to. He is bound to receive and carry all the goods offered for transportation, subject to all the responsibilities incident to his employment, and is liable to an action in case of refusal. If any implication is to be indulged from the delivery of the goods under the general notice, it is as strong that the owner intended to insist upon his rights and the duties of the carrier, as it is that he assented to their qualification. The burden of proof lies on the carrier, and nothing short of an express stipulation by parol or in writing should be permitted to discharge him from duties which the law has annexed to his employment."

These considerations against the relaxation of the common-law responsibility by public advertisements, apply with equal force to notices having the same object, attached to receipts given by carriers on taking the property of those who employ them into their possession for transportation. Both are attempts to obtain, by indirection, exemption from burthens imposed in the interests of trade upon this particular business. It is not only against the policy of the law, but a serious injury to commerce to allow the carrier to say that the shipper of merchandise assents to the terms proposed in a notice, whether it be general to the public or special to a particular person, merely because he does not expressly dissent from them. If the parties were on an equality in their dealings with each other, there might be some show of reason for assuming acquiescence from silence, but in the nature of the case this equality does not exist, and therefore, every intendment should be made in favor of the shipper when he takes a receipt for his property, with restrictive conditions annexed, and says nothing, that he intends to rely upon the law for the security of his rights.

It can readily be seen, if the carrier can reduce his liability in the way proposed, he can transact business on any terms he chooses to prescribe. The shipper, as a general thing, is not in a condition to contend with him as to terms, nor to wait the result of an action at law in case of refusal to carry unconditionally. Indeed, such an action is seldom resorted to, on account of the inability of the shipper to delay sending his goods forward. The law, in conceding to carriers the ability to obtain any reasonable qualification of their responsibility by express contract, has gone as far in this direction as public policy will allow. To relax still further the strict rules of common law applicable to them, by presuming acquiescence in the conditions on which they propose to carry freight when they have no right to impose them, would, in our opinion, work great harm to the business community.

The weight of authority is against the validity of the kind of notices we have been considering. See 2 Parsons on Contracts, p. 238, note N., fifth edition, and the American note to Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Smith's Leading Cases, seventh American edition; Redfield on Law of Railways, p. —, 16 Michigan; McMillan v. M. S. & N. I. R. R. Co., p. 109, and following. And many of the courts that have upheld them have done so with reluctance, but felt themselves bound by previous decisions. Still they have been continued, and this persistence has provoked legislation in Michigan, where this contract of carriage was made, and the plaintiffs in error have their existence. By an act of the Legislature, passed after the loss in this case occurred, it is declared "that no railroad company shall be permitted to change or limit its common law liability as a common carrier by any contract or in any other manner, except by a written contract, none of which shall be printed, which shall be signed by the owner or shipper of the goods to be carried." Statutes of Michigan, compilation of 1871, p. 783, section 2386.

It is fair to infer that this kind of legislation will not be confined to Michigan if carriers continue to claim exemption from common law liability through the medium of notices like the one presented in defence of this suit.

These views dispose of this case, and it is not necessary to notice particularly the instructions which the court below gave to the jury. If the court erred at all it was in charging more favorably for the plaintiffs in error than the facts of the case warranted.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARTMAN v. DANNER.

The extension of a note upon the payment of usury, will not discharge a surety.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Adams county.

Opinion of the court by SHARSWOOD, J.

The facts of this case, as presented on this record, appear to be that on April 3d, 1867, Daphorn, with Danner as his surety, executed and delivered a sealed note binding them to pay Hartman $500 on or before April 3d, 1868, with interest from date. At the time the note was given, Daphorn, without the knowledge of Danner, agreed to pay two per cent. extra interest, and gave his due bill for the usury, which was afterwards paid. A short time before the note fell due, Hartman agreed to extend the time for another year, upon Daphorn's giving his due bill for two per cent. extra interest, which was also afterwards paid. In the spring of 1869, the time was again, in like manner, extended, Daphorn giving to Hartman and his wife $10 worth of goods for the extra two per cent., which would not have been due under this arrangement, supposing it to be valid, until April, 1870. Danner was ignorant of these transactions. Had all this, or any of it, the effect of discharging the surety, Danner? This evidently depends upon another question—were the agreements to extend the time founded upon a sufficient consideration, so as to be legally binding upon the parties?

A payment of part of a debt, either principal or interest, before it is legally demandable, will be a sufficient consideration to support an agreement to give time. Flynn v. Madd, 27 Ill. 323; Manufacturers' and Mechanics' Bank v. Bank of Pennsylvania, 7 Watts & Sergeant, 340. But such payment, after maturity of the debt, has no such effect, for the plain reason that in a legal sense it is neither a benefit to the creditor, who is entitled to the whole, nor an injury to the debtor, who ought to have done this, and more, without any promise from the creditor. Papodie v. Peters, 4 Verm. 104; Halstead v. Brown, 17 Indiana, 202; Weidman v. Weitzel, 13 S. & R. 96. For the same reason, payment of part of a debt, though received in satisfaction, if without a release under seal, will not have the effect of extinguishing the whole. Latapee v. Pechollier, 2 W. C. C. Rep. 180; Geiser v. Kershner, 4 Gill. & Johns. 305; Lowrie v. Verner, 3 Watts, 319; Savage v. Everman, 20 P. F. Smith, 319. It is clear, as held by the learned judge below, that the due bills to pay the usurious interest were void contracts under the statute, and could not be a good consideration for any undertaking based upon them. Payne v. Powell, 14 Texas, 600. What effect then did the payment of the due bill given just before the maturity of the note produce? Assuming it to have been paid after the note had fallen due, it was in law a part payment on account of the debt and lawful interest. It cannot be doubted that either Daphorn or Danner, when sued on the note, could have insisted upon a credit for this amount. Such is clearly the provision of the act of May 28th, 1858, Ph. Laws, 622. "It shall be lawful for such borrower or debtor, at his option, to retain or deduct such excess from the amount of any such debt." What the principal had a right to deduct as payment; the surety may certainly avail himself of. It follows logically that the payment of this due bill—and the same principle applies to the subsequent payment in goods—having been made after the maturity of the debt, formed no sufficient consideration for the contract to give further time.

It may be that where there is a contract to pay interest for a specified period on a debt already due, so that the debtor, without the consent of the creditor is thereby precluded from paying the debt and interest until the time expires, there is an appreciable benefit to the creditor as well as an injury to the debtor. Chute v. Patton, 37 Maine, 102. But nothing upon which to found such a point appears in the evidence in this case. By the original contract, the obligors could have discharged the debt at any time on or before April 2d, 1868, and the extensions were evidently of that contract with this provision.

It may appear to be a very refined technicality that a part payment on account of a debt, twenty-four hours before it is due, will, and twenty-four hours after will not form a sufficient consideration for an agreement to extend the time. We must remember, however, that the law pays no regard to the adequacy of a consideration. There must be some legal benefit to the one party or injury to the other, though it may be of the slightest kind. It must be a benefit or injury, which the law can recognize and appreciate, not the performance in part or in whole of that which is an ascertained matured obligation.

The application of these principles to the answers to the points presented and the charge below, shows that the learned judge fell into an error in holding that the payment of the usury, though it may have been after the maturity of the debt, constitutes a sufficient consideration for the agreement to give time so as to discharge the surety.

Judgment reversed, and venire facias de novo awarded.

MOIST'S ADMR'S APPEAL.

1. Proof that a firm of which a decedent was a member, had agreed to pay for services, and that the surviving partners had paid what they considered the services were worth, is good evidence in the distribution of his estate to establish the contract of service and its value.
2. The administrator having allowed the firm a credit for the amount so paid, should not be surcharged therewith.

Appeal from the decree of the Orphans' court of Mifflin county.

Opinion by WILLIAMS, J. Delivered July 3d, 1873.

It is clear that the decree in this case must be reversed. The evidence in support of Runk's claim for services rendered the partnership, was sufficient to justify the administrators in allowing the surviving partner credit for its payment, even if they would be chargeable for allowing the credit if the claim had not been shown to be valid. The testimony of Jonas Moist was positive and uncontradicted, that all the partners agreed to pay Runk wages for all the time he stayed with them; and that the surviving partners settled with him, and paid him the amount they thought they honestly owed him. How, then, can it be said that there was no evidence of a contract or express promise to pay for the services? The evidence, if believed, was clearly sufficient not only to establish the contract, but the value of the services. What better evidence then could have been given to show that the claim was valid, and that the credit for its payment was properly allowed? If it is not just, why should the surviving partners have paid it, when two-thirds of the amount came out of their own pockets? There is no pretence that they were guilty of fraud or collusion in making settlement. The auditor failed to discover any evidence of fraud or collusion. We do not believe, say the court, that any fraud was intended here on their part. If then the settlement was made in good faith, it was binding on the administrators, and they had no right to refuse the credit. If it had been made in the lifetime of the deceased partner, it is clear that he would have been bound by it, unless he could have shown that it was fraudulently and collusively made. Why then should it not be binding on his administrators? The principle which governs the decisions of this case, is that the acts of one partner within the scope of his authority, are binding on his co-partners, and if he acts in good faith, he is not responsible to them for any loss arising from mere mistake or error of judgment. It was the duty of the surviving partners to make the settlement, and as it was honestly and fairly made, the administrators were bound by it. The Orphans' Court was therefore in error in surcharging the administrators with the sum of four hundred dollars, and directing that they should pay the costs of the proceeding, including the costs of the audit.

Decree reversed, and the report of the auditor confirmed, with the exception of so much thereof as finds the costs of the audit be paid out of the money of Mores Moist, in the hands of M. F. H. Kinsel and Wm. R. B. Catton, his administrators. And it is further ordered and decreed that the costs of the audit, and of the proceedings in the Orphans' Court, and the costs of this appeal, be paid by the appellees.

RIDER v. MAUL and wife.

1. The admission of a deposition was objected to by defendant on the ground that the statements of the witness were hearsay, and he offered another deposition of the same witness, taken six years afterwards, in which she testified that the statements were hearsay. The court would not then hear the second deposition, and admitted the first, saying that they would rule it out, if, when defendant gave his evidence, the first appeared to be hearsay. The second deposition so showed, and the court instructed the jury to disregard the first. Held, to be a matter of discretion, and not error.

2. Generally, a party is entitled to a full and unqualified answer to his point. But where the point may mislead the jury, if not qualified, or the evidence requires, the court should so qualify the answer as to turn the attention of the jury to the true question in the cause.

3. Jacobs and Rider bought land together by articles, and made partition; Jacobs gave Rider money to pay the taxes; the whole tract was sold for taxes in 1849; the purchaser assigned his title to Rider; he fraudulently obtained the articles from Jacobs, and obtained new articles from the original vendor to himself for the whole; he went into possession, paid the taxes for the whole, and sold part of the Jacobs lot. Jacobs died in 1849, leaving a minor child (the plaintiff), who came of age December 6th, 1855; in 1853 Rider obtained from the vendor a deed, which was recorded September 25th, 1854. Held, that these facts were not notice of a fraud, or such as would lead to its discovery by reasonable diligence, under the act of April 22d, 1856.

In re GEORGE MACDONNELL

1. These are proceedings in the case of a prisoner held in custody, under a warrant issued by the United States commissioner, for surrender to the authorities of Great Britain, pursuant to the treaty of August 9th, 1842, which warrant is held to be no conclusive bar to further inquiry into any questions which may properly be raised upon a return of the whole proceedings. It is decided, however, that the grounds upon which the discharge of the prisoner is sought ought not to prevail.
2. The discharge of a prisoner for want of evidence does not operate reactively to make his precedent holding and arrest illegal.
3. A new warrant of arrest is not invalid because issued pending proceedings on habeas corpus, though its operations is not to withdraw the prisoner from custody, but to require his continued detention when discharged on the prior warrant.
4. There may be as many demands of surrender, and as many proceedings preliminary to surrender, as there are offences subject to indictment; and, though the Executive may be called upon to guard against abuse, or against oppressive proceedings, where the case is such as properly appeals to the sense of justice which this government always entertains, a further mandate may be issued on a second requisition, and proceedings under it will be legal.
5. Depositions which are so authenticated as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of a foreign country, are to be received in evidence here, and the certificate to their authenticity of the "principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States, resident in such foreign country," is in its nature a judicial act which neither the commissioner nor this court can disregard or overrule.
6. By the terms of the treaty, our government is bound to respect only such evidence of criminality as would justify an apprehension and commitment for trial if the offence had been committed where the fugitive is found, but the enactment of Congress as to what shall be admissible to establish criminality in the inquiry under the treaty, is the law of the place where the prisoner is found, for all the purposes of the proceedings under the treaty.
7. The relation of the court to the commissioner is not that of an appellate tribunal; it is exercising an independent and original jurisdiction, and it does not follow by any legal rule that an error on the part of the commissioner in the reception of evidence should work the discharge of the prisoner. "No case has yet gone so far as to say that because some evidence was introduced which was not legal or competent, or because the court, upon a review of the evidence, was of opinion that it would have come to a different conclusion upon the evidence, therefore the proceedings were illegal and the prisoner should be discharged."
8. A fugitive is to be surrendered upon such evidence only as, being submitted to the jury, would properly secure his conviciton of the offence alleged.—Int. Rev. Rec.

Proceedings under writs of habeas corpus and certiorari.

Before Judges WOODRUFF and BLATCHFORD, June 2d, and 3d, 1873.

This case came before the court on the 2d of June, 1873, on writs of habeas corpus and certiorari. The prisoner was produced by the marshal, in obedience to the writ of habeas corpus addressed to him, returnable to this court. By the return to the writ it appeared that the prisoner was held in custody under a warrant issued by United States Commissioner Gutman, committing him to the custody of the marshal, for surrender to the authorities of Great Britain, pursuant to the treaty of August 9th, 1842, 8 U. S. Stat. at Large, 572, upon a charge of sundry specified forgeries, and the utterance of forged paper; and that, since the issuing of the writ, a warrant from the secretary of State of the United States has been received by the marshal, directing him to surrender the prisoner to the agents of the British Government. The said commissioner, to whom the writ of certiorari was addressed, returned a copy of the proceedings had before him, upon which he made the commitment of the prisoner for surrender, and that he had made his report of the proceedings to the Executive of the United States, upon which the warrant of the secretary of State had since issued.

The prisoner had previously been proceeded against pursuant to a requisition of the British Government, and a mandate of the Executive issued thereupon, on the 13th of March, 1873, under a complaint made before the same commissioner, March 18th, 1873, charging the crimes of forgery and the utterance of forged paper, to wit, certain two bills of exchange, for £1,000 each, on which a warrant was issued by him on that day. Under that warrant the prisoner was arrested and held. The proceedings upon that complaint were continued until the 24th of April, 1873. In the meantime the validity of the proceedings had been examined, under writs of habeas corpus and certiorari, before Judge Woodruff, and their validity affirmed, and the prisoner returned to the custody of the marshal.

On the 23d of April a second warrant of arrest was issued by the same commissioner, founded upon another mandate of the Executive, issued on the 8th of April, 1873, and another complaint made to the commissioner by the British consul general, charging the prisoner with the crimes of forgery and the utterance of forged paper, to wit, with forging and uttering eleven separate bills of exchange, which were particularly described, with date, time, place, amount, etc. Such warrant of arrest was delivered to the marshal on the same day, April 23d, and the prisoner (then in custody under a prior warrant) was notified thereof. On the morning of the 24th of April, the counsel conducting the prosecution under the first proceedings announced to the commissioner that they had no further evidence to offer under such previous proceedings, and the commissioner thereupon, deeming the evidence then before him insufficient to justify a commitment, discharged the prisoner from the said prior warrant of arrest. The prisoner was, however, detained by the marshal under and by virtue of such second warrant of arrest, and proofs were thereupon taken, which resulted in the warrant of commitment for surrender under which he was held to await the action of the Executive at the time the writ of habeas corpus was issued, which warrant of commitment was soon after followed by the warrant for his surrender to the agents of the British Government, mentioned in the return to the writ.

The prisoner answered the return to the habeas corpus, insisting therein upon the illegality of the proceedings, the discharge from the former arrest, as an acquittal, the errors of the commissioner in admitting incompetent evidence, and the insufficiency of the proof to warrant his commitment, and claiming to be discharged from custody. Some other facts, and the grounds urged by his counsel in support of his claim to be discharged, appear in the observations of the court in announcing the decision.

Francis F. Marbury, Esq, for the British consul.

James C. Carter, Esq, for the marshal.

WOODRUFF, J. (on the 3d of June, the counsel for the prisoner having been fully heard on the previous day), stated the conclusions of the court orally as follows:

The court have given such attention to this case, during the progress of the argument, and in the interval since the adjournment, as seemed to us due to its importance, to the earnestness and zeal with which the claims on behalf of the prisoner have been urged upon our attention, and to the gravity of some of the questions which have been agitated; such as seemed to us to be necessary to a safe and right conclusion upon the questions involved, having due regard, also, to the rights of the citizen, and a proper respect to the foreign government, and the good faith of our own, in the execution of its treaty. The result is, that we do not think it necessary to hear the counsel for the prosecution, upon the questions either of law or of fact, which were raised and discussed herein by the counsel for the prisoner. Nor do we think it necessary on this occasion at least, to consider the grounds upon which the court is moved, in behalf of the prosecution, to quash the writ of certiorari. Ex parte Van Orden, 3 Blatchf. C. C. R. 166; In re Martin, 5 Id. 303 and 311.

The conclusions which we have reached upon the points urged in behalf of the prisoner, render it unnecessary that we should say anything of the power of the court to issue the writ of certiorari, in a case arising under a treaty providing for the extradition of fugitives, or of the effect of the warrant of the President for the surrender of the prisoner, upon the proceedings, as a supersedeas, if a writ of certiorari has been properly issued. It is, however, proper to say that the power to issue such a writ, in cases of this description, has been frequently affirmed and exercised; and that the warrant of surrender, issued by the government of the United States, for the delivery of the prisoner to the agents of the demanding government, has not, so far as we can discover, or are advised, been heretofore held a conclusive bar to further inquiry into any questions which may properly be raised upon a return of the whole proceedings. On that subject we go no further, because, assuming that the writ was properly issued, and that the warrant for the surrender of the prisoner should have no effect to preclude further inquiry, and no effect to render valid proceedings which could not otherwise be sustained, our conclusion is, that the grounds upon which the discharge of the prisoner is sought under these writs, ought not to prevail.

Without discussing all the questions that have been raised by counsel, at great length, or attempting to review all the arguments, or seeking to array against them, in any considerable detail, reasons for not giving them the force which they seem to possess in the mind of the counsel by whom they were urged, we shall content ourselves with disposing of the objections substantially in the order in which they were presented.

The first practical question, as expressed by the counsel, in the course of his argument is, whether the arrest of the prisoner in this proceeding was a legal arrest. The facts out of which that question arises, appear by the return to the certiorari, to be these: A mandate had been issued by the president, directing proceedings against the prisoner in compliance with a requisition by the government of Great Britain, and a complaint had been made before the same commissioner, at an earlier day, in which the charge of forgery by the prisoner was made, that charge being only particularized by the statement that he had been guilty of forgery, in the making of two certain bills of exchange for one thousand pounds each, with intent to defraud the governor and company of the Bank of England. Upon that complaint a warrant had been issued for the arrest of the prisoner, he had been arrested, and inquiry into the question of his criminality in the matter thus charged had begun. The question whether, in the proceedings had upon that complaint, the commissioner, and the marshal who executed his warrant, acted legally, had been brought under judicial inquiry, and the proceedings and warrant had been pronounced by one of the judges of this court, after full argument, legal.

Still entertaining the views which governed that decision, we are bound now to pronounce that arrest and that detention legal—legal then, and legal always. So that on the 24th of April, before the discontinuance of the proceedings under that arrest (or, to use the other form of expression, before the discharge of the prisoner from that arrest), he was held in legal custody. While he was in that custody, the warrant of arrest now in question was placed in the hands of the marshal, and thereafter, on the following morning, on the suggestion of the prosecuting counsel that they had no further evidence to offer in support of that prior charge (and plainly upon the face of the proceedings, because the evidence produced did not establish that charge sufficiently to warrant any other result), the commissioner discharged the prisoner from that arrest. It is now argued, that, by some legal retroaction, the discharge of the prisoner from that arrest establishes, and establishes conclusively, that he was, up to that time, held under illegal arrest. That reason we cannot affirm. All that that decision affirmed was, that the demanding government, or those who represented the demanding government, in that prosecution had failed to establish the charge; but down to the time of that decision, the detention of the prisoner was legal, as had already been pronounced, as we still affirm. To hold now that the discharge of the prisoner from arrest under that charge for want of sufficient evidence to justify his commitment, operated retroactively to make the precedent holding and arrest illegal, is to hold, if it be extended, as the principle of the argument must extend it to other and kindred cases, that, whenever a party once charged with crime has been arrested and subsequently discharged, whether for informality, for want of proof, on verdict, or on other legal grounds, ipso facto, all who were actors in the previous arrest were trespassers, and liable to be proceeded against as such as if the arrest and all prior proceedings were void ab initio. No such result is due to the fact that the prisoner having been arrested, is discharged from custody. Such a doctrine, we think, would be fruitful of mischief that could not be tolerated. It, therefore, is not true that the arrest on the present warrant was illegal, because the prisoner was, at the time it was issued to the marshal, illegally detained; and if so, that branch of the argument fails and must be overruled.

It is, however, suggested, that the prisoner being in custody under a warrant of arrest, if the view which we have just discussed be not taken, then he was in legal custody; that it was irregular to issue another warrant of arrest and place it in the hands of the marshal, and that, if proceedings against him with a view to another or subsequent charge were to be instituted, it ought to have been done by a detainer lodged with the jailer, and not by a warrant of arrest delivered to the marshal. Without entering into the discussion of a mere question of practice, it is enough to say, that we are of opinion that such a technical objection has no place in proceedings for the execution of this treaty, and has no application to this subject. The prisoner had not then been committed to any jail. He was kept in the custody of the marshal, who used such place of safe keeping as was available to him, and the new warrant of arrest must necessarily be delivered to the marshal. Such new warrant operated to make it the duty of the marshal to detain the prisoner to await proceedings under it.

It was insisted that the decision of this court in a former case involved, as a necessary result, a proposition which, if maintained, rendered the arrest under the present warrant illegal. In the case of In re Farez, 7 Blatchf. C. C. R. 34, before this court on habeas corpus, the opinion was expressed by the judge that while in the custody of the court, by virtue of a writ of habeas corpus, a prisoner was to be protected against arrest upon a new warrant, and obviously because it was a direct interference with the power of the court then engaged in inquiring whether there was ground for detaining the prisoner under the subsisting arrest; and that the court owed it to itself, and to its necessary power to exercise its own jurisdiction, to see to it that no prisoner in its custody held on habeas corpus, was withdrawn from it pending the proceeding. Such a case has no application to the present point. The prisoner was not in the custody of any court. He was held by a ministerial officer, with a view to an inquiry into a charge of crime, and there was nothing inconsistent with the course of that inquiry, that another warrant of arrest issued by the same commissioner, directing that he be brought before him, should be placed in the hands of the marshal, to the end that an inquiry might be had upon a fresh charge. It was not held in the case of Farez, that a new warrant of arrest was invalid because issued pending the proceedings on habeas corpus, but only that while the prisoner was in the custody of the court, it could not be executed, so as to withdraw him from that custody. So here the present warrant of arrest was not invalid because issued while the prisoner was held under a prior warrant. In the most favorable view that can be taken, it operated when he was discharged from the prior warrant to require the marshal to detain him in custody. No power of any court was invaded. There was no conflict with any requirement or duty of any court to see to it that its jurisdiction was not interfered with. That case as we think has no application to the subject before us; and we therefore hold that there was nothing in the circumstances relied upon, which invalidates the arrest and detention under the second warrant.

The discussion of the point last considered was deemed by the counsel of the prisoner, to involve the question whether, in truth this second arrest was or was not for the same charge. The counsel hereupon insists that, upon the same charge for which the prisoner was first arrested, he was not liable to a second arrest, not only for the reasons above referred to, but because the discharge from the first arrest operated as an acquittal, and that, therefore, if we do not sustain the grounds for discharge already considered, the prisoner must nevertheless be discharged unless the second arrest was based upon a charge of a distinct offence. That the second arrest was for the same offence as the first is claimed by the prisoner's counsel, upon, in substance this reasoning: Inasmuch as the treaty of extradition (8 U. S. Stat. at Large, 576, section 10) provides that upon the requisition of the demanding government, setting forth that the alleged fugitive is charged with the offence of forgery, he shall in the manner pointed out in the treaty, be surrendered to the demanding government for trial, therefore, if forgery be charged, it, ex vi termini, means all forgeries up to that time committed; and, therefore, although it may be true that a second application or requisition for surrender proceeds upon an allegation of the forgery of distinct and separate instruments, there is therein, nevertheless, but the charge of forgery, and it is, therefore, the same offence, because forgery was charged in the first requisition. The fallacy of that view of the subject is quite apparent when it is suggested that every forgery is an offence; that, as there may be several forgeries, so there may be, and so there are several offences; and that there may be as many indictments, as many trials, as many convictions, and we may add, we think is the necessary consequence, as many demands of surrender and as many proceedings preliminary to surrender as there are instruments forged, or in other words, in the view that we take of the subject, as there are offences. It is unnecessary to add that there need not be so many warrants of surrender, for the obvious reason, that when the prisoner has been once surrendered, a further warrant of surrender would be useless, and, therefore, the Executive need not be called upon to make more than one, unless perhaps, for some cause, the first warrant of surrender had not been executed. In that case, a second warrant of surrender might be issued.

The requisition, mandate, and complaint under which the second warrant of arrest was issued, and under which the proceedings now in question were taken, charge the prisoner with forging and uttering eleven different bills of exchange, each specifically described. The first proceeding related to two bills of exchange, described in such general terms that while they may answer the description of two of those named in the second proceeding, they are not clearly identical therewith, and the other nine are plainly distinct and separate forgeries. It is, however, insisted that the discharge from arrest under the first warrant was such an acquittal as precluded another arrest under the second warrant. The reasons which we have given for our view of the other points in the order in which they were presented by the counsel, lead necessarily to the answer which we give, decidedly that it has no such legal effect. Not only so; we purposely refrain from even affirming, or admitting, that, if the offence charged had been identical in both complaints, the prior discharge would have operated as a necessary legal bar to a subsequent arrest, commitment, and surrender, when the demanding government was able to produce proper evidence to sustain it. Be that as it may, we do hold that such discharge has no legal operation or effect upon proceedings for the surrender of a fugitive, based upon complaint of a distinct offence. The Executive may be called upon to guard against abuse, or against oppressive proceedings. The Executive may, perhaps, be justified in saying to the demanding government: "You have had your day. You have had your opportunity. We have, in good faith, given you the benefit of the instrumentalities pointed out in the treaty, in order to effect the surrender of the alleged fugitive whom you demand; but we will see to it that needless or vexatious prosecutions be not indulged in." On the other hand, we unhesitatingly say, that, if the government be satisfied that a failure to procure a surrender in the first instance was due to circumstances explainable, consistently with good faith, and consistently with proper respect to our government, and the case be such as properly appeals to the sense of justice which this government always entertains, a further mandate may be issued on a second requisition, and the proceedings that will follow, conducted by the judicial officers of the government, will be legal. Indeed, on that subject, we apprehend, that the magistrate before whom the prisoner is brought has no right to entertain the question. And, in reference to this point, we add that there is no necessary legal obligation, on the part of the demanding government, to place in its original requisition all the offences of which it may suppose that the fugitive has been guilty. What may, in fairness and candor, be due between the two governments, and whether the President would grant further and successive mandates, where the proceedings were rendered unnecessarily vexatious, by witholding the information which the demanding government possesses, and so instituting several successive prosecutions, when one is sufficient, is, we think, a question for the Executive, and not for the court or the commissioner

The next point in the order of the discussion was, that, if the proceedings before the commissioner thus far be held to be legal, the prisoner should, nevertheless, be discharged from custody, because the commissioner, in the conduct of the inquiry into the criminality of the fugitive, received incompetent evidence. The supposed illegal evidence consists of depositions of two classes. The first class embraces depositions which are certified to have been taken before the Lord Mayor of London, before a warrant of arrest, which forms a part of the documents produced on the hearing before the commissioner was there issued. The other class consists of depositions which were taken successively on two supplemental informations and inquiries, at dates subsequent to the issuing of that warrant of arrest.

In respect to the first class, it seems to us sufficient to refer to the language of the acts of Congress under which these proceedings have been conducted, and to state that the necessary construction of those acts involves the correctness of the commissioner's ruling in this respect. We think we might place the decision of that point upon the act of August 12th, 1848, alone (9 U. S. Stat. at Large, 302); but, under that act, as supplemented by the act of June 22d, 1860 (12 Id. 84), it seems to us that there can be no reasonable doubt. Section 2 of the act of 1848 provides that, "in every case of complaint as aforesaid" (referring to proceedings under a treaty for the extradition of criminals), "and of a hearing upon the return of the warrant of arrest" (issued by the magistrate), "copies of the depositions upon which an original warrant in any such foreign country may have been granted, certified under the hand of the person or persons issuing such warrant, and attested upon the oath of the party producing them to be true copies of the original depositions, may be received in evidence of the criminality of the person so apprehended." It will be seen, that the principles upon which this act proceeds is, that evidence which, in the foreign country, was held sufficient to authorize the arrest of the fugitive, ought to be received as evidence here upon the same charge. But, to identify that evidence and show that the documents produced do contain the evidence received in such foreign country, they must be authenticated as true copies. The authentication which this statute contemplates is a certificate under the hand of the person or persons issuing such warrant, and attestation, upon oath, that they are true copies of the original depositions. That these depositions are certified under the hand of the person issuing the warant in the case now before us, to wit, the Lord Mayor of London, is not questioned.

Congress, in 1860, evidently conceiving that exigencies might arise, doubtless knowing that exigencies had arisen, in which there was difficulty in furnishing seasonable oral proof by the oath of the party producing the depositions, provided, in the act of 1860, that such depositions, or copies thereof, if they shall be properly and legally authenticated, so as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of the foreign country from which the accused party shall have escaped, shall be received in evidence. Here, again, Congress recognizes the propriety of receiving in evidence here depositions which are so authenticated as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of the foreign country. Such depositions are, in their nature and by express terms, made admissible here. Had the act stopped there, the question arising on the offer of such depositions would not be, are such depositions admissible, but are they so authenticated that they are ent tled to be read in the foreign country for similar purposes. How are the tribunals of this country to be advised of the sufficiency of the authentication? That question might have created embarrassment had the act of Congress gone no further. Should oral proof be taken? What official certificates from the foreign tribunals, or government, or officers would establish it? To relieve all doubt or embarrassment, the act declares what may be taken as proof, and conclusive proof, of such authentication, which the court must recognize, and by which that fact is established, in these words: "The certificate of the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States, resident in such foreign country, shall be proof that any paper or other document so offered is authenticated in the manner required by this act." It seems to us, that that removes all doubt from this question. Such certificate is not merely evidence, it is proof of such due authentication. The certificate of our minister at the court of St. James was produced before the commissioner. That certificate is unqualified, in its certification, that the depositions are authenticated in the manner required by the act, to wit, so authenticated as to entitle them to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of the foreign country from which the accused party is alleged to have escaped. It seems to us that that certificate is, in its nature a judicial act, which neither the commissioner nor this court can disregard or overrule. Moreover, that certificate states, on its face, that it is given and made under and pursuant to the provisions of the act of 1860. It may, therefore, be regarded, by its reference thereto, as incorporating the act itself, so far as the details of its requirements are involved in the certificate. It follows, that, in regard to the first class of depositions, there is no room to hesitate, in affirming the correctness of the ruling of the commissioner in receiving them as evidence.

It is suggested, that this construction of the acts of Congress involves an interference with the rights of the prisoner, as creating a species of evidence which the treaty did not contemplate. 8 U. S. Stat. at Large, 576, sec. 10. We are aware, that, by the terms of the treaty, the proof which the Government of the United States is bound, and which alone it is bound to respect, as creating an obligation on its part to surrender a fugitive, is such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person charged is found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had been there committed. In the first place, this language has especial reference to the degree, quantum, or weight of the evidence, rather than to the instruments of evidence themselves; and an act of Congress prescribing what instruments or vehicles of evidence shall be received, and how they may be authenticated, is in no inconsistency with the treaty. But more than this; it was just as competent, as a question of power, for the government of the United States, by act of Congress, as it was competent in the treaty itself, to say upon what evidence of criminality it would perform the stipulations in the treaty; and, therefore, when Congress declared, by their act, for the guidance of judicial officers, what shall be admissible to establish criminality, in the inquiry which, by the terms of the treaty, the government is bound to institute, they made their enactment the law of the place where the prisoner is found, for all the purposes of the proceedings under the treaty. Therefore, it is true—technically and literally true—that the evidence by which the prisoner in the present case has been charged, so far as it conforms to the provisions of the act of Congress, was evidence competent, in its nature, to justify any conclusion which is properly deducible therefrom, in the place where the prisoner was found, and where he was apprehended.

As to the supplemental depositions taken after the warrant was issued, their admissibility depends entirely upon the construction of the act of 1860. There are two grounds upon which we may hold that their admission does not invalidate the proceedings had before the commissioner in this case. If the construction which we have intimated of the act of 1860, namely, that the certificate of the principal diplomatic or consular officer of the United States, resident in the foreign country, is proof, plenary and conclusive, that the documents offered in evidence are so authenticated that they are entitled to be received for similar purposes by the tribunals of England, be correct, then, by the terms of the act of 1860, it was the duty of the commissioner to receive them in evidence, and they were competent, because so pronounced by the diplomatic officer to whom that question is referred by the act of Congress itself. If it were profitable, we might occupy time in suggesting reasons for the enactment, showing its propriety and its convenience; and we might even go further (if it were proper for the court to attempt to justify an act of the supreme Legislature) in support of the construction of the act of 1860, above stated. But we do not think that is necessary, and for the further reason that without resting the disposition of this case, in any respect, upon the conclusive effect of the certificate of the American minister, we are of opinion that even though the second class of depositions were inadmissible, their reception furnishes no ground for the discharge of the prisoner.

The arguments urged upon our attention proceed very much upon an assumption, which is entirely erroneous, to wit, that in this proceeding, under the writ of habeas corpus, we are sitting as an appellate tribunal. That is not our relation to the commissioner. A judge issuing a writ of habeas corpus, or a court issuing a writ of habeas corpus, in these cases, is exercising an independent and original jurisdiction, with a right to inquire, doubtless, whether the prisoner is legally held. What shall be the scope and extent of that inquiry, has been very much controverted in the courts of this circuit. We say on that subject, first, that we are not sitting as an appellate tribunal, for the purpose of reviewing the proceeding before the commissioner, as upon allegation of error. This is not a writ of error. The inquiry here is not to be conducted upon the rigid technical rules applicable to a writ of error, which is in the same proceeding. Sometimes, it is true, a writ of error is called a new suit, but in its relation to the subject matter, and in its ultimate result, it is so connected therewith, that it may be properly called a continuation of the same proceeding. It may result in reversing. What then? If the case is one which calls for it, a venire de novo may be had, which reaches back to the point where the error occurred which requires the proceedings to be reversed. If the decision is one of affirmance, it then adds an additional record sanction to what the inferior tribunal has done. This proceeding has no such relation to the proceedings of the commissioner. The question to be determined upon habeas corpus, in these cases is, as we apprehended, is the prisoner rightly held, or is he to be discharged? If the commissioner, having acquired jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the prisoner, commits an error in the reception of evidence, it does not follow by any legal rule, that his proceedings are to be held for naught, and void for error. The prisoner may, nevertheless, be legally held.

Our conclusion in regard to the case, as it stands upon the evidence, calls upon us to say, that whether the supplementary depositions were or were not admissible, the prisoner is legally held. Without those depositions the proofs justify the conclusion of the commissioner, and his commitment of the prisoner for surrender.

This brings us to notice the questions of fact, in relation to which what we have to say will be very brief. It is claimed that even with the evidence that we have last adverted to, a case was not made out justifying the commitment of the prisoner. Before, however, discussing that point, we desire to call attention to the state of the adjudications in this circuit. Three views have been taken of the power and duty of the court, on habeas corpus and certiorari, to entertain the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the commitment for surrender.

It was held, and held successively for many years, In re Veremaitre, 9 N. Y. Legal Obs. 129; In re Kaine, 10 Id. 257; In re Heiebronn, 12 Id. 65; Ex parte Van Aerman, 3 Blatchf. C. C. R. 160, that if it appeared to the judge, or to the courts issuing the writs, that the commissioner had acquired jurisdiction by a conformity of the proceeding to the requirements of the treaty and acts of Congress, and that he had not exceeded his jurisdiction; that was an end to the inquiry, that whether the evidence received by him was sufficient or insufficient was a question to be determined by him; that no tribunal had been provided by the treaty, and no jurisdiction had been given by any act of Congress to any judge, magistrate, or court to review that decision; that the only review possible was a review by the Executive, to whom the proceedings had before the commissioner were to be returned; that the Executivehad power to examine for himself and determine whether a case had been made within the treaty, and whether a case had been made which called upon him, as the Executive of the government of the United States, to surrender the fugitive, and that as this special jurisdiction in a special proceeding not theretofore within the jurisdiction, original or appellate, of any court or magistrate of the United States, had been conferred by law upon the magistrate acting under the act of Congress, and it was made his duty to certify his conclusion as the basis of executive action, without giving any right of appeal, in any form to any other magistrate or to any court, there was no appeal and no supervisory authority to be exercised, except by the Executive.

The next stage in the history contained an opinion which is supposed to go one step further. We may say, without disrespect to the decision itself, in any wise, that the decision in which the opinion was pronounced, In re Kaine, 3 Blatchf. C. C. R. 1, 4, had other grounds upon which it was deemed to be called for. The decision was that the commissioner never acquired jurisdiction, but the opinion nevertheless, went further, and held that in the case under consideration, there was no competent evidence before the commissioner, that is to say, there was no legal evidence upon which the commissioner could act, for if the evidence was not competent, it was not legal, that if there was no competent evidence before the commissioner, the proceedings before the commissioner were to be treated, whenever presented to any other tribunal, as an arbitrary act of commitment, upon mere complaint, and that the question became, therefore a question of law, not a question of fact, before the court on habeas corpus whether a commissioner could, upon complaint, issue a warrant of arrest, and upon the appearance of the prisoner before him, commit him for surrender. With that view of the subject, and with the assertion of the right to inquire, upon habeas corpus, whether the proceedings of the commissioner had been, in that sense legal, or in other words, whether he had not departed from his jurisdiction, which was a jurisdiction to inquire into and ascertain facts, and not to declare facts without any evidence before him, we are not disposed at present, to raise any controversy.

The next step in the consideration of this subject elicited the opinion, In re Henrich, 5 Blatchf. C. C. R. 414, that the court, acting in the proceedings instituted by habeas corpus and certiorari, was not confined to the mere inquiry whether there was any evidence, but that if it could see that there was a substantial defect of evidence, it might and ought not necessarily to discharge the prisoner, but to hold that the warrant of commitment was illegally granted.

That view of the subject was followed in its next step, or perhaps in its consequence, by the holding, In re Farez, 7 Blatchf. C. C. R. 345 and 491, that it was not the duty of the court to discharge when an error in rejecting evidence for the prisoner had been committed, but to remand that the error might be corrected, and the proofs be continued, if it was so desired, to the end that the facts might be ascertained, and that if the prosecuting government was able, it might yet establish a case against the prisoner. Indeed in the previous case to which we have referred, to wit, where the judge was of opinion that there was no legal evidence. In re Kaine, 3 Blatchf. C. C. R. 1, 4, he offered upon announcing the conclusion that he had reached, to detain the prisoner to the end that the inquiry might proceed, the defects be supplied, and proper and competent evidence be produced before him.

In no view of the subject, therefore, should we be called upon to discharge the prisoner upon the idea that the evidence was not sufficient. No case has yet gone so far as to say that because some evidence was introduced which was not legal or competent, or because the court, upon a review of the evidence, was of opinion that it would have come to a different conclusion upon the evidence, therefore the proceedings were illegal and the prisoner should be discharged. The inconveniences and the evils of such a rule, applicable to this subject are so great that the assertion and maintenance of that view of the meaning of the treaty might be assailed as evidence of bad faith. It has been deemed settled by the law of England, and the doctrine has been reiterated in this country, that a determination of one judge, or a determination of one court, touching a question of discharge under habeas corpus, is not a bar to the issuing of another writ by another court, or by another magistrate, and that practically a person held in detention may have successive writs of habeas corpus, so long and so often as he may find a judge or a court to whom he may address his petition. That practice applied to this subject, works this result. If the judge or the court, in these cases where extradition is sought, is at liberty, on habeas corpus, to weigh the evidence before the commissioner, and inquire whether they would have reached the same conclusion, the result is that the finding of the commissioner, and the findings of successive courts and judges issuing successive writs of habeas corpus, so long as judges can be found, instead of having any force or effect, can be assailed and assailed again, until at last, perhaps some doubting mind may be found who will say, "I would have reached a different conclusion upon the evidence," and thereupon discharge the prisoner. To that view of the duty of the court, touching the weight of evidence before the commissioner, we cannot subscribe. We are not called upon by any decision heretofore made, to assert any such rule. We feel conscious not merely of the inconvenience, but as we apprehend, of the great injustice that would result from any such construction of the treaty and the acts of Congress. Even in the case most relied upon, the Henrich Case, 5 Blatchf. C. C. R. 414, notwithstanding what is stated in the previous portion of the opinion, the conclusion of the court leaves this question open to consideration, and as we think, in the form and manner in which we have stated our views, for although the power is there asserted to reverse or overrule a proceeding before a commissioner, for the want of sufficient evidence, still it is stated that it is not to be done upon slight grounds.

Assuming, nevertheless, for the purposes of this case, that inquiry into the evidence is open to us, in these proceedings, we are brought finally to the question whether, upon the evidence, a case is made out which would justify the commitment of the prisoner for trial. We have carefully examined the evidence in its details, enlightened by the views urged upon us by the counsel for the prisoner, and we are constrained to conclude, that the commissioner (even without the testimony in respect to which exception was taken) would have been derelict in his duty if he had not made the commitment for surrender which he was called upon by the prosecuting parties to make. This is not a trial of the prisoner. Much that was urged upon us, much that was urged touching the admissibility of evidence, much that was urged with regard to the sufficiency of the testimony, proceeded upon the principles which govern a court and a jury when the question of guilt or innocence is finally to be determined. A fugitive is not to be surrendered upon slight grounds. There should be reasonable cause to believe, and in conformity with the case last referred to, we might go further, perhaps, and say that there should be such prima facie case made by proof, as being submitted to the jury, and being found by them to sustain the charge, would make it the duty of a court to sustain the verdict. Such testimony, we think, is found in this case. We are, therefore, not called upon to say anything more touching the power or the duty of the court to examine and weigh the evidence. If such be our duty, we find it sufficient. If there being some evidence tending to establish the prisoner's criminality, we are not to review the finding of the commissioner upon the weight of the evidence, the result in this case is the same.

The objection has been urged by the counsel for the prisoner, that it is not sufficiently proved that the Lord Mayor of London had jurisdiction to issue a warrant of arrest, or to take the depositions in the first instance. Opinion of four judges of the Supreme Court, in Ex parte Kaine, 14 Howard, 115. If what we have said in regard to provision of the act of 1860, touching the certificate of our minister plenipotentiary, be adopted as the rule of decision, that disposes of this question, for in that case his certificate that the depositions which are offered are so authenticated as to entitle them to be read in the courts of that country, is the conclusive test of the admissibilty of the evidence before the commissioner here. But we are of opinion that the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor is sufficiently established. It is not necessary that we should refer to the statute of Edward III, which defined and conferred the powers of justices of the peace in England, or inquire to what extent the tribunals of this country are at liberty or are bound to take judicial notice of the existence of such officers, from that period down to the time of our Revolution, or to recognize the existence of their jurisdiction and authority, and to dispense with proof that such officers have jurisdiction to keep the peace, and as magistrates, to arrest on charge of crime, and hold to bail and detain for trial. Much might be said, it seems to us, in support of that view of the subject, and to sustain the jurisdiction of the Lord Mayor, who appears by these proceedings to be a justice of the peace, without any other proof, whatever. But we think that if evidence is necessary, evidence was produced competent to prove it. We have in the testimony, the affirmative fact that he is the chief criminal magistrate of the city of London. That is testified under oath. There was no cross-examination, there was no inquiry into the sources of the witness' knowledge, and nothing offered in impeachment of the vefity of what was testified. The certificate of the government of Great Britain, in any form, would have told no other tale. At least it establishes that he is, in fact, in the exercise of the power and authority of the chief criminal magistrate of the city of London. It might be plausibly suggested, were it not for some things that have been said in former cases, that when the act of Congress of 1848 provided that the depositions on which a warrant had been granted in the foreign country, certified by the person issuing such a warrant, might, when proved to be true copies, be received in evidence, there was no room for inquiry here into the jurisdiction of that person. We do not, however, propose to go so far. We do say that the proof adduced before the commissioner, in connection with the certificate of the Lord Mayor, and the authentication or certification, ample and full as it is, by our minister, completes the chain of evidence, and sufficiently establishes the jurisdiction of that officer.

To conclude, we find nothing that will justify our further interference with the custody of the prisoner, under the warrant of commitment by which he is held, subject to the warrant of the Executive for his surrender. The prisoner is remanded to the custody from which he was taken, and the writs are discharged.

THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA v. THE PITTSBURG, FORT WAYNE AND CHICAGO RAILWAY COMPANY.

1. The mere nominal or arithmetical increase of the shares of a corporation without any transfer to the shareholders of anything out of the treasury or property of the corporation, the mere watering of stock, is not a dividend either made or declared.
2. Nor does the fact that its new form gives to the stock a greater commercial value, constitute it a dividend of any profit or property of the company.
3. The letter of the auditor of a company unaccompanied by proof of his authority to represent the company in the matter, or that his duties extend to this business, not evidence.
4. The causes of the commonwealth must be tried according to the same rules of evidence which apply to other suitors.—Legal Opinion.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Dauphin county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J.

The whole question in this case depends on the fact whether the increase in the stock of this company was a stock dividend. If it was, it must be conceded that this increase is the subject of the tax of one-half mill for every one per cent. of dividend, under the fourth section of the act of May 1st, 1868. 2 Bright. Dig., p. 1,382, pl. 157. A stock dividend is a thing well understood, and has been passed upon by this court in several instances. In the Commonwealth v. Cleve., Pains. & Ash. R. R. Co., 5 Casey, 370, it was said that "in assessing the tax, no difference can be made between the dividends actually paid to the stockholders, and stock dividends, which are profits added to the stock of each corporator." Nor is it necessary that the corporation should formally declare the dividend payable in stock. This was determined in the Lehigh Crane Iron Co. v. Commonwealth, 5 P. F. Smith, 448. There a company with a capital of $100,000, from time to time increased its capital from its earnings until its stock reached to $900,000, and we held that the increase having resulted from earnings, was liable to the half mill tax. It was a dividend made though not so declared. We said then that the earnings of the original capital belonged to the owners of the stock, in proportion to their shares. So long as they remained in the profit and loss account, there was no division, express or implied, but when added to the capital and made a basis of dividends to the stockholders, they then reaped the actual benefit of the earnings of their stock.

On the question, what is the true capital of a company as the basis of dividends, a converse of the last case is that of the Citizens' Passenger Railway Co. v. The City of Philadelphia, 13 Wright, 251. The authorized capital of that company, on which it declared its dividend, was $500,000, but its actual capital paid in was but $192,750, and the question was whether the tax should be estimated on the authorized or on the paid up capital. The estimate on the nominal capital drew the dividend below six per cent., the charter limit, and hence the controversy. This court, by Thompson, J., held that the paid up stock, not the nominal amount, was the true basis of taxation, and on that the dividend exceeded six per cent. The obvious reason is that the earning or profits of the stockholders on their actual investment, is the real ground on which the tax is laid. This purpose is manifested by the letter of the act as well as its spirit. The fourth section of the act of May 1st, 1868, is in these words: "The capital stock of all companies whatever, incorporated, etc., shall be subject to and pay into the treasury of the commonwealth annually at the rate of one-half mill for each one per cent. of dividend made or declared by such company." A dividend is not capital, but the product of capital, and this product it is which the law by its own terms makes both the criterion and the measure of the taxation of the capital. Thus, if a profit upon the actual capital or investment be either made or passed over to the stockholders without a declaration of dividend, or if a dividend be declared to them, the sum so made or so declared becomes the measure of the tax. If it be made and added to the investment of the shareholders in the form of new capital, though not declared as a dividend, still it must be taken and deemed to be a dividend of the earnings of their original capital, and the new stock is called a stock dividend. This is the point decided in the Lehigh Crane Iron Works' case, supra. On the other hand, if a dividend be declared and set apart to the shareholders, the stock is taxable on the basis of this declaration, of which it makes return by law to the auditor general. The company is estopped by its declaration and report, whether the dividend be earned or not. Atlantic and Ohio Telegraph Company v. Commonwealth, 16 P. F. Smith, 57. The late chief justice said, in the last case, the only question was whether the court below erred in regarding the returns as the true evidence of what dividends were declared as the basis of the auditor general's settlement. He remarked, "She (the commonwealth) is dealing with her own corporation, and acting solely on the evidence of its doings in regard to the subject of its liability to taxes, viz.: dividends made or declared. This is shown by its proper officer, the treasurer, in his return to the auditor general; and the basis of that taxation is the dividends declared and paid." And again, "By whomsoever the stock is held, the measure of the tax is upon the dividends declared, and no such thing as partial dividends is ever to be presumed. When a dividend is declared (he continues) that gives the measure and furnishes the rule for the tax." This ruling derives greater force from the language of the original act of 29th April, 1844, the prototype of the act of 1859, from which the fourth section of the act of May 1st, 1868, was taken. The act of 1844 was that the amount of the tax chargeable on the capital stock, on which a dividend or profit of six per cent. per annum or more shall be made and declared, shall be at the rate of one-half mill on each one per cent. of such dividend or profit. This "profit" was the legislative synonym of the dividend which should measure the tax. In the case of the Phœnix Iron Co. v. Commonwealth, 9 P. F. S. 104, the legislation on the subject of the tax on the capital stock is traced, and the difference is shown between the State tax on dividends specifically and on the capital stock as measured by the dividends. In that case the difference between the acts of 1844 and 1859, was pointed out, which is that instead of a valuation of the stock, as per act of 1844, when the dividend fell below six per cent., the act of 1859 required payment of the tax at the rate of half a mill for each one per cent. of dividend made or declared, and provided for the valuation of the stock according to the act of 1844, only when the corporation failed to make or declare any dividend. But when dividends are made or declared, they still continue to be the criterion and the measure of the tax. In this aspect, therefore, the law is still the same as under the act of 1844, which expressly denominates the dividend as profit.

These two cases, the Lehigh Crane Iron Works and the Atlantic and Ohio Telegraph Company, have, therefore, settled the interpretation of the fourth section of the act of May 1st, 1868, according to its letter and its spirit, and they now furnish the rule for taxation. This is, that when a corporation has actually made dividends from its profits or property without formally declaring them, by adding them to the stock of the shareholders, or where it has declared dividends and returned them, whether earned or not, the sum thus added to the stock of the shareholders, or the sum thus declared and set apart to him, becomes the measure of the tax, the legislative intent being to make the profit transferred by the corporation to its shareholders from its treasury or property the measure of the taxation of its capital. Hence, it is clear that a mere nominal or arithmetical increase of the shares, without a transfer to the shareholders of anything out of the treasury or property of the corporation, is not a dividend or profit either made or declared. It is a mere change in the form of the capital or investment—a transaction of one form into another. A dividend ex. vi. termini is a product of the stock, it is the legislative synonym of profit, not the capital which made it. But capital, no matter what new form it may take, either by the increase or diminution of the number or nominal amount of its shares, so long as no new product is added to it from the treasury or property of the corporation, is still the same capital in substance and effect Nor does the fact that its new form gives to the stock a greater commercial value, constitute it a dividend of any profit or property of the company. It resembles a non-negotiable note converted by consent of parties into a negotiable form. No new sum passes from the debtor to the creditor, the debt is the same, but the new form has given to the instrument a new commercial value in the hands of the creditor. The mere watering of stock, therefore, which has only subdivided existing shares and has transferred nothing from the treasury or property of the corporation to the pocket of the stockholder, is not a dividend either made or declared, within the letter or spirit of the act, and furnishes no basis for additional taxation upon the corporation. It must be remembered that the question before us concerns only the corporation. If the new form of the stock makes the shareholder amenable to additional taxation for more stock, as he was under the act of 1844, and still is to a certain extent, that is his concern, and he must pay any new burthen the increase in his stock may impose upon him. But the Legislature having made the corporation amenable to taxation only according to the dividends it declares, or the product of its capital actually invested in its shareholders in the form of new stock, the State can impose under the act of 1st May, 1868, no additional burthen founded only on a mutation in the form of its capital. This being the true interpretation of the fourth section of that act, which is almost a literal transcript of the act of 1859, the solution of the present case is free from difficulty. The resolution of the stockholders under which the change in the form of the stock took place, recites: That under the lease of the railway to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, a perpetual dividend fund is provided equal to pay twelve per cent. on the existing stock of the company, and that it is expedient that a guaranteed stock entitled to dividends, at the rate of seven per cent. should be created in substitution of the now existing stock. Authority is then conferred on the directors to carry out this purpose. In pursuance of this authority, it was ordered that "there should be issued to the stockholders new certificates, to be called 'guaranteed dividend stock,' in exchange for the old certificates, at the rate of 171 shares of new stock for each 100 shares of the old." This was but a change in the form of the stock, the new certificate representing precisely the same stock covered by the old certificate, altered only by a numerical subdivision of shares, which made 100 by the former computation to stand as 171 by the latter. Nothing new in the shape of profit or property, so far as it appears from the evidence, passed from the company to the stockholders. The existing shares summed up a capital of $11,497,700, on which twelve per cent. would yield a dividend of $1,379,724. The new, or guaranteed, stock at the rate of increase, gives a capital of $19,665,000, on which seven per cent. gives a dividend of $1,376,550, a shade less than the old form yielded. A further calculation shows also that the increased number of shares in the new form counterbalances the decreased percentage in the dividend, and that the commonwealth loses nothing in her tax.

Thus standing on the report of the company, which according to the case of the Atlantic and Ohio Telegraph Company, must be taken to be true in the absence of other evidence, no dividend or profit was made to the stockholders, and consequently the increase in the number of the shares was not a stock dividend and not a basis of taxation.

But had the rejected evidence been admitted, a new aspect might have been given to the case. A grave question would then have arisen, whether the increase of the stock was not an increment, arising from an actual appreciation of the entire property of the corporation, which it sought to transfer to its stockholders, under color of a mere transmutation in the form of stock. If this were the case, it cannot be doubted that the value thus transferred in the form of stock, would constitute a stock dividend, and be the measure of the tax. The rejection of the evidence becomes, therefore, an important assignment of error. It involves a nice discrimination, and yet we think the court was right in its ruling. The document offered was not issued by the company, but was framed and circulated by the trustee in the mortgage given to secure the bond creditors of the company. As a document its assertions were not binding on the company without evidence of their previous authority or subsequent adoption. There was no evidence of either, excepting what shall be found in the letter of Mr. Farley, the auditor of the company, to the auditor general, in response to an inquiry of the latter. There was no evidence of Mr. Farley's authority to represent the company in this matter, or that the duties of an auditor of the companies extend to this business. His authority, therefore, can only be an implication, and the extent of it cannot exceed the terms of the letter itself. Then, assuming an implication of authority to Mr. Farley, the document to which he refers, he adopted only to the extent of those parts to which he refers the auditor general, as explanatory of the action of the railroad company. Beyond these parts of the document, there is no evidence of adoption by the company, actual or inferential. To infer that the statements of a trustee for a different purpose, with no evidence of his authority to make them, outside of the portions adopted by another person without evidence of his authority to adopt the entire document, are binding on the company, and would stretch the doctrine of presumptions beyond the boundaries of safety. Such a presumption would leave the company at the mercy, whim, caprice or prejudice of a jury. It was in the power of the commonwealth or her officers, had they made the effort, to supply the evidence of authority, if it existed, or the evidence of the facts themselves recited in the circular. In regard to the facts, the causes of the commonwealth must be tried according to the same rules of evidence which apply to other suitors, she must supply the evidence of them, and if by loss or a want of evidence she fails, the misfortune or the fault is her own. The absence of evidence cannot be supplied by presumptions at war with justice as well as with the ordinary rules of evidence. The error of the argument which, without evidence, demands a presumption of a dividend of profits from a mere increase of capital, will be treated of in an opinion to be read in the case of the Erie and Pittsburg Railroad Company v. Commonwealth. There being no evidence on the trial that there was a dividend either made or declared by the company, there was nothing to be submitted to the jury.

Judgment affirmed.

THE COMMONWEALTH v. EVANS. EVANS v. THE COMMONWEALTH.

1. Mr. Evans was appointed a "special agent," under a joint resolution of the Legislature, P. L. 1867, p. 1343, which authorized the governor to appoint a special agent to collect certain claims against the United States—whose compensation shall not exceed ten per centum of the amounts thus collected, and shall be paid out of such collections. Held, That he was a public officer.
2. All persons, who by authority of law are entrusted with the receipt of public moneys—through whose hands money due to, or belonging to the public, passes in its way to the public treasury, must be so considered, by whatever name or title they may be designated in the law authorizing their appointment, and whether the service be special or general, transient or permanent.
3. Held, That he was an agent liable to account under the act of March 30th, 1811, the fourteenth section of which provides—"that no allowance for commissions shall in any instance be made by the accounting officers, in case of refusal or neglect to furnish accounts."—Legal Opinion.

Writs of error to the Court of Common Pleas of Dauphin county.

Opinion of the court by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered July 2d, 1873.

These are writs of error by both parties to a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas of Dauphin county, upon the verdict of a jury rendered in a suit by the commonwealth against George O. Evans. The case was tried by the learned president of the court with his accustomed ability and impartiality. We have examined carefully all his rulings on the subject of evidence which have been complained of in this court by either party, and find nothing upon which he can be convicted of error. Nor can any of the errors assigned to his answers and charge be sustained, except as to those points which in different forms appear in several of the specifications by the commonwealth. It will be unnecessary to consider these several specifications more in detail.

We are of the opinion that the defendant below was a public officer within the purview of the first section of the act of July 12th, 1842, Pamph. C, 339, which excepts from the provision of that act abolishing imprisonment for debt, proceedings for the recovery of "moneys collected by any public officer." It may sometimes, indeed, be a difficult matter to distinguish between a public officer and a person employed by the government to perform some special service by contract. It is clear that it is not all public debtors who are within the exception of the act of 1842, nor all parties who under the act of March 30th, 1811, 5 Smith, 225, are bound to account to the auditor general. But we are of the opinion that all persons who by authority of law are entrusted with the receipt of public moneys, through whose hands money due to the public, or belonging to it, passes on its way to the public treasury, must be so considered, by whatever name or title they may be designated in the law authorizing their appointment, and whether the service be special or general, transient or permanent. It is quite unnecessary to discuss the authorities which have been cited upon this point. None of them bear any resemblance to this case, except, perhaps, The United States v. Maurice, 2 Brock. 96, and that we think sustains the conclusion at which we have arrived. It was there held that an agent for fortifications, appointed under the army regulations, which had received the sanction of Congress, was a public officer from whom the government had a right to exact an official bond with sureties, and that such bond was therefore a valid obligation. The appointment then as here was for an indefinite period. Nor does it seem to us to distinguish this case from that, that this appointment was to collect a single claim, or rather a single set of claims against a particular debtor. No one can doubt that collectors of public taxes are within the letter of the exception of the act of 1842. Suppose a special tax laid for a temporary purpose, is it susceptible of any more doubt that a person appointed by authority of law to collect such tax—call him special collector or special agent—would be equally within the exception, and moneys collected by him be "moneys collected by a public officer?" Can it make any difference that a person is commissioned by the government as a general agent to collect all claims of the commonwealth, or as a special agent to collect only one particular claim? We think not. Mr. Evans was appointed by virtue of a joint resolution of the Legislature, approved March 22d, 1867. Pamph. L. 1,343, by which it was provided that the governor be and he is hereby authorized to appoint a special agent to collect the disallowed and suspended claims of the State against the United States. Under this resolution the governor appointed Mr. Evans, and very properly issued and delivered to him a commission under the great seal of the State. This commission is in the usual form of an official commission. In like manner he required of him to give bonds with two sureties. The bond is to the commonwealth, and is conditioned that "the above bounden George O. Evans, special agent as aforesaid, shall faithfully perform his official duties under said joint resolution." It is an official bond. It is true that it does not appear that he took the oath required of all officers, executive and judicial, by the eighth article of the constitution, but it does not follow that he was not bound to take such oath in order to render his qualification complete. Riddle v. Bedford County, 7 S. & R. 386. He certainly had official duties under the joint resolution, as his bond acknowledged, which when he accepted the position he was bound to perform with fidelity. It is not a case of service rendered to the commonwealth under a contract. The joint resolution did not empower the governor to make any contract, and as the learned judge rightly decided upon an offer of evidence, he had no authority outside of the resolution to do so. Even if the fact were that Evans did enter into a contract or contracts with the governor and auditor general, it did not change his character and responsibility as an officer. "If," says Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, "it may be converted into a contract, it must be a contract to perform the duties of the office of agent, and such an office must exist with ascertained duties, or there is no standard by which the extent of the condition can be measured." 2 Breck. 103. A contract to perform duties of an office is implied on the part of every person who accepts it. 3 Bl. Com. 165. We think, therefore, that the moneys collected by Evans were moneys collected by a public officer within the exception of the act of 1842, and the learned judge below ought so to have instructed the jury, and not that the defendant was entitled to a verdict in his favor on the second count of the declaration.

There was a further error in the charge upon the subject of the compensation of Evans for his services in the matter of the claims placed in his hands for collection by Auditor General Hartranft. The jury were directed, "you must fix the amount, and can say that it shall be three, five or ten per cent. as you may think just and reasonable." He had before rightly directed the jury that the defendant could not be allowed more than ten per cent. on the amount actually collected by virtue of his appointment under the joint resolution. He does not in this case limit the commission to the amount actually collected. But we think it clear from the letters of Governor Geary to Auditor General Hartranft, dated March 29th, 1870, and from the paper signed by the latter, dated March 30th, 1870, that the vouchers for these claims were handed over to Evans as the special agent, under the joint resolution requiring the auditor general to furnish him with these vouchers. Governor Geary names and describes him as "special agent of the State under the joint resolution of the Legislature of March 22d, 1867," and Auditor General Hartranft carefully stipulates that his compensation for these services shall be "out of the commission of ten per cent. allowed by the joint resolution."

That is, as we think it must be, reasonably construed. The services rendered in the matter of these claims should be considered in determining the rate of commission to be fixed under joint resolution, and not in the whole to exceed the maximum of that commission, since it is to be paid out of it.

One other point remains to be considered upon the subject of the forfeiture by Evans of his right to any commission. The learned judge undoubtedly laid down the rule correctly as between private principal and agent. But that was not the relation between the commonwealth and Mr. Evans. Admitting even that he was not a public officer, it cannot be questioned that he was an agent liable to account under the act of March 30th, 1811. The first section of that includes, as such expressly, "persons intrusted with the receipt, or who now or hereafter may become possessed of public money." Evans indisputably fell within this category. The fourteenth section of that act provides "that no allowance for commissions shall in any instance be made by the accounting officers, in case of refusal or neglect to furnish accounts." It cannot, with any show of reason, be maintained that this provision applies only to the accounting officers. It is a rule of forfeiture, applicable in all cases between the State and her agents, who are bound to account, and is to be applied whether the question arises upon an appeal from a settlement or in a common law action, if the commonwealth chose to resort to that remedy. The Legislature has laid down a very simple and just rule—essential to the safety of the State—and which can never work injustice to her honest agents. She ought, in no case be compelled to pay double or treble commissions for the collection of her claims—first to the original agent, and then to the agent or attorney employed to collect of that agent, and so on, as it may be, until the whole claim is exhausted in commissions. The simple rule laid down, and which she had an undoubted right to lay down, is to furnish accounts. She says to her agents, report the amount you have collected—make whatever offsets you may think yourself entitled to; the accounting officers will then have the means of making a settlement with you, and if you are dissatisfied with their decision you can appeal. Evans was bound, under the act of 1811, to account promptly—at least within a reasonable time, and besides it was a part of the condition of his official bond that he would "make semi-annual reports to the State treasurer of the amounts collected and of the sources from which derived." It is not pretended that he made any reports or furnished any accounts within a reasonable time, or within the time named in his bond. He received from the United States, May 1st, 1867, $78,516.39, October 27th, 1868, $105,651..46, and August 20th, 1870, $136,846.09. He furnished no accounts whatever until July 21st, 1871. He said on his examination as a witness in court: "I reported to the governor how I was succeeding in my collections. I did not report in writing, because it was not considered expedient, and against the interest of the State. The State had a large balance unsettled, and if reported and got into the newspapers would damage our claims. The governor requested that no public report should be made for the good of the State to facilitate the claims." Governor Geary was not alive at the time of the trial to meet this allegation. It is too clear for argument that the governor had no power to release the agent from one of the plainest of his duties, as well as the condition of his official bond, upon any such notions of expediency. The attention of the learned judge does not appear to have been distinctly called to the provision of the fourteenth section of the act of 1811, and if this was the only question in the cause, we might hesitate to reverse upon it. It is, however, necessarily involved in the answer to the defendant's fourth point, which forms the subject of the sixth assignment of error by the commonwealth.

Judgment reversed, and venire facias de novo awarded.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

[Head notes of decisions of Supreme Court of New Hampshire, to appear in vol. 52, N. H. reports Received from John M. Shirley, Esq., State Reporter.]

BELL v. LAMPREY.

The statute of limitations runs against a claim, unless the debtor is both absent from and residing out of the State.

He may have his legal residence out of the State, and yet be present in the State within the meaning of that provision.

During every absence of the debtor from the State, whether temporary or permanent, which is such that the creditor cannot, during the same, make legal service upon him, the statute of limitations will not run.

But during any return to or presence in the State of the debtor, whether permanent or temporary, with the knowledge of the creditor, or so open and notorious, and of such continuance as to amount to notice to him, and such that the creditor might, by ordinary diligence, have obtained service upon him, the statute of limitations will not run.

To a plea of discharge in insolvency in another State, the plaintiff replied that the defendant committed perjury in swearing to his schedule; and, also, that within a year before filing his petition, and being and knowing himself to be insolvent, paid, in part, borrowed money and pre-existing debts and liabilities, and that he procured the assent of creditors to his discharge by a pecuniary consideration, and made an assignment and transfer of property, in contemplation of insolvency in fraud of creditors, &c.;—upon demurrer,—held, that these replications were bad, because they did not specify time, place, persons, and circumstances, when, where, with whom, and under, and in connection with which the acts charged were committed and done.

ROCKINGHAM TEN CENT. SAVINGS BANK v. PORTSMOUTH.

Under the statute of 1869, ch. 4, all the deposits and accumulations in the several savings banks in this State, however such deposits and accumulations may be invested, are to be taxed to the banks; and such taxes are to be paid to the State, in the first instance. And such deposits, &c., are not liable to any other tax.

Real estate owned by a savings bank, and purchased with the deposits and accumulations of the bank, is not, under said statute, subject to taxation as real estate in the place where the same is located.

A fundamental principle in taxation is, that the same property shall not be subject to a double tax payable by the same party.

Thus, when it is decided that a certain class or kind of property is liable to be taxed under one provision of the statute, it follows, as a legal conclusion, that the Legislature could not have intended that the same property should be subject to another tax.

This court has no jurisdiction by bill in equity to restrain a town or the collector thereof from the collection of a tax which is illegally assessed, as the party has a plain and adequate remedy at law.

An application for abatement is the proper remedy in such cases, not only when the assessment is made upon an over valuation, but also when the whole assessment is illegal.

A bill in equity, one of the prayers in which (with others) is that the court will abate the tax, may be considered and treated as a simple application for abatement, if the necessary preliminary steps have been taken.

CLEMENTS v. MARSTON.

Under our statutes neither interest nor infamy is any disqualification as a witness, whether as a party or otherwise.

Nor are those disqualifications any longer operative, which, being founded upon grounds of public policy, such as the fear of producing dissensions and strife in families and encouraging perjury, were held at common law sufficient to exclude husbands and wives from testifying for or against each other in all cases.

Instead, therefore, of the common law rule that the wife could not testify for or against her husband, and vice versa, for the double reason that their interests were identical, and that it was also contrary to sound public policy, the rule in this State now is that husband and wife may elect and be compelled to testify for or against each other in all cases where the court can see that their examination as witnesses upon the points to which their testimony is offered, will not lead to a violation of marital confidence.

Therefore, when one party to a suit is an executor or administrator, and does not elect to testify, although the other party is thus precluded from being a witness, yet his wife may be called as a witness, either for or against her husband, where no violation of marital confidence is involved.

Conversations between the husband and third persons, and which were heard by the wife, would not ordinarily come within this exception.

And when the wife acted as the agent of the husband, in a matter requiring no special confidence, and where no such confidence is bestowed, and where any other person could have acted just as well, she may ordinarily state any facts learned in the course of such agency.

Where any part of the consideration of a contract is illegal, that may vitiate the whole contract; but where a part of the consideration of a contract with one party is a contract of the other party, which is void or voidable, but not illegal, that does not taint the whole consideration, or make void what would otherwise be valid.

Crawford v. Parsons, 18 N. H 293, questioned.

BREWSTER Ex'R, v. BREWSTER ET AL. Ex'RS.

A., being indebted to his sister. B., in the sum of $1,500, gave her a writing, by the terms of which he promised to pay her, "during her lifetime, $90 per year, semi-annually, being the interest, at six per cent., of $1,500; the principal to be paid to her personally when she may require it, but to no other person.—This obligation will bind my heirs in case of my decease, and release them from any obligation beyond her lifetime."

A., having paid to be B. $45 every half year during his life, died August 4th, 1868. Subsequently, his executors continued to make half-yearly payments of $45 each to her, until and including July 1st, 1869. On the 9th of August, 1869, in response to her written demand for the payment of the principal sum of $1,500, they paid her $393.50, and on January 1st, 1870, they paid her $33.20, being the interest then due upon the remainder of said principal sum. May 12th, 1870, after making a further demand on that day for the balance due upon said writing, B. died. The executor of B. brought an action against the executors of A. to recover said balance. Their action was commenced more than three years after the grant of letters of administration to the defendants as the executors of A., and after they had settled their account as executors in the probate court, and distributed the balance of the estate found in their hands according to the will of A.; but the action was commenced within two years after the original grant of administration upon the estate of B.

Held—1. The principal sum of $1,500 was due and owing to B. whenever she might demand its payment, whether or not such payment were requisite for her comfort or convenience. 2. The cause of action survived, and was capable of prosecution by the executor of A. 3. By virtue of sec. 7, ch. 179, Gen. Stats., such an action may be sustained if brought at any time within two years after the grant of administration upon the estate of the creditor, notwithstanding more than three years have elapsed since the granting of administration upon the estate of the debtor. 4. The operation of the statute, limiting the time within which an action may be brought against an executor for a cause of action against the deceased (Gen. Stats., ch. 179, sec. 5), is suspended during the period when, administration of the estate of a deceased creditor not having been granted, there is no representative of the deceased creditor entitled to bring suit. 5. The payments made by the defendants do not amount to successive new promises, suspending the operation of the statute of limitations. Gen. Stats., ch. 179, sec. 5.

The date of a writ, and not the date of its service, indicates the time of the commencement of an action.

THE WEST PHILADELPHIA PASSENGER RAILWAY CO. v. THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, et al.

1. The authority of the city of Philadelphia over its streets and highways includes the right to lay out and establish streets, determine their lines and grades, pave and keep them in repair, and generally to see that the free and common right to an unobstructed passage over them is secure to the public.
2. The Legislature may enlarge, abridge or abrogate this authority; but a grant to a private corporation to control or override such authority, must be clear, and if there be any ambiguity, the charter will be construed in favor of the public.
3. The passenger railway companies hold their special privileges subject to a proper exercise of this power by the city, which may regulate their franchises, provided it be not to a restriction or destruction of corporate rights, that the regulation be reasonable and necessary for common benefit, and not in restraint of trade, nor imposing a burden without an apparent benefit.
4. The ordinance of June 21st, 1873, requiring the removal of the Market street tracks is not within the act of April 3d, 1846, preventing the granting of injunctions restraining the erection of public works.
5. The removal of said tracks is not a necessity; the said ordinance is unauthorized, and the city should be enjoined from enforcing it.

Opinion by ALLISON, P. J. Delivered July 25th, 1873.

On the 21st day of June, 1873, the councils of the city of Philadelphia passed an ordinance, which orders the straightening of the tracks of the West Philadelphia and Union Passenger Railway Companies on Market street.

This ordinance directs the companies to remove their tracks to the central part of Market street, between Front and Broad streets, upon such lines and in such contiguity as the chief engineer and surveyor may direct. In default of a compliance with the requirements of the ordinance, the chief commissioner of highways is directed to cause the same to be done, and the city solicitor is empowered to collect the cost of change of track from said companies.

The execution of this ordinance is opposed by the plaintiffs, and an injunction is asked to restrain the officers of the city from carrying it into effect, on the ground of a want of power in the city of Philadelphia to take from them any of their existing lines or tracks of railway, or to substitute any other line or track for that which they now have, or to impose any charge or burden upon them. The plaintiffs further say they are advised that by no act of Assembly have they any right or franchise to lay new tracks in different locations from those long since adopted and laid down by them, and to accept, use or operate any such new line.

This general proposition is denied by the defendants, and the execution of the power which they claim is defended first, on the general corporate authority of the city, as expressed in the act of consolidation, and the charter of the city, which was supplied by the act of 1854; which latter act contained the express stipulation that in addition to the new powers granted to the city by the act of consolidation, should also be retained those which had theretofore been conferred on the municipality. These powers of regulation and control were most comprehensive in their scope and operation.

Over the streets and highways of the city ample authority is given. This includes the right to lay out and establish streets; determine lines and grades; pave and keep them in repair, and generally to see that the free and common right to an unobstructed passage over them is secured to the public. In the case of the Commonwealth v. the Central Passenger Railway Company, 2 P. F. S. 506, the Supreme Court have decided that, to a certain extent, the city is the owner of the highways within her boundaries. The power, therefore, of the city to regulate the use of the streets for the public welfare, is a near approach to an absolute power, and no authority short of the Legislature may abridge the dominion which the municipality possesses over highways, when that dominion is exercised inside of the grant of municipal corporate authority. That the Legislature may do this is beyond question; that which it has given to the local government it may take from it; it may entirely abrogate the power of the city over streets, or it may modify or change the same, according to its will or caprice. In the exercise of this right, grants are every year made to private corporations or to associations of individuals, of limited and restricted use of walks and streets, and to the extent of such grant, in any given case, is the general power of a municipality abridged. And yet these grants of special privileges must, in order to control or override the general powers of a public corporation, be clearly conferred. In the case of Commissioners v. Gas Company, 2 Jones, 320, the court say any ambiguity in the grant must be construed against them, and in favor of the public. The rule of construction is that in all such cases any ambiguity in the charter must operate against the corporation and in favor of the public. In the Trenton Water Company, 6 Pennsylvania Law Journal, 32, the rule is stated thus: Private corporations take their rights subject to the rights of individuals and communities; and the strong presumption of law is always against unconditional adverse privileges. This doctrine was recognized and acted on by this court, in the case of the North Pennsylvania Railroad v. Stone, 3 Phila. R. 421, where the city by several acts of Assembly was authorized to culvert Cohocksink creek.

The plaintiff was also by an act of Assembly empowered to construct a railroad upon certain streets of the city. We held that the city could temporarily remove the railway of the plaintiffs, the extent to which the same was necessary in the execution of its undoubted right to build the culvert, that the interests of the private corporation must for a time give way before the higher right of the public, whose convenience, comfort, and health were all to be conserved by the construction of the culvert.

To this may also be added the general principle, that where a private corporation accepts the grant of a franchise upon a highway over which a municipality possess general power of regulation and control for public purposes, it accepts its special privileges, upon the implied condition that it holds them, subject to the reasonable and necessary exercise of the general power of the municipality. "Until the Legislature overrides the local authorities their jurisdiction is not ousted." Philadelphia v. Lombard, etc., Railway, 3 Grant, 405.

We do not, therefore, agree with plaintiffs in the radical position on which they rest their application for an injunction, asserting that they are beyond all municipal control, in regard to a modification or change of the lines and track of their road, even when such modification is required by public necessity or convenience. We hold, on the contrary, that having accepted their charter with the knowledge that the city possessed the most ample power to legislate by ordinances as to her streets and highways, to make all needed regulations for the most convenient enjoyment of the same, by the citizens of the commonwealth, they are bound by an implied agreement to hold their special privileges subject to a proper exercise of this power by the councils of the city. This looks to a regulation only of the franchises of the corporation, not to a restriction or destruction of corporate rights, and this regulation must be reasonable and necessary for common benefit, not in restraint of trade or imposing a burden without an apparent benefit. Goddard's Case, 16 Pickering, 127. Upon this priciple the case in 2 Jones, 320, of Commissioners v. The Gas Company, was decided. An ordinance of the Northern Liberties, prohibiting the opening of streets for the purpose of laying gas mains between December and March, was held to be a reasonable regulation, which bound the private corporation; and an ordinance which prohibited the gas company from opening streets for the purpose of introducing gas into dwellings, was declared to be null and void, as an unreasonable exercise of authority. The vital question in every such case is, is the regulation or order of the municipal authority reasonable and necessary? If it is, it will be maintained; if it is not, it will be set aside.

This principle must not be confounded with that which was asserted in the case of the West Philadelphia Railway Company v. The Commissioners of Public Buildings. (Legal Intelligencer, March 28th, 1873.) It was asserted, upon the argument, that the ruling in that case was conclusive of the present motion in favor of the plaintiffs. We then said the act of August 5th, 1870, under which the defendants claimed a right to take possession of a portion of the track and roadway of the plaintiffs, whereby their property in this portion of the road, and all corporate frachises incident thereto, were utterly destroyed, was null and void; because it was in conflict with the constitution of the State, which declared that private property shall not be taken for public use without first making or securing compensation to the owner. We also said: It is true the defendants have proposed to give a new line or route of railway to the plaintiffs as a substitute for that which they intend to take from them. This route diverges from complainants' tracks at Merrick street, and is carried around the north and south sides of the proposed new buildings, etc. Our answer to this was: This would be satisfactory if it were not for two substantial objections. First, plaintiffs have not the power to accept the offer of the defendants; and second, the defendants possess no such rights as they propose to confer on the plaintiffs. The general remarks which follow this sentence, in the opinion of the court, as to the want of power in plaintiffs to lay new tracks on Market street, must be taken in connection with the point then under consideration, viz.: a change of route of the Market street road, and the power to change location of track on Market street at the will of plaintiffs, and of their own motion, which is an entirely different question from that which arises when the city becomes the actor, and from the highest considerations of public policy and necessity undertakes to regulate the use of the street by ordinance, prescribing a change in location of a track of a railway in a street. If this does not amount to a destruction of corporate franchises, or to a serious injury to them, and if common benefit makes it proper and necessary that it should be done, we think it is within the power of the municipality to direct such change, and to see that it is accomplished.

But the defendants further argue against the injuction, upon the ground that, by an express stipulation of their act of incorporation, the plaintiffs have agreed to the exercise of the power now sought to be enforced. The the 12th section of the act of May 19th, 1857, Appendix to P. L. 1858, page 587, provides that councils may from time to time, by ordinance, establish regulations, in regard to said railway, as may be required for the paving, repaving, grading, culverting, and laying water and gas pipes in and along said street, and to prevent obstructions thereon.

The preamble, if it may be regarded as explaining the true purpose and object of the ordinance of June 21st, 1873, recites that the tracks of the two companies are so laid as to occasion inconvenience to business men on Market street, and to others having occasion to use the same. This, in effect, declares the tracks as now laid to be an obstruction to the business of the street. But it is not that kind of obstructions contemplated by the 12th section of the charter of the company, which the city by this grant of express power is authorized to remove. The ordinances passed under this section could only prescribe regulations in relation to the road, in connection with paving, laying pipe, etc.; and to prevent obstructions thrown on the railway. This evidently has reference to the travel of wagons on the track, in such manner as to prevent obstructions of the cars; regulate stoppages at intersections of streets; the rate of speed of travel on the road, so that cars might not obstruct the travel or other persons on the street, or by being themselves obstructed, constitute an obstruction thereon. This is wholly distinct from the track or roadway being in itself a hindrance or obstruction to the business of the street. We do not think this point is well taken.

The defendants also ground their resistance to the application of plaintiffs on the act of April 8th, 1846, which prevents the courts in Philadelphia granting or continuing injunctions against the erection or use of any public works of any kind, erected, or in progress of erection, under the authority of an act of the Legislature, until questions of title and damages shall be submitted, and finally decided by a common law court.

But we think it would be straining this law beyond its true meaning, to hold that a mere change in the location of railway tracks of two private corporations upon the street, can be construed to fall under the designation of "public works." Nor can it with truth be asserted that such works have been erected, or that they are in progress of erection; for removal and replacement of the tracks, so far from having been erected or completed, have not even been commenced. The public works contemplated and already begun is the repaving of the street; this is to be done for the benefit of the entire community, at public cost. But if the railway tracks are to be shifted to the centre of the street, they are, and will continue to be, the private property of private corporations. Nor is it intended that the city shall bear the burden of effecting the change, the ordinance providing that each corporation shall be compelled to reimburse the city in the outlay, is, in the first instance, required to be paid out of the treasury of the municipality. That the work may be done by the agents of the city, if done for individual corporations, does not make it public work, or public property; it remains the property of private owners. We do not agree with the plaintiffs, however, that because the work is not done under a special act of the Legislature that it is wanting in sufficient legislative authority. If there is in the act of incorporation of the city, or its supplements, to be found a grant of general power sufficient to authorize them to remove the plaintiffs' tracks of railway, it may in such case be properly said to be done under the authority of an act of the Legislature.

This brings us back to the question: Is the proposed interference by councils with the right of plaintiffs to continue to use their road as now constructed, justified by the law of necessity? Is the ordinance a reasonable and proper ordinance? Nor must it be forgotten, that all that is proposed to be done is to regulate the enjoyment of corporate franchises, not to destroy them, as was done by the action of the building commissioners, taking absolute possession of the road between Juniper and Merrick streets. The ordinance does not aver that the tracks of the railway of the plaintiff, as they have heretofore existed, or that their use by the company plaintiff have or do now, of themselves, occasion inconvenience to any of the public; but it is asserted that they do so, in connection with the tracks of the Union Passenger Railway. This is not such an averment of inconvenience or obstruction as we can consider as at all conclusive of the fact itself. If the hardship recited in the ordinance be not occasioned by, or is not properly chargeable upon the plaintiffs, but by something which another has done, it is much more reasonable and it is every way proper to first endeavor to cure the existing evil by removing its cause, and not inflict punishment upon those who have not offended. If the removal of both tracks of railway from their present location nearer to the centre of the street is a public necessity; if common benefit or general advantage demand it, let it be done as councils have ordained; but if the whole of the inconvenience arise from the fact that the Union Passenger Railway have, without a necessity to justify it, exercised their right to lay their tracks upon Market street in such a manner as to have occasioned all the mischief, then the evil ought to be abated by the removal of their tracks to another portion of the highway. A personal inspection of the street has satisfied us that this can be done, and if in this we are mistaken, we hold ourselves open to correction, and to such a modification of the order, which we propose to make, as may appear proper under the circumstances of the case. Between Eighth and Ninth streets, the north track of the Union road can be laid near the centre of the street, and south of the northernmost track of the plaintiffs, connecting with the Union track as now laid at the intersection of Eighth and Market. This will take away, as it appears to me, all cause of objection west of Eighth street. And on the south side of Market street the inconvenience can be removed by placing the southerly track of the Union road north of the southernmost track of the roadway of plaintiffs. There appears to be ample space in the centre of the street for this readjustment of tracks, except for a short distance west of Third street; but this difficulty can be obviated by straightening the track of plaintiffs on the south side of Market street, west of Third, so as to make the space between the tracks of the Market street road uniform from Third to Seventh street. The Union road can cross the track of plaintiffs at the intersection of Third and Market streets, to connect with their track now laid from Third street east.

It is possible that it may be necessary, if this plan is adopted, that the Union track must cross that of the plaintiffs west of Eighth street. If this is found to be the case, and if the connection cannot be made at the intersection of Eighth and Market, then I shall require the plaintiffs to agree to such a crossing of their track at this point, or if they do not concede to this, I will dissolve the injunction in so far as it applies to the street between Eighth and Ninth streets.

This arrangement, if practicable, renders unnecessary any disturbance of the plaintiffs in the enjoyment of their franchises which they have possessed since 1858, and which they are entitled to continue to enjoy until the public benefit or the general welfare of the community shall justify an interference with them, by way of regulation, by the corporate authorities of the city.

Supreme Court of Minnesota.

SCHWARTZ v. GERMANIA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

1. An insurance company in accepting an application for insurance may prescribe such conditions as it desires.
2. The sending of a life policy from the home office to the agent from whom the application was received with instructions not to deliver it unless the premium be prepaid, and the applicant in good health, is a conditional acceptance, and the company is not bound unless the condition be fulfilled.
3. The applicant's refusal or inability to comply with such condition, is a rejection of the proffered acceptance, and a rescission of the policy.
4. If the premium, upon being duly tendered, is refused, it is not necessary in an action on the policy to bring the money into court, for if there be a recovery the jury may give credit for the amount of the premium in making up their verdict.

Opinion by BERRY, J.

The principal controversy in this case relates to the law applicable to certain facts, with regard to which there is very little difference between the parties.

The defendant is a life insurance company, having its home office in the city of New York, and a local agency in St. Paul, in charge of one Ferdinand Willins.

On the first day of September, 1870, the plaintiff made a written application to defendant, through said Willins, for insurance upon the life of Fridolin Schwartz, her husband. The application among other things contained statements that "the present state of health" of the party whose life was to be assured was good; that he was not afflicted with any bodily defect, that the state of his health had been good theretofore, and that he had never been afflicted with any serious illness, defect, or personal injury. It also contained the following question and answer, viz.:

"Are you aware that this contract of assurance becomes valid only by the payment of the first premium?" Answer—"Yes." The application closed as follows, viz.: "It is hereby declared that the above are fair and true answers to the foregoing questions, and it is acknowledged and agreed by the undersigned that the above statements shall form the basis of the contract for insurance, and also that any untrue or fraudulent answers, any suppression of facts in regard to the party's health, or neglect to pay the premium on or before the day it becomes due, will render the policy null and void, and forfeit all payment made thereon, also that the policy of insurance hereby applied for, shall not be binding upon this company until the amount of premium as stated herein shall be received by said company or some authorized agent thereof, during the lifetime of the party therein insured."

On said 1st day of September, said Willins, by mail, transmitted to defendant's home office the application, enclosed in a letter of that date, the text of which is as follows: "Enclosed please find application of F. Schwartz, $1,000."

On September 9th, Willins received from the home office a letter signed by defendant's president, dated September 5th, acknowledging receipt of the application and letter from Willins, and enclosing a policy on the life of Fridolin Schwartz, bearing date on said September 5th. This policy is in general in the usual form of policies of endowment assurance. It provides for the payment of annual premiums of $62.88 each, the first to be paid in hand, the rest, respectively, to be paid on or before the 5th day of September, in every year, during the continuance of the policy.

The policy provides further, that it is accepted upon the express condition that it shall be of no effect, 1st, if the declaration, evidently referring to the application made by or for the assured, "forming part of the contract, and upon the faith of which this contract is made, shall be found in any respect untrue." 5th. "If the above premiums or any of them, shall not be paid on or before the several days hereinbefore mentioned for the payment thereof, respectively." Willins offered to deliver this policy to Schwartz upon payment of the premium. Schwartz declined to pay the same in cash, claiming that one Rosenfield, a solicitor in the employ of Willins, had agreed to take the premium in whole or in part in board, which, however, such solicitor had no authority to do.

The policy was not delivered, but at the request of Schwartz was returned on October 13th, to the home office, with the request that it be changed for another policy providing for semi-annual instead of annual payments. On October 25th Willins received a letter from the home office, acknowledging the receipt of the returned policy and of his letter requesting the above mentioned change to be made, and enclosing another policy like the first in all respects, save that it provided for the payment of semi-annual premiums, $32.07 in hand, and $32.07 "to be paid on or before the 5th day of March and September in every year during the continuance of the policy."

At the foot of each policy was a note as follows, viz.: "Agents holding an appointment from the company are authorized to receive premiums at or before the time when due, upon the receipt of the president or secretary of the company, but not to make, alter or discharge contracts or waive forfeitures."

On October 13th Fridolin Schwartz was attacked with a dangerous illness, of which he died on October 29th.

On October 25th, after the arrival of the second policy, plaintiff went to the office of Willins, inquired for the policy, and was informed that it had come. Upon asking if she could have it, she was told that she could not, because her "husband was taken sick."

Thereupon having requested that the premium money be taken, which was refused on the ground that her "husband was sick," she tendered the premium money, but defendant's agent refused to receive it on the sole ground that her "husband was sick." The second policy was never delivered nor offered to be delivered to plaintiff or her husband, and about the 1st of November was returned to defendant's home office at defendant's request. On the 18th of March, 1871, proofs of the death of Fridolin Schwartz, and of the plaintiff's claim under the policy were transmitted by Willins to the home office. There was testimony in the case not contradicted, and tending to show that defendant's general instructions to Willins were to deliver policies on payment of the premium, provided the person whose life was to be insured was in health at the time of such delivery There is no evidence going to show that these instructions were known to the plaintiff.

Plaintiff's counsel takes the position that these facts make out an acceptance by defendant of a proposition by plaintiff. the effect being to conclude "a contract of insurance between the parties according to the terms proposed." What is said in Heiman v. The Phœnix M. L. Ins. Co., 17 Minn., would seem to be in point here. "The application for insurance is a mere proposal on the part of the applicant. When the insurer signifies his acceptance of it to the proposer, and not before, the minds of the parties meet and the contract is made. This acceptance must be signified by some act."

Plaintiff's application is properly characterized as a proposition to defendant.

And when Willins (defendant's agent) offered the first policy to Schwartz, who appears to be regarded by common consent as acting for the plaintiff as well as for himself in the whole business, upon payment of the first premium, defendant thereby signified its acceptance of plaintiff's proposition. In other words, defendant thereby offered to insure the life of Fridolin Schwartz by delivering to plaintiff its policy of insurance, upon prepayment of the first premium in hand. But this payment was refused. This was a refusal by plaintiff to comply with the terms of her own proposition.

It was a repudiation of the proposition, a rejection of the proffered acceptance. and in effect and in fact a refusal to receive the policy at all.

Plaintiff having thus repudiated her own proposition, and refused to comply with the conditions upon which defendant signified its acceptance of her proposition as the basis of a contract of insurance into which defendant offered to enter, by delivering policy, defendant, so far as any obligation or liability to plaintiff was concerned, stood precisely where it would have stood if it had never had accepted plaintiff's proposition, conditionally or otherwise.

Under these circumstances defendant certainly had the right to insist that it was not bound to the plaintiff by any contract of insurance, or by any agreement to enter into a contract of insurance.

After plaintiff had thus refused to receive the first policy, it was at plaintiff's instance returned to defendant's home office.

We are unable to conceive why under these circumstances it was not utterly inoperative as a foundation for any rights, whatever, upon plaintiff's part, whether such rights are sought to be placed upon the ground that defendant had insured, or upon the ground that it had agreed to insure the life of her husband.

If we are right, it follows that if there was any contract concluded between the parties to this action, this result must have been affected by the second policy, and what took place in reference thereto.

The facts already stated show that plaintiff's request that the policy should provide for semi-annual instead of annual premiums was acceded to, and that accordingly a second policy, providing for such semi-annual premium, was transmitted from defendant's home office to defendant's agent (Willins) at St. Paul.

Plaintiff's counsel claims that this second policy was not a "new contract;" that the original contract was not superseded or rescinded by it," but only modified in relation to the manner of payment; that it "was really an affirmation of the original contract;" "that it was intended to be but a redraft of the first as modified by mutual consent."

However ingenious these suggestions may be, it is evident that they possess little or no force, if the views which we have already expressed in regard to the first policy and its utter inoperativeness as a contract of any kind, or as evidencing a contract of any kind, are sound.

As we have no doubt of their soundness, we are forced to the opinion before expressed, that if there was any contract concluded between the parties, this result must have been brought about by the second policy, and the facts which transpired in reference to it. The second policy was never delivered nor offered to be delivered to plaintiff, or to any one for her. Yet independent of this policy, there is nothing in the case tending to show any binding acceptance of plaintiff's proposition, or any agreement to insure, or contract of insurance. If, then, defendant in any way signified its acceptance of plaintiff's proposition, so that a contract was concluded between the parties, it must have done it by transmitting the second policy to Willins, its agent, for the purpose of having the same delivered to plaintiff upon payment of the first premium in hand. And if Willins had no authority, discretion or duty in the premises, save only to deliver the policy upon payment of the first premium, then we can see no good reason why the transmission of the policy to him might not well be regarded as a signifying by defendant of its acceptance of plaintiff's proposition, nor any good reason why payment or tender of the first premium to such agent, even if delivery of the policy was withheld, would not have been completely effectual to entitle the plaintiff to the full benefit of the policy to the same extent as if it had been manually and unconditionally delivered. There is, however, nothing whatever in this case showing, or tending to show, that the defendant was under any legal obligation to accept plaintiff's proposition, or to enter into any contract of insurance thereupon by issuing or delivering a policy or otherwise. Plaintiff's application was a mere proposal, which defendant was at liberty to accept or decline at its own option. And as defendant was thus at liberty to accept or decline plaintiff's proposition at its own option, it is clear that upon the facts appearing in this case, defendant was at liberty to accept upon such terms and subject to such conditions as it saw fit to impose.

It was therefore competent for defendant to say to plaintiff, we will accept your application and deliver to you our policy upon payment of the first premium, provided your husband is now in good health, and it would be equally competent for defendant to transmit its policy to its legal agent, with instructions, general or special, to deliver the same to plaintiff upon payment of the first premium, provided her husband was in good health at the time of such delivery.

And in such case the transmission of the policy to the agent, would go no further than to signify the defendant's acceptance of plaintiff's proposition on condition that her husband was in good health. The agent's refusal to deliver the policy because of the fact that the husband was not in good health, would not be an attempt on his part to alter the contract, or impose terms other than those which had been agreed upon, as plaintiff's counsel contends. No contract could be made nor any terms agreed upon without some action upon the part of defendant.

There being no action upon defendant's part except the transmission of the policy to its own agent, to be delivered upon payment of the premium, upon the condition above mentioned, there would be no contract made nor any terms agreed upon, save such as embraced such condition.

Nor is this a case in which where an agent performs an act within the apparent scope of his authority, the act binds his principal, notwithstanding it was done in violation of private or secret instructions. The case at bar is not one in which the agent has performed any act in the name of his principal under an apparent authority to perform the same, so that the party with whom he has contracted has acquired rights which the principal will not be permitted to gainsay. But if the instructions under which Willins refused to deliver the policy were in fact given, the case is one in which the agent has refused to perform an act which would bind his principal, and by virtue of which, if performed, the plaintiff would acquire certain rights against such principal, and has refused to do this because instructed by his principal so to do.

Now if this plaintiff had acquired any right to the policy, or to a contract of insurance, except such as was subject to the condition of her husband's good health, as we have endeavored to show that she had not, if the instructions referred to were in fact given, then she might well contend that she was not to be deprived of that right by any private instructions given by defendant to its agent. Not having acquired any such right, that is to say, if the instructions referred to were in fact given, she is not in a position to insist that the policy shall be delivered to her in disregard of such instructions, or that she shall have the same rights and benefits as if it had been delivered to her. As the general charge of the court to the jury was entirely at variance with the views above expressed, there must be a new trial.

This disposes of what has seemed to us to be the principal and most difficult question presented by this appeal, but as there may be a new trial, it is expedient that we should consider some of the other questions raised and discussed by counsel.

The question whether the instructions as to delivering policies, provided the person whose life was to be insured was in good health, were given, being a question of fact, the plaintiff had the right to put in her testimony upon the basis that no such instructions were given. And in this view we perceive no reason why the two policies, notwithstanding the signatures were cancelled, together with the correspondence in reference thereto, between defendant and its agent, Willins, were not properly received in evidence as documentary history of the case, and of the transactions between the parties in reference to the subject of the action. We think the court was justified in receiving the evidence of what was said by Gustav Willins at the time when plaintiff went to the banking office occupied by him (Gustav) and his brother Ferdinand, since there was testimony tending to show that Ferdinand was present at the conversation, and also that Gustav was in the practice of assisting his brother in the insurance business, and of attending to the same in his brother's absence.

The tenth interrogatory addressed to Schroendler (defendant's vice president), inquired for the custom of the defendant as to delivering policies. The answer, which appears to be responsive to the interrogatory, states among other things a custom of the defendant not to deliver or send policies to agents for delivery, except upon the condition that the person whose life is to be insured is in good health.

We think the interrogatory and answer were properly excluded. Unless this custom was shown to be known to plaintiff, or to have been communicated to Willins as instructions, it is impossible to see its materiality in this case.

In regard to statements contained in the application, and mentioned in the early part of this opinion, as to the health, bodily defects, etc., of Fridolin Schwartz, we are of the opinion that they had reference to the state of facts existing or which had existed at the date of the application, not to any which might occur subsequently to such date.

The points made by defendant in reference to the court's refusal to instruct the jury as requested upon the question of tender, do not appear to be particularly insisted upon.

It is unnecessary to say more in regard to them, than that we think the tender sufficiently pleaded in the complaint, that it was not necessary for plaintiff to bring the amount tendered into court, the case being one in which, if she is entitled to recover at all, defendant may receive the premium money in the way of a deduction from the sum of her recovery, and that as the evidence tended to show an absolute refusal to receive the tender, the manner in which the testimony tended to show that it was made, was beyond doubt sufficient.

We need not consider the propriety of the questions which were excluded by the court as not proper cross-examination.

This objection to them can easily be obviated, if a new trial should be had.

Nor need we consider the point made as to the allowance of interest on the judgment.

An amendment allowable, as a matter of course, would prevent the recurrence of the question raised.

This in effect disposes, we think, of all the important matters presented by the case.

Order refusing a new trial reversed, and new trial granted.

U. S. Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois.

HEAD v. GREEN.

1. The measure of damages for breach of a guaranty of the amount due on a note, there being no guaranty of payment or collectability, is what the plaintiff has lost by that breach, which is, the value of a judgment if one had been obtained against the makers.
2. Where the makers were solvent but proved payment, the measure is the full amount due on the note at the time of bringing suit, as stated in the guaranty.—Legal News.

This was a motion for a new trial, the case having been tried by the court without a jury, and the issues found for plaintiffs.

The suit was brought on a guaranty by defendant, Harley Green, upon a note for $500, made by A. King & Co., to plaintiff, dated July 18th, 1867, payable on demand with interest at ten per cent., and on which there was an endorsement of $100. paid January 30th, 1869.

The guaranty is in the following words:

"I hereby guaranty that there is now due and unpaid on the within note, the original sum of five hundred dollars and interest, except the one hundred dollars endorsed. But it is expressly understood that the guaranty is without liability of any kind on the undersigned, except as above, as to amount due.

"Signed, HARLEY GREEN."

The defendant being the owner, on December 8th, 1870, of this note, together with four others for $500 each, made by Mary E. and A. C. King, and secured by mortgage, sold the whole to the plaintiff for the sum of $2,150, making at that time the guaranty sued on. The mortgage was collectable, and plaintiffs knew that the makers had nearly completed their arrangements to pay it, and neither party considered the A. King & Co.'s note of any great value.

After obtaining the guarantied note, plaintiffs brought suit on it against the makers, A. C. and Alpheus King, in Greene county, Iowa, to which the makers plead payment in full, to defendant, on the 30th of January, 1869. Defendant was duly notified of this defence, and requested to furnish proof to meet it. He directed plaintiffs to subpœna a son of A. C. King, and Mrs. Mary E. King as witnesses. Both were duly summoned; the son attended and testified that the note was paid; Mrs. King did not attend the trial by reason of sickness. Defendant did not attend the trial, nor furnish his deposition, although he was a competent witness, nor did plaintiffs take any steps to obtain his testimony. The case was tried, and resulted in a verdict against plaintiffs, on the ground that the note had been fully paid to defendant before he transferred the same to plaintiffs.

The record of the suit and judgment in Iowa, as well as other evidence of payment, was introduced on the trial, and the court found that the note had actually been paid at the time of the guaranty, and that the amount apparently due could have been collected if judgment had been obtained against the makers.

Opinion of the court by FLODGETT, J.

The only question now is as to what is the true measure of damages.

The well established rule in actions by endorsees against endorsers or guarantors of negotiable paper is, that the measure of damages is the amount paid by the assignee or endorser to the guarantor or endorser, with interest. But this rule has been only applied, so far as my examination has gone, to cases where there was either an express or implied guaranty of payment or collectability, and I have been unable to find from any research of my own, nor has the industry of counsel on either side furnished me with any adjudged case, or even the dictum of a court or text writer as to what is the true measure of damages on the breach of a guaranty like this. On a guaranty of payment or collectability, the holder knows that if he takes the necessary steps to fix the liability of the guarantor, he can recover back at least the amount paid for the note, with interest; but in a guaranty like this, he has no such redress. The holder of the guaranty takes all the chances of the collectability of the demand. There is no liability even by the guarantor in case the maker of the paper proves insolvent, but the holder must lose all he has paid unless he can collect from the maker. And it seems to me that the measure of his damages, in case of a breach of the contract as to the amount due, is what plaintiff has lost by that breach; which in this case should be the whole amount due on the note at the time suit is brought. And it appears to me that one weighty reason why this rule should be applied to a guaranty like this, is that the holder of notes or bills who attempts to negotiate them after due, must be presumed to know (and he alone) whether there are any legal or equitable defences to the paper he purposes to transfer to another. And as he assumes no risk in regard to the collectability of the debt, he should at least be held to make good his express undertaking that the paper represents an honest demand for what purports to be due thereon. Can it be supposed that any person would buy a note with such a guaranty unless he understood that the guarantor was holden to make good the pledge he gives? I do not say he is holden for the full amount due on the note, for the maker of the note may be insolvent, and a judgment obtained would be worthless, but the measure of his liability is the value of the judgment, if one had been obtained against the maker. And here it appears the judgment would have been worth the full amount, if it had been obtained.

Motion for a new trial overruled, and judgment for the plaintiff.

In compliance with the desire of many prominent members of the Bar, the Publishers have endeavored to produce a handsome book, full and complete in its contents. Owing to the sale being limited to the Philadelphia Bar, to whom only it can be of use, and in consequence of the expense attending its publication, the price has been fixed at a figure that may seem apparently high,—but the Publishers, to reimburse themselves for the outlay they have been subject to, have been compelled to decline giving discounts to any one, so as to enable them to give the Bar the advantage of the lowest possible price for which the Book can be made.

The volume has been carefully compiled, and has also been revised by the Judges of the different Courts, and endorsed by Rules of the same. They therefore contain not only the latest, but also the only full publication of those rules, as they now stand on the minutes of the different Courts.

MILLER v. THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

1. Where by the constitution or general law of a State a power is reserved for the Legislature to repeal, alter or amend a charter, such reservation becomes a condition in every subsequent grant of corporate rights.
2. Such a reservation will not warrant the Legislature in changing the control of an institution from one religious sect to another, in diverting the fund of the donors to any new use inconsistent with the intent and propose of the charter, or in compelling subscribers to the stock, whose subscription is conditional, to waive any of the conditions.
3. The constitution and general laws of New York contain such a reservation. The Legislature of that State authorized the city of Rochester to subscribe to the stock of one of its corporations giving the city the right to choose four directors. The city owning the majority of stock, the Legislature enacted that the city should choose seven directors, which was a majority: Held, the act was constitutional.

Error to the Court of Appeals of New York. The opinion states the case.

Opinion by CLIFFORD, J.

Corporate franchises granted to private corporations, if duly accepted by the corporators, partake of the nature of legal estates, and the grant, under such circumstances, if it be absolute in its terms, and without any condition or reservation importing a different intent, becomes a contract within the protection of that clause of the Constitution which ordains that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

Charters of private corporations are regarded as executed contracts between the State and the corporators, and the rule is well settled that the Legislature, if the charter does not contain any reservation or other provision modifying or limiting the nature of the contract, cannot repeal, impair, or alter such a charter against the consent or without the default of the corporation, judicially ascertained and declared. Subsequent legislation, altering or modifying such a charter, where there is no such reservation, is plainly unauthorized, if it is prejudicial to the rights of the corporators, and was passed without their assent. Where such a provision is incorporated in the charter, it is clear that it qualifies the grant, and that the subsequent exercise of that reserved power cannot be regarded as an act within the prohibition of the Constitution. College Cases, 13 Wall. 213.

Such power also, that is, the power to alter, modify or repeal an act of incorporation, is frequently reserved to the State by a general law applicable to all acts of incorporation, or to certain classes of the same, as the case may be, in which case it is equally clear that the power may be exercised whenever it appears that the act of incorporation is one which falls within the reservation, and that the charter was granted subsequent to the passage of the general law, even though the charter contains no such condition nor any allusion to such a reservation. Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 136; Terrett v. Taylor, 9 id. 51.

Matters of fact, though not in dispute, must be first ascertained, in order that the questions involved in the case may be properly presented for decision. Briefly stated, the material facts are as follows, as appears by the finding of the court of original jurisdiction, and from the concessions of the parties:

That the railroad company is a corporation duly organized under the general railroad act of the State, passed on the 2d of April, 1850, and that the articles of association were, on the 10th of July, of the succeeding year, filed in the office of the secretary of State; that the articles of association provided for the construction of a railroad from Rochester to Portage, a distance of fifty miles, with a capital of $800,000, to be divided into eight thousand shares each for $100, as therein specified; that the stock subscribed for the corporation, paid and unpaid, amounted to nine thousand seven hundred and seventy-five shares, of which only five thousand five hundred and fifty-two shares were ever fully paid, and for which certificates have been issued. Authority was conferred upon the city of Rochester, by an act to amend the charter of the city, to subscribe for or purchase stock of that railroad company to the amount of $300,000, and the provision was that by virtue of that subscription or purchase, the city should acquire all the rights and privileges and be liable to the same responsibilities as other stockholders of said company, except in certain particulars not necessary to be mentioned. Sess. Acts, 1851, p. 768.

Pursuant to that authority the proper officers of the city subscribed for that amount of the stock of the railroad company, and it appears that the proper officers of the railroad company elected to receive the subscription, and that the full amount of the subscription was paid, and that the certificates of the shares were duly issued to the city, and that the city has ever since been the holder and owner of the whole number of said shares.

Power was also conferred upon the city in case the company "elected to receive their subscription," to nominate and appoint one director for every $75,000 of capital stock held by the municipality, at the time of each election of directors, but the further provision was that the city should have no voice in the election of the remaining directors, consequently the common council of the city, at the time of each annual election of directors, elected four, the number being limited by law to thirteen, and the other stockholders elected nine, without any interference from the city authorities.

Complaints arose from the fact that $452,300 of the stock subscribed by parties other than the city, had never been paid in, nor had certificates ever been issued for any part of that unpaid subscription. On the contrary, the same was not in existence as stock, having long before been extinguished and forfeited for non-payment, in consequence of which the railroad company had abandoned the construction of their road south of Avon, and assigned all their right of way, property and franchises beyond that point to another corporation, so that their railroad as constructed and operated terminates at Avon, and is only eighteen and three-fourths miles in length.

Control of the railroad, by a change of circumstances not contemplated when the plan was organized, being in the hands of stockholders owning a minority of the stock, the Legislature of the State, on the 9th of March, 1861, enacted that the common council of the city should "have the power to nominate and appoint one director of the company for every $42,855.71 3-7 of capital stock of the said railroad company held by the said city, at the time of each election of directors of said company." Session Acts, 1867, p. 92.

Thereafter the common council of the city, as the plaintiffs claim, became entitled at each annual election of directors to elect seven of the number allowed by law, and that the other stockholders were entitled to elect the remaining six only, as authorized by the apportionment prescribed by the amendatory act of the Legislature. Accordingly, the common council of the city, at the annual election held in June of the succeeding year, elected seven directors, but the other stockholders, denying the validity of the amendatory act, elected nine directors under the old law, and the persons so chosen immediately entered upon, used and exercised the said offices as directors of said corporation, and without any warrant or authority, as insisted by the plaintiffs.

Deprived of their rights as defined by the amendatory act the plaintiffs brought the present action, in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, in the Supreme Court of the State, alleging that the nine directors elected by the other stockholders have usurped the offices of directors of the railroad company. Service was made and the defendants appeared and filed an answer. Hearing was had and the Supreme Court rendered judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendants transferred the cause to the Court of Appeals, where the judgment was affirmed, thereupon the losing party sued out a writ of error and removed the record into this court.

They seek to reverse the judgment of the State courts upon the ground that the act of the State Legislature, authorizing the common council of the city to elect seven of the thirteen directors in the railroad company, is unconstitutional and void as repugnant to their act of incorporation, and in support of that theory they submit the following propositions: 1. That the signers of the before-mentioned articles of association, when the articles were filed in the office of the secretary of State, became a corporation by the name specified in those articles, with all the powers and privileges granted by the general law of the State upon that subject. 3 Edm. Stats. 618, §§ 1–4. 2. That the powers and privileges thus conferred were granted by the State, and that the grant, as an act of incorporation, became and was an executed contract. 3. That the powers and privileges of the charter are prescribed and defined in the general railroad law of the State. 4. That the persons named as corporators in a charter cannot be compelled to accept the act of incorporation, nor any modification or extension of the powers and privileges granted, whether conferred or modified or extended, by a special act or by virtue of a general law. 5. That a contract created by an act of incorporation, when once complete, is unalterable by either party without the consent of the other.

Undoubtedly the powers and privileges of the railroad company in this case are the same as they would have been if the company had been incorporated by a special act, and it may also be conceded that the charter, when the articles of association were filed in the office of the secretary of State, became an executed contract, subject to the restrictions ordained by the constitution of the State, and to the reservations contained in the general law of the State relating to corporations, and also to the general railroad act, which it is admitted prescribes and defines the powers and privileges of the railroad company.

Section one of article eight of the constitution of the State ordains as follows: Corporations may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act except in certain cases. All general laws and special acts passed pursuant to this section may be altered from time to time or repealed. Const. 1846, art. 8, § 1.

Provision is also made by the eighth section of the act defining the powers, privileges and liabilities of corporations, that the charter of every corporation that shall hereafter be granted by the Legislature shall be subject to alteration, suspension, and repeal in the discretion of the Legislature. 1 Rev. Stats. 600.

Articles of association for the incorporation of railroad companies cannot be filed and recorded in the office of the secretary of State until at least one thousand dollars of stock for every mile of railroad proposed to be made is subscribed thereto, nor without complying with the other conditions specified in the second section of the general railroad act, and the first section of the act provides that such corporation shall be subject to the provision (except those enacted in the seventh section) contained in title three of chapter eighteen of the first part of the Revised Statutes, which includes section eight, containing the reservation that the charter of every corporation that shall hereafter be granted shall be subject to alteration, suspension, and repeal in the discretion of the Legislature. Sess. Acts, 1850, 212, § 1.

Such a reservation, therefore, is not only ordained by the constitution of the State, but it has been twice enacted by the Legislature, and it is conceded that both of those statutes are in full force. Superadded to those reservations is the further one, contained in the forty-eighth section of the general railroad act, which provides that the Legislature may at any time annul or dissolve any corporation formed under this act, the effect of which, it is admitted by the defendants, is to incorporate into the grant a power of revocation which seems to supersede all necessity for any further remark upon the subject. Sess. Acts, 1850, p. 234.

Much consideration was given to the question under consideration in the case of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 675, in which the right of the State was denied to amend the charter granted to the college by the crown before the revolution, and to modify and restrict the same without the consent of the trustees under the charter. Four propositions were decided by the court in that case, the opinion being given by the chief justice: 1. That the charter was a contract within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution which ordains that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. 2. That the charter was not dissolved by the revolution. 3. That the acts of the State Legislature altering the charter in a material respect, without the consent of the corporation, was an act impairing the obligation of the charter, and was unconstitutional and void. 4. That the college, under its charter, was a private and not a public corporation.

Concurring opinions were also given by two of the associate justices, and Judge Story, in enforcing his views, remarked that where a private corporation is thus created by the charter of the crown, it is subject to no other control on the part of the crown than what is expressly or implicitly reserved by the charter itself. Unless a power be reserved for this purpose, the crown cannot, in virtue of its prerogative, alter or amend the charter or divest the corporation of any of its franchises, or add to them, or augment or diminish the number of trustees, or remove any of the members, or change or control the administration of the funds, or compel the corporators to receive a new charter.

Prior to that adjudication the Supreme Court of Massachusetts had decided that rights legally vested in a corporation cannot be controlled or destroyed by any subsequent statute, unless a power for that purpose be reserved to the Legislature in the act of incorporation, and the learned judge having referred to that case remarked that the principles there laid down are so consonant with justice, sound policy, and legal reasoning, that it is difficult to resist the impression of their perfect correctness, showing very plainly that such legislation would be valid if the power for that purpose is reserved in the act incorporating the company. S. C., 4 Wheat. 708; Wales v. Stetson, 2 Mass. 146.

Conclusive evidence that such was the opinion of that learned judge is also derived from his subsequent remarks in that same case, in which he says that any act of the Legislature which takes away any powers or franchises vested by its charter in a private corporation or its corporate officers, or which restrains or controls the legitimate exercise of them, or transfers them to other persons without its assent, is a violation of the obligations of the charter, adding: "If the Legislature mean to claim such an authority it must be reserved in the grant." S. C., 4 Wheat. 712; Cooley's Const. Lim. 279.

Where such a provision is incorporated in the charter, it is clear that it qualifies the grant, and that the subsequent exercise of that reserved power cannot be regarded as an act within the prohibition of the constitution. College Cases, 13 Wall. 313.

Members of banking associations, it was enacted by the general banking law of New York, should not be individually liable for the debts of the association, unless it was so provided in the articles of organization, but this court held, in the case of Sherman v. Smith, 1 Black, 587, that a subsequent statute imposing such a liability upon the shareholders of the association, was a valid law, as the charter reserved to the Legislature the power to alter or repeal the act of incorporation. Such a conclusion was earnestly resisted at the bar, as the conditional exemption from such liability was embodied in the articles of association, but the court overruled the defence upon the ground that the reservation in the charter of the right to alter or repeal the act was paramount and controlling.

Decisions of the State courts, in repeated instances, both before and since that time, have been made to the same effect. When that case was before the Court of Appeals, before the record was removed here for revision, the Court of Appeals decided that the provision reserving to the Legislature the power to alter or repeal the general banking law became a part of the contract with every association formed under it, and that the State might modify it prospectively or retrospectively without infringing the article of the Federal Constitution, which ordains that no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, and this court affirmed the judgment in that case. Oliver Lee's Bank, 21 N. Y. 16.

Laws could not be enacted under the constitution in force when the general banking law was passed, to create, alter, continue, or renew any body politic or corporate, without the assent of two-thirds of the members in each branch of the Legislature. Consequently it was contended that the members of such associations, subsequently created, could not be affected by the statute declaring that shareholders should be liable individually for the debts of the association, but the Court of Appeals re-affirmed the decision in the preceding case, and determined that the statute imposing that liability was a valid exercise of that power reserved in that act, and its effect was that the franchises and privileges granted were at all times subject to abrogation or change by the legislative power of the State; that the power reserved was one to be exercised at any time by the existing legislative authority, however constituted and in any mode conforming to the organic law of the State for the time being. The Reciprocity Bank, 22 N. Y. 14; White v. Railroad Co., 14 Barb. 362.

Exactly the same principle was adopted in the case of Railroad v. Dudley, 14 N. Y. 348, where it was held that an alteration of the charter of the company, made by the Legislature in pursuance of the power reserved to alter or repeal the act, by changing its name, increasing its capital, and extending its road, did not discharge a subscriber to the stock from liability for his subscription, whether such alteration was or was not beneficial to him, the alteration having been duly made and without fraud on the part of the company. See also, Plank Road v. Thatcher, 11 N. Y. 110.

Under such a reservation it is also held by the same court, that a member of the corporation holds his stock subject to such liability as may attach to him in consequence of an extension or renewal of the charter, made without his application or consent, and that the estate of an intestate succeeds to the individual liability imposed on the owner in his lifetime as a stockholder in a corporation whose charter would have expired if it had been renewed, but was extended after his death, and that his administrator was liable for debts of the corporation contracted after the death of the intestate. Bailey v. Hollister, 26 N. Y. 116; Clark v. City of Rochester, 28 Id. 631; People v. Hill, 35 Id. 449.

Even the defendants admit that the exact question presented for decision in this case was decided by the Supreme Court of the State in the case between these same parties, or some of them, and which was subsequently transferred to the Court of Appeals, and was there reversed upon an exception involving a question of local law. People v. Hill, 46 Barb. 344.

Nearly forty years earlier the same question substantially was decided in the same way by the chancellor of that State, in which he held that where a State Legislature reserves to itself, in the very charter it grants to a private corporation, the right of altering, amending or repealing the act of incorporation, a subsequent repeal of the charter is valid and constitutional; that such a reservation in the charter of a corporation, upon common law principles, is not repugnant to the grant, but a constitutional limitation of the powers granted. McLaren v. Pennington, 1 Paige's Ch. 102.

Few or none, it is presumed, will question the correctness of that rule, but the court here is of the opinion that the reservation is equally valid and effectual if it exists in the constitution of the State, or in a prior general law. College Cases, 13 Wall. 213; General Hospital v. Insurance Co., 4 Gray, 227; Roxbury v. Railroad, 6 Cush. 424; Suydam v. Moore, 8 Barb. 363; Angell & Ames on Corp. (9th ed.) § 767, p. 787.

So where the Legislature in granting a charter to an insurance company reserved the right to alter it, and they subsequently exercised that right by declaring that if the assets of such corporation should pass into the hands of a receiver he might make assessments upon the premium notes, it was held that this was a legitimate exercise of the reserved power, and that it fully authorized the receiver to make assessments whenever it became necessary to carry the intention of the Legislature into effect. Hyatt v. McMahon, 25 Barb. 467.

Power to legislate, founded upon such a reservation in a charter to a private corporation, is certainly not without limit, and it may well be admitted that it cannot be exercised to take away or destroy rights acquired by virtue of such a charter, and which by a legitimate use of the powers granted have become vested in the corporation, but it may be safely affirmed that the reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant, or to secure the due administration of its affairs so as to protect the rights of the stockholders and of creditors, and for the proper disposition of the assets. Com. v. Essex Co., 13 Gray, 239; Miller v. Railroad Co., 21 Barb. 517.

Such a reservation, it is held, will not warrant the Legislature in passing laws to change the control of an institution from one religious sect to another, or to divert the fund of the donors to any new use inconsistent with the intent and purpose of the charter, or to compel subscribers to the stock, whose subscription is conditional, to waive any of the conditions of their contract. State v. Adams, 44 Mo. 570; Zabriskie v. Railroad Co., 3 C. E. Green, 180; Railroad Co. v. Veazie, 30 Me. 581; Sage v. Dillard, 15 B. Monr. 357.

Attempt is made in this case to show that the right to elect all of the directors, except four, had become vested in the stockholders owning a minority of the shares, and that the amendatory act giving to the city the power to elect seven impairs that vested right, but the court is entirely of a different opinion, as the Legislature, in conceding that right, made the concession subject to the reserved power to alter or repeal the charter, as ordained in the constitution of the State, and also in the several statutes mentioned, which clearly give to the Legislature the power to augment or diminish the number or to change the apportionment, as the ends of justice or the best interest of all concerned may require.

All parties supposed, when the charter was formed, and when the subscriptions to the stock were paid, that the capital stock would be $800,000, and that the right conceded to the city to elect four out of the thirteen directors would give the city a fair proportion of the whole number, but circumstances have changed in consequence of the failure of a large class of the subscribers to the stock to make good their subscriptions. Payments being refused the corporation found it necessary to reduce the capital stock, and to shorten the route, as before explained.

These changes from the original design made new legislation necessary to the ends of justice, and the amendatory act was passed to effect that object, and the court is of the opinion that the amendatory act is a valid law, and that the judgments hould be affirmed. Mr. Justice Bradley dissenting.

THE ALBANY CITY INSURANCE CO., for use, v. WHITNEY et al.

1. In a foreign attachment in the Common Pleas by an insurance company, bail was entered and the attachment dissolved. The declaration was in assumpsit, and averred that goods had been shipped by the defendants and the vessel had been wrecked on one of the "Great Lakes;" that the plaintiff came to the wreck with the necessary appliances to remove the cargo, tackle, furniture, &c., and that whilst at the wreck prepared to remove the cargo, &c., the defendants offered to receive the cargo and pay its proper proportion of the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs; and that the "proportion of the charges and expenses occasioned thereby and by the salvage of the rigging, furniture, &c., and of the cargo * * * which should be apportioned on the cargo was," &c., and that defendants received the cargo and agreed to pay such proportion," &c. The defendants pleaded in abatement that the cause of action occurred on the "Great Lakes and within the maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and being a claim for salvage," the jurisdiction was exclusive in a court of admiralty, and the Common Pleas had no jurisdiction. Held, that the action being on a contract to pay, it was within the saving of the 9th sect. of Federal Judiciary act of February 20th, 1789, and the common law court had jurisdiction.

2. The peculiar and exclusive jurisdiction is when the proceedings are in rem: remedies in personam are concurrent, when there is ground to maintain a common law action.

BENNETT et al. v. CADWELL'S EXECUTOR.

1. In a suit in Wisconsin on a partnership note, one of the partners was not served, and judgment was recovered against the others. This did not discharge the partner not served in a suit against him in Pennsylvania.

2. Prima facie, the law of the forum is the same with the law of the place of the contract.

3. Partners dissolved; Cadwell, one of them, received all the assets and covenanted to pay all the debts and indemnify his fellows. In a suit on a note against the firm, one of whom, Bennett, was not served, a judgment was recovered against the others, Cadwell being one of them. A judgment was recovered in Pennsylvania in a suit against Bennett for the same note for want of an affidavit of defence. This judgment was prima facie evidence of Bennett's right to maintain an action against Cadwell on his covenant.

1. 2. Cundy not having objected to convey, Ridgway could not object on the ground that the sale was by parol.

3. By the contract, Ridgway's debt became hers, and by transfer of that debt she paid the purchase money.

McCANDLESS' APPEAL.

1. Rhodes constructed a private railroad to his own mines through an alley on the line of an incorporated railroad company with their consent; he was enjoined from using it and ordered to remove the rails, &c. He procured the incorporation of himself and six others as a railroad, coal and oil company with a capital of $100,000; they were authorized to buy any railroad partly or wholly completed, and damages were to be ascertained, &c., according to the general railroad law. The company was organized before any stock was taken, and Rhodes sold to them his railroad, mines, &c., for $100,000, payable in the stock of the company, which had no other assets than the property sold by Rhodes. The company relaid the road and operated it with locomotives, &c. Held, that Rhodes was the owner after the organization and his sale to them, as he had been before.

2. The road sold by Rhodes having been built without authority of law, and being a nuisance, the act of incorporation did not authorize the company to purchase such road.

3. The railroad after the purchase was still a private road, and not covered by the act of incorporation.

4. The railroad was built from Rhodes' mines to private iron works. Held, that it did not come within the description of a partly built road.

5. The provisions of the general railroad law as to damages did not apply to such road, and there was therefore no provision for ascertaining damages.

HOUGH et al. v. NORTHERN CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

When the rates per ton per mile are not uniform for all distances for which freights may be carried, "average charges for toll and transportation" signify charges made at a mean rate, obtained by dividing the entire receipts for toll and transportation, by the whole quantity of tonnage carried, deduced to a common standard of tons moved one mile.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lancaster county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered July 2d, 1873.

The most important question in this case arises under the second assignment of error. It alleges "the court erred in deciding that the average charges in this case were not more than four cents per mile per ton for toll and transportation for the plaintiffs' coal and merchandise."

Strictly speaking, this raises a question of fact only. Inasmuch, however, as the facts were found by the referees under an agreement of the parties, that they should "have the same effect as a special verdict," we will consider whether the court decided the law correctly upon the facts found by the referees. As much of the argument has been directed towards the consideration of the meaning of "average charges," a reference to the legislation bearing upon it becomes necessary. The "Danville and Pottsville Railroad Company" was incorporated by act of April 8th, 1826. Under this act the road was constructed from Sunbury eastwardly to Shamokin, a distance of about twenty miles. By the act of April 8th, 1834, the credit of the State was pledged for the payment of the interest upon the loan certificates of said company, to the amount of $300,000, which were duly issued. The company became insolvent. The several acts of 21st April, 1846, March 16th, 1847, and April 11th, 1848, were passed, making provision for the sale of the road and the franchises of the company upon terms therein. No sale having been made, the further supplement of April 2d, 1850, was passed. It recited that the "State had already paid the sum of $225,000, and that there was no reasonable prospect that the company would ever complete the said railroad, and relieve the State from the annual drain of $15,000 from her treasury."

Under these laws a sale was finally effected in 1850. By act of April 12th, 1851, the sale was confirmed, and the name of the corporation changed to the "Philadelphia and Sunbury Railroad Company." This company repaired the part of the road already built, and in 1855 constructed a branch road from Shamokin eastwardly to Mt. Carmel, a distance of about eight miles. In November, 1857, the road and franchises were sold at sheriff's sale upon a mortgage executed by said company, under an act of the Legislature. The sale was confirmed by act of 25th of March, 1858, and the purchasers duly incorporated under the name of the "Shamokin Valley and Pottsville Railroad Company." This last named company operated the road until 27th February, 1863, at which time they leased it to the defendants for a term of years.

The act of April 8th, 1826, fixed the charges for tolls and transportation at prices varying from one and a half to four cents per ton per mile. The third section of the aforesaid act of April 11th, 1848, P. L. 1848, p. 541, provided "that the rates for toll and transportation may be fixed and regulated in such manner as the company may deem most advisable. Provided, however, That the maximum charges for toll and transportation on the said road shall not exceed four cents per ton per mile for freight." The second section of the supplement, approved April 2d, 1850, P. L. 1850, p. 298, declares that the "proviso to the third section of said act be and the same is hereby amended so as to read 'average charges for toll and transportation' instead of the maximum charges."

It is thus shown that at the time of the passage of the several acts relating to the sale of the road, prior to the act of April 2d, 1850, the maximum charges which the company was authorized to make was four cents per mile per ton. No greater charge than four cents per ton for any mile could be imposed. Beyond that sum the company could not go. The law made that the barrier which could not be passed. Under that limitation and restriction no purchaser was procured. What then was the object of the act of 2d of April, 1850? Was it to give more or less favorable terms to the company and to the purchaser? The desire to facilitate a sale having been unmistakably expressed by the Legislature, the reasonable presumption is that it was to offer more inviting terms to a purchaser. It is contended on the part of the plaintiff, that this law only gave power to make average charges below the four cents per mile. We answer the company had that power before its passage, so we will not give to the statute such a construction as will wholly prevent its taking effect. The maximum charge was the only limitation imposed by the previous law. Below that sum the company could have made such average charges as it "deemed most advisable." The undoubted intention of the act, therefore, was to authorize the company by a wise and judicious discrimination to impose some charges higher than four cents per mile; but by putting others less, to so adjust the whole that the general average should not exceed that sum.

The referees have found that the average charges for toll and transportation upon this road during the time in question was only 3 734-1000 per mile per ton. Objection is made to this conclusion for two reasons: First, because the referees considered the whole tonnage carried and not the plaintiffs' alone; and secondly, because of the much higher rates charged for short distances than over the whole road. We do not think either of these objections is sound. There is nothing in the act requiring that this adjustment should be so made as to bear equally upon each individual.

The adjustment is to be made between the whole road and the entire public who use it. Full effect is therefore given to the spirit and intent of the statute, as well as to its letter, by fixing different charges per mile for different kinds of freight. Such is the custom of all railroads. Nor is there anything unjust in discriminating in favor of longer distances. The referees have found it usual for railroad companies to charge higher rates for transporting freight short than long distances, for the reason that the number of men employed, the time consumed, and the incidental expenses incurred are proportionately greater. Strong reasons exist in this case for the application of that rule. The freight of the plaintiff was passed over one and three-fourths miles only of the defendants' road, while the motive power of the company had to be moved up a heavy grade to reach that portion of the road. The plaintiffs cannot be permitted to entirely separate their freight from that of others in determining the gross average charges received by the defendants. We, therefore, agree with the finding, that when the rates per ton per mile are not uniform for all distances for which freights may be carried, "average charges for toll and transportation" are understood to mean and do mean charges made at a mean rate, obtained by dividing the entire receipts for toll and transportation, by the whole quantity of tonnage carried reduced to a common standard of tons moved one mile. It is true this must be applied to some given time, but the finding shows that whether each year be considered separately, or the whole time together during which the tonnage of the plaintiffs was passing over the road, the average charges of the defendants did not exceed four cents per ton per mile for the whole tonnage.

This view of the case shows the judgment was correctly entered in favor of the defendants. It is, therefore, unnecessary to discuss the other assignments of error, as none of them can change the result.

Judgment affirmed.

THE PENNSYLVANIA R. R. CO. v. BEALE.

1. The failure to stop immediately before crossing a railroad track, is negligence per se, and is a question for the court.
2. The court charged that the person injured by a railroad train at a crossing, should have stopped, "if you find from the evidence that the approach of the train might have been seen or heard from there," Held, to be error by reason of the qualification.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Juniata county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered July 2d, 1873.

The evidence of the plaintiffs below showed a clear case of contributory negligence in the deceased. The crossing at which he met with the injury which resulted in his death, was a dangerous one, and as he was well acquainted with it, there was the greater reason that he should exercise the utmost care and caution, by stopping at the railroad before undertaking to pass over. It is very clear that if he had done so but for a few minutes the accident would not have happened. "This evidence," said the learned judge in his charge "is uncontradicted, that there was a level piece of ground, about ten feet wide, between the hill or bluff and the first track or siding on the approach to the track from the valley upon which the deceased was travelling." It was his plain duty to have stopped at that place, and so the learned judge instructed the jury, but he qualified this instruction by adding, "if you find from the evidence that the approach of the train might have been seen or heard from there." This in fact left the question of negligence to the jury, upon a point not material. Indeed, the duty of stopping is more manifest when an approaching train cannot be seen or heard than where it can. If the view of a track is unobstructed, and no train is near or heard approaching, it might, perhaps, be asked, why stop? In such a case there is no danger of collision—none takes place—and the sooner the traveller is across the track the better. But the fact of collision shows the necessity there was of stopping; and therefore in every case of collision the rule must be an unbending one. If the traveller cannot see the track by looking out, whether from fog or other cause, he should get out, and if necessary lead his horse and wagon. A prudent and careful man would always do this at such a place. In the Hanover Railroad Co. v. Coyle, 5 P. F. Smith, 396, the plaintiff, a pedler, in the depth of winter, was driving inside of his covered wagon, with his head muffled up in a thick overcoat, and it appeared that a traveller passing in the direction he was going could not see up and down the track until within sixteen feet of it. Yet these circumstances were not allowed to form any excuse for his negligence in omitting to stop. There never was a more important principle settled than that the fact of the failure to stop immediately before crossing a railroad track, is not merely evidence of negligence for the jury, but negligence per se, and a question for the court. North Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. Heilman, 13 Wright, 60. It was important not so much to railroad companies as to the travelling public. Collisions of this character have often resulted in the loss of hundreds of valuable lives, of passengers on trains, and they will do so again, if travellers crossing railroads are not taught their simple duty, not to themselves only but to others. The error of submitting the question to the jury whether if the deceased had stopped, he could have seen or heard the approaching train, runs through the entire charge and answers of the learned judge below. He should upon the uncontradicted evidence have directed a verdict for the defendants.

Judgment reversed.

TWENTY-FIRST JUDICIAL DIST.
Court of Common Pleas.

In re WEBER.

The act of 21st April, 1848, relating to public officers and their sureties, does not give the courts power to discharge solvent sureties upon their own application.

Opinion by PERSHING, J. Delivered July 21st, 1873.

Ernst F. Jungkurth and Adam Kull have presented their petition setting forth that John J. Weber was duly elected the recorder of deeds for the county of Schuylkill, and entered on the discharge of his duties on the first Monday of December, 1872; that he gave two several bonds to the commonwealth in the sums respectively of £1,000, and $1,666.66, conditioned according to law, and in both of which the petitioners are his sureties; that since the execution and approval of these bonds, the said John J. Weber has become liable for neglect of duty in not conducting the duties of said office legally and properly, in neglecting to make the proper entry and record of instruments presented for record, and in giving false certificates of search to parties, thereby rendering the petitioners liable for the penalty of said bonds, by which they will suffer loss by reason of the misconduct of said officer.

Petitioners pray for a citation to issue to said John J. Weber, to answer said petition, and to show cause why he shall not give other and further security, and the petitioners be discharged. The petition is verified by affidavit. In his answer, John J. Weber specifically denies the allegations of the petitioners as to the neglect of duty in conducting said office. He further denies that his said sureties have incurred any liability to loss by reason of his misconduct or neglect as an officer. He alleges that he is, and has been, ready and willing to give other and further security to the petitioners, whenever it shall appear that any damage has been, or shall be suffered, or any liability for the penalty of said bonds has been incurred, or any loss sustained by the relator. Respondent admits that a certificate of search made for D. C. Henning, Esq., by one of the employees in the office, omitted a mortgage for the sum of $800, against one Lewis Harris, but alleges that the omission was caused by a defective index, made by one of his predecessors; that the error was corrected, and that no loss has occurred or can occur, or any liability accrue to his said sureties in consequence of this omission, and that he has properly entered and recorded all instruments left in the office for that purpose. The right of the sureties to institute this proceeding, and on proof of the facts alleged, have themselves discharged, depends upon the construction of the first section of the act of 21st of April, 1846, entitled "An act relating to certain public officers and their sureties." Purdon's Digest, 1101, pl. 23. In this section it is provided that "The Court of Common Pleas of the county in which any prothonotary, sheriff, brigade inspector, county treasurer, or other public officer may reside, from whom, by law, security is required for the performance of his official duties, shall have the power to examine into the manner of the performance of said official duties, and the ability and solvency of the sureties of any such officer, at any time during his tenure of office, and to require from him such other or such additional security for the performance of his official duties, as they shall deem expedient, and such jurisdiction shall be exercised in the following manner, to wit: Whenever any person or persons shall apply to said court by petition, verified by affidavit, and setting forth that the solvency of such public officer, or of any one or more of his official sureties, has become impaired or diminished since the execution and approval of their official bond, or that such officer has become liable for neglect of duty, or has become a drunkard, and that the (by) reason thereof, the said officer and his sureties are not worth the amount of penalty of his said bond, or that said sureties are likely to suffer loss on account of misconduct of such officer, it shall be lawful for said court, or any judge thereof, in vacation, to award a citation to such officer and his sureties directed, commanding them to appear at the next term of said court to answer the matters alleged in said petition, and show cause why the said officer shall not give other and further security, and on the return thereof, or such time as shall be fixed for the purpose, the said court shall hear the said parties and examine the facts of the case. And if said court shall be satisfied that the sureties of such officers are insufficient, or have become liable for neglect of duty of such officer, or likely to become so from his intemperance, said court shall order and direct that he shall, within such time as shall be fixed by said court, enter into a new official bond, with sureties to be approved by the court or two of the judges thereof, in lieu of the former bond; and further providing, that upon the approval of the new bond, the sureties in the original bond shall "be discharged from all responsibility." Of the several grounds mentioned in this section on which the action of the court may be invoked, the only one specified in the petition is that of neglect of duty on the part of the recorder of deeds, involving his sureties in consequent loss. It would require a very liberal construction of this section to make it sustain this application. In this case the sureties have a citation issued to their principal alone, the citations authorized by this section is to be directed to the officer and his sureties, commanding them to appear, &c. This plainly implies that the petitioning party or parties, must be other than the sureties. The act was intended for the protection of the public, as when the officer by official misconduct had involved himself and his sureties to the amount of his bond, or the sureties, or either of them, had become involved, so that from the time this state of things was reached, the bond already filed was no longer a protection to those whose interests might be affected.

This view is strengthened from the reading of the latter part of this section, where the circumstances under which the court is authorized to take action are distinctly stated. If the court shall be satisfied "that the sureties of such officer are insufficient, or have become liable for neglect of duty of such officer, or likely to become so from his intemperance," then the court shall order and direct that a new bond be filed, &c. The language here is adapted to a proceeding, where parties are pursuing a remedy against an officer and his sureties, but will not harmonize with an application made by the sureties to be discharged from the legal obligations they voluntarily took upon themselves.

When the Legislature intends to make provision for a surety, that intention is expressed in no doubtful phraseology. Thus, where any executor, administrator, or guardian is mismanaging the estate committed to his care, or is likely to prove insolvent, or has neglected his duty in other respects, the 28th section of the act of 29th March, 1832, Purdon's Digest, 454, pl. 240, provides that any surety, in such cases, may apply to the Orphans' Court, and thereupon the court may order such executor, guardian, or administrator to give counter securities to indemnify the surety making complaint against loss by reason of his suretyship.

The fifth section of the same act, of which the first section is made the foundation for the application in this case, seems conclusively to establish that the first section was not intended to provide a way by which sureties could issue a citation to their principal, and as a result relieve themselves from liability. The fifth section provides: "Whenever upon petition and due proof, if it shall be made to appear to the Court of Common Pleas of the proper county, that any justice of the peace or alderman of any city or county, is likely to become insolvent, or that any surety of any justice or alderman has removed from the State, or has become insolvent, or is likely to become insolvent and when upon the petition of any surety of any justice or alderman, and proof as aforesaid, it shall appear such justice or alderman has become, or is likely to become insolvent, such court (or judge thereof in vacation, by section nine of the act of May 8th, 1850) may require any such justice or alderman to give security, or additional security, or counter security, to indemnify the surety so petitioning against loss, by reason of his suretyship, as the case may be," &c. Now if the Legislature intended the first section to afford such a remedy for the sureties of a recorder of deeds, as they have provided in the fifth section for the sureties of a justice, it must be confessed they have very obscurely indicated in the first case, what is stated with great clearness in the second. Why not provide for the sureties petitioning the court in one case, as well as in the other, when both classes are embraced in the same statute, if it was intended to furnish by the first section such a remedy as that claimed in this proceeding?

As to the facts: It does not appear that the recorder has failed to account to the State for any moneys received by him belonging to the treasury of the commonwealth.

The State treasurer may, whenever the occasion demands it, require a new bond for the protection of the State. Act May 18th, 1857, section 81, Purdon's Digest, 1102, pl. 25. We think the evidence discloses some want of care in the conduct of the office, which may be attributable, as argued by counsel, to the fact that Mr. Weber was a new officer, and compelled at the start to depend upon others. The omission to certify one mortgage is admitted, and some evidence was offered to show that in another certificate a mortgage for a much larger amount, $50,000, was left out. The certificate itself was not produced, and no sufficient ground was laid to authorize secondary evidence of its contents. Advantage of any omission to certify can only be taken by the party to whom the erroneous certificate is issued. 6 Philadelphia Reports, 90. It appears that both of these omissions were discovered in time to prevent the parties who received the certificates from being mis'ed. We are not satisfied that the sureties of John J. Weber are insufficient, or that they have become liable for neglect of duty on his part, or are likely to become so from his intemperance, and until one or all of these things can be established, we cannot take action, even if it is conceded that the law will cover the case of an application made by sureties of an officer, and the issuing of a citation to him alone.

As having some bearing upon the question of construction, we may refer to Smith's Forms of Procedure, page 542, et seq. The citation is dismissed.

BRYANT v. OSGOOD.

1. An officer, having a writ of attachment against A., went to the barn where some hay was stored, and there posted a paper written thus: "I have attached all the hay in this barn, in which (A.) has any interest." A. knew at the time, and the plaintiff soon after, and prior to his subsequent purchase of the hay of A., of the posting of this notice and its contents. The officer made return upon the writ, to the effect that he had "attached all the * * * hay * * * in the town of W., in which the said A. has any right, title, interest or estate; and on the same day left at the office of the town clerk of said town, a true and attested copy of this writ and of this my return endorsed thereon." Held, that these proceedings did not constitute a valid lien upon the property, as against the plaintiff.
2. The statute which provides that an attachment of bulky and ponderous articles shall not be defeated or dissolved by any neglect of the officer to retain actual possession thereof, provided he leave an attested copy of the writ, and of his return of such attachment thereon, as in the attachment of real estate—Gen. Stats., ch. 205, sec. 16—requires that the return should be so certain and explicit in its description of the property and its situation, as to give subsequent attaching creditors or purchasers substantially the same notice they would derive from knowledge of the actual retention of possession of the property by the officer.

Opinion by FOSTER, J.

At common law, the doings of an officer in respect to personal property cannot amount to a valid attachment, unless the articles are taken into his actual custody, or are placed under his exclusive control. Odiorne v. Colley, 2 N. H. 68. The articles must be within the power of the officer. He must continue to retain this power over them by remaining present himself; by appointing an agent in his absence; by taking a receiptor for the property; by inventorying and marking them; or by a seasonable removal of them. Huntinton v. Blaisdell, 2 N. H. 317; Runlett v. Bell, 5 N. H. 433; Chadbourne v. Sumner, 16 N. H. 129; Young v. Walker, 12 N. H. 506; Weston v. Dorr, 25 Me. 176. The officer must take possession of the goods. It is not necessary that they should be removed, but they must in all cases be put out of the control of the debtor. Dunklee v. Fales, 5 N. H. 527; Drake on Attach., sec. 256.

There was no valid attachment of this hay by proceedings at common law, for the property was not taken into the actual custody of the officer, nor was any agent or receiptor appointed to hold the property in the absence of the officer, nor was it put out of the control of the debtor.

But the statute has provided for dispensing with all these requirements in the case of bulky and ponderous articles, such as unthreshed grain, hay, potatoes, lumber, wood, machinery, &c., by authorizing the officer attaching such property to "leave an attested copy of the writ, and of his return of such attachment thereon, as in the attachment of real estate; and in such case the attachment shall not be dissolved or defeated by any neglect of the officer to retain actual possession of the property." Gen. Stats.; ch. 205, sec. 16.

If the sheriff in this case fulfilled the requisition of the statute, his attachment was and remained valid—that is, the lien acquired by the caption of the property was retained by the officer, and the plaintiff, as a subsequent purchaser of the hay, could acquire no title; but if the terms of the statute were not fulfilled, the lien of the officer was lost, and the attachment dissolved.

By the statute, a public record of the return of the property attached is made a substitute for the retention of possession by the officer or his agent, and its purposes would not be subserved nor its spirit maintained by any such effort at compliance with the terms of the statute, or by any such construction of its provisions as should fail to furnish a subsequent attaching creditor, or a purchaser of the property from the debtor, substantially and practically the same information as would be derived from knowledge of the officer's retention of possession at common law.

The defendant's return, a copy of which was left with the town clerk here, gave information that he had attached all the hay in the town of Warren, in which Smith had any interest; but with regard to quantity, or any particular location, and whether the hay was in one or more different lots or localities, there was no specification in the return; and if, ten days after the filing of this return, a purchaser, or a subsequent attaching creditor, should find a quantity of hay, either upon or not upon the premises occupied by Smith, he could have no knowledge or information, derived from inspection of the town clerk's records, as to whether such lot of hay had been attached or not; and a dispute would instantly arise between the purchaser, or subsequent attaching creditor, and the officer, as to the identity of the property; and infinite confusion would result, contrary to the demands of public policy.

We are clearly of the opinion, that the return in this case was insufficient for the preservation of the officer's lien upon the hay; and that, by reason of this insufficiency, the attachment was dissolved prior to the purchase of the property by the plaintiff on the 2d day of October. "The return," says Mr. Drake, "should state specifically what the officer has done." Drake on Attach., sec. 205. And again: "By the general principles of law, independent of any statutory regulation, the officer is bound to give, as nearly as it can reasonably be done, in his return, or in a schedule or inventory annexed thereto, a specific description of the articles attached, their quantity, size and number; and any other circumstances proper to ascertain their identity. * * * It does not seem, however, that any more precision should be exhibited in the return than is necessary for the identification of the property. Hence, where a sheriff returned an attachment of four horses (describing their color), it was held sufficient. So, where an officer returned all the 'stock of every kind,' in a woollen factory, particularly described, specifying the stock as a lot of 'dye-wood and dye-stuffs,' 'lot of clean wool,' 'sixteen pieces of black Oxford mixed cassimere,' twenty-five pieces doeskins and tweeds,' 'fifty-one pieces of unfinished cloth,' "lot of cotton wool,' 'cotton wool, oils,' &c., 'in said woollen factory,' the return was held sufficient"—citing Ela v. Shepard, 32 N. H. 277.

But concerning this return, it was remarked by the court, Fowler, J., that, although sufficient, "it was, perhaps, more general than desirable."

In Baxter v. Rice, 21 Pick. 199, Shaw, C. J., says: "It is highly important, upon grounds of public policy, that a good degree of exactness and particularity should be observed in returns on mesne process, to show their identity, and thereby more definitely to fix the rights and responsibilities of all parties in relation to them." And see Pierce v. Strickland, 2 Story, 292; Toulmin v. Lesesne, 2 Ala. (N. S.) 359.

In Haynes v. Small, 22 Me. 14, it was held, that "if an officer returns on a writ that he has 'attached one hundred and seventy-five yards of broadcloth, the property of the within named defendant,' it is not competent for him, in an action for not producing the property to be taken on the execution, to show that but thirty yards were in fact attached by him, he not having measured but only estimated the quantity of cloth, Whitman, C. J., remarking: "Officers ought to know what they attach, and to be holden to exactness and precision in making their returns. Neither the debtor nor the creditor would be safe if it were otherwise. And it will be well that the law should be so promulgated and understood. An officer, in such cases, is intrusted with great power. He may seize another man's property without the presence of witnesses, whether it be goods in a store or elsewhere; and safety only lies in holding him to a strict, minute and particular account. To hold that he may indifferently make return of his doings at random, and afterwards be permitted to show that what he actually did was entirely different, would be opening a door to infinite laxity and fraud, and mischiefs incalculable. Suppose the deputy had returned that he had attached one hundred and seventy-five sheep; he might as well be permitted to show, that by mistake, there were but thirty of them. It was the duty of the officer to have measured the cloth attached, or in some other way to have ascertained precisely what he had attached. Such a mistake as is here pretended could have arisen only from the grossest negligence, to which it would be a disgrace to the law to afford its countenance."

But it may be said that since the statute provides that the officer attaching hay, &c., "may leave an attested copy of the writ, and of his return of such attachment thereon, as in the attachment of real estate," the return in this case must be regarded as sufficient, because it is commonly understood, that a return of an attachment of all the defendant's real estate in town, without any other description, is sufficiently explicit.

It is to be observed, however, that the provision is not that the attachment may be made, as in case of real estate by leaving a copy. Indeed, no attempt is made to change the mode of making the attachment, but a new and easier method of preserving it is provided. Before the statute there was not so much difficulty in making as in preserving attachments of the various articles enumerated in section 16 of chapter 205 of the General Statutes. See Scott v. Print Works, 44 N. H. 508

Probably an attachment of real estate, by leaving a copy of a return expressed in such general terms, would be held sufficient, if the point were distinctly raised, on the ground that since the law provides for the registration of land titles, a reference to the county records would disclose the precise property referred to in the officer's return, and id certum est, &c.

But that argument will not avail this defendant, there being no analogy between the case of real and personal estate in that particular, and no registration being required of a man's acquisitions of personal property, to which an inquirer may have access, in order to ascertain what is included by a general designation of property in an officer's return; and the expression used in the 16th section simply means that, as real estate may be attached by leaving a copy, &c., "at the dwelling house of the town clerk," so an attachment of personal property may be preserved, by leaving a copy of a sufficient and proper return at the dwelling house of the town clerk, "as in the attachment of real estate."

A reasonable degree of certainty is required, even in attachments of real estate. Thus in Whitaker v. Sumner, 9 Pick. 308, a return of "all the right, &c., to a piece of land, with the buildings thereon, situate in Columbia street," was held sufficient, because it was said "Huntington had only one house in the street, so that the property attached could be readily ascertained, and id certum est."

So in the present case, if the return had been of all the hay in the barn occupied by the defendant, although inexcusably loose and irregular, so much so that the officer could not have resorted to parol evidence to explain, for his own protection, the quantity of hay included in the attachment, yet, as against third persons, the return, perhaps, might have been regarded as sufficiently explicit, as in Reed v. Howard, 2 Met. 36, where the officer attached "all the wood and coal of the defendant lying on a lot of land belonging to B. H., situate in B.;" and Dewey, J., said, we "do not perceive any objection to the validity of the attachment, arising from the generality of the description of the property in the officer's return, taking into consideration the nature of the property attached and the entire recital found in the return."

It is said in Taylor v. Mixter, 11 Pick. 347, "any description which would be sufficient to pass the land by a deed, will answer for an attachment." To the same effect is Howard v. Daniels, 2 N. H. 137, in which Woodbury, J., says the object of an attachment is "merely to caution the public and the debtor that the land attached is intended to be considered by the creditor as eventual security for his debt. A description of it, therefore, as 'the farm the defendant now lives on, with his tannery, &c., thereon,' could not fail to apprise the defendant, and all others in interest, what premises were intended. Our statute concerning attachments does not, like that concerning extents, require the 'metes and bounds' of the land to be set out; and in deeds, where the title itself passes, the same certainty contained in this return suffices; for there the rule always is, id certum est, quod certum reddi potest.

In Hathaway v. Larrabee, 27 Me. 449, the officer, upon a writ against three defendants, returned that he had attached all the right, &c., "the defendant has in and to any real estate in the county of Penobscot." It was held that the language was too vague and uncertain to create a lien by attachment on the estate of either one of the defendants." Shepley, J., remarked: "No person should be deprived of his right to sell or to purchase an estate as free from incumbrance, when he cannot ascertain, by an inspection of the officer's return, that it has been attached."

But the defendant contends that the posting of a notice in the barn was sufficient proclamation to all the world, and to Bryant in particular, who knew of the posting of the notice and its contents, that this particular hay had been attached.

There is no doubt about that. The attachment was well enough. The question is, was it preserved, or dissolved? It was not preserved by any retention of possession by the sheriff or an agent of the sheriff, by the exclusion of the debtor from the custody and control of it, by removal of the property, or by taking a receipt for it. And we have seen that it was not preserved by such a return as the law required for a substitute for the common law requisitions.

The simple question then is, whether the plaintiff, a subsequent bona fide purchaser, is to be excluded from acquiring title to the property, by reason of notice of an abortive attempt of an attaching creditor, through the agency of an incompetent or careless officer, to make and preserve a valid attachment.

Preliminary to the answering of this question, it may be remarked, that as between an attaching creditor and a bona fide purchaser, there can be no superiority or preference upon any equitable considerations.

Bryant had notice of the attachment, and was bound by it; but the attaching creditor was equally bound to fulfil the requirements of the statute if he would preserve the lien which, as against Bryant, he had obtained.

The most that can be said, then, is that Bryant had notice of an attachment, which the attaching creditor virtually abandoned.

Bearing in mind that the statute was not intended to change the mode of making the attachment, but only to provide a new and easier method of preserving it when made. Scott v. The Print Works, before recited. That the leaving of a copy of the return with the town clerk is merely a substitution for the retention of actual possession or other legal equivalent by the officer, the pertinency and conclusiveness of the cases of Young v. Walker, 12 N. H. 502, and Chadbourne v. Sumner, 16 N. H. 129, as authorities upon this branch of the subject, will be apparent. These are to the effect that "where a sheriff merely knows that property has been attached by another officer, if no possession be retained, he may make a valid attachment." Why? Not because no regular and valid attachment has been made by the first officer, but because the lien created thereby has not been preserved by the retention of possession requisite for that purpose; and full knowledge of all particulars, by a subsequent attaching creditor, will not reinstate the prior creditor in the rights which he has lost through the negligence or ignorance of the officer employed by him to acquire and retain those rights.

In Chadbourne v. Sumner, the defendant, a subsequent attaching creditor, had a very similar notice of an attachment of hay to that which the plaintiff in the present case had—a written notice posted on the barn, and a notice in red chalk thereon; but since the defendant, the first attaching officer, did not employ any agent to take charge of the hay (this was before the present statute), it was held that the first attachment was dissolved, and that the defendant might lawfully attach the property notwithstanding his notice.

So in Bagley v. White, 4 Pick. 398, where goods attached were put into the debtor's store, but the sheriff did not keep the key, and had no control over the store, nor any possession by any one, as his servant, for thirty or forty days after the goods were put there, the attachment was held to be lost as against another officer who knew these facts.

In Young v. Walker, it was said by the court, Gilchrist, J.: "Where the officer finds property in the possession of the debtor, the mere knowledge on his part that the property had been attached, will not prevent him from making a valid attachment of it. But if he knew that there is a subsisting attachment and an unrescinded contract of bailment, although the debtor might at the time have the possession of the property, he cannot acquire a lien by attaching it. And these principles are not unreasonable. If the officer find property in the possession of the debtor, and know only that it has once been attached, he might well presume that it was there because the suit had been compromised and the attachment dissolved. But if he knew that the attachment and the bailment still subsist, and that the property is in the hands of the debtor merely for his temporary convenience, he will not be misled, and can make no such presumption." And see Carpenter v. Cummings, 40 N. H. 158.

It will be said that there is a distinction between these cases and the present in this, that in the cases cited, the subsequent attaching officer may have had good reason to suppose that the suit had been compromised, and the property purposely released; whereas, in the present case, the plaintiff must have known that there had been no intentional abandonment of the security—and this is undoubtedly true; but the admission only brings us back to the proposition that a subsequent attaching creditor, or purchaser in good faith and for value, is not to be prejudiced by mere knowledge of a failure by his adversary to comply with the statute requisitions, positively essential to the preservation of his security.

The statute which provides that upon the filing of a copy of a sufficient return with the town clerk, "the attachment shall not be dissolved," by necessary implication provides that if such return be not filed, it shall be dissolved.

If it be said that this result is a hardship upon the attaching creditor, the answer is furnished by Gilchrist, J., in Young v. Walker: "The care of his rights was entrusted to (the defendant) his agent; and if that agent have so conducted as to sacrifice any of those rights, the creditor has his remedy against him. It does not follow, because this suit (can) be maintained, that the benefit of the attachment must be lost."

There must be judgment for the plaintiff, according to the finding of the court below.

EASTERN DISTRICT.

U. S. Circuit Court, Missouri.

UNITED STATES v. HORTON'S SURETIES.

1. A United States commissioner can take bail only in such cases as State magistrates may.
2. By a statute of Missouri, a magistrate might take bail upon an adjournment not exceeding ten days. A United States commissioner of that State adjourned a case for nineteen days, and took a bond with sureties for the appearance of the accused at that time: Held, the bond was void.

Opinion by DILLON, C. J.

One Horton was arrested for a violation of the internal revenue laws, and taken before Chamberlain, a commissioner of the United States for this district, for examination, on the 30th day of May, 1872. The accused asked for a postponement, and the commissioner adjourned the proceedings until the 19th of June following, and required the defendant to enter into a recognizance with sureties for his appearance before the commissioner at the adjourned time, and it was under this order that the recognizance in suit was executed. Horton failed to appear, and his default was duly entered. This suit is on the recognizance. The sureties defend. The District Court held the recognizance to be valid, and judgment was rendered against the sureties, who bring the same and the bill of exceptions, by writ of error, to this court.

The constitution of this State provides that all persons shall be bailable, except for capital offences.

The statute of the State provides that "a magistrate may adjourn an examination of a prisoner pending before himself, from time to time, as occasion requires, not exceeding ten days at one time, . . . and for the purpose of enabling the prisoner to procure the attendance of witnesses, or for other good and sufficient cause shown by the prisoner, said magistrate shall allow such an adjournment on the motion of the prisoner." 2 Wagner, 1,075, sec. 88.

The act of Congress of 24th of September, 1789, section 33, provides, that "for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may by . . . . . any justice of the peace of any of the United States, where he may be found, agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such State . . . . . be arrested, and imprisoned or bailed, as the case may be, for trial before such court of the United States as by this act has cognizance of the offence." By the act of 1842, 23d of August, section 1, it is provided that United States commissioners "shall and may exercise all the powers that any justice of the peace . . . . of any of the United States may now exercise in respect to offenders, by arresting, imprisoning, or bailing the same under the act of 1789."

The record shows that the principal cognizor was charged with an offence against the laws of the United States, and was arrested and taken before a commissioner for this district, who upon his application continued the time for the examination and hearing of the charge for the period of nineteen days, and thereupon ordered him to find bail in the sum of $500, to appear before the commissioner at his office on the day to which the adjournment was thus made.

The recognizance in suit was given in pursuance of this order. The principal failed to appear at the time and place to which the hearing was adjourned, and his default was entered by the commissioner.

The substantial question presented for determination is, whether the recognizance taken under these circumstances is binding upon the cognizors. It is settled that bonds of this character are valid only when taken in pursuance of law and the order of a competent court or officer. United States v. Goldstein's Securities, Dillon's C. C. R. 413; United States v. Rundlett, 2 Curtis C. C. R. 41–45. Whatever authority the commissioner has in respect to the arresting, imprisoning, or bailing of criminal offenders, is conferred by statute, and must be exercised by him pursuant to its requirements. Congress has not seen fit to prescribe a uniform mode of its own in respect to preliminary proceedings against persons accused of a violation of its criminal enactments, but in the 33d section of the judiciary act, it provided that the procedure in such cases should be "agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such State;" that is, in the State in which the offender may be arrested and the proceedings had. To this section we must resort to ascertain the powers of commissioners in respect to the arrest, imprisonment and bail of offenders against the laws of the United States. The meaning of this section was very carefully considered by Mr. Justice Curtis in the United States v. Rundlett, supra. This learned judge there says: "My opinion is that it was the intention of Congress by these words, 'agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders in such State,' to assimilate all proceedings for holding accused persons to answer before a court of the United States to proceedings had for similar purposes by the laws of the State where the proceedings should take place; and, as a necessary consequence, that the commissioners have power to order a recognizance to be given to appear before them in those States where justices of the peace, or other examining magistrates, acting under the laws of the State, have such power. The prisoner is not only to be arrested and imprisoned, but bailed, agreeably to the usual mode of process in the State.

As the legislation now stands, a commissioner, as respects taking bail, has the same power as State magistrates and no greater. On this principle it has been recently held by Judge Woodruff that in New York, where State magistrates have no power to take recognizances to appear before them at a subsequent day, United States commissioners have no such authority, and a bond conditioned for the appearance of the accused before the commissioner on a future day to which the proceeding was adjourned, was void. United States v. Case, 8 Blatchf. 250, 1871, affirming the judgment of the District Court. On the other hand, in those States where magistrates have by statute the power of adjournment, there a United States commissioner may let to bail pending the proceedings against the accused. United States v. Rundlett, supra.

By the statute of Missouri, "a magistrate may adjourn an examination of a prisoner pending before him, from time to time, as occasion requires, not exceeding ten days at one time." Wagner's Statutes, p. 1,075, sec. 88.

In this case the commissioner adjourned the examination for nineteen days, and ordered the accused to find bail to appear before him at that time. This was an order not only without authority of law, but directly contrary to law. He could not lawfully require the accused to find bail in pursuance of it; and a bond executed to avoid being imprisoned for the nineteen days, when the statute limits the period to ten days, is without any binding obligation. It is immaterial that in this instance the accused asked for the continuance. His consent could not confer jurisdiction or power to make the order; nor does it estop him or his sureties to set up the invalidity of the recognizance executed to comply with it.

Reversed.

ESHLEMAN'S APPEAL.

1. An advancement is an irrevocable gift by a parent to a child, of the whole or a part of what it is supposed the child would be entitled to upon the death of the parent, intestate.
2. Where an intestate's descendants are in different degrees of consanguinity, the more remote take by representation, and advancements either to them or their ancestors, are to be deducted in computing their shares of the intestate's estate.
3. An intestate died leaving as descendants a child and a grandchild, the son of a deceased child. The intestate had made advancements to the deceased child and to the grandchild. In the distribution of the estate: Held, the grandchild took by representation, and the advancements made to him and his parent were to be deducted from his share.

Appeal from the Orphans' Court of Lancaster county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered July 2d, 1873.

John Gyger died intestate, leaving a daughter, Elizabeth G. Eshleman, and a grandson, Abijah D. Gyger, the only child of his son, Jesse Gyger, who died during the life of his father. John was appointed guardian of Abijah. From time to time after Abijah became of full age, John furnished him with money and other property.

Upon the distribution of the estate of John between Elizabeth and Abijah, the question arises, whether the latter sustains such a relation to John as to be charged with the property given to him as an advancement. The precise question does not appear to have been hitherto considered by this court. If both the claimants were grandchildren of the intestate, so that they would take per capita, the doctrine of advancements made to them might not apply. Here, however, Abijah takes by representation. Purdon's Digest, 807, pl. 14 (C).

Section sixteenth of the act of April 8th, 1833, Pur. Dig. 810, pl. 35, provides, that if any child of an intestate shall have any estate by settlement of such intestate, or shall have been advanced by him in his lifetime, either in real or personal estate, to an amount or value equal to the share which shall be allotted to each of the other children of such intestate, such child shall have no share of the real or personal estate of such intestate; and if such settlement or advancement be to an amount or value less than the share to which he would otherwise be entitled, if no such advancement had been made, then so much only of the real and personal estate of such intestate shall be allotted to such child as shall make the estate of all the said children to be equal, as near as can be estimated.

The manifest design of the law is to equalize the intestate's property among all his children. It is equally clear that it was not the design of the law makers to put a grandchild upon higher ground than a child would occupy if living. It is true, the letter of the statute says, "if any child" shall have been advanced. In many cases, however, both in England and in America, it has been held that the word child may apply to, and include grandchild. The English statute of 22 and 23 Car. II., ch. 10, from which our act of April 8th, 1833, supra, as well as all of our former acts, relating to distribution, are derived, provides, that "if a child" shall be advanced; yet it is there held to extend to a grandchild, the father being dead. 1 Eq. Ab. 381, B., pl. 6; 382, B., pl. 8, 9, 10, 11. Grandchildren and great grandchildren are all children, and come within that to certain purposes. Wyth v. Blackman, 1 Vez., Sr. 196. It is allowed by all, that if no children are in being, grandchildren would come in under the word children, and may be thereby described. 2 Vern. 106; S. C. Ambler, 555. So grandchildren may take under the description of "children" in a will. Royle v. Hamilton, 4 Vez., Jr. 437. In a trust for children, it was held that grandchildren were entitled to participate. In re Crawel's Trust, 8 De G. McN. & Gord. 480.

In 4 Kent's Com. 419, in discussing the question of advancement to a child, it is said: In New Jersey the statute uses the word issue, which is a word of more extensive import than the word child; though children, as well as issue, may stand in a collective sense for grandchildren, when the justice or reason of the case requires it. It would have been better, however, if the statutes on this subject had been explicit, and not have imposed upon courts the necessity of extending by construction and equity the meaning of the word child, so as to exclude a grandchild who should come unreasonably to claim his distributive share, when he had been sufficiently settled by advancement.

In construing a statute, the real intention when accurately ascertained, will always prevail over the literal sense of terms. I Kent's Comm. 462. When the expression in a statute is special or particular, but the reason is general, the expression should be deemed general. Idem; People v. Utica Ins. Co., 15 Johns. 380; Whitney v. Whitney, 14 Mass. 92.

Under the act of 1764, relating to the partition and valuation of the real estate of an intestate, providing that the eldest son or heir at law should have his election of taking the land at the valuation, yet it was held, where the eldest son had died before the intestate, that the eldest son of the deceased eldest son, had the same priority of election of taking the real estate of his intestate grandfather, that his father, if living, would have had. Walton v. Willis, 1 Dall. 351. So under the 22d section of the act of 19th April, 1794, where one died intestate, leaving sons and daughters, and also grandchildren, the children of the eldest son of the intestate, who had died in the lifetime of his father, it was held, where the words of the statute gave the priority of choice to the "eldest son," and was silent in regard to grandchildren, yet that they were within the equity of the act which intended to put them in the place of their father, if he had survived the intestate; and therefore they were permitted to take the real estate of the intestate in preference to the eldest son then living. Hersha v. Brenneman, 6 S. & R. 2.

The general doctrine unquestionably is, that an advancement is an irrevocable gift by a parent to a child, of the whole or a apart of what it is supposed the child will be entitled to upon the death of the parent, who afterwards dies intestate. The question, however, recurs, who is a child within the meaning and spirit of the statute relating to advancements? In Hughes' Appeal, 7 P. F. Smith, 179, and in other cases there cited, it is held, that in the distribution of the grandfather's estate, the grandchildren take subject to advancements made to their father, and to such debts due by him to the intestate, as were recoverable when the estate descended. The reason given is, that they take not paramount to their father, but through him by representation. This, however, must be understood as applying to the facts in those cases. That is where the intestate shall leave descendants in different degrees of consanguinity to him, the more remote of them being the issue of a deceased child, grandchild, or other descendant, and not where he leaves granchildren only. In the latter case they would take per capita.

The clear intent and design of the statutes are to equalize the property of the intestate among his children. Where one of his several children has died during his life, leaving an only child, who the intestate has advanced after the death of his father, it seems to us the whole reason of the statute compels us to hold it an advancement. To do otherwise would work injustice to the surviving children, and defeat that equal distribution which the statute was designed to secure. We believe the true exposition of the statute to be, as against a surviving child of the intestate, that Abijah takes, not only subject to advancements made to his father, and to such debts due by him to the intestate as were recoverable when the estate descended, but also subject to advances made to himself after the death of his father, and to such debts due by him to his grandfather as were recoverable when the estate descended.

For purposes of distribution, the intestate should be held, after the death of his son, as standing in loco parentis towards Abijah, and all the principles flowing therefrom should be applied.

We think, therefore, the learned judge erred in confirming the second report of the auditor, and the case must go back to have distribution made upon the principles we have declared.

And now, to wit, July 2d, 1873, decree reversed, and the court is directed to send the case back to an auditor to restate the account.

Hon. Thos. E. Franklin, and D. G. & B. F. Eshleman, Esqs., for appellant.

Jesse Landis and Saml. H. Price, Esqs., for appellee.

PERSON'S APPEAL.

1. Where the immediate descendants of an intestate are his grandchildren, they take per capita.
2. In computing their shares of the decedent's estate, advancements to their parents are not to be considered.

Appeal from the Orphans' Court of Lebanon county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered July 2d, 1873.

John Person died intestate leaving a widow and five grandchildren. His three children, Sarah, Amanda and David, all died prior to his death. Sarah and Amanda each left one child, and David left three children. These five grandchildren are the only living lineal descendants of the intestate, and are equally removed from him. The question presented is, whether, in the distribution of the estate of the intestate, the children of David are chargeable with advancements made to their father in his lifetime. If the intestate had left surviving him a child or children, against whom these grandchildren were claiming, it is clear they are so chargeable. In that case they would take by representation such share only as their father would have taken, if he had been living at the death of the intestate. How do they take in this case? The second section of act of 8th of April, 1833, Pur. Digest, 807, pl. 9, 11, provides "if such intestate shall leave grandchildren, but no child or other descendant, being the issue of a deceased grandchild, the estate shall descend to and be distributed among such grandchildren."

The facts in this case are precisely those indicated by the statute quoted. The intestate left grandchildren, but he left no children, and no descendants which were the issue of a deceased grandchild. Then the estate shall be distributed among his grandchildren. How shall it be distributed? Shall it be by representation per stirpes, or shall it be per capita?

Under the statute of distributions, 22 and 23 Car. ii., which is very similar to our own, it is held that they take per capita, that is, equal shares in their own right. 2 Black. Comm. 517; 2 Will. on Executors, 1349. So under our act of 19th April, 1794, it was held, where the intestate's children are all dead, all of them having left children, the parties take per capita, or each an equal share in his own right. Earnest et al. v. Earnest et al., 5 Rawle, 213. The act of 8th April, 1833, has received the same construction; that is, when all the heirs are in equal degree of consanguinity to the intestate, they take per capita. Miller's Appeal, 4 Wr. 387; Krout's Appeal, 10 P. F. Smith, 380. It is true the second section of the act of 27th of April, 1855, Pur. Dig. 808, pl. 26, changes the rule of descent, and of distribution, among collaterals; but does not change it as to grandchildren of the intestate. Krout's Appeal, supra. Then David's children do not take by representation through him. They, as well as the other two grandchildren, take in their own right. Unless expressly so declared by statute, it is contrary to reason to hold them liable for advances made to one who is a stranger to their title. Neither the letter nor the spirit of the statute will make a grandchild liable for advances made to one under or through whom he does not claim. The several cases of Earnest v. Earnest, supra; Levering v. Rittenhouse, 4 Whar. 130; Christy's Appeal, 1 Grant, 369; McConkey v. McConkey, 9 Watts, 352; and Hughes' Appeal, 7 P. F. Smith, 179, have been cited as establishing a contrary doctrine. We do not controvert the correctness of construction given to the statute in each of those cases. In each of them the facts were entirely different from the present case. In each of them the intestate left surviving children and grandchildren. His heirs were standing in different degrees of consanguinity to him. Hence the rule established for the benefit of their surviving children applied. It follows that where there is no surviving children of the intestate to invoke the aid of the statute relating to advancements, the children of a deceased child do not take subject to advancements made to their father. Skinner v. Wayne, 2 Jones' (N. C.) Equity Reports, 42. The learned judge, therefore, erred in confirming the report of the auditor; and the first three assignments of error are sustained. This renders it unnecessary to consider the fourth assignment.

Decree reversed so far as it relates to the distribution among the several grandchildren of the intestate, and the record is remitted for the Orphans' Court to proceed in conformity to the above reversion, and it is ordered that the appellees pay the costs of this appeal.

Hon. Josiah Funck, for appellant.

A. R. Boughter, Esq., for appellee.

Quarter Sessions of Tioga County, Pennsylvania.

[We are indebted to M. F. Elliott Esq., of the Tioga county bar for the report of the following opinion.]

COMMONWEALTH v. BURGIN.

An indictment omitted in the caption the words "of the peace" from the style of the court. Defendant's counsel moved to quash, and the district attorney to amend. The amendment was allowed and the motion to quash dismissed.

Opinion by H. W. WILLIAMS, P. J.

Upon the return of the bill of indictment in this case by the grand jury, defendant's counsel moved to quash the indictment. The reason assigned is the omission from the style of the court in the caption of the words "of the peace." The district attorney has also moved for leave to amend by inserting the omitted words, and both motions are now for consideration.

Defendant's counsel relies upon the case of the Commonwealth v. M. J. Mackin, in Quarter Sessions of Philadelphia, reported in No. 11 of the Legal Intelligencer, for 1872, page 85. In that case an indictment having precisely the same defect in the caption was demurred to, and the court sustained the demurrer, holding the omission of the words "of the peace" to be fatal. We are of opinion, however, that it is not necessarily so. The caption is no necessary part of an indictment. W. A. C. L., ed. 1855, p. 150. It is merely "the style of the court prefixed by way of preamble when the record is made up, or when it is returned on certiorari." W. Law Dic., 370; Com. Dig., vol. 4, p. 672, note h; Chitty's Cr. L. 326. It is amendable in the same manner in which it is made up, viz.: from the records of the court where found. 4 P. L. J. Rep. 414. "The precept for holding the court, the sheriff's return, the minutes of the clerk of the sessions, and proceedings of the court, and the venire for the grand jury," are all to be taken into view, and what the whole shows with reasonable certainty, a court of review could examine if the record was before them on certiorari. Commonwealth v. Bell, 1 Addison, 156. The record in this case sufficiently shows that this indictment was found in the "Quarter Sessions of the Peace" in and for the county of Tioga, and any omissions or other defect in the caption, may be amended by the record. 4 P. L. J. Rep. 414; Commonwealth v. Bell, supra.

If this admitted of a doubt at the common law, it certainly does not since the act of 31st March, 1860, relating to criminal procedure. By section 11 of that act, it is made the duty of the court "before whom any objection shall be taken for any formal defect, if it be thought necessary, to cause such indictment to be forthwith amended," &c. We therefore hold, 1st. That the caption is no necessary part of an indictment, but a formal preamble thereto, made up from the records of the court. 2d. That its absence or a defect therein, can only be taken advantage of by motion to quash, or by demurrer. 3d. That the objection when so taken, may and should be removed by amending the caption so as to make it conform to the records. The motion to quash is therefore annulled, and the amendment allowed.

Supreme Court of California.

OAKLAND COTTON MANUFACTURING CO. v. JENNINGS.

1. If a vessel be chartered in the usual manner, either for a particular voyage or for a period of time, the charterer having the authority to appoint the master, and undertaking to victual, man and navigate her at his own expense, he will be deemed the owner pro hac vice, and the general owner will not be personally liable for supplies or under contracts for affreightment.
2. But where the owner appoints a master, he thereby authorizes him to do those things which the law attaches to that office, and a secret understanding between them cannot, as against third persons, change the liability of the owner.

Appeal from the District Court of the Third Judicial District of Alameda county.

Opinion by CROCKETT, J. Delivered July 15th, 1873.

The defendant being the owner of the American schooner Greenfield, caused her to be duly enrolled at the port of San Francisco with one Enos as master. Subsequently he appointed Horton as master in place of Enos; but whether the change of masters was reported at the custom house and noted or recorded, does not appear. Some time after Horton took command of the schooner, the defendant entered into an agreement with him to the effect that Horton was to have the entire control and management of her; was to make whatever contracts of affreightment he saw fit; to employ her in any business he desired, within the inland waters of the State; to victual, man and navigate her at his own expense, and to collect all her earnings; and to pay to the defendant one-third of her gross earnings, at the end of each month, or as often as a settlement was had between them—the defendant to keep the schooner seaworthy and in repair. Subsequently Horton entered into an agreement with one Finney, to the effect that the schooner was to be run for their joint benefit, under the contract with the defendant, and thereafter she was controlled and manned by the two jointly.

The plaintiff contracted with Finney, acting on behalf of himself and Horton, to transport certain machinery, on the schooner, from San Francisco to Clinton, on the opposite side of the bay. But owing to negligent stowage, the schooner capsized during the voyage, and the machinery was partially lost and the remainder damaged. The action is to recover damages for a breach of the contract of affreightment. On these facts, the defendant insists that he is not liable, for the reason that the schooner was not under his control or management, or navigated by his servants or agents; but by Horton & Finney, under the contract, they having the exclusive control and possession of her, with a right to make such contracts of affreightments as they saw proper; that Horton was in no sense the agent of the owner, with authority to bind him in maritime contracts, without his consent. On the other hand, the plaintiff claims, that by the maritime law, the master appointed by the owner is his agent to make contracts of affreightment, and that no secret agreement between master and owner, of which the shipper had no notice, can exempt the owner from liability.

It appears to be well settled, that if a vessel be chartered in the usual manner, either for a particular voyage or for a period of time, the charterer having the authority to appoint the master, and undertaking to victual, man and navigate her at his own expense, he will be deemed the owner pro hac vice, and the general owner will not be personally liable for supplies or under contracts for affreightment. This proceeds upon the ground, that as the charterer appoints the master and has the exclusive control of the vessel, the master is his agent, and not the agent of the general owner, who does not, therefore, hold himself out to the world as the principal for whom the master is authorized to act. In respect to a contract of affreightment, the general owner in such a case would not be liable, for the further reason, that inasmuch as the vessel was not navigated by him, or at his expense, or by his agents or servants, or for his benefit, he was not a common carrier, and was therefore not amenable as such. I do not understand the counsel for the plaintiff to controvert these propositions; but, at all events, they are abundantly supported by authority in this country and in England. It is equally clear, that if the owner let out to charter the hold of the vessel, appointing his own master, and sailing her at his expense, he will be responsible on all contracts of affreightment made by the master with the shippers, having no notice of the charter party. Sandemann v. Scurer, 2 Law Reports, 86; In re St. Cloud, Browning and Lushington R. 15. In the first of these cases, Cockburn, C. J., bases his conclusion on the ground "that the plaintiffs having delivered their goods to be carried, in ignorance of the vessel being chartered, and having dealt with the master as clothed with the ordinary authority of a master, to receive goods and give bills of lading on behalf of his owners, are entitled to look to the owners as responsible for the safe carrying of the goods. We think that so long as the relation of owner and master continues, the latter as regards parties who ship goods in ignorance of any arrangement whereby the authority ordinarily incidental to that relation is affected, must be taken to have authority to bind his owner by giving bills of lading. We proceed on the well-known principle that where a party allows another to appear before the world as his agent in any given capacity, he must be liable to any party who contracts with such apparent agent in a matter within the scope of such agency. The master of a vessel has, by law, authority to sign bills of lading on behalf of his owners. A person shipping goods on board of a vessel, unaware that the vessel has been chartered to another, is warranted in assuming that the master is acting by virtue of his ordinary authority, and therefore acting for his owner in signing bills of lading. It may be that as between the owner, the master and the charterer, the authority of the master is to sign bills of lading on behalf of the charterer only, and not of the owner. But in our judgment this altered state of the master's authority will not affect the liability of the owner, whose servant the master still remains, clothed with a character to which the authority to bind his owners by signing bills of lading attaches by virtue of his office. We think that until the fact that the master's authority has been put an end to is brought to the knowledge of a shipper of goods, the latter has a right to look to the owner as the principal with whom his contract has been made."

This reasoning commends itself strongly to our judgment, and appears to us to be unanswerable. In the case at bar, the master was appointed by the defendant, who was the registered owner; and whatever may have been the secret understanding between them, in respect to the management, employment and sailing of the vessel, or the appropriations of the earnings, persons dealing with the master in ignorance of this understanding, were warranted, in the language of Chief Justice Cockburn, "in assuming that the master was acting by virtue of his ordinary authority, and therefore acting for his owners in signing bills of lading." When Horton was appointed and entered upon his duties as master, the law conferred upon him authority to bind the owner in contracts of affreightment. By the act of appointing him, the defendant notified the public that Horton was his agent for this purpose. After thus openly proclaiming the agency, he is not at liberty secretly to revoke it whilst it ostensibly continues, in so far as persons are affected by it who dealt with the master within the scope of the agency in ignorance of the revocation. It is a familiar principle governing all agencies, that so long as the principal permits the agency ostensibly to continue, even though it has been secretly revoked, the principal is bound by the acts of his apparent agent within the scope of the agency, in respect to persons dealing with the agent without notice of the revocation. In Story's Agency, section 470, it is said that "the revocation, as between the principal and agent, takes effect from the time when the revocation is made known to the agent, and as to third parties, when it is made known to them and not before. Until, therefore, the revocation is so made known it is imperative. If known to the agent, as against his principal, his rights are gone, but as to third persons who are ignorant of the revocation, his acts bind both himself and his principal." It must be conceded, I think, on all sides, that by appointing the master, the owner, by a notorious act, constitutes him his agent to enter into contracts of affreightment, and if he can secretly revoke the agency, so as to effect third persons who are ignorant of the revocation, without revoking the appointment of the master, it must be because agencies of this description stand upon a different footing from other agencies, and are excepted from the operations of the general rule. But there is no sound reason for the exception. On the contrary, considerations of public policy and fair dealing appear to me to require a strict application of the rule to this class of agencies. Otherwise the general owner who appoints the master and permits him, under the appointment, to continue in command of the vessel, thereby inviting the public to deal with him as the agent of the owner, may wholly escape responsibility for the acts of his ostensible and accredited agent, by entering into a secret agreement with the master, of the terms of which the public are not informed. If he could thus escape responsibility, it would impose upon shippers the necessity of inquiring, at their peril, not only who was the owner and by whom the master was appointed, but also what secret understanding or agreement existed between them in respect to the management and sailing of the vessel. In my opinion the interests of commerce demand that this onerous duty should not be imposed upon shippers, and that the owners of vessels navigated by masters appointed by them, should be subject to the responsibilities which usually pertain to the relation of owner and master in dealing with those who are ignorant that those relations are different from what they prima facie are. I am aware that there is apparently a considerable conflict in the authorities on this point, but, in my opinion, those which hold the views above stated, are supported by the better reasoning.

WHELEN'S APPEAL.—NEVIN'S ESTATE.

1. The principle that for a mistake in law, equity will not relieve against a deed, &c., will not bar relief, if the party has acted upon a want of proper knowledge, which he could not obtain, though vigilant in his search; nor where necessary information has been refused and withheld; nor where unconscionable advantage of circumstances, whereby his will was coerced, and by undue pressure, he had done what otherwise he would not.

2. Relief against mistake in law will be given where there is actual or legal fraud, by one who thus seeks to obtain the execution of an agreement to benefit himself or those for whom he acts.

3. A daughter against whom charges were made in a statement exhibited to her by the executors of her father's estate, for the settlement of her share, was entitled to the freest access to her father's books by herself, or her agent, or attorney.

4. When a party has acted in misconception or ignorance of his title, and executed an agreement, &c., to his prejudice, he will be relieved in equity.

5. A bill of review is not allowed to stand on strict law and against equity.

6. The act of October 13th, 1840 (review in Orphans' Court), has no application to a case in which the distribution and payment were voluntary by the accountant, and made before the account filed.

7. A will contained this clause: "And whereas, during my lifetime, I have made or may hereafter make advances in money, stock or otherwise, to my said son, or to the husband of either of my said daughters, and it is my express intention that the shares of all my said children shall be equalized, I hereby direct that such advances respectively shall be deducted from the share to be paid to the trustees of my said son, or to either of my said daughters whose husband may be so indebted to me." Held, that "advances" did not mean debts of the husbands, but gifts to the husbands as advancements on account of the shares of the daughters, and they were not chargeable with interest.

8. Commissions to executors on an estate of $168,000 under the circumstances fixed at 3 per cent.

9. In this case an account after a distribution of the bulk of the estate, upon a statement showing advancements and deducting them; a subsequent account of the executors with the report of auditor confirmed, payment of the balance found due, &c., under the circumstances opened and corrected.

THROPP'S APPEAL.

1. Thropp leased to Gagg who erected a frame building, a removable fixture; a constable levied on the building during the term on executions against Gagg; afterwards Gagg in consideration of a release of rent due, &c., surrendered the term to Thropp, who had no knowledge of the levy, and he took possession; the constable sold the building under the execution. Held, that the purchaser could not remove the fixtures.

2. By the arrangement Thropp gave up his right to his rent out of the execution and Gagg's personal responsibility, which were a consideration for the surrender.

3. If the constable had given the landlord notice of the levy, the arrangement between Thropp and Gagg would not have been effectual against the levy.

4. Such building being prima facie part of the realty, is such notice as to put a creditor of the tenant upon his inquiry as to its character.

5. Notice of the levy to the landlord was necessary to enable him to protect his rights.

PATTERSON v. DELAWARE CO.

1. Patterson's property was returned by the assessor as "square of ground, factory and machinery," the whole assessed as real estate, and a tax levied on the valuation for county purposes. Held, that under the act of April 29th, 1844, § 32, the machinery was properly taxed as real estate.

Taylor by letter dated 9th wrote: "I received yours yesterday," and told him where to ship the goods. Held, in a suit against Taylor on a guaranty, that Hewes might prove that the letter dated 9th, was in answer to his of 10th.

2. Under the act of 26th of April, 1855 (Frauds), the date of a writing, whether omitted or inaccurately inserted, may be proved by parol.

WATTERS et al. v. BREDIN.

1. A deed was. "I, John Watters, * * * have sold and assigned the within-named farm to the said Lasher, * * * authorizing her in my name, or otherwise, but at her own expense, to carry on and possess the same according to the tenor of herein written * * * The condition of this assignment is such that said Watters is to have a good living out of the aforesaid farm his natural lifetime, and all other necessary expenses, and the residue to remain in the hands of the said Lasher or her heirs; that is to say, if the above conditions are complied with, * * * otherwise to become null and void and of none effect." Held, to be a deed upon condition.

2. The clause containing the condition is part of the habendum; it explains the premises that an absolute estate was not intended to be granted, and controls the generality of the words in the premises.

3. By the provisions of the deed, the grantee was required to furnish a living to the grantor, or in default to be subject to lose the estate by re-entry for condition broken.

4. The maxims, Animus ad se omne ducit and Mala grammatica non vitiat chartam, applied.

5. An inartificial and obscure deed construed.

SCOTT v. SCOTT.

1. A writing in form a deed, but in fact a will, contained a covenant of warranty of land designed to be passed by it. Held, that the clause, being in a will was not a covenant of warranty.

2. An express warranty must be created by deed; a will is not a deed.

3. The instrument granted real estate to the grantee after the death of the grantor; the grantor afterwards devised to others. Held, not a breach of the covenant.

4. If there had been such covenant, its breach could not occur in the life of the grantor so as to subject him or his executors after his death to an action.

5. To sustain an action on a covenant of warranty, there must be an actual or constructive eviction by title paramount.

Opinion and decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio in the case of JOHN D. MINOR et al. v. THE BOARD OF EDUCATION OF THE CITY OF CINCINNATI et al. Published by ROBERT CLARK & Co., 65 West Fourth street, Cincinnati, Ohio. Price 25 cents.

The Board of Education of the City of Cincinnati passed two resolutions prohibiting religious instruction, and the reading of religious books, including the Holy Bible, in the common schools of Cincinnati. Several taxpayers filed a petition in the Superior Court of Cincinnati, praying for an injunction to restrain the enforcement of the resolutions, which was granted. On an appeal to the Supreme Court of Ohio, the decree was reversed, and the petition dismissed, upon the ground that the board of education had the exclusive control of the mangement of the schools, and the courts had no right to interfere. The argument of counsel, however, extended over a large field, and Judge Welch in delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, meets and overthrows the arguments of the complainants.

To show the advanced liberal tone of the opinion, we make the following extracts: "True Christianity asks no aid from the sword of civil authority; True Christianity never shields itself behind majorities. Nero and the other persecuting Roman Emperors were amply supported by majorities; and yet the pure and peaceable religion of Christ in the end triumphed over them all; and it was only when it attempted itself to enforce religion by the arm of authority, that it began to wane. A form of religion that cannot live under equal and impartial laws, ought to die, and sooner or later, must die. Legal Christianity is a solecism . . . Its essential interests lie beyond the reach and range of human governments. United with government, religion never rises above the merest superstition; united with religion, government never rises above the merest despotism. . . . The State can have no religious opinions; and if it undertakes to enforce the teaching of such opinions, they must be the opinions of some natural person or class of persons. . . Whose opinion shall it adopt? If it adopts the opinions of more than one man, or one class of men, to what extent may it group together conflicting opinions? or may it group together the opinions of all? And where this conflict exists, how thorough will the teaching be? . . . . It is only when we come to teach what lies 'beyond the scope of sense and reason,' what from its very nature can only be the object of faith, that we encounter these difficulties. Especially is this so, when our pupils are children, to whom we are compelled to assume a dogmatic method and manner, and whose faith at last is more a faith in us than in anything else. If it be true that our law enjoins the teaching of the Christian religion in the schools, surely then, all its teachers should be Christians. Were I such a teacher, while I should instruct the pupils that the Christian religion was true, and all others false, I should tell them that the law itself was an unchristian law. I could not look the verriest infidel or heathen in the face, and say that such a law was just. 'Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do you even so to them.' . . . . . Does not the best government require the best religion? Certainly, but the real question is, not what is the best religion, but how shall it be secured? . . . Let religious doctrines have a fair field and a free, intellectual, moral, and spiritual conflict, the weakest will go to the wall, and the best will triumph. . . . . The State will impartially aid all parties in their struggles after religious truths, by providing means for the increase of general knowledge. . . If you desire people to fall in love with your religion, make it lovely. If you wish to put down a false religion, put it down by kindness, thus heaping coals of fire on its head. You can't put it down by force; that has been tried. . . . . Moral and spiritual conflicts cannot be profitably waged with carnal weapons; the enemy of truth and right is too apt to conquer. . . . . Three men, say a Christian, an infidel, and a Jew, ought to be able to carry on a government for their common benefit, and yet leave the religious doctrines and worship of each unaffected thereby, otherwise than by fairly and impartially protecting each, and aiding each in his searches after truth. If they are sensible and fair men, they will so carry on their government, and carry it on successfully, and for the benefit of all. If they are not sensible and fair men, they will be apt to quarrel about religion, and in the end have a bad government and bad religion, if they do not destroy both. . . . . The great bulk of human affairs and interests is left by any free government to individual enterprise and action. Religion is eminently one of those interests, lying outside of the true and legitimate province of government. . . . . Madison, who had more to do with framing the Constitution of the United States than any other man, and whose purity of life, and orthodoxy of religious belief no one questions, says, 'Religion is essentially distinct from human government, and exempt from its cognizance. A connection between them is injurious to both. There are causes in the human breasts which insure the perpetuity of religion without the aid of law.'"

The doctrines on the relation of Church and State, set forth in the opinion, are most accordant to an enlightened understanding of the subject.

The majority of the framers of the Constitution of the United States certainly held them. They appear in the first of the twelve amendments to that instrument, and they are the foundation of like provisions in most of the State constitutions.

There is a natural code which is separate and distinct from religious teachings. It is founded upon reason and enforced by the instructions of history. It has been well understood by the intelligent of all ages. It forms the basis of all laws made by enlightened minds, and is sufficient for the necessities of civil government.

From the nature of the American people, and by reason of the diffusion of general knowledge, there is little to apprehend from an attempt to establish a national religion in this country. Still, it cannot be denied, that there are many, who firmly convinced of the truth of their religious belief, look with disfavor on that of others, and what would be the consequence of even the slightest recognition of a direct connection between religion and the government, either national or State, it may be difficult to foretell, but not hard to imagine.

The opinion of Judge Welch, published as it is, together with a history of the case, and the arguments of counsel, in a cheap form, is within the easy reach of all. It is not to be understood only by lawyers, or the learned generally, but the truths therein are expressed so clearly, that every one may understand them, whilst the doctrines contained will receive the acquiescence of all save that enemy to true religion, the bigot.

PUTNAM v. OSGOOD.

1. Declarations of one in the possession of personal property that it is owned by another are competent evidence in favor of the person declared to be the owner, against an officer who has attached it as the property of the declarant.
2. Where one of two sureties is secured by a mortgage of chattels which are subsequently attached, and the mortgagee upon a demand renders an account, stating his liability at the full amount due without referring to his co-surety, evidence of the responsibility of the other surety for his share does not tend to prove the falsity of the account.
3. In an action between a mortgagee of chattels and an attaching officer, the officer offered his return "as evidence of what he did with the property," and the presiding judge excluded it:—Held, that the court, it not appearing that what was done with the property was material, could not say this was erroneous.
4. An agreement or understanding between a mortgagor and mortgagee of chattels, though made after the execution of the mortgage, that the mortgagor may sell the mortgaged property, or a part of it, on his own account, renders the mortgage void as to creditors, and such agreement or understanding will be proved by evidence that the mortgagor did so sell with the knowledge of the mortgagee, and without objection on his part.

Opinion of the court by BELLOWS, C. J.

The first question is as to the admissibility of the statements of Parker M. Child, as testified to by J. D. Child.

When Parker M. Child made these statements he was in the possession of the wool of which he spoke, and what he said was in disparagement of his own title, and went to show that the wool was purchased by him for the plaintiff, and belonged to him. The possession of the wool was prima facie evidence of title in Child, and his declarations that he held it in subordination to the plaintiff was against his interest; and upon that ground such declarations have been held to be admissible. It has been distinctly so held in this State in the case of Rand v. Dodge, 17 N. H. 358. In that case the title of real estate was in question, and the only evidence of possession in the plaintiff were the declarations and entries of a person in the actual possession, tending to show that he was in under the plaintiff's ancestor, and for that purpose his verbal declarations and various entries on his books of debit and credit, tending to show that he was managing the land as agent, were received. The same doctrine was recognized in Peaceable v. Watson, 4 Taunt. 16, and is also laid down as the law in 1 Greenl. Ev., sec. 109, and cases cited. Holloway v. Rakes is cited by Buller, J., in Davis v. Pierce, 2 T. R. 55, as deciding that the declarations of a tenant in possession, that he held under the devisor of the plaintiff, were admissible to show possession in the devisor. A similar doctrine is held in Carne v. Nicoll, 1 Bingh. N. C. 430. The doctrine, in fact, is well settled in our own State. It is recognized and acted upon in Spence v. Smith, 18 N. H. 587. It is applied also in the case of personal property, as in the case of real estate. Woods v. Blodgett, 18 N. H. 249; Walcott v. Keith, 22 N. H. 212; Bradley v. Spofford, 23 N. H. 444, and cases cited. So the declarations of the person in possession are admissible, although he himself is alive and in condition to testify. Woods v. Blodgett, 18 N. H. 249. We are of the opinion, then, that there was no error in admitting the testimony of J. D. Child.

The next question is as to proof of the responsibility of Dwight P. Child, the plaintiff's co-surety on Parker M. Child's note of $2,000, the mortgage in question being made to secure the plaintiff against his liability on that note.

I am unable to see how this inquiry was material. It is true, as suggested by the defendant's counsel, that Dwight P. Child was equally liable with the plaintiff, and might be made to contribute, if able to do so; but the plaintiff's right to take security against his liability could not be in the least degree affected by the responsibility or want of it of his co-surety. It is urged by the defendant's counsel that the inquiry was proper because the account rendered ought to have stated the fact, if the co-surety was able to contribute his share. It does not appear by the case whether he did fully describe that note or not, nor is any point made of it. Besides, the statute only requires an account of the amount due and liabilities secured, and does not require a description of other securities held by the mortgagee for the same debts and liabilities; and in view of the highly penal character of these provisions, we should not feel at liberty to enlarge by construction the obligation of the mortgagee beyond the plain requirements of the statute. Besides, this mortgage having been taken before the plaintiff was damnified, his co-surety is entitled to share in the security. Brown v. Ray, 18 N. H. 102; Low v. Smart, 5 N. H. 353; Currier v. Fellows, 27 N. H. 366. The case of Hall v. Cushman, 16 N. H. 463, holds a somewhat different doctrine, especially where the sureties have paid the debt and adjusted their shares between them, before a mortgage to one is taken; but this case, so far as respects mortgages taken before the sureties have been damnified, is overruled by the subsequent case of Brown v. Ray, 18 N. H. 103, both opinions having been given by Judge Parker. It will be perceived, also, that no authorities were cited for the opinion in Hall v. Cushman, and it is not certain that it was not intended to be limited to cases where the sureties had paid the debt and divided the amount between them, and afterwards one had taken security for the repayment of the amount paid by himself. Such a limitation might well be inferred from the decision in Brown v. Ray, which was made by the same judge about eighteen months later. The general doctrine, that securities taken by one surety enure equally to the benefit of his co-sureties, is well established. 1 Story Eq., sec. 499, note 2; 4 Kent's Com., 9th ed., note 6, and cases cited; Bachelder v. Fiske's Exrs., 17 Mass. 470; Fuller v. Hapgood, 39 Vt. 617. The right to contribution is not understood to spring from contract, but is a doctrine of equity, founded upon the equality of burthen, from which is deduced the obligation to hold securities received by one for the benefit of all the sureties. With this view of the law, it is obviously immaterial whether the plaintiff's co-surety was responsible or not.

In respect to the officer's return, to show what he did with the goods attached, enough is not stated to show whether it was material or not. If offered to prove the attachment, it would have been competent, clearly; but that cannot have been the purpose, for that appears otherwise in the case very distinctly. Until it is made to appear that what was done with the property was material, and that the return was evidence of it, we cannot say that there was error in the ruling on that point.

The great question in the case arises upon the instructions of the court. It appears that the mortgage to the plaintiff was made February 8th, 1867, and the defendant's attachment was on the twenty-second of the same month. The case finds that from the time of the mortgage down to the time of the attachment, the mortgagor, Child, had continued to sell these goods, on his own account, just as he had been doing before the mortgage —selling, in that time, some $600 worth of goods; and that this was done with the full knowledge of Putnam, and without any objection from him. The court held, and instructed the jury, that this would not be sufficient to invalidate the mortgage, unless such understanding existed at the time when the mortgage was made; and the jury have found that there was then no such understanding, and that the mortgage was made in good faith, and to secure an honest debt. This is precisely the question that was left undecided in the former opinion in this case, and its solution is not free from difficulty. Upon a careful consideration of the adjudged cases in this State and elsewhere, we are brought to the conclusion that the instruction on this point, without some qualification, was erroneous. As held in the former case, the selling of the goods by the mortgagor for his own benefit, was totally inconsistent with the avowed purpose of the mortgage, and if done in pursuance of an understanding between the parties when the mortgage was made, would invalidate it in respect to creditors. The jury having found that there was no such understanding at the time the mortgage was made, the question is whether such sales, with the knowledge and without the objection of the mortgagee, will have the same effect as if it had been agreed, when the mortgage was made, that a mortgagor might sell. The knowledge on the part of the mortgagee that these sales were being made, and no objection interposed, is equivalent to an assent to them; and it will be observed that the case finds that the mortgagor continued to sell the goods from the time of making the mortgage down to the time of making the attachment, so that the mortgage was no interruption to the sales; and in that state of things, the mortgagee, with a full knowledge of it, acquiesced.

The principles upon which this question is to be decided may be detected by considering the rules which govern the retention of the possession by the vendor on the absolute sale of goods. There the retention of the possession by the vendor is always prima facie, and, if unexplained, conclusive evidence of a secret trust. This is the doctrine of Coburn v. Pickering, 3 N. H. 415–425, which has since been followed, and must be regarded as the settled law of this State—see Coolidge v. Melvin, 42 N. H. 510, and cases cited; and it is equally well settled that, the trust being established, the sale is to be regarded as fraudulent and void as against creditors. Whether there was a trust, is a question of fact; but the trust being established, it is a conclusion of law that the sale is fraudulent and void as to creditors. Ordinarily, in the case of an absolute sale of goods, a trust will be presumed, with us, from the mere retention of possession by the vendor. In some States, as in Vermont and many others, the presumption is conclusive; in others, it is prima facie only, and may be rebutted by showing the sale to be bona fide, as in Massachusetts and some other States. The decisions, indeed, in this country are very conflicting and unstable on this subject. In New Hampshire, however, since the decision in Coburn v. Pickering, the rule has been steadily adhered to, that the retention of the possession by the vendor is always prima facie, and, if unexplained, conclusive evidence of a secret trust. By this it is not meant that the possession may be explained by showing that the sale was really in good faith; but a satisfactory reason must be shown for allowing the vendor to retain the possession of the goods, else it will be presumed that it was intended that he should have the use of them. What would be a sufficient explanation of the possession, as a general principle, has not been determined in this State. It has been decided, however, that it is not a sufficient explanation that the sale was at first without any trust, but that soon after, and before the goods were removed, it was agreed that the vendor might retain and use them, and pay rent therefor. Coburn v. Pickering, before cited. Nor that it was agreed that the vendor should store the property for a time for the vendee, and then transport and deliver it at another place. Page v. Carpenter, 10 N. H. 77. Nor that the vendor should retain and break the colt, which was the subject of the sale, and he retained it for seven months, and until it was attached. Shaw v. Thompson, 43 N. H. 130. But it was held to be a sufficient explanation, that the property was left until the vendor could procure the necessary means to remove it. Morse v. Powers, 17 N. H. 296. So, doubtless, it would be a sufficient explanation that the goods were at sea or at a distance, and possession taken as soon as they could be reached. Without some explanation of this kind, a trust will be conclusively presumed; and, as in all other cases of trusts, the sale will be held fraudulent and void as to creditors, without stopping to inquire what were the real motives and intentions of the parties; for it is well settled in New Hampshire that if the trust be established, the fraud is a conclusion of law—as in the case of a sale absolute on its face, but with an agreement to reconvey on the payment of a sum of money, or with an agreement for the future support of the vendor.

In these cases, however clearly it may be shown that there was no intent to defraud creditors, the sales will be held void. Coolidge v. Melvin, 42 N. H. 510.

These decisions go upon the ground that such trusts are inconsistent with good faith and fair dealing, and directly calculated to hinder and defeat creditors, and therefore should be held to be fraudulent per se, whatever may have been the motives of the parties in the particular case. In the case before us, the mortgagor was permitted to continue to sell the goods as before, immediately upon the execution of the mortgage, and to continue to do so at the rate of fifty dollars' worth daily until the attachment.

The sales made were of the goods mortgaged, and to a substantial amount, and were wholly inconsistent with the avowed object of the mortgage, which was to secure a debt, while it was used simply to protect the mortgagor in the enjoyment and use of the goods, and to shield him from the claims of his creditors. It makes no difference whatever that the mortgagee may not have intended to hinder and delay the other creditors. It is enough that his acts would naturally produce that effect, and he must, in law, stand charged with it.

The instructions were, that these sales would not be sufficient to invalidate the mortgage, unless the understanding existed when the mortgage was made. We think, however, that no such distinction exists, or is applicable here. The case as it stands before us is, that the mortgagor proceeded to sell as before, from the time of making the mortgage, with the plaintiff's knowledge and without objection; and it may well be urged that this conclusively shows that such was the agreement. In Coburn v. Pickering, the agreement that the goods should remain in the vendor's possession was, as the case finds, made after the sale, but before the goods were removed, and they were accordingly retained and used by the vendor. There was evidence tending to prove that the sale was made to pay a debt to the vendee. The court directed a verdict for the attaching officer, assuming that the sale and subsequent agreement for the use of the goods must be considered as one contract.

The ruling and direction of the court were fully sustained, the court, per Richardson, C. J., holding that this was purely a question of law for the court, and that the fact of the agreement, in respect to the possession being made after the sale, afforded no sufficient explanation. He says the principle contended for by the plaintiff's counsel, that the original contract is to form the criterion by which the honesty of the sale is to be determined, stands in direct opposition to the rules which have long been applied to the subject; that "it stands wholly unsupported by authority, and seems to have made its appearance for the first time in this case. To give it any countenance in our courts would, in our judgment, take from creditors some of the most efficient means of detecting fraud, which human ingenuity has been able to invent." Indeed, we think it quite clear that the presumption arising from the retention of the possession, has never been understood to depend upon its having been agreed at the time of the sale that the seller should keep possession.

In Twyne's Case, 3 Co. 81, a, it is laid down as one of the badges of fraud, that the "donor continued in possession, and used the goods as his own; and by reason thereof, he traded and trafficked with others, and defrauded and deceived them." In fact, the selling of the goods, as in this case, is intimately associated with retaining the possession of them—only, the permission to sell goods on the vendor's own account has much more decidedly the character of a trust reserved.

The case of Robbins v. Parker, 3 Met. 117, is much in point. That was a mortgage of "all the hay, grain and produce standing" on the mortgagor's farm; and it appeared that the mortgagor used the hay and other produce on the farm, with the mortgagee's knowledge, and without any objection from him. The court held the transaction to be fraudulent and collusive, the court saying that the mortgagor used and consumed the property in the same manner as if no mortgage had been made and without objection. In Kendall v. Fitts, 22 N. H. 7, Eastman, J., lays it down as the result of our decisions, that "all agreements or bargains, express or implied, which entered into the contract of sale, whereby the vendor should retain possession of the property for the advantage of either party, and not for the accommodation of the vendee, and all agreements and contracts to retain possession, made directly after the sale, either without changing the possession, or immediately after changing it, should be regarded as conclusive evidence of fraud." In Edward's v. Harben, 2 T. R. 595, it is laid down that unless possession accompanies and follows an absolute conveyance of goods, it is fraudulent and void. So is Coburn v. Pickering, and cases cited. So in French v. Hall, 9 N. H. 145, it is laid down by Parker, C. J., that, by the law of this State, to constitute a valid sale as against creditors, there must be a change of possessions. So is Clarke v. Morse, 10 N. H. 239; and Hamilton v. Russell, 1

Cranch, 318, confirms the case of Edwards v. Harben.

In none of these cases is there the least countenance given to the position that there must have been an agreement at the time of the sale that the possession should remain in the mortgagor, in order to produce the effect suggested; on the contrary, the language in which the rule is announced excludes such an idea. In Jennings v. Carter, 2 Wend. 449, it is held that a voluntary sale of chattels, with an agreement, in or out of the deed, that the vendor may keep possession, is—except in special cases and for special reasons, to be shown to and approved by the court—fraudulent and void as against creditors; and that where the possession is continued in the vendor without any agreement to that effect, the presumption of fraud is equally strong. These authorities show very clearly that the retention and use of the goods sold by the vendor have the same effect to avoid the sale, whether it was so agreed when the sale was made or not; and we think the same principle should be applied to the case before us. This being a recorded mortgage, the retention of the possession is not objectionable; but the selling of the goods mortgaged, with the assent of the mortgagee, occupies the same position in respect to the mortgage that the mere retention and use of the goods does in respect to an absolute sale. In the one case the vendor is in possession of the goods and using them, and in the other he has possession and sells them; and both are equally inconsistent with the avowed object of the respective conveyances.

The case of Robbins v. Parker, 3 Met. 117, is a direct authority to the point that the assent of the mortgagee, subsequent to the mortgage, to the consumption by the mortgagor of the property mortgaged, would render the transaction collusive and fraudulent. It is very obvious, indeed, that the substantial character of the transaction is the same, whether the agreement that the mortgagor may sell the goods be made at the time of the mortgage, or immediately after; and, as a means of sheltering the property of a dishonest debtor from the claims of his creditors, the latter method would be equally effective as the other. The policy of the law is equally against both, and there is much reason to apprehend serious mischief from giving the least countenance to an agreement that a mortgagor might sell the goods on his own account, because the agreement was made subsequent to the mortgage. I am satisfied that such a distinction is not sustained by principle or authority.

It is urged that the law which imposes a penalty upon a mortgagor for selling the goods without the written consent of the mortgagee, assumes that with such consent he may sell. It is true, he may so sell without being subjected to a penalty, but there is nothing in the act designed to change the law in respect to the validity of mortgages as against attaching creditors. That stands as it did before. It is urged, also, that it must appear that the sale was made with intent to defraud or hinder creditors, and that is so; but the trust being shown, the fraudulent intent is conclusively presumed. Again: the jury were told that the continuing to sell the goods with the plaintiff's knowledge and without objection would not invalidate the mortgage, unless such understanding existed at the time the mortgage was made. Now the fact of such selling was very strong evidence of an understanding when the mortgage was made that the sales might be continued, and, under ordinary circumstances, the jury ought so to have found, and therefore, without some qualification of that instruction, there was danger that the jury might be misled, and induced to give to this evidence less weight than it deserved, even if, as matter of law, the selling as the mortgagor did would not have invalidated the mortgage; and, upon the whole, I think this instruction, as here stated, was calculated materially to diminish the weight of that important testimony, unless there was some qualification not stated in the case, which is quite probable.

The instructions to the jury that, if the mortgage was made in good faith to secure an honest indebtedness, it would not be rendered invalid by including, by inadvertence and mistake, a greater sum than was really due, were correct. No authority has been cited, and we find none, to the effect that an innocent mistake as to the amount due, shall avoid a mortgage. Such a doctrine would be very severe upon mortgagees, and finds no countenance from analogous cases. In the former opinion in this case, it was held that an account rendered by the mortgagee of the amount due on the mortgage debt, in perfect good faith, and with all reasonable efforts to make it correct, would not be a false account within the statute, because by accident or mistake it was made too large. If the mortgage is made to secure a greater sum than is due, this would be a matter of proper observation to the jury on the question of the good faith of the transaction, but we cannot say that, as matter of law, it renders the mortgage void.

The instructions in respect to the rendition of the account were in accordance with the former decision in this cause, and we think were correct; nor do we think the verdict should be disturbed as against evidence, from anything now before us.

On the point of the instructions as to the trust, we think there must be a new trial.

BARNEY v. STEAMBOAT D. R. MARTIN.

1. No passenger, as such, has a right to carry on any business occupation upon the vehicles of a common carrier, and if he attempt so to do, after being requested to desist, he may be ejected.
2. A carrier may grant the right to transact a business upon its vehicles, but the right will be limited to the grantee.

Opinion of the court by HUNT, J.

On the trial before the district judge, the libellant recovered the sum of $1,000 as his damages, for ejecting him from the boat on the morning of October 23d, 1871. On an application subsequently made to him, the district judge reduced the recovery to the sum of $500. A careful perusal of all the testimony satisfies me that the libellant was pursuing his business as an express agent on board the boat; that he persisted in it against the remonstrance of the claimants, and that it was to prevent the transaction of that business by him on board the boat, that he was ejected therefrom by the claimants.

The steamboat company owning this vessel were common carriers between Huntingdon and New York. They were bound to transport every passenger presenting himself for transportation, who was in a fit condition to travel by such conveyance. They were bound, also, to carry all freight presented to them in a reasonable time before their hours of starting. The capacity of their accommodation is the only limit to their obligation. A public conveyance of this character is not, however, intended as a place for the transaction of the business of the passengers. The suitable carriage of persons or property is the only duty of the common carrier. A steamboat company or a railroad company is not bound to furnish travelling conveniences for those who wish to engage on their vehicles in the business of selling books, papers, or articles of food, or in the business of receiving and distributing parcels or baggage, nor to permit the transaction of this business in their vehicles when it interferes with their own interests. If a profit may arise from such business, the benefit of it belongs to the company, and they are entitled to the exclusive use of their cars for such purposes. This seems to be clear both upon principle and authority. Story on Bailments, § 591, a; Jenckes v. Coleman, 2 Sumn. 221; Burgess v. Clements, 4 Maule & S. 306; Fell v. Knight, 8 Mees. & W. 269; Commonwealth v. Powers, 1 Am. Railway Cases, 389.

These cases show that the principles thus laid down are true as a general rule.

The case of the N. J. Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. (U. S.) 356, shows that it is especially applicable to those seeking to do an express business on such conveyances. It is there held, in substance, that the carrier is liable to the owner for all the goods shipped on a public conveyance by an express company, without regard to any contract to the contrary between the carrier and the express company. Although they may have no custody or control of the goods, they are liable to the owner in case of loss, if they allow them to be brought on board. It is the simplest justice that they should be permitted to protect themselves by preventing their being brought on board by those having them in charge. This rule would not exclude the transmission as freight of any goods or property which the owners or agents should choose to place under the care and control of the carrier.

That persons other than the libellant carried a carpet bag without charge, or that such bag occasionally contained articles forwarded by a neighbor or procured for a friend, does not affect the carrier's right. The cases where this was proved to have been done were rare and exceptional, and do not appear to have been known to the carrier, nor does it appear that any compensation was paid to the agent. They were neighborly and friendly services, such as people in the country are accustomed to render for each other.

But if the services and the business had been precisely like that of the libellant, the rule would have been the same. The rights of the carrier in respect to A. are not gone or impaired for the reason that he waives his rights in respect to B., especially if A. be notified that the rights are insisted upon as to him. If Mr. Prime were permitted to carry a bag without charge on the defendants' boat, or to do a limited express business thereon, this gives the libellant no right to do such business, when notified by the carrier that he must refrain from it. A carrier, like all others, may bestow favors where he chooses. Rights, not favors, are the subject of demand by all parties indiscriminately.

The incidental benefit arising from the transaction of such business as may be done on board a boat or a car belong to the carrier, and he can allow the privilege to one and exclude it from another at his pleasure. A steamboat company or a railroad company may well allow an individual to open a restaurant or a bar on their conveyance, or to do the business of boot blacking, or of peddling books and papers. This individual is under their control, subject to their regulations, and the business interferes in no respect with the orderly management of the vehicle. But if every one that thinks fit can enter upon the performance of these duties, the control of the vehicle and the good management would soon be at end.

The cars or boats are those of the carrier, and I think exclusively so for this purpose. The sale or leasing of these rights to individuals and the exclusion of others therefrom, come under the head of reasonable regulations, which the courts are bound to enforce. The right of transportation, which belongs to all who desire it, does not carry with it a right of traffic or business.

It is insisted that the libellant could not legally be ejected from the boat for any offence or violation of rules committed on a former occasion. It is insisted, also, that having purchased a ticket from the agent of the company, his right to a passage was perfect. Neither of these propositions is correct. In Commonwealth v. Powers, 7 Metc. 596, the passenger had actually purchased his ticket, and the chief justice says:

"If he, Hall, gave no notice of his intention to enter the car as a passenger and of his right to do so, and if Powers believed that his intention was to violate a reasonable subsisting regulation, then he and his associates were justified in removing him from the depot."

In Pearson v. Duane, 4 Wall. 605, Mr. Justice Davis, in giving the opinion of the court, held the expulsion of Duane to have been illegal, because it was delayed until the vessel had sailed, "But this refusal," he says, "should have preceded the sailing of the ship. After the ship had got to sea it was too late to take exception to the character of a passenger as to his peculiar position, provided he violated no inflexible rule of the boat in getting on board.'

The libellant in this case refused to give any intimation that he would abandon his trade on board the vessel. The steamboat company, it is evident, were quite willing to carry him and his baggage, and objected only to his persistent attempts to continue his traffic on their boat. He insisted that he had the right to pursue it, and the company resorted to the only means in their power to compel its abandonment, to wit: his removal from the boat. This was done with no unnecessary force, and accompanied by no indignity.

In my opinion the removal was justified, and the decree must be reversed.

In re THOMAS RYAN.

1. An innkeeper and retail dealer in liquors is a trader, and when he is unable to pay his debts as they become due, in money, he is insolvent, although his property may exceed in value the amount of his debts.
2. An insolvent debtor who prefers one or more of his creditors, necessarily thereby commits an act of bankruptcy.
3. Where it appears that a debtor gave a mortgage upon a large portion of his property, which mortgage purported to be given as security for a debt that in fact never existed, the reasonable conclusion is that such mortgage was made to hinder and delay, if not to defraud the creditors of such debtor, and is, therefore, an act of bankruptcy.
4. Where a debtor has committed an act of bankruptcy by giving an unlawful preference, or making a transfer of his property, with intent to hinder, delay and defraud his creditors, he cannot discharge himself from his legal liability for such act by a subsequent rescission or undoing thereof.—Pacific Law Reporter.

Opinion by DEADY, J. Delivered April 29th, 1873.

Petition by F. Opitz and others to have respondent adjudged a bankrupt. The cause was heard by the court without a jury, on April 22d and 23d, and submitted.

At the filing of the petition, April 1st, 1873, and since 1864, the respondent was engaged in keeping a tavern and bar in this city, called the Russ House.

The petition alleges that the respondent being a trader and insolvent, committed acts of bankruptcy as follows: 1. That on January 29th, 1873, he made a conveyance and transfer of the chattels in said Russ House to one Catharine Crinnion, with intent to thereby hinder, delay and defraud his creditors, and with the intent to give a preference to said Crinnion, and also with the intent to defeat and delay the operation of the bankrupt act. 2. That on February 12th, 1873, he made a payment to Henry Wilmer, and on March 1st, thereafter, a payment to —— Hunsaker, with intent thereby to give each of them a preference.

The answer of respondent admits the making of the conveyance and payments, but denies the insolvency, and that either such conveyance or payments were made with the intents alleged.

The evidence proves that at the dates of the alleged acts of bankruptcy, the respondent owed not less than $1,700, and that his assets consisted of the furniture and fixtures of the Russ House, worth in cash probably $1,200, a piece of land on the McAdam road, worth not to exceed $150, and book accounts for board against forty-six different persons, scattered over the coast, for sums ranging from $239 to $5; amounting in all to $2,954. Some of these accounts are twelve months overdue; one-fourth of them are at least six months due, and only $200 or $300 were charged within two months before the commencement of this proceeding. The opinion of the respondent's barkeeper is that $1,500 of these accounts are good; that is, the persons who owe them will pay them when they get money, and he thinks they will have money sooner or later, and some of them before long. This, of course, amounts to nothing; there is really no evidence that a single dollar can be made on these accounts by law, and the strong probability is that they are not worth a cent. For the past nine months the respondent has been falling behind with his creditors, and the probabilities are that good accounts against boarders by the week would have been collected by him as they fell due.

It also appears that for at least six months prior to the filing of the petition, the respondent was unable, and so stated to divers of his creditors, to pay the debts incurred in his business as they became due, in money; and that during that term, for that reason, he procured an extension on $700 or $800 of said debts.

As to whether the respondent's property was sufficient to pay his debts at the date of these transactions, the burden of proof is upon him. Section 41, Bank Act; In re Randal, 1 Deady, 559; In re Silverman, 1 Sawyer, 418. The evidence furnished by the respondent upon this point is not satisfactory, and is altogether insufficient to establish the fact that this property could have been disposed of for cash at $1,700. It must also be borne in mind that the only portion of this property which appears to have had any market value was the furniture, and to have sold this, or any considerable portion of it, would have broken up respondent's business at once. Besides, at least $300 worth of it was probably exempt from execution, the respondent being a householder.

But it is immaterial whether his property was sufficient to pay his debts or not. The respondent was an innkeeper and a retail dealer in liquors, and therefore a trader, and being confessedly unable to pay his debts in money as they became due, in the ordinary course of business, he was insolvent. In Toof v. Martin, 13 Wal. 47, the Supreme Court affirmed the ruling of the court below, which was that "if the bankrupts" (who were traders) "could not pay their debts in the ordinary course of business, that is, in money, as they fell due, they were insolvent;" and to the same effect has been the decisions of the District Courts. Indeed, it would be intolerable, if a person in the situation of respondent, who refuses to pay the current bills of his baker, butcher and grocer, as they become due, because he has no money to do so with, and at the same time pays and secures other creditors, could prevent the former from having him adjudged a bankrupt upon the doubtful ground that his property was equal in value to his debts, and therefore he was not insolvent.

The payments to Wilmer and Hunsaker are admitted, and the fact being that the respondent was then insolvent, the necessary effect of such payments was to give these creditors a preference, which was an act of bankruptcy. The necessary consequence of his acts the respondent is conclusively presumed to have intended, and therefore the denial in the answer of an intent to give a preference to these parties is of no effect. In re Sutherland, 1 Deady, 348; In re Silverman, 1 Sawyer, 418.

The conveyance to Crinnion is a mortgage which purports to have been given by respondent to secure the payment of a note of even date therewith, for $3,000 in coin, payable in one year, with interest at the rate of one per centum per month. The property included in it was probably three-fourths in value of all the respondent possessed, subject to execution, and consisted of the furniture of the parlor and the sixty-one bed rooms in the Russ House. The instrument gave Crinnion power to take possession in case the note was not paid at maturity, or at any time, in case she should "deem herself unsafe," and sell the property at public or private sale for the payment of the debt. The mortgage was filed on January 30th, 1873, and on March 19th, thereafter, purports to have been assigned by Crinnion, for "a valuable consideration," to one Annie English.

On the trial Ryan testified that this note and mortgage was a scheme to raise money to pay his debts, but that no money was received upon it except $800 in currency, which was returned to English, when she gave up the note, and the transaction was rescinded, because the whole amount of the $3,000 could not be raised. The note was not produced on the trial, and the mortgage still remains on file in the clerk's office unsatisfied and uncancelled. Ryan stated that the note had been lying on the washstand in his bed room from the time it was returned to him until the day of trial, when it suddenly disappeared, and has not been found, and that the $800 received on the note was paid to and returned by his wife. Under the act (section 41) and upon general principles, the burden of proof is upon the respondent to show this mortgage to have been actually made upon the consideration and for the purposes expressed therein. The facts are peculiarly within his knowledge.

Neither Crinnion nor English are called as witnesses by him, or their absence attempted to be accounted for; while upon the evidence, their very existence is even doubtful. As the case appears in court, there is no other conclusion reasonable but that this mortgage was a mere sham and pretence from first to last. In point of fact it was not true, as therein represented, that respondent owed Crinnion the sum of $3,000 in coin, but only $800 in currency, and it is doubtful whether even that sum was received until after the making of the mortgage, if at all. The assignment to English purports to have been made as late as March 19th, and for "a valuable consideration," and although attested by counsel for respondent, no one was called to speak as to the amount or nature of such consideration, or the true character of the transaction. The strong probability is that this transfer is also a sham, and was put upon the instrument with the idea of giving color of good faith to the original transaction. The mortgage was left on file as an unsatisfied one, after, it is now claimed, the transaction was rescinded, apparently for the purpose for which it appears to have been originally made and placed there, to keep off and deceive his creditors; and to this effect was respondent's declaration to the witness Rohr, one of his creditors, as late as February 1st. The power to enter and sell at "private sale" whenever the mortgagee might "deem herself unsafe," is a significant and suspicious circumstance, and might at any moment be used by the parties to this contrivance to put the barrier of another apparently innocent ownership between this property and the respondent's creditors.

The intent with which the transfer was made is a question of fact, but if the note and mortgage were fictitious, as it appears they were, then the only reasonable inference from the premises is that it was done with intent to hinder and delay creditors, if not to defraud them. In re Drummond, 1 B. R. 10; Ecfort v. Greeley, 4 C. L. N. 209.

It is not an element of this act of bankruptcy that the respondent at the time of committing it should have been insolvent. A sale or transfer of property with intent to hinder, delay or defraud creditors, is an act of bankruptcy, without reference to the solvency of the persons making it. In re Randal, 1 Deady, 565.

On the argument counsel for the respondent seemed to assume that the inquiry as to his solvency was to be directed to the time of filing the petition. Insolvency alone is never an act of bankruptcy. In this case, respondent being insolvent on February 12th and March 1st, 1873, when he made payments to Wilmer and Hunsaker, he thereby committed an act of bankruptcy. But his even becoming solvent afterwards, much less getting further time to pay his debts, would not condone or discharge this act of bankruptcy, or prevent him from being adjudged a bankrupt therefor. And so with this mortgage; the question is, did the respondent at any time within six months before the filing of the petition, make it with the intent alleged, and not did he afterwards, and before the filing of the petition, recant, and procure the same to be cancelled or rescinded? When an act of bankruptcy has been once committed, the debtor cannot be relieved from the legal consequences thereof, except by lapse of time or an arrangement with the creditors, who have the right to sue on account of it.

I find that the respondent has committed the acts of bankruptcy alleged in the petition, and adjudge him a bankrupt accordingly.

In compliance with the desire of many prominent members of the Bar, the Publishers have endeavored to produce a handsome book, full and complete in its contents. Owing to the sale being limited to the Philadelphia Bar, to whom only it can be of use, and in consequence of the expense attending its publication, the price has been fixed at a figure that may seem apparently high,—but the Publishers, to reimburse themselves for the outlay they have been subject to, have been compelled to decline giving discounts to any one, so as to enable them to give the Bar the advantage of the lowest possible price for which the Book can be made.

The volume has been carefully compiled, and has also been revised by the Judges of the different Courts, and endorsed by Rules of the same. They therefore contain not only the latest, but also the only full publication of those rules, as they now stand on the minutes of the different Courts.

STECKMAN v. ERNST et al.

A promissory note payable twelve months after date, contained the further limitation, "or before, if made out of the sale of W. S. Coffman's Improved Broadcast Seeding Machine." In a suit on the note, it was held:

1. To constitute a negotiable promissory note, the time or the event for its ultimate payment must be fixed and certain; yet it may be made subject to contingencies, upon the happening of which, prior to the time of its absolute payment, it shall become due.
2. The contingency may depend upon some act to be done or omitted by the maker or upon the occurrence of some event indicated in the note, but not upon any act of the payee or holder, whereby the note may become due at an earlier day.
3. The note in suit was negotiable.

Error to the Common Pleas of Lancaster county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J.

This case hinges upon whether the instrument is a negotiable promissory note. It contains language sufficient to make it one. That language is a promise to pay, twelve months after date, to the payee named, or bearer, a specific sum of money, for value received. It is contended, however, that it contains too much. That the addition of "or before, if made out of the sale of W. S. Coffman's Improved Broad-cast Seeding Machine" changes its character and destroys its negotiability. The addition of some words beyond what are necessary to constitute a negotiable promissory note, do not destroy its character as such. Thus it was held in Zimmerman v. Anderson, 17 P. F. Smith, 421, that the addition of "waiving the right of appeal a valuation, appraisement, stay and exemption laws," did not destroy its negotiability.

It is claimed that the character of this instrument is changed by the fact, that in the contingency of the same being sooner realized from the sale of the machinery, it might become payable within the year.

The general rule to be extracted from the authorities undoubtedly, requires that, to constitute a valid promissory note, it must be for the payment of money at some fixed period of time, or upon some event which must inevitably happen. That it is not such a note if it purports to make the payment depend upon a contingency or uncertainty. Nor is it sufficient that the contingency does in fact happen afterwards, upon which the payment is to become absolute. Its character as a promissory note cannot depend upon future events, but solely upon its character when created. Story on Prom. Notes, § 22. Yet it is an equally well written rule of commercial law that it may be made payable at sight, or at a fixed period after notice, or on request, or on demand, without destroying its negotiable character. The reason for this, said Lord Tenterden in Clayton v. Gosling, 5 Barn. & Cressw. 360, is that "it was made payable at a time which we must suppose would arrive."

In Jordan v. Tate, 19 Ohio, it was ruled that the negotiable character of a promissory note is not affected by the fact that it was made payable by its terms, on or before a future day therein named Though the maker has the right to pay such note at any time after its date, yet for all purposes of negotiation it is to be regarded as a note payably solely on the day therein named.

No case has been cited in which the court has distinctly ruled upon such a form of note, yet we think this decision is in accord with the general sentiment of the legal mind of our State.

In Cota v. Buck, 7 Metc. 588, in addition to language sufficient to give it negotiability, the note proceeded "it being for property I purchased of him in value at this date, as being payable as soon as can be realized of the above amount for the said property I have this day purchased of said Peco (the payee), which is to be paid in the course of the season now coming." The instrument was held to be a negotiable note. In giving the opinion of the court Shaw, C. J., said, "We think the meaning was this, that the signer, for value received, in the purchase of property, promised to pay Peco or bearer the sum named as soon as the termination of the coming season, and sooner, if the amount could be sooner realized out of the funds. Such refer ence to the sale of the property was not to fix the fund from which it was to be paid, but the time of payment. The undertaking to pay was absolute and did not depend on the fund. So as to the time. Whatever time may be understood as the "coming season," whether harvest time, or the end of the year, it must come by mere lapse of time, and that must be the ultimate limit of the time of payment."

Carlon v. Kensaly, 12 Mees. & Wels. Exch. 139, was an action brought by an endorsee against the maker. The note was payable by instalments, subject to a condition that on default being made in payment of the first instalment, the whole amount should become immediately payable. The declaration averred that the payee endorsed the note to plaintiff, that the defendant made default in payment of the first instalment, and that he had not paid the amount of the note. Upon special demurrer on the ground that the note was not made according to the custom of merchants, and consequently that the right of action thereon could not pass by endorsement, and that on joinder in demurrer the court held the instrument to be a negotiable promissory note, and on default being made by the maker in payment of the first instalment, the endorser was liable for the whole amount. Lord Abinger, C. B., said, "I think there is no ground for saying the defendant is not liable." Peake, B., said, "Now, to hold that action could not be maintained upon such notes as this would be to impugn all the established practice. Almost every note payably by instalments, has such a condition. It is not a contingency. It depends on the act of the maker himself, and on his default it becomes a promissory note for the whole amount."

To these authorities is interposed the doctrine of Lord Campbell, C. J., in Alexander v. Thomas, 71 E. C. L. Rep. 333. The language of the note, however, in that case failed to declare clearly that the contingency must necessarily precede the ninety days named for the payment

It was "payable ninety days after sight, or when realized." So it was at last open to question whether "when realized" might not make the doing of an act beyond the ninety days. If so, it was made such a contingency as to its absolute payment as to clearly destroy the negotiable character of the instrument.

The principle to be deducted from the authorities is this, to constitute a negotiable promissory note, the time or the event for its ultimate payment must be fixed and certain; yet it may be made subject to contingencies, upon the happening of which, prior to the time of its absolute payment, it shall become due. The contingency depends upon some act done or omitted to be done by the maker, or upon the occurrence of some event indicated in the note, and not upon any act of the payee or holder whereby the note may become due at an earlier day. Hence it is not in conflict with the decision of this court, which declared that if the instrument contained a power under which the payee might enter judgment upon it. its negotiable character was entirely destroyed. We think the learned judge was correct in holding this note to be negotiable. None of the other errors assigned were urged.

Judgment affirmed.

Common Pleas, Luzerne Co

GRIFFIN v. FELLOWS et al.

1. Under the confirming acts of Assembly of 1826, 1831, and 1835, the relation of landlord and tenant, in case of a lease by the public committee of the township of Providence, in Luzerne county, made in 1796, claiming the Connecticut title, exists with the same effect as in leases held under title derived from a Pennsylvania claimant.
2. In the premises of a lease for the term of nine hundred and ninety-nine years, the lessor granted, demised, set and to farm let the land described. The habendum clause was as follows: "To have and to hold the above granted and demised premises, with every privilege, right, member and appurtenances whatsoever, to the same premises belonging, or in anywise appertaining, whether ways, waters, water courses, mines and minerals, of whatever description," &c.: Held, that although there was no opened mines at the time of the demise, the lessee had the right to dig for minerals, and to mine and take them away.
3. When a lease permits the opening of mines, it is not a cause of forfeiture for the tenant to work them even to exhaustion.
4. The term "minerals" embraces everything not of the mere surface, which is used for agricultural purposes. Granite, as well as fossils, are comprehended within it.
5. An ancient grant is to be construed by evidence of the manner in which the thing granted has always been possessed and used, for so the parties must be supposed to have intended.
6. A tenant for years does not incur a forfeiture of his term by entering into articles of agreement for the sale of the demised premises in fee, nor by absolute conveyance of the fee by deed. By such agreement or deed the estate of the reversioner is not divested. No other effect is given to such instruments than that of passing such interest only as the lessee might lawfully part with.—Lus. Leg. Reg.

Opinion by ELWELL, P. J.

The plaintiff seeks to recover, in this action, the possession of fifty acres of land, situate in that part of the city of Scranton which was formerly the borough of Hyde Park, in the certified township of Providence. His title was not much questioned upon the argument For the purpose of this case, under the view which I take of the rights of the defendants as lessees under the legal title, it may be conceded that the title rested in the public committee of the township of Providence, by the certificate dated in 1807, granted by the commissioners appointed under the act offering compensation to Pennsylvania, claimants of certain lands within the seventeen townships of Luzerne county, passed on the 4th April, 1799, and its supplement, together with the patent from the commonwealth dated in 1812, became vested in the plaintiff by the deed from the majority of the trustees of said township, on the 13th day of March, 1865.

Both parties in this controversy trace their rights back to what is called the "Connecticut title." The certificate granted to the public committee is of itself conclusive evidence that they, or those from whom they derived the title, were actual settlers prior to the decree of Trenton, in 1782.

On the 8th of September, 1796, the then public committee of the township of Providence executed and delivered to Joseph Fellows a lease of the land in question.

for the term of nine hundred and ninety-nine years, for the yearly rent of four pounds and four shillings and the taxes. The plaintiff now contends that this lease was, at the time of making it, absolutely void, and conferred no estate upon the lessee. And we are cited to the act of the 11th of April, 1795, which forbids the taking of possession of any lands in Luzerne county under color of title not derived from the commonwealth or the late proprietor. But neither this act nor that of 6th April, 1802, applied to lands within the seventeen townships.

It is unnecessary to refer particularly to the several acts of Assembly in reference to this subject. In 1814 (see 6 Laws Penn. 122,) the Legislature repealed the whole list of intrusion laws, acts to protect territorial limits, &c., and in 1813 so far recognized some rights of Connecticut claimants as to respect the law which suspended the act of limitation where lands were claimed under Connecticut. Prior to this time it was decided by the Supreme Court in Carkhuff v. Anderson, 3 Binn. 4, that the interest of a Connecticut settler in land within the seventeen townships, who was entitled by the act of 1799 to obtain a patent, was subject to the lien of a judgment. This case, in effect, decides what was expressly held by Judge Scott in Barney v. Sutton, 2 Watts, 3, to wit, that after acquired title of a Connecticut settler by a certificate under the act, enured to the advantage of a purchaser, where the vendor had conveyed or executed a contract before acquiring the legal title.

On the 8th day of April, 1826, a law was passed enacting "that the relation of landlord and tenant shall exist, and be held as fully and effectually between Connecticut settlers, and between Connecticut settlers and Pennsylvania claimants, as between other citizens of the commonwealth on the trial of any cause now pending or hereafter to be brought within the commonwealth, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding." This act was held in Setterlee v. Matthewson, 16 S. & R. 169, to be constitutional, and upon a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States the decision was affirmed.

But still more to the purpose, and directly in the line of the plaintiff's title, and without which he must have failed for want of authority in the committee or trustees to make a conveyance, is the act of 2d April, 1831, Pamphlet L., 367, and the supplement thereto, passed April 14th, 1835, by which all leases before made by the committee of the proprietors of Providence township, were confirmed and declared valid.

The objection to the lease on this ground is an ungracious one, coming, as it does, from a landlord who holds under or by virtue of the same act of Assembly which confirmed the tenant's title, and who is presumed to have knowledge of the fact, that for seventy years prior to his purchase the rent reserved had been to, and received by his predecessors in the title. If there were no confirming act of Assembly, there would arise, after this lapse of time, a presumption of confirmation by the lessor by the acceptance of rent and the written receipt therefor.

It is contended, secondly, by the counsel for the plaintiff, that the tenant has forfeited his term, by having conveyed a greater estate in the land than he possessed.

The facts as stated do not show any conveyance by the tenant. He entered into articles of agreement for the sale of a number of lots in August, 1865, and covenanted with the purchaser, that on the full payment of the purchase money (the last instalment of which sould fall due in 1875) he would execute and deliver to him a good and sufficient deed of the land, sold in fee simple, with covenant of warranty.

The law of England upon the subject of forfeiture, the common law, does not go the length of declaring that even a conveyance by a tenant will in all cases work a forfeiture. In order to have this effect, it must be such as displaces or divests the estate of the reversioner; if it have not that effect, the law will not adjudge it a forfeiture. It must, therefore, be by feoffment and livery, for this only operates upon the possession, and effects a disseisin. It cannot be by a grant or any other conveyance in the nature of a grant, such as lease and release, or bargain and sale—conveyances of this kind operating only on the grantor's interest, and passing only what he may lawfully part with. 5 Bac. Abr. 668, Title Lease and Form for Years; Co. Litt. 251, 6; 1 Blk. Com. 274, n; 1 Chitty's Genl. Prac. 243, 4, 287; 1 Bouvier's Law Dict. 602, and cases cited; 2 Blk. Com. 120, n.

The reason for the distinction as to the effect of the different modes of conveyance is this: "A feoffment may be a tortious conveyance creating a fee, even though made by the owner of a particular estate, and therefore incurring a forfeiture; but a lease and release form, but an innocent conveyance, which transfers only such an interest as the party conveying has, and therefore may be used without forfeiting his estate." 1 Chitty Gen. Prac. 327.

In McKee v. Pfouts, 3 Dall. 486, it was held by the Supreme Court of this State, and recognized as the law in numerous cases, that a conveyance by bargain and sale, acknowledged and recorded, of an estate in fee simple by tenant by the courtsey, was not a forfeiture of his estate, the reason being that a deed of bargain and sale operates by way of use, and conveys no greater estate than the bargain and sale may lawfully convey; therefore it never was considered as inducing a forfeiture on common law principles. Dunwoodie v. Reed, 3 S. & R. 445–454; 4 Kent Com. 85, 454. If a deed, the ordinary mode of conveyance, cannot work a forfeiture, surely a mere agreement to convey, which may or may nor be carried out, will not have that effect.

It is contended lastly by the counsel for the plaintiff, that the term is forfeited by reason of waste committed by the tenant upon the demised premises by opening mines thereon, by mining and selling annually large quantities of coal, and by opening and working, for the purpose of sale, stone quarries for a number of years before the commencement of this suit.

It is an important fact in the case that there were no opened mines or quarries on the premises at the date of the lease; that mining of coal was first commenced by the tenant in 1810, and quarrying stone in 1855 or 1856.

These acts were to the prejudice of the reversioner, and were undoubtedly waste, operating as a forfeiture of the term, and entitling the lessor to recover the premises by ejectment, unless they were authorized by the lease, or the forfeiture was by some act of his. This brings us to the consideration of the most important and difficult part of the case, involving the proper construction of the lease, and a determination of the rights of the parties under it.

In the first or granting part of the indenture, the lessors say that they "have, and a majority of them hath granted, demised, set and to farm let, and by these presents do grant, demise, lease, set and to farm let, unto the said Joseph Fellows, his executors, administrators and assigns, all that certain tract of land" (describing these several lots or tracts). Then follows this clause, "to have and to hold the above granted and demised premises with every privilege, right, member and appurtenances whatsoever to the same premises belonging, or in anywise appertaining, whether ways, waters, water courses, mines and minerals, of whatever description, to the said Joseph Fellows, his executors, administrators or assigns, for and during and until the full end and term of nine hundred and ninety-nine years, fully to be completed and ended."

It is the office of the habendum clause in a deed to determine what estate or interest is granted. It may lessen, enlarge, explain or qualify the estate granted in the premises. 2 Blk. Com. 298. Unless totally repugnant to the estate granted, the words of the habendum are to receive the same construction as if contained in the first part of the instrument. In Wager v. Wager, 1 S. & R. 375, it was said by Tilghman, C. J., that "one of the most important rules in the construction of deeds is so to construe them that no part shall be rejected. The object of all construction is to ascertain the intent of the parties, and it must have been their intent to have some meaning in every part." This rule applied to the lease relieves the mind from all doubt as to the meaning of the parties. When the lessors said that the lessee should have every privilege of mines and minerals, it was clearly their intention that he should reap some benefit and advantage from the exercise and enjoyment of that privilege. It never could have been contemplated that the tenant should forfeit all rights if he made those expressly granted to him available. The right to the minerals being granted to him, he might dig for them. It is a well settled rule that when anything is granted, all the means to obtain it, and all the fruits and effects of it, are granted also, and all shall pass inclusive together with the thing by the grant of the thing itself. Noyes' Maxims, 198.

If there be a lease of land with the mines in it, and there be no open mines, the lessee may dig for mines, otherwise the grant as to the mines will not take effect. Sanders' Case, 5 Rep. 12, a, b; 1 Inst. 54, b; Liford's Case, 11 Rep. 52; Co. Litt. 59 b, 1 W. Saund. 323, n, c; 10 Bac. Abr. 427; 1 Wash. Real Prop. 412.

The case of Whitfield v. Bewit, 2 Pecre Wms., 240, is not in conflict with Sanders' Case, nor with the general doctrine as stated above. There the grantor conveyed to trustees the fee simple of the lands, with all mines, &c., to his own use for life, remainder to A. for life, remainder to his first son in tail with other remainders stated, remainder to the grantor in fee. It was held, that being a tenant for life, A. could not commit waste by opening mines, and that the words mines, trees, &c., were introduced that all should pass to the trustees, but as they were part of the inheritance, no one should have power over them, but such as had an estate of inheritance limited to them.

The words used in conveying the fee to the trustee were the mere usual and formal words to convey a fee, and there was nothing to indicate that the tenant for life was to hold the property dispunishable of waste. It is very evident it was not the design of the lord chancellor to overrule Sanders' Case, but to distinguish the case under consideration from that. The one was a conveyance of the fee to trustees to support remainders for life and in fee, while the other was a lease of a present interest to the lessee, in which the words used could have no operation or effect unless the tenant was permitted to open and work the mines.

In a lease designed merely for agricultural purposes there is no occasion to say anything in regard to the mines or minerals where there are no open mines, unless it is intended to grant some interest therein. When they are mentioned it must be considered that there was a purpose in doing so, and when that purpose is plainly and expressly declared to be a privilege, a benefit to be enjoyed by the lessee, the case of Whitfield v. Bewit is not authority against the exercise of the privilege granted.

The term "mineral, embraces everything not of the mere surface, which is used for agricultural purposes; the granite of the mountains, as well as metallic ores and fossils, are comprehended within it. Earl of Ross v. Wainman, 14 M. & W. 859; Bainbridge on Mines, 1, note 1.

Having considered the case thus far upon the effect of the words of the lease, let us for a moment examine it in the light of the conduct of the parties.

It was said, per Lord Hardwicke, in Attorney General v. Parker, 3 Atk. 576, "that there is no better way of construing ancient grants and deeds than by usage." And the uniform course of modern authorities fully establishes the rule that an ancient grant is to be construed by evidence of the manner in which the thing granted has always been possessed and used; for so the parties thereto must be supposed to have intended. Weld v. Hornby, 7 East. 199; Rex v. Osborne, 4 East. 327.

More than half a century before the bringing of this suit, the lessee and those claiming his title, mined coal upon the demised premises. More than ten years before suit was brought they made valuable improvements for the purpose of mining coal, and annually mined, since 1855, from 3,000 to 5,000 tons. During all this period the lessors were annually, or from time to time, receiving the stipulated rent, without, so far as appears in the case, a word of complaint either from the trustees or any inhabitant. It is true that it is not expressly stated that the trustees had notice of the opening of mines by the tenant; but after this great lapse of time, and the notoriety which always attends the operations of mining coal, it may fairly be presumed and taken as prima facie evidence that not only the committee, but all the inhabitants of the township had full knowledge, as well of the acts of the tenant in mining, as of the large amount expended in the way of improvements for the purpose of mining. Under these facts, if it were even doubtful whether the words, "every privilege to the premises belonging, whether mines or minerals," &c., were intended to give the right to dig for, mine and take away coal, the meaning of the parties is elucidated by the conduct which they have pursued. The right to mine coal, as claimed by the lessee, has been exercised since 1810, and fully acquiesced in by the lessor by the receipt of the rent down to the 1st day of January, 1865.

But I put the decision of the case upon higher ground than that of waiver of forfeiture, and hold, that upon the face of the lease there is granted the absolute right to take minerals from the land demised, and for that purpose to dig the soil and open mines. When a lease permits the opening of mines, it is not waste for the tenant to work them even to exhaustion. Per Read, J., Kier v. Peterson, 5 Wright, 361. The conclusions at which I have arrived in this case may be summed up and briefly stated as follow:

1st. That Joseph W. Griffin, the plaintiff, at the commencement of this suit held the legal title to the land in question by virtue of a deed from two of the trustees of the public land of the certified township of Providence.

2d. That the lease by the public committee of said township, made on the 8th day of September, 1796, to Joseph Fellows, for the term of nine hundred and ninety-nine years, for the rent of four pounds and four shillings annually, is a valid and binding instrument, and the conveyance of the legal title to the plaintiff was subject to all the rights of the defendants as assignees holding under that lease.

3d. That the articles of agreement entered into by Joseph Fellows, the present holder of the leasehold interest, to sell and convey in fee simple certain lots to Joseph J. Postens, W. B. Carling and others, did not operate as a forfeiture of the term. If he had conveyed by deed, the only effect would have been to convey the residue of the term of years, and therefore no injury to the reversioner.

4th. By the terms of the lease, as well as by the construction given to it by the acts of the parties for more than fifty years before the plaintiff acquired his title, the lessee and his assigns have the right to mine coal and quarry stone for the purpose of sale.

5th. Upon the whole case, the defendants, holding as assignee of the original lessee, have the right of possession as against the plaintiff. Therefore, judgment for the defendants upon the case stated.

D. R. Randall, Esq., for plaintiff.

A. T. McClintock, Esq., for defendants.

Note. This case was taken to the Supreme Court by writ of error, and affirmed in the opinion of the court below, March, 1873.

U. S. Circuit Court of Texas.

UNITED STATES v. THROCKMORTON et al.

A surety in a bond of a public officer to the government, is by his discharge in bankruptcy released from liability on said bond, even though the officer had made no default at the time of the surety's discharge.

The opinion of the court was delivered by DUVAL, J.

This suit was brought on the 21st day of May, 1872, against the defendants, as sureties upon the bond of Robert H. Lane, deceased, given as collector of internal revenue for the second collection district of the State of Texas.

In bar of the action, one of the defendants, William Hooks, has pleaded his discharge in bankruptcy, setting out the same in hæc verba; and the question for decision is whether this defendant, as a surety to the government, is discharged under the bankrupt act. The discharge is dated 16th March, 1868. The 34th section of the act provides "that a discharge duly granted under this act shall (with certain exceptions thereto) release the bankrupt from all debts, claims, liabilities and demands which were or might have been proved against his estate in bankruptcy, and may be pleaded by a simple averment that on the day of its date such discharge was granted to him, setting the same forth in hæc verba, as a full and complete bar to all suits brought on any such debts, claims, liabilities or demands, and the certificate shall be conclusive evidence in favor of such bankrupt of the fact of the regularity of such discharge."

The exceptions referred to, and which the discharge would not bar, are specified in the 33d section of the act. It provides "that no debt created by the fraud or embezzlement of the bankrupt, or by his defalcation as a public officer, or while acting in any fiduciary character, shall be discharged under this act; * * and no discharge granted under this act shall release, discharge, or affect any person liable for the same debt for or with the bankrupt, either as partner, joint contractor, endorsee, surety, or otherwise."

Now, does the case of the defendant, Hooks, fall within any of these exceptions? I think not. He has committed no defalcation as a public officer, because he held no office; neither as a surety for the collector, can he be regarded as acting in a fiduciary character. If the defendant has committed no defalcation as a public officer, and was not acting in a fiduciary capacity (which in my judgment he was not), no other portions of the exceptions specified in the act can have any possible application to his case.

That the discharge is a bar in this case, is further apparent to my mind by a consideration of the 14th section of the act. It is therein provided "that if the bankrupt shall be bound as owner, endorsee surety, bail or guarantor upon any bill, bond, note, or any other specialty or contract, or for any debt of another person, and his liability shall not have become absolute until after the adjudication of bankruptcy, the creditor may prove the same after such liability shall have become fixed, and before the final dividend shall have been declared. In all cases of contingent debts and contingent liabilities contracted by the bankrupt, and not herein otherwise provided for, the creditor may make claim therefor, and have his claim allowed, with the right to share in the dividends, if the contingency shall happen before the order for the final dividend; or he may at any time apply to the court to have the present value of the debt or liability ascertained and liquidated, which shall then be done in such manner as the court shall order, and he shall be allowed to prove for the amount so ascertained."

My construction of this provision is, that where the payment of a debt cannot be enforced until the happening of some contingency, such debt, being readily estimated, may be proved; or if the extent of a liability depends on the happening of a contingency, and such contingency is reasonably certain to happen before final dividend, the court may, by some method, determine the value to be placed by the claimant on such value, and admit him to prove it. But in this case the contingency did not happen before the final dividend; or, if it did, the government made no effort to have the value of the liability ascertained, or to prove it in the bankrupt court. A final dividend was made and the defendant discharged nearly four years before the bringing of this suit. To this hour the extent of the liability of the sureties on Lane's bond is undetermined, and can only be fixed by judicial determination yet to be had.

I am unable to see, either from any provisions of the bankrupt act, or any principle of general law, that the government is excepted out of the provisions of the bankrupt law making the discharge in this case a bar to the action. My opinion on this subject is sustained by Judge McLean, in the case of the United States v. Davis, 3d McLean R. 483.

The plea in bar is sustained, and the case dismissed as to defendant Hooks.

ST. MARY'S BENEFICIAL SOCIETY v. BURFORD'S ADMINISTRATOR.

1. The charter of a beneficial society stated its object to be to afford relief to its members and their families, to defray expenses of their funerals, or such other cases of distress as should be defined by the by-laws; it authorized the society to ordain, &c., by-laws, &c., necessary for its government, and generally to do the matters, &c., lawful for them to do for the well being of the society, &c. A by-law provided, that at the death of a member "entitled to benefits," $60 should be paid to his widow or legal representatives. Held, that this provision was within the power of legislating for the well being of the society.

2. A by-law provided, that the steward should withhold benefits, when intemperance, debauchery, &c., were the cause of death. Held, not to be an unreasonable regulation.

3. The regulation is not a determination of the right of the member; the member or his widow may call for a proper trial in the society; it merely restrains the steward from paying until the right is so decided.

4. The provision that the widow of a member who dies from intemperance shall not receive benefits, is reasonable.

5. A purely voluntary association may adopt such reasonable regulations as conduce to their interest.

6. Such societies may prohibit their members from indulgence in vices which multiply disease and death among them, and thus diminish their general fund.

7. Such provisions are not to regulate behavior, but to strike at acts on whose results relief is to depend.

8. The by-law withholding benefits in case of intemperance, &c., is not expulsion or total denial of benefits, but the loss of benefits, pro hac vice; the membership remains.

9. The title to benefits remains and attaches to every case of death not from the prohibited vices.

DEATH OF HON. WILLIAM MORRIS MEREDITH.

On Sunday last, August 17th, 1873, died the Hon. William Morris Meredith, aged 75 years. By his death Philadelphia has lost one of its truest citizens, its bar has lost one of its greatest lawyers, and our country is compelled to mourn the demise of one of its brightest and best patriots. Like many other great lawyers, Mr. Meredith passed the early years of his professional career in comparative obscurity. He was admitted to the bar in 1817, but he had to wait several years before his eminent abilities were in the slightest degree appreciated. This interval he improved by the most arduous and diligent study.

From the time of Mr. Meredith's first appearance in public life, he gave proof of those superior talents and that excellent genius which won him the first rank of his profession, and the esteem, love and respect of his fellow citizens. Whether he be viewed as a man, a lawyer, or a citizen, every one must testify to his pre-eminent learning, wisdom and characteristic purity. He now is gone, and we cannot better picture his many virtues, than by publishing in full the proceedings in the Court of Quarter Sessions on Monday last, and at the bar meeting on Wednesday.

In the Court of Quarter Sessions on Monday last, after the hearing of the habeas corpus cases, the following proceedings were had. District Attorney Mann, arising inside the bar, said:

May it please the court—"It is with sincere and deep regret that I announce to the court the death of the Hon. William M. Meredith. No one can more keenly than your honor realize the great loss that his death has inflicted upon this bar, and upon the State and Nation.

Mr. Meredith was yesterday the acknowledged head of our bar—to-day we are without a leader—for his acquirements were so extensive, his knowledge so profound, and his abilities so great, that the mind cannot rest upon any one, or even suggest one so pre-eminent as worthy to be called his successor. His private virtues endeared him to all who knew him; his public services will always be gratefully admitted and acknowledged.

To do justice to his memory requires an abler voice than mine. I will not attempt it. I simply move, in respect to it, that this court do now adjourn."

Judge Ludlow, in reply, said: "It is eminently proper for the only court now in session in this county to pause in the transaction of its ordinary business, and pay a just tribute to the memory of an illustrious man. For more than a quarter of a century, William M. Meredith has occupied the position of a leader at the Pennsylvania bar; his reputation long since established, was maintained to the end. Distinguished alike for his keen wit, powerful logic and commanding eloquence, he was a most remarkable man, and his loss is one which, while it will create a wide-spread and sincere sorrow, is almost irreparable.

The links which bind us to the past are one after another broken; the man we have been accustomed to admire departs, the lips from which we have learned lessons of profound wisdom are closed forever, but there is a victory which death cannot achieve, for a life adorned by intellectual efforts of the highest order, and illustrated by every Christian virtue, is immortal. This is not the time or place for an extended eulogy upon the deceased, but I am thankful for an opportunity as a judicial officer thus to pay an imperfect but honest public tribute to the memory of my old teacher and friend.

And now, August 18th, 1873, let a minute of these proceedings be entered at length upon the records of this court, and let the court stand adjourned until Tuesday morning, at 10 A. M."

At noon on Wednesday a meeting of the members of the bar, attended by almost all the lawyers now present in the city, was held in District Court Room No. 1, to take action relative to Mr. Meredith's death.

Precisely at 12 o'clock, Hon. William M. Stokes arose and said that he had been requested to call this meeting to order, and to propose the selection of officers. He then recommended Judge Sharswood as chairman of the meeting. Mr. Edward M. Shippen was elected Secretary.

Judge Sharswood, in assuming the chair, said it would have been more appropriate for the chief justice to have taken this chair, but his absence from the city prevented him. He then read the following letter from the chief justice:

"I didn't know of Mr. Meredith's death until this morning, and then through the Philadelphia papers of Monday. He was one of my earliest friends, and we were classmates in the University of Pennsylvania, and graduated July, 1812. He was the youngest, and I was the next youngest in our class. I need not speak of his great ability, which fitted him both for the bar and the Senate. I had a warm affection for him as friend and associate."

Judge Sharswood resumed by referring to the death of Mr. Meredith; and stating that in him were nobly blended characters which rarely meet in the same person; characters which go to make up the profound lawyer and sound and safe counsel. There are some men who are noted for one of these characters. One has the powers of great research, and it is seldom that you find one possessing this faculty with that of fluency of speech.

Mr. Meredith was remarkable for a faculty known as acumen. With a jury, who had more power? Who could seize the points of a case with such readiness, or place them before the jury as it suited him? In every assembly with which he was connected, he was at the lead. We all knew the characteristics of his private life—that geniality of temper and fund of humor for which he was noted.

Henry J. Williams, Esq., said:

This is not an ordinary occasion. A great man had fallen, and he could not fail to add his mite to the testimonials of regret that would be showered upon his memory. Mr. Meredith and the speaker began their labors at the bar at about the same time.

They had always been intimate, and their association constant, and they frequently discussed the prospect and probabilities of their success, and occasionally gave way to despondency. We all know that Mr. Meredith had no cause for this despondency. Fortunately for us and fortunately for himself, he did not leave Philadelphia, as he once almost determined to do. Success came to him slowly, but it came surely, and when it did come, it was overflowing.

The speaker cited a case in which Mr. Meredith was early engaged, in which there was not a single point which he made which was not decided in his favor. The result of this case established Mr. Meredith's character as a sound lawyer, and from that time there was no doubt as to his ability.

Mr. Meredith was not only a profound lawyer but the most eloquent advocate. It was not eloquence in manner, but the power of thought to which he gave expression in the most fitting words. There were very few speakers to whom he listened with such gratification as to Mr. Meredith.

Can any one doubt that the death of such a man is a loss not only to the profession, but to the community? It has been said that the life of a lawyer is like the traces of sand on the sea-shore, obliterated by the first turn of tide. I cannot believe it. Mr. Chairman, I cannot but believe that the talent of Mr. Meredith will long be remembered by the gentlemen of the bar throughout the country.

Mr. Williams then offered the following resolutions:—

Resolved, That the bar of Philadelphia have learned with profound regret the decease of their late fellow member, the Hon. Wm. M. Meredith.

Resolved, That the bar desire on this occasion to record their sense of the deep loss which they, in connection with the public, have sustained by the death of Mr. Meredith.

Gifted with abilities of the highest order, he was equally distinguished for his legal learning and various attainments, for strict integrity and high tone of professional conduct. His shining talents and purity of character threw a lustre over the bar of which for many years he was the acknowledged leader. In the numerous important positions which he held during his long and brilliant career, he rendered eminent services to his State and country.

Resolved, That a committee of —— be appointed to communicate the proceedings of this meeting to the family of the deceased, and to tender to them the heartfelt condolence of the bar.

Judge Cadwalader, in seconding the resolutions, said:

I estimated Mr. Meredith as a self-educated statesman. He should be recollected before we speak of him as a lawyer, not merely as an educated but a practical statesman. He came into life inheriting the principles of the old Federal party, and he adhered to them. He became a politician, but with him it was the conduct of a dutiful citizen; and in his political relation he served his country, and he thought he did so by serving his party. He seems to have disregarded the rank in which he should render public service.

In whatever relation you found him, he looked down from above, and gave his own views of the petty contentions of public men. Mr. Meredith believed that the government of a free country could not be exercised without strict adherence to party organization.

Through this primary education as a statesman, he looked downward from above instead of upward from below in his search after a knowledge of general jurisprudence. It was easy to him. It was the general, uniform, complete organization of everything in the practice of his profession which renders his career remarkable. As to Mr. Meredith, when he was a toiling young man, I can say that those who were his immediate friends, never doubted that he was to be a leader in every walk of life, in which he might be engaged. The last relation in which he was publicly known, is one which admonishes us of the uncertainty of destiny. I refer to the Geneva arbitration, the greatest tribunal which ever sat for the dispensation of public justice.

We had a gleam of sunshine when we thought that our fellow citizen was to participate in the action of that body but he was prevented by the organic disease that finally caused his death. When we read the report of the proceedings of that "more than Amphictyonic counsel," we must feel that the whole human race were losers by his absence. We will never see a greater, and it may be, perhaps, long before we will see an equal statesman and lawyer.

Peter McCall, Esq., the next speaker, said:

Words are inadequate to express the sentiments that all feel. I believe that the death of Mr. Meredith is a public calamity. We shall no more look up to him for guidance and counsel; the ripe fruit, sir, has fallen into its mother earth; he has gone from us forever. Surely the path of glory leads but to the grave. I do not desire to deal in excessive praise, for no man was more averse to that than the man whose death we lament. There was in him a combination of faculties and powers, such as are rarely found in one man. He was a brilliant man, and sound as well as brilliant, and these natural faculties were improved by the highest culture. His extensive knowledge on all subjects made him the most delightful converser. Sir, he was a great lawyer; not a case lawyer, but a philosophical lawyer; his mind had been built on the foundations of law; he had drunk deep of the fountain of jurisprudence. Thus saturated with legal principles, when a new case arose, depending upon analogy, there he showed his great power, and he was a valuable assistant. His manner of speaking has been dwelt upon here. It was of the Demosthenian order. Often he enlivened his discourse with flashes of wit, and was capable, sir, of the deepest pathos. His professional escutcheon is without a stain; himself the sense of honor, he was keenly alive to the honor of his profession. He set his face like a flint against the practice of contingent fees. I have known him on more than one occasion return a very large fee, such was his delicacy in all money matters. His emoluments as district attorney of the United States were but eight hundred per year. He was not a mere money maker, he argued a case for the principles it contained.

Mr. Meredith was a great debater. He ought to have been in the Senate of the United States. His efforts in the Constitutional Convention which framed the present law of Pennsylvania, established his reputation in this State.

In the present Constitutional Convention he was selected as chairman, but stayed there, alas! too long; he died in harness, and died, as he would like to have died, in the public service.

Mr. Hazlehurst said:

He would add a very few words to what had already been said in reference to the estimable man whose death had occasioned this meeting. A useful and valued life had been brought to a close—an honorable counsellor had fallen. The members of the profession will cherish his memory with affectionate recollections. Our community will hold in grateful remembrance the faithful performance of all the duties which were imposed upon him. They were all well performed, having reference to their interests and to his character. As an advocate he was unsurpassed. Loving his profession, he at all times maitained its dignity and the rights of its members.

His charming manners, simple habits, and pure life secured for him the confidence of the people of the city of his birth and affections—he never betrayed them. No suspicion ever reached any act of his. His course was onward and upward. In your councils, as a member of the Legislature, called upon on two different occasions to aid in reforming the organic law of this commonwealth, and, dying, it may be said, with the baton in his hand, he was the bright exemplar of all that was faithful and true. It is here that the great loss is felt—the loss of his exemple.

Judge Ludlow addressed the meeting as follows:

Upon Monday last it became my duty as a public officer to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of William M. Meredith. Now I mingle with my brethren of this bar to pay a like tribute, as a lawyer and as a man, to the memory of one who was my master, benefactor and friend.

More than thirty years since, as a youth, I was introduced to this great leader of our bar, and from that time to this I enjoyed his friendship. Of the many students who received his instruction during my time, six have died, while of the remainder, two are at this bar at this time (though not in active practice), and I find myself to-day the only surviving representative of that office. Judge Hare preceeded me, and I regret that his absence from the city prevents his attendance today. Mr. Meredith was a conscientious teacher. He taught to his students the doctrines of the common law, and moreover imbued their minds with true principles of honor. He rigidly examined such of his students as desired it from October to May in each year.

The most striking characteristic of Mr. Meredith was strength. His large and commanding frame attracted the attention of every one. In the calm quiet of the office, in the social circle, and as he approached the bar of the court, his very appearance commanded your notice, and his robust constitution enabled him to contend against a disease which would long since have terminated the career of any ordinary man. As some one has elsewhere said, "He was before you like a column, on which no ordinary weight of public burden might be safely laid." The very lines of his countenance, the flash of his eye, betokened no ordinary decision or strength of purpose. His intellect was strong; its rugged proportions were toned down by cultivation, but his logic was profound, his analysis like a sledge-hammer, and woe betide the antagonist who misunderstood the strength of the one or the perfection and power of the other. His will was strong. He aimed at the truth, and would reach it if success were possible. Even his wit had an element of strength about it which was wonderful, and I have witnessed on more than one occasion the utter discomfiture and overthrow of an antagonist by the use of this, in his hands, most powerful weapon. His affections were strong. To any one who looked upon his large frame and rugged features, this remark might be considered inappropriate, but by those who knew him in social life, his students, his associates, and his family, I know the truth of the remark will be admitted.

It will not do to draw aside the veil which divides his family from the world; but I can and will say that when, as a student, I saw the manifestations of his regard for his family, especially his younger children, no one could doubt the strength of his affections, or cease to admire the man who could amuse his children as only a great man can do. But his affections were not restrained to the limit of the family circle—they went beyond it, and I have especial reason thus to speak; for, in addition to that kindness which marked my daily intercourse with him, it is impossible to forget the moments of my life when, with a firm purpose and the strength of his great manhood, he stood beside me as my benefactor and friend. The voice of eulogy cannot reach him now. The admiration of this world counts as nothing, but turning my eyes heavenward I can and will exclaim, may God's riches blessings descend upon his children, and his children's children, from generation to generation!

Only last spring our deceased friend spoke to me concerning the state of his health. He knew that his disease was fatal, and that at any moment he might cease to live, but like such a man he calmly surveyed his approaching dissolution, and he died as calmly as shuts the eye of day at eventide, or as dies a wave along the shore.

He has departed, but shall we call his dissolution death? Ah no, of such a man, adorned by every virtue, with the sacred poet may we not truly say:

> "It is not death to die,
> To leave this weary road,
> And with the brotherhood on high
> To be at home with God."

Mr. Charles H. A. Essling said:

He hoped it would not be deemed inappropriate for the younger members of the bar to add their tribute to the memory of the deceased. He, as among the last line of students, thought it proper to make a few remarks, as upon the death of the sire, the youngest as well as the oldest receive alike their heritage of grief.

When a student, the speaker, while sitting in Mr. Meredith's office alone, often thought that his clients were not laymen, but lawyers, great lawyers, who went to him for advice.

After he was admitted he went to his preceptor with some knotty question, simple to an older lawyer, but knotty to a beginner, and his explanation was so plain and simple that it almost caused doubt of his great legal ability; it seemed but the voice of his good common sense. Especially to the younger members of the bar is he commended for his example. The speaker closed with an epitaph, touching in its reference to the life and death of the departed.

Upon the conclusion of Mr. Esling's remarks the question was put upon the resolutions given above, and they were adopted. The blank in them was filled with the number seven, and the chairman appointed the following gentlemen as the committee.

Chief Justice Read, Judge Cadwalader, Judge Ludlow, Henry J. Williams, Esq., Hon. Eli K. Price, Hon. Peter McCall, and Hon. William A. Stokes.

To these were added the officers, and the meeting then adjourned.

TWENTY-FIRST JUDICIAL DIST.

Court of Common Pleas, Schuylkill County.

MINERS' TRUST CO. BANK v. JAMES WREN, JOHN T. NOBLE, AND MATTHEW RHODA.

W., N. & R. formed a co-partnership for the single purpose of erecting a furnace for the Emaus Iron Co. They borrowed for partnership purposes, $15,000 from the Miners' Trust Company Bank, for which they gave their joint judgment obligation, and also deposited with the bank, stock of the Emaus Iron Co. as collateral security. The partnership was dissolved before the work was completed, and a short time thereafter W. was declared a bankrupt. His assignee in bankruptcy sold his real estate, at which time notice was given of the above judgment. On petition presented by the purchaser for a rule to show cause why the real estate bound by the lien of said judgment, including that of N. and R., should not be sold in the proportion or in the succession that the owners were liable to contribute to the payment of said judgment, otherwise on the payment of the judgment, that the Miners' Trust Company Bank might be compelled to assign the judgment and the collaterals for such uses as the court might direct.

Held:

1. That as between the original parties, until there was a final settlement of the partnership business the court would not subrogate W. to the rights of the plaintiff in the judgment, notwithstanding the agreement of N. and R. to pay the partnership debts, it being alleged that the partnership transactions were unsettled, that W was a debtor to N. and R. in a large amount, and that the consideration for the promise of N. and R. to pay said partnership debts had failed.
2. That the purchase of the real estate having been made with notice of the judgment, was made subject to its payment by the purchaser, and that he had no claim to subrogation or contribution.

Legal Chronicle.

Opinion delivered by PERSHING, P. J.

The material facts in this case are as follows: James Wren, John T. Noble and Matthew Rhoda, in July, 1870, made an agreement by which they became partners, under the firm style of James Wren & Co., for the erection of a furnace for the Emaus Iron Company, and for no other purpose. Of this firm Mr. Wren was the treasurer. The interest of Wren in this contract was the one-half, whilst Noble and Rhoda jointly held the other half. Before the work was completed, viz., on the 16th October, 1871, this partnership was dissolved. By the stipulations of the agreement Noble and Rhoda were to pay all the debts due by the firm of James Wren & Co. It was also agreed that the agreement dissolving the partnership should be a "final and complete settlement of the affairs of the partnership of James Wren & Co., and of all claims and demands of each partner upon the others, arising out of the said partnership." The settlement being made, as expressed in the agreement, "with the understanding that all moneys and stock received by said James Wren, as treasurer of the firm of James Wren & Co., have been applied by him for the benefit of said firm, and any mistake or error in that particular was to be corrected, notwithstanding the settlement." This was followed on the 18th of October, 1871, by the receipt of Noble and Rhoda to James Wren for the books, papers, cash book, receipts, &c., of the firm of James Wren & Co., which the receipt states, were compared and found to be correct. On the 25th October, 1871, James Wren was adjudged a bankrupt.

During the time the firm of James Wren & Co. was in existence, viz., on July 7th, 1871, James Wren, John T. Noble, and Matthew Rhoda gave their judgment, obligation to the Miners' Trust Company Bank of Pottsville, for the sum of $15,000, which money was borrowed from the bank for the purposes of the partnership. Upon this judgment was entered on July 10th, 1861, in the Common Pleas of Schuylkill county, to No. 206, September term, 1871, the obligation having one year to run from its date. At the time this money was borrowed there was deposited with the Trust Company Bank, as collateral security for the payment of the loan, 302 shares of the stock of the Emaus Iron Company, of the par value of $50 per share, all of which stock was issued in the name of James Wren & Co., and taken by them on account of their contract for the erection of the furnace for that company. James Wren testifies that this judgment was one of the partnership debts which Noble and Rhoda agreed to pay, and that upon its payment by them, they were to receive the stock left as collateral security. Lewis C. Dougherty, assignee in bankruptcy, on the 23d March, 1872, sold three lots of ground situate in Pottsville, as the property of James Wren, to John W. Roseberry, Esq., for the sum of ten thousand dollars ($10,000), which sale was confirmed by the United States District Court. On September 3d, 1872, Mr. Roseberry presented his petition to the court, setting forth his purchase of said three lots of ground "in trust for others," that at the time of the sale by the assignee, the judgment of the Miners' Trust Company Bank was a lien on said real estate, and still was at the date of the petition a lien on said real estate, as also a lien on the real estate of John T. Noble and Matthew Rhoda; that he was informed and believed that Wren, Noble and Rhoda had given or assigned to said Trust Company Bank 151 shares of the Emaus Iron Co., of the par value of $15,100, as collateral security for the judgment held by said bank; that in law and equity the real estate and collaterals of the said John T. Noble and Matthew Rhoda shou'd contribute their proper proportions towards the discharge of said judgment, and praying for a rule on said Miners' Trust Company Bank to show cause "why they should not levy upon and make sale of the said real estate and collaterals liable to execution for the payment of said judgment, in the proportion in which the properties of the said James Wren, John T. Noble and Matthew Rhoda shall in law or equity be liable to contribute towards the discharge of the said judgment, otherwise upon the payment of such judgment to assign the same together with such collaterals for such uses as the court may direct."

This application is based on the 9th section of the act 22d April, 1856, Purd. Dig. 827, pl. 40. This section provides that "whenever the real estate of several persons shall be subject to the lien of any judgment to which they should by law or equity contribute, or to which one should have subrogation against another or others, it shall be lawful for any one having right to have contribution or subrogation, in case of payment, upon suggestion by affidavit and proof of the facts necessary to establish such right to obtain a rule on the plaintiff, to show cause why he should not levy upon and make sale of the real estate liable for the payment of said judgment, in the proportion or in the succession in which the properties of the several owners shall in law or equity, be liable to contribute towards the discharge of the common incumbrance, otherwise upon the payment of such judgment, to assign the same for such uses as the court may direct, and the court shall have power to direct to what uses the said judgment shall be assigned," &c.

In deciding this application, we can assign Mr. Roseberry no better position than that occupied by James Wren at the date of the sale. It must be remembered that the judgment held by the Miners' Trust Company Bank was given by the members of a firm, for money borrowed for and used in the partnership business, as is shown by the evidence. Each partner is liable to pay the whole of the partnership debts, to the last acre and the last shilling, says Lord Eldon. As between partners there can be neither contribution nor subrogation. Bailey v. Brownfield, 8 H. 41, is a case in point. It is there held that where partners borrow money to be used in the business which they are jointly carrying on, it becomes a partnership fund, and no matter how they stand on the security given to the lender, they are accountable to one another as partners. The relation of principal and surety has no place between them. It is not the law that a partner, after paying a partnership debt, may be substituted to the rights of a creditor against his copartner. If as between the joint debtors themselves, there is a superior obligation, resting on one to pay the debt, the other after paying it may use the creditors' security to obtain reimbursement.

The reason why subrogation is not allowed to one partner as against his copartners, or to one merely a joint debtor as against his co-debtor, is because that as between them there is no obligation resting upon one superior to that which rests upon the other. McCormick's Administrator v. Irwin, 11 Casey, 111.

By the terms of the agreement dissolving the partnership, Noble and Rhoda agreed to pay the partnership debts of James Wren & Co., and thus took upon themselves the superior obligation, the effect of which was to fix themselves as principals and Wren as the surety, the transaction between them stopped at this point. It is well settled that a binding agreement by which one copartner or co-contractor assumes the debt or agrees to bear the whole burden of its payment in discharge of the rest, will give rise to the relation of principal and surety, and with it to the right of subrogation to the remedies of the creditor on the one hand, and to that of discharge on the other, if those remedies are wrongfully impaired or surrendered. 1 L. E. C. Equity, 153. But the right of subrogation or of contribution is subject to principles of law which are presented by the testimony taken on this rule. Where the original debt springs from a partnership transaction, there can be no substitution before a settlement of the partnership accounts, clearly evincing that the partner whose estate has been taken in satisfaction for the partnership debts, in defeat of his individual creditors, was not indebted to his fellow, and that no countervailing equities existed in the latter. And the duty of showing this devolves on the party claiming to be substituted, in the clearest manner. Sterling v. Brightbill, 5 W. 229; Gerhart v. Jordan, 1 Jones, 325. If the surety be also a debtor, he has no claim to be substituted. It has been repeatedly held that care must be taken to make no order of substitution or subrogation where injustice would be done the plaintiff or other parties whose interests are involved. In the case now before us, James Wren testifies that he complied with the conditions stated in the agreement for the dissolution of the firm of James Wren & Co., and that there has been a final settlement of the partnership business. In flat contradiction of this, John T. Noble testifies that Mr. Wren has not complied with the conditions on which the dissolution was to be a settlement of their partnership transactions; that he is indebted on these transactions to Noble and Rhoda to the amount of about nine thousand dollars ($9,000), and in effect, that the consideration upon which Noble and Rhoda agreed to pay the firm debts of James Wren & Co., has failed. Here is a conflict in the evidence which cannot be decided one way or the other in this proceeding. But until it was settled, if James Wren himself were making this application, that the joint business in which he and Noble and Rhoda were engaged has been settled, and that he (Wren) was not indebted as alleged in the deposition of Noble, it is clear from all the authorities that he could demand neither contribution nor substitution. To allow either might be to destroy countervailing equities existing in his former partners.

But there is another ground which we think fatal to this application. Mr. Roseberry purchased the real estate of James Wren, subject to the judgment of the Miners' Trust Company Bank. Assignees in bankruptcy take the property of the bankrupt, subject to the liens legally and bona fide existing as against him. James on Bankruptcy, 4'. The 14th section of the bankrupt law authorizes the assignee to sell the real estate subject to a mortgage, lien or other incumbrance. An assignee in bankruptcy succeeds to all the rights and interests of the bankrupt, to precisely the same extent that the bankrupt himself had, subject to and affected by all the equities, liens, and incumbrances existing against them in the hands of the bankrupt, and the same rule applies to the purchaser at the assignee's sale of the bankrupts effects. Strong v. Clawson, 5 Gilman, 346. It is part of the evidence that at the sale made by the assignee in bankruptcy of Mr. Wren, verbal and written notice was given of the existence of the judgment of the Miners' Trust Company Bank. Mr. Roseberry acknowledges it to be a subsisting lien in his petition. That his purchase was made subject to this judgment is clear. What, then, is the legal position of the purchaser? The authorities seem to answer this question fully. One who purchases subject to a prior mortgage and pays it off, does no more than his duty. Taking an assignment is fruitless for the purpose of collecting the amount from the mortgagor's assigned estate. Cooley's Appeal, 1 Gr. 401. In Hansell v. Lutz, 8 H. 284, the court says: The land was sold by the sheriff charged with the payment of the mortgage. How would this be usually and naturally understood? Unquestionably that the purchaser shall discharge the mortgage, and not that he will do it if the mortgagor should fail to pay his bond. On this account the land always sells for at least the measure of the mortgage debt less than its value. Hence it follows that the purchaser in thus buying the land, undertakes the duty of paying the mortgage, not personally but so far as the land is sufficient for that purpose. It follows also that if the obligor pay the debt, he may claim subrogation to the mortgage, else the purchaser would unjustly hold the land without having paid the entire consideration. This is explicit. Mr. Roseberry has virtually retained purchase money to the amount of this judgment. In paying it he succeeds to no right of contribution or substitution. He stands in no better attitude than if he had bought this real estate at private sale, with an obligation on his part to pay the liens against it.

SOUTH HAMPTON v. FOWLER.

1. Where land and the franchises of a town contai ing it were granted to the same persons by the sa charter, this was held to vest no title to the land the town as a municipal body.
2. A town acquires no title, by virtue of its act of i corporation, to land within its limits not befo granted.
3. If the title to lands in Hampton not granted to i dividuals was in the town, and a new town w formed within its limits containing the land, t title still remained in Hampton; affirming the d trine of Union Baptist Soc. v. Candia, 2 N. H. 20.
4. Votes of a town in possession of land, showing claim of title, are admissible, as giving a charac to its possession; but where there is no eviden of possession, they are inadmissible.
5. Records of a town which holds land as a priv corporation, unless accompanied by possession, a not admissible, even against a stranger, to pro that the town claimed the title.

BELLOWS, C. J. It is contended by tl plaintiffs' counsel, that, by the charter incorporation granted in 1742, the unocc pied lands within its limits became tl property of South Hampton.

It will be perceived that the royal go ernor did not undertake to make a grant of land, within the bounds describe to the town, or to any person, but simp to make the inhabitants of that territo and their successors a body corporate.

It is urged that the body corpora thus constituted, at once acquired title all the lands within its limits not befo granted; and to sustain this position t plaintiffs rely much upon the views e pressed by Judge Bell, in Willey v. Por mouth, 35 N. H. 310, and by Judge Ea man, in Forsaith v Clark, 21 N. H. 41 The remarks of Judge Bell had relati to the rights and votes of the town Portsmouth soon after it had come und the government of Massachusetts in 164 and he said, "It is matter of history th the towns of this province at that tir claimed the fee of the lands within the limits, which were not granted to indiv uals. Some portion of the lands in Por mouth was held under grants by Mas or his agents; but the titles general were not under Mason, but under gran of the town. It was nearly a century aft this that the distinction began to be ma between the town and the proprietar The town exercised the rights of own and, whether well or ill founded, it w acquiesced in, and not disputed."

These remarks applied obviously to t origin of land titles at that early peri and in that part of the State which w included within the original limits of wh was afterwards known as Dover, Por mouth, Exeter, and Hampton. Th never could have been intended to be a construction that should give to a to the title to land which was granted to dividuals. In Forsaith v. Clark, Jud Eastman suggests that, in the early gra of townships in this province and Massachusetts, the grant of the land a the franchises of the town were made the same persons by the same chart and that the power of the grantees ov the land was exercised by them in th character of a town corporation, and n as a proprietary distinct from the tow and that the very early records of anci towns show that the entire managem of the business of the proprietary was conducted in the town meetings until after 1730.

It will be perceived that here is no suggestion that the title to such land was in the town as a municipal body, but that the proprietary, down to 1730, exercised its power over its lands through the town organizations. So long as the grantees of the land and the inhabitants of the towns were the same, it is quite reasonable to suppose that the distinction should not always have been preserved; but for a very long time the distinction has been kept up, and the proprietary meetings have ever been largely held in towns other than those in which the lands lie.

We think, then, that in cases of this sort there can be no ground for a valid claim by the town to the land so granted to a proprietary, even although the same individuals are incorporated into a town by the same grant. Neither can we entertain the opinion that by the mere act of incorporation of individuals settled upon a particular territory, the town acquires the title to the land not before granted. By such incorporation the inhabitants acquire the ordinary municipal rights and privileges of a town, but acquire no title to land, unless it be provided for in the grant. Such acts of incorporation are very numerous in this State, arising out of the divisions of towns; and it has never been supposed that the title to land is affected by such incorporation unless special provision for it is made. If it were otherwise it would be fatal to the plaintiffs' case, as Seabrook was incorporated in 1768, and the lands in question are there.

We must, then, look beyond the mere charter of South Hampton, granted in 1742, for evidence of its title to the land in question; and with this view the plaintiffs' counsel urges that, by the common law of this State, the title to all the lands in the southeastern part of the State was in the settlers, collectively, before they were incorporated as towns, and that the charters simply organized the proprietors of the common and unoccupied lands without vesting any new title. In respect to the towns once known as Cochecho or Northam, Strawberry Bank, Squamscott, and Winnicumett, and now known as Dover, Portsmouth, Exeter, and Hampton, it is unquestionable that they claimed and exercised the right of disposing of the lands within their respective limits, and the titles thus granted have been to a large extent acquiesced in or otherwise established.

It would seem, indeed, that until their union with Massachusetts in 1641, which was the result of their own voluntary act, these towns exercised separately, as little democracies, most of the powers of government, including the right of granting the lands within their limits. At an earlier period than 1641, the colony of Massachusetts, as shown by their provincial records, exercised jurisdiction over what was then called Winnicumett, now Hampton, and those records furnish some evidence that the settlement of that town was commenced under authority of that colony in 1638; and by the same authority, in March, 1639, it was made a town with the usual town privileges, and the disposition of the lands within its limits was committed to the freemen thereof.

These acts of the Massachusetts colony were recorded in the first book of the records of Hampton, and the powers committed to the town were unquestionably exercised.

These four towns, which thus exercised the power of granting the lands within their limits, were much greater in extent than the present towns of those names, and, indeed, for some years comprised all the settlements in the province of New Hampshire, the territory beyond their limits being regarded as the great waste. These towns remained under the government of Massachusetts until 1679, when they were severed from it by the crown and made part of the province of New Hampshire.

The town of Winnicumett, soon changed to Hampton, embraced what is now North Hampton, South Hampton, Hampton Falls, Kensington, Seabrook, and perhaps other territory, all taken at different times from Hampton, which is now a small town.

If the title to the lands not granted to individuals was in the town of Hampton—as perhaps might be inferred from the fact that it had the power to grant the lands within its limits—then, according to the doctrine of Union Baptist Society v. Candia, 2 N. H. 20, the title still remained in Hampton, notwithstanding the lands, by a division of the town, may have fallen within the jurisdiction of a new town; and such is the law in Massachusetts. Windham v. Portland, 4 Mass. 389; Hampshire v. Franklin, 16 Mass. 86.

The same doctrine is applied to lands held by a parish for the use and support of the ministry; and the title in the old parish is not affected by the formation of a new one, even although the land fall into the new parish. Brunswick v. Dunning, 7 Mass. 445; and see Newmarket v. Smart, 45 N. H. 87, and cases cited.

If this doctrine is not to be recognized here, but the title is held to vest in the new town where the land happens to fall, then it would still be fatal to the plaintiffs' claim to recover, as the lands lie within the incorporated town of Seabrook, even if that town was formed out of South Hampton, as the case seems to assume, although the act of June 3d, 1768, assumes to form the parish of Seabrook from the southerly part of Hampton Falls parish, which appears to have been incorporated in 1712.

However this may be, whether Seabrook was in whole or in part taken from South Hampton, as would be inferred from the boundaries given in the charter of the latter in 1742, it is wholly immaterial in this view of the case.

If the title to the lands within its limits did not vest in Hampton, there is obviously no ground for claiming that the lands in South Hampton vested in that town by virtue of any usage or State common law; for it is only from the powers exercised by Hampton and the other three towns that the existence of any such right could be deduced. Without a reference to the history of these ancient towns, no plausible ground could be found to uphold the plaintiffs' claim that the title to the ungranted land vested in the town within the limits of which it was situate. Whether or not the title to such lands was vested in these ancient towns, we give no opinion; but if it did, we think it does not show a title in South Hampton to lands in Seabrook, which was once part of Hampton. We have thus referred to the existence of these ancient towns, and the fact that the towns of Seabrook and South Hampton were formed out of Hampton, upon the ground that these facts are shown by public statutes of which courts may judicially take notice. Winnipiseogee Lake Co. v. Young, 40 N. H. 429.

If the town of South Hampton entered upon the lands in question claiming title, it could, like any private person, maintain a suit against a mere wrong-doer, and, upon proving such entry and possession, any votes of the town showing a claim of title would be admissible, as giving character to that possession—much the same as the payment of taxes on land by one in possession of it. Hodgdon v. Shannon, 44 N. H. 576, and cases cited; Farrar v. Fessenden, 39 N. H. 277. The payment of the taxes is admissible only to give a character to the possession, and without the possession it would not be admissible.

The evidence offered in this case by the plaintiffs, and rejected, went to show that the town, by its votes, claimed title to the land. Had this been accompanied by proof of possession, it would clearly have been admissible; but no such proof was offered.

This raised the naked question whether proof of an assertion of title by the town is competent evidence against a stranger.

So far as respects the land in question, the town holds it, if at all, substantially as a private corporation, and not as a municipal corporation, created by the government for the purpose of executing public duties, exercising, in fact, a portion of the sovereignty of the State; but it holds the land for its own benefit, and by virtue of some special law or usage which authorizes, but does not require, the town to hold it. This distinction is well defined in Eastman v. Meredith, 36 N. H. 296, where the cases are cited and examined. It is the doctrine, also, of Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489.

The land, then, being held as by a private corporation, the records of the town are not admissible to prove that the town claimed the title, unless it was accompanied by possession; for, although the records are competent to prove the acceptance of a charter, the organization of the corporation, the election of officers, and other corporate acts, yet in matters of a private nature they are not admissible in support of its own claims against a stranger, or even against a member who holds adversely and not under the corporation. So it is laid down in Wheeler v. Walker, 45 N. H. 358, and in several authorities there cited. Such is the doctrine of Angel & Ames on Corp. 605-7, and cases cited; and so is Haynes v. Brown, 36 N. H. 567, and Jackson ex dem. Donally v. Wales, 3 Johns. 226.

Of course, if the corporate act of the town became material, as to show the appointment of an agent to make entry upon the land and the like, the record would be the proper evidence so to show a claim of title to give character to an entry; but the difficulty here is, that the offer was to show a mere naked claim without any entry, and that being the case, it was properly excluded. The testimony offered by the plaintiffs from the selectmen's books may have tended to prove possession in the town, and we think was competent and had it been received, the testimony from the records offered by the plaintiffs would also have been competent; but it does not appear in the case that the plaintiffs excepted to the exclusion of this evidence offered from the books of South Hampton. This, however, is of little importance, as the nonsuit is to be set aside if the plaintiffs so elect. If the plaintiffs had excepted to the exclusion of this testimony, the nonsuit would have been set aside. It is urged that the title of South Hampton is recognized by the act of June 26th, 1822; but we are unable to see how a provision, that land in Seabrook owned by South Hampton shall be exempt from taxation so long as so owned, can be regarded as confirming any title upon South Hampton, where, as the case stands, the title to the land in question must be regarded as in Hampton or else in Seabrook, if, indeed, it had ever passed from the original proprietor.

Unless, then, the plaintiffs elect a further trial, there must be judgment on the nonsuit.

MORGAN v. NEVILLE.

M. was indebted to N. for wages. Whilst M. was in Maryland this debt, without any collusion of his, was attached and he was summoned as garnishee. M. at once notified N. of the attachment. Judgment was given against M. by default. In an action by N. against M. to recover the wages, Held,

1. The proceeding being in the nature of a foreign attachment both M. and N. were bound by the judgment.
2. The statute of Pennsylvania exempting wages from attachment, was no portion of the contract between M. and N., and could not be pleaded with effect in Maryland.
3. The judgment in the attachment against M. was a defence pro tanto in the present action.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Somerset county.

Opinion by AGNEW, J. Delivered July 2d, 1873.

This action, in the court below, was for the wages of labor performed by George Neville for Wm. Morgan, a contractor upon the Sand Patch Tunnel in Somerset county. Morgan set up a payment made by him as garnishee of Neville, in an attachment issued by a justice of the peace of Alleghany county, Maryland, in favor of one Michael Shannon, served on Morgan in Maryland, and judgment against him by default. All the parties were residents of Somerset county, Pennsylvania, but there was no evidence of collusion or combination between Shannon and Morgan, to evade the Pennsylvania statute as to the wages of labor, by going into Maryland for the purpose of having the attachment executed. We must, therefore, assume that the Maryland proceeding was bona fide. The court below held that, because Neville, the plaintiff below, was not in Maryland and was not served with notice, he was not affected by the judgment in the attachment, and that the Maryland court ought to have enforced the Pennsylvania act, exempting the wages of labor from execution. In both of these respects the learned judge fell into error. Upon the first point, the judge seems to have misapplied the doctrine of Steel v. Smith, 7 W. & S. 447, which decided that a judgment in personam in a foreign attachment against a vessel, under the civil code of Louisiana, was not binding, and would not be enforced in Pennsylvania, and that the Louisiana court not having jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, the record was not within the protection of the 1st section of the article of the Constitution of the United States, requiring full faith and credit to be given in each State, to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. But Steel v. Smith concedes jurisdiction in the attachment over the property of the defendant within the State of Louisiana; and this is the only feature in that case applicable to this, the defendant below claiming credit only for the money paid by him under the Maryland attachment. There being no collusion, Shannon, though a citizen of Pennsylvania, had a right to sue out his attachment in Maryland. He falls within the words and spirit of the 1st clause of the 2d section of the 4th article of the Constitution of the United States, that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. One of these is the right to institute actions of any kind in the courts of another State; Corfield v. Coryell, 4 W. C. C. R. 380, 1. Shannon went into Maryland, a right he had under that clause, and there made the affidavit required by the Mayland statute, and sued out his attachment. So far then the magistrate had jurisdiction. The attachment was served personally on Morgan, the debtor of Neville, when found in Maryland. A citizen of Maryland would have an undoubted right to serve his attachment on Morgan had he found him there, in order to secure his debt against Neville; and he having this right, Shannon has the same right under the Constitution of the United States. The debt to Neville was therefore legally attached, and the jurisdiction of the Maryland justices court vested fully without notice of the writ to Neville. In foreign attachment (and this proceeding is in the nature of a foreign attachment) notice is not given to the defendant by service of the process, for the valid reason that he cannot be served, and service on his property or on his debtor is all that can be had, in the nature of the thing. The garnishee must give notice to his own creditor, if he would protect himself; and this he did in this instance, the next morning, as proved by himself and by Neville.

The Maryland tribunal having jurisdiction, it was not error to disregard the Pennsylvania act, exempting the wages of labor from attachment in the hands of the employer. The act of 15th April, 1845, P. L. 459, is a supplement to the act relating to executions, and the proviso in the 5th section has relation to the remedy for the collection of debts. It forms no part of the contract itself under which the labor was performed, though the contract was subject to it, and was limited thereby, in this State, in the means of recovery after judgment for the debt. Not being part of the contract, the Pennsylvania statute was not imported with the debt into the Maryland forum, but the remedy there was regulated by the Maryland statute, which gave an exemption to the wages of labor of the sum of ten dollars only. Besides, how could the Pennsylvania act be known in the Maryland forum, without proof or pleading it? The garnishee made default and judgment was given without evidence and without a plea of the Pennsylvania act. It was an error then, to hold, that the Pennsylvania act exempted the debt from the attachment.

Though not noticed in the opinion of the judge upon the reserved question, it is contended here, that the record of the judgment is defective in showing no judgment against the defendant or the garnishee, but only a judgment of condemnation against the property or debt. But the judgment is a judgment in rem, and therefore against the property or debt, and according to the 13th section of the Maryland code, which says if neither the defendant nor garnishee in whose hands the property or credits may be attached, shall appear, at the return day of the attachment, the court may condemn the property and credits so attached, and award execution thereof. And by the 37th section, the judgment of condemnation is made pleadable in bar, in any after action brought against the garnishee by the defendant.

It is now also objected, that it does not appear by the record, that the plaintiff gave the notice required by the 4th section, by setting up, at three or more of the public places in the district or ward, an affidavit and copy of claim and copy of the attachment. But the 42d section provides, if the defendant or garnishee shall not show cause against the attachment, the justice may condemn the property, provided he is satisfied by the oath of the plaintiff or by other proof, that the notice required above has been given. As the proof is thus, by the statute, a mere preliminary to judgment, and not a return of process to appear in the record, but is heard at the trial, the presumption in favor of judicial acts, that they have been rightly done, comes to the aid of this proceeding. We cannot presume that the justice gave judgment contrary to the statute and to his duty, but must presume he was satisfied by the oath of the plaintiff or other proof, that the plaintiff had done all that was requisite to entitle him to judgment. The return to the attachment itself is full and complete, and made by the constable, the proper officer. This being a proceeding before a magistrate, a presumption in favor of the regularity of his proceeding, is more necessary, and is strengthened by the 35th section of the code, declaring that no special pleading shall be required before a justice of the peace. This carries a belief that Maryland law as well as our own, looks benignantly upon the proceedings before justices, whose want of knowledge of legal forms must often be their excuse for informalities.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

WITTE v. THE PEOPLE'S PASSENGER RAILWAY COMPANY.

1. When a subscriber gave two of his acceptances payable at different times for stock, upon the agreement that if neither were paid he should have no interest in the stock, and if either were paid he should have a ratable proportion, Held: If he pay one of the acceptances, he is not thereby entitled to a certificate until the other falls due.
2. Quære. Whether directors can compel certain stockholders to pay their subscriptions in cash, and take the notes of others.
3. When the charter of a corporation provides that if assessments on stock are not paid within six months it may be forfeited, a court of equity will not restrain such a forfeiture at the suit of a delinquent stockholder, who has received notice of the assessment.
4. The company need not give notice that the forfeiture will be made.

Opinion by PERSHING, P. J.

The People's Railway Company was incorporated by act of Assembly of 4th April, 1865, subject to the general railroad law, passed in 1849. By the charter, the road was required to be completed in three years. A supplement was passed April 28th, 1871, extending the time for the making of the road, and under which a reorganization of the company took place. Up to that time, it appears nothing had been done in the actual construction of the railway. The plaintiff was not a stockholder till after the passage of the supplemental act of 1871. The entire list of stockholders now embraces six persons, and we have the affidavits of five of these in this case. The plaintiff seeks by his bill to restrain the company from transferring 416 shares of the stock, and asks for an order or decree to have the same delivered to him on his paying the amount unpaid on said shares. The plaintiff at no time has paid anything on these shares, as it appears from the evidence submitted at the hearing.

Waiving any discussion as to whether the plaintiff actually subscribed for the number of the shares of stock he claims in this company, it is established that there was an understanding between themselves, that each of the six stockholders should own, by subscriptions and allotments, an equal number of the 5,000 shares, into which the stock of the company was divided. Other undisputed facts are that the directors made an assessment of $5 per share, in cash, payable on the first day of September, 1871; and at that date the plaintiff was unable to pay the assessment on his stock, and that an arrangement was made by which he gave his two acceptances, or, as shown by the evidence, his promissory notes, the nature of which arrangement is best shown by the receipt given by the treasurer, as follows:

"Received, Pottsville, September 2d, 1871, of William H. Witte, his two acceptances, one for two thousand and eighty-eight dollars and fifty-one cents, and the other for two thousand and ninety-three dollars and fifty-two cents, at fifteen and thirty days respectively, which, when paid, will entitle him to have delivered to him eight hundred and thirty-three shares of stock in the People's Railway Company, with a credit of ten per cent. paid thereon. In case default of payment of said acceptances at maturity, then all claim in said stock will be treated as released, and in case of payment of one and not the other acceptances, then only a ratable proportion of said shares to be delivered to the said W. H. Witte. The said acceptances include interest thereon from date to their maturity.

(Signed,) "L. F. WHITNEY,
Treasurer People's Railway, Pottsville."

It is not disputed, that the acceptance at fifteen days was paid, and that on the maturity of the other, the time of its payment was extended for thirty days longer. The plaintiff admits that he did not pay this renewed obligation. The sufficiency of the reasons he assigns for not paying it, will be considered hereafter.

The defendants admit, as stated in the 7th paragraph of plaintiff's bill, that on the 23d day of February, 1872, the board of directors adopted a resolution directing the secretary to notify the plaintiff, that unless he paid the renewed draft within fifteen days, the 416 shares of stock (being the same now in controversy) would be sold, and that plaintiff would be held liable for any loss or deficiency that might arise on the sale of said stock; but defendants expressly deny that the meeting at which this resolution was adopted, was not duly and legally called, and aver that the same was called in strict accordance with the by-laws of the company. It is also admitted by the defendants, as stated in the 8th paragraph of the bill, that this stock was sold. It appears from the evidence that this sale was made on the 15th day of May, 1872, and that the purchasers (who are not named by defendants nor made parties by plaintiff) had paid the assessments, with interest, up to that date.

The plaintiff avers in the 6th paragraph of his bill, that "previous to the time of the maturity of the renewed draft, he demanded the delivery to him of 417 shares of stock, being the ratable proportion for which he had paid at that time," and that the delivery was refused by the company; and he alleges in the 9th paragraph, that it was in consequence of this refusal, that he, the plaintiff, refused to pay the said renewed draft at its maturity; that he has at all times been and is now ready to pay the amount of said draft, with interest, upon the receipt of said stock; that previous to the meeting aforesaid and alleged sale, the plaintiff tendered (and is ready to tender now) the amount of said draft, with interest, and demanded the delivery of the stock, but the defendants always refused to accept said money and deliver the said stock."

The defendants, in answer, aver in their affidavits, that the plaintiff was to receive 833 shares of the stock "on paying for the same as required by the board of directors;" and that by an agreement, to which the plaintiff was a party, no formal certificates of stock were to be issued until the full amount which the company might require to be paid thereon, should have been paid; that upon the latter ground, plaintiff had no right to make any demand for the delivery of stock, even had he not expressly agreed not to do so. Defendants also allege, that after plaintiff paid his first acceptance, he requested from L. F. Whitney, the secretary and treasurer of the company, certificates of stock on which he had paid $5 per share, and that on being reminded of the agreement that no regular certificates should issue, he, the plaintiff, agreed to receive, and did receive an informal certificate for such stock, the same as had been issued to other subscribers to the stock of the company. Defendants deny that the plaintiff refused to pay the renewed draft because of any refusal on the part of the company to deliver stock, as stated in the 6th paragraph of plaintiff's bill, and deny that plaintiff ever made any such tender as he alleges, and that he was at all times ready to pay the renewed draft. In proof of this they gave in evidence a letter of the plaintiff, dated November 2d, 1871, to L. F. Whitney, secretary, in which he states that he cannot arrange for the payment of his note, due on the 5th of that month, because he had only a certificate, and not the stock itself, and proposing a further extension for fifteen days, at which time he would be able to pay.

Now, looking at the facts which are admitted by both parties, has the plaintiff a valid claim to the 416 shares of stock he asks to be decreed to him? By his own agreement, as embraced in the receipt of L. F. Whitney, treasurer, dated September 2d, 1871, plaintiff was entitled to receive 833 shares of stock if he paid both acceptances; if he made default in the payment of both, all claim to the stock was relinquished; if he paid the one and not the other, then he was entitled to only a ratable proportion of said shares, and the company was released as to the balance of the 833 shares, by a fair construction of this contract. We think it also clear, that no demand could legally be made after the payment of the first acceptance, for a ratable proportion of the shares of stock, till after the date of the maturity of the second acceptance, and a failure on the part of the plaintiff to pay it. The plaintiff admits he made his demand before that time, and because he failed to receive a ratable proportion of the stock, he refused to pay his renewed obligation when it fell due afterwards, viz.: 2d or 5th of November, 1871. By his own act, the plaintiff lost his claim for any stock beyond that for which he now holds a certificate. The refusal of the company to comply with a demand which was made out of time, could furnish the plaintiff no excuse for the refusal to pay his renewed acceptance or note when it matured.

Was there a forfeiture of this stock under the act of 1849, to which the company was made subject? The plaintiff contends there was not, upon the grounds that the meeting of the 23d of February, 1872, at which notice was directed to be given to him, was not called in accordance with the by-laws of the company, and that he had not been in default for a period of six months, as required by the statute. The by-law provides that special meetings may be called by the directors as often as they may deem expedient. Other special meetings are to be called by the secretary, on the request of the holders of one-tenth of the stock of the company, and in these the purpose and object of the meeting shall be stated. The defendants aver that in the meeting called for February 23d, 1871, the by-law was strictly complied with.

A company in enforcing the payment of calls by forfeiture of the stock, must strictly pursue the mode pointed out in its charter, and the general laws of the State. This is a universal rule, which the courts will rigidly enforce. 13 Vesey, 428.

In this case, the second acceptance or note, as renewed, became payable on the 2d of November, 1871, or allowing the days of grace, on the 5th day of November, 1871. The sale was made of the stock on the 15th day of May, 1872, more than the required six months having elapsed since the renewed note became due, and the plaintiff was in default. We are not clear, however, that the taking of plaintiff's acceptances extended the time beyond the first day of September, 1871, from which the six months of default were to be reckoned. If this company was made up of a large company of stockholders, it might be proper to discuss the power of a board of directors to exact money in payment of assessments from the body of the stockholders, and favor others by taking their obligations and extending the payment of them from time to time. We have not met any decision on the exact point, but the general current of authority throws a strong doubt on the power of the directors of a corporation to make any discrimination between stockholders. They cannot accept from shareholders a sum of money in discharge of his liability to calls. 27 Eng. L. Eq. R. 575. Directors are agents with limited powers. All subscribers to the stock must stand on an equality. These points have been frequently decided. The discretion of the managers as to calls are modal, merely relating to the time and manner of making payment. Ger. Pass. R. W. Co. v. Fitler, 10 P. F. Smith, 132. It is not necessary to pursue this question. Here the number of stockholders is limited, and the taking of plaintiff's paper, and the extension of the time of payment, were done with the consent of all.

There is no provision in the charter of this company, nor in the general railroad law of 1849, which requires actual notice to a stockholder in default, before forfeiting his stock. The notice to the plaintiff of 23d February, 1871, was not necessary on the part of the company. The plaintiff, as a subscriber to the stock, and a member of the corporation, must be presumed to know its terms. It is not denied that the call for the assessment was duly made, and that the plaintiff had personal knowledge of it; and it is clear that six months had elapsed after his default before the stock was forfeited and sold to other parties. He has no right to any other or further notice. Ger. Pass. R. W. Co. v. Fitler, 10 P. F. Smith, 130. That equity will not relieve against such a forfeiture, has been a settled doctrine of the court ever since Sparks v. The Liverpool Water Works, 13 Ves. 438. At the expiration of six months, the time limited in the charter, the power of the managers to forfeit the stock was perfect, and the defaulting stockholder could claim no further delay, or any other notice than he had already received. Ger. Pass. R. W. Co. v. Fitler, supra. Nor is it necessary that the sale should be a public one, for, as it is held, the defaulting stockholder by the forfeit is relieved from future liability, and is not entitled to any surplus accruing from the same. Ang. & Ames, § 551.

There is another reason for dissolving the injunction granted on the filing of the bill in this case: All the equities of plaintiff's case are denied. That no injunction can issue or be continued where the equities of comlainant's case are denied, is a proposition too well fortified by reason and authority to be successfully attacked. Claplian v. White, 8 Ves. 35. Affidavits entirely responsive to a bill, must dissolve the injunction if granted, if they deny materially every fact alleged, though not with the particularity required in an answer. It is the universal practice to dissolve an injunction on an affidavit denying the facts and equity upon which it has been granted. Carpenter v. Burden, 2 Pars. 24, cited in Dull v. Holl, 1 Phila. R. 258.

And as a final reason for our present action, the plaintiff, if he at any time had a claim to this stock, has lost it by his own neglect to assert his right at the proper time. The action of the board of directors on February 22d, 1872, gave him notice of the contemplated action of the company. He made no effort to prevent the sale, nor has he taken any step since, till the filing of this bill, more than a year after the sale of the stock. When the first assessment was made in 1871, the company had neither road nor cars, and the stock was of no marketable value. Since then the road has been constructed and put into operation. That the stock is increasing in value, is asserted by both parties. The plaintiff now comes forward and claims 416 shares of the stock, upon which he has heretofore paid nothing, and asserts his willingness "to pay the amount unpaid on them," including, we suppose, the two additional assessments made by the directors since the one which was made payable on September 1st, 1871. The case of the Germantown Pass. R. W. Co. v. Fitler, 10 P. F. Smith, 124, is similar to this one in many of its features, and we cannot do better than quote the conclusion of the opinion of Judge Strong in that case: "It would be a strange equity thus to allow a party to speculate upon contingencies. The forfeiture relieved him from all the obligations of his subscription. The company could not have pretended to enforce those obligations. Thus, he alone would be allowed to play fast or loose. Equity aids the vigilant and active, not the sleeping and indolent. Nothing, in the language of Lord Camden, can call forth this court into activity but conscience, good faith and reasonable diligence. When these are wanting, the court is passive and does nothing. Smith v. Clay, 3 Bro. C. C. 639, note." The preliminary injunction is dissolved.

DISTRICT OF INDIANA.

United States Circuit Court.

In re INDIANAPOLIS, CINCINNATI AND LAFAYETTE RAILROAD COMPANY.

When an estate was large, and all of the creditors except two desired it to be withdrawn from the bankrupt court, the court in the exercise of its equitable discretion ordered that the proceedings in bankruptcy should be dismissed upon security being given for the payment of the claims of the dissenting creditors.

Opinion of the court by DRUMMOND, J.

It is to be observed that there was no property in possession of the bankrupt court. Assignees had been appointed, but they were nominal, and were the same persons that were receivers under the order of the State court, and that of the Circuit Court of the United States; and all the property of the bankrupt was held by the receivers of the road, managed by them, and, of course, subject to all valid liens subsisting against the company; and if the property had been ultimately controlled by the bankrupt court, it, of course, would have been disposed of in such a way as to marshal the different claims and liens existing against the road, and they must have been paid according to their priority, the bondholders confessedly holding the first lien.

It was to avoid the sacrifice of so much property, which it was thought would be necessarily incurred, if it remained in the bankrupt court, that the stockholders made the arrangement which has been referred to, and which was assented to by all the creditors except only Charles Dwight and the Whitewater Valley R. R. Co., and the question is, whether with such an immense property, with so many and various liens and incumbrances upon it, and such a great preponderance both in numbers and amounts of those holding these liens, desiring the withdrawal of the case from the bankrupt court, it should be prevented by the opposition of the two creditors already named. It is quite clear that if the case had been wound up in the bankrupt court, and the property disposed of, the probability of its realizing anything for the two non-assenting creditors would not have been very great, as all these other claims would have first to be paid; and, in fact, there would be great doubt, perhaps, whether any portion of the floating debt would be paid, under which, of course, would be included that of the two non-assenting creditors, and, therefore, it may be a question whether it was not most for the interest of these non-assenting creditors themselves that the case should be withdrawn from the bankrupt court, and some arrangement made by which their claims could be satisfied, and thus leave this large property in the control of the company, with the assent of the other creditors, to be made available, if it can be, for the ultimate payment of the claims which might be brought against it.

It is also a question whether, in a case like this, it is for the interest of all the various parties that the property should remain in the bankrupt court, or be withdrawn from it. For example, there could be no controversy that it would be entirely competent for the party against whom a decree in bankruptcy was made, with the assent of all his creditors, to withdraw it from the bankrupt court, and the question is, whether the opposition of an insignificant portion of the creditors can prevent that result. I think that the bankrupt court, as a court of equity, has a full equitable discretion upon this subject, and can allow a case to be withdrawn from it, provided it is done without prejudice to the interests of any of the parties, debtors or creditors, who are before it. And in this case I think it was competent for the bankrupt court to allow the case to be withdrawn from it, protecting the interests of the different non-assenting creditors. And if the court had given the same protection to the claims of the Whitewater Valley R. R. Co. that it did to that of Dwight, this court would not feel inclined to interfere with the decree. The reason why the District Court made a distinction between the claims of the two non-assenting creditors was undoubtedly because that of the Whitewater Valley Railroad Company was not set forth so distinctly as the other, being somewhat vague and uncertain, and depending more or less upon contingencies. But it seems to me, as long as there was a creditor who prima facie had a claim against the bankrupt company which was liable to be proved, before the court could dismiss the proceedings, it should have given some security or protection to that claim. And it will be recollected that there was an allegation which was not denied, that the Whitewater Valley R. R. Co. had paid a considerable amount as drawer of bills of exchange, held by the Globe National Bank, and which, therefore, was a distinct and positive claim, either legal or equitable, against the bankrupt. And it is further to be observed, perhaps as a reason why the District Court made a discrimination between the claims of the non-assenting creditors, that the proceedings in bankruptcy had been pending some time; that all the other claims had been proved in the bankrupt court except that of the Whitewater Valley R. R. Co. Some excuse is given for the fact that these claims of the latter company were not proved in bankruptcy, that one of the assignees, who was also one of the receivers, had requested that the proof should be postponed and should not then be presented in the bankrupt court.

On the whole, then, it seems to me, that if the proper protection can be given to the claims of Dwight and of the Whitewater Valley R. R. Co., it would be unwise and contrary to the best interests of all concerned, for the property to remain in the bankrupt court; and that it is desirable that it should be restored to the company, to enable it, with the aid and co-operation of all the principal creditors, and that of the stockholders, to endeavor to retrieve itself from its present embarrassments. The property is very large, the business done is apparently quite profitable, and there is certainly strong reason for supposing that with time the company may be able to extricate itself from the load of debt which now oppresses it. It seems to me, therefore, nothing more than the exercise of a reasonable equitable power, which rests in the bankrupt court, to allow the case to be withdrawn from its jurisdiction, under circumstances like these, and giving adequate security to one or two parties holding claims, who are opposed to the withdrawal, from causes which do not fully appear, and which are either real or imaginary, but the prominent object of whose opposition is to coerce some settlement from the great mass of the creditors. Therefore, this court, while conceding the correctness of the principle upon which the decree of the District Court was made, will modify its order dismissing the proceedings in bankruptcy, and will allow it to be done upon the condition that the bonds which have been deposited for the security of Mr. Dwight shall be put in some safe place as indemnity for any decree or judgment which he may obtain for his claim against the Indianapolis, Cincinnati and Lafayette R. R. Company, they to remain until the case is ultimately disposed of by the highest court to which it can be taken; and in this particular instance, as Mr. Dwight is a citizen of Ohio, the court will require the suit to be brought in the Circuit Court of the United States for this district, and also upon the condition that adequate security is given for any claims which may ultimately be established by the Whitewater Valley R. R. Co., against the Indianapolis, Cincinnati and Lafayette R. R. Co.; the claims both of Dwight and the Whitewater Valley R. R. Co. to be presented and prosecuted with reasonable diligence, and in default thereof, any of the parties in interest to have the right to apply to the District Court for the withdrawal of the bonds and securities so deposited.

Decree accordingly.

MICHELTREE et al. v. SWEEZY.

1. Shortly before the bounty act of March 25th, 1864, a meeting of citizens of a township at which the school directors were present, agreed that money should be borrowed for filling the township's quota. It was "understood and agreed" with the directors, that if the law should be passed they would levy a tax to pay the borrowed money. The money was borrowed. After the passage of the act of 1864, the directors adopted a resolution to levy a tax to repay it, and a warrant was issued for its collection. In 1866 an act was passed legalizing all the acts of the directors, and authorizing the collection of the tax, &c. This justified the levying and collecting the tax.

2. The resolution of the directors was an official recognition of the money raised to fill the quota, needing only a legal sanction to make it binding on the citizens, which the act of 1866 was.

STEWART v. MAPLE.

1. The assessors returned a valuation of property of defendant, who was notified of the day of appeal. He did not attend nor appeal; the county commissioners, under sect. 9 of act May 15th, 1841, raised the valuation. The supervisor of his township rated him on the basis of the county valuation. Held, in a suit for road tax he could not defend on the ground that the valuation had been improperly raised; his remedy was by appeal.

2. Until altered by the commissioners, the increased rate was the proper basis for township rates.

3. If aggrieved by the township rating, his remedy was by appeal to the Quarter Sessions, under the 30th section of act of April 15th, 1834.

4. The remedy for illegal taxation under a general power to tax, is by appeal to the proper appellate tribunal; when no appeal is given, the courts cannot reverse the judgment of the tax officers.

Court of Appeals of N. Y.

BACHELLER v. PEOPLE ex rel. THE DUNKIRK, &c., R. R. CO.

1. A railroad company, as to the building and operation of its road, is a public corporation, but as to the ownership of its property, and the profits of its business, it is private.
2. Municipalities are created by the Legislature as instrumentalities of the government, and so far as legislation for governmental purposes is concerned, are absolutely subject to its control.
3. A municipal corporation may be compelled to enter into contracts for an exclusively public purpose, but not when the purpose is private.
4. When a municipal corporation engages in things not public in their nature, such as subscribing to stock, it acts as a private individual. The Legislature cannot compel it so to act.
5. Under a statute a town consented to its supervisor issuing bonds to raise funds for a subscription to the stock of a railroad company. A subsequent act superseding the former and materially altering the conditions of the subscription was passed. The supervisor refused to issue the bonds. Held: So far as the second act would compel a subscription contrary to the assent of the town, it was unconstitutional, and a mandamus to the supervisor to issue the bonds was refused.

Opinion by GROVER, J.

Section 1, chapter 672, Laws of 1867, enacts that it shall be lawful for the supervisor of any town in the county of Chautauqua through which the Dunkirk, &c., Railroad shall run, or of any town adjoining either of the towns through which said railroad shall run, to borrow, on the faith or credit of such town, any sum of money not exceeding twenty per cent. of the assessed valuation of the real and personal property of such town, as shown by the last assessment roll previous to the issuing of the bonds authorized by the act, at a rate of interest not exceeding seven per cent., and for a period not exceeding thirty years, and to execute bonds therefor, provided that the power and authority conferred shall only be exercised upon the condition that the consent shall first be obtained in writing of a majority of the taxpayers of such town owning or representing, &c., more than one-half of the taxable property of said town assessed and appearing upon the assessment roll of the year last preceding the issuing of the bonds authorized, proved or acknowledged as therein specified, and that such consent shall be procured within three years from the passage of the act. That such consent shall state the amount of money to be raised, and the fact that a majority of the taxpayers owning or representing a majority of the taxable property, as appeared from the assessment roll, had been obtained, should be proved by the affidavit of one of the assessors of the town, or that of the town or county clerk, endorsed upon or annexed to such written consent, which should be filed and have the effect specified in said section.

Sect. 2 provides that said supervisor may, in his discretion, dispose of such bonds or any part thereof to such persons, and upon such terms, not less than par, as he may deem most advantageous to the town, and that the money raised by loan or sale of the bonds shall be invested in the stock of the railroad company, and that the same should be used in the construction of the railroad, &c., the public necessity and utility of which was thereby declared, and that in its construction, the said towns were immediately interested. And that for the purpose of such construction the said supervisor, in the name of the town, might subscribe for and purchase the stock of said company to the amount to which the tax payers had consented, as above specified, and that, by virtue of such subscription and purchase, the town should acquire all the rights and privileges and incur all the responsibilities as other stockholders of the company.

Other sections provide for levying and collecting taxes for the payment of the interest and principal of the bonds to be issued, and other matters not material to the question in this case.

Between the passage of the above act and before the passage of chapter 472, vol. 1, page 850, Laws of 1868, the town of Stockton was not bonded.

By the first section of the last-mentioned act it was provided that, in case the written consent of the taxpayers of any town has been or should thereafter be obtained in the manner provided by the first-mentioned act, its supervisor was authorized and required to make a subscription to the stock of the company to the amount fixed in such consent, and to issue the bonds of the town and dispose of the same as required by the said first-mentioned act.

Sect. 3 of the last act provides that the supervisor of Stockton shall not be required to issue the bonds of that town, although authorized as required by the act of eighteen hundred and sixty-seven, until the iron was laid upon the road from Dunkirk to the Pennsylvania line.

The following consent of taxpayers was introduced in the evidence upon the trial: "The undersigned, taxpayers of the town of Stockton, hereby consent that the supervisor of the town of Stockton may borrow the sum of thirty-four thousand dollars on the faith and credit of said town, at a rate of interest not exceeding seven per cent. for a term not exceeding thirty years, and execute bonds therefore under his hand and seal, and that the said supervisor may, in his discretion, dispose of such bonds or any part thereof, and that the proceeds of the sale of such bonds shall be invested in the stocks of the Dunkirk, &c., Railroad Company; and that the said supervisor may exercise full and complete powers for said town under the first-mentioned act." This consent was signed by a considerable number of taxpayers, whose signatures were proved or acknowledged as required by the act, to which was annexed an affidavit of Corydon Putnam, one of the assessors of the town, to the effect "that the persons whose names appear attached to said consent, and which appear on the assessment roll of the town for the year 1867, were a majority of all the taxpayers of the town of Stockton, whose names appear upon said assessment roll, and that they are a majority of all the taxpayers in the said town of Stockton whose names appear upon the assessment roll for the year 1867, including resident taxpayers, owners of non-resident lands, and including agents representing owners of taxable property, and that each person so signing such consent has in due from acknowledged the same, or his signature been proved in due form of law." This affidavit was sworn to, November 21st, 1867, but the papers were not filed in the town clerk's office until April 25th, 1868. No further steps to bond the town appear to have been taken until after the passage of chapter 282, Laws of 1870, vol 1, p. 634.

Sect. 2 of this act provides, that in any case where the written consent authorizing the supervisor of any town to subscribe to the stock of the Dunkirk, etc., Railroad Company, shall have been filed in the town clerk's office of the town, and a copy thereof in the county clerk's office of the county, with the affidavit of one of the assessors of the town, etc., endorsed or annexed to such written consent, and such affidavit shall be based upon the assessment roll of such towns for either of the years 1867, 1868 or 1869, or for the last year previous to the issuing of the bonds as authorized, such affidavit shall be evidence in all courts and for all purposes, and such consent shall authorize, uphold and require the respective subscriptions to be made to such stock, and authorize, uphold and require the issue of bonds to the amount specified in such consent for such towns respectively, and such bonds shall bear date and interest from the respective dates of the first filing of said copy of consent and affidavit in the Chautauqua county clerk's office, and no clerical or other defects in any of such affidavits shall invalidate such proof or the subscription to the stock of the said bonds.

Sect. 3 provides, that if the said bonds, when issued, shall not be sold for money, as required by the original act, within thirty days from the time when they are ready for sale, the supervisor of the town issuing the same shall deliver said bonds to the railroad company, receiving therefor the par value of the principal of said bonds in the stock of the company at its par value.

Sect. 4 repeals section 3 of the act of 1868, which provided that the supervisor of Stockton should not be required to issue the bonds of the town until the iron was laid on the road from Dunkirk to the Pennsylvania line.

The act of 1867 was a mere enabling act, conferring power upon the several towns embraced therein, to issue bonds upon the conditions therein specified, to aid the construction of the railroad, &c. It conferred no right upon the railroad company or any one else, where proceedings for bonding had been commenced, to have any further steps taken until bonds had been actually issued under the act. Then such rights were acquired. The railroad company could then enforce the application of the proceeds to the construction of its road according to its provisions, assuming the act to be constitutional. The consent of the taxpayers was given under this act. The entire language of the consent shows that the signers understood the act and their consent as conferring discretionary power upon the supervisor to act upon his views as to the interest of the town. They consent that he may borrow the sum of $34,000 upon the faith and credit of the town, &c., and execute bonds therefor. That he may, in his discretion, dispose of such bonds or any part thereof and invest the proceeds in the stock of the railroad company, and that he may exercise full and complete powers for said town under the act. Sometimes the word "may" is construed as "shall," but only where the context shows that such was the intention, or where the public have an interest in the exercise of the powers so conferred upon officers, or official boards or tribunals.

The import of the word as used in the consent and the act is to give power, leave, license and permissions, not to require or enforce the performance of any one of the specified acts. This view is confirmed by the different language of the acts of 1868 and 1870, relating to the same subject, the latter showing an intention to compel the supervisor to bond the town, and if he failed to sell the bonds at par within thirty days after they were ready for sale, he is not authorized, but required to deliver the bonds to the railroad company upon receipt from it of an amount of stock equal to the principal of such bonds. Under the act of 1867, care was taken that the bonds should not be issued for less than the par value in cash. This would be the result whether the money was borrowed upon the faith and credit of the town, and the bonds given as security, or the bonds sold at not less than par. Thus there would, in case the town was bonded, be secured for the construction of the road, cash equal to the principal of the bonds. If the bonds are delivered to the company upon the receipt of stock to an amount equal to the principal of the bonds, pursuant to the act of 1870, the bonds become the property of the railroad company, and may be sold upon the market much below par, and thus much less money accrue therefrom for the construction of the road.

It is obvious that the consent given does not embrace any such transaction. Again, the act of 1867 requires that the consent shall be based upon the assessment roll of the year last previous to the issuing of the bonds. This is entirely departed from in the act of 1870. Had there been no subsequent legislation, it is clear that no bonds could have been issued upon the consent given and affidavit made after the completion of the roll of 1868. Had bonds been issued under the provisions of the act of 1867, and the town had complied with its provisions, it would not have been liable to pay a tax at any one time to pay more than one year's interest upon the bonds, as none would have accrued prior to the issue: while the act of 1870 requires, in effect, that they should bear date and be upon interest from April 25th, 1868, the time of filing the consent and affidavit in the town clerk's office, thus subjecting the town to a tax for this back interest, in addition to such as should accrue after the issue. No taxpayer of the town has ever consented to any such issue of its bonds. The judgment awards a mandamus to the appellant, compelling him to issue bonds according to the requirements of the act of 1870. If the consent of the taxpayers, or any part of them, or of any of the town boards or officers, or any of the electors of the town is necessary, this judgment cannot be sustained, as no such consent has been given to such an issue of the bonds as the judgment commands.

But before examining this question, it may be well to consider the point made by the counsel for the respondent, that the appellant having made a return to the alternative writ, and issue having been taken upon such return by the relator, and a verdict having been found in his favor, he is entitled to judgment thereon awarding a peremptory mandamus together with damages and costs, of course, and therefore the question whether any of the acts in question are constitutional cannot be raised by the appellant either in this or the Supreme Court.

2 R. S. 587, section 57, cited by counsel, provides that, in case a verdict shall be found for the person suing out such writ, or if judgment be given for him upon demurrer or by default, he shall recover damages and costs in like manner as he might have done in an action on the case as aforesaid, and a peremptory mandamus shall be granted to him notwithstanding.

The common law, providing and regulating the remedy by mandamus, will show that the purpose of enacting this and other provisions of the statute and that of 9 Anne, chap. 90, was to authorize such pleadings in the proceedings as would present to the court the real merits for adjudication instead of compelling the relator to resort to an action on the case for the recovery of damages and to obtain a peremptory writ in case of a false return to the alternative. A review of the common law and the reasons for the passage of statute will be found in the opinion of Marvin, J., in The People v. The Supervisors of Richmond County, 28 N. Y. 112.

This shows that it was the intention of the statute to do complete justice in the proceeding itself, without a resort to any other.

The People v. The Board of Metropolitan Police, 26 N. Y. 316, was decided upon a point not affecting the present question, and while the opinion of Wright, J., seems to sustain the position of the counsel, he does not place his judgment upon that ground. It could not have been intended by the statute to give a peremptory writ when the record showed no legal right because of a mistake in the return in matters of fact resulting in a verdict for the relator.

The Commercial Bank of Albany v. The Canal Commissioners, 10 Wend. 25, gives the true rule. That at any time after a return and before a peremptory mandamus is awarded, the defendant may object to a want of sufficient title in the relator to the relief sought, or show any other defect of substance, though he cannot, after return, object to defects in form.

If the law gave an absolute right to the writ where a verdict was found for the relator although from the entire record it appeared he had no such right, great injustice might be the result.

This brings us to the question, whether a mandatory statute compelling a town or other municipal corporation to become a stockholder in a railroad or other corporation, by exchanging its bonds for stock upon the ter s prescribed by the statute, without its consent in any way given, is constitutional. This is a different question from that decided by this court in The Bank of Rome v. The Village of Rome, 18 N. Y. 38, and in subsequent cases. In these the question was, whether enabling statutes, conferring power upon such corporations to contract debts with their own consent, and investing the money thus raised in the stock of railroad corporations, or of exchanging directly its bonds for such stock, were valid. These facts were held constitutional by this court, but this does not determine that municipal corporations may be compelled by the mere authority of the Legislature to enter into this class of contracts and become such stockholders without their consent and against their will.

In The People v. Flagg, 46 N. Y. 401, it was held that an act requiring the town of Yonkers, without its consent, to issue bonds for raising money, which was to be expended in the construction of highways in the town in the manner prescribed by the act, was constitutional. This was so determined upon the ground that the making and improving of public highways, and providing the means therefor, were appropriate subjects of legislation. That towns possess such powers as are conferred by the Legislature, that they are a part of the machinery of the State government, and perform important municipal functions, subject to the regulation and control of the Legislature; in short, that the act was the mere exercise of the unquestioned power of the Legislature to determine what highways should be constructed, and of the taxing power in providing means to defray the expenses incurred in their construction.

But it is said in the opinion, that if the object of the expenditure was private, or, if the money to be raised was directed to be paid to a private corporation, which is authorized to use the improvement for private gain, the question would be quite different, and in this respect there is a limit beyond which legislative power cannot legitimately be exercised. It is manifest that the question presented in the present case was not determined in that, unless it shall be further held that a railroad owned and controlled by a corporation, and operated by it for the benefit of its stockholders, is a public highway in the same sense as the common roads of the country. The towns through which the latter run may be compelled to construct and keep them in repair for the common use of the public. The substantial question in the present case is, whether they may be so compelled to construct and repair railroads owned and operated by corporations for the benefit of the stockholders.

It is clear that they may be, if they are public highways, in the same sense as common roads. It has been uniformly held that the right of eminent domain may be exercised so far in behalf of railroad corporations as is necessary for the construction and operation of the road, upon the ground that the road and its operation was for a public purpose, and the real estate condemned for its use was taken for public and not private use. But it is equally clear that the property acquired by the corporation belongs to it exclusively, and its ownership is as absolute as that of any private individual of property belonging to him. It is also clear that, so far as the road is operated for the benefit of its stockholders, the corporation is private. We have then an artificial being created by the Legislature, endowed with public franchises, the absolute owner of property of which it cannot be deprived by legislation, except for public purposes, carrying on business for the private emolument of its stockholders. The People v. Flagg determines that towns may be compelled to provide for the construction and maintenance of improvements of a public character exclusively.

But here we have an attempt to compel them to aid in the construction of a work, public in some respects, but private in others, of at least equal importance. It is said that municipal corporations are creatures of the Legislature, and subject to its control. In a certain sense this is true. They are created by the Legislature as instrumentalities of the government, and, so far as legislation for governmental purposes is concerned, are absolutely subject to its control. The power of legislation over individuals is given to the Legislature for all the purposes of government, subject to such restrictions as are contained in the Constitution, yet no one would claim that an individual could be compelled by a statute to exchange his note or bond and mortgage with a railroad corporation for its stock, against his will, upon such terms as were prescribed in the act, or any other.

It is within the province of the Legislature to provide for enforcing the performance of contracts when made, but to enforce the making of them by individuals is entirely beyond it. We have seen that municipal corporations may be compelled to enter into contracts for an exclusively public purpose, but I think they cannot be when the purpose is private. This is equally beyond the province of legislation in the case of such corporations as in those of private corporations or individuals.

In Atkins v. The Town of Randolph, 31 Vt. 226, it was held that an act providing for the appointment of an agent of the town by the county commissioner, with power to purchase liquors on the credit of the town, and to sell the same for certain specified purposes, and account for and pay over the proceeds to the town as prescribed, was unconstitutional, and the town not having consented to the appointment or ratified the contract, was not liable for the liquors purchased upon its credit by such agent pursuant to the act. This judgment is based upon the grounds that the legislative power over municipal corporations is not supreme, and does not include the power of compelling them to enter into contracts of a private character, although such contract would conduce to the public good, by enabling the government to suppress traffic in intoxicating liquors.

In the Western Saving Fund Society of Philadelphia v City of Philadelphia, 31 Penn. St. 175, 185, it was held that when a municipal corporation engages in things not public in their nature, it acts as a private individual, and in the same case between the same parties, Id. 175, it was held that it so acted in supplying its inhabitants with gas.

In Bailey v. The Mayor, &c., 3 Hill, it was held that a municipal corporation was to be regarded as private as to its ownership of lands and other property and that the test, whether powers exercised by a municipal corporation were public or private, was whether they were for the benefit and emolument of the corporation, or for public purposes; and it was further held, that the city of New York, under the act to supply the city with pure and wholesome water (Laws 1834, p. 451), acted as a private corporation, and was responsible as such for the acts of those appointed by the act, for the reason that the corporation had accepted and consented to the act.

Surely a town acts as a private corporation in becoming a stockholder in a railroad corporation, and as such interested in the operation of the road for the benefit of the stockholders.

When a municipal acts as a private corporation, it acts as a private individual.

In Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140, it was tersely said by Bronson, J., that the power of making bargains for individuals has not been conferred upon any department of the government.

In The People v. Morris, 13 Wend. 325, the distinction between the nature of the action of public and private corporations is clearly given.

Olcott v. The Board of Supervisors of Fond du Lac, recently decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, not reported, is cited as decisive of the question now under consideration in the present case. But this question was not in that case. That action was for the recovery of notes and orders issued by the Sheboygan and Fond du Lac Railroad Company, in pursuance of an enabling act, passed by the Legislature, which required such issue to be approved by a majority of the votes given at an election to be held for the purpose of determining whether such majority approved such issue. The question was, whether the enabling act was constitutional? The Circuit Court held it was not, and gave judgment for the defendant upon the ground that the Supreme Court of Wisconsin had previously so determined, and that as the question was, whether an act of the State Legislature was authorized by the constitution of the State, the Federal courts must adopt the determination of the State court. This judgment was reversed by the Supreme Court, the chief justice and Justices Davis and Miller dissenting.

Upon the question involved, the Supreme Court has no appellate jurisdiction from judgments of the State courts; and, hence, its judgment is not controlling in the determination. I concur in the views of the dissenting justices, that when the Federal courts acquire jurisdiction by reason of the residence of the parties, they ought in such questions to follow the determination of the courts of the State.

Justice Strong, in the prevailing opinion, holds that the taxing power can be exercised for the public purposes only, but insists that the construction of railroads falls within this class, and that the taxing power may be resorted to therefor.

But the exercise of the taxing power, either general or local, for this purpose is altogether different from compelling a town to take stock in the corporation without its consent, and to that extent engage in the business of a common carrier.

I think it would not be claimed that a town could be compelled to become a stockholder in a banking or manufacturing corporation, although it appeared that the particular corporation would largely promote the public interest where the business was conducted. Such legislation could only be sustained by holding the power of the Legislature supreme over municipal corporations, for private as well as public purposes. Upon principle and authority, I think it is not as to the former, although it is as to the latter. The test is whether the purpose to be effected is public or private. If the former, a mandatory statute, is valid. If the latter, it is not within the province of legislation, and consequently not within the power of the Legislature, and the act is therefore void.

We have seen that a railroad corporation possesses some of the characteristics of both—public as to its franchise, private as to the ownership of its property and its relations to its stockholders. Were it exclusively public, the act of 1870 would be valid, but void if exclusively private. It follows that, as the Legislature is supreme only as to public purposes, and as the act in question relates in part to private, to this extent it is void; and as the latter is inseparably connected with the former, the entire act must be held void.

In Sweet v. Hulbert, 51 Barb. 312, it was held that an enabling act to issue bonds and donate the same, or the proceeds, to a railroad corporation to aid in the construction of its road, was void.

It is unnecessary to go so far in the present case.

It is argued that the power of taxation for any purpose is supreme, and such power may be exercised upon the State at large, or any particular locality, in the discretion of the Legislature, and that the act in question is but the mere exercise of this power of taxation, and therefore valid.

The People v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 4 Comst. 419, and Town of Guilford v. Supervisors of Chenango, are relied upon to sustain the position. These cases do not go quite as far as claimed by the counsel. The former only determines that an act to provide for the expense incurred in grading and improving the streets of a city, by assessment upon the people properly benefited, is a legitimate exercise of the taxing power, and therefore valid; and the latter, that the Legislature can recognise claims founded in equity and justice in the largest sense of these terms, or in gratitude and charity, and providing for their payment by imposing a tax upon those who ought to pay them.

The act in question cannot be maintained upon the taxing power.

A municipal corporation cannot be compelled to embark in a business of a private character, because its prosecution by it will probably or certainly lead to its taxation for the capital to be invested or expenses incurred therein.

The above view renders an examination of the other questions discussed unnecessary.

The judgment appealed from must be reversed, and a judgment rendered declaring the relator not entitled to a peremptory writ, with costs to the appellant.

FIRST DEPARTMENT.

BARCLAY v. THE PEOPLE.

Jurors who have tried and decided a criminal case are not competent to sit on a second trial of the same case. The act of 1872 (ch. 475), relating to challenges of jurors in criminal cases, does not apply to such a case.—Al. L. J.

The plaintiff in error was indicted, charged with committing the crime of grand larceny in the dwelling house of Henry M. Smith, by feloniously taking and carrying away the personal property of John H. Morrell in the night time. The indictment also charged, that the plaintiff in error had been theretofore convicted of a felonious crime and had been imprisoned upon such conviction. For some cause not stated, a previous trial and conviction of the prisoner on the 23d of May, 1873, was set aside, and the prisoner was tried and again convicted on the following day. On the trial, Stephen Price was called as a juror and challenged by prisoner's counsel for principal cause. Q. You were on the jury? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you hear the case tried, and did you form an opinion of the guilt of the accused? A. Yes, sir. By district attorney. Q. Mr. Price, do you believe that, having taking an oath as a juror in this case, you can decide the case upon the evidence that may be adduced, irrespective and wholly disregarding any present impressions you may have; in other words, will you be governed by the view you may have of the case now, or will you be governed in your verdict exclusively by the evidence that may be brought out in the trial? A. The view I have of the case now. Q. That will control you, regardless of what the evidence may be? A. Yes, sir.

By counsel for the prisoner:

Q. You heard the case tried yesterday? A. Yes, sir. Q. You rendered a verdict of guilty against this man on the very same indictment you are now to try this man? A. Yes, sir. Q. If you were to hear the same evidence to-day, would your verdict be the same? A. Yes, sir. Q. Have you at this moment formed a belief as to the guilt of the prisoner? A. Yes, sir. Q. That impression remains with you now? A. Yes, sir. Q. If you were sworn, you would render a verdict of guilty? A. Yes, sir. The court—He is competent. The prisoner's counsel then moved that the juror be rejected as incompetent for principal cause. The motion was denied and counsel excepted. Several other jurors on the former trial were also accepted as jurors subject to exception. Several other exceptions were taken, which are referred to in the opinion herein. The prisoner was convicted and sentenced to the State prison for eight years. On appeal from motion denying a new trial.

William F. Howe, for plaintiff in error. The court erred in overruling the objections to the juror Stephen Price; also to the other jurors on the former trial. Cancemi v. The People, 16 N. Y. 507; Willis v. The People, 32 Id. 715. The act of May 3d, 1872, "in relation to challenges of jurors in criminal cases," is unconstitutional. Const. N. Y., art. 1, § 6; Taylor v. Roster, 4 Hill, 140; Wynehamer v. The People, 13 N. Y. 446; Coke Inst., part 1, Lib. 2, chap. 12, § 234, 157 b.

Benjamin K. Phelps, district attorney, for defendants in error, cites Walter v. The People, 32 N. Y. 147; Sedg. Const. Law, p. 457; Beers v. Beers, 4 Conn. 539; Colt v. Eus, 12 Id. 243.

INGRAHAM, P. J. The prisoner was indicted for grand larceny, and for a second offence.

The indictment charged that the prisoner on the 8th of November, 1866, had been convicted of an attempt to commit grand larceny, and had been sentenced to the penitentiary and to pay a fine, and had been duly discharged and remitted of such judgment.

It further charged that on the 11th May, 1872, the prisoner was guilty of grand larceny in stealing the property of John H. Merick, in the dwelling house of one Henry M. Smith.

The prisoner had been tried in the general sessions on the previous day for the same offence, and had been found guilty. For some cause, not stated in the error book, that trial and conviction was set aside, and the prisoner was tried on the 24th May, 1872.

Several of the jurors who had served upon the former trial were called and sworn as jurors on this trial, after having been challenged for cause by the prisoner's counsel.

On the trial, the people gave in evidence the arrest of the prisoner in 1866, and his conviction then of an attempt to commit grand larceny. All these matters were duly excepted to by the counsel for the prisoner.

It is objected that the act in relation to challenges of jurors in criminal cases (Laws 1872, ch. 475), is unconstitutional and void, for the reason that the constitution (art. 1, § 1) declares the trial by jury shall remain inviolate forever, and in article 1, section 6, provides that no person shall be deprived of liberty, &c., without due process of law.

The construction of the sixth section was passed upon by Bronson, J., in Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 140, where he says: "The meaning of this section seems to be, that no member of the State shall be disfranchised or deprived of any of his rights or privileges, unless the matter be adjudged against him upon the trial had, according to the course of the common law. It must be ascertained judicially;" and again he says: "The words due process of law cannot mean less than a prosecution or suit instituted and conducted according to the prescribed forms and solemnities for ascertaining guilt."

In Wynehamer v. The People, 13 N. Y. 446, Judge Selden says: "The clause in question was intended to secure to every citizen the benefit of those rules of the common law by which judicial trials are regulated, and to place them beyond the reach of legislative subversion, and Hubbard, J., defines due process of law as meaning an ordinary judicial proceeding; in a criminal case an arraignment, formal complaint, confronting of witnesses, trial, conviction and judgment. Such trials, therefore, are to be regulated and conducted according to the common law, viz., by indictment, trial by jury, proof of guilt, unanimous verdict of jury, and those rules which the defendant at common law had a right to insist upon in his defence. These requisites do not control the Legislature as to the rules of evidence, the qualifications of jurors, the nature of crime, and the punishment to be inflicted for its commission. All these are matters left to the discretion of the Legislature. Any other rule would prevent the Legislature from changing the qualification of jurors, altering the age at which they should be excused from serving, prescribing who may and who may not be witnesses, and many other regulations in regard to trials which do not necessarily violate that provision."

In Walters v. The People, 32 N. Y. 147, 159, Wright, J., says, in regard to these constitutional provisions: "There are no limitations or restrictions upon legislative power, except as to the right guaranteed, viz., a jury trial in all cases in which it had been used before the adoption of the instrument. Trial by jury cannot be dispensed with in criminal cases, but it is obviously within the scope of legislation to regulate such trial."

If these views are correct, then there is no force in the objection that the act referred to is in violation of the constitution in regulating the right of challenge to jurors, and providing the necessary qualifications, even if it does alter the rule of the common law on that subject. But does the law referred to make any such alteration?

In regard to challenges to the favor, they remain unaffected by that statute. The statute is confined to challenges for principal cause only, and in no way changes the law as to challenges to the favor.

It provides that "the previous formation or expression of an opinion, or impression on which any criminal action at law is based, or in reference to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, or a present opinion or impression in reference thereto, shall not be a sufficient ground of challenge for principal cause, provided the person proposed as a juror shall declare, on oath, that he verily believes that he can render an impartial verdict according to the evidence; that such opinion or impression will not bias or influence his verdict; and provided the court shall be satisfied that the proposed juror does not entertain such a present opinion as would influence his verdict as a juror." It is difficult to see how this law changes the common law rules as to the qualification of jurors.

If we go back to the common law as it existed prior to statutory provisions, it must be remembered that jurors were always selected from the vicinage. In Coke's Littleton, vol. 3, p. 464, it is said: "Every trial shall be out of that town, parish or hamlet, or place known out of the town within the record, within which the matter of fact issuable is alleged, which is most certain and nearest thereto, the inhabitants whereof may have the better and more certain knowledge of the fact." And in Cro. Eliz. 260, it is said: "So essential did the common law deem the having some of the neighbors on the jury, that if the visne appeared on the record to be a wrong place, it was a mistrial."

Afterward, by statute 16 Charles II., it was provided that the cause might be tried by a jury from any part of the county. These provisions show that by the common law, it was a matter of right that neighbors should form the jury, because they had more knowledge of the accused, and of the facts connected with the alleged offence. These provisions have been altered from time to time, so that now, partly by the English statutes before the formation of this government, and since then by laws passed by the Legislature, the qualifications of jurors have been changed, and all that is now required is that a juror shall be impartial, unbiassed, and capable of rendering a true verdict upon the evidence.

The act of 1872 makes no different provision, and takes away no qualification which existed previously.

The same rule which is incorporated in this statute, has been repeatedly adjudged by the courts and adopted for years previous to its passage. In Darell v. Mosher, 8 J. R. 347, a juror, on challenge, said that he had said that the defendant was wrong and the plaintiff was right; but he also said he had no personal knowledge of the matter in dispute, but if the reports were correct the defendant was wrong and the plaintiff was right. The court held that the objection was unfounded. In Freeman v. The People, 4 Denio, 9, 34, the jurors had an impression that the prisoner was guilty, but not an absolute opinion. The challenge was not sustained. In Lohman v. The People, 1 Com. 384; The People v. Bodine, 3 Denio, 122, questions were put to jurors whether they could try the case and render an impartial verdict, notwithstanding their impressions or opinions, and on answering that they could, they were held to be good jurors.

In The Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. 295, where the juror had an opinion, but said it was not strong enough to cause him to prejudge the case or to prevent a candid judgment on the evidence, he was held to be competent.

Such seems to be the general rule where the opinion is formed from mere rumor or newspaper statements, and would not influence the juror in deciding on the evidence, and he would not be disqualified thereby.

The statute of 1872 does not require anything different. The juror is not only to declare, on oath, that he believes he can render an impartial verdict on the evidence, and that the opinion or impression he has will not bias or influence his verdict, but the court must also be satisfied that such juror does not entertain such a present opinion as would influence his verdict.

These requisites would seem to require that the juror, before he is accepted, must be free from bias, and must satisfy the court of his impartiality.

The alteration of the qualifications as to the juror, if any such alteration is made by this statute, only applies to the challenge for cause. The objection is not taken away from the other challenge, and the same can be available on the challenge to the favor if it really exists. It amounts then to nothing more than providing that if the juror says he can try the case without being influenced by such impressions, it shall not be a good cause for rejecting the juror on that challenge, and does not compel the trial by a juror not qualified, if the party challenging sees fit to use the challenge to the favor.

If it be conceded that the constitutional restriction included in its provisions the right to have impartial jurors, as stated in The Matter of Vermilyea, 6 Cow. 555, still there is nothing in this law which takes it away or interferes with its exercise. It is a mere regulation of the challenge for principal cause, prescribing what shall not be a sufficient ground to sustain such challenge. The Legislature may change or regulate the mode of challenging. So long as the right of a jury trial is preserved, and means provided by which impartial jurors can be obtained, there is no violation of the costitutional guarantee of a trial by jury.

There is no ground, therefore, on which the act referred to can be held to be unconstitutional.

The objection to the jurors who were held to be competent on the second trial, when they had tried the cause previously, and had found a verdict against the prisoner, is of a different character

Stephen Price was challenged for principal cause. He stated he was on the first jury, and heard the case; that he had formed his opinion; that the view he then had of the case would control him, regardless of what the evidence might be; that his verdict would be the same on the same evidence, and if sworn, that he would render a verdict of guilty. In answer to a question from the court whether, without regard to previous impressions, he could give a true verdict upon the evidence, and try the case fairly and impartially, he answered that he could do so.

The opinion or impression which is referred to in the act of 1872, is not intended to apply to such a case. The words are: "The previous formation or expression of an opinion or impression in reference to the circumstances upon which any criminal action at law is based, or in reference to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, shall not be a sufficient ground of challenge for principal cause," &c. Such an opinion or impression was not intended to include the case of jurors sworn and acting as jurors in the same case on a previous trial. The duty they have discharged is the rendering a solemn judgment upon the guilt of the prisoner, and that under oath. With the same evidence, it is hard to see how any other verdict can be rendered on a second trial by an honest juror. They have done more than formed an opinion. They have rendered a judgment against the prisoner that he was guilty.

Such has been the uniform course of decisions at the common law as to jurors who had acted as such on previous trials of the same case. So long ago as the case of The King v. Titus Oates, 10 Howell's S. T. 1079, it was held that a man who had been one of the indicters could not sit on the petit jury. In the reign of Edward III., this was made a statutory provision, and the same has been incorporated in our statutes, and is now the law in this State. 3 R. S. 1029. The objection to a grand juror is by no means as strong as it is when applied to a petit juror. The grand juror has only heard one side of the testimony, and has not adjudged the prisoner guilty, but merely held that the facts proven were enough to put the prisoner on trial.

So, if a juror hath been an arbitrator in the same cause, he cannot sit on the jury. And the reason given for it is, that a man who has made up his mind, and has declared it under his name, and placed it upon the record, will not be impartial as a juror ought to be. 2 Rawle, 46.

So it was held, that if the juror had given a verdict before in the same case, albeit it be reversed by writ of error, or if judgment be arrested, he cannot serve on the second trial.

And the reason given is, that the juror had not only formed and expressed an opinion, but had given a decided judgment under the solemnities of his oath on the merits after he had heard and examined all the testimony.

Various cases might be cited where it has been held that a juror, who had formerly given a verdict in the same cause, between the same parties, could not act as such on the second trial. Co. Litt. 157; Cro. Eliz. 33, p. 13; 2 Brown, 268; Kirby, 166; 2 Rawle, 498; 16 Ind. 298; 15 Ohio St. 155; 20 Ga. 60. Not one case has been cited where such a juror has been held to be competent.

We are of the opinion that the challenge should have been sustained, that jurors who have tried and decided a cause are not qualified to sit on a second trial, if such shall be granted, and that the act of 1872, relative to the qualification of jurors, does not apply to such cases. An exception was taken by the admission of the record of the former conviction of the prisoner on another charge, and also to the jury that they could only convict for grand larceny, because there was no proof that the prisoner had been discharged and remitted of the first felony. The recorder refused so to charge, holding that the refusal of the recorder to charge the record and the sentence, which had expired some time since, was evidence that the prisoner had been discharged. This was sufficient to submit that question to the jury. The legal presumption would be, that at the expiration of the sentence the prisoner would be discharged.

We are of the opinion, that the judgment was erroneous, on account of the admission of the jurors, who were sworn on the first trial, being on the jury by which the prisoner was finally convicted, and it is unnecessary to examine the other exceptions in the case.

Judgment reversed and new trial ordered.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Chief Justice, Supreme Court, Pa.

"I have examined the Legal Gazette Reports which you did me the favor to send me, with great satisfaction. It is well gotten up, and neatly printed and bound. The variety of matter contained in it, emanating indiscriminately from courts in every portion of the State, renders the volume useful in every section to both lawyers and judges, and to them I cheerfully commend it." March 1st, 1872.

From HON. WM. S. PEIRCE,
Court of Com. Pleas, and Orphans' Court, Phila.

"It is presented to the public in good style, and so far as I have had opportunity to examine my own decisions, they are accurately reported, and the syllabi are concise and correct, and I am sure from the known ability of the Reporter, that they are so with respect to the other decisions."
Philada., March 1st, 1872.

From HON. JAMES LYND,
District Court, Phila.

"I have received and examined with interest and pleasure the first volume of Legal Gazette Reports. It contains much valuable matter, carefully edited and handsomely published. As multitudinous as the decisions of the Supreme Court seem to be, the number of quite important points that never reach that tribunal is very large; and the early publication, therefore, of cases disposed of in the courts of first resort is greatly to be commended. Permit me to express a hope that the Legal Gazette Reports will prove as profitable to the publishers as it will be serviceable to the bar and judiciary of our State." Philada., March 2d, 1872.

From HON. JOSEPH ALLISON,
President Judge 1st Judicial District, Pa.

"The work is in all respects most creditable to its Editor and Publishers, not only as to its external merit, but as a valuable addition to the reports of decided cases. The work affords abundant evidence of great care in its preparation, and is every way worthy of a favorable reception by the legal profession." Philadelphia, Feb. 23d, 1872.

From HON. THOS. K. FINLETTER,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts, Phila.

"I have examined volume one, Legal Gazette Reports, and am much pleased with the execution of the work. Many of the cases contained therein are familiar to me, as being argued and determined in the courts in which I sit, and I can testify to the fidelity and accuracy with which they are reported. I think that the volume will be a valuable addition to the Pennsylvania Reports." Philadelphia, March 21st, 1872

From HON. A. B. LONGAKER,
President Judge 3d Judicial District, Pa.

"The cases are well selected and important. It is a most valuable volume for the bench and bar, and very deservedly so as regards various points of practice. Every practitioner ought to have it." Allentown Pa., April 20th, 1872.

From HON. JAMES T. MITCHELL,
District Court, Phila

"The volume is handsomely got up, and to those who have not a full set of, the Legal Gazette will be necessary to complete the Pennsylvania series, and the bar will buy it with a good grace even in this day of multiplied reports, as it contains only cases that have not been elsewhere reported." Feb. 23d, 1872.

From HON. B. F. JUNKIN,
President Judge 9th Judicial District, Pa.

"I am convinced of its great value to the profession. It contains many decisions, involving questions which seldom reach the regular State Reports. You have done much for the bar and bench and they owe you a reward. The volume is neat and accurate." Bloomfield, Pa., April 2d, 1872.

From HON. A. W. ACHESON,
President Judge 27th Judicial District, Pa.

"It is replete with valuable information, and I think must be favorably received by the profession." Washington, Pa., April 6th, 1872.

From HON. J. B LIVINGSTON,
President Judge 2d Judicial District, Pa.

"I have carefully examined the 1st vol., "Legal Gazette Reports." The matter contained therein, taken as it is from the decisions and practice of different courts throughout the State, will render this work indispensable to the practicing attorney as well as the judiciary. The book is well gotten up, neat in appearance, the syllabi accurate and index complete. I have no doubt it will soon find a place in the library of every practising attorney in the Commonwealth." Lancaster, Pa., April 8th, 1872.

From HON. J. C. BUCHER,
President Judge 20th Judicial District, Pa.

"From the examination I have made, I am convinced that they (the Reports) will be of great value to the practitioner and indispensable to all who desire a complete record of all the Pennsylvania cases." Lewisburg, Pa., March 10th, 1872.

From HON. HENRY P. ROSS,
President Judge 7th Judicial District, Pa.

"The volume has so much to commend it, both in its external appearance as a book, with regard to paper, type and general typographical execution, and in the great practical utility of its contents, that any expression of individual opinion as to its merits seems to be superfluous. I hope it will be the first of a series, and that its successors will present as many valuable cases as carefully edited as this initial volume. Such a series will be an indispensable element in the library of every lawyer." Norristown, Pa., March 22d, 1872.

From HON. JAMES A. LOGAN,
President Judge 10th Judicial District, Pa.

"To me this seems an exceedingly valuable volume. Its decisions must prove of great assistance to both bench and bar, throughout the State. I regard as the peculiar excellence of these reports the class of well considered "lower court" decisions, which aside from their great aid to the profession must so largely tend to establish a most desirable uniformity of practice in the different districts in the State." Greensburg, Pa., March 28th, 1872.

OPINION OF THE JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT.

1. When an act is found lodged in the office of the secretary of State, with other public acts passed at the same session, signed by the speaker of the House of Representatives, and the president of the Senate; and approved and signed by the governor, and published by authority as one of the public statutes of the State; that constitutes prima facie evidence, that said act received the assent of the two branches of the Legislature, and the approval of the governor, in the manner required by the constitution to make it a valid statute of this State.
2. But the journals of each branch of the Legislature, are to be considered and treated as authentic records of the proceedings of the Legislature, and they may be resorted to, in such cases to ascertain whether the two houses in fact, concurred in the passage of any specified act; and if it appears by the journals that both houses did not thus concur, the prima facie evidence derived from an examination of the act itself will be overcome, and the act will be held to be invalid, and of no effect as a law.
3. The opinion of the justices, 35 N. H. 579, confirmed.
4. Held: That chapter 33 of the Pamphlet Laws of 1872, entitled "an act in amendment of chapter 49, section 2 of the general statute relating to persons and property liable to taxation," by which act, parsonages were exempted from taxation, is not a valid law of this State, as it appears never to have received the assent of the House of Representatives, though it had all the forms of a valid law.

To His Excellency Ezekiel A. Straw, Governor of New Hampshire, and the Honorable Council.

The undersigned justices of the Supreme Judicial Court, have considered the question raised by the joint resolution of the Legislature as stated in your communication of August 9th, 1873.

That question is, "whether chapter 33 of the Pamphlet Laws of 1872, entitled an act in amendment of chapter 49, section 2 of the general statutes, relating to persons and property liable to taxation, is a law of the State?" and it is represented that said chapter 33 of said Pamphlet Laws, never passed both branches of the Legislature, as was required by the constitution of this State. By said act parsonages were exempted from taxation.

A similar question arose in this State in 1858, in relation to an act, entitled "An act in amendment of an act prescribing the duties of cashiers of banks," in which case an opinion of this court was given, which was published in the 35th vol. N. H. Reports, 579, in which it was held that when an act is found lodged in the office of the secretary of State, with other public acts passed at the same session, signed by the speaker of the House of Representatives and the president of the Senate, and approved and signed by the governor, and published by authority as one of the public statutes; that constitutes prima facie evidence, that said act received the assent of the two branches of the Legislature, and the approval of the governor in the manner required by the constitution, to make it a valid statute of this State.

But that the journals of each branch of the Legislature, are to be considered and treated as authentic records of the proceedings, and that they may be resorted to in such cases, to ascertain whether the two houses in fact concurred in the passage of any specified act; and that if it appears by the journals that they did not thus concur, the prima facie evidence derived from an examination of the act itself will be overcome, and the act will be held invalid, and of no effect as a law.

The act here in question has all the requirements necessary to make it prima facie, a valid public statute. Let us examine the records in the case as found in the journals of the two houses of our Legislature, and see if in fact, it did receive the necessary assent of both branches of that body.

The journal of the Senate for June session, 1872, shows on pages 27 and 28, that on the 19th of June notice was given of an intention to introduce the bill in question, and on page 31, that on the 20th of June it was accordingly introduced, read twice, and referred to the committee on the judiciary; and on page 44, that on the 25th of June it was reported from said committee without amendment, and ordered to a third reading; and on page 51, that on the 26th of June it was read a third time and passed; and on page 70, that on the 28th of June, it was reported to the Senate as correctly engrossed. We have also examined the bill itself, on file in the office of the secretary of State, and find entries upon the back of said bill corresponding with the above entries in the journal of the Senate; and in addition, a memorandum, that the bill was engrossed June 27th, 1872. But there is no entry or memorandum on said bill tending to show that it was ever sent to, or acted upon by the House of Representatives.

An examination of the journal of the House of Representatives shows on page 49, that on June 12th, notice was given of a bill "in amendment of chapter 49 of the General Statutes relating to persons and property liable to taxation," and on page 55, that on June 13th, said bill was introduced, read twice, and referred to the committee on finance; and on pages 171 and 172, that on June 27th, the bill was reported back to the House, with a resolution that it was inexpedient to legislate upon the subject, which resolution was adopted. Upon examining the original bill on file, we find that said bill related to the taxation of money at interest, alone, and had no reference to parsonages or church property.

The journal also shows on page 99, that notice was given of the introduction of a bill "to exempt parsonage and church property from taxation." Also, on page 133, notice of a bill entitled, "an act exempting parsonage houses from taxation." But there is no record in said journal that either of said bills was ever introduced or read, or referred to any committee. But it appears on page 158, that on June 26th, a bill entitled "an act to exempt parsonages and church property from taxation," was reported from the committee on finance in a new draft, which was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading; and on page 161, that on the same day, the bill entitled "an act to exempt parsonages from taxation," was read a second time, and ordered to a third reading, when it was laid upon the table; and on page 262, that on July 3d, this bill was taken from the table and indefinitely postponed. It also appears on page 189, that on June 28th, the joint committee on engrossed bills, reported to the House (as they did to the Senate), that "an act in amendment of chapter 49, section 2 of the General Statutes" was found to be correctly engrossed; and also on page 207, that a message was received in the House from the Senate, announcing that the Senate concurred with the House of Representatives in the passage (among others) of "an act in amendment of chapter 49, section 2 of the General Statutes, relating to persons and property liable to taxation."

The above are all the entries that we find in the journals of either House relating to chapter 49, section 2 of the General Statutes, or in relation to the taxation of parsonages or church property.

From all the evidence thus before us, it appears that the bill in question, after its passage in the Senate June 26th, was sent directly to the engrossing clerk; was by him engrossed June 27th; and was reported to both branches by the joint committee on engrossed bills, on June 28th, as correctly engrossed; but that the bill was never sent to the House of Representatives for their concurrence; and that said House never took any action whatever upon said bill.

We find, therefore, that said bill was not erected in the form prescribed by the constitution, and did not become a valid statute of the State.

Our opinion is, that the act entitled "An act in amendment of chapter forty-nine, section two, of the general statute, relating to persons and property liable to taxation," purporting to have been passed at the session of the Legislature of this State, held in June, 1872, is not legally valid and binding as a law of the State.

BLODGETT et al. v. THE BERLIN MILLS CO.

1. In an action to recover for work and labor, the plaintiff claimed that, by the original contract of hiring, he was to work "so long, and so long only, as he chose." The defendants claimed that the hiring was for a specified time; and it appeared that the suit was commenced before the expiration of that time. Held, that evidence to show the extent of damage occasioned the defendants by the plaintiff's leaving their employ before the expiration of the term of service claimed by them, was properly excluded.
2. A breach or failure of performance by the employe of the original contract of hiring may be shown by the employer in defence, pro tanto, to an action against him for the wages, under the general issue.

Opinion by LADD, J.

The first exception was to the exclusion of evidence tending to show that the defendants were damaged by the plaintiffs' leaving the work to an extent equal to the contract price of the labor done. To ascertain whether this ruling was right, it is necessary to see what was the exact position of the case, and what was the question for the jury on the writ and pleadings as they stood.

The suit was commenced before the logging season expired. It was therefore apparent that, unless the plaintiffs could satisfy the jury that the contract was as they claimed, and not for service during the whole logging season as claimed by the defendants, they must fail, for the reason that in such case the action would have been prematurely brought. No other legal conclusion was possible if that fact were found against them. Thompson v. Phelan, 22 N. H. 339; Davis v. Barrington, 30 N. H. 517, 530; Hartwell v. Jewett, 9 N. H. 249; Bailey v. Woods, 17 N. H. 365. On the other hand, if the contract was found by the jury to be as claimed by the plaintiffs, that is that they might work so long, and so long only, as they pleased, the defendants would be entitled to no deduction, for the very obvious reason that then there would be no fault or breach of contract by the plaintiffs, their right to leave as they did being expressly allowed by the terms of the agreement under which the labor was performed.

The question, therefore, how much the defendants were damaged by the plaintiffs' leaving when they did, was not in the case, and could not have been tried without leading to a very manifest absurdity; for, suppose that question had been sent to the jury, and the jury had thereupon found the defendants' damages on account of the leaving to be $200, while at the same time they found that the plaintiffs were entitled to be paid $250 for their labor; deducting the one sum from the other, it would follow that they must return a verdict for the plaintiffs for $50. This clearly involves the inconsistency of finding the contract to be as claimed by both plaintiffs and defendants at the same time, when those claims are utterly incompatible and repugnant. We are clearly of opinion that the evidence offered on this point was not admissible, and was properly excluded.

The defendants complain of the instructions given to the jury, principally, as it seems, because the jury were told that if the defendants' version of the contract be sustained, they cannot recover by way of set-off or in reduction of the plaintiffs' claim; because, in the first place, the plaintiffs cannot recover at all upon their declaration, and, in the second place, the defendants cannot recover damages under the general issue and set-off in this case.

If this instruction had been entirely wrong, and both the reasons given for it entirely erroneous, it is not easy to see how the defendants could have been injured by it, or what ground it would furnish for setting aside the verdict; for the jury did not find the defendants' version of the contract to be sustained; what would have happened, or what their verdict must have been in case they had so found, was of no consequence. They never had occasion to apply the rule laid down for their guidance in such a contingency, because the contingency never arose. Whether a rule is right or wrong can hardly be very material, when it is certain that it has not been used.

This would seem to be a sufficient answer to the objection, even if the instruction on this point was wrong; but we think it was right. It is sufficiently settled in this State, that where the defendant, in a case like the present, elects to have the damages which he has suffered from the plaintiff's breach of contract under which the service was performed, considered and allowed in the action brought against him to recover pay for such service, he must be understood as conceding that they are not to be extended beyond the amount of what he has received. Britton v. Turner, 6 N. H. 481. The doctrine is clearly stated by Bronson, J., in Batterman v. Pierce, 3 Hill, 171. He says: "The defendant has the election whether he will set up his claim in answer to the plaintiff's demand, or resort to a cross action; and whatever may be the amount of his damages, he can only set them up by way of abatement, either in whole or in part, of the plaintiff's demand. He cannot, as in case of set-off, go beyond that, and have a balance certified in his favor."

And see an elaborate and valuable discussion of the whole subject by Martin, J., in Ward v. Fellers, 3 Mich. 281. A different practice prevails under those systems of pleading which authorize the court, in any action which requires it, to grant the defendant affirmative relief. But where the common law rules of pleading are in use, and the defendant is allowed to recoup his damages by way of defence only, he can do no more than reduce, or, at most, wholly cancel and defeat the plaintiff's claim.

If the defendant thinks his damages are more than the plaintiff's whole demand, his proper course is to waive that defence and bring a cross action to recover them. Merriam v. Woodcock, 104 Mass. 326. The instruction complained of amounts to no more than this: If the plaintiffs, by reason of their own breach of the contract, are not entitled to recover at all in this suit, which was commenced before the end of the logging season, then the defendants cannot have the damages they have suffered, by reason of the breach, deducted or recouped from the plaintiff's damages; and the reason is quite obvious, that in such case the plaintiffs would have no damages to be reduced, and an independent judgment for damages in favor of the defendants could not be rendered on the pleadings as they stood. The instruction was therefore right, and, one, at least, of the reasons given for it was correct. Whether the other reason, namely, that the defendants cannot recover damages under the general issue and set-off, was correct or not, would therefore be immaterial, even if the correctness of the instruction were material. A wrong reason given for a right ruling, when it appears that the jury were not misled thereby, furnishes no ground of exception. Gibson v. Stevens, 7 N. H. 352, 360; Carpenter v. Pierce, 13 N. H. 403. To avoid any misapprehension, however, it may be well to add a few observations on this point.

Instructions to the jury are to be considered with reference to the facts and situation of the case in which they are given. In this case we have seen that the defendants could not recoup their damages, whichever way the jury found the contract; for in one event the plaintiffs were entitled to recover without reduction, and in the other, there would be nothing from which the defendants' damages could be deducted; to say, therefore, that the defendants could not recover damages under the general issue, really added nothing to what had been already said, or to the plain law governing the case. Whether, in a case where the damage suffered by the defendant, by reason of the plaintiff's failure to fully perform the contract on his part, is relied on as a defence pro tanto, the facts upon which the defendant's right to the deduction depends can be shown under the general issue, has not, perhaps, been raised and settled by a distinct adjudication in this State, while in other jurisdictions the cases seem to be somewhat conflicting. For example, in Runyan v. Nichols, 11 Johns. 547, which was an action by an attorney for his fees, it was held that the defendant could not show negligence of the attorney in conducting the business as a defence under the general issue; and Van Ness, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "In such a case as this, it is peculiarly fit and proper that the plaintiff should be appraised that such a defence as this was intended to be insisted on." And he further remarks, that "to allow the reputation of an attorney to be assailed by a defence involving such serious consequences, without any previous notice, would, I think, be unreasonably and unnecessarily harsh and rigorous." But in Hill v. Allen, 2 M. & W. 283, it was held that a special plea to an attorney's bill, which sets up as a defence that the plaintiff conducted the business so negligently and unskilfully as to be useless to the defendant, is bad on special demurrer, as amounting to the general issue; and in Grounsell v. Lamb, 1 M. & W. 352, which was assumpsit for a cutting machine sold and delivered, it was held that the defendant might show, under the general issue, that the machine was manufactured by the plaintiff for the defendant under a condition that if it did not work, nothing should be paid for it; that it could not be made to work, and that it was useless to the defendant. See, also, to the same effect, Cousins v. Paddon, 2 C. M. & R. 547; Jones v. Nanney, 1 M. & W. 333; Jones v. Reade, 1 N. & P. 18. And again, in New York, in Hopping v. Quin, 12 Wend. 517, it was held, without reference to the question of notice, that an attorney could not recover in an action of assumpsit for his fees, where the suit which he had been retained to bring, had been so negligently managed that his services were worth nothing. But these cases are generally put upon the ground that the plaintiff's breach of his contract, which the defendant sets up to defeat the claim, is of such a character that it goes to the whole consideration; in other words, that the service, being improperly performed, is not at all the thing contracted for, and therefore furnishes no ground of action.

Where the defence shows only a partial failure of consideration, a different rule has been applied. The People v. Niagara, C. P., 12 Wend. 246; Burton v. Stewart, 3 Wend. 238; Reab v. McAlister, 8 Wend. 109.

But the doctrine of Britton v. Turner has not been generally received in other jurisdictions; and the rule of pleading in such cases must be settled with reference to the grounds upon which that decision is put, and the practice established by it in this State, rather than by authorities which indicate the practice where a different rule exists.

In Britton v. Turner, the plaintiff had broken his original contract, and, of course, could not recover on it at all; hence there was no question of a partial or total failure of the consideration upon which that contract stood. The court, however, held that the plaintiff's labor, received and enjoyed by the defendant from day to day, furnished a new consideration for a new contract, whereupon the law would raise a promise to pay what the services were worth over and above the damage occasioned by the plaintiff's breach of the original agreement. The plaintiff's position in this class of cases is, that upon such new consideration, he is entitled to recover such portion of the actual value of his services as may be left after deducting the defendant's damage occasioned by the breach. A special count, setting forth accurately and fully the ground of the defendant's liability on the new contract, would show a promise by him, in consideration of services rendered (the benefit of which he has enjoyed, and cannot reject), to pay, not what such services are worth, but only what remains of their value after deducting the damage resulting from the plaintiff's breach of the original contract. Page v. Marsh, 30 N. H. 305; Horn v. Batchelder, 41 N. H. 86; Smith v. Newcastle, 48 N. H. 70.

If this be so, there would seem to be no reason for requiring this defence to be specially pleaded. It is quite significant, also, that none of our cases, where the doctrine of Britton v. Turner has been recognized and reaffirmed, show that notice of the defence was given, by plea or otherwise; while in Elliott v. Heath, 14 N. H. 131, it appears that the defence was received under the general issue. Such has probably been the usual practice in this State, and we are disposed to think it is well enough. The question, however, is not involved in the decision of this case, for the reasons given; and these observations have been made, to prevent any misapprehension that might arise from the form in which the instructions to the jury were put.

The memorandum introduced by the defendants was not a writen contract; it was not signed by the parties. If, however, it was agreed to by the plaintiffs as containing the whole contract, without any condition or qualification, it would be extremely good evidence of what the contract was. Whether there was such assent, or whether the assent was qualified or limited, and, if so, in what way, were purely questions of fact for the jury. There was no legal presumption that the words "well enough as far as it went," had reference to one any more than another of the matters embraced in the parol contract just concluded. It was clearly for the jury to say, upon the whole evidence, what the understanding or contract of the parties was. We think the instructions on this point were entirely correct.

Judgment on the verdict.

[We are indebted to J. Warren Coulston, Esq., counsel for the accused, for a copy of the proceedings in the following case, from which we make the report.]

EASTERN DIST. OF PENNSYLV'A.

District Court, United States.

In re BENJAMIN PALMER.

1. The lowest grade of inexcusable homicide is within the generic term murder, as used in the treaty of extradition, of 1842, between the United States and Great Britain. Cadwalader, J.
2. The extradition of a fugitive being demanded under this treaty, the tribunal where he is found will not inquire as to the grade of guilt, and not being competent to acquit or convict the warrant must issue. Id.
3. Where a judge had ordered a warrant of extradition to issue, the secretary of State, upon a review of the case, refused to issue the warrant, and the accused was discharged.

This was a petition by the British consul at Philadelphia, for the extradition of Benjamin Palmer, upon the charge of murder. By the depositions taken in the cause it appeared that Benjamin Palmer shipped on the barque "J. B. Duffus," on April 15th, 1873, as boatswain or second mate. That on June 8th, 1873, whilst the barque was at sea, the morning being squally, and the ship not steering well, the master ordered Palmer to lower the spanker. At the time this order was given it was Palmer's watch on deck. In his watch, among others, was John McDonnough, who when the order was given, went to the throat halyards. The sail was lowered about half way down, when it jammed upon the mizzen mast. Palmer got on the spanker boom to clear the sail, when suddenly the gaff, weighing about five hundred pounds, got clear and was coming down by the run, he being immediately under it. The master seeing the danger, quickly called to him "look out Mr. Palmer the gaff is coming on you." Palmer instantly jumped from the boom on to the starboard side of the ship. McDonnough had left his position at the throat halyards, and was standing abreast of the mizzen rigging in the alleyway between the rail and the after house, on the starboard side of the ship. As Palmer jumped, he and McDonnough came together, one of Palmer's feet struck McDonnough in the stomach, and so injured him that shortly thereafter he died. As to whether or not Palmer kicked McDonnough, the depositions were somewhat contradictory. The master testified that as Palmer jumped "to save himself from going overboard, he caught the mizzen rigging with his hands, that brought his feet about opposite the stomach of McDonnough; the boatswain's feet came in contact with McDonnough about his stomach." Four of the crew however agreed that the distance between where Palmer struck the ship when he jumped, and where McDonnough stood, was several feet, that the toe of Palmer's boot struck McDonnough, but whether it was accidental or purposely done, they could not say, except one man who said it was "accidental out of passion;" all of the witnesses agreed that Palmer had no quarrel with McDonnough, that he always acted kindly towards all the men, and that after McDonnough was hurt, he endeavored to restore him.

The depositions being reported to the court, Silas W. Petit, Esq., and John R. Read Esq., as counsel, appeared for the government of Great Britain, but made no argument, as the court did not desire to hear any, except on behalf of the accused.

J. Warren Coulston Esq., counsel for Palmer, argued,

1. The proof in all cases under a treaty of extradition should be not only competent, but full and satisfactory, that the offence has been committed in the foreign jurisdiction, sufficiently so to warrant a conviction, in the judgment of the magistrate, of the offence, with which he is charged, if sitting upon the final trial and hearing of the case, No magistrate should order the surrender short of such proof. Exparte Kaine, 3 Black, C. C. 10.

2. The court must pass upon the weight as well as the competency of the testimony, and a fugitive is to be surrendered upon such evidence only, as, being submitted to the jury, would properly secure his conviction, of the offence alleged. In re Henrich, 5 Bl. C. C. 414. In re McDonnell, 5 Leg. Gaz. 236.

No judge would sustain a verdict of guilty of any offence under the testimony in this case.

3. The treaty requires the specific application of the definitions to be conformable in particular cases to the jurisprudence and legislation of the respective places were the parties may be arrested; and likewise require the application of local rules of decision, as to the sufficiency of the evidence. Muller's Case, 5 Phil'a, p. 292, &c.

4. The evidence is not sufficient to sustain the charge of murder. In the worst aspect of the case, it could only be manslaughter, which under the laws of Pennsylvania, may be either voluntary or involuntary. Manslaughter is voluntary when it happens upon a sudden heat, involuntary when it takes place in the commission of some unlawful act.

5. It is clear that the extradition treaty between the United States and Great Britain (8 Stat. at Large, p. 576) does not apply to manslaughter. If this be doubtful, the court should follow the analogy of the act of Congress of 3d March, 1825, (4 Stat. 115), providing for the punishment of the crime of murder on the high seas, on board of an American vessel. It has been held that this act does not include the offence of manslaughter. U. S. v. Armstrong, 2 Cart. C. C. 451.

After argument, CADWALADER, J., said.

The homicide in question having occurred upon the high seas, in a British vessel, was committed within British jurisdiction. Whether it was an excusable homicide, and if not, what was the grade of guilt, are questions for the decision of a British tribunal. This does not preclude the observation that if a crime has been committed, it was of the lowest grade of inexcusable homicide. The offence in question was, nevertheless, if punishable at all, within the generic description of murder, as the word is used in the treaty of 1842. And, as no tribunal in the United States can exercise jurisdiction to convict or acquit, the warrant of extradition must be granted, if the application for it shall be insisted on.

It may not be improper to add that, if the offence had been cognizable here, I would have admitted the accused party to bail, during the hearing, because the peculiar circumstances of the charge would have justified such an exception from the ordinary course of procedure, in cases of homicide.

I consider the application for extradition as made by Sir Edward Thornton, the diplomatic representative of the British government, though it is made in the name of the consul. It occurs to me that the consul may perhaps desire to communicate with Sir Edward Thornton, before deciding whether to insist on the application for a warrant. The case may therefore stand over until Wednesday next, unless the accused party objects to the delay.

"And afterwards, on Wednesday the twenty-fifth day of June, A. D. 1873, the said consul praying that a warrant of extradition issue, it is issued accordingly, and is hereto subjoined.

"And all the said depositions, examinations, warrants, orders and other documents, are therewith returned and certified by the said judge, at Philadelphia, in the said district, on the day last aforesaid."

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.
EAST. DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, } ss.:

To the marshal of the United States:

In the matter of Benjamin Palmer charged with murder, on the British barque J. B. Duffus, on the high seas.

This case having been heard before me, on petition of George Crump, Esquire, acting consul for her Britannic Majesty at the port of Philadelphia, that the said Benjamin Palmer be committed for the purpose of being delivered up to justice, under the provisions of the treaty made between the United States and Great Britain, on the ninth day of August, A. D. 1842. I find and judge that the evidence produced against the said Benjamin Palmer, is sufficient in law to justify his commitment on the charge of murder, had the crime been committed within the United States.

Wherefor I order that the said Benjamin Palmer be committed pursuant to the provisions of said treaty, to abide the order of the President of the United States in the premises. Given under my hand and the seal of said court, at Philadelphia, this twenty-fifth day of June A. D. 1873.

(Signed,) JOHN CADWALADER,
[SEAL.] Judge.

[After the evidence in the case had been certified to the secretary of State, the case was reargued before him, by the counsel for the prisoner. The secretary of State finally refused to issue the warrant of extradition, and Benjamin Palmer was released from imprisonment. While the case was pending in Washington, the British minister, Sir Edward Thornton, raised the question whether the secretary of State has the right to refuse a warrant of extradition, after a judicial tribunal had certified, under the treaty, that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the charge made against the accused, and has called the attention of his government to the matter, for the purpose of obviating the difficulty in the future, if possible. Court of Common Pleas of Schuylkill County.

SAMUEL LONG v. JOHN SHELLY.

1. A judgment of a justice of the peace affirmed or reversed on certiorari is final, and execution can issue out of the Court of Common Pleas for the debt, interest and costs when affirmed, and for the costs when reversed, under the act of 1810.
2. The record need not be remitted to the justice except where the proceedings are non-prossed.

Motion to set aside the execution.

Opinion by WALKER, J.

This suit, brought before a justice of the peace, was removed into the Common Pleas by the defendant upon a writ of certiorari. After argument, the judgment of the justice was reversed by the court, and the defendant issued execution for the costs. A motion was made by the plaintiff to set aside the writ, on the ground that no execution can be issued under the 25th section of the act of 20th of March, 1810 (Purdon's Dig. vol. 1, page 608, pl. 29), until the final disposition of the case upon a second trial before the justice. This is the sole poi

On the affirmance or rever l of a judgment removed into the Comm n Pleas by certiorari, the record is not remitted to the justice (as in cases of writs of error to inferior courts), but execution issues at once from the Common Pleas for the debt, interest and costs, when it is affirmed; and when the judgment is reversed, for costs only, without referring the cause again to the justice. Troubat & Haly's Prac. vol. 1 part 2, p. 716; Robbins v. Whiteman, 1 Dallas, 410; Silvergood v. Storrick, 1 Watts, 532.

This is the invariable rule, with the exception where the certiorari is non-prossed. in which case the record must be remitted to the justice to be proceeded in, for the non-pros. is not final. In this respect there is no difference between certiorari and writs of error. Welker v. Welker, 3 Pa. Rep. 24. The reversal here, however, is a final determination of this suit. See act 20th March, 1810, section 22, Purdon's Digest, vol. 1, p. 608, pl. 27, and no writ of error can issue thereon, Purd. Dig. 608 pl. 27; 7 Wright, 111. And it is in the nature of a judgment for defendant for the amount of the costs. See British Statutes, Rob. Dig. 129, and Troubat & Haly, vol. 1, part 2, p. 734. The act of Parliament passed in the 4th year of James I., chapter 3, gives costs to the defendant in all actions brought in any court, if non-prossed, or judgment be entered for defendant, where the plaintiff, if successful, would be entitled to costs. Roberts' Dig. of British Statutes, 129 and 130. A judgment affirmed on certiorari, becomes a judgment of the Common Pleas, and there it can be enforced. Essler v. Johnson, 1 Casey, 350, After this, if the plaintiff desires to institute another suit before the same or another justice of the peace, under that section of the act of 1810 above referred to, and shall obtain a judgment equal to or greater than the present judgment, then he will be entitled to costs under the act, and these costs may be recovered before a justice of the peace in the same manner as sums of a similar amount are recoverable. Motion discharged.

F. W. Bechtel, Esq., for plaintiff.

George D. Haughawout, Esq., for defendant.

THEODORE F. JENKINS,
ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

We call the special attention of our readers to the very important decision of Judge Cadwalader, in the extradition case of Benjamin Palmer, in this city, coming so close after the celebrated MacDonald and Vogt cases, it possesses special interest. It will be found on page 282.

FRAUDULENT LAWS.

It seems that Pennsylvania is not the only State in which complaints have been made of the passage of acts of Assembly by fraudulent means. In New York it has been charged that laws, in some instances, which had only passed one branch of the Legislature, were officially promulgated as valid, and many have been the hints and insinuations that such scandalous occurrences were not rare. In Pennsylvania there have been instances of laws appearing upon our statute books that either never passed the Legislature, or passed it in a different shape from that in which they were published. And now New Hampshire is troubled with the same complaint, although there the courts have taken a step that will startle some of their judicial brethren in this and other States. On our first page will be found the opinion of the judges of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire rendered a few days ago, declaring an act, which was duly signed and authenticated by the proper legislative and State officers, to be invalid, because it was shown that the act had never passed but one branch of the Legislature.

The State reporter, who, by the way, is one of the most enterprising in the country, sends us the following letter accompanying the decision:

ANDOVER, N. H., Aug. 30, 1873.

EDS. LEGAL GAZETTE,

DEAR SIRS:—I herewith send you an opinion of the judges of our Supreme Court furnished me to-day. If my memory is not at fault, the highest court of New Jersey, a few years ago, following what was supposed to be the rule laid down in The King v. Arundel, 1 Hob. 109, held, upon a case somewhat akin to this in principle, that the court would not go behind the great seal. In this day of tricky legislation, there should be a power lodged somewhere to determine what acts have really passed, and what have not. The question has been very carefully considered here, both in this case and in the opinion in 35 N. H. 579, in which Chief Justice Perley ransacked all the judicial history of the world upon this point.

The court were unanimous in both cases.

Very truly,
JOHN M. SHIRLEY.

In this connection our attention has been called to an article which appeared in "The Press" of this city on Wednesday last, opposing the section of "the proposed constitution, as passed second reading," which endeavors to provide a remedy for the evil of corrupt legislation. Among other things the writer makes the rather extraordinary statement that "the proposition is not entirely novel, but it has been uniformly spurned from every court as most mischievous and unsound." The decision we have referred to, coming right upon the heels of this statement, will no doubt cause the writer to qualify his language a little. It is certainly deserving of a careful perusal, especially in view of the passage in the Constitutional Convention of this State of the section so distasteful to the editor of "The Press." As many of our readers may have not had the reasons for its passage set before them at length, we take the occasion to print in this issue the speech of Hon. Wm. H. Armstrong, chairman of the judiciary committee, and that of Hon. Chas. R. Buckalew, both delivered in the convention upon the 2d of July last. As these gentlemen are of opposite political views, and are both well known throughout the State, their words will be of interest.

The section as passed on second reading (it has yet to go through a third reading) is as follows:

SECTION 21. Whenever, within six months after the official publication of any act of Assembly in the pamphlet laws, and not thereafter, it shall be alleged before the attorney general by affidavit, showing probable cause to believe that the passage or approval of such law was procured by bribery, fraud, or other corrupt means, it shall be the duty of the attorney general forthwith to apply to the Supreme Court, or one of the judges thereof, for process in an appropriate proceeding, which shall be ordered, if there appear to the said court or to such judge to be such probable cause, and in which the commonwealth, upon relation of the attorney general, shall be plaintiff, and such party as the Supreme Court or the judge who shall grant such issue shall direct, shall be defendant, to try the validity of such act of Assembly, whereupon the court shall direct publication of the same, and any party in interest may appear, and upon petition be made a party plaintiff or defendant thereto; the said issue shall be framed and tried before a jury, by one of the judges of the Supreme Court, in whatever form and in such county as the Supreme Court may direct, and if it shall appear to the court and jury, upon such trial, that the passage or approval of the same was procured by bribery, fraud, or other corrupt means, such act of Assembly shall be adjudged null and void, and such judgment shall be conclusive, and the governor shall thereupon issue his proclamation declaring such judgment; either party shall be entitled within three months, and not thereafter, to a writ of error as in other cases; no officer of the commonwealth, nor any officer or member of the Legislature shall be exempt from testifying when required in such case, but the testimony of any such witness shall not be used against him in any criminal prosecution except for perjury therein.

The speech of Mr. Armstrong, the author of the section, is as follows:

Mr. President:—I desire as briefly as possible to present this question. I am admonished by the manifest impatience of debate which generally prevails, that it would not be wise to detain the convention by anything like an elaborate discussion.

This subject has been more or less in the minds of members of the convention. It has been printed and laid on the desks of members, and some of them have doubtless examined it.

The proposition as a constitutional provision is novel, and chiefly so from the difficulty of devising a plan which shall not too greatly interfere with legislative freedom. The necessity for some such provision has long been felt and acknowledged. It has heretofore been held by the courts with great unanimity that whatever may be the fraud which has been perpetrated by or upon the Legislature, or by whatever means of corruption or otherwise an act of Assembly has been procured, when it has once passed the forms of legislation, it is, as held by the courts, to be sacred, and cannot be declared to be void by reason of any fraud, bribery or corruption which may have entered into its passage, however outrageous and clear.

The leading case upon this point is Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, which was decided in the Supreme Court of the United States in 1810. I do not mean to discuss this subject elaborately, but I desire that the true bearings of this celebrated case shall be understood. In 1795, the Legislature of Georgia passed an act by which, in consideration of $500,000, they transferred five hundred thousand acres of extremely valuable land, lying upon the Mississippi, and then belonging to the State, to a company of adventurers. By the terms of this law, $50,000 was to be paid in cash to the treasurer and a mortgage for $450 000 was to be taken for the balance. It was admitted as clear beyond all dispute, that the parties interested in the procurement of the law had executed deeds for portions of the land, and laid them upon the desks of the various members of the Legislature willing to take them, until by the most open, flagrant, unblushing fraud they procured the passage of the act referred to. I need not trace its history. The Legislature subsequently repealed the act, with every possible effort on their part to put their seal of condemnation upon it, and so far as lay within their power, prevent its operation. The question came before the judges of the Supreme Court in the case already cited, and was exhaustively discussed. It was held in substance, that the validity of a law cannot be questioned because undue influence may have been used in obtaining it. However improper it may be, and however severely the offenders may be punished, if guilty of bribery, yet the grossest corruption will not authorize a judicial tribunal to disregard the law."

This decision, whether based upon sound principles or not, and I have often doubted its soundness, has become the rule of decision, and the courts of the various States and of the United States have uniformly accepted this doctrine. It has been so held in Pennsylvania and in the State of New York, and in other States. In short, wherever the question has arisen, under the effect of the holding of the court, which thus cuts off all possible inquiry into the corrupt modes of legislation, has happened that Legislatures have felt themselves to be wholly beyond the power of the courts or of any power to intercept the operation of fraudulent legislation. Under the impunity guaranteed by the decision to which I have referred, corruption has grown in every tate of the Union until it has become the commonest of all things for legislation to be procured by means conspicuously and admittedly corrupt. To such an extent has this pernicious practice grown, that the people are fast coming to regard it as inseparable from republican institutions. It is bringing discredit upon our institutions and threatens their perpetuity. The impunity which attends corrupt legislation derives nearly all its strength from the conviction that there are no means by which the guilty perpetrator of the fraud can be deprived of the profits of his corruption. The want of judicial power to investigate and set aside such legislation is a lamentable deficiency in our system. The want of it has promoted the growth of this enormous wrong until our institutions are strained to their utmost extent, for it must be borne in mind, that a republican government rests essentially upon the integrity of its law-making power.

Acts of Assembly, public or private, depend upon the judgment and will of the Legislature. If we perpetuate this disastrous impunity to corrupt legislation we unsettle the foundations of our government—we tolerate corruption at its very fountain, and we can have no assurance that our legislation will be wise or such as the public interests require. It will inevitably in the future as in the past, be largely influenced, and in many instances controlled by the particular and corrupt motives brought to bear upon members of the Legislature. The evil has become enormous, and it is attracting attention in all the States. In Ohio, their convention now in session are considering the subject. What has been their precise action I do not know.

The gentleman from York (Judge Black) told me yesterday that he had a letter from Mr. Charles O'Conor, of New York, calling attention to the subject, and stating his conviction that the purity of republican institutions depends largely upon the power of arresting corruption in the Legislature. In our own State we have had numerous instances of it. I will refer to only one. The act approved the nineteenth of June, 1871, entitled "an act relative to legal proceedings by or against corporations" was approved by the governor, and stands to-day as a valid law in the statute books of the State. I do not know whether the bill was passed or not, but I do know that it was alleged that the act was not passed through either house of the Legislature, and I have now before me a letter from a gentleman of high standing and reputation in the State, urging the necessity of a provision like this now proposed, in which he states to me that he has the letters of twenty-two members of the Senate of 1871, who state over their own hands that they did not vote for the act, and that it never passed the Senate of the State. The question was submitted to a committee of the Senate of which the gentleman from Indiana

(Mr. Harry White) was chairman. That committee, through pressure of other duties, were not able to make an exhaustive examination into the facts, as I am informed; but they did make a report to the Senate, in which they stated that the bill, although approved by the governor, never passed the Senate. It was openly stated by Senators on the floor, that the bill had never passed the Senate, and it was also stated that it had never passed the House, and so far as I know this was not contradicted. Mr. Buckalew and Mr. Purman were both in the Senate at the time. Mr. Buckalew states now, and Mr. Purman also, that it never did pass the Senate.

What was the consequence? An act of Assembly of exceeding great importance is thus foisted upon the statute books, and becomes a law of the State of Pennsylvania, without the vote of either the Senate or the House! Now trace its further history. When this act of Assembly in a litigation which subsequently ensued at Nisi Prius in this city was cited by the learned counsel of one of the parties, the opposite party alleged before the court that the act had never been passed. The court, following the lead of Fletcher v. Peck, and the line of decisions which had shut them up to this inevitable course, held that it was not competent for the court to inquire into the mode of its passage or into the fact whether it had been passed at all. The villainous fraud was under the cover of the broad seal of the commonwealth, and no power on earth could withdraw it from this protection.

My friend (Mr. Cuyler) suggests that the judge added that it was so salutary. that it ought to have passed. Perhaps it was, but the other party to the suit would hold a very different opinion. But you will observe that we are not inquiring into the value of the act itself, but into the mode of its passage; and no matter whether it were or were not a good law, it was a law which should not have been upon the statute books until it had been clearly and honestly passed through the forms of law, and with the concurrence of both the Senate and the House.

Mr. Funck. Will the gentleman state what the character of that legislation was?

Mr. Armstrong. I have it before me.

The act of Assembly referred to is entitled "An act relating to legal proceedings by or against corporations," and will be found on page 1360 of the laws of Pennsylvania for the year 1871. I do not think it important now to read the act; but I will send it to the desk and have it read if the gentleman from Lebanon desires; but I presume it is not necessary It is composed of two sections, and vitally affected important litigations pending between two great railroad corporations of the State. The parties adversely interested in the legislation referred to were the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Catawissa Railroad Company, the latter of which desired to establish the fraud by which the act became a law, and by which they alleged their rights were fraudulently and most injuriously affected.

Notwithstanding the earnest and persistent efforts of counsel, the court steadily refused to enter into any inquiry upon the subject. Thus bound by established precedents, the court, in the existing state of the law, could afford no relief, and with irresistible conviction forced upon them that the rights of legislation, the rights of private property, and the sovereignty of the people were flagrantly outraged and trampled under foot, they proceed to complete the fraud by solemn adjudication upon a law which they knew was an unholy fraud upon every right which courts of justice are established to protect Shall these things be? Shall we continue to grasp at the shadow and let the substance go? Shall we be told that the sovereignty of the legislative department must not be invaded by judicial inquiry, when it stands to-day debased by frauds like these? Shall the punctillio of respect stand in the way of substantial justice? I have no indiscriminate invective to launch against members of the Legislature. The lack of personal integrity in the members has no doubt been greatly exaggerated, but we are not blind, and we dare not close our eyes to the corrupting influences which every intelligent man knows so largely controls our legislation. Every man on this floor, and throughout the commonwealth, who has closely observed the course of legislation, knows there are now upon our statute books laws, and their name is legion, which never could have been there if the right of investigation had existed even to the limited and cautious extent which this section proposes. The progress of events has brought our State in common with others face to face with this enormous wrong. Could the Supreme Court in 1810 have foreseen the consequences which have grown from the rule they established, I cannot doubt they would have paused long before they would have handed over legislation to stand conspicuous and alone as the only fraud which judicial inquiry cannot reach. By a rule of law as universal as it is necessary and salutary, fraud vitiates everything into which it enters but legislation. Corrupt decisions are reversed. Corrupt judges are impeached or removed by the Legislature. A corrupt executive would be impeached or removed. Corrupt elections are set aside. The sovereignty of the people in its original exercise by election has always been open to judicial inquiry, and elections are reversed without hesitation when it is manifest that fraud has affected its results. Yet, with an inconsistency which is without parallel, we accord to the act of the agent an impunity we deny to the people in the exercise of the highest sovereignty they can exercise. Corrupt legislation and the rights it confers even upon the particeps criminis are protected and enforced by every department of the government. This inconsistency is monstrous; this injustice is too grievous to be borne.

Standing then in the presence of a corrupt influence and a corrupt power so enormous as I have indicated, what shall we do? To look to the Legislature for any remedy, even if they have the constitutional power to confer it, which some doubt, is delusive and wholly inadequate. The extraneous influences which procure corrupt legislation would be quite sufficient to prevent the passage of any law which would be sufficient to prevent such legislation, or to inquire into it when accomplished. And if by any chance such law were passed, it could not long remain. For I do verily believe that nothing we have done or can do will be so great a terror to evil doers as the consciousness that for all these things they shall come to the bar of a court where judgment will be without fear and without favor.

There is necessity that this remedy shall be embodied in the fundamental law. It may well be doubted whether the Legislature under the influences which have heretofore controlled them, and which we cannot wholly exclude, would give any efficient remedy if they could. And certainly it would be always subject to repeal. Without a constitutional provision the line of decisions will follow on, ad infinitum, in the direction which it now tends, and these corruptions will be wholly without remedy.

In view of these facts, and I might extend these illustrations indefinitely, some remedial provision is imperatively needed. Besides the procurement of laws which have never passed either branch of the Legislature, it is known that bills which have passed have been surreptitiously abstracted from the file and have not been permitted to go before the governor at all, put particularly in the last days of the session have been mysteriously lost or mislaid; and thus legislation has been thwarted in that direction. So, also, bills have been passed and when engrossed for executive approval, important words, lines, and whole sentences and paragraphs have been omitted. In such cases, if discovery ensues, it is always laid to the mischance of unintentional error, or to emission or mistake. In other instances words and sentences have been substituted or added, by which the purpose and effect of the act have been totally changed. In other instances bills fraudulently procured to be engrossed have been, in the hurry incident to final adjournment, fraudulently slipped into the bundle of bills prepared for signature by the speakers of the Senate and the House. I am saying that which men on this floor know to be true. These are but a few of the many devices known to the ingenious manipulators of fraud, by which the will of the people is thwarted under the confident belief, I may say the confident knowledge, that if the law has once assumed authentic form it has passed beyond the power of investigation. Now, in view of these facts, what is the proper remedy?

It is manifest that a law which is upon its face regular is to be taken prima facie to be valid. It is also manifest that any unwarrantable suspension of its operation might be, and in some cases would be, injurious to some extent. There should, therefore, be a limit of time beyond which no inquiry into its validity by reason of any fraud in its procurement should be permitted.

So also it is clear that an inquiry of this kind ought not to be in the power of parties in merely private litigation. It concerns the credit of a department of the government, and ought not to be brought in question except under such fixed and solemn forms of judicial investigation as will at once clothe the proceedings with the highest dignity, and give assurance that the investigation shall be not only thorough but impartial. An inquiry so important ought not to be collateral but direct, and should be the immediate and only subject under consideration. Again, if it were open to question in merely private litigation it might be under investigation at different times in different courts, and subject to diverse decision. Nor could such objection be obviated, for if the decision were to be final where the jurisdiction first attached, it would be open to collusive action by interested parties, and tried with intent to establish its validity, and with no power to permit other parties to interplead, who, whatever their interest in the question, might have no interest in the subject matter of the suit. And if such decision were not conclusive, inconsistency of decision would necessarily sometimes occur.

It would follow that the act of Assembly which would be controverted in one county to-day and decided to be void, might in the next decision and in another jurisdiction be held to be valid, and if perchance in the first litigation it were held to be valid, rights might become vested under it and a second decision which would declare it to be void must either unsettle the first with the rights vested under it, or be wholly nugatory. The latter I would presume to be the correct holding, for I suppose that under a void law no rights could vest. It would not, therefore, be well to frame the section in a way which would allow the validity of the law upon the grounds designated to be the subject of merely private controversy.

In view of these difficulties it was important in framing the amendment to consider in what manner they could be surmounted to preserve its efficiency without imparing any rights of the citizen.

With this purpose in view, allow me to call the attention of the convention to the provisions of the section in detail.

The first clause provides that "whenever within one year after the official publication of any act of Assembly in the pamphlet laws," &c. I have said one year because there must be a time when an act of Assembly, whatever it may be, must have the force and effect of positive law; and if the time be too greatly extended the operation of the law would be too long suspended, six months, in my judgment might be sufficient, but of this the convention will judge. I have said the official publication in the pamphlet laws, because the year might expire before the public would have notice that the act had passed at all. It is therefore made one year after public notice that the act has passed, and this is the more necessary —as under our laws private acts are not published in the pamphlet laws until the enrollment tax is paid.

"It shall be alleged before the attorney general by affidavit, showing probable cause to believe that any fraud, bribery, or undue means were employed to procure the passage or approval of such law."

The attorney general is the recognised official head of the law in the State. It is appropriate that the application should be made to him. But it would not do to allow to the attorney general an unlimited discretion, for if by chance he should himself be interested in any of these widely extended and profitable speculations which in a thousand forms, are so frequently the subject of fraudulent legislation, he would be reluctant to institute the proceeding. Therefore it is provided that when probable cause is shown in the affidavit:

"It shall be the duty of the attorney general forthwith to apply to the Supreme Court, or one of the judges thereof, for process in an appropriate proceeding."

It was not proper to limit the discretion of the Supreme Court as to the mode of proceeding.

In the first place, I had drawn it "by scire facias." Afterwards it occurred to me it would be better to try the case in a feigned issue; but then after all it might happen that a bill in equity would be the very best process. So it resulted that I thought it best to leave it open for the Supreme Court, and attorney general to, devise the most efficient mode. It is therefore simply provided that an "appropriate proceeding" shall be had which may be by bill in equity, or by feigned issue, or by scire facias, or by whatever mode might, under the exigencies of the particular case, be deemed most appropriate and efficient.

But then it is provided that the process "shall be ordered of course." But perhaps it would be as well or better that the Supreme Court, or the judge applied to, should have the right to pass upon the question of probable cause, leaving it in their discretion to withhold process if the grounds alleged appeared to be either frivolous or unfounded

The party plaintiff shall be the "commonwealth at the relation of the attorney general." This is eminently proper. It is a well known mode of procedure, and befits the dignity and importance of the case to be tried.

There was more difficulty in designating the defendant. It would not always be easy or possible to designate the party in interest, but it is not of paramount importance under the safeguard provided. The court might raise a party—pendente lite—might make a nominal party—or name some officer of the government or Legislature. It is therefore declared that the defendant shall be "such party as the Supreme Court or the judge who shall grant such issue shall direct." If it were imposed upon the attorney general to designate the defendant, he might not be able to do so because the whole of the facts might not be sufficiently developed to enable him to determine who ought to be the defendant.

But to afford the fullest opportunity to all persons having any interest in the question to protect their interests, it is further provided that when the process is thus ordered, "the court shall direct publication of the same, and any party in interest may appear and upon petition be made a party plaintiff or defendant thereto." The purpose of this is manifest. If the action is instituted by the commonwealth at the relation of the attorney general, he would have no especial and particular interest in ordinary cases to press this investigation with sufficient ardor; but when it is permitted to any party having an interest under the act of Assembly to be made co-plaintiff with him and thus introduce the vigor and force of personal interest, efficient investigation will be insured, at the same time that the power and the process is kept wholly under the control of the commonwealth as represented by the attorney general.

But, again, parties in interest have the right to appear as defendants, because, perchance, the charges might be unfounded. It might be that upon proper showing it would appear that the act of Assembly was sufficiently and properly passed, and therefore it is that the parties in interest claiming under an act of Assembly ought to have the right as parties defendant to show, upon proper pleading, that the act of Assembly was properly passed without bribery, fraud or other corrupt means.

Thus providing for the parties who shall first make up the record and the mode of giving notice and bringing other parties in interest before the court, the question next occurs as the trial. "The said issue shall be tried upon proper pleadings;" that is, pleadings properly adapted to the particular proceeding which may be instituted. It is to be tried "by one of the judges of the Supreme Court." The question is one of extreme importance, involving not only the dignity but the reputation of the Legislature, involving also the validity of the act, and possibly the reputation and the fidelity of the executive of the State. In such an event the dignity and importance of the question demand that the highest tribunal of the State should supervise the trial. It may be tried "in whatever county the Supreme Court may direct" If the act were such that it affected, advantageously or adversely, the interests of a particular section of the State, there would be a manifest impropriety in trying the cause before a jury of such a county. Local and private interests and prejudices shall be excluded as far as possible. It is therefore left to the discretion of the Supreme Court to say in what county the action shall be tried, trusting to the high tribunal before which the parties must appear for the assurance that the question at issue will be justly, fairly and impartially adjudicated.

Having thus provided for the institution of the proceeding and for the mode of trial, it is next provided that if the court and jury, that is, the jury under the direction of the court, guiding them in their deliberations, as they do in other cases, and under the established forms and principles of law, shall declare that the act of Assembly is void, or if they shall declare that it is a valid law, in either event, the litigation upon that question having been once impartially had, and a through investigation made, shall be conclusive. The law thus investigated shall stand upon the footing of every other right of the commonwealth, that, once adjudicated, the judgment of the court shall be final and conclusive. The question thus raised is important in the highest degree, but it rises no higher than other questions which engage the attention of the court from time to time. The tribunal which passes upon life and liberty and every right of person and of property is surely competent to guard with impartiality, and to decide with justice to all parties in interest any question which such investigation could possibly involve. It seems wholly inconsistent with every principle of sound morality that whilst every other fraud which men can perpetrate shall be brought to the light of truth and justice, this crime against the State, against the liberty, against the dearest rights involved in the exercise of government, shall be protected by a sort of high sounding sentimentalism which professes to regard the legislative department of the government as too sacred to be touched even where it reeks with corruption—I confess, sir, I have no sympathy with such grasping at shadows—such disregard of substance.

But, sir, as we are dealing with an act of Assembly appearing in the pamphlet laws of the State, and liable to mislead those who depend upon the act of Assembly as published, it is further provided that "the governor shall thereupon issue his proclamation declaring such judgment," so that if the law be found valid the litigation that has ensued respecting it shall be ended by a public proclamation which shall restore confidence to the law. If it be declared null and void, the public proclamation puts all the commonwealth upon notice that that act is inoperative and void. The proclamation is therefore a proper part of the process to give notice to the people of the judgment of the court.

But the finding of the jury might be wrong in law; there might be error; and hence it is eminently proper that there should be a provision for revision in the Supreme Court. Hence it is provided that "either party shall be entitled within six months, and not thereafter, to a writ of errors as in other cases." The writ of error is made a writ of right, because it is eminently just that a question of this magnitude should be passed upon by the highest judicatory of the State. But if the right to a writ of error were unduly extended, it would suspend the operation of this law to a very indefinite period. Six months I thought was quite sufficient. The gentleman from Columbia (Mr. Buckalew) suggests to me that three months would be quite sufficient. I would prefer myself three months, and I had so written it, and struck it out, and put in six in deference to what I supposed might be the view of the convention; but three months, in my judgment, is ample time for the parties to take a writ of error in such a proceeding if either party feels aggrieved by the decision.

There is another provision of the section to which I call the attention of the convention. The concluding paragraph of the section provides that—

"No officer of the commonwealth"——

Which includes of course the executive and all inferior officers——

—"nor any officer or member of the Legislature shall be exempt from testifying when required in such case, but the testimony of any such witness shall not be used against him in any criminal prosecution unless for perjury therein."

It is desirable that every means of information shall be in the possession of the commonwealth in this investigation. Not even the executive himself shoul be exempt from testifying, nor any mem ber of the Legislature, nor the clerks an officers of the Legislature, by whom it i possible, if not probable, that a very larg amount of the corrupt manipulation c the Legislature is conducted. It ough therefore, to be placed in the constitutio that they shall not be exempt from test fying. Otherwise, we would have an ac of Assembly passed, probably the firs year, exempting members of the Legisla ture and officers of the government fror giving testimony in such cases. They ar sufficiently protected when it is provide that the testimony of any such witnes shall not be used against him in any crim inal prosecution except for perjury in suc case. The effect of this will be that ever officer of the commonwealth, from th executive down, and every member an officer of either House of the Legislatur will be admonished that there is a powe above him to investigate his infidelity t public trust and to open the way to th infliction of the penalties incurred by th breach of his oath of office and of corrup tion under the constitution which w have framed. I do not believe that unde the operation of this section we would b often called upon to investigate the que tions which fall within it. I have an abic ing confidence that the very existence c the power would so admonish the Legi lature and the executive that it would b among the surest of the methods by whic pure and honest legislation would be se cured.

One other thing I desire to notice. I occurred to my mind, as doubtless it wi to the minds of many here, that ther ought to be some saving of vested right under an act of Assembly which shoul subsequently be declared void for th reasons defined. I will state the objec tions which occurred to me, and I gav it very full consideration. Of course th convention will not understand me a undertaking to say that the result of m deliberations is necessarily right, or a expressing any dogmatic opinions on th question. I am only endeavoring to giv the convention as fairly as I can the re sult of my investigations and deliber tions, and the reasons for the conclusion I have reached. I inserted such a provi ion originally, but struck it out for thi reason: If a saving clause is inserte saving the vested rights in an individu which may have accrued under the law you afford the readiest mode of evasio and instantly when the law is passed i will become the interest of the partie who expect to be benefited by it to s manipulate its operation as to bring i third parties in interest. By this eas and common expedient the whole pu pose of the investigation might be de feated. But it would even reach furthe The law would be so constructed that i could be thus manipulated, thus putting i in the power of the parties, who corrupt procure this act, to manipulate it in way which would create vested rights, an secure indirectly the very thing whic this measure is intended to prevent.

But no hardship can come from th omission of such a saving clause. I would seem to be certain that no righ could become vested under a void law

But be this as it may, the section requires that application for process in the proceeding contemplated shall be made within one year, and I should have no objection to making it six months, and then the provision of the constitution would stand as public notice to every citizen of the commonwealth that he can take no right under an act of Assembly which shall become a vested right in less than six months. I believe it is sufficiently guarded, and I know of no vested right which would occur under it which it would be important to protect. The utmost inconvenience that could arise would be the suspension of the operation of a law for six months, and this could be, unless in very exceptional cases, of very little moment, especially as compared with the importance of providing any guarantee which will aid in securing honest legislation. So little is such inconvenience to be regarded that in some of the States no statue is allowed to take effect until six months after its passage. It could not of coure apply to any act of Assembly which has already become a law; but as to all future laws such provision in the constitution would be notice of record to all parties that within six months there is a power to inquire into the validity of the law upon the grounds which are here asserted. In all ordinary cases no such question could arise, and parties would take their rights under the act of Assembly without hesitation, knowing that the six months would soon pass away, and that there being no suspicion of unfairness in the act their rights vested would remain intact and every interest be protected. But where we are attempting to deal with fraudulent and corrupt legislation, grown expert by the experience of years, and strong in its confidence of impunity, and to wholly prevent it if possible, it is not going to far to say that for six months such an act thus tainted with suspicion shall stand under notice to the people of the commonwealth, and to all others, that within that time investigation may be instituted under which the law may be pronounced to be invalid for the reasons which are set forth.

Sir, the instincts of the people point unerringly to the acts which fall under suspicion of fraudulent procurement. The great body of the law will be received and acted upon with undiminished confidence, but those acts which in the past have so discredited the State, or others like them in the future, could not, under a section like this, pass successfully the ordeal of judicial inquiry before an impartial court and jury. The evils to be remedied are frightful in their enormity, the inconveniences to be incurred, taken in their largest aspect, are inconsiderable and trifling as compared with the results which I believe would flow from this provision.

Entertaining these views, Mr. President, and having given this subject as thoughtful attention as I am capable of bestowing upon it, I have come to the deliberate conviction that this section is right. It may be amended. Far be it from me to suppose that it is not capable of amendment; but, in my judgment, it is a step in the right direction. It protects all interests which ought to be protected. It is an admonition to the Legislature, and to the executive, that any corrupt practice which touches the foundation of the honesty of our legislation shall be open to judicial investigation; and under such a constitutional provision, and with the other safeguards which have been placed around legislation by this constitution, I believe we shall have done a vast deal towards stemming the tide of corruption which now threatens to destroy the liberties of the people.

The speech of Mr. Buckalew is as follows:

This is a proposition offered by the gentleman from Lycoming (Mr. Armstrong) that an additional requirement shall be placed in the constitution regarding acts of Assembly. He proposes that we shall provide that an act of Assembly shall be honestly passed, that it shall not be passed by bribery or by fraud, or by any form of corruption; that if the passage of a law be tainted with fraud or corruption, the question may be judicially investigated, and the fact being ascertained, the law shall be pronounced unconstitutional and void. The courts now pronounce, as the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas) has so well argued, any act of Assembly void for unconstitutionality, but not because it has been passed by corrupt influence, for there is no constitutional requirement at present that laws shall be honestly passed.

The only difference that I discover in classifying this proposition with other propositions, covered by the power of the courts to pronounce acts void for want of conformity to the constitution—the only difference that I can discover in making this classification is that in cases under this amendment the court will call to its assistance a jury in order to ascertain how the fact may be. Ordinarily the elements of judgment for a court appear upon the face of the statute itself as compared with the constitution. In these cases, as a fact is to be ascertained, the intervention of a jury becomes necessary. Therefore a jury is to be empanelled, who, under the direction of the court, will determine the fact in controversy—was or was not the statute passed honestly through the two houses of the Legislature, and honestly signed by the governor of the commonwealth?

I do not see anything very novel, extraordinary or alarming in this proposition. But the question remains, and it is a proper one for consideration: Is it expedient to place such a provision as this in the constitution? I observe that there is a great difference of opinion among my colleagues on this floor, and for that reason I speak at this time.

These general charges of corruption upon the Legislature, or rather upon a small part of the members, for it is not intended ever to corrupt them all, but only so many as are necessary to constitute a majority to pass a bill—this general cry of legislative corruption is an evil in itself. It may be a necessary evil under some circumstances, but it is unquestionably a great evil; its effect upon the public life of the State and upon the morals of the people of the State is in the highest degree pernicious.

My idea in reference to an evil of this sort is that it shall not be talked about unless the discussion is accompanied with a blow—with something that tends to check or mitigate or destroy the evil. I grant you it is perfectly legitimate, here and now, to discuss this question, because we have before us a practical proposition to abate this evil. Ordinarily indiscreet discussion of this subject is pernicious Discourses of this sort go out over the State, and I have no doubt that they cause many men in different parts of the State to come forward as candidates for the Legislature who otherwise would never think of it. There are plenty of men seeking nominations for seats in the Legislature who are brought forward by these very denunciations of legislative corruption; men who think it would be a good thing to get there themselves and participate in the enjoyment of those favors, which, according to the public rumor, the third house distributes to the first and second houses. I am entirely in favor of arming the courts, or a proper court, in this State, with power to say that an act of Assembly shall be void, and be pronounced unconstitutional when it is fraudulent. I see no objection to that. As I said before, the only point for discussion is the question of expediency, as to the instrumentality by which to reach our object.

There is one thing material to observe, however, here, in connection with the remarks made by sundry gentlemen, particularly by the member from Indiana (Mr. Harry White) that is, that these regulations, which you have provided in the article on legislation, do not reach this evil of corruption in the passage of laws. At all events the effect of any of these regulations, as a check on corruption, must be indirect and but of small account. Corrupt legislation almost invariably, though not always, goes through all the forms required by the constitution. Corrupt legislation is carefully formed by its authors. They "make clean the outside of the cup and the platter." The corruption and the evil is within and hidden, and the simple question is whether you will arm the judicial power of this State with authority to penetrate beneath the fair outside and detect and repress one of the capital evils of our political system. Well, the attorney general is to be called upon. Now, there is objection in a case of this kind to allowing anybody in the State who may desire to challenge an act of Assembly to go into a court and call in question the constitutionality of a statute for fraud. That is not to be thought of. Therefore, you have here provided a single hearing of such question, a hearing within a brief time after the act is passed—three or six months—a hearing only upon the information of the attorney general—a hearing by the highest court of the State or by one of its selected judges—a hearing under all the forms and guarantees even of the common law—trial by jury under the instruction of a court. What additional guarantees can you have that an investigation of this kind will be fair, thorough, intelligent and effectual; yes, and as a gentleman before me reminds me, in case of error from any cause, a prompt hearing by the full bench of the Supreme Court promptly afterwards.

Now, sir, I say, here in my place, that no citizen of the State, no corporation of the State, no municipality of the State, interested in your laws, can object to this requirement that your laws shall be honestly passed, not merely through constitutional forms, but with the baptismal blessings upon them of that justice which, in the language of Hooker, "constitutes the very foundation of the Eternal Throne."

In compliance with the desire of many prominent members of the Bar, the Publishers have endeavored to produce a handsome book, full and complete in its contents. Owing to the sale being limited to the Philadelphia Bar, to whom only it can be of use, and in consequence of the expense attending its publication, the price has been fixed at a figure that may seem apparently high,—but the Publishers, to reimburse themselves for the outlay they have been subject to, have been compelled to decline giving discounts to any one, so as to enable them to give the Bar the advantage of the lowest possible price for which the Book can be made.

The volume has been carefully compiled, and has also been revised by the Judges of the different Courts, and endorsed by Rules of the same. They therefore contain not only the latest, but also the only full publication of those rules, as they now stand on the minutes of the different Courts.

Supreme Court of Ohio.

SCHNEIDER v. HOSIER.

1. An action for injuries sustained by a wife, in her person or property or means of support, under (original) section 7 of the act of May 1st, 1854 (S. & C. 1432), entitled "An act to provide against the evils resulting from the sale of intoxicating liquors in the State of Ohio," may be commenced after the death of the husband.
2. The phrase "means of support," used in said section, is not too vague and uncertain to receive judicial construction.
3. A wife has an interest in her husband's capacity to perform labor as a means of support, and she may prosecute an action for damages resulting to her from the deprivation of such means of support, in consequence of the intoxication of her husband, against any person who caused such intoxication by selling to him intoxicating liquors in violation of said statute.
4. The omission of a court, in its charge to the jury, to define or explain doubtful words or phrases contained in a statute upon which the action is founded, does not constitute a ground of reversal, unless such definition or explanation was requested by the party claiming to have been prejudiced thereby.
5. In actions under said section, in which the plaintiff shows a right to recover damages actually sustained, the jury may also assess exemplary damages without proof of actual malice or other special circumstances of aggravation.
6. The verdict in such cases should not be set aside on the ground that the damages are excessive, unless the court is satisfied that the jury abused its discretion.
7. Nor will the verdict be disturbed because the court in its charge stated general propositions of law not involved in the issue, if it appears from the whole charge that the jury could not have been misled thereby.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Preble county. Reserved in District Court.

Sarah Hosier, plaintiff below, filed second amended petition against John Schneider, the defendant below, as follows:

"The plaintiff, during the three years immediately preceding and including the 18th of March, A. D. 1865, was the wife of one Zimri Hosier, on whose good conduct, frugality and personal labor she was dependent for the support of herself and their seven minor children; for the proper culture and moral training of the latter; and, to a good extent, for her own position in society."

"The said Zimri Hosier, when not intoxicated or laboring under the effects of intoxication, was an industrious laboring man, and regularly earned and received for his labor $1.50 a day, applicable to the support of themselves and their said family, and which said sum was so applied by him accordingly. (The italicized words were interlined by way of amendment.) But the said Zimri Hosier was in the habit of getting intoxicated, and the defendant, well knowing the same, at divers and sundry times, on divers days and nights, throughout and during the said entire term of three years, up to and on or about the 12th day of the said month of March, 1865, at the village of Lewisburgh, in the county of Preble, unlawfully, wilfully and maliciously sold to the said Zimri Hosier, intoxicating liquors, thereby causing him thus frequently to get intoxicated, in consequence of which, he as often became and was, in addition thereto, infirm and diseased, and for times varying from and to several days, and aggregating within the said term of three years, not less than nine months, or the average of one-fourth part of his whold time, incapable of laboring; by reason whereof, she, as his wife, was compelled to and did take charge of and provide for him, for and during the said aggregate time of nine months, until and on the said 18th day of March, A. D. 1865, when said series of intoxications and their said effects culminated in his death; leaving her wearied with the labor of providing him with necessary food and medicine, the attention and care bestowed upon him; and burdened with the further expense of his funeral rites and burial, and of the rearing, maintenance and education of their said minor children, by her own unaided labor; whereby she was and is injured in her person, her property, and her means of support, to the damage of the plaintiff, five thousand dollars, for which she prays judgment."

The defendant moved the court to compel the plaintiff to make her second amended petition more specific and certain in the following particulars: 1. By stating the nature of the injuries upon which the plaintiff seeks to recover; whether it be to her person or her property, or means of support. If to her person, in what manner, and by what means. If to her property, what property, and how injured. If to her means of support, the amount thereof, and in what particulars her means of support were injured, and the special damage sustained by each. If any damage is claimed for causing the death of said Zimri Hosier, let such claim be distinctly made, and the damages claimed on account thereof. 2. By stating the time of the sales of liquor, and the quantity sold at each, and the damages resulting to her person, her property, or means of support by reason of any such sales.

On the hearing of this motion, the court found the petition to be uncertain in not stating that the money earned by said Zimri Hosier was applied to the support of his wife, and in that particular sustained the motion; and as to the remainder of the petition, overruled the motion, and defendant excepted.

Thereupon the plaintiff obtained leave of the court to amend her petition at bar, by inserting the following words at the end of the second paragraph of the petition, to wit: "and which said sum was by him so applied accordingly." To this the defendant excepted. All which appears in a journal entry.

Thereupon the defendant demurred to the second amended petition for the following causes:

1. There are several causes of action improperly joined in the petition.
2. The plaintiff has not legal capacity to sue.
3. The petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

This demurrer was overruled, and exception was taken by the defendant.

Thereupon he filed an answer, which

1. Denies that on or about the 12th of March, 1865, or at any other time, he unlawfully, wilfully and maliciously sold to said Zimri Hosier intoxicating liquors, thereby causing him to get intoxicated.

2. Denies that the plaintiff's husband was at any time prevented or hindered from following his usual avocation, or laboring, by reason of any sales of liquors made to him by the defendant.

3. Denies that the plaintiff was injured in her person, her means of support, or in her property, by reason of any sale or sales of liquor by the defendant to the plaintiff's husband.

The cause was tried by a jury. The opinion of the court contains a statement of what the testimony tended to prove. At the trial the plaintiff disclaimed to the jury the right to recover anything on the ground of the death of the husband, or for any injury to her person or property.

The court charged the jury as follows:

"If the defendant, by the sale of liquor to Zimri Hosier, produced his intoxication, and if Zimri Hosier was a man in the habit of getting intoxicated, and the defendant knew the fact that Hosier was in the habit of becoming intoxicated, and if the plaintiff was, by such intoxication of her husband, so produced by the defendant, injured in her means of support, she is entitled to compensation for the injury she has sustained.

"You are to look at all the testimony, and determine what would have probably been the means of support which the plaintiff would have had in the event that no sale of liquor had been made to Zimri Hosier by the defendant, and to the extent that she has suffered in her means of support by intoxication produced by the defendant. If that intoxication was produced by liquor sold in violation of law, alleged in the petition, you are to allow her damages.

If the deceased, Zimri Hosier, was in such circumstances that his wife and children required the proceeds, or part of the proceeds, of his daily labor for their support, they were entitled to this support out of his daily labor; and the person who, by selling liquor to the deceased, and thereby producing his intoxication, deprived them of the means of support, in whole or in part, would be liable to respond in damages to the amount of support he deprived them of.

"Every man who has a wife owes her maintenance. If he has not other means at command to afford that support and maintenance, he must necessarily provide such means in some comfortable manner. If his only means of affording such support is out of his daily labor, then the person who, by producing his intoxication in violation of law, renders him unfit for labor, and prevents him from pursuing his only means for the sustenance of his wife, is liable. But if the party alleged to have neglected his business from intoxication would not have pursued his business if sober, or if, before the sale of liquors to him, as alleged, he was unfit for any occupation, in that event his wife would suffer no damage from his intoxication. But if he would have pursued his regular occupation if sober, and by intoxication produced by another, by the sale of liquor in violation of law, failed to pursue such occupation, and his wife is thereby deprived of the means of support, she is entitled to recover to the amount which she may have been deprived of the means of support. And if the other facts appear, it is for you to say, from the testimony in the case, in the light of surrounding circumstances, what injury the plaintiff has sustained in her means of support, and to allow her accordingly.

"And you may go beyond this, and not only allow her the actual damages sustained, but allow damages by way of punishing the defendant, and of serving as an example to others. This is a matter within your sound discretion, as to whether you will allow these vindictive or exemplary damages or not, or, if you allow them, what amount you will allow.

"If there were aggravating circumstances surrounding the selling, such circumstances may be considered in assessing the amount of damages. If the defendant knew the family of Hosier needed the assistance of his labor for their support, and that, by his intoxication, he neglected to provide for their support; and if he was requested by the wife or other persons of the family to desist from selling liquor to the husband, and still persisted, these would be circumstances in aggravation of damages. What circumstances are or are not shown by the testimony to exist in this case, whether aggravated or mitigated, is for you to determine. You are to look to the testimony, and the whole testimony, and render such verdict as you may think, under your oaths, is justified.

"You should not be influenced by your personal views of the propriety or impropriety of the law. Whether the law was properly or improperly passed, is not for you or me to determine. It is the duty of courts and juries to enforce the laws in proper cases, as they may find them, until they are repealed, or by some proper tribunal declared unconstitutional.

"If the party was far gone in the habits of intoxication, and had become diseased bodily or mentally, and the defendant knew this fact, the selling to him, under these circumstances, would be more aggravating than selling to one not so badly addicted to intemperance, and who had more vigor of mind and body.

"On the other hand, if the defendant at times, in good faith, refused to furnish liquor to the deceased when requested, this would be a circumstance that might be considered in mitigation of damages. If such refusal was not in good faith, but merely to deceive persons present as to his course towards the deceased, his refusal would not be in good faith, and would not go in mitigation. It is not intended by these remarks to intimate to the jury any opinion as to what the facts were in this case; what the facts were is entirely for the jury."

The defendant excepted to the charge of the court, and after it was concluded, requested the court to charge the jury, that before they could find the defendant's liability fixed under the law, a preponderance of evidence must show:

"First. That the defendant sold intoxicating liquors to the plaintiff's late husband, in violation of law, whereby her said husband was made to become intoxicated."

"Second. That while thus intoxicated, from the defendant's unlawful act, and as the probable result of such intoxication, the said husband did some act or some thing resulting in immediate and actual injury to the plaintiff, in her person, her property or her means of support actually in existence."

"Third. That the said husband's omissions to labor while intoxicated, by the unlawful act of the defendant, cannot be made the ground of recovery in this action."

"Fourth. That the wages of the said husband, for labor never performed by him, did not constitute the means of support of the plaintiff within the meaning of the law, even if the jury should believe from the evidence that the said husband would probably have labored and made wages, had it not been for his intoxication, produced by the unlawful act of the defendant."

The second, third and fourth of these propositions the court refused to give in charge to the jury, and defendant excepted.

The verdict was for the plaintiff, assessing the damages at $200. The defendant moved to set aside this verdict, and for a new trial, on the following grounds:

1. The verdict is against the weight of the evidence.

2. The verdict is against the law of the case.

3. The court erred in its charge to the jury.

4. The court erred in refusing to charge as requested by the defendant.

5. The damages are excessive, and were given under the influence of passion, prejudice and misapprehension of the law and evidence.

This motion was overruled and exception taken, and judgment entered on the verdict.

To reverse the judgment the defendant filed his petition in the District Court, claiming that the Common Pleas erred:

1. In overruling his motion to make the second amended petition more definite and certain, and in permitting the plaintiff below to amend her petition at bar, without verification of the amendment.

2. In overruling the demurrer to the petition as amended.

3. In the charge to the jury, and in refusing to charge as requested by the defendant below.

4. In overruling the motion to set aside the verdict, and for a new trial.

The cause was reserved in the District Court for decision in this court.

Gilmore & Campbell (with Hubbard & Freeman), for plaintiff in error.

1. The statement of facts and averments of the second amended petition are such as to leave it uncertain whether the plaintiff below placed her right to recover on the sixth or on the seventh section of the "liquor law" (S. & C. 1432), or on the act allowing damages for unlawfully causing the death of her husband. S. & C. 1139.

2. The demurrer to the petition was improperly overruled:

(1.) The plaintiff improperly joined causes of action which should be separately stated and numbered. Code, §§ 85, 86.

(2.) The plaintiff had not legal capacity to sue in the action. The original petition was filed after her husband's death. The right of action against the defendant, which she had as a wife, under the seventh section of the liquor law, did not survive to her as a widow.

The liquor statute is penal in its character, and should be strictly construed. Hall v. The State, 20 Ohio, 7; U. S. v. Wilson, Baldw. C. C. 78. The widow is not within the definition of the seventh section, taking the word in its ordinary acceptation. The statute does not provide that the right of action—a purely statutory right—given to the wife shall survive to her as a widow. Where one claims a statutory right against another, he shall bring himself clearly within the terms which confer that right. Rolcliff v. Beck, 10 West L. J. 72, and cases there cited.

The statute does not vest in the wife any interest or property, but simply a naked right of action. The plaintiff, as wife, had no claim or title whatsoever, till after suit commenced, to the damages for which the seventh section gives her a naked right of action only.

3. The court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict, and grant a new trial.

(1.) The verdict is against the weight of the evidence, and the damages are excessive.

(2.) The verdict is contrary to law. The plaintiff rested her right to recover on the grounds of injury to her "means of support." The phrase is too loose, vague and uncertain to found upon it an action at law to recover a penalty. The phrase cannot be used by the wife for the recovery of damages for an injury to a thing so intangible as the uncontracted, unperformed future labor of the husband.

(3.) The court erred in its charge to the jury and in refusing to charge as requested. The charge was inapplicable and legally unsound. The court fails to give a legal definition to the vague phrase "means of support." Each juror was left to guess its meaning.

It was error to unite the children with the wife. Each of them had a right of action under the statute. She had sued for herself alone, and could not recover for them or on account of them. The language of the statute is "that every wife, child," &c., shall have a right of action, &c.

It was stating the case too strongly and erroneously, and in a way calculated to mislead the jury, for the court to say that every husband "must necessarily procure" means of support for his wife, &c.

As to exemplary damages, the charge was erroneous and calculated to mislead the jury, and prejudice them against the defendant. The term "exemplary damages" is used without qualification in the seventh section. It must be presumed, therefore, that it is used in the sense in which it is understood at law, and it cannot be expanded or contracted from this. "Exemplary damages are given in cases where the aggressor is animated by a fraudulent, a malicious, or an oppressive intention." Sedgw. on Dam. 35. And the defendant must have acted with these, or some of these, toward the plaintiff. The testimony shows no legal ground upon which exemplary damages could be allowed; and the court should either have said so to the jury or have said nothing on the subject of exemplary damages. The court failed to indicate or define the legal grounds upon which such damages are allowable, but gave the jury erroneous impressions on the subject, and turned them in upon the defendant with no rule to guide them but their "sound discretion."

Throughout the charge, matters of fact which should have been left to the jury, are charged as matters of law. Kober v. The State, 10 Ohio St. 444.

J. H. Foos, for defendant in error.

1. The second amended petition contains but one cause of action. All the averments in the petition, respecting the death of the husband, are simply descriptive of the injury to the plaintiff's means of support, and do not profess to be a substantive ground of recovery.

2. The plaintiff had legal capacity to sue. The action is by her as a person, Sarah Hosier, not as a widow. The injury was done to her while she was the wife of Zimri Hosier, and his death did not work a forfeiture or abatement of this right. It was not necessary to the continuance of the right of action that the suit should have been brought in the lifetime of the husband. This is not a case where the principles of survivorship obtain. The husband had no interest in the subject matter of the suit. His death did not affect the right of the wife. If she had died before suit brought, the question of survivorship might have been raised. But in the present case, no one has died who had any interest in the controversy; both parties are living. If the plaintiff does not come under the description of "wife," she surely does come within the description of "other persons," as used in the statute.

The civil action given by the statute is not a penal action. It is like actions for a malicious prosecution, injury to personal property, or slander; in all of which exemplary damages may be given as a punishment for the malice. And yet these actions are not termed or known as penal actions, nor are the rules governing them construed strictly.

2. The motion for a new trial was properly overruled:

(1.) The verdict is not against the weight of the evidence, and the damages are not excessive.

(2.) The verdict is not contrary to law. By virtue of the statute giving the right of action, the plaintiff was entitled, on the facts stated in the petition, to recover for the injury to her "means of support," resulting from her husband's inability, in consequence of intoxication, to perform labor and earn wages necessary and applicable to her support. Duroy v. Blinn & Letcher, 11 Ohio St. 331. The wife has the right to be supported by the husband (2 Kent's Com. p. 146), and by his daily labor, if necessary.

(3.) The charge of the court, when taken as a whole, will be found to be a correct exposition of the law of the case.

McElvaine, J. 1. We find no error in the overruling of the motion to make the second amended petition definite and certain. The nature of the charge contained therein is sufficiently apparent. The petition contains, no doubt, much irrelevant matter that might have been stricken out, but no objection was made by motion to strike out, which is the only way of reaching such matter.

2. It is also assigned for error, that on the hearing of the motion to make the second amended petition definite and certain, the plaintiff below was permitted by the court, against the objection of the defendant, to amend, by inserting in the petition an allegation that the proceeds of her husband's labor had formerly been applied to her support, without subsequent verification.

The petition containing the averment referred to appears in the record properly verified. It is true, the clerk entered upon the journal of the court the fact as claimed by plaintiff in error, but the only proper mode of saving such rulings upon the record is by bill of exceptions.

The practice of mutilating pleadings by striking out or inserting new matter, by way of amendment, must be condemned; but, in this case, even if the question had been properly saved, it would not afford ground for reversal, as it is clear the defendant was not prejudiced by the alteration, for the reason that the amendment was immaterial and unnecessary. Before the alteration the petition contained a statement that the plaintiff was dependent upon the labor of her husband for her support, which certainly was a sufficient predicate for an averment of injury by being deprived of such means of support.

But quære—whether it was necessary to aver that she was dependent upon his labor for her support?

3. The overruling of the demurrer to the second amended petition is also assigned for error.

The demurrer specifies these grounds of objection:

1st. That several causes of action are improperly joined;

2d. That the plaintiff has no legal capacity to sue; and,

3d. That the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

As to the first objection. There is, in fact, but one cause of action stated in the petition. The action is brought under the seventh section (original) of the act of May 1st, 1854 (S. & C. 1432), entitled "An act to provide against the evils resulting from the sale of intoxicating liquors in the State of Ohio," to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff, as the wife of Zimri Hosier, in consequence of his intoxication caused by the defendant.

Said section reads as follows: "That every wife, child, parent, guardian, employer or other person, who shall be injured in person or property or means of support, by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of the intoxication, habitual or otherwise, of any person, such wife, child, parent, guardian, employer or other person shall have a right of action, in his or her own name, against any person who shall, by selling intoxicating liquors contrary to this act, have caused the intoxication of such person, for all damages actually sustained, as well as exemplary damages," &c.

As to the second objection taken by the demurrer, it is claimed that the plaintiff below had no legal capacity to sue: "1st. Because the statute does not provide that the right of action given to a 'wife' shall survive to her as a widow. And 2d. Because the statute does not vest in the wife any interest or property, but simply a naked right of action."

It may be conceded that this statute, being in its nature penal, and providing a remedy unknown to the common law, must be strictly construed; and, therefore, no person can maintain an action under its provisions, to whom a right of action is not given by its terms.

The term "wife" is used to designate a class of persons to whom the right of action is given. The plaintiff was the wife of Zimri Hosier at the time the defendant caused his intoxication, and at the time the injuries complained of were sustained. The right of action then vested in her, and having vested, the statute did not divest it upon the death of her husband; nor does it abate upon common-law principles. The husband had no interest in it, and no control over it. The right of action vested in her, to be prosecuted in her own name, and for her sole use. She did not lose her identity by the death of her husband. True, the relation of wife closed, but that relation, although essential, by the terms of the statute, to the inception of the right of action, is not necessary in the prosecution of the remedy. The plaintiff does not sue because she is the widow of Zimri Hosier, but because she was his wife at the time she was injured. The term "employer" is used to designate another class of persons to whom a right of action is given by the terms of this statute. If the right of action vested in a wife abates upon the death of her husband, because the relation of wife no longer exists, I take it, that an employer cannot sue under this statute, after the relation of master and servant has ceased. Strict construction does not lead to such conclusions.

Nor is the right of action given by this statute a mere naked right, as in popular or qui tam actions. But it is a right to a remedy for a real injury; a means of recovering actual, personal damages.

In popular actions the right to sue is given to any person who may first prosecute, not for a personal injury, but for a penalty to which the prosecutor has no claim until suit is commenced. Under this statute the right of action is confined to the persons named, and they cannot recover unless they prove actual injury to their persons or property, or means of support.

As to the third objection stated in the demurrer. It is sufficient to say, that the statutory grounds of action are all sufficiently stated in the petition.

4. The defendant below moved the court to set aside the verdict and for a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and evidence. The overruling this motion is claimed to be error.

The testimony tended to prove (and it is sufficient for that purpose) that the plaintiff's husband, for some time previous to his death, was habitually intoxicated; that the defendant sold him intoxicating liquors in violation of the act of May 1st, 1864, and thereby caused his intoxication; that by reason of such intoxication he (the husband) was rendered incapable of performing his ordinary labor; that the plaintiff was dependent on his labor for support; that the proceeds of his labor had previously been applied for that purpose; that in consequence of such intoxication the plaintiff was compelled to resort to other resources for the supply of her wants; that plaintiff was reduced to a state of want, although the husband continued to furnish a portion of her means of living, from money received on the sale of his property.

The plaintiff on the trial disclaimed any damage resulting to her from the death of her husband, and also for any injury to her person or her property, and relied solely upon the claim that she had been injured in her means of support.

Upon this state of facts two objections are made by plaintiff in error: 1st. That the phrase "means of support," as used in this statute, is too vague to receive judicial construction; and 2d. That if the meaning of this phrase can be ascertained, still the plaintiff was not injured in her means of support.

This phrase was in common use at the time and long before the passage of this statute. It then was and still is as well understood as most words and phrases in the English language. It is commonly used in the plural form, but often in a singular sense. In its general sense it embraces all those resources from which the necessaries and comforts of living are, or may be, supplied, such as lands, goods, salaries, wages or other sources of income. In its limited sense it signifies any resource from which the wants of life may be supplied.

We are not called upon in this case to determine the full extent and scope of its meaning, but only to ascertain whether the wages or proceeds of ordinary labor is a "means of support" within the meaning of the statute. And of this proposition we entertain no doubt. See Duroy v. Blinn, 11 Ohio St. 331.

Ordinary labor being a means of support, the next question is, whether the labor of the husband, or its proceeds, can be regarded as the wife's means of support.

A husband is morally and legally bound to supply his wife with the necessaries and comforts of life. If he has no other resource, it is his duty to contribute his labor and its proceeds to her support. And the wife has a corresponding right to be maintained and supplied, and to that end she has an interest in all her husband's resources. It is upon this principle that alimony is decreed to a wife out of her husband's estate, or charged upon him personally. A wife, then, has an interest in the labor of her husband, and in its proceeds, and especially when that labor is necessary for her support. If she has an interest in her husband's labor and its proceeds as a means of support, she has an interest also in his capacity to labor. Capacity to labor is a means of support; and any deprivation of her rights or interest in the proceeds of his labor, or his capacity to labor, is an injury to her in her means of support. This must be so, especially if she is dependent upon such labor for her living in whole or in part.

Nor is it an answer to say, that because the common law gave her no remedy for the wrongful deprivation of her rights in such case, that, therefore, she was not injured. Her injury was none the less without than it would have been with a remedy. It is not true that the common law gave a remedy for every wrong or injury.

5. It is further objected that the court erred in the charge as given to the jury, and in refusing to charge as requested.

Without referring specially to the charge as given, or to the requests refused, it will suffice to state the rules by which the objections urged must be determined against the plaintiff in error:

1st. The omission of a court, in its charge to the jury, to define and explain doubtful words or phrases contained in a statute upon which the action is founded, does not constitute a ground for reversal, unless such definition or explanation was requested by the party claiming to have been prejudiced thereby.

2d. Nor will a verdict be disturbed because the court charged the jury upon general propositions of law not involved in the issue, if it appear from the whole charge that the jury could not have been misled thereby.

3d. Whatever may be the rules of the common law as to the state of facts necessary to justify the assessment of exemplary damages, it is clear to our minds that exemplary damages may be recovered in any action brought under this section, in which the evidence shows a right to recover actual damages. The amount of such damages is left to the sound discretion of the jury, subject to be controlled by the court when such discretion is abused. In actions under this statute the jury, in the exercise of its discretion as to exemplary damages, ought to consider all the circumstances properly before them tending to aggravate or mitigate the conduct of the wrong-doer.

We find no error in the charges given, or in refusing the charges requested.

The whole amount of damages awarded in this case was $200. We cannot say that this amount was excessive. Judgment affirmed.

GREENVILLE v. MASON et al.

Abstract of the opinion of the court. Delivered by LADD, J., August 15th, 1873.

In 1856, the town of Mason received of John Boynton, $10,000 upon the the following conditions: "That the same should be forever kept upon interest, and should forever be known as the Boynton Common School Fund, and that the interest or income thereof should annually forever be applied by said town of Mason, to the support of district or public schools in said town, in proportion to the number of scholars in such districts or schools, between the ages of five and fifteen years; and that, whenever said town should fail so to apply the interest or income of said money annually, in addition to the sum that shall be required to be raised by law by said town for the support of district or public schools, the said town should repay the same sum of $10,000 to the said John Boynton, his executors, administrators, or assigns."

Subsequently the Legislature passed an act authorizing the town of Mason to elect a board of trustees of said fund, giving them the entire control and management of the same, and requiring them to invest it, and apply the income according to the conditions of the gift; and the gift was accepted and received.

In 1872 the town of Greenville was constituted from a part of the territory and inhabitants of Mason, by an act of the Legislature, wherein it was provided among other things, that "all school and other funds" belonging to Mason, should be divided between said towns; that is the town of Mason, and the newly erected town of Greenville, in the proportion of six dollars and fifty cents to Greenville, and three dollars and fifty cents to Mason.

On a bill in equity brought by the new town of Greenville against Mason and the trustees of the fund, to compel a division of the fund or the income thereof, it was held:

1. That a division and distribution of the fund or income, in accordance with the provisions of the act, constituting Greenville, would be inconsistent and incompatible with the condition of the gift, and would work a forfeiture according to the plain terms of that condition.

2. That if the act is to be construed as prescribing a ratio and mode of division, it is so far repugnant to the constitution of New Hampshire, as well as the Constitution of the United States, inasmuch as it would annul and defeat the intention of the donor in devoting it to a charitable use in a particular way; while it at the same time destroys a vested right in the beneficiaries resting upon contract; and that it is, therefore, so far void.

3. That no legal provision being made in the act for a division of the fund or the income of it (even were such a thing possible), the property remains unchanged in the original town of Mason, and the trustees are right in paying over the income to the treasurer of that town, the same since the division as before.

THE PHILADELPHIA COURTS.

The provisions of the proposed new constitution, in reference to the Philadelphia courts, have attracted much attention from the bench and bar of this city, and warm discussions have arisen as to the expediency of adopting the system of courts proposed by them. How best to remedy the numerous evils arising out of the insufficient number of courts and judges, is a question that sore perplexes the legal mind at the present time, and whether the system proposed by the convention is calculated to afford the needed remedy, is a subject that has not yet been settled. Whatever its demerits, it is decidedly superior to the one now in force. It cannot be denied, even by the judges themselves, that it is physically impossible to dispose of the great number of cases brought in the "District Court." The number actually disposed of in a given time falls far below the number of new cases actually prepared for trial in the same period, and with such a state of affairs staring them in the face, disappointed suitors, neglected witnesses, wearied attornies, indignant taxpayers, all ask, if something cannot be devised to expedite causes, and give to the people "simple justice." The convention have grappled with the subject, and after much anxious thought; have put forth the following provisions (above referred to).

SECT. 5. In the city of Philadelphia and in the county of Allegheny, all the jurisdiction and powers now invested in the District Courts and the courts of Common Pleas, or either of them, in said city and county, subject to such changes as may be made by this constitution or by law, shall be in the city of Philadelphia vested in four, and in the county of Allegheny in two distinct and separate courts of equal and co-ordinate jurisdiction, composed of three judges each, and in such additional courts of the same number of judges and of like jurisdiction as may, from time to time, be by law added thereto. The said courts in the city of Philadelphia shall be designated respectively as the Court of Common Pleas number one, number two, number three and number four, and in the county of Allegheny, as the Court of Common Pleas number one and number two, but the number of said courts may be by law increased, from time to time, and shall be in like manner designated by successive numbers; the number of judges in any of said courts, or in any county where the establishment of an additional court may be authorized by law, may be increased from time to time; and whenever such increase shall amount in the whole to three, such three judges shall compose a distinct and separate court as aforesaid, which shall be numbered as aforesaid.

SECT. 6. Each court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all proceedings at law and in equity commenced therein, subject to change of venue as may be provided by law.

SECT. 7. For the city of Philadelphia there shall be one prothonotary's office, and one prothonotary for all said courts, to be appointed by the judges of said courts, and to hold office for three years, subject to removal by a majority of the said judges; the said prothonotary shall appoint such assistants as may be necessary and authorized by said courts; and he and his assistants shall receive fixed salaries, to be determined by law and paid by said city; and all fees collected in said office, except such as may be by law due to the commonwealth, shall be paid by such prothonotary into the city treasury; each court shall have its separate dockets, except the judgment docket, which shall contain the judgments and liens of all the said courts, as are or may be directed by law.

SECT. 8. The said courts in the city of Philadelphia and county of Allegheny, respectively, shall, from time to time in turn, detail one or more of its judges to hold the courts of oyer and terminer and the courts of quarter sessions of said district, in such manner as may be directed by law.

SECT. 23. A register's office for the probate of wills and granting letters of administration, and an office for recording of deeds shall be kept in each county; the Register's Court is hereby abolished, and the jurisdiction and powers thereof are vested in the Orphans' Court; in every city and county wherein the population shall exceed one hundred and fifty thousand, the Legislature shall, and in any other city or county may establish a separate Orphans' Court, to consist of one or more judges, who shall be learned in the law, and which court shall exercise all the jurisdiction and powers now vested in, or which may hereafter be conferred upon the Orphans' Court, and thereupon the jurisdiction of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas within such city or county in Orphans' Court proceedings, shall cease and determine; the register of wills shall be compensated by a fixed salary, to be paid as may be provided by law; he shall be clerk of the Orphans' Court, and subject to the direction of said court in all matters pertaining to his office; assistant clerks may be appointed by the register, but only with the consent and approval of the court; all accounts filed in the register's office and in the Orphans' Courts shall be audited by the court without expense to parties, except where all parties in interest in a pending proceeding shall nominate an auditor whom the court may, in its discretion, appoint.

As the above provisions affect to a certain extent the bar of the whole State, though more particularly that of this city, it may be of interest to our readers to give some extracts from the debates which took place in the convention, upon the adoption of the sections pertaining to Courts of Common Pleas. Upon June 30th last, section 5 came before the convention, whereupon Mr. Dallas moved as an amendment to strike it out, and insert in lieu thereof a proposition which substantially let the District and Common Pleas Courts remain as they are, the only difference being that the District Court should have no equity jurisdiction, and the Common Pleas Courts jurisdiction over the trial of common law cases and upon certiorari and appeal from magistrates, was transferred to the District Court.

Mr. Geo. W. Biddle, of Philadelphia, in advocacy of the section, spoke as follows:

"Mr. President: I cannot understand why, after the very full discussion upon this section heretofore, in which all the advantages and disadvantages were thoroughly weighed, this opposition to it should spring up now. I propose to answer as briefly as I can the objections which are made to the section.

In 1810, the Court of Common Pleas then being unduly pressed by business, a branch court of the Common Pleas was established, which certainly worked satisfactorily for a time. It was confined to the trial of civil issues.

After a while, some fifteen years ago, probably more, in order to bring it in harmony with the other court in which the equity practice was beginning to be considerable, it had equity powers conferred upon it, to the very great advantage of the suitors. Some six years ago, the equity powers were taken from this branch court, and recently, within two or three months, they have been re-conferred upon it.

We are told here by a number of gentlemen professing to represent the entire legal interests of the city of Philadelphia, that any change by which this branch court shall be compelled to discharge all the judicial duties of the parent court from which it springs, will be regarded as an infliction upon the community, and something which the bar and the bench of Philadelphia are alike opposed to. So far as I know the sentiment of the people, I do not believe any such thing. I believe it will be regarded as no infliction, but on the contrary will be held an improvement in accordance with the original design of the court, and with the desires of the people. The design of that branch court was to give it co-extensive jurisdiction with the Common Pleas. Now, if you take from the District Court all criminal jurisdiction, all equity powers, you leave it a very limited and a very lame affair.

Why, Mr. President, just think of what the convention is asked to do in relegating this District Court to its original narrow jurisdiction. Abroad the sentiment of the whole profession is in favor of blending the equity powers of the courts of chancery with the powers of the courts of common law; and a bill elaborated with a great deal of care and suggested during the past winter by the chancellor of Great Britain looks in that direction, while we should be stripping our District Court of that which it already possesses; and for what? For what it is difficult to understand; either to gratify the mere private wishes of some of the judges in that court, or because it is supposed that it is unadvisable to disturb that which has heretofore performed its part tolerably well.

Now, I, for one, am emphatically for bringing the judicial power of the county of Philadelphia in accord with the judicial power of the rest of the State. No good reason can be pointed out, except that it has so happened during the last fifty years, for keeping those two courts distinct. The narrower the jurisdiction, the narrower the intellectual processes of the court—you really maim and put at a disadvantage a tribunal by depriving it of that which is possessed by other tribunals sitting alongside of it.

And in regard to the administration of criminal justice in the county of Philadelphia, I say unhesitatingly, as the result of a considerable examination into the subject, that it will be an enormous advantage—I use the word advisedly; I do not over-state it when I say and enormous advantage—both to citizen and court to have every judge of the county of Philadelphia, for at least one month in the year, go into that court and discharge its duties, sitting there long enough to acquire competent knowledge of the business, but not too long to be affected, and I may say infected, by the atmosphere which always hangs over a criminal court, and which sooner or later becomes injurious both to him who practices constantly, and to him who presides constantly in such a jurisdiction.

Do gentlemen recollect that the highest judge in the Kingdom of Great Britain considers it no derogation from his office to mingle in the administration of criminal justice, and to try criminal offenders? For my part I cannot imagine any spectacle more calculated to endear the judiciary to a people than to see its chief heads participating in the administration of that justice which goes home to the meanest individual in the community. The moment you put a man above and beyond that, you really declare, so far from affixing a dignity to his position, that he is unfitted for the business which he is selected to discharge. Why should six judges or five judges in the District Court undertake to say that they are only to try the civil issues, when the highest judges abroad, and the highest judges of the land in this country, from the chief justice of the United States and every associate of his court, mingles with advantage to himself and to the whole community in the administration of criminal justice? Let gentlemen reflect upon the result of their actions here. The principle of the amendment is not in accordance with the universal sentiment of the city of Philadelphia, in accordance with the universal sentiment of the delegates who are supposed to represent specially that community here—for I see before me and around me gentlemen who differ entirely with the views of the two gentlemen from Philadelphia who have spoken to-day. Why should this question be discussed in the narrow view in which it seems to me to be presented, instead of being looked at in the shape in which it becomes important to gentlemen representing every section of this broad commonwealth to regard it? Why should we be deprived of this enlarged experience, these broader views which the administration of equity and which the administration of criminal justice gives to a judge in the rest of the State, by being told that in Philadelphia you shall have one court to try all the civil issues, that is the common law part, and then by a most extraordinary perversion of terms, have the Court of Common Pleas, which, according to the amendment of the gentleman who spoke first to-day, is not to try a single common plea between man and man in the city of Philadelphia? I cannot imagine a greater anomaly. What is its advantage? It is that it is always to be supposed that because men are doing the same thing all the time they will do it a great deal better. There never was a greater mistake than that. They do acquire a little mechanical expertness in the business which they are doing every day; but they lose that breadth, they lose that larger experience, they lose that wider view which the administration of equity has given, and is continuing to give judges who administer the common law exclusively.

Wha does this section propose? I am not at all tenacious about the form in which it is presented by the committee, although I believe after having looked at it with some care, and after having had more than one conference, much to my own advantage, with the members of the committee, that the plan proposed by them is the best one, of having four branches co-equal in jurisdiction, with three judges each, because I believe that three is a better number than six. I am not at all tenacious about this, however. What I am tenacious about is the great principle enunciated in this section, by which all the judges in the county of Philadelphia, are made to discharge precisely the same functions as they are in the rest of the State, because I believe in that way they will be better judges, and the interests of the suitors will be better subserved. But I am authorized now and here to say that if this convention adopts the principle of the section as reported from the committee on the judiciary, that is to say, the section conferring criminal and equity jurisdiction alike upon all the courts of Philadelphia county, the judges of the District Court prefer it in the shape in which it comes from the committee to-day, rather than in any other shape. Why do I say this? There is no objection to repeating what occurred in the interval of the sessions of the convention. One of the judges of the District Court called upon me, and while he told me frankly that the judges of his court would prefer the District Court remaining just as it is (which I do not find fault with them at all for preferring, because change is distasteful to most people), yet if there was to be a change, if it was the sense of this house that criminal jurisdiction should be conferred upon them, that the equity powers recently re-conferred upon them should remain, that they should become, as they ought to become, a constitutional court in the sense of the constitution, and not a mere legislative court, deriving its power from the Legislature alone, and which might be extinguished in a moment, they prefer very much the section in the shape in which it is presented by the committee on the judiciary.

I do trust, therefore, Mr. President, that the convention will not—and I address on this point rather the members outside of the county of Philadelphia than those in it—that the members from the country districts, from the other portions of the State, will not, in the belief that the amendment offered by my colleague who spoke first, is in entire harmony with the wants and wishes of the city of Philadelphia, and that the section is not in harmony with those wishes, vote for the amendment rather than the section. If they do, they will inflict, in my judgment, a very grievous wound, not only upon the symmetry, which perhaps is a small matter, but upon the efficiency of the administration of justice throughout the State.

No possible good reason, except the old reason of keeping things exactly as they are, can be urged in favor of the amendment, while every philosophic view, every reason taken from the broader ground which should be occupied by this question, every reason by which it is sought to elevate the judiciary by giving them that refreshing contact with all sorts of business, is strongly in favor of the report of the committee in the shape in which the section now stands.

I hope, therefore, very warmly, Mr. President, that the amendment will be voted down and that the report as presented will be adopted."

After some further discussion less than a majority of a quorum voted in favor of the amendment offered by Mr. Dallas, and it was accordingly lost. Mr. Dallas then offered a lengthy amendment, providing for one court in the city of Philadelphia in lieu of the present District and Common Pleas Courts, composed of twelve judges, and divided into four divisions of three judges each. This amendment was almost unanimously rejected, the following extracts showing the feeling in the convention on the subject.

"Mr. Dallas. * * * For I desire to say to this convention that I believe I represent what the bar and people of Philadelphia want, and they are making a mistake against 150,000 voters in refusing to hear this proposition.

Mr. Armstrong. I only desire to make a single remark. This proposition was in print, and was considered by the judiciary committee. If it was not submitted in committee of the whole, which I cannot now state, it was unfortunate. But it is a plan which proposes to make one court with subordinate committees. That is about the smallest interpretation of it I do not propose to enter into any discussion upon it.

Mr. Biddle. I have only a single remark to make in regard to this subject. It can hardly be supposed that this convention will believe that the amendmens offered in the morning session by the gentleman from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas), who has just taken his seat, had the almost unanimous recommendation of the bench and of the bar of this city, and that the present project has the same recommendation, for they are as wide asunder as the poles. The present project gives criminal jurisdiction, gives equity jurisdiction, gives road jurisdiction, gives every jurisdiction known to our joint systems of law and equity, to all the courts; and if the unanimous desire of the bench and the bar is to keep the courts separate, how my distinguished friend can get up and say, in behalf of the citizens of Philadelphia, that this present project meets their views exactly, I cannot understand.

The President pro tem. The question is on the amendment of the delegate from Philadelphia (Mr. Dallas)."

The amendment was rejected.

The original section was then passed by a vote of 44 to 34.

We would commend to our readers, especially those of the Philadelphia bar to carefully consider the arguments contained in the speech of Mr. Biddle in favor of the system of courts for this city, proposed by the convention.

CONSTITUTIONAL RESTRAINTS UPON R. R. CORPORATIONS.

We have received an official pamphlet, containing the "proposed constitution of Pennsylvania, as passed second reading." The object of the publication of this document at the present time, is to bring the subject of the new constitution before the people in an accessible shape, thus enabling them to judge in an intelligent manner, of the merits and demerits of the work, as far as completed. Some of the provisions, those contained in the judiciary article, for instance, we have already laid before our readers, and others we intend to present from time to time, for their consideration. To-day we print the most important article of all, viz.: that upon railroads and canals. The subject is full of difficulties, as it involves one of the great problems of the day, to wit, How far to restrain the powers of corporations, so as to place them under proper control, and at the same time permit them to develop the resources of the State?

The convention has proceeded upon the assumption that the people of Pennsylvania are suffering manifold evils from the almost unlimited power of her gigantic railroad corporations, and that unless something is done to check this power and restrict the corporations within legitimate bounds, the people will become almost as slaves, compelled to do the bidding of a few great railroad kings. They have therefore endeavored to mould an article, strong enough to control these giants. As to how far they have succeeded, our readers can themselves determine. For our own part, we do not consider the railroad article as at all perfect, but on the whole it is the best that could be obtained under the circumstances. It remedies to a great extent the evils complained of by the people. We hardly think it is strong enough, but even as it is, it is something that is highly needed. Much clamor has been raised against it, but such clamor almost invariably comes from those pecuniarily interested in corporations. To the people at large it is a boon, and as such we should most heartily desire to see it a part of the new constitution.

The article is as follows:

ARTICLE —

Of Railroads and Canals.

SECTION 1. Any individual, partnership or corporation, organized for the purpose, shall have the right to construct and operate a railroad or canal between any two points in this State; any railroad may intersect and connect with any other railroad, and may pass its cars, empty or loaded, over such other railroad, and no discrimination shall be made in passenger or freight tolls, and tariffs on persons or property, passing from one railroad to another, and no unnecessary delay interposed in the forwarding of such passengers and property to their destination; the Legislature shall, by general law prescribing reasonable regulations, give full effect to these powers and rights.

SECT. 2. Every railroad or canal corporation organized or doing business in this State shall maintain an office therein where transfers of its stock shall be made, and books kept for inspection by any stock or bondholder, or any other person having any pecuniary interest in such corporation, in which shall be recorded the amount of capital stock subscribed or paid in, and by whom, the names of the owners of its stock and the amounts owned by them, respectively, the transfers of said stock, and the names and places of residence of its officers.

SECT. 3. The property of railroad and canal corporations, or other corporations of a similar character doing business in this State, and other joint stock companies now existing or hereafter created, shall forever be subject to taxation, and the power to tax the same shall not be surrendered or suspended by any contract or grant to which the State shall be a party.

SECT. 4. No railroad, canal or other corporation, nor the lessees, purchasers or managers of any railroad or canal corporation, shall consolidate the stock, property or franchises of such corporation with, nor lease, purchase, or in any way control any other railroad or canal corporation, owning or having under its control a parallel or competing line, nor shall any of the officers of such railroad or canal corporation act as an officer of any other railroad or canal corporation owning or having the control of a parallel or competing line; and whether railroads or canals are parallel and competent lines, shall always be decided by a jury in a trial according to the course of the common law.

SECT. 5. No incorporated company doing the business of a common carrier shall, directly or indirectly, prosecute or engage in mining or manufacturing articles for transportation over the works of said company; nor shall such company, directly or indirectly, engage in any other business than that of common carriers, or hold or acquire lands, freehold or leasehold, directly or indirectly, except such as shall be necessary for carrying on its business; but any mining or manufacturing company may carry the products of its mines and manufactories on its railroad or canal not exceeding fifty miles in length.

SECT. 6. Presidents, directors, officers, agents and other employees of railroad and canal companies, shall not engage or be interested, directly or indirectly, otherwise than as stockholders in such railroad or canal companies, in the transportation of freight or passengers, as common carriers, over the works of any company of which they are presidents, directors, officers, agents or employees, and they shall not so engage or be interested in the transportation of freight or passengers over the works of any other such company, except as stockholders in such company which may be leased, or the majority of the capital stock of which may be owned or controlled by the company of which they are presidents, directors, officers, agents or employees.

SECT. 7. No corporation engaged in the transportation of freight or passengers in or through this State shall make any discriminations in charges for the carriage of either freight or passengers, between or against the people thereof, nor make a higher charge for a shorter distance than for a longer distance, including such shorter distance, and no special rates or drawbacks shall, either directly or indirectly, be allowed, excepting excursion and commutation tickets. Reasonable extra rates within the limits of the charter of a company may be made in charges for any distance not exceeding fifty miles.

SECT. 8. All railroads and canals are declared public highways, and all individuals, partnerships and corporations shall have equal right to have persons and property transported thereon, except as above excepted, and all regulations adopted by the companies owning, controlling or managing such railroads or canals, having the effect of hindering or discriminating against individuals, partnerships or corporations, except as above excepted, in the transportation of property on such railroads and canals shall be void, and no railroad corporation, nor any lessee or manager of the works thereof, shall make any preference in their own favor or between individuals, partnerships and companies shipping and transporting thereon, in furnishing cars or motive power.

SECT. 9. All discriminations made by railroad companies, being common carriers, in their rates of freights, or passage over their roads, in favor of transportation companies or others engaged in transportation, by abatement, drawback or otherwise, are hereby prohibited; and all contracts made with any transportation company or others engaged in the business of transportation, for carrying freights or passengers over any railroad within the State, at higher rates than those agreed upon by and between said railroad companies and transporters are hereby declared void.

SECT. 10. No railroad company shall grant free passes or passes at a discount, to any person except officers or employees of the company.

SECT. 11. No corporation shall issue stocks or bonds except for money, labor or property actually received; and all fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness shall be void; the stock and indebtedness of corporations shall not be increased except in pursuance of general law, nor without the consent of the persons holding the larger amount in value of the stock first obtained, at a meeting to be held after sixty days' notice given in pursuance of law.

SECT. 12. Municipal and other corporations and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use, shall make just compensation for property taken, injured or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of their works, highways or improvements, which compensation shall be paid or secured before such taking, injury or destruction.

SECT. 13. No street passenger railway shall be constructed within the limits of any city, borough or township, without the consent of its local authorities.

SECT. 14. No railroad, canal or other transportation company, in existence at the time of the adoption of this article, shall have any beneficial legislation by general or special laws, except on condition of complete acceptance of all the provisions of this article.

SECT. 15. The existing powers and duties of the Auditor General in regard to railroads, canals and other transportation companies, are hereby transferred to the Secretary of Internal Affairs, who shall have a general supervision over them, subject to such regulations and alterations as shall be provided by law; and in addition to the annual reports now required to be made, said Secretary may require special reports at any time upon any subject relating to the business of said companies from any officer or officers thereof.

TWENTY-FIRST JUDICIAL DIST.
Court of Common Pleas of Schuylkill County.

THE CO. OF SCHUYLKILL v. FREDERICK BUCKHOLTZ.

Judgment for want of an affidavit of defence may be taken against a surety for the payment of rent on a lease.

Motion for judgment for want of an affidavit of defence.

Opinion delivered by WALKER, J.

This was an action of debt, brought to recover $200 rent due on a written lease, dated —— March, 1872, given by the plaintiff to Jacob Griesel, of a house and lot in Pottsville, and on which the defendant, Frederick Buckholtz, was the security. The writing is attached to the lease, and is in these words:

"For a valuable consideration, I hereby become security for the payment of the above rent to the said lessor or assignees, as often as the same shall come due.

FREDERICK BUCKHOLTZ." [SEAL.]

Copies of the lease and the contract of the security were duly filed of record. There was no affidavit of defence made. The point here raised is, whether this is such an instrument of writing for the payment of money, upon which judgment may be taken for want of an affidavit of defence, under the act of 1851, P. L. p. 625, sec. 14. See Purdon's Dig., vol. 1, p. 495, pl. 13, and notes. There is a distinction in Pennsylvania between a surety and a guaranty, and the intent of the parties drawn from the language of the instrument must establish this. In this case we should construe the defendant to be surety. Monberger et al. v. Pott, 4 Harris, 9; Allen v. Hubert, 13 Wr. 259; see also Gilbert v. Henck, 6 C. 205.

The contract of the defendant is an absolute undertaking to pay the rent as it shall fall due, and the instrument is within the terms of the act of Assembly. Blackburn v. Boker, 1 P. L. J. Rep. 15–30. So, a guarantee of rent was held to be within the provision of the act. Girard Ins. Co. v. Finly, Troubat & Haly's Prac., vol. 1, part 1, p. 369 to 372. So also in forfeited recognizances. Harris v. Commonwealth, 11 C. 416. And it is only necessary to file a copy of the lease without statement or declaration, to entitle the plaintiff to judgment for want of an affidavit of defence. Frank v. Maguire, 6 Wright, 77; Dewey v. Dupuy, 2 W. & S. 553. We would also refer to the following as within the meaning of the words, "instruments of writing for the payment of money." Lukenbach v. Anderson, 11 Wr. 123; 6 Barr, 476; Bayard v. Gilaspy, 1 Miles, 256; Moore v. Fields, 6 Wr. 467; Hogg v. Charlton, 1 C. 200; Johnston v. Cowan, 9 P. F. S. 275. But the defendant has filed no affidavit, and it is in his power to deny or explain the claim. But he has done neither.

Judge Sargent, in Dewey v. Dupuy, 2 W. & S. 556, speaking of act of Assembly relative to affidavits of defence, says, "It would seem as if the Legislature intended that the propriety of entering judgment was to be tested, not so much on the plaintiff's claim, as by the defendant's affidavit." See also Sleeper v. Dougherty, 2 Wharton, 177; McConeghy v. Kirk, 18 P. F. S. 200. We are clearly of the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to his judgment. Motion granted.

F. W. Bechtel, Esq., for plaintiff.

A. W. Schalck, Esq., for defendant.

In re WILSON.—IN BANKRUPTCY.

SUSPENSION OF PAYMENT.

1. Single note sufficient.—The non-payment by a merchant for fourteen days, without legal excuse, of a single piece of commercial paper, is an act of bankruptcy, without reference to whether he is actually insolvent.
2. Solvency is no answer.—It is no answer to a petition in bankruptcy that the respondent is solvent, and the only justification for non-payment of commercial paper is a legal one, as that he was not liable upon it.
3. One of the objects of the bankrupt law was to compel merchants to pay their commercial paper as it fell due, under penalty of being adjudged bankrupts, if non-payment was continued without legal excuse for fourteen days.
4. Prima facie case sufficient.—In an involuntary petition it is not necessary to negative all the circumstances which might excuse the non-payment. For a rule to show cause, it is sufficient that a prima facie case be made. And where the petition alleged that the debtor had suspended payment on his commercial paper for more than fourteen days, and had not yet paid the same, that he was a merchant, and that the petitioners knew of no reason for the non-payment except the neglect or inability of the debtor: Held, it was prima facie an act of bankruptcy.—*Legal News.

Petition for review under the 2d section of the bankrupt act.

The original proceeding was a petition in bankruptcy filed by P. Vanvalkenburg & Co., against Guy Wilson, a merchant doing business in Chicago, alleging as an act of bankruptcy, that on the 2d of June, 1873, he suspended payment of his commercial paper, and had not resumed payment of the same within a period of fourteen days thereafter, nor at any time since. The commercial paper referred to was a promissory note for $509.79, due June 2d, 1873, and held by petitioners. The petition stated that they knew of no cause for the non-payment of this note except neglect or inability of the said Wilson. The affidavit accompanying the petition did not show any other act of bankruptcy, or that the respondent was actually insolvent.

On this petition the district judge made the following order:

"There being no sufficient evidence of actual insolvency, I do not deem it proper to enter a rule to show cause on this petition. I hold that suspension of payment for fourteen days on a single piece of paper, does not alone show insolvency. Petition dismissed."

The petitioners thereupon filed this petition for review.

McClellan & Hodges, for petitioners.

The application for the rule is ex parte, and the only question for the court to pass upon is, are the petition and accompanying depositions in due form, and do they properly allege an act of bankruptcy.

All matters of defence or in explanation can only be offered by the debtor in response to the rule, and any possible excuse the debtor may have, need not be anticipated and negatived by petitioner, and the suspension of a single piece of commercial paper by a merchant, and non-resumption for a period of fourteen days, is prima facie an act of bankruptcy. Opinion by DRUMMOND, J.

The 39th section of the bankrupt law as amended by the act of July 14th, 1870, declares that any one who "being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer or miner, has fraudulently stopped payment, or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days," has committed an act of bankruptcy, and might be adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one or more of his creditors.

The 39th section sets forth various acts which constitute bankruptcy, one clause of which has just been cited. There was a difference among judges as to the true construction of the original clause of the 39th section, and to remove this doubt it was amended by the act of 1870, and the question is now presented whether the petition does not bring the parties, both creditor and debtor, within this amended clause of the 39th section.

It has in several cases been stated that there may be a suspension of payment of commercial paper for a period of fourteen days, which does not of itself constitute an act of bankruptcy. For instance, the paper may not be valid, or there may be a set-off against it; or, from some cause, the party may not be legally bound to pay it. In such cases the courts have held that the suspension of payment does not constitute an act of bankruptcy, because in point of fact there is actually no indebtedness, or if there is, it is offset by an indebtedness on the other side, so that there is no legal obligation to pay.

The ground upon which the district judge decided the case was that the fact of one piece of commercial paper being unpaid was no sufficient proof of insolvency. The question then arises, whether on that ground can be based the refusal of a rule to show cause.

The point, it will be observed, is, whether a party has, prima facie upon the papers as they appear, committed an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the 39th section, and whether insolvency is an indispensable element entering into and constituting the act of bankruptcy. I think it is not.

The real question is, whether, being a merchant or trader, he has suspended payment of his commercial paper for fourteen days, within the meaning of the law. Of the various acts which the 39th section declares to constitute acts of bankruptcy, most of them do not refer to insolvency at all. For instance, the departure from the State, district or territory of which the debtor is an inhabitant, with intent to defraud his creditors, is an act of bankruptcy. Where a debtor conceals himself to avoid the service of [illegible] process in an action for the recovery [illegible] a debt or demand provable under the bankrupt act, he commits an act of bankruptcy. The concealing or removing any of his property to avoid its being attached, taken, or sequestered on legal process, is an act of bankruptcy. So with many other acts declared to constitute bankruptcy, as where the debtor has been actually imprisoned for more than seven days in a civil action founded on a contract for the sum of one hundred dollars or upward. In all these cases insolvency is not an element.

Then comes the further definition which the district judge has apparently applied by analogy to the particular circumstances of this case: "Or who being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency shall make any gift, grant, sale, conveyance," &c., &c.

Some of the courts have intimated that "suspension of payment" means a general suspension of payment, and not the suspension of payment of a single piece of commercial paper; and it is in carrying out that view that the district judge has held there must be an allegation of insolvency. But the question is, whether it is competent for a man, being a merchant, to suspend payment of any of his commercial paper, and bid a creditor defiance, and then to turn round and allege in answer to an application to declare him a bankrupt, that he is solvent and therefore a proceeding in bankruptcy cannot be instituted against him.

I hold that allegation to be no answer to a petition in bankruptcy under such circumstances. It is not enough for him to show as a reason why a decree in bankruptcy should not go against him, that he is solvent, and because of spite or caprice, or some other similar causes he does not choose to pay his commercial paper. The reason which alone can prevent the non-payment of commercial paper and its continuance for fourteen days, from constituting an act of bankruptcy, must be a legal reason, such as to enable a court to say that it is not within the scope and meaning of the bankrupt law, because the debtor was legally justified in not making payment.

Upon the face of this petition no legal reason appears for the non-payment of this commercial paper within fourteen days after maturity, and the petitioners say they know of none. If there is any legal reason, it is for the debtor to show it before the bankrupt court. prima facie a case is made out against the respondent, and the question of solvency or insolvency is not material.

A solvent merchant cannot, therefore, refuse to pay his commercial paper, and then defend himself from a petition in bankruptcy, on the ground that he is solvent. One of the very objects of the bankrupt law was to compel merchants to pay their commercial paper as it fell due, by holding over them the consequences of its non-payment, if continued for fourteen days.

I admit that I should prefer to have the rule different, because if a man is solvent he can be proceeded against in the ordinary way, but the bankrupt law has not so provided. Insolvency does not constitute an element of the act of bankruptcy in this case, as it does not in most of the cases set forth in the 39th section.

If it be said that we can suppose a suspension of payment of commercial paper for fourteen days, which does not constitute an act of bankruptcy, the answer is that it is not possible for the petitioner to recapitulate all the various circumstances which might negative any supposed case, and thereby exclude it from the operation of the bankrupt law.

The district judge has required an allegation of insolvency. Something else might be required to be negatively set forth in the petition, which, if it existed in point of fact, would show that the act was not one of bankruptcy.

We cannot, therefore, require that the petitioner should set forth by negative allegations, all the particular circumstances which by possibility might show the non-payment to be within the meaning of this clause of the bankrupt law. It is sufficient that a prima facie case is made upon the petition.

It is for the debtor to make explanation or defence.

Again, if it be said that the non-payment for the given period must be a "general" suspension, where is the line to be drawn? On how many pieces of commercial paper must payment be suspended in order to constitute an act of bankruptcy? The statute has not declared that suspension of payment on any particular number of notes or bills of exchange shall constitute an act of bankruptcy, but the language is, "commercial paper," and it will be found impracticable to adopt a rule which limits the non-payment to some certain number of notes or bills of exchange in order to constitute an act of bankruptcy.

For these reasons I think the order of the district judge was erroneous, and must be reversed; and that the petitioners are entitled to a rule to show cause.

THE FARMERS' MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF LANCASTER CO. v. FORNEY.

1. Loss having occurred between the sale and its confirmation by the Orphans' Court the legal title was in the heirs of A.—and the action on the policy was rightly brought in the name of the administrator to the use of the vendee.
2. The effect of an agreement to "only claim three-fourths of the actual loss," construed.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Lancaster county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered July 2d, 1873

It is clear both upon principle and authority, that by sale of the premises insured under the proceedings in the Orphans' Court, there was no such alienation before confirmation as avoided the policy; and the loss having occurred between the sale and the confirmation, the legal title was then in the heirs of Forney, and the action on the policy was rightly brought in the name of the administrator to the use of the vendee. Insurance Company v. Updegraff, 9 Harris, 548; Reed v. Lukens, 8 Wright, 200; Hill v. Cumberland Valley Mutual Protection Co., 9 P. F. Smith, 474.

It is equally clear that the vendee had sufficient interest to entitle him to give notice to the company of the loss. As was well remarked by the learned judge below, if the clause be literally taken, in case the member insured was dead at the time of the fire, no one could give notice.

His personal representative, succeeding to his legal right as covenantee, is a trustee for the heirs of the vendee, and either the trustee or the cestui que trust sufficiently represent the party for that purpose. In the case before us, it appeared that both joined in the notice, which was received by the secretary of the company without objection.

It must be conceded that there is some difficulty as to the legal construction of the agreement given in evidence, signed among others, by the insured member, Graybill B. Forney. This paper was drawn up in pursuance of certain resolutions of the directors of the insurance company, to a copy of which it is attached. The whole must be considered as one instrument, and be construed together. The principle intended to be adopted by the company, was that every member insured should stand his own insurer to the extent of one-fourth of any loss which should occur. This was for the safety of the company, to induce care as well as honesty on the part of the insured, as he must himself be a loser by every fire, and could not throw his entire loss upon the insurers. The sixteenth section of the by-laws had declared, that not more than three-fourths of the actual cash value of any building or property should be insured. In all cases of total loss, this accomplished the purpose. But it is evident, that when the loss was only a partial one, the insured might still claim his entire loss, provided it did not exceed the sum insured This was not their meaning, and it did not secure the result at which they aimed. The directors, therefore, adopted a resolution that, in all policies thereafter issued, it should be plainly stipulated and expressed that only three-fourths of the actual loss should be paid by the company, and also resolved that the assent of the holders of existing policies should be procured to this as the true construction of their contracts. The agreement, however, which was to carry out this last resolution, was not confined to the exact words of the directors, but added a clause which has given rise to the question here. By it the subscribers "agree that (to avoid all doubt and difficulty) in case any loss should occur to our respective properties by fire, we will only claim and receive three-fourths of the amount of the actual loss, provided three-fourths of the amount, as aforesaid, does not amount to more than three-fourths of the sum insured." It is plain that the insertion of this proviso was altogether unwarranted by the resolutions, and had the directors been so inclined, they might have repudiated the entire agreement in consequence of it. But they have approved it, and now insist that it is to be construed as if it had read, "provided, and it is further agreed, that in no case shall any more than three-fourths of the sum insured be paid." That is, if a person having exempli gratia, a property, the cash value of which is $4,000, has insured it according to the sixteenth by-law for $3.000, if the entire property is consumed by fire, he shall be entitled to receive, not three-fourths of his actual loss, namely, $3,000, but only $2,250. Yet if he suffers only a partial loss of $3,000, he shall still be entitled to recover the same sum of $2,250. Instead, then, of the insured being limited to three-fourths of his actual loss when his loss is total, on the construction now contended for, he is entitled only to three-fourths of three-fourths or nine-sixteenths, little more than one-half. This could not have been the intention of the parties, and it is not the proper grammatical construction, of the writing. A simple proviso, without other words extending its operation, so as to make it a distinct and independent covenant, is a condition on the performance of which the validity of the deed or writing depends. Wharton's Law Lexicon, adverbum. The agreement was not, therefore, to apply where three-fourths of the amount of the actual loss shall exceed three-fourths of the sum insured. In the case before us, three-fourths of the actual loss does amount to more than three-fourths of the sum insured. The agreement then is inapplicable. The insured is entitled to recover the whole sum insured, but as, by the sixteenth by-law, this is only three-fourths of the actual value, the spirit of the agreement is maintained. This must be so in every total loss, the sum insured being only three-fourths of the actual cash value, the loss must of necessity be more than three-fourths of the sum insured. We hold the agreement not to have been intended to reach the case of a total loss, already provided for sufficiently by the sixteenth by-law. It is to be observed also, that the agreement was executed to give a construction to the existing contracts, not to make an entirely new rule. It declares that it is "to avoid doubt or difficulty." Now, the construction of the contract in connection with the by-laws, was without doubt or difficulty, in case of total loss. The insured bore one-fourth of it, which upon a fair interpretation of the whole paper, resolutions and agreement, was what we think was intended. What the effect of the proviso may be in case of partial loss, is not now before us for determination. We express no opinion upon the subject. It is not easy to understand what the penman meant; it is certainly obscurely and unhappily expressed so as to convey any clear meaning. If I might hazard a conjecture (which, however, is entirely my own), it would be that by "sum insured," was meant the sum which was the basis of the insurance, in other words, the valuation of the premises in the policy, a change of phraseology which makes the whole simple and just. It perhaps occurred to the writer, that the broad words, "three-fourths of the actual loss," might entitle the insured to demand more than three-fourths of the valuation.

There can be no question that the offers of parol evidence to explain the writing were rightly rejected.

Judgment affirmed.

Supreme Court of Illinois.

JAMES E. TYLER, JOHN H. ULLMAN v. THE WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

1. Admitting the blank of the company upon which the message sued by the plaintiffs was sent, with the usual provision printed in it in regard to repeating messages was a contract, held, that it did not and could not exonerate the company from the use of ordinary care and diligence, both as to their instruments and the care and skill of their operators.
2. That a telegraph company cannot purchase exemption from gross negligence.
3. That it was the duty of the receiver of the message to telegraph to ascertain the correctness of the message; that the company was bound to send the message correctly in the first instance.
4. It is a sham and a delusion, and an imposition upon the public, who are compelled to resort to this agency in the transaction of their business. If it be a contract, the sender entering into it was under a species of moral duress—by a necessities compelled him to resort to the telegraph as the only means through which he could speedily transact the business in hand, and was compelled to submit to such conditions as the company in their corporate greed might impose, and sign such a paper as the company might present.
5. That as a party repeating a message and paying fifty per cent. additional therefor, cannot recover of the company to the extent of his loss, we are free to say such a contract, forced, as we have shown it is, upon the sender, is unjust, unconscionable, without consideration, and utterly void.
6. That the doctrine to benefit the public must be to establish that a mistake in transmission is prima facie evidence of negligence, and the burden is on the company to show the contrary; that if these companies rely upon a contract as restricting their liability, it is incumbent on them to show a valid contract, freely entered into by the sender of the message, and for a valuable consideration paid by the company or acknowledged by the sender; that even such contract will not relieve the company from gross negligence.

Appeal from the Superior Court of Chicago.

Opinion by BREESE, J. Delivered February 7th, 1873.

This was an action of assumpsit to recover damages of the Western Union Telegraph Company for alleged carelessness in transmitting a dispatch for appellants from Chicago to the city of New York. The delivery of the message at the company's office in Chicago to the operator there, by one of the plaintiffs, is alleged, and proper averments of negligence and carelessness on the part of the company are found in the declaration, and proper averments of damage.

The defendant pleaded non-assumpsit, with notice of special matter.

It appears the message was written on one of the blanks prepared by the company, which contained the following stipulations:

"In order to guard against, and correct, as much as possible, some of the errors arising from atmospheric and other causes appertaining to telegraphy, every important message should be repeated by being sent back from the station at which it is to be received, to the station from which it is originally sent. Half the usual price will be charged for repeating the message, and the companies will not hold themselves responsible for errors or delays in the transmission or delivery, nor for the non-delivery of repeated messages beyond two hundred times the sum paid for sending the message, unless a special agreement for insurance be made in writing, and the amount of risk specified on this agreement, and paid at the time of sending the message. Nor will these companies be responsible for any error or delay in the transmission or delivery, or for the non-delivery of any unrepeated message, beyond the amount paid for sending the same, unless, in like manner, specially insured, and amount of risks stated hereon, and paid for at the time.

"No liability is assumed for errors in cypher or obscure messages, nor for any error or neglect by any other company over whose lines this message may be sent to reach its destination, and these companies are hereby made the agents of the sender of this message to forward it over the lines extending beyond those of these companies. No agent or employee is allowed to vary these terms, or make any other verbal agreement, nor any promise as to the time of performance, and no one but a superintendent is authorized to make a special agreement for insurance. These terms apply through the whole course of this message on all lines by which it may be transmitted.

The message, when written, and as delivered to the operator at Chicago, read as follows: "Dated Chicago, October 29th, 1866. To J. H. Wrenn, or at A. T. Brown. Sell one hundred (100) Western Union. Answer price. T., U. & Co." As delivered to Wrenn in New York, the message read as follows: "Dated Chicago, Illinois, to J. H. Wrenn, care Gilman, Son & Co. Sell one thousand (1,000) Western Union. Answer price. T., U. & Co."

It is averred in the declaration that Wrenn understood the words "one hundred Western Union," to mean one hundred shares in the Western Union Telegraph Company, which number of shares, it appears the banking house of plaintiffs was then carrying for a customer.

On receipt of the message, Wrenn sold one thousand shares of this stock, and to do so, was obliged to go into the market and purchase nine hundred shares, to replace which he had to buy on a rising market the same number of shares, so that the difference in the selling and buying price amounted to seven hundred and twenty-nine dollars and seventy-seven cents, which amount was wholly lost to the plaintiffs.

The court, on its own motion, having refused instructions asked by plaintiffs, charged the jury as follows:

"The dispatch in question in this case being sent upon one of the printed blanks of defendants, the printed heading of that blank constitutes a contract between the parties, by the terms of which both parties are bound, and as one of these terms is, that the defendants are not liable for any error in the transmission of an unrepeated message beyond the amount paid for sending the same, the plaintiff can only recover that amount, with interest on the same from the time it was paid to this time, in this suit. Transmission means all that happens between the receipt of the dispatch here from the plaintiffs and its delivery to them in New York."

It was admitted the message in question was not repeated. The jury found for the plaintiffs, assessing their damages at two dollars and sixty cents, being the cost of the message, with interest. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and judgment rendered on the verdict, to reverse which the plaintiffs appeal, and make several points, one of which is, the refusal of the instructions asked by them on the trial of the cause.

Those instructions are as follows:

"If the jury believe from the evidence, that the dispatch sent by Tyler, Ullman & Co., to John H. Wrenn, on the 29th day of October, 1866, was erroneously and negligently read by the operator in Chicago, and that said dispatch was transmitted to said Wrenn in the words as received by him, on account, and as the result of such erroneous and negligent reading by the operator in Chicago, then the verdict must be for the plaintiffs, if they suffered pecuniary loss by such error and negligence.

"If they believe from the evidence, that the dispatch sent by Tyler, Ullman & Co. to John H. Wrenn, on the 29th day of October, 1866, was correctly transmitted from Chicago to New York, and was correctly received in New York, at the office of the said defendants, yet if they believe from the evidence that said dispatch, although correctly received by defendants, was erroneously and negligently transcribed by their agents in New York, and was delivered by said agents to said Wrenn, so erroneously and negligently transcribed, and that such error caused any pecuniary loss and damage to the plaintiffs, then the verdict must be for the plaintiffs.

"If they believe from the evidence, that a mistake was made in transmitting the message, through the gross negligence of defendants or their servants, and that plaintiffs suffered damage by reason of such mistake in transmitting said message, the defendants are responsible for such damage, although the jury may believe from the evidence, that plaintiffs used one of the forms of defendants, having the terms printed at the top, as shown by the form copied in the notice accompanying defendant's plea, and that said plaintiffs asserted and agreed to such terms and did not require said message to be repeated, or its correct transmission insured.

"The plaintiffs were not bound by the terms printed at the top of the forms commonly used by defendants, as set out in the form copied in defendants' notice accompanying their plea, if they delivered their message to defendants for transmission by telegraph, and defendants accepted it for that purpose without plaintiffs' consent or agreement to be bound by such terms."

These instructions, in connection with that given by the court, open up the merits of this controversy, and we have given to the question raised by them full consideration. It is a case of the first impression in this court, requiring us to examine all the authorities cited, and such others as are within our reach, and we find them not entirely harmonious.

It is contended by appellants that telegraph companies are common carriers, and under the same common law liabilities.

In the earlier cases reported, they were so held. McAndrew v. The Electric Telegraph Company, 33 Eng., L. & E. R., decided in 1855. It was also held they could restrict their liability by contract, and that the paper containing the message, signed by the plaintiff, which was identical with the one in this case, was such contract. They were also held to be common carriers in Parks v. Alta Cal. Telegraph Co., 13 Cal. 422, decided in 1859. The counsel for the company argued against this proposition, and contended that the rules of the common law governing common carriers did not apply to telegraph companies. He insisted they could not be regarded as insurers, for the reason that a message is without value.

The court said there was no difference in the general nature of the legal obligation of the contract between carrying a message along a wire and carrying goods or a package along a route. The physical agency may be different, but the essential nature of the contract is the same. The breach of contract in one case or the other is, or may be, attended with the same consequences, and the obligation to perform the stipulated duty is the same in both cases. The importance of the discharge of it in both respects is the same. In both cases the contract is binding, and the responsibility of the parties for the breach of duty is governed by the same general rules.

Strong reasons might be urged in favor of holding these companies to the severe liability of common carriers, but the current of authority, at this time, is not, as admitted by appellants, in that direction. While their liability is held to be analogous to that of common carriers, who are insurers of the safe delivery of the articles intrusted to them, it is considered, in view of the means employed by telegraph companies to transmit messages, and their liability to sudden accidents which cannot be foreseen and provided against, to hold them as insurers of the safe delivery of every message intrusted to them, would be too rigid a rule. Cases so holding, hold, nevertheless, that they are liable for a failure to exercise the highest degree of diligence and skill in the performance of their duty. The case of Rittenhouse v. The Independent Line of Telegraph, 44 New York, 263, is one of this description. There it was held, the failure to transmit a message in the form in which it was received by the operator, was prima facie negligence, for which the company is liable, and the onus is on the company to show the mistake occurred by no fault of their own. This case came up from the Court of Common Pleas, and is reported in 1 Daly, 474, and was an unrepeated message. To the same effect is New York and Washington Printing Telegraph Company v. Dryburg, 35 Penn. 298. This action was in tort, and brought by the receiver of the message. The court say, the wrong of which the plaintiff complained consisted in sending him a message different from that which they had contracted with Le Roy to send. That it was a wrong, is as certain as that it was their duty to transmit the message for which they were paid. Though telegraph companies are not, like carriers, insurers for the safe delivery of what is intrusted to them, their obligations, as far as they reach, spring from the same sources, the public nature of their employment, and the contract under which the particular duty is assumed. One of the plainest of their obligations is, to transmit the very message received. They further say, the company claimed that their operator was a skilful and careful one. Then his negligence in this instance was the more apparent and inexcusable. In Elwood et al. v. The Western Union Telegraph Company, 45 New York, 549, the court said, the agent was placed in the office and in the control of the instruments to use them in transmitting messages for a compensation. If the agent performed the duty in a negligent manner, whereby the plaintiff was injured, the principal is clearly liable. Transactions of the most important character are daily carried on by means of telegraphic communication, and the confidence which the public is invited to and does repose in the care with which the proprietors of these lines conduct the business, is a source of large remuneration to such proprietors. They have a corresponding degree of responsibility, and must be held to the exercise of such care and caution as it is in their power to employ, in order to avoid being made the instrument of deception and fraud.

Another class of cases holds these companies are bound to the exercise of reasonable diligence and skill. Washington and New Orleans Telegraph Company v. Hobson & Son, 15 Grattan, 122. In this case the declaration did not allege negligence on the part of the company, and one instruction, that the defendants were not responsible as common carriers, but only as general agents, for such gross negligence as in law amounts to fraud, was not authorized by the pleadings, and was properly refused. In Ellis v. The American Telegraph Company, 13 Allen, 226, the court said, it would be manifestly unreasonable and unjust to annex to a business of such a nature the liability of a common carrier, or to require that those engaged in it should assume the risk of loss and damage arising from causes the operation of which they could neither prevent nor control. But although they ought not to be held to such a standard of diligence, they are not exempt from all responsibility for a want of fidelity and care in the exercise of the employment which they undertake to carry on. There can be no doubt that, in the ordinary employments and occupations of life, men are bound to the use of due and reasonable care, and are liable for the consequences of carelessness or negligence in the conduct of their own business to those sustaining loss or damage thereby. We can see no reason why this rule is not applicable to the business of transmitting messages by telegraph. The court then comments on the efficacy of the regulation of the company requiring a message to be repeated, and hold it is a reasonable regulation. In Western Union Telegraph Company v. Carew, 15 Mich. 525, the court say, this is not a case which calls upon us for laying down the rule which must be held to govern as to the degree of skill, care and diligence to be required in the transmission of messages. But doubtless the use of good apparatus and instruments would be required, and reasonable skill, and a high—perhaps the very highest—degree of care and diligence in their operation; and when an error has occurred in the transmission of a message, it may be found that they ought to be held prima facie guilty of negligence, the onus of proof resting upon them to show diligence, the means for doing this being peculiarly within their knowledge and power. Other cases on this point might be cited: Birney v. New York and Washington Telegraph Company, 18 Md. 341; Breese et al. v. United States Telegraph Company, 45 Barb. 275. All these cases hold, as do the following, that these companies may limit or modify their common law liability by stipulations, such as given in evidence in this case. Wann v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 37 Mo. 472; Camp v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 1 Met. (Ky.) 164. This last case holds, when a message is not repeated it will be regarded as sent at the risk of the sender, and the company will not be liable for damages resulting from a mistake not occasioned by negligence or the want of skill of the agents of the company.

An examination of the decided cases shows that the law applicable to telegraph companies is in an unsettled condition. It must, however, be conceded, that there is great harmony in the decisions that these companies can protect themselves from loss by contract, and that such a regulation as the one under which appellees defended, is a reasonable regulation, and amounts to a contract.

We are not entirely satisfied with the conclusion announced in some of these decisions. Whether the paper furnished by the company, on which a message is written and signed by the sender, is a contract or not, depends on circumstances. In an analogous case in this court, Adams Express Company v. Haynes, 42 Ill. 19, and in Ill. C. R. Co. v. Frankenberg et al., 54 Ib. 88, it was held, the simple delivery of a receipt to the shipper is not conclusive upon the latter. Whether he had knowledge of its terms, and assented to its restrictions, is for the jury to determine as a question of fact, upon evidence, aliunde, and all the circumstances attending the giving the receipt are admissible in evidence to enable the jury to decide that fact. The receipt given by the company in this case was declared on its face to be a contract, and was as full for such purpose in the terms employed as is the form in the case now before us. It was a question for the jury in that case, but in this case the court undertook to determine the question and decide the fact. We think this was error. We do not see why the same rule should not apply to telegraph companies as is applied to express companies and railroad companies. In regard to the latter, it is always held, whether or not such a regulation was brought to the notice of the shipper so as to fix knowledge upon him, to be a fact for the jury. Brown v. Eastern R. R. Company, 11 Cushing, 97. Slight evidence of acceptance or assent to such regulation would, no doubt, suffice, but it is for the jury to determine.

In the various and somewhat conflicting decisions of the courts on the question presented, we are inclined to hold, admitting the paper signed by the plaintiffs was a contract, it did not, and could not, exonerate the company from the use of ordinary care and diligence, both as to their instruments and the care and skill of their operators. The plaintiffs having proved the inaccuracy of the message, the defendants, to exonerate themselves, should have shown how the mistake occurred. This proof was not in the power of the plaintiffs, and was in the power of the defendants. In the absence of such proof the jury would be authorized to presume a want of ordinary care on the part of defendants. If the error was caused by atmospheric disturbances, or a momentary displacement of the wires, the defendants knew it, and ought to show it. In the absence of any proof on their part, the jury should be told the presumption was, a want of ordinary care on the part of the company. The court, however, refused to instruct the jury that the company was liable for gross negligence. It is the settled doctrine of this court that a railroad company cannot purchase exemption from gross negligence, or protect itself against such; that it would be against public policy so to contract. We see no reason why the rule should not be the same in regard to telegraph companies, for they are, like railroads, public institutions, having duties to perform to the public. On general principles, we must hold the company, notwithstanding the special conditions relied upon, is responsible for mistakes happening by its own fault, such as defective instruments, or carelessness, or unskilfulness of their operators, but not for mistakes occasioned by uncontrollable causes. Sweatland v. Ill. and Miss. Telegraph Company, 27 Iowa, 433. This company sought the patronage of the public in the exercise of their employment, and assured that public they would use at least ordinary care and diligence in their business, both as to their instruments, and as to the skill of their operators. It cannot be claimed the contract in question was designed to relieve them from that, nor should it. They assure the public they have the most approved instruments and employ skilful operators, and they further assure the public that due care and diligence shall be exercised in conducting their business. If the conditions relied upon were designed to shield the company from consequences flowing from a want of skill of operators, or insufficiency of instruments, which would be gross negligence, such a condition would be contrary to public policy, and void. The pretext for imposing the conditions in question is, "to guard against, and correct as much as possible, some of the errors arising from atmospheric and other causes appertaining to telegraphy," &c. In these "other causes," it cannot be allowed to embrace defective instruments or unskilful operators, for the company are bound by their obligations to the public to provide the best, certainly to provide operators of sufficient skill and intelligence, and instruments of the most approved construction. "Other causes" must mean only such causes as appertain, specially, to the business of telegraphy. Defective apparatus, and unskilful operators, appertain to business and public employments, other than telegraphy.

A railroad company cannot be excused on failing to employ competent engines, and servants to manage and conduct them and the trains to which they are attached. If a loss happens by reason of insufficient engines, or by the incompetency of their employees, they are liable. We cannot hold that the printed conditions in evidence in this case protect this company from losses and damage occasioned by causes wholly within their own control. They must be confined to mistakes due to the infirmities of telegraphy, and which are unavoidable.

A point is made by appellees that the negligence of appellants materially contributed to the loss incurred. This is a question of fact for the jury, and if it is established they cannot recover.

But we fail to discover any evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs. And as to the receiver of the message, it was not his duty to telegraph back to ascertain the correctness of the message. The company was bound to send the message correctly in the first instance.

It is urged by appellees' counsel, in his comments on the instructions asked by plaintiffs below, that the first two were properly refused by the court, for the reason there was no evidence on which to base them. There may have been no direct testimony on this point, but a jury is permitted to infer a fact from circumstances proved to them. It was in proof by John H. Wrenn, and not attempted to be contradicted or questioned, that so soon as he received a telegram from Chicago, which he did on the 30th of October, stating that an error had been committed, and ordering him to cover the extra nine hundred shares, he went immediately to the office of the company in New York, and asked them to correct it. They told him the error had not occurred at their office but in Chicago. We think the attention of the jury was properly called by these instructions to this testimony, as it was not contradicted. It was in the power of the defendants to show the mistake did not occur at the Chicago office, by producing the original, which was in their possession. This they failed to do. If the fact was, the error occurred in the Chicago office, then the plaintiff's right to recover is unquestionable, for there is no excuse for failing to start a message correctly. That fact would show a defective instrument or an unskilful operator, and for these the company would not be exonerated.

Another point is made by appellees, not undeserving notice, and that is, the want of knowledge on the part of the company, of the importance or value of the message. It is a sufficient answer to this to say, that be a message of great or trifling importance, the company is bound to transmit it literally, at least, according to some of the authorities, to use the highest degree of skill and care in their efforts so to do. But the dispatch disclosed the nature of the business as fully as the case demanded. A similar case is reported in 55 Penn. 262, United States Telegraph Company v. Wenger. The dispatch was, "Buy fifty (50) Northwestern, fifty (50) Prairie du Chien, limit forty-five (45)." It was held, this dispatch disclosed the nature of the business to which it related, and that a loss might occur if it was delayed. In this case a great loss has occurred by incorrect transmission.

As to the point that appellees should have had an opportunity to replace the stock before Wrenn went into the market for that purpose, it is apparent from Wrenn's testimony the company had such opportunity, for he testifies he went to them in New York and requested them to correct the error. On their refusal, on the pretext that the error occurred at the Chicago office, he then purchased.

We have carefully read and considered all that has been written on the subject of the art of telegraphy which our libraries can furnish, and we are not satisfied with the grounds on which a majority of the decisions of respectable courts are placed.

In the first place, modern telegraphy is not now an infant art. It sprang into existence from the teeming brain of one now no more, who had the boldness to attempt to render subservient to the wants of man the most subtle element of nature, and by its mysterious potency convey ideas, wants and wishes to the farthest limits of civilization, and with the speed of its kindred element. In its infancy it scarcely ever failed to perform its office. Thirty years have witnessed vast improvements in the art, a higher knowledge of the subtle agent called into use, more finished instruments, and almost perfect skill in those who operate them, so that setting aside atmospheric causes, which have not yet been provided against, it may be asserted as an incontestable truth, that given a line of wire properly established, the most perfect instruments, and skilled operators, who exercise their skill with proper care, a message started at Chicago for New York, is as sure to reach its destination, exactly in the words and figures in which it was started, as the lightning is sure to strike the object which attracts it. Intelligent and skilful operators all admit this. There is no reason, the atmosphere being right, and all else right, why a message correctly started, should not be correctly transmitted along the line to the end of the line, no matter how many hundred miles asunder may be the point of its departure from the point of its reception. If this be so, then the efforts made by the courts to excuse those who undertake this business should not be imitated or encouraged by this court. Again, it is said by enlightened courts whose opinions we have quoted, that these forms furnished by the several companies, and they are all alike, when used by the sender of a message, and signed by him, become a contract between him and the company, by the terms of which he must abide. The court told the jury in so many words, that this form signed by appellants, was a contract between these parties, by which their liability must be gauged. We have, in this opinion, said something on this point—that it was for the jury to determine whether it was, or not, a contract knowingly executed by the party, with the intention to be bound by it. We now desire to say it is not a contract binding in law for these reasons. Our statute makes it the duty of telegraph companies to transmit all messages committed to them for purposes of transmission, in the order in which they are received; they are bound by law to serve all who apply; they are public institutions established by public law, and to whom is granted the right of eminent domain. Persons who unlawfully injure or molest, or destroy any of their lines, posts, piers, etc., on conviction are deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and liable to fine, or imprisonment in the penitentiary, or both. Failing to transmit a message, or suppressing a message, or making known its contents to any one other than the party to whom it is addressed, is deemed a misdemeanor, and punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars. By section 4 of the act, such companies have the power to purchase, receive and hold such real estate as may be necessary, &c., and may appoint such directors, officers and agents, and employ such servants, and make such prudential rules, regulations and by-laws, as may be necessary in the transaction of the business, not inconsistent with the laws of this State or of the United States. Laws of 1849, p. 188. This act imposes upon these companies duties to perform to the public, which they must perform, nolens volens. For their performance they are entitled to a reasonable compensation, the tariff of which they adjust themselves, under the power granted by the fourth section. When this tariff is paid by the sender of a message, the duty of the company begins. This payment is the consideration for the performance of its duty in each particular case. On the assumption, then, that it is the duty of the company to transmit correctly the message for which they have received compensation, where, in law, arises any obligation on the part of the sender to repeat the message? The fact is conceded that a telegraph company is the servant of the public, and bound to act whenever called upon, their charges being paid or tendered. They are in that respect like common carriers, the law imposing upon them a duty which they are bound to discharge. The extent of their liability is to transmit correctly the message as delivered. This is conceded. But it is decided by all the courts that a common carrier can by contract restrict this liability. The argument is that the condition for repeating is such a restriction, and, being in writing, and signed by the sender, is, to all intents and purposes, binding upon him as a contract. The question at once arises, where is the consideration for this contract? It does not move from the company; on the contrary, they demand of the sender of the message fifty per centum in addition for repeating—for assuring the faithfulness of their own conduct. We fail to perceive any consideration whatever on which to base this so-called contract. It is not a contract of any legal or binding force. This court said, in Illinois Central Railroad Company v. Morrison et al., 19 Ills. 136, that a common carrier might restrict his common law liability by a contract fairly made with the shipper. In that case the contract was special and under seal, and for which the railroad company paid a valuable consideration by reduction of the freight charges. That was a binding contract, for value. The one in question is not so, and does not possess one of the essential elements of a valid and binding contract, namely, a consideration. It is a sham and a delusion, and an imposition upon the public, who are compelled to resort to this agency in the transaction of their business. If it be a contract, the sender entering into it was under a species of moral duress; his necessities compelled him to resort to the telegraph as the only means through which he could speedily transact the business in hand, and was compelled to submit to such conditions as the company, in their corporate greed, might impose, and sign such a paper as the company might present. "Prudential rules and regulations," such as the company is authorized by statute to establish, cannot be understood to embrace such regulations as shall deprive a party of the use of their instrumentality, save by coming under most onerous and unjust conditions.

But it is said, a special agreement might have been made for insurance, in writing. To do this, the amount of risk must be specified in the contract, and paid at the time of sending the message, and as there is but one person in the world—a superintendent—authorized to make a contract of insurance, he must be hunted up, and the terms negotiated, all which require time, and a favorable opportunity to the sender be irretrievably lost. At Chicago, or other large cities, where a superintendent is supposed to be, there might not be much loss, but we are declaring the law for the whole State, and it is well known that at subordinate, though important, stations on telegraph lines, superintendents are not to be found. This provision is to such perfectly valueless. As a party repeating a message and paying fifty per cent. additional therefor, cannot recover of the company to the extent of his loss, we are free to say such a contract, forced, as we have shown it is, upon the sender, is, in our opinion, unjust, unconscionable, without consideration, and, utterly void.

The remaining question is, as to the damages. As this case must be tried again, it is necessary some rule should be prescribed by which the damages are to be estimated. As a general principle, every person and corporation ought to make good all damages occasioned by his or their default. But it is not always easy in cases of this kind to state a general rule. It has been said, and very properly, that the great difficulty in such cases is, to distinguish between the right to recover, and the amount to be recovered, the line, dividing these two branches of the law sometimes vanishing entirely. The best reflection we have been able to bestow on this branch of the case, prompts us to say, the rule adopted in the United States Telegraph Company v. Wenger, supra, in a similar case, is a reasonable rule. The message in that case ordered a purchase of stock, which advanced in price between the time the message should have arrived and the time it was purchased under another order. The advance in price was held to be the measure of damages. That message, as this, disclosed to the agent of the telegraph company the nature of the business to which it related—in this case, to sell a certain number of shares of stock.

If appellants were compelled to, and did, purchase nine hundred shares of this stock to replace the stock so sold by reason of the carelessness of this company, and that, in the interval, between the selling one thousand shares and the re-purchase by Wrenn of the nine hundred shares, to replace the extra number of shares sold, and that stock had advanced in price, this advance should be the measure of damages. It is reasonable to suppose this is what both parties had in view, when the message was committed to the care of the appellees.

In looking at these conditions prescribed by telegraph companies, this one in particular, but they do not differ essentially from those of other like companies, we are forcibly impressed with the belief that they are designed to relieve themselves from all responsibility. Content to receive the money of the sender, they design to escape all responsibility. Such conditions are unreasonable, and ought not to receive the sanction of any court. We have said, and we repeat, that there is no reason, apart from atmospheric causes, why a message should not be transmitted precisely as received. The art is reduced to a certainty. That courts should not be swift to exempt these companies from liability, is a dictate of public policy. To such perfection has the art reached, that in the last thirty years in which electric telegraphs have been operated, we have been unable to find among the reported cases in this country and in England, more than fifty instituted against these companies for losses occasioned by their negligence. The messages sent by them in this time have amounted to millions. Under these circumstances, their bold claim to exemption should meet with no favor from the courts. The doctrine, to benefit the public, must be, as we have endeavored to establish, that a mistake in transmission is prima facie evidence of negligence, and the burden is on the company to show the contrary. If these companies rely upon contract, as restricting their liability, it is incumbent on them to show a valid contract, freely entered into by the sender of the message, and for a valuable consideration paid by the company or acknowledged by the sender. But even such contract will not relieve the company from gross negligence. On the most mature reflection, aided by all the light shed upon this subject, we are at a loss to understand upon what principle telegraph companies should be accorded immunity for their torts, or be relieved from the liabilities voluntarily assumed by them. If they desire to restrict their liability, it must be done by a contract fairly and knowingly entered into, and for a valuable consideration.

Holding these views, the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.—Chicago Legal News.

District Court of Phil'a.

GERETY v. READING RAILROAD COMPANY.

The plaintiff having been nonsuited in a former action, brought another action for the same cause against the same defendants; upon application, proceedings were stayed until the costs of the former action were paid.

Rule to stay proceedings.

Opinion by THAYER, J. Delivered September 15th, 1873.

The plaintiff having brought an action in this court, and failing upon the trial to make out his case, was nonsuited by the court. He then commenced another action against the same defendants for the same cause, without having paid the costs of the former action, thereupon the defendants took the present rule. The practice of courts in staying proceedings in a second action for the same cause between the same parties, where the plaintiff has failed in his first suit, until he shall have paid the costs of that suit, is a very beneficial one, and too well settled to admit of any doubt. It is founded upon the necessary control which courts of justice have over their own proceedings, and their duty to prevent them from being made the means of oppression and vexation. 3 Wilson, 149; 2 Wm. Bl. 741; 1 Tidd's Pr. 94; 2 T. R. 501, n.; Beames on Costs, 209. It is a practice which, as has been well said, is convenient and just in all the aspects in which it can be viewed. Whatever may have been its origin, it is not confined to actions of ejectment, but applies equally to all forms of action. Nor is it confined to cases in which there has been a trial on the merits. It is applicable also to cases of nonsuits; Nevitt v. Lade, 3 Doug. 396; and to cases of discontinuance, non pros., and judgment on demurrer. Neither will a slight variation in the names of the parties make any difference; Lamply v. Sands, 1 Tidd's Pr. 539; or the fact that the first action was in another court. All these points have, in other places, been settled in various decisions. In Pennsylvania, by a happy coincidence, they have all been determined in one, for in Flemming v. The Pennsylvania Insurance Company, 4 Barr, 475, an order for a stay of proceedings until the costs of a former action should be paid, was made in a case where the action was upon a policy of insurance, where the former action was in a different court, and was ended by a compulsory nonsuits, after the plaintiff had gone through his evidence, and where there was a slight variation in the parties to the two actions. The justice and propriety of such orders can, therefore, no longer be open to question in this State. There may be, sometimes, cases of hardship, in which this restraint would not be put upon a plaintiff. It rests in the discretion of the court, and a refusal to exercise this power is not assignable for error: Withers v. Haines, 2 Barr, 435. In the present case we see nothing to exempt the plaintiff from the operation of the usual practice.

Rule absolute.

Alexander Dallas Campbell, Esq., for defendants.

David Sellers, Esq., for plaintiff.

IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

The Constitutional Convention, now in session in this city, have in several cases, found themselves restricted by the provision of the United States Constitution (art. i., sect. 10) prohibiting a State from passing any law "impairing the obligation of contracts." The Convention found that the Legislature had conferred, by means of charters granted, immense powers and privileges, which the corporations possessing them claimed could not be taken away or restricted, by reason of their being protected by the clause of the United States Constitution referred to. These powers and privileges being in many instances highly injurious to the well-being of the people of the commonwealth, it was felt to be a serious want of power, in being unable directly to restrict them. The Convention, however, feeling that something must be done to place within the proper control of the State certain great corporations, that towered giant-like among the others, passed a section which declared as follows:

"No railroad, canal or other transportation company, in existence at the time of the adoption of this article, shall have any beneficial legislation by general or special laws, except on condition of complete acceptance of all the provisions of this article."

It was our purpose in drawing attention to this important section, to lay before our readers some of the arguments, pro and con, which were submitted in the convention. In accordance with that purpose, we print to-day some extracts from the debates which took place in that body. We invite especial attention to Mr. Biddle's argument.

"Mr. Cuyler. This section is the embodied threat of the commonwealth to her railroad companies, that if they will not give up their vested rights protected by the Constitution of the United States, they are to have no further favors from the commonwealth, for that is simply what it amounts to. It simply amounts to saying to existing corporations who have their rights by authority of law, protected by contract, "unless you give them up without compensation being made to you for the rights that are taken away, we will deny you the rights of citizens of this commonwealth." The proposition is perfectly monstrous. It is beneath the dignity of the commonwealth; it is beneath the dignity of the convention; it has no proper place in our organic law, and I trust gentlemen will consider very carefully before they vote in favor of any such proposition.

Mr. Campbell. Mr. Chairman: I think this is a very good section, and I hope it will pass. Several of the gentlemen who have spoken upon the report of the railroad committee, have stated that they opposed a number of the sections of the report, because, whilst they considered them good in themselves, especially if they could be applied to all railroad corporations now existing, or to be hereafter incorporated, yet their adoption would only be placing more power in the hands of certain large corporations of this State, by giving to those corporations a monopoly of the enormous privileges which they now possess, and preventing any future corporations from competing with them.

Now, this section proposes to say to the large corporations or monopolies referred to: "You have obtained from the Legislature certain rights and privileges that have enabled you to become great monopolies—injurious to the commonwealth—you say we cannot get from you any of the franchises which you have obtained, because you are protected by the Constitution of the United States. Now, unless you will be willing to come within the constitutional provisions that we lay down for all corporations in the future, you shall have no more legislation." This is eminently proper. It is but fair, if we can in any manner apply to them the same rule that we apply to the corporations that will hereafter come into existence; it is but fair to make them accept the provisions of this article; provisions that, by adopting, we declare to be wise and proper.

Mr. Hunsicker. Allow me to ask a question?

Mr. Campbell. Certainly.

Mr. Hunsicker. What is meant by beneficial legislation?

Mr. Campbell. The word "beneficial" may be stricken out if you wish. I, myself, prefer to say that corporations now existing shall have "no legislation whatever." The wording of the section is not mine. I am merely speaking of the general principle of the section. If the gentleman does not like the word "beneficial," strike it out, and say simply that they shall have no further legislation at all. If we can in any way make the two or three giant corporations of Pennsylvania act within the provisions of the article that we are putting forth as the fundamental law of the State, we should do so.

Mr. Gowen. One of the members of the railroad committee the other day said that this was no place to ventilate a man's legal learning on the subject of vested rights, and that the only question which a constitutional convention should take into consideration was not the right of doing a thing, but whether it was expedient or not. I take it that that sentiment has found utterance in the section which is now the subject of consideration, and upon that subject I desire to speak to this convention as the representative of a railroad company, owning from fifty to one hundred million dollars' worth of property, which they obtained by virtue of a contract with the forefathers of this convention.

Let us say, that in the year 1830, at a time when nobody could charge the Legislature of Pennsylvania with corruption; when it was not the custom to go to the Legislature corruptly to obtain a charter, and when a charter was obtained after great deliberation, and when a charter was not a matter of one or two sections, as it now is, but was a subject sufficiently important to occupy twelve or fifteen pages, many of the corporations of this State were chartered. It was thoroughly well known that that charter became a contract. The people of Pennsylvania, at that time at least, were anxious to have corporations develop their material interests. They invited men to become stockholders. They invited the citizens of this State, and the people of other States, and the people of other countries, and asked them to expend their money upon the solemn faith of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania; and had it been once intimated in those early days that such a thing, even in the wildest conception of the most infuriated reformer, would ever come to pass as that a constitutional convention should assemble in the city of Philadelphia for the purpose of taking away those vested rights, simply because it was deemed expedient to do so, I apprehend that the vast amount of money expended in the development of this State would have remained in the pockets of its owners. Every corporation created prior to 1857 holds its franchises by a title founded in contract, which contract cannot be altered, cannot be varied, cannot be impaired, unless the Constitution of the United States is changed. Every incorporated body that holds its franchises since the year 1857, holds them by exactly the same contract, only subject to this limitation, that its charter may be altered or annulled or repealed, but only in a certain way, and only so as to do no pecuniary injury to the stockholders.

Therefore, every incorporated company holds its franchises by virtue of a contract. If the incorporation dated prior to 1857, that contract is absolute, and cannot be changed; if since 1857, the Legislature has the power to alter or annul that contract, provided it is done in such a manner as not to do injury to the owners of it—the stockholders.

It is said that it is expedient to do this. Sir, it never is expedient to violate a contract. No possible good can ever come from the State of Pennsylvania violating a contract with her meanest citizen; and this attempt to violate it, not by striking it actually out of existence, but by saying it shall have no legislation hereafter, is just as bad as an attempt to violate it altogether. Corporations pay large amounts of taxes, it is well known. Many of those taxes were imposed during the war, and it might happen that the taxation of Pennsylvania would be reduced in the future, and no general law reducing taxation upon every one could be taken advantage of by an existing corporation without a surrender or a practical surrender of its franchises. The effect would be that you tax an existing corporation where you will tax another one, and impose a penalty upon them because their charters are thirty or forty years old. But if gentlemen want to strike down contracts because questions of expediency and not a question of right should control, let me tell them that we have a burden that is borne by every citizen of this commonwealth. We have a State debt of twenty millions of dollars, I think, at present. It is very oppressive, and every man, woman and child has to labor to raise money to pay taxes. We get the money from the people, and the question of right would not prevail. It would be expedient to reduce taxation by repudiating this debt, and it seems to me that to repudiate a contract of any kind with any person is just exactly the same as to repudiate a debt; and I trust that the people of Pennsylvania will never have laid to their charge hereafter anything which savors of repudiation, either of their public debts, or of their public contracts.

Mr. Cuyler. Mr. Chairman: * * *

I have risen, Mr. Chairman, merely to say a very few words as to what I conceived to be the positive immorality of the doctrine of this section. I will not linger here to discuss the doctrine of the Dartmouth College case, which has been so often alluded to. No man, it seems to me, at this late day, can doubt that that is the law of this country. No man can doubt that what these corporations have is property, that they hold it by contract, and that when an attempt was made to take away that which is a vested right, or which is possessed by contract, without making compensation, the doctrine settled by this great and leading case is contravened. To doubt it is to doubt the plainest dictates of one's own judgment. It is to doubt the wholesome utterances of the law, pronounced after full discussion, by some of its greatest masters, through the lips of the greatest chief justice that ever presided in this country, and whose name is to be ranked as a peer with the name of any chief justice who ever presided abroad.

The Dartmouth College was a foreign charter, a charter granted by the Crown. The State of New Hampshire laid its hands upon it, in only what you or I would think almost non-essential particulars. It enlarged the number of its trustees from twelve to twenty-one; it enlarged the scope of the application of the funds which it held in trust for educational uses. Yet after solemn argument by Mr. Webster, whose greatest legal reputation is built upon this case, replied to by Mr. Wirt, then attorney general of the United States, was the law pronounced by Chief Justice Marshall, and declared to be that though its charter was granted by the Crown, it was not competent for the State of New Hampshire to modify it or change it in any degree without the consent of the corporation. And from that day to this has the most conservative doctrine been recognized by statesmen and by lawyers as part of the great constitutional law of every State of the American Union.

And if I turn to my own State, I have but to point to two or three cases familiar to every Philadelphia lawyer, one of them so closely resembling the Dartmouth College case in its doctrine, that it is almost precisely like it. I mean the case of the Western Saving Fund v. The City of Philadelphia, where the city of Philadelphia undertook to do nothing more than to add four trustees to the number of those who administered the gas works, without one single change in the trust beyond this, without an enlargement of the powers of the trustees or a modification of the trust, but simply adding four men to the number of trustees, they having themselves created that trust, and the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, I think by a unanimous decision, said that it was unlawful, and could not be done in this commonwealth. Yet we are to be gravely told that although the $600,000,000 which have been invested in railway corporations in this State, on the faith of the law, cannot, by reason of the doctrine of those decisions, be taken away from them by any direct application of the power of the commonwealth, the State may take them by the throat and extort it from them as a matter of actual and positive force, for that is the doctrine of this section.

Now, sir, I will not consume the time of the convention ["go on! go on!"] by any further discussion of such a doctrine as that. I want to say a word or two on one or two other points, but so far as that particular thing is concerned, I scorn to utter another word to this convention. If the dignity of character, if the moral sense, if the sense of common honesty of this convention does not rise high enough to trample upon and spit upon such a doctrine as that, then we are unworthy of the seats we hold here. But I want to say a word or two, though not entirely, perhaps, germane to the particular question which is before the committee, with regard to one or two other matters which have been alluded to here, and which are presumed to affect interests that I am supposed peculiarly to represent.

Sir, suffer me to say as to those interests, that I am supposed peculiarly to represent, that if I know my own heart, I am incapable of standing upon this floor to advocate that which I believe to be wrong; that I am incapable of defending the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, or any other corporation, or any other client (for I am not an officer of the company), in that which I believe to be wrong. It has never occurred to me yet to do so. I am but simply the general counsel of that company, its defender and advocate in courts of justice, and its advisor to endeavor to keep it rightly and duly observant of its duties and its obligations to the law.

Now, I have to say with regard to this corporation, that when I hold up that sizeable book in the eyes of my brethren of the convention (holding up an octavo volume of about eight hundred pages), they will join me in saying this is a law-abiding corporation, for I think the size of the volume indicates a great deal on that subject. This little volume embodies the laws which affect that company down to 1864, inclusive. I suppose that about one-third might be added to its dimensions for those which have been passed since. But I want to say with regard to that company, which on a former occasion I have endeavored to show has done large service to this commonwealth, that in the year 1861, an act of Assembly was passed, which is commonly known as the commutation tonnage act, and without taking up time by reading at any length from that act, I desire to read a few of its provisions, in order that I may bring them to bear upon the minds of gentlemen who have spoken here with regard to certain discriminations which are alleged to have been made.

The recitals of this act confess that it was the right of the company to have the tonnage tax taken off—its right by contract with the State; and then they proceed to say that if the company will make a certain contract, which I will read, with the State, the arrears of that tax, amounting to some $800,000, shall be not released, as in justice they should have been, but be paid over in development of the resources of the commonwealth, by aiding various struggling railroad companies. True, these companies were generally companies that would be feeders of the line of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, but, nevertheless, though feeders of the line of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, they were developers, if I may use such a word, of the wealth and resources of the State. The act says:

"That from and after the passage of this act, all railroad, canal and slackwater navigation companies, incorporated by this State, and liable for the payment of taxes or duties on tonnage, imposed by any laws heretofore enacted, shall make a reduction of their charges for transportation on their local freight, as fixed by their respective toll-sheets, on the first day of February, 1861, equal to the full amount of the tax or duty chargeable upon such freight or tonnage by the laws aforesaid; the present winter rates, between the first day of December and the first day of May, shall be considered as fixed at ninety cents per one hundred pounds for first class; seventy-five cents per one hundred pounds for second class; sixty cents per one hundred pounds for third class, and forty cents per one hundred pounds for fourth class; summer rates, between the first day of May and first day of December in each year, shall be seventy-five cents per one hundred pounds for first class; sixty cents per one hundred pounds for second class; fifty cents per one hundred pounds for third class; and forty cents per one hundred pounds for fourth class, on all trade carried between Philadelphia and Pittsburg; and a failure on the part of either of said companies to make such reduction shall render the company so neglecting liable to the commonwealth for double the amount of the tonnage tax heretofore chargeable against them upon such trade; and every such company shall, within thirty days after the passage of this act, under a like penalty, file in the office of the auditor general, under the oath of the president, or other proper officer, a toll-sheet," &c.

And then it proceeds, and this is what I wish to invite the attention of gentlemen to:

"Further, The Pennsylvania Railroad Company shall not, at any time, charge or collect rates, on any description of freights, from any eastern or seaboard cities to Pittsburg, higher than the gross rates charged or collected by the same route from same points to any point west of Pittsburg; nor shall the said Pennsylvania Railroad Company, at any time, charge or collect rates on any description of freights from Pittsburg to Philadelphia, Baltimore, New York or other sea-board cities, higher than the gross rates that may be charged by the same route from any point west of Pittsburg to the same points on the same description of property. The local rates from Pittsburg or Philadelphia to stations on the line of the Pennsylvania railroad shall at no time exceed the gross rates charged through between Philadelphia and Pittsburg; nor shall local rates between any two stations on the road between Philadelphia and Pittsburg exceed the through rates, as made from time to time under the provision of this act; nor shall the rates charged to any local points exceed those charged to any point of greater distance in the same direction from the place of shipment."

And then follows a provision as to the rights of those who ship to or from Pittsburg by way of the river.

Now, I am here to say, and say by authority, that a solitary instance cannot be produced of a violation of the requirements of that section. I am not unaware that gentlemen on this floor have said, and many have said out of doors, that a contrary state of affairs existed; but I am here by authority to say that any and every charge of that sort is without foundation in fact, and if the facts are presented, and the cases are investigated, it will be found not to have its basis in truth.

It is not more than five years ago that a great litigation occurred in this commonwealth, in which my friend, Mr. Gowen, was one of the counsel on the other side, and with eminent colleagues represented the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, in which these charges were made, and in which this question was the subject of thorough judicial investigation. Mr. Thompson, Mr. Scott, and every gentleman connected with the transportation department of the Pennsylvania Railroad, was subjected, under oath, to a most thorough and sifting scrutiny, and there was a failure to substantiate a solitary instance of the violation of these provisions.

I heard a gentleman on this floor, I think it was my friend from Pittsburg (Mr. S. A. Purviance), allude to a merchant in Pittsburg, and others said that numbers of other cases of the same sort had occurred, who could send his goods to Alliance, and then have them brought from Alliance to Philadelphia at a less rate than the Pennsylvania Railroad carried from Pittsburg to Philadelphia. I stated that case to Mr. Scott, who, protesting his own profound ignorance of anything of the sort, caused inquiry to be made, and reported that no such thing had ever occurred, and added a fact, which I think will carry conviction to the minds of all here

Mr. Howard. Will the gentleman allow himself to be interrupted?

Mr. Cuyler. Certainly, sir.

Mr. Howard. I have this fact, that so far as the shipment of fourth class freights is concerned, shippers are prevented, by the discriminations made by the Pennsylvania Railroad, from shipping to the city of Philadelphia. They make discriminations in favor of the west. I have it from gentlemen whom I know personally, men engaged in the flour and feed business, and the difference is just precisely the figures given, the difference between forty-five and thirty. Western men pay thirty, and Pittsburg men are charged forty-five. I have this from men of as high veracity as live. Now, is that true or false?

Mr. Cuyler. It is false, if the gentleman wants to know.

Mr. Howard. Very well, I do not think it is false.

Mr Cuyler. I have read, Mr. Chairman, from the law the right of the citizen, and I say that that citizen, cognizant of such facts as are stated by the gentleman from Allegheny (Mr. Howard), who does not avail himself of the remedy which the law clearly places in his power as a protection, is as unjust to himself as he is to the citizens generally of this commonwealth.

But what I wanted to present to gentlemen was this: The Pennsylvania Railroad Company owns the line between Philadelphia and Alliance, owns to Cnicago, owns to Cleveland; and on what earthly consideration could the company make a double carriage from Pittsburg to Alliance, and from Alliance back to Pittsburg again for nothing, in order to get the freight from Pittsburg to Philadelphia? Let gentlemen reflect upon the absurdity of it.

Mr. Guthrie. Will the gentleman allow me? I desire to explain. I think my friend from Allegheny erred in his statement in regard to shipping from Pittsburg. Mr. Dickey told me that he had shipped his freight from Philadelphia to Alliance, and then from Alliance back to Pittsburg, and thus saved money. And I will say further, that I think that was stated on oath by Mr. Dickey in an investigation. I am not sure of it, but I think it was stated under oath in an investigation.

Mr. Cuyler. My friend from Allegheny will perceive that the case he supposes is practically the same as that put by his colleague. It amounts simply to this: It amounts to the supposition that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, owning the entire line all the way to Alliance, would carry this gentleman's freight for nothing from Pittsburg to Alliance, and back again from Alliance to Pittsburg in order to earn the freight she is to get between Pittsburg and Philadelphia. The officers of that company have had some little reputation for sagacity; they have not been reputed to be fools, whatever else may be said with regard to them. Such conduct would be so transcendently foolish that every intelligent mind must regard it as being positively incredible. The fact is that these charges are loosely and thoughtlessly made, and that, although the specified cases are infinitesimal in number compared with the vast mass of transportation, yet they suffice to stir the hostility which exists to corporations, and are magnified to large and overshadowing proportions in the public mind.

Mr. Sharpe. Let me ask the gentleman whether there was not a competing line from New York, which came in at Alliance, which might explain the mystery why the company should ship produce to Alliance and back again without charge?

Mr. Cuyler. What competition does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. Sharpe. The New York Central.

Mr. Cuyler. I do not think so. I do not think it touches it as a competing line. It would still carry with it the absurdity of which I have spoken, and still leave the citizen with the full redress which is pointed out by the act of Assembly, and if he will not avail himself of his clear statutory right by going into the courts of justice, which are the places where men and corporations are to be arraigned and to be punished for their wrongs, it is his own fault that he does not do it. Let him make his complaint there, where the facts may be calmly investigated, and their truthfulness ascertained, and an effectual remedy provided. This is not his proper tribunal.

I will not go into a more lengthy discussion of these cases, but I will allude to another that was mentioned on the floor. The gentleman from Susquehanna (Mr. Turrell) stated that he had been informed that the Cambria iron works had proposed to introduce the manufacture of shoes, had put up a capital of $200,000 for the purpose, and employed two hundred men, with a view to it, but had been compelled to abandon the business because of persistent discriminations against them, and in favor of Chicago. I can only say that I addressed an inquiry on that subject to every leading officer of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and I was informed by them, in answer, that it was the first time they had ever heard of such a thing; that it was not true that any application on the subject had ever been made to them, or any of them; that they had never heard that those works contemplated the manufacture of shoes; that it would not be a natural business for them to engage in; and that the whole subject was purely one upon which they were wholly uninformed.

Mr. Dodd. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. Cuyler. Certainly.

Mr. Dodd. Did the gentleman, in his inquiries, make any inquiries about the South Improvement Company?

Mr. Cuyler. I say the Pennsylvania Railroad Company never had any relations with the Southern Improvement Company of any sort or kind.

Mr. Dodd. Colonel Scott signed the contract.

Mr. Cuyler. I have nothing to do with Colonel Scott personally; he is able to take care of himself; but I say the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, in no manner whatsoever, directly or indirectly, was ever mixed up with that business. I speak of the corporation. I am not Colonel Scott's defender; nor am I to be understood as at all justifying any criticism that is made upon him. He is abundantly able to take care of himself, as gentlemen will find when they come into intercourse with him.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have only to say that this company has once submitted to thorough investigation in the courts of justice; that those courts of justice are all the while open to the citizen, and the rights of the citizen are defined in words so clear, that the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein; and that it is not manly, it is not right, it is not proper, when the plain remedy is pointed out and the tribunal for redress is established, that this species of wholesale denunciation should be resorted to and these vague allegations made, which, if true, should go into the courts of justice, where they properly belong.

I pass from this to another subject—

Mr. Turrell. Will the gentleman permit me to say a word?

Mr. Cuyler. Certainly.

Mr. Turrell. I simply wish to say that I made the statement from Mr. Morrell almost word for word, as he gave it to me; and in further corroboration of that I am happy to say, lest my veracity might be doubted, that Mr. Morrell has since that time, and since that article was prepared, had it submitted to him by the gentleman from Somerset, and he made the same statement to him.

Mr. Cuyler. I can only say after searching for Mr. Morrell, whom I have the pleasure of knowing very well, after going to three places where I hoped to find him, without success, I have written to him in regard to it, and his reply, when received, will be submitted to the convention.

Mr. Turrell. I only say this in justification of myself.

Mr. Cuyler. I do not doubt for a moment that the gentleman designed to state with precise accuracy what he supposed was told to him.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make this single remark: The law of railroad life is inequality. It is a matter of absolute vital necessity that it should be so. It cannot be otherwise. No two railroad companies are, or can be situated alike. There is inequality in their construction by reason of the region of country they pass through. There is inequality in their business relations by reason of the greater or less wealth of the communities which they reach by their lines. There is inequality in their relations by reason of the varying competition they encounter. All these circumstances combine to make the very law of railroad life inequality. Therefore I say that the effort to bring all these companies down to a single and inflexible rule, which shall be written in the constitution of the State as an iron rule, must of necessity be nugatory; it cannot work out a just result.

Take the line of the Pennsylvania Railroad. To build the line between Altoona and Cresson, over the mountains, cost vastly more than to build the line through the valley of Chester county. To operate that line, where the power of a locomotive is reduced to less than one-third the power it has upon a plain, requires a large expenditure all the while. To say, therefore, that freights shall be carried over the mountains elevated two thousand four hundred feet, and carried over such grades at the same price precisely that it shall be carried over the plains of Chester county, is an absurdity; and yet this bill does provide for a uniform rate of charge all the way through. It ignores the great general laws of trade and business and finance. No merchant dreams that he is to sell at the same price from a store where he is exposed to severe competition as he would from a store where he had no competition at all. No man could reason fairly or justly that, when the lines o the Pennsylvania Railroad reach Cincinnati, for example, and come into competition with other lines of transportation, they shall charge precisely the same rates that they would charge from Pittsburg, or from other points where no such competition exists. Nor is it an injustice to Pittsburg, because capital is entitled to earn its fair dividend, and if it can earn any dividend, no matter how small, toward that competent sum it should divide among its stockholders by the carriage of freight at a point where it encounters the greatest competition, it is in relief of the other community where no competition exists that it should carry that freight. That is the natural law of trade.

But we seem to be sitting here in this convention to ignore all the natural laws of trade and finance. We are sitting down to legislate that water shall run up hill; that fire shall not burn; that the opposite of that which the great laws of nature declare, just as much with regard to finance and railroads, and business generally, as they do with regard to the elements about us, shall be done; that those great laws are to be ignored and treated as if they did not exist at all. Such an effort is perfectly hopeless. We cannot legislate the opposite of that which the great laws of trade and finance have ordained. We must subordinate ourselves to them; or if we do not, we must put an extinguisher upon the business interests of the country.

Mr. Biddle. Mr. Chairman: If I felt the assurance that this article would be concluded this afternoon, in the condition in which the few last sections now stand, I would not rise to say a single word; and if the assurance is now made to me that the committee will vote the section now under consideration, I will cheerfully give way; but unless that assurance is made, unless I know that those who are the opponents of this measure are willing to let it pass now, and allow the article to go upon second reading, I deem it my duty to say something about it.

The debate upon this section has been so discursive in its tone, that we really have been entirely led away from the real proposition now before the house. There is nothing in this section that has a tendency to strike down vested rights; there is nothing in this section that goes to interfere improperly with the laws of supply and demand, with the laws of trade, which my colleague, Mr. Cuyler, very properly says are immutable, and which he who strives against, strives against only to his own detriment. What, then, is the real point under consideration?

Quite a number of these corporations were incorporated before the adoption of the amendment of 1857. That amendment provides in terms, that the Legislature shall have the power to alter, revoke or annul any charter thereafter conferred by special or general law, whenever in their opinion it may be injurious to the commonwealth, in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done. It strikes me, that with the same reason might companies, incorporated after 1857, complain that their vested rights were struck at by the existing constitutional provision, as companies coming hereafter before the Legislature for special favors, or obtaining privileges under general legislation, can properly complain that the present article, if adopted as part of the fundamental law of the land, shall be made applicable to them.

No man recognizes more fully than I do the right of these great interests to be heard upon the floor of this house. I would go further and say that interests of such vast magnitude have the right to be represented here; and I have never objected to any gentleman, posessing peculiar means of knowing their wants and their wishes, and of stating objections to what he considers unwise legislation, presenting his views as fully and as often as he desires. So far from objecting, I believe a very large, a very decided majority of this house always hears with pleasure from those who have special sources of information upon any subject whatever.

But, Mr. Chairman that is not the question now before us, nor is the wisdom or the existing condition of the law at all a matter under consideration. Professional gentlemen may have different views in regard to the correctness of the decision known as the Dartmouth College case. That decision, in its true purview, in its real scope, was only dealing with a private charity founded by a private individual, who had a right to dictate the terms and limitations of his gift as he pleased. We may, therefore, believe, without at all desiring to strike at vested interests, that when the Supreme Court pronounced that any interference with the terms of that private bounty would be in violation of a contract, that every franchise granted by successive Legislatures, year after year, to these corporate bodies, did not necessarily partake of the same contractual character. It may have been supposed that such a deduction was pushing a just principle to an absurd conclusion. No man on this floor, however, quarrels with the law as it is. I state the case, I think, as it really occurred.

If the principle of the Dartmouth College case is so omnipotent, so universal in its application, as to bring within its protecting influence the franchises conferred upon these corporations, be it so; we so understand it; we so receive it; we desire not to legislate here otherwise; but it is for that very reason, and no man can look at this section without seeing it written transparently on its face, that we desire to say to these bodies for the future, "yes, we respect your contracts; true, the people, by these successive grants, have really left little or nothing to confer upon anybody else, but if what you have already got exists in the shape of contract, keep it; we will not disturb the enjoyment of what has been so obtained. But do not come before us hereafter, do not ask to take away the little remnant of that which is left as valuable in the hands of the sovereign power, and while you stretch out one hand to receive a boon, with another, present an obstacle to the enforcement of the constitution as it is established." It is to correct this great anomaly that this section is found here, and we may as well admit now and for all time, that unless you put a section substantially like this in the article under consideration, you may as well tear it up, and erase it from your records, and proceed to the discussion of something else; because we have been told here—I do not say by way of threat, but by way of warning—as to several of the provisions found in this article, that the two great leading corporations in the State can each afford to pay five millions of dollars into the public treasury, provided we fasten what are called these trammels upon the condition and action of the corporations who are hereafter to receive their life at the hands of this commonwealth, leaving, as we are told we must do, those others unaffected. I am not speaking rhetorically when I say this; I am merely repeating the very language——

Mr. Cuyler. No such language certainly fell from me. I never entertained any such thought.

Mr. Biddle. No, sir; the house know very well to what I refer. I am not speaking of what fell from your lips. I am repeating the very words that fell from the lips of a gentleman advocating (as undoubtedly he had a right to do) what he conceived to be the true policy that should be pursued by this convention.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how far have we proceeded? Do I understand the advocates of these corporations—and I use the word in no unkind sense; I recognize, as I said in the beginning, their right to be heard and to be heard fully; I will call them the friends—do I understand the friends of these corporations to say that no change is needed in the constitution by which they may be affected? That will hardly be said. That can hardly be admitted. Will gentlemen say to us, after the result of the labors of the last three or four days, that it is not a wise thing to prevent the absorption of competing lines, that it is not a wise thing to make these corporations answerable for what I still choose to call the consequential damages, resulting from injury by the construction of their works? Will gentlemen say that there is anything impolitic or improper in allowing stockholders, bondholders, or others having a pecuniary interest to know who their fellows are in each corporation? Will gentlemen say that we have substantially invaded any sacred right of contract by anything which has been done here? I cannot see it in that light. But suppose it be so, the objection should be made to those sections, and not to the section now under discussion which merely says, "You corporations, who boast and say, 'we cannot be touched? you are putting money in our pockets by what you are doing in regard to the future offspring of the Legislature;' you, too, shall come under the same general law whenever you place yourselves in the position of seekers of legislative favors." Where is the principle in this that strikes at the impairing of the obligation of contracts? Where is the injustice? Where is the black crape and pistol, in this, of the highwayman? Where is the robbery? Where is the thievishness? I do but repeat the terms that have been employed on the other side of this question in discussing the fundamental principle of justice and common sense contained in this article.

Mr. Chairman, I deny that there has been anything like an effort here, in any one single provision of this article, to attempt to extort, by the supposed superior force of the commonwealth, any right which has been consecrated under the terms of a contract, and which now exists in the possession of any one of these corporations. Point it out, if it be so. Do not denounce by general rhetorical phrases; do not perorate on this subject. Lay your hands upon any one single clause by which anything like injustice is attempted to be done, and my word for it, if this house shall be convinced that in their previous action anything like wrong has been committed, they will at once strike the obnoxious section from this instrument. But I would say to this house, and I would say to the gentleman who spoke last, who knows how to advocate so ably the interests entrusted to his care, that superior astuteness will always be more than a match for what is called superior force. The world is not governed now by brute force; intelligence is a much more powerful element in its direction, and it is no figure of speech to say that "the pen is mightier than the sword."

The pen which is employed year after year in the writing of the special provisions which each successive Legislature confers upon these corporations, and which have become so large that they are contained in a volume larger than the codes of many communities, bears mute but eloquent testimony to the truth of what I am saying. I will go as far with my friend as any one, in the attempt to remedy anything like an act of injustice where it is pointed out. I will go further than the exigency of this case requires.

We have had made, time and again, in the discussion of this article, references to the tonnage tax and to its repeal. I say now, although my action would probably have been misconstrued if I had been a member of the Legislature when that repeal was voted; I say, now, that I believe the repeal of the tonnage tax was an act of legislative wisdom, of legislative justice; that it ought to have been done; that the tax was acting unjustly and oppressively upon our own interests, and that the sooner it was got rid of, the better. And I am willing, morover, to concede—because the gentleman who last spoke states it—that the company in whose favor the repeal was made has lived up to the terms of its engagement with the commonwealth. Pray, what has that to do with the section under consideration, except, as I shall attempt to show directly, to strengthen and confirm the reasoning in favor of its adoption?

The section now under consideration means nothing more nor less than this: Suppose that the gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Cuyler), and the gentleman who preceeded him (Mr. Gowen), and other gentlemen who are specially interested and concerned in these companies, had themselves drawn up an article by which, recognizing the existence of certain evils, in connection with them, they had attempted, as I am sure they would fairly have done, if the task had been committed to them, to remove them. Their plan would have been laid before this convention for consideration. But I will go further; I will suppose that from the hands which framed it, it came forth so perfect that it required no single alteration or amendment. It is just about being adopted; some one gets up and says: "The Dartmouth College case instructs us that every franchise at present owned by any of these corporations is a solemn contract; most of these corporations date their charters back to a period long anterior to the year 1857; we know that as to all corporate bodies coming into existence after that date, the Legislature has the power to which I referred a little while ago, under constitutional sanction, to act upon those since incorporated. But there are many, and very great corporations, who say, and who say truly, your article will be inoperative as to them. Now, we recognize the anomaly; we recognize the practical absurdity, after these vast grants of power have already gone out from the Legislature, to attempt to fetter the limits of the few puny corporate children that may be brought into life hereafter. What is to be done by us?" Is it wrong, is it unfair, is it in the spirit of the highwayman, to say in answer to just such a question, "corporations already in existence, you who have already had conferred upon you a large share of the sovereignty of the State, if you desire to receive further Legislative favors, if you shall ask hereafter an extension of that which is already very large, conform to, bring yourselves under the operation of the present existing constitution. Liken yourselves to those who have been created since its adoption, and you shall then receive whatever may with propriety be granted to you. If you refuse to do this, the door of Legislative beneficence shall be forever closed in your faces?" What more is done, in saying this, than was done by the act of 1861, when the tonnage tax was repealed? Was there not, by it, concession made in the future by the corporation, as an equivalent for the remedial legislation? As well might my learned colleague from Philadelphia (Mr. Cuyler) tell me that the act of 1861 was an act of injustice and a violation of contract, because when the Legislature, in its bounty, in its sense of justice, if you please, chose to repeal the tax which was pressing so hardly upon the Pennsylvania railroad company, they coupled it with conditions, excluding them, and properly, from the acceptance of the bounty unless they took it with the terms annexed to it. That is all this section says; that is all it means. If this be striking down a contract, then why does my friend tell us, not by way of boast, but by way of just pride and confidence in the integrity of the company with which he is so familiar, that from that day to this it has fairly lived up to the terms of its engagement? That is all the section means; and I put it to the gentlemen of the convention whether it would not be a striking absurdity when we have heard, day after day, what we have heard, when it has been harped upon by way of objection to every provision, no matter how salutary, that you can only reach the future, that the past is beyond your control, whether we would not be guilty of an act of most monstrous fatuity, while we have the power now in our own hands, by writing into this article the few lines contained in this section, to compel these companies, when they seek for future benefits, to bring themselves under precisely the same law, which we are bound to believe good, because we ordain it for all future corporations, were we to strike them out, or omit them now, because they may prove unpalatable to those who have already waxed great under the large lease of power already extended to them.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I trust the house will adopt this eighteenth section.

BURLEIGH v. CLOUGH.

1. By his last will, H. devised to his wife—if she should be living at the time of his decease—all his estate, real, personal, and mixed, to her use and disposal during her natural life; and "what is remaining at her decease, undisposed of by her," the testator devised to D. and his heirs and assigns forever. Held, that the wife of the testator took by the will an estate for life, with a power to defeat the remainder over; and D. took a vested remainder, and not an executory devise.
2. H. died, and his wife, having taken possession of the property given to her by the aforesaid will, consisting of both real and personal property, and being also possessed of other real and personal property, which she held and controlled in her own right, made her own will, by which, after certain special bequests, she gave to B. "all the rest and residue of [her] estate, real, personal and mixed, wherever found, and however situated," &c. Held, that she did not, by force of her will, execute the power to defeat the remainder given to D. by her husband's will.
3. A power, technically speaking, is not an estate, but is a mere authority, enabling a person, through the medium of the statute of uses, to dispose of an interest in real property, vested either in himself or in another person.
4. A gift shall not be deemed an executory devise, if it can take effect as a remainder.
5. A remainder shall not be considered contingent, if it may, consistently with intention, be deemed vested.
6. A power of disposal annexed to an estate for life, although it may divest the estate in remainder, cannot enlarge to a fee an estate for life, expressly declared and limited.
7. Where a power is given which may be exercised by a will, it will not be executed unless there is a reference in the will to the power or to the subject of it; or unless the will would be inoperative without the aid of the power, and the intention to execute it become clear and manifest.
8. So, also, an act in pais, such as, for example, the use of money derived from an estate, in the only manner consistent with the profitable enjoyment of it, will not, in the absence of a manifest intention to appropriate the same, definitely and absolutely, be deemed an execution of a power over it.

Appeal by Benaiah P. Burleigh, and his wife, Mary Burleigh, against David C. Clough, executor of the last will of Hannah Hersey, from the decree of the judge of probate for the county of Belknap. The case is submitted on the following agreement of facts:

On February 21st, 1867, Jacob Hersey, of Sanbornton, made his last will, containing the following provisions: "I do give, devise and bequeath unto my wife, Hannah Hersey, if she is living at the time of my decease, all my estate, both personal and real, or mixed, wherever the same may be found, to her, the said Hannah Hersey, to her use and disposal during her natural life; and what is remaining at her decease, undisposed of by her, I give, devise and bequeath unto Joshua E. Dennis, and his heirs and assigns forever. And if my said wife, Hannah Hersey, is not living at the time of my decease, I do give, devise and bequeath all of said estate unto the said Joshua E. Dennis, to him and his heirs and assigns forever." Jacob Hersey died before June 18th, 1867, and his will was proved on that day. Hannah Hersey took possession of the property given to her by her husband's will, which consisted of real estate, returned in the inventory of his estate at $1,365, and personal estate, returned at $1,178 64. On November 20th, 1867, Hannah Hersey made her last will, in which, after certain special bequests, it is provided as follows: "I give, bequeath and devise to Benaiah P. Burleigh, and his wife, Mary Burleigh, all the rest and residue of my estate, real, personal and mixed, wherever found, and however situated, while they both live; and, in the event of the death of one of them, to descend to the survivor, his or her (as the case may be) heirs and assigns forever." This will, of which David C. Clough was appointed executor, was proved in June, 1869.

When Jacob Hersey made his will, on February 21st, 1867, his wife, Hannah Hersey, had real and personal estate in her own right, and on the same day she disposed of her estate by a will, which was revoked by her will of November 20th, 1867. Her real estate, which included the house she lived in at the time of her death, remained hers till her death, and was appraised in the inventory of her estate at $738. She also had, at the time of her death, personal estate valued at $814.97, with which the executor is charged in his account, as settled by the decree in the court of probate.

In the settlement of the executor's account of his administration of the estate of Hannah Hersey, in the court of probate, he claimed to be credited with the following items: "Delivered to Joshua E. Dennis, executor of J. Hersey's estate, the hay cut on J. Hersey's land after Mrs. H. Hersey's death, $128." The hay was cut on land of Hersey, as is above stated. "Also, a lot of crockery, which was of J. Hersey's estate, as inventoried, $5." "Paid Joshua E. Dennis, executor of J. Hersey's will, the amount of receipt for cash delivered by him as executor to Hannah Hersey, as per said receipt, dated May 20th, 1867, $262.96." The $262.96 was received by Hannah Hersey, as is above stated.

Under the wills of Jacob Hersey and Hannah Hersey, the said Burleigh and wife claimed that the executor should not be credited with the aforesaid items, while under the same wills the said Dennis claimed that said executor should be thus credited. The judge of probate credited and allowed said items to the executor, and from such allowance and credit the said Burleigh and wife appealed, and the appeal is depending in this case.

The money embraced in said receipt of May 20th, 1867, was not kept separate by said Hannah, and in its use by her no distinction was made between it and other money belonging to her, not derived from said Jacob. It was agreed that the said will of Hannah Hersey, executed on said February 21st, might be referred to in argument, if the court should be of opinion that it is important and material; also, the administration accounts of the said Dennis, and of the said Clough, as settled in the probate court. Neither Jacob Hersey nor Hannah Hersey left any lineal descendant. The wife of Joshua E. Dennis is a niece of Jacob Hersey, and the said Benaiah P. Burleigh is a nephew of Hannah Hersey.

FOSTER, J.

The first question naturally presented by this case is: What kind of an interest or estate did Hannah Hersey take under her husband's will? Was it a fee simple, or an estate for life?

In considering this question, we resort, in the first instance, to the application of those elementary rules of construction which provide that every portion of the instrument must be made to have its just operation, unless there arises some invincible repugnance, or else some portion is absolutely unintelligible; and that the intention of the testator is the prevailing consideration, and the supreme rule of interpretation. 1 Redf. Wills, 431–433.

The words of the devise are plain and distinct: "I give," &c., "all my estate, both personal and real, or mixed." * * "to her, the said Hannah Hersey, to her use and disposal during her natural life;" and what is remaining at her decease, undisposed of by her, I give, devise, and bequeath unto Joshua E. Dennis, and his heirs and assigns forever."

If the will had given the estate to Mrs. Hersey and her heirs, or to Mrs. Hersey, generally, without words of limitation, she would have taken, by the operative words of the will, an estate in fee; and that estate would not have been reduced below an estate in fee by the added power of disposal, because such a construction would be manifestly repugnant to the estate in fee already granted. The expression of the added power would be mere surplusage, since every estate in fee involves an absolute power of disposal of the whole.

But here the estate devised to Mrs. Hersey is expressly limited to an estate for life, with remainder in fee to Dennis; and we have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the intention of the testator was that she should take only an estate for life, with a power to defeat the remainder over.

The testator has used apt and explicit words of limitation to express this intention, which, to our minds, is as clear as that, by the use of equally apt and express words, he intended to give to the remainderman an estate in fee. If he had intended to give his wife an estate in fee, he would have expressed that intention by the use of such terms as he employed in the devise to Dennis, which is of the remainder to him and his heirs and assigns forever.

The question then arises, whether this intention is to be controlled by any superior rule of law; for an intention will not avail to create an illegal or an impossible estate. Smith v. Bell, 6 Peters, 68.

"There is an evident difference between a power and an absolute right of property," said Sir Wm. Grant, M. R., in Holmes v. Coghill, 7 Ves. 506. See 4 Kent's Com. 335; 2 Washb. R. P. *325; 3 Washb. R. P. *303, *315, *334; Williams on Real Property, 249.

A power, when conferred by will, is a bare authority derived from the will. It is not an estate, and has none of the elements of an estate. It is defined by Bouvier as "an authority enabling a person, through the medium of the statute of uses, to dispose of an interest in real property, vested either in himself or in another person." See Williams R. P. 245; Co. Litt. 271 b, Butler's note, 231, sec. 3, pl. 4. "A power is an authority enabling one person to dispose of the interest which is vested in another." Buller, J., in Goodill v. Brigham, 1 Bos. & Pul. 197. "A general power of disposition, existing as a power, does not imply ownership; in fact, the existence of such a power, as a technical power, excludes the idea of an absolute fee simple in the party who possesses the power." Parker, C. J., in Eaton v. Straw, 18 N. H. 331.

The learned chief justice, in the same case, although he does not find it necessary, for the purposes of its decision, to controvert the opinion expressed by the appellants in the present case, that there can be no limitation over after the gift of a general power of disposition of an estate, remarks that such a proposition "is certainly not a necessary result from any legal principle;" and he adds, "there is nothing incongruous in holding that the gift of such a power, superadded to language which might otherwise be construed as conveying an absolute fee, tends to limit the preceding phraseology, so that it is not to be construed as creating such an estate.

The appellants contend, in argument, that this will must be construed as devising a fee, because the power annexed to the devise was general, and not a mere power of appointment in favor of specified persons. She had, they say, an unqualified right to dispose of the whole property—she was a free moral agent; and, because she could do with the property all that an owner in fee could, simply by executing the power, therefore she must be the owner in fee; and, by further consequence, the limitation over to Dennis is by way of executory devise, with which the right of disposition given to Mrs. Hersey, is incompatible.

It is quite obvious, that such an argument is the result of confounding the distinction between property and power. The estate given Mrs. Hersey is a property; the power of disposal a mere authority, which Mrs. Hersey may exercise or not, in her discretion.

If B., having a general power annexed to the life estate which he has derived from A., executes that power by a sale of the property to C., the title of C. is derived, not from B., who executes the power, but from A., who gave it.

"The appointer," says Mr. Washburn, "is merely an instrument; the appointee is in by the original deed. The appointee takes in the same manner as if his name had been inserted in the power, or, as if the power and instrument executing the power had been expressed in that giving the power. He does not take from the donee as his assignee." 2 Washb. R. P. *520; 1 Sug. Pow. (ed. 1856) 242; 2 Sug. Pow. 22; Doolittle v. Lewis, 7 Johns. Ch. 45.

This distinction between property and power being kept within view, it becomes unnecessary to controvert the proposition, supported, doubtless, by the authorities so abundantly collected by the learned counsel for the appellants, and so explicitly declared by Chancellor Kent, in Jackson v. Robins, 16 Johns. 589, that it is a clear and well settled rule of law, that an executory devise cannot be prevented or defeated by any alteration of the estate out of which, or after which, it is limited, or by any mode of conveyance;" that where conditions are repugnant to the estate to which they are annexed, they are void (2 Redf. Wills, 659); that a valid executory devise cannot subsist under an absolute power of disposition in the first taker (4 Kent's Com. 270); from all of which the appellants argue that the limitation over to Dennis, being by way of executory devise is void; for we are led to the inevitable conclusion, that the estate limited to Dennis was not an executory devise, but a vested remainder; and the reasons which apply to the destruction of an executory devise by joining it to a power of disposal, have no application to a remainder, limited upon an estate for life

We cannot so well express the definition and character of an executory devise as by adopting the language of the learned counsel for the appellee, in argument: "An executory devise is a future interest, such as the rules of law do not permit to be created in conveyances, but allow in the case of wills, like an interest given after an estate in fee simple, or to arise in futuro, without a particular estate to support it. Scatterwood v. Edge, 1 Salk. 229. They came into use after the Statute of Wills, 32 Hen. 8, and were allowed out of indulgence to testators, that they might, without the intervention of trustees to preserve remainders, establish future interests in strict settlement beyond the reach of those who had the prior estates; 4 Kent, 260; and such being the object, it was held to be essential to a good executory devise that the first takers should have no power to dispose of the interest devised. If, therefore, the first taker had the power by grant from the testator to dispose of the executory devise, the power defeated the whole object of such devises, and was held to make them inoperative though the power was not executed. Every good executory devise, as the rule would seem to be established in England, is 'inalienable, though all mankind join in the conveyance.' Scatterwood v. Edge, 1 Salk. 229; 4 Kent, 260; 6 Cruise's D. 461, 465. For this reason, a power of disposition has been held to be inconsistent with the nature of such an interest. It is against this rule, even in the case of an executory devise, that Parker, C. J., objects, in Eaton v. Straw, 18 N. H. 320."

The distinction between an executory devise and a vested remainder is elementary. An executory devise is such a disposition of lands by will, that thereby no estate vests at the devisor's death, but only on some future contingency. It needs no particular estate to support it. An estate in remainder is one limited to take effect and be enjoyed after another is determined. No remainder can be limited after the grant of a fee simple, because the tenant in fee has the whole. See Jackson v. Robins, 16 Johns. 537, 588; Downing v. Wherrin, 19 N. H. 9, 85.

Another elementary principle applies in cases where it may be doubtful whether an estate is an executory devise or a remainder, namely, that a gift shall not be deemed an executory devise if it can take effect as a remainder; and that no remainder shall be considered contingent, if it may, consistently with intention, be deemed vested. Blanchard v. Blanchard, 1 Allen, 225; Doe v. Perryn, 3 Term, 484–489, note; 4 Kent's Com. 202; and see Banister v. Henderson, Quincy, Ms., 120.

By the terms of the will, Mrs. Hersey took two things, an estate for life, and a power of disposal of the estate; and it is contended that the grant of this power enlarges the estate for life to an estate in fee—that the power becomes merged in the estate.

Now, as an estate in fee, involving the right of disposal, cannot be reduced to an estate for life, by implication, from the addition of words conferring a power of disposal, so a separate and distinct grant of a power of disposal, although it may divest the estate in remainder, cannot enlarge an estate for life, expressly declared and limited, to a fee, because the power of disposition is not inconsistent with nor repugnant to an estate for life, as we shall presently see. It is not repugnant, because, if no power of disposal had been conferred by the will, she would have still taken an estate for life, as she now takes both an estate for life and an added power of disposal.

And by this construction, the whole and every portion of the will becomes effectual, according to the manifest intention of the testator, which was, as we have no doubt, to give to his widow an estate for life at all events; and, more than that, a power of disposition of so much of the property, even to the extent of the whole, as her needs, her comfort, or her gratification should demand; and that the remainder, if any, should go to Dennis.

It will be found, upon examination, that a majority of the authorities to which we are referred by the appellants, which apparently go to the extent of holding that a power of disposition, annexed to an estate for life, enlarges the life estate to a fee, are cases in which the estate for life is not conferred by express terms, but arises from implication, such implication being deemed essential, in the particular case, in order to give effect to the intention of the testator, as manifested by the whole scope of the devise. Such is particularly the case in Ramsdell v. Ramsdell, 21 Me. 288; Pickering v. Langdon, 22 Me. 213; Burbank v. Whitney, 24 Me. 146; and White v. White, Ex'r, 21 Vt. 250. In neither of these cases is the estate for life granted by express terms of limitation. And in other cases cited to the same point, such as Harris v. Knapp, 21 Pick. 412; Hall v. Marsh, 100 Mass. 468; Dodge v. Moore, 100 Mass. 335; and Stroud v. Morrow, 7 Jones (N. C.) 463, the general expression of an opinion by the court, that those cases exhibited an estate in fee in the first taker, must be regarded as obiter dictum, since the real question involved was, not as to the character of the estate created by the devise, but, in the former of these cases, whether the devisee in fact, under the terms of the will, had a power of disposition, and in the others, what was the extent of that power?

In none of them, as I understand it, was the question raised as to the effect of the power upon the particular estate devised.

These cases, when compared with others, to some of which we shall presently refer, serve to mark this plain distinction—that where general words, implying an estate for life, if limited to such an estate, would manifestly defeat the intention of the testator, the intention shall control and enlarge the estate to a fee; but if the testator in express terms give an estate for life, the intention is manifest and beyond doubt; and in such case an added power of disposition cannot enlarge the estate, contrary to the testator's intention.

Thus, in Popham v. Banfield, Salk. 236, it is holden that, where a particular estate is expressly devised, a contrary intent is not to be implied by subsequent words; or, as the same case is expressed in 2 Vern. 449, "an express estate for life cannot be enlarged by an implication, but may by express words;" and, as again expressed in the statement of the same case, in 1 P. Wms. 54, "no estate raised by implication in a will can destroy an express estate."

In Thomlinson v. Dighton, Salk. 239, it is holden that "devise to A. for life, then to be at her disposal to any of her children, gives an estate for life, with power to dispose of the fee." In the argument for the defendant in the same case as reported 1 P. Wms. 149, it is said: "There are two cases that are express authorities that the wife in the principal case has but an estate for life, with a power to dispose of the fee; and these two cases do make this very difference, viz.: where lands are devised to one generally, and to be at his disposal, this is a fee in the devisee; but where lands are devised to one expressly for life, and afterwards to be at the devisee's disposal, only an estate for life passes to the devisee, with a bare power to dispose of the fee; for that (as it is said) words of implication shall not merge or destroy an express estate for life." The cases referred to are Anon, 3 Leon. 71, and Liefe v. Saltingstone, 1 Mod. 189. In accordance with these views was the opinion of the court. 1 P. Wms. 171.

In the case above referred to, from 3 Leon. 71, A., seized of lands in fee, devised them to his wife for life, and after her decease to give them to whom she would. The court said, "A. gave the lands expressly to his wife for life, and therefore she should not have, by implication, any further estate. But if an express estate had not been appointed to the wife, by the other words, the estate in fee would have passed." See to the same effect, Robinson v. Dusgate, 2 Vern. 181; Nannock v. Horton, 7 Ves. 398; Holmes v. Coghill, 7 Ves. 505; S. C. 12 Ves. 206.

Surman v. Surman, 5 Madd. Ch. 123, was a "bequest of household goods, &c., after payment of debts, to the testator's wife, for life or widowhood, with power to her to sell the same as she should think proper, for her own benefit and the maintenance of testator's nephew and daughter-in-law during their minorities, with a bequest over upon the death or second marriage of the wife, of the same, or so much as should then remain, to such nephew and daughter-in-law." Held, that "the widow was entitled to the residue (that is, after payment of debts) for her life or widowhood, with a power to apply any part of the capital for her own benefit and the proper maintenance of the nephew and daughter-in-law during their minorities; and that, on the death or marriage of the widow, the remainder of the capital unapplied was well limited over."

This case distinctly shows that the uncertainty whether there will be any remainder does not vitiate the limitation over, and that the power does not enlarge the estate for life to a fee.

And see Doe v. Martin, 4 D. & E. 39, at pp. 64, 65, where Lord Kenyon quotes Lord Hardwicke as saying in Cunningham v. Moody, 1 Ves. 174, that the effect of a power of appointment added to an estate for life "is, that the fee which was vested was thereby subject to be divested, if the whole were appointed."

And in Reith v. Seymour, 4 Russ. 263, it was holden that a gift of personal estate to the wife for life, with a direction that, after her death, one moiety thereof should be at her entire disposal, either by will or otherwise, amounts only to an estate for life in the use, with a power of appointment.

If we turn now to the American authorities, we shall find them numerous and conclusive to the effect that where the estate for life is devised by express terms, a power of disposal of the fee, whether general or special, will not enlarge the estate. In Jackson v. Robins, 16 Johns. 537, at p. 588, Chancellor Kent says: "We may lay it down as an incontrovertible rule, that where an estate is given to a person generally, or indefinitely, with a power of disposition, it carries a fee; and the only exception to the rule is, where the testator gives to the first taker an estate for life only, by certain and express words, and annexes to it a power of disposal. In that particular and special case, the devisee for life will not take an estate in fee, notwithstanding the distinct and naked gift of a power of disposition of the reversion. This distinction is carefully marked and settled in the cases."

In the Virginia Court of Appeals this matter is considered at great length, and presented with much force by Tucker, President, in Burwell's Ex'rs v. Anderson, Adm'r, 3 Leigh, 348, particularly at pp. 356–358, where it is said "a devise to A., with power to dispose at pleasure, is considered as conveying property, not as conferring power; for the words of power will not be permitted to take away what, without them, is expressly given. 2 Preston on Est. 81, 82; 13 Ves. 453. But where there is an express and inconsistent estate for life given, the construction of the instrument is altogether different; for the express estate for life negatives the intention to give the absolute property, and converts these words into words of mere power, which, standing alone, would have been construed to convey an interest. This appears to me to be very clearly established by the cases that were cited at the bar; which, further, lay it down, that where an interest and not a mere power is conferred, the absolute property is vested, without any act on the part of the legatee; but where a power only is given, that power must be executed, or it will fail."

Not to multiply quotations, the general principle established by the foregoing cases, and the manifest distinction between property and power, will be found laid down as the law in Flintham's Appeal, 11 S. & R. 18; 2d Pres. Church v. Disbrow, 52 Pa. St. 219; Haralson v. Redd, 15 Geo. 151; Cook v. Walker, 15 Geo. 457, 463; Morris v. Phaler, 1 Watts, 390; Rubey v. Barnett, 12 Mo. 3; Pulliam v. Byrd, 2 Strob. Eq. 134; Ward v. Amory, 1 Curtis C. C. 419, and numerous other cases.

Particular reference, however, should be made to the case of Denson v. Mitchell et ux., 26 Ala. 360, which overrules the case of Flinn v. Davis, 18 Ala. 132, cited by the appellants, if that case is to be regarded as supporting their view of the matter.

In Denson v. Mitchell et ux., it is said that "an express bequest of an estate for life negatives the intention to give the absolute property, and converts a superadded right of disposition into a mere power."

These views seem to be fully endorsed by the text writers; thus, Kent says (4 Com. 520, 521): "If an estate be given to a person generally or indefinitely, with a power of disposition, it carries a fee, unless the testator gives to the first taker an estate for life only, and annexes to it power of disposition of the reversion. In that case the express limitation for life will control the operation of the power, and prevent it from enlarging the estate to a fee." See, also, 2 Washb. R. P. *371; Greenleaf's Note to 6 Cruise, 208, Devise, ch. 11, sec. 6.

In our own State the decisions seem to be not in conflict with the doctrines we have stated. Thus, in Eaton v. Straw, 18 N. H. 320, the head note is, "A general power of disposition, existing as a power, does not imply ownership, but excludes the idea of an absolute fee simple in the party who possesses the power."

This case is cited by the appellants as an authority to the point that there can be no limitation over after the gift of a general power of disposition, which is undoubtedly true if the distinction be entirely disregarded which we have found to be so marked and plain, and the general power of disposition be applied to a general devise, without limitation of a life estate. That was the case of an executory devise, and the precise point before us did not arise, but the doctrine of the case is expressed in the head note above quoted.

In French v. Hatch, 28 N. H. 331, at page 350, Mr. Chief Justice Gilchrist expresses in the plainest terms, the true rule, as follows: "Where there is a devise for life, in express terms, a power of disposition does not enlarge it to a fee. But where to a general devise, without any specification of the quality of interest, an absolute power of disposition is annexed, the devisee takes a fee. This distinction is carefully marked and settled in the case of Jackson v. Robins, 16 Johns. 558, and cases cited by Kent, Ch." This case which was a gift by will of both personal and real property expressly limited for life, necessarily involved the consideration of the distinction between a general devise and an express limitation for life. Upon this branch of the case, therefore, it is precisely in point, and seems to settle the law of this State in accordance with the doctrine declared by Chancellor Kent, in Jackson v. Robins.

And in the earlier case of Leavit v. Wooster, 14 N. H. 551, although the point was not presented in such manner as to require adjudication, the principle seems clearly recognized by Gilchrist, J., in the following language: "The quantity of estate devised to her is not a matter of doubt, as she is expressly limited to an estate for life. There are numerous cases which hold that where a devise contains no words of limitation, and the payment of debts and legacies is made a personal charge upon the devisee, he takes a fee by implication, unless there are other words in the will which limit the quantum of interest. But that question does not arise in this case, as the estate of the devisee is particularly described."

In Dennet v. Dennet, 40 N. H. 498, Bell, C. J., remarks concerning the case then before the court: "The terms of this will, 'all the residue of my estate,' if standing uncontrolled by other expressions, would pass a fee (citing among other cases, Leavit v. Wooster). They cannot be so construed here, because the devises following control the sense, and show that a life estate was intended to be given him."

The cases already cited from our own reports, together with Weeks v. Weeks, 5 N. H. 326; Ladd v. Harvey, 21 N. H. 514; Yeaton v. Roberts, 28 N. H. 459; and Healey v. Toppan, 45 N. H. 243, show that there is no distinction between real and personal property with regard to the limitation of a remainder after an estate for life, except, perhaps, in the case where the use necessarily involves the destruction of the property.

Richardson, C. J., in Weeks v. Weeks, 5 N. H. 326, remarks: "In ancient times there could be no limitation over of a chattel after a gift for life, but such a gift carried the absolute property. Afterwards a distinction was made between the use and the property. The use might be given to one for life, and then the property afterwards to another. But this distinction is now disregarded. The law admits of a limitation over by will of a chattel interest, after a life estate in the same." To the same effect is Ladd v. Harvey and Yeaton v. Roberts, before cited.

Many of the English cases before referred to in this connection, were bequests of personal property.

Smith v. Bell, 6 Peters, 68, is a very important case in support of the general proposition that a power of disposition does not enlarge an express estate for life. It would be interesting and instructive to quote lengthy passages from the luminous opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, in that case, but we forbear, commending the case to the attention of the lawyer and student, simply repeating the language of that celebrated jurist, that "the rule that a remainder may be limited after a life estate in personal property, is as well settled as any other principle of our law."

Having determined that Mrs. Hersey took by her husband's will a life estate with a power of disposal, and Dennis a vested remainder, subject to be divested by the due execution of the power, the next question presented is, was the power legally executed by Mrs. Hersey's will?

The property devised to Mrs. Hersey by her husband's will consisted of real estate, returned in the inventory of his estate at $1,365, and personal estate returned at $1.178.64, making $2.543.64. In addition to this, she had, in her own right, at the time of her death, real estate returned in the inventory of her estate at $738, and personal estate returned at $814.97, making $1,552.97.

By her last will, she gave certain special bequests, the character and value of which are not indicated by the case, and then declared as follows: "I give, bequeath, and devise to Benaniah P. Burleigh, and his wife, Mary Burleigh, all the rest and residue of my estate, real, personal and mixed, wherever found and however situated, while they both live; and in the event of the death of one of them, to descend to the survivor, his or her (as the case may be) heirs and assigns forever."

A preliminary question is suggested, namely, Did Jacob Hersey, by his will, give to his wife a power of disposition by will of the estate devised to her? The terms of the devise in Jacob Hersey's will are—"to her, the said Hannah Hersey, to her use and disposal during her natural life; and what is remaining at her decease, undisposed of by her, I give, devise and bequeath, unto Joshua E. Dennis, and his heirs and assigns forever."

It is suggested by the appellee, in argument, that "Hersey and his wife were two childless people, having each separate property, not very unequal in amount; that, in addition to her own property, which might well be considered of itself adequate to her support, he gave her the use of all his property for her life, with authority to dispose of such part of it as she might need or desire, leaving what might be remaining at her decease to Dennis, to whom he gave all his property in case he survived his wife; that giving her the power to apply to her own use such part of the property as she might choose during her life would abundantly provide for her comfort and independence, without entrusting to her the power to give away by will what remained at her decease, and so defeat the remainder limited to Dennis, and would fully answer all the object which we can suppose her husband had in the provisions made for her;" that the testator intended a substantial benefit to Dennis, and did not intend that anything of his should go by descent to the heirs of his wife, nor that any will of hers should take from Dennis what was remaining at her decease, and give it to her devisee or legatee.

The construction of his will, like hers, is to be governed by the intention of the maker, if it can be ascertained; and, supposing those circumstances alluded to to exist (which we do not understand to be controverted), they must be regarded as quite material, as affecting the question of intention.

And, in connection with the phraseology of his will, they suggest to our minds very serious doubts whether Jacob Hersey intended to give to his wife a power of disposition by will.

We do not, however, find it necessary to decide that such was not his intention.

Recurring, then, to the main question upon this branch of the case—Was the power of disposal executed by force of Mrs. Hersey's will?

The will disposes of her estate, but makes no mention of the power, nor of the estate which was subject to the power.

The rule must be regarded as settled, by doctrine and authority of very ancient date, and of almost uniform application, that where a power is given which may be exercised by a will, it will not be executed unless there is a reference in the will to the power, or to the subject of it, or unless the will would be inoperative without the aid of the power, and the intention to execute it became clear and manifest. 4 Kent's Com. 334; 1 Jarman on Wills, 628, note.

In Lovell v. Knight, 3 Sim. 275, Shadwell, V. C., said: "I apprehend it to be perfectly settled that whenever a will is couched in such terms as that, upon the face of it, it appears to express an intention to pass the general property which may belong to the party making the will, such a will shall not be deemed an execution of the power with regard to any specific property."

This remark was applied to the case where a married woman, having power to appoint leaseholds and stock, by her will, executed and attested as required by the power, but not referring to it, gave to her husband the whole of her property, both real and personal, and whatsoever she might possess at her decease. It was held that this was not an execution of the power.

This case is expressly affirmed in Lempriere v. Valpy, 5 Sim. 108, where the V. C., at page 121, adverts to what he calls the known rule laid down in Standen v. Standen, 2 Ves., Jr. 589; Standen v. McNab, 6 Bro. P. C. 193, 2d ed.; Bennett v. Aburrow, 8 Ves. 609; Jones v. Tucker, 2 Mer. 533; Jones v. Curry, 1 Swanst. 66. In Standen v. Standen, ante, the lord chancellor (Loughborough) declares the rule to be as expressed in Sir Edward Clere's Case, 6 Co. 17, b, that a general disposition will not dispose of what the party has only a power to dispose of, unless it is necessary to satisfy the words of the disposition.

In Jones v. Curry, ante, the M. R., in giving judgment, said: "This will contains no words which will be without operation, unless referred to the power: on the contrary, the testatrix uses terms of generality—'all my estate and effects of whatever denomination.' That clause would embrace all her real and personal property, but would it go beyond that?" And in Webb v. Honnor, 1 Jac. & Walk. 352, the M. R. said: "In this instrument there is nothing to show that the testator meant to dispose of anything but his own property. Every part of it is satisfied by giving all that he was possessed of."

The only exception to the requirement of a reference to the power or the subject matter of it, in order to the execution of the power, evidently is the fact that the will, in the given case, must be wholly inoperative without the aid of the power. "A general roving description of property in a will is not sufficient" to execute a power, said the V. C. in Rooke v. Rooke, 2 Drew & Smale, 38, 44. "If you can find evidence of the testator's intention to dispose of the property which is the subject of the power, then the court will give effect to that intention."

Best, C. J., in Doe v. Roake, 2 Bing. 497, 504, expresses the doctrine and the rule thus: "It has long been settled, that an express declaration of the intent to execute a power is not necessary; on the other hand, no terms, however comprehensive, although sufficient to pass every species of property, freehold and copyhold, real and personal, will execute a power, unless they demonstrate that the testator had the power in his contemplation, and intended by his will to execute it." See the remarks of Lord Chief Justice Hobart, in the Commendam case, Hob. Rep. 159, 160; and, for a review of the antecedent English and American cases, the opinion of Judge Story, in Blagge v. Miles, 1 Story, 426, where he says, at page 446:—"I agree that the intention to execute the power must be apparent and clear, so that the transaction is not fairly susceptible of any other interpretation. If it be doubtful, under all the circumstances, then that doubt will prevent it from being deemed an execution of the power." And see Gratwick's Trusts, 1 L. R. Eq. 177; Attorney General v. Wilkinson, 2 L. R. Eq. 817; Johnson v. Stanton, 30 Conn. 297.

Now, although we can have no doubt that the rule of the common law in England, and wherever in this country it has not been changed by legislation, is in accordance with the doctrine declared by these numerous and most respectable authorities, we cannot refrain from expressing our extreme dissatisfaction with this supposed condition of the law.

Perhaps Lord Eldon used too strong language, if he made the remark attributed to him by Sir John Leach, in Hughes v. Turner, 3 Myl. & K. 688, that the rule, "although professed to be adopted in order to further the intention of the testator, in nine cases out of ten defeats that object."

However that may be, and whether the rule is the result of a correct interpretation of the law or not, its practical operation was found to work injustice in so many instances that British legislation was invoked for a remedy, and it became enacted by the Statute of Wills of 7 Wm. IV & 1 Vic., ch. 26, sec. 27, "that a general devise of real or personal estate shall operate as an execution of a power of the testator over the same, unless a contrary intention shall appear on the will."

"By this statute," says Judge Story, in a note to Blagge v. Miles, before cited, "all these refined and subtle distinctions, in relation to the execution of powers, are now swept away in England, and the doctrine has at last settled down in that

JOHN H. CAMPBELL,
EDITOR.

HON. WM. M. MEREDITH.

EULOGIES OF THE DECEASED, DELIVERED BY HON. GEO. W. BIDDLE, OF PHILADELPHIA, AND HON. J. MACDOWELL SHARPE, OF CHAMBERSBURG, IN THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION, SEPT. 16TH, 1873.

MR. BIDDLE'S ADDRESS.

Mr. President: It is not because I expect to add anything to the comprehensive and eloquent eulogy that has been pronounced by the mover of the resolutions upon our deceased friend that I rise to speak; it is because I feel it a necessity to say something on this occasion of one whom I have known, whom I have honored, whom I have revered from early boyhood.

I may be permitted to say in the outset of these remarks, that I was allowed the great privilege of close personal intercourse with the distinguished deceased, that free interchange of mind with mind which enables us truly to form a just estimate of the character of a friend.

In a body like this, composed so largely of members of the same profession, it is not perhaps inappropriate to refer to the professional life of the distinguished dead. Indeed, so much of that professional life was, as it were, a public life, because in no question of great public interest was Mr. Meredith, for many, very many years of his active life at the bar, absent from one side or the other, that in speaking of his professional life, we, in a measure, touch upon that other life which has been so well referred to in the resolutions and in the speech introductory of them.

Mr. Meredith, born the son of an eminent practitioner of the law, was so well educated in and imbued with the principles of jurisprudence, that at an early age he stepped forth as the thoroughly trained lawyer, the ready advocate, equal to any forensic encounter; yet his advance was a slow one, and his success but tardy, for he neither had, nor affected, the popular arts by which practice at the bar is early secured. He could not solicit business, business must solicit him; not because he thought it wrong to solicit business, but because he disdained it. Success did ultimately come, as we all well know, and first in a cause which involved not only the interests of his native city, but, as it were, the interests of every citizen in this commonwealth. The exhibition in this case of his great legal acumen, his profound knowledge of the early history of the commonwealth, his wonderful mastery of all the weapons of advocacy, placed him at once in the front ranks of a profession then led by a Binney, a Sergeant, and a Chauncey. After the decision of the case I refer to, which occurred in the year 1837, a case involving the right of the people of this commonwealth to the full enjoyment of one of the public squares of thivicity, his success was assured and his advance rapid; for I feel entirely safe in saying that until his call by President Taylor to the secretaryship of the treasury, no important cause was argued in the State in which he was not retained on one side or on the other.

How he conducted the business entrusted to his hands very many gentlemen on the floor of this house well known, and it requires no statement from me to call to recollection the brilliant and successful manner in which his abilities were displayed in the service of every client by whom he was employed.

In the office of attorney general, which he filled at a comparatively recent date, his term of six years was marked by a singular devotion to the interests of the commonwealth. It would be rendering but poor justice to his character to say that no temptation could ever for a moment induce him to swerve from the strict line of duty. It is not in that way that I wish to speak of him; but I desire to refer to his zeal, his devotion to the cause of the commonwealth, his thorough personal identification with the interests of the State; all of which qualities were so eminently conspicuous as to impress, in a very marked manner, those who were brought into necessary opposition with him by the nature of their business. He retired from that office, leaving upon it, in a striking degree, the impress of his great abilities and his high character.

In concluding this very slight sketch of his professional career, I feel that I am not overstepping the bounds of just eulogium if I apply to him what the master of Roman oratory said of a great contemporary when he characterized him as the most eloquent of the lawyers, the most lawyer-like in his eloquence, eloquentissimus jurisperitorum, jurisperitissimus eloquentium.

But here, in this convention so lately presided over by him, it seems more appropriate to touch upon his public life, upon that side of his life which was dedicated to the public service, to public affairs. I wish to say a few words in regard to his political character.

Mr. Meredith was born a Federalist. He came into the world in perhaps the most exciting period of the politics of this country, certainly in as exciting a period as ever existed. He was born in the year 1799, in the presidency of the elder Adams; and intellectually precocious, he entered as a mere boy warmly and sympathetically into the political feelings and the political excitements of that day. His attachment to his own party leaders, or rather to the leaders of the party in which he was born, and to which he adhered so long as it was a party, partook of the ardor of his temperament; yet it was not to the principles of the party as such, so much as to the men who led it, that he gave his thorough adhesion. He was a Federalist, without being strongly attached to any of the peculiar tenets of that most respectable party. He certainly was not what might be called a concentrationalist, a consolidationist. He was rather the reverse, rather a States rights man. He was not a liberal constructionist; he was rigid in his views of the explication of the great charter which lies at the foundation of our government. It was to the Federal party as he conceived it ought to be, rather than to the principles which the existing Federal party enunciated, that he gave his full concurrence. While he worshipped the great men of the party, he never could have gone along thoroughly with all their political peculiarities. When he reached manhood he was undoubtedly strongly imbued with many of their views; but with his advent into active life that party had practically ceased to exist, for Mr. Meredith attained his majority just about the time of the second presidency of Mr. Monroe, when, as we all know, party opposition lay for the moment dormant, if not dead.

Mr. Meredith was formed to be a debater, and as has been very justly said by my distinguished colleague from Philadelphia (Mr. Carey), his fellow citizens were not slow in discovering his great powers in that direction, and at least a decade of years before he had become distinguished at the bar, by the unsolicited suffrages of the voters of his native city, he was elected to the Legislature of the commonwealth, where he soon became eminent.

Let me say a few words here about what I believe to have been some of his characteristics as a debater. He certainly was in the very foremost ranks in this respect, if not the very first. I disparage no man when I say this. Strong, vigorous good sense, clothed in nervous language, rising as the subject rose to fervor, and often to passion; directness of purpose, singling out the strong points of attack, and throwing overboard the little ones; wonderful power of repartee, biting sarcasm where he chose to resort to it, were only some of the parliamentary weapons which he had at ready command. His masterly treatment of any great political question has again and again impressed his listeners with admiration. How he seized with instinctive rapidity the weak points of his adversary; how cogently he drove home his own strong blows with sledge hammer force, many gentlemen here have again and again witnessed with delight, and almost with approval, even when they differed from the views of the speaker.

It has been said here, and truly said, there was nothing aggressive in his nature; but while he was not aggressive he held his honor in a wary distance, which made it dangerous to offer the slightest offence to it, and woe betide the man who incautiously or presumingly thought that in the way of attack he might safely measure his sword with Mr. Meredith's; his defeat was a foregone conclusion.

Mr. Meredith, without the most indirect solicitation on his part, or even on the part of his friends, after presiding long and well over the local Legislature of this city, and after conducting for a quarter of a century or so the leading business at the bar here, was called by President Taylor to one of the most important positions in his gift. That President did not live long enough (I think but little over a year) to enable him to develop anything like a fixed or settled policy, and therefore Mr. Meredith's great abilities were scarcely tested in the treasury department; but his trueness, his integrity of purpose, were shown there as everywhere else. His disdain of mere party intrigues, of mere partisanship, were conspicuous here, as they always had been throughout his whole life. He was too little, probably, of a politician to be very successful in public life. He dwelt too little upon that which is usually uppermost in the thoughts and calculations of the mere politician, to cope very successfully with those who walked nearer the earth; but had he been permitted to hold the position to which he was called, for its ordinary period, undoubtedly he would have greatly distinguished himself.

How he conducted himself as attorney general of this great commonwealth, to which post he was invited by our friend and colleague, Governor Curtin, has been so well spoken of by my colleague from Philadelphia, that I am indisposed to add a single word upon that portion of his public life.

Every man in Pennsylvania, every man in the country, felt a sincere pleasure when it was announced that he was to represent the United States as one of its counsel before the tribunal at Geneva. While the fact that he did not finally accept this position was not unfortunate for himself, it was certainly so, in my estimation, for his country. Had he been present as one of its leading counsel, I believe, from my estimate of his character, that this country would have been spared the humiliation of advancing pretensions not only destitute of justice, but even of the cover of plausibility, and which the good sense of the whole people, the moment they were announced, unhesitatingly rejected. Nor would our government have been placed in the dilemma from which it was in part curiously enough extricated by the pronunciation in advance, by the tribunal which might have been ultimately called upon to adjudicate them, of an adverse opinion as to claims which were withdrawn from its consideration without formal presentation and argument. Mr. Meredith would have been a party to no such procedure.

But the crowning event of his life, in my opinion, was the position to which he was called in this convention, not only by its unanimous suffrage, but by the unanimous heartfelt selection of every man here. No mere party man, no man who had erected as the standard by which he was to govern his political life, mere adherence to party, could have received this choice in such a way. It was because every one felt and knew that he never could, and never did "give up to party what was meant for mankind," that Mr. Meredith stood in the estimation of this body not only as its foremost man, but as the man who was entitled to receive the unsolicited vote of every delegate present. No doubt, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, he was a party man so far as to adhere to the general policy marked out by his party, surbordinating to the success of this policy any petty or private differences of opinion on minor points; no doubt he was a party man to the extent of sinking unselfishly his real or supposed claims when the interests of his party seemed to demand it. But he never pre-pledged himself to follow the dictates of party or party leaders, without regard to whether in his judgment they were right or wrong. Much less would he have ever bound himself in advance, under the specious plea of adherence to party, to accept unhesitatingly mere party nominations for all offices, judicial and others, as they were cast before him by party dictators. Mr. Meredith was not that man; and the best authority entitles me to say that more than once he overlooked in this regard party considerations as altogether inferior to what he conceived to be his duty to himself and to his country.

Mr. Meredith's character was such, his public and his private character was so simple, so direct, so free from all affectation, he was so accessible in intercourse, that we scarcely knew how great a man he was until we found ourselves deprived of him. And this community in which he lived, perhaps a little cold in its external manifestations, a little too much averse to anything like demonstrativeness, only felt silently the worth and the value of the man who was dwelling in its midst. But when Philadelphia, with the whole country, was aroused by the intelligence of his decease to a full sense of her loss, she then keenly perceived and warmly and strongly expressed her sense of the bereavement. She has felt, and she will long continue to feel, in the death of this distinguished man, her very great loss, and she will long continue to search for, without finding, another fit to replace him.

MR. SHARPE'S ADDRESS.

Mr. President, we are conscious once again of the presence of death in this chamber. Since we crossed its portals on the 16th of July last, his messenger has summoned hence the distinguished and venerable president of this convention. A prince and a great man has fallen in our midst. It seems hard, indeed, to realize that William M. Meredith lives no longer upon earth; that he hath gone down to the grave and shall come up no more; that he shall return no more to this house, neither shall his place know him any more. But he hath gone to his rest, full of years and crowned with honor. After having scaled all the difficult ascents of professional success, after having attained the summit of professional distinction, after having shed the effulgence of his radiant intellect upon the jurisprudence of his country and his age, after having filled the ear of the nation with his great fame, he now sleeps well, where the weary be at rest.

I purpose not to enlarge upon the character, virtues, and career of this most remarkable man. Tongues far more eloquent than mine have done all this. Voices that have a much better right than mine to be heard on this melancholy occasion have spoken in fitting terms of the illustrious dead. Hearts that were knit to his by the closest ties of friendship, and cemented with his by a life-long intimacy and companionship, have come up into the mouth, and given utterance to their uncontrollable emotions. I have no ambition at all to thrust myself unduly upon the sacred solemnities of this sad hour. I only desire to add my humble tribute to the volume of eulogy that has gone forth from the hearts of this august body. I only wish to say that the chambers of my heart are also draped in mourning. and that in them dwells too the same consciousness that pervades this entire assembly, of the irreparable loss which we have sustained in the death of Mr. Meredith. The temptation to do so much was irresistible, for "I did love the man and do honor his memory, this side idolatry, as much as any." It is certainly safe to assert that there is not one of us whose heartstrings do not tone themselves in harmony with the voice of praise, and whose judgment does not commend the encomiums that have been heard here to-day on behalf of Mr. Meredith.

It matters not in what light we gaze at him, he dazzles us. It matters not in what pursuit we follow him, he was in all alike unapproachable. As a lawyer, learned, profound, unequalled. As an advocate, transcendently persuasive and eloquent. As a statesman, broad-minded, catholic and deeply versed in the science and true principles of government. As a patriot, imbued with a zeal and love of country far surpassing the passion of a devotee. As a citizen, progressive, enterprising, public spirited, and a lover of order. As a gentleman, without stain and without reproach. As a man, big hearted, benevolent, charitable, of unimpeachable integrity, and with the most exquisite sense of honor. As a pater familias, a model of all the domestic virtues. There was met in him, such a combination of rich qualities, great faculties and rare traits, as is seldom found in one man. But with all, he had an unassuming modesty and gentleness of deportment that added additional lustre to the glories that clustered about and adorned his character.

He possessed also in an eminent degree that crowning ornament of all mental stature, good common sense. Without this treasure, the most shining parts and most brilliant faculties can only achieve but temporary success. The meteor that flashes across the midnight firmament, and then goes out in darkness forever, is a fitting emblem of genius, without the ballast of a sound judgment. But the intellect of Mr. Meredith burst not in meteoric showers. It shone upon everything it touched with the steadiness and fixedness of the rays that come down from the sun. For he was not simply brilliant; he was also cool-headed. He had not the flash of genius merely, but with it, the clear-sightedness, calm deliberation, and sound understanding of the philosopher.

Neither was he one "to split the ears of the groundlings." He had no ambition at all for this. He had a native dignity of character, and an intense self-respect which lifted him high above all the arts and tricks of the demagogue. He was a statesman, but not a politician, in the present popular and degraded sense of that term. He was a party man, but not a partisan. He had faith in the utility of parties in a republic, and he believed his party was right. He rejoiced in its triumph—not for the sake of the spoils of victory—but for the sake of its principles. Loving his country as he did, he could not help loving his party, for to him the welfare of the nation was bound up in the success of his party. He had no confidence, however, in the Jesuitical dogma that the end justifies the means, and therefore he loathed with intense loathing the bribery, corruption and intimidation which are the crying evils and the burning shame of the politics of the present times. No earthly consideration could have induced him to countenance the employment of any sinister means or improper agencies, although they might have been demonstrated ever so clearly, to be absolutely necessary to party triumphs. He had an abiding confidence in the common sense and inborn integrity of the people, and he infinitely preferred honorable defeat to dishonorable victory. His whole aim was the happiness of his race and the prosperity of his country. His loyalty to his party was meant for this and this only. Who can help but admire him for it?

Mr. President, I feel that it would be presumptuous for me to undertake to weigh in my small balances the value of the life work of Mr. Meredith. I am wholly conscious that I have no capacity to take in the full measure of that great man. But I trust that indulgence will be granted to a brief allusion to one or two phases of his career that have enlisted my closest attention, and excited my highest admiration. Coming to the bar as I did at the immature age of twenty, I had of course no experience in the fierce conflicts of the forum, and no knowledge of the professional athletes that struggled for the prizes in that arena.

But he whose death we mourn to-day was then in the zenith of his great fame, and its effulgence reached even me in my quiet obscurity. The heart of the young professional aspirant must necessarily have some idol. Its altar must burn incense to some deity. I could claim no exemption from this common frailty—if frailty it indeed be. Hence, Mr Meredith became the object of my hero-worship, for he had won victories more highly to be prized than the conquest of kingdoms. His brows were wreathed with greener and more honorable laurels than those of the war-worn and blood-stained chieftain. It became my delight to glean from every source, and to garner up in the cells of memory every fact and circumstance that entered into his early professional life. With what interest I pondered and mused and wondered over the wild bursts of passion, that must have swept through the chambers of his heart, and the rough conflicts that must have torn the realms of his mind, while he patiently waited for public recognition and appreciation during his long novitiate.

Such a contemplation was consoling and somewhat flattering, for it proved that genius must sometimes at least temporarily wear the fetters of mediocrity.

But when my mental vision, passing beyond this contracted and unnatural orbit of such a brilliant luminary, followed his subsequent career, and grasped its magnitude and power; when I read and studied the great cases which his intellect had illumined; when I came to know and comprehend, imperfectly it is true, the mental sweep that could by a touch make the most abstruse principles luminous to the commonest understanding, then, indeed, I suffered the pangs of hopeless despair, for I realized that his goal was as far beyond my reach as the sun in the firmament. It was by such mental processes that I came to fix the professional standard of Mr. Meredith, for I had very few of the opportunities which some of the gentlemen of this conventio almost daily enjoyed of hearing and s ing him in this, to me, by far the most i teresting walk of his life. To me he was the epitome of all that was admirable and great and worthy of imitation in a lawyer. He would as soon have thought of violating the decalogue as of violating his professional word. He was one of that old-fashioned type of lawyers that stoutly doubted the professional ethics that would teach that a client's cause is to be gained at all hazards, and by any means. Whilst he was loyal to his client, he was equally loyal to truth and justice. If he did not always gain his case, he always saved his self-respect and honor.

For the passion that weds me to my profession, I do, therefore, the more honor him, because he, most of all his contemporaries, did exemplify its dignity and pre-eminence above all other temporal pursuits. And I am glad to hear upon this floor that my appreciation of him as a lawyer has been fully sustained by those who are so much more able than myself to form a correct and discriminating estimate of him in this regard.

Time will permit but a passing allusion to his duties and position as the president of this convention. His unanimous election to that dignified office was not only hailed with delight here, but also throughout the commonwealth, as a harbinger of that reformation in political and governmental affairs which the people so devoutly longed for, yet scarcely dared to hope for. It was a fitting seal to that popular judgment which had long since singled him out and commended him as the first citizen and great glory of his native city and State. His government here was characterized by urbanity, impartiality, promptness and dignity. Such was the weight of his character, and the sense of his intense honesty of purpose with us, that his decisions became the unquestioned law of this body. His administration has left behind it no private grievance to canker in any bosom, and no feeling of intentional slight or personal injustice dwells in any heart in this assembly. It seems to me that it is the experience of every one of us, that he was one of the very few great men who grew greater the nearer you approached him.

It was, therefore, with melancholy forebodings and sad misgivings, that we observed day by day the clay tabernacle that anchored his great spirit to earth gradually yielding to the assaults of disease. But he refused to put off the harness of active life so long as his spent frame could endure its weight. But though dead he yet liveth, and will live whilst learning and virtue and genius and moral greatness shall command the homage and admiration of the sons of men.

There are in the present Constitutional Convention of this State, three members of the last Constitutional Convention (1837-8), viz., Geo. W. Woodward, Wm. Darlington, and Saml. A. Purviance. The late Mr. Meredith was also a member of the Convention of 1837-8. There are now surviving, as far as can be ascertained, but twenty-one out of one hundred and thirty-three members of that body, viz., Daniel Agnew, Andrew Bayne, Andrew Bedford, Charles Brown, Joseph R. Chandler, Walter Craig, Wm. Darlington, John R. Donnell, David N. Farrelly Robert Fleming, John A. Gamble, Virgil Grenell, Orlo J. Hamlin, Henry G. Long. Levi Merkel, Christian Myers, Hiram Payne, Saml. A. Purviance, Ebenezer W. Sturdevant, Robert G. White, and Geo. W. Woodward.

District Court of Philad'a

SPENCE v. WALLACE.

1. Goods purchased by a married woman having no separate estate, with money loaned to her, are subject to levy by her husband's creditors.
2. The act of April 3d, 1872, includes only the "earnings" of a married woman; it cannot be construed to include borrowed money.

Opinion by LYND, J. Delivered July 12th, 1873.

This was a feigned issue upon a sheriff's interpleader. The plaintiff was the wife of the defendant in the execution. She borrowed money, and bought therewith the goods levied upon. She had no separate estate. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following reserved question: Whether goods purchased by a married woman who has no separate estate, with money loaned to her, are subject to levy by the creditors of her husband.

Bucher v. Rean, 18 P. F. S. 421, seems to settle this question against the plaintiff. But her counsel points to the act of April 3d, 1872, Brightley's Dig. 1010, §§ 38, 39: "The separate earnings of any married woman of the State of Pennsylvania, whether said earnings shall be as wages for labor, salary, property, business or otherwise, shall accrue to and enure to the separate benefit and use of said married woman, and be under the control of such married woman, independently of her husband, and so as not to be subject to any legal claim of such husband or to the claims of any creditor or creditors of such husband, the same as if such married women were a feme sole: Provided, That in any suit at law or in equity, in which the ownership of such property shall be in dispute, the person claiming such property, under this act, shall be compelled, in the first instance, to show title and ownership in the same."

He contends that money borrowed by a married woman, though not upon the credit of her separate estate, is protected from her husband's creditors by the letter of this legislation. But by the letter of the act, "separate earnings" alone are protected. Unless "separate earnings" and "borrowed money" are identical, the letter of the act does not help the plaintiff. That that which one earns is entirely different from that which one borrows, is too clear for ratiocination. The clause "whether said earnings shall be as wages for labor, salary, property, business or otherwise," even if much less inelegant and obscure than it is, does not enlarge the operation or scope of the main sentence. The thing comprehended is still "earnings"—nothing else. To amplify here would be to waste time.

But again, he contends that the purpose of the act was to still further break down the common law disabilities of married women, and to make her separate earnings her separate property, free from the control of her husband and of his creditors, and that moneys advanced to her by her friends, to enable her to go into business, and to thus acquire profits or earnings, are as well entitled to protection as are such profits or earnings.

But this view overlooks the fact that a wife can have no separate credit. For what she borrows, with the concurrence of her husband, he is liable. Personally she is not liable for money loaned to her, although her separate estate, if any, and if properly pledged, may be liable. Robinson v. Wallace, 3 Wr. 129. Why should she have an independent control of that which she acquires at his expense? Why should his other creditors be shut out from such property, when this creditor can come in upon his general property? It was probably because of this that the Legislature did not frame the act so that "moneys loaned" to a married woman would be clearly within the letter of it.

This would be holding open the door for fraud so wide as to imply an invitation to enter. Should the law lead its subject into temptation?

It may be, too, that public policy dictated the omission. A failing debtor could contrive many indirect modes of getting his money into the hands of a friend, if that money could be loaned to his wife and be used in business by her, free from the reach of his creditors. Detection by the latter would be almost impracticable.

But even though no reason could be assigned why moneys loaned to a feme covert should not become her separate property, as absolutely as her separate earnings become so under the act in question, we should still deem it our duty, inasmuch as the two things are distinct and independent, to refuse to adopt the construction contended for by the plaintiff. Legislative and judicial functions must not be confounded. If it was the intent of the lawmakers to protect moneys loaned to a wife, they should have caused it to be so written.

Judgment for defendant on the point reserved.

Thomas J. Diehl, Esq., for execution plaintiff.

Court of Chancery, England.

BOOTH v. ALCOCK.

1. The court will restrain a landlord from interfering with his tenant's lights, although the diminution of light is not great, and although if the contest were merely between neighboring properties, the court would only award damages.
2. The defendant being lessee of properties A. and B., granted an underlease of A., "together with all lights," to the plaintiff. He subsequently acquired the fee in B.
3. The court restrained him from so building upon B. as to interfere in any way with the lights of his lessee of A.

[March 20, 1873.—28 L. T., N. S. 221.]

By indenture dated 31st August, 1864, the defendant underleased to the plaintiff for the term of twenty-one years, a messuage, No. 26 Old Change, in the city of London, "together with all edifices, buildings, ways, lights, sewers, water-courses, rights, easements, advantages, and appurtenances." The lease contained a covenant for quiet enjoyment. At the time of granting the underlease the defendant was himself lessee of the messuage, for the term of eighty years, and was also assignee of an underlease of an adjoining messuage and premises in Distaff lane, situate on the east side of the Old Change property, of which the term would expire in 1868.

The messuage, No. 26 Old Change, was lighted on the east side by windows and a skylight. Subsequently to granting the underlease of the Old Change property, the defendant purchased the freehold of the property in Distaff lane, and pulled down the messuage with the intention of rebuilding it. The defendant proposed to raise the new building twenty-one feet higher than the old one, which would have the effect of interfering to some extent with the plaintiff's light.

On the 19th February, 1873, the plaintiff filed a bill to restrain the defendant from raising the house in Distaff lane to a greater height than the house which formerly stood there, or so as to interfere with the plaintiff's light and air. The case now came on on motion for injunction.

Cotton, Q. C., and E. Harvey for the plaintiff.

Glasse, Q. C., and W. R. Ellis, for the defendant.

The following cases were cited: Tipping v. Eckersley, 2 K. & J. 264; Beadel v. Perry, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 465; 15 L. T. Rep., N. S. 345; Senior v. Pawson, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 330.

The vice chancellor said he did not think the diminution of the plaintiff's light would be great, still there would be a material interference with it. If this had been an ancient light case between neighboring proprietors, he thought it would have been a case for damages and not injunction; but it was clear that a landlord could not do anything in derogation of his tenant's rights. The plaintiff was entitled to the uninterrupted use of his lights for every purpose for which they could possibly be used. The injunction must, therefore, be granted.

country to what would seem to be the dictate of common sense, unaffected by technical niceties."

See, also, the remarks of Hoar, J., in Avery v. Meredith, 7 Allen, 397, where the rule of the common law is repudiated.

But the rule is too clearly recognized and established in our own State to be disregarded. See Bell v. Twilight, 22 N. H. 500. And while we cannot let the occasion pass without expressing our doubts as to its practical justice, we feel quite confident that its application to the present case will do no wrong, but on the contrary, will fully effectuate the intention of both Jacob and Hannah Hersey, with regard to the disposition of their several estates.

Our conclusion, in view of all the apparent circumstances, as well as the settled rules of construction, is, that Mrs. Hersey, by her last will, did not execute—as she did not intend to execute—the power conferred by the will of her husband.

The counsel for the appellants refer us to but two cases in support of their position upon this branch of the case. Neither of them is in point. In the one—Jackson v. Coleman, 2 Johns. 392—there was no limitation of a life estate to the wife, the testatrix, and no power to be executed by her; in the other—Harris v. Knapp, 21 Pick. 412—as we have already observed, the question was not as to the execution, but related only to the extent of the power.

The appellants, however, insist that, even in the position in which this case is placed by the opinions now expressed, their third reason for appeal must be allowed.

This is, because the judge of probate, in the final settlement of the account of the executor of Mrs. Hersey's will, allowed him the sum of $262.96 for cash which he had paid to the executor of Jacob Hersey's will, which sum was the amount of money that had been paid to Mrs. Hersey from her husband's estate.

This money was part of the gross amount of personal estate derived from her husband, the whole being, as appraised, $1,048.96; and this money was not kept separate by Mrs. Hersey, and, in its use by her, no distinction was made between it and other money belonging to her, not derived from her husband.

Upon this point, the position of the appellants seems to be, that, since Mrs. Hersey received personal estate from her husband to the amount of $1,048.96, and had at her death only $814.97, therefore she must have executed her power of disposal over the difference, which is $233.99, and that to that extent, at least, the executor's claim for $262.96 was improperly allowed; but, further than this, that the commingling of the money derived from her husband with her own money, and the indiscriminate use of the whole, constitute a disposal of the money, within the meaning of the will, and was an execution of the power to divest the remainder.

But the argument, so far as it is based upon an exhibition of figures, fails; for, by examination of the inventory of Mrs. Hersey's estate, to which we are referred by the case, it appears that the articles of personal property which she received from her husband's estate, and which at the time of her death remained unchanged in form, are not included in the $814.97, but are returned in the inventory separately "as an inventory of articles which belonged to the estate of Jacob Hersey, and which is in controversy as to title."

These articles amount to $342.77. There are also the avails of the hay cut on the land, and which would be a part of the proceeds of Mrs. Hersey's estate for life, amounting to $128, and these sums added to the rest of the personal estate, make the total $1,285.74, instead of $1,048 96—or $236.78 more than the amount derived from her husband's estate.

These figures, however, do not afford us much aid, while they furnish no support to the appellant's argument; for it does not appear how much personal property Mrs. Hersey had in her own right, at the time of her husband's death, nor how much of that derived from her husband was of such character that it would necessarily be destroyed and consumed in the using.

A change of form in the nature of personal property, which can only be profitably enjoyed by making such change, is by no means to be regarded, per se, as an execution of a power of disposition over it. The profitable use of money is obtained only by its investment in securities paying interest, or in property, like live stock, for example, on a farm, from the labor of which profit may be derived. The remainderman is not defrauded nor harmed—his estate is not divested nor diminished—if the money—the $262.96 limited to him by Jacob Hersey's will,—comes to him at last through Mrs. Hersey's executor, whether that money in the meantime, has been usefully employed or kept "laid up in a napkin."

The tenant for life is entitled to the use of the money. She is not required to give security for it to the remainderman, and her executor is only bound to account for the fund, not for the identical money, precisely as he has done in this case. Weeks v. Weeks, 5 N. H. 326; French v. Hatch, 28 N. H. 352; Healey v. Toppan, 45 N. H. 243.

In Healey v. Toppan, it is said that "there is nothing in the fact that real and personal estate are bequeathed together, at the same time, and in the same general or residuary bequest, that tends to show that the testator intended that the personal property, or any part of it, should be enjoyed in specie by the tenant for life."

A change, therefore, in the precise form of the property, whether it be goods, perishable or otherwise, or money, in order to the practical and profitable use of the same by the tenant for life, cannot be assumed to be the exercise of absolute dominion over it, and a conversion of it.

Money is not property of that perishable nature which is necessarily consumed in the using of it. The use may be enjoyed, and the equivalent avails of the same thing retained for the benefit and as the property of him to whom the principal is limited.

Any lawful use of the money, as tenant for life, is not to be deemed an execution of the power of disposal of it, in the absence of any act evincing that intent. What is relied upon by the appellants as an execution of the power, is just what the tenant for life would naturally do in the exercise of her rights as tenant for life.

The principles which we have already recognized apply fully in this connection; and as a conveyance of property, by deed or will, will not be regarded as an execution of a power over it, in the absence of any reference to the power or the subject of it, evincing an intention to execute it, unless the deed or will must otherwise be inoperative—so, here, such an act in pais as the use of this money, in the only manner consistent with the profitable enjoyment of it conferred by her husband's will, cannot be regarded as an execution of a power over it.

The equivalent sum of money paid by the executor of Jacob Hersey's will has been paid to the remainderman by the executor of Mrs. Hersey's will, in pursuance of the intention, not only of the original testator, but also, so far as appears or can be inferred, in pursuance of the design of Mrs. Hersey, and the duty imposed upon her.

The conclusion of the whole matter is, that the reasons for appeal are disallowed, and the decree of the probate court is affirmed.

STEWART v. EMERSON.

1. In assumpsit for the price of goods sold, when the defendant pleads discharge in bankruptcy, the plaintiff is not estopped by the form of his action to reply that the debt was created by the fraud of the defendant.
2. A debt is created by fraud, when one, intending not to pay for goods, induces their owner to sell them to him on credit, by fraudulently representing or causing the owner to believe he intends to pay for them, or by fraudulently concealing the intent not to pay.

DOE, J.

I. The defendant claims that the plaintiff, by this suit upon the contract of sale, affirming the sale, cannot, in this suit, assert the creation of the debt by the fraud of the defendant; that the fraud of the vendee can be set up by the vendor only in an action founded on the fraud. The defendant's position is, in effect, that when the declaration is on a contract of sale, and the plea is discharge in bankruptcy, the replication of debt created by the defendant's fraud is bad; that an issue upon a traverse of such a replication is an immaterial issue, and a trial of such an issue a mistrial; and that, on a verdict for the plaintiff on such an issue, a repleader should be awarded, or judgment be arrested, or judgment be rendered for the defendant non obstante veredicto. Tidd Pr. 828. Is such a replication good? When, in an action brought by a vendor on a contract of sale to recover the price of the goods sold, the defendant pleads a discharge in bankruptcy, can the plaintiff reply that the debt was created by the fraud of the defendant.

The plaintiff declares upon a promise of the defendant to pay for goods sold, and, if he maintains his action, he maintains it upon the contract of sale affirmed by him. When a party has an election between two inconsistent rights or remedies,—for instance, when he can rely upon a contract, or renounce the contract and rely upon fraud,—and he has knowledge of all the facts material to be known in making a choice, his selection of one may be a renunciation of another. Butler v. Hildreth, 5 Met. 49. But the plaintiff in this case avers the fraud of the defendant, not as the plaintiff's cause of action, but as a refutation of the defendant's alleged defence of discharge. The plaintiff claims to recover damages, not for the defendant's fraud, but for the breach of his promise to pay for the goods bought; and in the replication he alleges the fraud, not as the ground on which his action rests, but to show that there is no ground on which the defendant's discharge can be applied to this debt. He asserts, not that the sale was void for fraud, but that, by reason of fraud, the debt was not discharged under the bankrupt act. He asserts the fraud, not for the purpose of rescinding the contract, but to show that the defendant has not been relieved from his obligation to perform his part of the contract.

The replication, "that the debt sought to be recovered in this suit was created by the fraud of the said defendant," follows the bankrupt act in recognizing the distinction between a debt annulled by the creditor's disaffirmance of it at common law, and a debt affirmed by the creditor, and not discharged under the statute by reason of fraud. The bankrupt act provides that no debt created by the fraud of the bankrupt shall be discharged under that act; but the debt may be proved, and the dividend thereon shall be a payment on account of said debt. The statute recognizes a debt, created by the fraud of the bankrupt, as a debt not discharged and not affected by the proceedings in bankruptcy, except so far as it may be paid by a dividend. So far as this case is concerned, the debt, if created by the fraud of the defendant, is excepted out of the operation of the bankrupt act. And when the plaintiff answers the plea of discharge by the replication of debt created by fraud, he does not attempt to rescind or invalidate or renounce the contract, but he affirms it, and claims that the debt is a valid, subsisting debt. In the declaration, he asserts a debt. In the replication, he asserts the same debt. He avers the fraud, not to avoid the contract himself, but to show that the defendant cannot avoid it; not to show the defendant that by reason of the fraud, the debt declared upon was never created, but to show that, being created by fraud, it was not dischared under the bankrupt act; not to show that there is no such debt, but to show that there is such a debt notwithstanding the discharge. In this course there is no inconsistency, and the plaintiff is not estopped to answer the plea of discharge by the replication of debt created by fraud.

II. The judge instructed the jury that the debt was created by the fraud of the defendant, if the defendant, by his acts or words, prior to or at the time of the sales, intentionally induced the plaintiff to believe that the defendant intended to pay for the goods, and the defendant in fact did not intend to pay, and the defendant induced this belief, intending to deceive the plaintiff, and induce him to sell the goods to the defendant, and the plaintiff was thereby deceived, and was induced by this misrepresentation to make the sales, and would not have made them if the defendant had not made this misrepresentation. Was this a correct statement of the law applicable to this case?

In Noble v. Adams, 7 Taunt. 59, the vendee, at the time of the sale, delivered worthless bills in payment, knowing them to be worthless. Gibbs, C. J., instructed the jury that if the vendee went to the vendor, having formed a deliberate plan to put off bad bills for valuable merchandises, knowing the goods would never be paid for, and intending then to abscond with the goods, or to throw them into an immediate bankruptcy, or to pass them over to a particularly favored creditor, the vendee was guilty of a fraud, and the sale would not change the property; but if the vendee only meant to give these bills, and himself by these bills, more credit than they deserved, but intended to continue to carry on his business, and to try to pay for the goods at some time or other if he could, that was not such a fraud as would vitiate the sale. This instruction, which was held to be correct, made the intent of the vendee never to pay, the material inquiry for the jury in that particular case, and did not present the criminal offence of obtaining goods by false pretences, as the test of fraud in a civil suit. It might have been taken for granted, at the trial, that the case was one of a criminal false pretence, if the vendee intended never to pay. The jury found the sale fraudulent. But it was held that the evidence did not show such a fraud as would vitiate the sale, because there was no proof of what passed between the vendor and the vendee, or by what practices the latter obtained the goods, without which it could not be known whether or not the means which the vendee used were such as to fix him with the offence of obtaining them by false pretences. The whole case, taken together, seems not to support the doctrine that obtaining goods on credit, by concealing an intent not to pay for them, is a fraud in a legal sense.

In Irving v. Motly, 7 Bing. 543, 552, Park, J., expressed the opinion that obtaining goods by false pretences is not the only ground upon which a vendor can vacate a sale, and that a contrary rule was not announced in Noble v. Adams.

In Bristol v. Wilsmore, 1 B. & C. 514, the bargain was that the price should be paid in ready money; but the vendee prevailed upon the vendor's servant, who made the bargain, to accept a worthless check for the price, by assuring him it was as good as money. It was held, upon authorities tending to show the case within the criminal law of false pretences, that, if the vendee obtained the property with a preconceived design of not paying for it, the fraud would vitiate the sale, and that whether he obtained it with such a design or not was a question of fact which ought to be left to the jury. Such a design was regarded as material; but it would seem that the court did not mean to declare it to be a fraud to obtain property by the mere omission to disclose such a design, without using any worthless bill, or check, or other thing considered as a false token in the criminal law.

In Hawse v. Crowe, R. & M. 414, the goods were to be paid for on delivery; the vendee gave for them a check drawn by himself on a bank, payable to the vendor; and the check was dishonored. Abbott, C. J., held that the transaction was fraudulent if the vendee had not reasonable ground to expect that the check would be paid.

In Kilby v. Wilson, R. & M. 178, the same judge seems to have held a preconceived design of a vendee not to pay, to be fraudulent.

In Ferguson v. Carrington, 9 B. & C. 59, the goods were bought on credit, were to be paid for by bills accepted by the vendee, such acceptances were given, and the vendee, immediately after receiving the goods, sold them at reduced prices. The vendor contended that it was manifest that the vendee purchased the goods with the preconceived design of not paying for them. At the trial, Lord Tenterden expressed the opinion that if the vendee had obtained the goods with a preconceived design of not paying for them, no property passed to him by the contract of sale. But the case turned on another point, and all the evidence of fraud may not be reported.

In Load et al. v. Green et al., 15 M. & W. 216, the jury found that the vendee bought the goods with the fraudulent intention of not paying for them. Parke, B., delivering the opinion of the court, described the action as trover brought against the assignees of a bankrupt to recover goods obtained by him by a fraudulent purchase from the plaintiffs without intent to pay for them, and which, therefore, the plaintiffs had a right to recover from the bankrupt himself, by avoiding the contract on the ground of fraud, on the principle of the case of Noble v. Adams, 7 Taunt. 59, and others. But the point decided has no bearing on the question whether obtaining goods, by concealing an intent not to pay for them, is sufficient to vitiate the sale.

In Chitty on Contracts, 356, it is said that if one purchases goods with the preconceived design of not paying for them, such sale does not pass the property therein. If this is the English doctrine, there would seem to be reason to expect that it could be more satisfactorily shown in English reported cases than it is in those cited by Chitty. Generally, no doubt, a vendor who alleges fraud in a purchase has some express misrepresentation of a material fact by the purchaser to rely upon, aside from a purchase on credit obtained by the concealment of an intent not to pay. But as the vendor necessarily understands, when the vendee buys on his own credit, that the vendee intends to pay, and the vendee necessarily intends the vendor shall so understand—as the vendee, by the very act of buying on credit, intentionally induces the vendor to believe he intends to pay, and obtains the goods by inducing the vendor to entertain that belief—if this, with an intent not to pay, had been regarded as fraudulent in a legal sense, it would seem that this ground alone would have been frequently taken, and that the English reports would show that it had been taken in many cases, and that it had been sustained by explicit decisions, or was so elementary and well understood that no one brought it in question. It can hardly be said that this is shown by the English cases usually cited in this country on this subject.

The English authorities certainly declare, in general terms, that a fraud may be committed by one person inducing another to enter into a contract, by the intentional and dishonest concealment of a material fact which is peculiarly within his own knowledge, or which the other party cannot, by due vigilance, discover; that a suppression of a truth may be equivalent to an express false representation. But the same authorities seem not to establish the legal bounds of this kind of fraud with precision, by a comprehensive definition or universal rule. It is said to be extremely difficult to advance any general principle upon this subject, inasmuch as what does or does not amount to fraud depends very much on the facts of every particular case, on the relative situation of the parties, and on their means of information. Chitty on Contracts, 588. Professor Parsons says the common law not only gives no definition of fraud, but perhaps asserts as a principle that there shall be no definition of it; and he suggests that a definition of it would inform the crafty by what fraudulent devices they could avoid the grasp of the law. 2 Parsons on Contracts (5th ed.), 769. But the common law claims that it is, or can be, or ought to be, known by all who are subject to its government, and that it is a rational system, and not a collection of rules, maxims and definitions constructed upon verbal distinctions, to be applied in an arbitrary or literal sense; and it is not apparent how a definition of fraud, as accurate as legal definitions generally are, taken in the liberal sense indicated by the spirit, and not by the letter, in which all legal definitions are understood, would promote the safe practice of deceit.

The law enforces certain moral duties, and admits that others are of imperfect obligation. In trade, it prohibits a certain degree of craft, and does not prohibit a certain other degree. On this subject, as on many others, it may not be easy to fully describe the dividing line, on one side or the other of which all possible cases must fall (a difficulty from which moral philosophy is by no means free). The whole line may not be judicially promulgated at once, with an exactness and minuteness of detail superior to the fraudulent inventive faculty of all future time. The general course of the line is well known; its precise location at all points is presumed to be ascertainable by the application of settled principles, although, at certain points, it may be marked in the authorities only approximately by the cases on either side, whose positions are determined from time to time as they arise. A proposition concerning an immoral suppression of a material fact being equivalent to an express fraudulent misrepresentation, is everywhere recognized as a statement suggestive of a sound principle; but the proposition, as commonly expressed, does not determine what is a material fact, or when it is peculiarly within the knowledge of one party, or ought to be discovered by the other party, or under what circumstances the law requires it to be disclosed. Like caveat emptor, and many other maxims and rules, it may be designed to convey some idea of a certain general theory of the law, and not to designate the application of the theory to the varying circumstances of particular cases in actual practice.

In some jurisdictions in this country, the effect of a vendee's concealment of his intent not to pay has been somewhat considered. "If a man, knowing his own insolvency and utter incapacity to make payment, purchases goods of another, who is ignorant of any change of his circumstances, and sells them under the most implicit belief of the good faith and solvency of the buyer, in what respect does the transaction differ from a direct affirmation by the buyer of his own good faith and solvency? If the buyer conceals a fact that is vital to the contract, knowing that the other party acts upon the presumption that no such fact exists, is it not as much a fraud as if the existence of such fact were expressly denied, or the reverse of it expressly stated?" Story, J., in Conyers v. Ennis, 2 Mason, 236, 239, 240.

In Cross et al. v. Peters, 1 Greenl. 376, 380, the judge instructed the jury that insolvency, unattended by any misrepresentations or falsehood in obtaining credit, would not render the purchase from the plaintiffs void; and that unless the vendee obtained credit, with a fraudulent intent and secret understanding with one H. that the goods should be attached by him to secure his debt, the verdict should be for the defendant; but that, if the goods were purchased with such intention and understanding the verdict should be for the plaintiffs. The verdict was for the defendants; and the court refused to set it aside—first, because there was no proof that the vendee knew he was insolvent; secondly, because, if he had known it, he was not bound to disclose it, and no deceptive assurances or false representations were fraudulently made by him. It was said the purchase would be void if made in pursuance of the secret arrangement with H. because there would be an indictable conspiracy.

At the trial of Wiggin v. Day, 9 Gray, 79, the buyer's intent not to pay was regarded as material, as it might sometimes be, even if not sufficient of itself to constitute fraud.

"We can entertain no doubt that when goods are purchased with a preconceived intention not to pay for them, this is a fraud upon the vendor, which will entitle him to repudiate the sale. Such is the doctrine of the English authorities; and, although it has been questioned in some recent cases in Pennsylvania and New York, it rests upon sound principles of morality and law. In such a case the fraudulent party pretends to be a purchaser when he is not, but is, in fact, attempting to obtain possession of the property of another, dishonestly, with a view to deprive him of it without consideration. As far as the buyer is concerned, the whole sale is a mere fiction, a delusion imposed upon the seller, to induce him to part with the possession. If it be said that a mere intention does not constitute a fraud, the answer is, that the purchase, with such a fraudulent intention, is a fraudulent act. In its moral quality, it is hard to distinguish it from a larceny. There are other cases in which an intention to defraud entitles the party against whom the fraud is meditated to treat a sale as a nullity, such as sales made with intent to defraud creditors. And, however the law might be held elsewhere, in Massachusetts a purchase of goods, with an intent not to pay for them, is expressly recognized by statute as a fraud which will deprive the debtor of the benefit of the act for the relief of poor debtors, and may subject him to sentence of imprisonment. Gen. Stats., ch. 124, secs. 5, 24. Rev. Stats., ch. 98, secs. 31, 36." Dow v. Sanborn, 3 Allen, 181, 182.

"We believe that the rule is now settled, that if a person purchases goods with a preconceived design not to pay for them, the vendor has a right to treat the sale as void." Thompson v. Rose, 16 Conn. 71, 81.

In Powell v. Bradlee, 9 Gill & J. 220, 248, 278, it was held that a purchase is fraudulent, if the vendee at the time of the purchase is insolvent, knows he is insolvent, has no reasonable expectation of paying for the goods purchased, and conceals these facts from the vendor, who by ordinary prudence cannot know of their existence.

Obtaining property with a preconceived design never to pay for it, under color of a formal sale, induced by a sham promise to pay, which the party intends never to comply with, is a fraud. Bidault v. Wales, 19 Mo. 36; S. C., 20 Mo. 546.

In a dictum in Bell v. Ellis, 33 Cal. 620, 630, the rule, that the concealment of an intent not to pay is fraudulent, is doubted.

When dealings between a vendor and vendee during a period of years, naturally would excite and have excited the confidence of the vendor in the responsibility and integrity of the vendee, and the vendee commits an open and notorious act of insolvency by assigning all his property, and two days afterwards buys goods of the vendor without informing him of the assignment, the purchase is fraudulent. Mitchell v. Worden, 20 Barb. 253. The doctrine, that concealment of intent not to pay is fraudulent, was adopted in Buckley v. Artcher, 21 Barb. 585. "If a purchaser who is insolvent conceals that fact from the vendor, and thus obtains goods without intending to pay for them, it is a fraud." Durell v. Haley, 1 Paige, 492, 493. "A purchase, with intent not to pay, is such a fraud as will avoid the sale." Ash v. Putnam, 1 Hill, 302, 305. In Nichols et al. v. Pinner et al., 18 N. Y. 295, 297, 302, 303, 305–311, 315, the judge instructed the jury that if the vendee procured the possession of the goods from the vendors fraudulently, with a preconceived design not to pay for them, they would have the right to repudiate the sale. A new trial was granted because the judge refused to charge, as requested, that the mere omission of the vendee to disclose his insolvency was not fraudulent; and the question whether a preconceived design not to pay renders a purchase fraudulent, was not decided, although three of the judges expressed opinions upon it—Harris and Roosevelt, JJ., holding the affirmative, and Selden, J., the negative. Judge Harris, upon an examination of authorities, concludes that, in asserting that there must have been actual artifice, intended and fitted to deceive, before a vendor can reclaim his property on the ground that he has been defrauded, Smith v. Smith et al., 21 Pa. St. 367, stands alone, and is unsupported by principle. Judge Selden said: "The law takes no cognizance of a naked design which is demonstrated by no act. If one does only that which is lawful, and violates in action no positive duty, his intentions cannot be reached. An intent to overthrow the government is not treason without an overt act. An intent to commit murder or any lesser crime is never punishable, and an intent to commit a fraud is governed by the same rule. The intention may exist at one moment, and be changed the next. The party is in loco penitentiæ until he does some act in furtherance of the intent. The purchase of goods is a lawful act, and the validity of the purchase cannot be affected by the mere mental state of the purchaser." In Hall v. Naylor, 18 N. Y. 588, 589 (S. C., 6 Duer, 71), Comstock, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said, "It does not appear that Kerr & Co., on purchasing the goods in question, made any representations of their ability to pay for them. If, however, they concealed the fact of their insolvency, with a design of procuring the goods and not paying for them, it was a fraud, which rendered the sale void, if the plaintiff (the vendor) chose to so regard it. On the trial of such an issue, the quo animo of the transaction is the fact to be arrived at."

In Smith v. Smith et al., 21 Pa. St. 367, it was held, by a majority of the court, that a vendee's concealment of his insolvency and of his intent not to pay, without any fraudulent overt act or actual artifice, intended and fitted to deceive the vendor, is not fraudulent. Lowrie, J., delivering the opinion of the majority, said, "An intention not to pay is dishonest, but it is not fraudulent. * * * And it is no more fraudulent to have such an intention at the time of the purchase, than at the time when payment ought to be made. * * * It is no more fraudulent in an insolvent than in a perfectly solvent man, to have such an intention. * * * Insolvency is a state of one's affairs; and the consciousness of it, and the intention not to pay, are states of the mind, and if these constitute fraud, then it may be made out without proof of a single overt fraudulent act. And if none of its elements consist of an overt act, then the law requires no evidence of an overt act to establish it. * * * Where must we look for the fraud? Not in the buyer's intention merely. It must be a fraud upon the vendor, that is, a fraud acted out. We are seeking to avoid a contract because it was induced by fraud, that is, because there was some fraudulent act leading to it. The very statement of the proposition excludes the act of purchase from being an element in the fraudulent conduct, and makes it a consequence of it. What, then, is left but the dishonest intention and the concealed insolvency? And, surely, these did not induce the vendor to sell his goods. The error, in the other view, is in making the purchase a part of the fraud, instead of the object and consequence of it. All the books concur in placing the avoidance of the contract on the ground of actual fraud practised in procuring it. And, as between persons standing upon an equal footing, and holding as to each other no relation of influence or trust, all authorities, when they speak clearly on the subject, regard it as essential to actual fraud that the intent to mislead should be acted out by false representations, contrivances, or artifices, or by conduct which reasonably involves a false representation. The rule is proved by the exceptional cases, where special confidence is reposed and influence presumed. Here the law interferes, though there be no actual fraud. * * * There must have been actual artifice, intended and fitted to deceive, before a man can claim that he has been defrauded."

It is necessary to consider the reasons given by Judge Selden, in Nichols v. Pinner, and by Judge Lowrie, delivering the opinion of the majority of the court in Smith v. Smith et al., for holding that a person who induces another to let him have goods on credit, by concealing an intent not to pay for them, is not guilty of a fraud in a legal sense. The reasons given by Judge Selden are, that, as an intent to overthrow the government is not treason, and an intent to commit any other crime is not a crime, so a mere intent to commit a fraud is not the commission of a fraud; that the vendee, intending at the time of the purchase never to pay, may change his mind, and pay the price when it becomes due, and is in loco penitentiæ until he does some act in furtherance of the intent; that the purchase of goods is a lawful act, and the validity of the purchase cannot be affected by the mere mental state of the purchaser. Are these reasons sufficient? If one does only that which is lawful, the law does not generally take notice of his intention; but an act, lawful when done in good faith, with an honest purpose, may be unlawful when done in bad faith, with a dishonest purpose. The law, in many cases, takes particular notice of the knowledge, intent, and state of mind with which an act is done. The purchase of goods is, in general, a lawful act; but the purchaser's knowledge that the goods were stolen by the person of whom he buys them, may be a very material fact. 1 Hale P. C. 620. Upon a question of unlawfulness, and even of criminality, the intent of the owner of goods to part with the ownership, or only with the possession of them, is often decisive. Mowrey v. Walsh, 8 Cow. 238; State v. Watson, 41 N. H. 533. The purchaser's knowledge of the seller's intent to delay, hinder, or defraud his creditors may vitiate the sale, and deprive the purchaser of property for which he has paid the full value. Robinson v. Holt, 39 N. H. 557. The validity of a purchase may be affected by the mere mental state of the purchaser.

The substance of a contract is a mutual understanding, existing in fact or in contemplation of law. A contract of sale, from B. to A., completely performed, is their mutual understanding, executed by the delivery of the goods and the payment of the price. The understanding is, that A. is to acquire the possession and ownership of B.'s goods, and to pay for them. Without a mutual understanding that A. is to pay for them, there is no sale. If both parties understand there is to be no payment, the transaction is a gift, and not a sale. If B. understands there is to be payment, and A. understands there is to be no payment, it is neither a sale nor a gift, and the title does not pass, because there is no mutual understanding, unless a case of estoppel can be made out by one party against the other. When A. so conducts as to intentionally cause B. to understand that A. is a purchaser, or, in other words, that the transaction is a sale, he necessarily causes B. to understand he intends to pay, because a sale or purchase necessarily implies payment or an intent to pay. If he acts in bad faith, intending never to pay, and therefore the understanding is in fact not mutual, still B. could maintain an action on the contract, because A. would be estopped to deny that his understanding and intent were what he induced B. to understand they were. Having, by his words or conduct, wilfully caused B. to believe the existence of a certain state of facts, and induced him to act on that belief so as to alter his previous position by parting with his goods, A. is concluded from averring against him a different state of things as existing at the same time. Davis v. Handy, 37 N. H. 65, 75. This estoppel

B. may set up against A. But he is not obliged to set it up. He may take the ground that, there being in fact no mutual understanding, no meeting or agreement of minds, no harmony of intention, no joint assent to the same thing, there was no contract. And when he takes that ground, it may be said that the validity of the sale is affected by the mere mental state of the parties, or it may be said that there was no sale to be affected by the mental state of the parties. In this analysis, the entire contract falls to pieces and disappears, and the transaction, resolved into its original and real elements, becomes a wrongful and fraudulent conversion of B.'s goods by A. And when B. may allege that the contract or the debt was created by the fraud of A., he may sustain his allegation by proof of facts which would show that by reason of A.'s fraud there would have been no contract and no debt, if B. had chosen to take that ground.

The intent to commit a fraud is not the commission of a fraud; but when A., in the assumed character of a buyer, animo furandi, obtains goods of B. on credit by the concealment of such a material fact as an intent not to pay—a fact peculiarly within his own knowledge, and impossible to be discovered by B.—the fraudulent part of the transaction cannot be reduced to the fact concealed, the intent not to pay. The concealment of that fact is fradulent. B. has lost his goods: that is a serious part of the business. They have been taken from him with an agreement on his part to give time for payment: he cannot, in an action on the contract, recover their value till that time has passed: that time was obtained from him by A. for the purpose of gaining a position of safety and defiance by so disposing of the goods (and his own property, if he had any exposed to attachment) that B. could never recover his goods or their value. This is another practical matter, of no little importance. The fraudulent part of all this cannot be called a mere intention or state of the mind. The condition of both parties is substantially changed by means of the fraudulent concealment. B. has lost his goods, and A. has obtained them without any valuable consideration. Not only has B. lost them, but, if he is held to his agreement to give credit, he has lost them irrevocably; for it must be presumed that A. will avail himself of his advantage, and use the time of so-called credit for the purpose for which he obtained it. No one in B.'s situation would regard A.'s fraudulent design as wholly unexecuted; and if the law says it is wholly unexecuted, there is something singular in legal language or in legal ideas. If the law holds B., during the period of credit, utterly helpless, it not only allows A. to rob B., but gives A. time to make off with his booty after the robbery is discovered. An intent to obtain goods by a pretended purchase and not to pay for them, is a mere operation of the mind, that for inoffensiveness may be classed with an intent to overthrow the government. But actually obtaining goods, under the false pretence of a purchase, with intent not to pay for them, taking them from their owner by an intentional concealment of the real character of the transaction, animo furandi, is as far from being a mere naked, unexecuted design, as levying war is from being a mere emotion.

An intent to commit a fraud is not a fraud committed; but the question is, whether obtaining goods and credit under color of a pretended purchase by concealing an intent not to pay for them is a fraud committed, or whether in such an affair there is nothing fraudulent but an unexecuted intent to commit a fraud. If the intent not to pay were the only fraudulent intent, it might be claimed that the only intended fraud would not be committed till the time of payment arrived. But the fraudulent design of which B. complains is the intent of A. to get goods without payment, and by fraudulent concealment. That intent is executed the moment A. gets the goods. No overt act remains to be done by him to complete the artifice practised upon B. The expiration of the time of credit is not an overt act of A., or an execution of the entire fraudulent intent. By what A. does during the time of credit, he does not obtain the goods or the credit, nor induce B. to enter into a contract of sale, but merely fortifies himself against B.'s legal remedies. The intent not to pay is a material fact, by the concealment of which he induces B. to part with his goods on credit. And it is only by confining the dishonest design to the intent not to pay at a future time, that the fraudulent intent can be said to be unexecuted when the goods are obtained. But the fraudulent design is not merely negative,—not to pay at a future time; it is also affirmative,—to obtain the goods and the credit by the concealment of the material fact of the intention not to pay. This concealment is not a mere fraudulent intent: it is the execution of a fraudulent intent and the commission of a fraud, if a fraud can be committed by the concealment of a material fact. At common law, a fraud may be committed by the omission to disclose a material fact under some circumstances. Hanson v. Edgerly, 29 N. H. 343; 2 Kent's Com. 482–492, 513, 514. If the owner of goods desires to get rid of them without payment, he gives them away, or throws them away, or destroys them. Payment is his object in selling them. And, payment being the whole of the contract which he desires the vendee to perform, what fact can be more material than the vendee's intent not to pay, comprehending not only an intent not to try to pay, but also an intent to try not to pay? Whether the vendee's intent not to pay is a material fact, and whether it is so peculiarly within the vendee's knowledge (Hoitt v. Holcomb, 32 N. H. 202–206; Page v. Parker, 40 N. H. 71), and so peculiarly beyond the vendor's knowledge and means of information that the vendee's omission to disclose it is a concealment of it, may be questions of fact which the vendee might ask a jury to pass upon. But they are questions of such a nature that he must be presumed to waive them unless he distinctly raises them. What circumstance, then, is wanting to bring the case within the principle that a fraud may be committed by an omission to disclose a material fact?

During the time of credit, is the vendee in loco penitentiæ? When one fraudulently obtains goods on credit by a false representation, he is not in loco penitentiæ. The vendor may get his pay if he will wait; but he is under no obligation to wait, because, the contract of sale and credit being fraudulent on the part of the vendee, the other party is not bound by it. By what legal distinction is the vendee in loco penitentiæ when his fraud is concealment, and not in loco penitentiæ when his fraud is misrepresentation? If the vendor is not bound by his agreement in the latter case, how is he bound in the former. If, at the time A. converts B.'s goods to his own use, he discloses to B. his intent never to pay for them; if a future time of payment is agreed upon, both parties understanding that payment is never to be made; if B. relies upon A.'s changing his mind, paying for goods which by the agreement he is not to pay for, and turning a gift into a sale,—A. will have the agreed opportunity for changing his mind. But when he has obtained the goods by fraudulently inducing B. to believe he intends to pay for them, and fraudulently concealing his intent not to pay, and then claims a time in which to elect whether he will repent or not, he can maintain his claim only on the ground that, by a contract binding on the other party, he was to have such a time. The contract, induced by his fraudulent concealment, is in no part binding on the other party. Moreover, by what stipulation was the peculiar privilege loco penitentiæ secured? When B. alleges the validity of the contract, and claims payment before it is due, A. may defend on the ground that the action is premature. But when B. alleges that the debt was created by fraud, and A. claims, not that the action is premature and the debt not due, but that he is in loco penitentiæ, he claims that which would be a consequence of the contract being valid. The contract is what the parties mutually understood: B. understood that he gave A. time. Time for what? For payment, or for avoiding payment, or for repenting of a resolution not to pay? That is a question of fact which A. would not ask a jury to settle. B. did not undertake to give A. time to live, or time to do nothing, or time to do anything in general. He agreed to give A. time, in a certain sense, and for a particular purpose; and that purpose was an opportunity to carry out the intent to pay, which had no existence. B. understood the time was for payment; A. understood it was for avoiding payment; neither of them understood it was for repenting. A. caused B. to understand that the time was for payment, and to act upon such an understanding in the belief that it was mutual, and A. is estopped to deny that it was mutual. And the law cannot apply the penitential theory to such a case without altering a fraudulent contract, making it, in an essential and vital part, what neither of the parties understood it to be, and enforcing it upon the defrauded party. Even if the law were to make the contract for the parties, it would make a reasonable one, consistent with the sense of business men, the interests of trade, and the welfare of society. And it would not be reasonble to require B. to wait for a possible favorable result of a possible working of A.'s conscience, which he did not agree to wait for. In a practical mercantile view, the chance of A.'s improving the opportunity, as he intended, would be entitled to as much consideration as the prospect of his unintended reformation.

The reasons given by Judge Lowrie, in the opinion of the majority of the court in Smith v. Smith et al., are, in substance, the same as those given in the opinion of Judge Selden, in Nichols v. Pinner. They are all based on the proposition that a mere fraudulent intent is not a fraud—a proposition that does not cover the case of obtaining goods and credit by the fraudulent concealment of a material fact. In the former opinion it is said, that it is no more fraudulent to have an intent not to pay, at the time of the purchase, than at the time when payment ought to be made; that such an intent is no more fraudulent in an insolvent, than in a perfectly solvent man; that the act of purchase cannot be a part of the preceding fraud necessary to invalidate the purchase; and that the intent to defraud must be acted out by false representations, contrivances, or artifices, or by conduct which reasonably involves a false representation. The mere intent not to pay, separated from everything else, and considered by itself, without reference to any accompanying motive, word, or act of omission or commission, may be no more fraudulent in a legal or moral sense, at one time than another. But, while such an intent, coming into existence in A. after a real purchase, does not induce B. to make the contract of sale, the deceitful concealment of the fact of such an intent existing at the time of a pretended purchase, by which A. induces B. to part with his goods on credit, possesses every essential, moral, and legal element of fraud. The solvency or insolvency of A. may be evidence on the question of his intent; but his fraudulent intent and his fraudulent concealment of it are equally fraudulent, whether he is solvent or insolvent. No other preceding overt act than a fraudulent concealment of a material fact is necessary to constitute fraud. When the intent not to pay is concealed, the intent to defraud is acted out. The mere omission of A. to disclose his insolvency might not be satisfactory proof of a fraudulent intent in all cases. He might expect to become solvent. He might intend to pay all his creditors. He might intend to pay B., though unable to pay others. His fixed purpose never to pay B. is a very different thing from his present inability to pay all or any of his creditors. A man may buy goods, with time for trying to pay for them, on the strength of his own or inferred disposition to pay his debts, his habits, character, business capacity, and financial prospects, without his present solvency being thought of, and even when his present insolvency is known to the vendor. But who could obtain goods on credit with an unconcealed determination that they should never be paid for? The concealment of such a determination is conduct which reasonably involves a false representation of an existing fact, is not less material than a misrepresentation of ability to pay (Bradley v. Obear, 10 N. H. 477) and is an actual artifice, intended and fitted to deceive.

An application for or acceptance of credit, by a purchaser, is a representation of the existence of an intent to pay at a future time, and a representation of the non-existence of an intent not to pay. What principle of law requires a false and fraudulent representation to be express, or forbids it to be fairly inferred from the acts of purchase? A representation of a material fact, implied from the act of purchase, and inducing the owner of goods to sell them, is as effective for the vendee's purpose as if it had been previously and expressly made. If it is false, and known to the pretended purchaser to be false, and is intended and used by him as the means of converting another's goods to his own use without compensation, under the false pretence of a purchase, why does it not render such a purchase fraudulent? When the intent is to pay, it is necessarily understood by both parties, and need not be expressly represented as existing. When the intent is not to pay, it is of course concealed. Whether the deceit is called a false and fraudulent representation of the existence of an intent to pay, or a fraudulent concealment of the existence of an intent not to pay, the fraud described is, in fact, one and the same fraud. A man obtains goods on credit by fraudulently representing (that is, fraudulently causing their owner to understand) that he intends to pay for them; or, he obtains them by fraudulently concealing his intent not to pay for them; —if he obtains them in either way, he obtains them in both ways. In the instructions given to the jury in the present case, the question was presented as one of fraudulent representation. It seems to be immaterial, in such a case as this, whether the question is left to the jury as one of fraudulent representation, or of fraudulent concealment; and the instructions, in any view to which our attention has been called, do not appear to us to be erroneous.

CHARLES J. BIDDLE.

BAR MEETING.

On Tuesday, at noon, a meeting of the bar was held in the Supreme Court Room, to take action upon the death of Hon. Charles J. Biddle. It was very largely attended, and among those present were the following distinguished gentlemen: Justice Sharswood, Judges Cadwalader, Thayer and Ludlow, Ex-Chief Justices Thompson and Woodward, Ex-Judges Findlay and Parsons, Hon. Peter McCall, William L. Hirst, Esq., United States District Attorney William McMichael, United States District Attorney Valentine, and many others.

At twelve o'clock Ex-Chief Justice Woodward moved that the meeting come to order, and proposed as president Hon. George L. Sharswood, and as secretaries William McMichael and George M. Dallas. The motion was agreed to.

Judge Sharswood on taking the chair, said:

JUDGE SHARSWOOD'S ADDRESS.

GENTLEMEN OF THE BAR: We have been called together on this occasion to pay a tribute to the memory of one of our associates who has just passed from us. It is always sad at these meetings, and of late they have been recurring very, very frequently, both as to the younger and the older members of the profession. The deceased, Colonel Biddle, whose loss we are now deploring, has been for a number of years withdrawn from active practice; we have not seen him much in our court rooms, but there are none of us who knew him, I am sure, but did not appreciate his character. He had inherited talent and cultivation that made him a fine scholar. He was fully read up in all the literature of the English and other languages; he was a gentleman of the most polished manners, one of the most agreeable conversationalists that I have ever met; he was a brave man, not physical courage only, which nobody ever for a moment doubted he possessed, but that which is higher, moral courage. He could not only have faced a regiment of men in the field, but he could have faced popular opinion, if he was satisfied that his judgment was right before the whole community; a man without fear, because he was without reproach. To lose such a man from our midst is a great loss, and I hardly know how to express the feelings with which I came to this meeting. Perhaps I should end here. I have said as much as ought to be said by a presiding officer, and the meeting is now open and the chair ready to receive any resolutions that may be offered, and entertaining remarks that may be made.

Addresses were then made by R. C. McMurtrie, Esq., and Wm. A. Stokes, Esq.

Mr. Peter McCall then offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we have learned with great sorrow of the death of Charles J. Biddle, a member of the bar, a man who filled various public stations in military and civil life with distinction, and was possessed of a character for courage, fidelity to duty, courtesy and gentleness that endeared him to all with whom he was connected.

Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed by the chair to communicate this resolution to the family of Mr. Biddle, with the expression of our sincere sympathy with them in their affliction.

MR. MCCALL'S ADDRESS.

In seconding these resolutions, Mr. Chairman, I am sure I but express the sense of the whole bar, when I say that the decease of Mr. Biddle may be regarded as a public calamity. The loss of one so pure, so noble cannot but be deeply felt by this community. If I were called upon to sum up in a few words the striking characteristics of Mr. Biddle, I should say he was a man for an emergency. If an enemy were at the gates, he is the man under whom I would like to serve. With a courage hereditary, as has been said, and with courage directed by superior intellect, prudence, moderation, wisdom in counsel and energy in action, he was the man of all others in whom public confidence could be reposed in any public emergency. Sir, this lion-hearted man, as has been said, was gentle as he was brave; kind, amiable, courteous, tender hearted, true as steel and faithful to his friends. He was a man, sir, that it was impossible not to respect, to admire; nay, more, sir, to love, and his loss, I am sure, will be as deeply felt by this community as it is by every member of this bar. He was a man of the highest probity, a true man, a lover of his country, a lover of its institutions. He helped, as has been said, to plant the flag of his country on the heights of Mexico, in those memorable battles which preceded the final result—Contreras, Chapultepec, Molino del Ray and Cherubusco, where he was distinguished by his gallantry, earning the highest applause of his senior officers—the same which he displayed in our unfortunate civil war, where he again offered his sword to his country. But, Mr. Chairman, not only had Mr. Biddle military talent, but I conceive he was a man of very fine talent, a high order of ability, a man who could grasp a subject and see the merits and points of the case or question presented to him as quickly as anybody, and arrive at as accurate a conclusion. He was a scholar, a ripe scholar, and a thorough gentleman. His scholarship was more than ordinary. He was a graduate of Nassau Hall, and that was the scene of my first connection with him; and, mark me, Nassau Hall will set him down among her distinguished children.

He was a man of fine literary tastes, a man of great reading, extensive reading—as an English scholar there were very few superiors. You could see that in his style. And besides, he was a very effective speaker; he showed that in the halls and on the floor of Congress, where he made a very distinguished mark. He was a forcible and effective speaker, and he was a clear, concise, and most effective writer; he handled the pen as well as he did the sword. I believe, sir, that as my friend, General Stokes, has said, if he had confined himself to the bar, he would have been a very distinguished lawyer; but his taste led him in other channels. It led him, finally, to another sphere of usefulness no less important, perhaps more extensive than the bar—I mean the conduct of the press, that mighty engine for good or for evil, which in this country more than in any other, exercises a powerful influence upon the public mind. How vast are the responsibilities of leaders of the press, the educators of the public mind, the moulders of public opinion, and the trainers of the thought of the country? The temptation I know is very great, very great to pander to popular prejudice, and to sacrifice the everlasting truth to popularity; that is the great temptation which the leaders of the press have to undergo; but Mr. Biddle never yielded to the temptation. He was always true to the line of duty, always the advocate of truth as he understood it to be, always aiming high and holily, endeavoring to elevate the standard of private and public morals. While he frankly and bravely advocated the opinions of the political party to which he was attached, he was always courteous to his opponents, and, as my friend has just said, the general applause which has been elicited is the best testimony in this respect.

I say the loss of such a man as this is a public calamity, and it is impossible for us to permit such a man as this to pass away, because his reputation is a part of our reputation. The press claim him, he did honor to them; and we also claim him as a member who has done honor to the bar. I say it is impossible that such a man should pass away without some manifestations from those who were connected with him, w'n we think under what circumstances he has passed away, cut down, snatched from us in the very bloom of his manhood, in the midst of his usefulness, with apparently many years before him. Little did I think when I met him a few days ago, and I seemed likely to pass away before him, that I should be called upon to pay this feeble tribute to his memory.

What an impressive lesson it should teach us, what a solemn and impressive lesson does it teach us, about the shortness and uncertainty of human life. Two or three days ago Mr. Biddle was apparently in ordinary health and in the vigor of his mind, and now to-day he is dead. Sir, this teaches also, a warning to be ready for that summons, the coming of which we know not the day or the hour.

JOSEPH A. CLAY'S ADDRESS.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I have but little to say, indeed, nothing but to tell of one trait which, in my own experience, illustrated the character of Colonel Biddle. I need not divert to allude to the differences which grew between men of the same profession, who were formerly friends, arising from the civil war, and I need not recall the time when the men who formerly clasped hands in friendship, but w were during the war opposed in opinio but the incident I am about to relate is lesson to us, and now that both of t parties have gone from us, I can det it without any breach of courtesy or friendship. It so happened that after t close of the war, when feelings were b ginning to subside, I was surprised o day by a visit from the late Hora Binney, Sr., who came to say that he h something on his mind, and you all kn what a Christian he was, under which could not rest without coming to s whether I could not put him right. I said that during the course of the war, could not tell whether he had stopp speaking or had broken off intercour with Colonel Biddle, or whether Colon Biddle had chosen to break off the inte course with him, but that he considered his duty to reconcile the matter; if I wou only go to Colonel Biddle and find o how the case stood, and say that he w sincerely sorry that all intercouse betwe them had been broken. I accepted t office, but did not intend to go to Colon Biddle for that special purpose, althoug I meant to speak of the matter the fir moment I met him. I did meet him o day in the Law Library, and the cordiali and gentleness and good feeling with whi he embraced the offer, and the affectiona and cordial recognition of those two me in consequence of his conduct, struck n as a noble example to all others, who u happily had broken off the ties of frien ship in consequence of our great nation calamity. It is to the honor of Colon Biddle to tell with what joy and heart good feeling he embraced the overtur and the beautiful spirit in which M Binney made it.

HON. M. RUSSELL THAYER'S ADDRESS.

Mr. Biddle was very much withdraw from the bar by circumstances which le him into other pursuits. The announc ment of his death was received, I am sur with profound and most universal regr by our profession; for he was a man t purity of whose life was manliness of cha acter, whose accomplishments reflecte honor upon the bar, and whose engagin manners and whose manifold resource and accomplishments very fervently a tached him to all his friends. He was all the relations which he filled in life t type of a pure and noble character. H was a brave and gallant soldier; he w a good lawyer, and an accomplishe scholar. He was able and generous, a was a firm and true friend.

In his political life he was honest. H was fair and he was impatient at falsehoo or deceit; he opposed with the force his whole nature what he conceived to b inherently wrong, and he was an open an candid adversary. In his strictures upo his opponents he took care not to tran gress what he believed to be the trut and treated every man fairly. I have right to testify to this, because I happene at a certain period of my life to occupy political position in connection with hi and I never had occasion to complain th he ever did anybody intentional injustic He was very zealous in the maintenanc of what he believed to be the truth, an in the enunciation of his own views i support of what he honestly believed t be right: but he was always fair, he wa always an open and candid adversary, and he never resorted to any underhand practices, nor to any mean resources for the purpose of either advancing himself or his party, or decrying his political enemies or opponents.

Mr. Biddle, as I well remember, for we were about the same age, and came to the bar about the same time, gave promise in the early period of his professional experience of the very greatest success in his profession. I well remember several speeches which were made in the commencement of his career, in the prosecution of the public causes of the commonwealth, which he frequently, at that period conducted for the then district attorney, which were distinguished not only by great eloquence but by great ability and knowledge of his profession, by consummate skill in the handling of cases, and by a beautiful classic diction which gave grace and beauty to everything he uttered.

He was a man, who, in all the relations of life, might be taken as an example of a pure and disinterested character; a man of modest and retiring manners, probably more so than was for his advantage so far as regarded his success in life; a man accomplished in letters, exceedingly attractive in society, always considerate of the opinions and views of others, and very fascinating in the communication of his own. He was a man, sir, for whom no one who knew him could fail to have the very deepest respect on account of his personal character and his personal history.

Hon. Benjamin Harris Brewster's Address.

It is under the pressure of a feeling of melancholy and deep grief that I am prompted to say something before this meeting adjourns. Forty-two or three years ago Mr. Biddle and myself were students at Princeton College. We were boys together. I can recollect distinctly my impressions when he came to the college. He entered the freshman class. I was then a junior. His father then was one of the most important personages in this country, and when his son, Charles J. Biddle, came to college he was the object of universal observation and attention, because of his father's fame.

But he soon established for himself a character which overshadowed if it did not suppress the memory of his relation to his father and his father's name, and the history of his great race of heroic Americans, historic Americans.

Soon after he arrived there, by accident we became acquainted, an unusual thing in those days. I didn't know him, it is true, for I was far advanced in college, though young myself (there was a difference of only two years in our ages); and it was not the habit or the custom of boys in the upper classes to associate with those far below them. Their daily pursuits were different, as well as their studies. One of the professors, however, I think, Dr. McClure or President Cardigan, wished us to become acquainted, and thus we were brought together. Our acquaintance soon led to personal intimacy, and from that hour down to the day of his death, last Saturday, we were friends—sincere, earnest, honest friends. Never, for one moment, was the current of our friendship broken or disturbed. I left college, leaving him behind me, and I learned day by day, or certainly month by month, because Princeton was so near, how he continued persistently and steadily the character he started with, and how he improved with years and experience, and advanced in the admiration and affection of those by whom he was surrounded. He had the esteem of all. He was looked up to and respected by those far older than himself, as though he were a matured man though only a lad.

I have said that I came here with feelings of sadness. Indeed, I have felt sad ever since Saturday. A curious coincidence has happened me connected with Mr. Biddle. While sitting in my office, occupied with my business, a strange-looking person entered about the time Colonel Biddle was dying, and it seems did die. I asked him to take a seat, and desired to know his business. He sat down. He then asked me in a quiet and subdued tone, peculiar to the man, whose voice was always plaintive and touching, "if I didn't know him?" "Don't you know me?" I did not know him. "Why, don't you know me?" "No." "Am I then so much changed?" "Benny, don't you know me?" It was William McCully, an old friend, and he and I and Charles J. Biddle, were boys together. Twenty-eight years ago he was a member of this bar, having studied law with the present Chief Justice Read. He was admitted to college at the same time as myself, and came from college with me. He sought a practice here, but lost his health, and was obliged to go away. A friend of his, a very eminent gentleman, the Hon. David Kaufman, once an ambassador from Texas to this country, and afterwards the representative of Texas in Congress, came and found him in ill health and took him to Texas. While Mr. Kaufman lived, for a year or two, I learned all about him, but by and by my information ceased, and I believed him dead. I believed him dead, so that last Saturday I lost one dear friend, and there was restored to me another. Both of them were dear friends, and so you can appreciate how it was that I came to this meeting with feelings of sadness and deep depression. One was taken away, and the other was restored. The departure of the one reminded me how we must all pass away—as he passed away who started with me in life, with the exultant shouts of high-hearted boyhood; and the return of the other reminded me of the mutability of human events. The one is dead who, a few days since, was apparently in vigorous health, and the other who, because of failing health, had gone to the wilds of Texas, had there recovered strength, and turned away from his first calling to a higher one—the service of the Almighty and everlasting God. And there, in my office, a minister of the Gospel, he turned to me as a friend and reminded me of the past, and warned me to beware of the future.

Benjamin Rush's Address.

So many years have elapsed, sir, since I have had any active connection with the bar, that I assure you it is with great diffidence and distrust I venture upon this occasion to obtrude myself upon the notice of this meeting, and I purposely waited until you were about to put the question in the resolutions which have been made, lest I might chance to intefere with any other gentleman better qualified to speak. Having done so, however, I am prompted by two strong motives to ask your indulgence for a very few minutes.

Sir, I was one of those who knew and appreciated the lamented gentleman whose sudden death has cast such a shadow over us all. I knew him when he first came to this bar, and knew him afterwards when he was in Congress. I knew him when he returned to the bar, and knew him subsequently as an efficient journalist, to which allusion has already been made; and while I can add nothing to what has been said so earnestly in reference to his high character as a man and a gentleman, as a statesman and a soldier of the highest truth and honor and courage, while I can make no improvement in the eloquent and touching analysis of his character to which we have listened, and which afforded me a melancholy pleasure, still the strength of my regard for him will not allow me to remain silent.

In rising, sir, I would call attention to another among the many attractive attributes of Mr. Biddle's character, one which couldn't escape observation, but which has not yet been touched upon, and that was the strength of his fraternal feeling. It was most conspicuous, sir. I remarked it often myself, and have heard it remarked by others. You must also pardon me, sir, when I advert further to another thought present in my mind, not wholly unconnected with the object of this meeting. We stand, sir, almost in the very presence of death. It comes to all—it comes everywhere, and under all circumstances, to the young and the old, to those who occupy distinguished places in the land, and to those of obscurest place. Always and everywhere it is the same inexorable tyrant. Sometimes he lingers in the household, and sometimes he startles with a sudden stroke. We stand, I say, almost in the very presence of death to-day, and on such an occasion as this, not a great many years ago, in February, 1862, and I crave pardon for alluding to it, if not in this very room, certainly not far off, there was gathered a very large and distinguished meeting of the bar, called to pay tribute to the memory of one who, Mr. Chairman, I can at least say, was an honor to his profession—and whose highest earthly ambition was to dignify and adorn it. His death, too, was sudden. I always, since that time, intended to take the first suitable opportunity to present and tender my heartfelt and grateful thanks for what was said on that occasion, and, sir, it so happens, through a train of circumstances, that this is the first opportunity I have had to attend a meeting of the bar from that day to this. There are now in this room some who were present then, and sir, I am sure that the eminent gentleman whose death we all deplore was also present.

Upon my recent return to Philadelphia, the week before last, one of the very first of my former friends I met was Charles J. Biddle, and, sir, I was shocked with his appearance. I could not, of course, let my feelings escape my lips, but it seemed to me that death was then painted on his face.

Mr. Chairman, permit me to close my imperfect observations, by reading an article from one of the public tribunes, which was a political opponent of Mr. Biddle. The article struck me very much, and it is so well expressed that nothing can be added to it:

"'We who knew Mr. Biddle as a political adversary, can freely speak of him as a chivalric antagonist, a generous friend and an intuitive gentleman. He gave dignity to his party and to his profession. He adhered to the one in all its disasters, and seemed to honor it most when it needed him most; to the other he showed a fidelity that had in it a pride which scorned the courtier and shunned the slanderer.'"

Ex-Chief Justice Woodward's Address.

I rise to say that the words which have been uttered at this meeting should not perish, and that they ought to be preserved. I, therefore, wish some gentleman to move that a committee be appointed to publish a memorial, containing a brief memoir of the deceased, to include the utterances that have been made here this morning. I will be extremely happy to see such a memorial to perpetuate these thoughts, these words, and which I am sure would be a great solace to the friends and the family of the deceased.

Mr. Wm. L. Hirst. I make such a motion.

The motion was agreed to, and the Chairman appointed the following gentlemen as the committee: Ex-Chief Justice Woodward, Colonel J. Ross Snowden and William L. Hirst, Esq.

The question being on the resolutions, they were agreed to, and the Chairman announced the following committee which he had appointed in accordance therewith: Robert C. McMurtrie, Esq., Hon. Peter McCall, Wm. A. Stokes, Esq., Hon. Benjamin Harris Brewster, Benjamin Rush, Esq., Hon. M. Russel Thayer and Hon. James R. Ludlow.

The meeting then on motion adjourned.

Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia.

FRICK & SNYDER v. GLADDINGS, Owners, and FRANKLIN CASSELL Contractor.

Sub-contractors filed liens against certain houses; the owner and contractor petitioned to have the liens stricken off, on the ground that under the act of April, 1872, the contractor only had the right to file a lien. The court refused the petition, because the contracts were matters for a jury and not for the court to determine.

Mechanic's lien claim.

Opinion by Finletter, J. Delivered September 26th, 1873.

The defendants filed their petition praying the court to strike off the liens.

The petitioners aver that they entered into a contract, in writing, with Franklin Cassell, for the erection of three houses, for a specific sum. That agreeably to the act of Assembly, the said contract was acknowledged before a proper officer of this commonwealth, authorized by the laws thereof, to take acknowledgments of deeds, and duly recorded within fifteen days after the execution thereof.

The act of April, 1872, is as follows: "That when any building or buildings shall be erected in whole or in part, by contract in writing, such building or buildings and the land or lands whereon it or they stand, shall be liable to the contractor alone for work done or material furnished."

It is not contended that the liens are defective in form or substance. It is, however, argued that no right to lien existed under the circumstances in any one but the contractor, Cassell; that the plaintiffs' claims are therefore irregular and void, and should be stricken off.

It is too well established to require citation of authorities, that upon petition or demurrer the court may strike from the record mechanics' liens which are defective. The questions which are raised in such cases, are questions of law, and properly triable by the court and not by the jury.

The cases which establish the principle indicate that no question of fact can be determined by the court, and therefore cannot be determined upon petition or demurrer.

Whether the defendants contracted with Cassell in writing, and whether the contract was duly executed and recorded, and other matters, are questions of fact, not arising upon the record, which the court cannot determine, and which the plaintiffs have a right to have determined as all facts are, by a jury.

In Lee v. Burk, 16 P. F. S. 336, Justice Sharswood has carefully elaborated and discussed this whole subject in the light of all the authorities. He says: "The plaintiffs had a right to accept the issue tendered of no lien as an issue of fact, because it might well be that for some cause dehors the record, there was no lien, as that the claim had not been in fact filed within six months after the work done or material furnished; that the work was not done or the material furnished upon the credit of the building; that the plaintiffs had bound themselves to file no lien; or that the building was not such a one as was within the acts of Assembly; and there may be other defences coming under the same category."

Rule discharged.

LINGERFILLD et al. v. GEORGE.

An appeal from the judgment of an alderman is in time if filed on or before the monthly return day after the affidavit and bail are entered before the alderman.

Opinion by FINLETTER, J. Delivered September 26th, 1873.

Rule to show cause why appeal should not be stricken off.

March 24th, 1873, Judgment entered by the alderman.

April 10th, 1873, Defendant entered bail, &c., for appeal.

May 3d, 1873, Defendant filed his appeal.

It is contended in support of the rule, that as the judgment was entered March 24th, the monthly return day, next ensuing this date, was the first Monday of the following April; and that it was too late to file the transcript after that day. In other words, that the computation of time within which the appeal must be filed, should be from the rendition of the judgment.

The argument is based upon the peculiar phraseology of the act of May 1st, 1861, which is as follows: "That all appeals from aldermen, as aforesaid, shall be filed in the Court of Common Pleas of the city and county of Philadelphia, on or before the monthly return day in said court, next ensuing the date of the judgment before the alderman, instead of to the first day of the next term as heretofore."

We do not think this position well taken By the act of 1861, no appeal can be had until the affidavit has been filed. This is an additional restriction upon the right of trial by jury, and should not be allowed, by implication to destroy altogether that right, or to take away or abridge the time within which appeals under existing laws might be entered. It is not asserted that the act of 1861 in express terms repealed the act of 1823, which gave twenty days after the judgment, within which to enter bail to appeal, or that such was the object. We must, therefore, give such construction to this act as will make it in harmony with the act of 1823.

It is clear that the act of 1861 was not intended to operate upon the time in which an appeal could be taken, for upon that subject it is significantly silent. It is equally clear that its sole purpose was to prevent delay and litigation not based upon supposed right.

The first section, therefore, provides, "That no appeal shall be allowed unless the defendant shall make oath or affirmation that the same is not intended for delay, merely."

The effect of this section is to prevent any delay not meritorious. The second was designed to give and does give the litigants an earlier opportunity to have their disputes settled. It makes the return day, before or upon which the appeal may be entered, monthly instead of quarterly. It supplements and perfects the first section, and both work together to obtain speedy justice. This object is not inconsistent with the existing law which gave twenty days for appeal. Nor is it in conflict with or inimical to appeals which are not "for the purpose of delay, merely."

Rule discharged.

Supreme Court of Wisconsin.

THE STATE OF WISCONSIN ex rel. HENSHALL v. LUDINGTON et al.

1. The general power of the Legislature to prohibit entirely the traffic in intoxicating liquors, necessarily carries with it the utmost limit of legislative discretion in prescribing the conditions of sale and establishing the liabilities, both civil and criminal, of persons engaged in the trade, when it is tolerated.
2. The "Wisconsin liquor law," declared constitutional.

Opinion of the court by DIXON, C. J. Delivered September 1st, 1873.

Counsel for the respondent frankly concedes the constitutional power of the Legislature to entirely prohibit the selling or giving away of ardent or intoxicating liquors or spirits to be used as a beverage, and attack only certain provisions of the act as being inconsistent with the authority to sell conferred and repugnant to the constitutional rights of the citizen engaged in an authorized and lawful traffic and business. The point thus yielded, and as to which there would seem to be little room for controversy at the present day, of the general power of the Legislature over the subject of legislation acted upon, not only very much narrows the field of contest and investigation, but has, as it appears to us, also taken away all grounds of constitutional support for the objections specially urged against particular clauses and portions of the act. Assuming the general power of the Legislature over the subject to the extent of prohibiting entirely the traffic in intoxicating liquors or drinks, necessarily involves, as it seems to us, the admission of the utmost limit of legislative discretion in prescribing the condition of sale and establishing the liabilities, both civil and criminal, of persons engaged in the trade, in case the Legislature sees fit in any manner or under any circumstances of restriction or responsibility to authorize such sale or trade.

The law being prospective only in its operation, the legislative power to prohibit all sales must carry with it, as it seems to us, that of declaring the precise terms and conditions upon which any particular sale may take place. This would seem to be so by the familiar principle upon which the greater is always said to include the less. Possessed of the power of absolute prohibition under the constitution, it seems to follow that any relaxation from a plenary exercise of such power, or qualified or conditional enactment by the Legislature by which license to sell may be obtained in the way and subject to the liabilities imposed by the act, cannot be an encroachment of legislative authority, unless, indeed, the Legislature should transcend some settled principle of fundamental law, respecting the trial or mode of prosecution or punishment of the party charged with an infraction of the provisions of the act, or with having incurred some liability under it. Acting in obedience to those fundamental principles, in accordance with which the guilt or liability of the party charged must first be ascertained and established, and the judgment of the law rendered against him, it seems competent for the Legislature to attach such consequences, civil or criminal, to the mere act of sale as it pleases, even when such sale is made in pursuance of an authority of the Legislature qualifiedly given for that purpose. Empowered to prohibit entirely, the Legislature may license sub modo or conditionally only. It may affect the licensee with such restraints, conditions and responsibilities as it pleases, growing out of the act of sale. It may visit him with such consequences as it sees fit, proceeding from the same act. It may couple the license with conditions so oppressive, burdensome and unjust that no citizen can afford to apply for or accept the privilege and engage in the business, and thus the act, though nominally otherwise, may amount to a prohibitory law. These conclusions seem unavoidably to flow from the position admitted, or not denied, that the Legislature possess the unqualified power of prohibition. The Legislature may not take away the right of trial by jury, or of proceeding by due process of law to ascertain the fact of violation or liability incurred. It may not require the accused to plead guilty, to confess judgment, or to give evidence against himself. Neither may it create an arbitrary or violent presumption of guilt upon facts equally or more consistent with innocence. It may not change the rules of evidence or the burden of proof established according to the principles of the common law and secured and made perpetual by the constitution; nor destroy vested rights, or punish one man for the delinquencies or misconduct of another, or, without his consent, make him answerable in damages for the injurious consequences of the acts of another in which he had no participation, or with which he was wholly disconnected. These and other like things the Legislature may not do; but with respect of the act of sale, over which the power of legislation is conceded to be unlimited, and with respect to the responsibility which shall attach to the doing of that act or the conditions under which it may be done, the way seems open for the Legislature to enact whatsoever it pleases. As already more than once observed, this conclusion seems clearly to result from the unrestricted and arbitrary nature of the discretion vested in the Legislature in the exercise of what is termed the police power of the State. The Legislature may say to all citizens and persons within the State that they shall not sell, give away or traffic in at all as a beverage, or it may say that they may do so, being responsible for all the injurious consequences of their acts, which consequences are pointed out and defined by previous law. The power of the Legislature in this respect is like that which it possesses in creating and conferring rights and franchises upon a corporation which must be such and such only, as it prescribes. It may declare, for example, that a railway company applying for the franchise, shall be an unqualified insurer of the safety of all goods entrusted to its care. Fire, though a very useful, is at the same time a very dangerous element, and the Legislature may declare, as it has done in Massachusetts and several other States, that any railroad corporation shall be absolutely responsible in damages for any injury done to any building or other property by fire communicated by a locomotive engine of such railroad corporation. Ross v. Railroad Company, 6 Allen, 87.

And herein, as this court conceives, consists the chief defect and fallacy of the positions assumed and argued with so much ingenuity and research by the learned counsel for the respondents. They forget, as it appears to us, that the subject with which we are dealing is not one of those pertaining to the primary and fundamental rights of the citizen, and as to which no unlimited control has been vested in the Legislature. They seem to overlook this principal ground of distinction, and argue as if the action of the Legislature was an infringement of the natural and inalienable rights of the citizen, declared and guaranteed by the constitution, instead of the exercise of a discretionary power against which no limit has been set by that instrument. And this, we think, the turning point of the controversy, namely, that the Legislature may grant or withhold authority to sell at its pleasure, and granting such authority, it is held by the licensee at the mere pleasure or grace of the body granting it. It is held by him, not as a mattery of primary and absolute right, but as a favor which, like all favors, must be received upon such terms and conditions, and subject to such burden and inconveniences as the donor thinks proper to impose and the donee elects to accept. Unlike other trades and employments which it is the right of the citizen to pursue, undisturbed by arbitrary legislative interference and control, the person who engages in this must within the limitations above indicated, do so subject to such disadvantages and restraint as may be prescribed by the law-making power which authorizes it.

It is fallacious, therefore, to argue from the incompetency of the Legislature in other cases, that there exists no legislative power to make harsh and unjust discriminations, or so enact inequitable and oppressive conditions upon a subject like this. Conceding that the operation of the law will be what counsel say, and that their criticisms of its provisions are well founded and true, still these do no annul the law or affect its validity in a constitutional sense, but only render it "void in its obligatory quality on the mind, and therefore determine it as the proper object of abrogation and repeal, so far as regards its civil existence." They are proper arguments to be addressed to the Legislature, but not to this court. This court must accept the law as counsel must, and as all citizens must, just as the Legislature has deemed expedient to enact it. Speaking in the sense of that "immovable principle" of natural justice which should govern all legislative bodies in their enactments, but not in that restricted sense of the constitution which leads to the disregard or abrogation of the expressed will of the Legislature by any other than the legislative body itself. It has been observed by one of the greatest statesmen and wisest political philosophers of modern times, that "in reality there are two, and only two, foundations of law; and they are both of them conditions without which nothing can give it any force. I mean equity and utility. With respect to the former, it grows out of the great rule of equality which is grounded upon our common nature, and which Philo, with propriety and beauty, calls the mother of justice.

"All human laws are, properly speaking, only declaratory; they may alter the mode and application, but have no power over the substance of original justice. * * * * * Law is a mode of human action respecting society, and must be governed by the same rules of equity which govern every private action." Burke's Works, vol VI., page 22.

If, therefore, the Legislature has exceeded the limits of natural equity by the statute in question, in imposing conditions and declaring liabilities for acts done under the license granted; if it has made the license liable for damages which are remote or consequential, when by the rules of the common law and the principles of natural justice he should only be held responsible for those that are proximate or direct; if it has made him answerable in full damages, where in truth his act was only in part, and it may have been in a very small part, the cause of the injury complained of; if it charges him with the consequences as of an act partially or wholly wrongful or criminal in its nature, but which he innocently performed; and if, in fine, the statute is justly subject to all the objections urged against it by counsel. Still the answer must be, that the remedy is of a kind which must be sought in the legislative, and not in the judicial department of the government. They may constitute the best of reasons for legislative modification or repeal, but are none whatever for arresting the operation of the law by the judgment of this court

The foregoing observations, we believe, meet all the constitutional objections which have been urged, and leave only one of that kind concerning which more particular notice and comment seem to be required. It is assumed that the law legalizes or sanctions, in an unqualified sense, the act of sale by the party who has complied with the formal requirements prescribed, and obtained a license in the manner provided for by it; and then it is argued that the Legislature has no power to inflict penalties or mulct the party in damages for the performance of a lawful act. The difficulty with this proposition is, as will be seen from the course of reasoning above adopted (if such reasoning be correct), that it assumes that to be an absolutely lawful act, which is so conditionally, or with qualification only expressly so made by the very terms of the law which authorizes the sale, it enters into and becomes a part of the license or authority to sell; that the individual accepting the same bestowed ex mero motu by the Legislature, takes its subject to the burdens thus lawfully imposed. The terms and conditions annexed by the law and qualifying the authority herein, and run with the license, and bind and restrain the licensee. He consents to them by accepting the license. The law is to be construed as a whole, and all its parts looked to with a view to their operation and effect on each other, conformably to the intention of the Legislature. The form of enactment, being that by way of proviso appended to the clause granting authority to sell, is such as to make the conditional nature of the license most clear and indisputable. The person or persons licensed are permitted to sell, but not otherwise than upon the conditions named in the proviso of the first section. He or they must enter into the bond therein prescribed, and submit to the obligations thereby imposed, and to the liabilities fixed and declared by the sixth section. For as we read and understand the statute, and as we think the Legislature evidently intended the first and sixth sections are to be construed together. The bond provided for in the first section is to secure the liquidation and payment of the damages recovered under the sixth. The language of both sections sufficiently indicates this, so that the sixth section, which is more specific in its terms and accurate in the definition of the liabilities imposed operates as a limitation upon the general words contained in the first, and restricts the general obligation of the bond to the class of cases or kind of damages mentioned in the sixth.

The court has thus, at the earnest solicitation of counsel on both sides, considered and expressed its opinion upon the constitutional questions presented, and argued upon the motion to quash the alternative writ of mandamus, and it has done so without first adverting to the question, preliminary in its nature, whether the case made by the petition is in any way a proper one for the application of the remedy, which question, had it first been considered, would have resulted in the decision of no other. No writ of mandamus can properly issue in such a case, as this. The licenses issued without the giving of the bond being void, of course no revocation of them by the mayor is necessary. It would be a merely idle act for him to do so, and a still more idle act for the law or this court to require it to be done. But whether the licenses are void or not, there existed ample remedy by suit or prosecution at law to test the questions and settle the controversy, which of itself is always sufficient cause for refusing the writ or for quashing it, if it has been improperly issued.

Motion to quash granted.

SCAMMON v. KIMBALL, Assignee of the Mutual Security Co.

1. A claim against an insurance company for loss under its policies, held in this case not to be a set-off against an unpaid subscription to its capital stock.
2. Though the charter of the company only required the stockholder to pay in a part of his subscription, the balance was in the nature of a trust fund, for the creditors of the company.
3. Though in a solvent company the debts might be considered mutual and the set-off allowed, the fact of insolvency changes the rule.
4. A stockholder coming into equity for relief, should first do equity by making good his share of the capital stock. Lawrence v. Nelson, 21 New York, 158, approved.
5. Though the bankrupt law recognizes rights of set-off, it was not intended to enable one occupying a fiduciary relation, to take advantage of the bankruptcy of the company.
6. Set-off cannot be allowed except between parties sustaining the simple relation of debtor and creditor. And this principle applied to the case of a treasurer of an insurance company.

Geo. W. Smith and Samuel W. Fuller, for complainant.

The transaction with complainant was a loan to him. The charge for interest and its payment, the method of depositing and calling for moneys, &c., are all of the character which dealings between borrower and lender naturally and usually bear. No trust attached to the moneys in the hands of borrowers. Prior to the year 1870, and to his appointment as treasurer, complainant stood as any other person to the company, competent to contract with it, and to become a borrower of its moneys. The office of treasurer only required him to keep the custody of moneys which came to him as treasurer. It did not prevent him from becoming either a debtor or creditor of the company.

The present relations of the complainant and defendant are the result of an agreement made by the company when solvent, and to this agreement all the officers and stockholders of the company were parties. The policyholders who are now creditors of the company have received or are about to receive, the gains which accrued from it, and the complainant should not be excluded from the privileges which belong to a borrower of money having a cross-demand.

He holds these moneys under an agreement to pay interest, which fact constituted him a debtor of the company, and gives him the right to make this set-off upon the principles established in the case of Drake v. Rollo, Assignee, &c., heretofore decided by the court.

Williams and Thompson, for assignee.

The evidence of an arrangement or contract was incompetent, having no tendency to establish a contract of loan. Directors, when assembled, must act as a body, and conversation among them is no evidence of their action. Butler v. Cornwall Iron Co., 22 Connecticut, 335; Essex Turnpike Co. v. Collins, 8 Massachusetts, 298; Bank of Columbia v. Patterson's Adm'r, 7 Cranch, 299.

The charter of the company forbids the loan of the capital stock of the company, except upon security. The contract, therefore, which the complainant attempts to establish, is forbidden by law, and is void.

For some general principles applicable to the construction of charters, see Commonwealth v. Erie & N. E. R. R., 27 Pennsylvania, 339; Plank Road Co. v. Douglass, 9 N. Y. 444; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Peters, 587.

Charters of corporations are strictly construed by the courts, and no powers are held to be granted by them, except those expressly given, or such as clearly exist by necessary implication. The mode of using the capital of the company is determined by the charter. If the transactions in reference to the funds of the company, amount to a loan to one of the directors, without any security whatever, and without any stipulation as to time, then there was a violation of the charter, the contract was void, and the fund was still the fund of the company, in the hands of a director, not invested by contract of loan or otherwise.

Directors of corporations are agents and trustees, and their contracts with the corporation are regarded with disfavor, and scrutinized with jealousy and suspicion. The strictest proof of the fact of the contract, and of its fairness and justice is required. The fund which was taken by the complainant was a trust fund for the payment of the debts of the company. It was charged with this trust before it was taken, and it could not be divested of it by the manipulations of the complainant. Curran v. Arkansas, 15 Howard, 304; Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 308; Voss v. Grant, 15 Massachusetts, 505; Spear v. Grant, 16 Id. 9; Nathan v. Whitlock, 3 Edwards' Chancery, 228; S. C., 9 Paige, 151; Richards v. Insurance Co., 43 New Hampshire, 263; Koehler v. Iron Co., 2 Black, 715; Robinson v. Smith, 3 Paige, 222; Charitable Corporation v. Sutton, 2 Atkyns, 404.

When it was reported to the stockholders and to the public that these funds were "in hand" or "in bank," the stockholders and the public had a right to assume and believe that so much, at least, of the company's assets were available for the payment of liabilities without set-off, defalcation or discount of any kind; and when they are sought to be charged with a set-off by one of the largest creditors, and one occupying the most intimate relations to the company, the transactions by which such a state of things is brought about, are, in law, fraudulent, and cannot be sustained.

One holding a position of trust cannot use it to promote his individual interests by buying, selling, or in any way disposing of the trust property. Butts v. Wood, 37 New York, 317; Coleman v. Second Avenue R. R., 38 Id. 201.

One occupying the double relation of manager and crediter of a bank, cannot bind the bank by any act of his concerning his own funds. Claflin v. Farmers' Bank, 25 New York, 293.

As to the effect of the relation of a director to the corporation upon contracts made by him with his company. Stacy v. Bank of Illinois, 4 Scam. 91; Benson v. Hearthorn, 1 Young & Collyer, 329.

A treasurer is a trustee in the strictest sense of the term, and trustees cannot borrow the trust funds. Perry on Trusts, § 453, and cases cited in Note 9; Ex parte Lacey, 6 Vesey, Jr., 626; Pocock v. Redington, 5 Id. 799.

George W. Smith, in reply: The power of the directors was limited only by their discretion in the performance of their duties. Session Laws of Illinois for 1853, p. 394, § 4.

The non-recorded acts of a corporation may be proved by parol, and it may be bound by an implied contract, provided such act is within the scope of its authority. Abbott's Digest of Corporations, 223 and 281; Maher v. Chicago, 38 Illinois, 266; Langsdale v. Borton, 12 Ind. 467.

The company had power to make this contract. "The capital * * * may be loaned upon promissory notes or bills of exchange, or otherwise, not having more than twelve months to run." Session Laws of 1853, p. 396, § 13.

That the evidence of indebtedness in the form of a note is wanting is not material, the essential thing being the personal responsibility of the borrower. The account kept by the company with the complainant was a sufficient compliance with the law, and, further, the words "or otherwise," warranted a lending in the manner now in question.

Directors are not, by reason of their office, incapacitated from dealing with the corporation as individuals. The same rules apply here that apply to trustees purchasing of the cestui que trust. Perry on Trusts, § 183, and cases cited.

And the trustee may purchase from the cestui que trust, provided there is a distinct and definite contract, and one in which there is no fraud and no advantage taken. Tiffany v. Bullard; Beeson v. Beeson, 9 Penn. St. 280; Davon v. Fanning, 2 Johnson's Ch. 252.

None of the cases cited by the defendant on this point militate against the position assumed by complainant.

The stockholders repeatedly applied the interest moneys, derived under this contract, as dividends upon the stock notes, and recognized the agreement in every way in which it was possible so to do.

The case of Dogget v. Rollo, assignee, &c., recognized the equitable claim of the complainants in that case, although one of them was at the time the chief officer of the company. His appointment as treasurer made no change in law in the position of complainant under the contract, as it made none in fact.

If there were any disabilities resting upon complainant, the stockholders might, and did, waive them.

The opinion of the court was delivered by DRUMMOND, J.

This was a bill in equity to claim a set-off against certain demands of the assignee of the company. The debt sought to be set off arose as follows: At the time of the fire in Chicago, on the 8th and 9th of October, 1871, the plaintiff held several policies of insurance against the company, as indemnity for loss by fire. He sustained loss to a large amount, which, it is conceded, was within the terms of the policies, and for which the company is liable. This and other losses at the same time, rendered the company insolvent, and it was shortly after put into bankruptcy by its creditors. The assignee, while admitting the liability of the company, denied that the debt could be set off against the demands of the company, and filed a cross-bill asking for a decree against the plaintiff for these demands. They were two, and the first arose as follows: The charter of the company authorized the subscribers to the stock, to pay a small per centage of their subscriptions in money, and to give notes with real or personal security for the remainder, and declared that when $50,000 of the capital stock was subscribed, and five per cent. paid, and the remainder secured, business could be commenced. The plaintiff was one of the original subscribers for a considerable amount of the stock and paid in one instalment, and gave promissory notes to the company, secured as required, for the remainder. This has never been wholly paid by the plaintiff, and at the time of the decree of bankruptcy, he was indebted to the company for a part of his subscription to the stock.

The other demand was as follows: From the organization of the company, in 1864, the plaintiff had been a director and a member of the executive and financial committee, and one of its chief managers. After the stock was subscribed and a portion of it paid, the plaintiff proposed to take the amount, hold it subject to call, and pay interest at ten per cent. This offer was never distinctly and in form accepted by the board of directors, but the plaintiff being a banker at the time, held the money, and interest was credited on the sum total. The act and the result seem to have been acquiesced in by the directors and by the company for some years. There were other assets which appear at first to have been paid to the treasurer or secretary, and deposited to the credit of the company in the Mechanics' National Bank, of which the plaintiff was president. The money in his hands was used as required. In 1868 a further call was made on the stock subscription, and afterwards, what was obtained, as well as other funds, appears to have been deposited in the Mechanics' National Bank to the credit of the plaintiff. There was always a treasurer of the company, and in 1870 the plaintiff was elected treasurer, and re-elected in 1871, and was treasurer at the time of the fire, October 8th and 9th, 1871. In 1870, the plaintiff objected to paying ten per cent. interest. No distinct action was taken on this. After he was elected treasurer, the money of the company was permitted to remain in his hands as before, by general acquiescence. There was credited to the company each year, at first ten per cent. interest, and for the year ending July 1871, eight per cent There was nothing on the books of the company to show that the money was loaned to the plaintiff, but they contained reports made from time to time, with interest credited. The books and reports, and indeed all the records of the company, treated the money in the hands of the plaintiff as stock or cash assets, or cash in bank, and after September, 1869, all money was charged to the treasurer. At the time of the fire the plaintiff had in his hands, under the circumstances above mentioned, the sum of $39,188.33, belonging to the company.

It was claimed by the plaintiff that at the time the funds of the company were thus in his keeping, in consequence of losses, he had made considerable advances to the company to enable it to pay the same.

The first question is, whether the plaintiff, has the right to set off his losses under policies of the company against his subscription to the stock. In one sense, what the plaintiff owes to the company on his stock is a debt due the company. What the company owes the plaintiff on his policies of insurance, is a debt due the plaintiff. The debts are mutual, in that they exist from one to the other reciprocally. And if the debt due from the plaintiff were an ordinary debt, then, as we have already decided in the case of Drake v. Rollo, assignee, the set-off would be allowed, although the result would be to pay the plaintiff his claim against the company in preference to other creditors. We are to apply the bankrupt law to the law of the State creating the corporation. The charter authorized the company to commence business on the payment of five per cent. of the amount subscribed, provided the payment of the remainder of the stock was secured.

The purpose of this was to accommodate the stockholders, by permitting secured promises to pay to stand in the place of the money. It was still intended as a fund to protect the creditors of the company, and the charter pointed out the special manner in which the fund could be made available in case of necessity, and which has been followed in this case. So long as the company was solvent there might not be any serious objection to the stockholder insisting that his loss on a policy should be an answer to a call to pay his subscription to the stock, because if he were to pay his subscription, the company would be obliged immediately to refund to the extent of the loss. In that case no one is injured by the allowance of the set-off. But where the company is insolvent and bankrupt, it is different. Some one must sustain a loss, and the question is whether the stockholder who has not paid his stock subscription, and who happens to have a policy on which the company is liable shall bear his share of the loss, or shall be paid in full to the extent of his subscription. Does the fact of insolvency or bankruptcy make no change in the rule? We think it does, and that there is a difference in principle between the two cases. We have the right to judge of causes from their effects, and to reason accordingly, and certainly we ought not to sanction a rule which produces so much loss to the general creditors of the company, unless by following a different course we trench upon some settled principles of law or equity. Where a party borrows from the capital of the company, takes out a policy, sustains a loss, and in case of insolvency and bankruptcy, claims to set it off, we admit it, because he is an ordinary debtor of the company, and therefore comes within the rule that one debt answers another, however hard it may occasionally be, and doubtful on general principles of ethics. But in this case the plaintiff is not an ordinary debtor of the company. The charter has permitted him to retain a part of the capital of the company, and hold it in trust for the creditors. And, it seems to us, that to allow him, under the circumstances of the case, to pay himself in the way he seeks for his losses under the policies, would enable him to take advantage of his fiduciary relations, and obtain a preference over the other creditors, not warranted by the equitable principles of the bankrupt law, and contrary to the manifest intent of the charter of the company.

In a court of equity, as a set-off may be allowed which is not sustainable at law, so we suppose, though generally equity follows the law, there may be a set-off, technically good at law, which, owing to the relations of the parties, may not be admissible. In this case the plaintiff comes into a court of equity for relief, and we think he should first do equity by making good his share of the capital stock, on the strength of which the company obtained its credit, and were enabled to start in business. This has become equity, because he is in one sense a trustee of that fund, and because, further, the company is insolvent and in bankruptcy.

Some very late English authorities were cited by the plaintiff's counsel, which it is insisted are decisive of this case in favor of the set-off.

The first was—In re Duckworth, 2 Law Reports (Chancery Appeal Cases). 1866-7. It is difficult to comprehend this case fully without an examination of the various statutes referred to. The party had subscribed for certain shares of stock in a company; he was also a creditor. The company was wound up under a special statute. Afterwards the party made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, which was registered in bankruptcy. The question was between the representative of the company, under the winding-up act, and the trustees, under the bankruptcy registration, as to the right of the latter to set off the debt from the company to the party, against calls for the subscription, and the court held that the set-off was allowable, on the ground apparently that the case was one of ordinary mutual debts, and so within the statute in bankruptcy as to set off. It was admitted that if the court of chancery, as such, had been adjudicating the case, that the set-off would not be allowed, because the true construction of the winding-up act cut it off.

But treating it as a court of bankruptcy, and not as a court of equity, and independent of the differences between that case and this, the reasoning of the court is not very satisfactory. The judge merely says, it is his opinion that there would be a set-off under a particular section of the statute.

The other case is In re Universal Banking Corporation, 5 Law Reports (Chancery Appeal Cases), 492—1869-70—and is similar to the first and relies upon it.

So far as these cases show that a subscriber to the stock of a company may set off a demand due from the company against his subscription, under the circumstances set forth, there may be certain analogies between those cases and this, though the debts are treated throughout as ordinary debts, and no consideration seems to have been given to any relation of trust existing between the parties. And besides, as already intimated, there are various statutes referred to, which may have more or less affected the views of the court. The winding-up act seems to concede that the principle of set-off, in case of contribution, is wrong, as it prohibits it.

These cases were both decide after the passage of our bankrupt law, and therefore could not have entered into the consideration of the law maker. But there are some decisions in this country which do not agree with the principle of those late English cases.

It seems to be admitted by the counsel of the plaintiff, that in the case of mutual companies, so called, the rule did not apply of allowing set-off. One case may be referred to—Lawrence v. Nelson, 21 New York R. 158—where the party had given what is termed a "premium note," and had sustained a loss—one a debt due him from the company, the other by him to the company, and he sought to set off his claim on the policy against his premium note, and the court held that this could not be done in that case, because the note constituted a part of the capital of the company, and in case of insolvency to suffer it to be done, would be giving one creditor an unfair advantage over another.

The bankrupt in this case was called a mutual company, though technically a stock company, but we are somewhat at a loss to understand the alleged difference between the two cases; it is true we can call one a joint stock company and the other a mutual company, but names do not change things. In both the "bills payable" constitute a part of the capital of the company, and a trust fund for the benefit of creditors. In both the party owning the bills receivable has met with a loss on a policy of the company. The difference, if any, seems to be in favor of the premium note as claiming a set-off, because that is given for the policy, and by a species of arrangement stands indirectly as a part of the capital, whereas here the bills receivable have to be treated directly as a part of the capital, and were given with that special purpose.

It seems to us that the argument of the court in the case of Lawrence v. Nelson, applies to this case.

It is said that the bankrupt law has not taken away any of the rights of set-off, but has recognized and enforced them. That is so, but the bankrupt law was not intended to encourage anything inequitable, or to enable one to take advantage of the bankruptcy of an individual or of a company, to obtain payment in full, while others could only have a pittance, and especially when those seeking the advantage occupied relations of trust.

It follows, from what we have said, that we are of opinion that the plaintiff has not the right in equity to set off his losses on the policies against his liabilities for the payment of the stock of the company. We think that the obligation of every person who subscribes and owes for stock in such a company as this, is, in case of its insolvency, to pay what he owes for the benefit of the creditors.

The other question is as to the equitable right of set-off of the claims under the policies against the funds which the plaintiff held as the treasurer of the company.

Here the position of the plaintiff was unquestionably that of trustee. The only point is whether that was changed by the contract, or, rather, understanding of the parties. It may be admitted that the fair inference is that the plaintiff had the right to use the money, because the payment of interest implies that; but it is impossible to consider this part of the case fairly, without bearing in mind the peculiar relations of the parties to each other. If the plaintiff had authority to employ the funds, as treasurer, he was obliged to have them always ready to answer the necessities of the company. He was still, as to them, a trustee, and not an ordinary debtor of the company. It was the case of a trustee using trust funds with the consent of the cestui que trust, but always on the condition that they were to be so used that he could meet the object of the trust.

The evidence shows that at the time of the fire the plaintiff had in his hands the funds of the company. It was as treasurer. Having met with losses on his policies, he claims the right, so to speak, of sequestering the funds in his hands as treasurer to answer his losses as a general creditor of the company. If we concede this may be permissible in case of an ordinary debtor, we think it would not apply to one occupying the situation of the plaintiff. He would be receiving the obligations of the company upon different terms from an ordinary policyholder, and he would occupy a vantage ground over others.

There are several difficulties in the way of a set-off on the special facts of the case. The plaintiff was elected treasurer in 1870. Whatever arrangement was made, if at all, was prior to that time. The most that can be said is that after he was elected treasurer, the funds in his hands, while they were, from time to time, reported as cash or capital, drew interest, which was accounted for, and this with the acquiescence of those who may be presumed to represent the company. There was no distinct contract made with him while he was treasurer, which would constitute him the debtor, and nothing more, of the company.

The plaintiff was not only the banker of the company, but its treasurer, considered as sustaining those relations to the company pertaining to the office. It is very clear that whatever may have been the view of the plaintiff, the directors and the company did not regard the plaintiff as the mere borrower of the funds in his hands, and before a set-off would be admissible as between the company and its treasurer in case of the insolvency or bankruptcy of the former, there ought to be satisfactory evidence that he, as to the money, had taken the position of an outside party; in other words, that he had, as to the money, ceased to be the treasurer of the company.

We need not refer to the question, whether if it was a loan to the treasurer by the directors, it was a violation of law, and therefore invalid. We prefer to place it on the ground that under some of the conceded facts of the case, the set-off is not maintainable, unless there is established the simple relation of debtor and creditor. This, we think has not been done, and therefore we overrule the claim of set-off.

The original bill will be dismissed, and a decree will be rendered for the assignee on the cross-bill for the amount due.
