PHILADELPHIA LIBRARY COMPANY v. HENRY J. WILLIAMS, Executor and Trustee.

The testator bequeathed his estate in trust to select and purchase a lot of ground, and thereon to erect a building sufficiently large to accommodate and contain all the books of the Library Company of Philadelphia; and in further trust to convey said lot and building to the said company for the uses and purposes of their library, subject to the restrictions and conditions named in his will. By a codicil he authorized and allowed his execu or "under a broad and thoughtful foresight, to increase the size of the lot, and select any situation he may deem most expedient, without regard to any provision of my will or codicils." In the lifetime of the testator, and after said codicil had been made, the executor promised him that he would erect the building upon a lot of ground at Broad and Christian streets, Philadelphia, which had been previously purchased by the testator. Upon a bill filed to restrain the exec tor from proceeding to erect said bu lding upon the lot at Broad and Christian, upon the ground, principally, that his promise to the testator had influenced his judgment and prevented the exe cise of the sound discretion required in the selection of said lot, the court referred the matter to a master to report the law, the facts and a decree proper to be made therein. Upon exceptions to his report, the court held:

1. The purchase of the lot by the testator, after the execution of his will, with the express object of having the library building located thereon, was not an ademption pro tanto of the bequest, and the executor must rely upon the will alone as it stands, for his authority to act in the matter.
2. The executor being authorized by the will to select any lot which commended itself to his own free, unbiassed judgment as most suitable, if he acted in good faith and if no improper influences were acting upon his mind and warping his judgment, equity will not interfere with the exercise of that discretion.
3. The facts, in the opinion of the court, showing that his judgment was biassed by the promise given to the testator in his lifetime, the court will interfere to prevent the selection of a lot by the executor, contrary to the "broad and thoughtful foresight" required of him by said will.

Exceptions to report of master dismissed.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered December 31st, 1872.

This case comes before me upon exceptions to the report of a master. He was directed to report the law, the facts, and a decree proper to be made therein. Twenty-two exceptions have been filed to his report. The very able arguments of counsel, however, have not been directed to each exception separately, but rather to the discussion of two questions, which may be stated to be covered by these, to wit:

First. What powers were vested in the defendant under the trust created by the will of Dr. James Rush in regard to the location and purpose of the library building?

Secondly. Has he properly executed those powers in selecting the lot at Broad and Christian streets as the site for said library building?

The first question can be more satisfactorily answered by referring at some length to different portions of the will.

The testator, by his will of the 26th of February, 1860, devised and bequeathed the whole of his real and personal estate to his brother-in-law, Henry J. Williams, his heirs and assigns, in trust, to pay certain legacies, annuities, gifts, and bequests, to be thereafter expressed in codicils, and then to hold the residue and remainder of his estate "in trust, to select and purchase a lot of ground, not less than one hundred and fifty feet square, situate between Fourth and Fifteenth and Spruce and Race streets, in the City of Philadelphia, and thereon to erect a fireproof building, sufficiently large to accommodate and contain all the books of the Library Company of Philadelphia." And upon the further trust, "so soon as this building is completed and ready for occupation, then in trust to convey the same, with the lot of ground whereon it is erected, unto 'The Library Company of Philadelphia' aforesaid, and their successors, for the uses and purposes of their library, and for no other use or purpose whatever." Providing, however, before such conveyance should be made to the said Library Company, they should, either by an alteration in their charter or in some other way satisfactory to his executor, bind themselves and their successors to conform to, and comply with, certain express conditions therein specified. One of the conditions was "that all the accounts of the receipts and expenditures from the estates aforesaid, real and personal, shall be kept separate and distinct from all other accounts of the said Library Company, and shall all be headed and kept as the accounts of 'The Ridgway Branch of the Library Company of Philadelphia.'"

He also appointed said Williams executor of said will.

By a "first codicil" thereto, dated the 16th of May, 1866, he imposed additional restrictions upon said Library Company, and designated the beneficiaries of the legacies, annuities and gifts indicated in his original will.

In his "additional codicil" of the 18th of April, 1867, he says, "I authorize and allow my executor, under a broad and thoughtful foresight, to increase the size of the lot and select any situation he may deem most expedient, without regard to any provision of my will or codicils."

On the 18th of January, 1869, Doctor Rush purchased by contract a lot at Broad and Christian streets, in the City of Philadelphia for the avowed purpose of having the library building erected thereon, and made a payment of $1,000 upon the contract. He held this lot subject to the payment of the residue of the purchase money at the time of his death. That occurred upon the 26th of May, 1869. The defendant has selected this lot as the site for the library building. Had he the power in equity so to do? He says he had; that the will left it to his sole judgment and discretion, and not to the judgment and discretion of anybody else; and in the exercise of that judgment and discretion he has made the selection. Superadded to the power given him in the will he points to the purchase of this identical lot by the testator, after the execution of his will, with the express object of having the library building located thereon, and claims that was an ademption pro tanto.

I, however, am of the opinion that the doctrine of ademption or double portion cannot be applied to the facts in this case. The defendant must fall back upon the will, and rely upon that alone, for his authority. By that instrument he was authorized to select any lot which commended itself to his own free, unbiassed judgment as most suitable. If no improper influences were operating upon his mind and warping his judgment in the exercise of his discretion, and he acted in good faith, a court of equity will not interfere with that discretion. Hill on Trustees, 488; Goehenauer v. Froelich, 8 Watts, 19; Chew v. Chew, 4 Casey, 17; Pulpress et al. v. Af. M. E. Church, 12 Wright, 204. But discretionary powers like other authorities must be exercised in the manner prescribed by the trust instrument. Hill on Trustees. 488.

To the defendant was given by this instrument, the power to select any lot which, "under a broad and thoughtful foresight" commended itself to his judgment. The selection must be made under and by the exercise of the defendant's judgment, entirely free from any obligations imposed upon it by the testator other than those contained in the will and codicils. Such a discretion the defendant must bring to the discharge of his trust, and then it only marks the limits of the power given to him. The exercise of such a discretion the claimants have a right to demand. They can require no more, and may not submit to any less.

Secondly. Did the defendant properly use his own discretion, and execute the power intrusted to him in the selection of the lot in question? The complainants aver that this site will be prejudicial to the interests of the library, utterly destructive of the trusts which they have hitherto administered, and which they claim it was the manifest design of the testator to promote. They further allege that the defendant assumed the trust under such a trammelled and crippled discretion, that he was thereby disabled from using his natural, unbiassed judgment in the selection of the lot. The master concurred in this, and in his very able report has found "that the trustee, by his promise to the testator, had so crippled his discretion as to make it impossible to say how much his preference for the lot in question is due to his unbiassed opinion that it is most expedient for the purpose, and how much to his promise to Dr. Rush," and that the action of the defendant should be subject to the control of the court.

This presents the controlling question in the case. Do the facts and the law justify the master in his conclusions?

The evidence shows that some weeks before the death of the testator he became very anxious to have the location of the intended library building fixed and settled; and he desired the defendant to ascertain the size and cost of all the vacant lots on Broad street (upon which street he desired it to be placed). The defendant procured statements of the sizes and prices of all he thought suitable, from Vine to South street; but Doctor Rush was not satisfied with any of them. Some other gentlemen brought him a plan of the lot on Christian street, and he was so much pleased with it that he directed the defendant to buy it at once. The defendant did so, by the aforesaid contract of May 18th, 1869. The Doctor thereupon expressed great pleasure that it was concluded, as it relieved his mind from all anxiety. "Some days after," says the defendant (in his letter of the 30th December, 1870, to Doctor Charles Willing, chairman of a committee appointed by the complainants), "the Doctor recurred again to this subject, as it had probably occurred to him that he had given me an absolute discretion as to the situation of the library by the terms of his will, and that I might be induced to overrule his decision after he was gone. He called me to his bedside and asked me to give him a promise that I would build the library on that lot, and nowhere else. I gave him this promise as fully and solemnly as language could express it, and he then thanked me, and said he could now die in peace."

In his testimony taken before the examiner on the 17th of April, 1872, he says:—"I think it was about the second day after the interview with Mr. Wharton (which he had just stated was on the 20th or 21st of May, 1869), when I was seated by Doctor Rush's bedside. I think the lot had been the subject of conversation between us, when the Doctor turned to me and said, 'Harry, now you will promise me to put the building upon that lot?' I said, 'Certainly, Doctor, if you desire it; I will promise you that I will put it there, and nowhere else.' The Doctor merely expressed his satisfaction. I think he said, as near as I can recollect, 'Well, I am very glad of it; it is now all settled.'"

The Doctor died within five or six days thereafter. This promise, then, was demanded and given a very few days prior to his death. It was two years after the last codicil to his will had been executed. It was demanded of a brother-in-law to whom he was about to intrust more than a million of dollars—I say about to intrust, for there was yet time for him to revoke the will and all of its trusts. He was unwilling to pass all his vast estate into the hands of the defendant upon the implied assurance that the library building would be located upon the lot which he had purchased for its site. Hence he made the specific demand. What his action would have been, had the defendant's answer not been in accord with his judgment, is left to conjecture. He suffered his will to remain unchanged. He passed from this earth, there is every reason to believe, in an abiding faith that he had restrained the free choice of the defendant, and that he had secured the erection of the library building upon the lot designated by himself.

What was the position of the defendant? He knew that he had been named in the testator's will as his trustee and executor. Sitting by the bedside of his dying friend and brother—recognizing the Doctor's right to control his own property—wishing to relieve his mind from all doubt upon the subject that troubled him, the defendant then and there promised, as fully and as solemnly as language could express it, to put the building on that lot and nowhere else. Do not all the attendant and surrounding circumstances impress the mind of every conscientious and reflecting person with the very strong moral obligation thereby imposed upon the defendant? I can scarcely conceive one stronger. The greater the integrity, the higher the moral sense, the stronger would be the obligation upon the conscience. That the defendant possesses both in a high degree is manifest in his letter of the 30th December before referred to. When asked, in behalf of the claimants, to reconsider his intention of building on said lot, and locate the building elsewhere, his answer was such as did credit alike to his conscience and to his heart. After repeating the promise which he had made, and the circumstances under which it was made, he says:—"Now, do you think it would be at all consistent with truth and honesty for me voluntarily to violate a pledge given under circumstances which render it as sacred as an oath, and made to a dying man who had confided to me the whole of his estate? Would you, with your well-known delicacy and sensibility to all honorable engagements, feel yourself justified in doing so were the case your own, and should I not lose your respect and regard (which I value very highly) were I to hesitate for a moment as to what was my duty?"

Therein and thereby he proves the indelible stamp made upon his mind. Conscience, resting under an obligation strong as an oath, bound him to the observance of his promise. With that deep recognition of moral obligation resting upon his conscience, he assumed the duties of the trust. He thinks he executed the power and discharged the trust under the written will alone, wholly uninfluenced by his promise.

The well known integrity and high moral character of the defendant do not permit me to doubt that he honestly thinks so. If, however, he be correct, there must have been a time when his conscience was absolved from this deep moral obligation—a time when he threw it off, and when the lawful one took exclusive possession of his judgment. I understand the answer to be that it was at the time he was obligated to take the usual oath in order to assume the duties of executor. This was on the 31st of May, 1869. This latter oath, he says, created a legal as well as a moral obligation. Did it, however, wholly eradicate the moral obligation, "sacred as an oath," under which he had rested up to that time? In his letter of 30th December, 1870, he refers to it as still resting strongly upon him, and that his duty required him to be influenced thereby.

It is contended, however, inasmuch as the defendant has sworn in his answer, and again before the examiner, that he has considered and decided the question as to the site of the library building entirely irrespective of and uninfluenced by any promise made by him to Dr. Rush, that the complainants have failed to make a case in which a court of equity will interfere with the discretion which he has exercised.

In considering the act which the defendant has committed, or is about to commit, we must look at the position of the donor, the donee, and of the beneficiaries of the power. The beneficiaries have the right to require the power to be executed according to the terms of the written instrument creating it. If the donor induced the donee to accept the trust under a pledge that he would execute it otherwise than was provided in the instrument, he committed, in equity, a fraud upon the power. If the donee accepted it under such pledge and so executed it, he committed a fraud upon the power. It is not necessarily a moral fraud. A wilful departure from the terms of the power is a fraud upon it, without regard to whether the motive thereto was good or bad. Topham v. the Duke of Portland, 1 De Gex. Jones & Smith, 571. Nor does it change the rule of law in regard to the agreement to pervert the trust from the original purpose for which the power was intended, whether that influence be exerted before the appointment or after it, provided that in both cases it secures the consent of the appointee to fulfil the wishes of the appointer. Topham v. Portland, 31 Beavan's Reports, 539-540.

No American authority has been found which covers the case under consideration, but in Topham v. The Duke of Portland, reported in 5 Chan. Appeal Cases, 40, it is held that although the donor and the donee both swore that the power was not executed to carry out any agreement between them, other than those specified in the written instrument, yet that a chancellor might look beyond the oaths and see whether the presence of a moral obligation did not at the date of the appointment, and when the trustee came to act, weigh upon her mind with such force as to make her a passive instrument of the donor's intentions.

A judge or juror is forbidden to sit in a case wherein a party litigant is closely related to him by blood or marriage. He will not be permitted to purge himself of his disqualification by answering that he can, and will, act wholly uninfluenced by such relationship.

Certain facts, which the wisdom of ages has recognized as influencing the judgment of mankind generally, create a conclusion of law that they will influence the judgment of each individual.

Applying the law and reasons to this case, testing the uncontradicted evidence by all those principles which I have ever been taught to believe influence the human mind, and control the actions of men, it does establish such a state of facts as would naturally and reasonably restrain and trammel the free judgment of the donee of a power. Such a general presumption cannot be removed by the honest opinion of a donee that in his particular case he is not influenced thereby. Hence I am unable to conclude that the defendant had, when he made the selection of the lot in question, or has now, such a free discretion and unbiassed judgment as the complainants are entitled to invoke and a court of equity bound to provide. It should therefore be referred to a master to inquire and report what will be the most expedient location for said library building, without my indicating any opinion as to whether or not the lot at Broad and Christian streets is a suitable one.

The exceptions to the report are dismissed, the report of the master is confirmed, and decree accordingly.

BIRKINBINE v. BOYER.

The defendant, an attorney at law, came to Philadelphia to advise with his associate counsel in a case, and whilst there was served with a summons. Held, that the facts did not show such an active pendency of the case requiring the professional services of the defendant at that time, as to permit him to claim his privilege from the service of the summons.

Rule to show cause why the service of the writ shall not be set aside.

Opinion of the court by MERCUR, J. Delivered December 31st, 1872.

The defendant, an attorney at law, residing at Lebanon, in this State, was served with a writ of summons while in this city. He claims that he was privileged from the service, and asks that it be set aside.

Was he here attending upon court as an attorney, at the time?

The depositions read show that in 1868 a bill was filed in the Circuit Court of the United States for the third district, in favor of Wallace & Sons, by Furman Sheppard and George M. Wharton, Esqs., attorneys at law, residing in Philadelphia, and William M. Derr, an attorney at law, residing at Lebanon, against Bubb, for an alleged infringement of a patent right for a plough, and for an account. No answer was put in, and a decree pro confesso was taken.

Testimony was taken by complainant and injunction issued. This being disregarded, an attachment was ordered.

Subsequently, and some time in 1869 or 1870, by agreement of counsel, the injunction and attachment were vacated.

Thus the case rested so far as is shown down to the present time.

In the spring or summer of 1872, the defendant was employed by Wallace & Sons, under an agreement that he should have a certain interest in the plough, as a contingent fee for his professional services "in the matter."

Upon the 19th November, 1872, the defendant and Mr. Derr came to this city for the purpose of advising with Mr. Sheppard, and taking some action in the case in behalf of Wallace and Sons. The defendant testifies: "Our object in going to Philadelphia, was to see our associate counsel, Messrs. Sheppard and Dallas, for the purpose of making a motion to have the injunction again granted upon the testimony before the court." He further says: "If action had been taken, I suppose I would have taken an advisary part in the matter."

Mr. Dallas was out of the city. Upon the defendant and Mr. Derr going to the office of Mr. Sheppard, on the morning of the 20th of November, they ascertained he was engaged in the trial of a cause, so they were then unable to see him, and could have no opportunity so to do, until the next morning. Mr. Derr returned home; the defendant remained in the city. The next morning defendant called again to see Mr. Sheppard, and found he had already left his office; but that he could be seen between twelve and one o'clock that day. The defendant then returned to his hotel with the intention of there remaining until the time arrived for meeting Mr. Sheppard. Upon reaching the hotel, the defendant was served with the writ.

The defendant came to this city without knowing whether the Circuit Court was in session. It was not. The business, however, he says, could have been done in the District Court, which was in session.

No action was taken. The defendant had never taken any part in anything which had been done in court in the case. No reason existed why action should be taken at that particular time. The case had rested for two or three years. The defendant therein was not moving. The "advisary part" which the defendant expected to take, would not necessarily require him to go into court. He was here rather to counsel and advise with the attorneys of record as to what they, not he, should do in court. It might have resulted in no action. It is true the case was pending in court, but it was not such a pendency as necessarily required any action in court at that particular time.

We do not think the facts show such an active pendency of the case requiring the professional services of the defendant at that time, as to put him in a position to claim his privilege from the service of a summons.

Rule discharged.

Supreme Court United States.

PHŒNIX INS. CO. v. HAMILTON.

1. Insurance may be effected in the name of a nominal partnership where the business is carried on by and for the use of one of the partners; especially when the property insured (grain) is held by the parties insured on commission only, and in the policy is described "as held by them in trust or on commission, or sold and not delivered."
2. In case of an insurance thus effected, where no representations are made with regard to the persons who compose the firm, there is no misrepresentation on that subject which avoids the policy.
3. And where the firm has no actual care of custody of the property insured (grain), but so far as regards its preservation from fire, it is entirely in the control of the other parties, and is so understood to be by the company making the insurance, the omission to inform the insurance company of an agreement of dissolution previously made cannot be considered a concealment which will avoid the policy.

Error to the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Ohio; the case being thus:

Hamilton and Cook were partners in the grain commission business, at Toledo, Ohio, and kept their consignments of grain in store in an elevator at that place, belonging to the Michigan Southern Railroad Company, whose servants had the entire charge and care of it. Hamilton retired from the firm in July, 1867, but no notice of the dissolution was given, and by common agreement Cook was allowed to carry on the business in the partnership name until the end of the year. During this term, insurance to the amount of $10,000 was effected with the Phœnix Insurance Company of Brooklyn, through their agent, in the name of the firm, Hamilton & Cook, against loss or damage by fire on the "grain in store, their own, or held by them in trust or on commission, or sold and not delivered," this being the usual method of taking insurance among commission merchants in Toledo. A loss occurred on the 21st of December, whilst the policy was running, and the insurance company declining to pay it, Hamilton & Cook sued them. The defence set up was:

1st. Want of insurable interest in Hamilton; and,

2d. Misrepresentation and concealment with regard to the interest.

The plaintiffs, on the trial, waived any claim for grain belonging to themselves individually, and asked a verdict but for the value of the grain which was received on commission; asking to recover this amount for the use and benefit of the owners.

At the request of the plaintiffs' counsel, the court charged that if no representations were made with regard to the individuals who composed the firm of Hamilton & Cook, there was no misrepresentation which could avoid the policy; and that if Hamilton & Cook had no actual care or custody of the grain, but that so far as regarded its preservation from fire, it was entirely in the control of the railroad company, and so understood by the company's agent when the policy was effected, the omission to inform the defendant of the agreement of dissolution could not be considered a concealment which would avoid the policy. Verdict and judgment went accordingly for the plaintiffs, and the case now came here on exceptions to the charge of the court.

Mr. A. C. Bradley, for the insurance company, plaintiff in error.

1. Cook, alone, at the date of the policy and of the fire, held the grain in question in trust or on commission. He alone was the bailee, and alone had an insurable interest. Hamilton had no custody, was no bailee, and had no insurable interest. No action, therefore, can be maintained; not a joint action, because the interest was sole, nor a sole action, because the policy was joint.

It is true, indeed, that a nominal partner is sometimes regarded as a real one. But he is only so regarded adversely and to subject him to the obligations of a partner. And this is but right. When a partner retires from a firm, still keeping his name before the public, he can mean nothing but to give to the firm a credit which it does not deserve. Here, Hamilton, whose name doubtless made the firm attractive, withdraws; leaving his name in order that business might be drawn to Cook. This was a deception. Such an act may subject a person to the liabilities of a partner, but surely should not give him a partner's benefits and advantages.

2. The policy was void for fraud. Hamilton and Cook had been partners under their joint names, and the firm name continued to be used by each of them, from the time of the dissolution till the time of insurance and afterwards. Every such use of that name was a representation that both persons still composed that firm. Such representation was untrue and of a material matter. Had Cook been alone held out to the world, less insurance would have been needed. It was obviously Hamilton's name which made the firm attractive and brought business to it. Indeed, but for the prestige which Hamilton's name gave the firm, it does not appear that Cook would have had any business or needed any insurance. Then, again, if Hamilton, in addition to the name, had felt the care and exercised the natural vigilance of a partner, he might have prevented the destruction of the building. At all events, every untruth uttered with an intent to deceive others for the benefit of the party uttering it, or the benefit of his friends, is a fraud on all parties deceived. Here the company's agent issued the policy, believing both Hamilton and Cook to be partners. They so represented themselves; herein committing a fraud on the company. That fraud vitiates the policy.

Mr. R. Phillips (a brief of Messrs. Waites, Aissell, and Gorill being filed), contra.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY, delivered the opinion of the court.

The principal question is whether insurances can be effected in the name of a nominal partnership where the business is carried on by and for the use of one of the partners.

Hamilton was a nominal partner, held out to the world as a member of the firm by his own consent, and affected with every liability of a partner—to consignors, creditors, and all persons dealing with the concern. The plaintiffs contended that this was a sufficient interest to support the policy, at least, in a commission business where insurance was effected for the benefit of the real owners of the goods. It is objected that a nominal partner is only held such, adversely, for the purpose of subjecting him to liability as a partner, and not for the purpose of giving him the benefits and advantages of a partner. But whilst this is generally true, the interest of a nominal partner in the liabilities of the firm is such as should entitle him, in the absence of any attempt to defraud, to join with the other members of the firm in effecting insurance on the property of the concern. As Chief Justice Jones remarked in De Forest v. Fulton Insurance Co., 1 Hall, 110: "It does not always require either the legal title or beneficial interest in the property to entitle a party otherwise connected with it to effect a valid insurance upon it. A carrier may insure goods he contracts to convey, yet he has neither the legal title nor the beneficial interest in them, but he is responsible for their loss."

But the case of a nominal partnership carried on for the benefit of one or more members of the firm seems to be still stronger. For it may be said that the legal interest in the business is in the firm, whilst the beneficial interest is in the member or members for whose use it is carried on. In the case before us, as to all the world except themselves, the legal interest of the business was in the firm of Hamilton & Cook, the beneficial interest in Cook alone. And as it is well settled that a trustee or agent may insure the property held in that capacity for the benefit of all concerned, there seems to be no valid reason why persons constituting a nominal partnership should not be competent to effect insurance as well as transact the other business in the partnership name. In this case the intimate connection of Hamilton with the business, and the fact that as between him and the consignors of the grain insured, the railroad company with whom it was stored, and all other persons dealing with it, he was actually a partner, and incurred all the responsibility and risk attaching to that relation, constituted, in our judgment, a sufficient basis of interest for effecting insurance in the name of the firm. The doctrine, established by a number of cases, that nominal partners are proper plaintiffs, as well as proper defendants, in actions by and against the firm, lends support to this view.

See Parsons on Partnership, 134; Story on Partnership, §§ 241, 242; 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 1190.

The case before us is an especially strong one, from the fact that the policy was effected mainly for the benefit of the owners of grain held by Hamilton & Cook on commission. The action was prosecuted solely for their benefit. The plaintiffs, on the trial, expressly waived any claim for grain belonging to themselves, individually, and asked a verdict only for the value of the grain which was received on commission, claiming to recover this amount for the use and benefit of the owners. The liberality with which policies of this character, issued to trustees and agents for the benefit of parties really interested, are sustained by the courts, is stated and illustrated in the case of The Insurance Company v. Chase, 5 Wallace, 509, decided by this court in December Term, 1866. As looking in the same direction, we may refer to the cases in New York which decide that a sale by a retiring partner to his copartners of his interest in the firm, is not a breach of the condition that the policy shall be void if the property is conveyed without the consent of the insurance company. See Hoffman v. Ætna Insurance Company, 32 New York, 405, and cases there reviewed.

The other ground of defence was, that there was misrepresentation and concealment, as to the interest, which vitiated the policy. It is laid down by this court in The Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 2 Peters, 49, that an applicant for insurance is bound to fair dealing with the underwriters, and, in his representations, should omit nothing which it is material for them to know; nothing which would probably influence the mind of the underwriter in forming or declining the contract. This doctrine is repeated in several subsequent cases, and is undoubtedly the well established law. But its application will depend upon the circumstances of each case. Generally speaking it is undoubtedly true that any misrepresentation with regard to the ownership of the property insured will suffice to vitiate the policy. But policies are constantly applied for and granted on general stocks of goods, held in trust or on consignment for numerous and unknown parties. In such cases it is not expected, nor would it be possible, that the insurers should be informed as to the ownership. They are content to insure for the benefit of whom it may concern. Of course, an omission to disclose the ownership in such cases cannot be regarded as an improper concealment. In some cases it is important to the insurers to know who is interested in the property, in order that they may form a judgment as to the probable care which will be bestowed in its custody and preservation. In other cases this knowledge may be a matter of little importance. In the case before us the grain insured was in the sole custody and care of the railroad company, and the insurers were little concerned, as, in fact, their agent made no inquiry, who were the owners or interested therein; and no representation was made on the subject, farther than to make the application in the name of Hamilton & Cook, and to ask for a general insurance on the grain in the elevator, whether their own, or held by them in trust, or on commission, &c. Under the circumstances of the case we do not see that anything material for the insurers to know, or that would have had a bearing on taking the risk or fixing the premium, was concealed or withheld. On this subject the court, at the request of the plaintiffs' counsel, charged the jury that if no representations were made with regard to the individuals who composed the firm of Hamilton & Cook, there was no misrepresentation which could avoid the policy, and that if Hamilton & Cook had no actual care or custody of the grain, but that so far as regards its preservation from fire, it was entirely in the control of the railroad company, and so understood by the defendant's agent when the policy was effected, the omission to notify the defendant of the agreement of dissolution could not be considered a concealment which would avoid the policy. Under the circumstances of the case, we do not think there was any error in this charge.

manded and given a very few days prior to his death. It was two years after the last codicil to his will had been executed. It was demanded of a brother-in-law to whom he was about to intrust more than a million of dollars—I say about to intrust, for there was yet time for him to revoke the will, and all of its trusts. He was unwilling to pass all his vast estate into the hands of the defendant upon the implied assurance that the library building would be located upon the lot which he had purchased for its site. Hence he made the specific demand. What his action would have been, had the defendant's answer not been in accord with his judgment, is left to conjecture. He suffered his will to remain unchanged. He passed from this earth, there is every reason to believe, in an abiding faith that he had restrained the free choice of the defendant, and that he had secured the erection of the library building upon the lot designated by himself.

What was the position of the defendant? He knew that he had been named in the testator's will as his trustee and executor. Sitting by the bedside of his dying friend and brother—recognizing the Doctor's right to control his own property—wishing to relieve his mind from all doubt upon the subject that troubled him, the defendant then and there promised, as fully and as solemnly as language could express it, to put the building on that lot and nowhere else. Do not all the attendant and surrounding circumstances impress the mind of every conscientious and reflecting person with the very strong moral obligation thereby imposed upon the defendant? I can scarcely conceive one stronger. The greater the integrity, the higher the moral sense, the stronger would be the obligation upon the conscience. That the defendant possesses both in a high degree is manifest in his letter of the 30th December before referred to. When asked, in behalf of the claimants, to reconsider his intention of building on said lot, and locate the building elsewhere, his answer was such as did credit alike to his conscience and to his heart. After repeating the promise which he had made, and the circumstances under which it was made, he says:—"Now, do you think it would be at all consistent with truth and honesty for me voluntarily to violate a pledge given under circumstances which render it as sacred as an oath, and made to a dying man who had confided to me the whole of his estate? Would you, with your well-known delicacy and sensibility to all honorable engagements, feel yourself justified in doing so were the case your own, and should I not lose your respect and regard (which I value very highly) were I to hesitate for a moment as to what was my duty?"

Therein and thereby he proves the indelible stamp made upon his mind. Conscience, resting under an obligation strong as an oath, bound him to the observance of his promise. With that deep recognition of moral obligation resting upon his conscience, he assumed the duties of the trust. He thinks he executed the power and discharged the trust under the written will alone, wholly uninfluenced by his promise.

The well known integrity and high moral character of the defendant do not permit me to doubt that he honestly thinks so. If, however, he be correct, there must have been a time when his conscience was absolved from this deep moral obligation—a time when he threw it off, and when the lawful one took exclusive possession of his judgment. I understand the answer to be that it was at the time he was obligated to take the usual oath in order to assume the duties of executor. This was on the 31st of May, 1869. This latter oath, he says, created a legal as well as a moral obligation. Did it, however, wholly eradicate the moral obligation, "sacred as an oath," under which he had rested up to that time? In his letter of 30th December, 1870, he refers to it as still resting strongly upon him, and that his duty required him to be influenced thereby.

It is contended, however, inasmuch as the defendant has sworn in his answer, and again before the examiner, that he has considered and decided the question as to the site of the library building entirely irrespective of and uninfluenced by any promise made by him to Dr. Rush, that the complainants have failed to make a case in which a court of equity will interfere with the discretion which he has exercised.

In considering the act which the defendant has committed, or is about to commit, we must look at the position of the donor, the donee, and of the beneficiaries of the power. The beneficiaries have the right to require the power to be executed according to the terms of the written instrument creating it. If the donor induced the donee to accept the trust under a pledge that he would execute it otherwise than was provided in the instrument, he committed, in equity, a fraud upon the power. If the donee accepted it under such pledge and so executed it, he committed a fraud upon the power. It is not necessarily a moral fraud. A wilful departure from the terms of the power is a fraud upon it, without regard to whether the motive thereto was good or bad. Topham v. the Duke of Portland, 1 De Gex. Jones & Smith, 571. Nor does it change the rule of law in regard to the agreement to pervert the trust from the original purpose for which the power was intended, whether that influence be exerted before the appointment or after it, provided that in both cases it secures the consent of the appointee to fulfil the wishes of the appointer. Topham v. Portland, 31 Beavan's Reports, 539–540.

No American authority has been found which covers the case under consideration, but in Topham v. The Duke of Portland, reported in 5 Chan. Appeal Cases, 40, it is held that although the donor and the donee both swore that the power was not executed to carry out any agreement between them, other than those specified in the written instrument, yet that a chancellor might look beyond the oaths and see whether the presence of a moral obligation did not at the date of the appointment, and when the trustee came to act, weigh upon her mind with such force as to make her a passive instrument of the donor's intentions.

A judge or juror is forbidden to sit in a case wherein a party litigant is closely related to him by blood or marriage. He will not be permitted to purge himself of his disqualification by answering that he can, and will, act wholly uninfluenced by such relationship.

Certain facts, which the wisdom of ages has recognized as influencing the judgment of mankind generally, create a conclusion of law that they will influence the judgment of each individual.

Applying the law and reasons to this case, testing the uncontradicted evidence by all those principles which I have ever been taught to believe influence the human mind, and control the actions of men, it does establish such a state of facts as would naturally and reasonably restrain and trammel the free judgment of the donee of a power. Such a general presumption cannot be removed by the honest opinion of a donee that in his particular case he is not influenced thereby. Hence I am unable to conclude that the defendant had, when he made the selection of the lot in question, or has now, such a free discretion and unbiassed judgment as the complainants are entitled to invoke and a court of equity bound to provide. It should therefore be referred to a master to inquire and report what will be the most expedient location for said library building, without my indicating any opinion as to whether or not the lot at Broad and Christian streets is a suitable one.

The exceptions to the report are dismissed, the report of the master is confirmed, and decree accordingly.

BIRKINBINE v. BOYER.

The defendant, an attorney at law, came to Philadelphia to advise with his associate counsel in a case, and whilst there was served with a summons. Held, that the facts did not show such an active pendency of the case requiring the professional services of the defendant at that time, as to permit him to claim his privilege from the service of the summons.

Rule to show cause why the service of the writ shall not be set aside.

Opinion of the court by MERCUR, J. Delivered December 31st, 1872.

The defendant, an attorney at law, residing at Lebanon, in this State, was served with a writ of summons while in this city. He claims that he was privileged from the service, and asks that it be set aside.

Was he here attending upon court as an attorney, at the time?

The depositions read show that in 1868 a bill was filed in the Circuit Court of the United States for the third district, in favor of Wallace & Sons, by Furman Sheppard and George M. Wharton, Esqs., attorneys at law, residing in Philadelphia, and William M. Derr, an attorney at law, residing at Lebanon, against Bubb, for an alleged infringement of a patent right for a plough, and for an account. No answer was put in, and a decree pro confesso was taken.

Testimony was taken by complainant and injunction issued. This being disregarded, an attachment was ordered.

Subsequently, and some time in 1869 or 1870, by agreement of counsel, the injunction and attachment were vacated.

Thus the case rested so far as is shown down to the present time.

In the spring or summer of 1872, the defendant was employed by Wallace & Sons, under an agreement that he should have a certain interest in the plough, as a contingent fee for his professional services "in the matter."

Upon the 19th November, 1872, the defendant and Mr. Derr came to this city for the purpose of advising with Mr. Sheppard, and taking some action in the case in behalf of Wallace and Sons. The defendant testifies: "Our object in going to Philadelphia, was to see our associate counsel, Messrs. Sheppard and Dallas, for the purpose of making a motion to have the injunction again granted upon the testimony before the court." He further says: "If action had been taken, I suppose I would have taken an advisary part in the matter."

Mr. Dallas was out of the city. Upon the defendant and Mr. Derr going to the office of Mr. Sheppard, on the morning of the 20th of November, they ascertained he was engaged in the trial of a cause, so they were then unable to see him, and could have no opportunity so to do, until the next morning. Mr. Derr returned home; the defendant remained in the city. The next morning defendant called again to see Mr. Sheppard, and found he had already left his office; but that he could be seen between twelve and one o'clock that day. The defendant then returned to his hotel with the intention of there remaining until the time arrived for meeting Mr. Sheppard. Upon reaching the hotel, the defendant was served with the writ.

The defendant came to this city without knowing whether the Circuit Court was in session. It was not. The business, however, he says, could have been done in the District Court, which was in session.

No action was taken. The defendant had never taken any part in anything which had been done in court in the case. No reason existed why action should be taken at that particular time. The case had rested for two or three years. The defendant therein was not moving. The "advisary part" which the defendant expected to take, would not necessarily require him to go into court. He was here rather to counsel and advise with the attorneys of record as to what they, not he, should do in court. It might have resulted in no action. It is true the case was pending in court, but it was not such a pendency as necessarily required any action in court at that particular time.

We do not think the facts show such an active pendency of the case requiring the professional services of the defendant at that time, as to put him in a position to claim his privilege from the service of a summons.

Rule discharged.

Supreme Court United States.

PHŒNIX INS. CO. v. HAMILTON.

1. Insurance may be effected in the name of a nominal partnership where the business is carried on by and for the use of one of the partners; especially when the property insured (grain) is held by the parties insured on commission only, and in the policy is described "as held by them in trust or on commission, or sold and not delivered."
2. In case of an insurance thus effected, where no representations are made with regard to the persons who compose the firm, there is no misrepresentation on that subject which avoids the policy.
3. And where the firm has no actual care of custody of the property insured (grain), but so far as regards its preservation from fire, it is entirely in the control of the other parties, and is so understood to be by the company making the insurance, the omission to inform the insurance company of an agreement of dissolution previously made cannot be considered a concealment which will avoid the policy.

Error to the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Ohio; the case being thus:

Hamilton and Cook were partners in the grain commission business, at Toledo, Ohio, and kept their consignments of grain in store in an elevator at that place, belonging to the Michigan Southern Railroad Company, whose servants had the entire charge and care of it. Hamilton retired from the firm in July, 1867, but no notice of the dissolution was given, and by common agreement Cook was allowed to carry on the business in the partnership name until the end of the year. During this term, insurance to the amount of $10,000 was effected with the Phœnix Insurance Company of Brooklyn, through their agent, in the name of the firm, Hamilton & Cook, against loss or damage by fire on the "grain in store, their own, or held by them in trust or on commission, or sold and not delivered," this being the usual method of taking insurance among commission merchants in Toledo. A loss occurred on the 21st of December, whilst the policy was running, and the insurance company declining to pay it, Hamilton & Cook sued them. The defence set up was:

1st. Want of insurable interest in Hamilton; and,

2d. Misrepresentation and concealment with regard to the interest.

The plaintiffs, on the trial, waived any claim for grain belonging to themselves individually, and asked a verdict but for the value of the grain which was received on commission; asking to recover this amount for the use and benefit of the owners.

At the request of the plaintiffs' counsel, the court charged that if no representations were made with regard to the individuals who composed the firm of Hamilton & Cook, there was no misrepresentation which could avoid the policy; and that if Hamilton & Cook had no actual care or custody of the grain, but that so far as regarded its preservation from fire, it was entirely in the control of the railroad company, and so understood by the company's agent when the policy was effected, the omission to inform the defendant of the agreement of dissolution could not be considered a concealment which would avoid the policy. Verdict and judgment went accordingly for the plaintiffs, and the case now came here on exceptions to the charge of the court.

Mr. A. C. Bradley, for the insurance company, plaintiff in error.

1. Cook, alone, at the date of the policy and of the fire, held the grain in question in trust or on commission. He alone was the bailee, and alone had an insurable interest. Hamilton had no custody, was no bailee, and had no insurable interest. No action, therefore, can be maintained; not a joint action, because the interest was sole, nor a sole action, because the policy was joint.

It is true, indeed, that a nominal partner is sometimes regarded as a real one. But he is only so regarded adversely and to subject him to the obligations of a partner. And this is but right. When a partner retires from a firm, still keeping his name before the public, he can mean nothing but to give to the firm a credit which it does not deserve. Here, Hamilton, whose name doubtless made the firm attractive, withdraws; leaving his name in order that business might be drawn to Cook. This was a deception. Such an act may subject a person to the liabilities of a partner, but surely should not give him a partner's benefits and advantages.

2. The policy was void for fraud. Hamilton and Cook had been partners under their joint names, and the firm name continued to be used by each of them, from the time of the dissolution till the time of insurance and afterwards. Every such use of that name was a representation that both persons still composed that firm. Such representation was untrue and of a material matter. Had Cook been alone held out to the world, less insurance would have been needed. It was obviously Hamilton's name which made the firm attractive and brought business to it. Indeed, but for the prestige which Hamilton's name gave the firm, it does not appear that Cook would have had any business or needed any insurance. Then, again, if Hamilton, in addition to the name, had felt the care and exercised the natural vigilance of a partner, he might have prevented the destruction of the building. At all events, every untruth uttered with an intent to deceive others for the benefit of the party uttering it, or the benefit of his friends, is a fraud on all parties deceived. Here the company's agent issued the policy, believing both Hamilton and Cook to be partners. They so represented themselves; herein committing a fraud on the company. That fraud vitiates the policy.

Mr. R. Phillips (a brief of Messrs. Waites, Aissell, and Gorill being filed), contra.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY, delivered the opinion of the court.

The principal question is whether insurances can be effected in the name of a nominal partnership where the business is carried on by and for the use of one of the partners.

Hamilton was a nominal partner, held out to the world as a member of the firm by his own consent, and affected with every liability of a partner—to consignors, creditors, and all persons dealing with the concern. The plaintiffs contended that this was a sufficient interest to support the policy, at least, in a commission business where insurance was effected for the benefit of the real owners of the goods. It is objected that a nominal partner is only held such, adversely, for the purpose of subjecting him to liability as a partner, and not for the purpose of giving him the benefits and advantages of a partner. But whilst this is generally true, the interest of a nominal partner in the liabilities of the firm is such as should entitle him, in the absence of any attempt to defraud, to join with the other members of the firm in effecting insurance on the property of the concern. As Chief Justice Jones remarked in De Forest v. Fulton Insurance Co., 1 Hall, 110: "It does not always require either the legal title or beneficial interest in the property to entitle a party otherwise connected with it to effect a valid insurance upon it. A carrier may insure goods he contracts to convey, yet he has neither the legal title nor the beneficial interest in them, but he is responsible for their loss."

But the case of a nominal partnership carried on for the benefit of one or more members of the firm seems to be still stronger. For it may be said that the legal interest in the business is in the firm, whilst the beneficial interest is in the member or members for whose use it is carried on. In the case before us, as to all the world except themselves, the legal interest of the business was in the firm of Hamilton & Cook, the beneficial interest in Cook alone. And as it is well settled that a trustee or agent may insure the property held in that capacity for the benefit of all concerned, there seems to be no valid reason why persons constituting a nominal partnership should not be competent to effect insurance as well as transact the other business in the partnership name. In this case the intimate connection of Hamilton with the business, and the fact that as between him and the consignors of the grain insured, the railroad company with whom it was stored, and all other persons dealing with it, he was actually a partner, and incurred all the responsibility and risk attaching to that relation, constituted, in our judgment, a sufficient basis of interest for effecting insurance in the name of the firm. The doctrine, established by a number of cases, that nominal partners are proper plaintiffs, as well as proper defendants, in actions by and against the firm, lends support to this view.

See Parsons on Partnership, 134; Story on Partnership, §§ 241, 242; 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 1190.

The case before us is an especially strong one, from the fact that the policy was effected mainly for the benefit of the owners of grain held by Hamilton & Cook on commission. The action was prosecuted solely for their benefit. The plaintiffs, on the trial, expressly waived any claim for grain belonging to themselves, individually, and asked a verdict only for the value of the grain which was received on commission, claiming to recover this amount for the use and benefit of the owners. The liberality with which policies of this character, issued to trustees and agents for the benefit of parties really interested, are sustained by the courts, is stated and illustrated in the case of The Insurance Company v. Chase, 5 Wallace, 509, decided by this court in December Term, 1866. As looking in the same direction, we may refer to the cases in New York which decide that a sale by a retiring partner to his copartners of his interest in the firm, is not a breach of the condition that the policy shall be void if the property is conveyed without the consent of the insurance company. See Hoffman v. Ætna Insurance Company, 32 New York, 405, and cases there reviewed.

The other ground of defence was, that there was misrepresentation and concealment, as to the interest, which vitiated the policy. It is laid down by this court in The Columbian Ins. Co. v. Lawrence, 2 Peters, 49, that an applicant for insurance is bound to fair dealing with the underwriters, and, in his representations, should omit nothing which it is material for them to know; nothing which would probably influence the mind of the underwriter in forming or declining the contract. This doctrine is repeated in several subsequent cases, and is undoubtedly the well established law. But its application will depend upon the circumstances of each case. Generally speaking it is undoubtedly true that any misrepresentation with regard to the ownership of the property insured will suffice to vitiate the policy. But policies are constantly applied for and granted on general stocks of goods, held in trust or on consignment for numerous and unknown parties. In such cases it is not expected, nor would it be possible, that the insurers should be informed as to the ownership. They are content to insure for the benefit of whom it may concern. Of course, an omission to disclose the ownership in such cases cannot be regarded as an improper concealment. In some cases it is important to the insurers to know who is interested in the property, in order that they may form a judgment as to the probable care which will be bestowed in its custody and preservation. In other cases this knowledge may be a matter of little importance. In the case before us the grain insured was in the sole custody and care of the railroad company, and the insurers were little concerned, as, in fact, their agent made no inquiry, who were the owners or interested therein; and no representation was made on the subject, farther than to make the application in the name of Hamilton & Cook, and to ask for a general insurance on the grain in the elevator, whether their own, or held by them in trust, or on commission, &c. Under the circumstances of the case we do not see that anything material for the insurers to know, or that would have had a bearing on taking the risk or fixing the premium, was concealed or withheld. On this subject the court, at the request of the plaintiffs' counsel, charged the jury that if no representations were made with regard to the individuals who composed the firm of Hamilton & Cook, there was no misrepresentation which could avoid the policy, and that if Hamilton & Cook had no actual care or custody of the grain, but that so far as regards its preservation from fire, it was entirely in the control of the railroad company, and so understood by the defendant's agent when the policy was effected, the omission to notify the defendant of the agreement of dissolution could not be considered a concealment which would avoid the policy. Under the circumstances of the case, we do not think there was any error in this charge.

Judgment affirmed.

LEGAL GAZETTE.

Friday, January 3, 1873.

JOHN H. CAMPBELL,
EDITOR.

THEODORE F. JENKINS,
ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

OUR FIFTH VOLUME.

With this number we commence our fifth yearly volume, and we are happy to say, with bright prospects and gratifying assurances of continued success. It has been our aim, during the last four years, to make the Gazette a live newspaper, furnishing early and accurate reports of all the important decisions of the courts of this city and of Pennsylvania and the other States. How far we have succeeded in this endeavor, our readers can judge for themselves. Our columns have always been open to communications and articles on topics interesting to the profession, and for items of legal information; nor have we abstained from freely criticizing and commenting upon the acts of the judges and the proceedings in our courts. The Gazette is now recognized as authority in all the courts of Pennsylvania, and, we are glad to notice, is extensively quoted from by contemporary journals throughout the country. Looking back now over the difficulties and trials through which, in common with all new enterprises, we have had to fight our way; looking at the mass of prejudice and old fogyism which we have had to remove; the conservative distrust of innovation which we have had to deal with, and our final establishment on a solid and recognized footing, we have felt tempted, out of our ordinary custom, to say these few words about ourselves, and to return thanks to our numerous subscribers for their intelligent and appreciative support of our no longer doubtful undertaking. During the present year we expect to be able to make still further improvements in the Gazette, and to furnish a much larger amount of information on legal matters in other States besides Pennsylvania. There is no reason why the Gazette should not be a National paper, reporting not only the decisions of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania courts in full, but also those of the Supreme and other courts of the United States, and of the courts of last resort of the various States of the Union, and we fully intend that it shall be one.

FIELD'S INTERNATIONAL CODE.

The second book of Mr. David Dudley Field's Outlines of an International Code, has just been issued. The first book, which we noticed in this paper at the time of its publication, treated of the relations of nations and of their members in time of peace. This one treats of those relations during a state of war, discussing in their order the status of belligerents, allies and neutrals, and the commencement, conduct, and termination of war. Mr. Field gives his views and ideas in reference to what should be embodied in an international code, whenever it is possible for nations to rise to the sublime pitch of submitting their international relations to the jurisdiction of a permanent tribunal. That the day will come when some such arbitrament shall be substituted, to a great extent, among civilized nations, for the present mode of deciding questions of international law, we have no doubt, and when such a day does come, it will be necessary to have a code of laws, which the moral sanction of the people and governments of the various States of the world will give effect to and enforce. References of inter-State and National questions to tribunals of friendly or neighboring powers, or to a supreme council or general representative of a number of small states, have been frequently resorted to in the history of the world, but nothing like a general code, defining and regulating the duties, rights, and powers of all the nations, great and small, of the civilized world, has ever yet been attempted. The settlement of the Alabama dispute by the tribunal at Geneva, has awakened an unusual degree of interest as to the feasibility of putting such a code in force, and the labors of Mr. Field and his associates will do much towards keeping alive this interest and effecting some practical result from the agitations and discussions consequent upon it. We will in this article content ourselves with giving Mr. Field the benefit of his own words, as to the objects of the work, reserving until some other time a more extended commentary upon them:

"The adoption of such a code, as this outline proposes," says Mr. Field, "contemplates the prolongation and, if possible, the perpetuation of a state of peace, between the nations uniting in its adoption. It is among its chief objects, by defining rights and obligations that are now uncertain, to remove, or at least to diminish, the causes of war; by reducing, upon common consent, the excessive armaments of modern times, to reduce the temptations to war, and, by the establishment of tribunals of arbitration, to render a resort to it unnecessary and wrongful, in ordinary cases of difference.

"The regulations for these purposes contained in the first book of this code, narrow the scope of the regulations necessary for the second book. The adoption of the system would unite the assenting nations in an alliance for mutual advantage, under which it seems both practicable and safe for them to renounce, as against each other, the most mischievous of the old rights of war; and to concede to each other the exemptions which the most humane of modern treaties have recognized, and the ameliorations of the evils of war for which the most enlightened jurists have contended.

"The influence of modern civilization has affected the usages of war in two opposite directions. It has increased the deadly character of combat by scientific improvement of the instruments of war; while on the other hand, it has diminished the surface upon which war acts in the destruction of life and property, by exempting, to a large degree, non-combatants and private property; and, while increasing the rights and protection of neutrals, has practically increased, also, the stringency, if not the extent, of their obligations to refrain from aiding either party.

"The best authorities are now discussing the question whether the time has not come when civilized nations should disavow the old maxim that war makes every subject of one belligerent an enemy of every subject of the other; and recognize the principle that war is a duel between nations, in which the governments and the persons impressed with their military character, are alone to be deemed enemies.

"This change in the theory of the state of war, has already made great progress among publicists, and is now supported by eminent modern authorities, while it has received some practical sanction in the provisions of special treaties. It is submitted that it is both practicable and safe to make the modern doctrine the basis of a general code.

"In accordance with these considerations, the general principles which have been followed in the preparation of the articles of this book, have been.

"1. That as between the military forces of the belligerents, hostilities are sanctioned without other limits than those already recognized by the laws of civilized warfare, as modified by recent general conventions, such as those respecting small explosive balls, and the treatment of sick and wounded. One qualification should be added, namely: that the use of false colors and signals is forbidden, as an act of bad faith;

"2. That nations, when they engage in war with each other, should confine their struggle to military measures; and as far as possible leave undisturbed all undefended persons and places, all peaceful relations and modes of intercourse, and all property, public or private, which does not directly subserve the purposes of war;

"3. That those nations which remain neutral, must not only refrain from active assistance, but [illegible] exert themselves to prevent their people from furnishing implements of warfare to either combatant. In accordance with the rule adopted in some recent treaties, and with usage in one or two cases, war material alone is declared contraband, and all other private property not engaged in illegal traffic, is protected from capture.

"In considering the application of the provisions of this book, it should be remembered that its object is not to state all the rules of public law which are in force during war, but only those rules unknown in time of peace, which war calls into application. By article 7, in the beginning of book first, it is declared that the first book treats of the relations of nations and of their members to each other, except as they are modified by a state of war; and the second treats of the modifications in these relations produced by a state of war. Therefore, the provisions for the protection of foreigners and their property, which are contained in book first, are not repeated here; as they will continue uninterrupted in war as in peace, except so far as the provisions of this book would suspend them during war.

"The notes, without attempting to refer to all the authorities, give a sufficient number to afford the reader a convenient clue to the discussions contained in the books concerning the various topics referred to, without burdening him with multiplied references."

DISPOSED OF.

The bar of the United States has been disgusted for a good while past by a discreditable exhibition in the bar of New York; an indecent attack by three or four men—who, though making themselves rather public, were after all but little known—upon one of their own brethren David Dudley Field, a brother of Cyrus W. Field, and of Judge Stephen Field of the Supreme Court of Washington; a man of admitted high abilities, great practice, large wealth, and wide-spread reputation; and who, if he was a villain, was certainly a villain on that sort of scale that demanded dignified accusers and a solemn trial. We have referred to the matter once or twice already. Mr. Field seems to have let "the pack," as he calls them, go on for nearly two years, as much as to say, "You rather annoy me, to be sure; but I am a busy man, making a good deal of money, and I really have not the time to attend to you just now." It appears, however, that some of the party have come lately rather close to his heels; for at a recent meeting of the Bar Association of New York, an opportunity being given, Field "let fly," and certainly he deals an awful blow. The whole pack are sent up into the air as a lot of curs might be by the kick of a Connestoga stud horse. His remarks to the bar are now printed, being followed by letters from counsel on both sides of the suits in which he was said to have misconducted himself; all the counsel on both sides testifying to his perfectly correct course in the cases throughout. We have no room for the whole matter; nor is it edifying, however amusing. But as illustrating a class of lawyers, peculiar, we hope, to the Metropolitan Bar, we make an extract from Mr. Field's remarks.

"I did not begin this quarrel, but I mean to end it. For two years or more I have been followed by a noisy pack, whose bark has disturbed the neighborhood, but who have never bitten, and I will now see whether they can bite or not. Shall I show you who these men are? They are not many—less than a score in all. I confess to feeling some embarrassment how to speak of them here. While I know that my own professional life will bear the closest scrutiny, I am certain that theirs will not. I have in my possession evidence of disreputable practices by most of them and a clue to further evidence. I am sure that in their assaults upon me they have been impelled by the basest motives. Shall I use here the facts which I have in my possession against them, or shall I leave them for a future occasion? Shall I, for instance, dwell upon the scandals which attach to the name of Barlow, or shall I leave them to the Tribune and the next Assembly? Shall I mention the stigma which I have heard cast upon Van Cott, or shall he be left to the trials which perchance await him? Shall I utter the name of Stickney, or shall he be left to the little newspaper notoriety that he has coveted, begged, and earned? If I were to go into the history of these men I might give you an amusing and instructive chapter; but I forbear. One may bribe and lobby; another may live on lawsuits which he gets by drumming and pursues upon speculation, and others, still, may fall into other disreputable professional practices, but I shall not drag them into this debate. A majority of them, I think I may say without contradiction, have so little knowledge or experience of difficult lawsuits, that they do not know whether an order is right or wrong. Let me, by way of example, name four of them—Messrs. Barlow, Peckham, Van Cott, and Stickney. There is Mr.

Barlow, with knowledge so infinitesimal that in a suit upon a note of hand he actually interposed as a counter claim the damages which he insisted that the maker sustained by being called upon to pay at maturity, contrary to a promise by the payee when he took the note that he would give time for payment, and he so managed a suit in the Marine Court about tanner's bark, that his client has consulted counsel whether to sue him for causing the loss of his case, and he and Mr. Peckham together have for several months been vainly trying to frame a good complaint upon an assigned claim growing out of the late city frauds. It is perfectly well known to lawyers that Mr. Barlow does not venture himself to try the cases appertaining to his office of attorney general. His display in the office is a most laughable burlesque. Would you have me justify my action to such a man—so incompetent, so ignorant? I might as well talk to a child as to him about a course of action in a difficult case. Then here is Mr. Van Cott, who, having signed an administrator's bond at the surrogate's office for his brother, as administrator of the estate of another brother, and being sued upon the bond by a creditor of the estate, has pleaded in his defence that the bond was taken without jurisdiction, because the deceased brother was not an inhabitant of the county when he died, and the administering brother procured his signature upon false representations as to the residence. Would you have me justify my action to one who thinks that a defence either in morals or in law? And here is Mr. Stickney, the newspaper lawyer, whose chief practice has been the prosecution of fifteen lawsuits which he took on speculation, for alleged differences in gold contracts made in the Black Friday gambling shambles, and which suits it has been my lot to defend."

While we are not disposed even after reading such a piece to imitate the Pharisee and to thank God that our bar is not like other bars, and especially like that bar of New York, we may certainly feel a satisfaction at the spirit of good brotherhood which among us has always prevailed, and which found so splendid an exhibition in the recent tribute to Chief Justice Thompson, where the whole bar, after an election canvass unparalleled in interest, united really like a "band of brothers" in originating, arranging, and carrying through one of the most splendid social entertainments ever given anywhere. It was not less a tribute to Chief Justice Thompson than it was to the Philadelphia bar itself; for at no bar where a spirit of unity—of real cordiality—did not prevail, could such a manifestation have been developed; no jealousies, no dissatisfaction, anywhere. And, thank heaven! we have no Barlows, Peckhams, Van Cotts, or Stickneys here to trouble the peace of a successful lawyer any more than of an honored judge. Long may it be before this bar, in all gradations of it, ceases to be an honorable bar, or before we ever know among our barristers any of those low feelings which seem to be so common in our neighboring city! any feelings, indeed, but those which now prevail; feelings of that honorable rivalry at the bar, with which friendship, respect, and most cordial intercourse in social life are entirely harmonious, and, with us, constantly co-exist.

"The pack," indeed, as Mr. Field calls them, at the New York bar, are for the present doubtless "disposed off;" but in the atmosphere of such a place, some new one will soon be littered, for some new and discreditable exhibition. May such vermin,—under whatever names, or at whatever bar, appearing—receive the same reward that they have got from Mr. Field. He has done a service to honorable men in all professions everywhere.

To those of our subscribers who are members of the Constitutional Convention, we will furnish without charge an extra copy of the Gazette, during their attendance at the sessions of the convention in this city. THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

We have reserved a portion of our space for articles upon the Constitutional Convention, and the subjects which will probably come before that body for consideration. All communications intended for publication in this department, should be addressed to the Editor of the Legal Gazette, and must in all cases be accompanied by the name and address of the writer. Correspondents will please state under what names they wish their communications to appear.

LETTERS OF PERICLES.

IV.

To the Editor of the Legal Gazette:

My present letter will contain the remaining sections of the Declaration of Rights of the proposed constitution. Many of them are taken verbatim from the present constitution of the State. Some of them, however, are entirely new. The sections which are adopted without alteration, are not exactly as I would wish them, as there are several changes which I might suggest. But there is a strong, conservative element in the State, that opposes any alteration in the Declaration of Rights, and which will resist any change. Hence, in order to make the draft, submitted by me, as acceptable as possible, I have retained several minor provisions, which I would otherwise have omitted. I have retained in all cases the phraseology of the originals, as far as it could be done, without marring the sense—With this explanation I will proceed.

Art. I. Declaration of Rights.

Sect. 11. That all courts shall be open, and every person for an injury done him, in his lands, goods, person or reputation, shall have a remedy by the due course of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial or delay. Suits may be brought against the commonwealth in such manner, in such courts and in such cases, as the Legislature may by law direct.

This section is taken verbatim from the present constitution, with the exception of the word person being substituted instead of the word man, in order to make it as general as possible.

Sect. 12. That no power of suspending laws shall be exercised, unless by the Legislature or its authority

Sect. 13. That excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel punishments inflicted.

Sect. 14. That all prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient sureties, unless for capital offences, when the proof is evident, or the presumption great; and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.

Sect. 15. That no commission of oyer and terminer or jail delivery shall be issued.

Sect. 16. That the person of a debtor, where there is no strong presumption of fraud, shall not be continued in prison after delivering up his estate for the benefit of his creditors, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

These sections (12 to 16) are taken from the present constitution,

Sect. 17. That no ex post facts law, nor any law impairing contracts, nor laws making any irrevocable grant of special privileges or immunities shall be made.

I have made the addition, "nor laws making any irrevocable grant of special privileges or immunities," which is taken from the Illinois constitution of 1870 (art. II. sec. 14), in order to prevent companies incorporated in this State from claiming under the Dartmouth College Case, that their charters were contracts containing grants of power that could never be altered or revoked. There should be no irrevocable delegation or grant of special privileges or immunities, whether to individuals or corporations, and it is both proper and necessary to make some provision upon this subject.

Sect. 18. That no person shall be attainted of treason or felony by the Legislature.

Sect. 19. That no attainder shall work corruption of blood, nor except during the life of the offender, forfeiture of estate to the commonwealth; that the estates of such persons as shall destroy their own lives, shall descend or vest as in case of natural death; and if any person shall be killed by casualty, there shall be no forfeiture by reason thereof.

Sect. 20. That the citizens have a right, in a peaceable manner, to assemble together for their common good, and to apply to those invested with the powers of government, for redress of grievances, or other proper purposes, by petition, address or remonstrance.

Sect. 21. That the right of the citizens to bear arms, in defence of themselves and the State, shall not be questioned.

Sect. 22. That no standing army shall in time of peace, be kept up without the consent of the Legislature; and the military shall, in all cases and at all times be in strict subordination to the civil power.

Sect. 23. That no soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner; nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Sect. 24. That the Legislature shall not grant any title of nobility or hereditary distinction, nor create any office for a longer term than during good behavior.

The foregoing sections (18 to 24) are taken entire from the present constitution.

Sect. 25. Emigration from the State shall not be prohibited. Foreigners who are, or who may hereafter become bona fide residents of this State, shall enjoy the same rights in respect to the acquisition, possession, enjoyment and descent of property as native born citizens.

Section 25 of the present constitution merely provides "that emigration from the State shall not be prohibited." I have thought it best to add a provision in reference to foreign born residents of the State and their powers in relation to property. The constitutions of Oregon, California, Florida, Nevada, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Mississippi, Nebraska, Arkansas and Wisconsin contain substantially the same provision. It is but fair and in accordance with an enlightened and liberal policy towards foreigners, who actually settle in the State and become bona fide residents.

The remaining sections which follow the foregoing are new.

Sect. 26. No property nor educational qualification shall ever be required for any person to become an elector or an officer in this commonwealth.

In Pennsylvania, fortunately, the citizens can exercise their franchises as electors and officers under the commonwealth, without necessarily owning any property, or having educational qualifications prescribed for them. In the section proposed, I have given an emphatic enunciation of the doctrine conveyed in its words, as I think it necessary, in view of the effort which will no doubt be made to adopt some property or educational qualification for a voter or officer. In the language of the North Carolina constitution of 1868 (art. I. sec. 22). "as political rights and privileges are not dependent upon or modified by property, therefore, no property qualification ought to affect the right to vote or hold office." The same is true of education. In some of the Southern States, since the war, it was found necessary in order to protect the negroes in their rights as newly made citizens, to adopt sections similar to the one proposed. Now, although it is objected that ignorant voters cannot vote freely at elections nor hold office intelligently, and that poor men, possessed of no property, should not be intrusted with the power to legislate over or control by voting, the interests of property holders, nor interfere with the acquisition, control or disposition of property, yet it is held by many, and by myself among the number, that it is absolutely necessary for the existence of genuine liberty and free institutions,—which should be for the many and not for the few,—that the greatest possible extension of the franchise, consistent with sound reason, should have effect in order to counterbalance the influence and power of property.

That influence and power, if left unchecked or untrammelled, are seldom exerted for the public good. All history proves that the power of property is selfish, its views narrow and its end destructive of the liberty of the masses.

Athens, at the time when Solon was called upon to reform its political affairs (594 B. C.), presented a fearful picture of the possession of unlimited power by the rich or property holding classes. The masses of the poorer population are described (Grote, vol. 3, p. 126, chap. XI.) "as weighed down by debts and dependence, and driven in large numbers out of a state of freedom into slavery—the whole mass of them, we are told (Plutarch, Solon 13), being in debt to the rich, who were proprietors of the greater part of the soil," And again (p. 127), "The manifold and long continued suffering of the poor under this system, plunged into a state of debasement not more tolerable than that of the Gallic plebs—and the injustices of the rich, in whom all political power was then vested, are facts well attested by the poems of Solon himself, even in the short fragments preserved to us." When Kleisthenes commenced and Pericles afterwards completed the establishment of a pure democracy, founded upon the suffrages of all the citizens, then was seen the gradual development and full growth of that political liberty which has made the Athens of Pericles, the admiration and the wonder of every succeeding age.

After the revolution which drove out the Turquins in Rome, and abolished the life kingship, political power fell into the hands of the aristocracy, whose government, says Mommsen (vol. 1, p. 346), "appears to have aimed from the first at the destruction of the middle classes, particularly of the intermediate and smaller holdings of land, and at the development of a domination of landed and moneyed lords on the one hand and of an agricultural proletariate on the other." In describing the state of Italy during a later period (third century B. C.), says Mommsen (vol. 2, p. 460): "But above all, the deep rooted immorality which is inherent in an economy of pure capital, ate into the heart of society and of the commonwealth, and substituted an absolute selfishness for humanity and patriotism." At the time of Julius Cæsar's advent to supreme power, the radical misfortunes of Italian society were "the disappearance of the agricultural and the unnatural increase of the mercantile population, with which an endless train of other evils were associated." "In consequence of this economic system, based both in its agrarian and mercantile aspects on masses of capital and on speculation, there arose a most fearful disproportion in the distribution of wealth." (Mommsen, vol. 4, pp. 606–7.) "It is a dreadful picture (idem, p. 621), this picture of Italy under the rule of the oligarchy. The wider the chasm by which the two worlds were externally divided, the more completely they coincided in the like annihilation of family life, which is yet the germ and core of all nationality; in the like laziness and luxury, the like unsubstantial economy, the like unmanly dependence, the like corruption, differing only in its scale, the like criminal demoralization, the like longing to begin the war with property." It was only when the poorer classes of the citizens were represented in the government by their tribunes and had their share in the other offices of the State, that anything like liberty was experienced in ancient Rome.

France, immediately preceding the revolution of 1789, is another fearful example of the tyranny of class and property. "Its state, political and economical," says Thiers, "was in truth intolerable. There was nothing but privileges belonging to individuals, towns, provinces, and to trades themselves; nothing but shackles upon the industry and genius of man. Civil, ecclesiastical and military dignities were exclusively reserved for certain classes, and in those classes for certain individuals. A man could not embrace a profession unless upon certain titles and certain pecuniary conditions." "All was therefore monopolized by a few hands, and the burdens bore upon a single class. The nobility and the clergy possessed nearly two-thirds of the landed property. The other third belonging to the people, paid taxes to the king, a multitude of feudal dues to the nobility, the tithe to the clergy, and was moreover liable to the devastations of noble sportsmen and their game. The taxes on consumption weighed heavily on the great mass, and consequently upon the people. The mode in which they were levied was vexatious; the gentry might be in arrear with impunity, the people, on the other hand, ill treated and imprisoned, were doomed to suffer in body in default of goods. It subsisted, therefore, by the sweat of the brow; it defended with its blood the upper classes of society, without being able to subsist itself." "Justice, administered in some of the provinces by the gentry, in the royal jurisdictions by magistrates who purchased their offices, was slow, frequently partial, always ruinous, and particularly atrocious in criminal cases." (Hist. French Rev., vol. 1, p. 21, ed. Bentley, London.)

I might fill a volume with citations like the above to prove that the exercise of the political power of a State, by property owners or by a special privileged class, is dangerous to liberty, and that the only true safety of a republican form of government lies in the possession of free, untrammelled suffrage and privileges by the masses of the people. Hence I would have no property or educational qualification required for electors or public officers. The extended discussions in the press upon the recent and still continued struggles in England to extend the right of suffrage and do away with property qualifications for electors, clearly exhibit the gross injustice both in England and in Ireland, of the present English electoral system.

In our own country Rhode Island has in her constitution (art. II, sects. 1 and 2) most unjust and unrepublican provisions as to property qualifications, and Delaware is also behind the age in this respect. The Connecticut and Massachusetts constitutions require electors to be able to read and write, and that of Florida has a similar provision to go into effect after 1880, and of Missouri to go into effect after January 1st, 1876. On the other hand, Mississippi and North Carolina expressly forbid any property qualifications, and the latter, also, educational qualifications, for electors. For eligibility to office, the constitutions of Arkansas, Minnesota, Kansas, Alabama, South Carolina, Louisiana and Mississippi expressly prohibit any property qualifications from being required.

To prevent the establishment of any restrictions upon citizens, as above referred to, there should be inserted in the Declaration of Rights, a provision securing, beyond doubt, total exemption from such restrictions. The section I have proposed will accomplish that purpose.

There are two other sections of the Declaration of Rights, viz.: concerning the taking of private property for public use, and the rights of married women over their separate property, which I will give in my next letter. I will also commence Article II. which will treat of Suffrage, Elections and Representation.

REPORTS OF CASES ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE SUPREME COURT OF OREGON FROM 1869 TO 1870; and Cases in the Circuit Courts of Oregon from 1867 to 1872. By Joseph C. Wilson, Ex-justice of the Supreme Court, and Official Reporter—Vol. III., 8vo., pp. 641. San Francisco, A. L. Bancroft & Co., publishers, 1872. Received from the publishers.

This volume as far as regards its mechanical execution is neat, well printed, and well bound. It forms the third volume of the regular series of Oregon reports. There are numerous interesting decisions contained in it, among which we may note especially, Wills v. Wilson, as to alterations and interlineations in promissory notes; Bird v. County of Wasco, as to legislative regulation of fees of municipal officers; Hedges v. Paquett, as to the powers of directors of private corporations; Oregon & Cal. R. R. Co. v. Barlow et al., as to the measure of damages for taking land for railroad purposes; Oregon Cascades R. R. Co. v. Bailey & Oregon Nav. Co., as to crossing of one railroad by another; Howe v. Douglas County, as to mileage; State v. Bertrand, as to question of malice in trials for homicide; Heath v. Glisan et al., as to liability of physicians and surgeons for malpractice; Weise v. Smith, as to navigable rivers and riparian rights. Many points of practice in the Oregon courts are treated of in the cases reported. The volume, to a lawyer on the Pacific coast, is a necessity, and farther East, it will be requisite to complete sets of State and United States reports, and will be very useful to have as a report of recent decisions.

THE ILLINOIS REPORTS—An address of the Chicago Law Institute to the Bar and Press of the State, Chicago, 1872.

This is a fierce attack upon Mr. Freeman, the present reporter of the Supreme Court of Illinois, who is accused of managing the reportership "on the principle of profit to the reporter rather than to the public." His volumes are complained of "as excessive in price, deficient in quantity, and dilatory in appearance." If this indictment is as true as the report seems conclusively to make it, the sooner the reporter is removed the better. The Institute, it is announced, wish to have legislative action "to cheapen and expedite the reports of our Supreme Court." It is quite a pretty little quarrel, and we shall watch the further proceedings in it with great interest.

UNITED STATES COURTS.

The U. S. DISTRICT COURT of Oregon, per DEADY, J., November 23d, 1872, decided in the case of In re Francis & Buchanan.

1. That participation in the profits of a business is presumptive or primary proof that the participator is a partner in such business, and in the absence of other proof is sufficient evidence thereof, but such presumption may be overcome by showing that such profits were received by the party simply as wages for services performed, or interest for money loaned to the person carrying on such business.

2. The English and American authorities examined and commented on, touching the rule announced in Waugh v. Carver (2 H. Bl. 235), upon the authority of Grace v. Smith (2 W. Bl. 298), "that he who shares in the profits indefinitely, shall, by operation of law be made liable to losses" and the rule denied to be law.

3. Upon the evidence, and as a matter of fact, a partnership found to exist between two parties, where the transaction was intentionally and for collateral reasons disguised under the cloak of a pretended loan and employment as bookkeeper.

MISSOURI.

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI, October Term, 1872. Snider, Executor, v. Murdock. Decision by ADAMS, J.

This was an action on two promissory notes executed to the plaintiff's testator. There were allegations in the defence to the effect that the notes were given for land and fixtures, that a bond was given for title, and that there had been a failure to convey.

In the replication it was admitted that the notes were given for real estate, but contended that the testator had always been ready to comply with his bond on the payment of the purchase money, and that on the trial a deed was tendered. Held:

1. That after an executory contract for the conveyance of real estate is entered into by the execution of a bond for title, and notes for the purchase money, the property is at the risk of the purchaser.

2. The plaintiff's right to sue on these notes did not depend upon a tender of a deed.

3. A vendor ordinarily is not bound to part with his title until all the purchase money is paid.—The Law News, Dec. 27th.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Duff v. Wilson.

1. Smethers owning land subject to a mortgage, sold an undivided half clear of encumbrances to Duff, who leased his moiety to Smethers. Wilson became surety for Duff's performance of the covenants in the lease. In a suit against Wilson as surety on Duff's breach of his covenants, the court below rejected evidence that the land had been sold under the mortgage, and Smethers evicted by the sheriff's vendee. Held to be error.

2. On the sale by the sheriff, the relation of landlord and tenant between Smethers and Duff ceased, and the sheriff's vendee might have affirmed the lease and required the rent to be paid to him.

3. There being an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment in every lease, whenever the enjoyment ceases by lawful title, the rent ceases.

4. Wilson was surety only that Smethers should pay the rent; compelling Wilson to pay after the eviction, would indirectly be paying for Smether's breach of covenant to pay the mortgage, for which he was not surety.

Bindley's Appeal.

1. Gregg died in 1857; in 1858, on petition of the administrator, part of his land was sold by order of the Orphans' Court, for payment of debts, and distributed. In 1860, on a like petition, a further portion was sold for the same purpose; in 1863, another portion was sold for a like purpose, one of the debts being a judgment against the decedent in his lifetime; the purchaser asked that the sale be set aside on the ground that the lien of the debts had expired. The application was dismissed and the sale confirmed. Held, that the proceeds of the sale of 1863 were distributable amongst the heirs to the exclusion of the common creditors, because as to them the lien of their debts had expired.

2. The previous orders of sale, although within five years of the death, did not extend the lien of the debts.

3. The court had jurisdiction to order the sale, one of the debts being a judgment which as against heirs was indefinite, and the purchaser took a good title.

4. The presentation of his claim within five years by a creditor before an auditor distributing under a previous sale, and the receipt of a dividend, did not continue the lien.

5. Such presentation was not "an action commenced" within the act of February, 1834.

6. The principal intention of the 24th section of the act of 1834, was to promote security in titles in devisees, heirs and purchases; no admission however solemn will dispense with an action.

Neel et al. v. McElhenny et al.

1. S. claimed title to land against J. by twenty-one years, adverse holding. J. gave in evidence a lease of the land by him within the twenty-one years, in which S. recognized J.'s title. Declarations of J. made after the twenty-one years, were evidence to show that he was holding as trustee for S., and not by absolute title.

2. J. permitting S. to hold the land as his own for twenty-one years under an alleged trust, made the title of S. perfect.

3. Where one holds land for himself, taking the profits to himself exclusively for twenty-one years, with no evidence to stamp upon it a different character, the presumption, except as to co-tenants, i that the possession is adverse.

McClurkan v. Thompson et al.

1. C. being much in debt, gave to B. a mortgage, to be sold, and his creditors paid at 50 per cent. The mortgage could not be sold, and with the consent of the creditors it was assigned to S., their attorney, for their use. The land bound was sold under the mortgage, bought by S. for the same use and rented by him. He then sold to T., one of the creditors, the consideration being the payment of a preferred claim against C., T.'s own debt in full, and the balance in three notes of T., payable in one, two and three years, with an agreement by deed with T. that he would reconvey to S. in one year, upon payment of the above consideration. T. received the rent, made no improvements nor exercised any other act of ownership, nor paid his notes. Ten years afterwards S. sold the land to M., to hold in trust for the creditors of C. In ejectment by M. against T., the court below held the transaction between S. and T. a conditional sale, and nonsuited M. Held, to be error: the facts raising the question for the jury whether the transaction was a mortgage.

2. The deed to T. and his agreement under the facts, were but one instrument, and under the general rule would constitute a mortgage.

3. If considered as a conditional sale, the facts of the deferred payments, and the continued receipt of the rent showing that the reconveyance was not limited to one year, would produce the same result.

Dougherty v. The Commonwealth.

1. In a trial for homicide, the record showed that the indictment was found in the Quarter Sessions; the defendant was admitted to bail by the Supreme Court, to appear at the Oyer and Terminer to answer the indictment at June sessions; a motion there by the defendant to quash the indictment was overruled, and the defendant pleaded; the jury found him guilty of manslaughter. On the 13th of July he was sentenced; on the 20th, a writ of error issued; on the 27th, the district attorney moved the court to certify the indictment into the Oyer and Terminer, "nunce pro tunce, as of March 9th." On the 29th, against the objection of the defendant, the motion was allowed. Held, that the record showed that the proceedings were irregular, and the sentence was reversed.

2. The record appearing to be that of Quarter Sessions, the recognizance to appear in the Oyer and Terminer, and the order to certify into that court, could not be divided from the other parts.

3. The record showing that the defendant had been arraigned, tried, convicted and sentenced in the Quarter Sessions, the conviction and sentence were void for want of jurisdiction.

4. The exclusive jurisdiction to try and punish homicides is in the Oyer and Terminer.

5. In capital felonies, it must appear by record that the prisoner was present at the trial, verdict and passing sentence; his presence cannot be presumed.

6. When substantative parts of a proper record are wanting, they cannot be supplied by the presumption that all things were rightly done.

7. The sentence in this case was held to be erroneous because the record did not show that the prisoner was present when the jury were sworn, and the verdict rendered; nor that he was asked if he had anything to say why judgment should not be pronounced against him.

8. The Court of Quarter Sessions had authority to amend their record by the order nunc pro tunce; and the record was to be treated as if the certificate had been ordered on the 9th of March; but the Oyer and Terminer could not obtain jurisdiction except by the transmitting of the order duly attested from the Quarter Sessions.

9. Such certificate should be filed in the Oyer and Terminer and noted on the docket, that the jurisdiction might appear from its own record.

10. The Oyer and Terminer and Quarter Sessions in the same county should keep distinct records.

1. A son over age, and working for himself, made the plaintiff's house his home; he was taken sick, and whilst living with plaintiff, the father declared that whoever would take care of his son should be well paid; this was communicated to plaintiff, who continued to take care of the son; the plaintiff demanded payment from the father who promised to pay; this was sufficient for the jury to infer the acceptance of the offer by the plaintiff.

2. Compliance with a proposition, especially where no notice of acceptance is required, is the most significant evidence of its acceptance.

3. The promise was not one to pay the son's debt, but an independent undertaking of the father, and therefore was not required to be in writing.

4. The original promise and the death of the son, were more than six years before the suit. Within six years of the suit and before six years after the services had expired, the father said that the plaintiff had asked him to pay for the services, specifying them, and that he had told plaintiff as soon as he got so much money he would pay him. This was evidence to take the case out of the statute of limitations.

5. The recognition of a debt or of the instrument or circumstances of indebtedness, accompanied by a promise to pay or such an acknowledgment as is consistent with such promise, when the statute has not run will prevent the bar of the statute in an appropriate case.

Spangler v. Sheffer et al.

1. Foust's goods being levied on under a fi. fa., Spangler bought the judgment and execution, Foust giving his note payable on the return day of the execution, with Sheffer as his surety, as collateral security for the judgment. Held, that this did not raise the presumption of an engagement for a stay of execution, till the maturity of the note.

2. By Spangler's conduct the levy was lost. Held, that he could not recover from Sheffer on the note.

The Commonwealth, to the use of Lancaster City, v. Frailey et al.

1. The act of March 21st, 1772, requiring thirty days' notice before bringing suits against justices, does not apply to suits on their official bonds under the 6th section of act of June 21st, 1839.

2. An alderman of Lancaster collected water rents under an ordinance of the city. Held, that thirty days' notice before bringing suit on his bond for not paying over, was not necessary.

3. When a demand is made and the money not paid over, the bond is broken.

4. Proceedings against justices under the Acts of 1772, 1839, and March 28th, 1820, compared.

Heckert's Appeal.

On the settlement of Lane's account as assignee for the benefit of creditors of Heckert, there was a large balance decreed to be payable to Heckert, which was deposited in a bank then in good credit, to the account of Lane, assignee of Heckert, and Heckert notified to come and receive it. Heckert did not, but made an arrangement with the bank, not communicated to the assignee, that he would not demand the money from the assignee, but that it should remain without change of the account and at interest; he received interest on it for some time, when the bank failed. Held, that the assignee was not liable for the loss.

Letzkus v. Butler,

1. Letzkus gave his negotiable note to a company. Butler as holder sued him on it. Letzkus gave evidence that the note had been given for stock in the company, at the solicitation of Butler, who was a director and a leading man in the company, and on condition that Letzkus should be superintendent. Stock was transferred to him by Butler, and he was employed as superintendent at $1000 for six months, and discharged in two and a half months, for which time he was paid wages. Held, to be no defence to the note.

2. Under the act of May 11th, 1871, the Supreme Court will reduce their opinions to writing only in cases of reversal, and in such cases of affirmance as shall be deemed by a majority of the court sufficiently important.

3. When a judgment is pronounced with an opinion "PER CURIAM," it will imply that elucidation and argument are not required in the particular case.

Gamble et al. v. McClure.

1. The title of land being in the wife, an exchange was agreed to be made with W.; he and the husband (with the wife) made deeds of bargain and sale of the same date and for the same amount of consideration, to each other, the wife not acknowledging the deed. After the death of the husband and wife, the heirs of the wife recovered her land from D., the grantee of W. Held, that the devisee of D. could not, on the ground of failure of title in the land conveyed to W., recover the land conveyed by him.

2. In a technical exchange of lands, the law annexes an actual warranty with a condition of re-entry on the failure of title of the land exchanged; and the party evicted can recover back the land given in exchange.

3. To produce this effect it is absolutely necessary the word "exchange" should be used. No other equivalent word can supply its place.

4. Where an exchange is effected by deeds of bargain and sale, the remedy of the party evicted is for damages on his covenants of warranty.

5. A parol agreement for exchange consummated by deed of bargain and sale, will not establish an exchange, so as to enable one of the parties on eviction to recover back his land.

Supreme Court of Pennsylv'a

FOWLER et al v. J. D. SCULLY, in trust for First National Bank of Pittsburgh.

The court below decided that a National bank could enforce by scire facias the payment of a mortgage for future advances; upon a writ of error the Supreme Court reversed this decision—holding

1. In deciding whether the mortgage for future advances, held by the National bank, is valid or not, Federal laws and Federal precedents must be followed, as the subject is one which arises out of the construction of the National bank act of Congress, of June 3d, 1864.
2. The evident intent of Congress in passing said act, was that National banks should be institutions of commerce, not dealers in real estate, stocks or produce, and that no other security than personal should be taken for money lent.
3. A National bank cannot lend money on the security of a mortgage, and its power to take and hold a mortgage is confined to the second case enumerated in the 28th section of said act, viz, "for debts previously contracted."
4. The mortgage in question, which contained a recital that the bank "hath agreed to discount for said Fowler an amount in the aggregate not exceeding $100,000, such negotiable paper as he shall offer for that purpose," was made to secure the future debts of Fowler whenever they should be incurred by such discounting. Even if the recital be treated as a covenant to lend, still the loans and discounts were to be made in the future. Being to secure future advances, the mortgage is therefore void.
5. The distinction between a mortgage to cover future advances at the discretion of the mortgagee, and one to cover advances he is bound to make, recognized in Ter. Hoven v. Kerns, 2 Barr, 99, and other cases, has no bearing on the present question.
6. The mortgage being in direct violation of a positive statute, and therefore void, its payment cannot be enforced. The plaintiff could not open its case without disclosing that it sought the enforcement of an illegal security—its action must therefore fail.

Error to the District Court of Allegheny county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 6th, 1873.

The First National Bank of Pittsburgh asked the District Court to enforce by scire facias, the payment of a mortgage for future advances. The defendant, the owner of the mortgaged land, asserts that the mortgage is forbidden by the act of Congress, which confers upon the bank its charter and all its powers. The simple question is,—Is the mortgage valid or void; and if void will the law enforce it? In deciding this question, we must be guided by the Federal laws and Federal precedents, for the subject is one of Federal origin and Federal control. The plaintiff is a corporation created and governed by the act of Congress, approved the 3d of June, 1864, commonly called the National bank act. What is the Federal rule to be applied to such a corporation? In the Bank of U. S. v. Dandridge, 12 Wheaton, 64. Justice Story lays down this rule: "Whatever may be the implied powers of aggregate corporations by the common law, and the modes by which these powers are to be carried into operation, corporations created by statute must depend, both for their powers and the mode of exercising them, upon the construction of the statute itself." For this he cites the following language of Chief Justice Marshall, in Head v. Prov. Ins. Co., 2 Cranch, 127: "Without ascribing to this body, which in its corporate capacity is the mere creature of the act to which it owes its existence, all the qualities and disabilities annexed by the common law to ancient institutions of this sort, it may correctly be said to be precisely what the incorporating act has made it; to derive all its powers from that act and to be capable of exerting its faculties only in the manner the act authorizes." These propositions are repeated by himself in Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheaton, 636, and by C. J. Taney, in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Peters, 587, and Penrise v. Chesapeake & Delaware Canal Co., 9 Howard 184. In our own State, the same doctrine is recognized in the case of a National bank. Justice Strong said: "The bank is a creature of the act, dependent on it for all its powers, and controlled by all the restrictions which the act imposes." Venango National Bank v. Taylor, 6 P. F. Smith, 14.

This being the settled rule of interpretation, the question is,—Does the act of Congress authorize or permit a National bank to take a mortgage of lands, to secure the payment of future loans and discounts?

The banking powers of these associations are to be found in the 8th section, and are "to carry on the business of banking by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt; by buying and selling exchange, coin and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; by obtaining, issuing and circulating notes according to the provisions of the act." In view of the rule of interpretation of such charters given to us by the Federal courts, and the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius, the argument might close with the terms of the power to loan money on personal security: for agreeably to this rule and maxim, no other security than personal can be taken for money lent. This is the law of the bank's capacity, and of its control. It accords also with the nature of banking as a business, which is precisely described in the language of the law itself; the discounting and negotiating of promissory notes, drafts, bills and other evidences of debts (meaning, of course, debts ejusdem generis, such as checks, certificates of deposits, &c), the buying and selling of bills of exchange, bullion, and lending of money on personal security. The reasons are manifest. The business of a bank is commercial, not that of dealing in real estate, brokerage, &c. It, therefore, does not buy and sell real estate, groundrents, mortgages, stocks, produce, &c.

It deals in commercial paper, on the security afforded by the personal responsibility of drawers, endorsers and payers, and this because banks are created for the purposes of trade, which require ready access to loans of money, and discounts on business paper made in the course of trade. Experience also has shown, that whenever banks abandon the legitimate practice of loaning or discounting on the well known standing of the parties to commercial paper; to lend money on the hypothecation of stocks, real estate, &c., in lieu of personal security, they enter an uncertain and unknown region of credit. The directors can well know or ascertain the standing of drawers and endorsers as men of capital or means in the community, but the moment they leave this plain field to enter the region of corporation stocks, real estate and liens, they take a leap in the dark, and must resort to outside agents, such as lawyers, brokers, &c. The internal affairs and condition of a corporation are known to few, while the security of a mortgage rests on both title and liens, requiring professional skill to explore them. The evident intent of Congress is, that National banks should be institutions of commerce, not dealers in real estate, stocks or produce.

Another obvious purpose of confining their loans of money to personal security, is to prevent these associations from splitting on the rock which has ruined so many banks, to wit, that of lending too much of their capital to one person or firm. The 29th section provides: "That the total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company corporation, or firm, for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm, the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such association actually paid in." Thus Congress has prohibited an undue aggregation of its capital in single hands even though each note or bill may be well secured by the names upon it. Then what must we say of large aggregations of capital in the hands of one man, without personal security on the faith of an estimated value of real estate and the risk of title, and conflicting liens? In the present case we see an aggregate of loans to Fowler, the mortgagor, of $76.303.59; the very mortgage reciting, that it was taken to dispense with personal security, and to extend to the sum of $100,000. How much the paid in capital of this bank is, we do not know. That such a transaction is contrary to the first principles of correct banking and to the charter, is obvious.

The intention of Congress is manifested by other features of the act. The 35th section declares: "That no association shall make any loan or discounts on the security of the shares of its own capital stock, nor be the purchaser or holder of any such shares, unless such security or purchase shall be necessary to prevent loss upon any debt previously contracted in good faith, and stock so purchased or acquired, shall within six months from the time of its purchase, be sold or disposed of at public or private sale, in default of which a receiver may be appointed to close up the business of the association according to the provisions of this act." What is this, but to repeat to the bank—you must lend money only on personal security. Then comes the 37th section, prohibiting the bank from hypothecating its circulating notes to procure money to pay on its capital, or to be used in its banking operations, or from using its notes so as in any form to increase its capital. These two sections, the 35th and 37th, when viewed together, teach another lesson, that these banks shall not live upon themselves, so that when compelled to wind up, creditors and stockholders shall not then discover that their apparent assets are composed of their own decayed viscera, instead of outside personal security. In this way only can the public be made safe against mismanagement.

Here the argument might rest, that the lending of money on mortgage or real estate security is ultra vires and forbidden. But Congress has left nothing to implication, and in the 28th section has said in what cases these banks may hold real estate, and has forbidden all others. The 28th section reads thus: "That it shall be lawful for any such association to purchase, hold and convey real estate as follows:" Then follow four numbered cases.

"First. Such as shall be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business.

Second. Such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted.

Third. Such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings.

Fourth. Such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees, mortgages held by such association, or shall purchase to secure debts due to such associations."

Now comes the prohibition against, any other mode, and the appointed time such as shall have been legally acquired, shall be held.

"Such association shall not purchase or hold real estate in any other case or for any other purpose than as specified in this section, nor shall it hold possession of any real estate under mortgage, or hold the title and possession of any real estate purchased to secure any debts due to it, for a longer period than five years."

Thus the section speaks to the bank in plain language—you shall not purchase or hold real estate (besides your banking house) except in good faith to secure debts already contracted, and you shall not hold in mortmain, for a longer period than five years, that which you can legally take. This section is interpreted also by the 35th section, which forbids the bank from taking its own stock in security, except to prevent the loss of a debt previously contracted in good faith; and when stock shall be so taken it shall not be held longer than six months. The language of prohibition in the 28th section is quite clear. The bank "shall not purchase or hold real estate in any other case or for any other purpose than as specified in this section." The second specified case in this section is, "such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted." The law therefore says plainly—you shall not hold a mortgage for future loans, for that is another case.

If anything were wanting to make plain that which is clear, it is the amendment of the 2d clause in the 28th section, and the debate on it in the Senate. See Cong. Globe, April 26th 1864. The amendment of the committee proposed to strike out, "for loans made by such association in the usual course of its banking business, or for money due thereto," and to insert "for debts previously contracted," so as to make the clause read, "such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted." At the call of Senator McDougalls, Senator Sherman explained the amendment of the committee to allow the banks to take a mortgage for a pre-existing debt; but not to loan money on real estate security; "Not to loan money on mortgage?" said Mr. McDougall, Mr. Sherman again replied, "They have no right to loan money upon mortgage; they must take personal security, but after a debt is contracted, they may, in order to secure the debt, take a mortgage upon real estate." The amendment was adopted, and the section now stands so.

It is argued, however, that a mortgage is not real estate, and therefore it cannot be said that the bank holds real estate when it holds a mortgage. The criticism is unsound in forgetting that the law is its own interpreter. A mortgage is one of the four enumerated cases of which the law says the bank may hold real estate as follows. Then follows the second case. It is also one of the cases referred to when the law says, the bank shall not hold in any other case than as specified in this section. The criticism overlooks the fact also that the act as a Federal law is intended to embrace the various conditions of the law of mortgage as realty or personalty, in the several States. Even in Pennsylvania, where no court of chancery existed, though viewed only as a security for money, mortgages have been regarded as conveyances of real estate in form, and subject to real estate remedies, as by ejectment, and by writ of waste.

The argument founded on the 52d section is unsound. The mortgages therein referred to are of course those which may be lawfully taken for pre-existing debts, which when found among the assets of the bank shall not be so assigned as to create preferences among creditors. The express prohibition of the 28th section cannot be repealed by this reference to mortgages in the 52d section, when so ready a meaning can be found for the latter.

It is a clear and incontrovertible position, therefore, that a National bank cannot lend money on the security of a mortgage, and that its power to take and hold a mortgage is confined to the second case in the 28th section, for debts previously contracted.

It is argued that the mortgage before us is not a mortgage for future advances of money, because of the recital that the bank "hath agreed to discount for said Fowler an amount in the aggregate not exceeding $100,000, such negotiable paper as he shall offer for that purpose." It is said this is a covenant or obligation on part of the bank to loan that sum, and, therefore, the money to be lent is not a future loan. But this confounds distinctions and ignores facts. Treat the recital as a covenant to lend, still the loans and discounts to be made are future. The bank did not owe Fowler $100,000, and if it did, it had a security without a mortgage. The mortgage before us is not to secure a debt from the bank to Fowler, but a debt from Fowler to the bank, not exceeding $100,000, which is to consist of negotiable business paper discounted for him without the necessity of procuring the additional endorsement for said paper by a third party. If the bank is bound to make the discounts, the breach of the covenant would be followed by such damages only as Fowler could show. So much is drawn from the instrument itself. Then the fact is, as it appears in the schedule of discounts, that though the mortgage bears date the 21st October, 1869, acknowledged and recorded on the same day, the first discount claimed under it was on the 11th April, 1870, after which come twenty-two others, down to September 26th, 1870. These are Fowler's debts to the bank, and they are all future to the mortgage. It would be an unmitigated fraud upon the act of Congress if a bank could first covenant to lend the money, and then found upon its own covenant a mortgage to cover a line of future loans and discounts.

The distinction between a mortgage to cover future advances at the discretion of the mortgagee, and one to cover advances he is bound to make, recognized in Ter Hoven v. Kerns, 2 Barr, 99, and other cases, has no bearing on the present question. That distinction was taken to regulate the rights and equities of lien creditors among themselves, but does not change the nature of the advance itself. The advance in either case is future, but the effect upon the lien is different, just as the creditor was bound or not bound to make the advance.

It is further argued that to prevent injustice, equity will regard the mortgage as delivered anew, on each discount or advance. This will do inter partes, to prevent wrong; but such a fiction cannot confer a power upon a corporation, withheld from it by its charter. The error is in forgetting that this is a question of statute power and public policy, not of mere equity between the parties. Any want of corporate power might be supplied by this means, and the mere interests of parties be made to override the law.

Whether Vankirk, the voluntary assignee of Fowler, can set up the defence here, depends not on his character as a volunteer, but on the question whether the law will aid the plaintiff's recovery. If it will not, it is clear that Vankirk, as the owner of the estate by assignment, and under bond to administer his trust according to law, may, and ought to defend for the interest of the creditors. This brings us to the second question stated in the outset of this opinion. The mortgage being void, will the law enforce it? All the authorities, English, Federal and State, say no. Mr. Powell, in his work on Contracts, p. 166, says, that all contracts repugnant to the welfare of the State, or against some maxim or rule in law, or in contradiction to some positive statute, are void. Then follow numerous instances. Mr. Comyn, in his work on Contracts, p. 59 to 67, enumerates many statutes upon which contracts have been declared by the courts to be void as mala prohibia, and it is not essential that the statute life set should declare the contract to be void.

The doctrine that a contract in violation of the provisions of a statute, though not expressly made void by it, is null, and will not be enforced by the courts, is very distinctly stated and sustained by authorities in the case of the Bank of the U. S. v. Owens, 2 Peters, 538. Johnson, J., said, "No court of justice can in its nature be made the handmaid of iniquity. Courts are instituted to carry into effect the laws of a country; how can they become auxiliary to the consummation of violations of law? There can be no civil right where there can be no legal remedy, and there can be no legal remedy for that which is itself illegal." The same principles are recognized in Coppell v. Hall, 7 Wallace, 558. Justice Swayne, commenting on the instruction of the court below, that the illegality had been waived by the act of the defendant, says "In such cases there can be no waiver. The defence is allowed not for the sake of the defendant, but of the law itself." Again, "Whenever the illegality appears, whether the evidence comes from one side or the other, the disclosure is fatal to the case. No consent of the defendant can neutralize its effect. A stipulation in the most solemn form to waive the objection, would be tainted with the vice of the original contract, and void for the same reasons. Where the contamination reaches, it destroys. The principle to be extracted from all the cases is, that the law will not lend its support to a claim founded on its own violation." See also Bank v. Lanier, 11 Howard, 369. And in Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Peters, 587, C. J. Taney says: "It may be safely assumed that a corporation can make no contracts and do no acts within or without the State which creates it, except such as are authorized by its charter."

Coming now to our own State, a long line of decisions testifies that our courts will not lend their aid to enforce illegal contracts. In Mitchell v. Smith, 1 Binney, 110, a case of the sale and purchase of a Connecticut title to Pennsylvania lands, Shippen, C. J., says: "The contract is illegal, being founded on the breach of the law, and of consequence is a void contract and cannot be enforced in a court of law." In Siedenbender v. Charles, administrator, 4 S. & R., it was held there could be no recovery upon a ticket in an illegal lottery. Tilghman, C. J., said: "I consider it perfectly settled that an action cannot be sustained, founded on a transaction prohibited by statute, although it is not expressly declared that the contract is void;" p. 160. Yeates, J., said: "The principle of public policy is, that no court will lend its aid to a man who grounds his action upon an immoral or illegal act. Justice as between these individuals would require either payment of the money or a re-conveyance of the property, but principles of public convenience demand that the justice of the case shall yield to higher considerations, the operation of the precedent on public morals and the public interest. It is for these reasons courts of justice will not assist an illegal transaction in any respect." In Biddis v. James, 6 Binney 329, a case of lottery ticket also, C. J. Tilghman states the same doctrine in fewer words. There is, therefore, no room for equitable presumptions, or estoppels, in cases of illegal contracts. Without protracting the statement too much, I may refer to the following cases of illegal contracts, which the court have refused to aid by a recovery: Maybin v. Coulson, 4 Dallas, 298; Duncanson v. McLare, Ibid, 308; Badgely v. Beale, 3 Watts, 263; Kepner v. Keefer, 6 Watts, 231; Wagonseller v. Snyder, 7 Watts, 343; Clippenger v. Hepbaugh, 5 W. & S. 315; Wilson v. Hines, 5 Barr, 452; Columbia Bank & Bridge Co. v. Haldeman, 7 W. & S. 233; App v. Corryell, 3 Pennsylvania, 494; Edgell v. McGlaughlin, 6 Wharton, 176; Bruce's Appeal, 5 Smith, 295. Two of these cases may be noticed particularly on the ground that the contracts were collateral to the illegal act, and that the court refused its aid. Badgely v. Beale was for wages as a marker at an illicit billiard table; and Columbia Bank, &c., v. Haldeman, was on a bond of indemnity to a stakeholder for paying over money won on a wager on an election. Here the bank, as plaintiff, asks to recover on an alleged mortgage; and it follows, from the doctrine stated, that the court will not assist the illegal act; and that the argument in regard to the State, being the only party to avail herself of the illegal forfeiture, has no place here. The defendant has the right to avail himself of the defence, and prevent a recovery. The doctrine of League v. Hillegas, 7 S. & R. 313, and cases following in its track, is founded on the law of Pennsylvania as to corporations, that though they may take real estate, except for superstitious uses, yet they cannot hold it in consequence of the statutes of mortmain, but as the title has passed into the corporation, it must rest there, till the State enforces the forfeiture. This is very clearly shown by C. J. Tilghman in that case. But in the case now before us, as we have seen, the act of Congress forbids the taking of a mortgage, except as a security for debts previously contracted. The disability attaches therefore to the acquisition, and not to the retaining of the mortgage. The transaction is without authority and illegal from the start, and the law will not enforce it. The defendant may, therefore, defend against it, not because of his own merit, but because the law will not suffer itself to be prostituted. This being the rule, it only remains to state the test adopted. "The test (says Judge Duncan, in Swan v. Scott, 11 S. & R. 164) whether a demand connected with an illegal transaction is capable of being enforced at law, is whether the plaintiff requires the aid of the illegal transaction to establish his case. If the plaintiff cannot open his case without showing that he has broken the law, the court will not assist him, whatever his claim in justice may be upon the defendant." This test has been repeated in the following cases: Thomas v. Brady, 10 Barr, 170; Scott v. Duffy, 2 Harris, 20; Evans v. Deavo, 12 Harris, 65. The mortgage of Fowler to the plainaiff is, on its face, a security for future advances, and the schedule of the debts claimed under it shows also their subsequent character. The plaintiff could not open its case, therefore, without disclosing that it sought the enforcement of an illegal security—one forbidden by the law. The action must, therefore, fail. Judgment reversed.

KING v. BLACKMORE.

Where a landlord distrains for rent, and the tenant replevies, the landlord, pending the replevin is not barred from instituting a suit against a surety for the payment of the rent.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Allegheny County.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 6th, 1873.

This was an action in the court below against the defendant as surety, upon a distinct, several and independent covenant, as bail absolute to pay the rent of William Lynn, a tenant, in consideration of the letting, and for a valuable consideration, it said also. The instant the rent fell due and was unpaid by Lynn, a cause of action arose against Blackmore, the surety. There cannot be a doubt that King could have sued the tenant for the rent, and brought an action also against the surety, and prosecuted both suits concurrently until he obtained satisfaction from one of them. As the plaintiff's right of action against the surety was immediate, independent and concurrent, it is plain that the distress merely of the goods of the principal was not ipso facto a bar or a suspension of the plaintiff's remedy against the surety. The true question, therefore, is, whether the distress upon the tenant's goods, followed immediately by a replevin by the tenant, and a return to the writ by the sheriff that he had executed the writ by delivering the goods to the plaintiff in the replevin, is such an extinguishment or satisfaction in law, as will discharge the surety from his separate covenant. On principle, clearly it is not; for the goods were not sold, but went back into the possession and custody of the tenant as his own property, and by his own act; and the landlord had in lieu of the distress only the replevin bond, and the liability of the sheriff for the solvency of the sureties in the bond, both of which were mere choses in action, and not satisfaction per se. Even in the case of a levy upon execution, the levy is not a satisfaction when the goods remain in the hands of the defendant in the writ, or are restored to him at his own instance. Cummins' Appeal, 9 W. & S. 73; Lytle v. Mehaffey, 8 Watts, 275, Davids v. Harris, 9 Barr, 501; Cathcart's Appeal, 1 Harris, 421. The replevin bond and sheriff's liability, are but a means of producing ultimate satisfaction, but are not in themselves payment of a precedent and absolute debt, as the surety's debt here was. They are neither money nor goods. The very ground upon which the sheriff's ultimate liability stands, was rested by Shippen, President, in the leading case, upon the hardship of the case of the landlord. "For," says he, "by the replevin he is divested of the immediate security of his tenant's goods, and yet has no right to interfere in the choice of sureties that undertake to see them returned when he has established his demand." Oxley v. Cowperthwaite, 1 Dallas, 349, 350.

The court below founded its decision on the supposed authority of Quinn v. Wallace, 6 Wheaton, 452. But that case is no precedent for this. That case decides that a landlord who has made a distress on goods of his tenant, cannot make a second distress on the goods of an undertenant, without showing that the distress upon the goods of the tenant was insufficient, or rendered unproductive by the act of God, or of the tenant himself; and that the burthen of the proof of the insufficiency or unproductiveness of the distress, lay on the landlord, who, having taken the goods into possession, is presumed to have put them to sale, as he is bound to do under the act of 1772, and consequently has it in his power to show the result of the sale. But the present case is clearly distinguishable from that, on the very ground that the record of replevin and sheriff's return show that the goods were made unproductive by the act of the tenant himself, who has had them returned into his own possession, and the liability of the bond and of the sheriff substituted. The record of the replevin and return, therefore, show that the distress was no satisfaction, and, consequently, no bar to the independent action against the surety on his several covenant as bail absolute for the rent. Nor can the surety or bail complain of this. His liability is original, concurrent, and prior to the distress. If he has to pay, he will be entitled by subrogation to the security of the replevin bond. See Burns v. Huntingdon Bank, 1 Penna. Rep. 395; Pott v. Nathans, 1 W. & S. 155; Armstrong's

Appeal, 5 W. & S. 352. He can prosecute the action of replevin to final judgment, and avail himself of the security of the replevin bond. In the meantime, he can protect himself against the risk of mispayment by a notice to the tenant as his principal to defend the suit of the landlord against himself, on his covenant as surety for the rent. Why then should the landlord be deprived of his concurrent remedy against the surety, by a replevin which itself accounts for the distress, and shows that it was made unavoidable by the tenant's own act? The consequence flows from the very form which the contract was made to take by the mutual acts of the parties; that is to say, two separate and independent agreements for the debt, like the several liabilities of drawer and endorser, the remedy against each is complete and independent, and can be pursued concurrently with the other to judgment and execution, and can be ended only by actual payment, or a legal extinguishment which satisfies the debt. The distress and replevin were not a bar to the plaintiff's action, and the court erred, therefore, in entering judgment for the defendant non obstante veredicto.

The judgment is reversed, and judgment is now entered for the plaintiff on the verdict, with interest since the rendition thereof, and costs.

E. McFADDEN v. H. C. JOHNSON.

Damages for the entry of a railroad company upon land are personal, and do not pass by a conveyance of the land, unless specially mentioned.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Allegheny county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 6th, 1873.

The court below charged the jury that on all the evidence the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, except for the admitted balance of purchase money unpaid by the defendant. This was an error, the plaintiff having shown that she was the owner of the farm when the railroad company entered upon it, and made the cutting and filling for the railroad track, for which she claimed damages; and that this injury was done by the Pittsburgh and Erie Railroad Company, before the road passed into the hands of the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad Company. The facts are clearly proved by a number of witnesses; among them was Mr. Mumford, a land surveyor, and a director of the Atlantic and Great Western Company, who, as a member of a committee to settle for damages and the right of way, had examined the ground. He testifies distinctly to the profile of the road through the cut and fill, the former thirty feet deep, and the latter twenty-five feet high, at their lowest and highest points respectively. This profile he testified showed the condition of the farm after the grading was done, and that it was the condition in which the Atlantic and Great Western Company took the road. The proof is equally clear, that Johnson, the defendant, settled with the company and received the damages, and this settlement comprised all that had been done upon this farm. The cause seems to have been tried and decided upon the principle, that unless Mrs. McFadden reserved her right to the damages, they passed by her sale of the farm to John Scott, who testifies that she did not reserve her right at the time of her sale to him, and that he also did not reserve the right at the time of his sale to Johnson. This was a manifest error; the reverse being true, that the damages did not pass either by the article or the deed, unless expressly conveyed. The damages for the injury done to the land while Mrs. McFadden was the owner, were clearly a personal claim, which did not run with the land. If the company entered unlawfully, the entry and work done upon the land were a trespass, and the right to recover damages could be enforced by a common law action. If the entry were lawful, the company acquired a right, for which the damages (so called) are a compensation, enforceable in the statutory mode given to assess it. McClinton v. R. R. Co., 16 P. F. Smith, 409. In either case qua amque via data therefore the right is personal, belonging to the owner of the land when the entry and injury took place, and could pass only by her assignment. In Schuylkill Navigation Co. v. Decket, 2 Wall. 343, the very point is decided, that the damages do not pass by the deed. Chief Justice Gibson saying: "To the parties proposed to be made defendants, it is a decisive objection that they have not title to the damages, which being in compensation of an injury in the nature of a trespass, could not pass by a conveyance of the land." The same principle will be found to be asserted and sustained in the following cases; Hart v. Hucker, 5 S. & R. 1; Commonwealth v. Stephens, 3 Penna. R. 509; Reese v. Adams, 16 S. & R. 40. Instead, therefore, of holding Mrs. McFadden to proof of a reservation of her claim to the damages, the defendant, Johnson, was bound to show that she had parted with her rights, which had become vested in him. Neither the articles with Scott, nor the deed to Johnson is exhibited; but it is to be presumed, if either contained a transfer, it would have been noticed.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

MARY MURRAYS' EXEC'RS v. JOS. SHARP.

Where executors, and others suing or being sued in a representative capacity, take out a rule of reference, they may appeal from the award without the payment of costs and entering into a recognizance.

Error to Court of Common Pleas of Beaver county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 6th, 1873.

The plaintiffs below took out a rule of reference in this case, and an award having been made against them, appealed therefrom without the payment of costs and entering into recognizance; and in consequence, the court below set aside the appeal. The 31st section of the act of 16th June, 1836, relating to arbitration, provided, "'that in all cases in which executors, administrators or other persons suing or being sued in a representative character, or minors, shall be the party appellant from an award, the appeal shall be good without the payment of costs or entering into recognizance as aforesaid, if such appellant shall not have taken out the rule of reference." The question is, whether the qualification that the appellant had not taken out the rule of reference still exists in view of the subsequent legislation in regard to executors and administrators. The abolishment of imprisonment for debt, carried with it the bail known as special bail, conditioned for the surrender of the body, and led to the passage of the act of 20th March, 1845, P. L. 188, the first section of which enacted that, "In lieu of the bail heretofore required by law in the cases herein mentioned, the bail in cases of appeal from the judgments of aldermen and justices of the peace, and from the award of arbitrators, shall be bail absolute, in double the probable amount of costs accrued and likely to accrue in such cases with one or more sufficient sureties conditioned for the payment of all costs accrued, or that may be legally recovered in such cases against the appellants." (Brightly, 57, pl. 41.) The words "costs accrued and likely to accrue," led to the impression that no costs were to be paid under the general act of 1836, as a condition of obtaining an appeal. It was decided differently, however in Merritt v. Smith, 2 Barr, 161, and the Legislature with a view to a remedy, passed the act of 13th April, 1846, P. L. 303, validating appeals made without the payment of costs, and declaring in the second section that "the first section of the act entitled 'an act concerning bail and attachments' shall be so construed as to require the payment by the appellant to the prothonotary, of all costs which have previously accrued, whenever an appeal is entered from an award of arbitrators, excepting where executors, administrators, guardians or trustees are appellants." It will be noticed that the exception as to executors, &c., fails to repeat the qualification of the act of 1836, § 31, "if such appellant shall not have taken out the rule of reference." This act was followed by the 12th section of the act of 25th April, 1850, P. L. 571, which declared that "so much of the 1st section of the act passed on the 20th day of March, 1845, entitled an act concerning bail and attachments," as pertains to appeals from the awards of arbitrators, shall from henceforth be construed to extend to all such appeals whether made by persons natural or artificial." This section was evidently intended to embrace corporations, but the generality of its expression, natural as well as artificial, led in its turn to the passage of the act of 3d May, 1852, § 1, P. L. 541, in order to prevent its taking effect upon persons suing or being sued in a representative capacity. It provided that "the 12th section of the act of 25th April, 1850, relating to appeals from the awards of arbitrators, shall not be construed so as to embrace executors, administrators or other natural persons suing or being sued in a representative character." Here again the Legislature omitted the before stated qualification contained in the 31st section of the act of 16th June, 1836. This double failure to re-enact the qualification cannot go for nothing. We must presume that the Legislature was aware that the act of 1836, excepted from the 31st section the case of an appellant taking out the rule of reference, and consequently intended to abolish the exception. Such is the plain effect of the act, of 1846 and 1852. These laws were intended to preserve to executors and others suing or being sued in a representative capacity, the benefit of the act of 1836, of appealing without payment of costs and giving a recognizance, and if they intended to preserve the exception as to taking out the rule of reference, it was more natural they should have stated it. The intention to omit the exception accords also with the views of this court in the case of the Penna. Ins. Co. v. Hawes, 5 Binney, 508, and the practice under the arbitration act of 1810, as to executors and administrators. The impolicy of compelling them to pay costs which may come out of their own pocket, is there strongly asserted by Tilghman, C. J. It is in consonance also with the decision in Musser et al. v. Good, 11 S. & R. 247, that an executor is not liable for costs de bonis proprius, except when some fault is personally imputable to him. The liability of an executor or administrator for costs was again examined very elaborately in Callender's Adm'r v. The Keystone Ins. Co., 11 Harris, 471, and his non-liability reasserted, except where he is defeated in a wanton or vexatious suit. The same distinction is again maintained in Pennypacker's Appeal, 7 P. F. Smith, 114. In view of that legislation since 1836, and the current of decisions upon the non-liability of executors and administrators personally for costs, we are of opinion that the Legislature did not intend to revive the qualification as to the party taking out the rule of reference, in the 31st section of the act of 1836. An opposite intention would often compel the executor or administrator to pay the costs out of his own pocket, or else to sacrifice the interests of his trust, by refusing to appeal. The order of the court below quashing the appeal is therefore reversed, the appeal ordered to be restored, and a procedendo awarded.

SUPREME COURT OF PENNSYL'A.

Upon Monday last, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania commenced its regular January term in Philadelphia. Chief Justice Read, and Justices Agnew, Williams, and Mercur being present, Justice Sharswood being absent at Nisi Prius. A number of decisions were rendered in Western District cases, several of which we publish in our columns to-day, and we were glad to observe that the judges in announcing their decisions, merely stated the substance of them, and did not read all their written opinions through. Where there are so many decisions rendered at one time in our court of last resort, it is unnecessary to consume valuable time in reading them, and the judges showed their good sense in this instance, in not doing so.

After rendering these decisions, several young gentlemen (whose names we will give next week) were upon motion admitted to practice as attorneys of the court. The Philadelphia list of cases for argument was then called, occupying the remainder of the day. The court room was crowded with members of the city bar, and we noticed also the presence of several members of the Constitutional Convention, now in session in this city; among others Hons. Saml. A. Purviance, Chas. A. Black, and Senator Purman. The court is now engaged in hearing the arguments in Philadelphia cases.

The Constitutional Convention resumed its sessions upon Tuesday, 7th inst., in this city, and will probably remain for several months. Nearly one hundred out of the whole one hundred and thirty-three members are lawyers, and we have no doubt their professional brethren in this city will do all in their power to make them feel at home. The hall of the convention is very neatly fitted up, and has met with general approbation from both the members and the outside public. The Convention will be watched by the people with great interest, as many reforms are expected from its action.

Owing to the pressure upon our columns to-day in publishing the Supreme Court opinions, we are compelled to omit much interesting matter, including decisions of the U. S. Supreme Court, head notes of recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, several decisions of judges of the interior districts of Pennsylvania another letter from our correspondent, Pericles, book notices and other items, which we hope to present in our next issue.

We call especial attention to the important opinions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, which we publish to-day. Fowler et al. v. Scully, decides that mortgages taken by national banks to secure future advances, are void, and their payment cannot be enforced. Chartiers & Robinson Township Turnpike Co. v. Budge et al. decides that an unstamped instrument cannot be admitted in evidence in a State court.

THE CHARTIERS AND ROBINSON TOWNSHIP TURNPIKE ROAD COMPANY v. BUDGE & McNAMARA.

1. No instrument of writing within the act of Congress of June 30th, 1864, can, unless properly stamped, be admitted in evidence in any State or Federal court.
2. The 30th section of the act of Congress, of 1866, is not a rule for the mere regulation of evidence, but disqualifies the document from fulfilling its purpose as an instrument of evidence.
3. The act is within the powers of Congress.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 6th, 1873.

It appears in the bill of exceptions in this case, that the defendants offered in evidence a special written contract, dated April 24th, 1868, for the performance of the work done by the plaintiff. Objection to its reception in evidence was made "because the paper is not stamped as required by the act of Congress." The paper being not stamped, the court rejected the evidence. The single question is whether the act of Congress justified the court in rejecting the paper as evidence. Under this bill, no question arises upon the validity of the written contract. Had the paper gone in evidence, that point could have been fairly open to discussion, under the 9th section of the act of Congress of July 13th, 1866, amendatory of the 158th section of the act of June 30th, 1864, declaring a paper not stamped "with intent to evade the provisions of the act," "invalid and of no effect." Laws U. S., 1866, p. 303-4; Ibid. 1864, p. 148. The inquiry under this bill is, therefore, confined to the amendment of the 163d section of the act of 1864, contained in the 9th section of the act of 1866 (p. 149), in these words: "That hereafter no deed, instrument, document, writing, or paper required by law to be stamped, which has been signed or issued without being duly stamped, or with a deficient stamp, nor any copy thereof, shall be recorded or admitted, or used in evidence in any court, until a legal stamp or stamps, denoting the amount of the tax, shall have been affixed thereto as prescribed by law." This provision gives rise to two questions, the first upon the meaning of the enactment; the second, upon the power of Congress to make it.

It has been held in Massachusetts and Michigan, that the provision applies only to the Federal and not to the State courts. Carpenter v. Snelling, 97 Mass. 452; Lawrence v. Halloway, 21 Michigan, 162. It seems to us this interpretation of the act of Congress was not well considered, and is contrary to the language and the design of the act. The words are, "or used in evidence in any court." Language could not be broader, and no exception or qualification is to be found in the act, while the design of Congress makes the meaning perfectly clear. The paper is not to be admitted or used in evidence. "until a legal stamp, or stamps, denoting the amount of the tax, shall have been affixed thereto, as prescribed by law." Thus the purpose is plain to prevent the use of the unstamped paper, so long as it remains without payment of the tax or duty upon it. This is simply a disqualification of the instrument in the hands of the delinquent, to prevent its use, until he pays the tax. If "any court," mean only the Federal courts, the design of Congress is totally frustrated, as will be seen at once upon referring to schedule B, containing the subjects of the stamp tax, numbering over forty classes of "deeds, instruments, documents, writings, and papers, used in ordinary business. They will be found to comprehend all those numerous writings of every kind, which enter into the domestic affairs of the people, and the business of every-day life, in the very bosom of the State—a few for example: agreements, checks, orders, bills, bonds, certificates, deeds, mortgages, policies of insurance, leases, powers of attorney, protests, receipts, and legal documents. Now, for one such paper which can be sued upon in the Federal court, by reason of ex-territorial citizenship or other ground of Federal jurisdiction, nine hundred and ninety-nine others can never reach a Federal court, and must be prosecuted in the courts of the State, where they were made, and where the parties reside. This law is a revenue law, and of what use is the disqualification of the paper until the stamp duty is paid, as a means of enforcing payment, unless "any court" means State courts, as well as Federal? Other portions of the section confirm this interpretation. The United States have no offices for the recording of deeds, mortages, powers of attorney, and other documents, yet the paper is forbidden to be recorded till the proper stamp tax be paid. The word "recorded" cannot be separated from its immediate context, the words following it, viz., "or admitted, or used, in evidence in any court," both run together, are part of the same sentence, and interpret each other. If "recorded" applies, as it must, to State offices of record, "any court" applies with equal force to State courts. Then, also, the words "until a legal stamp or stamps denoting the amount of tax, shall have been affixed thereto, prescribed by law," refer to all the different kinds and amounts of stamps in schedule B, just as clearly as the words "deeds, instruments, documents, writings, and papers," refer to their various kinds in that schedule, and thus bring us back a second time to the entire body of writings and papers in use among the people within the State. How can it be said, in view of all these provisions, the subjects of the tax, and the evident design of Congress, that the words "any court," thus used in the broadest form and fullest sense, without qualification or exception, are to be limited to the Federal courts, and thereby to defeat the enforcement of the payment of the tax, the only real purpose of the provision? When it is said, as in Carpenter v. Snelling, supra, that Congress cannot pass laws regulating the competency of evidence in the trial of causes in the several States, the purpose of this provision is incorrectly stated. The abstract proposition is true, but it is misapplied. The purpose of Congress was not to make rules of evidence, but to stamp the instrument of evidence with a disqualification, which will prevent its use as evidence until the delinquent has paid his tax. If, then, in legislating upon proper subjects of Federal power, so as to enforce the execution of the rightful power of Congress, it be said Congress cannot affix to the subject of the exercise of its clearly granted powers, qualities which must be recognized by State courts, I deny the assertion, and oppose to it the second section of the sixth article of the Federal Constitution, which makes such a law the supreme law of the land, binding on the judges in every State. If in legislating on a proper subject of Federal power, Congress declare a forfeiture, for instance of smuggled goods, with intent to evade payment of the duties on them, the State courts are clearly bound to recognize the title acquired by forfeiture in whosoever hands the goods may be. When the subject of a law is fairly within a Federal power given in the Constitution, Congress has express power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry the given power into execution. This is the test of the competency of this evidence. The instrument being a proper subject of the Federal power to tax, it is just as clearly competent for Congress to affix a disability to the unstamped paper that will compel the payment of the tax. The propriety, as well as the necessity, of the disability in this case, is so obvious, it does not admit of a serious question. The writing is a thing done between private persons, unseen by the eyes of revenue officers. Neither party has a motiv to reveal it for taxation, for the tax enhances the price of an article of sale, and the expense of every pecuniary transaction evidenced by a writing. Neither is interested in inflicting the penalty upon the other. The very touchstone of the value of the writing to the party who claims under it, is his ability to put it in evidence. It is just here the law touches the writing with its power, and makes it useless to the party until he performs his duty, by paying the tax upon it. What can be more proper, and, indeed, more just? He makes his contract under the law and subject to it. He knows, or is presumed to know, his duty, and should perform it. If he fail from real ignorance, or for reasons which show that he did not intend to defraud the revenue, the instrument is not invalid, and he has but to procure the writing to be stamped, and can then use it in evidence. Then on what principles of reason, or of sound constitutional law, can a State court, subordinate in this respect by the Federal Constitution, disregard the act of Congress, and receive the disqualified paper in evidence, when the prohibition concerns the rights of the superior government, and is essential to its power to collect the tax? The taxing power being a clear Federal grant of power, and the disqualification affixed to the writing as an instrument of evidence, being clearly proper to compel payment of the tax, the case falls directly under that provision of the Federal Constitution which makes the law supreme, "and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

We come next to the question of power, if, indeed, there can be any question in a matter so plain. But courts in other States have denied the power, and their decisions have been cited to us. I shall, therefore, state our views briefly. I heartily concede the doctrine of State rights in all those things wherein State rights have been withheld from the Federal Government, and are by the Constitution itself reserved to the States, or the people thereof. In all that concerns the personal happiness and freedom of the citizen, the State is his natural protector, and I would cling to her, therefore, in whatever belongs to her reserved and ungranted powers. I have said, heretofore, that the doctrine of State rights, pushed to excess, culminated in civil war, while the rebound, caused by the success of the Federal arms, threatens a consolidation equally serious; and, therefore, that the landmarks of the Constitution, as planted by Chief Justice Marshall and his associates, on the solid ground of reason, and a due regard to the rights of the States and of the Union, constitute the only safe guides of decision. Craig v. Kline, 15 P. F. Smith, 399. But when, as here, a clear case of Federal power comes before us, the paramount duty we owe, as State judges, to the Federal Constitution, requires that we should uphold the exercise of the Federal powers, as a matter of duty and conscience.

The power of Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," is the first great power conferred in the enumeration of powers found in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, and immediately precedes, as its true purpose and end, the power "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." The nineteenth clause in the same enumeration, declares that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof."

At a very early day, Congress, under the taxing power, passed a stamp tax act, on the 6th of July, 1797, entitled, "An act laying duties on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper." 1 U. S. Stat. at Large, p. 527. The thirteenth section contains this clause—"and no such deed, instrument, or writing, shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any court, or admitted in any court to be available in law or equity, until it shall be stamped as aforesaid." Next came the act of 2d August, 1813, entitled, "An act laying duties on notes of banks, bankers and certain companies; on notes, bonds, and obligations discounted by banks, bankers, and certain companies; and on bills of exchange of certain descriptions.". 3 U. S. Stat. at Large, p. 77. The seventh section begins with this provision: "That no instrument or writing whatsoever, charged by this act with the payment of a duty as aforesaid, shall be pleaded, or given in evidence in any court, or admitted in any court to be available in law or equity, unless the same shall be stamped or marked as aforesaid." This section contained a further provision, enabling the party, in cases of omission, to pay the stamp duty to the collector, and thereby to establish the efficacy of the instrument. Similar provisions are made in existing laws. Thus, it appears that the exercise of the power in question, in its most rigid form, is an old practice of the government, sanctioned by those contemporary with the formation of the Constitution, and familiar with the relations between the States and the Federal Government. Added to this, is the analagous legislation exercised from the first year of the organization of the government. Thus the act of July 31st, 1789, to regulate the collection of duties, in the twelfth section, provides that goods, wares and merchandise, landed without the collector's permit, shall be forfeited, and may be seized by the officers of the customs; and if of the value of $400, the vessel, tackle, and furniture, shall be subject to like forfeiture and seizure. 1 U. S. Stat. at Large, p. 29. The act of June 4th, 1794, for the collection of the internal revenue upon distilled spirits, stills, wines and teas, in the second section, provides for the forfeiture of the spirits distilled, and of the still itself. 1 U. S. Stat. at Large, p. 379. Then there are the numerous statutes relating to the coasting trade, tonnage duties, the embargo, &c., forfeiting both vessel and cargo; and various statutes on the subject of the internal revenue, forfeiting the subjects of taxation, for nonpayment of the taxes and excises; and decisions thereupon without number. See Brightly's Federal Digest, pp. 127–8, 278, 487, 736, 803. This power to forfeit the subject of the tax, duty, impost or excise, as a consequence of evasion or non-payment, is undeniable; for the reason that, being in the exercise of the express powers of the Constitution, and the lawful means of carrying these powers into effect, they are within the clearly defined powers granted to the Federal Government. Now, it is perfectly obvious, that the evidence of the title is not more sacred than the very thing itself. If the latter can be forfeited for delinquency, on what principle can it be affirmed that the former cannot be reached to compel payment? Certainly, the paper evidencing the owner's right to money or other property, is quite as much within the power of regulation to secure payment, as the thing itself is, of which it is the mere type. The argument which affirms that it cannot be so regulated, places the incident on higher ground than its principal, and makes the shadow more sacred than the substance.

It is said, in some of the cited cases, that the exercise of this power enters within the domain of the State, and interferes with its internal affairs. Granted; but what logical consequence follows? Certainly, not that the act of Congress is unconstitutional and invalid. From the very nature of the power to lay taxes and excises, its exercise comes right into the heart of the State, and visits its citizens in all their most private relations, estates and property. It is more searching in its operation than the power to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, to return fugitives from justice and labor, to call out the militia, to regulate the value of money, and fix a standard of weights and measures, and to establish post offices and post roads; yet all these, admittedly, enter within the State, and touch most intimately its business and people. Like the taxing power, these are among the express powers of Congress, and their rightful exercise within the States is, therefore, undoubted. A notable instance of the exercise of Federal power within the bosom of the State, is that discussed in the United States v. Fisher, 2 Cranch, 358, under the act of Congress, giving priority in payment to the claims of the United States, out of the estates of decedents. C. J. Marshall there discussed and settled the interpretation of the nineteenth clause of the eighth section of the first article, conferring the power to pass necessary and proper laws to carry the main powers into effect. In that case, from the duty of the United States to pay their debts, is inferred the power of preserving their own claims as a means of paying debts; and from this was inferred the further power of declaring the claims of the United States first liens on the estates of decedents, thereby entering into the most sacred trusts of the State herself, in which she holds the property of the dead, and changing the order of distribution of that property, placed upon it by State legislation. This right of priority of the United States, has been conferred upon the sureties of debtors by way of subrogation.

Without extending the argument unnecessarily, the license tax cases reported in 5 Wallace's U. S. Rep. 462, bear more directly upon the question of power in this case, and, in effect, settles it. It seems to us very clear that the provision of the act of 1866, which excludes an unstamped writing or paper from record, and as evidence in any court until the tax be paid, is not a rule for the mere regulation of evidence, but is a disqualification attached to the document, making it incompetent to fulfil its purpose as an instrument of evidence, until the stamp duty is paid; that it is a provision to enforce the payment of the tax of the most necessary kind, and binding on all courts; and that it falls clearly within the express powers of Congress to levy taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, and to make all laws necessary and proper to carry the taxing power into execution.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Thompson, C. J., dissented, upon the ground that the legislation alters a rule of evidence belonging to the State tribunals.

AT NISI PRIUS. IN EQUITY.

RAILROAD CO. v. ASHTON.

An averment in a bill that a contract was made for the account and use of the plaintiff, clearly alleges his right to the benefit of the contract.

Demurrer to bill.

Opinion of the court by MERCUR, J. Delivered January 3d, 1873.

The defendant has assigned four causes for demurrer.

The whole ground, however, is substantially covered by this one, to wit:

"1st. Because plaintiffs show no title in the bill to enable them to bring their suit against this defendant."

The bill charges inter alia that one S. P. Kase entered into two written contracts, under seal, with the defendant; one dated August 16th, 1870, the other February 18th, 1871; by which said defendant agreed to purchase of said Kase the notes of one Thomas Woods, to the amount of $30,000, at a discount at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, secured by the bonds of the plaintiff in double the amount of the said notes, as collateral; Kase agreeing to guarantee the payment of said notes at maturity; that the defendant further agreed that upon the payment of said notes, he would deliver up to said Kase the bonds of the said plaintiff; that the notes and bonds were delivered to said defendant under said contracts; that said contracts were made by said Kase, for the account and use of said plaintiffs; and upon the 23d, of August, 1871, before the filing of this bill, said Kase, in behalf of the plaintiffs, notified the defendant that the $30,000 loan made to him, was for the plaintiffs, and that they held their bonds to the amount of $60,000 as collateral security; that they are ready and willing to pay whatever may be due on said notes, and otherwise fulfil the contract made by said Kase; and that they have demanded the said notes and bonds, but that the defendant has refused to give them up, &c., and asking for a decree that they shall be delivered up upon the payment of whatever may be found to be due on account of said notes, &c.

The transaction was substantially a loan of $30,000, by the defendant, at 12 per cent.; the payment of it was secured by placing in his hands as collateral security, the notes against Wood, and the bonds against the plaintiff.

The question then is, do the plaintiffs aver a right of property in the notes and bonds in language sufficiently definite to enable them to file a bill therefor?

It is wholly unimportant whether the plaintiffs have a legal or an equitable interest in the notes and bonds claimed; Story's Eq., Pl. § 137; Brightly's Eq. Jurisp, § 537; but every bill must show clearly that the plaintiff has a right to the thing demanded. Dan'l Chan, Prac. 322. It must be an actual existing interest. Idem, 323; and that he has a proper title to institute a suit concerning it. Idem, 324.

It is very true, as urged by the counsel for the defendant, the bill does not aver any transfer or assignment of the contracts by said Kase, to said plaintiff; but what is the fair and natural import of the averment, "that the said contracts were made by said Kase, for the account and use of said plaintiffs." I understand it to be, that Kase, at the time of the making of the contracts, was acting in behalf of the plaintiffs, and for their use and benefit, and not for himself or his benefit; that the notes and bonds placed in the defendant's hands were the property of the plaintiff's at that time, and not his own. It is not averred that he communicated these facts to the defendant at the time of making the contracts, nor is it necessary that it should have been either done or averred. It is averred that prior to the filing of this bill, the defendant did have notice, and that the same was demanded in the name and on behalf of the plaintiffs. I think, therefore, the bill does allege clearly; the plaintiffs' right to the property demanded.

The demurrer is overruled.

District Court of Philada.

CALLAHAN v. ACKLEY.

A note given to one creditor contrary to the terms of a composition agreement, is either in fraud of the other creditors, or a nudum pactum, and will not support an action.

Rule for a new trial.

Opinion by BRIGGS, J. Delivered January 4th, 1873.

Whether we regard the arrangement between the plaintiff and defendant, resulting in the giving of the note in suit to the plaintiff, as fraudulent to the defendant's other creditors, or as one made between the plaintiff and defendant immediately after the creditors signed the composition release, it is alike fatal to the plaintiff's right of recovery.

If the former, it is void because of the fraud upon the other creditors, who certainly would not have signed the release for fifty per cent. of their claims had they known the plaintiff was to be paid his in full. Stewart & Bro. v. Blum, 4 C. 225; Mann v. Darlington, 3 H. 310.

If the latter, there was no consideration to sustain a recovery upon the note, it being admitted that it was given for the balance of the plaintiff's claim, released but two hours before. The claim being thus released, there was nothing left to serve as the consideration for the note. Snivly v. Read, 9 W. 396.

The cases where moral obligation has been held to operate as a consideration to sustain a promise, have arisen where the promisor had been discharged by his own act, as in bankruptcy; or by operation of law, as by the statute of limitations, and not as in this case, by the act of the creditor himself.

Here the plaintiff, of his own accord, joined the other creditors in executing the composition release, and by that act he so effectually remitted to the defendant his entire claim, that no court would enforce it in view of the release. The claim then being entirely gone, how can he recover upon the note, the only consideration for which is the balance of the released claims, coupled, it is true, with the defendant's promise to pay? But we have already shown, that a promise growing out of a fraudulent arrangement can be of no avail. Indeed, such a promise is void even as between the parties, on the ground of policy. Courts of justice are always closed against parties to a fraud. Mr. Kent, in vol 2 of his Commentaries, p. 466, upon this point, uses the following expressive language: 'Contracts are illegal when founded on a consideration contra bonos mores, or against the principles of sound policy, or founded in fraud, or in contravention of the positive provisions of some statute law. If the contract grows immediately out of, or is connected with, an illegal or immoral act, a court of justice will not enforce it. * * * * The courts of justice will allow the objection that the consideration of the contract was immoral or illegal, to be made even by the guilty party to the contract, for the allowance is not for the sake of the party who raises the question, but is grounded on general principles of policy."

It hence follows, that the rule for the new trial must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

HAMILTON v. LYLE.

As to residents of the county, the sheriff is bound to serve a writ, he being presumed to know the resident's dwelling house; but as to strangers, he is not presumed to know them nor where they live, and is only bound to act according to the information given him.

Rule to take off nonsuit.

Opinion by BRIGGS, J. Delivered January 4th, 1873.

Both Stetson and Roberts, his agent were residents of the State of Massachusetts. The former being manager of various places of amusement, rented for a few weeks the Walnut street theatre in this city, and sent Roberts, his agent, here in advance, to prepare for the engagement soon to come off. While Roberts, was alleged to be here, the plaintiff sued Stetson, and placed the summons in the defendant's hands as sheriff, for service, with the information that the defendant, or his agent was then at the Walnut street theatre. The sheriff accordingly proceeded to the theatre to make the service, but could find neither Stetson nor his agent, and so reported to the plaintiff's agent, who left the foregoing instructions as to where and how the service could be made. No further information was given, and the sheriff made no further efforts to serve the summons. Neither Stetson nor Roberts had other residences or place of business here than at the theatre. These facts were disclosed by the plaintiff's own witnesses. He now brings this suit against the sheriff for failing to serve the summons. Upon the foregoing facts a non-suit was directed, and in this the plaintiff alleges there is error.

The modes of serving a summons in this State, are clearly defined by statute: On residents within the county, personally, or by leaving a copy at the defendant's residence, with an adult member of his family. On a non-resident, doing business in the State, by service on his clerk or agent, at his usual place of business or residence. The sheriff should be held to the strictest accountability for service upon a resident defendant, because he is presumed to know, or may ascertain upon inquiry, the residence of every person in his county. While such is the law as to resident defendants, surely a more relaxed rule prevails as to non-resident strangers, temporarily sojourning in the county. Being strangers, the law does not presume the sheriff knows them, or where they may be found. If pointed out, of course he is bound to make the service. But if not pointed out except by designation of place, is he bound to do more than go to the place appointed and make a reasonable effort to effect the service, and if he do not find the defendant there, does the law presume he may find him elsewhere in the county?

Failing to find Stetson or his agent at the theatre, as per information given the sheriff when the writ was left with him, was not the sheriff remitted to the same uncertainty as to their whereabouts as he would have experienced had no information been given him at all. And in such case, surely, no court would hold him answerable for non-service. But should the sheriff have gone to the theatre a second time? Why should he, unless informed by the plaintiff that Stetson or his agent had returned? They were not residents, and the law does not presume that they would return. When the sheriff had obeyed the instructions given him, we think it was the plaintiff's duty to again locate Stetson or his agent, before seeking to hold the sheriff responsible; and, not having done so, we are of the opinion that he has no cause to complain, especially as his own testimony shows that the sheriff made an effort to serve the summons in accordance with the instructions given him when he received the writ.

Rule discharged.

SUPREME COURT UNITED STATES.

CARLTON v. BOKER.

The court disapproves of attempts to expand, by re-issue, a simple invention of a distinct device into an all-embracing claim, calculated by its wide generalizations and ambiguous language to discourage further invention in the same department of industry, and to cover antecedent inventions. Such a claim cannot stand the test of sober consideration.

While a repetition of substantially the same claim in different words does not necessarily vitiate a patent, yet, when a specification, by ambiguity and a needless multiplication of nebulous claims, is calculated to deceive and mislead the public, the patent is void.

One void claim does not vitiate the entire patent, if made by mistake or inadvertence, and without any wilful default or intent to defraud and mislead the public.

Orphans' Court of Philada.

McCARTHY'S ESTATE.

1. The relationship of sister-in-law, will not rebut the presumption that a housekeeper was to be paid for her services even though no demand of payment be made by her.
2. In this State there is no presumption that a servant is paid either weekly or monthly.

Sur exceptions to report of auditor.

Opinion by FINLETTER, J. Delivered January 4th, 1873.

The claimant was the sister-in-law of decedent. She performed all the duties of housekeeper and servant, and in addition did the washing and marketing. In this she had no assistance and needed none, as the family consisted only of the decedent and his grown up daughter.

Her services continued, to the death of her brother-in-law, and covered a period of fourteen months, for which she claimed pay at the rate of $3 per week. The evidence which has been reported to us does not show an express contract, nor does it warrant the finding of the auditor that it was the case of an asylum rendered to the claimant in consideration of her services, rather than a contract to pay therefor.

There is evidence that "he was to pay her," which, although unsatisfactory, throws some light upon the relations in which the parties stood in regard to the services which were rendered. If it be considered merely as the opinion or surmise of the witness, it is still of some weight as showing that appearances, at least, indicated that the claimant occupied the position of servant for pay, rather than the position of one living upon the charity of another.

However this may be, that she performed all the duties of housekeeper and servant is undisputed. From this alone the contract could and should be inferred, unless the circumstances of the case be inconsistent with the relation of employer and employee.

The only circumstances upon which the auditor relies in rejecting her claim, are, that "she was the sister-in-law of the deceased; that there was no evidence of any demand for wages, and that she kept no accounts."

The relationship which had existed made it more desirable that she should keep house for him; but it is not inconsistent with the fact that she rendered these services for wages. What obligation did it impose upon her to render gratuitously services for which she might elsewhere have been well paid? What obligation was there upon him to give her an "asylum?"

When we consider that one party is dead, and the other is not permitted to testify, it may very well be that no evidence of a demand of wages could be produced. Servants, even if capable, seldom keep accounts. It would be hard ruling to hold that a servant, or any one else, must prove demand for payment, or show accounts before recovery could be had.

The claimant had no need for her wages. She was amply supplied by her husband. Might not a disposition to accommodate her relative, and a desire to keep her earnings together until her husband's return from the war, be sufficient reasons for not demanding them? If they were not, might not respect for the feelings of her relative prevent her from making her demand public.

The auditor finds that there is a legal presumption that servants are paid either weekly or monthly. If this be so in England, or elsewhere, it is not so here. It is not the practice to pay either weekly or monthly, or at any stated times, and there is nothing in the contract or services from which it may be legally inferred. The act in relation to decedents' estates, which makes the wages of servants for one year preferred claims, is inconsistent with such a presumption.

It is not the fault of the claimant that the estate, has not been settled sooner, and the argument of staleness is, therefore, fallacious. Exceptions sustained.

ELEVENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Court of Common Pleas of Luzerne County.

LACKAWANNA IRON AND COAL CO. v. FALES.

1. When referees return findings of law, they should embody in their reports, at least, a brief reference to the authorities on which such findings are predicated.
2. The legislative purpose in enacting the "referee law," was the erection of a new tribunal before which civil cases could be tried. It was designed to be as potent as any other statutory tribunal in the commonwealth, erected for any other specific purpose. It was not a tribunal imposed on suitors by positive mandate, on the contrary, it was one which they must mutually seek, and seeking it, they must waive their right to trial by jury. It dispensed with both court and jury, and put in their stead a referee.
3. The supplement to the act applicable to this county, took away none of the powers of the referee as originally delegated. It only constituted this court an intervening step on the road to a higher review.
4. As to all questions purely of fact, the findings of a referee are as conclusive as those of a jury in a case tried before the court.
5. If a plain mistake or a palpable abuse of power appears on the face of the report, or, if either be shown by affirmative evidence aliunde, the court may set the proceedings aside; or, if his findings of law are erroneous, we may correct them, or commit the report again to him; or, if his findings of fact are unsupported by testimony, a record of which comes up with the report, we may reverse them, and send the report back, or enter such judgment in the case as we may deem proper.
6. Where, however, his findings of fact are based upon testimony actually in the case, no matter how conflicting it may be, the court will not disturb them, no more than we would the verdict of a jury because of a mere conflict in the testimony submitted.
7. With respect to findings of fact, the referee stands where the statute places him, namely, in the place of a jury. It would be an invasion of his province in the administration of justice to override this doctrine.
8. Where the court are satisfied that testimony material to the issue, and upon which a referee has based an important finding of fact, was submitted at the trial, but through some mistake or inadvertence it has been omitted from the record of testimony sent up, an exception to such finding on the ground that the report contains no evidence to support it, will not prevail, but the court will, under such circumstances, send the case back for further hearing.

Exceptions to report of referee.

Opinion by HARDING, P. J. Delivered at Wilkesbarre, January 6th, 1873.

Before proceeding to a consideration of the matters which give rise to the exceptions in this case, we beg to call the attention of the bar to a feature connected with reports of this character, which has already become quite too general, and which if not changed will in a great measure defeat one of the prominent purposes in view when the "referee act" was engrafted into and became an incident of the practice in the Court of Common Pleas of this county. That purpose was nothing more or less than to speed the administration of justice within our borders.

In reference to the results reached under the act, we said on a former occasion, "that the delays which are inseparable from the court, and which spring sometimes from a crowded trial list, and sometimes from the difficulty of securing, and the impossibility of enforcing the attendance of absent and important witnesses; and, in truth, from a catalogue of legitimate reasons well understood by the profession and by the court, are, by the operation of this law, largely escaped, and justice is attained and administered, not only with greater dispatch, but often with entire satisfaction to suitors on both sides."

While the act does not in terms provide that references of causes shall be made exclusively to gentlemen learned in the law—a legislative oversight, perhaps—still the practice here has been almost uniform so to refer them. And very often in the cases so referred, questions of law arise which are of great nicety and importance, and which, in the hurry of a jury trial, it would be scarcely possible for the court to examine and pass upon advisedly, or with the care which the principle involved, or the issue itself might demand. Such questions, when raised before a referee, are usually unattended with any circumstances demanding haste of disposition. On the contrary, there is an opportunity for argument by counsel in extenso; the authorities referred to may be subsequently examined, and their force and pertinence ascertained and properly accredited; a decision may be thus reached, which besides being grounded upon the law as it actually is, shall have the force to work out as between the litigants the true purpose of a judicial tribunal, namely, the administration of justice.

But while there is this advantageous feature growing out of the "referee act," referees themselves forget that the discharge of their functions is not always followed by an ending of the cases referred to them. By the terms of the supplement to the act, exceptions may be sealed to their findings both of law and of fact, and also to their admission or rejection of testimony. It then becomes the duty of the court to hear and decide upon the exceptions so sealed, and ultimately to enter such judgment in the particular case as shall seem proper. Now, as we have remarked, these exceptions may, and they do, ordinarily give rise to intricate and important questions of law, which, though they may have been properly ruled by the referee himself, nevertheless constitute the very basis of exception; and thus the whole case, perhaps with a volume of testimony attached, is brought before us on review. Under such circumstances, while the labors of the referee may have ceased, those of the court have just had a beginning. And further, although the counsel in the case may have furnished the referee with elaborate briefs, covering perhaps all the precedents as well as authorities applicable to the matter in hand, yet when it is brought before the court with a view to more certain or satisfactory adjudication, such briefs rarely ever appear. In accordance with a practice long ago chronic with the members of this bar, at least to a large number of them, the "papers" are simply "handed up;" no reference either to precedent or authority is vouchsafed; often no argument is proffered on either side, or, at best, but a general statement of the principles or questions alleged to be involved, is made; the court is left to wade through the findings and through a mass of testimony in manuscript, often shabby in chirography and almost interminable in length; the law applicable to the questions involved, we are generously privileged to "hunt up;" in fact nothing is further heard from counsel, except always an early inquiry as to the probable time of final decision, accompanied by an intimation, delicately put of course, that the interests of clients are seriously jeopardized by delay.

The cure in part for this state of things lies with the referees. If in making up their reports they would append to their findings of law even a brief reference to the authorities on which they are predicated, it would be of substantial service to the court. It would relieve us of a labor of research necessarily occasioning that very delay which seems to fill counsel with those troublesome apprehensions concerning the interests of their clients.

The report before us, and in fact most of the surroundings connected with the case, furnish no exceptions to the general features as herein already referred to. The referee reports five findings of fact, and five of law; and to the whole of them the plaintiff excepts. The exceptions, though very general, nevertheless, in effect, cover all the findings both of law and of fact. But, as we shall commit the report again to the referee, it will not be necessary to examine at this time any of the exceptions with a view to their present disposition. We shall only refer to them, with one exception perhaps, in so far as they indicate a mistaken view of the province of a referee.

The legislative purpose in enacting what is commonly known as the "referee law," was the erection of a new tribunal before which civil causes could be tried; and for that specific purpose, it was designed to be as potent as any other statutory tribunal in the commonwealth erected for any other specific purpose. It was a tribunal not imposed upon suitors by positive legislative mandate, nor against their wishes, nor even against the wishes of either one of them; but, on the contrary, one which they must mutually seek, and seeking it thus, must waive their right to trial by jury. It was new to practice, and new to the statute law, dispensing as it did with both court and jury, and putting in their stead a referee. It was a statutory creation outright; but, to the extent prescribed, it was, nevertheless, adequate for the purpose contemplated. The referee was clothed with certain well defined powers. The manner of conducting trials before him was indicated—it was to be the same as before the "court with a jury." His decision was to "stand as the decision of the court."

Under the statute as originally enacted, the referee, after he had been selected, or appointed, as the case might have been, was independent of the Court of Common Pleas altogether. No exception to his decision could be heard in that court; no review of his proceedings could be had elsewhere than in the Supreme Court; writs of error were issued, and his proceedings went up for a review precisely as they did from the Court of Common Pleas.

By the provisions of the supplement of June 23d, 1871, applicable to this county, this feature of the act was somewhat changed. The proceedings of the referee may now be reviewed in this court, but only to the extent provided by the supplement. He is shorn of none of the powers delegated to him by the original act. His province is still as wide as ever. The Court of Common Pleas, though technically the tribunal to which the writ of error issues, really constitutes but an intervening step on the road to a higher review.

If a plain mistake appears on the face of the proceedings of a referee, or a palpable abuse of power; or, if the existence of either be shown by affirmative evidence, aliunde, we may set the proceedings aside; if his findings of law are erroneous, we may correct them, or commit the report again to him for correction; and still further, if his findings of fact are unsupported by the testimony, we may reverse them. But it must not be overlooked, that if the findings of fact are based upon testimony actually in the case, however conflicting it may be they are binding upon us. The referee stands where the statute put him, namely, in the place of the court and jury, and his decision, so far as the facts are concerned, amounts to the same—no less, no more—as the verdict of a jury in a case tried before the court. And a verdict we would not disturb merely because there was a conflict in the testimony submitted, no matter how great it might be. The credibility for witnesses is for the jury, not for the court. It would be an invasion of their province in the administration of justice, to override this doctrine.

Such being also the province of a referee, and the tribunal, as we have shown, being one not of necessity but of choice on the part of suitors, how long must it be before they, as well as their counsel, will learn that in selecting it, they must abide by all its legitimate incidents? It is, indeed, supremely idle, after an issue has been fairly chanced in this way, for the parties, or either of them, to come before us complaining that the facts have not been found as they desired or requested. In charity, perhaps, we ought to presume that they misconceive the plain provisions of the statute which they had invoked, and are unmindful too of the necessary effect of their choice under it. Certain it is, however, that their complaint is not complimentary to their understanding, nor creditable to their recollection.

But to recur again to this report. The referee in the first part of his third conclusion of fact, finds that "previous to the sale for taxes in 1854, for the taxes of 1852 and 1853, the tract had been assessed in the seated list to George Fales, viz.: in 1850 and 1851; and so far as appears from the testimony, it was removed to the unseated list, without notice to him, and without his knowledge or consent," &c.

Upon this finding, which, under his view of the case, was of material, if not of controlling importance, his decision of the issue seems to have been chiefly predicated. The exception which reaches this, though not at all direct but circuitous almost to the last degree, is, that "he should have found as requested by the plaintiff in the written memorandum hereto attached."

Now, by an examination of the "written memorandum," which consists of fourteen "requests" long drawn out, we find one in the following words: "From the evidence, the Mary Wright tract was divided into two parts; one known as the John Myers tract, and so assessed; the other being the balance of the Mary Wright tract proper, and not improved." We find another, also, in these words: That upon the whole evidence, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the land described in the writ, &c.

Clearly, therefore, under the views as already laid down herein, if the finding of fact before quoted, be founded upon testimony actually submitted to the referee, albeit there was other testimony in conflict with it, we should overrule the exception at once; but if the finding of the particular fact mentioned, be without any testimony whatever to support it, then the report should be set aside, or if in the opinion of the court justice requires it, the report should be committed again to the referee.

And herein is raised, under the statute, a question exclusively for our determination. Ordinarily we should look no further in disposing of it, than the record of the testimony which comes up with the report. The law requires that this should contain "the whole testimony taken."

In the present case, however, there are peculiar circumstances connected with the report, which deserve at least a passing reference.

In the brief and rather conversational argument which was had before us, at chambers, the counsel for defendant alluded to testimony contained in the report relative to the alleged fact, that the whole of the Mary Wright tract, during the years 1850 and 1851, was taxed in the seated list to George Fales, and that he paid the taxes assessed thereon for those years; and further, that in the years 1852 and 1853, it was transferred to the unseated list without notice to the owner. The plaintiff's counsel did not controvert the existence of such testimony, or something like it, but contended rather that, coming from the source it did, whatever it might have been, it was not legal or competent evidence, and therefore could have no bearing in the case.

At that time, it is true, the report was before us, but we did not refer to it, nor was our attention specially drawn to it further in this particular. We took it for granted, however, that the record attached contained some sort of testimony upon the subject. Besides, it is hardly to be presumed that a referee would return to the court an important finding of fact, or one at least that he regarded as important, unless there was some testimony in the case on which to found it.

But, taking the record as we have it, we are obliged to adjudge that it does not contain any testimony on which to base so sweeping a finding of fact as the one heretofore quoted. Whether it was offered in evidence, and thus became a proper foundation for the finding but was omitted from the record through mistake or inadvertence of any kind; or, whether having been offered, it was not competent, and therefore entitled to no weight or bearing in the case, we cannot determine as the case now stands. We can only say, that if it was adduced before the referee, but from some unexplained oversight he did not get it upon his record, not only is the defendant entitled to have the omission supplied, but the referee himself should be allowed to show that his finding was founded on authority.

By the terms of the statute there is reserved to the "court the power of committing the report again to the referee, should justice require it." We think the present case comes within that provision clearly. The effect of the exercise of that power is the same as granting a new trial, had the case been tried before a court and jury.

The report is hereby committed again to the referee.

FIFTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Court of Common Pleas of Chester County.

IN EQUITY.

McVAUGH v. McVAUGH.

When persons married in Delaware become residents of Pennsylvania, the married woman's act of 1848 applies to them, the wife's choses in action remain her property, and a subsequent purchase of real estate here in the husband's name with such choses, creates a trust in her favor which a court of equity will enforce.

STATEMENT OF CASE.

The plaintiff and defendant were married in Delaware. The plaintiff, at the date of the marriage, owned a judgment and mortgage. Without reducing the property to possession or exercising any control over it, the husband removed with his wife to Pennsylvania. The wife here contracted for the conveyance to herself, of valuable real estate, to be paid for by means of the money secured by the judgment and mortgage. When the time arrived for carrying the contract into execution, the husband refused to unite in satisfying the records in Delaware, unless the conveyance was made to himself. The wife, being unable to obtain the money without, yielded to this demand, the conveyance was so made. Subsequently, difficulties arising between the parties, and the defendant leaving the plaintiff, without provision for her support, and threatening to encumber the property, as she alleges, she applied by bill to have the defendant compelled to convey the property to her, or in trust for her, and restrained from encumbering it in the meantime. The master found the facts to be as alleged in the bill.

Opinion by BUTLER, P. J. Delivered January, 1873.

It is conceded that the statute of Delaware, relating to husband and wife, does not apply to this case; and that the marital rights of the parties, while domiciled in that State, depended upon the common law.

What then are the rights of the husband under the common law, in his wife's choses in action? In answering this question, the distinction drawn between her chattels in possession and her choses in action, must be kept in mind. The former vests in the husband immediately on marriage, while the latter remain in the wife, subject to a power in the husband to transfer them to himself by reduction to possession. It is optional with him whether he will or will not exercise the power; if he do not, his death revokes it, and the right of the wife again becomes absolute. Even reduction to possession will not under all circumstances transfer the property to the husband; it must be in the assertion of his marital rights, and if it appear that it was not, the property will continue in her.

Such was the common law of England, as it has always been understood and administered in this State. 2 Black. Com. p. 433; Siter's Case, 4 R. 263; Skinner's Appeal, 5 Barr, 262; Dennison v. Nigh, 2 W. 90; Robinson v. Woelpper, 1 Wh. 179; Willinger v. Bausman, 9 Wr. 522.

The husband, it is thus seen, has no vested, fixed interest in the property involved in such choses. His right is simply a power to divest his wife—a power liable to be revoked by his death, or by statute, and to be waived or forfeited by his acts. And the Supreme Court, therefore, held that our statute of 1848 had this effect—to revoke the power wherever it had not previously been exercised. Millinger v. Bausman, 9 Wr. 522. In Mississippi, the Court of Appeals decided in the same way, upon the question arising thereunder a similar statute. Clark v. McCreary, S. & M. 347. The Legislature cannot take away vested rights in property, and give to the wife what the law had previously transferred to the husband. But while fully recognizing this, the courts in the instance cited, denied that the husband had such vested rights in the property of his wife's choses in action.

Applying these principles to the question before us, its solution does not seem difficult. The defendant, in Delaware, possessed a power to transfer the choses here involved, to himself. He did not, however, exercise it, but removed with his wife to this State, and fixed their domicile here. The situs of their personalty accompanied them; and the effect was the same as if they had brought the property along. Thereafter, it as well as themselves were subject to the laws of this State. The Legislature might revoke the power, and it did so, by means of the act of 1848. The moment the parties and the property were made subject to its jurisdiction. The right of the wife again became absolute, as it had been before the marriage. That the power accrued to the husband while domiciled in another State, is unimportant; it is no more sacred than such a power arising under the common law here.

But it is argued for the defendant, that the common law (relating to the choses in action of the wife) is differently understood and administered in Delaware; that there the property in such choses vests in the husband on marriage. If this is so, the plaintiff has no case; for marriage being a civil contract, whatever property accrued to the husband upon his marriage there, will continue to be his wherever he may go. But we have not found anything to justify the assertion that the common law is so understood and administered in Delaware. It is true, creditors are there admitted to the rights of the husband, by means of attachment, and allowed to exercise his power of reducing the choses of the wife to possession. And in this, it is also true, that they have differed from us; Robinson v. Woelpper, 1 Wh. 179; Dennison v. Nigh, 2 W. 90; still they have but followed the rule in bankruptcy—a rule always difficult to reconcile with reason and justice—of which Ch. J. Gibson, says (in Siter's Case, 4 R. 480): "The spirit of the bankrupt law is not justice. The object being to encourage trade by procuring payment of mercantile debts out of any fund within the bankrupt's control, without regard to the interests of others; those laws are deaf to the claim of his family in respect to interests which he has even a naked power to control. Notwithstanding the assignment is not the act of the husband, but of third persons, it was held to be ipso facto a divestiture of the wife's title, as if it were the husband's own act, and a spontaneous exercise of his power. On abstract principles it might have seemed that though the power is a valuable one, yet the exercise of it pertains by its nature and origin to his individual volition, and not to the volition of his creditors or their representatives, who have no moral or expressly legal right to require him to despoil his wife for their benefit. The palpable injustice of these decisions induced Sir Wm. Grant, in Mitford v. Mitford, to depart from them to a certain extent; not, however to take his stand upon principle, and entirely protect the title of the wife, as it seems to me he should have done, but to take a middle course, and allow the assignment to pass the incidental right of reduction into possession, as the husband had it, subject to the same limitation as to time in the exercise of it." It is this rule that the court in Delaware has followed in Johnson v. Fleetwood, 3 Harrington. The language used by the judge is very broad,—as that "the rights of the wife by contract, immediately become the rights of the husband;" her choses in action vests in him on marriage;" "he at once acquires a qualified property in her choses," &c. But the citations of authority show quite plainly, we think, that nothing more was intended to be expressed by these general terms than has been decided in bankruptcy; and the case required nothing more. Some reference, it is true, is made to the cases in outlawry. But the part played by the crown in outlawry, never arose much above that of a robber; and these cases have never been cited as precedents for anything but the rule in bankruptcy. If it were true that the property in the wife's choses, vests in the husband on marriage, it would necessarily go to his legal representatives on his death. It could not survive to the wife, unless, indeed, his death be held to divest it, and the common law knew nothing of the kind. Such a view overlooks the distinction which has always existed between the wife's choses in action and her chattels in possession; and if carried out would obliterate it.

It does not follow, therefore, from what has been decided in Delaware, that the courts of that State will hold the husband's rights in his wife's choses, to be beyond the reach of statutory provision—that they constitute vested property, of which he cannot thus be deprived.

The consideration paid for the land was, therefore, the wife's, and the conveyance must be treated as in trust for her.

Supreme Court of Pennsylv'a.

SAM'L McKELVY v. THOS. S. BLAIR.

1. An assignment for the benefit of creditors by a partnership, works a dissolution of the firm.
2. The statute of limitations as between partners, runs from the dissolution.
3. An agreement by one partner to pay the other interest on an excess of capital put in by him, is for the purpose of making an equal division of profits, and does not create a loan.

Appeal from the District Court of Allegheny County.

Opinion of the Court by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 6th, 1873.

The partnership between Samuel McKelvy and John C. and Thomas S. Blair began by agreement under seal dated January 1st, 1853, and was to continue seven years. The plaintiff, McKelvy, sets forth in the second paragraph of his bill, that on the 17th of May, 1854, by reason of pecuniary losses and embarrassments, the firm of McKelvy & Blairs made a voluntary assignment of all their effects for the benefit of their creditors. No averment is made in the bill that the partnership continued in business after the assignment. A contrary inference is to be drawn from the third paragraph, which avers that since the assignment McKelvy had repeatedly called on Thomas S. Blair for a final settlement of accounts, which he had refused. The second paragraph of the amended bill avers that by the terms of the partnership agreement, Thomas S. Blair was the financial agent and manager of the firm, and as such is the trustee of the other partners. This has reference to his duty under the agreement, but contains no averment that Thomas S. Blair became the liquidating partner after dissolution. The averment that "as such (financial agent and manager of the firm) he acted, and does still act, up to the final settlement of the partnership accounts," is evidently only a legal conclusion from the agreement, and not an averment of the fact itself as existing since the dissolution. As a legal inference, it is not true that Thomas S. Blair became the liquidating partner after dissolution. Therefore, the next clause in the amended bill must not be construed to mean that the sums alleged to be received by him were received in the capacity of liquidating partner. The question of the dissolution of the partnership stands wholly upon the effect of the assignment for the benefit of creditors in 1854, unaided by any averments of fact to show a continuance of the partnership relation, or that Thomas S. Blair became the liquidating partner, bound to render an account of the affairs of the firm.

That an assignment by an insolvent firm of all its assets for creditors necessarily works a dissolution of the partnership, when no provision to continue the business is made by the partners, seems to be very plain. It is so stated by Sergeant, J., in Brown v. Agnew, 6 W. & S. 238. Bankruptcy is an admitted cause of dissolution. Collyer on Part. 59. It is not easy to distinguish from bankruptcy the case of a voluntary assignment by an insolvent firm, which strips the partnership of all its means of continuing business, followed by an actual relinquishment of the business.

The partnership being dissolved in 1854, and Thomas S. Blair not being a liquidating partner, the statute of limitations is a bar to the plaintiff's demand for an account, unless the case fall within some exception. Collyer on Part. 207–8; Hamilton v. Hamilton, 6 Harris, 20.

It was, no doubt, to establish an exception that the plaintiff introduced the fourth paragraph into his amended bill, alleging that the plaintiff had within the last three years paid a considerable sum of money in the partnership accounts, for which, with sums previously paid, Thomas S. Blair is alleged to be equally liable. But this, at most, can operate only as a demand for contribution. Certainly, a partner may be compelled to contribute to the payment of a partnership debt for which the partners continued jointly liable, but this does not imply, of necessity, a settlement of the whole partnership account, unless the account is still open and current. This is ruled in Brown v. Agnew, 6 W. & S. 238. "The partnership (said Sergeant, J.) had been dissolved by a general assignment by the partners for the payment of their debts in August, 1832, more than six years having elapsed from the dissolution till the payment of the claim and institution of the suit. These circumstances, we think, raise a fair presumption that the partnership account had been settled or terminated in some way, till it is overthrown by some evidence on the part of the defendant, that the general partnership accounts yet continued open and current."

The next exception is, that the account between McKelvy and the Blairs is one concerning the trade of merchandise, between merchant and merchant, and therefore it takes the case out of the statute. Whether every partnership whatever, or a partnership such as this, for manufacturing steel in all its varieties, is a transaction of merchandise within the meaning of the exception as to merchants' accounts, we need not decide. There are two cases in which this subject has been examined very fully. Coster v. Murray, 5 Johnson Chan. Rep. 522, decided by Chancellor Kent; and Spring v. Gray's Ex'r, 6 Peters, 151, decided by C. J. Marshall, in both of which stress was laid on the fact that the action was not founded on an account concerning the trade of merchandise between merchant and merchant, their factors or servants, and therefore not within the exception of the statute. There is, on the other hand, a class of cases in our own reports, called cases of mutual accounts, carried down within six years, where the statute of limitations does not apply to the items beyond the six years. Van Swearingen v. Harris, 1 W. & S. 356; Thompson v. Hopper, Ibid, 467; Chambers v. Marks, 1 Casey, 296; Hay v. Kramer, 2 W. & S. 139. These cases rest on the implied acknowledgment arising from the mutual charge and credit between the parties, and not on the exception in regard to merchants' accounts. Supposing the case of the plaintiff might fall within the exception as to merchants' accounts, yet he has not brought himself within the exception. The defendant pleaded the statute of limitations to the bill, and demurred to that part of it which had charged the loan of $12,000. To the plea of the statute the plaintiff demurred, and joined in the defendant's demurrer as to the alleged loan, and set the cause down for argument on the bill, amended bill, plea and demurrers. The plaintiff did not reply to the plea of the statute that the account was between merchants, and that no account had been settled. On this part of the case the quotation of the language of Judge Sergeant, in Brown v. Agnew, supra, may be continued. After stating that the presumption of settlement lasts till overthrown by evidence that the partnership accounts remained open and current, he says: "This burden lies on him who seeks to avoid the plea of the statute of limitations to an action of account render, or assumpsit, by the replication that it was an account between merchant and merchant; for the replication to such a plea must go further, and state that no account of said merchants was ever adjusted or settled" (citing Godfrey v. Saunders, 3 Wilson, 79, 80; William's Saunders, 127, note); see also Bevan v. Cullen, 7 Barr, 286. "By analogy, therefore (he continues), after the lapse of six years it lies on the party settling up an account to aver that it remains open and current." That the account must be one not closed by striking a balance between the partners, or by the delivery of a stated account unobjected to, and is still open and running between the partners, is the clear result of the authorities, as may be seen in the following cases: Barber v. Barber, 18 Vesey, Jr., 286; Norton v. Hodgson, 19 Vesey, Jr., 180; Jones v. Penque, 6 Vesey, Jr., 580, note C; Spring et al. v. Gray, 6 Peters, 166—169; Toland v. Sprague, 12 Peters, 333; Bevan v. Cullen, 7 Barr, 281. And in reason and justice, why should not the statute close upon partners, who, for six years after dissolution, take no steps to ascertain the balance between them? On what principle should such an account remain open for all time? As soon as dissolution takes place, they stand no longer in any relation of trust or confidence to each other — the implied authority given by each to the other ceases, and they are no longer agents one for the other; and the objects of their association having come to an end, the time for a settlement has arrived. Six years is a fair time to allow for closing their affairs, and is a reasonable time for demanding a settlement in analogous cases. Thus, in the case of moneys collected by attorneys. Campbell v. Boggs, 12 Wright, 524; Rhines v. Evans, 16 P. F. Smith, 192. And a subscription to shares of railroad stock, even without a call for instalments. Pitts. & Conn. R. R. v. Byers, 8 Casey, 22; see also Morrison v. Mullen, 10 Casey, 12; Barton v. Dickens, 12 Wright, 518. The case of Stiles v. Donaldson, 2 Dallas, 264, and 2 Yeates, 105, is no exception, for there the offer of set-off expressly set forth that the accounts were made beyond sea, bringing the case within one of the provisos of the statute.

In regard to the alleged loan of $12,000, little need be said. No such loan, in fact, appears in the article of copartnership, and this is all that is before us on this point. The sum of money put in by each partner as capital is distinctly set forth. It is expressly stated McKelvy has put into the concern $31,615.20; J. C. Blair has put in $19,548.14, and Thomas S. Blair has put in $7,481.08. The agreement of T. S. Blair to pay McKelvy interest on $12,067.08, the excess paid in by McKelvy over an equal share of the capital, and that this makes all the shares equal, is evidently for the purpose of making an equal division of profits, not to create a loan. It would be a singular omission, if intended to be a loan, that no provision in the article was made for its repayment. As a loan, it would be an individual transaction between McKelvy and T. S. Blair, inconsistent with the fact that $31,615 20 were put in by McKelvy as capital. There was a reason, also, that it should be part of the capital, and not a mere advance to T. S. Blair, as thereby the assets of the firm would be a security to McKelvy, instead of the private responsibility of T. S. Blair. Finding no error in the record, the decree of the District Court is affirmed, with costs, to be paid by the appellant.

EZRA COOPER v. E. H. BUSHLEY.

C., a purchaser at a tax sale in 1860, of the lands of D., allowed the taxes to become in arrear, and the land was again sold for taxes in 1862, at which last sale C. was also the purchaser. C. then conveyed to B., after which C. accepted from D. the redemption money for the sale of 1862. B. then brought suit against C., alleging the acceptance of the redemption money to be a fraud on him, Held: The title to C. under the sale of 1860, having become indefeasible, D. was a stranger, and the acceptance of the redemption money by C. could not divest B's title, either as a parol sale, trust, or by way of estoppel.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Erie county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 6th, 1873.

Without referring in detail to the errors as assigned, we may say there are two errors in the charge of the court below necessary to be noticed. One was in submitting to the jury the finding of a material fact, on which the case in a great measure turned, without instructing them upon the bearing this fact was to have upon the verdict. The other was in holding that the receipt of Cooper of the redemption money under the treasurer's sale of 1862, estopped him and his assignee from claiming title under the treasurer's sale of 1860. The action was in case, and the declaration set forth the fraudulent concealment by Cooper of the redemption of the sale of 1862, as the gist of the action. Rescission of the purchase on the ground of fraud in the sale, was clearly the basis of the suit for which the plaintiff claimed his damages. Had there been no treasurer's deed but that of 1862, and the assignment had been specially upon it, the case would have been a clear one. But there was evidence tending to show that Bushley purchased Cooper's interest in both the deeds of 1860 and 1862; that both were handed over by Cooper to Bushley; that it was a question between the parties, whether both deeds should be assigned to carry the title; and that Cooper thought as he had both deeds, the assignment carried all his title. The court was, therefore, right in submitting the question of fact to the jury, as to what the real bargain of the parties was, which they intended to consummate by the assignment, endorsed upon the deed of 1862. But this fact was of no moment unaccompanied by any instruction as to its effect upon the case. If the real bargain was a sale of the entire interest of Cooper under both deeds, and the assignment was made upon that of 1862 only, under a mistaken belief that it would convey all his interest in the land under both sales; it was a case of mistake in the very transaction itself, and at the time of it, which could be reformed. The submission was, therefore, not of a question of law, as the plaintiff in error asserts under the first assignment of error, but of a question of fact, out of which arose a question of law, and here it was the court erred in failing to instruct the jury upon the legal consequence of the finding. For if the bargain was for the entire title of Cooper under both deeds, then the redemption of the sale in 1862 did not affect his title under the sale of 1860, and the plaintiff's purchase had not failed. In this event this action could not be maintained, for he lost nothing by the concealed redemption of the sale of 1862, and the alleged fraud did him no injury, unless Cooper was estopped from claiming title under the sale of 1860 by his receipt of the redemption money under the sale of 1862, as the court held. This leads us to consider the question of estoppel. There was no evidence to show that the land was seated, or that the taxes for which the land was sold in 1860 were paid before the sale, or that the sale of 1860 had been avoided by a redemption. Cooper's title under the sale of 1860, was therefore absolute and indefeasible. When the sale took place in 1862, Cooper was both the owner of the estate sold and the purchaser at treasurer's sale. His was the hand to pay as well as to receive the redemption money. The most that can be said of that sale is, that it did not divest his title under the sale of 1860, but was simply the means of coercing the payment of his own taxes, with costs, as a penalty for his neglect. Then what was the effect of the payment of the taxes, costs, and twenty-five per cent., constituting the redemption money, by one who had been an owner of the land, but whose title was extinguished by the sale of 1860? In the first place, there is no evidence that his payment was in the slightest degree induced by Cooper. His payment was, therefore, wholly voluntary, and uninfluenced by Cooper. In the next place, he had not even a scintilla juris remaining in him after the sale of 1860 became absolute, to which his payment could attach, in order to create a title in equity. He was, therefore, a mere stranger making a voluntary payment. In the last place, the money he paid did not represent the value of the land, or even a price put upon it by Cooper; but was merely the public charge upon the land, with the costs and percentage incurred by the non-payment of that charge. The sum thus paid, therefore, did not represent a price or consideration given for the land to constitute either a trust or a purchase of it. The payment then being voluntary, and induced by no act of Cooper, and the sum received by him not representing the value of the land or any price put upon it by Cooper, on what principle in law or equity can it be said that Cooper's title under the sale of 1860, passed by his receipt of the money paid to redeem the sale of 1862? Clearly, the most that can be founded upon his receipt of the money paid under the circumstances stated, voluntary by a stranger to the title, would be an implied parol sale of Cooper's title, if such an implication could arise, by reason of the payment of a sum not representing the value or price of the land. But to such a parol sale, were it implied, the statute of frauds and perjuries would be a complete bar. The consequence would be the same, if a trust were implied instead of a sale. The court erred, therefore, in holding that either Cooper or his assignee were estopped by the receipt of the redemption money paid upon the sale of 1862, from setting up title under the deed of 1860.

On the other hand, if the facts found were that Cooper sold only his title under the treasurer's deed of 1862, and so specially assigned it to Bushley, the concealment by Cooper of the redemption of that sale, in which he had acquiesced by taking the money, would be such a fraud on Bushley as would enable the latter to rescind, and to recover from Cooper the money paid and interest, and any special expense to which he was put in making the purchase. How far Cooper's sale of the title under the deed of 1862, would convert him into a trustee of the title under the deed of 1860, for Bushley, is a question not raised in the case, and depends upon the true facts of the sale as to the title intended to be bargained for. Nothing can be said, therefore, on that question.

In regard to the question of tender before suit, if the fraud were found by the jury to entitle the plaintiff to rescind, there can be no difficulty as the case was presented. The sale of 1862 being wholly inoperative, if that were the only title intended to be conveyed, or which would legally pass by the assignment of that treasurer's deed, nothing passed by the assignment of Cooper to Bushley. There was nothing, therefore, to be reconveyed, unless Cooper might require it, ex majore cautela, and if he did, this could be provided for in the verdict at the time of trial. Such is the doctrine of Babcock v. Case, 11 P. F. Smith, 427. If any interest or estate had passed from Cooper to Bushley by the sale, even though an imperfect or a defeasible interest, a reconveyance would be necessary, and that according to the doctrine of Pearsall v. Chapin, 8 Wright, 9, would require the reconveyance to be tendered before suit brought. The purchaser cannot hold what he has actually obtained, and yet ask a return of the price he has paid.

Judgment reversed and a venire facias de novo awarded.

FRANK SCHLAUDECKER v. JAMES C. MARSHALL et al., Board of Licensees of the City of Erie.

Under the general laws relating to the granting of licenses for the sale of liquors, it is the duty of the court to act upon a sound legal discretion, and to hear and determine each case on its evidence and facts; to ascertain the fitness of the applicant, the necessity of his house for the public accommodation as a hotel, or as an eating house, and to see that the applicant has fully complied with the law.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Erie County.

Opinion by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 6th, 1873.

In the court below this case was a rule for a mandamus to compel the board of licensers of the city of Erie to grant a license to the plaintiff in error, to keep an eating house.

The rule was discharged, and hence this writ of error. The real question in the case is upon the nature and extent of the discretion to be exercised by the board of licensers in granting or refusing licenses for eating houses. It arises under the act of 10th May, 1871, P. L. 728, giving to the board "the same power and authority to grant lincenses in the said city of Erie, as the Court of Quarter Sessions by law now has." The requirements of the application for the license are governed by the 8th section of the act of 31st March, 1856, P. L. 201. See section 2d, act 10th May, 1871. But the power and authority of the board in acting on the application are to be ascertained by the state of the law as to the Court of Quarter Sessions, at the date of the act of 1871. This involves an attentive examination of the legislation of the State for a series of years, a subject of no small difficulty, owing to the fluctuations in the Legislature as the temperance or liquor interests prevailed.

The initial point of modern legislation on the subject of licenses, may very properly be said to be the act of 11th March, 1834, P. L. 117, reported by the revisers of the code as the result of all the then existing laws, together with their own modifications and amendments. The discretion conferred upon the Court of Quarter Sessions by this act will be stated hereafter, when we come to the reviving act of 14th April, 1859, P. L. 653. For twenty-one years the act of 1834 remained without material change. In 1855, the temperance reform movement prevailing in the Legislature, the act of 14th April, 1855, entitled "An act to restrain the sale of intoxicating liquors," was passed. P. L., p. 255. This act was nearly prohibitory in its terms, and in derision was called the "Jug Law." It lasted but a year, and was overthrown by the act of 31st March, 1856, P. L. 200, entitled "An act to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors," an act passed through the influence of what was then known as the "Liquor League." The act of 1856 was considerably modified by the act of 20th April, 1858, P. L. 365, and the two, with a few alterations since adopted, form the basis of the present system of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Under the act of 1856, the discretion of the court in granting licenses differed somewhat, but not greatly, from that given by the act of 1834, and was regulated by the sixth section, which required the court to fix by rule or standing order, a time at which applications for licenses should be heard, and when all persons applying or making objections might be heard by evidence, petition, remonstrance, or counsel. This provision was essentially changed by the sixth section of the act of 1858, which made the granting of the license mandatory "to citizens of the United States of temperate habits and good moral character, whenever the requirements of the laws on the subject are complied with by any such applicant, to sell the liquor aforesaid, for one entire year from the date of his license: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prohibit the court from hearing other evidence than that presented by the applicant for license: And provided further, That after hearing the evidence as aforesaid, the court, board of licensers, or commissioners, shall grant or refuse a license to such applicant, in accordance with the evidence."

This act took away the discretion which the courts had exercised under the acts of 1834 and 1856, and made it a matter of legal judgment on the evidence. The temperance movement rallying again, effectuated the passage of the act of 14th April, 1859, P. L. 653, in these words: "That it shall be lawful for the several courts of Quarter Sessions of this commonwealth to hear petitions, in addition to that of the applicant, in favor of, and remonstrance against, the application of any person applying to either of them for a license to keep a hotel, inn, or tavern, and thereupon to refuse the same, whenever, in the opinion of said court, such inn, hotel, or tavern, is not necessary for the accommodation of the public, and entertainment of strangers and travellers. And so much of the sixth section of the act of Assembly relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors, passed the 20th day of April, A. D. 1858, as is inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed: Provided, That the several courts of Quarter Sessions empowered to grant licenses, shall have and exercise such discretion, and no other, in regard to the necessity of inns and taverns, as is given to said courts by the act relative to inns and taverns, approved 11th March, 1834."

Thus the discretion of the courts upon the necessity of inns and taverns was turned back upon the act of 1834, the first section of which merely empowered the court to grant such licenses. The third section provided that "no court shall license any inn or tavern which shall not be necessary to accommodate the public, and entertain strangers and travellers." The fifth section further enacted that "no court shall license any person to keep an inn or tavern, unless from the petitions and certificate, or from their own knowledge, or upon evidence sought for and obtained, they shall be satisfied of the fitness of the person applying, and the sufficiency of the accommodations as aforesaid." The fourth section had provided that no court shall grant a license, unless upon a certificate of twelve citizens, setting forth the necessity of the inn or tavern to accommodate the public and entertain strangers and travellers, and the good reputation of the applicant for honesty and temperance, and his being well provided with house room and convenience for the accommodation of strangers and travellers. The bearing of the act of 1834 upon the discretion of the court, is noticeable in the negative character of its provisions to prevent granting unnecessary licenses. The nature of this discretion will be discussed after noticing the legislation on the subject of eating houses, or restaurants as they are termed. They were provided for in the act of 10th April, 1849, P. L. 570, the 20th section of which forbade them from being kept without a license first obtained from the county treasurer, and provided for classifying and rating them. By the act of 1856, the mode of granting licenses to eating houses was changed, and given to the Court of Quarter Sessions, as may be seen in the 6th, 7th, 8th and 14th sections. The act of 1858, again changed the manner of granting them, dispensing with the certificate required by the 8th section of the act of 1856, and returning the power of granting the license to the county treasurer. See sect. 10, act 1858, P. L. 367. Under this section the treasurer exercised no discretion, except to see that the applicant had complied with the requisites of the law. This was changed afterwards as to the counties of Erie, Warren and Clinton, by the act of 11th April, 1866, P. L. 560, which adopted the provision for the borough of Warren, contained in the act of 22d April, 1863, P. L. 534, enacting "that all licenses for the keeping of eating houses, which shall authorize the sale of domestic wines and malt and brewed liquors within the borough of Warren, Warren county, shall hereafter be granted only by the Court of Quarter Sessions of said county, in the same manner and subject to the same restrictions as licenses to hotels, inns and taverns are now granted, except that said eating houses shall be classified and rated as provided by existing laws." This local act was superseded by the general act of 22d March, 1867, P. L. 40. The first section put the hearing of all applications for licenses to sell intoxicating drinks on the same footing, directing that it should be lawful for said court to hear petitions in addition to that of the applicant, in favor of, and remonstrance against, the application for such licenses; and, in all cases, to refuse the same whenever, in the opinion of the said court, having due regard to the number and character of the petitioners for and against such application, such license is not necessary for the accommodation of the public, and entertainment of strangers and travellers; and upon sufficient cause shown, to revoke any license granted by them. The second section expressly directs that applications for license to keep an eating house or restaurant, shall be made in the same manner and to the same authority as applications for license to keep a hotel, excepting that the regulation as to bed-rooms shall not apply; and, also, repeals expressly the authority in the 10th section of the act of 1858, conferred on the county treasurer to grant licenses to eating houses and retail breweries. In conclusion, therefore, we find that the granting of licenses to hotels, inns, eating houses and restaurants, all stand on the same footing as to the authority to which the power is confided, and it now remains only to inquire into the nature and true character of the discretion to be exercised by the Court of Quarter Sessions in granting these licenses.

No subject has been productive of more difference of opinion and practice than this, in the different judicial districts of the State. Some judges holding it to be obligatory on the court to grant every license where the applicant has brought himself within the provisions of the law, as to the terms of his application; and others holding that they are not bound to grant any licenses whatsoever. Clearly neither opinion is right; the discretion which the court exercises being a sound discretion upon the circumstances of each case, as it is presented to the court, and not a general opinion upon the propriety or impropriety of granting licenses.

Whether any or all licenses should be granted, is a legislative, not a judicial question. Courts sit to administer the law fairly, as it is given to them, and not to make or repeal it. The law of the land has determined that licenses shall exist, and has imposed upon the court the duty of ascertaining the proper instances in which the license shall be granted, and therefore has given it to the court to decide upon each case as it arises in due course of law. The act of deciding is judicial, and not arbitrary or wilful. The discretion vested in the court is, therefore, a sound judicial discretion; and to be a rightful judgment, it must be exercised in the particular case and upon the facts and circumstances before the court, after they have been heard and duly considered; in other words, to be exercised upon the merits of each case, according to the rule given by the act of Assembly. To say that I will grant no license to any one, or that I will grant it to every one, is not to decide judicially on the merits of the case, but to determine beforehand, without a hearing, or else to disregard what has been heard. It is to be determined not according to law, but outside of law, and it is not a legal judgment, but the exercise of an arbitrary will. Discretion is thus described: "Where anything is left to any person to be done according to his discretion, the law intends it must be done with a sound discretion and according to law, and the Court of King's Bench hath a power to redress things that are otherwise done, notwithstanding they are left to the discretion of those that do them." Tomlin's Law Dict., vol. 1, Title, "Discretion." "And though there be a latitude of discretion given to one, yet he is circumscribed, that what he does be necessary and convenient, without which no liberty can defend it." Ibid. It is the duty of the court, therefore, to hear and determine each case on its evidence and facts; to ascertain the fitness of the applicant, the necessity of his house for the public accommodation as a hotel, or as an eating house (and this involves the number of each in the particular locality), and to see that the applicant has fully complied with the law, before his license can be granted. This is a large discretion, and is to be exercised primarily for the public good, and secondarily for the private interest; and this being the power and authority of the Court of Quarter Sessions, is the measure, also, of the duty of the board of licensers. It is an error to suppose, as argued by the plaintiff in error, that the sole duty of the board is confined to the inquiry whether the applicant is a citizen of the United States, and is a man of good moral character and temperate habits. The mandamus was properly refused, and the order of the court below is affirmed.

THEODORE F. JENKINS, ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

AN EFFICIENT OFFICER.

There is one thing that can be said of the Philadelphia Bar—it appreciates the courtesy and efficiency of the officers of the courts with whom it has dealings, whenever by good luck those officers are possessed of the qualities mentioned. A signal instance of this appreciation occurred on the 9th inst., when a number of gentlemen of the bar assembled for the purpose of presenting a testimonial to Alfred J. Fortin, the deputy prothonotary of the Orphans' Court of this county, "as an expression of their appreciation of his uniform efficiency and courtesy," during his fifteen years' continuance in his present position.

The testimonial consisted of a gold watch, hunting case, fresh from the "American Waltham Company," stem-winder, purchased from John E. Caldwell & Co., of this city, with a double gold chain, ending in a "good luck" medal, the latter being presented as a Christmas gift to Mr. Fortin, by a friend (Mr. Geo. Junkin), and containing a neatly-engraved reproduction of "Our Lord's Prayer."

The inscription on the inner side of the watch was: "Presented to Alfred J. Fortin by members of the Philadelphia Bar, and others, as an expression of their appreciation of his uniform efficiency and courtesy as deputy clerk of the Orphans' Court, January 1st, 1873."

Daniel Dougherty, Esq., delivered the presentation speech which was responded to by Alex. R. Cutler, Esq., on the part of Mr. Fortin.

This closed the proceedings, pleasant throughout, after which Mr. Fortin received the congratulations of his numerous friends there assembled.

We regret that we have not space to insert the full speeches of Mr. Dougherty and Mr. Cutler, as there is no officer in the city of Philadelphia more deserving of the respect of the members of the Philadelphia Bar than Mr. Fortin. He, like his brother deputy of the District Court, Mr. Fletcher, is so well known and well liked for his kindness, courtesy, efficiency, and a host of other excellent qualities, that we feel that we but echo the universal sentiment of the bar in wishing him plenty of luck and happiness to wear his testimonial, and a long continuance in his office, as a standing proof of its being well-deserved.

ELECTORAL REFORM.

Now that a Constitutional Convention is in session in this State, many and varied are the projects of reform offered for its consideration. From all sections of the State, and even from places without our borders, come suggestions and propositions, as to what the convention should do to remedy the great evils from which the body politic is suffering. These suggestions are good, bad, and indifferent, as their authors have or have not studied their subjects, and they all agree but in one thing, that there must be a change of some sort in the existing condition of things. Among the evils which attract the greatest attention, as, perhaps, the most familiar to all classes of the people, is the evil of corruption at elections, and it is astonishing to note the number of propositions for electoral reform which have already been offered to do away with this evil. We have already briefly noticed Senator Buckalew's work upon the free vote, and our attention has been again specially drawn to the subject, by having sent to us a little pamphlet entitled "The Commonwealth Reconstructed," by C. C. P. Clark, of Oswego, New York. Mr. Clark offers a panacea for all the ills of elections, in a scheme which is to take away from the professional politician his opportunity to work upon "fixed and geographical boundaries," which enable him to canvass them minutely, "distribute his forces, make his combinations, lay his pipes, and roll his logs." By removing these boundaries of election districts, all our evils are to vanish. In order to effect this, "the constituency of the elector must be established by lot. For this purpose let the voters in a town or ward be registered. Let their names be publicly drawn by the proper authorities, as the names of jurors are now drawn from the panel, till the whole are divided by fifties, or hundreds or other suitable number, into as many lists as the register will fill. Let each such list constitute a primary electoral constituency. Let this constituency be assembled as soon as convenient after the drawing, and after notice to its members, and proceed, retired by itself like a jury, to choose its representative elector. Let this establishment of constituencies and choice of representative electors be repeated every two years, or as often as may be judged expedient. Let citizens be forbidden to decline the office of elector.

This constituency should not be limited in its choice to its own members, but should have the range of the town or ward of which it might form a part. In voting, the roll should be called, and voting should be by ballot or viva voce as each voter might prefer. It might be well to provide that in case of insuperable disagreement in a constituency, it should be represented, in due proportion, by the two who had received the largest number of votes. It is believed, however, that under this system party feeling and other distracting and illegitimate influences would, after a little time, so disappear from the public mind that unison of sentiment would not be difficult to obtain. Undoubtedly, this plan will work better and better with the progress of time and experience.

Let the body of representatives so chosen in any ward or town constitute a college of electors for such ward or town, and appoint, in public session and viva voce, its supervisor, its justices of the peace, its town agent, its alderman and all its other functionaries.

Let them also appoint one or more electors of a higher class to represent them, and the people for whom they act, in a higher college for the selection of county officers, members of Assembly and State senators. The electors so chosen in an Assembly district should appoint its member of Assembly, those chosen in a senatorial district, its senator, and so on."

Notwithstanding the glowing enthusiasm with which Mr. Clark dilates on the good which is to result from it in his estimation, it strikes us that this plan is not such a novel one after all. The idea is certainly as old as the days of the Athenian Dikasteries, if not, indeed, much earlier. Historians tell us that the citizens of Athens were divided, for judicial purposes, into panels of jurors or dikasts, "six thousand of whom were annually drawn by lot, and sworn, and then distributed into ten panels of five hundred each, the remainder forming a supplement in case of vacancies." These panels decided the different cases; "which of the ten he (the magistrate) should take, was determined by lot, so that no one knew beforehand what dikastery would try any particular cause." Hallam and Sismondi tell us that the magistrates of several of the Italian republics of the middle ages, were chosen by lot. The following description (Hallam's Middle Ages, vol. 1, p. 457) of an electoral system once adopted in Venice, was recalled to our mind upon reading Mr. Clark's pamphlet.

"As a further security, they devised a remarkably complicated mode of supplying the vacancies of his office (the doge). Election by open suffrage is always liable to tumult or corruption, nor does the method of secret ballot, while it prevents the one, afford, in practice, any adequate security against the other. Election by lot incurs the risk of placing incapable persons in situations of arduous trust. The Venetian scheme was intended to combine the two modes without their evils, by leaving the absolute choice of their doge to the electors by lot. It was presumed that, among a competent number of persons, though taken promiscuously, good sense and right principles would gain such an ascendency as to prevent any flagrantly improper nomination, if undue influence could be excluded. For this purpose the ballot was rendered exceedingly complicated, that no possible ingenuity or stratagem might ascertain the electoral body before the last moment. A single lottery, if fairly conducted, is certainly sufficient for this end. At Venice, as many balls as there were members of the great council present were placed in an urn. Thirty of these were gilt. The holders of gilt balls were reduced by a second ballot to nine. The nine elected forty, whom lot reduced to twelve. The twelve chose twenty-five, by separate nomination. The twenty-five were reduced by lot to nine; and each of the nine chose five. These forty-five were reduced to eleven as before; the eleven elected forty-one, who were the ultimate voters for a doge."

Now we do not wish to accuse Mr. Clark of plagiarism in his scheme for choosing electors by lot, but we would merely direct his attention to the fact that various projects of a similar nature have been already tried, and have not accomplished the great results intended by them. The difficulty of avoiding corruption in casting the citizens into their respective constituencies, and the greater difficulty in preventing the wholesale corruption of those selected by these constituencies, are great objections to the introduction of a system such as is proposed by the author of this pamphlet. The necessity of narrowing "primary constituencies to the limits of ordinary acquaintanceship," though not in the way suggested, is, after all, the real way of accomplishing electoral reform, as our correspondent "Pericles" points out in a letter, which, as we stated last week was then crowded out of our columns, but which we publish in this issue, and has long been recognized to be so by many of those who have made electoral reform a study. This reform would certainly not be accomplished by the system proposed by Mr. Clark, if the effect of that system be, as he indicates in the following passage, to throw political power into the hands of the wealthy and privileged classes (who are not the honest class which he seems to think they are). "More than this—far more than this, in the purification of the polls—would result from the speedy disappearance therefrom, under this system, of that large body of electors, who now come there from no good motive, but who yet weigh equal with the best of us. The thousands of indifferent and ignorant foreigners who are naturalized and brought to the polls at the expense and instigation, and for the use of parties and candidates; the thousands who come there to sell their votes; the millions who have no stake in public affairs, or who feel little or no intelligent interest in them, but who are moved by ignorant prejudice, by sympathy, by excitement, by personal ill will or good will, and other illogical and illegitimate influences, all these in a brief time would drop from the registration, or would never appear there, and the government of the country would be left where it belongs, in the hands of the intelligent, the honest, the interested. This class, on the other hand, will come to this reformed and purified caucus in full force, because now for the first time, their votes and their influence will have their lawful weight."

We call special attention to the opinions of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, which we publish to-day.

On our inside columns will be found the decisions of the Supreme Court, rendered upon Monday, January 6th, also an opinion by Judge Walker of Schuylkill county.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

We have reserved a portion of our space for articles upon the Constitutional Convention, and the subjects which will probably come before that body for consideration. All communications intended for publication in this department, should be addressed to the Editor of the Legal Gazette, and must in all cases be accompanied by the name and address of the writer. Correspondents will please state under what names they wish their communications to appear.

LETTERS OF PERICLES.

V.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GAZETTE:

In this letter I propose to give the remaining sections of the Declaration of Rights, and as many of the sections upon the subjects of elections, suffrage and representation as I can conveniently include, without trespassing too much upon your space.

ART. I. DECLARATION OF RIGHTS.

SECT. 27. That private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation being made. Such compensation, when not made by the State, shall be ascertained by a jury, as shall be prescribed by law. The fee of lands taken for railroad tracks, without the consent of the owners thereof, shall remain in such owners, subject to the use for which it is taken.

The provision in the existing constitution of Pennsylvania, in reference to the taking of private property for public use, is contained in section 10 of the Declaration of Rights, and is as follows: "Nor shall any man's property be taken or applied to public use without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being made." As I stated in my third letter, published in the Gazette of December 27th ult., I have preferred to make a separate section for this important subject. The section I have adopted is almost identical with the section of the Illinois Constitution of 1870, upon the subject. I would still further restrict the right of seizing private property in this article of the proposed constitution, but that the article upon legislation, which I will give hereafter, contains a prohibition upon the passage by the Legislature of special acts authorizing the taking of private property. All the constitutions of the different States recognize the principle of compensation for the taking of private property, though they differ in the method of expressing it. Some of them, such as those of Alabama, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio and other States, contain provisions that the damages shall be first paid or secured before such taking; but I think that the section I have proposed is sufficient for the present, as it must be remembered, that too much detail in a constitution makes it resemble an act of Assembly, and the less likely to be acceptable to the people.

SECT. 28. That married women shall have the same rights and powers over their separate property as if they were not married, and no woman, merely on account of her sex, shall ever be debarred from entering into or engaging in any lawful pursuit or calling. There shall be no tenancy by the curtesy in this State.

This goes farther than any of the State constitutions in protecting women in their powers and rights over their separate property, but I think it is but fair, and in accordance with the enlarged views which have of late years been entertained by prominent writers and legislators upon the subject. The old and absurd doctrines of the English Common Law, as regards the control, or rather want of control, of a married woman, over property owned by her before marriage, or coming to her after marriage, are fast being exploded, and new doctrines are taking their place. The constitutions of Alabama, Arkansas, California, Nevada, South Carolina, Georgia, North Carolina, Florida, Kansas, Maryland, Mississippi, Oregon, Michigan and Texas, provide that the separate property of married women shall not be liable for the husband's debts, and some of them contain the further provision, that it may be devised by them. In Pennsylvania, and we believe most, if not all the other States, the same exemption and the same power of devising are provided for by law. The tendency of all recent legislation in this country, in reference to the separate property of married women, is to give more and more liberty to the owner, and to do away with the restrictions imposed under the old laws. It is notably so in Pennsylvania. There is a series of acts of Assembly, which have gradually extended the powers of married women over their separate earnings and property, and which, though not yet going far enough, have accomplished much good. The recent revised code adopted in California, made a step forward, in that it provided for the separate conveyance by married women, under certain regular forms, of their property. A very recent act of the territorial Legislature of Utah, enacted that the marriage relation should not affect in any way the acquisition, control or disposition of the property of either husband or wife, though as an offset it abolished dower entirely. I have limited the section above proposed to the lifetime of the parties, except that that "relic of barbarism," tenancy by the curtesy, is done away with. This, I believe, will place husband and wife, as they should be, upon an equal footing as regards their separate property.

The part of the section opening to women all the lawful trades, callings, pursuits or professions, from which they are now debarred, is but simple justice. The arguments in the case of the right of women to practice as doctors, are to a certain extent applicable to all other pursuits as well as that of medicine. As they must be very familiar to all intelligent readers, I will not waste time by repeating them. There is no reason why a woman should not be a doctor or a lawyer, as well as a man, and her right to be so should be clearly enunciated in the Declaration. The case of Mrs. Myra Bradwell, who applied for admission to the bar in Chicago, and was refused on account of her sex, led to the passage of laws by the Illinois Legislature, permitting women to practice as attorneys in that State. I want to see the matter fixed so certainly that such laws will be unnecessary in this State.

ART. II. SUFFRAGE AND ELECTIONS.

The subject of suffrage and elections naturally comes next after the Delaration of Rights in a constitution, and I have accordingly so placed it among the articles of the poposed constitution of Pennsylvania. This is following the example of New York, California, Kentucky, Indiana, West Virginia and many of the other States.

SECT. 1. In elections by the citizens, every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, having resided in this State one year, in the county three months, and in the election district where he offers to vote, one month, immediately preceding such election, and every male person of foreign birth, having declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, conformably to the laws of the United States on the subject of naturalization, and being otherwise qualified as to age and residence, shall enjoy the rights of an elector; but any person who had previously been a qualified voter of this State, and removed therefrom and returned, and who shall have resided in the election district as aforesaid, shall be entitled to vote after residing in the State six months.

If it were not my desire to retain as much as possible of the language of the present constitution, I would alter this section considerably, but as it stands, it expresses the ideas I wish to convey, though not in the precise language I would wish. The corresponding section of the present constitution is as follows:

"In elections by the citizens, every white freeman of the age of twenty-one years, having resided in this State one year, and in the election district where he offers to vote, ten days immediately preceding such election, and within two years paid a State or county tax, which shall have been assessed at least ten days before the election, shall enjoy the rights of an elector; but a citizen of the United States, who had previously been a qualified voter of this State, and removed therefrom and returned, and who shall have resided in the election district and paid taxes as aforesaid, shall be entitled to vote after residing in the State six months: Provided That white freemen, citizens of the United States, between the ages of twenty-one and twenty-two years, and having resided in the State one year, and in the election district ten days, as aforesaid, shall be entitled to vote, although they shall not have paid taxes."

In the section proposed by me, everything in reference to a tax as a prerequisite for voting is stricken out, in accordance with the views expressed in my last letter under section 10 of the Declaration of Rights. In Philadelphia, where the election frauds, complained of by honest citizens are of the most stupendous character, the imposition of the tax (50 cents) under the old constitution, has always been the means of committing great frauds. It is a notorious fact, that the unprincipled men who have controlled the political organizations in that city, of both the great parties, have been cognizant of and have actually connived at and procured the issue of thousands of fraudulent tax receipts for voters, and have in many cases authorized the issue of large quantities of blank receipts, to which the names of tax collectors were afterwards forged. As a means of dignifying the elective franchise, the tax qualification is a humbug; rich men laugh at it; poor men think it a hardship upon them. As a means of identifying the voter, it is a farce, as it is well known that gangs of "colonizers" and "repeaters" have voted, all of them being furnished with tax receipts and other vouchers, by the desperate and unprincipled scoundrels of both parties, who help to perpetrate election frauds. Pennsylvania, Delaware, Rhode Island and Massachusetts, are the only States in the Union that have such a provision in their constitutions; and in the name of common justice to the poor citizen, and as taking away one of the incentives to fraud, abolish an absurd provision, that exists only because it has been handed down to us from our previous constitutions!

The residence of three months in the county is added, to prevent the evils complained of in many sections of the State, resulting from large numbers of men being brought, in times of congressional or senatorial elections from one county to another, "to work on railroads," etc., with the intent to influence the result in particular districts. Provisions of this kind exist in many of the State constitutions, Texas, Florida, Oregon, and Maryland, require a county residence of six months; Kentucky, one year; New Jersey, five months; New York, four months; Virginia and Alabama, three months; Illinois, ninety days; Missouri, Iowa, Tennessee, and West Virginia (Constitution of 1872), sixty days; California, Delaware, Georgia, Nevada, and North Carolina, thirty days; Mississippi, one month; and Louisiana, ten days. Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Virginia, require a residence of six months in the city or town. Pennsylvania also needs a county residence. A proposition offered in the Constitutional Convention by Mr. McMurray, of Jefferson county, proposed a residence of six months, but this, in consideration of the thirty days' residence in the election district, is too long.

The residence in the immediate election district is extended from ten to thirty days in the section above proposed. Were it not that I have provided elsewhere for very small election districts, which obviate the necessity of a great length of residence, I would extend the time still further, as one of the reforms which seem to be pretty generally demanded by the people, is an extension of the time of residence in an election district to the longest possible limit consistent with justice to the poorer classes of the people. In the Convention, Messrs. Harvey, of Lehigh, McMurray, of Jefferson, Brodhead, of Northampton, Broomall, of Delaware, Lamberton, of Dauphin, and Runk, of Lehigh, severally offered propositions to extend such time, and there seems to be a general disposition to make a change of this kind. In Maine, three months' residence in the district is required; in Michigan, six months; in Kentucky, sixty days; in California, Delaware, Illinois, Kansas, and Nevada, thirty days; in Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, and Pennsylvania, ten days; in most of the other States there is no constitutional provision upon the subject. Now, with small election districts, I think thirty days are quite sufficient to secure the recognition of the voter and prevent the numerous frauds perpetrated under the present election system.

I have retained the provision about qualified voters removing from the State and returning, more because it is already in the constitution than for any other reason.

I have provided that foreign born persons who have declared their intentions to become citizens of the United States, shall vote after a year's residence in the State. This, I think, is but just to the thousands of foreign born persons who have settled and others who will settle, in this State, and eventually become citizens of the United States. Our institutions and our people invite them here; they are offered homes and the means of subsistence, and once they have fully declared their intentions to become citizens, being otherwise qualified, they should be given the right of suffrage, that they may protect themselves in their lives and occupations. Pennsylvania, though older than some of her western sisters, is yet but scarcely two hundred years old, and the mere pride of American birth should not prevent us from giving the rights of State citizens to those who, like our fathers and grandfathers did before them, are helping to build the country up. Pennsylvania does not fear the interference of foreign powers, as none such are contiguous to her borders. If we were not separated from the eastern continent by such a great distance, or had we Canada or Mexico immediately upon our borders, we might stop before extending the suffrage in the manner proposed, but being an inland State, removed from any possibility of foreign control, it is but fair to make our suffrage laws as liberal as possible. This extension of the suffrage is not without precedent. Indiana, Kansas, Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, Texas and Wisconsin, have similar provisions, and I would like to see Pennsylvania, even though she does not need the influx of population like many of the States named, go with them.

SECT. 2. For the purpose of voting, no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence, while employed in the service of the United States, or of this State; nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of this State, or of the United States, or of the high seas; nor while a student of any seminary of learning; nor while kept at any almshouse, or other asylum, at public expense; nor while confined in any prison.

This section is new in Pennsylvania, though substantially the same provisions are to be found in the constitutions of California, Kansas, Michigan, Missouri, Nevada, New York, Oregon, Maine, Minnesota, and some other States. In the Allentown election case, decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania last year (Fry's Appeal, reported in 4 Leg. Gaz.), it was held that students at a college could not vote in the election district in which the college was situated, even though they did not intend to return to the homes from which they had come to enter the college. As the word resided, in the present constitution, as will be seen in reading that case, is somewhat doubtful in its meaning, I have thought it best to add this section.

SECT. 3. Whenever any of the qualified electors of this commonwealth shall be in any actual military service, under a requisition from the President of the United States, or by authority of this commonwealth, such electors may exercise the right of suffrage in all elections by the citizens, under such regulations as are, or shall be, prescribed by law, as fully as if they were present at their usual places of election.

I do not like the wording of this section, which is taken from the present constitution, but I have retained it on account of the opposition that would likely be made to a change. While I do not object to soldiers or sailors voting, yet the exercise of that power should be guarded strictly, so that no abuses could creep in.

SECT. 4. Every person who shall hereafter be convicted of bribery, or perjury, at an election, or of wilful fraud either in giving or receiving votes, or in counting or returning the same, or of fraudulently tampering with, altering, mutilating or destroying any election returns, certificates or records, shall be disqualified from voting at any election thereafter, and from holding any office of honor or profit in this State. No idiot or insane person, or person convicted of treason or felony in this State, shall hold any office or vote at any election therein.

This section is new in Pennsylvania, though there is a general feeling that something like it must be adopted in order to prevent the numerous frauds perpetrated at every election. Nearly all the States of the Union specify certain crimes and offences which disqualify the persons committing them from voting, though they do not go as far as this section in reference to election frauds. The phrase "or of wilful fraud either in giving or receiving votes, or in counting or returning the same," was suggested by a proposition of Mr. Simpson, a member of the Constitutional Convention, on this subject; and it is but fair that I should give him credit for his own words, which no doubt his large experience as counsel in contested election cases has enabled him to frame so happily.

SECT. 5. Electors shall in all cases, except treason, felony and breach or surety of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance on elections, and in going to and returning from the same; and no elector shall be obliged to do military duty on the day of election, except in time of war or public danger.

The first part of this section is taken from the present constitution; the second part, in reference to the performance of military duty, is added. A similar provision being in the constitutions of Iowa, Illinois, Maine, Michigan, Oregon, Virginia, and West Virginia. The reason for it is obvious.

SECT. 6. Wherever in an election district, over one hundred electors cast their votes at any two successive elections, such election district shall be divided into two distinct election districts of contiguous and compact territory; and whenever in any two or more contiguous election districts, less than one hundred electors cast their votes at any two successive elections, such election districts shall be consolidated into one.

The length of my letter admonishes me that I must conclude. I will give the advantages of the election system indicated in this section, in my next letter.

MESSAGE of John W. Geary, Governor of Pennsylvania.

TWENTY-FIRST JUDICIAL DIST.
Court of Common Pleas of Schuylkill County.

THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA v. PATRICK DONAHEW, Supervisor of Mahanoy township.

Where the title of an act was "A Supplement to an act entitled an act authorizing the supervisor of New Castle township, Schuylkill county, to make, repair, and keep in good order and condition the public roads, bridges, and culvert, in said township;" and the supplement extended the provisions of the New Castle act to Mahanoy township, without mentioning Mahanoy township in the title: Held, that the title did not clearly express the subject, and was in conflict with section 8th, of article 11th, of the constitution of Pennsylvania, adopted in 1864.

Petition for a mandamus.

Opinion by WALKER, J. Delivered January 6th, 1872.

The petition of the plaintiff for a mandamus (among other things) sets forth that the supervisor of Mahanoy township is acting in disregard and violation of the provisions of the act of Assembly, approved the 19th January, 1860, P. L. 4, requiring him to sell the making and repairing of the public roads, in Mahanoy township, Schuylkill county, at public outcry, to the lowest and best bidder; that he alleges, in justification of his neglect, that the act aforesaid was repealed by an act approved the 29th March, 1872 (P. Laws, 651), and that this act (the act of 29th March, 1872) is in violation of the 8th section of the 11th article of the constitution of Pennsylvania, adopted in 1864, which provides that "No bill shall be passed by the Legislature containing more than one subject—which shall be clearly expressed in the title—except appropriation bills."

To this petition the defendant has, in substance, demurred.

The constitutionality of the last mentioned act is, therefore, raised.

The title of the act is "A Supplement to an act entitled an act authorizing the supervisor of New Castle township, Schuylkill county, to make, repair and keep in good order and condition, the public roads, bridges, and culverts in said township."

The original act was approved 6th May, 1871 (P. L. 583), and relates to the roads in New Castle; and by this supplement, the provisions of the act of 1871 are extended to the township of Mahanoy in the act itself, though not mentioned in the title.

Hence the constitutional objection.

The wisdom of this amendment must be apparent to every one acquainted with the crude, hasty and improper legislation not inappropriately called "omnibus" bills, for years before its adoption.

This evil the amendment was intended to remedy. Its object was to guard against the passage of acts of a different nature from that expressed in the title, and to give the public notice of their true purport and design.

And the courts, therefore, should give the amendment a construction (if there be room for the construction of such plain and intelligible words), to accomplish the purposes intended.

Amendments similar to this have been embodied into the constitutions of New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Indiana, Iowa, and other States.

Does the title, then, in the case before us, "clearly express the subject?" If it be imperfectly or ambiguously expressed, the act is null and void.

But the subject is not expressed at all, and the title, therefore, tends to mislead.

No one reading the title can say that the act had reference to any other township than that of New Castle.

No amount of intelligence in any person would lead him to suppose that the supplement referred to Mahanoy township, any more than any other township in the State—without reading the act itself.

But he is not required to read the act—he may stop after reading the title—and a subject not therein contained is expressly and by positive words excluded.

But this question has been settled by the Supreme Court in the appeals of the Union Passenger Railway Company, reported in the Legal Intelligencer of the 29th November, 1872, in which Justice Agnew holds, "that a title of a bill which tends to mislead, stands upon a different footing from one that is merely general in its terms." "When the title (he says) conveys the belief that one subject is the purpose of the bill, while another and a different one is its real subject, it is evident that it tends to mislead, by diverting the attention from the true object of the legislation."

Neither does the case of Blood v. Mercelliott, 9 P. F. Smith, 391, conflict with these views.

Judge Agnew has fully shown that it does not, in the appeals of Dorsey & McMakin, and Donnelly & Co., in an opinion delivered 4th November, 1872, and reported in the same paper. Blood v. Mercelliott was a case "standing on the border of the constitution," as he appropriately says.

Judge Pierce, on these appeals, rules the case of the Commonwealth v. Dickinson, and which is published in the Legal Gazette of 20th December, 1872.

These authorities are conclusive, and fully warrant the court in declaring the act in question unconstitutional, and in granting the alternate mandamus as prayed for by the petitioner.

Alternate mandamus granted.

Hon. Edward O. Parry and James Ellis, Esq., for petitioner.

Charles D. Hipple, Esq., for respondent.

Supreme Court of Pennsylv'a.

The following decisions were rendered upon Monday, January 13th, 1873.

PER CURIAM.

Cresson et al. v. Dickey et al. January Term, 1868. No. 35. The appeals in this case are dismissed, and the decree of the Court of Nisi Prius is affirmed by a divided court. W. L. Hirst, Wm. A. Porter and Geo. Junkin, for Dickey's appeal and against Cresson's appeal; Thos. Greenbank, Geo. W. Biddle and A. V. Parsons, for Cresson's appeal and against Dickey's appeal.

Murray's Appeal. July Term, 1873. No. 40. Sur rule to show cause why the appeal and the certiorari therein issued should not be quashed. Rule made absolute, and appeal and certiorari quashed.

O'Neill & Patton v. Wilt. January Term, 1873. No. 160. Sur motion to quash writ of error. Motion refused.

Same v. Same. Sur rule to show cause why leave should not be granted to amend the proceedings by adding the name of Alexander Foster, whose name has been omitted by mistake. Rule made absolute, and the name of Alexander Foster added as a plaintiff.

Brown et al. v. Lebanon Cemetery of Philadelphia et al. July Term, 1869. No. 8. And now, January 13th, 1873, the decree of the Court of Nisi Prius is affirmed. J. Cooke Longstreth, for appellants; Geo. Junkin, contra.

John J. Ridgway v. Charles C. Melvin, Treasurer of McKean county. Appeal of defendant from decree of Court of Common Pleas of McKean county, in Equity, granting a special injunction. And now, January 13th, 1873, the decree of the court below is reversed and the injunction dissolved.

Beine v. Norris et al. January Term, 1869. No. 15. And now, January 13th, 1873, the appeals in this case are dismissed. The report of the master, Mr. Olmsted, is confirmed, and the decree of the Court of Nisi Prius is affirmed. Theo. Cuyler, for Beine's appeal, Edward Waln, contra; J. Parker Norris and Edward Waln, for Norris' appeal, Theo. Cuyler, contra.

WM. T. KOUNTZ v. J. KIRKPATRICK and J. LYON, use of FISHER & BROTHERS.

1. The assignee of a chose in action is not affected by collateral transactions, secret trusts, or acts of the assignor unconnected with the subject of the contract.
2. When the market price is unnaturally inflated or depressed by unlawful and fraudulent practices, it is not the true means of ascertaining what is the measure of compensation for a breach of contract. Such price is not the legal market value.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Allegheny County.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 6th, 1873.

The second, third, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth errors, are not well assigned, for all the answers of the court to the points were omitted. When a court simply refuses a point, the error is well assigned by reciting the point, and stating that it was refused. But when the judge answers specially, in order to introduce a qualification he deems necessary to make his instruction correct, the answer must be recited as well as the point. We shall not decline considering, however, all the important questions; and in order to discuss them, we may state succinctly the nature of the case. On the 7th of June, 1869, Kountz sold to Kirkpatrick & Lyon, two thousand barrels of crude petroleum, to be delivered at his option, at any time from the date, until the 31st December, 1869, for cash on delivery, at thirteen and a half cents a gallon. On the 24th of June, 1869, Kirkpatrick & Lyons assigned this contract to Fisher & Brothers. Kountz failed to deliver the oil. He defends on the ground that Kirkpatrick & Lyon, and others holding like contracts for delivery of oil, entered into a combination to raise the price, by buying up large quantities of oil, and holding it till the expiration of the year 1869, and thus to compel the sellers of oil on option contracts, to pay a heavy difference for non-delivery. Fisher & Brothers, the assignees of Kountz's contract, were not in the combination, and the principal questions are whether they are affected by the acts of Kirkpatrick & Lyon, subsequent to the assignment; whether notice of the assignment to Kountz was necessary to protect them, and what is the true measure of damages. The court below held that Fisher & Brothers, as assignees of the contract, were not affected by the acts of Kirkpatrick & Lyon, as members of the combination in the following October, and subsequently, and that notice in this case was not essential to the protection of Kountz.

The common law rule as to the assignability of choses in action no longer prevails, but in equity the assignee is looked upon as the true owner of the chose. He may set off the demand as his own. Morgan v. Bank of North America, 8 S. & R. 73; Ramsay's Appeal, 2 Watts, 228. The assignee takes the chose subject to the existing equities between the original parties before assignment, and also to payment and other defences to the instrument itself, after the assignment and before notice of it; but he cannot be affected by collateral transactions, secret trusts, or acts unconnected with the subject of the contract. Davis v. Barr, 9 S. & R. 137; Beckly v. Eckert, 3 Barr, 292; Mott v. Clark, 9 Barr, 399; Taylor v. Gitt, 10 Barr, 428; Northampton Bank v. Balliott, 8 W. & S. 318; Corsen v. Craig, 1 Wash. C. C. R. 424; 1 Parsons on Cont. 193, 196; 2 Story on Cont., § 396, n.

The act of Kirkpatrick & Lyon, complained of as members of an unlawful combination to raise the price of oil, was long subsequent to their assignment of Kountz's contract, and was a mere tort. The contract was affected only by its results as an independent act. It does not seem just, therefore, to visit this effect upon Fisher & Brothers, the antecedent assignees. The act is wholly collateral to the ownership of the chose itself, and there is nothing to link it to the chose, so as to bind the assignors and assignees together. After the assignment, there being no guaranty, the assignors had no interest in the performance of this particular contract, and no motive, therefore, arising out of it to raise the price on Kountz. The acts of Kirkpatrick & Lyon seem, therefore, to have no greater or other bearing on this contract than the acts of any other members of the combination, who were strangers to the contract.

In regard to notice of the assignment to Kountz, it is argued, that having had no notice of it, if he knew of the conspiracy to raise the price of oil, and thus to affect his contract, and that Kirkpatrick & Lyon were parties to it, he might have relied on that fact as a defence, and refused to deliver the oil, and claimed on the trial a verdict for merely nominal damages for his breach of his contract. Possibly in such a special case, want of notice might have constituted an equity, but the answer to this case is, that no such point was made in the court below, and there does not seem to be any evidence that Kountz knew of the conspiracy, and Kirkpatrick & Lyon's privity, and relying on these facts, desisted from purchasing oil to fulfil his contract with them. As the case stood before the court below, we discover no error in the answers of the learned judge on this part of the case.

The next question is upon the proper measure of damages. In the sale of chattels, the general rule is, that the measure is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the article at the time and place of delivery under the contract. It is unnecessary to cite authority for this well established rule, but as this case raises a novel and extraordinary question between the true market value of the article, and a stimulated market price, created by artificial and fraudulent practices, it is necessary to fix the true meaning of the rule itself, before we can approach the real question. Ordinarily, when an article of sale is in the market, and has a market value, there is no difference between its value and the market price, and the law adopts the latter as the proper evidence of the value. This is not, however, because value and price are really convertible terms, but only because they are ordinarily so in a fair market. The primary meaning of value is worth, and this worth is made up of the useful or estimable qualities of the thing. See Webster's and Worcester's Dictionaries. Price, on the other hand, is the sum in money or other equivalent set upon an article by a seller, which he demands for it. Ibid, Ibid. Value and price are, therefore, not synonymes, or the necessary equivalents of each other, though commonly, market value and market price are legal equivalents. When we examine the authorities, we find also that the most accurate writers use the phrase market value, not market price. Mr. Sedgwick, in his standard work on the measure of damages, 4th ed., p. 260, says: "Where contracts for the value of chattels are broken by the vendor's failing to deliver property according to the terms of the bargain, it seems to be well settled, as a general rule, both in England and the United States, that the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the article at the time it should be delivered upon the ground; that this is the plaintiff's real loss, and that with this sum, he can go into the market and supply himself with the same article from another vendor." Judge Rogers uses the same term in Smethhurst v. Woolston, 5 W. & S. 109: "The value of the article at or about the time it is to be delivered, is the measure of damages in a suit by the vendee against the vendor for a breach of the contract." So said C. J. Tilghman, in Girard v. Taggert, 5 S. & R. 32. Judge Sergeant, also, in O'Conner v. Foster, 10 Watts, 422, and in Mott v. Danforth, 6 Watts. 308. But as even accurate writers do not always use words in a precise sense, it would be unsatisfactory to rely on the common use of a word only, in making a nice distinction between terms. It is therefore proper to inquire into the true legal idea of damages in order to determine the proper definition of the term value. Except in those cases where oppression, fraud, malice, or negligence enter into the question," the declared object (says Mr. Sedgwick, in his work on damages) is to give compensation to the party injured for the actual loss sustained," 4th ed., pp. 28, 29; also, pp. 36, 37. Among the many authorities he gives, he quotes the language of C. J. Shippen, in Bussey v. Donaldson, 4 Dallas, 206. "As to the assessment of damages (said he), it is a rational and legal principle, that the compensation should be equivalent to the injury." "The rule," said C. J. Gibson, "is to give actual compensation, by graduating the amount of the damages exactly to the extent of the loss." "The measure is the actual, not the speculative loss." Forsyth v. Palmer, 2 Harris, 97. Thus, compensation being the true purpose of the law, it is obvious that the means employed, in other words, the evidence to ascertain compensation, must be such as truly reaches this end. It is equally obvious, when we consider its true nature, that as evidence, the market price of an article is only a means of arriving at compensation; it is not itself the value of the article, but is the evidence of value. The law adopts it as a natural inference of fact, but not as a conclusive legal presumption. It stands as a criterion of value, because it is a common test of the ability to purchase the thing. But to assert that the price asked in the market for an article is the true and only test of value, is to abandon the proper object of damages, viz., compensation, in all those cases where the market evidently does not afford the true measure of value. This thought is well expressed by Lewis, C. J., in Bank of Montgomery v. Reese, 2 Casey, 146: "The paramount rule in assessing damages (he says), is that every person unjustly deprived of his rights, should at least be fully compensated for the injury he sustained. Where articles have a determinate value and an unlimited production, the general rule is to give their value at the time the owner was deprived of them, with interest to the time of verdict. This rule has been adopted because of its convenience, and because it in general answers the object of the law, which is to compensate for the injury. In relation to such articles, the supply usually keeps pace with the demand, and the fluctuations in the value are so inconsiderable as to justify the courts in disregarding them for the sake of convenience and uniformity. In these cases, the reason why the value at the time of conversion, with interest, generally reaches the justice of the case, is that when the owner is deprived of the articles, he may purchase others at that price. But it is manifest that this would not remunerate him where the article could not be obtained elsewhere, or where from restrictions on its production, or other causes, its price is necessarily subject to considerable fluctuation." This shows that the market price is not an invariable standard, and that the converse of the case then before Judge Lewis is equally true—that is to say—when the market price is unnaturally inflated by unlawful and fraudulent practices, it cannot be the true means of ascertaining what is just compensation. It is as unjust to the seller to give the purchaser more than just compensation, as it is to the purchaser to give him less. Right upon this point, we have the language of this court in the case of a refusal by a purchaser to accept. Andrews v. Hoover, 8 Watts, 240. It is said: "The jury is bound by a measure of damages where there is one, but not always by a particular means for its ascertainment. Now the measure in a case like the present, is the difference between the price contracted to be paid and the value of the thing when it ought to have been accepted; and though a re-sale is a convenient and often satisfactory means, it does not follow that it is, nor was it said in Girard v. Taggert, to be the only one. On the contrary, the propriety of the direction there, that the jury were not bound by it, if they could find another more in accordance with the justice of the case, seems to have been admitted; the very thing complained of here." Judge Strong took the same view in Trout v. Kennedy, 11 Wright, 393. That was the case of a trespasser, and the jury had been told that the plaintiff was entitled to the just and full value of the property, and if at the time of the trespass the market was depressed, too much importance was not to be given to that fact. "If (says Judge Strong) at any particular time, there be no market demand for an article, it is not of course on that account of no value. What a thing will bring in the market at a given time, is perhaps the measure of its value then; but it is not the only one." These cases plainly teach that value and market price are not always convertible terms; and certainly there can be no difference in justice or law, in an unnatural depression and an unnatural exaltation in the market price neither is the true and only measure of value. These general principles in the doctrine of damages and authorities, prove that an inflated speculative market price, not the result of natural causes, but of artificial means to stimulate prices by unlawful combinations for the purposes of gain, cannot be a legitimate means of estimating just compensation. It gives to the purchaser more than he ought to have, and compels the seller to pay more than he ought to give, and it is therefore not a just criterion. There is a case in our own State, bearing strongly on this point. Blyanburg et al v. Welsh et al., Baldwin's Rep. 331. Judge Baldwin had charged the jury in these words: "If you are satisfied from the evidence, that there was on that day a fixed price in the market, you must be governed by it; if the evidence is doubtful as to the price, and witnesses vary in their statements, you must adopt that which you think best accords with the proof in the case." In granting a new trial, Judge Hopkinson said: "It is the price—the market price of the article that is to furnish the measure of damages. Now what is the price of a thing, particularly the market price? We consider it to be the value, the rate at which the thing is sold. To make a market, there must be buying and selling, purchase and sale. If the owner of an article holds it at a price which nobody will give for it, can that be said to be its market value? Men sometimes put fantastical prices upon their property. For reasons personal and peculiar, they may rate it much above what any one would give for it. Is that the value? Further, the holders of an article, flour, for instance, under a false rumor, which, if true, would augment its value, may suspend their sales, or put a price upon it, not according to its value in the actual state of the market, but according to what in their opinion will be its market price or value, provided the rumor shall prove to be true. In such a case, it is clear, that the asking price is not the worth of the thing on the given day, but what it is supposed it will be worth at a future day, if the contingency shall happen which is to give it this additional value. To take such a price as the rule of damages, is to make the defendant pay what in truth never was the value of the article, and to give to the plaintiff a profit by a breach of the contract, which he never would have made by its performance." The case of suspended sales upon a rumor tending to enhance the price, put by Judge Hopkinson, bears no comparison to the case alleged here, where a combination is intentionally formed to buy up oil, hold it till the year is out, and thus force the market price up purposely to affect existing contracts, and compel the sellers to pay heavy damages for non-fufilment of their bargains. In the same case, Judge Hopkinson further said: "We did not intend that they (the jury) should go out of the limits of the market price, nor to take as that price whatever the holders of the coffee might choose to ask for it; substituting a fictitious, unreal value, which nobody would give, for that at which the article might be bought or sold." "In determining (says an eminent writer on contracts) what is the market value of property, at any particular time, the jury may sometimes take a wide range; for this is not always ascertainable by precise facts, but must sometimes rest on opinion; and it would seem that neither party ought to gain or lose by a mere fancy price, or an inflated and accidental value, suddenly put in force by some speculative movement, and as suddenly passing away. The question of damages by a market value, is peculiarly one for a jury." Parsons on Contracts, vol. 2, page 482, ed. 1857. In Smith v. Griffith, 3 Hill, 337–8, C. J. Nelson said: "I admit that a mere speculating price of the article, got up by the contrivance of a few interested dealers, is not the true test. The law in regulating the measure of damages, contemplates a range of the entire market, and the average of prices as thus found, running through a reasonable period of time. Neither a sudden and transient inflation, nor a depression of prices, should control the question. These are often accidental, promoted by interested and illegitimate combinations, for temporary, special and selfish objects, independent of the objects of lawful commerce; a forced and violent perversion of the laws of trade, not within the contemplation of the regular dealer, and not deserving to be regarded as a proper basis upon which to determine the value, when the fact becomes material in the administration of justice." I may close these sayings of eminent jurists with the language of Chief Justice Gibson upon stock-jobbing contracts. Wilson v. Davis, 5 W. & S. 523. "To have stipulated (says he) for a right to recruit on separate account, would have given to the agreement an appearance of trick, like those of stock-jobbing contracts, to deliver a given number of shares at a certain day, in which the seller's performance has been forestalled by what is called cornering, in other words, buying up all the floating shares in the market. These contracts, like other stock-jobbing transactions, in which parties deal upon honor, are seldom subjected to the test of judicial experiment, but they would necessarily be declared fraudulent."

Without adding more, I think it is conclusively shown that what is called the market price, or the quotations of the articles for a given day, is not always the only evidence of actual value, but that the true value may be drawn from other sources, when it is shown that the price for the particular day had been unnaturally inflated. It remains only to ascertain whether the defendant gave such evidence as to require the court to submit to the jury to ascertain and determine the fair market value of crude oil, per gallon, on the 31st December, 1869, as demanded by the defendant in his fifteenth point. There was evidence, from which the jury might have adduced the following facts, viz.: That in the month of October, 1869, a number of persons of large capital, and among them Kirkpatrick and Lyon, combined together to purchase crude oil, and hold it until the close of the year 1869; that these persons were the holders, as purchasers, of a large number of sellers' option contracts, similar to the one in suit; that they bought oil largely, and determined to hold it from the market until the year 1870 before selling; that oil, in consequence of this combination, ran up in price, in the face of an increased supply, until the 31st day of December, 1869, reaching the price of seventeen to eighteen cents per gallon, and then suddenly dropped as soon as the year closed. Major Frew, one of the number, says: It was our purpose to take the oil, pay for it, and keep it until January 1st, 1870, otherwise we would have been heading the market on ourselves. Mr. Long says, that on the 3d of January, 1870, he sold oil to Fisher & Brother (the plaintiffs) at thirteen cents a gallon, and could find no other purchaser at that price. Several witnesses, dealers in oil, testify that they knew of no natural cause to create such a rise in price, or to make the difference in price from December to January. It was testified, on the contrary, that the winter production of oil was greater in December, 1869, than in former years by several thousand barrels per day, a fact tending to reduce the price, when not sustained by other means. Mr. Benn says he knew no cause for the sudden fall in price on the 1st January, 1870, except that the so-called combination ceased to buy at the last of December, 1869.

It was, therefore, a fair question for the jury to determine, whether the price which was demanded for oil on the last day of December, 1869, was not a fictitious, unnatural, inflated, and temporary price, the result of a combination to "bull the market," as it is termed, and to compel sellers to pay a false and swollen price in order to fulfil their contracts. If so, then such price was not a fair test of the value of the oil, and the jury would be at liberty to determine from the prices before and after the day, and from other sources of information, the actual market value of the oil on the 31st of December, 1869. Any other cause would be unjust and injurious to fair dealers, and would enable gamblers in the article to avail themselves of their own wrong, and to wrest from honest dealers the fruits of their business. It cannot be possible that a "corner," such as took place a few weeks since in the market for the stock of a western railroad company, where shares, worth in the ordinary market about sixty dollars each, were by the secret operations of two or three large capitalists, forced up in a few days to a price over two hundred dollars a share, can be a lawful measure of damages. Men are not to be stripped of their estates by such cruel and wrongful practices; and courts of justice cannot so wholly ignore justice as to assume such a false standard of compensation. Our views upon the effect of the affidavit of defence, on which the learned judge in a great measure ruled the question of damages, will be expressed in the case of Kountz v. The Citizens Oil Refining Co., in an opinion to be read immediately.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

SUPREME COURT UNITED STATES. NEW PUBLICATION. 14TH WALLACE.

W. H. & O. H. Morrison beg to inform their friends that they expect to publish, sometime in March, 1873, the 14th volume of WALLACE'S REPORTS. The volume will contain a large number of important Cases, including several on Maritime Law, the Law of Collision, the Obligations as to Lights (their color and distinctions) at Sea and on Rivers; the Law of Patents, including the Rule of Damages, the effect of Assignments, and the principles of Law applicable to Patents for design, a subject largely new and of practical and growing importance; decisions on the Bankruptcy Act; how far Bills of Lading may be interpreted by parol; an unusual number of Cases relating to the Jurisdiction of the Court, especially its jurisdiction under the 25th section of the great Judiciary Act of 1789, a matter to which the Court in one of the cases directs the special attention of the Bar, and for want of accurate knowledge about which, many cases, most vexatiously, and in a way often deeply mortifying to counsel, are lost every session.

The undersigned cannot, however, find space to specify the large variety of cases in this volume, many of them of the first importance. From such a judicial body as the Supreme Court of the United States, every adjudication deserves regard.

The effect of the late civil war has undoubtedly been to make that court a tribunal whose decisions it is necessary for every lawyer to be acquainted with. A leading journal of the city of New York has recently attempted to treat the subject popularly, and thus to keep the country informed of the leading cases decided by it. And it notes, as hardly conceivable, the fact, "that while the nation is periodically thrown into agonies about political rights and duties, and as to who shall be President and who members of Congress, nine grave lawyers are sitting in a quiet room of the Capitol, deciding questions of immediate political and practical concern to every person in the land, though too many have, until lately, been unconscious of what the decisions are." This state of things, as it truly says, can no longer exist; for the decisions come so nearly home to the "business and bosoms of men" that, with the present extensive jurisdiction and almost continuous sessions of the Court, they who are the professional judges of the land cannot be ignorant of what is done in that tribunal, without injury to the constant and practical concerns of all conditions of people among us. The tribunal which used to sit three months now sits almost eight; and is constantly delivering judgments upon every class of subjects.

IMPROVEMENT CO. v. MUNSON.

1. By the settled land laws of Pennsylvania no title can exist under a second survey, unless such second survey had been ordered by the board of property.
2. The mere fact that a second survey was made is not evidence, even after a long time, as against another confessedly first, that an order for the second was made by the board of property, and that the order has been lost. And although the loss of such an order may be presumed after a lapse of time, yet the presumption can be made only where the order is shown by some kind of competent proof to have once existed.
3. Where a charge is merely ambiguous, a party dissatisfied with it ought, before the jury leave the bar, to ask the court to make it clear. He should not acquiesce in the correctness of the instruction, take his chance with a jury and after the verdict is against him, claim the benefit of the ambiguity on error.

In error to the Circuit Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania; in which court, Munson and others brought ejectment against The Schuylkill and Dauphin Improvement Company, and two other like companies, all corporations of Pennsylvania, to recover certain valuable lands in the State just named. Judgment having gone for the plaintiffs, the companies brought the case here.

Mr. N. H. Sharpless, for the plaintiff in error; Messrs. G. W. Woodward, F. B. Gowen, and J. E. Gowen, contra.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD stated the case, and delivered the opinion of the court.

Rules of decision in the courts of the United States, as well as the forms and modes of process, are very largely derived from the laws of the States, as construed by the decisions of the State courts, in cases where they apply, except where the Constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States otherwise require or provide.

Controversy having arisen between the parties in respect to the title to the tract of land described in the record, the plaintiffs, on the sixth of February, 1866, brought an action of ejectment against the three corporation defendants, and the other defendants therein named, to recover the possession of the tract, alleging that the title to the tract and the right of possession were in them and not in the defendants. Service was duly made and the defendants appeared and pleaded that they were not guilty as alleged in the declaration. Issue was joined upon that plea and the parties went to trial, and the verdict and judgment were for the plaintiffs. Exceptions were duly taken by the defendants, and they sued out a writ of error and removed the cause into this court.

Title to the premises in controversy is deraigned by the plaintiffs from one Benjamin Bonawitz, whose claim to the same is supposed to be established by the following documentary evidences of title, as more fully set forth in the bill of exceptions: (1.) An application to the land office of the State, dated December 14th, 1829, made by him for sixty-six acres of unimproved land in Lower Mahantongo township, Schuylkill county, bounded as therein described. (2.) Warrant from the State, of the same date, to the applicant for the land described in the application, as fully set forth in the record. (3.) Return of survey made by a deputy surveyor of the county, June 1st, 1829, in pursuance of the warrant, as duly returned to the land office, and accepted the fifth of March of the succeeding year, as follows, to wit: Situate in Lower Mahantongo township, Schuylkill county, containing sixty-six acres and one hundred and three perches, and allowance of six per cent., returned this third day of March, 1830, in pursuance of a warrant dated the 14th of December, 1829, to Benjamin Bonawitz. Superadded to the return is the following statement, that the lines and corners of the survey were made on the eighteenth of June, 1829, in pursuance of a warrant dated the seventeenth of March of that year, granted to the same person, a return on which was made, but was rejected on account of the survey not answering the description of the warrant. (4.) Sundry mesne conveyances from the warrantee and subsequent grantees of the land described in the warrant, to the plaintiffs.

Appended to the statement that those conveyances were introduced, is the admission of the counsel for the defendants that Schuylkill county was erected out of Berks county, and that Porter township, where the premises are situated, as alleged in the declaration, was created out of Lower Mahantongo township, which is the name of the township where the location was made under the warrant, survey, and return.

Documentary evidences of title were then introduced by the defendants to maintain the issue on their part, as follows: (1.) An application, dated July 1st, 1793, made by Jacob Yeager to the land office for four hundred acres of land adjoining land granted the same day to William Witman, Jr., in the county of Berks. (2.) Warrant from the State, dated July 1st, 1793, to Jacob Yeager for the same land, as more fully set forth in the bill of exceptions. (3.) Return of survey on the warrant by the deputy surveyor of Berks county, on the tenth of July, 1794, of four hundred and forty acres and sixty-four perches of land and allowance, situate in Pinegrove township, in the county of Berks, returned and accepted August 26th, 1794, as therein certified. (4.) Sundry conveyances were also offered in evidence by the defendants, tending, as they contend, to deduce title to the said corporations, or one of them, to the land located and surveyed under the warrant to Jacob Yeager, which includes the land embraced in the warrant and survey under which the plaintiffs deraign their title.

Rebutting evidence was then introduced by the plaintiffs: (1.) Certified copies of eighteen applications, dated July 1st, 1793, to the land office, for four hundred acres each, the leading one being in the name of James Silliman, and one of the number being the application by Jacob Yeager given in evidence by the defendants, as follows: Jacob Yeager applies for four hundred acres of land, adjoining land this day granted to William Witman, Jr., in the county of Berks. (2.) Certified copies of eighteen descriptive warrants, issued upon those applications, including the warrant given to Jacob Yeager, introduced in evidence by the other party. (3.) Also certified copies of eighteen surveys, including the Jacob Yeager tract, made by a deputy surveyor of Berks county, upon those warrants, corresponding with the descriptions set forth in the warrants, the certificate of the survey in question being fully set forth in the bill of exceptions. (4.) Return and acceptance of those eighteen surveys, made by Henry Vanderslice, July 16th, 1793, as appears in the list annexed to the return. They also introduced a certified copy of a caveat, entered July 18th, 1793, by John Kunckle and Aaron Bowen against granting the tracts either to the said Jacob Yeager or to any one of the other seventeen applicants under the warrants included in that list. (5.) Certificate from the office of the surveyor general that no proceedings had ever been had upon the said caveat.

By that certificate it appears that diligent and careful search had been made in that department for proceedings on that caveat, and the proper officer certifies that he does not find that any citation was ever applied for, or that any proceedings or action was ever had by the board of property upon or concerning the same, which remains recorded in the office of the surveyor general. (6.) They also offered in evidence a map, showing the two locations of the Jacob Yeager tract, the first by Henry Vanderslice, and the second by William Wheeler, both deputy surveyors of Berks county. (7.) Both sides admitted that Henry Vanderslice was a deputy surveyor of Berks county, and that the location of the Jacob Yeager tract as made by him was made in the county of Northumberland, within one mile of the line between that county and Berks county, and that the second location of the warrant by William Wheeler was made in Berks county, about twenty-two miles distant from the survey made by the other deputy surveyor.

Responsive to the rebutting evidence given by the plaintiffs the defendants then introduced certified copies of returns of surveys made by William Wheeler, July 10th, 1794, upon the Jacob Yeager warrant, and upon three others of the eighteen warrants returned and accepted, August 26th of that year, together with a connected chart of the four tracts, as prepared from the original surveys on file in the office of the surveyor general.

Neither party desiring to offer any further evidence, the presiding justice proceeded to charge the jury. Speaking of the warrant and survey introduced by the plaintiffs, he told the jury that the court saw no defect in the plaintiffs' title under that warrant and survey, adding that the only claim which the defendants have set up is under warrants located several miles from the land in controversy, by surveys returned and accepted, and to that instruction no exception was taken by the defendants. But the court also told the jury that "no subsequent official survey of the land under those warrants, without a warrant of survey or order of the board of property, was authorized." Therefore, said the justice, if the jury take the same view of the evidence as the court, the verdict should be for the plaintiffs, and the jury followed that instruction, and the defendants excepted.

Two errors are assigned, as follows: (1.) That the court erred in charging the jury that no subsequent official survey of the land under those warrants, without a warrant of survey or order of the board of property, was authorized. (2.) That the court erred in telling the jury that if they took the same view of the evidence as the court, the verdict should be for the plaintiffs, as the effect of the instruction, as the defendants contend, was to withdraw from the jury the consideration of the question whether or not the board of property might not have issued an order for a second survey of the tract, the evidence of which had been lost.

Much discussion of the first error assigned is unnecessary, as the defendants admit that the law is well settled in that State that a warrant, where it appears that a survey has been ordered upon it and made, returned, and accepted, is functus officio, and that no title under a second survey can be made unless such second survey was ordered by the board of property, which it is admitted is not directly proved in this case. Such an admission by the defendants is a very proper one, as the decisions of the State court which furnish the rule of decision for this court in this case, are very numerous and decisive to that effect. Perhaps the leading case upon the subject is that of Deal v. McCormick, 3 Sergeant & Rawle, 346, in which Gibson, J., said, "The law is well settled that after a survey made and returned into office, a second survey without an order of the board of property is merely void." If the owner of a warrant be prejudiced by the fraud or mistake of the officer, the board of property, which is a board created by statute, will grant him relief, if no new right has attached itself to the land, but a new survey, even pursuant to an order of the board, will not affect an intervening claim: Purdon's Digest, 9th ed., 619, pls. 7 and 8.

Doubtless the official surveyor may correct his survey while the warrant remains in his hands, but his control over it ceases after his return has been made to the land office, and the decisions are direct that no second survey thereon without an order for that purpose is of any validity whatever, either against the State or any other claimant, or, as Justice Strong said, in the case of Hughes v. Stevens, 7 Wright, 197, a second survey without an order for it amounts to nothing, as it is merely an unofficial act, which cannot give the warrantee any rights either against the State or any other claimant of the tract, Drinker v. Holliday, 2 Yeates, 89; Porter v. Ferguson, 3 Id. 60; Vickroy v. Skelley, 14 Sergeant & Rawle, 377; Oyster v. Bellas, 2 Watts, 397; Bellas v. Cleaver, 4 Wright, 260; Gratz v. Beates, 9 Wright, 495.

2. Whether the Circuit Court erred, as alleged in the second assignment of errors, depends upon the disputed fact whether there was any evidence in the case which would have warranted the jury in finding that an order for a second survey was ever granted by the board of property, as it is settled law that it is error to submit a question to a jury in a case where there is no evidence upon the subject.

It is clearly error in a court, said Taney, C. J., in United States v. Breitling, 20 Howard, 254, to charge a jury upon a supposed or conjectural states of facts, of which no evidence has been offered, as such an instruction presupposes that there is some evidence before the jury which they may think sufficient to establish the fact hypothetically assumed in the charge of the court, and if there be no evidence which they have a right to consider, then the charge does not aid them in coming to a correct conclusion, but its tendency is to embarrass and mislead them in their deliberations. Goodman v. Simonds, 20 Id. 359; Dubois v. Lord, 5 Watts, 49; Haines v. Stouffer, 10 Barr, 363. When a prayer for instruction is presented to the court and there is no evidence in the case to support such a theory, it ought always to be denied, and if it is given, under such circumstances, it is error; for the tendency may be, and often is, to mislead the jury by withdrawing their attention from the legitimate points of inquiry involved in the issue. Nor are judges any longer required to submit a question to a jury merely because some evidence has been introduced by the party having the burden of proof, unless the evidence be of such a character that it would warrant the jury in finding a verdict in favor of that party. Ryder v. Wombwell, Law Reports, 4 Exchequer, 39; Law Reports, 2 Privy Council Appeals, 335. Formerly it was held that if there was what is called a scintilla of evidence in support of a case the judge was bound to leave it to the jury, but recent decisions of high authority have established a more reasonable rule, that in every case, before the evidence is left to the jury, there is a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the onus of proof is imposed. Jewell v. Parr, 13 C. B. 916; Toomey v. L. & B. Railway Co., 3 C. B., N. S. 150; Wheelton v. Hardisty, 8 Ellis & Blackburn, 266; Schuchardt v. Allens, 1 Wallace, 369.

Very strong doubts are entertained whether the construction of the language employed by the judge, assumed by the defendants, is the correct construction of the same, and the settled rule is, if the charge is merely ambiguous, the party dissatisfied with it should have requested to have it made clear before the jury left the bar; that a party under such circumstances may not acquiesce in the correctness of the instruction, by his silence, and take his chance with the jury, and then be allowed, if the verdict is against him, to claim the benefit of the ambiguity without having invited attention to the subject, and given the court an opportunity to have made the correction to the jury. Much weight is certainly due to the suggestions of the plaintiffs, that the judge did not withdraw the evidence from the jury, if any there was in the case, that the language only warrants the conclusion that he expressed his own opinion, as he had a right to do, if he thought it proper, and left the question to the determination of the jury. Assume that to be the true construction of the language employed, and it is quite clear that the exception cannot be sustained, but the court is not inclined to place the decision upon that ground, as it is even clearer that there was no evidence in the case which would have warranted the jury in finding that an order for a new survey was ever granted by the board of property, as required by law and the repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the State.

Lost instruments may be proved by parol testimony where it is shown that the instrument once existed and is lost, and the proof of loss, where it is first shown that it once existed, may consist of evidence showing diligent and unsuccessful search and inquiry in the place where it was usually kept, or in which it was most likely to be found, if the nature of the case admitted of such proof. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, 2d ed., § 558. Presumptions of law are frequently absolute and conclusive, as they determine the quantity of evidence requisite for the support of any particular averment, which is not permitted to be overcome by any proof that the fact is otherwise. Such presumptions arise in respect to the intermediate proceedings in cases where lands are sold under licenses granted by courts to executors, administrators, guardians, and other officers, where they are required to advertise the sales in a particular manner, and to observe other formalities in their proceedings. Lapse of time, usually for the period of thirty years, affords a conclusive presumption in such cases, if the license and the official character of the party and the deed of conveyance are proved, that all the intermediate proceedings were correct. Were it otherwise, great uncertainty of titles and other public mischiefs would ensue; but the rule that lapse of time, accompanied by the acquiescence of parties adversely interested, does not in general extend to records and public documents which are supposed always to remain in the custody of officers charged with their preservation, and which, therefore, must be proved, or their loss accounted for by secondary evidence. 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, 12th ed., § 20; Hathaway v. Clark, 5 Pickering, 490; Brunswick v. McKean, 4 Greenleaf, 508.

Surveys, it seems, were sometimes made in that State by deputy surveyors in early times, without going upon the land, by plotting the chart and marking the lines and corners in their offices, and those surveys are called "chamber surveys," but such surveys were forbidden by the act of the State Legislature of the eighth of April, 1785, which enacts that every survey hereafter to be returned into the land office upon any warrant issued after the passing of the act, shall be made by actually going upon the land and measuring the same and marking the lines. Purdon's Digest, 9th ed., pl. 65. Decided cases are referred to by the defendants, where it is held that in controversies respecting titles under those surveys, there arises a conclusive presumption, after the lapse of twenty-one years from the return of the survey into the land office, that the survey was regularly made upon the ground as returned and required by law. Mock v. Astley, 13 Sergeant & Rawle, 382; Caul v. Spring, 2 Watts, 390; Norris v. Hamilton, 7 Watts, 91; Nieman v. Ward, 1 Watts & Sergeant, 68; Ormsby v. Ihmsen. 10 Casey, 462. Evidently the cases referred to must be regarded as establishing a rule of property in that State, but the court here is of the opinion that they are not applicable in this case, as the defect in the defendants' title arises from the fact that the new survey was made without any order to that effect ever having been granted by the board of property as required by law. Surveys made under those circumstances, are simply void, as shown by the best considered cases upon the subject decided by the highest court of the State. Deal v. McCormick, 3 Sergeant & Rawle, 346; Oyster v. Bellas, 2 Watts, 397; Cassiday, v. Conway, 1 Casey, 240; Hughes v. Stevens, 7 Wright, 197.

Attempt is made in this case to supply by presumption, a matter absolutely necessary to give legality to the survey, and without which it is a nullity and amounts to nothing, but is held to be as worthless as if there never had been any warrant at all. Viewed in that light, as it must be, it is clear that the case falls within the decision of the court in the case of Wilson v. Stoner, 9 Sergeant & Rawle, 39, which, indeed, is decisive of the controversy. It was there decided that a survey is not evidence without first showing an authority to make it, or proving that such authority existed, and was afterwards lost. Possession in that case was proved for upwards of thirty years, under a survey in the handwriting of an assistant deputy surveyor, endorsed "copied for return," with a memorandum by him that there was authority to make it; but the court held that those circumstances could not be received as affording presumptive evidence from which the jury might draw the necessary conclusion, as matter of fact, that even if the existence of the location was admitted, some account of its loss would have to be given before secondary evidence of its contents could be received, as without that the survey would be inadmissible for want of a previous authority. Unless it can be shown that the rule laid down in that case is not good law, it is quite clear that the second error assigned, must be overruled, as the defendants did not prove possession for any considerable time, or occupation of the premises, nor the making of any improvements upon the same, nor the payment of any taxes assessed upon the land. On the contrary, they proved nothing except the mere lapse of time, unaccompanied by evidence of possession, or of improvements, or the payment of taxes, or any other circumstance, as a ground of presumption to warrant the jury in finding that the board of property ever granted a new warrant of survey, or made any order of a character to give legality to the title set up in their behalf, which is all that need be remarked to show that there is no error in the record. Unquestionably, lost records may be proved by secondary evidence, but their former existence and loss must first be established by competent proof, and it is clear that evidence merely showing that they do not exist is not sufficient to establish either of those requirements.

Judgment affirmed.

Supreme Court of Pennsylv'a.

STEWART et al. v. THE PITTSBURGH, FORT WAYNE & CHICAGO R. R. CO. et al.

Where the incorporation of one company depended upon the contingency of a judicial sale of the franchises and property of another, a conveyance of such property to the former company by the purchaser at such sale, will not create a trust in favor of the creditors of the latter. Railroad Co. v. Howard, 7 Wallace, 392, distinguished.

Appeal from the District Court of Allegheny county. In Equity.

Opinion by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 6th, 1873.

George W. Cass, T. D. Messler and John P. Henderson, the president, auditor and treasurer of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Rail Road Company, and afterwards the president, comptroller and treasurer of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Rail Way Company, were in no way liable to the plaintiffs as attaching creditors. The attachment was not served on them, and no judgment was had against them as garnishees. Nor were they trustees of or for the debts attached, or the securities representing these debts. So far as they were connected with these debts, or in possession of the securities, they were acting as officers and agents of the Rail road company, and not of the Rail way company; and all they did was in their official capacity and in subordination to the Rail road company. Their possession and acts were those of the Rail road company, and were not individual, either in their own right or their own wrong. No negligence is charged to make them individually responsible; and if any were, the liability would be to their own principal and not to the plaintiffs, with whom they were in no privity, and who have not charged them by attachment. The liability for the debts and securities attached was, therefore, wholly upon the Rail road company. It is not denied that the Rail road company is liable. The liability was fixed by the judgment in the attachment, and the return to execution which followed the judgment.

The liability of the other defendant, the Rail way company, is attempted to be founded upon its alleged privity with its predecessor, the Rail road company, and its possession of the assets of the rail road company as trustees for the stockholders of the latter. Neither position is sustained. The Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Rail Way Company is a new, original and distinct corporation, deriving its existence and franchises under and pursuant to the act of 31st March, 1860 (P. L. 498), and was by the terms of the act dependent for its existence upon the sale in law or equity of the railroad of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Rail Road Company. It was upon this contingency, involving the extinction of the Rail road company, that the law itself places the incorporation of the Rail way company. The term "reorganization" in the title of the act, which was passed before the adoption of the constitutional amendment of 1864, cannot overcome the very facts of the case and the language and intent of the law. Nor could the organization of the company precede the contingency of sale, made by the act the basis of the organization of the new company.

Nor is the position sustained by the facts in evidence, that the new company is the trustee for the stockholders of the old company, of any of its assets; and consequently it is not trustee for the creditors, whose equity, in case of assets, would be superior to that of the stockholders. It is not proved, as charged in the bill, that the reorganization, as it is termed, was in pursuance of certain private agreements between the mortgage bondholders and the stockholders, whereby the new company became possessed of assets or property belonging to the old company. On the contrary, the proof is that the road, property and franchises of the old company were sold under judicial proceedings, to every appearance adversary; and the sum bid—two millions—paid to a receiver before the sale was confirmed, and the deed ordered to be made, vesting the title and franchises of the old company in the individual purchasers, through whom the new company derives its title. In this connection it is to be noticed that there is no charge of collusion or fraud alleged in the bill to subvert the judicial proceedings under which the property and franchises of the old company passed to the purchasers and from them to the new company. The whole case of the plaintiffs, in this branch of it, is rested on the fact that the new company came into possession of the assets and property of the old company under such a voluntary arrangement with the stockholders of the old company as would leave the property liable to the creditors of the old company. This liability is expressly denied in the seventh paragraph of the answer; while in the sixth paragraph not only is it alleged that the sale and foreclosure under the mortgages passed a free and unencumbered title to the new company, but it is also alleged that the rights of the old stockholders were acquired under an arrangement subsequently made; and this accords with the power conferred upon the new company by the 3d section of the act of March 31st, 1860. Taking all the facts and evidence found properly in the record, we discover no proof of a preliminary agreement, or such an arrangement with the stockholders of the old company, or such admissions of liability, as would charge the new company with a trust of any of the assets for the creditors of the old company. This is the difference between the present case and that cited from 7 Wallace, 392, Railroad Co. v. Howard. There not only was there a preliminary agreement to sell the property of the Mississippi and Missouri R. R. Co. to the Chicago and Rock Island Co., and to make the proceeding to foreclose the mortgage and sell the road of the former, ancillary to the agreement; but after all this had been done, and the property vested in the latter company, the latter admitted the possession of sixteen per cent. of the fund in hand to belong to the stockholders of the former company, and the real question was whether the stockholders or the creditors of the Mississippi and Missouri R. R. Co., should be entitled to this surplus fund. It was held, of course, that the equity of the creditors was superior to that of the stockholders. Finding no error in the decree dismissing the bill with costs, it is affirmed, and the appellants are ordered to pay the costs of this appeal.

MILLER'S APPEAL.

An administrator should charge himself with his indebtedness to the decedent, and if he receive the amount of a policy of insurance on decedent's lifetime, should account for it.

Appeal of John M. Miller from the decree of the Orphans' Court of Washington county.

Opinion of the court by WILLIAMS J. Delivered January 6th, 1873.

This is an appeal of the surety in the administration bond of A. J. Miller, administrator of the estate of Wm. D. Murphy, deceased, from the decree of the Orphan's Court of Washington county, confirming the report of the auditor appointed to hear and determine the exceptions filed by the decedent's mother and heirs to the account of the administrator, as restated by the register.

The auditor, in pursuance of the written consent and agreement of the accountant, restated the account, by striking out from the credit side thereof, the items excepted to, and surcharging the accountant with the amount of his indebtedness to the intestate for services rendered and for money paid for his use, showing a balance at the date of the exhibition of the account of $6,275.70, which he reported to be due by the administrator to the estate. The report was confirmed without objection, no exception being filed thereto. Subsequently the appellant presented a petition of review, alleging that there were errors in the account, and asking the court to grant a rehearing thereof. The appellee filed an answer denying the existence of the alleged errors, and the court dismissed the petition; and thereupon this appeal was taken by the appellant. No complaint is made of the order of the court in dismissing the petition of review. But it is alleged that the court erred in confirming the report of the auditor because the accountant is improperly charged with the following items:

1st. Because he is charged with $4,900, "net proceeds of policy of insurance," on the life of the decedent. This item is objected to as not being assets of the decedent's estate, but the property of his mother Mrs. Margaret Murphy, to whom the administrator accounted for it by giving her his judgment note. The policy of insurance was taken out by the decedent, and was in his possession at the time of his decease. There is no evidence tending to show that he made a valid gift of the policy to his mother; the very utmost that can be inferred from the evidence; is that he intended in the event of his death that she should receive the amount insured on his life. But he did not give or assign the policy to her, and she has no title to the proceeds, except as next of kin under the intestate act. The money was received by the accountant as administrator of the decedent's estate, and he was properly charged with it. If he has settled and accounted with the decedent's mother for the proceeds of the policy, he will be entitled to a credit therefor in the settlement of his distribution account, but whether he has paid her or not, he is clearly chargeable in his administration account with the amount he received.

2d. The two remaining items alleged to have been erroneously charged, may be considered together. The accountant admitted his indebtedness to the intestate for services as clerk and salesman, and for money paid for goods purchased and put in his store. The evidence as to the value of the intestate's services and the amount paid for the goods, fully sustains the charges made by the auditor. The conditional partnership agreement between the parties was never consummated, and by its terms the intestate was entitled to compensation for his services; and there can be no question as to his right to be reimbursed for the money paid for the accountant's use. The Orphans' Court was therefore clearly right in confirming the report of the auditor.

Decree affirmed, and appeal dismissed at the costs of the appellant.

Supreme Court, United States.

Rees v. Gould.

Patentable invention may consist entirely in a new combination of old ingredients, whereby a new and useful result is obtained.

In a patent for a new combination of old ingredients, the ingredients should be named, their mode of operation given, and the new and useful result pointed out in the specification, that the public may know the nature and extent of the claim, and what the parts are which co-operate to produce the new and useful result.

When only a combination of mechanical devices is claimed, the patent is not infringed by the use of a combination differing substantially in any of its parts, and the omission of one essential feature or element of the combination as claimed, avoids the infringement.

Mere formal alterations of a combination do not constitute any defence to the charge of infringement, but the inventor of a combination cannot suppress, under the doctrine of equivalents, subsequent improvements, which are substantially different from his invention, whether such subsequent improvements consist in a new combination of the same old ingredients or of some newly discovered ingredient, or even of some old ingredient, performing some new function not known at the date of the letters patent, as a proper substitute for the ingredient withdrawn.

If a subsequent combination was new, or if a newly discovered ingredient was substituted for one of the ingredients in the patented combination; or even if an old ingredient, performing some new function, was substituted for one of the ingredients of the patented combination, such substitution would avoid the infringement.

A new combination, or a newly discovered ingredient substituted in place of an ingredient in the patented combination, or even the substitution of an old ingredient performing a new function not known at the date of the patent as a proper substitute for the omitted ingredient of the patented combination, is not an equivalent within the meaning of the patent law, and cannot be claimed as an infringement.

An alteration in a patented combination, which merely substitutes another old ingredient for one of the ingredients in the combination claimed, if the substitute performs the same function and was well known at the date of the patent as a proper substitute for the ingredient which it displaces in the combination, is an infringement under the doctrine of equivalents.

If a substituted ingredient is a new one, or if it performs a substantially different function, or was not known at the date of the patent as a proper substitute for the ingredient which it displaces in the patented combination, then such substitution carries the combination in which it is embodied, outside of any infringement, under the doctrine of equivalents.

It was error to instruct the jury that they must find for the plaintiff, whether the ingredient substituted for the one omitted was new or old, or whether the one substituted was or was not well known at the date of the plaintiff's patent, as a proper substitute for the omitted ingredient.

Young v. The Key City.

1. While courts of admiralty are not governed by any statute of limitations, they adopt the principle that laches or delay in the judicial enforcement of maritime liens, will, under proper circumstances, constitute a valid defence.

2. No arbitrary or fixed period of time has been, or will be established, as an inflexible rule; but the delay which will defeat such a suit must, in every case, depend on the peculiar equitable circumstances of that case.

3. When an admiralty lien is to be enforced to the detriment of a purchaser for value, without notice of the lien, the defence will be held valid under shorter time, and a more rigid scrutiny of the delay than when the claimant is the party who owned the property when the lien accrued.

4. When two corporations united their vessels and other property used in navigation, and formed a new corporation, in which no money was paid by either party, and in the contract of consolidation made arrangements for the payment of the debts of one or both, before any dividends should be declared in the new stock, the new corporation cannot avail itself of the doctrine applicable to such a purchaser without notice; and a lien, three years and a half old, will be enforced against one of the vessels so transferred to the new corporation.

Delmar v. Insurance Co.

1. On a writ of error to a State court, this court cannot revise a decision founded on the ground that a contract is void on the general principles of public policy or morality, when that is the only ground on which the contract is held to be void.

2. But if the decision of a State court is based upon a constitutional or legislative enactment, passed after the contract was made, this court has jurisdiction to inquire whether such legislation does not impair the obligation of the contract, and thereby violate the Federal Constitution.

3. In the prosecution of that inquiry, this court must decide for itself, whether any valid contract existed where the legislation complained of was had, and in making up its judgment on that question is not concluded by the decisions of the State court.

5. This court is of opinion that the notes of the Confederate States, in ordinary use as money, during the rebellion, might constitute a valid consideration for a contract; and that a provision in the constitution of a State, subsequently adopted, declaring such contracts void, was an impairing of the obligation of such contract within the meaning of the Federal Constitution.

6. A judgment of a State court, holding such a contract void, expressly based on the constitutional provision, and not on general ground of public policy, must be reversed in this court.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

With great pleasure, we give a place in our columns to the following circular, addressed to the members of the Bar.

DEAR SIR:

The Committee of "Lawyers" beg leave to call the attention of their fellow members of the Bar to the subscription list of stock for the Centennial Board of Finance.

In this matter the Bar should take a deep interest, and it is of the first importance that sufficient funds should be raised to render the celebration successful. The well known liberality of the profession justifies the public in anticipating large subscriptions from its members.

If you desire to subscribe, on sending your name and address to any of the undersigned, the subscription book will be sent to you.

The fight in Illinois over the manner in which the Supreme Court reporter of that State does his work, grows quite lively. In reply to the fierce attack upon the reporter, issued in the name of the Chicago Law Institute, and which we noticed a short time since in the Gazette, comes another document, signed by over fifty members of that society, alleging that the issue of the address was only authorized by a vote of 14 to 12, while the number of members of the institute is 270. These fifty gentlemen are perfectly satisfied with the reporter, and so we have allegation and counter-allegation. Now for the judgment!

The Constitutional Convention has at last got to work. After much delay and uninteresting debate on questions of printing, and accounts, and adjournment, it has begun seriously to consider sections of the new constitution. Now that it has evinced an industrious disposition, the public can gather from its proceedings, its temper and feeling on questions of reform. We are glad to say, that partisanship, thus far, is rather below par in the convention.

In the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, upon Monday, January 20th, the motion to quash the appeal in Griffin v Griffin, was granted, and the appeal was quashed.

SUPREME COURT OF PENNA.—Upon the 6th instant, the following gentlemen were admitted to practice as attorneys and counsellors in the Supreme Court:

W. W. Weigley, Esq., on motion of Samuel C. Perkins, Esq.

William Nelson West, Esq., on motion of Hon. Wm. A. Porter.

Franklin Swayne, Esq., on motion of Hon. Benjamin H. Brewster.

Walter S. Stark, Esq., on motion of Thos. Greenbank, Esq.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

We have reserved a portion of our space for articles upon the Constitutional Convention, and the subjects which will probably come before that body for consideration. All communications intended for publication in this department, should be addressed to the Editor of the Legal Gazette, and must in all cases be accompanied by the name and address of the writer. Correspondents will please state under what names they wish their communications to appear.

LETTERS OF PERICLES.

VI.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GAZETTE:

In my last letter I reached the 6th section of the proposed article upon Suffrage and Elections. As I had merely time to give the wording of the section without explanation, I will commence this letter by again presenting it.

ART. II. SUFFRAGE AND ELECTIONS.

SECT. 6. Whenever in an election district, over one hundred electors cast their votes at any two successive elections, such election district shall be divided into two distinct election districts of contiguous and compact territory; and whenever in any two or more contiguous election districts, less than one hundred electors cast their votes at any two successive elections, such election districts shall be consolidated into one.

If this section is adopted, it will go farther to purify elections, and get rid of the vast amount of fraud now perpetrated as well at the election polls as in counting and returning the votes. By reducing the election precinct or district to a small size, every person offering to vote will be known by some one or more of the other voters of his precinct. The great trouble now is, that most of the election districts contain such a large number of voters, that it is impossible to distinguish in many cases those entitled and those not entitled to vote, and hence personation of voters, false registry of names, assessment of illegal voters, the voting of gangs of "repeaters" or "colonizers," and numerous other fraudulent devices at the elections. Another abuse where the size of election district is not limited, is that districts are often not subdivided, because they contain a great many voters of an opposite political party from those who happen to be in power, and consequently it is impossible to poll all the votes in the hours allotted for an election. By subdividing an election district, wherever it is clearly established that it contains over one hundred electors, all these frauds and abuses are prevented, because everybody in the district is known, persons not entitled can be easily detected if they attempt to vote, and great temptation is taken away from election officers, who will be afraid to tamper with or alter the returns of a district when the number of votes polled can be so easily ascertained. Another advantage is, that no registry laws of any kind will be required, as the sole, honest purpose of such laws is to identify the voters. The length of residence need not be extended to a greater time than one month, or even less, in case this section is adopted, as the residence qualification of a voter is also for the purpose of identification, which purpose is answered by the small election districts. The only objections that can seriously be made to the introduction of the small election district system, is the multiplication of election officers and its cost. As to the first, the number of officers in each precinct could and should be reduced from five, viz., the judge, two inspectors and two clerks, to three, viz., the judge and two inspectors, who could easily act as clerks, and where there are so few votes to receive and count, could get through their task much earlier and easier than at present. As to the cost, it would no doubt be found, that with a simple, pure electoral system, many men, if in fact it would not be a general thing, would consent to serve as election officers without pay, or even if not, what is the cost of such a system compared with the cost of the present system, in the shape of fraudulent elections, dishonest officers and legislators, taxes upon taxes piled up, until nearly every municipality is being driven into insolvency, and thousands, aye millions of dollars collected from the taxpayers, and squandered by their own servants?

The small election district system has been advocated by many serious thinking citizens of late years, and it strikes me as the real great reform needed to purify our elections. Coupled with the other reforms I have already indicated, in regard to the qualification of voters, it will give us, what we want,—free elections.

As to the number 100, I think this is not too small in cities of any size, nor, indeed, in the country districts either. In the cities, if anything, it is too large, as it is extremely difficult to prevent election frauds in them.

SECT. 7. Elections by persons in their representative capacities shall be viva voce; all other elections shall be by open ballot, a record being made of the numerical order of the voter, his name and residence, the persons for whom he votes, and the number of votes cast by him for each of said persons.

The section of the present constitution in reference to the manner of voting, is as follows, viz. art.: III. sec. 2. "All elections shall be by ballot, except those by persons in their representative capacities, who shall vote viva voce."

I do not expect that voting by open ballot will be agreed to by the convention, as the prejudices in favor of the present system of voting by secret ballot are too many and too strong to permit of any change, but I hope that by discussion and agitation of the subject, the public may be prepared at some future time to adopt the open ballot. I know that the current of popular feeling at present, is strongly in favor of the secret ballot, but I think that the experience of the people at elections during the last few years, is leading to a great change in this current. The secret ballot, and its merits and demerits, have been seriously considered by thinking men of late years; and while in England a secret ballot bill has been recently passed, here, in the United States, a disposition to do away with the secret ballot has been evinced in many sections.—Kentucky has for a long time held all her elections viva voce, although I think the open ballot much preferable to this method of voting. In the State of Illinois, the ballots are required by law (Laws of Illinois of February 22d, 1861, sec. 13, and February 15th, 1865, sec. 16) to be numbered by the proper election officers, which really does away, to a certain extent, with the secrecy of the ballot. In the most recent Constitutional Convention held in this country—that of West Virginia in 1872—a motion to strike out the provision for voting by ballot, and inserting viva voce voting, was lost only by a vote of 29 to 36, and the report of the committee was amended so that the section (afterwards adopted by the people) was made to read as follows: "In all elections by the people, the mode of voting shall be by ballot; but the voter shall be left free to vote, either by open, sealed or secret ballot, as he may elect" (art. IV. sec. 2). In the convention now being held in this State, Judge Woodward has already offered a resolution favoring the abolition of the secret ballot, and Judge J. S. Black, is a pronounced advocate of such abolition. Even the recent ballot act in England does not provide for strictly secret voting; by the provisions of that act, each voter marks on paper, containing the names of all the candidates, a cross on the right hand side of the name of the candidate for whom he votes; the "voting-paper" is furnished him by the election officers, and after marking it, presumably in secret, he folds it up and returns it to the officer, running the risk, all the time of being watched when he marks his ticket, or if he be infirm or illiterate, having his ballot recognized by the officers who assist him in getting it ready for voting.

In an interesting article in the Edinburgh Review (April, 1870), the disadvantages of the English ballot system are set forth in a very forcible manner, notwithstanding the writer's politics evidently warps his judgment in pronouncing so strongly against the governmental ballot bill.

Now, viva voce voting by the people, is undoubtedly cumbersome, vexatious, and the occasion of great disorder and delay, and I would not like to see it adopted, but these objections do not hold to the open ballot, which provides a simple method of voting, and does away with many of the election frauds of which we now complain. The great argument in favor of the secret ballot, is that it prevents (so it is assumed) intimidation of workmen and others by their employers, or persons whose influence or power they fear. Now this intimidation is after all very much limited in this country, where the working classes avow their sentiments pretty openly, and the evil resulting from it is nothing compared with the gigantic evils of fraudulent voting, personation, counting illegal votes, altering returns, stuffing ballot boxes, etc., etc. What is wanted in this country is a pure election system, and the secret ballot does not give it to us. Make, if necessary, the most stringent laws against the capitalist, if he interferes with his employees in their right to vote as they please (and I would favor them to the utmost in this respect), but let those employees gradually be convinced, that to vote openly is the fair, manly, honest way of expressing their desires, and then we will not be "a nation of liars," attempting to conceal how we vote, but a nation, purified and regenerated by "free elections."

SECT. 8. The general election for State executive officers, judges of the Supreme Court and members of the Legislature shall be held on the Tuesday next following the first Monday in November; but the Legislature may by law fix a different day two-thirds of each house consenting thereto.

The Convention has already passed a section, similar to this but without nameing the officers to be elected, and as the purpose of the section is substantially the same, I merely give this section here, without further comment, than, that it expresses my views more fully.

SECT. 9. All elections for county, city, ward, borough and township officers, except elections to fill vacancies, shall be held on the third Friday in February.

The Convention has passed the following section: "All elections for city, ward, borough, and township officers, for regular terms of service, shall be held on the third Friday of February." As far as it goes, this section is very good, but it should undoubtedly have county officers, also included within its provisions The day fixed is the one which most of the members of the convention seemed to favor, and as the principle involved, viz.: the separation of local from State and national elections, is retained, the day should be fixed at a time to suit the people. As the third Friday of February seems to suit them, I have inserted that day.

SECT. 10. Elections to fill vacancies shall be for the unexpired term only, and shall be provided for by law.

This section is to avoid the present want of system in electing Supreme Court judges, and other officers in this State.

In section 1 of the present article, the word male is inserted as a qualification for an elector. This was not intended to deny female suffrage, but was inserted merely, because I do not think the people of Pennsylvania are yet prepared to grant the suffrage to women, and with the view that the whole section, in case it should in substance be adopted by the convention, might not be defeated by reason of having the word male omitted. Now I am in favor of granting the suffrage to women, and for that purpose I wish to see a separate section, with the word male stricken out, submitted when the constitution is submitted, and every five or three years thereafter to a vote of the men and women of Pennsylvania, so that in case it should be adopted, it would take the place of section 1, given in my last article.

The letter from a judge of the Supreme Court in Wyoming Territory, read at the hearing granted by the Committee of Suffrage and Elections, to the advocates of women suffrage, gives facts in reference to women voting in that territory, that, go far to remove the objections of those who think woman suffrage is a matter of expediency and fitness, and not of right. Orderly and peaceable elections, greater purity in the administration of public affairs, the elevation of the moral tone of the community, have been the result of granting the suffrage to women in that progressive place. I would vote, if in my power, to give the suffrage directly to women; but as all the amendments or provisions adopted by the convention must be submitted to the people of the commonwealth, I have provided, by the means above suggested, a practical method of obtaining suffrage for women, as soon as the people can be convinced of the justice of it.

ART. III. OF THE LEGISLATURE.

In my next letter I will commence my proposed article on the Legislature, its main features are as follows: the Senate to consist of 45 members; the House of Representatives of 225 members.

The State to be divided every ten years into 75 Representative Districts, in each of which 3 representatives are to be chosen by the "free vote," thus providing for practical minority representation. At the time of such division, 15 Senatorial Districts to be formed by grouping 5 contiguous Representative Districts into 1 Senatorial District, and in each of said Senatorial Districts, 3 senators to be chosen by the "free vote." The Senate to be presided over by a lieutenant governor; the House by a speaker elected by it from its own members. The terms of senators to be 3 years and of representatives 1 year. The regular time of meeting of the Legislature to be on the first Tuesday of January, and its time of adjournment the 22d of February.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GAZETTE:

I.

Vattel in his admirable work on the "Laws of Nations," chapter iii., sec. 27–30, declares that the fundamental laws of a State should be plain and precise, to the end that they may possess stability, and that they may not be eluded. The constitution of a State is defined in Dwarris on Statutes and Constitutions, page 347, to be the framework of political government.

A constitution being the fundamental law of a State, as Vattel expresses it, or a framework of political government, as defined in Dwarris, should be of a plain phraseology, precise language, and without a pretext for elusion. The constitution of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania is not in accordance with this standard, and it is the object of these letters to point out some of its failings, and first some pretexts for elusion:

Art. 1, sec. xxv. and xxvi. contain the words: "In such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators."

Sec. xxv. ordains that no charter for banking corporations shall hereafter be granted for longer than twenty years. Both sections xxv. and xxvi. declare that the Legislature shall have power to alter, revoke or annul any charter of incorporation hereafter conferred by or under any special or general law, whenever in their opinion it may be injurious to the citizens of the commonwealth; in such manner, however, that no injustice shall be done to the corporators.

The intent of both sections is evidently to keep corporations within governmental control. And nothing can establish a more efficient check to corporate arrogance, than the power of the people, exercised through their representatives, to revoke the grant of the charter as soon as the corporate object becomes injurious to the citizens of the commonwealth.

But why the proviso? What meaning has the word "injustice" in the above phrase? How can injustice be done to corporators or associators who allow the object of their association to work out injury to the citizens of the commonwealth? Can the abatement of an injury, and especially such general injury, work out injustice to the faulty party?

The word injustice, in the above phrase, is very apt to be interpreted with "losses," and if such interpretation can be judicially established, it neutralizes the benefits of the sections, and gives the welfare of the citizens entirely into the hands of corporations. We then would experience the strange anomaly that the citizens of this commonwealth, through their representatives, could create an artificial being, which may work out the most oppressive injury to the citizens, without any remedy in those who created it.

Such a position cannot be intended. The welfare of the citizens of the commonwealth (which, as it must be kept in view, is the commonwealth itself) cannot be jeopardized because wrongdoers, who are corporators and commit the wrong through their corporate object, may have so-called "injustice" done to them, or may sustain losses through the revocation of their charter. The word "injustice" stands with evil grace, and the sections alluded to will certainly gain in precision and clearness if the whole proviso, contained in the words first above quoted, were stricken out. IN EQUITY.

MARVINE v. DREXEL.

To prevent injury arising from a mistake, the court refused to confirm a public sale of real estate, and gave a party in interest leave to offer a bid.

Per Curiam opinion delivered January 23d, 1873.

Delay is always regarded in equity. In such a case as this, a time must arrive when further delay becomes injustice. So we thought in the case before us, when in July last, after many futile efforts to sell the property in the interest of the plaintiff, we concluded that justice to the estate of Mr. Drexel required more promptness in proceeding. And even then, while ordering a public sale, we endeavored to aid the plaintiff by allowing an intermediate private sale, if one could be effected to his advantage It is admitted, that the receiver has done his whole duty in giving publicity to the offer of the property for sale. Mr. Marvine has not been able to obtain a purchaser or purchasers at private sale, and cannot or will not take the property himself. On the day of the public sale, many persons attended. but except in two or three instances, gave no bids. Mr. A. J. Drexel, a gentleman of undoubted financial ability, bid on all the parcels offered, sums, in the aggregate amounting to $170,500, that being the sum nearly of the original purchase money and interest. There is no intimation that there has been any unfairness in the sales, or that the receiver was managing it in the interest of Mr. Drexel, or of Drexel's executors. Mr. Marvine, with his counsel, attended at the sale, but declined to bid thereat. With a privilege of the order of this court for a peremptory sale, it is not in proof, that Mr. Marvine has been able to procure a purchaser or purchasers at higher prices than those bid by Mr. Drexel, or that better prices can be obtained. After the long lapse of time and the admitted full and honest effort of the receiver to sell the property, and the publicity he gave to the public sale, and the refusal of Mr. Marvine to bid upon the property, the sale must be taken to be a fair test of the value of the property, and it should be confirmed. Mr. Marvine, it seems, acted under the advice of counsel in declining to bid. We know not the ground of the advice. It may have been entirely proper, but lest Mr. Marvine may have been led to act by his own hope of further time, we are disposed to give him an opportunity of retrieving his misstep, by enabling him to bid upon the property before a final confirmation of the sale. We have therefore made an order to this end.

And now, January 23d, 1873, it is ordered by the court, that the report of the receiver, of the sales made by him in this case, stand over for final confirmation or modification, and final allowance, until the eighth day of March next, and that Edward E. Marvine, the plaintiff, be permitted to file, on or before the 15th day of February next, a bid or bids, including an agreement to be bound thereby, for the property sold by the receiver, or for any or as many of the subdivisions thereof sold to A. J Drexel, as he shall think proper to bid for, of which notice shall be given to the said A. J. Drexel, by delivering to him or to his counsel a copy thereof, on or before the day of filing, as aforesaid. That the said A. J Drexel shall have leave to advance his bid or bids over the sum or sums bid by the said Edward E. Marvine, upon any and as many as he may elect to advance, and to file his election and advance on or before the 24th day of February next, a copy of which shall be delivered to the said Edward E. Marvine or his solicitor, on or before the day of filing. The said several offers and bids shall be laid before the court on or before the day fixed for final confirmation, and shall be subject to the further order of the court, as in equity, and justice may be right.

By the court.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE JUROR: being a guide to citizens summoned to serve as jurors. Containing information as to the manner of drawing and selecting jurors, their rights, privileges, liabilities and duties; reasons for exemption from service, and mode of arriving at and rendering verdicts. By Andrew Jackson Reilly, officer of the District Court for the city and county of Philadelphia. Revised by E. Cooper Shapley, Esq, of the Philadelphia bar, and secretary of the board for selecting and drawing jurors for the city of Philadelphia. 18mo., pp 96. Philadelphia, John Campbell & Son, 1873. Price 50 cents.

The title of this excellent little work expresses fully its purpose and the subjects of which it treats. The want of such a publication has long been felt, not only by those citizens who have been actually summoned to serve on juries, but by the body of the citizens generally, who, though not yet called upon to perform this duty, yet may expect to be so called at any moment. The work has been carefully prepared by Mr. Reilly, whose long experience as an officer of the District Court, has enabled him to make it a useful, practical, and comprehensive guide. It deserves, by all means, an extensive sale.

THE LEGAL CHRONICLE, Pottsville, Pa., Nos. 1 and 2.

Pennsylvania seems to be pre-eminently the State wherein legal publications thrive and flourish. Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Harrisburg, Lancaster and Scranton, have already their legal organs, and now comes the city of Pottsville to add its quota to the general fund of information. The more the merrier, say we, and the Chronicle has our hearty welcome and best wishes for its firm establishment and prosperity. We like its neat appearance and make up, and if Mr. Sol. Foster, Jr., will continue to edit it with the same ability displayed in the first two numbers, now before us, we have no doubt he will make the Chronicle a useful institution to the bar of Schuylkill and adjoining counties. With Judges Pershing and Walker to help him, there is no reason why he should not succeed in his venture. We gladly place the Chronicle upon our list of exchanges.

THE LADIES' BAZAAR, Vol. 1, No. 1. Philadelphia, T. Ellwood Zell, Publisher. January, 1873.

This is a new rival to Harper's Bazar, and we would be glad of its success. This, the initial number, is admirably gotten up, and contains a number of well executed plates of fashions, dresses, etc., equal in our estimation to the best of Harper's. There is also a neat picture of "Finding the Wind," and another, of "The Flower Signal," which are decidedly well engraved. Altogether we like the Bazaar very much. Its price is only one dollar per year.

PENNSYLVANIA.

MORROW v. REES.

1. To sustain an action to recover back purchase money on the ground of fraud, there must be an actual rescission by the party defrauded, notice of it to the other party, and unless the subject be utterly worthless, an offer to return it, so as to put the vendor in statu quo.

2. Evidence for the jury in this case as to rescission.

PIER v. CARR.

1. Carr rented to Sewell; during the term Sewell's goods were levied on for tax; before the sale he left the premises. The constable delivered the key to Carr, who had a bill, "To let," put on the house, retained the key; had repairs done to the house, and showed it to a person applying to rent it. Held, that these acts did not discharge Sewell from the rent before the end of the term.

2. Had the tenant returned during the term, he would have had the right to enter.

3. When a tenant is evicted, he is discharged from the rent for the time following, not for that due before eviction. Per Stowe, J., of Common Pleas.

4. If the acts of the landlord are such an interruption of the tenant's rights under the lease as interfere with his possession, or amount to taking the property off the tenant's hands, the rent will be suspended from that time. Id.

MCKEE v. PERCHMENT.

1. Asken, in a plan of lots, laid out an alley between the rear of two tiers, and conveyed the lots, ninety-four feet in depth as bounding on the alley, to different persons with use of the alley to each. The alley could not be abandoned without the consent of all the lot holders.

2. In an action by a lot holder against another for obstructing the alley by a building, the defendant gave evidence that erections had been made up to the centre of the alley, and maintained for twenty-one years or more. Held, that the plaintiff might show by the acts and declarations of different former proprietors of the lots, that such occupation was for temporary purposes.

3. The deed to defendant from a former grantee, described the lot as ninety-four feet deep "with use of the alley." This was not a recital in the deed, but a description of the thing granted; and even if defendant's grantor had acquired title to the soil by abandonment, it was not conveyed to the defendant.

4. The plan of lots was not recorded, but was referred to in the deeds; this was notice to the defendants of the existence of the alley.

M. Masters v. The Pennsylvania Railroad Co.

1. A custom so long persisted in as to be known and practised by a community, is the law of the particular business in which it exists; and the presumption arises that it is in the view of the parties who contract about its subject matter

2. To establish such custom it should be reasonable, continued and acquiesced in by all acting within its operations.

3. There was a custom that a railroad company should deliver freight on the platform of minor stations, whose business would not justify a warehouse, &c., to be received there by the consignee on discharge from the car. Held, a good custom.

4. A custom will control the general law of liability of carriers.

5. To relieve a carrier, the custom must be clearly proved; and that the employer knew it, or is to be presumed to know it, by reason of its generality in the neighborhood.

Maffitt's Admin. et al. v. Rynd et al.

1. Although a conveyance of land with a parol trust to hold for the benefit of the grantor, be not enforceable under the act of April 22d, 1856, yet a parol declaration of trust by the grantee after its conversion into money, will impress the proceeds with the trust.

2. The act does not raise a bar to enforcing a parol declaration of trust as to personal estate.

3. Creditors of a debtor bought real estate in their name under a mutual agreement that the debtor should take charge of it at a salary, and when their advances and debts should be paid from it, the surplus should be the debtor's. It was afterwards conveyed to Maffitt, he agreeing by parol to hold it upon the same condition. The real estate was sold and a surplus remained, which Maffitt acknowledged was subject to the trust. Held, that from this, the law implied a promise by Maffitt to pay the debtors.

4. Since the act of 1856, an absolute deed can be shown by parol to have been a mortgage.

5. A mortgage may be given to secure future advances, whether for the mortgagor or third persons.

6. Suit was brought by the debtor against Maffitt. During the trial the court allowed an amendment by inserting the names of the creditors "to the use of" the debtor. Held, not to be error.

7. The refusal of the court to grant a continuance on an allegation of surprise on account of the amendment, is not reviewable in the Supreme Court.

8. When an amendment in the names of the parties is allowed after the jury are sworn, they should be resworn according to the amended condition of the record.

Neiler & Warren v. Kelley.

1. Trover will not lie for a "share of stock," but may be maintained for the certificate.

2. A declaration of a single count in trover was for seventy shares of stock of the value of $100 each, and for four bonds of $1000 each. The declaration was defective as to the stock, but not as to the bonds, and a demurrer to the whole declaration was properly overruled.

3. In trover the goods ought to be set out with some degrees of certainty of description, but the same certainty is not required as in detinue and replevin, damages being recovered in trover, the very articles in detinue and replevin.

4. If some counts are good and others bad, and the defendant demurs to the whole declaration, the plaintiff will have judgment.

5. In general the measure of damages in trover, is the value of the goods at the time of the taking, with interest; if there be circumstances of outrage, jury may give more.

6. When there is a duty on a party to deliver stocks or securities at a particular time, which duty has not been fulfilled, he is liable for the highest price in the market between that time and the trial.

7. Kelley pledged to Neiler stocks as collateral for debt; the debt being due and unpaid, Neiler sold the stocks without notice to Kelley, he having neither demanded them nor tendered payment. In trover against Neiler, Held that the measure of damages was the market value of the stock at the time of sale, with interest.

8. In trover for wrongful conversion of a pledge, a tender of the debt is not necessary, but it may be recouped by the jury from the damages.

Mrs. Selden owned a United States bond for $5000, and assigned it to a bank as collateral, for $4700 lent to her husband. The council constructed reservoirs, but suffered one to dilapidate so that it would not hold water. A fire occurred near this reservoir, and no water could be obtained from it; the buildings were burned. The owner claimed damages, alleging negligence on the part of the city. Held, that it was discretionary with the city to construct the reservoirs, and they were not liable.

2. The city having in pursuance of the act constructed the reservoir, was not therefore bound to maintain it.

L. Irwin, Cashier." Irwin had actual charge of B. & Co.'s business; signed his name as cashier in their business transactions, &c. Held, under the circumstances, that B. & Co. were bound by Irwin's endorsement.

2. The cashier of an incorporated bank is the general executive officer to manage its concerns in all things not peculiarly committed to the directors; he is agent of the corporation, not of the directors.

Rogers contracted to build a sawmill on Bemus' land, Bemus to prepare the foundation at a specified time, and to furnish means for the erection, with other expenses, to stock the mill until the earnings should pay for stocking, Rogers to have half the profits. Rogers prepared the superstructure, &c. Bemus did not lay the foundation, or furnish means as stipulated, and Rogers was thereby delayed from operating the mill. Held, that evidence of what the mill would have rented for when finished, was proper in measuring damages in an action by Rogers on the contract.

2. Probable profits from the manufacture of lumber, the mill being unfinished, would be too remote, contingent and speculative.

3. A party may resort to different means of estimating his damages, to be judged of by the jury.

October 19th, 1871. Before Thompson, C. J., Read, Agnew, Sharswood and Williams, JJ.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Crawford county: Of October and November Term, 1870. No. 121.

Kelsey v. The National Bank of Crawford Co.

1. The maxim Omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur et mandato æquiparatur applies as well to corporations as to natural persons, and is equally to be presumed from the absence of dissent.

2. A principal not promptly disavowing an act of his agent, who has transcended his authority, makes the act his own.

3. Upon the discovery of the robbery of a bank, a minority of the directors and the cashier met with a detective in the bank; the cashier with the advice of those directors offered a reward for the money and the thief, and sent to different places telegrams containing the offer; all the directors lived in the same place; they did not disavow the cashier's act; the detective arrested the thief and obtained the money. Held to be evidence of ratification by the bank.

4. It was not necessary, in order to bind the bank by acquiescence, that notice of the cashier's act should be given to the directors when acting officially. If personally cognizant of it, they should have assembled the board and disavowed the cashier's act, if unwilling to be bound by it.

5. The robbery and offer was whilst the bank was a State institution; the suit for the reward was brought after becoming a National bank under the enabling act, August 22d, 1864: Held, that the action was properly brought, the National Bank being responsible for all the liabilities of the State bank.

6. Objection not having been made in he court below to a defective but amendable declaration; the Supreme Court will allow the amendment as if made below.

October 17th, 1871. Before Thompson, C. J., Read, Agnew, Sharswood and Williams, JJ.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Crawford county: Of October and November Term, 1870. No. 99.

The American Express Co. v. The Second National Bank of Titusville.

1. Common carriers cannot so limit their liability by special notice or contract, as to relieve themselves from the consequences of their own or their servants' negligence.

2. If a common carrier fails to deliver property safely at its destination, the burden is on him to prove that it was not lost or injured whilst in his custody.

3. An express company received a package of money from a bank at Titusville, to be transmitted to Lancaster. In their printed receipt, they undertook to "forward to the nearest place of destination reached by this company." By conditions printed with the receipt, they were not to be liable "except as forwarders only, * * * or for any default or negligence of any person or corporation to whom" the package should be delivered, "at any place of the established route run by this company," and such person, &c., was to be taken to be the agent of the consignor. To reach Lancaster the package was carried by three other express companies. The consignee at Lancaster refused to receive it, and directed it to be returned to Titusville, to which place it was carried by the same routes. On its arrival there it was found that part of the money had been abstracted. Held, that at most the company were liable as carriers only to the end of their own route, and afterwards were forwarders, responsible only for reasonable care and diligence in selecting proper carriers.

4. The burden was not upon the company to prove when, where, or by whose negligence the package was lost.

5. The contract in the conditions of the receipt was not unreasonable or unlawful.

6. Forwarders are not insurers as common carriers; they are liable as an ordinary bailee for hire, who need only satisfy the jury by the best evidence in his power of his care and fidelity; and that the loss was not from default of himself or servants.

October 16th, 1871. Before Thompson, C. J., Read, Agnew, Sharswood and Williams, JJ.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Crawford county: No. 48, to October and November Term, 1871.

Sumner v. Stewart.

1. S. gave orders to R. in the employ of W., a broker in Pittsburg, to buy five hundred barrels of oil, on terms, &c., specified; the order was telegraphed to W.'s house in Philadelphia, who telegraphed in reply, "we have bought subject to immediate confirmation, five hundred barrels," &c., on the terms of the order, R., not knowing the name of the seller, immediately replied: "We hereby confirm purchase," &c., signing S.'s name, having had no further communication with S. Next day R. received the name, and told S., who, not being satisfied with the seller's standing, refused him, and W.'s guaranty, and refused to sign a contract or accept the oil. The custom of oil dealers is that the contract with the name of the seller must be submitted to the principal for confirmation. When names are given and rejected, the sale fails. Held, that there was no evidence of a contract on which the seller could recover from S.

2. The broker could not bind his principal, except in the manner recognized by the custom, and R.'s confirmation was without authority.

October 5th and 6th, 1871. Before Thompson, C. J., Read, Agnew, Sharswood and Williams, JJ.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Allegheny county: No. 62, to October and November Term, 1870.

LAMB et al. v. IRWIN.

1. Unseated land was assessed in Clark's name; the land book showed payment of taxes by Irwin; and also after a tax sale "redeemed by Irwin for Clark's heirs; Irwin afterwards bought the land at a tax sale; and continued to pay taxes in his own name. He denied having any agency for Clark or his heirs, alleging that he had before his purchase redeemed for a creditor of Clark, who had not repaid him. The court charged that the evidence was too slight to constitute an agency in Irwin for Clark. Held to be error—these were facts for the jury.

2. Where a party in redeeming from tax sale claims to have paid all taxes demanded, in order to be relieved as to any not demanded, it must appear that the fault was with the treasurer exclusively. The party must have demanded a search for all sales, and not allowed the treasurer to believe that a particular sale only was asked for.

WISCONSIN.

[Our thanks are due to the Clerk of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, for the following head-notes of decisions in that court.]

STATE v. HILL.

1. A draft, note, or other instrument required by the act of Congress to be stamped, is not void for want of a stamp, but is valid, unless the omission is shown to have been fraudulent. Rheinstrom v. Cone, 26 Wis. 163; Grant v. Conn. Mut. Life Ins. Co., and Timp. v. Dockham 29 Wis., followed.

HARER v. THE CITY OF MILWAUKEE.

1. The statute (R. S., ch. 19, sec. 120; Tay. Stats. 513, § 156) which makes towns liable for damages to person or property caused by the insufficiency or want of repairs of a highway, relates only to damages sustained by a traveller using the highway as such, and not to damages caused to adjoining property by the overflowing of water caused by an obstruction of the highway.

2. In general, a municipal corporation has no more right than a natural person to create and maintain a nuisance, and is liable for injuries occasioned thereby in any case where a private person would be liable under like circumstances.

3. If a city, in causing a sewer to be constructed in a street by its officers or agents, knowingly permits earth, etc., to be placed in the street unnecessarily, or to remain for an unnecessary length of time, so as to obstruct the proper flow of water in the gutters, such obstruction is a public nuisance, and the city is liable to an adjoining owner for injury done to his property by an overflow of water caused by such obstruction.

4. The fact that the sewer was being constructed under a contract will not relieve the city from liability, if the contractor acted as its agent and subject to its control as to the mode of performing the work.

5. If a public work is constructed under an independent contract (lawfully entered into by the city), the municipal authorities having no control of the mode of performing the work, the contractor alone, and not the city, will be liable for such injuries.

6. Where a city contracts for the construction of a work of improvement (as a sidewalk, gutter or sewer), the fact that the expense thereof is chargeable upon the adjoining lots, will not render the contractor an agent of the lot owner's rather than of the city.

7. If such works were not regarded as public works, it seems that the Legislatore could not authorize the municipality to make them.

LUM ET AL. v. HOAG ET AL.

1. One who purchases chattels in good faith, for their full value, and pays for them by discharging the just debts of the true owner, is entitled to hold them as against such owner's other creditors, who have not a prior specific lien, although such purchase may have been made in form, and a bill of sale taken, from some one claiming title other than the true owner.

2. Where the property was brick in a kiln, and the vendee took a bill of sale and took control of the kiln, this was a sufficient delivery and change of possession (as against general creditors), although he delayed removing the brick until certain attachment liens thereon were discharged.

NICHOLS ET AL. v. MITCHELL.

1. An oral agreement by M. to deliver 25,000 bushels of wheat to N., at a specified time and price (no part of the wheat being delivered, or of the price paid), held void by the statute of frauds.

2. If N. subsequently bought the wheat at M.'s request, and upon his implied promise to pay the difference between the contract price and the market price at the time of such purchase, such promise is void for want of a consideration. Hooker v. Knab, 26 Wis. 511.

3. Such purchase cannot be treated as one made for M. by N. as his agent, where it appears that the title was not expected to vest at all in M., but immediately in N.

NOODAN v. MCNAB, IMP.

1. A stipulation in articles of copartnership that neither partner shall, without the other's written consent, sell or assign his interest in the copartnership, or in any property thereof: Held to restrict the jus disponendi only during the continuance of the partnership, and not after its dissolution and the appointment by the court of a receiver of the partnership property.

2. The articles not providing for the continuance of the partnership for any specified time, it must be presumed that the object of the stipulation was to prevent a dissolution by such a sale or assignment by one partner without the other's consent.

3. The fact that an assignment of the interest of one of the former partners was made to a person with whom the firm had been engaged up to that time in a protracted litigation, will not justify a different construction of said stipulation, or an interference by the court to prevent the sale; especially as the stipulation was made long before such litigation commenced.

4. Neither of the former partners can interfere with the receiver in winding up the partnership business; nor can the assignee of one of them do so.

HOLDEN v. MEADOWS. (Denying motion for a rehearing.)

1. A party interested, who, having reasonable grounds for believing that a will was obtained fraudulently, or by undue influence, or when the testator had not testamentary capacity, did not take steps to prevent the probate of the will, nor attempt to have it set aside until after five years: Held guilty of gross laches.

2. The complaint in an action to set aside a will, etc., avers that by reason of the softening of his brain, the testator's "memory and mental faculties had become almost wholly obliterated," and that he had been in that condition for many months before the will was made, and died a few weeks after its execution: Held, that upon these averments the testator cannot be regarded as having had, at the time, testamentary capacity.

IN RE BERGIN.

1. Rowan v. The State, 30 Wis., holding valid ch. 137, Laws of 1871 (which authorizes the commencement of criminal prosecutions by information instead of indictment), is here followed.

2. In re Boyle, 19 Wis. 264, holding that the act of 1859 establishing the Municipal Court of Milwaukee, is a general law, is also followed; and the provisions of ch. 137, Laws of 1871, are held applicable to that court.

3. A "misdemeanor" is a "crime" within the meaning of sect. 2, art. i. of the State constitution, which prohibits involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime.

4. The Legislature may, therefore, authorize a person convicted of an assault to be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor.

5. All boards of county supervisors in this State are authorized to establish houses of correction for the confinement at hard labor of persons convicted of crime, and the court in which such conviction is had, when the term of imprisonment exceeds six days, may sentence the prisoner to be kept at hard labor in such houses. Tay. Stats. 1948, §§ 5, 6.

6. The act authorizing the courts of Milwaukee county to pronounce such sentences is, therefore, not invalid on the ground that it applies to no other county in the State.

7. Whether the act would be invalid if the courts of other counties were not authorized by law to pronounce a similar sentence, is not here decided.

CHAPMAN v. INGRAM ET AL.

1. For a refusal to accept chattels according to agreement, the usual measure of damages is the difference between their contract price and that at which they might have been sold to other parties on the day when the vendee was bound to receive and pay for them.

3. If the vendor carries the goods to another market and sells them, he cannot recover the difference between the contract price and the net proceeds of such sale, after deducting the charges for such carriage.

SUPREME COURT UNITED STATES. NEW PUBLICATION. 14TH WALLACE.

W. H. & O. H. Morrison beg to inform their friends that they expect to publish, sometime in March, 1873, the 14th volume of WALLACE'S REPORTS. The volume will contain a large number of important Cases, including several on Maritime Law, the Law of Collision, the Obligations as to Lights (their color and distinctions) at Sea and on Rivers; the Law of Patents, including the Rule of Damages, the effect of Assignments, and the principles of Law applicable to Patents for design, a subject largely new and of practical and growing importance; decisions on the Bankruptcy Act; how far Bills of Lading may be interpreted by parol; an unusual number of Cases relating to the Jurisdiction of the Court, especially its jurisdiction under the 25th section of the great Judiciary Act of 1789, a matter to which the Court in one of the cases directs the special attention of the Bar, and for want of accurate knowledge about which, many cases, most vexatiously, and in a way often deeply mortifying to counsel, are lost every session.

The undersigned cannot, however, find space to specify the large variety of cases in this volume, many of them of the first importance. From such a judicial body as the Supreme Court of the United States, every adjudication deserves regard.

The effect of the late civil war has undoubtedly been to make that court a tribunal whose decisions it is necessary for every lawyer to be acquainted with. A leading journal of the city of New York has recently attempted to treat the subject popularly, and thus to keep the country informed of the leading cases decided by it. And it notes, as hardly conceivable, the fact, "that while the nation is periodically thrown into agonies about political rights and duties, and as to who shall be President and who members of Congress; nine grave lawyers are sitting in a quiet room of the Capitol, deciding questions of immediate political and practical concern to every person in the land, though too many have, until lately, been unconscious of what the decisions are." This state of things, as it truly says, can no longer exist; for the decisions come so nearly home to the "business and bosoms of men" that, with the present extensive jurisdiction and almost continuous sessions of the Court, they who are the professional judges of the land cannot be ignorant of what is done in that tribunal, without injury to the constant and practical concerns of all conditions of people among us. The tribunal which used to sit three months now sits almost eight; and is constantly delivering judgments upon every class of subjects.

The price of the volume, handsomely bound, with double titles, is $6. Forwarded by mail, free of postage, on receiving that sum.

IN EQUITY.—AT NISI PRIUS.

LONG v. COCHRAN & RUSSELL.

1. All reasons for sustaining a bill in equity, predicated upon a necessity for procuring the defendant's testimony, are now removed; for in a common law action the defendant can be compelled to testify.
2. When there is an adequate remedy at law a bill will not lie.

STATEMENT OF CASE.

Plaintiff alleged in his bill that in 1867, he being the owner of certain coal oil land, agreed with the defendants to form a stock company for the mining of oil. Plaintiff was to convey said land to the company for $200,000, of which $30,000 was to be paid in stock. Defendants were to sell the stock and pay the plaintiff for the land out of the money so received. Plaintiff did convey the land to the company, received the $30,000 worth of stock, and defendants sold the remainder, but did not account for nor pay to plaintiff any of the money arising from said sale. Plaintiff prayed for an account, and for general relief. The defendants demurred, and assigned the four causes stated in the opinion.

Opinion of the court by MERCUR, J. Delivered January 25th, 1873.

The defendants have assigned four causes of demurrer. They are substantially:

1. The plaintiff does not present such a case as entitles him to the relief for which he asks in a court of equity.

2. It is not such a case as entitles him to an account as prayed for.

3. The plaintiff has a full, complete, and adequate remedy in a court of law.

4. All the persons shown to be necessary parties are not made parties thereto.

The bill charges that the plaintiff was the owner of large quantities of land, which were supposed to be favorable for the mining of oil, and being anxious to dispose of the same, met with the defendants, and it was agreed that an oil company should be formed, called the Mercantile Petroleum Company; the capital of which should be $400,000; the plaintiff should convey five certain pieces of land, in the bill described, to said company, for which he should be paid $200,000.

$30,000 thereof, to be paid in stock, and the balance in cash when the same should be realized from the sales of said stock. The defendants were to receive the subscriptions, sell the stock, originate the corporation, and pay over to plaintiff, when received by them from sales of stock, the consideration aforesaid. The defendants were to receive for their services the sum of $10,000. That in pursuance of said agreement the company was duly formed and incorporated, and the plaintiff conveyed said land. That the defendants acting under said agreement, sold all or nearly all the stock of said company, to wit, eighty thousand shares, and received for the same the sum of $5 per share; that the defendants, although justly bound to account for the full consideration stated, out of the moneys coming into their hands as receivers aforesaid for plaintiff, and the other parties conveying the lands, have not paid over to him any money or consideration whatever, save six thousand shares of said stock, which plaintiff accepted for the sum of $30,000. The bill also avers, that "other conveyances of land were made by other parties," and prays that an account may be taken of all stock sold and moneys received by the defendants for and upon account of the parties conveying said lands to said company; that an account be stated showing to what portion of the same the plaintiff is entitled; and that said defendants be decreed to account and pay over to the plaintiff whatever sum may be found in his favor, and for general relief.

This, then, was a single transaction. The plaintiff was to convey certain lands, for which the defendants were to pay him $200,000. $30,000, part thereof in stock, and the residue of $170,000 in cash, when the same should be realized from the sale of stock. The plaintiff conveyed the land. The defendants have sold the stock, for which they have actually received $400,000, but have paid plaintiff $30,000 only. The residue of the $200,000 remains unpaid and in the hands of the defendants.

There is no averment that any portion of these $400,000, which the defendants have received, was realized from the sale of stock based upon the lands conveyed by other parties. It is distinctly charged, that the said eighty thousand shares, from the sale of which said sum was realized, were sold by "the defendants acting under said agreement." There was no other agreement than the one already stated. The case does not require any examination of accounts. There is no prayer for a discovery. It is simply that an account may be taken and stated. Any inquiry in regard to the "other conveyances of land made by other parties" is wholly irrelevant.

Acting under and in pursuance of the agreement with said plaintiff, the defendants have sold the stock, and have received therefor twice as much money as they agreed to pay the plaintiff. The demand is for a specific sum. A sum which they have received for the use of the plaintiff and retain.

What prevents a recovery, therefore, in an action of assumpsit? Will not that give a full, complete and adequate remedy? Under existing laws there is no impediment in the way of compelling the defendants to disclose under oath, in a common law action, all the facts necessary to sustain the complainant's allegations, as fully as they can be compelled in a court of equity. All reasons for sustaining a bill predicated upon a necessity for procuring the defendants' testimony, are now removed. The remedy is full, complete and adequate in a court of law. The third cause of error is sustained. This makes it unnecessary to discuss the other causes assigned.

DANZEISEN v. MILLER et al.

A. conveyed his property to B., the latter agreeing to take the property, raise money for A. through a building association, apply the rents to the repayment of the loan, and to reconvey the property when the building association had expired: Held, the conveyance was a mortgage, and B. could be compelled to account, and to reconvey the property upon being refunded the money advanced. The decree at Nisi Prius, reported in 1 Legal Gazette Reports, 215, reversed.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 27th, 1873.

The transaction between Danzeisen and the elder Miller in this case, was a mortgage. The former conveyed his property to the latter, expressly as a security for money to be obtained to pay his debts. Miller agreed to take the property, raise the money through a certain building association, apply the rents to the repayment of the loan, and to reconvey them when the building association expired. In Harper's Appeal, 14 P. F. Smith, 320, where the difference between a mortgage and a trust is very clearly shown by our brother Sharswood, and that the former is within the act of 2d April, 1856, he says, whenever there is in fact an advance of money to be returned within a specified time, upon the security of an absolute conveyance, the law converts it into a mortgage, whatever may be the understanding of the parties. Here the intent to deliver the deed only as a security for the money to be borrowed on the faith of it, is very clear, and the time for repayment is equally distinct. In such a case, where the purpose of the parties is not to sell, but to make the deed a mere security, it cannot be material that Miller was to procure the money from an association, whose business it was to lend money on real estate security. The fact that the parties, who were Germans, called it a trust, cannot overcome the distinct terms of their agreement, that it was to be a security only. Indeed, their use of the word trust, giving to it an ordinary signification, only confirms the intent not to make an absolute conveyance. It is very evident that the deed was a mortgage, or a trust ex maleficio would arise, for when the deed was delivered, no consideration passed. Miller procured the estate without the payment of any purchase money, and, therefore, stood in no better situation in point of fact, than one in whose name a deed is taken by another who pays the purchase money. In equity, the estate should remain in Danzeisen, who had received nothing but a promise to raise money for his use, unless the promise to raise it be the equivalent of the money when raised. If the promise was not intended to be performed by Miller, the deed was obtained by a deceit, and it was a fraud at the time it was delivered. But if the promise be performed, the true intention of the parties is executed, and the deed should stand as a security for the money. It would have been different had the deed been intended to enable Miller to raise money by a sale, for then Danzeisen would intend to pass an absolute estate, and to trust the promise of Miller to apply the proceeds to his use. A breach of such a promise would not convert Miller into a trustee, and the case in principle would resemble that of Burnet v. Dougherty, 8 Casey, 371. But where no sale is intended, and the conveyance is only to be a security for a loan to be obtained on it, the parting with the title must be by way of mortgage, or the deed is procured by a false pretence. The law, however, will rather treat the deed as a mortgage than to impute a fraud to Miller. In equity, where the estate is conveyed without consideration, and for the special purpose of security for a loan, what difference can it make that the money was not paid on the delivery of the deed? The grantor's intent in its delivery is the same in either event, while any breach of faith in the grantee partakes of a fraud. To say, therefore, that the relation of debtor and creditor did not arise, because no money passed at the time of the delivery, is to stand on a hard technicality, and ignore the true intent and relation of the parties. Miller's intent to raise the money, which was the effective means of procuring the title, must be viewed as the equivalent of the money, where it is raised and applied to Danzeisen's use. Then the purpose of the deed is executed, and then it should stand as a security to reimburse the money borrowed on the faith of it. It is plainly a mortgage, therefore, and equity will so regard it, and compel a reconveyance when the money shall have been refunded. As was said in Thomson v. Hanson, decided in February, 1872; in all the cases the sum of the matter has been to determine by the true nature of the transaction whether the conveyance was an actual sale or a mere security for money. But without further discussion, the case of Sweetser v. Jiffkins, decided last year, is an authority in point, that even a sheriff's sale will be converted into a mortgage, when it is made an instrument to carry out the agreement of the parties to raise money by way of loan, and when the loan is subsequent to the deed. Legal Intelligencer, September 13th, 1872, page 392. At Nisi Prius, this case was treated as a question of trust. The draftsman of the bill evidently looked at it in that light, and in that light the bill was dimissed. But a careful examination of the bill discloses all the facts essential to support it as a bill to redeem a mortgage; and it prays for an account and for a re-conveyance. With these substantial averments and appropriate prayers, and with the ample power of amendment possessed by the court to do equity, and reach the justice of the case, we cannot turn the plaintiff out of court by reason of inappropriate terms used in the bill, indicating a trust instead of a mortgage. Treating the bill as substantially one to redeem a mortgage, we are of the opinion the evidence clearly proves the conveyance by Danzeisen to Miller to be a mere security for money to be borrowed for the use of Danzeisen, and therefore, it was a mortgage in law, and that Henry E. Miller was not a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of the nature of the deed. The decree of the Court of Nisi Prius is therefore reversed; the plaintiff's bill restored; a decree for an account to be taken between the plaintiff and the defendants is ordered, and George M. Dallas, Esq., is appointed a master to take the account and report the same to the court, together with the proper form of a final decree, in accordance with the rules and practice in equity.

NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE v. THOMAS et al.

As between a corporation and its corporators, the stock book is the evidence of the ownership of stock, and an assignee of stock of an expired corporation, who neglects to have the transfer entered on the stock book, or to notify the trustees thereof, cannot complain of their making distribution according to the books.

Opinion by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 27th, 1873.

This bill is to make the officers of an expired corporation, responsible for alleged negligence in the settlement of the affairs of the corporation and the contribution of its assets, on the ground that the complainant is the holder of an outstanding certificate of stock under an assignment, but without a transfer on the books, or notice to the corporation, or to these defendants, that the plaintiff held the stock.

In point of fact notice was not given for nearly three years after the dissolution of the corporation and the settlement of its affairs. As between a corporator and the corporation, the records of the corporation, or its stock book as it is called, is the evidence of their relation. Meetings of the stockholders, elections, and dividends, &c., are regulated by this record. The certificate is but secondary evidence, and is never demanded except when the stockholder deals with the corporation in a contract relation. Such was the case of Building Association v. Sendmeyer, 14 Wright, 67. The assignment of the certificate is only an equitable transfer of the stock, and to be made available, must be produced to the corporation and a transfer demanded. As between adverse claimants of the certificate, the possession of it with the transfer upon it is often the test of the title. But when the corporation itself is not dealing with its stockholder on the security of his stock, and is merely performing a corporate duty, its own record is all it needs to consult, for whoever would demand the privilege of a stockholder, should produce the evidence of his title and ask to be admitted to participate. These defendants acted officially as the trustees of the expired corporation to settle its affairs under the powers conferred by the law, and in doing so made their distribution according to the record of the corporation, which exhibited the membership of its corporators. In doing this without any notice from the plaintiff of his equitable assignment of the stock, clearly they were not guilty of any negligence, while the loss of the plaintiff was attributable to his own negligence, and negligence on their part is the only ground of this bill.

The decree of the Court of Nisi Prius dismissing the bill is affirmed, with costs to be paid by the appellants.

DILLINGER & SON v. MACKEY.

1. One to whom a factor pledges his principal's goods can not retain them, if at the time of the pledge he knew the factor was not the actual owner.
2. Set off does not exist in replevin: but when the goods for which the action is brought are the subject of a charge or lien, it can be enforced by way of recoupment.

Certificate from Nisi Prius.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered January 27th, 1873.

This was an action of replevin for forty barrels of whiskey. Dillinger & Son were distillers in the western part of the State, and consigned the whiskey to Moorhead & Co., of Philadelphia, for sale. Moorhead & Co. pledged the whiskey to Mackey, for the repayment of a loan of $3,700. The instrument of hypothecation embraced other whiskey pledged for the same loan, including ten barrels testified to belong to Moorhead & Co. themselves. On the trial, James R. Moorhead, who transacted the business, testified that he had told Mackey that that orty barrels of whiskey were consigned to them by Dillinger & Son for sale, at a limit of one dollar and ninety cents a gallon. The question of Mackey's knowledge of the ownership of the whiskey by Dillinger & Son was submitted to the jury, with the instruction, that if he did not know of the consignment by Dillinger & Son to Moorhead & Co. for sale, when he took the hypothecation, that the plaintiffs could not recover. The verdict establishes the fact of Mackey's knowledge. This, therefore, raises the principal question in the cause, the defendant claiming the right of a consignee for sale to pledge the goods for a loan to himself, made even with a knowledge that the consignee was not the owner, and had no authority from the owner to hypothecate. In Lanpatt v. Lippincott, 6 S. & R. 386, it was said by Chief Justice Tilghman: "That a factor cannot pledge the goods of his principal for his own debt, seems to be too well settled to admit of dispute." He regretted that this rule, "puts it in the power of the factor, to deceive innocent persons who deal with him bona fide and on valuable consideration"—for he says, "it bears extremely hard upon persons who deal with a factor without a probability of knowing that the goods do not belong to him." The revisers who reported the factor's act, passed on the 14th of April 1834 (Purdon, 453), referred to this case in their report, and to the alteration of the common law rule, by the statute of 6 Geo. IV. ch. 94, passed in the year 1825, which they took as the foundation of the factor's act reported by them. They say also, that "the evil complained of by the board of trade of Philadelphia, and by the mercantile community in general, is that consignees and factors authorized to sell the goods of their principal, and who are held out to the world as the owners thereof, have not power to pledge the goods in their possession for advances made by persons who have every reason to believe that they are the actual owners." They then add, "now we would apply a remedy for this particular evil, but we think that it would not be prudent at present to go further, lest evil should be produced on the other side." In remarking upon the third section, they say, it "is intended to protect all persons who in the ordinary course of business may have paid or advanced money to consignees or factors, authorized to sell goods of their principals, without knowledge that they were not the actual owners of the goods." The phraseology of this section, (the report adds) "is designedly guarded, and we have thought it best to limit the power of factors more than we find it expressed in the statutes of England and New York, which we have alluded to."

We have been referred by the plaintiff in error to the case of Navalshaw v. Brownrigg, 13 Law & Equity Reports, 262, in support of the right of Mr. Mackey to take the goods in pledge for a loan, even with the knowledge of Morhead, & Co. being consignees for sale only. That case, however, is decidedly against him, it being decided on the force and effect of the statute of 5th & 6th Victoria, ch. 39, which has not been adopted in this State. The Lord Chancellor states there, the common law rule and the statutes of 4 Geo. IV., ch. 83, and 6 Geo. IV. ch. 94, and commenting on the statute of 6 Geo. IV., said: "So that the statute enabled the agent, as regarded third persons, to sell or pledge, provided the persons with whom he pledged did not know that he, (the person that pledged) was not the actual and bona fide owner of the property."

With these guides to the interpretation of the factor's act of 1834, it would not be difficult to arrive at its meaning, if the language were more doubtful than it is. But the language is clear. The pith of the act is contained in the first and third sections. But the second section, and the proviso to the third section, expressly except the case of one having notice by the bill of lading document or otherwise, that the persons in whose name the merchandise was shipped or transmitted, or who is the holder, is not the actual owner thereof. The fourth section is equally explicit, for one who accepts a pledge for a pre-existing debt without notice, or one who takes the pledge with notice, shall acquire the same interest only in the merchandise, as the factor himself had at the time of making the pledge. The purpose of the 4th section, says the revisors, was to reserve to the person taking on deposit goods for a precedent debt without notice, or for any debt with notice, of the person being only a factor, all the rights of the factor over the property, as against his principals, which might be supposed to be impaired by the preceding sections. The fifth section is also intended (they say) to prevent the preceding sections from operating injuriously to existing interests. An examination of the several clauses in the 5th section bears out this intent, as is obvious in the clauses themselves, and furnishes at once the answer to the argument of the plaintiff in error, which sought to give an extension to the pledgee's rights by these clauses, instead of the protection they are designed to give to the existing rights of the owner as well as the factor

On the trial of the cause, the defendant Mackey rested his case wholly upon his right to hold the whiskey for his entire claim of $3,700. Neither at the time of the demand of the goods by Dillinger, nor on the trial, did he set up any claim for freight or storage. He did not even claim for the advances made by Moorhead & Co.; but the jury were instructed by the judge, that if they found Mackey had notice of the ownership of the whiskey, they should still allow the defendant for the advances made by Moorhead & Co. to Dillinger & Co. on the whiskey, or whatever balance was unpaid; by way of recoupment from the damages. It was insisted in the argument, that although no claim was made for freight or storage, and no attention called to them, the judge erred; because the language of his charge would in effect restrict Mackey's claim to advances of Moorhead & Co, and the sum of $117.36, contained in Mackey's account of sales, as charges for freight, ought to have been allowed. But evidently, the language was not intended to lay restrictions on the extent of the recoupment. The whole subject of the charge was upon the right of Mackey to hold the whiskey in pledge for the repayment of the loan of $3,700, and when it was said the defendant in that case having no right to demand these conditions, can now be permitted only to recoup the advance of Moorhead & Co., from the damages, it is clear this was by way of contrast of these two aspects of the case, and not to limit the rights of Mackey to any claim he could legally set up by way of recoupment. It was his own fault, therefore, if he did not claim the freight. But in fact, as the evidence stood, he had no such claim on this whiskey. The hypothecation shows that Mackey had taken three lots of whiskey, in pledge of which the testimony proves that ten barrels were the property of Moorhead & Co. The account of sales shows that the gross proceeds of the three lots amounted to $5,333.21; and gross set-off, $538.65. Of this, the $117.36, was the freight on the whole. Thus, by his own showing, the freight was paid by the charge in the accounts. While the ten barrels of Moorhead's whiskey, were ample to pay all expenses, no attempt was made to prove how much, if any, of this charge for freight, applied to the forty barrels of Dillinger & Son's whiskey. And besides this, Mackey's knowledge of Dilinger & Son's ownership of the whiskey, being found by the verdict, how can a charge for expenses incurred by Mackey in the transfer and storage of the whiskey as a pledge, in violation of Moorhead & Co.'s authority, stand on a higher ground than the loan itself? Viewed in any aspect, therefore, the charge in this respect did the plaintiff in error no harm.

The only question remaining which we need notice, relates to the tender said to be necessary. Mackey refused to deliver the whiskey unless Dillinger & Son paid him the loan of $3,700, and put the Craycroft & Co. order out of the way. In charging that this refusal, and insisting on terms not binding on the plaintiffs, would be a waiver of a tender of the advances made by Moorhead & Co., clearly the judge did not mean to say that it was a waiver of Mackey's right to these advances, but only of a tender, as an act precedent to a suit. The instruction following immediately, to allow Mackey the advances by way of recoupment, proves this. The instruction was according to the general doctrine of tender, that when a party declines to accept payment or performance, except in a particular way, to which he is not entitled, he cannot insist that the action is prematurely brought. Mackey would deliver the whiskey only on his own terms, and these terms the verdict shows he was not entitled to demand. This necessarily left his rights to be determined by the suit. Set-off does not exist in replevin, but when the goods are the subject of a lien or charge, the charge upon them can be enforced by way of recoupment; for the charge is inseparable from the thing itself, and therefore when the value of the thing is to be allowed in damages, the charge necessarily reduces the damages by way of a recoupment, in order to do justice to both parties. As to the order to Craycroft & Co, there was no evidence given to show that it had fastened upon the whiskey, by such a bona fide sale or pledge as would attach to the property, and enable Mackey to use the title of Craycroft & Co., to defend his possession. We discover no error, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

UNITED STATES COURTS.

THE U. S. CIRCUIT COURT, S. D. of New York, decided December 31st, 872, in the case of Freidman v. Sigel, that

Under the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of The Collector v. Day, the salary of a judge of a court of record of a State is exempt from the income tax imposed by the United States. The question whether such salary is payable out of the State treasury under a State law, or out of the city treasury, under the authority of a board of supervisors, is an immaterial one; the manner in which a State chooses to determine the salaries of its judicial officers, neither changing the character of the tribunals over which they preside, nor the relation of these officers to the State, or to the Federal Government. 17 *Int. SUPREME COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE—BARNEY v. LEEDS.

The family homestead is the residence or dwelling-place of a family.

A widower, having a minor child residing with him and supported by him, at his own dwelling-place, is the "head of a family," within the meaning of the homestead act of 1851. (Laws, ch. 1089.)

As such "head of a family," he is secured by the law of 1851, in the possession, enjoyment of, and title to a homestead right to the extent of $500 in value, exempt from attachment and levy or sale on execution.

This right thus acquired is not lost or destroyed by the arrival of his only child at years of majority, and the removal of the child from the homestead, the father still continuing to occupy the premises as his own dwelling-place and home.

A debtor's right of homestead is not lost or waived by the debtor's neglect to make application to an officer levying an execution upon his lands, to have such homestead set off to him, as provided by section 3 of the homestead act [of 1851].

An execution may properly be extended upon real estate in which a right of homestead exists, subject to such right of the debtor, in case the debtor (or his wife, if the debtor has a family) does not make application to the officer executing the writ to have a homestead set off to him in severalty.

A creditor, causing the real estate of his debtor to be set off on execution, subject to a family homestead, is estopped to deny the validity of the debtor's then existing homestead right.

The right of homestead, before the same has been set-off and assigned, is not such as estate or interest in the land wherein it exists as will bar a writ of entry therefor by a creditor who has levied an execution thereon. subject to the debtor's homestead right.

Where a creditor causes the estate of his debtor, of greater value than the homestead right of the latter therein, to be set off on execution, subject to such homestead right, the creditor and the debtor, after the levy of the creditor's execution, and before any proceedings by either for a separation and assignment of their respective interests, are tenants in common of the estate.

A creditor levied an execution on the estate of his debtor. and caused the same to be set off to him in part satisfaction of his execution, subject to a family homestead. He subsequently brought a writ of entry to recover the premises thus set off. and had judgment thereon for a writ of possession, subject to the defendant's homestead of $500. Upon petition by the creditor for partition—held, that the committee appointed to make such partition should assign to the debtor, by metes and bounds, so much of the estate as they might find to have been of the value of $500 on the date of the completion of the levy thereon, not at the time when partition is made.

GOLDER V. LITTLEJOHN.

1. In construing a will effect is to be given to the intent of the testator, if that be not contrary to law.

2. A testator devised and bequeathed all his property, real, personal and mixed. with the rents, issues and profits thereof, to his wife during her life, to be used and enjoyed by her. and directed that after her decease said property should be "sold and converted into money," and the proceeds paid to certain other legatees. Held, that this gave the widow a life estate in the property, with remainder to the executors in trust to sell the same after the widow's decease, and pay over the proceeds as directed.

3. In case of a bequest of the whole personal estate (or the residue after payment of debts, &c.) to one person for life, with remainder to others, the general rule is, that the whole property must be converted into money, and invested in permanent securities, and the income only paid to the legatee for life.

4. But if it can be gathered from the will that the testator intended the legatee for life to enjoy any part of the property in its then condition, the bequest is so far specific, although such property is not particularly designated in the will.

5. In this case the direction to sell the property after the death of the widow, shows an intent that she shall possess and enjoy for life, in specie, all that part of the property capable of being so possessed and enjoyed and then sold; i. e., of personal chattels as distinguished from choses in action.

6. Such personal chattels being transferred to or left in the possession of the widow, the executor will not be liable for them during her lifetime.

7. If the widow dies possessed of such personal chattels, the executor must resume possession, and sell them for the benefit of the other legatees.

8. If the widow sells or destroys such personal chattels in her lifetime, the remedy of the other legatees is against her personal representative, and not against the executor of her deceased husband.

9. Where the widow, in such a case, is one of the executors, the possession of the personal chattels by her co-executor is her possession; and such possession, by operation of law, immediately vests in her as legatee—that of the executors, as such, being divested.

10. A subsequent sale of such chattels by the co executor for the widow's benefit must be treated as made by him as her agent, and not as executor. No recovery, therefore, can be had on his bond for the value of such chattels.

11. It is proper for the executor to take from the legatee for life a receipt for the personal chattels specifically bequeathed; but it seems that a failure to do so is not a breach of his bond; especially where such legatee is also co-executor.

12. The choses in action belonging to the estate are held not to have been bequeathed by the will above described.

13. It was therefore the duty of the executors to collect the notes and other contracts to pay money, as they became due, and to sell the railroad stock belonging to the estate; to invest the proceeds in permanent securities, and to pay over the interest accruing therefrom, to the legatee for life; and, after her death, it was the duty of the surviving executor to sell such securities, and distribute the proceeds to the other legatees.

14. If the executors, in good faith, sold the railroad stock for its then market value, they are chargeable only with such value, and not for the highest amount which it would have brought at some subsequent period during their administration.

15. In stating the executor's account, he should be allowed a reasonable sum for the support of the widow before probate of the will.

16. After accepting the provisions of the will, in her behalf, and entering upon their enjoyment, the widow could have no further provision for her support out of the estate.

TESTIMONY OF ACCUSED PERSONS

We had occasion during the session of the Legislature of last year, to notice the passage of the Dechert Act of 1872, permitting persons accused of crimes or offences "not above the grade of misdemeanor," to testify in their own defence if they so desired, and we commended, in the highest terms the advance which that act made towards a more rational administration of justice. We also regretted at the time, that it did not go far enough, and include crimes above the grade of misdemeanors, within its provisions. We are glad to perceive that Senator Edwin Allbright, of Lehigh county, has recently introduced into the State Senate, a bill extending the provisions of the Dechert Act to the trial "of all indictments, complaints and proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes or offences," which bill if passed will accomplish a still greater revolution in our criminal court procedure. In the multitude of bills introduced from time to time in the Legislature, it is pleasant to meet one of such general interest to the bar and to the public generally. There is so much injustice done to accused persons, by not permitting them to volunteer their own testimony in defence of themselves, that it seems to us that nothing but a blind and conservative spirit of reverence for the old law, could prevent such injustice from being done away with. The administration of justice will be much purer, much more suitable to the genius of free institutions, when all the old absurd fictions, obsolete technicalities, and intricate machinery, with which even to the present day it is encumbered, shall be abolished, and a more simple, method of procedure in both pleadings and practice, and a more enlightened system of applying legal principles to actual facts, shall be established in lieu thereof. We regard Mr. Allbright's proposed bill as another important step in the right direction, and shall regard with pleasure its passage.

For the information of our readers, we add the full text of the bill, which is as follows:

"An act to extend the competency of persons to be witnesses in criminal proceedings.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted &c., That on the trial of all indictments, complaints and other proceedings against persons charged with the commission of crimes or offences, in any court of record, the person so charged shall, at his own request, but not otherwise, be deemed a competent witness; but his neglect or refusal to testify shall not create any presumption against him, nor shall any reference be made to, nor shall any comment be made upon, such neglect or refusal by the court or counsel in the case during the trial thereof."

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

Thus far the Convention has adopted two sections of a new constitution, viz.:

ART. —. SUFFRAGE AND ELECTIONS.

SECT. —. The general election shall be held on the Tuesday next following the first Monday of November; but the Legislature may by law fix a different day, two-thirds of each house consenting thereto.

SECT. —. All elections for city, ward, borough and township officers, for regular terms of service, shall be held on the third Tuesday of February.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

We have reserved a portion of our space for articles upon the Constitutional Convention, and the subjects which will probably come before that body for consideration. All communications intended for publication in this department, should be addressed to the Editor of the Legal Gazette, and must in all cases be accompanied by the name and address of the writer. Correspondents will please state under what names they wish their communications to appear.

LETTERS OF PERICLES.

VII.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GAZETTE:

In my last letter I gave the outlines of an article of the proposed constitution on the Legislature. In the present letter I shall proceed with the separate sections of that article.

ART. III.—OF THE LEGISLATURE.

SECT. 1: The legislative power of this commonwealth shall be vested in a General Assembly, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

This is the existing section upon the subject.

SECT. 2. The Senate shall be composed of forty-five, and the House of Representatives of two hundred and twenty-five members.

The report of the Committee on the Legislature of the Constitutional Convention, now in session, retains the present number of members, viz.: thirty-three in the Senate and one hundred in the House; and the chairman of that committee, Mr. Wayne Mac Veagh, announced in a speech in the convention last week, that he thought that fifteen in the Senate and forty-five in the House would answer the purpose of legislation better than a larger number. Now, in my estimation, the numbers in both houses should be increased, especially in the lower house. Where the numbers are small, there is too much danger of legislative corruption, especially where the immense interests in this great State can raise enormous amounts of money to purchase legislation. In the State of Delaware there are nine members in the Senate and twenty-one in the House, and we all know how notorious is the fact that the Legislature is practically owned by two families of the State, who alternate in sending their members to the United States Senate. In Kansas, South Carolina, Louisiana, Pennsylvania, and many other States, possessing small Legislatures, flagrant instances of legislative corruption are known to exist. The Caldwell investigation now going on at Washington, would probably never have occurred, or at least would have before this detected the guilt, if the Legislature of Kansas had had two or three hundred members. Now, I think it especially important that the lower house of a legislative body should be numerous, springing at short intervals from the people, representing, as far as possible, every nook and corner of the State or county for which it legislates. This is genuine democracy, the reverse of the aristocratic government of the few, which the Committee on the Legislature proposes to us in their advocacy of biennial elections, biennial sessions, and a small number of members of the Legislature. In no State in the Union, except New York, is the ratio of representation so enormous as in Pennsylvania. The following tables, for which I am indebted to J. Alexander Simpson, Esq., a member of the Convention, show the ratio of population to the number of senators and representatives in the various States:

* One for each county. † One for each city and county.

‡ First numbers under constitution.

‡ One member for one hundred and fifty registered voters, and one for every three hundred additional.

‖ Each town of eighty taxable inhabitants two members, all other towns, one.

From these tables it will be seen that the ratio of population to the number of senators varies from thirty-five thousand two hundred and eighteen in Pennsylvania, and thirty-four thousand two hundred and forty in New York, down to two thousand two hundred and thirty-nine in Connecticut, one thousand one hundred and eighty in Nevada, and a still smaller ratio in Rhode Island and New Hampshire. To the number of senators from one hundred and thirty-six thousand nine hundred and sixty-one in New York, and one hundred and six thousand seven hundred and twenty-one in Pennsylvania to seven thousand eight hundred and twenty-three in Florida, and two thousand three hundred and sixty in Nevada. Two hundred and twenty-five representatives in Pennsylvania, would give one to every fifteen thousand six hundred and seventy-five population, and forty-five senators would give one to every seventy-eight thousand three hundred and seventy-five population, which would be a juster representation of the people than at present, while at the same time the other extreme of unwieldy and turbulent bodies would be avoided.

SECT. 3. No person shall be a senator who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, nor a representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-one years.

These are the ages prescribed in the existing constitution. Members of the lower house must be at least twenty-two years of age in South Carolina; twenty-four years in Delaware, Kentucky, and Missouri, and twenty-one years in all the other States. Senators must be at least twenty-seven years of age in Delaware and Alabama; thirty years in Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Tennessee, Vermont, and Kentucky; twenty-five years in Arkansas, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Maine, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, and Texas. In most of the other States it is twenty-one years.

SECT. 4. No person shall be a senator or representative who shall not have been a citizen and inhabitant of the State for two years, and an inhabitant of the district in which he shall be chosen for one year next preceding his election, unless he shall have been absent on the public business of the United States or of this State; and if a senator or representative shall during his term of office remove from the district in which he was chosen, his seat shall be thereby vacated.

The present limitations as to residence are, for a representative three years in the State and one year in the district, and for a senator, four years in the State and one year in the district. I think the time could be shortened to two years for both senators and representatives, without injury. Alabama, Georgia, Indiana, and North Carolina, require two years' residence of a senator in the State; Iowa, Ohio, Oregon, Wisconsin, and several other States one year; Illinois, Massachusetts, Kentucky, New Hampshire, and others require five years and upwards. For a representative one and two years' residence in the State are required by a majority of States.

SECT. 5. No member of Congress, no officer, director, or salaried agent or attorney of any railroad, canal, mining, manufacturing, or banking corporation; and no person holding any office (except of attorney at law, and in the militia) under the United States, this State, or any foreign government, shall be a member of either house of the Legislature during his continuance in such station or office.

The existing provision is as follows (art. 1, sec. 19): "And no member of Congress, or other person, holding any office (except of attorney at law and in the militia) under the United States or this commonwealth, shall be a member of either house during his continuance in Congress or in office."

Nearly every State constitution contains sections similar to this, except that officers of corporations are not prohibited from becoming members of the Legisla-

607 AND 609 SANSOM STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

PHILADELPHIA FRIDAY, JANUARY 31, 1873.

SHERIFF'S SALE.

Abstract of Properties to be sold by WM. R. LEEDS, ESQ., Sheriff.

On Monday, Febuary 3, 1873,

At the New County Court House,

Sixth street below Chestnut street, at 4 o'clock, P. M.

CONDITIONS OF SALE.

Fifty dollars of the price or sum at which the property shall be struck off, must be paid to the Sheriff at the time of sale, unless the purchase-money be less than that sum, in which case only the purchase-money is to be paid. Otherwise the property will again be immediately put up and sold. The balance of the purchase-money must be paid to the Sheriff, at his office, within TEN DAYS from the time of sale, without any demand being made by the Sheriff therefor. Otherwise the property may be sold again at the expense and risk of the person to whom it is struck off, who, in case of any deficiency at such resale, shall make good the same.

EXPLANATION.

For the benefit of our unprofessional readers, who do not understand the meaning of the letters and figures following the defendant's names, we make the following explanation:

D. C., District Court; C. P., Court of Common Pleas; S. C., Supreme Court—indicate the Courts out of which the writ of execution issues under which the sale is made; V. E. or Ven. Ex., Venditioni Exponas; Lev. Fac. or L. F., Levari Facias—show the kind of writ—a Levari Facias is the writ of sale upon a Mortgage or Mechanic's Lien; a Venditioni, upon an ordinary Debt, or for Ground rent; 223, J. 69, means No. 223, June Term, 1869, the number and term of the docket entry; the following figures show the amount of debt, and the name following is that of the attorney issuing the writ.

The arrangement of the sale being made according to alphabetical sequence of the counsels' names; commencing at A one month, and at Z the other, and so alternately, this is done in order that each counsel's writs may come together.

ture. The new constitution of West Virginia (1872) takes the initiative in declaring, art. 6, section 13, inter alia, that "no person who is a salaried officer of any railroad company" shall be eligible to a seat in the Legislature. Pennsylvania, which above all other States, is subjected to the power of the mammoth railroad corporations existing within her limits, should follow the example of West Virginia, and put a stop to one dangerous species of legislative corruption—the holding of seats by those who are the paid officers or agents of large corporations.

Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland and Tennessee, do not permit clergymen to become members.

SECT. 6. No person who shall be convicted of bribery, perjury, or other infamous crime, nor any person who is or may be a collector or holder of public moneys, who shall not have accounted for and paid over according to law, all such moneys due from him, shall be eligible to a seat in the Legislature, or to any office of honor, trust or profit in this State.

Disqualifications for office on account of infamous crimes, are common to nearly all the State constitutions, some of them including but a few, others a great many such disqualifications. The provision about defaulters with public moneys, is substantially the same as found in the constitutions of Illinois, Georgia, Alabama, Indiana, Oregon, Iowa, Ohio, Mississippi, Missouri, Texas and other States.

SECT. 7. Senators shall be elected for the term of three years, and representatives for the term of one year. Their term of office shall begin on the first day of December succeeding their election. When vacancies occur in either house, the governor shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

I have retained in this section the present length of terms of members of the Legislature. The Convention Committee on the Legislature have reported in favor of terms of four years for senators, and two years for representatives. I much prefer the present plan. Especially is it important to have short terms for members of the lower house, in order that the people can frequently call their representatives to account. As "all power is inherent in the people," so should their representatives spring from and return as often as possible from them. I am one of those who have great confidence in the people, and unbounded faith in republican institutions, and, therefore, believe that an assembly is popular so far as it represents the latest wishes of the people. Although the people of this State are suffering under great evils and bad representatives, yet the very fact that a "reform" convention is in session shows that they are resolved to have a better state of affairs.

The terms of senators are three years in New Jersey and Pennsylvania; four years in Alabama, Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, and Nevada, Oregon, South Carolina, Virginia, and West Virginia (but as most of these States have biennial sessions of the Legislature, the term is in effect but two years); six years in Texas; two years in Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Tennessee, Vermont, and Wisconsin; one year in Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. The terms of representatives are, one year in Connecticut, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin; and two years in the other States.

As regards the time when the term of office begins, I have fixed it at the 1st of December, in accordance with the action of the Convention in that respect, as the general election is about the middle of November, the interval of time between the two dates is not very long. Some of the States make the terms begin the day after or upon the very day of the election, so as to prevent any possibility of a governor convening the old Legislature after the election of the new. The interval should be as short as is consistent with the proper ascertainment of who are elected members.

The provision about vacancies is that contained in the present constitution (art. 1, sec. 20), except that the issuing of the writs of election is transferred from the Speaker of the respective houses to the governor. This is to prevent the delays and troubles arising from the present method. In nearly all the States the governor performs this duty, and not the Speakers.

SECT. 8. An election for members of the General Assembly shall be held on the day fixed for the general election next succeeding the adoption of this constitution, and annually thereafter. The General Assembly shall meet at twelve o'clock noon, on the first Tuesday of January in every year, unless sooner convened by the governor; and its regular session shall not continue longer than the 22d of February following, without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members elected to each house.

The time of meeting here fixed is the present one, art. 1, sec. 10, Const. Pa.—except that the time of the day is also fixed, in order to prevent confusion or illegal gatherings. Annual sessions are retained, as I think the interests of this State require them.

The States having annual sessions are 18, viz.: Alabama, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Massachusetts, Minnesota, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Texas, Virginia, and Wisconsin. Those having biennial sessions are 18, viz.: Arkansas, California, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Maryland, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, Ohio, Oregon, Tennessee, Vermont, and West Virginia. Rhode Island has semi-annual sessions.

I have placed February 22d as the limit of the regular session, as the restrictions to be placed on the Legislature as to local or special legislation, will obviate the necessity of long sessions. In many of the States it has been found necessary to limit the sessions. In California and New York they are limited to one hundred days; in Maryland and Virginia, to ninety days; in Indiana, to sixty-one days; in Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, and Nevada, to sixty days; in Kansas, to fifty days; in West Virginia, to forty-five days; in Nebraska, to forty days, and in Alabama, to thirty days. With annual elections, annual sessions, short terms and sessions, better methods of selection and election of members and the curtailment of the powers of special legislation, Pennsylvania ought to be a well governed State.

SECT. 9. In the year 1873, and in every tenth year thereafter, the total population of the State, as ascertained by the last preceding Federal census, shall be divided by seventy-five and the quotient obtained, rejecting the fraction remaining, shall be the ratio of population to a district. The State shall then be divided into seventy-five legislative districts, of compact and contiguous territory, each district containing a population equal to said ratio, or at least four-fifths of it, and not more than said ratio and one-fifth thereof, and all of said districts shall be of nearly equal population as possible. Counties containing a population greater than said ratio, shall be divided into as many districts, as they contain the requisite population. Districts shall be bounded as far as possible by county, township, or ward lines, and no ward or township shall be divided in the formation of a district. Counties containing a population less than four-fifths of said ratio shall not be so divided.

SECT. 10. Three representatives shall be elected in each legislative district, and in voting for the same, each qualified elector may cast as many votes for one candidate as there are representatives to be elected, or may distribute the same or equal parts thereof among the candidates, as he shall see fit, and the three candidates highest in votes shall be declared elected.

SECT. 11. At the same time that the State is apportioned into legislative districts, the Legislature shall apportion it into fifteen senatorial districts, by combining five legislative districts into one senatorial district of compact and contiguous territory.

SECT. 12. Three senators shall be elected in each senatorial district, and in voting for the same, each qualified elector may cast as many votes for one candidate as there are representatives to be elected, or may distribute the same or equal parts thereof among the candidates as he shall see fit, and the three candidates highest in votes shall be declared elected.

I will make some notes upon the last four sections (9–12) in my next letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LEGAL GAZETTE:

II.

Another pretext for elusion occurs in art. vii., sect. 1, which contains the words: "As soon as conveniently may be."

The whole section reads as follows: The Legislature shall, as soon as conveniently may be, provide by law for the establishment of schools throughout the State, in such manner that the poor may be taught gratis.

Republican institutions, as established in America (and which Hon. Judge Sharswood in his notes to Blackstone fitly termed representative democracies), can only be perpetuated by giving to all citizens such a mental development, that they may be able to judge for themselves. The constitution, art. ix., sect. 1, guarantees to all men the enjoyment of life and pursuance of their own (sic!) happiness. The commonwealth therefore owes to every man the enjoyment of life, and such a co-equal position with all the others, that his happiness may not be marred. The guaranty of enjoyment of life, clearly means that the Legislature and the State executive should keep the avenues of success open and unobstructed, so that every man may have a fair and equitable chance to work out his felicity. The guaranty of happiness can only mean such an education for every child, that it can, when grown up, fully display its God-given talents, and find its proper level.

The necessity of universal education in our republics being admitted (and our best thinkers deny to any State the right to punish, when it failed to educate), it is difficult to see why former conventions introduced to the very clause, which enjoins an active duty, a pretext for its elusion. Without the words above referred to, the Legislature will find obstacles enough to the introduction of a constitutionally ordained school law, and its introduction is at best of slow progress. With the words, the obstacles may be made a convenient plea of inconveniency.

Happily for us, the Legislature gave us a school law. But the same is insufficient, and will be regarded as such, until every child in this commonwealth grows up under proper tuition. By striking out the objectionable words, the Legislature must try and make it convenient to introduce laws for general education, and this is in better keeping with the intent of the clause referred to. T.

A meeting of the bar of Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, was held on January 6th, in the court room at Wilkesbarre, to take action upon the death of Volney L. Maxwell, one of its members. Hon. Garrick M. Harding was called to the chair, and Alexander Farnham, Esq., was appointed secretary. Addresses eulogistic of the decedent, were made by Messrs. Ricketts, H. W. Palmer, Brundage and Wright, and a committee consisting of the last named gentleman and Hon. E. L. Dana and A. T. McClintock, Esq., was appointed to draft appropriate resolutions. The Luzerne Legal Register, commenting on Mr. Maxwell's death, gives the following interesting item of legal information.

"The death of V. L. Maxwell, Esq., leaves another blank in the brilliant constellation which once adorned the bar of Luzerne county. In history, the State of Pennsylvania could point with honorable pride to a long list of distinguished men. But what county in the State could show a better array than Luzerne? There were none in the United States could excel in legal knowledge or forensic eloquence, such men as John N. Conyngham and Chester Butler. Then there was the young and gifted Henry M. Fuller, who was distinguished on the floor of Congress, and who passed away before he was fairly in his prime. There were Judge Scott and B A. Bidlack, minister to Bogota, with Dr. Leib, Judge Ross and H. B. and Harrison Wright, G. W. Woodward, and others whose names are as familiar as household words. Col. Wright, A. T. McClintock, Esq., and Judge Woodward, are now almost the only survivors of all that once noted and brilliant circle."

ESTATE OF JOHN H. SYFERT.

1. A disagreement between trustees that does not endanger the trust estate, is not sufficient ground for dismissing them.
2. Neither will the court dismiss a trustee because he deposits small amounts of the trust fund with his private account, when it appears it was done merely for convenience until an amount large enough to make a deposit had accumulated.
3. The books and accounts of a trustee should, upon a reasonable demand by one interested in the trust, be submitted for inspection.

Exceptions to report of the Examiner.

Opinion by LUDLOW, J. Delivered January 25th, 1873.

We have carefully consid red the elaborate report of the examiner, the exceptions filed to it, the evidence, and the authorities cited by the parties interested, and we fail to discover any reason why we should sustain the exceptions.

Upon four points especially have we paused and deliberated, because if either of them had been in fact sustained, we might have been obliged to discharge the trustee.

These points may be briefly stated as follows, viz. :

The disagreement of the trustees, the mixing of the trust funds and accounts of the trustee, the giving of checks without funds in bank to pay them, and the refusal to exhibit the books and accounts of the estate.

Upon the first point we are quite certain that unfortunate difficulties exist, but it does not appear to us that this trustee is any more to blame than his co-trustee; the same argument which would oblige us to remove the one would compel us also to discharge the other.

The true rule of law doubtless is, as is proved by an examination of the authorities cited by the examiner, that a disagreement between trustees, which does not endanger the safety of the estate, will not require us to inflict summary punishment. In this instance, the testator had himself selected the respondent, he knew his peculiarities, and it is very possible that because of these he made the selection; no satisfactory proof has been submitted to establish the fact that the trustee is a negligent or dishonest man, and as far as we can judge, on the whole, the trust estate has been properly managed. A division of labor between the trustees seems to have been settled upon, and it will not do to lend a too ready ear to these complaints, when the chief trouble seems to arise from peculiarities of temper for which both parties are to blame.

If this trustee had, to any considerable amount, and without reasonable cause, mixed up his private funds and accounts with those of the trust estate, he might be removed; but the fact is, that while small sums have occasionally been mixed with his own, the reason assigned surely excuses him, for these sums were small, and for convenience he deposited them with his own money, until a large enough amount had accumulated to make a deposit. While we say this, we are not to be understood as sanctioning a departure from the well established rule. As a matter of convenience this course was pursued in this case; it would hardly justify a discharge of the trustee now; it might, however, turn the scale against him had other facts been established throwing doubt upon his integrity or capacity, and it is always attended with peril to the trustee.

The giving of a check without funds provided for payment of it, is another grave cause of complaint, and if the charge had been established, would cause the dismissal of the trustee.

The evidence does not sufficiently support the charge, for the burden was upon the petitioner to establish it.

Checks were given and not at once paid; at the time, however, for some cause, no complaints were made, and a number of accounts have been settled and confirmed; the petitioner failed to specify the dates or amounts of these checks. If any difficulty arose before the settlement of the accounts, it ought to have appeared in proof at the time, or before the accounts were settled. If it occurred since that time, proof of a specific nature should have been made of time and amount, so that the respondent could defend himself.

On the whole testimony we refuse to sustain this point for want of satisfactory evidence.

The fourth material point in this case involves the non-production of books and accounts. The course pursued by this trustee does not satisfy us, but is not a sufficient cause for a discharge. The trustee evidently labored under the idea that he was not bound to produce his books and accounts, but only to file an account. There was error in this view, for the law is, not that a trustee is bound to submit to a vexatious and unwarrantable call for books and papers, but that at all reasonable times, in proper places, the books and accounts should, on call, be submitted to those who have a right to the inspection of them. The trustee here, always, it seems to us, was ready to file an account; he never, so far as we can determine, refused to do so, and this fact saves his case now, but hereafter, and subject to the principles above stated, he must give to his co-trustee and the parties interested, ample opportunity to look into the condition of the estate.

We do not care to notice in detail the other points in this case, because, taken together, and in view of all the evidence, we do not think we would be justified in sustaining the exceptions and granting the prayer of the petition.

One word before we conclude an opinion already sufficiently extended.

The difficulty in this case, we conceive, does not arise from any want of honesty or capacity, but from peculiarities of character upon one side, and a rather suspicious and hasty temper upon the other.

Would it not be well to attempt to modify the one, and control the other?

The interests of the estate demand a careful consideration of this question, for the time may arrive when by the substitution of other trustees we may be obliged to introduce into the management of the estate those whose characters and tempers will not be the subject of judicial criticism.

Exceptions dismissed and prayer of petition refused.

BRINCKLE v. BRINCKLE.

A libel in divorce must allege with certainty a marriage actually consummated.

Demurrer.

Opinion by LUDLOW, J. Delivered January 25th, 1873.

Leave was granted to the libellant in this case, to amend her libel, by setting forth in explicit terms, that a marriage had been contracted and celebrated between the respondent and herself.

The attempt has now been made to comply with the order of the court, but the majority of this tribunal do not think that the order made has been complied with.

It is true, the libellant declares, that in the month of January, 1857, she became the lawful wife of J. Gordon Brinckle, but she goes on to say, that "a contract of marriage was made between your libellant and the said J. Gordon Brinckle, whereby your libellant agreed to become then and there his lawful wife, and the said J. Gordon Brinckle agreed to become then and there her lawful husband."

Was this contract executed or executory merely? If only executory, then the contract is simply an agreement to marry, and not a marriage. The language used in this amended libel clearly raises a doubt upon the point named, for while one construction might possibly indicate the existence of an executed contract, the other as clearly implies a mere promise, and this idea is strengthened by the fact, that no precise time is specified, but only the month of January.

Our difficulty is to understand why the usual form is not adopted in this case. If the facts to be proved by libellant, and which must be presumed to be within the knowledge of libellant and her counsel, will establish a marriage, according to the law of Pennsylvania, why cannot the libellant conscientiously declare that she was married? Why embarrass the case by allegations which throw doubt upon the question, or at least, qualify the main proposition sought to be established?

Judge Peirce thinks this amendment is within the order of the court, but the other judges do not agree with him, and believe that no useful purpose will be accomplished by permitting a departure from our usual form, especially when it is easy to understand how a door would be open to suits for divorce, in which nothing could be established but the existence of an executory agreement.

Demurrer sustained, with leave to amend.

From July 2, 1869, To January 5, 1872, inclusive.

BY JOHN H. CAMPBELL.

VOL. 1. JUST ISSUED.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Chief Justice, Supreme Court, Pa.

"I have examined the Legal Gazette Reports which you did me the favor to send me, with great satisfaction It is well gotten up, and neatly printed and bound. The variety of matter contained in it, emanating indiscriminately from courts in every portion of the State, renders the volume useful in every section to both lawyers and judges, and to them I cheerfully commend it." March 1st, 1872.

From HON. WM. S. PEIRCE,
Court of Com. Pleas, and Orphans' Court, Phila.

"It is presented to the public in good style, and so far as I have had opportunity to examine my own decisions, they are accurately reported, and the syllabi are concise and correct, and I am sure from the known ability of the Reporter, that they are so with respect to the other decisions."
Philada, March 1st, 1872.

From HON. JAMES LYND,
District Court, Phila.

"I have received and examined with interest and pleasure the first volume of Legal Gazette Reports. It contains much valuable matter, carefully edited and handsomely published. As multitudinous as the decisions of the Supreme Court seem to be, the number of quite important points that never reach that tribunal is very large; and the early publication, therefore, of cases disposed of in the courts of first resort is greatly to be commended. Permit me to express a hope that the Legal Gazette Reports will prove as profitable to the publishers as it will be serviceable to the bar and judiciary of our State." Philada, March 2d, 1872.

From HON. JOSEPH ALLISON,
President Judge 1st Judicial District, Pa

"The work is in all respects most creditable to its Editor and Publishers, not only as to its external merit, but as a valuable addition to the reports of decided cases. The work affords abundant evidence of great care in its preparation, and is every way worthy of a favorable reception by the legal profession." Philadelphia, Feb. 23d, 1872

From HON. THOS. K. FINLETTER,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts, Phila.

"I have examined volume one, Legal Gazette Reports, and am much pleased with the execution of the work. Many of the cases contained therein are familiar to me, as being argued and determined in the courts in which I sit, and I can testify to the fidelity and accuracy with which they are reported. I think that the volume will be a valuable addition to the Pennsylvania Reports." Philadelphia, March 21st, 1872

From HON. JAMES R. LUDLOW,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts, Phila.

"Every valuable contribution to our legal literature ought to be a gratification to the profession, for additional knowledge is thereby contributed to the common stock, and is preserved for future use. Your volume contains many important cases, carefully selected, and must be of great service to the profession. Practical experience teaches me the worth of this publication, and its real value should secure for it an extended circulation." Philadelphia, April 13th, 1872.

From HON. THOS. H. WALKER,
Judge 21st Judicial District, Pa.

"I must express my satisfaction with the volume. The entire work does credit to the taste and ability of the reporter; the type is neat, the decisions are carefully arranged and accurately indexed. There are many important opinions collected in the book, and the legal profession will find it a valuable addition to our Supreme Court reports. The chief merit of the Legal Gazette is not only to furnish an early publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court, but also to embrace in a permanent form those of the Common Pleas Judges of our State for constant reference and easy access. The work has been successfully commenced and its continuance is essential to the labor of the bench and bar." Pottsville, Pa., April 13th, 1872.

From HON. SAML. S. DREHER,
President Judge 22d Judicial District, Pa.

"I am much pleased with these reports. They contain much valuable information, and from the high character of the judges whose opinions are reported, I feel safe in following them. The book is well printed, well bound, and so far as I have been able to read it since my return home, I find the syllabi full and accurate." Stroudsburg, Pa., March 26th, 1872.

From HON. GARRICK M. HARDING,
President Judge, 11th Judicial District, Pa.

"In point of mechanical execution the Legal Gazette Reports are not surpassed by any modern legal publication, and in point of useful service to the profession, the Reporter and the Publishers have done a work in every way praiseworthy." Wilkes Barre, Pa., March 2, 1872.

From HON. JOHN DEAN,
President Judge 24th Judicial District, Pa.

"Some copies of the paper have been lost or mislaid, in which were reports of cases of great value to me, and just as I was thinking of writing to you, to ascertain if you could replace them, your present valuable work is received." Hollidaysburg, Pa., March 8th, 1872.

From HON. SAML. A. GILMORE,
President Judge 14th Judicial District, Pa.

"I was so well satisfied of the value of the cases reported in the Legal Gazette, that I took care to file away that paper as it came to hand. This was inconvenient for reference, but is now obviated by the Legal Gazette Reports. Most of the cases are important and so well elaborated as to make them quite satisfactory. To a judge who has something to do with all the jurisdictions, the book is very convenient and to the bar we would suppose almost indispensable." Uniontown, Pa., March 27th, 1872.

From HON. E. M. PAXSON,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts. Phila

"Its mechanical execution reflects much credit upon Messrs. King & Baird, the printers, whilst your own industry and care in the arrangement and report of the cases are equally apparent. I regard your book as a valuable addition to the library of every lawyer, and trust it will meet with such success as to make its continuation a certainty." Philadelphia, May 1st, 1872.

From HON. WM. ELWELL,
President Judge 26th Judicial District, Pa.

"Your plan of preserving cases originally appearing in the Legal Gazette, by the publication of them in book form, will I have no doubt be very acceptable to the profession. The first volume of the Legal Gazette Reports is well executed, and will be found to be an indispensable adjunct to the library of every practicing lawyer in the State." Bloomsburg, Pa., March 7th, 1872.

From HON. JAMES T. MITCHELL,
District Court, Phila

"The volume is handsomely got up, and to those who have not a full set of the Legal Gazette will be necessary to complete the Pennsylvania series and the bar will buy it with a good grace even in this day of multiplied reports, as it contains only cases that have not been elsewhere reported." Feb. 23d, 1872.

From HON. B. F. JUNKIN,
President Judge 9th Judicial District, Pa.

"I am convinced of its great value to the profession. It contains many decisions, involving questions which seldom reach the regular State Reports. You have done much for the bar and bench and they owe you a reward. The volume is neat and accurate." Bloomfield, Pa., April 2d, 1872.

From HON. A. W. ACHESON,
President Judge 27th Judicial District, Pa.

"It is replete with valuable information, and I think must be favorably received by the profession." Washington, Pa., April 6th, 1872.

From HON. J. B LIVINGSTON,
President Judge 2d Judicial District, Pa.

"I have carefully examined the 1st vol., "Legal Gazette Reports." The matter contained therein, taken as it is from the decisions and practice of different courts throughout the State, will render this work indispensable to the practicing attorney as well as the judiciary. The book is well gotten up. neat in appearance, the syllabi accurate and index complete. I have no doubt it will soon find a place in the library of every practising attorney in the Commonwealth." Lancaster, Pa., April 8th, 1872.

From HON. J.C. BUCHER,
President Judge 20th Judicial District, Pa.

"From the examination I have made, I am convinced that they (the Reports) will be of great value to th practitioner and indispensable to all who desire a complete record of all the Pennsylvania cases." Lewisburg, Pa, March 10th, 1872.

From HON. HENRY P. ROSS,
President Judge 7th Judicial District, Pa.

"The volume has so much to commend it, both in its external appearance as a book, with regard to paper, type and general typographical execution, and in the great practical utility of its contents, that any expression of individual opinion as to its merits seems to be superfluous. I hope it will be the first of a series, and that its successors will present as many valuable cases as carefully edited as this initial volume. Such a series will be an indispensable element in the library of every lawyer." Norristown, Pa., March 22d, 1872.

From HON. JAMES A. LOGAN,
President Judge 10th Judicial District, Pa.

"To me this seems an exceedingly valuable volume. Its decisions must prove of great assistance to both bench and bar, throughout the State. I regard as the peculiar excellence of these reports the class of well considered "lower court" decisions, which aside from their great aid to the profession must so largely tend to establish a most desirable uniformity of practice in the different districts in the State." Greensburg, Pa., March 28th, 1872.

Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia.

In re CREDIT MOBILIER.

1. Under the act of 1856, the powers of courts of common pleas to dissolve corporations, is not restricted to any class of corporations.
2. A petition for dissolution can be filed only in the county where the corporation has its principal office or place of business, or where its business is chiefly conducted. Hence, if its chief place of business be in another State, it cannot avail itself of the benefit of the act.
3. The capital of banking and other monied corporations, constitute a trust fund and pledge for the payment of creditors and stockholders, and a court of equity will lay hold of the fund, and see that it is duly collected and applied.
4. The court must be satisfied before entering a decree of corporate dissolution, that it may be done without prejudice to creditors, stockholders, or the public welfare.

Opinion by ALLISON, J. Delivered February 1st, 1873.

In the matter of the petition of the Credit Mobilier of America for decree of dissolution.

The petitioners are a corporation chartered by the Legislature of Pennsylvania in 1859, under the name of the "Pennsylvania Fiscal Agency," and by the act of March 26th, 1864, the name of the corporation was changed to that of the Credit Mobilier of America.

The petition is based upon the act of April 9th, 1856. P. L. 293, which declares that it may be lawful for the Court of Common Pleas of the proper county to hear the petition of any corporation praying for permission to surrender any power contained in its charter or for the dissolution of such corporation; and if such court are satisfied that the prayer of such petition may be granted without prejudice to the public welfare or the interests of the corporators, the prayer of such petition may be granted. The restrictions on the exercise of this power, are that such surrender shall not remove any limitation or restriction contained in the charter; that the accounts of the managers, directors or trustees of any dissolved company shall be settled in or approved by the court, and dividends of the effects shall be made among any of the corporators entitled thereto, as in the case of the accounts of assignees and trustees.

The petition asserts that from a date anterior to July 6th, 1868, the corporation has transacted no business except to collect assets and pay previous liabilities and expenses incident to litigation, and that it has no other functions than these to perform, except to distribute among creditors, if any there be, and divide surplus among persons entitled to the same. That by reason of pending suits against the corporation, they are prevented winding up and making distribution of assets.

The reasons assigned in support of the application, are the inconvenience and expense of maintaining the organization, and taxation imposed on their unemployed capital.

At an adjourned meeting of the corporators, held June 12th, 1872, at which 22,900 shares of stock were represented, a vote was passed authorizing the present application; Henry S. McComb, alone, by his attorneys, protesting against the action of the meeting. A resolution was at the same time passed, requesting the directors to vest the property and assets of the company in trustees, in the event of a dissolution being obtained, in trust, to pay all claims on the corporation, and distribute the assets among the persons entitled to the same.

This instruction was carried into effect by a conditional conveyance of all the property of the corporation to three trustees, citizens of the city of Boston, Massachusetts, in trust, for the objects set forth in the resolutions of July 12th, 1872.

The case is before us at this time on exceptions filed by Henry S. McComb to the report of the master, to whom the petition was referred. The report recommends that the prayer of the petitioners be granted.

It is made a ground of objection that the act of April 9th, 1856, does not apply to corporations chartered by the Legislature; that the true intent and meaning of the act is, that no other corporations except such as are created by decree of the Court of Common Pleas, can avail themselves of its provisions. If we felt at liberty to regard this as an open question, there is much in this suggestion worthy of serious consideration. It might be proper for us to look at the title of the act, as needed to let light in upon that which may be regarded as obscure without it, it is called a supplement to the acts relating to incorporation by the courts of common pleas, and the context of the act would seem to point to corporations created by the Common Pleas of the "proper county" which is authorized to entertain jurisdiction of the application, and it needed subsequent legislation to explain the true meaning of the term proper county. A legislative interpretation was given to it by the act of April 4th, 1872, which provides that the proper county intended by the act of April 9th, 1856, may be either the county in which the principal operations of the corporation are conducted, or the county in which its principal office or place of business is located. But it may be a question of no little difficulty in some cases, to settle even this point, as where a corporation, like a railroad or canal company, may extend from one border of the commonwealth to the other, having extensive operations and places of business in several counties. There are other considerations which it might be proper to refer to in this connection, if we did not regard the question as settled against the exceptant by the case of The Commonwealth v. Safer, 3 P. F. S. 71, which holds that the act of 1856, does not restrict the power of courts of common pleas to dissolve corporations, to any class of corporations, whether chartered by the Legislature, or by the courts, or by letters patent, granted by the governor, under the act of July 18th, 1863, relating to the incorporation of mechanical, manufacturing, mining and quarrying companies. This decision we regard as the conclusion of all controversy upon this point; nor do we agree with the argument made by the exceptant, that we ought to consider as extra judicial all that is contained in the opinion of the court, giving to the act an interpretation broad enough to embrace companies chartered by the Legislature, because not necessary to the decision of the question then before the court. But the point was doubtless made in resisting the application for a mandamus to compel the secretary of the commonwealth to file in his office a decree of the Court of Common Pleas, dissolving a corporation holding letters patent from the governor, under the act of July 18th, 1863. To the broad question the court addressed itself in the decision of the cause, which stands to us as res adjudicata, behind which we cannot go; we, therefore, pass by, without further remark, the very able argument made by the counsel for the exceptant, against giving to the act under which the petition is filed, a construction which takes in corporations whose authority is desired by direct grant from the Legislature. Starting with this as a point established against the exceptant, is the way clear on all other grounds for a decree of dissolution and surrender of corporate power?

It is not unworthy of remark just here, that the master has not found as a fact, that which is necessary to give jurisdiction to this court. No one could have decided before the act of April 4th, 1872, the "proper county" in which to make the application for dissolution; this is determined by the fact of location of the principal office or place of business, or the county in which the business of the corporation is chiefly conducted. Before a petition for dissolution can be entertained, one or the other of these facts ought to appear prima facie, at least, and before a decree in accordance with the prayer of the petitioner can be entered, such fact must be shown to the satisfaction of the court.

This does not appear to have been done, perhaps because it could not have been established. In the charge of Judge Pearson, reported in 17 P. F. S. 250, in the case of the Credit Mobilier, v. The Commonwealth, I find this statement: "The corporation was created by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and was required to keep an office in this State, which was done in point of form merely, as all of its business was transacted in the cities of New York and Boston, where the stockholders mainly resided."

Assuming this to be true, the petitioners are not entitled to make application in the Court of Common Pleas of either of the counties of this commonwealth; if its principal offices and places of business are in other States, then it is not in a position to avail itself of the benefits of the act under which the petition is filed, for the act of 1872, clearly contemplates the location of the principal office, or the transaction of the chief part of its business, in one or the other of the counties of Pennsylvania, as determining the "proper county" in which to make application under the act of 1856.

It is further objected against the right of the petitioner to the decree of dissolution, that the act does not contemplate the case of a corporation whose affairs are unsettled, and against which suits are pending and undetermined. It is confessed in the petition filed, that suits have been instituted against the Credit Mobilier, which places them in the position of not being able to wind up the affairs of the corporation by a division of corporate property among stockholders and creditors whose claims are not denied. The act does not, in terms, provide for the ascertainment or payment of debts due to creditors.

The court must see that the public welfare and the interests of corporators suffer no prejudice, and this would seem to look to the dissolution of a corporation when its affairs were settled up, so that nothing remained to be done but to divide the effects among corporators who are the members of the corporation or stockholders of the body. The omission of the act to provide in terms for the ascertainment of the claims of creditors, and distribution among them, favors this view, and unless such power can be drawn from the latter clause of the sentence referring to the settlement of the accounts of the corporation, it does not exist. It says the accounts shall be settled and approved by the court, and dividends of the effects made among corporators, as in the case of the accounts of assignees and trustees. The master is of the opinion that creditors may maintain their claims on settlement of the accounts as contemplated by the act. He asks, may not the company's liabilities be ascertained in this court, upon the settlement of the accounts of the trustees, and will not this satisfy any creditor, and fully meet the substantial requirements of justice?

No stronger reason can be urged against this interpretation of the act because of the magnitude of the interests which by this process might be brought into liquidation, than could be made against the settlement of the affairs of a bank, or railroad, or other corporation which should make an assignment for the benefit of creditors, involving property of the value of millions of dollars, and the adjustment and payment of claims of equal magnitude.

But with this much conceded we are not prepared at this stage of the proceeding to decide that such is the correct interpretation of the act, and to give a binding construction to it now; this can be better done when the question arises, if it ever should, upon the report of an auditor making distribution upon settlement of the accounts of the directors of the corporation, as preliminary to a decree of dissolution. Upon one point we are very clear in our opinion, that is, that no such decree should be made in any case until the court are able to make distribution among the corporators of that which remains after the payment of creditors; so that we can with certainty carry out the injunction of the act, and see to it that the decree works no prejudice to the interests of the corporators, and at the same time guards the just interests of those whose rights stand upon an equity prior to that of the stockholders.

Such has been the practice of this court in all cases which have been brought before us, under the act upon which the petitioners ground their application. The instances have not been frequent, but several have arisen and been acted on, where incorporated engine or hose companies have gone out of service since the paid fire department of the city has taken the place of the old organization. The exceptant, Henry S. MacComb, is not merely a creditor by demand, made to the officers of the corporation, for payment of his claim, but in 1868 he brought suit in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in equity, against the Credit Mobilier in its corporate capacity, and Sidney Dillon, et al., claiming that he is the owner of between three and four hundred shares of the stock of the company, together with all the dividends and profits accrued thereon since 1866. He seeks, in this proceeding in equity, to recover the value of 375 shares of stock, at $500 per share, and profits amounting to $280,000, which he claims had accrued thereon up to the date of the finding of this bill. This suit is still pending and undetermined. It is not doubtful what the effect of a decree of dissolution would have upon this claim if the exceptant was seeking to enforce its payment by suit at law. It is certainly true that at law debts due to and from a corporation, are totally extinguished upon dissolution, so that neither can they be recovered by it or charged against it, and both at law and in equity all pending suits by or against thereby abate. Angell & Aymes, S. 779.

Where, during the pendency of a suit, a corporation surrenders its charter, which is accepted by the Legislature, it becomes defunct and the suit abates, unless the Legislature save the right of action against the corporation. 3 Story, 567; Greeley v. Smith. And this must be equally true where the Legislature, without saving the rights of suitors, gives to the courts the power to accept a surrender of corporate authority, and decree the death of the body. To the same effect is Merrill v. The Bank, 31 Maine Reports, 57; May v. State Bank, 2 Robinson, 56.

This is conceded by the master, who reported in favor of a dissolution, and says a technical abatement of a suit at law against the Credit Mobilier would be worked by a decree of dissolution, whilst the rights of a creditor remain in equity unaffected, as against the assets of a dissolved corporation. It is difficult to see how a suit at law can be maintained after the death of the defendant, who can make no temporary disposition, appoint no executor, and upon whose estate no administration can be raised.

The master, however, holds that as the assets of the corporation in the hands of the trustees are held subject to any claim that may be established against them by creditors, the protection is ample. The question is asked, without being answered, may not the trustees be made parties defendant to the suit in the Supreme Court? This may be so, and yet there is room to doubt whether the suit against the corporation now pending would not abate, and the creditor be turned over to a new proceeding against the trustees.

The equity of the creditor to obtain satisfaction of his debt out of the assets of a dissolved corporation, is now well established. In support of this doctrine the master cites 8 Peters, 281; 15 Howard, 304; 8 Georgia, 493; 10 Paige, 541.

He also cites from Chancellor Kent, who states the doctrine thus: The rule of the common law has, in fact, become obsolete; it has never been applied to dissolve monied corporations in England. The sound doctrine now is, as shown by statutes and by judicial decisions, that the capital and debts of banking and other monied corporations, constitute a trust fund and pledge for the payment of creditors and stockholders; and a court of equity will lay hold of the fund and see that it be duly collected and applied.

But whether the present suit in equity can be maintained by calling in the trustees as parties defendant, after the death of the corporation, or whether a new proceeding would have to be instituted, we should pause before we make a decree that might impose on suitors against the Credit Mobilier great risk and inconvenience in the prosecution of their claims against the company. We are not to shut our eyes to the fact that all three of the trustees are citizens of the State of Massachusetts, and not therefore within reach of the process of courts of Pennsylvania, and that a decree such as is prayed for, would to a great extent, if not wholly, deprive the exceptant and other suitors in equity from obtaining such further discovery as they may be entitled to have in the maintenance of their demands. If dead in law, the corporation could make through its proper officers no further answer to inquiries that might be important, if not essential, to more full and perfect discovery in equity.

The master, as we have seen, asserts the general doctrine that equity will carry the effects of a dissolved monied corporation over to the trustees for the use and in trust for creditors. But the rights of creditors, under the act of 1856, to make claim upon the funds of the corporation in the hands of the trustees, upon accounts settled under the act, which in direct terms makes no provision for creditors, is not entirely free from doubt; the question should be settled before we enter the decree prayed for. Nor is it satisfactorily shown that the pending suit in equity would not fall dead the moment such a decree was made; nor in what way the trustees, if the suit survives, can be made parties to it, if they elect to keep beyond the jurisdiction of the court. A decree ought not to be made that would subject suitors to either one or the other of these risks, which would impose great inconvenience if suits had to be again brought, and might result in entire loss of remedy before the tribunals in which they have chosen to litigate their claims. To do that which we are asked to do, in advance of the settlement of the accounts of the corporation, would be to bar in some degree the way of justice, and impair, if we did not destroy, the remedy which the law of the land now gives to those having claims against the body.

But there is still another reason why we should at least pause and at this time refuse the petitioners the death for which they pray. The law says that the court must be satisfied before entering a decree of corporate dissolution, that it may be done without prejudice to public welfare. In view of recent developments, which reach us as a part of the history of the Government making inquisition into the past transactions and present standing of the Credit Mobilier of America, can any one affirm that the dissolution of this corporation would be without prejudice to the interests of the public?

The Government has given notice that it claims to be a creditor of the corporation to a large amount. Congress has by its action directed the employment of counsel to investigate and prosecute such claims. Shall we embarrass the possible future action dependent on such an inquiry, by taking from the body its very existence, and enable it to pass out of sight, by quietly descending into a grave, which by anticipation it has prepared for itself, and turn the Government as well as individual creditors over to a scramble for the effects of the body?

This corporation should be compelled to continue to live and stand in its proper place until the way be made clear, beyond reasonable doubt, that without prejudice to public welfare or the interests of corporators, and we may add that of creditors, we may safely give to it the death which it desires to die by our hands.

The exceptions to the report of the master are sustained, and the prayer of the petitioners is refused.

Court of Quarter Sessions.

CITY v. WILLIAMSON.

1. Every presumption is in favor of marriage, and it will not be destroyed upon doubtful testimony.
2. A foreign statute upon the subject of marriage, which is in direct conflict with the established policy of the American government, and tends also to debase and destroy public morals, will not be recognized as binding.
3. Where a marriage took place in Ireland, and the parties lived and cohabited there as man and wife for sixteen years, and the husband then established his domicile here, if an English statute be interposed as a bar to proceedings against him for desertion, in the absence of evidence clearly establishing the fact that the case is within the statute, an order will be made for the support of the wife.

Desertion.

Opinion by LUDLOW, J. Delivered February 1st, 1873.

This case presents a number of questions, all of them interesting, and in view of the facts proved somewhat novel.

The real plaintiff here is a woman, who alleges that she married the defendant, lived with him as his wife for sixteen years, and was the mother by him of seven children, all are now dead except two, and one of the survivors appears with his mother in court. The defendant does not deny that he went through the ceremony of marriage with this woman, and that the ceremony was performed by a Catholic priest, in a private room at Antrim, in Ireland, at or near the place of the then residence of the parties; the cohabitation and birth of children during a period of sixteen years is admitted, but the defendant declares he is, and always has been a Protestant, and interposes as a flat bar to this motion an English statute, passed in the nineteenth year of the reign of George II, which declares, chap. 13, section 1: "That every marriage that shall be celebrated after the 1st day of May, 1746, between a Papist and any person who hath been or hath professed him or herself to be a Protestant at any time within twelve months before such celebration of marriage, or between two Protestants, if celebrated by a Popish priest, shall be and is hereby declared absolutely null and void to all intents and purposes, without any process, judgment, or sentence of law whatsoever."

As a consequence, it has been argued that the children of these parties are bastards, and their mother nothing more than a concubine.

With these facts before us, and these consequences likely to flow from a decision in favor of the defendant, we are more anxious to give to him the amplest opportunity to sustain his case; to do so, however, he must very clearly establish the existence of the law, and of the facts necessary to bring his case within its provisions, and we must be certain that the case is one which does not fall within the class of exceptions recognized by all jurists, and, moreover, that to enforce a general principle will not be to destroy that policy of our own government, which will not tolerate the enforcement of a law born in bigotry and intolerance, and which will carry havoc and ruin into many a virtuous household. The general principle undoubtedly is that between persons sui juris, marriage is to be decided by the laws of the place where it is celebrated; if valid or void there, it is valid or void everywhere. But Judge Rogers in delivering the opinion of the court in Phillips v. Gregg, 10 Watts, 168, most righteously observes that our courts have not established, e converso, that marriages of citizens not good, according to the place where celebrated, are universally and under all possible circumstances to be disregarded." Well known and universally recognized exceptions to the general rule exist, as in cases involving polygamy or incest; for, says Chancellor Kent, no Christian country will recognize such marriages. 2 Kent, 91, note.

Story, in his Conflict of Laws, pp. 85, 87, 91 and 92, in substance, maintained that, whenever the laws of a foreign country are in violation of the laws of God, sound principles of morals, or settled principles of public policy, they will not be recognized.

Bishop, in his work upon Marriages and Divorce, p. 130, also refers to cases which must of necessity be exceptional. Indeed, the whole doctrine of the law upon this important subject, while it recognizes the law of marriage as a part of the jus gentium, as distinctly enforces the idea that in the application of that law, the courts having jurisdiction of a particular case, must be governed by the facts of that case, and by its opinion of the applicability of the general principle to the particular cause.

It is not absolutely necessary now for us to dispose of this motion upon a question of law alone. Granting that the English statute is now in force and has been properly proved, if it could be disposed of upon no other ground, I incline most strongly to the opinion that, in so far as it is now sought to destroy this marriage, the effort must be abortive, for upon grounds of public policy an American court cannot recognize the legal effect of this English statute.

The words public policy may have an unlimited meaning, and therefore we pause here to specify some of the reasons which induce us to use that language.

Marriage is universally regarded as the foundation stone of all the social relations. Without its existence the social fabric falls into ruins. The presumption of law is always in its favor, and he who contests its validity has the burden of proof thrown upon himself.

A religious test is of all things most objectionable to an American legislator or jurist, and a law which would bastardize issue and destroy civil rights upon the basis of a difference of opinion in religion, could not be tolerated in the United States. The government is one of universal toleration, and its policy has been and is to invite to its hospitable shores the inhabitants of all the earth. Foreign governments, to execute their own schemes may, indeed, render impossible marriages between different classes of their own subjects; but unless we are prepared to give effect to laws, the relic of other days, days of bigotry and rank intolerance, and of a policy as short-sighted as it was cruel, we will declare that universal toleration, hospitality, and protection, shall not only be proclaimed, but shall also be enforced.

We shall not be told that a husband and father may come into this jurisdiction, make it his domicile, and then when followed by his wife and children, shall deliberately turn them all out upon the cold charity of the world, proclaiming that every right has been destroyed by virtue of an antiquated statute. Seizing the principle that exceptions do exist to the general rule of law upon the subject of foreign marriages, sustained and fortified upon this point by the opinions of text writers, jurists, and publicists the most eminent, we are not to be deterred from the expression of an opinion by any supposed international law, which would countenance as binding upon us an English statute, which, if it does not belong to the class which includes bigamy and polygamy, certainly does deserve to be ranked among those laws, enacted by another sovereignty, which tend to debase public morals, and to introduce a test utterly at war with a fundamental principle of American government. If this nation, in the strength of its manhood, is to be respected; if it has achieved the right to speak and to be heard, its policy upon this subject ought to be marked and understood; and it surely will entitle itself to the grateful consideration of the civilized world, if it emphatically declares that upon the subject of marriage, and especially its destruction, it will determine every case by its own enlightened principles of morals and of public policy, and, in such a cause as this, upon the policy of universal toleration.

There is another view to be taken of this cause. The English statute has not been proved according to law. It may be in force, but we are not absolutely certain that it has not been qualified, become obsolete, or been repealed; and therefore we are not bound to regard its provisions. Assume, however, that it is in force: how stands the cause upon the evidence?

Mrs. Williamson details the circumstances of courtship and marriage. Her testimony as to cohabitation and reputation of marriage is corroborated by several other witnesses.

Upon the question of the religious faith of her intended husband, we do not agree with the view taken of the evidence by defendant's counsel. We think Mrs. W. declares that she told him she would never marry a Protestant; that he wrote a letter to the priest, which he showed to the plaintiff, informing him that he was a Catholic; that he so informed his intended wife before marriage, adding that he had for a long time been a Catholic.

He was married by a Catholic priest. His children were baptized by a Catholic priest in his own house and presence. The defendant admitted, on the hearing, that he took his son James in a carriage to the Catholic chapel to be confirmed by the bishop. To the important and essential points in this testimony, the defendant interposes an absolute denial, but he stands alone, and as to collateral matters, he was contradicted in several particulars.

If a doubt existed as to his religious faith, that doubt would settle the case in favor of the wife, for, as the presumptions of law are in favor of, rather than against, a marriage, it cannot be destroyed by doubtful testimony.

We, however, go further than this, for upon the evidence we have no doubt that Williamson did represent himself to be a Catholic, and had done so for a long time before the celebration of the marriage.

In Yelverton v. Yelverton, 4 McQueen's H. of L. Cases, p. 862, Lord Wensleydale said: "The appellant having been born a Protestant, must be deemed to have continued so, unless he had done something to denote a change in his religious persuasion, and nothing of that kind appears."

And again, "Had he said he was a Roman Catholic, it would have raised the question reported to have been decided by Baron Alderson in Regina v. Owell, whether he was estopped by his declaration that he was a Roman Catholic."

The evidence here, as we have already stated, seems to be, at best, in a doubtful condition upon one point, but the weight of it seems to establish the fact that this defendant considered himself a good enough Catholic to contract this marriage, to live for sixteen years unmolested by any legal authority, to become the father of seven children by his wife. Nor did the defendant discover how thorough a Protestant he was until it became convenient to abandon this wife, establish a denial here, and contract another marriage with another woman in this country.

It gives me great judicial satisfaction to be enabled, upon the facts before me, to render a decision in favor of this wife; to make this faithless husband and father, who did not hesitate in fact to brand his own offspring, in an open court of justice, as a bastard, to understand that justice is administered here, and that his conduct does not fail, in the most unequivocal manner, to meet with the sternest, most uncompromising judicial condemnation.

Let an order be prepared directing the defendant to pay for the support of his wife $6 per week, and let a bond in the usual form be also prepared in the sum of $700, conditioned for the faithful performance of this order.

Daniel Dougherty, Esq., for wife.

Ford & Bonham, Esqs., for defendant.

ACTS OF CONGRESS.

The following list embraces a statement of the material parts of all the acts of Congress of general interest, thus far passed at the present session.

An act to amend the one hundred and thirty-third section of an act approved June 8th, 1872, entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the post office department." Approved January 9th, 1873.

The effect of this statute is to authorize the transmission by mail of packages of seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, and scions of any weight, for each package not exceeding four pounds, at a rate of postage of one cent for each two ounces or fractions of an ounce of such package.

By the previous law, such packages sent through the mail could not exceed twelve ounces in weight.

An act supplemental to and amendatory of an act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections, approved February 19th, 1851. Approved January 10th, 1873.

Sections one and two prescribe the time within which testimony, in cases where a contest arises as to election of a representative in Congress, may be taken, and authorize depositions of witnesses to be taken in the districts in which they reside. Sections three and four prescribe the course of the examining officers anywhere throughout the United States, in taking depositions and returning them. The act reads as follows:

SECT. 1. That in all contested election casesthe, time allowed for taking testimony shall be ninety days, and the testimony shall be taken in the following order: The contestant shall take testimony during the first forty days; the returned member during the succeeding forty days, and the contestant may take testimony in rebuttal only during the remaining ten days of said period. Such testimony in rebuttal may be taken on five days' notice. Testimony may be taken at two or more places at the same time.

SECT. 2. Depositions of witnesses residing outside of the district and beyond the reach of a subpœna, may be taken before any officer authorized by law to take testimony in contested election cases, in the district in which the witness to be examined may reside.

SECT. 3. That the party desiring to take a deposition or depositions under the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this is an amendment, shall give the opposite party notice, in writing, of the time and place, when and where, the same will be taken, as well as of the name of the witness or witnesses to be examined, and of the name of an officer before whom the same will be taken. The notice shall be personally served upon the opposite party, or upon any agent or attorney of his authorized by him to take testimony or cross-examine witnesses in the matter of such contest, if, by the use of reasonable diligence, such personal service can be made; but if by the use of such diligence, personal service cannot be made, the service may be made by leaving a duplicate of the notice at the usual place of abode of the opposite party. The notice shall be served so as to allow the opposite party sufficient time by the usual route of travel to attend, and one day for preparation, exclusive of Sundays and the day of service. And the taking of the testimony may, if so stated in the notice, be adjourned from day to day. The notice with the proof or acknowledgment of the service thereof, shall be attached to the depositions when completed. The party notified as aforesaid, his agent or attorney, may, if he see fit, select an officer (having authority to take depositions in such cases) to officiate with the officer named in the notice, in the taking of the depositions; and if both such officers attend, the depositions shall be taken before them both, sitting together, and be certified by them both. But if only one of such officers attend, the depositions may be taken before and certified by him alone. It shall be competent for the parties, their agents, or attorneys authorized to act in the premises, by consent in writing, to take depositions without notice; and it shall also be competent for them, by such written consent, to take depositions (whether upon or without notice) before any officer or officers authorized to take depositions in common law or civil actions, or in chancery, by either the laws of the United States or of the State in which the same may be taken, and to waive proof of the official character of such officer or officers. Any written consent, given as aforesaid shall be returned with the depositions; and every such officer so chosen by the parties, their agents or attorneys, and officiating, shall have all the powers in the premises that are conferred by the act to which this is an amendment, upon the officers named therein. At the taking of any deposition under this act, or the act to which this is an amendment, either party may appear and act in person, or by agent or attorney.

SECT. 4. All officers taking testimony to be used in a contested election case, whether by deposition or otherwise, shall, when the taking of the same is completed, and without unnecessary delay, certify the same, and carefully seal and immediately forward the same by mail, addressed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C.; and shall also endorse upon the envelope containing such deposition or testimony, the name of the case in which it is taken, together with the name of the party in whose behalf it is taken, and shall subscribe such endorsement. Upon the written request of either party, the clerk of the House of Representatives shall open any deposition at any time after he shall have received the same, and he may furnish either party with a copy thereof.

An act to amend section twelve of an act entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of shipping commissioners," &c., approved June 7th, 1872. Approved January 15th, 1873.

The act here referred to, is the well known act passed last year, prescribing the general rule that seamen for merchant vessels, with certain exceptions, should be shipped by an agreement in writing specifying certain terms and stipulations, and signed in the presence of a "shipping commissioner."

The new act provides that the above requirement shall not apply to vessels when engaged in trade between the United States and the British North American possessions, or the West India Islands, or the Republic of Mexico.

An act to prevent certain officers of the United States and Territories, from practicing as attorneys or solicitors in courts of the United States, in certain cases. Approved January 16th, 1873.

This act provides that no clerk, assistant, or deputy clerk of any territorial, district, or circuit court, or of the Court of Claims, or the Supreme Court of the United States, or marshal or deputy marshal of the United States, within the district for which he is appointed, shall act as solicitor, proctor, attorney, or counsel in any cause depending in either of said courts, or in any district for which he is acting as such officer, under penalty of being stricken from the roll, and if a marshal or deputy marshal, dismissal from office.

An act to amend an act entitled "An act relating to members of Congress, heads of departments, and other officers of the Government," approved June 11th, 1864. Approved January 16th, 1873.

The former law forbade any member of the Senate or House of Representatives, while in office, or any departmental officer, to receive or agree to receive, any compensation for any services to any person in relation to any proceeding, claim, &c., or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party, or directly or indirectly interested, before any department, court-martial, bureau officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever; and declared his doing so punishable by fine and imprisonment.

The new law extends the prohibition and penalty to delegates from the Territories and District of Columbia.

DEATH OF JUDGE SMYSER.

ACTION OF THE ADAMS COUNTY BAR.

At a meeting of the judges, members of the bar, and officers of the courts of Adams county, held January 13th, 1873, Hon. Robert McCurdy was called to preside, and John M. Krauth, Esq., appointed secretary.

On motion of R. G. McCreary, Esq., a committee, consisting of Messrs. E. B. Buehler, D. McConaughy and D. A. Buehler, was appointed to draft a minute expressive of the views of the meeting on the occasion of the death of Hon. Daniel M. Smyser. The committee reported an appropriate minute in memoriam, which was unanimously adopted after remarks by Messrs. R. G. McCreary, E. B. Buehler, D. McConaughy, and D. A. Buehler, viz.:

On Monday afternoon, Jan. 27th, 1873, Edward B. Buehler, Esq., presented to the court, this action of the members of the bar and officers of the court on the death of Judge Smyser, with a motion that they be entered on the records of the court, and that the court adjourn, as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased. Mr. Buehler accompanied his motion with a few remarks, referring to his intimate relations to the deceased as law student under him, and in subsequent practice at the bar. The minute thus presented having been read by the prothonotary, Judge Fisher ordered it to be entered on the records, at the same time paying a handsome tribute to the deceased in the following words;

Our feelings of respect and regard for the Hon. Daniel M. Smyser in his lifetime cannot permit this motion to be acted upon, without paying our tribute to his character, as a citizen, a lawyer, and a judge.

Our acquaintance with him has been long, and our intercourse of the most friendly character. The first time we visited Gettysburg on professional business, although an entire stranger to him, he tendered to us the use of his library and his office; and afterwards, whether concerned with him or opposed to him, we always received the same polite invitation.

At the time of his decease, he was the survivor of those who composed the Adams county bar when we first became acquainted with it. In a few short years death has claimed all of them for his own.

Daniel Martin Smyser was born on the twenty-seventh day of February, 1809, at the residence of his father, the late Hon. George Smyser, near "Table Rock," Straban township, this county. On the removal of his parents to Gettysburg, their son was placed at the best school this town afforded, and at a proper age was prepared under the direction of the Rev. David McConaughy, D. D., for his collegiate course. Early in life he entered Dickinson College, and graduated with the highest honors of his class in September, 1827, being then eighteen years of age. On his return home he entered as a student at law the office of Hon. Thaddeus Stevens. On his admission to the bar on the 23d of August, 1831, he became a partner of that gentleman as an attorney at law, which relation continued until 1841, when Mr. Stevens removed to the city of Lancaster.

Mr. Smyser was an active and ardent member of the Whig party, and was elected to the House of Representatives of this State in 1849. In that body he distinguished himself as an able and eloquent debator, and exhibited such marked ability that Governor Johnson selected him as a suitable person to fill the important office of attorney general of Pennsylvania; but Mr. Smyser declined the appointment for the reason that, having been elected by the people of his native county as her representative in the councils of the State, it was his bounden duty to serve them in that capacity, and not accept another position, although of greater honor and emolument, which required him to sever the official relations which then existed between himself and his constituents. Surely this was a rare instance of the sacrifice of personal preferment at the shrine of duty, and well worthy to be remembered, and well deserves to be remembered, and is worthy of imitation in all time to come.

At the close of Mr. Smyser's term of service in the Legislature, he was nominated as a candidate to represent York and Adams counties in Congress, but failed of an election by less than four hundred votes.

The commission of Chief Justice Black expiring in December, 1854, Mr. Smyser received the nomination of the Whig party to fill the vacancy thus created on the bench of the Supreme Court; but Judge Black was re-elected.

In 1851, most unexpectedly, and without any previous knowledge on his part, Mr. Smyser was nominated for president judge of the Seventh Judicial District, and having accepted the nomination was elected to that office by a large majority. He then removed to Norristown, where he has since resided. On the expiration of his term of office he recommenced the practice of law, and for nine or ten years did so with great ability and success. For the last year or two, his health has declined rapidly, and he died at the residence of his son-in-law, David Wills, Esq., at Gettysburg, on the eleventh of this month.

Mr. Smyser was eminently fitted for the profession of his choice. His perceptions of all subjects were clear and accurate; in addition to which he possessed what may be called a legal mind. When he came to the bar, he was well grounded in its elementary principles; and being so, in his early practice he revolved in his own mind any legal question submitted to him in the light these principles afforded, and then turned to his law books to discover whether his conclusions were sustained by adjudged cases—a course well calculated to make him the sound lawyer he afterwards became.

From his youth to his latter days he was a close and diligent student, and it is to be feared that severe and unremitted mental labor brought on the disease that terminated his professional career.

In addition to other qualifications, Mr. Smyser brought to his assistance at the bar a correct literary taste, formed by the study of the ancient classics and the standard writers both of England and America.

The hours that many professional men spend in frivolous pursuits, called by them relaxation, HE spent in reading works on science and history, the poets, or the light productions of the day.

As a practitioner of law, the interests of his client were always looked to rather than his own emolument, and his views of the case were given with sincerity and truth. He discouraged litigation, when no honest or proper end was to be obtained by it; but when justice was sought, or innocence was to be defended, he left no honorable means untried to insure success. To his opponents he was frank and courteous, and no man ever tried a case with him as an opponent who did not form a high opinion of his fair and upright action and gentlemanly bearing.

As a legislator, he was the leader of his party in the House. His views on public questions were presented in a forcible manner, and proved him to be rather a statesman than a politician, and more anxious to serve his country than promote mere partisan ends.

As a judge, to the laborious duties of the bench he brought accurate legal learning and untiring industry. In the trial of cases, where the facts were many and complicated by conflicting testimony, he exhibited an ardent desire to analyze them, separating the truth from the falsehood, to place them in a proper light before the jury. Upon questions of law, where the decisions of courts were in conflict, he was indefatigable in his research, and delivered his conclusions in opinions fraught with learning and sound and convincing argument. On all occasions he treated with great kindness the junior members of the bar. He desired to have them well instructed and improved in their profession; to this end he encouraged the establishment of a Moot Court, and allowed himself to be elected their presiding officer. In this capacity he sat in their imitative court, prepared for it imaginary cases, heard them argued with patient attention, delivered opinions, and referred to cases of undoubted authority to elucidate the points of law involved and decided in them.

His great legal knowledge, judicial firmness, and unbending impartiality and integrity, obtained for him the confidence and respect of the bar and the public; whilst the kindness of his disposition, social qualities and liberality, secured for him their regard and affection. Why should we multiply words? We can sketch the character of Judge Smyser in a single sentence: He was respectful, obedient and affectionate as a son; tender, kind and loving as a husband and father; faithful as a friend; conscientious as a lawyer; public spirited as a citizen; pure as a legislator; upright and incorruptible as a judge. In short—in thought, speech and action, he was an honest man and an honorable gentleman.

In conclusion, we tender our sympathy to the bereaved wife and family of our deceased friend—direct that the resolutions adopted by the members of the bar and officers of the court, at the time of his death, be entered on the records of the same—and order that the court do now adjourn as a mark of our respect for his memory.

Our thanks are due to Hon. Benjamin Vaughn Abbott, Commissioner to revise the United States Statutes, for abstracts of the general laws passed during the present session of Congress. We print them in another column.

In the Supreme Court, on Monday, February 3d, 1873, S. M. Murphy, Esq., on motion of John Goforth, Esq.; and John Grady, Esq., on motion of E. Spencer Miller, Esq., were admitted to practice as attorneys of the court.

The following judgments were entered:

County of Northumberland v. Borough of Sunbury. Error to Common Pleas of Northumberland. The judgment in this case is erroneous in not being for the interest as well as the principal of the debt. We, therefore, modify said judgment by entering judgment for the plaintiff below, for the sum of $4.500, with interest from the 1st day of May, 1866, to the day of the date of the judgment upon the case stated.

Cummings v. Richter. Error to Union county. The striking off of the appeal at the cost of the defendant, is affirmed upon the opinion of the court below.

Drunkenmiller v. Renn. Northumberland county. Judgment affirmed.

Schrack v. State Bank, at Harrisburg. Error to Common Pleas of Union county. Judgment affirmed.

Bagar v. Henning. Union county. Judgment affirmed.

Drunkenmiller v. Bowen. Northumberland county. Judgment affirmed.

Overseers of Madison Township, Columbia county, v. Overseers of Hemlock Township, Montour county. Error to Quarter Sessions of Montour county. The order affirming the order of removal is affirmed upon the opinion of the court below.

Teets v. Miller. Error to Northumberland county. Writ of error quashed.

Lynn v. Miller. Error to Common Pleas of Northumberland county. Writ of error quashed.

By MERCUR, J.:

Union R R. & Transportation Company v. Jacob Riegel & Co. Certificate from Nisi Prius. Judgment reversed and venire de novo awarded.

The Court appointed Messrs. Theodore Cuyler, Wm. H. Rawle, Samuel C. Perkins, C. H. T. Collis, and George Biddle, a committee to revise the equity fee bill.

The court promulgated the following

RULE OF COURT.

On Monday last the Supreme Court made the following order and rule, by reason of which the practice in paying money into court will be the same in that court as it is under the recent rule adopted by the District Court. The justice of this rule is admitted by all, and we think it is the unanimous opinion of the bar that it would be advisable for the court of Common Pleas to adopt the same or a similar rule.

"Sections 43 and 45, of Rule XVI., in the printed rules of practice in the Supreme Court, are repealed, and the rule now adopted is to be section 43 of said rule, as follows:

"Rule XVI., set. 43. The court order and direct that 'The Pennsylvania Company for the Insurance on Lives and Granting Annuities,' shall be the bankers and depository of this court. All moneys paid into this court in banc or at Nisi Prius, by the sheriff, shall be paid by him directly into said company to the credit of the court in the particular suit or proceeding in which the payment is made, and the said company shall keep a separate account of each of said payments, designating by the term and number or other sufficient description thereof, and the entries made accordingly in said book shall be evidence that the money is so deposited in the said company to the credit of the court in that particular suit or proceeding. A duplicate of said deposit book shall also be kept by the prothonotary of this court, in which the same entries shall be made by the said company; when the sheriff is about to pay money into court, in any suit or proceeding, they shall receive the said duplicate deposit book from the prothonotary, and as soon as the deposit and the proper entry by the said company shall have been made as aforesaid, in each of the said deposit books, the said duplicate deposit book shall be returned by the sheriff to the prothonotary. All moneys paid into this court in banc, or at Nisi Prius, by parties other than the sheriff, shall in like manner be paid directly into said company to the credit of the court in the particular case or proceeding in which it is paid, and the receipt of said company for said sum shall be presented to the prothonotary, who shall thereupon have said payment entered by said company in his deposit book, to the credit as aforesaid of said suit or proceeding, and after so doing, shall file said receipt of record, and give to the person or party thus paying said money into court, as his voucher, a certified copy of said receipt, attested by him under the seal of the court.

"No money shall be paid out of court by the said company, except on the checks of the prothonotary, accompanied by a certificate endorsed on said check, under the hand of the prothonotary and the seal of the court, that the money was so ordered to be paid, and to be countersigned by one of the judges of this court.

The prothonotary shall, on the last day of March, June, September, and December, of each year, have his bank or deposit book settled by said company; and shall on the first Monday of January, April, July, and October, make out and present to the chief justice of the court, or in case of his absence from the city, to any of the justices who may be in the city, an account of the moneys paid into and out of the court during the preceding three months, and exhibit his deposit book as a voucher for the correctness of said account.

Supreme Court of Pennsylv'a.

AT NISI PRIUS

TAYLOR v. THE ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY.

1. The giving of security is a condition precedent to the execution of a writ of replevin, and some return by the sheriff as to the goods is absolutely necessary, to enable the court to pronounce a judgment.
2. Where the sheriff had made no return as to the goods, the defendant having appeared and pleaded, was allowed to withdraw his appearance and plea.

Demurrer to plea.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered February 1st, 1873.

This case presents rather a novel and curious question. It is a writ of replevin, to which the return of the sheriff was, that he served it "by giving a true and attested copy thereof to Henry Gorman, agent of said company, and making known to him the contents thereof. The goods as mentioned in said writ were not replevied and delivered to plaintiff, she, the plaintiff not making me secure of prosecuting her claim." Mr. Webster entered an appearance for the defendants. The plaintiff filed a declaration in the detinet, and ruled the defendants to plead. The plea which is now demurred to, was in effect that the writ was never executed—to which the objection urged is that it is no answer to the declaration.

It is clear, that the writ was not executed. It was certainly a mistake in the sheriff to take any step in the execution before the replevin bond was delivered to him. The act of 1705, 1 Smith, 44, provides that "it shall and may be lawful for the parties of each county in this province to grant writs of replevin in all cases whatsoever, where replevins may be granted by the laws of England, taking security as the said law directs, and make them returnable to the respective courts of common pleas in the proper county, there to be determined according to law." Our form of writ is in accord with this express injunction of the statute. "We command you, that you cause to be replevied and delivered unto the plaintiff—if he make you secure in prosecuting his claim," &c., and that "you put by sureties and safe pledges, the defendant, that he be and appear." &c. The security for prosecuting the claim is a condition precedent, and the sheriff would certainly have been justified in refusing to serve the writ on the defendant.

It is contended, however, that the appearance waives this irregularity, and that the action by the clause of summons is a proceeding in personam, as well as in rem. Undoubtedly, in purely personal actions, and even in mixed actions, this rule holds good. Even in real actions, appearance will cure defects in the service of the process. But replevin is a very peculiar form of action, and some return by the sheriff as to the goods, seems absolutely necessary to enable the court to pronounce a judgment in the case If the goods are replevied and delivered to the plaintiff, the judgment for the plaintiff is that he recover his damages for the taking and unjustly detaining. The judgment for the plaintiff is pro retorno habendo Where the goods have not been delivered to the plaintiff, are either left with the defendant, or not being found, the return is elongned. the plaintiff recovers as well their value in damages as damages for their detention. Easton v. Worthington, 5 S. & R. 130. It is said that in this case we may, perhaps must, assume either that the goods were left in the possession of the def ndant upon a claim of property, or were elongned, as the court to which the defendant is called on to answer, is in the detinet. The defendants might certainly plead non cepernnt, but then if the plaintiff proves that they had ever been in possession, they must be defeated on that issue; and how is a defendant to protect himself, who is lawfully and innocently in possession—the finder or the common carrier—if ready to deliver the goods to the plaintiff in replevin, on his giving security as the law directs? Now the goods have never been lawfully demanded, and yet if this argument holds good, the defendant will have a verdict against him for the value of the goods in damages, without any evidence of conversion. The return of eloigned, if the plaintiff proves a taking, and unless the defendant shows a lawful possession, would be evidence of conversion, and so certainly would be a delivery to the defendant upon a claim of property. It seems to me, therefore, that without a return of the sheriff, or an agreement of the parties as to the goods which are the principal subject of the writ, the court would not be able to give any judgment appropriate to the form of action.

I think, therefore, that the plea is an answer to the action. Perhaps it is properly a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. assuming the act of 1705 as requiring the security to be taken as a condition precedent; in that aspect the appearance is of no consequence. At present I overrule the demurrer, and if the defendants apply, I will give them leave to withdraw their plea and appearance, as I am of opinion that they certainly were not bound to appear and plead and under the circumstances, as they might well conclude, when served with the writ, that it had been duly executed, it is a case in which they ought not to be held to their appearance.

Demurrer overruled.

NEAL'S APPEAL.

The act of 21st April, 1854, so far as it authorizes the courts of quarter sessions to vacate private roads existing by prescription or lapse of time, is constitutional.

Appeal of James Neal from the order and decree of the Court of Quarter Sessions of Montgomery county, vacating a private road in Moreland township, in said county.

Delivered February 4th, 1873.

Per Curiam.

This private road, one perch in width, was laid out by the then owner of the land, for the use of certain lots into which he divided said land. The said private road was over the land now of the petitioner, Ann Krier, and led from a public road over what is now the land of the said Ann Krier, to the said lots of ground which were in the rear of those fronting on the said public road. The petitioner had become the owner of all of the said lots, for the use of which said private road was laid out, whereby the said private road had merged and had become extinguished.

James Neal's land adjoins this private road, and although this private road was not laid out for his use or that of the prior owners of his land, he by reason of having used the said private road for twenty-one years and upwards, claimed that it existed by prescription or lapse of time, which the said Ann Krier did not deny.

The viewers appointed by the court reported, that the said private road had become useless, inconvenient and burdensome, and ought, therefore, to be vacated, which report was confirmed by the court from which decree this appeal is taken, and it was argued here and in the court below, that so much of the first section of the act of 21st April, 1845 (P. L. 416). as authorizes the courts of quarter sessions to vacate private roads "existing by prescription or lapse of time," is unconstitutional.

In Stubers' Road, 4 Casey, 199, this court held this power thus conferred upon the courts of quarter sessions to be a constitutional and valid exercise of legislative authority.

This decision was made sixteen years ago, and so far as we know, has been acquiesced in up to the present time, and it would require a clear conviction of its unsoundness to induce us to reverse it at this late period. It extends only to private roads existing by prescription or lapse of time, and not to private roads resting upon express grant, drawing a clear line between the two kinds of title. The latter title is founded upon contract, the former upon mere lapse of time by an uninterrupted use of it for more than twenty-one years, by analogy to the statute of limitations. This is the true title to such an easement, and not the fiction of a grant, which has sometimes been resorted to as a reason for such a right gained only by prescription or by adverse user for a long period of time. We must, therefore, be governed by the former decision in the case before us. It is not intended in any way to affect vested rights, or to trench in any manner upon property protected by the statute of limitations.

James Neal has no land taken from him, nor any easement secured by grant or contract, and only loses an easement originating in a wrongful use of another person's land.

The order and decree vacating said private road is affirmed, and appeal dismissed at the costs of the appellant.

THE UNION RAILROAD AND TRANSPORTATION CO. v. JACOB RIEGEL & CO.

Where there was a verbal contract, followed by a writing referring to the same subject matter, both the writing and the verbal contract should be submitted to the jury to find what the true contract was.

Certificate from Nisi Prius.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered February 3d, 1873.

The first and second assignments of error are not sustained. The third, fourth, fifth and sixth. will be considered together. They all relate to the ascertainment of the contract under which the merchandise in question was delivered to the defendants.

The plaintiffs gave evidence that Furniss & Co., of Indianapolis, desired to purchase goods of them upon a credit. Not being satisfied as to their solvency, plaintiffs made an arrangement with Mr. Welch, agent for the Union Railroad and Transportation Company, before delivering the goods for transportation, by which the boxes should be marked "F" Indianapolis, Indiana, care of S. F. Gray, agent, and should not be delivered to Furniss & Co., until further orders from plaintiffs. The boxes thus marked, were delivered to the defendants. The plaintiffs claimed this to be the contract under which they delivered, and the defendants received the goods. The defendants gave evidence, that when the drayman, subsequently, upon the same day, delivered the goods to them, he brought and presented for their signature, a shippers' receipt, filled up by plaintiffs' shipping clerk, in which the boxes were described as "marked F Indianapolis, Ind. For J. Furniss & Co., care of S. F. Gray, agent." Upon the face of the receipt, it declares they were "to be carried and delivered upon the terms and according to the agreement as specified on the back of this receipt." Upon the back of the receipt inter alia is part of the consideration of this contract,

"1. That all goods received for transportation shall be .... distinctly marked with the name of the consignee, and the station, when and to whom consigned."

That the defendants signed said receipt, and returned it to the drayman, who took it back to the plaintiffs. This direction as contained in the receipt, was substantially copied into the manifest which was sent on to Gray. It appears that upon the arrival of the goods, Gray delivered them to Furniss & Co., who soon after failed, and the goods were lost to the plaintiffs.

The counsel for the defendants requested the court to charge the jury, that the said shippers' receipt superseded the arrangement made with Mr. Welch, respecting the consignee of the goods. The court declined so to charge. In this was no error. We think, however, the court did err in saying to the jury, that the contract depended entirely upon the verbal arrangement. The court thus withdrew wholly from the consideration of the jury the shippers' receipt, which was executed after the verbal arrangement. The receipt, as well as the verbal arrangement, ought to have been submitted to the jury to enable them to find from the whole evidence, what the true contract was. The seventh assignment is not sustained. It assumes the receipt alone embodied the terms of the contract. Whether the agent was authorized to deliver the goods, depended not upon the receipt alone, but upon what the jury found the contract to be under the whole evidence, as we have indicated.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

AT NISI PRIUS.

HEVENER v. HEINT.

It appearing that the defendant had been decoyed by the plaintiff within the jurisdiction of the court in order that service might be made on him, the court set aside the service.

Rule to set aside service of writ.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered February 1st. 1873.

I am satisfied upon the deposition, that the defendant was decoyed into this jurisdiction, if not by the plaintiff himself, by some one acting on his behalf. The defendant was telegraphed by some one in the name of Hoffman. "Come down by three o'clock train, meet me at Merchant's Hotel." The defendant is a member of the bar, and was acquainted with Jacob Hoffman. Jacob Hoffman testified that he never sent such a despatch. Two other gentlemen, of the same name of Hoffman, were examined with the same result. The defendant testified that he knew no other person in Philadelphia of that name. When Mr. Heint came down to Philadelphia, in obedience to the telegram, and went to the Merchants' Hotel, he was immediately arrested there. Under these circumstances, I am clearly of the opinion that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to produce the sheriff's deputy who made the arrest, in order to show that it was not by the instruction of the plaintiff, or his attorney, that he went with the writ at that time, to that place, to arrest defendant.

Rule absolute.

PALETHORP v. WHITTAKER.

A plea that the cause of action was in a former suit between the same parties, pleaded and allowed as a set-off, is in bar and not in abatement.

Rule to strike off plea.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered February 1st, 1873.

This rule was taken upon the idea that the plea which the court is asked to strike off is irregular, because it is a plea of the pendency of a former action, which is in abatement, and cannot be pleaded after a plea in bar, nor without an affidavit; but the plea is evidently not of this character. It avers very distinctly that the cause of action set forth in the plaintiff's declaration, was, in a former action by the defendant against the plaintiff, pleaded by the plaintiff as a set-off, and had been passed upon and adjudicated in that action. If this be so, it is clearly a plea in bar, and not in abatement.

Rule absolute.

LOWER v. WIGHTMAN & NEVINS.

1. After a master has found a question of fact, it is too late to ask for an issue to determine it by a jury.
2. A. by fraud induced B. to convey lands to him, which A. subsequently conveyed to C. C. had no notice of the fraud. B. filed a bill against A. and C. to obtain a reconveyance. The bill was dismissed as to C., and a decree for pecuniary compensation entered against A.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

The facts of the case as set forth in the report of the master appointed by the court below, are as follows:

In February, 1851, Samuel Lower, by virtue of a contract of purchase, became the owner of a certain tract of land situate and lying in Brushvalley township, Indiana county, adjoining lands of David B. Hite, Daniel Cramer and others, containing one hundred and ten acres and fifty-six perches. Immediately after his purchase, he went into the possession, and from that time on until the 5th day of October, 1865, he continued therein, in quiet and peaceable enjoyment, the sole and exclusive owner. For a considerable time prior to this last day, letters passed between Lower and Wightman concerning the Brushvalley farm, and on that day, having met on the premises, they entered into a contract of agreement in writing, whereby the Brushvalley farm was exchanged for lands in Wisconsin.

The article itself is not in evidence, and therefore we are unable to find more specifically what it contains.

Afterwards on the same day, Lower, the complainant, and his wife, joined in the execution of a deed with covenants of general warranty to Wightman for the Brushvalley farm, mentioning therein as a consideration the sum of three thousand dollars.

On the 11th day of February, A. D. 1866, John Wightman prepared and executed a lease of the Brushvalley farm to Lower for one year from the first day of April, A. D. 1866. This lease, having been brought to Lower's house by Wightman's son, was accepted by him, and signed on the 2d day of March, A. D. 1866, and a copy drawn off by his son Isaiah W. Lower, and retained.

On the 24th day of October, A. D. 1865, Wightman executed two deeds to Lower for lands in Wisconsin.

One of which conveyed 160 acres as per government survey. Consideration, $1,600—acknowledged October 23d, 1865.

The other conveyed 120 acres and 80 acres. Being part of the J. P. Huling lands—consideration $1,600. Acknowledged 24th of October, 1865. Both containing covenants of general warranty.

On the 22d of January, 1868, Wightman, through Alexander Taylor, Esq., and W. H. Kerr, tendered another deed dated November 15th, 1867, to Lower, conveying 160 and 11-100 acres, duly stamped; signed and acknowledged by Wightman and wife, before Albert Watson, a notary public of Trumbull county, Ohio, on the 18th of January, 1868. Consideration $1,600.

They then demanded from Lower a reconveyance of the land held by him, by virtue of the first of the above mentioned deeds of October 23d, 1865, which they alleged had been conveyed to him through mistake and not contemplated by the article of agreement of the 5th of October, 1865, and at the same time produced for him to sign and acknowledge, a deed, duly stamped, describing the lands required to be re-conveyed to Wightman, and tender the necessary fees for acknowledgment.

On the 30th of October, 1865, Wightman executed and acknowledged a deed for the Brushvalley farm to John Nevins. Consideration, $3000. Recorded in D. B. A., Vol. 33, page 248, on the 12th day of August, 1866. This deed was not delivered by Wightman to Nevins until the 24th day of March, 1866.

November 22d, 1865, Nevins executed and acknowledged a deed for the "Huron House," situate in New Brighton, Pa., to Wightman. Consideration, $7,000. This deed was not delivered to Wightman until the 24th of March, 1866.

March 24th, 1866, the day on which Wightman and Nevins exchanged deeds, the lease of the 11th of February, 1866, by Wightman to Lower above mentioned, was transferred to Nevins by assignment on the back. This assignment is not dated, and the date is only fixed by the cancellation of the revenue stamp thereto affixed. It was written by W. J. Paulhamus, who has been examined as a witness by respondents, and who fixes this date in his testimony.

During all the time through which these negotiations between Wightman and Nevins extended, Lower remained in the actual, visible and notorious possession of the Brushvalley farm, and in fact had continued therein from the time of his sale to Wightman, and still remains to this day. His possession has been uninterrupted from February, 1851, the time when he bought, until this present time.

Master's Finding.

It is sought by Lower in this bill to avoid the consequences of his contract with Wightman for the sale or exchange of the Brushvalley farm upon three several grounds.

1st. That his consent to the contract and the execution and delivery of the deed was obtained from him by Wightman through fraud and misrepresentation.

2d. That the deed of October 30th, 1865, by Wightman to Nevins was a mere pretence, done in bad faith, for the purpose of avoiding the fraud perpetrated on Lower by Wightman, and without consideration.

3d. That even if for valuable considerations, Nevins at the time of his purchase, had such notice, either actual or constructive, of the fraud, as takes from him the character of an innocent purchaser, for value without notice.

The first of these propositions, we think, is fully sustained by the evidence, and we do therefore find that John Wightman on the 5th day of October, 1865, at and immediately before the signing of the agreement for the sale or exchange of the Brushvalley farm, and the execution of the deed for the same by Lower and wife, practiced such a fraud, either knowingly and wilfully, or otherwise, upon him, by misrepresenting the character, quality and value of the Wisconsin lands, as would in Wightman's hands, render the contract null and void, and require at the hand of a chancellor such relief as is sought for in this bill.

With reference to the second proposition of the complainant, we have failed to discover that the contract of exchange between Wightman and Nevins was a mere pretence. On the contrary, we find that the deed from Wightman to Nevins for the Brushvalley farm was based upon a good and valuable consideration, viz.: A conveyance of the title of the hotel property in New Brighton.

As to the third proposition we find that Nevins, at the time of his purchase, had no notice, either actual or constructive, of the fraud practiced on Lower by Wightman, and that he was an innocent purchaser for value actually paid.

We do further find that on the 5th day of August, A. D. 1869, the complainant Lower, by his counsel, made a tender to the counsel of John Wightman of a deed reconveying the Wisconsin land to him, and also the sum of sixty-one dollars and twenty-five cents, being the amount of money paid by Wightman to Lower at the time of their contract of October 5th, 1865, with interest thereon up to the date of the tender.

The master reported the following

Form of Decree.

And now, to wit: A. D. 1870, the cause coming on to be heard, and having been fully argued by counsel, after due consideration, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the bill of the complainant, Samuel Lower, be and the same is dismissed as against the respondent, John Nevins. And it is further ordered and adjudged, that the respondent, John Wightman, do pay to the complainant, Samuel Lower, the sum of $4.000, for his damages sustained by reason of the representations aforesaid, and that the said Samuel Lower do deliver up and surrender to said John Wightman the several deeds he has received from him for the lands in Wisconsin. And that respondent, Wightman, pay the costs of this proceeding.

Opinion of the Court Below.

Bill in equity.

Opinion by Logan, P. J. Delivered September 26th, 1872.

We had little difficulty in agreeing with the master that the evidence developed such elements of fraud in the original contract between Lower and Wightman, as demanded a decree either avoiding the obligation of that contract or compelling compensation in damage. A much closer question, however, to our mind, is as to whether Nevins was an innocent purchaser of valley farm from Wightman, without notice.

Before going into this, however, we may say that the application by Wightman's counsel to have the questions of fact referred to a jury, made on the final argument, if ever meritorious, is now much too late. After having submitted the determination of the facts to the arbitrament of a master, and having taken the chances of a finding in their favor, they cannot now after an adverse finding select a new tribunal. No allegation of unfairness or charge of partiality is made against the master nor is it presumed any such could be sustained. There is therefore nothing to induce us to grant the request. It is due to the master to say, that his report is elaborate and seems to be candid, and his conclusions probably nearer the truth than the finding of a jury. Turning then to the question as to whether Nevins was an innocent purchaser for value without notice, we will for our own convenience inquire first, whether or not under the facts and circumstances he had constructive notice.

We are free to say that our first impression was that the master erred in not holding these to have been constructive notice, growing out of the fact of the possession by Lower of the land at the time of Nevins' purchase. We did not then think the position of the master sound in ruling—that the fact of a contract of lease, the term of which had not yet begun, constituted Lower's possession as equivocal as to take it without the rule that possession is notice. The master's doctrine seemed to us a dangerous encroachment on a wise and benificent rule of law, and we therefore have given the matter most careful and extended examination.

If it had appeared that on inquiry by Nevins of Lower, then in possession of the land, at the time of his (Nevins') purchase, the fact of the fraud would have been discovered, in such event Nevins' failure to inquire would to us have seemed the absence of ordinary diligence, and therefore constructive notice. In this view the fact of an existing contract for a future lease would not explain a present possession. If Lower became aware of the fraud after the 2d of March, 1866 (the date of the contract of lease of Wightman to Lower), and before the 24th of March, 1866, (the date of the delivery of deed by Wightman to Nevins), he had a right to depend on his possession as notice up until the 1st day of April, 1866, the time at which the tenure under the lease began. After this the burthen would have been on him, as against any one with a knowledge of the lease to have given actual notice. The question then to our mind largely turns on the fact as to the time when Lower first became advised of the fraud perpetrated by Wightman. In short, whether or not at the time of the purchase by Nevins from Wightman, which was on the 24th of March, 1866, and before the term of the lease began, Lower was in a position to have advised Nevins of the fact of the fraud and his claim to the title, despite his deed to Wightman by virtue of that fraud.

Nevins should not be prejudiced by not having made an inquiry, which if made would have been fruitless, and not have insured to the protection of Lower. If on the 24th of March, 1866, Lower had not notice of the fraud, he was in full recognition of Wightman's title, and an inquiry then by Nevins must have resulted in such information as would fairly have induced Nevins to conclude the purchase from Wightman.

As to this fact, namely, the time when Lower first discovered the fraud, the master's report does not advise us, except, as incidentally referred to in supplementary finding. The master's report is, however, so exhaustive of the general features of the case, and this being a single fact discernible by an examination of the testimony, we can have little difficulty in determining it, guided by the supplementary report.

Bringing to the inquiry our utmost care, we are led, after an examination of all the evidence, by the testimony of Samuel Lower, the plaintiff, in answer to interrogatory "41," taken in connection with the testimony of Esquire McCrea, to the conclusion, that Lower did not know of the fraud until July or August, 1866. In this connection, Samuel Lower in substance says, that he did not know at the time of signing the lease that the representations made by Wightman as to the quality, location and value of the western lands, was not correct, and that the first he knew of this was after he got Esquire McCrea to examine the deeds. From Esquire McCrea's testimony, we learn that this examination was in July or August, 1866.

We, of course, make no reference to the testimony of Wightman, Nevins or Nelson in this connection. We rely upon the declarations of Lower, testifying as to a matter against his own interests and peculiarly within his own knowledge, as connected and explained by Thompson McCrea, a wholly disinterested, uncontradicted and unimpeached witness.

Wherefore, as by inquiry Nevins could have discovered no fact at the time of his purchase by an inquiry of Lower, inconsistent with the face of the papers, he was not bound to make inquiry, and in view of this and all the circumstances in the cause, we must conclude there was no constructive notice.

Coming then to the question of actual notice to and alleged complicity with Wightman by Nevins, we have a difficult and anxious inquiry. In the testimony, conflict and contradiction seem apparently irreconcilable. In treating this question, we shall look indifferently to the first and second reports, and the testimony attached to each. We may also find it convenient to treat together allegations of notice and complicity.

Robert Nelson swears positively to actual notice, sufficiently direct, positive and express, if the strongest expressions were to be given credence, to bring it within the rule of the closest case. He is corroborated by the testimony of Wightman in his supplemental examination, who also swears to actual notice in Nevins of Lower's allegation of fraud. Nelson is also corroborated by Alex. Taylor, Esq., who swears to having heard Nevins say to Nelson, shortly after his examination and during the same day, that what he had sworn was true, save as to some immaterial matter. This would have constituted an admission by Nevins of the fact of his having notice, inasmuch as Nelson testified to having given such notice, or otherwise, evidence of complicity with Wightman. This position is somewhat further sustained by the fact of the price of the Huron House—the precedent negotiations—the singular reticence of Dr. Nevins in his first examination as to Nelson and his profuseness on this subject in his later testimony, as also other less significant circumstances developed in the cause. This much as to affirmation of evidence of actual notice and complicity.

On the other hand, we have, however, the fact that up until the first report of the master there is no allegation of prior notice in Nevins, but on the contrary, this fact stood distinctly negatived in the testimony (vide reference to Lower's testimony, supra). Dr. Nevins, in terms, positively contradicts the fact of notice under oath, and explains with some plausibility his connection with Nelson. He also denies the fact that the negotiations with Wightman were in a part delayed from November, 1865, until March, 1866, by reason of his claiming a general warranty deed, induced by a fear of difficulty in getting possession. He attributed the delay entirely to a difficulty as to some articles of personal property, and in this he is corroborated by the testimony of Wm. J. Paulhamus, and still more strongly by the fact that in none of the letters which passed between the parties at the time upon the subject, so far as they are in evidence, is there any mention made of the difficulty in getting possession.

We then had the character of Nelson for truth attacked. This effort, however, the master quaintly remarks, "was not attended with such satisfactory results as he (Dr. Nevins) would have wished for." How strong Dr. N. wished the testimony we cannot say, but that it is largely weak, if evident.

To these, with certain other circumstances, more or less pregnant on his side, is added the finding of the master. Is this finding then sustained by these facts?

It might be conceded, that without the testimony of Lower, before referred to, we would have difficulty in sustaining the master. We cannot, however, imagine that Lower could be mistaken in saying he was not informed of the fraud until he took the deeds to McCrea. If so, this fact is wholly irreconcilable with any such construction of Nelson's testimony as would constitute notice from Lower to Nevins of the fraud. The master did not so credit this testimony of Nelson's. Nor can we, in the light of the testimony and the master's finding, give it the full force sought by the complainants and Wightman's counsel.

We have no doubt that Nelson is mistaken in so far as he contradicts the testimony of Lower, and therefore Nevins could not before his purchase from Wightman have received notice of the fraud from Lower. That Lower, earlier than his actual discovery of the fraud, might have felt in sympathy with his now deceased wife's anguish, in giving up the homestead, of which we are informed in the testimony, and in popular parlance, thought himself cheated by Wightman's fairly getting a good bargain out of him, is possible.

Or it may be that he regarded as cheating, those blandishments allowable by the laws of trade, though responsible to morals through the seductive influences of which Wightman, without actual fraud, had led him into a contract that broke up the family association, sending them from the quiet and peaceful Indiana to the great west, where, as we learn from the testimony, the neighbors told him the Indians were. All this we say is possible, but would not have avoided the contract, and if told to Nevins would not necessarily have been notice. But that Nevins had notice from Lower on or before 24th of March, 1866, of the fraud charged in the bill and which moved the master to sustain the recovery against Wightman, and now moves this court to sustain this action of the master, we cannot believe.

As to whether Nevins had notice of the fact of the fraud from Wightman, or in other words was a party to it, the testimony is at most, conflicting and contradictory. Supposing Nelson to have received his knowledge of the fraud from Wightman, and communicated to Nevins, we would then have him in conflict with himself, and the force of his testimony destroyed. Or looking at the allegation that Nevins was privy to Wightman's fraud, we again glance over the testimony, and find nothing clear and satisfactory pointing to such a conclusion.

No element in the cause seems to invite us in the aid of justice to a reversal of the master's finding upon these questions of fact. Something, and not a little, is due to the conclusions of a master upon such questions. He has the witnesses before him, sees their expressions, their conduct and actions are reflected upon him, and he sympathizes with their motives, therefore his construction of the testimony is entitled to great weight.

Besides, to him is committed questions of fact. Still, apparent injustice or even a marked weight of authority would have moved us. Despite his conclusions of the existence of such in this case, we are not convinced.

It is very much urged by counsel of Wightman, that the master overstepped his power in imposing pecuniary compensation upon Wightman, and that the court has no power to enforce such decree. To this it is enough to say that the authorities referred to by the counsel on argument, fully vindicate the action of the master, and the fact of this case seems with great force to invoke the exercise of such power.

We may also here refer, although somewhat out of order, to the position taken by counsel, that no tender of reconveyance or repayment of the $50 paid by Wightman, preceded the institution of these proceedings. Such tender has, however, been made, and is at present on deposit for the benefit of the defendant. We have not been able to regard the failure to make such tender earlier, as sufficient, under the circumstances at this late day, to dismiss the case with costs.

Wherefore, and now July 26th, 1872, the exceptions to the report of the master are overruled and the report of the master confirmed, and the report adopted as the judgment of the court. It is further directed that a decree conformable to such judgment be drawn by counsel and presented to the court according to equity rules Nos. 78 and 79, and it is further ordered, should the complainant's counsel choose to avail themselves of the privileges of the 80th rule, that the amount entered and indexed shall be the net sum of $4.000, with interest from the 9th of June, 1870.

DECREE OF COURT BELOW.

And now, to wit, September 26th, 1872, the cause coming on to be heard, and having been fully argued by counsel after due consideration it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that bill of the complainant, Samuel Lower, be and the same is hereby dismissed, as against the respondent, John Nevins.

And it is further ordered and adjudged, that the respondent, John Wightman, do pay the complainant, Samuel Lower, the sum of $4,000, with interest thereon from the 9th day of June, A. D. 1870, for his damage sustained by reason of the representations aforesaid, and that the said Samuel Lower do deliver up and surrender to said John Wightman, the several deeds he has received from him for the lands in Wisconsin, and that the respondent, Wightman, pay the costs of this proceeding. And it is further ordered, that the compensation of A. C. Boyle, Esq., the master in this case, be fixed at $400. The parties by their counsel being present, waive notice of the making and entering of this decree. (By the court.)

ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR,

By complainant, Samuel Lower.

1. The court erred in dismissing complainant's bill, as against the respondent, John Nevins.

2 The court erred in finding that John Nevins was a bona fide purchaser, without notice, actual or constructive.

3. The court erred in not ordering the agreement between Lower and Wightman, and the deed made in pursuance thereof, dated October 5th, 1865, to be delivered up and cancelled, for the reason that they were fraudulent and void.

4. The court erred in not decreeing the deed of October 30th, 1865, John Wightman to John Nevins, null and void, as against Samuel Lower.

ARGUMENT FOR NEVINS, APPELLEE.

The controversy embraces three distinct parties, each having separate and independent interests to protect, each being represented by his own counsel, and each occupying a position antagonistic to the others.

Lower, the complainant, demands—

First. A cancellation of his deed to Wightman, and also of the deed from Wightman to Nevins;

Or, failing in this—

Second. Compensation from Wightman for the injury sustained by reason of the alleged fraud.

Wightman, one of the respondents, defends—

1. By a denial of the fraud alleged to have been perpetrated upon Lower;

Or, failing in this—

2. He seeks to aid Lower, in carrying notice to Dr. Nevins, and thus, by making Nevins the victim, instead of Lower, save himself from the consequences of the decree for damages.

Dr. Nevins' defence consists in this only—

That he was an innocent and bona fide purchaser of the lands in controversy from Wightman, for value, without notice, either actual or constructive, of any fraud having been perpetrated upon Lower, if there was any such fraud. This is the only defence set up in his answer, and the only one which he has attempted to rely upon throughout the whole conduct of the case. We refer the argument on the question of the alleged fraud of Wightman to his own counsel, as this is a question peculiarly affecting him, whilst we, representing Nevins, will confine our argument to the question of notice as affecting Dr. Nevins.

Assuming, then, the fraud of Wightman, had Dr. Nevins, at the time of his purchase, notice, either actual or constructive, of such fraud?

1. The master found, as matter of fact, that Nevins had no actual notice. See also page 16 of plaintiff's book.

The finding of the master is, perhaps, not conclusive, but it is entitled to great weight. He had the witnesses before him and saw their manner and method of testifying. He had abundant time and opportunity to sift the facts, and intelligently to weigh the testimony. 18 P. F. Smith, 130. His finding, when reported to the court, is said, in Clark's Appeal 12 P. F. Smith, 450, to be somewhat like a special verdict. Its soundness, however, may be tested on exceptions in the court below.

The court reviewing the findings of the master upon the exceptions filed, say:—

"The master did not so credit the testimony of Nelson, nor can we, in the light of the testimony and the master's finding, give it the full force sought by the complainant's and Wightman's counsel. We have no doubt that Nelson is mistaken, in so far as he contradicts the testimony of Lower, and, therefore, Nevins could not, before his purchase from Wightman, have received notice of the fraud of Lower" (Plaintiff's book, page 35).

When the court below approve of the master's finding, after argument on the exceptions, it will require very clear and satisfactory proof of a mistake to reverse his finding. Clark's Appeal, 12 P. F. Smith, 450.

Kerns v. Swope, 2 Watts, 78; Ripple v. Ripple, 1 Rawle, 390; Woods v. Farmere, 7 Watts, 387; 8 S & R. 496; 14 S & R. 334, cited as authorities as to what is evidence of notice.

2. It is settled that actual and unequivocal possession is notice, not so much, however, because possession is evidence of actual notice, as because it is the duty of one about to purchase real estate to ascertain by whom, and in what right, it is held or occupied Brightly's Equity, sec. 116.

4. But there is a corresponding duty on the part of the occupier, that he shall maintain his possession consistently with his claim. If he claims under one title, he should not record or register another, else his possession will only protect the title which he thus registers or records. By exhibiting a conveyance to which, by his own showing, his possession may be referred, he does what he can to turn a purchaser from the direct path of inquiry. Possession alone would have led to a particular examination of the foundation of it. When the occupant, therefore, points the attention of the public to a particular conveyance or title, he abandons every other index. Woods v. Farmere, 7 Watts, 384. Whilst this principle is directly referable to the recording or registering of titles, and the constructive notice consequent therefrom, application must be made of it, when the occupant executes and publishes any instrument of writing which fully explains his possession, provided actual notice of such instrument is received by the purchaser, and he acts upon the faith of it; otherwise, the purchaser may be the victim of a fraud on part of the occupant. Supreme Court of New Hampshire.

HORN v. COLE et al.

If the owner of goods, to prevent them from being attached as his own, represent that they belong to another, and the party to whom the representation is made, relying, and from the circumstances having reason to rely, on the representation as true, attach the goods for a debt due from the party, to whom it was represented that the goods belonged, in trover for attaching the goods, the owner will not be permitted to show that his representation was false, though at the time when he made it he had no notice of the debt on which the goods were attached, and had no intention to deceive the party who attached them.

STATEMENT OF CASE.

Trover, against Cole and Green, for feather-beds, crockery, glass ware, &c. It appeared on trial that the plaintiff was contemplating to remove West; that his son, Charles E. Horn, had removed before, and was residing at Jefferson, Illinois. The plaintiff packed a box of goods and delivered them to the freight agent at East Milan, directed to Charles E. Horn, Jefferson, Illinois, and ordered them to be forwarded by freight on the railroad. The box started from Milan in the freight cars on the 29th of August, 1864.

The defendant Cole, having a note against Charles E. Horn, instituted a suit on it, and had the box and contents attached on the writ at Northumberland, on the same 29th of August; and the defendant Green is the officer who made the attachment. The plaintiff brought this suit on the 31st of the same August. On the 3d of September he procured a receipter for the goods, and had them forwarded according to the original direction. The suit of Cole against Charles E. Horn was settled by payment of debt and costs. The plaintiff, on his arrival at Jefferson, found the box and contents there in good condition. The plaintiff claimed damages for the detention of the goods, and for consequential damages.

The plaintiff testified that the goods all belonged to him when they were delivered to the railroad, and when they were attached.

The defendant Cole testified that the plaintiff, when carrying the box to the depot, passed by Cole's shop, and that he said to the plaintiff, "Are you going to leave us, Horn?" that Horn replied, "No; but Charles had some things at my house, and I took them, and put a few of my things with them into the box, and am sending them to Charles;" that the plaintiff then procured Cole to mark the box, as before stated. The evidence tended to show that the plaintiff made similar statements to others, before and after, as to the ownership of Charles E. Horn.

There was no evidence that the plaintiff knew Cole had any demand against Charles E. Horn.

The defendant Cole also testifies that, relying on this representation to him that the goods belonged to Charles E. Horn, he had procured his writ and caused the property to be attached as belonging to Charles E. Horn.

The plaintiff was not indebted to Cole, but there was evidence that he was indebted to others.

The jury returned a verdict for the defendants, which the plaintiff moves the court to set aside.—and contends that, in order that the plaintiff should be estopped by his statements to show that the goods were his, the statements must have been made with the knowledge that Cole had a debt against Charles E. Horn on which the goods might be attached; and that the plaintiff intended to deceive and defraud Cole.

Fletcher, for the plaintiff, cited Andrews v. Lyons, 11 Allen, 349; Coggill v. H. & N. H. Railroad, 3 Gray, 549; Osgood v. Nichols, 5 Gray 420; Audenried v. Betteley, 5 Allen, 384; Plumer v. Lord, 9 Allen 455; Langdon v. Doud, 10 Allen 437.

Ray, for the defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT.

By PERLEY, C. J. There is no complaint that the rulings and instructions of the court on the trial were erroneous or improper, provided the evidence warranted the jury in returning a verdict for the defendants; and the verdict must stand, if the evidence was competent to prove such representations by the plaintiff as would estop him to set up his title to the goods attached as the property of Charles E. Horn.

The evidence reported in the case was competent to prove that the plaintiff made the representations on the occasion and in the circumstances testified to by Cole; that the plaintiff, though not indebted to Cole, was in debt to others; that Cole, believing the representations to be true, and relying on them as true, caused the goods to be attached as the property of Charles E. Horn; and, also, that the plaintiff made these representations, knowing them to be false, with the intention that all persons who were interested in the subject should take them to be true and act on them as such, and with the intention to mislead and deceive all to whom the representations were communicated, and induce them to act on them as true; that his intention was to deceive his own creditors, and prevent them from taking the goods as his for the debts which he owed to them. These facts must be taken to have been established by the verdict.

But, as there was no evidence that the plaintiff knew Cole had any demand against Charles E. Horn, we cannot infer that the plaintiff had Cole in his mind as an individual whom he meant to deceive by his false representations, or that he had an intent to prevent Cole from taking the goods for a debt which he owed to Cole, as he owed no such debt; and, on the evidence reported, the jury were not at liberty to find that the plaintiff had Cole in his mind as an individual whom he meant to deceive and defraud by inducing him to take the goods for his demand against Charles E. Horn. This raises the point, which the counsel for the plaintiff takes, whether, to estop a party from showing that his representations were false, it is necessary that the false representations should have been intended to deceive and defraud the individual party who trusted to them and acted on them, provided there was a general intention to deceive and defraud all persons who were interested in the subject matter of the false representations.

The ground on which a party is precluded from proving that his representations on which another has acted were false, is, that to permit it would be contrary to equity and good conscience. This has been sometimes called an equitable estoppel, because the jurisdiction of enforcing this equity belonged originally and peculiarly to courts of equity, and does not appear to have been familiarly exercised at law until within a comparatively recent date; and, so far as relates to suits at law affecting the title to land, I understand that in England and in some of the United States, the jurisdiction is still confined to courts of equity. Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 166, 168; Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. 174, 178; Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & Ellis, 469. The doctrine, however, is a very old head of equity, and is recognized and applied in a great number of the early cases. Dyer v. Dyer, 2 Ch. Cases, 108; Teasdale v. Teasdale, 13 Viner, 539; Hobbs v. Norton, 1 Vernon, 136; Gale v. Lindo, 1 Vernon, 475; Hunsden v. Cheyney, 2 Vernon, 150; Lumlee v. Hanman, 2 Vernon, 499; Raw v. Pote, 2 Vernon, 239; Blanchet v. Foster, 2 Ves. 264; East Ind. Co. v. Vincent, 2 Atkins, 83; Stiles v. Cowper 3 Atkins, 693; Farmer v. Webber, 13 Viner Abr. 525—2 Brown's Parl. Cases 88—2 Eq. Cases Abr. 481; Neville v. Wilkinson, 1 Bro. C. C. 543; Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 166; Strong v. Ellsworth, 26 Vt. 366.

Many of these cases related to underhand agreements in fraud of marriage settlements; but the principle is of general application. 1 Fonblanque Eq. 267, note (x). Relief was given according to the circumstances of the case—sometimes by enjoining suits at law, in which the legal title was set up, and sometimes by decreeing conveyances and the cancelling of deeds and other instruments; but in all these cases relief was given in equity contrary to the strict legal rights of the defendants.

Thus, in the case of an equitable estoppel, a party is not allowed to assert his strict legal right, because in the circumstances of the individual case, it would be contrary to equity and good conscience. Take the present case for an illustration. In trover, following the legal definition of the action, if the plantiff proves property in himself and a conversion by the defendant, he has maintained his action, and is entitled to a verdict and judgment. It is conceded that the plaintiff owned the goods, and that the defendants converted them. The defence here set up appeals from the strict rule at law to the equitable doctrine that a party shall not be allowed to exercise his legal right of proving the facts, if, on account of his previous declarations or conduct, it would be contrary to equity and good conscience. So in a writ of entry; by the technical rules at law, if the demandant proves seisin in himself and a disseisin by the tenant within the time of limitation, he is entitled to judgment; but if the demandant, having a dormant title to the land demanded, concealed his title and encouraged the tenant to purchase from another, he is not allowed in our practice to set up his legal title, because it would be contrary to equity and good conscience.

It thus appears that what has been called an equitable estoppel, and sometimes with less propriety an estoppel in pais, is properly and peculiarly a doctrine of equity, originally introduced there to prevent a party from taking a dishonest and unconscientious advantage of his strict legal rights,—though now with us, like many other doctrines of equity, habitually administered at law. But formerly the practice was different, and suits at law, the courts being incapable of giving effect to this equity, were often enjoined where the party insisted on his rights at law contrary to the equitable doctrine, as in Raw v. Pote, Stiles v. Cowper, and Farmer v. Webber, qua supra.

It would have a tendency to mislead us in the present inquiry, as there is reason to suspect that it has sometimes misled others, if we should confound this doctrine of equity with the legal estoppel by matter in pais. The equitable estoppel and legal estoppel agree, indeed, in this, that they both preclude from showing the truth in the individual case. The grounds, however, on which they do it are not only different, but directly opposite. The legal estoppel shuts out the truth, and also the equity and justice of the individual case, on account of the supposed paramount importance of rigorously enforcing a certain and unvarying maxim of the law. For reasons of general policy, a record is held to import incontrovertible verity, and for the same reason a party is not permitted to contradict his solemn admission by deed. And the same is equally true of legal estoppels by matter in pais. Certain acts done out of court and without deed were, by a technical and unyielding rule of law, upheld on like grounds of public policy, and followed always by certain legal consequences. The legal effect of such acts was not permitted to be controverted by proof.

Thus, if one accepts a lease and enters under it, he is estopped to claim any other estate in the land during the term; he cannot show that he owned the land when the lease was made. Estoppels by matter in pais were few in number, and all of this general and well defined character; and they all enforced some technical rule of the law against the truth, and also against the justice and equity of the individual case. Coke, in his examination of the different kinds of estoppel by matter in pais, enumerates the following: "By livery, by entry, by acceptance of rent, by partition, and by acceptance of an estate." Co. Lit. 352, a. In Lyon v. Reed, 13 M. & W. 309, Parke, B., speaking of legal estoppels by matter in pais, says: "They are but few, and are pointed out by Ld. Coke, Co. Lit. 352, a. They are all cases which anciently really were and in contemplation of law have always continued to be, acts of notoriety no less solemn than the execution of a deed, such as livery, acceptance of an estate, and the like. Whether a party had or had not concurred in an act of this sort was deemed a matter which there could be no difficulty in ascertaining, and then the legal consequences follow."

In the authorities which contain the most complete enumeration of the different kinds of legal estoppels and the fullest discussion of the law on the subject, I find no allusion to the equitable estoppel which we are now considering. All legal estoppels, whether by record, by deed, or by matter in pais, depended on strict legal rules, and shut out proof of the truth and justice of the individual case. Viner's Abr., Estoppel, passim; Lyon v. Reed, 13 M. & W. 309; Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Ex. 658.

For this reason, because legal estoppels, whether by record, deed, or matter in pais, shut out proof of the truth and justice of individual cases, they have been called odious, and have been construed with much strictness against parties that set them up. They were formerly required, like other defences regarded as inequitable, to be pleaded with certainty to a certain intent in every particular. If they were relied on by way of averment and tried by the jury, the jury might find, and according to some authorities were bound by their oath veritatem dicere to find, according to the truth of the case regard less of the estoppel. Trials Per Pais, 284; Co. Lit. 227, a; Com. Dig., Estoppel (S. 5). The practice is now different, and legal estoppels may be relied on, when given in evidence, without being specially pleaded. Legal estoppels exclude evidence of the truth and the equity of the particular case to support a strict rule of law, on grounds of public policy.

Equitable estoppels are admitted on the exactly opposite ground of promoting the equity and justice of the individual case, by preventing a party from asserting his rights under a general technical rule of law, when he has so conducted himself that it would be contrary to equity and good conscience for him to allege and prove the truth. The facts upon which equitable estoppels depend are usually proved by oral evidence; and the evidence should doubtless be carefully scrutinized, and be full and satisfactory, before it should be admitted to estop the party from showing the truth, especially in cases affecting the title to land. But where the facts are clearly proved, the maxim that estoppels are odious,—which was used in reference to legal estoppels, because they shut out the truth and justice of the case,—ought not to be applied to these equitable estoppels, as it has sometimes been, inadvertently as I think, from a supposed analogy with the legal estoppel by matter in pa , to which they have, in this respect, no resemblance whatever. Ld. Campbell, in Howard v. Hudson. 2 Ellis & Bl. 10; Andrews v. Lyons, 11 Allen, 349, 351. In other cases, where more attention has been paid to the real nature of this equitable doctrine, it has been held that such estoppels are not odious, and to be construed strictly, but are entitled to a fair and liberal application, like other equitable doctrines which are admitted to suppress fraud and promote honesty and fair dealing. Mellor and Compton, Justices, in Ashpitel v. Bryan, 3 Best & Smith, 472; Cowen, J., in Dezell v. Odell, 3 Hill, 220; Com. v. Motz, 10 Barr, 530, 531; Buckingham v. Hanna, 2 Ohio St. 557; Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 Howard, 326; Preston v Mann, 25 Conn. 118, 128

In this equitable estoppel, the party is forbidden to set up his legal title, because he has so conducted himself that to do it would be contrary to equity and good conscience. As in other cases of fraud and dishonesty, the circumstances out of which the question may arise are of infinite variety; and, unless courts at law are willing to abdicate the duty of administering the equitable doctrine effectually in suppression of fraud and dishonesty, the application of it cannot be confined within the limit of any narrow technical definition, such as will relieve courts from looking, as in other cases depending on fraud and dishonesty, to the circumstances of each individual case. Certain general rules will doubtless apply, as in other cases where relief is sought on such grounds. But I find myself unable to agree with the authorities where the old maxim, that legal estoppels are odious, has been applied to this equitable estoppel, and where attempts have been made to lay down strict definitions, such as would defeat the remedy in a large proportion of the cases that fall within the principle on which the doctrine is founded.

The doctrine having been borrowed from equity, courts at law that have adopted it should obviously look to the practice in equity for their guide in the application of it; and in equity, the doctrine has been liberally applied to suppress fraud and enforce honesty and fair dealing, without any attempt to confine the doctrine within the limits of a strict definition. For instance, the doctrine has not in equity been limited to cases where there was an actual intention to deceive. The cases are numerous where the party who was estopped by his declarations or his conduct to set up his legal title, was ignorant of it at the time, and of course could have had no actual intention to deceive by concealing his title. Yet, if the circumstances were such that he ought to have informed himself, it has been held to be contrary to equity and good conscience to set up his title, though he was in fact ignorant of it when he made the representations. Hobbs v. Norton, Hunsden v. Cheyney, Teasdale v. Teasdale, qua supra; and Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. 470. So if the party knew the facts, but mistook the law. Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 166. Nor is it necessary in equity that the intention should be to deceive any particular individual or individuals. If the representations are such, and made in such circumstances, that all persons interested in the subject have the right to rely on them as true, their truth cannot be denied by the party that has made them against any one who has trusted to them and acted on them. Gale v. Lindo, Farmer v. Webber, qua supra.

In the much and well considered case of Preston v. Mann, 25 Conn. 118, 128, Storrs, J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The doctrine of estoppel in pais, notwithstanding the great number of cases which have turned upon it and are reported in the books, cannot be said even yet to rest upon any determinate legal test which will reconcile the decisions, or will embrace all transactions to which the general principles of equitable necessity wherein it originated demand that it should be applied. In fact, it is because it is so peculiarly a doctrine of practical equity, that its technical application is so difficult, and its reduction to the form of abstract formulas is still unaccomplished." This was said in 1856, and little has since been done towards extricating the doctrine from the confusion and conflict of authority with which it was then embarrassed. This, as I think, has been caused by the fact that courts have continued to exercise their ingenuity in the vain attempt to compress a broad doctrine of equity within the narrow limits of a technical definition.

The case of Pickard v. Sears, 6 Ad. & Ellis, 469, decided as late as 1837, appears to have been regarded, both in England and in this country, as the leading case at law on this subject. It was trover by the mortgagee of personal goods against the defendants, who were purchasers at a sheriff's sale on execution against the mortgagor. The facts set up in defence were, that the plaintiff was present at the sale, did not disclose his title as mortgagee, and encouraged the defendants to purchase. The question on trial was as to the property of the plaintiff in the goods, and Ld. Denman directed a verdict for the plaintiff. A rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside was made absolute.

In delivering the judgment of the court, Ld. Denman said: "His (the plaintiff's) title having been established, the property could only be divested by gift or sale, of which no specific act was even surmised. But the rule of law is clear, that where one, by his words or conduct, wilfully causes another to believe the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring a different state of things as existing at the same time; and the plaintiff might have parted with his interest in the property by a verbal gift or sale, without any other formalities that threw technical difficulties in the way of legal evidence. And we think his conduct in standing by and giving a kind of sanction to the proceedings under the execution was a fact of such a nature that the opinion of the jury ought to have been taken whether he had not, in point of fact, ceased to be the owner."

It is worthy of note, that in this suit at law the court, so late as 1837, after stating the general equitable doctrine, did not venture to put the defence directly on the ground that the plaintiff was estopped by his conduct to prove the truth of the case, but allowed the facts to go to the jury as evidence that the plaintiff, in some undefined and mysterious way, had parted with his property in the goods; so late and so reluctant were the courts to admit in suits at law this defence, which depended on fraud and dishonesty, and which belonged, originally and appropriately, to the jurisdiction in equity.

It can hardly be supposed that Ld. Denman, in the statement which he made of this equitable doctrine in reference to the facts of that case, understood that he was laying down a technical definition fixing the limits of the doctrine, and excluding all cases that did not come clearly within the terms which he used on that occasion. Nevertheless, these remarks of Ld. Denman have often being treated as a sort of authoritative text, covering the whole ground, which it was the business of courts in later cases to expound and explain. And it is curious to observe what different and contradictory interpretations have been put on his statement of the equitable doctrine. It has been cited in Massachusetts as authority for decisions, in which it has been held that the representations, to estop the party from showing they were not true, must have been made with the intent to deceive, and the intent to deceive the party who sets up the defence. Plumer v. Lord, 9 Allen, 455; Andrews v. Lyons, 11 Allen, 349. And in California the same case has been relied on for the rule that where a representation comes in any way to the ears of a party, who acts on it, the party making the representation is estopped to deny its truth, unless it had the character of a confidential communication. Mitchell v. Reed, 9 Cal. 204. In England it has been treated as a statement of the equitable doctrine made in reference to the circumstances of that case, and not intended as a formal and complete definition. Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Ex. 654; Gregg v. Wells, 10 A. & E. 90; Jorden v. Money, 5 House of Lords Cases, 212.

It would be a laborious and not a profitable task to attempt an analysis of all the recent decisions on this subject. I will briefly advert to some of those which appear to be the most important.

In Plumer v. Lord, 9 Allen, 455, it was held that to create an estoppel in pais, the declarations or acts must have been accompanied with a design to mislead; and Langdon v. Doud, 10 Allen, 433, is to the same point. In Andrews v. Lyons, 11 Allen, 349, the court went one step further, and decided that the declarations or acts must have been accompanied with a design to deceive the party who sets up the estoppel, and induce him to act on them; and in this last case it is said that such an estoppel shuts out the truth, and is odious, and must be strictly proved. In Hawes v. Marchant, 1 Curtis C. C. 144, the rule is laid down that to be estopped the party must have designedly made admissions inconsistent with the defence or claim which he proposes to set up, and another, with his knowledge and consent, so acted on this admission that he will be injured by allowing the admission to be disputed; and this rule is cited and apparently approved in Audenried v. Betteley, 5 Allen, 382.

In these cases it is to be observed, the court have not been content with saying, in reference to the facts before them, that if certain things concurred in the case, it would fall within the equitable doctrine, and the party would be estopped, but they have undertaken to lay down a strict legal definition of general application, excluding from the operation of the doctrine all cases that do not fall within the terms of the definition. Applying the rule, as laid down in Hawes v. Merchant, to the present case; if Horn had known that Cole had a demand against Charles E. Horn, had falsely represented to Cole that the goods belonged to Charles, with the design to deceive him and induce him to attach the goods as the property of Charles, and Cole, relying on the representation, had taken the goods as the property of Charles and as Horn intended, yet, if after he had made the false representation he did not know that the goods were taken, as the property of Charles, and assent that they should be so taken, he would not be estopped to set up his own title in the goods. The statement that another party must have acted on the false statement with his knowledge and assent, must mean this, or it can mean nothing; for he could not know that he had acted on it at all until the act was done and accomplished.

The remark of Lord Campbell in Howard v. Hudson, qua supra, though not called for by the case, is to the effect that the representation must have been intended to deceive.

The authorities would seem to sustain the plaintiff's counsel fully in his position that the false representation must not only be intended to deceive, but also to deceive the identical party that acted on them.

There are, however, authorities of equal respectability, and in greater numbers, which maintain a different doctrine.

In England, the case of Pickard v. Sears does not appear to have been understood as intended to lay down a complete definition of the equitable doctrine excluding all cases that could not be brought within the terms of the remarks made by Lord Denman. In Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Ex. 654, it was held that the term wilfully, used in Pickard v. Sears, was not to be understood in the sense of maliciously; and that whatever a man's real meaning may be, if he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe it was meant he should act on it, and he did act on it as true, the party making the representation would be equally precluded from contesting its truth. This is wholly inconsistent with the notion that an intention to deceive is an essential ingredient of the representation, which precludes the party making it from showing that it was false. So in Jorden v. Money, 5 House of Lords Cases, 212, it was held not to be necessary that the party making the representations should know that they were false; that no fraud need have been intended at the time; but if the party unwittingly misled another, you must add that he has misled him under such circumstances that he had reasonable ground for supposing that the person whom he was misleading would act upon what he was saying.

In Gregg v. Wells, 10 A. & E. 90, Lord Denman says: "Pickard v. Sears was in my mind at the time of the trial, and the principle of that case may be stated even more broadly than it is there laid down. A party who negligently or culpably stands by and allows another to contract on the faith and understanding of a fact which he can contradict, cannot afterwards dispute that fact in the action against the person whom he has himself assisted in deceiving." This shows that Lord Denman did not himself understand that his remarks in Pickard v. Sears were to be taken as a definition and limitation of the equitable doctrine, for he says the principle of the case might be stated more broadly than it is laid down there, and may include the case of a culpable negligence. So Hobbs v. Norton, 1 Vernon, 136; Hunsden v. Cheyney, 2 Vernon, 150, Teasdale v. Teasdale, 13 Viner, 539, Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. 475, before cited, show that the practice in equity does not require that there should in all cases be an intention to deceive, or even a knowledge that the representation was false.

We come now to the decisions in this country, which give a broader application to this doctrine than those before cited.

In Dezell v. Odell, 3 Hill, 221, the general doctrine is said to be that when a party, either by his declarations or his conduct, has influenced a third person to act in a particular manner, he will not be afterwards permitted to deny the truth of the admission, if the consequence would be to work an injury to such third person, and that in such case it must appear, first, that he made an admission which is clearly inconsistent with the evidence he proposes to give, or the claim which he proposes to set up; second, that the party has acted on the admission; third, that he will be injured by allowing the truth of the admission to be disputed. According to this interpretation of the equitable doctrine, it would seem not to be necessary that the representation should be intended to deceive, or that the party making it should know it to be false, or that it should be intended the party should act on it, who does so in fact, and is deceived by it. The rule of this case has been adopted and followed in Newman v. Hood, 37 Mis. 207; Carpenter v. Stillwell, 12 Barb. 135. and Eldred v. Hazlett, 33 Penn. St. 316.

In Roe v. Jerome, 18 Conn. 138, the general doctrine is stated to be, that where one person by his words or conduct causes another to believe in a certain state of things, and thus induces him to act on that belief, so as injuriously to affect his previous position, he is concluded from averring a different state of things as existing at the time; and this rule was followed in the later cases of Cowles v. Bacon, 21 Conn. 451, and Dyer v. Cady, 20 Conn. 563; and in Preston v. Mann, 25 Conn. 118, before cited, it is said that the doctrine did not then rest on any determinate legal test which will embrace all transactions to which the general principles of equity, in which it originated, demand that it should be applied.

Buchanan v. Moore, 13 S. & R. 304, 306, is to the point that though the party believed his representation to be true, and made it under a mistake, he is estopped to show that he made the representation innocently believing it to be true, provided the other party acted on it, and had reason to act on it, as true. So in Strong v. Ellsworth, 26 Vt. 366, it is said by Redfield, C. J., that he who by his words or actions, or his silence even, intentionally or carelessly induces another to do an act which he would not otherwise have done, and which will prove injurious to him if he is not allowed to insist on the fulfilment, may insist on such fulfilment, and that the doctrine of equitable estoppels lies at the foundation of morals. In Mitchell v. Reed, 9 Cal. 204, it was held that where a statement made to a third person is not confidential, but general, and is acted on by others, the party making the declaration is estopped to deny its truth; that the intention with which the declaration is made is not material, except, perhaps, where it is confidential. This case, and Quirk v. Thomas, 6 Mich. 76. are authorities that to work the estoppel it is not necessary the declaration should be made to the party who acts on it, nor in his presence, nor that the declaration should be intended to come to the knowledge of any particular person.

In a suit at law to recover damages for a false affirmation that the signer of a note was of age, it was decided, in Lobdell v. Baker, 1 Met. 193, that it was not necessary to allege or prove that the defendant knew the signer was an infant. Wilde, J., in delivering the opinion of the court said: "A party may render himself liable in an action for damages to a party prejudiced by a false affirmation, though not made with any fraudulent intention." This, it may be said, is not directly in point, but the only difference is in the form of the remedy. The principle involved is the same, whether the question is raised in a suit to recover damages for the false representation, or redress is sought by estopping the party to prove the falsehood of the representation. Both cases go on the same general ground, that the party is responsible for the consequences of his false representation.

There are numerous authorities that it is not necessary to the estoppel that the declarations or conduct should be intended to deceive any particular person or persons; that if they were intended to deceive generally, or were of such a character and made in such circumstances that it must have been understood they were likely to deceive, and any person using due diligence was in fact deceived by them, it is enough. Gregg v. Wells, 10 A. & E. 90; Wendell v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Johns. Ch. 353; Adams County v. Brown, 16 Ohio St. 78; Dezell v. Odell, 3 Hill. 221; Quirk v. Thomas, 6 Mich. 76; Mitchell v. Reed, 9 Cal. 204.

It has been declared in many cases that this equitable estoppel involves a question of legal ethics, and applies wherever a party has made a representation, by words or conduct, which he cannot in equity and good conscience prove to be false; and that this kind of estoppel, being a broad doctrine of equity, cannot be limited in application by the terms of any narrow legal definition. In the Canal Co. v. Hathaway, 8 Wend. 483, it is said by Sutherland, J., that the party is estopped when in good conscience and equity he ought not to be permitted to gainsay his admission; and in the same case, by Nelson, J., "from the means in which the party must avail himself of these estoppels, it is obvious there can be no fixed and settled rules of universal application." And in Dezell v. Odell, 3 Hill, 225, Bronson, J., adopting the language of Nelson, J., in the Canal Co. v. Hathaway, adds: "It is a question of ethics." In Strong v. Ellsworth, 26 Vt., Redfield, J., says, the doctrine lies at the foundation of morals. In Lucas v. Hart, 5 Iowa, 415, the court held that "in these estoppels there can be no fixed and settled rules of convenient application to regulate them as in technical legal estoppels; that in many, and probably in most instances, whether the act or admission shall operate as an estoppel or not, must depend on the circumstances of the case, though there are some general rules which may materially assist in the examination of such cases." In the application of these general rules to that case, the court decided that the acts and admissions of the respondent estopped him from asserting his title to the property in question; that to permit him to do it would be "unconscionable, and contrary to that fairness and honest dealing which courts of equity seek ever to promote and encourage."

In Frost v. The Saratoga Co., 5 Denio 154, it is said by Beardsley, C. J., that such an estoppel is a question of ethics, and is allowed to prevent fraud and injustice, and exists wherever a party cannot in good conscience gainsay his own acts or assertions. The case of Preston v. Mann, 25 Conn. 118, is strong to the point that this estoppel, depending on a broad doctrine of equity, cannot be governed in application by narrow and strict rules of construction, such as have prevailed in legal estoppels.

In some if not in most of the cases, in which it is said that if a party makes representations intending to deceive the party that acts on them, the equitable estoppel applies, it was not intended, as I think, to lay down a rule excluding all cases that did not fall within the statement made in reference to the facts of the case then under consideration; that what is said is not to be taken as a rule to limit and define the doctrine and exclude all other cases. They say, if such and such things concur, this case will fall within the doctrine; but they do not intend to say no other cases are within it. For example, in Kinney v. Farnsworth, 17 Conn. 361, Storrs, J., says that "admissions which have been the means, designedly, of leading others to a particular course of conduct, cannot afterwards be conscientiously retracted by one who has made them." He could not have intended to lay down the rule that one would in no case be estopped by a representation not designed to deceive, because the same judge, in Preston v. Mann, says: "The doctrine is not reduced to the limits of any formula," and "whatever the motive may be, if one so acts or speaks that the natural consequence of his words or conduct will be to influence another to change his condition, he is legally charged with the intent to induce the other to believe and to act on that belief, if such proves to be the result." So Lord Denman, speaking, in Gregg v. Wells, 10 A. & E. 90, of his judgment in Pickard v. Sears, says: "The principle of that case may be stated even more broadly than it is there laid down."

In this State we have several cases where the general question has been more or less considered. In Wells v. Pierce, 27 N. H. 503, the doctrine of equitable estoppel was traced to its origin in equity, and it was held that if the owner actively encourages the purchase of his property from another, he will be precluded from claiming it, though he was not aware of his interest at the time; which is clearly in conflict with the notion that the representation must be accompanied with an intention to deceive. In Davis v. Handy, 37 N. H. 65, the doctrine of Wells v. Pierce was approved and applied. In the recent case of Drew v. Kimball, 43 N. H. 285, one point directly involved was, whether it was necessary that the party to be estopped should intend to deceive and defraud the individual to whom the representation was made, and who set up the defence; and it was held that it was not necessary. Indeed, it seems to me that it would be trifling with a doctrine depending on equity and good conscience to hold otherwise. So, if a representation was intended to deceive one man, and it in fact deceived and defrauded another. Then, again, if the representation were intended to have one operation, and, as it turned out, deceived and defrauded by another method not contemplated by the party at the time, but still the natural consequence of the representation, it would be quibbling with a doctrine depending for its application on the morality of the act, to hold that the party would not be answerable for the consequences of his false and fraudulent representation, as much as if it had taken effect on the party and in the manner intended. In a case depending on a question of "legal ethics," it would bring down the morality of the law to a very low standard to hold that a party was not liable for the wrong caused by his fraud to one man, because the fraud was contrived against another man.

In Drew v. Kimball the case did not raise the precise point taken in this case. But, on a full discussion of the general doctrine and a review of the authorities, the court adopting the hypothetical case put by PARKE, B., in Freeman v. Cooke, say: "If whatever a man's intentions may be, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe it was meant that he should act upon it, and he did act upon it as true, the party making the representa- would be equally precluded from contesting its truth. In short, the representations are to be regarded as wilful when the person making them means them to be acted on, or if, without regard to intention, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe it was meant he should act on it."

There have been several other cases in this State where this equitable doctrine has been considered and applied. Thompson v. Sanborn, 11 N. H. 201; Simons v. Steele, 36 N. H. 73; McMahon v. Portsmouth Ins. Co., 22 N. H. 15; Odlin v. Gove, 41 N. H. 473; Corbett v. Norcross, 35 N. H. 99. 115; Richardson v. Chickering, 41 N. H. 380, 385. Though I do not find that the precise point taken here for the plaintiff has been directly decided in any of our cases, yet the general current of our decisions on the subject tends to a liberal application of the doctrine for the suppression of fraud and dishonesty, and the promotion of justice and fair dealing. No disposition has been shown in the courts of this State to treat this equitable estoppel as odious, and embarrass its application by attempts to confine it within the limits of a narrow technical definition. We are content to follow where the spirit and general tone of these decisions lead; and they lead plainly to the conclusion, that where a man makes a statement disclaiming his title to the property, in a manner and under circumstances such as he must understand those who heard the statement would believe to be true, and, if they had an interest in the subject, would act on as true, and one, using his own means of knowledge with due diligence, acts on the statement as true, the party who makes the statement cannot show that his representation was false to the injury of the party who believed it to be true, and acted on it as such; that he will be liable for the natural consequences of his representation, and cannot be heard to say that the party actually injured was not the one he meant to deceive, or, that his frand did not take effect in the manner he intended.

Our conclusion is, that, on the facts which the verdict has established, the plaintiff was estopped to show his representation that the goods belonged to Charles E. Horn, to be false, though he did not know that the defendant Cole had any demand against Charles E. Horn, and though he had not Cole in his mind as the party whom he meant to deceive.

UNITED STATES v. KELLY.

A soldier, who had deserted, but was restored to duty by order of his department commander, without trial, on condition that he make good the time lost (about two months), and who complied with the condition, and was honorably discharged at the expiration of his term of service, held, entitled to bounty money, notwithstanding his desertion.

This was an appeal by the United States from a judgment of the Court of Claims, in favor of one Kelly, late a soldier in the army of the United States, for an unpaid balance of bounty money.

The claim was denied by the pay department, on the ground that the bounty had been forfeited by desertion. The case as found by the court was, that the petitioner had deserted, but was restored to duty by order of his department commander, without trial, on condition that he make good the time lost, about two months; that he complied with the condition, and was honorably discharged at the expiration of his term of service.

Upon this case, Mr N. P. Chipman, for the soldier, and in support of the ruling below, made a very full examination of the acts of Congress, and on an exhibit of their provisions, argued that there was nothing in any of them prohibiting the payment of bounty money to a soldier who had deserted, irrespectively of the circumstances of his desertion; that desertion, being sometimes a mere technical desertion, and without cowardice or disaffection to the service, did not, per se, so taint the status of the soldier, as to render him necessarily and without any judicial proceedings, absolutely disqualified to receive bounty; nor was it, under every circumstance, such an act that his contract with the government was wholly and ipso facto dissolved, and that he could never return, and by performance of service, properly thereafter—which service should be accepted—set up a condonation of his offence. "What," said Mr. Chipman, "would be the result in an army of a million of troops, called out as troops were during the rebellion, comprising officers and men of inexperienced years, unacquainted with the laws of war, the rigors of discipline, unused to the restraints which capricious or incompetent superior officials could enforce; not schooled, or proof against the evil influences of depraved associates, and liable, under some physical suffering or discouragement, or inadvertence, to commit an offence, the gravity of which was not comprehended, the penalty for which had not been understood or appreciated." The learned counsel fortified his views by references to the third edition, published in 1868, of the Digest of the present Judge Advocate General of the United States, the Honorable Joseph Holt, Esq., whom he characterized as "the most eminent and able writer on military law, that this country had ever produced."

Mr. C. H. Hill, assistant attorney general, contra, submitted the case on the record.

The Chief Justice delivered the opinion of the court.

We do not think, that under the circumstances of the present case, the bounty was forfeited. The able lawyer who fills at present the post of judge advocate general in a case similar to the present, held (Digest of Opinions of the Judge Advocate, p. 146, paragraph 7, title "Discharge"), that "the honorable discharge of the deserter was a formal final judgment passed by the government upon the entire military record of the soldier, and an authoritative declaration by it that he had left the service in a status of honor; that as such, it dispensed altogether with the supposed necessity that the soldier must obtain bounty by removal, by order, of the charge of desertion from the rolls, and amounted of itself to the removal of any charge or impediment in the way of his receiving bounty."

With this opinion we entirely concur. The judgment of the Court of Claims is affirmed.

NICOLSON PAVEMENT COMPANY v. JENKINS.

An assignment of a reissued patent, reciting the date and number of the reissue, and that the original patent had been "given for the term of fourteen years;" reciting that the assignee had agreed to purchase all the right, title, and interest which the patentee had "in the said invention as secured by the said letters-patent;" and transferring to the assignee all the right, title and interest which the patentee has "in the said invention and letters-patent;" "the same to be held and enjoyed by the said party for the use and behoof of him and his legal representatives to the full end of the term for which the said letters-patent are or may be granted, as fully and effectively as the same would have been held and enjoyed by the assignor had the assignment never been made," will transfer an extension and renewal of the patent made under the acts of July 4th, 1836, and of May 27th, 1848; and this though the patent be reissued subsequently to the assignment.

Error to the Circuit Court for the District of California; the case being thus:

On the 8th of August, 1854, Samuel Nicolson obtained letters-patent for an improvement on wooden pavements. On the 1st of December, 1863, he obtained a reissue. He then, December 1st, 1864, made an assignment to Jonathan Taylor, thus:

"Whereas I, Samuel Nicolson, invented a certain new and useful improvement in wooden pavements, of which letters-patent of the United States of America (numbered 1583 of reissued patents, and bearing date the 1st of December, 1863) have been granted to me, giving to me and my legal representatives the exclusive right of making, using, and vending the said invention throughout the said United States; the original patent being dated August 8th, 1854, and given for the term of fourteen years.

"And whereas Jonathan Taylor has agreed to purchase from me all the right, title, and interest which I have in and to the said invention for and in the city of San Francisco, as secured by the said letters-patent, and has paid to me the sum of one dollar, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged.

"Now, therefore, this indenture witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the said sum to me paid, I have assigned, sold, and set over, and do hereby assign, sell, and set over, unto the said Taylor, all the right, title, and interest which I have in the said invention and letters-patent for and in the said city of San Francisco, but in no other place.

"The same to be held and enjoyed by the said Taylor for the use and behoof of him and his legal representatives to the full end of the term for which the said letters-patent are or may be granted, as fully and effectively as the same would have been held and enjoyed by me had this assignment never been made."

Afterwards, August 20th, 1867, Nicolson obtained another reissue of the same letters-patent on an amended specification; and he having died in January, 1868, intestate, the commissioner of patents, on the application of his administrator, on the 7th of July, 1868, renewed and extended the letters-patent for seven years from the 8th of August, 1868, under the well known 18th section of the act of July 4th, 1836, and the act of Congress of May 27th, 1848.

The right (whatever it was) which was vested in Taylor under the assignment, being subsequently transferred to the Nicolson Pavement Company, and that company having laid a large extent of the patented pavement in San Francisco, after the expiration of the original patent, one Jenkins, who had obtained from the administrator of Nicolson whatever right was vested in him under the renewal and extension of 1868, sued the company.

The question, of course, was whether the assignment from Nicolson to Taylor of December 1st, 1864, vested any estate, right, title, or interest in the assignee, in or to the extended or renewed term, which was acquired by Nicolson's administrator under the act of Congress, subsequent to the date of the assignment.

The court below thought that it did not, and gave judgment against the company. From that judgment the company brought he case here.

Mr. T. T. Crittenden, for the plaintiff in error:

The commissioner of patents having been authorized by statute to grant extensions for seven years, the original letters-patent then became virtually a patent for twenty-one years. No one can in view of well known decisions of this court deny that the inchoate right of the inventor to the exclusive privileges under an extension of letters-patent is the subject of a sale, and certainly the words of this assignment in the concluding part of it are applicable only to a design to convey both a present and future interest.

Mr. M. H. Carpenter (a brief of Mr. J. R. Sharpstein being filed), contra:

The recitals in the assignment show that the original patent had been issued for the term of fourteen years, and that before the expiration of the term there had been a reissue of the patent; that Taylor had agreed to purchase a certain interest in said invention, "as secured by said letters-patent" (the letters-patent recited); that in consideration of the premises he assigned, sold, and set over to said Taylor his interest "in the said invention and letters-patent," the letters-patent thereinbefore mentioned. Thus far there is no allusion to any term or letters-patent other than the original term of fourteen years, and the letters-patent originally issued, and the reissued letters recited.

These form the entire subject matter of the contract. There can be no doubt as to the intention of the parties, unless certain words in the habendum clause, contrary to the ordinary rules of construction, can be construed as extending the contract to a subject matter not before embraced, or referred to, in the recitals or granting portions of the deed. As we have seen, the habendum clause is, "the same to be held and enjoyed . . . . to the full end of the term for which the said letters-patent are or may be granted." The words "may be granted" are the only ones in the whole instrument that can be thought to point to an extension that might subsequently be acquired. But they must be read in connection with, and in subordination to, the rest of the instrument, and this very clause refers to "the term for which the said letters-patent," &c. A single term is referred to, and the said letters-patent. The reference is in terms to the term and the letters-patent already mentioned. The phrase "may be granted," seems to be an expression loosely used, and without any definite meaning in the connection in which it is found, unless it refers to other reissues of patents covering the remainder of said term. There had already been one reissue, and the facts show that a second reissue was had for the remainder of the term after this assignment, doubtless to cover some defect. These reissues are authorized by the act of Congress; and often occur. In a certain sense, when the patents thus originally issued are surrendered, and others issued in their place, the whole may be regarded as the same letters-patent. They cover the same term. The reissued patent covers no improvement or extension, but is intended to rectify some error, or remedy some defect, and accomplish the identical object intended to be accomplished by the letters originally issued. In this sense, they are substantially the same letters-patent. In this view, the words "may be granted" may have some significance as used in this instrument, and they are satisfied by applying them to any further letters patent that might be issued for the same term and to accomplish the same objects intended by those already issued. And in this instance, there was a subsequent reissue for the remainder of the term, to which they might in fact apply. But upon a view of the whole instrument, to construe them as referring to a new term, and letters-patent not yet in esse, would be doing violence to the language.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

An assignment of an interest in an invention secured by letters-patent, is a contract, and like all other contracts is to be construed so as to carry out the intention of the parties to it. It is well settled, that the title of an inventor to obtain an extension, may be the subject of a contract of sale, and the inquiry is whether the instrument of sale employed in this case, did secure to the purchaser an interest not merely in the original letters-patent, but in any subsequent extension of them. It recites the invention and the agreement of Taylor to purchase the right to use it in the city of San Francisco, and then conveys to him all the title and interest which Nicolson had in the invention, and letters-patent for and in the said city, to be enjoyed by Taylor and his legal representatives to the full end of the term for which the said letters-patent are, or may be granted. There is no artificial rule in construing a contract, and effect, if possible, is to be given to every part of it, in order to ascertain the meaning of the parties to it. Taking this whole deed together, it is quite clear that it was intended to secure to Taylor and his assigns the right to use the invention in San Francisco, as long as Nicolson and his representatives had a right to use it anywhere else. Manifestly, something more was intended to be assigned than the interest then secured by letters-patent. The words "to the full end of the term for which the said letters-patent are or may be granted," necessarily import an intention to convey both a present and a future interest, and it would be a narrow rule of construction to say that they were designed to apply to a reissue merely, when the invention itself, by the very words of the assignment, is transferred. It was easy to have restricted the right to use the invention to the end of the term of the original letters and reissues, but this was not done; and in view of the right of the inventor in certain contingencies to a renewal—which must have been well known to both buyer and seller of this kind of property—we are led to the conclusion that both parties contracted with reference to it. The case of The Rai road v. Trimble is not different in principle from this, although in that case the language used is somewhat broader.

Judgment reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

MAYER v. SIMPSON.

Where a building when completed was found to overlap the adjoining lot, the court refused a mandatory injunction to remove the building.

Appeal from a decree of Nisi Prius in equity.

For opinion and decree at Nisi Prius, see Legal Gazette, vol. 4, p. 1.

Opinion by READ, C. J. Delivered February 13th, 1873.

Robert F. Simpson owns a lot of ground at the northwest corner of Arch and Ninth streets, extending in front on Arch street 48 feet, and in length or depth on Ninth street 126 feet, and John Mayer owns a lot adjoining it on the north 18 feet on Ninth street, 48 feet in depth. The defendant, in 1870, erected a building, intended for a museum and theatre, covering the whole of his lot, the north wall of which was an eighteen inch brick party-wall, which by law should be six and a half inches on the plaintiff's lot. Mr. Shedaker gave to the defendant, or his agent, the true line between the two properties in his capacity as surveyor and regulator of the third district, and the stone foundation of the party-wall was correctly laid. The brick wall was carried up, beginning at stone foundation, as would appear by Mr. Sheldrake's measurement of the 30th and 31st Aug., 1870. three-eighths of an inch over on plaintiff's lot, beyond the limits allowed by law. In extending the wall back on the stone cellar wall, in different parts it overlapped three-quarters of an inch and seven-eighths of an inch, and in the middle of building the wall overhung the lot No. 110, top of first story, two and three-quarter inches, at top of second story, three and a half inches, and four feet above the floor, on the third floor, four and one-eighth inches. A subsequent measurement by John F. Wolf, surveyor and regulator of the fifth district, was more unfavorable to the defendant. Jacob Rush entered into a contract with the plaintiff to erect on his lot, No. 110, a three-story building, with Mansard roof, 18 feet front by 46 feet deep. It was for a certain price; Rush contracting to pay for all party-walls. Defendant's cellar wall was up before the contract was signed, and the excavation for the building on No. 110, was commenced on the 23d June, 1870. Defendant's wall was carried up ahead of the plaintiff's, and Mr. Rush saw the wall was coming over, and notified Mr. John Bingham, who had charge of the work at the time, that the wall was coming over, and that he had better shore it. He did so, but put the shore in the wrong place. Mr. Rush put in the joists in the party wall, and paid for the party-wall according to his contract. The plaintiff having heard of its overhanging, employed Mr. Shedaker to make the measurement already stated, and immediately took measures to have the error corrected, which ended in filing this bill in equity, September 22d, 1870. The wall is up and both buildings are under roof. The usual five days' injunction was issued and dissolved on the 29th of September. The case was then heard on bill, answer and proofs, and the bill dismissed with costs. From this decree this appeal is taken. The occupation unlawfully of a portion of the plaintiff's lot does not convey any title to it to the defendant, nor does it affect the plaintiff's title, or his right to recover damages for the trespass, but as an injunction is a matter of discretion with a court of equity, we do not feel bound to grant a mandatory injunction to tear down the wall, which is the practical meaning of the second prayer of the bill. This case shows the necessity of great care and attention on the part of the owners and contractors in the erection of party-walls, from the time they are commenced until they are finished The party erecting, as in this case, will take care it is plumb, as it is smooth on his side, and it is his interest to get the full use of his lot; but as was the fact here, more careless as to the encroachment on his neighbor's property. The building inspectors should be particularly careful in inspecting party-walls, for their powers are large in correcting all errors in such walls, not built in accordance with law. A full history and discussion of the subject is to be found in Vollmer's Appeal, 11 P. F. Smith, 118. We affirm the decree of the court below, with a modification. The bill is dismissed with costs, without prejudice.

HOUGHTON v. ROWLEY.

A license is personal and not assignable.

Exceptions to master's report.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered February 8th, 1873.

It has not been seriously maintained in the argument upon these exceptions, that if the construction placed by the master upon the agreement and license of February 17th, 1869, is the right one, that the conclusion at which he has arrived is wrong. Taking both instruments together, I agree that Houghton's exclusive privilege to manufacture the rings for and to supply them to Rowley, was "personal to said Houghton," which he could not assign to any other party; and it follows, that he could not arrange with others to manufacture screw rings "made substantially after the manner of the specimens" annexed—so as in that way to enable him to supply Rowley. If this be so, it is clear, that Houghton, in point of fact, was not able to comply with his contract, and there was a failure on his part, in consequence of which his right, by the terms of the license, ceased and determined.

Exceptions dismissed, and bill dismissed with costs.

AT NISI PRIUS. IN EQUITY.

THE PHILADA. TRUST SAFE DEPOSIT AND INS. CO., Assignee, v. THE FAME INS. CO.

An assignee of an insolvent insurance company which had effected re-insurances, can, before paying the insured bring a bill against the company making the re-insurance for the amount of insurance for which the insolvent company was liable.

Demurrer to bill.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered February 8th, 1873.

I think there is authority which sustains the jurisdiction of a court of equity in a case of this kind. A contract of re-insurance is a contract of indemnity. The re-insured may go into equity as soon as the claim arises upon him, without waiting to pay the original insured. I do not understand this to be denied by the learned counsel for the defendants. But he maintains that it is not applicable to this case, because by the express terms of the contract, "the losses, if any, are to be payable pro rata to the Enterprise Insurance Company, at such time, and in such manner as the latter company may pay." This clause must have such an interpretation as will not entirely defeat the contract. It can evidently have no application where, as in this case, the Enterprise Company have made a general assignment for the benefit of their creditors. If the assignee can only recover from the defendants when and as he pays dividends of the assigned estate to the original insured, it is plain an endless number of suits must be the consequence; and if it had so happened that there was no assigned estate, there could be no recovery at all. I would construe the words "as the latter company may pay," to mean "as the latter company may be liable to pay." It meant that the Fame Company should have all the advantages of the Enterprise Company as to the times and manner of payment; that they should not be called on to pay on the immediate happening of the loss, but whatever condition as to the times and manner of payment might be annexed to the original policy, should be extended to them.

Demurrer overruled.

WENTWORTH v. RAIGUEL.

1. A. B. & C. were partners in one business, and A. & B. also partners in another. The funds of the former firm were misappropriated to pay the debts of the latter: Held, after the dissolution of the former firm, and the settlement of all other accounts between A. B. & C., C. might file a bill against A. & B., and obtain against them a decree in solido for his proportion of the funds so misappropriated.
2. The act of 1838, giving a remedy at law in actions between different firms, composed in part of the same members, did not take away the previously existing remedy in equity.

Sur exceptions to master's report.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered February 8th, 1873.

When this case was before me on exceptions, to the first report of the master, I dismissed all the exceptions but the 22d, 24th, and 25th. The administratrix of Ulp having been made a party, and filed an answer, that defect in the proceedings is supplied. The other two exceptions were grounded upon the objection that the master had reported an account of the plaintiff with the firm of Raiguel & Co., No. 3, of which firm alone he was found to be a member; had recommended a decree in his favor against the other members of that firm, and had not made a final settlement of the partnership, by ascertaining the balances due by and to each partner separately. I saw, then, nothing on the face of the report which ought to vary the rules which seem to be well settled in regard to partnership account, generally. It was accordingly referred back to the master, to reconsider and report as to these matters.

Upon the supplemental report, we find very distinctly, and there is no evidence before me upon which I can re-examine that finding—"that nothing else remains to be settled between the partners, irrespective of the amount due on account of John L. Wentworth's interest in No. 3." He also found that this indebtedness of the firm of Raiguel & Co., No. 3, to John L. Wentworth, arose entirely from misappropriation by the other members of the firm, who were members of the firm No. 2, of the amounts of No. 3, to the payment of the debts of No. 2. He never draws the conclusion that the members of No. 2, who are members of No. 3, are liable to the plaintiff in solido. It would follow that justice could be done in no other way than by a decree against the defendant in solido, and until one or more of these defendants pay this amount, there can be no decree as between themselves, settling their respective contributory shares. That must be left to a subsequent proceeding.

If these facts were stated in the former report, I failed to extract them from it, or they were not distinctly brought to my notice. They very much affect the view to be taken of the case. To simplify the matter, if the accounts of a firm of A., B. & C. are applied to pay the debts of a former firm of A. & B., without the consent of C., it would seem that as A. & B. would be liable to answer in solido to the firm of A., B. &. C. A. & B. must in equity be held liable in solido to C., for his share of such debts. Prior to the act of April 14th, 1838, Pamph. L. 457, the firm of A., B. & C. could not have maintained an action at law against the firm of A. & B. The appropriate remedy of C. would have been a bill to account. If, as the master reports, all other accounts between the members of the firm of A., B. & C. have been settled, except what grows out of this misappropriation of the assets of A., B. & C. to the injury of C. I see no objection to such a decree as will do justice between the parties. I observe that the bill distinctly avers the act of this misappropriation. It follows, that until either A. or B. pay this debt for which they are jointly and severally liable, what they respectively owe each other cannot be ascertained and settled. The act of 1838, which gave the remedy at law, did not take away the previously existing remedy in equity.

On the whole, then, I have come to the conclusion to dismiss these exceptions and confirm the report.

Decree accordingly.

MORRIS v. BANCROFT.

When a contract calls for "dollars lawful money of the United States," a tender of gold dollars is good.

Case stated.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered February 8th, 1873.

It will not be worth while to discuss the question presented by this case, stated on principle. I would find it difficult to do so. But I must consider one thing as settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, that Congress, under the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, can settle conclusively the value of a dollar, so as at least to reach and bind all subsequent contracts. It is necessary, in order to enable them to do this, that they should have power to say what the relative value of gold and silver shall be in the coinage. The proportional value of gold to silver in all coins, is settled then by the act of Congress of 18th January, 1837. Brightley's Dig. 152. After providing for the weights of the respective gold and silver coins, it provides, that for all sums whatever, the eagle shall be a legal tender for ten dollars; the half-eagle for five dollars; and the quarter-eagle for two and a half dollars. So by the act of March 3d, 1849, Ibid, "for all sums whatever, the double eagle shall be a legal tender for twenty dollars, and the gold dollar shall be a legal tender for one dollar." I cannot, it seems to me, strike out of this contract the words "dollar," and "lawful silver money of the United States," and the acts of Congress have declared, without regard to the weight of the silver dollar—whether it be of the weight provided before January, 1837, or since—that a gold dollar shall, in legal tenders upon all contracts, be equal to it in value.

Judgment for the plaintiff, $692.42, coin, with interest from December 1st, 1872.

MACREADY v. HART.

When an account would cause a long and expensive proceeding, the complainants' right being doubtful, his bill was dismissed pro forma.

Sur exceptions to master's report.

HISTORY OF CASE.

This was a bill in equity, brought against the directors of the Quaker City Insurance Company, by certain creditors of, and insured in said company. The bill alleged that the said directors had published false and fraudulent statements as to the assets of the company, and that in consequence thereof, plaintiffs became creditors of, and insured in said company; that they had obtained judgments against the company, which remained unsatisfied. The bill also alleged, that the directors had improperly declared dividends. The answers denied that the statements were fraudulent, and alleged that the directors did not know of the publication.

The case was referred to an examiner to take testimony, and upon his filing his report, he was appointed master. As master, he reported in favor of a decree against the defendants. The defendants filed exceptions thereto.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered February 8th, 1873.

This is a case in which a decree to account would necessarily be followed by a long and expensive proceeding to ascertain the amount to be paid by the several defendants, if they are at all liable. The preliminary questions, then, as it seems to me, ought to be determined in the first instance, by the court of the last resort.

Exceptions sustained.

Bill dismissed with costs pro forma.

Geo. Sergeant, Jos. G. Rosengarten and Morton P. Henry, Esqs., for plaintiffs.

George Biddle, Thomas R. Elcock, George W. Biddle, Esqs. and Hon. F. Carroll Brewster, for defendants.

SEVENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Court of Common Pleas of Montgomery County.

RAMSEY v. RAMSEY.

1. Where the respondent in a proceeding for divorce has not been personally served with the subpœna, nor appears, nor defends, the libellant is not a competent witness.
2. Jurisdiction in cases of divorce is exclusively in that forum in which is the real domicile of the parties, at the time and place of the injury.

Sub. sur divorce a. v. m. Sur report of examiner.

Opinion by ROSS, P. J. Delivered February 1st, 1873.

One error is patent upon the face of the report of the examiner. He has taken the testimony of the libellant, which was not admissible upon this record. In this case there was no service upon the subpœna, or upon the alias and pluries subpœna, that were awarded upon the sheriff's return of "non est inventus." No appearance was ever entered by the respondent to any of the successive writs of subpœna. The testimony was taken before the examiner ex parte; and the respondent has, therefore, been neither served, nor has he entered an appearance, neither has he at any stage of the proceedings participated, either personally or through counsel.

These being the facts, the libellant could not be received as a witness against the respondent, under the enabling act of March 4th, 1870. Ph. L. 70, page 36. That act provides, that the provisions of the act of April 15th, 1869, entitled an act allowing parties in interest to be witnesses, "are hereby extended so as to allow the testimony of either husband or wife to be given in his or her own behalf, in any proceeding for a divorce, in every case where personal service of the subpœna is made on the opposite party, or said party appears or defends."

This is an imperative statutory prohibition, and one it is the duty of the court to enforce. We desire in all cases hereafter, that copies of all the docket entries, certified by the prothonotary, shall, together with the subpœnas and sheriff's affidavits of service, be certified to the examiner with the certificate of his appointment. This will enable him to judge whether the libellant is, or is not competent when she is offered as a witness.

In considering the propriety of pronouncing a decree of divorce in this case, the testimony of Mrs. Ramsey must be rejected.

Throwing it out of the case, there is no proof of a malicious and wilful desertion by the respondent, committed in Pennsylvania or elsewhere, and the case fails for want of proof.

But in order that this case may be terminated by this proceeding, it is proper to say, that, if all that the libellant has sworn to, was proved by a competent witness, it would fail to establish facts upon which this court could pronounce a decree of divorce.

Sometime after this husband and wife were married, they removed to Indianapolis, Indiana, where they settled and lived for some time, nearly five years. They then went to Peoria, Illinois, where the alleged malicious and wilful desertion was perpetrated. Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that the acts of the respondent there constituted a desertion, it is apparent that this court has no jurisdiction over the matter. It is high time that the inferior tribunals should strictly follow the wise and healthy principle declared in Colvin v. Reed, 5 P. F. S. 375; Dorsey v. Dorsey, 7 W. 350; 3 Story's Conf. of Laws, §§ 230 205, N. S.; McDermott's Appeal 8 W. & S. 256; Holister v. Holister, 6 Barr, 451.

This doctrine is stated with his usual clearness, by C. J. Gibson, in Dorsey v. Dorsey, the leading case in Pennsylvania on this subject. In that case the facts were, that the parties had been citizens of Pennsylvania, and had married here, but had both removed to Ohio, where they were domiciled at the time of the alleged desertion of the husband. The wife returned to Pennsylvania, where, after a residence of several years, she presented her petition for a divorce a vinculo, which was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. The great chief justice, differing from both the Scotch and English courts, wisely ruled that jurisdiction depended on the real domicile of the parties, at the time and place of the injury. "In all such cases," he said, "the person of the transgressor is not amenable to our jurisdiction, and an attempt to pronounce a decree depriving him of rights, particularly where he had no hearing or notice, is an extravagance. "It follows," said Judge Gibson, "on our own principle, however, that not only does jurisdiction belong to the courts at the place of the domicile, but that the retribution must be meted by their measure. The appellant's case, therefore, appertains to the authorities in Ohio. The forum is there, and the law which declares the offence is there."

So, too, it may be said in this case. The libellant's case, therefore, appertains to the authorities in Illinois, and is not cognizable here.

The English rule upon the same subject, is well stated by Lord Penzance in Shaw v. Atty. Genl., Legal Intelligencer, vol. 29, 14.

This law is in accordance with sound principles. The shifting rules of evidence in the several States, varying with the notions of legal reform, and stages of progress in the various commonwealths; the varied character of redress and protection afforded by the statute law of the several States; the ease with which a new domicile can be acquired by either party, and above all the shameful facility by which divorces can be obtained in some of our sister sovereignties, require an adherence to these principles.

Tested by these standards, this case fails for want of jurisdiction, as well as for want of evidence.

We decline to dissolve the bonds of matrimony existing between this libellant and respondent, and dismiss the libel for want of jurisdiction.

And now, February 1st, 1873, decree of divorce a vinculo refused, and the libel is now dismissed, and it is further ordered that the libellant pay the costs which have accrued thereon.

H. A. Brunner, Esq., for libellant.

VOL. I. JUST ISSUED.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Chief Justice, Supreme Court, Pa.

"I have examined the Legal Gazette Reports which you did me the favor to send me, with great satisfaction. It is well gotten up, and neatly printed and bound. The variety of matter contained in it, emanating indiscriminately from courts in every portion of the State, renders the volume useful in every section to both lawyers and judges, and to them I cheerfully commend it." March 1st, 1872.

From HON. WM. S. PEIRCE,
Court of Com. Pleas, and Orphans' Court, Phila.

"It is presented to the public in good style, and so far as I have had opportunity to examine my own decisions, they are accurately reported, and the syllabi are concise and correct, and I am sure from the known ability of the Reporter, that they are so with respect to the other decisions."
Philada., March 1st, 1872.

From HON. JAMES LYND,
District Court, Phila.

"I have received and examined with interest and pleasure the first volume of Legal Gazette Reports. It contains much valuable matter, carefully edited and handsomely published. As multitudinous as the decisions of the Supreme Court seem to be, the number of quite important points that never reach that tribunal is very large; and the early publication, therefore, of cases disposed of in the courts of first resort is greatly to be commended. Permit me to express a hope that the Legal Gazette Reports will prove as profitable to the publishers as it will be serviceable to the bar and judiciary of our State." Philada, March 2d, 1872.

From HON. JOSEPH ALLISON,
President Judge 1st Judicial District, Pa.

"The work is in all respects most creditable to its Editor and Publishers, not only as to its external merit, but as a valuable addition to the reports of decided cases. The work affords abundant evidence of great care in its preparation, and is every way worthy of a favorable reception by the legal profession." Philadelphia, Feb. 23d, 1872.

From HON. THOS. K. FINLETTER,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts, Phila.

"I have examined volume one, Legal Gazette Reports, and am much pleased with the execution of the work. Many of the cases contained therein are familiar to me, as being argued and determined in the courts in which I sit, and I can testify to the fidelity and accuracy with which they are reported. I think that the volume will be a valuable addition to the Pennsylvania Reports." Philadelphia, March 21st, 1872

From HON. JAMES R. LUDLOW,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts, Phila.

"Every valuable contribution to our legal literature ought to be a gratification to the profession, for additional knowledge is thereby contributed to the common stock, and is preserved for future use. Your volume contains many important cases, carefully selected, and must be of great service to the profession. Practical experience teaches me the worth of this publication, and its real value should secure for it an extended circulation." Philadelphia, April 13th, 1872.

From HON. THOS. H. WALKER,
Judge 21st Judicial District, Pa.

"I must express my satisfaction with the volume. The entire work does credit to the taste and ability of the reporter; the type is neat, the decisions are carefully arranged and accurately indexed. There are many important opinions collected in the book, and the legal profession will find it a valuable addition to our Supreme Court reports. The chief merit of the Legal Gazette is not only to furnish an early publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court, but also to embrace in a permanent form those of the Common Pleas Judges of our State for constant reference and easy access. The work has been successfully commenced and its continuance is essential to the labor of the bench and bar." Pottsville, Pa., April 13th, 1872.

From HON. SAML. S. DREHER,
President Judge 22d Judicial District, Pa.

"I am much pleased with these reports. They contain much valuable information, and from the high character of the judges whose opinions are reported, I feel safe in following them. The book is well printed, well bound, and so far as I have been able to read it since my return home, I find the syllabi full and accurate." Stroudsburg, Pa., March 26th, 1872.

From HON. GARRICK M. HARDING,
President Judge, 11th Judicial District, Pa.

"In point of mechanical execution the Legal Gazette Reports are not surpassed by any modern legal publication, and in point of useful service to the profession, the Reporter and the Publishers have done a work in every way praiseworthy." Wilkes Barre, Pa., March 2, 1872.

From HON. JOHN DEAN,
President Judge 24th Judicial District, Pa.

"Some copies of the paper have been lost or mislaid, in which were reports of cases of great value to me, and just as I was thinking of writing to you, to ascertain if you could replace them, your present valuable work is received." Hollidaysburg, Pa., March 8th, 1872.

From HON. JAMES A. LOGAN,
President Judge 10th Judicial District, Pa.

"To me this seems an exceedingly valuable volume. Its decisions must prove of great assistance to both bench and bar, throughout the State. I regard as the peculiar excellence of these reports the class of well considered "lower court" decisions, which aside from their great aid to the profession must so largely tend to establish a most desirable uniformity of practice in the different districts in the State." Greensburg, Pa., March 28th, 1872.

From HON. SAML. A. GILMORE,
President Judge 14th Judicial District, Pa.

"I was so well satisfied of the value of the cases reported in the Legal Gazette, that I took care to file away that paper as it came to hand. This was inconvenient for reference, but is now obviated by the Legal Gazette Reports. Most of the cases are important and so well elaborated as to make them quite satisfactory. To a judge who has something to do with all the jurisdictions, the book is very convenient and to the bar we would suppose almost indispensable." Uniontown, Pa., March 27th, 1872.

CROSS v. UNITED STATES.

The government had leased from A. a warehouse for ten years, the rent payable by instalments. A. assigned his lease to B. and died. B. sued the government in the Court of Claims for certain instalments of the rent which became due after the assignment. The Court of Claims dismissed the claim solely on the technical ground that the assignment of the lease was not so drawn as to vest B. with a legal title to the accruing rents. Congress afterwards passed a joint resolution, reciting that B. had "heretofore" filed his petition, &c., on account of rents alleged to be "due," and that the court had dismissed the "said" petition on the sole ground of an alleged technical defect, and remanding the "said cause" to the Court of Claims for a further hearing, upon the testimony already taken, "and such further testimony as either party might take," and ordering that if, on such further hearing, it should appear that B. was in justice and equity entitled to the rents due on the lease the court should render judgment in his favor: Provided, That no money should be paid him from the treasury until after he had given indemnity against any demand which might be set up by the heirs of A., (the original lessor) "under or by virtue of the said lease or contract."

Held* that B could sue in the Court of Claims for all the rent that became due under the lease; and that the fact that, after the remand, he had filed his second petition for but the same rents for which he had filed his first, did not so exhaust the power of the court under the joint resolution as that he could not file a third one for additional rents; even though they were rents that were due when he filed his second petition and such as he might have included in a claim in it.

Appeal from the Court of Claims; the case being this:

Daniel Saffarans, in 1851, according to the forms of law, leased to the United States for a term of ten years, at a certain monthly rent, a warehouse, in San Francisco. Alexander Cross advanced the money to complete the building, and was compelled for his own protection to purchase the property and the contract of lease. The lease was assigned to him, and the warehouse occupied by the government for a term of three years, the secretary of the treasury of that day, availing himself of an apparent legal informality in the assignment of the lease, against the written protest of Cross, rescinded the contract.

On the 15th of November, 1856, Cross petitioned the Court of Claims for relief, but failed to obtain it on the ground that the assignment of the lease was defective and insufficient to vest in him a legal title to the accruing rents. This adverse decision, in conformity with the law at that time, was reported to Congress, and while the proceeding was pending there, Congress, on the 2d July, 1864, passed the following joint resolution for his relief:

"Whereas, Alexander Cross heretofore filed his petition in the Court of Claims of the United States, praying relief on account of certain rents alleged to be due from the United States to him as assignee of one Daniel Saffarans, by virtue of a certain alleged contract of lease between the said Saffarans (who is now deceased) and the United States; and whereas the said Court of Claims, on the 24th of January, 1859, rendered a decision adverse to the prayer of the said petition, on the sole ground of an alleged technical defect in the assignment of said lease from the said Saffarans to the said petitioner: Now, therefore,

"Be it resolved, &c., That the said cause be remanded to said Court of Claims for a further hearing upon the testimony heretofore filed therein, and such further testimony as either party may take; and if, upon the further hearing of said cause, it shall appear that the said petitioner is the equitable owner of said lease, and in justice and equity entitled to the rents (if any) due thereon from the United States, the said court shall be authorized to render judgment therefor in his favor, notwithstanding any technical defect in the assignment of said lease: Provided, That no money shall be paid out of the treasury upon any judgment which may be rendered in favor of the petitioner in said cause, until he shall have filed with the secretary of the treasury a bond, with ample security, in such sum as will fully indemnify the United States against any demand which may be set up and established by or on behalf of the heirs or representatives of the said Daniel Saffarans, deceased, under or by virtue of said contract or lease.

Cross, accordingly, after the passage of the resolution, by a supplemental petition, asked the Court of Claims to rehear the cause and give him judgment for the instalments of rent claimed in his original petition, embracing the terms of time between the 14th day of August, 1853, and the 14th day of November, 1856. This was done. Two years afterwards he brought another action, to recover the instalments of rent (amounting to $69,515), which were not included in the first suit.

The court below held that this second suit could not be maintained because the power and authority conferred upon it by the joint resolution had been exhausted when it reheard the cause and rendered judgment. From that judgment it was that the present appeal was taken.

The only question in this case related, of course, to the proper construction of the already quoted joint resolution of Congress of July 2d, 1864.

Mr. G. H. Williams, attorney general, and Mr. C. H. Hill, assistant attorney general, in support of the ruling below:

The joint resolution only applied to the case of the first petition of the appellant in the Court of Claims. This is shown by the preamble: "Whereas, Alexander Cross, heretofore filed his petition in the Court of Claims of the United States, praying relief on account of certain rents alleged to be due from the United States to him;" and "Whereas, as the said Court of Claims rendered its decision adverse to the prayer of said petition;" and therefore, "Be it resolved, &c., That the said cause be remanded to said Court of Claims for a further hearing, upon the testimony heretofore filed therein, and such further testimony as either party may take and file pursuant to the rules of said court."

This language would seem to refer to the cause of action covered by the first petition, and to none other; and as the Court of Claims could not give relief except so far as it was specially authorized by this act of Congress, its powers must be strictly confined within the language and limits of that act.

But if the resolution is broad enough to cover any claim which the appellant had against the United States under the lease from Saffarans, then the former judgment is a bar to any future recovery by him for the same cause of action. The resolution certainly did not contemplate more than one action, and when the appellant filed his supplemental petition, the rents for which he now sues were due and might have been included by him in that suit. As he did not elect to do so, but brought a suit for a portion only of his claim, he has lost by his laches any right which he might have had under the resolution to recover the amount of the rents which he had negligently omitted to include in his petition.

J. J. Combs, contra, for the claimant.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

To uphold the ruling made by the Court of Claims would be, we think, to take a narrow view of the legislative intention in this case and to give substantial effect to the technical defences which have distinguished this litigation. There is no defence now on the merits, nor was there when the case went to Congress. It went there, not because the United States was not bound by the covenants of the lease, but for the reason that, in the opinion of the Court of Claims, Cross had not the legal right to enforce the obligation. Saffarans had undertaken to assign the lease to Cross, and no question was made as to his ownership until the secretary of the treasury attempted to rescind the contract. Then it was discovered that the assignment lacked legal formality, and the government availed itself of this defence, and this only, in the Court of Claims to defeat the action. In this state of the case Congress was called upon to act.

The technical defect in the mode of assignment was the only obstacle encountered by Cross in the prosecution of his claim, yet while it remained it was effectual to prevent a recovery. To remove it and allow a trial on the merits required the assent of Congress, and this was given. That the waiver by Congress of the right of the United States to make this defence was not limited to any particular suit, but was extended to the entire controversy respecting the lease, seems clear enough from the language of the resolution itself. The Court of Claims was told if it found Cross to be the equitable owner of the lease, and in justice and equity entitled to the rents (if any) due thereon from the United States, to render judgment in his favor, notwithstanding any technical defect in the assignment of the lease. And to leave no room for doubt on the subject, the court was directed further, to take bond from Cross to indemnify the government "against any demand which may be set up and established by or on behalf of the heirs or representatives of Saffarans under or by virtue of said contract or lease." Why the extent of this requirement, if the waiver was only applicable to the rents in controversy in the proceeding then pending before Congress? We cannot suppose, without an express declaration to that effect, that Congress intended to legislate in a manner that would enable a creditor of the government to obtain only a part of his claim when the whole of it was deemed by the court that tried the case to be meritorious.

It is true the lease was at an end when Congress acted and the court reheard the cause, and Cross could by proper amendment to his petition have embraced also that portion of his demand for which he now sues; and that would have been the proper course for him to have pursued, but he was not compelled to take it. In covenant for non-payment of rent, payable at different times, a new action lies as often as the respective sums become due and payable. As this suit is for instalments of rent not due when the first suit was instituted, and as they were not included in it in any stage of the proceeding, the plea of former recovery has no application.

On the finding of facts by the court below, judgment should have been rendered for the claimant for $69,515.

It is, therefore, ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded to the Court of Claims, with directions to enter Judgment for that sum.

DOLTON v. CAIN.

1. Under the limitation laws of Illinois, which declare in substance "that whoever has resided on a tract of land for seven successive years prior to the commencement of an action of ejectment, having a connected title in law or equity deducible of record from the State or the United States, can plead the possession in bar of the suit," it is not necessary that the entire title of the defendant be evidenced by acts of record. If the source or foundation of the title is of record, it is available to every person claiming a legal title who can connect himself with it, by such evidence as applies to the nature of the right set up.
2. If a party to a contract does all that it can be reasonably expected that he will do, he will be considered in equity as having performed his part of the contract so far as to come within the limitation laws above mentioned; as ex gr., if a party bound to pay money to an agent of his creditor, resident beyond seas, offers to pay it to one who was the agent of that creditor, and who declines to receive it only because he had heard rumors of the principal's death, and had always been and still is ready to pay it to any one having authority to call for it.
3. Where A. in A. D. 1823 conveys to B., in trust for C., habendum "to the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns," and B. dies in 1845, and C. conveys in 1848, equity would find a way to protect C.'s grantees against a deed made by B.'s heirs in 1864; supposing such a deed made without undue influence, a supposition hard to make.
4. Where a power of attorney is made by husband and wife, French people resident in France, to sell lands in Illinois—the power, a long French instrument, with the usual verbiage of the style de notaire, speaking of the lands as lands which "Mr. and Madame," &c., own there—there being evidence that the husband owned land there, but none that the husband and wife did, the presumption is that the joinder of the wife was made to alienate some supposed right of dower, and not to describe lands owned by the wife and husband jointly, instead of by the husband alone; this at least in favor of a bonâ fide purchaser, long in possession.
5. A mistake in the baptismal name of an obligor to a bond executed by his attorney duly authorized to execute a bond in his right name, does not vitiate the bond, the error being shown to be purely accidental.

Error to the Circuit Court for the Southern District of Illinois; the case being this:

Certain statutes of limitation in Illinois, Revised Statutes of 1845, § 8, chapter 24; Id. §§ 8 and 11, chapter 66, declare in substance that whoever has resided on a tract of land for a term of seven successive years, prior to the commencement of an action of ejectment, "having a connected title in law or equity deducible of record from the State or the United States," can plead the possession in bar of suit to dispossess him.

These provisions of limitation being in force, Dolton sued Cain, A. D. 1865, in ejectment, to recover a piece of land in the State just named.

The plaintiff showed as title,

1st. A patent, A. D. 1818, from the United States to one Stephenson for the land.

2d. A deed, A. D. 1820, from Stephenson to one McGuire.

3d. A deed, A. D. 1823, from McGuire "to Auguste Thiriat, in trust for René Marie Ferdinand Jacquemart" (a resident of France), the habendum clause being thus:

"To have and to hold the said premises with the appurtenances, unto the said party of the second part, and his heirs and assigns forever."

4th. The death of Thiriat in 1845, and of Jacquemart in 1848; no more particular dates being shown.

5th. Conveyance, A. D. 1864, by the heirs of both Thiriat and Jacquemart, to Dolton (the plaintiff).

Title in Jacquemart having been as above stated, shown by the plaintiff, the defendant relied on:

1st. August 10th, 1847, a power of attorney, "each one for themselves, from René Marie Ferdinand Jacquemart and wife, to F. R. Tillon and W. L. Cutting, with power of substitution, authorizing them to sell any lands in Illinois "which Mr. and Madame Jacquemart at present own; and in which the said constituents have interests, of any kind soever to be protected," and to "sign the contracts of sale in the respective names of the constituents."

2d. September 20th, 1847. A substitution by Tillon and Cutting of one Cockle, to their power to sell, &c.

3d. Proof that on the 29th July, 1848, Cockle as attorney for Jacquemart and wife sold the land to Cain, the defendant, for $300; of which $100 was to be paid down, and the residue secured by three notes, one for $68, at one year, and two for $66 at two and three years respectively; that the $100 was paid and the three notes given; that contemporaneous with the sale, he, Cockle, professing to act as attorney of Jean Ferdinand Jacquemart (the name of Jean instead of René Marie, having as Cockle himself testified, been signed by inadvertence and mistake," and "the intention having been to execute the instrument in Jacquemart's true name,") executed and gave to Cain a bond for $600, reciting the sale and the terms of it, and conditioned that if Cain paid the notes on the days specified for their payment, and Jacquemart should upon such full payment of the purchase money execute and deliver to Cain a warranty deed with the usual covenants, then the bond should be void; that the sale was reported within a month to Tillon and Cutting, who approved it; that the first and second notes were paid as they came due, and with the $100 cash were devoted by Cockle to the paying of taxes on other lands of Jacquemart; that Cain offered payment of the third note at its maturity, but that Cockle refused to receive it, replying to Cain's offer to pay it, that it was rumored that Jacquemart was dead; that Cain had always been ready and willing to pay the note, which from the cause mentioned was remaining unpaid, but that he did not know who was entitled to receive the money.

4th. Proof that the defendant took possession of the land very soon after his purchase, and had occupied it continuously by himself or his tenants from that time till the time of the suit brought (A. D. 1865), and for seventeen years had paid taxes on it.

On the facts thus proved, the court below decided that the possession of Cain was protected by the limitation laws of Illinois, already in substance stated, and gave judgment accordingly. From this judgment the plaintiff sued out the present writ of error. The sole question in the case was, whether the defendant, Cain, was within the protection of these laws.

Mr. B. C. Cook, for the plaintiff in error:

Cain had no connected title deducible of record, either in law or equity, to the premises. The question of title must be connected; it must be deducible of record. Cain in fact had no title in equity at all; though he may have had interest in equity. No title in equity could have arisen until he had paid all his notes, for not till then could he have come into chancery and demanded a conveyance. He held, in short, but that inchoate interest which might or might not ripen into an equitable title. Reference by the court to decisions of the Supreme Court of Illinois; Steele v. Magie, 48 Illinois, 397; Stow v. Steel. 45 Id. 328; Nicoll v. Ogden, 29 Id. 377, will show that no other view can be taken consistently with them.

Further. All the claim that Jacquemart had to the land arose from McGuire's deed to Thiriat. That deed conveys to Thiriat, in trust for Jacquemart, indeed, but with a habendum whose effect was obviously to give the estate to Thiriat alone. Brown v. Combs, 5 Dutcher, 36.

Then these lands, if Jacquemart's at all, were Jacquemart's alone. His wife did not have any ownership in them. The bond was executed by him alone, if by anybody. But the power of attorney does not authorize the sale of the lands of either Mr. or Madame Jacquemart alone, but only the lands owned by them jointly. Dodge v. Hopkins, 14 Wisconsin, 630.

Finally, René Marie is quite a different name from Jean.

Mr. Jackson Grimshaw, contra.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

The limitation laws of Illinois, relied on by the defendant, in substance declare that whoever has resided on a tract of land for a period of seven successive years prior to the commencement of an action of ejectment, having a connected title in law or equity, deducible of record from the State or the United States, can plead the possession in bar of the suit.

It is objected, that the entire title of the defendant is not evidenced by acts of record, but this is not necessary. If the source or foundation of the title is of record, it is available to every person claiming a legal or equitable interest under it, who can connect himself with it by such evidence as applies to the nature of the right set up. Collins v. Smith, 18 Illinois, 163; Poage's Heirs v. Chinn's Heirs, 4 Dana, 54.

Is the right set up by Cain, then, within the purview of the statute?

It is conceded to be, if the bond was executed under a valid power of attorney, coupled with full payment of the purchase money, and the obligor had the legal title to the land. This concession was necessary, because it is too plain for controversy, that a union of these elements would constitute a complete equitable title, which a court of chancery, on the proper application, would perfect into a legal title. But there are other principles by which an equitable title can be tested, and, in their application to this case, relieve it of all difficulty. If a party has done all that could reasonably be expected of him to perform his part of the agreement, it will be considered in equity as having been done. Cain is within this condition. He purchased the land from Cockle, paid him all he agreed to pay, except the sum of $66, and this he was ready and willing to pay, but Cockle would not receive it, on the plea that it was rumored his principal was dead. Was not this offer equivalent to payment? What more, under the circumstances of this case, would a court of equity require? It would be a harsh rule to say that the purchaser should lose his land, because he did not institute inquiry in France, to ascertain whether the rumor of Jacquemart's death was well founded or not. There was no revocation of the power, and Cockle was the proper person to receive the money, unless Jacquemart were dead; and there is nothing in the record to show that Cain ever received any information on the subject, except what was contained in the reply of Cockle when he offered to pay him the money. Naturally, a man in the predicament of Cain, would rest in security, until advised by Cockle that he could safely pay the money to him, or until some one having authority called upon him for payment. This was never done; and after sixteen years' residence on the land, he is called upon to surrender it, because he did not employ unusual means to ascertain the proper parties to whom the small balance due on the land should be paid. If there were no limitation law in Illinois applicable to this case, the action of ejectment would, on proper application, have been enjoined until Cain could, through a court of equity, have perfected his title so as to make it available as a legal defence in a court of law. If, then, Cain had such a title as a court of equity would recognize and convert, by its decree, into a legal title, it must be considered a title in equity within the meaning of the statute. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive what the law does mean by a title in equity, if this be not one. It must be something less than a legal title, else these words in the statute can have no effect. The law was designed to protect both kinds of title alike, and unless equal influence is extended to both, there is a practical repeal of a portion of the statute. In no proper sense can it be said that Cain broke his agreement. It is true, he did not formally tender the money to Cockle, but this would have been a useless act, as Cockle told him, on his application to pay, that he could not receive the money. Besides, he had good right to suppose, from what had previously occurred, that the offer to pay Cockle was as valid as the offer to pay Jacquemart.

Why, then, has not Cain, having shown a record foundation, brought himself within the scope of the statute?

It is urged, as an additional reason against this, that Jacquemart did not own the legal title, because one of the mesne conveyances made in 1823, was to Thiriat in trust for Jacquemart. This is true, but Thiriat died in 1845, and Jacquemart, the beneficial owner of the land, assumed to have the right to sell it in July, 1848, when he executed his letter of attorney to Tillon and Cutting, with power of substitution. Nothing is heard from the heirs of Thiriat for a period of nineteen years from the death of their ancestor, when, in 1864, they convey, as do also the heirs of Jacquemart, the tract of land in controversy, to the plaintiff. After such a lapse of time, in the absence of any proof on the subject, it is difficult to resist the conclusion, that some undue influence must have been used to procure those conveyances; but, be this as it may, the title of Cain is not less an equitable one on account of them, and if so, the statute will not allow his possession, rightfully obtained and continued the requisite length of time, to be disturbed. Without discussing the effect of the deed of Thiriat's heirs, in its application to this case, it is enough to say, that a court of equity, looking through forms to the substance of things, would find a way to protect Cain's purchase.

It is urged, as an additional reason why this defence cannot prevail, that the bond is in the name of Jacquemart alone, while the power was to convey the joint property of husband and wife. There would be some force in this position, if the original deed to Thiriat had been in trust for the wife as well as the husband; but, as this was not the case, the joinder of the wife could only have been intended to alienate any supposed right of dower in the event that she survived her husband. She had no present title to the land, either legal or equitable; and although Cockle was empowered to use her name, as well as her husband's in any instrument of sale he might execute, the failure to do so cannot, in any event, operate to invalidate the bond for a deed which he gave to Cain.

It is hardly necessary to notice the objection that Jacquemart's name is incorrectly given in the contract of sale. Cockle testifies that this was a mistake, and it is the business of a court of equity to see that Cain is not harmed by it.

On the whole case, we are of the opinion that the defendant is within the protection of the limitation laws of Illinois, which he invoked for his defence, and which he had a right to do for that purpose, although the title used to accomplish this object could not be employed by a plaintiff in an action of ejectment, who can only recover when he has the paramount legal title.

In conclusion, it is proper to state, that we have examined the decisions of the Supreme Court of Illinois, to which we have been referred, as affecting the question at issue, and do not find anything decided, which militates against the views we have presented.

Judgment affirmed.

BLACK v. CURRAN.

1. Under the homestead laws of Illinois, the homestead right is not in an absolute sense an estate in the land. The fee is left as it was before the statute, subject to a right of occupancy, which cannot be disturbed while the homestead character exists.
2. The disposition of the property by judicial sale is accordingly left unaffected, except so far as is necessary to secure a homestead for the family of the occupant.
3. Hence the land in fee can be sold under execution, subject to the homestead right, and the purchaser has the absolute title when the homestead right ceases.

Error to the Circuit Court for the district of Illinois; the case being thus:

The statutes of Illinois (Laws of 1851, p. 25; Chapter 48 Gross's Statutes, p. 327, amended by act of February 17th, 1857; Act of 1857, p. 119), relating to homesteads enact:

"SECT. 1. . . . There shall be exempt from levy and forced sale, under any process or order from any court in this State, for debts contracted, the lot of ground and buildings thereon, occupied as a residence and owned by the debtor, being a householder and having a family, to the value of $1,000. Such exemption shall continue after the death of such householder, for the benefit of the widow and family, some or one of them continuing to occupy such homestead, until the youngest child shall become twenty-one years of age, and until the death of such widow, and no release or waiver of such exemption shall be valid unless the same shall be in writing subscribed by such householder and his wife, if he have one, and acknowledged in the same manner as conveyances of real estate are by law required to be acknowledged.

"SECT. 3. If in the opinion of the creditors or officers holding an execution against such householder, the premises claimed by him or her as exempt, are worth more than $1,000, such officer shall summon six qualified jurors of his county, who shall appraise said premises, and if, in their opinion, the property may be divided without injury to the interests of the parties, they shall set off so much of said premises, including the dwelling house, as in their opinion shall be worth $1,000, and the residue of said premises may be advertised and sold by such officer.

"SECT. 4. In case the value of the premises shall, in the opinion of the jury, be more than $1,000, and cannot be divided as provided for in this act, they shall make an appraisal of the value thereof, and deliver the same to the officer, who shall deliver a copy thereof to the execution debtor, with a notice thereto attached that unless the execution debtor shall pay to said officer the surplus over and above $1,000, on the amount due on said execution, within sixty days thereafter, that such premises will be sold.

SECT. 5 In case such surplus, or the amount due on said execution, shall not be paid within the said sixty days, it shall be lawful for the officer to advertise and sell the said premises, and out of the proceeds of such sale to pay to such execution debtor the said sum of $1,000, which shall be exempt from execution for one year thereafter, and apply the balance on such execution, provided that no sale shall be made unless a greater sum than $1,000 shall be bid therefor, in which case the officer may return the execution for want of property."

With this statute in force one Craddock, the head of a family, was from 1853 till 1863, the owner of a lot in Illinois, which constituted his homestead, his house being built on one half, and the other half, exceeding in value $2,000, being used for its necessary purposes, both halves alike, however, constituting, as was assumed by the court, the homestead of himself and family.

In 1858 one Spear obtained a judgment against Craddock, but although the homestead property was sufficient to pay his demand, and set off to the debtor what he was entitled to under the law, Spear did not pursue any of the modes pointed out by the statute of obtaining satisfaction of his property, but caused the western half to be sold at sheriff's sale under his execution, and having obtained a sheriff's deed for this half, conveyed it to one Curran.

Subsequent to this, that is to say, in 1863, Craddock and wife conveyed the whole lot, east and west halves alike, in fee simple, by deed, with full covenants releasing the homestead, and properly acknowleged, to certain persons who subsequently conveyed to one Black. In two weeks after Craddock and his wife thus conveyed the premises, Craddock with his family removed from them and ceased to occupy them afterwards.

In this state of things, A. D. 1866, Curran claiming title through the judicial sale to Spear, brought suit against Black for the west half of the lot; Black defending himself under the title, if any, acquired under the deed from Craddock and wife to his vendors.

The court below relying, as was said here by counsel, on McDonald v. Crandall and Coe v. Smith, decisions in the Supreme Court of Illinois (43 Illinois, 231, and 47 Id. 225), and considering that the sheriff could levy on and sell and convey a part of the homestead lot, while in occupancy of the judgment debtor, and that the deed would take effect if the debtor and his family abandoned the homestead, adjudged that the plaintiff was entitled to the property claimed by him, that is to say, the western half of the lot, in fee simple, and gave judgment accordingly. That judgment was now here for review.

Mr. Lyman Trumbull (a brief of Messrs Stuart, Edwards, and Brown being filed on the same side) for the plaintiff in error:

Assuming that the facts show the occupation of the entire lot as a homestead, does the plaintiff show any title to the premises? To recover, he must show a valid execution, a regular levy and an authorized sale. Now, here none of the requisitions of the law were complied with. Assuming the lien to exist and the premises to exceed in value the sum of $1,000, how is this lien to be enforced? The act provides in detail the manner, time, and circumstances under which levy and sale can be made. These provisions are mandatory, prerequisite to the right to sell. They are, by the decision of the Supreme Court, prohibitory of a sale in any other way. Bliss v. Clark, 39 Illinois, 596–7.

But by the decisions of the Supreme Court of Illinois, which are the rule in this matter for the Federal court, a judgment and execution do not create a lien against the homestead of the judgment debtor, and the owner may sell or mortgage it free from the lien of the judgment. This is emphatically declared in Green v. Marks, 25 Id. 221, a leading case on this matter, and the doctrine of that case has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State in a series of decisions. Bliss v. Clark, 39 Id. 590; Ives v. Mills, 37 Id. 76; Hume v. Gosset, 43 Id. 297; Pardee v. Lindley, 31 Id. 187. As a rule of property it has existed for ten years. Titles to many valuable tracts and lots of land have been acquired on the faith of this construction. The title of the grantors of plaintiff in error was so obtained in 1863. The judgment in this case unsettles these titles and prescribes a different rule. We submit that both on principle and the authorities of every State having homestead laws, the doctrine asserted by the court below (that without complying with any of the terms of the homestead law, and in a mode not pointed out by the law, the sheriff can divide the homestead lot, levy on part, sell and convey it, while in the occupancy of the judgment debtor, and that the deed so made will convey title to take effect when the occupation by the debtor of the lot ceases) is in effect a judicial repeal of the law.

The authority to sell is derived confessedly but from the statute. What is it that is exempt from sale? Not some ideal homestead right estate, leaving another imaginary reversionary interest which can be subjected to the debts of the occupant. The exemption from levy and forced sale, is of "the lot of ground and buildings." The thing out of which, about and in which, all the different kinds of estate arise, cannot be levied on or sold except in the mode provided. If the lot is exempt from levy and sale, every conceivable estate in and to said lot must also be exempt. It is no answer to say that the exemption is only to the value of $1,000, for the reason that the provisions are by the statute made to apply only where in the opinion of the creditor, the premises exceed in value $1,000; then, and then only, can he demand through the sheriff a jury to ascertain the value and divisibility of the premises, and upon notice to the judgment debtor, after the expiration of sixty days, may he sell. By the proviso to the 5th section, no sale can be made unless more than $1,000 shall be bid. The carefully defined provisions to protect the judgment debtor in his homestead right in a case where, in the opinion of the creditor, the value of the lot exceeds $1,000, the court below has decided are not necessary in the only possible case in which they could have any application.

By making these provisions in all cases essential, no one can be injured. If the premises are only worth $1,000, then nothing can be done. If the creditor at any time conceives them to be worth more, he can instantly secure his claim by proceeding in accordance with the statute. If he chooses to remain inactive until the judgment debtor conveys, the loss is the result of his negligence.

As to the cases of McDonald v. Crandall, and Coe v. Smith, relied on by the court below, it is enough to remark that in the first case the court expressly refer with approval to Green v. Marks, cited and relied on supra by us, and that the opinion in the latter, simply refers to the former case as controlling it.

These were cases of voluntary conveyances to grantees of the person claiming the homestead right. The case now before the court involves a sale in invitum. This distinction would of itself be sufficient to demonstrate the inapplicability of these decisions.

But the court in these cases did by no means decide that a deed failing to release the homestead was, or could be, by and of itself, a valid conveyance of the title by virtue of which the grantee might maintain ejectment against the grantor, or his grantees occupying the premises under conveyances from him. They decide only that the irregular deed and the surrender of the premises to the grantee of that deed, constituted an abandonment of the homestead to that grantee, so as to estop the claims of the grantor and all claiming through him. It was the concurrence of the voluntary deed and voluntary surrender, that operated to the destruction of the right.

In the case now before the court, the possession was surrendered to the grantees of the deed under which plaintiff in error claims, and he was in possession thereunder when this suit was commenced.

[The learned counsel then went into an examination of decisions in New York, Iowa, Wisconsin, New Hampshire, and Minnesota, to show that the law as conceived by them was the law in every State where exemptions similar to those in Illinois existed.]

Mr. Jackson Grimshaw, contra.

Mr Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

The rights of the parties to this suit depend upon the construction to be given the homestead laws of Illinois. These laws exempt from forced sale on execution, the lot of ground and the buildings thereon, occupied as a residence and owned by the debtor, being a householder and having a family, to the value of $1,000. And the owner of the homestead, if a married man, is not at liberty to alienate it except with the consent of the wife, and there must be an express release and waiver of the exemption on the part of both, to render the conveyance operative. A mode is provided for dividing the property, if divisible, in case its value exceeds $1,000, and of selling it, if indivisible, and applying the proceeds in a particular manner. As Spear did not pursue these modes of obtaining satisfaction of his judgment, although the homestead property was sufficient to pay his demand and set off to the debtor what he was entitled to under the law, the inquiry arises whether the proceedings which he did take operated to pass the title after the homestead was abandoned.

It is conceded that this inquiry must be answered, if possible, by the decisions of the Supreme Court of Illinois on the subject, for these decisions constitute a rule of property by which we are to be governed. Although the exact point in dispute has not been adjudicated by that court, yet certain general principles have been announced, which in their application to this case we think relieve it of difficulty. The embarrassment encountered in the administration of this law, has been chiefly owing to the fact that the exemption was confined to real estate of a limited value. If the exemption had extended to the entire lot of ground occupied as a homestead without regard to its value, it is easy to see that many troublesome questions which have arisen would have been avoided.

In order to reach a proper conclusion in this case, it is necessary to understand what is the nature of the homestead right. It cannot in an absolute sense be said to be an estate in the land; the law creates none and leaves the fee as it was before, but in substance declares that the right of occupancy shall not be disturbed while the homestead character exists. While this continues, the judgment creditor cannot lay his hands on the property, nor the husband sell it without the consent of his wife, and not then without an express release on the part of both, of the benefits of the law. The purpose of the Legislature was to secure a homestead for the family, and the disposition of the property either by judicial sale or voluntary conveyance, was left unaffected except so far as was necessary to accomplish this object. As long as the property retained its peculiar character, it was within the protection of the law, but the exemption from sale under execution or by deed (except with homestead waiver) could be lost by abandonment or surrender; that is to say, by acts in pais.

The Supreme Court of Illinois have recognized and applied these principles in several recent cases, where the effects of voluntary conveyances by the owner of the homestead, were the subject of consideration.

In McDonald v. Crandall, 43 Illinois, 231, it was held that where a conveyance is made not waiving the homestead, it passed the fee, but its operation was suspended until the grantor abandoned the premises or surrendered possession, and that the homestead, when occupied by the debtor as such, is not subject to the lien of a judgment. But the case decides that where the homestead exceeds $1,000 in value, a judgment becomes a lien and may be enforced against the overplus, and that the homestead act has not created a new estate, but simply an exemption.

In Coe v. Smith, 47 Id. 225, the facts of the case were these: The owner having a homestead right in the lot, made in 1858, a mortgage without waiver of the homestead, and then in 1860 made another mortgage with waiver; afterwards, in 1861, he abandoned the premises. The court held that the first mortgage was the prior lien.

In Hewitt v. Templeton, 48 Id. 367, it was decided that upon the abandonment of the homestead by the grantor, the grantee in a deed in which the homestead right has not been waived, is entitled to immediate possession, the homestead right being annihilated. The court in commenting on the decision in McDonald v. Crandall, which they say governs this case, uses this language: "We there held, although a judgment was no lien upon a homestead, where the premises were worth less than $1,000, and a lien upon the surplus where they were worth more than that sum, yet, where the owner conveys the same by an absolute deed or mortgage legally executed, the fee in the premises conveyed, no matter what their value, passes to the grantee, subject only to the right of occupancy on the part of the grantor in case the homestead has not been relinquished, and when such occupancy terminates, the homestead right is annihilated, it not being an estate in the premises which can be transferred as against a former conveyance that has passed the fee.

If a conveyance by the occupier of the homestead without the release of his right as required by the law has the effect to pass the title, regardless of the value of the premises conveyed, and can be enforced so soon as the occupation of the homestead ceases, it is difficult to see why the conveyance by the officer of the law, instead of the debtor, should not have the same effect.

And if, as between two voluntary grantees, the first takes the land discharged of the homestead after its abandonment, although the second conveyance contains a release of the homestead and the first does not, why should not the same rule obtain when the property was sold on judicial process, before the debtor conveyed it? The junior grantee takes nothing, because there was no estate to pass, it having been transferred by the first conveyance. On the same theory, there was no estate to convey after the sheriff had sold the land. The only difference between a conveyance made by the judgment debtor who has a homestead, and by the sheriff under a sale or execution against his land, is, one is the act of the party, the other of the law—one a voluntary, the other an involuntary conveyance. It is certain that the owner of a tract of land of more than $1,000 in value, on which there is a judgment, cannot sell it freed from the judgment, and although the homestead as such cannot be sold under execution, nor is a judgment a lien on the homestead as such, but as the land can be sold by the owner subject to the homestead, so a judgment is a lien on the land subject to the homestead, and the land or fee can be sold under execution subject to the homestead, and the purchaser, as in the case of a deed by the debtor without the waiver, has the absolute title when the homestead right ceases.

If these views of the law on this subject are correct, and we think they are fairly deducible from the decisions in Illinois, they are conclusive upon the rights of the parties to this suit.

On the hypothesis that there was no judgment against Craddock, it is clear that if he had conveyed the lot or any part of it in 1858 (the date of the judgment against him), without the waiver of the homestead, and then in October, 1863, conveyed it with the waiver (as he did), and then left the premises (as he did), the deed of 1858 would bind the land.

It follows equally, that the deed of 1863 with the clause of the waiver, did not convey the absolute title to the west half of the lot, because there was a deed made by the law under a judgment of 1858, and which operated (just as a deed made by Craddock himself would have operated) upon the west half as soon as it ceased to be a homestead—that is by abandonment. And this is true while conceding that on neither hypothesis, that is deed without the waiver and sale under the judgment, could Craddock's homestead right be disturbed—his occupation of the lot.

Judgment affirmed.

DISTRICT COURT.

The Court in Banc will be held on Monday, 24th instant, to hear rules returnable on Saturday, and motions for judgments.

Our thanks are due to Hon. Joseph B. Hancock, a member of the Legislature from this city, for a diagram showing the proposed alteration of the walls surrounding Girard College, and change in the plan of the streets in that section of the city, so as to permit the opening of Twenty-second street through the grounds. Accompanying the diagram is a printed statement of how the proposed changes are to be effected. We would desire still further information upon the subject, especially from the opponents of the measure, before we could agree to the necessity of the alteration at this time, or to the manner in which it is proposed to make it. The statement, which shows that the alteration can be made without much serious inconvenience, is as follows:

"It is proposed to obviate and overcome any inconvenience of communication occasioned by the division made by running Twenty-second street through the College grounds, by placing two carriage-way gates opposite each other (say halfway between Girard and North College avenues) in the walls on the east and west lines of Twenty-second street, and by the erection of two sets of granite steps, to be built firmly in and running north and south parallel with the walls and inside the enclosure on east and west sides of Twenty-second street; the said steps to lead from the ground to the top of the walls as above mentioned, and constructing a handsome iron bridge, extending from top landing of steps or walls and crossing Twenty-second street, in the same manner as the bridge across Poplar street, connecting the old and new Houses of Refuge on the north and south sides of said Poplar street. If the system of steps and bridge is considered objectionable, communication can be made by excavating (say eight feet deep and ten feet wide across and under Twenty-second street) from the eastern to western enclosure, and building a handsome marble or granite lined tunnel, ascending and descending from and to the ground, from the bottom of the tunnel by stone steps, or by walks of a descending grade, either paved or gravel laid. The length of the tunnel will be only sixty feet, which can be kept perfectly dry by drainage into a culvert sufficiently deep, now constructed on the ground near by."

SCRIBNER'S FOR MARCH.

The illustrated articles in Scribner's for March, include an interesting description of "Life in the New Diamond Diggings of South Africa;" "Professor Morse and the Telegraph," with an account of the sending of the first telegram, of which a fac-simile is given, as well as a fac-simile of the first daguerreotype of the human face ever made in America: "Napoleon II., King of Rome and Duke of Reichstadt," with several portraits of the son of the first Napoleon, and curious particulars of his life: and "Folk-Life in German By-Ways," with a number of interesting pictures. In the present instalment of Dr. Holland's "Arthur Bonnicastle," there is a description of a "revival" in a ew England village, and "Aunt Flick," makes her first appearance. There are two short stories, "The Woman who Saved me," by Fannie E. Hodson, and "A Ghost who Made Himself Useful," also a remarkable essay by Augustus Blauvelt, entitled "Christ's Miracles Scientifically Considered." Mr. Stedman gives some "Stanzas for Music," from an unfinished drama; and from George MacDonald we have another translation from "Novalis." Dr. Holland, the editor, discusses in the "Topics of the Time" The Reading of Periodicals, Professional and Literary Incomes, and The Complicity of Justice With Crime. The Old Cabinet contains a notice of the recent Census, and some verses entitled "The Poet to His Poem." In Home and Society, Household Art, Co-operative Housekeeping, Ladies at Sea, Hyper-gentility, and the Games of Children and the Gambling of Men, are treated.

THE CANADA LAW JOURNAL commences its ninth volume by an increase in the number of pages and various other improvements, greatly adding to its usefulness and value to the profession. It also issues the Canada Law Journal Almanac, containing lists of the judges of Canada, England, etc. We congratulate the Journal on its increasing prosperity.

THE UNDERWRITER. Philadelphia, February, 1873.

THE HISTORY OF THE CONSOLIDATION OF THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA. By Eli K. Price. Philadelphia, 12mo., pp. 140. J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1873. Received from the publishers.

This is a very excellent little work, the author of which is so well known to the Philadelphia Bar and the public, that it is merely necessary to draw attention to the fact that he has written it, to insure its careful perusal by all citizens who take an interest in the history and progress of this great city, and who earnestly desire to reform the evils from which it now suffers.

The publication of this work, at the present time, when a Constitutional Convention, which will have as one of the subjects before it, the regulation of our municipal government and its connection with the State, is in session here, is most opportune.

The work was prepared by Mr. Price at the request of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. It contains the first and second charters of the city, a historical account of the measures that preceded and produced consolidation, the passage of the act and the festivities and proceedings consequent upon that passage. It concludes with a portrayal of the advantages of the consolidation, and a prayer that those advantages may long be preserved. We commend the work to our readers.

THE ELECTRA OF SOPHOCLES. Translated by J. G. Brinckle. Published by John Campbell & Son, No. 740 Sansom street. Philadelphia, 1873.

This translation, from the short and imperfect examination we have as yet been able to make, appears to possess great merit. It exhibits close fidelity to the best texts, correct and varied versification, and a good ear for the melody of our language.

It is remarkable for its conciseness, which is shown conspicuously by the correspondence in the lines of the translation and the original, the number being precisely the same, and the figures in the margin of the English corresponding all the way through with those in the original.

The translator has introduced no epithets, expletives and adjectives of his own, but has followed the original closely and scrupulously, almost word for word, and has shown a decided preference for our own sharp Anglo-Saxon monosyllables. This peculiarity is particularly observable in the dialogue pictures, to which it gives great force and sprightliness. We have no doubt that this work will add to the reputation of the translator, and prove a credit to the taste and scholarship of our country.

We take a special pleasure in noticing this translation, as it is the work of a member of the Philadelphia Bar. The name of the printer, Mr. Henry B. Ashmead, is a sufficient guaranty that the mechanical part of the book is of the highest excellence.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

[Head notes of decisions in Supreme Court of New Hampshire, to appear in Vol. 52, N. H. Reports. Received from John M. Shirley, Esq., State Reporter.]

STATE v. RUM, WHISKEY AND GIN.

Section 23, chapter 99, of the general statutes, provided that intoxicating liquors kept for sale in violation of law may be seized, and upon due proceedings adjudged forfeited, but omitted to point out the mode in which such liquors should be disposed of after the decree of forfeiture. Held, that upon proper preliminary proceedings, and proof of an illegal keeping for sale, a valid decree of forfeiture might pass; and that the liquors thus forfeited might legally be disposed of according to the provisions of an act passed subsequently to the seizure.

RICH v. ERROL.

Selectmen have not authority, ex-officio, without a vote of the town, to borrow money upon the credit of the town.

Selectmen, without being authorized by a vote of the town, borrowed money, representing that it was for the use of the town, and gave a note in the name of the town therefor. Held, that a bona fide endorsee of the note could not recover upon merely proving the borrowing of the money and the giving of the note by the selectmen.

STATE v. RAND.

The purchaser of liquor sold in violation of the statute is not guilty of a criminal offence, and cannot be excused from testifying as to the purchase.

CHARTIER v. MARSHALL.

Equity will not decree the specific performance of a contract to convey real estate, when it is proved that the vendor has no title to the estate in question.

When the plaintiff's bill is dismissed for that cause, no costs will be allowed against the plaintiff.

ADAMS v. ADAMS.

Courts have power to set aside or vacate decrees of divorce for fraud or imposition, as in the case of other judgments, and will exercise that power where such fraud or imposition is clearly established.

GLEASON v. EMERSON.

A divorce a vinculo bars dower.

BIXBY v. MOOR et al.

The defendants kept a billiard saloon, and a bar for the sale of liquor. The liquor traffic was illegal. The plaintiff was employed by the defendants to work generally in and about the saloon; there was no special agreement that he should or should not sell liquor, or as to what particular duty he should do; but he was accustomed to work generally in and about the saloon, taking care of the room, building the fires, taking care of the billiard tables, tending at the bar, and waiting upon customers; in the absence of the defendants, he had the whole charge of the business. The plaintiff, at the time he entered into the service of the defendants, knew what business was carried on there. In assumpsit upon a quantum meruit,—held, that the plaintiff could not recover compensation for any portion of his services.

UNITED STATES COURTS.

ILLINOIS.

U. S. DISTRICT COURT, N. D. OF ILLINOIS.

1. In an action by the assignee of a corporation organized under the Illinois statutes, against a stockholder, to recover the amount unpaid on his stock, it is not a sufficient defence that the corporate proceedings have not been strictly in accordance with the statute. Upton, Assignee, v. Hansbrough, 5 Ch. Leg. News, 242.

2. Where an insurance company has attempted to increase its capital, and filed papers for that purpose, received subscriptions for and sold stock under such increase, and incurred liabilities upon policies of insurance bearing upon their face evidence of such increase, this is sufficient to constitute the company a corporation de facto, so that neither it nor its stockholders can object that it is not a corporation de jure. Id.

3. A provision in the subscription and the stock certificate, that the balance was to be paid on the call of the directors, when ordered by a vote of a majority of the stockholders themselves, does not prevent this power being effectually exercised by this court. The claim that a stockholder could not be made liable except after such a call, would be nothing more nor less than that a party might legally and morally owe a debt, and yet so frame a contract, that its payment shall be wholly discretionary, and not subject to be enforced in the courts without his consent. Id.

4. The fact that the agents and officers of the company represented to the stockholders at the time of their purchase, that no assessment would ever be made, and that the stock was in fact non-assessable, or made other false and fraudulent statements in regard to the condition of the company, are inadmissible as evidence, and constitute no defence as against the creditors of the company. Id.

5. The attempt to set up such a defence as against the creditors of the company, who have entered into contracts with it without knowledge of such provision, and whose only means of obtaining payment is by compelling stockholders to pay the balance due upon their stock, cannot receive the sanction of any court, and is without parallel in judicial proceedings. Id.

6. Persons indebted to an insolvent corporation, cannot withhold from its creditors the assets which in equity and good conscience should be applied to the payment of their debts, and courts of equity by virtue of their inherent jurisdiction, will enforce the proper application of the capital stock. Id.

. Such a secret arrangement is a palpable fraud, and it cannot be maintained, that being good as between the company and stockholders, it is also good as against the assignee. The assignee represents the interests of the creditors, and is a trustee for their benefit, and any defence not good as against them in an equitable suit, is not maintainable as against him. Id.

1. Correction of mistake.—Where personal property is correctly described in a chattel mortgage, but the lot of ground upon which it is situated is misdescribed, such misdescription will be rejected as surplusage, and equity will not take jurisdiction to make a useless correction of the mortgage. Spaulding v. Mozier, 57 Ill. 148.

2. Parol.—In such a case, parol evidence would be admissible to establish the identity of the property, and in this the law affords a full and complete remedy, and it must be sought on the common law side of the court. Ib.

3. Mortgaged chattels on execution.—Where creditors hold an execution against the mortgagor of chattels, they may sell such chattels subject to the lien of the prior mortgage, and equity will not enjoin such a sale. Ib.

1. Whether a deed, absolute upon its face, is a mortgage—Proof necessary to show.—In a proceeding in chancery, to redeem a certain lot of ground from a mortgage, alleged to have been executed on the premises, to secure the payment of a debt owing by the grantor to the grantee, the deed being in form absolute, to change its character to that of a mortgage, it was held, to require clear proof that it was really but a security for the payment of the debt. (Opinion by Sheldon, J.) Cummings v. Ehrenfels, 57 Ill. 195.

2. And evidence of loose declarations of the grantee in regard to his intentions, was regarded as a dangerous species of evidence upon which to disturb the title to land, being extremely liable to be misunderstood or perverted, and the allowance of it for that purpose not in accord with the policy of the law requiring written evidence to attest the ownership of real property. Ib.

3. The kind of parol evidence properly receivable, to show an absolute deed to be a mortgage, is that of facts and circumstances of such a nature as in a court of equity will control the operation of the deed, and not of loose declarations of parties touching their intentions and understandings. Ib.

4. It has been held, that evidence of such declarations alone, is insufficient proof to show an absolute deed to be a mortgage. Ib.

WISCONSIN.

WEBER et al. v. ZEIMET et al.

Where mortgaged lands are conveyed subject to the mortgage, the grantees (and all claiming under them) undertake that the land shall be the primary fund for the payment of such debt; and a subsequent reconveyance of a part of said lands to the mortgagor does not relieve the remainder from their equal liability for such debt.

2. Under an indictment for murder (regular in other respects), which avers that the killing was committed by defendant "feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice aforethought," but does not aver that it was committed "with premeditated design to effect the death" of any person, the accused, upon a proper verdict, may be convicted of murder in either the second or third degree, as defined by our statute. SAMUEL v. BLAYLOCK.

1. Evidence of the relation existing between the parties to a written agreement, and of the circumstances leading to it is always admissible, and may be considered in its construction.

2. B. agreed that if he purchased certain property at sheriff's sale, he would hold it in trust, to sell it for the payment of the debts of the firm of H. & S., and divide the surplus, if any, between S. and himself. B. purchased at said sale in the name of Z. The debts of H. & S. being paid and settled, Z. was ordered to execute a conveyance of the property to B., in fee, upon the trust expressed in said agreement.

Appeals by plaintiff and defendant from the decree of the Court of Nisi Prius.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered February 13th, 1873.

Upon a careful examination of the testimony, I am unable to discover anything which varies the agreement in writing set forth as the ground of the bill. The evidence before the examiner was given without objection, and was entirely proper as explaining the relation between the parties, and the circumstances which lead to the agreement. These facts are always admissible, and may be considered in the construction of a written instrument. It appears that the verbal understanding originally was that Hirst was to have an interest of one-third in the premises, if purchased by Blaylock, but with his acquiescence that was changed, and the final arrangement was as expressed in the writing, that if Blaylock became the purchaser of the sheriff's sale, he was to hold the property in trust to sell, and after paying incumbrances, to apply the proceeds to discharge the debt of the firm of P. Hirst and Samuel, and to divide the surplus, if any, between Blaylock and Samuel. It is in evidence, and is not a matter in dispute, that all the debts of the firm of P. Hirst and Samuel have been settled and paid, so that Hirst has no longer any interest in the controversy. It clearly appears, also, that Hirst and Samuel had performed their part of the contract, by procuring the consent of David Samuel to accept the bond and mortgage of Blaylock for his judgment. It is true that Blaylock did not covenant to become the purchaser; but it is equally true, that if he did purchase, he could not throw aside the obligation of the agreement, by paying David Samuel in cash, instead of giving his bond and mortgage. If he bought, he must hold the property upon the trust for which he had agreed to hold it in that event. The master reports, that Blaylock was in fact the purchaser, though in the name of Zeigler, to whom he loaned or furnished the money to pay for it, and, we think, that he is fully sustained in that finding by the evidence, for the reasons he has stated. The testimony of Blaylock and Zeigler themselves, with the circumstances as detailed by other witnesses, lead the mind to the conclusion and overcome the answers. This being so, Zeigler's legal title is equally affected and bound by the trust. Blaylock had no right to constitute another person as trustee, without the consent of Samuel. So much, therefore, of the decree below as declared the trust to exist, and ordered Zeigler to execute a conveyance in fee to Blaylock, to hold in trust as expressed in the agreement, was certainly right. But, we think, it should have stopped there. There is no right or equity in Samuel to be paid one-half the net income. Until the sale takes place the rents are applicable, in the first instance, to the reimbursement of the amount advanced by Blaylock. When the sale takes place, Blaylock must, of course, account for the rents. The bill does not pray for an account, or for a sale, and the prayer that a conveyance should at once be made to Samuel of a moiety of the property, subject to the amount of $10,800 paid by Blaylock, and the prior incumbrances, is clearly inadmissible, because its effect would be to destroy the power of sale, and abrogate the very agreement which is made the basis of the relief prayed in the bill. The only equity which the complainant had upon his bill, was to enforce the agreement, by a decree that the legal title should be transferred to and vested in the trustee named in it.

The decree below is reversed, and now it is ordered and decreed that George W Zeigler shall execute a conveyance, in fee, of the premises described in the bill to Lewis Blaylock, in trust, as expressed in the written agreement set forth in the bill, and that he be enjoined from conveying or incumbering said premises, and from executing any deed therefor other than is herein ordered; that the said trustee shall not sell the premises at private sale without the consent and approbation of the said Samuel, in writing, nor at public sale, without reasonable notice thereof beforehand, to be given to him, and that the parties to these appeals shall respectively pay their own costs, and the defendants, Blaylock and Zeigler, pay the costs in the court below, except the costs of the second reference to the master, and the costs subsequent thereto, which shall be paid by the complainant, Samuel.

LOCKHART & FREW v. BONSALL, KING & CO.

1. L. & F., upon a contract for the delivery of 5,000 barrels of petroleum, tendered to B, K. & Co., a lot of 5,981, in gross; 5,000 on contract with B., K. & Co., and the surplus, 981, on a distinct individual contract, of different date, with B. alone, but which matured at the same time, L. & F. making no attempt to set apart the 5,000 from the 5,981, but required B. K. & Co., to make the separation themselves. Held, That L. & F. utterly failed to perform or make a valid offer or tender of performance.
2. A party tendering a larger quantity of merchandise than called for by a contract, cannot require the purchaser to take a larger quantity, measure and take out his portion, and give the surplus to another party.
3. A purchaser has the right to decline an actual tender made by a seller, if such tender is clogged with a demand which the seller had no right to make.
4. He is not bound to give a reason for the refusal; the reason is in the tender itself.

Sur motion for a new trial.

HISTORY OF THE CASE.

On April 27th, 1870, the plaintiffs and defendants entered into the following contract for the sale and purchase of oil:

Joseph P. Wood,
Duquesne Way.

No responsibility taken, unless by special agreement.

Pittsburgh, April 27, 1870.

10 cent stamp.

Sold to Messrs. Bonsall, King & Co., for account of Messrs. Lockhart & Frew, five thousand (5,000) barrels good, green, merchantable crude petroleum, forty gallons to the barrel, gravity forty to forty-six (40 to 46) degrees, at a temperature of 60° Fahrenheit, to be delivered at buyers' option, at any time on or before thirty-first (31) day of December, 1870—buyers giving ten (10) days' previous notice to sellers—in bulk cars, or bulk boats, at Pittsburgh. If delivered by Allegheny Valley or Western Pennsylvania Railroads, the buyer may designate any other point of delivery on line of said roads. If delivered by water, then at any good landing in or near Pittsburgh buyer may direct. Payment to be made cash on delivery, at the rate of fourteen and one quarter (14¼) cents per gallon, on lots as gauged and delivered.

Brokerage, 11-20 per cent. by seller.

JOSEPH WOOD,
Broker.

Accepted.
Lockhart & Frew.

On December 21st, 1870, the defendants gave the plaintiffs notice to deliver the oil on December 31st, 1870.

On December 31st, 1870, the plaintiffs tendered to the defendants, 70 tank cars, containing 5,981 5-40 barrels of oil. 5,000 were stated to be on the contract for the defendants, and the balance on another contract between the plaintiffs and Sterling Bonsall alone, bearing a different date, and at a different price. The plaintiffs did not separate one lot from the other, nor designate the cars which were to go to one or the other. They tendered them in the aggregate, jointly, upon both contracts, and left the duty of the separation of the oil, under each contract, upon the defendants. The plaintiffs, subsequently, upon the same day, tendered to Sterling Bonsall, upon his individual contract, 48 cars, containing 4,076 38–40 barrels, and demanded payment for the same, together with the 981 5–40 barrels, previously tendered to the defendants, and also demanded payment for 58 3–40 barrels surplus.

The defendants declined to receive the oil, and the plaintiffs sold it at auction for a less price, and brought this suit to recover the difference.

The defendants offered no evidence, but went to the jury upon the plaintiff's evidence.

After the charge from the learned court, the jury found a verdict for the defendants, and the plaintiffs moved for a rule for a new trial.

The opinion of the court was delivered by TRUNKEY, P. J.

On April 27th, 1870, the plaintiffs contracted to sell Bonsall, King & Co., 5,000 barrels of crude petroleum, to be delivered at buyers' option, at any time on or before the 31st day of December, 1870—buyers giving ten days' previous notice—in bulk cars, or bulk boats, at Pittsburgh. Payment to be made, cash on delivery, at 14¼ cents per gallon, on lots as gauged and delivered. The purchasers gave no notice till December 21st, and then claimed the oil on the 31st. In the notice they named no place for delivery. On the morning of the 31st, they designated the "Anchor Works." There was no time or room for delivery at that place on the day of its designation. Prior to that the plaintiffs had sought to have the defendants name a place. Hence, if the plaintiffs delivered the oil at Pittsburgh, the defendants cannot complain. The plaintiffs had over 10,000 barrels of crude petroleum at Pittsburgh, on the 31st, December, 1870. Before that date they had offered none. They had made no attempt to deliver a part and obtain payment in lots at the specified rate.

They allege they offered the whole on the 31st December, and that the defendants refused to accept. They do not rest the case on the ground that they had a large quantity of crude petroleum at the place, ready and willing to measure out, or set apart the precise quantity, and were prevented because the defendants were not there to receive it, or because they refused the precise quantity before the time for delivery. Was the oil delivered or offered, in performance of the contract? The parties met at an office several miles from the tank cars containing the oil. In the morning, when Bonsall was asked by Lockhart to examine the oil, he did not say he would or would not; he would not talk. Between 4 and 5 P. M., says Frew, I tendered 5,000 barrels on contract of Bonsall, King & Co., and a surplus of 981 barrels tendered on a contract of different date with Bonsall, which matured on same date. I presented the entire 5,000 barrels at one time; Sterling and Charles T. Bonsall were present; spent some time looking over the papers; and declined to accept the oil, and gave no reason for the declination. A short time after I made another tender on the other contract, and then handed them a receipt from the A. V. Railroad, for the whole amount due on both contracts and the surplus. In another part of his testimony he speaks of charging them for the surplus.

The gauger's certificates tendered and in evidence show there were 5,981 barrels, these certificates gave the numbers of the cars, but not the quantity of oil on each car; they show the aggregate quantity of oil on a number of cars. On their face it is impossible to select cars containing 5,000 barrels of oil. The plaintiffs made no attempt to set apart cars or certificates for 5,000 barrels. They tendered the whole; the surplus of 981 barrels, to apply on another contract with another party; no division was made by themselves, but that act was required of the purchasers. Bonsall, who although a member of the firm of Bonsall, King & Co., had his distinct individual contract of a different date, and for aught that appears, the defendants had no more to do with it than if it had been with an entire stranger. Bonsall was reticent, and by his acts showed in the clearest manner that the defendants were standing upon their contract, with no intention of receiving the oil, unless so tendered as to be a performance, or offer of performance by the sellers. The plaintiffs knew this; they were not misled. They undertook to tender the oil. They made a tender of a much larger quantity, and demanded that the surplus be given by the defendants to another purchaser, who held another contract. There is no pretence of any other or different tender, or offer of performance by the plaintiffs. Even when they made a tender to Bonsall on his contract, they took into account the 981 barrels surplus, which they had previously tendered to the defendants.

The tender was made as the execution of a contract for delivery of 5,000 barrels of oil. As part of their tender, the plaintiffs endeavored to force the defendants to take a larger quantity, then measure and take out their own, and give the surplus to another party. The purchasers were under no such obligation. The plaintiffs utterly failed to perform or make a valid offer or tender of performance. The opinion in Stevenson v. Burgin, 13 Wright, 36, settles the principles applicable to the evidence in this case. It is useless to consider whether the exceptions to the general rule as to tender of chattels, stated by Parsons, in his work on Contracts, 2d vol., 159, exist in this State, under the law as stated in Stevenson v. Burgin. If such exceptions do exist, I am unable to so understand the evidence, as to submit it to a jury. Instead of proof of an exception to the general rule, it seems to me that the proof is express of an actual tender, clogged with a demand which the plaintiffs had no right to make. The defendants had a right to decline to take 5,981 barrels of oil thus offered. They were not bound to render a reason for the refusal. The reason was in the tender itself.

My views of the evidence and law applicable thereto, impel me to overrule the motion; but if found erroneous by the court of last resort, I shall be gratified.

THIRD JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Court of Common Pleas of Lehigh County.

JONAS RAUCH & CO. v. PETER A. GOOD.

The writ of attachment under the act of March 17th, 1869, will lie upon a demand for an alleged breach of contract, where the damages are unliquidated.

Sur motion to dissolve the attachment.

Opinion of the court by LONGAKER, J. Delivered February 18th, 1873.

This proceeding was commenced under the attachment act of March 17th, 1869, and the defendant moves to dissolve the writ for the reason that the plaintiff's affidavit shows the demand to be an alleged breach of contract for unliquidated damages.

By the first section of this act, the affidavit must set forth the nature and amount of the indebtedness; by the third section, the defendant may enter into a bond in double the amount of the debt or demand claimed, conditioned, &c., and retain the possession of the goods attached; and by the fourth section, in case of personal service, residence, or appearance, the court shall proceed in the case in like manner as in a case of summons for debt regularly issued and duly served. In these several sections occur the words indebtedness, debt or demand, and the phrase "the case shall proceed as in a case of summons for debt regularly issued and duly served," and all of them become the subject of interpretation.

A more inartistic act, and one more confusing in its terms, could not well be drawn. An action of debt is well defined by the general practice, and debt itself, in a restricted sense, has a well defined and a certain meaning, but debt as defining the relation of parties having claims against each other, and which is sought to be enforced by suit, is not restricted to an action of debt alone; while demand has a most comprehensive signification. Debt, in its restricted sense, is "a sum of money due by certain and express agreement; as by bond for a determinate sum, a bill, note, a special bargain, or a rent reserved on lease, where the amount is fixed and specific; and does not depend upon any subsequent valuation to settle it;" 3 Bl. Com. 154. In its enlarged sense, Hubbard, J., 3 Metcalf's Rep. 522–526, says: "The word debt is of large import, including not only debts of record, or judgment, and debts of specialty, but also obligations arising under simple contract to a very wide extent; and in its popular sense, includes all that is due to a man under any form of obligation or promise." Demand, according to Judge Coke, is one of the most comprehensive terms in the law: Co. Litt. 291. Beardsly, J., 1 Denio's R. 257–261. It is of much broader import than debt, and embraces rights of action belonging to the debtor, beyond those which may appropriately be called debts. 2 Hill's (N. Y.) R. 220–223. A release of all manner of demands is the best release that a man can have, and shall enure most to his advantage. Litt., sect. 508.

Giving the proper legal import to each of these sections construed together, so that each shall be operative in its particular sphere, it becomes apparent that the legislative intent was to give a right of action in all cases of demands arising ex contractu. This act is to be construed liberally, as were the foreign attachment acts of 1705 and 1836. By the act of 1705, the writ was to be levied upon the goods and chattels of non-residents; yet, in McClenachan et al. v. McCarty, 1 Dallas, 377, and Ludlow v. Bingham, 4 Dallas, 55, it was held that a levy upon real estate was good. These cases are approved by Schacklett & Glyde's Appeal, 2 Harris, 329.

There are some dicta that foreign attachment, founded upon claims ex contractu, will not lie for unliquidated damages, nor in actions ex contractu sounding in tort; but no adjudicated case is found in which it has been denied in actions ex contractu. In the Girard Fire Ins. Co. v. Field, 9 Wright, 131, it was held to lie against a policy of insurance for loss occasioned by fire, before the amount due had been ascertained by an assessment of the damages. In Strock v. Little, 9 Wright, 418, it was sustained in an account render. In Thornton v. Bonham, 2 Barr, 102, it was held to lie for the penalty of a bond to the sheriff for an appearance. In Franklin Fire Ins. Co. v. West, 8 W. & S. 350, it was held to lie for a claim, uncertain at the time of the attachment, but rendered certain at the time of the answers to the interrogatories.

Construing the acts of 1869 by the aid of these authorities, it must be held, that an attachment will lie upon a demand of unliquidated damages for an alleged breach of contract.

The motion to dissolve is therefore denied.

In compliance with the desire of many prominent members of the Bar, the Publishers have endeavored to produce a handsome book, full and complete in its contents. Owing to the sale being limited to the Philadelphia Bar, to whom only it can be of use, and in consequence of the expense attending its publication, the price has been fixed at a figure that may seem apparently high,—but the Publishers, to reimburse themselves for the outlay they have been subject to, have been compelled to decline giving discounts to any one, so as to enable them to give the Bar the advantage of the lowest possible price for which the Book can be made.

The volume has been carefully compiled, and has also been revised by the Judges of the different Courts, and endorsed by Rules of the same. They therefore contain not only the latest, but also the only full publication of those rules, as they now stand on the minutes of the different Courts.

The Duke of Argyll, Matthew Arnold, Max Muller, Erckmann-Chatrian. Miss Thackeray, C. Kingsley, Arthur Helps, George MacDonald, Charles Reade, Karl Blind, Miss Mullock, Sir Robert Lytton, Fritz Reuter, Prof. Huxley, Prime-Minister Gladstone, Julia Kavanaugh, James Anthony Froude, Frances Power Cobbe, Jean Ingelow, Alfred Tennyson, Robert Browning, are some of the distinguished authors lately represented in the pages of

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

A WEEKLY MAGAZINE, of sixty-four pages, THE LIVING AGE gives more than THREE AND A QUARTER THOUSAND DOUBLE-COLUMN OCTAVO PAGES of reading-matter yearly, forming four large volumes. It presents an inexpensive form, considering its great amount of matter, with freshness, owing to its weekly issue, and with a SATISFACTORY COMPLETENESS attempted by no other publication the best Essays, Reviews, Criticisms, Tales, Poetry, Scientific, Biographical, Historical, and Political Information, from the entire body of Foreign Periodical Literature.

TRANSLATIONS.

In addition to the productions of the leading British authors, and in pursuance of its plan of including the best translations, THE LIVING AGE will publish serially, beginning about Jan. 1, one of the finest productions, translated expressly for it, of that charming Platt-Deutsch novelist and humorist, FRITZ REUTER, "the most popular German author of the last half-century." His writings, says Bayard Taylor in the N. Y. Tribune, "are the wonder and delight of Germany." A charming Christmas-story by the same author will be given about Christmas-time.

The importance of THE LIVING AGE to every American reader as the only thorough as well as fresh compilation of a generally inaccessible but indispensable current literature, —indispensable because it embraces the productions of in all departments of Literature, Science, Art, and Politics,—is sufficiently indicated by the following.

EXTRACTS FROM NOTICES.

"It is, beyond all question, the best compendium of the best current literature.... In no other single publication can there be found so much of sterling literary excellence."—N. Y. Evening Post.

"We know of no way in which one can so easily keep well informed in the best English thought of our time as though this journal."—Christian Union. N. Y.

"For thinking people, the best of all the eclectic publications, and the cheapest. . . . It is a monthly that comes every week."—The Advance, Chicago.

"It gives articles from the great foreign quarterlies which its rivals have not room for .. It has no equal in any country."—Phila. Press.

"The ablest essays, the most entertaining stories, the finest poetry of the English language, are here gathered together."—Illinois State Journal.

"Were I, in view of all the competitors that are now in the field, to choose, I should certainty choose 'THE LIVING AGE.'"—Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

"It still merits the most unqualified praise we can bestow."—N. Y. Times.

"The best periodical in America."—Rev. Theo. L. Cuyler.

"It gives to its readers more than three thousand double column octavo pages a year, of the most valuable, instructive, and entertaining reading of the day. 'History, biography, fiction, poetry, wit, science, politics, criticism, art,—what is not here?' It is the only compilation that presents with a satisfactory completeness, as well as freshness, the best literature of the almost innumerable, and generally inaccessible, European quarterlies, monthlies, and weeklies,—a literature embracing the productions of the ablest and most cultured writers living. It is, therefore, indispensable to every one who desires a thorough compendium of all that is admirable and noteworthy in the literary world."—Boston Post.

Published weekly at $8.00 a year, free of postage. The next volume begins Jan. 1. New Subscribers beginning then will receive Reuter's Christmas story without charge.

Address, LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

BRIGGS v. EWART.

1. No one can be made a party to a contract without his own consent. In the execution of instruments of writing, such as contracts, deeds, e c., the mind must act intelligently, and the instrument must not only be signed but delivered by the party, as and for what he intended it.
2. If the mind is drawn away by fraud or otherwise, and the party is induced to sign an instrument, as and for another, different from what it purpor s to be, then there is no consent given and no delivery made or authoriz d to be made of the paper so signed. If such paper purports to be a negotiable note, it is void as to the payee, and all other holders, whether innocent purchasers or not.

Appeal from Pettis Court of Common Pleas.

Opinion by ADAMS, J.

This suit originated before a justice of the peace, and was founded on the following note:

"$150. SEDALIA, February 24, 1870.

"On or before the 10th day of June, 1870, for value received, I, the subscriber, of Mt. Sterling Township, county of Pettis, State of Missouri, promise to pay S. R. Squier, or order, one hundred and fifty dollars, without discount or defalcation, and with interest at 10 per cent. from date, at Sedalia, Mo., P. O."

"DAVID EWART."

A judgment was rendered against the defendant by the justice, from which he appealed to the Common Pleas Court.

On the trial in the Common Pleas, evidence was given conducing to show that the defendant's signature to the note was obtained by Squier, the payee, in the following manner: He went to defendant's house late in the evening and proposed to sell his son a patent pump; he had been there before for that purpose and the defendant had advised his son not to purchase. Squier brought a model of the pump with him and proposed to appoint the defendant's son agent for the sale of the pumps, and the son agreed to take the agency. The defendant agreed to vouch for his son, and a contract of agency was produced by Squier, by which Squier made the son agent, and the son, with the defendant, signed the agency contract to account for the proceeds of sale, etc. This was after dark and a lamp was lighted. Squier then produced a printed order, with necessary blanks, for the defendant to sign and keep as the form of an order for pumps to be sent to the agent. The defendant read over this form and signed and retained it. Squier then rose to his feet and seemed in a great hurry to start, and drew out what he said was a copy of the order, and that the defendant must sign it to send off at once to New York for the pump—that he would take it right into town with him and mail it that night. He said the papers were just the same. They looked just alike. He hurried up defendant, had his own pen and ink with him, and defendant signed the paper as and for an order for a pump. Defendant in his evidence stated he never signed the paper as a note but as an order. That he never delivered any paper to Squier as a note, and the only papers he intended to make were the agency contract and the order for a pump. That Squier took his paper off with him as an order for a pump.

On the part of the plaintiff it was in evidence that he purchased the note from Squier for $125, without any knowledge or notice of the alleged fraud in obtaining the signature of the defendant. That Squier sold it to him a short time after its date and before maturity.

This suit was brought by plaintiff as assignee of the note.

The defendant asked the court to declare the law to be that "although the court should find from the evidence that the defendant did write his name on or to the paper herein sued upon, yet if the court further finds from the evidence that the signature of defendant was obtained thereto without the fault or negligence of defendant on the fraudulent representations of the payee, that the paper to which it was put was a mere duplicate of the order read in evidence, and that the defendant neither knew it was a note, nor intended to sign a note, but supposed it was such a duplicate, and that the plaintiff did not pay therefor a full and valuable consideration, then the court will find the issues for the defendant."

Other instructions not covering the point raised by this one, were given and refused, and some were given for plaintiff in conflict with this instruction. The verdict and judgment were for plaintiff. The instruction above set forth raises the only point necessary for us to consider.

It may be assumed as an axiom too well settled to be disputed, that no one can be made a party to a contract without his own consent. Although his signature may be put to the writing, and may have been written by himself, yet if he did not know what he was signing, but acted honestly under the belief that he was signing some other paper and not the one he really signed, he ought not to be bound by such signature. In the execution of instruments of writing, such as contracts, deeds, etc., the mind must act intelligently, and the instrument must not only be signed but delivered by the party, as and for what he intended it for.

Commercial paper is no exception to this rule, only that in some cases a party knowingly putting his name to such paper, may by his own negligence be estopped from disputing the execution as against an innocent holder for value.

For instance, if a person knowingly signs a negotiable note and it is stolen from him and gets into the hands of an innocent holder before maturity, he must suffer the consequence of his own negligence. In such case he knows that he has signed a note, and that it only needs delivery to constitute a valid instrument, so when it is delivered, no matter by whom, to an innocent holder, he is estopped by his own negligence from denying that he authorized its circulation. It was his own folly to sign the note and leave it in existence. But if a party is compelled by duress to sign a note, or is insane when he signs it, or signs a blank paper for no purpose at all, and leaves it on his table, and a note be written over it and put into circulation without his knowledge, I know no principle of commercial or other law that will compel him to pay it, whether in the hands of an innocent holder or not. The point is that the mind must act in the execution of the paper. It must be executed as and for the paper it purports to be. If the mind is drawn away from it by fraud or otherwise, and the party is induced to sign it as and for another instrument different from what it purports to be, then there is no consent given and no delivery made or authorized to be made of the paper so signed. If such paper purports to be a negotiable note, it is void as to the payee, and all other holders, whether innocent purchasers or not.

Parties dealing in commercial paper must ascertain whether it was knowingly signed or authorized to be signed by the payer, and this is the only inquiry an innocent purchaser is bound to make.

If the evidence given on behalf of the defendant be true, his name was obtained to the note without his consent. He did not know that it was a note, but believed it to be a mere order for a pump, and signed and delivered it as such, and not as a note.

I have not been able to find any direct authority in conflict with these views. In the case of Clark v. Johnson, 54 Ills. 296, the court held that a party executing a note for a plowing machine was bound to pay it to an innocent holder, although he intended to add a condition to the note after it was written and signed, and before he could do so the payee snatched it from him and sold it to an innocent purchaser. This seems to be carrying the doctrine beyond its proper limits. The case does not appear to have been well considered. No authorities are cited either by the counsel or by the court, except the case of Shiply v. Carroll et al., 45 Ills. 285, where the maker was held liable on a stolen note in the hands of an innocent purchaser. In the case of Shiply v. Carroll, it was intimated that if the execution of the note had been obtained by fraud, it would have been void under their statute, which allows the maker of a note to set up fraud and circumvention in the execution of a note as a defence. This statute, in my judgment, is only declaratory of the common law. What greater fraud could have been practiced than to induce a party to draw a note, and before its delivery, and before a condition was added to make it complete, to snatch it and run away with it! But that was not a parallel case with the one at bar. In Nance v. Lany, 5 Alabama, 370, the court held that where one writes his name on a blank piece of paper, of which another takes possession, without authority, and writes a promissory note above the signature which he negotiates to a third person who is ignorant of the circumstances, the former is not liable as the maker of the note.

In Foster v. Mackinnon, 4 Law Reports (English Common Pleas), 704, which is very much in point and seems to have been well considered, the court held, that where a defendant was induced to put his name upon the back of a bill of exchange, by the fraudulent representation of the acceptor that he was signing a guarantee, he was not liable as an endorser at the suit of a bona fide holder for value.

The Supreme Court of New York, in the case of Whitney v. Snider, 2 Lansing, 477 (a case directly in point), held, that in an action on a negotiable promissory note, brought by a purchaser thereof before maturity, in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, against the maker, the latter may prove as a defence that when he signed it, it was represented to him and he believed it to be a contract entirely different in character. The court distinguished this case from a note fraudulently obtained and which the maker intended to make.

In Gibbs v. Linabury, 22 Mich. 479, a case precisely in point—except that was a hay-fork and this a pump—the court held that when the defendant unwittingly signs an instrument in the form of a negotiable note, relying upon false representations made to him at the time, that the instrument he is signing is the mere duplicate of a contract just previously signed by him, making him an agent for the sale of a patent hay-fork, under circumstances devoid of any negligence on his part, and when fraudulent means are taken to prevent him from noticing the body of such pretended duplicate, and he delivers the same in ignorance of its true character, believing it to be the mere duplicate contract which he supposed he had signed, such instrument is to be regarded as a forgery, and cannot be enforced even in the hands of a bona fide purchaser.

These cases were all well considered, and lay the rule down as it should be in regard to the execution of commercial paper, without in the least impugning the well settled doctrine that no inquiry can be allowed as to the consideration of such paper as between the maker and an innocent endorser for value.

I think, both upon reason and authority, the instruction under view ought to have been given and those in conflict with it refused.

Let the judgment be reversed and the cause remanded. The other judges concur.

Supreme Court, United States.

DIRST v. MORRIS.

1. A plaintiff in ejectment, claiming under a deed made on a sale on the foreclosure of a mortgage, may properly put in evidence the record of the proceedings in foreclosure, even though the defendant claims by a deed absolute made by the mortgagor, prior to giving the mortgage under which the foreclosure took place. Showing title from a party previously seized, the plaintiff has a right to exhibit it subject to such decision with regard to its effect as might become necessary after all the evidence is in.
2. Even more obviously has he a right to introduce it as evidence in chief, and when the prior deed, absolute under which the defendant claims, has not yet been offered in evidence, for in such a stage of the proceeding, the proceedings in foreclosure give apparently a valid title.
4. Under the act of Congress of March 3d, 1865, authorizing the trial of facts by the circuit courts, and enacting that the findings of the court upon them shall have the same effect as the verdict of a jury, this court, sitting as a court of error, cannot pass, as it does in equity appeals, upon the weight or sufficiency of evidence. If the court chooses to find generally for one side or the other, instead of making a special finding of the facts, the losing party has no redress on error, except for the wrongful admission or rejection of evidence.

Error to the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois, the case being this:

Russell being the owner of a large number of lots of land in different counties in Illinois, conveyed one in May, 1837, to Josiah Breese. This deed was not recorded until the year 1864.

In December, 1837, Russell being a debtor to the United States, mortgaged the same lot, with all the several others that he owned, to the then solicitor of the treasury, to secure this debt, and the mortgage was promptly put on record. There was no evidence that the existence of the deed to Breese was known to the agents of the government at the time when this mortgage was taken by it.

On the 1st of September, 1841, the United States filed a bill to foreclose the mortgage. The bill was in ordinary form against Russell, but it contained a clause alleging that Francis Peyton, Gordon Hubbard, Josiah Breese, H. S. Fuller, Augustus Garrett, Frederick Faylor, and several others named, "commissioners of school lands, have or pretend to have some interest or claim upon the above described premises, as judgment creditors or otherwise;" and process was accordingly prayed against them.

A summons with subpœna issued accordingly, the record saying—

"Which said subpœna went into the hands of the marshal to be executed, and was returned by him into the said clerk's office, executed upon all of the defendants, by delivering to each of them true copies thereof."

The marshal's return, however, on the summons itself, which it was shown by the fee bill on file in the case was the only summons issued, while making return that certain of the defendants named had been served, stated that Breese and the rest had not been found in his district.

An order taking the bill pro confesso against the defendants was subsequently entered, reciting "that the said defendants have been duly served with process and have failed to appear."

Final decree having been entered and sale made, the lands were bought in by the United States, whose title by means of a deed from the solicitor of the treasury, in whose name the title had been made, became subsequently vested in W. W. Corcoran, who conveyed to W. B. Morris.

The title of Breese, under the deed of 1837, of Russell to him, became, on the other hand, vested in one Dirst, and he in 1864, having taken possession of the land, which till then had been unoccupied, Morris brought ejectment against him.

The case was tried by the court, under the act of Congress of March 2d, 1865, 12 Stat. at Large, 501, authorizing the circuit courts on written stipulation of the parties to try issues of fact without the intervention of a jury, and enacting that "the findings of the court upon the facts shall have the same effect as the verdict of a jury."

On this trial before the court, the plaintiff, having first put in the mortgage to the government, offered in evidence the record of the foreclosure suit, to which the defendant objected, on the ground (amongst others) that Breese had not been served with process in the cause. To prove this, he referred to the record itself, and also proved by parol that Breese was not in Chicago in 1841, but was in New York; and further produced the original subpœnas and files in the cause. As already stated, the papers showed that Breese had been made a party to the bill, and that his name had been included in the subpœna; and the record recited that the subpœna was returned by the marshal into the clerk's office executed upon all the defendants, but the return of the subpœna did not show any service on Breese. Nevertheless, the court admitted the record in evidence, and the defendant excepted.

The plaintiff also offered in evidence the deed from the solicitor of the treasury (representing the government) to Corcoran, the plaintiff's grantor. The defendant objected to it, on the ground that it did not appear thus far in the proceedings, that the United States had any title to the premises in controversy, except as mortgagee, and that as the deed did not purport to assign or convey to the grantee any part of the mortgage debt, and as the defendant maintained that it did not appear that the mortgage had been foreclosed as against Breese, the owner of the equity of redemption, therefore, that the said deed did not pass to the grantee any legal title or estate to the premises. The court, however, received the deed, and the defendant excepted.

The defendant, on his part, produced Breese's deed and mesne conveyances to himself, and evidence to show that under this title, in 1864, he had taken possession of the property, which till then was unoccupied. He now insisted that his right was paramount to that of the plaintiff. But the court decided that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, notwithstanding the possession taken by the defendant, and found the issues generally in the plaintiff's favor. This ruling of the court at the close of the trial was alleged by the defendant as an additional error.

Mr. S. W. Fuller, for the plaintiff in error:

1. Breese being the owner and holder of the equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises, no effectual foreclosure of the mortgage could be made without his being made a party defendant to the foreclosure suit, brought into court, and subjected to its jurisdiction. This is familiar law.

2. Taking the record in the foreclosure suit and the parol testimony, it affirmatively appears that Breese was not served with process, or otherwise brought into court in that suit. It is not pretended that he entered an appearance.

Of course, every presumption should be indulged to uphold the validity of judicial proceedings; and they will be upheld where the records are consistent with themselves, and where the recitals or presumptions contained in one part of the record are not rebutted by positive proof in other parts. But they are rebutted here. The summons shows explicitly that it was not served upon Breese; the whole record taken together, shows that but one summons was issued. There is no pretence of his appearance having been entered. The proof outside the record shows that he could not have been served. If the summons was not preserved in the record with the return of the officer, showing who were and who were not served, then the recital of service in the decree would be prima facie evidence that all the defendants were served, as was held by this court in Comstock v. Crawford, 3 Wallace, 403, and in Secrist v. Green, Ib. 751. But this is not either of those cases. It is the case of Sibley v. Waffle, 16 New York, 189, where, notwithstanding the recital that "due service" had been made upon all the defendants, it appeared, by reference to the notice of publication, that the notice had not been published for the length of time required by law, and so the Court of Appeals decided that no jurisdiction was acquired, and that the recital did not aid the matter. The doctrine of that case is declared in many other cases. Tunis v. Withrow, 10 Iowa, 308; Harris v. Hardeman et al., 14 Howard, 338; Lessee of Walden v. Craig's Heirs et al., 14 Peters, 152; Bodurtha and another v. Goodrich, 3 Gray, 508; Bloom et al. v. Burdick, 1 Hill, 130; Clark v. Thompson, 47 Illinois, 27; Pardon v. Dwire et al., 23 Illinois, 572; Comstock v. Crawford, 3 Wallace, 396. Its correctness is obvious.

Most of the cases on the whole subject are collected and classified, with excellent discrimination, in the seventh edition of Smith's Leading Cases, vol. 1, part 2, pp. 1009 to 1025. We select and cite only those which involve the precise point raised upon this record, that is to say, that while in the absence of the summons and return from a record, a recital in the judgment or decree, of service of process upon the parties, or that they entered their appearance, is sufficient prima facie evidence of that fact, yet when the original summons and return are contained in the record, the latter shall prevail, and the recitals go for nothing.

Setting out with this as a settled and obvious principle, the recital in the order of court taking the bill pro confesso that the defendants had been "duly served," must be construed as including only the defendants who appeared by the officer's return to have been served; the only construction consistent with law, the record and justice.

3. The deed from the United States to Corcoran was improperly admitted, for the reasons assigned at the trial.

The rule on this subject is probably not uniform in the State courts, but it is believed to be settled in this court and for all the Federal circuits by Hutchins v. King, 1 Wallace, 58. It is there said:

"The mortgagee cannot by conveyance transfer any interest in the premises without a transfer of the debt secured; his interest is not subject to attachment or seizure on execution, he cannot remove the buildings on the premises, nor the fixtures attached, nor can he subject the premises to any uses but such as may furnish the means for the payment of the debt secured, without impairing the value of the estate."

4. As to the equities, though Corcoran paid his money to the United States for the deed which he received, and also paid the taxes on the land in controversy until 1864, yet, on the other hand, Dirst paid his money and took possession of the premises in 1864 (the same being then and having always been vacant and unoccupied), under the chain of title derived from Breese, the first grantee of Russell, believing that Breese and his grantees had the better title. His title was a paramount title.

On the whole case the judgment should have been for the defendant. How the court decided that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, notwithstanding the possession taken by the defendant, and found the issues generally in the plaintiff's favor, it is difficult for us on the evidence to see. This court, we submit, must reverse that judgment.

Messrs. Carlisle and McPherson (a brief of Mr. Thomas Dent being filed on the same side), contra.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the court.

We think that there was no error in admitting in evidence the record of the foreclosure suit, whether Breese was served with the subpœna or not. If he was not served, and could show that fact, he was not bound by the decree. But the decree and sale formed a link in the plaintiff's chain of title from Russell, and at this stage of the cause the deed from Russell to Breese had not been given in evidence. So far as yet appeared, the evidence was not only admissible, but effective to transfer the title. But it was admissible in any view, for it tended to show title from a party formerly seized, and the plaintiff had a right to exhibit it, subject to such decision with regard to its effect as might become necessary after all the evidence was in.

The same remarks apply to the admission of the deed from the solicitor of the treasury to the plaintiff's grantor.

The only other alleged error necessary to be noticed, is the ruling of the court at the close of the trial.

The particular reason why, or ground on which the court decided that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, notwithstanding the possession taken by the defendant, and found the issues generally in the plaintiff's favor, is not specified. The court was exercising the functions of both court and jury, and whether, as matter of fact, it regarded the proof sufficient to show that Breese had been served with process in the foreclosure suit, or whether as matter of law, it regarded that fact as not material, or what other view of the case it may have taken, does not appear, and therefore no error can be asserted in the decision. This court sitting as a court of error, cannot pass, as it does in equity appeals, upon the weight or sufficiency of the evidence; and there was no special finding of the facts. Had there been a jury, the defendant might have called upon the court for instructions, and thus raised the questions of law which he deemed material. Or, had the law which authorizes the waiver of a jury, allowed the parties to require a special finding of the facts, then the legal questions could have been raised and presented here upon such findings as upon a special verdict. But, as the law stands, if a jury is waived and the court chooses to find generally for one side or the other, the losing party has no redress on error, except for the wrongful admission or rejection of evidence.

However, as there was no proof that the government agents, when the mortgage was given, had any notice of Breese's unrecorded deed, and as the mortgage in such case would have the superior efficacy, and would entitle the mortgagee or his assigns to possession of the land on non-payment of the money at maturity, we do not see on what possible ground the defendant could have claimed to succeed.

No error appearing on the record, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

NOTE—At the same time with the preceding case was heard another from the same Circuit Court, and similar to it in all respects, with, however, one additional feature. It was the case of COLLINS v. RIGGS.

To redeem property which has been sold under a mortgage (as is alleged irregularly) it is not sufficient to tender the amount of sale. The whole mortgage money must be tendered, or if suit be brought, be paid into court.

In this case, Riggs had brought ejectment in the court below against Collins to recover a lot, one of the several ones mentioned in the preceding case as having been mortgaged by Russell to the United States, and bought by Corcoran from the United States after the foreclosure by the government of their mortgage, and the purchase in by them of all the several lots included in it. Riggs was the grantee of Corcoran.

The lot in controversy in this case, like that in controversy in the preceding case, had been conveyed previously to the mortgage, by a deed not put on record, to Breese.

On the trial the defendant made the same objections to Riggs's title, that in the preceding case he had made to Morris', to wit, that Breese as grantee of Russell, of the lot, prior to the date of the mortgage to the United States, and so owner of the equity of redemption, had not been brought into the foreclosure suit; and assuming this to be true, the defendant inferred and assumed that the mortgage was still, therefore, in existence. He then offered to prove that during the pendency of the present suit in ejectment, he had tendered to Riggs the amount for which this particular lot now in controversy had been struck off at the marshal's sale, together with the taxes, interest, and costs; informing the plaintiff at the time of this tender, that he, the defendant, was willing to treat him, the plaintiff, as the equitable assignee of so much of the mortgage as had been paid at the sale for the land in controversy, and that he wished to redeem the said land, and that he, the defendant, made the tender for that purpose; which tender the plaintiff declined to receive; the defendant offering to prove, further, that the said sum of money was then paid into court as a tender to redeem the land in controversy from the mortgage.

The court below decided, simply, that the evidence as presented was not competent or sufficient to constitute a defence to the action, but upon what ground this decision was made did not appear.

Mr. B. C. Cook, for the plaintiff in error (iterating and enforcing, as to the other parts of the case, the arguments of Mr. Fuller, already presented in the report of the preceding case) argued upon this new point that Breese not having been brought in, and the mortgage being so still in existence, Corcoran was but an assignee of part of it, and Riggs his assignee, nothing more; that the defendant could, therefore, properly tender payment of it; that the only question was as to amount; that as to this, Riggs's right in the mortgage was to secure only such a proportion of the whole as the value of this tract represented, which value or amount was shown by the marshal's sale; that this sum, with costs, taxes, and interest, had been tendered and was now in court.

Messrs. Carlisle and McPherson (a brief of Mr. Thomas Dent being filed on the same side) argued contra, that the defendant, by his tender, substantially confessed that he could not resist the mortgage, but that his willingness to liquidate it pro tanto, by showing a tender of a sum of money to the plaintiff some time after the commencement of the suit, was no valid tender, that the amount was insufficent, and that the whole mortgage money should be tendered. Independently of this, that such an attempt to avoid an action of ejectment was unheard of; that after condition broken, the mortgagor's rights were purely equitable, and that he could obtain relief only in chancery.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY delivered the opinion of the court.

It is clear that the criterion by which the amount tendered was gauged, was incorrect. To redeem property which has been sold under a mortgage for less than the mortgage debt, it is not sufficient to tender the amount of the sale. The whole mortgage debt must be tendered or paid into court. The party offering to redeem, proceeds upon the hypothesis that, as to him, the mortgage has never been foreclosed and is still in existence. Therefore he can only lift it by paying it. The money will be subject to distribution between the mortgagee and the purchaser, in equitable proportions, so as to reimburse the latter his purchase money and pay the former the balance of his debt.

Judgment affirmed.

GREGG v. MOSS.

1. A judgment will not be reversed for the rejection of testimony, whether it was in strict principle admissible or not, where the rejection worked no harm to the party offering it.
2. Whether the evidence before a jury does or does not sustain the allegations in a case, is a matter wholly within the province of the jury, and if they find in one way, this court cannot review their finding.
3. A. lent to B. & C. a certain sum of money, whether for themselves or for a firm of which all parties were members, was a matter not clear. The money was, however, in fact, put in the firm by B. & C. An agreement was subsequently made, by all the partners, reciting that some had advanced money beyond their shares, and agreeing that each should make a statement of what he had advanced, and that the accounts so rendered and agreed upon should remain capital stock, and that partner's stock in the partnership. On the trial, evidence being given, on the one hand, tending to show that in a statement furnished by A. in professed pursuance of the agreement, he had not included this money lent to B. & C., and on the other that at the time of the agreement, he had agreed that he would put it in, an instruction was held to be correct, which told the jury, that if at the time of the agreement between the partners, A. had assented to treat this money as an advance and to fund it, B & C. would not remain personally liable on the original loan, if it had in truth been made to them personally; and that the fact that A. did not include the amount in his statement of advances made was not material, provided, as already said, that at the time of the agreement he had in fact agreed to include it.

Error to the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois; the case, as assumed by the court from a bill of exceptions covering thirty 8vo. pages, in long primer type, without any assignment of errors, having been thus:

Richard Gregg sued W. S. Moss in assumpsit, on this instrument; Kellogg, the party signing it with Moss, having been wholly insolvent.

PEORIA, December 23, 1856.

RICHARD GREGG, ESQUIRE,

DEAR SIR:—Mr. Elder is here, and wants to take the funds with him to pay drafts due to-morrow. It is not right that he should be forced to pay this money for our accommodation. If you will send us two drafts at sixty days, $5,000 each, we will return you the money before the expiration of the sixty days. It must be done, as we cannot get along any other way. Mr. E. wishes to leave in the cars.

Yours truly,
W. KELLOGG,
W. S. Moss.

The defendant pleaded non assumpsit, &c.

On the trial no question was made but that the money asked for in the letter, or its equivalent, had been advanced by the plaintiff. But it seemed that there existed at that time in Peoria, where the transaction occurred, and where all the parties resided, a partnership formed, to build a railroad, styled Kellogg, Moss & Co., of which the plaintiff and defendant, and Kellogg and others were members, and that the money furnished by Gregg had been used for the benefit of this partnership, which had now spent its funds and failed in its enterprise. The defendant alleged that the money had been advanced by the plaintiff to the partnership, and on its credit, and not on the individual credit of Kellogg and Moss; and that if this were not so at the time, that the plaintiff afterwards (on the 1st of December, 1857) had agreed that this sum, with others advanced by him to the partnership should become capital in the partnership business, and thus increase his share of the capital.

The plaintiff proved the signatures to the letter, and that the sum mentioned in it was received by Kellogg, partly in money and partly in drafts, which answered the purpose; and, in the further progress of his case, offered to prove by a competent witness that only a few minutes after Kellogg had obtained the money, he told the witness that he had received the money from the plaintiff, and had "fixed Elder off," and that Elder had gone home. On objection by the defendant, the court excluded the testimony, and the exclusion was the subject of the first bill of exceptions.

Testimony was given on both sides, on the point above stated to have been the grounds on which the defendants chiefly put the case; to wit, that the $10,000 had been advanced originally to the partnership, and on its credit; and if not, that by the agreement of 1st December, 1857, the plaintiff had agreed that it should become capital in it. It was not denied that all the partners of the firm of Kellogg & Co., had on the 1st of December named, made an agreement reciting that some of the members had advanced money and funds beyond their shares in the partnership, and agreeing that "each and every member of the said firm should make a statement of . . . advancements made to said firm, together with 10 per cent. interest from the dates of them, which after the said 1st of December, 1857, should remain as the capital stock of the firm, and represent the capital stock of each individual member of the firm, and fix their interests therein respectively and pro tanto." But Gregg swore that he had never funded this debt; that he had made out the statement in accordance with the agreement of December 1st, 1857, and that this $10,000 was not included in that account. Other testimony, however, tended to prove that when the agreement of 1st December was made, Gregg did agree to put in this $10,000, and that it was one condition on which other partners signed it.

The evidence being closed, the court charged fully, saying among other things, to the jury:

"If the evidence satisfies you that the plaintiff, at the time the agreement of the 1st of December, 1857, was made, assented to treat this $10,000 as a part of his advances to the firm of Kellogg, Moss & Co., and to have the same funded, as contemplated in said agreement, such assent on his part is binding upon him, and releases Kellogg & Moss from their promise to pay the said sum, or see the same paid. It is a substitution of the liability of the new firm to ultimately reimburse this amount as a part of the capital put into the old firm by the plaintiff for the individual liability of Kellogg & Moss to him. But it is for you to say, under the evidence, whether such assent or agreement to fund was, in fact, made or not. If made, the defence is made out.

"Nor is it material whether the plaintiff afterwards included this amount in his statement of advances to the old firm or not. It is enough that he agreed to do so. Granting that Kellogg & Moss were liable to make it good to him in December, 1857, still, if the plaintiff agreed that the sum for which they were so liable should be carried over to his capital stock with Kellogg, Moss & Co., then the agreement is binding on the plaintiff, because this sum had already clearly been put into the affairs of the firm, and either the plaintiff or Kellog & Moss were entitled to have it charged up as part of the assets furnished and sunk in the past business of the firm."

Verdict and judgment having gone for the defendant, the case was now brought here, where it was submitted on a printed brief of Mr. O. Jackson, for the plaintiff in error; a like brief by Messrs. Harding and McCoy, for the defendant in error; a reply by Mr. Jackson, and an answer by Mr. Harding to the same. The argument of the counsel of the plaintiff in error was directed to prove,

1st. That there was error in the exclusion of the testimony to show what Kellogg had said a few minutes after obtaining the money; that this ruling was erroneous, because the plaintiff had a right to prove the admission of one of the joint promisors as to the receipt of the money, made about the time of or immediately after the transaction took place; a position which the learned counsel sustained by an able argument; relying on Lowle v. Boteler, 4 Harris & McHenry, 346; Bachman v. Killinger, 55 Pennsylvania State, 416; Cady v. Shepard, 11 Pickering, 400, and other cases in Massachusetts and elsewhere, though he admitted that the rule was different in New York, and perhaps in some other States.

2d. Because, as a matter of fact, the testimony did not show with sufficient certainty, either that the plaintiff had originally advanced the money to the partnership, or that he had subsequently, on the 1st of December, 1857, agreed to fund it.

3d. That the charge on this branch of the subject (and quoted supra) was erroneous.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court.

This cause has been submitted to us on printed arguments on each side, with replies and counter-replies, none of which contains any regular assignment of errors, as required by the twenty-first rule of this court. The record presents a bill of exceptions of thirty printed pages of testimony, which is certified to be all that was given on the trial, and the arguments address themselves to the entire merits on this evidence.

We have felt very much inclined to dismiss the writ of error, or affirm the judgment without an attempt to look up the questions of law which might possibly be involved in the record, for the number of cases coming to this court in which the bill of exceptions embodies all the evidence offered, and counsel, tempted by this, argue before us the whole case as if the verdict concluded nothing, requires a decisive remedy.

As far as we are able to see there are but two questions of law raised by the record.

The first relates to the exclusion of a single item of evidence offered by the plaintiff, and the second to the charge of the court.

The plaintiff having proved the signatures to the letter of December 23d, 1856, and that the sum mentioned in it was received by Mr. Kellogg, offered in the further progress of his case to prove by a competent witness, that only a few minutes after Kellogg had obtained the money, he told the witness that he had received the money from the plaintiff, and had "fixed Elder off," and that Elder had gone home. The exclusion of this testimony is the occasion of the first bill of exception.

We have a learned argument on the vexed question of the admissibility of the declarations of one partner, or joint obligor, against the other. But we are of opinion that the ruling of the court presents no error which should reverse the judgment, because its rejection worked no harm to the plaintiff. The execution of the paper was not denied, nor was it controverted, except by the general form of the pleading, that Kellogg had received the money. It had already been proved by several other witnesses and was at no time made a point in the case. The whole controversy before the jury turned on the question whether the money so received was advanced by Gregg on the credit of Kellogg and Moss alone, and if so, whether he had afterwards agreed to convert it into capital. The admission of Kellogg that he had received the money from Gregg gave no light on either of these questions. The judgment should not be reversed for the rejection of this testimony, whether it was in strict legal principle admissible or not.

The brief of the plaintiff proceeds to argue that the evidence before the jury does not sustain either of the allegations of advancing the money to the partnership, or the agreement of the plaintiff, to convert it into the capital of the partnership. With this we can have nothing to do. It was the province of the jury to determine whether either of these allegations was proved, for either of them was a valid defence to this action, and they have found in favor of defendant.

It is argued, however, that the instructions of the court on this branch of the subject were erroneous—to the prejudice of the plaintiff.

We have examined carefully the points of the charge objected to, as well as the other parts of it, and, without elaborating the matter, we are of opinion that it puts this, the turning-point of the case, to the jury on fair grounds, and we can see no objection to the legal propositions stated by the court and excepted to by counsel.

Judgment affirmed.

LEGAL GAZETTE.

Friday, February 28, 1873.

JOHN H. CAMPBELL,
EDITOR.
THEODORE F. JENKINS,
ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

At a meeting of the members of the Schuylkill County Bar, held at the court house, in Pottsville, February 20th, 1873, in respect to the memory of Hon. Charles Frailey, deceased, the Hon. Thomas H. Walker presided; Hon. Jacob Kline, and Nicholas Seitzinger were appointed vice presidents, and Wm. R. Smith, Esq., acted as secretary.

Judge Walker stated the object of the meeting, and spoke with feeling of the many virtues of the deceased, and of the high esteem in which he was held in the community.

On motion, the president appointed Messrs. B. W. Cumming, John W. Ryon, and Chas. N. Brumm, a committee to report resolutions expressing the sense of the meeting.

The committee reported a set of resolutions, which were unanimously adopted. The meeting then adjourned.

THE LAWYERS AND THE CENTENNIAL.

The lawyers of this city and State are taking an active part in the meetings now being held in reference to the Centennial Exibition in 1876. At the meeting held in the hall of th Constitutional Convention in this city on the 19th inst., admirable addresses were made by Hon. John H. Walker of Erie Co., Hon. Wm. H. Armstrong of Lycoming Co., Hon. Chas. R. Buckalew of Columbia Co., and ex-Governor Andrew G. Curtin, all of them well known lawyers. At the Academy of Music meeting on Saturday evening last, Hon. John Scott of Huntingdon Co., and Hon. A. A. Purman of Greene Co., both lawyers, made speeches, while John Goforth Esq., of the Philadelphia Bar officiated as secretary. We are glad to perceive this active interest taken by members of the bar, as it will materially aid in making the celebration a grand success.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

The following is the substance of a paper entitled "The Work of the Constitutional Convention," read on the evening of the 20th inst., by Mr. A. Sydney Biddle, before the Social Science Association of Philadelphia:

Mr. Biddle began by explaining the importance of the subject, and the deep stake which the humblest member of the community had in the successful solution of the problem of good State government. He thought, that, in the present anomalous condition of political society, which was proved to exist by the need of a written constitution, framed to restrict the action of the legislative body, as much as to define the spheres of the different branches of the government, a constitution should not deal only in generalities; specific restrictions and directions should be introduced where the acts forbidden or declared obligatory were within the just sphere of the Legislature, unless that body through ignorance or wilfulness had proved its incapacity to provide the necessary measures. Mr. Biddle then deprecated the prevailing popular idea that written constitutions are a kind of panacea for all political diseases where the ingredients are properly mixed. He believed that in the long run nothing but an increasing vigilance in regard to elections, and more especially nominations, would be of any service in raising the standard of politics.

In the present constitution the corrupt condition of politics should be distinctly recognized, and its various clauses framed so as to cure as far as possible existing disorders. In this task the convention should especially be guided by the experience of other States.

Mr. Biddle then asked the question, "To what are the abuses in our system owing?" and proceeded to answer it by showing that one cause was the undue influence of the Federal upon the State elections, and the joining of municipal with State elections. The convention has already sought to obviate this evil by changing the time of the municipal elections to February, and by so arranging the terms of office of members of the Legislature that no State election shall occur in the same year with a Federal election.

Another abuse, more difficult to deal with, was the low character of the average legislator, and this Mr. Biddle believed was owing to the small inducements offered by any community to its lawmakers. He showed that no salary that the State could afford to give would ever be enough to tempt the best men in the community to give up lucrative employment for the sake of serving an ungrateful constituency, and that therefore the position should be rendered as attractive as possible. This could never be done to a reasonable extent while Harrisburg remained the State capital, and he therefore advocated a proviso in the constitution declaring that Philadelphia should be henceforth the capital. He then advocated a similar proviso to the effect that the Supreme Court should sit in Philadelphia only, showing the great importance of the influence of our homogeneous bar upon that court.

From this topic he approached another of greater interest, and warmly advocated the advantages of an appointed judiciary. Some remarks by Mr. Binney were quoted in support of this position, and a plan was suggested by means of which the choice of able men for that high office would be made a matter of necessity. This was to create a council as in Massachusetts, of whom two-thirds must approve every nomination for any office made by the governor. This council was to be composed of retired members of the Supreme Court, drawing pensions, and incapacitated from practising at the bar after leaving the bench. This council might also try all legislative contested election cases, while the Court of Common Pleas should have sole cognizance of contested elections of county officers.

It was shown that in England, Parliamentary election cases are no longer tried by the House of Commons, but by the courts, and that this is a change of very recent date. Mr. Biddle then suggested a liberal annual pension for retired judges equal to one-half of their annual salary, if they had served for ten years, two-thirds if for fifteen, and the same as the salary if for twenty.

He hoped that the Legislature would pass a bill fixing $10,000 as the minimum yearly salary of judges of the Supreme Court, but permitting the Legislature to increase it. The proviso of our present constitution, giving the office of chief justice to the puisne judges in succession was censured.

The general practice of giving increased legislative executive powers to the judiciary, incompatible with their regular functions, was deprecated, and its dangers predicted. The branches of the government should be distinctly separated, and each should have that which properly appertained to it. The appointment of prothonotaries and other court officers formed an exception to the general rule, and should be made by the court.

The character and office of justice of the peace was then discussed, and the following changes suggested. That this officer should receive a fixed salary, payable by the State. That he should be appointed by the unanimous consent of all the judges of the county in which his jurisdiction existed; and that he should not only be a member of the bar, but should be compelled to pass a rigid examination by the board of examiners before being entitled to act. Power of summary removal should be lodged in a majority of all the judges who appointed him, and in the governor.

The constantly increasing evil of the delay of justice was then commented on, and it was shown that this year the Supreme Court would probably be unable to finish last year's Philadelphia cases, and would thus be a whole year in arrears. It was shown that, if the judges received handsome salaries, and the employment of assistants, they could do two or three times as much as at present, as in England. A system of costs was also advocated, by which certain counsel fees graded by the amount involved should be paid by the losing to the winning party, whenever a case was appealed, and the decision of the court below affirmed. Mr. Biddle suggested that the district attorneys should also be appointed by the governor with the consent of his council, and should hold office during the governor's term.

He then discussed, at considerable length, the various systems of minority representation, and after showing the theoretical injustice of the limited vote and the cumulative vote, used many arguments in favor of the Gilpin system of proportional representation. The machinery of which he advocated the use, was that now employed in England under the new ballot bill, and was similar to that reported by the committee on elections, to the convention a few days ago. Mr. Biddle then spoke in conclusion of special legislation, and of the tyranny of corporations, suggested among other remedies a proviso abolishing all laws limiting the amount to be recovered against corporations in case of death or injury arising from their negligence or carelessness. He touched on the question as to how far carrying companies should be permitted to engage in other operations, and without expressing any views on the subject, recommended the subject to the close attention of the Legislature.

Some of the suggestions of Mr. Biddle are excellent, but we differ most emphatically with him in the propriety of appointing judges of the courts and justices of the peace; with his views in reference to the cumulative and "free vote" systems of casting votes, and on some other points. We believe that all judges should be elected and that the "free vote" is the best of the reformed systems of voting, now advocated. The paper of Mr. Biddle, however, is interesting and suggestive, and deserves attentive perusal.

THE FEDERALIST, February 8th, 1873, New York.

Supreme Court of Pennsylv'a.

YOUNGMAN v. WALTER.

An affadavit of defence, alleging that a promissory note was, by mistake, given for a greater amount than was due, and that before suit was brought two-thirds of the amount of the note was paid, is sufficient.

Error to the Common Pleas of Union county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered February 24th, 1873.

The alleged error is that the court entered judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defence.

The plaintiff claimed upon a note executed by John Youngman, under seal, payable to Jesse M. Walter, guardian of Rosanna, Margaret and Sarah Jane Walter, for $865.66, being for one-half the sum which said Jesse, as guardian, had received for himself and said Youngman.

The obligation was assigned to said Sarah Jane before suit was brought.

The original affidavit of defence filed, was not drawn with great clearness or precision. Rejecting much irrelevant matter therein contained, we understand the defendant to aver, that he and the plaintiff were, at the time of the execution of the note, and still are copartners; that he was induced to sign the note under the representation of the plaintiff, that he had received twice that amount of his ward's money, for the use of their said firm; but now he gives some reasons why he does not believe the firm received the sum alleged, thus substantially affirming, that he was induced to execute the note under a false statement of existing facts, which might establish a partial failure of consideration. He further averred, that two-thirds of said note had been paid in cash by said firm to said plaintiff.

In his supplemental affidavit, he distinctly avers, that the note was given for more than was due; and that two-thirds of the amount of the note had been paid to the plaintiff by the defendant, in cash, before the bringing of the suit, and prior to the assignment of the note to the equitable plaintiff, all of which he expected to be able to prove upon the trial.

It appears by the certificate of the learned judge, that he did not have the supplemental affidavit before him when he directed judgment to be entered. Considering the original affidavit insufficient, he ordered judgment to be entered against the defendant for the full amount of plaintiff's claim. In this, we think the court erred. The rules of court require only "an affidavit of defence setting forth the nature and character of the same." The defendant does swear, that he has a defence to the whole of the plaintiff's claim. The nature and character thereof is an absence, in part, of consideration for the note, and an actual payment in cash of two-thirds of the note. While the extent of the failure of consideration is vague and indefinite, yet the averment of the amount paid upon the note in cash, is sufficiently positive and specific, if proved, to establish a defence against two-thirds of the amount of the claim.

YOUNGMAN v. WALTER.

Error to the Common Pleas of Union county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered February 24th, 1873.

In this case, the legal parties are the same as in the one in which the opinion has just been read. These two cases were argued together. The facts in each are substantially the same, and for reasons given in the preceding case

Judgment is reversed, and a procedendo awarded.

PERCIPHOR BAKER v. CHESTER GAS COMPANY.

The owner of land, against which there was a mortgage and a judgment, opened streets through it. Under a levari facias upon the mortgage, a portion of the land was sold, fronting it on the streets as laid out. Subsequently, by a vend. exponas on the judgment, the land covered by the streets was sold. Held, The sale under the levari, the lots being bounded on the streets, passed the title to the middle thereof, and divested the lien of the judgment from the land over which the streets ran.

Error to the Common Pleas of Delaware county.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered February 24th, 1873.

The plaintiff assigns for error the entry of judgment in favor of the defendant upon the case stated.

This depends upon the validity of the right claimed by the defendant to close up a portion of Evans street, in the city of Chester.

The land covered by this street is part of a larger lot, bounded westerly by Welch street, which was purchased June 28th, 1854, by Carnog & Evans. Upon the same day they executed a mortgage to the vendor to secure the payment of a part of the purchase money. They purchased the land with a view of dividing it and selling it for building lots. They laid out three streets, to wit, Evans, Crosby and Porter, and fifty lots, and made a plot or draft thereof.

October 23d, 1854, the plaintiff purchased of them, by deed, one of said lots, having a frontage of 110 feet on Evans street; bounded west by Welch street and south by Evans street. Upon the same day the mortgagee released this lot, as described in the deed, from the lien of the mortgage. Judgment having been subsequently entered upon the mortgage, a levari facias issued thereon to November Term, 1855, and the remaining lots were sold by the sheriff. In the writ they were described as "all of those 49 several lots." Fifteen of said lots, "bounded north by Evans street," and extending along the same 312 feet, were purchased by Campbell. Ten of the lots on the northerly side of Evans street, east of and adjoining the plaintiff's lot aforesaid, with a frontage of 20 feet each on Evans street, were purchased by plaintiff. Prior to this sale, the streets and lots had been designated by marks upon the ground. May 1st, 1856, Campbell conveyed his said 15 lots to the defendant, bounding them by Evans street.

It appears, however, that upon the 16th September, 1854, one Steel obtained a judgment against said Carnog & Evans and one Hannum. Whether the plot or draft of the lots and streets had then been made is uncertain.

The proceeds of the sale upon the mortgage were insufficient to reach this judgment. A vend. exp. issued thereon to August Term, 1856, by virtue of which the sheriff sold to said Hannum the lot situate at the northeast corner of Welch and Evans streets, which had been conveyed to plaintiff in October, 1854, as aforesaid; and to one George Baker, another lot, part of said mortgaged premises bounded by Crosby street. Under an alias vend. exp. issued on the same judgment to November Term, 1857, said Hannum purchased the land covered by each Evans, Crosby and Porter streets. The former being described as "a lot of land called Evans street," measuring 45 by 313 feet, and bounding it on the north and on the south by lots previously sold at sheriff's sale as aforesaid.

By virtue of divers mesne conveyances, all the title which Hannum acquired by his purchase of Evans street for the distance of 110 feet easterly from Welch street, became vested in said defendants. They therefore closed up the street, putting a fence or gate at each end of the 110 feet, thereby denying the plaintiff's passage through the street, and he has no other way of access to his said ten remaining lots.

Thus it appears at each sale, both public and private, made prior to the sale of Evans street, it was distinctly recognized as a street. The lots lying north and south of it, were bounded by it. The sale upon the judgment united with the sales upon the mortgage, in proclaiming it to be a street. Every lot which the defendants own, when sold at sheriff's sale, was bounded upon it. This description is directly in the line of their title. Each deed showed it to be a street dedicated to the public. The fair presumption is that a larger sum was realized from the sale of the property in lots, than if it had been sold in one body.

Upon a sheriff's sale of land, the general rule prescribed by public utility is, that different lots of ground should be sold separately. The reason is that the competition is thereby much increased. Many persons might desire to purchase one, who would not, or could not, purchase several. The primary object of selling at sheriff's sale is not to transfer the title, but to collect the money. A common incumbrance creates no reason for selling the lots together. 1 Trou. & Haley, part 2d, page 1001.

Upon an application to the court whence the execution issued, a sale will be ordered, by such sub-divisions as will be most likely to produce the largest sum. In this case, without an order of court, the sales were made, it is fair to presume, in the manner the court would have ordered if application had been made thereto.

The lots having been thus sold, without objection from the defendants in the execution, or from any of the lien creditors, and purchasers having invested their money therein, the titles thereby acquired must now be held to be of like force and effect as if the sales had been made in pursuance of a prior order of court. Great injustice would be done to the purchasers of lots bounded by Evans street, to now hold that their titles extended no farther than the edge of the street, and that a subsequent sale of the ground covered by the street excluded them therefrom. Conceding, then, what the case stated does not admit, that the lien of the judgment attached prior to the making of the plot, dedicating the street to public use; yet we think the learned judge erred in holding that the sale of the lots bounded by Evans street did not divest the lien of the judgment upon the land covered by the street. By these sales the title to the whole land passed, and nothing remained to be sold.

The law is well settled, that upon a sale of a lot bounded by a street, the title passes to the centre of the street. Paul v. Carver, 12 Harris, 207; Idem, 2 Casey, 223; Greer v. Sampson, 3 Casey, 183.

Even if the lot be bounded by the side of the street, the grantee takes title to the centre thereof, if the street is not expressly or by clear implication reserved. Cox v. Freedley, 9 Casey, 124.

We are of the opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Judgment reversed, and judgment is entered in favor of the plaintiff upon the case stated.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS. LOUGHMAN v. BARRY et al.

1. It is not necessary that a fraud by the vendee of chattels should be indictable, in order to entitle the vendor to rescind the contract of sale by reason thereof.

2. The drawing and giving of a check upon a bank, in payment, amounts to an implied representation that the drawer has authority to draw upon the bank, against assets eo instanti applicable towards payment.

3. The giving of an unproductive check in payment on a sale of chattels for ready money, by a vendee, then knowing there are no assets in a bank against which he has authority to draw, at the time of the cheque being taken by the vendor upon the faith that there are immediate funds applicable towards payment, amount to a fraudulent misrepresentation by the vendee, and such misrepresentation will entitle the vendor to rescind the contract and resume the goods, notwithstanding that the vendee, upon reasonable grounds, believes at the time, that there would be funds in bank to pay the check when presented, and though he were not indictable for obtaining the goods by false pretences. —*Ir. NOVA SCOTIA.

SUPREME COURT OF NOVA SCOTIA. BOWEN et ux. v. SHEARS.

1. In 1831, C. gave the plaintiff's wife a piece of land, part of a farm. In 1833, the plaintiffs went into actual possession, C. helping them to build the house, and so continued until 1870, when defendant entered. Plaintiffs brought trespass, and defendant set up title in himself under the will of C. (made in 1859), by which the farm, "then owned and occupied by the testator," was devised to the defendant. In 1838, the plaintiffs conveyed to C., in trust, to preserve the right, title and interest of plaintiff's wife, for their free use, from the father's debts, &c., the rents and profits to the wife during her life, and after her death, to the support and maintenance of the daughter. By this deed, C. had power to call for and receive the rents and profits. Before his death, C. recognized in a survey he made, the fact that he had given the land in dispute to plaintiff's wife.

2. Held, That although the plaintiffs were estopped by the deed made in 1838, from claiming title by possession, before that time, they were entitled so to claim, being in effect a tenant at will, after the lapse of one year from that date; and the plaintiffs could maintain their action against defendant as a wrongdoer, having held adversely to him for more than twenty years.—Canada Law Journal, February, 1873.

PHILPOT v. GRUNINGER.

1. In the matter of a contract, a distinction sometimes exists between a motive which may induce entering into it and the actual consideration of the contract. Ex. gr., A person, in virtue of some benefit passing to him, may be bound to give for it his promissory note for a certain sum and payable at a certain time, and yet refuse to give the note. Now if upon an expectation of some particular results in another transaction, into which expectation he is led by his creditor in the original transaction, he gives the note, the original benefit to him, and not the expectation, must be regarded as the consideration of the note.
2. A promise by one party being a good consideration for a promise by another, a jury will not, in a case where such mutual promises are shown, and no dependence exists between them, be held to have been misinstructed by a direction which makes a distinction between motive and consideration, such as taken in the paragraph above, even if the distinction be one not well founded. The instruction could do no harm.
3. A consideration moving to A. and B., with whom C. afterwards enters into partnership, and of which consideration C. thus gets the benefit, will support a promise by C.
4. On an issue between a partnership and third parties as to the day when the partnership was formed, the mere articles of partnership are not evidence in favor of the partnership. It must be shown by extrinsic evidence, that they were made on the day when they purport to have been made.

Error to the Circuit Court for the Northern District of Illinois; the case being this:

On the 19th of October, 1864, Gruninger, by articles of agreement, sold, or agreed to sell, to B. Philpot and H. Picket, residing at Titusville, Pennsylvania (who, with George Sherman, of Philadelphia, had been speculating in oil wells), a well "on the Blood Farm," near the town named; Philpot and Picket agreeing by the articles to pay Gruninger $3,500 within thirty days. The money was not thus paid. Gruninger, after the sale, went to Massachusetts, but by the 24th of February, 1865, had returned to Titusville. On the day just mentioned, Picket writes to him expressing satisfaction at his return, and acknowledging the receipt of a letter from him "some time since; an answer to which had been neglected on account of press of business until it had passed out of mind," and saying: "I think we can fix up that Blood Farm matter satisfactorily, when you come up."

By the 21st of April, 1865, Philpot, Picker, and the Sherman already named, had become interested as partners, under the name of Philpot, Sherman & Co., in the well on Blood Farm (if, indeed, Sherman had not been partner with the other two from the first) in other oil wells; and on the day the partnership, under the firm name, along with several other projectors in oil (not, however, including Gruninger) entered into an agreement to form a joint stock company; Philpot, Sherman & Co. agreeing to put into the company certain wells, but not this one, which they had bought, or agreed to buy, on the Blood Farm.

On the 6th of May, 1865, Gruninger also agreed to put in a certain well which he still owned; one on the Smith Farm; and on the same day, by deed, witnessed and acknowledged, "in consideration of the sum of $3,000," which was acknowledged to have been to him "paid, and the receipt of which he acknowledged," conveyed to Philpot, Sherman & Co., the already mentioned well on the Blood Farm. On that same day, but without reciting on account of what transaction, Philpot gave the firm note for $3,000, payable to Gruninger on demand.

The joint stock company apparently fell through. Gruninger, at any rate, would not put in his well on Smith's Farm.

On the 5th July, Picket, one of the persons to whom Gruninger had agreed to sell the well on the Blood Farm, and a member of the now admitted firm of Philpot, Sherman & Co., writes to Gruninger, from Titusville, signing the firm name.

"We have learned that the note given you by our firm has been sent to Philadelphia for collection. All I can say is, we are, at present, unable to pay it. The change in times has so contracted our means as to make it doubtful if we are able to pay your note in cash at all. We will be glad to settle with you by letting you have some good property any time; but money, at the present time, is out of the question with us. Let us hear from you soon."

And on the same day Philpot, in Philadelphia, writes to him from there:

"The note given by me to you has been presented by a collector for payment. We think this a strange proceeding under the circumstances the note was obtained, and a part having been paid. We have your name to a contract assigning us your interest in well on the Smith Farm, and we would recommend that you withdraw that note, and, as soon as convenient, meet us in Philadelphia, when a satisfactory adjustment of the whole can be arrived at. If you push that note, we shall assuredly demand that interest which we have you bound for, and proceed accordingly."

Gruninger replies, two days afterwards, by a single letter addressed to the firm:

"Yours of July 5th was received with one also of same date. You write me that the note given by you to me was presented to you by a collector for payment, and you think it a very strange proceeding. I myself can't see anything strange in it. You know that the note ought to have been paid this long time. I am in need of money, and must have it

"I am sorry to see you mention in your letter about a contract I assigned to you, and you would 'recommend me to withdraw that note as soon as convenient,' &c.; and that if I push that note you shall demand the interest, which, you say, you have me bound for, and proceed accordingly. If you think this kind of talk goes with me, you better try it. I am sorry that you have wrote so. And the note I have given to collect must and shall be collected, if—. I am sorry to answer you in this way, but you commenced it."

No arrangement being made, Gruninger sued all three persons as partners on the note. Philpot and Picket pleaded jointly and Sherman separately and alone. The defence was, in substance, that the note was given by them to Gruninger in consideration of the agreement of Gruninger that he would become a member of the proposed oil company, and put certain property in it, and also in consideration of the transfer to them of the well on the Blood Farm; and that he had failed and refused to perform his agreement, and that the well had no value.

Gruninger, on the other hand, asserted that it was given in consideration alone of the transactions of October 19th, 1864, and of an existing debt.

The controversy thus involved was, of course, what the consideration of the note really was.

On the trial the defendants offered in evidence articles of partnership dated 8th November, 1864, and between them, in order to show that the partnership between the three was not in existence when the articles of agreement of October 19th, 1864, were made; but they did not offer or propose to offer any other evidence of the same fact.

The court rejected the articles.

The plaintiff and defendants each gave evidence tending to show on the one side that the well on the Blood Farm was worth what it cost, on the other that it was worthless.

In charging, after adverting to the various letters already quoted, including that of July 5th, by Picket, in the firm's name, in which no objection is taken to the validity of the note, and the cause of its non-payment is stated to be that the firm was then unable to pay it in money, and after adverting to some other evidence the court said:

"If, in point of fact, the note was given in consideration of past transactions, of obligations already accrued or accruing, then, of course, the defence fails.

"If, on the other hand, the note was given in consideration of the agreement, on the day, 6th of May, made by Gruninger, to enter into the company; and also, in consideration of the transfer of the said well, and he did not enter into the company, but failed to comply with his agreement, and there was no value in the well, as stated in the plea, then the defence is made out."

The court, however, said further:

"But it is proper for you to consider whether or not this might have been the state of the case; that there were transactions between the parties; that there was a claim on one side, and which may have arisen, or did arise, in consequence of these transactions. Now, was there a present, existing indebtedness from Philpot and Picket, or from Philpot, Sherman & Co., to Gruninger, and was the execution of this agreement by Gruninger, on the 6th of May, simply a motive for the giving of the note and not the consideration of the note? It may be that that was held out as an inducement to the defendants to give the note, as a motive for putting the debt in the shape of a note rather than let it remain in its then present form. If that were so, then the defence would fail, because that proceeds upon the ground, as I understand, that the actual consideration of the giving of the note, not the motive for putting the claim in that form, was the signing of this agreement of the 6th of May, and the transfer of the well on the Blood Farm.

"It may well happen that A. may owe a valid debt to B., and B. may say to A., 'If you will put the debt in the shape of a note I will do some act for you;' and then, when it is done, the promise to put the debt in that shape is not the consideration of the note, but the debt which is due from one to the other."

The jury found for the plaintiff, and judgment was given accordingly. On exceptions to the portion of the charge last above quoted, and to the rejection of the partnership articles, and on some other matters not necessary in any part to be reported, the case was now here.

Messrs S. B. Gookins and J. H. Roberts, for the plaintiffs in error.

I. The jury were misled in view of the evidence in this case—

First. By the distinction made by the court between the motive or inducement for giving the note, and the consideration of the note; and,

Secondly. (If the distinction were a sound one) in applying it to the contingency of a present existing debt from Philpot and Picket or Philpot, Sherman & Co., whereas it should have been confined to a present existing indebtedness from Philpot, Sherman & Co.

As to the latter proposition—

Assuming that the jury might have fairly found that there was a debt of $,500 from Philpot and Picket only for the well purchased on the 19th of October, 1864, yet, as to Sherman, who did not owe the debt, what possible motive could he have for becoming liable to Gruninger for this debt? "The execution of this agreement by Gruninger," says the court. Then, if without that agreement he would not have been induced to put the debt in that shape, it follows that such agreement was, as to him, the consideration of the note.

As to Sherman, therefore, especially, this distinction between the motive or inducement and the consideration, if well founded in any case, was inapplicable to the facts in evidence, and was, therefore, well calculated to, and in fact did, mislead the jury.

Then, as to our first proposition, that the distinction made by the court, in view of the evidence in this case, between the consideration of the note and the motive or inducement operating to cause defendants to give it, misled the jury.

There was obviously controversy between Gruninger and defendants just previous to and at the time this note was given, as to the sale of the well on the Blood Farm. Concede that the evidence is insufficient to show that it was worthless, and that on the whole the defendants were lawfully indebted to Gruninger $3,500 for it, but in good faith thought otherwise, and refused payment, or would only consent to pay or execute the note in question, provided Gruninger would agree to go into and put his property into the proposed new company.

Now, says the court to the jury:

"It may well happen that A. may owe a valid debt to B., and B. may say to A., 'If you will put the debt in the shape of a note I will do some act for you;' and then, when it is so done, the promise to put the debt in that shape is not the consideration of that note, but the debt which is due from one to the other."

This was put by way of illustration, to show the distinction between the consideration and the motive or inducement. If this distinction is known to the books, it can only apply to such a case as this put by the court where A. owes a valid debt to B., and does not dispute it, but it could never apply to a case where, although A. owed a valid debt to B., he believed otherwise and denied it, and B., in order to induce A. to give him an acknowledgment of it in the shape of a promissory note, promises on his part to do some other thing. In such case, while the valid debt may be in part the consideration of the note, it is not the whole consideration, and to allow B. to repudiate his promise and sue and recover on that note, would be to encourage fraud.

II. We submit, also, that the court erred in excluding from the consideration of the jury the articles of copartnership between Philpot, Sherman, and Picket.

Mr. O. K. Hutchings, contra.

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court.

That a part of the consideration of the note was the debt due for the oil well which Gruninger had sold six months before to Philpot and Picket, or that the note was intended as an adjustment of that debt, is but faintly denied; but the plaintiffs in error insist that a part at least of the consideration was the agreement of the promisee to contribute to the formation of the proposed company, an agreement which they allege he has failed to perform; and they complain that the jury were misled by an instruction that they might consider whether the signing of the agreement, or the undertaking of Gruninger to put into the company the interests mentioned, was anything more than an inducement to the making of the note by the defendants, furnishing a motive for giving it, but constituting no part of the consideration.

It is, however, not easy to see how the jury could have been misled, to the injury of the plaintiffs in error, by calling attention to a possible distinction between the motive which may have induced giving the note and its consideration, even if no such distinction can be made. For if it be assumed, as was claimed, that the promisee's undertaking to unite in the formation of a joint stock company was a part of the consideration, it could not aid the promisors. It would not be a step toward showing that the consideration had failed. Gruninger's neglect or refusal to perform his agreement is not to be confounded with the agreement itself. The latter was the consideration, not its performance. He might be answerable in damages for non-performance, but his undertaking to perform would have been the price of the defendants' promise. That undertaking they still have, and with it the full consideration. Nothing is more common than a promise in consideration of a promise, and the defendants' pleas in this case aver that Gruninger's undertaking was the price of their stipulation. Were it then conceded, as the defendants' claimed, the jury would not have been warranted in finding that the consideration of the note had failed.

It is, however, not to be doubted that there is a clear distinction sometimes between the motive that may induce to entering into a contract and the consideration of the contract. Nothing is consideration that is not regarded as such by both parties. It is the price voluntarily paid for a promisor's undertaking. An expectation of results often leads to the formation of a contract, but neither the expectation nor the result is "the cause or meritorious occasion requiring a mutual recompense in fact or in law." Dyer, 306 b. Surely a creditor may do a favor to his debtor, or may enter into a new and independent contract with him, induced by which the debtor may assent to giving a note for the previously existing indebtedness. Without the favor or the new contract there is in such a case a full consideration for the note, and the parties may not have contemplated that the favor or the new contract was to be paid for. To regard them as entering into the consideration of the note would be to make a contract for the parties to which their minds never assented.

It is argued that if Sherman did not owe the debt due from Philpot and Picket to Gruninger (as the jury might have found), there was no motive or inducement, much less even consideration, for his becoming a joint promisor in the note, unless it was Gruninger's agreement, and hence it is inferred that the jury were misled in being allowed to consider that agreement as merely a motive or inducement to his assumption. But he was then a partner of Philpot and Picket, and a joint owner with them of the property for which the debt had been contracted. A consideration moving to his co-promisors was enough to support his promise. The note was given for a smaller sum than the price for which the property had been sold to them. It was accepted as a settlement of the promisee's claim, and a conveyance of the property was made to all the defendants, including Sherman. There was, then, adequate consideration for his promise apart from Gruninger's agreement to put other property into the proposed company. For these reasons, we think, there was no error in the instructions given by the court to the jury.

The second assignment is that the court erred in excluding articles of copartnership between the defendants, dated November 8th, 1864. They were offered to show that the partnership did not commence until after the sale of the oil well was made to Philpot and Picket, which was on the 19th of October, 1864, and therefore that Sherman was not a debtor to Gruninger at that time or when the note was afterwards given. The proposed evidence seems to have been intended to show that the debt due for the well was not the consideration of Sherman's promise, and to raise the inference that Gruninger's agreement to join in forming the stock company was. We have already considered that, and from what we have said it appears that the rejection of the evidence did not injure the defendants. That there was error in the rejection has not been seriously contended.

Judgment is affirmed.

LORAH, Surviving Partner v. TOD.

Where one member of a firm agrees to sell goods to a third person, who is to pay for them by medical services, rendered to that partner and his family, and the other member of the firm does not consent to such an arrangement, such contract with one partner does not enable the person rendering such services, to set off their value against the partnership account.

Opinion of the court by Ross, J. Delivered February 1st, 1873.

The question presented by the case stated is involved in a conflict of authority; and a different rule prevails in Pennsylvania, from that which exists in England, and many of the States. If the question were an open one, we should adopt the conclusion of Prof. Parsons, in his learned work on Partnership, page 210, note J., where it is said, "one partner has an undoubted right to sell the goods of the partnership, or to contract for its services; and he may take pay therefor, in behalf of the partnership, in either specific articles or money; and, as an appropriation by him of such articles or money, once received for the partnership, to his private use, would not subject the party from whom he received them, to an action by the firm, the nature of the case is not changed, if the party, thus dealing with one partner, knows at the time, that what he pays for labor, materials, etc., furnished him by the partnership is intended to come to the use of the partner alone. The disposition of the articles or money received by one partner, for benefits conferred by the partnership, is a matter entirely between the different partners."

This is the rule adopted in New Hampshire (Greeley v. Wyeth, 10 N. H. 15); in Alabama (White v. Toles, 7 Ala. 559); in Vermont (Shong v. Fish, 13 Vt. 277); in Georgia (Perry v. Butt, 14 Ga. 699); in Massachusetts (Arnold v. Brown, 24 Pickering 89, 93); in Connecticut (13 Conn. 185).

In England it has been held, that a suit at law cannot be maintained in the names of all the partners, for a debt from which one of the joint plaintiffs has already discharged the defendant, although such discharge may have been a fraud upon the firm in which the released debtor was participant; as where it has been given in consideration of one partner's receiving a discharge from his private and separate debt. Jones v. Yates, 9 Barn. & Cress. 532, 539. Lord Tenterden, in entering the nonsuit against the plaintiffs in this case, said, it was done "because if the defrauded partner should die, the action, if permitted, would survive to him who had been guilty of the fraud, who might sue alone, and thus for his own benefit, avoid his own act by alleging his own misconduct."

But in Pennsylvania and New York a different rule prevails. It is said by Judge Bell in Purdy v. Powers, 6 Barr, 494, but "with us it is settled beyond controversy, that a partner has no power to bind his fellows by such a transaction, without their knowledge and assent. The act is simply void, it does not operate to discharge the debt, or to change the relative liabilities of the partners. Nor is it permitted to interfere with the form of action by law." Vide Noble v. McClintock, 2 W. & S. 152; Tanner v. Hall and Easton, 1 Barr, 417. In New York, the same ruling has been followed. Cunningham v. Ensunthy, 7 Wend. 326; Graw v. Stewart, 5 Cowd. 489. In Texas also, the Pennsylvania rule has been adopted. Good v. McCartney, 10 Tex. 193; and so also in North Carolina; Norment v. Johnson, 10 Wendell, 89.

In commenting upon this conflict of authority, Judge Bell, in Powers v. Purdy, supra, says: "It is difficult to reconcile the American with the English decisions, so far as a remedy is involved. But should they be thought to clash, we prefer the rule sanctioned by our own cases, as better calculated to subserve justice and advance right."

It is our duty, regardless of our individual view of what should be the law, to follow the decisions of the court of last resort, and subordinate all our conclusions to conformity with its judgments. It is plain, therefore, that unless it appears from the case stated, that Lorah, the other partner, knew and assented to the arrangement between Ullman and Dr. Tod, such arrangement is simply void, and the latter cannot avail himself of a set-off accruing from it. It is agreed by the case stated "that Lorah, the other partner, knew that the said defendant was buying goods on these conditions—Lorah, however, was not a party to the agreement, and did not consent thereto." The clause italicized, under the rule, declared by Judge Bell, states a fact which is fatal to the defence, and obeying that rule we are reluctantly compelled to direct judgment to be entered in favor of the plaintiff. And now February 1st, 1873, judgment is directed to be entered upon the case stated, in favor of the plaintiff, for the sum of $40.33.

Court of Common Pleas of Northampton County.

SCOTT & SONS v. REYER, BRO. & CO.

1. The expression of an opinion by a juror, made during the progress of a trial, that the defendants will lose the case, is not good cause for a new trial; nothing less than a pre-judgment will be good cause.
2. A pre-judgment is that condition of mind which has formed a conclusion so irrevocably fixed as not to be liable to be changed, or to be free to persuasion, or to be opened to a different conviction, upon the production of testimony or evidence which ought reasonably to produce a different conclusion.

Sur reasons for a new trial.

Opinion of the court by LONGAKER, P. J. Delivered March 3d, 1873.

The only reason alleged for a new trial, is that one of the jurors expressed the opinion while the trial was progressing, that the defendants would lose the case.

The deposition discloses the fact, that Wm. Baer, one of the jurors, during the adjournment of the court, had a conversation with Mr. Beck, the deponent, as follows: "I came out from dinner at Henry Whitesell's hotel. I asked him what was up in court. He said the case of Reyer, Bro. & Co. Then I asked him how it looked. Then he said, the Reyers will lose it. I then asked him why? and he said they had confused the testimony of Thomas Beck, who was their principal witness."

That a pre-judgment is a good reason to set aside a verdict, is well established. A pre-judgment, however, differs greatly from the mere expression of an opinion based upon testimony produced and heard upon a trial. An expression of opinion, even if it be based upon testimony as far as given, and before the case is closed, and formed without due reflection, in a casual conversation, and with no settled purpose to act upon it, is not a pre-judgment.

Pre-judging, and giving an opinion upon facts as they are then believed to be, are quite different conclusions. The first implies a strong disposition to favor the one side or the other, regardless of the testimony; a fixed determination to find in favor of a particular party, let the evidence be what it may. The last involves a belief in the facts as they were supposed to exist at the time the opinion is declared; they are impressions formed from existing facts, which it is to be presumed will be removed by the production of evidence showing a different state of facts. Pre-judgment involves a charge of gross misbehavior, amounting to criminality in the juror; it is a determination to decide, right or wrong, in a particular way. McCausland v. Crawford, 1 Yeates, 378; Com. v. Flanaghan, 7 W. & S. 420.

To express an opinion casually, during the progress of a trial, is quite natural; and it is to be regarded as an expression only upon the testimony as far as the case has been heard; nor is it to be presumed that it will be presisted in, if, during the further progress of the trial, other testimony is adduced, and new developments are made, which lead, or ought to lead to a different conclusion. It is, however, far better for jurors not to form opinions, were it possible, and most especially, not to express them before the case is fully given them in charge. The mind, however, is so constituted, that it constantly alternates during the progress of a trial, first receiving one impression, and then quickly changing and adopting another thought, as each varying phase of the testimony is presented; but such mental assertions are not settled convictions, nor unchangeable opinions—much less are they a pre-judgment. To judge a case legally, presupposes that condition of mind in the juror which is open to a reasonable conviction. To pre-judge a case, requires that condition of mind which has arrived at a conclusion so irrevocably fixed as not to be liable to be changed, or to be free to persuasion, or to be open to a different conviction, upon the production of testimony or evidence which ought reasonably to produce a different conclusion.

If verdicts are to be set aside upon the facts here presented, it is to be feared, that few, if any, would ever survive such a rule of law. All that would be required, would be that some meddlesome or designing person should entrap some unwary juror into the expression of an opinion (without the knowledge of the unsuccessful litigant), and as soon as the verdict is known, make it the subject matter for a new trial. It is necessary that such a rule shall not be declared, so that the fruits of a verdict shall not perish.

The rule is discharged, and a new trial is refused.

ACTS OF CONGRESS.

For the furtherance of hearing claims against the government in the Court of Claims not to be interpreted in a narrow spirit, so as to give substantial effect to technical defences. Cross v. United States, 479.

ADVERSE POSSESSION.

Continuity of, in law, held to have been broken when, perhaps, continuous in fact, in a special case under certain statutes of Virginia, regarding the redemption of land sold for taxes. Armstrong v. Morrill, 120.

AGENT.

As ex. gr., the cashier of a bank, when made consignee of goods under a bill of lading, may libel vessel for their non-delivery. The Thames, 98.

AFFREIGHTMENT.

Distinguished from an equitable ownership in the party hiring proportioned to money paid for hire, with the privilege of purchasing at a price fixed. Propeller Company v. United States, 670.

ANNUAL RESTS.

In a State where the law allows as high as ten per cent. per annum interest, a decree will not be reversed, because it allows against a fraudulent administrator eight per cent., with annual rests. Hook v. Payne, 252.

ANSWER.

An amended answer in admiralty setting up an improbable defence, and one quite departing from that set up in the original answer, treated unfavorably. The Maybey and Cooper, 204.

ATTORNEY IN FACT.

To execute a bond, who in executing it, makes by accident a mistake in the baptismal name of the obligor, does not impair the efficacy of the bond; the accident being shown. Dolton v. Cain, 472.

AUCTION SALES.

Where the land department of the government, denying an unfounded preemption claim in the government lands, set up by a person indebted to several persons, proceeds to sell the lands at public auction as part of the public lands, and the debtor and several of his creditors enter into an agreement that the land shall not be bid up, but on the contrary, shall be struck off at as low a price as possible to one of the creditors, who shall divide it among such creditors as will come into an agreement to receive it in satisfaction of their debts, and the land is thus sold at an under price, creditors who have not come into the arrangement cannot set the arrangement aside. The government alone can interpose. Easley v. Kellom et al., 279.

BANKRUPT ACT.

1. A judgment b yconfession when both parties to it knew of the insolvency of the debtor, though taken before the 1st day of June, 1867, is an unlawful preference under the 35th section of the bankrupt act, if taken after the enactment of the law. Traders' Bank v. Campbell, 87.

2. The proceeds of the sale of a bankrupt's goods being in the hands of one sued as a defendant, another person who had a like judgment and execution levied on the same goods, is not a necessary party to this suit, being without the jurisdiction. The rule laid down as to necessary parties in chancery. Ib.

3. The proceeds of the sale being in the hands of a bank, though it had given the sheriff a certificate of deposit, the assignee was not obliged to move against the sheriff in the State court to pay over the money to him, but had his option to sue the bank which had directed the levy and sale, and held the proceeds in its vaults. Ib.

4. The defendant having money received as collections for the bankrupt, delivered it to the sheriff, who levied the defendant's execution on it and applied it in satisfaction of the same. This is a fraudulent preference, or taken by process under the act, and does not raise the question whether if the defendant had retained the money it could be set off in this suit against the bankrupt's debt to the defendant. Ib.

5. So taking a check from the bankrupt and crediting the amount of the check then on deposit, on the bankrupt's note the day before taking judgment, was a payment by way of preference and therefore void, and does not raise the question of set-off. Ib.

6. The two clauses of the 35th section of the bankrupt act, construed and held to differ mainly in their application to two different classes of recipients of the bankrupt's property or means. Gibson v. Warden, 244.

7. Where an assignee in bankruptcy claims a fund as the property of his bankrupt, which sometime before the bankruptcy a firm of which the bankrupt was a member transferred to a third party, and which the transferee now claims adversely to the assignee, the proceedings in the District Court should not be summary and under the first section of the bankrupt act, but formal and under the second clause of the third section. Smith v. Mason, Assignee, 419.

8. An appeal from a proceeding in bankruptcy, disposing, under the first section, of such a claim, lies (other requisites allowing it) from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to this court. Ib.

BILL OF LADING.

1. The bill delivered to the shipper of the goods shipped, is the bill that makes the contract concerning them, and if it is different from the one retained by the ship, it, and not the "ship's bill," is evidence of the contract. The Thames, 98.

2. Goods shipped under a bill of lading must be delivered to the person named in it or to his order, and under no circumstances may be delivered to a mere stranger. The obligation of the ship stated where the endorsee of the bill is unknown. Ib.

3. The endorsee of A. may libel a vessel for non-delivery of the goods shipped, though he be but an agent or trustee of the goods for others. Ib. And see The Vaughan v. Telegraph, 258.

4. A "clean" bill of lading, that is to say, a bill of lading which is silent as to the place of stowage, imports a contract that the goods are to be stowed under deck. The Delaware, 579.

5. This being so, parol evidence of an agreement that they were to be stowed on deck is inadmissible. Ib.

BILL OF REVIEW.

A bill of review held to have been properly entertained on the after-discovery of a lost paper; and a former decree held, on the new evidence, to have been rightly reversed. Easley v. Kellom, 279.

BOND.

One executed by an attorney in fact, who, through what is shown to have been accident, causes the bond to be prepared, and signs it with the obligor's right family name, but with a wrong baptismal name, is valid. Dolton v. Cain, 472.

CAPTURED AND ABANDONED PROPERTY.

An inference that the proceeds of, had been paid into the treasury, drawn from the prima facie presumption of law that the military and financial officers of the United States had done their official duty; and the money restored to a loyal claimant accordingly. United States v. Crusell, 1.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE.

Seal to, not necessary under the statutes of Ohio. Gibson v. Warden, 244.

CASE STATED.

The parties to a suit in the District Court may, independently of any legislative provision, agree on and state a case for the judgment of the court. Henderson's Distilled Spirits, 44.

COLLECTORS.

Certain ones entitled to retain, for their own use, moneys received by them from the owners of steamers, and from engineers and pilots, by virtue of the thirty-first section of the act of August 30th, 1852. United States v. Ballard, 457.

COLLISION.

1. When navigating in a port, it is no excuse for a steamer which runs against another vessel 200 feet and more outside of the ordinary channel, and between 300 and 400 feet out of the ordinary track of steamers, that she was rounding a point and coming into her dock; and that she could not see in consequence of a fog, and that she supposed she was at the right place to change her course. The Bridgeport, 116.

2. The respective rights and obligations as to keeping or changing their courses, of steamers and sailing vessels approaching each other at sea—this matter examined, and the rules deduced and stated in a case of collision at night. The Scotia. 170.

3. Rules to guard against collision stated, which govern vessels sailing on intersecting lines at different rates of speed. The Cuyuga, 270.

4. Though a steamship pursuing, in a crowded harbor, for her own greater convenience in getting into dock in a particular state of the harbor, a channel not entirely the ordinary one for vessels of her size, be bound to more than ordinary precaution, yet if she has a right to use that channel and do take such more than ordinary precaution, she is not responsible for accidents to other vessels that, with it all, were inevitable. The Java, 189.

5. The fact that a steamship is in charge of a pilot taken conformably to the laws of a State, is not a defence to a proceeding in rem against her for a tortious collision, the laws of the State providing only that if a ship coming into her waters, refuse to receive on board and pay a pilot, the master shall pay the refused pilot half pilotage, and no penalty for the refusal being prescribed. The China (7 Wallace, 58) affirmed. The Merrimac, 199.

6. A steamship of 2000 tons having a tug, each of 500 tons, on each side, condemned as guilty of a rash act for sailing in a place from 70 to 75 feet wide, which had little or no more than the width of the ship and tugs abreast, between a buoy which indicated an entire obstruction of navigation, and a ship aground with a steamtug on each side. Ib.

7. Where a ship ordered a tug to tow her out of the harbor to sea when the navigation was made dangerous by wind, tide, and ice, and the master of the tug remonstrated, and finally went only on the shipowner's insisting, and on their agreeing to take the risk of all accident, both ship and tug were held liable on a libel for a collision, there being in addition some evidence of faulty navigation. The Mabey and Cooper, 204.

COMMISSIONERS OF TAXES.

1. Though "authorized" under the act of 6th February, 1863, to bid off property to the United States "at a sum not exceeding two-thirds of its assessed value," are not bound to bid it up so as to make it bring in all cases that much. Turner v. Smith, 553.

2. Under this act and that of June 7th, 1862, the tax commissioners are not bound to hunt up the real owners. The tax laid is a direct tax on the land, and on all the estates, interests, and claims connected with or growing out of it. A rent charge is accordingly cut off and destroyed by a sale of the land. Ib.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Congress has power to confer on the city of Washington authority to assess upon the adjacent proprietors of lots, the expense of repairing streets with a new and different pavement, or of repairing an old pavement. The tax need not be a general one on the city. Willard v. Presbury, 676.

CONTRACT.

1. In the matter of a contract, a distinction sometimes exists between a motive which may induce entering into it and the actual consideration of the contract. This subject illustrated. Philpot v. Gruninger, 570.

2. A consideration moving to A. and B., with whom C. afterwards enters into partnership, and of which consideration C. thus gets the benefit, will support a promise by C. Ib.

3. Equity will not readily set aside a reasonable one, made for the sake of peace, though want of money may have been an inducing cause with one of the parties to the making of it. French v. Shoemaker, 315.

CORPORATE SECURITIES.

When a corporation has power under any circumstances to issue negotiable securities, the bona fide holder has a right to presume that they were issued under the circumstances which give the requisite authority, and they are no more liable to be impeached in the hands of such a holder for any infirmity than any other commercial paper. City of Lexington v. Butler, 282.

COUPON.

Statutes of limitation will not bar suit on, unless the time be sufficient to bar suit on bond also. City of Lexington v. Butler, 282.

COURT AND JURY.

1. When a plaintiff presents as an important part of his case a written proposal, and then insists on a recovery on the ground of mere suspicion that there was a verbal proposal differing from it, it is the duty of the court, if there is no evidence at all of such different verbal proposal, to tell the jury when requested that there is none, and to tell them that they may in such a case find such a verbal proposition; is error. Ward v. United States, 28.

2. Where there is such a written proposal, it is the duty of the court, at the request of either party, to construe it, and in doing so the admitted facts concerning the relation of the parties to the transaction are to be considered. Ib.

3. Parties may by consent waive a jury in the District Court, and state a case for the court independently of any legislative provision. Henderson's Distilled Spirits, 44.

4. Whether, under a policy which provides that fraud or false swearing in furnishing the preliminary proofs of loss, or in an examination which by the terms of the policy the assured, on a claim for loss, was bound to submit to, there has been such fraud or false swearing, is a question for the jury. Insurance Company v. Weides, 375.

5. Whether the evidence before a jury does or does not sustain the allegations in a case, is a matter wholly within the province of the jury, and if they find in one way, this court cannot review their finding. Gregg v. Moss, 564.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

1. The 4th and 5th rules regulating appeals from, were designed to enable a party to secure a finding of fact on any point material to the decision of that court. Mahan v. United States, 109.

2. But a failure of the court to find the fact as the party alleges it to be, will not justify the bringing of all the evidence on that subject before the Supreme Court, though on a refusal of that court to make any finding on the subject, the Supreme Court may remand the case for such finding. Ib.

3. Directed, by the Supreme Court, to interpret an act of Congress, passed for the furtherance of hearing a claim against the government, in a liberal spirit, and not in a narrow view of the legislative intention, and so as to give substantial effect to technical defences. Cross v. The United States, 479.

DEED.

One executed by an attorney appointed by a husband and wife under a power drawn in France, and with the verbiage which notaries there usually indulge in, to sell the lands in the United States of the husband and wife, the husband owning lands here, but not the husband and wife, Held, sufficient in favor of a bona fide purchaser, long in possession, to convey the husband's lands. Dolton v. Cain, 472.

DERELICT.

The master, officers, and crew of a vessel, with every person on board, having gone off, in extreme anxiety for their personal safety, from the vessel on to another which they had brought to them by signals of distress, the mere expressed intention by the master to employ if possible a tug to go and rescue his vessel (she then lying at anchor in a violent gale), to which expression of intention, the person to whom it was made replied, that he "could not get a tug that would come and bring the boat in, as the weather was too rough," was held not sufficient to deprive the vessel of the character of a derelict, so far as timely effort to save her was contemplated. The Laura, 336.

EQUITABLE OWNERSHIP.

In a party hiring a vessel with the privilege of buying her at a price named, crediting the money paid for hire, distinguished from an affreightment. Propeller Company v. United States, 560.

EQUITY.

1. Will not set aside a contract whose purpose is a settlement of disputes, simply because one party to it was in want of money when he made it, and because such want may have been an inducing cause for his making it; the party having been an intelligent person, who acted deliberately and with knowledge of what he was doing. French v. Shoemaker, 315.

2. Will consider that a party to a contract who, when the act of the other side renders impossible literal performance, has performed all that can be reasonably expected of him, comes in certain cases within the character of a party performing his part. Dolton v. Cain, 472.

3. Will look through forms to substance, and protect a bonâ fide pu chaser long in possession under a deed of cestuis que trust, and plainly intended for their benefit, from disturbance by conveyance, long afterwards from the heirs of the party named in the deed as trustee, and now claiming the land under a sharp and mere technical rule of conveyancing. Ib.

Acts of Assembly.

SESSION OF 1873.

An act declaratory of the law relating to square timber taken adrift in the West Branch, and regulating the control of the same.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That it is the true intent and meaning of the several acts of the General Assembly, regulating the taking up of lumber or logs adrift in the West Branch of the Susquehanna and its tributaries, that none of the provisions thereof are applicable to squared timber taken from landings or moorings, or from the banks of the said streams within the counties of Elk, Cambria, Cameron, Clearfield, Indiana, Central, Clinton or Lycoming, by extraordinary freshets or ice floods and driven or floated down the said streams thereby, but that all of the said squared timber so as aforesaid taken adrift and lodged or found upon the banks within the bed or on lands adjoining said West Branch or its tributaries, at any point on the same, shall be as fully to all intents and purposes the property of those out of whose possession the same was taken by said freshets or floods at the place at which it may be found, as it was when lying at the landings from which it was taken away, and no claim for salvage, bank lease, or labor expended thereon shall be of any validity whatever in regard thereto, but the parties owning the same, or their agents, may enter on the said land, adjoining the said streams, or within the bed or banks thereof, and remove the same by paying such damages as may accrue to the owners of the land on which said timber may be found.

SECT. 2. That the Court of Common Pleas of Clearfield county, or two of its judges, shall appoint three experienced and competent lumbermen, actually engaged in the business of taking square timber to market, who shall each give bond in five thousand dollars, with two sureties, to be approved by the said judges for the faithful performance of their duties, who shall be known as prize masters, and shall be subject to the control and jurisdiction of the said court in all things relating to their said duties, and it shall be their duty to take charge of all marked square timber so as aforesaid taken adrift by extraordinary freshets or ice floods on the stream, and its tributaries aforesaid, and found and being in the bed, on the banks, on lands adjoining the said streams, or in the custody and possession of persons whom they have reason to suspect obtained the same without authority, to gather up the same and secure it wherever found, and in whosesoever possession the same may be, to distinctly mark the same with a mark, by them to be selected and duly registered at all the booms, and in the offices of the prothonotaries of Clearfield and Clinton counties, to keep accurate accounts of the same by size and length, kind of timber, and apparent value, and they shall hold said squared timber to deliver it to the owner or owners at any time prior to the sale thereof, when he or they shall satisfy by proof the said prize masters, or a majority of them, that it is his or their property, and shall pay to them a just pro rata for the expenses incurred in taking up and securing the same; they shall after three months from such freshets shall have passed, or at such other times as they may fix, proceed to sell in open market, for the best price they can obtain, all of the said timber then remaining in their hands, for which no owner hath appeared and proved his right, and after deducting expenses of the performance of their duties herein provided for, and of securing and selling said squared timber, they shall distribute the proceeds under the order of the court aforesaid pro rata, among all those who shall prove to an auditor to be by said court appointed, the quantity, value, kind and character of the timber, so as aforesaid taken from them, and no provision of law now in existence shall authorize any boom company in said stream to charge for tonnage, or hold therefor any square timber going into the said booms, but on demand therefor, either by the owners thereof, or by the prize masters herein named, the same shall be delivered up at the earliest day practicable, and a right of action shall accrue to and exist in favor of said prize masters for all unmarked square timber, which on demand therefor shall not be to them delivered by any corporation, person or persons, in whose possession the same may be, and the said corporation, person or persons, shall not be permitted to defend said action by showing title or ownership thereof in any other person or persons, corporation or corporations than themselves: Provided, That they may show and prove a bona fide purchase thereof, from the real owner before suit is brought.

SECT. 3. All laws or parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be and the same are hereby repealed.

Approved 11th February, 1873.

An act to authorize the governor to appoint additional notaries public.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the governor is hereby authorized to appoint as many notaries public as in his judgment the interest of the public may require: Provided, That before any commission shall be issued under this act, a receipt from the State treasurer shall first be produced, showing the payment of twenty-five dollars into the State treasury, for the use of the commonwealth.

Approved 19th February, 1873.

An act to fix the salary of the governor of this commonwealth.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the salary of the governor of this commonwealth is hereby fixed at the sum of ten thousand dollars per annum, payable quarterly, this act to take effect upon and at the expiration of the present gubernatorial term.

Approved 15th January, 1873.

An act to repeal an act entitled an act supplementary to an act relating to the jurisdiction and powers of courts, approved the 16th day of June, A. D. 1836.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the act entitled an act supplementary to an act relating to the jurisdiction and powers of courts, approved the 16th day of June, A. D. 1836, and approved the 10th day of June, A. D. 1871, be and the same is hereby repealed, with like effect as if the same had not been enacted.

Approved 5th February, 1873.

An act relative to writs of estrepement.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That the president judges of the several courts of common pleas of this commonwealth, shall and may exercise in vacation all the powers and authority for dissolving writs of estrepement that could be exercised by the courts over which they preside when in session: Provided, That notice shall be first given to the opposite party.

Approved 18th February, 1873.

An act to authorize mining and manufacturing companies to issue bonds and mortgages, and to use the same as collaterals for bank accounts.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That mining and manufacturing companies organized under any general or special law of this commonwealth, are hereby authorized to issue and sell their coupon or registered bonds secured by mortgages upon the real estate of said companies to an amount not exceeding two-thirds of the capital stock of such companies, and to pay interest on said bonds at any rate not exceeding eight per centum per annum: Provided, That such issue shall be deemed necessary by the board of directors, either for the payment of indebtedness to construct improvements, or to purchase lands and materials.

SECT. 2. The manufacturing and mining companies are hereby authorized to make bonds and mortgages and use them as collaterals on which to obtain discounts from banks and banking companies or individuals.

Approved 20th February, 1873.

An act authorizing mining and manufacturing companies, or other organized companies of individuals, to take and hold mortgages on real estate to secure payment of notes, bills and renewals thereof.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for mining and manufacturing companies organized under any special or general law of this commonwealth, or for any other organized company or individual, to execute, and deliver, and for all banks organized under any law of this commonwealth, or any other organized company, individual or individuals, to take and hold mortgages on real estate to secure payment of such notes, bills and other negotiable or other paper and renewals thereof, belonging to, or made by said companies, as the said banks, company, individual or individuals, shall agree to and execute from time to time for discount or otherwise: Provided, That such mortgage shall operate as a lien from the date of the record of such instrument.

Approved 17th February, 1873.—Legal Opinion.

March 3d, 1873, the following additional rule was made in the District Court of Philadelphia.

RULE XXX.

In all cases in which, before the issuing of any writ of scire facias, security shall be entered by any party in interest under the 4th section of the act of August 1st, 1868 (relating to liens of mechanics and others upon buildings), said security shall consist of the bond of such party, with one or more sufficient sureties, in double the amount appearing to be due by the affidavit of the claimant, conditioned for the payment forthwith, of such sum as may be due to the claimant. In all actions upon said bonds, the claimant shall recover the amount appearing to be due to him, with interest and costs, and having filed a copy of said bond in said action, shall be entitled to judgment for want of an affidavit of defence, the prothonotary shall assess the damages, taking as the basis of such assessment, the claim filed.

A meeting of the Luzerne county bar was held on the 13th of February, in the court room at Wilkesbarre, to take action regarding the death of G. Byron Nicholson, Esq., late one of its prominent members. Judge Dana presided, and addresses were delivered by Messrs. Charles Pike, A. T. McClintock, D. L. Rhone, S. S. Winchester, H. Hakes, E. P. Darling, C. L. Lamberton, Judge Harding, W. W. Ketcham, and Judge Dana. Appropriate resolutions were adopted, after which the meeting adjourned.

Affairs in France and Spain are possessed of great interest at the present moment to Americans. In each country a republic is sought to be established, and the problem how to establish it is attempted to be worked out. France seems not to be as fully alive to the meaning of a real republic as Spain. The cable informs us that the Corps Legislatif on Tuesday last adopted the preamble to the constitutional project recently submitted by the "Committee of Thirty" of that body, which preamble declared "the assembly reserved to itself constituent power," thus refusing to dissolve. On the other hand, in the Spanish Cortes, a bill has been introduced by the president of the ministry, convoking the new Cortes on May 1st, and providing for an election by all male citizens of the age of twenty years, of its members on April 1st. This is getting at the matter in the right way, dissolving the present Legislature and having a new one elected by the people. France would do well to copy after Spain.

Our correspondent PERICLES, has been suffering under an affection of the eyes for some weeks past, but is now recovering. In answer to inquiries made, we would state that we hope to print another communication from him next week.

This week the press of matter compels us to crowd out the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois, reversing the decision of Judge Tipton, in the case of The People v. Chicago & Alton Railroad, published in the Gazette recently.

WILLIAM H. HOPKINS.

On Wednesday, at 2 P. M., died at Pittsburg, William H. Hopkins, a well known citizen of this State. He was born in Washington county, September 14, 1804, and was at the time of his death a banker in his native town. In 1834 he entered political life, being then elected to the lower house of the Legislature. By subsequent re-elections he retained his seat until 1840, being during his term of office three times speaker of the House. During the years 1842 and 1843 he held the position of secretary of the land office, and was canal commissioner during 1853, 1854 and 1855. He was also a commissioner of the old Cumberland State road for three years under Shunk, and for two years under Porter. In 1864 he was elected to the State Senate, his term ending in 1866. His latest official position, held at the time of his death, was that of a member of the Constitutional Convention.

In the Convention yesterday, Mr. Hopkins' death was announced, and eloquent speeches were made in eulogy of the high character for honesty, integrity and ability which he always possessed. Hons. Geo. V. Lawrence, John N. Purviance, and Thos. Hazzard, his colleagues, were especially earnest in their addresses and Judge Black, T. H. Baird Patterson, Esq., of Allegheny, and others also added their tributes of praise. Our own personal acquaintance with the decedent as a fellow member of the Convention, inspired us with the highest admiration for his many good qualities, and makes us deeply regret the loss which his family and the whole State have sustained. His name, will be handed down to posterity as that of an able, pure, and upright public officer, who will serve as a bright example for our youth to follow.

Among the many interesting matters pertaining to the Centennial celebration, is a memorial volume, designed to perpetuate among the records of the Centennial Commission the names of the living members of the Philadelphia bar, in which the autographs are preserved chronologically, according to admission. The caption to the subscription, written entirely by the hand of the venerable Horace Binney, reads as follows:

The members of the bar of Philadelphia, in conformity with the resolution hereinbefore recorded, respectfully subscribe one share each to the stock of the Centennial fund, understanding that the aggregate subscriptions are to be regarded as a contribution in their associate relations as members of the bar.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 22, 1873.

Date of Admission.	Name.
1800	Horace Binney.
1809	Henry A. Freeman.
1815	Henry J. Williams.
1821	Eli K. Price.
1825	John Cadwalader.
1825	Isaac Norris.

The committee of the bar having the subject in charge consists of James Page, chairman; J. Sergeant Price, secretary; Edward H. Weil, Frank M. Etting, R. L. Ashhurst, John Cadwalader, Jr., Alex. Thackara, Elwood Wilson, Jr., and Paul M. Elsasser. The volume has been prepared at the instance and under the personal supervision of Elwood Wilson, Jr., Esq., one of the committee.

BAR MEETINGS.

At noon on Saturday, 1st instant, members of the Philadelphia Bar met in the room of the Supreme Court, for the purpose of taking such action as will obtain for Philadelphia cases more of the time of the Supreme Court. T. Bradford Dwight, Esq., on motion of William L. Hirst, Esq., took the chair, and John Cadwalader, Jr., acted as secretary.

George L. Crawford read a preamble containing the statement of cases on the argument list before the Supreme Court in Banc. The total number of causes on the list is eight hundred and forty-three, two hundred and sixty-two of which, or nearly one-third the entire list, are on the Philadelphia county list.

As the six weeks already allowed for the hearing of this list is not sufficient for the purpose, a resolution requesting an extension of three weeks, in addition to the six already devoted, was appended to the preamble, and adopted.

William L. Hirst offered the following resolutions:

That the learned judges of the Supreme Court be requested to make a general order rule of court that causes on the argument list from Nisi Prius, shall take rank according to the time at which appeals shall be taken, and not according to the time at which suits shall have been originally commenced.

That a committee of seven be named by the chair to address the Constitutional Convention in favor of amending the constitution, by providing that the Supreme Court shall hold all its sessions in banc in the City of Philadelphia.

A committee was then appointed to take charge of the resolutions, and report at a subsequent meeting.

The meeting then adjourned.

An adjourned meeting was held on the afternoon of the 4th instant, in the room of District Court No. 4, Mr. T. Bradford Dwight in the chair. The committee to whom was referred the matter of the present condition of the Philadelphia list, and case for argument before the Supreme Court of the State sitting in banc, for the purpose of digesting and reporting some method of relief for the bench itself, as well as for the bar, presented the following resolutions for consideration:

First. That the Supreme Court be requested by the bar of Philadelphia to make a rule or order of court, to the effect that all appeals from the said court sitting at nisi prius be arranged as the list of cases for argument before the said court sitting in banc, according to the date of the original process in such case.

Second. That the Supreme Court be requested by the bar of Philadelphia to direct the prothonotary to prepare a list of cases in which counsel to secrue an early hearing may agree to limit their argument to a definite time.

Third. That a committee of seven be appointed to present these resolutions to the judges of the Supreme Court, and confer with them in order to ascertain whether the request can be acceded to and whether any other modes of relief can be devised.

Fourth. That a meeting of the bar be held on Saturday, March 15th, 1873, at 12 M. to consider what course shall be taken in order to make the sessions of the Supreme Court permanent in this city, and to suggest such other action as may be proper to attain the object in view.

The report was accepted, and the resolutions, after being read, were adopted.

The chairman then appointed the following gentlemen as the committee called for in the third resolution: Messrs. George L. Crawford, E. Spencer Miller, George W. Biddle, William L. Hirst, Benjamin Harris Brewster, Edward Olmstead, and George Junkin.

The meeting then adjourned.

JURIES AND PHYSICIANS ON INSANITY. By R. S. Gurnsey, Esq., of the New York Bar. 8vo., pp. 11 N. Y., J. R. McDevitt & Co.

This is a pamphlet reprint of a paper read by Mr. Gurnsey before the Medico-Legal Society of New York City. The writer suggests that "the question of insanity should be taken from a legally irresponsible jury, and in all cases placed in the hands of a responsible judiciary, with the same rules of evidence as at present.

A PRACTICAL TREATISE ON THE LAW OF MUNICIPAL BONDS. By Wm. N. Coler, counsellor at law. 2 vols., 8vo., pp. 468, 498. New York, 1873. Received from John Campbell & Son, Philadelphia.

We acknowledge the receipt of a set of "The Law of Municipal Bonds," by Wm. N. Coler, counsellor at law.

The title of the work would not seem to convey the scope of subjects treated, or their general utility, without an examination of the index; but the index seems to be exhaustive, and harmonizes what is the law of municipal bonds. The author says the only distinction between the law merchant and that of municipal bonds, is the status of the payor, it being the right of taxation. In this the work becomes a treatise on constitutional provisions, legislative power creating and obligating the payor. The author seems to have found in every State some leading principles, as having become fixed law by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the State, by which the status of the payor is to be known. The first three chapters is a text on "The Law of Municipal Bonds;" "Status of the Payor;" "Public Purpose;" after which, the States are arranged under chapters in alphabetical order, giving the constitutional provisions and decisions affecting the right and remedy incident to taxation, prominent among which is: Pennsylvania, "Public Purpose, right to tax for;" Alabama, "Organic Law;" Delaware "Delegation of Legislative Power;" Illinois, "Debt by Donation," Iowa and Missouri, "Remedy of Payee;" while other States furnish equally as important questions adjudicated, that go to make what may be considered to be the law of municipal bonds. The arrangement in chapters by States, would be subject to many objections, were it not for the exhaustive index; but with this, it might be said to be text, and the objections fall. The work is well exe-

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

LETTER III.

To the Editor of the Legal Gazette:

The people of the commonwealth have decided that the constitution shall be examined, for the purpose of proposing necessary amendments. The Legislature endeavored by after legislation, to except art. ix. from such examination; but the Convention, right after its assembling, correctly decided that such legislation is not binding, and is of no effect. The people is the master, the Legislature but the agent.

How necessary it is to examine art. ix., I shall endeavor to show in the following two letters, for the same contains an absurdity and a contradiction.

The first is contained in section 1, art. ix. the closing sentence of which reads as follows: "and of pursuing their own happiness."

The section guarantees certain rights, and is evidently fashioned after the Declation of Independence. But the minds drafting the section varied the language of the latter, by adding a small word, and thereby embodying into its substance what the writer deems an absurdity. The section as it stands, reads: "All men are born free and independent, and have certain inherent and indefeasible rights, among which are those of ..... pursuing their own happiness.

It is evident, that this section, if construed literally, leads to anarchy; for if every man has an indefeasible right to pursue his own happiness, government is impossible. Government can guarantee every man's happiness generally, but not every man's own happiness; and this general happiness is exactly what is meant to be guaranteed. Why, then, the word "own?"

It may be said, that this word was in the constitution from its beginning, without doing any injury, and may, therefore, remain for any further indefinite time. But such reasoning is fallacious; for history teaches us that a seemingly insignificiant error, or mistake, or oversight in the fundamental laws, in the course of time will work out a mistaken governmental system, and may even be the cause of its total destruction.

The overthrow of the Roman republic dates back to the establishment of Rome's second constitution, under Tullius Survilius, 534 b. Ch. The latter conceived that wealth should be the division line of the people, and he thereby broke up the arrogance of certain of the patrician classes, who, being the descendants of Rome's founders, enjoyed certain privileges. But by giving to wealth a political recognition, it became superior to worth. An aristocracy of wealth grew up. The wealthy found means to absorb the constantly increasing and newly created wealth. Men learned to honor wealth for its own sake, no matter how it might have been acquired, and corruption and servility became the type of the degenerated Romans. Would patriots like Cincinnati, Mus, Mucius, Scaevola, and the host of others, have thought that their descendants would bow before a hero Caligula, or an emperor purchasing the imperial throne? And yet, the subtle principle laid down by Tullius Servilius, in making wealth the standard of a Roman citizen's worth, in the course of five hundred years led to Cæsar, and ultimately to Nero. Our commonwealth has not completed its first century!

Let me point to the history of our Federal Union. The framers of the Constitution proposed art. iv., section 3, and the people accepted it as a compromise. Nobody thought harm, and yet that very section, within seventy-one years almost led to a disruption of the Union. Without this section, we would not have had a Dred Scott decision; no fugitive slave law; no abolition agitation of such magnitude, and no secession war.

Constitutions are intended for the security of the citizens and perpetuity of institutions. Their language shall be precise, and just mean that which the words imply. The word "own," in the section above referred to, if literally construed, implies anarchy. If it shall not be literally construed, may not enemies of republican institutions, fifty or five hundred years hence, succeed to construe it in their favor? T.

In Equity.

MICHAEL PRICE v. JAMES H. SPENCER et al.

1. Where the plaintiff is employed by an association of which he is a member, and the chief and permanent service contemplated is to work a silver mine, if the adventure fail through from no fault of his, he may file a bill against them for compensation for the initiatory services performed by him.
2. The measure of compensation is the salary prescribed by the agreement.

Exceptions to master's report.

Statement of the Case.

Upon the 21st day of December, 1867, the defendants entered into the following agreement with the plaintiff:

Articles of agreement made the twenty-first day of December, Anno Domini 1867, between Michael Price of the first part, and James S. Spencer, Thomas S. Cavender, Joseph Firth, the said Michael Price, Michael E. Price, George R. Huzewell, and John M. Lisle, of the second part: Whereas the said Michael Price hath this day been appointed by the parties of the second part, their true and lawful attorney, for them and in their names, to examine the seven silver mines belonging to Joseph M. Sanchez, situated and located in the Guanacevi mining district, State of Durango, Mexico, to wit: Surrana Rosario, Barradon, Enciuella, Capuzaya, Cabras and La Galana, and also if he shall find the character and conditions of the said mines to be practically such as represented by their owner, to take possession and proceed in the working thereof. Now the articles witness: That the said Michael Price hereby agrees, in case he shall decide to take possession of the said mines, to give his whole and best services and abilities to the working thereof, in all legal and proper ways, for the term of three years, and in consideration thereof, the said parties of the second part, do for themselves respectively, their respective heirs, executors and administrators, covenant, promise, and agree to pay unto the said Michael Price, his executors, administrators and assigns, the yearly salary or sum of five thousand dollars in silver bars, at the mines, at their value by weight, in equal quaterly payments of one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars each, the first thereof to be made on the first day of April next ensuing the date hereof, and also in case the said Michael Price, shall deem it advisable to employ the services of his son George W. Price, as an assistant, to pay unto the said George W. Price, his executors, administrators and assigns, the yearly salary or sum of one thousand dollars in silver bars as aforesaid, in equal quarterly payments of two hundred and fifty dollars each, the first thereof to be made on the first day of April next ensuing the date hereof.

In pusuance of said agreement, as also by the authority conferred by a power of attorney, given to plaintiff by defendants, he proceeded immediately after the execution thereof, to the said silver mines. He employed his son George W. Price, as an assistant, who remained in Mexico about the business of the defendants, for upwards of a year.

The plaintiff finding it impossible to obtain from defendants, the means wherewith to proceed in the working of said mines, return to Philadelphia, May, 1868, and solicited the defendants to proceed in the said undertaking. Defendants ratified his proceedings, but refused to comply with his request, and after a long delay abandoned the undertaking.

Opinion by Agnew, J. Delivered March 1st, 1873.

This is a peculiar, and not a clear case. I am inclined to think, however, that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation under the contract of December 21st, 1867. Being himself a member of the association, and one of the signers of the contract with himself, he has no remedy by action at law, as the District Court held, in an action on the covenant. That he performed services under the agreement is undeniable, and it will be singular if there be no remedy at law or in equity to recover compensation. The difficulty in the case seems to flow from the original adventure having come to an end, and the fault of this the report of the master eventually places at the door of the plaintiff. But is this a reason to refuse partial compensation?

The original purchase, through Gilmore & McManus, fell through, but not by any fault of the plaintiff. When he arrived at Durango, he found he had no title which would enable him to take possession of the mines and work them, in consequence of the purchase money not being paid to Mr. Sanchez by the first purchaser. He negotiated with Sanchez, and purchased from him directly, and on better terms. But he could not go on under the new arrangement, without submitting his acts to his associates for ratification. This he did by returning to Philadelphia. They ratified his purchase, and tried to raise means to pay the purchase money, but after considerable delay, failed. Here the master lays the fault at Price's door, because he was a member of the association. But it is not in the case that they raised their proportions and he failed to raise his. The adventure fell through by a common fault. But the plaintiff had earned a portion of salary before this failure. He had gone to Mexico under the agreement and visited the mines, and the original purchase fell through by no fault of his. When it fell through, he endeavored to carry it out by a new arrangement, and performed his duty to the best of his power, and his effort was ratified. How, then, can the subsequent failure of the association to carry out the substituted arrangement deprive him of his reward for services actually rendered under the agreement?

This brings the case to the question, did he earn anything under the agreement? The master interpreted it, that the salary was only for working the mines; and not having done so, and not having made silver bars, the prescribed medium of payment, the plaintiff is entitled to nothing under the agreement.

True, the annual salary is for working the mines, the chief and continued subject of reward; but does the agreement include no more? Does it not include the initiatory services also? I think so. The agreement of the plaintiff was to do two things; First, to proceed as agent and attorney of the association, from Philadelphia to the mines of Mr. Sanchez, in the Guanacevi Mining District, in Mexico, examine the mines, and ascertain their character and fitness. Second, to take possession and work them for the association. For these services, but one compensation was provided in the agreement—a salary of $5,000, payable in quarterly instalments, the first beginning on the first of April following. The contemplated year in the contract began, therefore, on the first of January, 1868. The date of the contract being December 21st, 1867, the duties of the plaintiff necessarily began within ten days, and at Philadelphia, the place of starting. Now, though working the mines was the chief service for which the salary was contemplated, the absence of all other compensation, and the time the salary was to begin, together with evident justice of compensation, makes it clear that the salary included the initiatory, as well as the permanent services. It could not have been the intention that the plaintiff should make a long, dangerous, and toilsome journey, in midwinter, to a remote, wild, and semi-barbarous region, there to exercise his skill and judgment in determining the character and availability of the mines, make preparations for mining, and only begin the working of them months after the year had commenced; and yet have nothing for services so arduous and so valuable. This would be the effect, if the contract be interpreted as understood by the master. Certainly such could not have been the purpose of the parties. The payment of the $2,000 for expenses cannot alter the interpretation of the contract. There is no evidence that this payment was understood to be a part of the agreement, while the expenses necessary for such a journey, and to make preparations for mining, would be great. There being no proof to alter or modify the written agreement, its interpretation must rest upon the writing itself. The services being rendered on the footing of the agreement, and before the adventures fell through, it seems to me the plaintiff is entitled to a due proportion of his salary. This would be three quarterly instalments, the master having reported that the enterprise was abandoned in October, 1868.

The finding of the master disposes of the $2,000 consumed in necessary expenses, excepting so much as the plaintiff expended in payment of his son. Though no cross bill was filed, the sum thus illegally expended would be a fair and legitimate abatement from the plaintiff's salary, to be ascertained and reported by the master. The exceptions of the plaintiff, therefore, are sustained, and the case is referred back to the same master to find the balance of salary due to the plaintiff, and report the same to the court, with the form of a final decree, in accordance with this opinion.

Thomas R. Elcock and William J. McElroy, Esqs., pro plaintiff.

George Junkin, Jr., Esq., pro defendants.

FOX v. SNYDER.

A copy of a bond for $1,481.50, conditioned that the defendant should, within two years, improve a certain lot of ground, being filed, to which defendant filed an affidavit of defence, alleging that the said sum was penal, and was only to secure the improvement of the value of said lot, which defendant had done by erecting houses contiguous, upon a rule for judgment for want of a sufficient affidavit of defence: Held, That the said sum was not a penalty, but liquidated damages, and that the affidavit showed no defence.

Rule to show cause why judgment shall not be entered for want of a sufficient affidavit of defence.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered January 11th, 1873.

The plaintiff declared on a bond under seal, executed by the defendant to plaintiff, bearing date March 9th, 1869, in the sum of $1,481.50, conditioned that if the said defendant should improve or cause to be improved, within two years from the date thereof, on the lot that day conveyed by said plaintiff to defendant, by the erection of dwelling houses, fronting on Oxford street, each to be similar, or not inferior to those built by —— Lewis, during the years 1868–69, on the north side of Columbia avenue, &c., so as to fully comply with this agreement, then said obligation to be null and void, "or else to be and remain in full force and virtue as liquidated damages for the non-compliance thereof."

With a copy of the bond, the plaintiff filed a suggestion under oath, that the defendant did not erect or commence the erection of any house or houses, such as are in said bond stipulated, at or before the expiration of two years from the execution and delivery of said bond, nor were there any such houses erected thereon, nor had there been any such.

The defendant swears that he has a full, just and legal defence to said action, the nature of which he gives, and is substantially this, to wit: That about the time he purchased the aforesaid lot of plaintiff, on the northwest corner of Seventeenth and Oxford streets, he also purchased one other lot of him on the northwest corner of Sixteenth and Oxford streets; that the reason plaintiff gave for requiring said bond, was because he desired said mentioned lot to be improved, and thus enhance the value of remaining lots of which he then was and still is a large holder; and to indemnify the plaintiff against any loss which he might sustain by reason of the failure of the defendant to enhance the value of ground in that vicinity, was the sole object for which the bond was given. That defendant proceeded to erect and finish two houses on the lot of ground at the corner of Sixteenth and Oxford streets, which houses were much superior in character, style and finish to the kind which he was bound to erect by the terms of his contract, and to the same degree increased the value of plaintiff's property in the vicinity, and that the bond had no further consideration nor significance, being no part of the consideration paid for said lot; also, that defendant subsequently built upon the lot of ground immediately west of the one referred to in the bond, eighteen dwelling houses, which have greatly added to the value of plaintiff's other lots, and much more than fulfilled the conditions of the bond. That he has further entered into a contract with a responsible builder to erect upon the lot of ground mentioned in said contract, twelve substantial three-story brick houses; that the necessary papers have been prepared, and that work upon said buildings will be commenced in a few days upon this said lot, where he had agreed to erect two houses only.

It will be observed that defendant does not swear that he has erected any dwelling houses upon the lot on which he agreed to build; nor that he has erected elsewhere, any one similar or not inferior to those he was obligated to build; but that he has erected in other locations several houses, whereby the plaintiff has been benefited as much as if he had fulfilled his contract. This, however, is a question not given to the defendant to decide. The written instrument shows the only contract between the parties. The defendant does not aver the making of any other or different one. There is no ambiguity in it. It clearly expresses what the plaintiff required, and what the defendant agreed to perform. A contract to sell and deliver a pair of horses, not more than four years old, suited to driving in carriage, is not satisfied by a tender of a pair eight years old, although in the judgment of witnesses the latter were much more valuable to the vendor.

The defendant avers that he has now entered into a contract for the erection of houses on the lot in question, yet he does not affirm that they are to be of such a description, style or value as required by the contract. There has been no fulfilment of the contract.

What then is the increase of damages? Is the sum mentioned in the bond to be deemed a penalty or liquidated damages? The authorities have not been either uniform or consistent in determining the line of separation. Great importance should be given to the meaning and intention of the parties. That intention, however, need not be deduced from the language of the written instrument alone; but the subject matter and surroundings may be considered. Hence a sum expressly stipulated as liquidated damages will be relieved against, where it is obviously to secure the payment of another sum capable of being compensated by interest. So on the other hand, a sum denominated a penalty or forfeiture will be considered liquidated damages, where it is fixed upon by the parties as the measure of the damages, because the nature of the case, the uncertainty of the proof, or the difficulty in establishing the measure of damages, have induced them to make the damages a subject of previous adjustment. Streeper v. Williams, 12 Wright, 450; Powell v. Burroughs et al., 4 P. F. Smith, 329; Pearson v. Williams' Administrators, 26 Wendell, 630. This last case is very similar to the one under consideration. Williams sold to Pearson certain lots. Pearson, by writing under seal, covenanted to erect by a day specified on some part of said lots, two brick houses, or in default thereof to pay said Williams on demand after the day specified, the sum of $4,000. It was held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the specified sum as liquidated damages.

In the bond executed by Snyder, the sum specified is not stated as a penalty, either in the obligatory part or in the condition. In the latter, it is expressly stated to be liquidated damages. The extent of the injury sustained by the plaintiff through a failure of the defendant to fulfil the contract, is very uncertain. It would be extremely difficult to prove. The amount specified is not large. It is not such a gross sum as usually indicates a penalty. Upon the other hand, it clearly indicates a sum which the parties have agreed shall fix and determine the legal liability of the defendant, irrespective of what the actual damages might be.

Holding then that the damages are fixed and liquidated, the rule is made absolute.

IN EQUITY.

JAMES D. WHETHAM v. THE PENNSYLVANIA AND NEW YORK CANAL & R. R. CO., and J. C. MILLER.

Great delay is regarded in equity as a bar to a remedy.

On bill and plea.

Opinion by AGNEW, J. Delivered March 1st, 1873.

The plea in this case is not double. It sets forth a forfeiture of the stock in question for non-payment of an assessment, not as the substantive ground of the plea, but as an absolute and distinct act of denial of the corporation of the plaintiff's right to the stock. Hence it is not set forth in such terms of legal certainty as to constitute a legal bar in and of itself, but in such as to fix a positive act, and a distinct period of time from which the delay of the plaintiff shall be counted against him. This being the only inducement, the final and declarative assertion in the plea is the lapse of time offered as an equitable bar to the plaintiff's bill.

In the case of McKelvy v. Blair, decided, at the last Pittsburgh Term, we held, that in analogy to the statute of limitations, a bill for an account filed more than six years after the dissolution of a partnership, the defendant not being a liquidating partner, and no proceeding having been taken to compel an account in the meantime, was barred by lapse of time. This had been substantially decided before in Hamilton v. Hamilton, 6 Harris, 20. That delay is regarded in equity as a bar to a remedy, is sustained by many authorities, some of which will be found collected in Rand v. Goodyear, 17 G. & R. 350. See also Ashurst's Appeal, 10 P. F. Smith, 290; Fleming v. Culbert, 10 Wright, 498.

The claim of Whetham, the plaintiff here, is purely in equity. He claims by outstanding certificates of stock transferred to him, not presented for transfer to himself, while Miller, who has the legal title to the stock standing in his name, has not asserted his title at all, and is made a co-defendant. These facts are rightfully assumed, for the plaintiff has set forth in his bill no excuse for his delay, and has not replied to the plea any ground to relieve himself of the effect of the facts set up in the plea. The question, therefore, in the bill and plea, arises solely when the naked effect of ten years' delay after forfeiture of the stock, be that forfeiture regular or irregular.

There is a class of cases bearing on this question, which shows that even where the relation of the parties is that of agent or attorney, or in a partial sense confidential, yet delay will bring the party who ought to have demanded an account or settlement within the operation of the statute of limitations. Finney v. Cochran, 1 W. & S. 112; Alexander v. Lackey, 9 Barr, 120; Lafarge v. Zane, Ibid. 410; Campbell v. Boggs, 12 Wright, 524; Pittsburgh & Conn. R. R. Co. v. Byers, 8 Casey, 22; Rhines v. Evans, 16 P. F. Smith, 192. The principle to be extracted from this class, is, that diligence is necessary to enable a party to avoid the running of the statute of limitations. Hence, though in many instances a demand may be necessary before the institution of suit, yet the want of it, when it is the party's own neglect, will not stop the running of the statute. In this case the plaintiff was in default, for though holding only a title in equity by the assignment of the certificate, he made no demand to be admitted to the privileges of a stockholder, and his claim was necessarily unknown to the corporation. It was his duty before the six years had expired to ascertain the condition of the stock, and to demand a transfer. Had he done so he would have found the forfeiture on the stock entry, and would have at once been prompted to measures to set it aside if irregular.

Having these views of the case, judgment must be given for the defendants on the plea.

C. B. ALLEN v. J. BUCHANAN, M. D.

The Legislature cannot repeal a charter granted before the amendment of the constitution of 1857.

Demurrer to narr.

Opinion by AGNEW, J. Delivered March 1st, 1873.

The charter of the Eclectic Medical College of Pennsylvania was granted by act of Assembly in 1850, before the amendment of the constitution in 1857. It contains no power of repeal. That such a charter is a contract between the State and the corporators, as to the franchises granted, is well settled. Iron City Bank v. City of Pittsburgh, 1 Wright, 340. Without a judicial proceeding to declare a forfeiture of the charter upon cause shown, there is no power to repeal it summarily. Erie & North East R. R. Co. v. Casey, 2 Casey, 301; Same v. Same, 1 Grant, 271; Com. v. Pittsburgh & Connellsville R. R. Co., 8 P. F. Smith, 46–7. The act of 22d March, 1872, is the act of but one party to the contract, without a power reserved in the contract to authorize the State to do the act, and being without the consent of the other party (the corporators), is nugatory, because of the Constitution of the U. S., art. 1, § 10, and the constitution of the State, art. 9, § 10, forbidding the passage of laws impairing the obligation contracts. The recital in the preamble of the act of 1872, that it had been ascertained by evidence produced before a committee of the Senate, that the Eclectic Medical College had been guilty of unlawful, discreditable and dangerous acts, on which the repeal was thereupon declared, does not help the case. The committee had no judicial power, and could not turn itself into a court of justice to take jurisdiction, summons and try the corporation for its alleged offences. It was but a portion of the legislative body itself, charged with a function merely auxiliary to legislation. Its judgment was no more than the judgment of the body conferring upon it the power of inquiry. The act of 1872, repealing the charter, was therefore without legislative force, and void. The corporation is entitled to a trial in due course of law, to ascertain its breach of duty, before its charter can be taken away. A franchise is a valuable privilege, and is property in the contemplation of law; and the body possessing it, is as much entitled to a judicial determination of its right, or want of right, to hold it, as a natural person is of his right to his lands or his goods. The defendant is therefore entitled to judgment upon his demurrer.

Demurrer sustained, and judgment thereupon for the defendant, that he go without day, and be paid his costs.

Recent Decisions.

MISSOURI.

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI. WHEELER v. STANDLEY.

1. When in a suit on his non-negotiable notes, the defendant alleges that the notes were a part of the purchase money for certain real estate, which was conveyed to him by an alleged attorney in fact, and that the power of attorney was a forgery, such an allegation is a good defence.

2. When there is no fraud, and a party receives a conveyance with covenants of general warranty, he cannot retain possession, and set up failure of consideration when sued for the purchase money.—1 Law News, 196.

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI. HAZEN et al. v. BARNETT.

1. Although a parol partition is good between the parties when accompanied by possession, yet the equitable title only passes, which by adverse possession may ripen into legal estate; and a party to such an agreement has a right to have the parol agreement confirmed by a decree vesting in him whatever title the other party had in the premises.—1 Law News, 197.

SUPREME COURT OF MISSOURI. MATTISON v. AUSMUSS.

1. A. was in possession of certain land under title from C., when B. entered upon it, falsely claiming that he had a tax title, while in fact he had none, and the land had been redeemed, which fact of redemption he concealed from A.

2. B. subsequently made a quiet claim deed to A. under such false representations and concealment, and took a deed of trust to secure the consideration thereof; the land was sold to B. under the deed of trust, and he sued A. for possession. Held:

3. That A. had not so admitted B.'s claim as to be estopped from denying it; first, because the claim was a fraudulent one and was not made in good faith; second, because the grantee in a deed holds adversely to the vendor, and may strengthen his title from any other source.

4. There is no estoppel where the occupant is not under an obligation, express or implied, that he will at some time or in some event surrender the possession.—1 Law News, 196.

Supreme Court of Illinois.

THE CHICAGO AND ALTON RAILROAD CO. v. THE PEOPLE.

The Legislature of Illinois, with the intention of carrying out art. xi., sec. 13, of the State constitution of 1870, passed an act regulating the charges for freight on railroads. The act provided that no greater charge should be made for the transportation of freight over any distance than was charged at the same time for freight of the same class over a less distance. It also provided that in case of unlawful violation of its provisions, the franchises of the offending corporation should be forfeited. The plaintiffs, a railroad company, having made such discrimination, proceedings upon quo warranto were commenced against them. Their defence was, that by their charter, which was a contract, they were entitled to make such discrimination and that the act was in contravention of the section of the United States Constitution prohibiting a State from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts, and was therefore invalid. The court below decided that the act was constitutional. [See opinion of the court reported in 4 LEGAL GAZETTE, 385.] Upon appeal to the Supreme Court of Illinois, this decision was reversed, the court holding:

1. It is undoubtedly clear that the Legislature has the right to pass an act for the purpose of preventing unjust discriminations in railway freights, and to enforce its observance by appropriate remedies.
2. But while the Legislature has an unquestionable power to prohibit unjust discrimination in railway freights, no prosecution can be maintained under the act in question, because it does not prohibit unjust discrimination merely, but discrimination of any character, and because it does not allow the companies to explain the reason for the discrimination, but forfeits their franchises upon an arbitrary and conclusive presumption of guilt, to be drawn from the proof of an act that might be shown to be perfectly innocent. In these particulars the act violates the spirit of the constitution.

The judgment of the Circuit Court ousting the appellant of its franchises, must therefore be reversed.

Appeal from McLean Circuit Court.

Opinion of the court by LAWRENCE, C. J. Delivered February 22d, 1873.

This record brings before us the proceedings upon an information in the nature of a quo warranto, filed by the railroad commissioners of the State against the Chicago and Alton Railroad Company, under the act which went into operation July 1st, 1871, entitled "An act to prevent unjust discriminations and extortions in the rates to be charged by the different railroads in this State for the transportation of freight on said roads."

The information set forth that the company, in violation of this act, had repeatedly charged and received for transporting lumber from Chicago to Lexington, a distance of one hundred and ten miles, the sum of $5.65 per 1,000 feet, while at the same time it had only charged for transportation of like lumber from Chicago to Bloomington, a distance of one hundred and twenty-six miles, the sum of $5 per 1,000 feet. The company by way of defence, pleaded its charter, and alleged that the rates of toll from Chicago to Lexington were in fact reasonable, while the rates from Chicago to Bloomington were unreasonably low, and were established because of the competition at the latter point with the Illinois Central Railroad Company. To this plea the relators demurred. The demurrer was sustained, a judgment of ouster was pronounced against the company, and its franchise was declared forfeited. From this judgment the company has prosecuted an appeal to this court.

The question involved in this record is the constitutionality of the act of the Legislature under which the information was filed. The object of the General Assembly in passing the law is indicated by its title, which we have already given. The substance of the first section of the act is, that no railroad corporation in this State shall charge a larger compensation for the transportation of freight over any distance than it is charging at the same time for freight of the same class over a less distance; nor shall it charge the same amount that it charges over a less distance. Another clause of the same section provides that no railroad company in this State shall charge a larger compensation for freight over any portion of its road, than is charged for freight of the same class over any other portion of equal length.

The second section of the act merely defines what is meant by the phrase "railroad corporation."

The third section makes the rates of the year 1870 the standard for freight charges. This section is not brought before us by this record.

The fourth section provides for the recovery of a penalty of $1,000 in an action of debt, together with a reasonable attorney's fee, by any person aggrieved by the violation of this act.

The fifth and last section provides that any unlawful violation of this act by any railroad corporation "shall be deemed and taken a forfeiture of its franchises" and authorizes a proceeding to that end, such as is before us in the present record.

Very elaborate arguments have been filed by counsel, but they are chiefly devoted to a discussion of the power of the Legislature to control the rate of railway charges or to fix their maximum limit. It is urged by counsel for the company, that its charter is a contract with the State, by which the latter has irrevocably granted to the corporation the right to establish its rates of toll, subject only to an implied condition, which is admitted by counsel, that they shall not be unreasonable or excessive. It is further urged that this charter, with all the privileges it granted, is protected under that clause of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits the States from enacting any law impairing the obligation of contracts. On the other hand it is contended by counsel for the relators, that railroad corporations which obtain their right of way through the exercise of the right of eminent domain—a right belonging only to the sovereign power of the State, and to be delegated by that power only for public purposes—must be regarded as quasi public corporations, and therefore subject to legislative control, so far as may be necessary for the public welfare, of which the Legislature must necessarily be the judge. It is further contended that the right to control and regulate their tolls is a species of police power, which the Legislature cannot alienate from the State, even if it should so desire, because essential to the proper sovereignty of the State.

These propositions of counsel invite us to a wide field of discussion, upon which we do not at present propose to enter. We have stated them for the purpose of saying in terms, that we express no opinion in regard to them, and do not propose to do so until a case shall come before us demanding their discussion. There are laws upon our statute book involving their consideration, but the act before us does not necessarily do so in its application to the present case, and the expression of an opinion in regard to legislation not involved in this record would be obviously improper.

Conceding, for the purposes of this appeal, all that is claimed by counsel for the appellant in regard to the inviolability of railroad charters regarded in the light of contracts, we are still of opinion that the Legislature has the clearest right to pass an act for the purpose of preventing an unjust discrimination in railway freights, whether as between individuals or communities, and to enforce its observance by appropriate penalties. The grounds of this opinion may be briefly stated, and they are as follows:

A railroad company is chartered, and is chartered solely for the purpose of exercising the functions and performing the duties of a common carrier.

The duties and liabilities of common carriers are clearly defined by the common law, and have been so defined for centuries. In all commercial countries the law upon this subject is one of the most important branches of legal science, and its leading principles were established by the courts of England at an early day. One of these principles is, that nothing excuses the carrier for the non-delivery of the goods received by him for carriage, except the act of God or the public enemy.

We do not find it written in the charters of railroad corporations in this State that they shall exercise their franchises subject to this stringent liability. Yet, nevertheless, this court has firmly held them to it, not permitting them to evade it even by a notice, or by any means short of a special contract with the shipper to which his free assent must be shown to have been given. Another perfectly well settled rule of the common law in regard to common carriers, is that they shall not exercise any unjust and injurious discrimination between individuals in their rates of toll. In the language of Chief Justice Holt, when delivering the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, in the celebrated case of Coggs v. Brenard, L. Raymond, decided in 1703, the common carrier "exercises a public employment," and it necessarily follows that he must deal with the public fairly and without unjust discrimination. This common law duty of common carriers is not prescribed in the charters of railroad corporations, but, like the other duty of delivering goods in safety, unless prevented by the act of God or the public enemy, it attaches to them, by virtue of their function as common carriers, the moment they commence the transportation of freight. In accepting their charters, which gave them an artificial existence as common carriers, they necessarily accepted them with all the duties and liabilities attached by the existing law to the function of a common carrier. This proposition seems to our mind so plain as hardly to admit of more argument than an axiom in mathematics. While the law now imposes, and always has imposed, upon individuals exercising the vocation of a common carrier, the obligation of rendering service to all persons without injustice to any, how utterly unreasonable it is to claim that a corporation is to be permitted to discriminate in its tolls, at its own discretion, and without regard to justice, merely because the Legislature, in the charter that created it for the purpose of exercising a like vocation, has authorized it to establish rates of toll, without in terms providing that they shall be free from unjust discrimination. What was the import of that grant, made as it was, in broad and general terms? Clearly nothing more than that the corporation should have the same right of establishing tolls that a natural person has when acting as a common carrier—a right to be exercised within the same limitations that the common law, in behalf of justice and public policy, imposes upon the natural man.

This case has been argued on both sides with commendable ability and candor, and we avail ourselves of an admission made by counsel for the company, to illustrate the position we are enforcing. It is conceded by counsel in express terms that "a natural person is not allowed to make unreasonable and excessive charges as a common carrier, and an artificial person is subject to the same restrictions." It is, of course, contended by counsel that the Legislature has no power to determine what charges are reasonable or unreasonable, but with that branch of the question we have in this case no concern. It is undoubtedly true, as conceded by counsel, that the artificial person has no more right than the natural person to make unreasonable and excessive charges as a common carrier. And why? This restriction is not found in railway charters as generally framed, and certainly not in the charter presented by this record in regard to which counsel are speaking. The obvious reason is the principle we have already stated. The rule forbidding unreasonable charges was a common law rule when these charters were granted, and the companies accepted their charters with this implied limitation upon the power granted, in general terms, to establish their rates of freight. If this implied condition against unreasonable rates of freight attached by the existing law to their charters at the date of their acceptance, on what ground can it be held that the corresponding condition against unjust discrimination did not equally attach? There is no ground for the distinction. The charters were granted for the purpose of furnishing improved means of transportation and travel to all persons alike, without unjust discrimination between individuals or communities, and they were accepted with the knowledge that the nature of the grant imposed that obligation.

This question of unjust discrimination is not before this court for the first time. In the case of Vincent against this same company, 49 Illinois, 33, we held that railway companies can make no injurious discrimination between individuals, and therefore could not charge one rate for delivering grain at a certain elevator in Chicago, and a higher rate for delivering at another elevator in the same city, and equally accessible upon its line.

The same rule was recognized in The People v. C. & A. R. R. Co., 55 Ill. 111, though the facts of that case were found not to require its application. The rule was declared in C. & N. W. R. R. Co. v. The People, not yet reported, but to appear in 56 Ill. The opinion in that case cites several English and American cases, in which it was held that railway companies could not be permitted to practice an injurious and arbitary discrimination between different persons, and we now refer to them without further citation.

If, then, an unjust discrimination is not to be permitted as between individuals in regard to freights, is it any more permissible as between different communities or localities?

We are wholly at loss to discover the slightest difference in reason or principle.

If a farmer living three miles from the Springfield station, upon this company's road, is charged fifteen cents per bushel for shipping his corn to Chicago, is it just that the farmer who lives twenty miles nearer Chicago should be charged a higher sum? Certainly not, unless the railway company can show a peculiar state of affairs to justify the discrimination, and this must be something more than the mere fact that there are conflicting lines at one point and not at the other. The discrimination in such a case is as much a discrimination between individuals as it would be in reference to two persons living in the same locality and shipping at the same station, unless, as before stated, a satisfactory reason can be given for discrimination between the points of shipment, and such a reason, in the case supposed, it is not very easy to conceive.

So, too, in the case before us. The resident of Bloomington who sends to Chicago for a car of lumber, is charged by the company at the rate of five dollars per thousand feet for transportation. The resident of Lexington who orders the same lumber at the same time is charged five dollars and sixty-five cents per thousand feet for a transportation sixteen miles less in distance. Is there not here, unless an explanation can be furnished by the company, an unjust discrimination between individuals, quite as much within the prohibition of the principles of the common law as would be an unjust discrimination between individuals of the same town.

We have endeavored to show on what a firm foundation rests the constitutional power of the Legislature to prohibit unjust discrimination in railway freights, even conceding what is claimed for their charters as contracts.

We should, however, be doing the counsel for the appellant an injustice, if it were to be inferred from what we have said that they distinctly assert a right on the part of the company to make unjust discriminations.

We understand them to concede in the conclusion of their argument the power of the Legislature to prohibit such discriminations, but they insist that no discrimination is unjust if the person against whom it is made is not himself charged an reasonable rate. They therefore averred in their plea to the information that the charges for freight to Lexington were in fact unreasonable, and those to Bloomington were unreasonably low. But in our opinion if the act of the Legislature had directed its penalties as it should have done, not against all discriminations, but only against unjust discriminations, and had made that the issue to be tried, it would have been no answer to aver in the plea that the larger rates for the less distance were reasonable rates. That would have had only an argumentative bearing upon the issue to be tried, to wit, the existence of an unjust discrimination between neighboring towns. What is a reasonable rate of freight over a railroad is at best a mere matter of opinion, depending on a great variety of complicated facts, which but few persons could intelligently investigate, and which it would be wholly in the power of the company to furnish or withhold. Railroad experts might be produced who would testify that in their opinion the rate to Lexington in the present case was a reasonable rate, but the fact that a less rate was charged for the greater distance to Bloomington, if the difference was a permanently established and not a casual difference, and if it could be explained only by the fact that there was a competing line at one place and not at the other, might be well accepted as conclusive proof that the rate to Lexington was not a reasonable rate.

The only issue to be made, under a law properly framed, would be whether there was an unjust discrimination or not. If on the trial of such an issue, the prosecutor proves a permanent established discrimination, like that disclosed by the present record, and the company can show no other reason for it than the existence of a competing line at the favored point, the defence must be held unsatisfactory, notwithstanding witnesses may testify that they believe, as a matter of theoretical opinion, that the rates to Lexington are reasonable. They cannot be reasonable, and the discrimination must be unjust, if the lesser rates for the greater distance have been established merely because the company have ceased to exercise at that point a practical monopoly.

It cannot be supposed that either of the competing lines would establish a permanent rate of charges upon a scale that would not furnish a remunerative profit. The rates to Bloomington would be established under the influence of a fair competition, which, by the ordinary laws that govern commerce, might be relied upon as establishing a rate not unreasonably low. At Lexington the rates would be established by the uncontrolled discretion of the company, and it should not cause surprise if they were fixed unreasonably high. If the rates are not unreasonably high at Bloomington they are unreasonably high at Lexington. If they are, and at all other points touched by competing lines, is it not certain that the company will indemnify itself by charging, at the stations where there is no competition, a rate unreasonably high? And will not a discrimination arising solely from such a cause be necessarily an unjust and injurious discrimination, as to all persons shipping or receiving freights at the non-competing stations?

If Lexington is a town where a considerable business is done, it is evident that this discrimination of rates, if permanently established, will diminish its business and check its growth. It was never intended or expected that these corporations should use their power to benefit particular individuals, or build up particular localities by arbitrary discriminations in their favor, that must cause injury to other persons or places engaged in rival pursuits or occupying rival positions. It is in vain to say in defence of such discriminations, made without just cause, that the rate of charges against the injured person or locality is a reasonable rate, and therefore no injury is done.

An injury, as a matter of fact, is committed in the manner just suggested, and the Legislature has the right to require the corporation to show a sufficient cause for the discrimination which produces the injury, and it cannot be permitted to evade the issue, by raising the legislative inquiry as to whether the rates charged against the injured parties or localities are not, after all, reasonable rates. Even if reasonable, when regarded in reference to the profit upon the capital invested in the road, they are not reasonable in the true sense of the term, if no satisfactory reason can be given for charging less rates for the same or for greater services rendered to persons doing buiness with the company at neighboring stations.

From what we have said, it will be seen that the object of the law under which these proceedings were instituted was, in our opinion, clearly within the power of the Legislature. The law was intended to prescribe the methods by which to enforce a common law duty that the railways of the State voluntarily assume whenever they exercise the functions of a common carrier, and it is in no respect a violation of their charters. It remains to be considered whether these are defects in the details of the law which need to be amended before it can be exercised. We are of opinion that there are such defects, but they are susceptible of easy amendment.

The discrimination forbidden by the common law to common carriers is an unjust or unreasonable discrimination. The provision in our new constitution is also against unjust discrimination. It is in the following words:

"The General Assembly shall pass laws to correct abuses and prevent unjust discrimination and extortion in the rates of freights and passenger tariffs on the different roads in the State, and enforce such laws by adequate penalties, to the extent, if necessary for that purpose, of forfeiture of their property and franchises." Art. xi., sec. 15.

This provision, expressly directing the Legislature to pass laws to prevent unjust discrimination, is a recognition of the palpable fact that there may be discriminations which are not unjust, and by implication it restrains the power of the Legislature to a prohibition of those which are unjust. That was undoubtedly the object of the Legislature in passing the existing law. This is clearly shown by its title. But the act itself goes further. It forbids any discrimination whatever under any circumstances, and whether just or unjust in the charges for transporting the same classes of freight over equal distances, even though moving in opposite directions, and does not permit the companies to show that the discrimination is not unjust. The mere proof of the discrimination makes out a case against the railway companies which they are not allowed to meet by evidence showing the reason or propriety of the discrimination, and then, upon this sort of ex parte trial, imposes, as a penalty for the offence, a forfeiture of the franchise, which would often be equivalent to a fine of millions of dollars. The object of the law is commendable, but such a proceeding to be followed by such a penalty for the first offence can not be sustained.

It could only have been authorized through the inadvertence of the Legislature. The law, as it now stands, makes an offence out of an act which might be shown not to be an offence, but an exercise of a wise discretion, really beneficial to the people of the State, and while debarring the companies from all right of explanation, confiscates their franchises upon the first conviction. The Legislature cannot raise a conclusive presumption of guilt against a natural person for an act that may be innocent in itself, taking from him the privilege of showing the actual innocence or propriety of the act, and confiscating his property as a penalty for the supposed offence. Those provisions of our constitution which forbid the deprivation of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law, and which guarantee the right of trial by jury as heretofore enjoyed, and the right in all criminal prosecutions to appear and defend in person or by counsel, would all be violated by such a law. These provisions, it is true, are designed to apply only to natural persons, but artificial persons must be permitted to invoke the spirit of justice which prompted them, so far as may be neccessary to protect their property and franchises against the operation of a law that substantially condemns without a trial.

That the naked fact that a railway company charges a larger sum for transporting freight of the same class over a given distance than it is charging for the same distance over another part of its road, or in the opposite direction, is not of itself conclusive evidence of an unjust discrimination, will be manifest on a moment's consideration. Take, for instance, the road of the appellant, with one terminus at Chicago and the other at East St. Louis. At one season of the year more freights are moving from Chicago towards East St. Louis than in the opposite direction.

The consequence, of course, is that the supply of empty cars at the latter point will be in excess of the demand. There is a water route between those points which also touches several intermediate stations upon the road. Now, unless the railway company is permitted under such circumstances to induce shipments over its line by lowering its freights, it is evident that a portion of its cars will return empty. This would, of course, necessitate a higher charge for freight moving towards St. Louis than it would be necessary to impose if return freights could be secured by lowering the rates on the return trip. To forbid the company to lower the rates of return freight would thus benefit no one, and would work an injury both to the company and the people along the line. At other seasons of the year the larger amount of freights is moving in the opposite direction, and then the operation must be reversed.

We give this illustration for the purpose of showing that a difference of price for the same distance of transportation is not necessarily an unjust discrimination, and that any law must be fatally defective which infers guilt as a conclusive presumption, from the mere fact of difference of rates, without permitting the companies to show why the different rates were adopted.

We may so far take judicial notice of the course of public affairs in this State, as to say that the real abuse which the Legislature was understood by this act to prevent was not such proper discriminations as those we have just been supposing, but the practice which had become general among the railways of charging a higher compensation for carrying the agricultural products of the State to market, when shipped at a station where there was no competing line, than when shipped where there was such competition, although the distance over which the freight was carried in the latter case might greatly exceed the distance in the former. The same system also prevailed in regard to the freight from Chicago to points in the interior, although probably not felt to be so great an evil. For discriminations of this character, when adopted as a system, we can certainly perceive neither justification nor excuse; but, nevertheless, it is the right of a company, when prosecuted on the ground of unjust discrimination, to offer what evidence it can by way of explanation.

It might, for example, show in the present case, that the lumber shipped to Lexington had caused a greater expense in loading or unloading than to Bloomington. This may not be a very probable defence, but defences may, nevertheless, exist, and if they do the companies should not be deprived of the right to make them.

Before this act can be enforced, it should be so amended as to correspond with the requirement of the constitution, by directing its prohibitions against unjust discriminations. It should make the charging of a greater compensation for a less distance or for the same distance, merely prima facie evidence of unjust discrimination, instead of conclusive evidence as it now is, and it should give to the railway companies the right of trial by jury, not only on the fact of discrimination, but upon the issue whether such discrimination is just or not.

There is another feature in this law to which we deem it our duty to advert. As the act now stands, a forfeiture of all franchises is the only penalty that can be imposed upon a company, in a prosecution instituted on behalf of the people, and it is imposed for the same offence. This, as already remarked, in some cases would amount to a fine of millions of dollars. Is not this a violation of the spirit of that constitutional provision which says, in terms, that "all penalties shall be proportioned to the nature of the offence?"

Is it not also a violation of the spirit of the very clause of the constitution under which this act was framed, and which requires the Legislature to pass laws to prevent unjust discrimination and extortion by railroad corporations, "and enforce such laws by adequate penalties, to the extent, if necessary for that purpose, of forfeiture of their property and franchises?" Would it not be better to enforce the law by a series of considerable and increasing fines, before imposing the final penalty of forfeiture? A law admitting of but one penalty, and that of the harshest possible character, will necessarily be subjected by the courts to close criticism and a strict construction.

The English Parliament passed a law in 1854, prohibiting the giving of undue or unreasonable preferences or advantages by railway companies in the management of their business. Under this act various cases have arisen in the English courts which have been cited by counsel. It is unnecessary to comment upon them. They hold, as we do, that a discrimination is not necessarily an unjust discrimination. That is to be determined upon the evidence.

The opinion of the court is, that while the Legislature has an unquestionable power to prohibit unjust discrimination in railway freights, no prosecution can be maintained under the existing act until amended, because it does not prohibit unjust discrimination merely, but discrimination of any character, and because it does not allow the companies to explain the reason for the discrimination, but forfeits their franchises upon an arbitrary and conclusive presumption of guilt, to be drawn from the proof of an act that might be shown to be perfectly innocent. In these particulars the existing act violates the spirit of the constitution.

The judgment of the Circuit Court, ousting the appellant of its franchises, must therefore be reversed.

LEGAL GAZETTE.

Friday, March 14, 1873.

JOHN H. CAMPBELL, EDITOR.

THEODORE F. JENKINS, ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

Quite a number of judges and lawyers from the interior of the State have visited this city during this week and last, principally to attend the sitting of the Supreme Court in banc. The Constitutional Convention seems to be a central point of interest to them. Judges Hall, of the Bedford district; Harding and Dana, of the Luzerne district; Butler, of the Chester district; Ross, of the Montgomery district; Pearson, of the Dauphin district; Walker, of the Schuylkill district; and Bucher, of the Union district, having severally made their appearance at the sessions of that body. Among the lawyers who have "come to court" during the period above mentioned, we have noticed quite a number of familiar faces; among them, Geo. B. Kulp, the editor of our excellent little contemporary, the Luzerne Legal Register, and Messrs. Campbell and Smith, of the Luzerne county bar.

Notwithstanding the fact, that three courts for jury trials are held by the judges of the District Court of Philadelphia, business is still very much behindhand. We understand that there are over SIX HUNDRED CASES ordered for trial prior to the September Term, that have not yet been tried, and as on an average, there are not more than twenty or twenty-five cases tried in each court in a week, or from sixty to seventy-five in all, there seems to be no earthly prospect of ever catching up. The constitution of the State contains a provision, that "all courts shall be open, and every man for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person or reputation, shall have remedy by the due course of law, and right and justice administered without sale, denial or DELAY." Now, if the judges find it physically impossible to try all the cases that are commenced in the District Court, and lawyers and suitors, and witnesses are compelled to lose valuable time, waiting for cases to be reached or tried, and dancing attendance in court when their cases are expected to be reached, there should be some remedy provided, so that the constitutional provision above quoted should not be a mockery We hope the Constitutional Convention will take the matter in hand.

The Pacific Law Reporter, in noticing the appearance of the Legal Chronicle, of Pottsville, says that "Pennsylvania seems to be the mother for all law papers. Nearly as many are now published there as in all the other States combined."

The Constitutional Convention has been doing some work this week and last. The reports of the committees on suffrage and elections, the legislature, the executive, education, and legislation, have been almost disposed of on first reading, and we may reasonably hope that the second and third readings of these reports will not consume much time. The Convention takes a recess from the 28th instant,' to April 8th.

Error to the District Court for the city and county of Philadelphia.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Deilvered March 6th, 1873.

The only question which appears to have been raised on the trial of this case in the court below was, whether the power of sale which by the deed of trust of February 28th, 1832, John Zane and wife to William L. Hirst, was vested in the trustee, was duly exercised by the conveyance of January 30th, 1841, by William L. Hirst and Maria Antoinette Zane to Anthony M. Zane. It may be conceded, that if the evidence offered—the rejection of which forms the fourth error assigned—had been admitted, it would have proved that the deed was without consideration as between the parties, and was executed solely in order that the grantor, Anthony M. Zane, might mortgage the property to Isaac M. Zane, as was done accordingly, February 1st, 1841; which mortgage was to be, and was assigned to Kennedy and others, as collateral security for certain notes of Isaac M. Zane, given to the assignee for goods purchased by him. The object of the whole transaction being to set Isaac M. Zane up in business. Isaac M. Zane was a son of Maria Antoinette Zane, who was the cestui que trust in the deed of trust of February 28th, 1832, and who was a party to the deed to Anthony M. Zane. The power contained in the deed of 1832, is in these words: 'And upon the further special trust and confidence that the said William L. Hirst, his heirs, executors, successors, and assigns, shall be, and he and they are hereby, and by force and virtue of these presents, authorized and fully empowered to sell and convey, by all lawful assurances and conveyances, all or such parts of the said hereby granted estate, as the said Maria Antoinette shall, by writing under her hand, from time to time request and require, and for and as respects the purchase money thereof, upon the special trust and confidence, that in the said William L. Hirst, his heirs, executors, successors, and assigns, shall and will pay the same to the said Maria Antoinette, and her receipt for the same shall be his full voucher and protection for so doing, notwithstanding her present or any future coverture." The question then is, whether the trustee, at the request, and with the consent in writing of the cestui que trust, had power to mortgage the premises. It is perfectly clear that if he had, Mrs. Zane was entire mistress of the money raised by the mortgage, and could give it to her son, Isaac M. Zane, if she so pleased. In a case in which a married woman had power to mortgage for her separate use and disposal, it was held by this court that she could execute the power for the benefit of her husband. Hoover v. The Samaritan Beneficial Society, 3 Whart. 445. The whole case, then, is resolved into the question whether in this State an absolute and unrestricted power to sell includes a power to mortgage. We cannot regard this as an open question. It was expressly decided in Lancaster v. Dolan, 1 Rawle, 231, that a power to sell does include a power to mortgage, which is a conditional sale. It was not a mere obiter dictum, but the very point upon which the judgment hinged as to the remainder of the estate, over which there was a general power of appointment. It has since been recognized as the settled law in several cases. Presbyterian Corporation v. Wallace, 3 Rawle, 130; Gordon v. Preston, 1 Watts, 386; Duval's Appeal, 2 Wright, 118; Pennsylvania Life Insurance Co. v. Austin, 6 Wright, 263. It is of no consequence whether the case of Mills v. Banks, 3 P. Williams, 9, cited in support of the ruling in Lancaster v. Dolan, has or has not been subsequently disapproved of in England. We are bound to adhere to a determination of this court settling a rule of property, and which has been so often recognized and arffimed. There would be no security for titles, nor could counsel advise with confidence if we were ready to listen to suggestions for the re-consideration of points solemnly determined by our predecessors whenever the courts of some other State or country have adopted a different rule.

There are two other objections to the judgment which were not made below, nor are they contained in the printed paper book of the plaintiff in error; but we will, nevertheless, briefly dispose of them. The first is, that as there was evidence that the promissory notes of Isaac M. Zane, to secure which the mortgage was intended, had been extended without the consent of Mrs. Zane, who was known to all parties to be the real mortgagor, and should, therefore, to the extent of the mortgaged premises, be viewed as a surety, the mortgage was discharged by such extension. There was no evidence to submit to the jury, upon which such a defence could be based. A witness for the plaintiff, indeed, testified that in a general conversation with Mr. Julian, one of the assignees of the mortgage, he said, "that they had done all they could for Isaac; that they had extended the notes for which the assignment of the mortgage was made as collateral, several times;" but on cross-examination he added: "Nothing was said about any consideration having been given by Isaac for the extension of the notes; does not know that there was any consideration, or that the old notes were given up." A mere agreement to extend the time without consideration, and without a surrender of the old notes, and the taking of new ones, would not be binding on the creditor, and would not prevent the surety from paying the debt and immediately seeking reimbursement from his principal, which is the reason of the rule that when time is given by a binding agreement, the surety is discharged. The United States v. Simpson, 3 P. R. 437; Clippinger v. Corps, 2 Watts, 45; Rhoads v. Frederick, 8 Watts, 448; Miller v. Stem, 2 Barr, 286; 2 Jones, 383; Brubaker v. Okeson, 12 Casey, 519. There is nothing, therefore, in this objection.

The other ground upon which a reversal of the judgment is asked, is, that the execution of the power was subject to the prior charge of the debts of John Zane, specially secured by the deed of trust. But there are several conclusive answers to this. These debts were charged upon and made payable only out of John Zane's interest in the property, which was for his life, probably his estate by the curtesy, and that interest had expired at the time of the trial. Moreover, more than twenty years had elapsed since the execution of the deed of trust, and the presumption was that the debts were paid. Besides all this, the claims of these creditors could only be set up by themselves, or the trustees suing for their use. The plaintiff below was not the holder of the legal title, nor a trustee for them, but a cestui que trust, under the deed of trust, prosecuting this ejectment to recover the equitable estate, if it had not been legally diverted by the mortgage, and the proceedings upon it, by which, however, both the legal and equitable title were vested in James M. Kennedy, the purchaser at sheriff's sale, a title which the plaintiff had herself solemnly confirmed, by joining the new trustee, Thomas D. Smith, in the deed dated May 7th, 1844.

Judgment affirmed.

APPEAL OF JOHN S. HAINES.

1. An act of Assembly cannot vest in a tribunal like a court of chancery, acting without a jury, the power to determine upon the legal right of parties, unless their exists some equitable ground of relief.
2. The act of April 28th, 1868, relating to the extinguishment of ground rents, is unconstitutional.

Appeal from an order of the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered March 6th, 1873.

The only ground upon which the constitutionality of the act of April 28th, 1868, Pamphlet Laws, 1147, can be supported under the decisions of this court in North Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Snowden, 6 Wright, 488; Norris' Appeal, 14 P. F. Smith, 275, and Tillmes v Marsh, 17 Ibid. 507, is that it is a proceeding within the jurisdiction of a court of equity. It must certainly be considered as settled by those cases, that an act of Assembly cannot vest in a tribunal like a court of chancery, acting without a jury, the power to determine upon the legal rights of parties, unless there exists some equitable ground of relief. We may look in vain for any principle or authority to sustain a bill praying for a decree under the facts and circumstances, as disclosed in the petition filed in the court below. As to the power which has been principally relied on, to order deeds or instruments to be delivered up and cancelled, there is always some ground of equity upon which the chancellor has interposed, besides the mere fact that the instrument cannot be enforced at law. There must be some danger of future litigation, when the facts will be no longer capable of complete proof, or have become involved in the obscurities of time. 2 Story's Eq. Jur., s. 705. This is the reason upon which a bill quia timet may be sustained. No case has been produced, and we think none can be, which goes the length which must be maintained here, that wherever there is an outstanding claim or incumbrance upon an estate which is barred by reason of lapse of time, and therefore cannot be enforced at law, but which nevertheless, is a cloud upon the title, and prevents it from being marketable, the possessor can invoke the aid of a court of equity to remove the cloud, and forever bar such claim or incumbrance by a perpetual injunction. If this could be done, there is not an ejectment in the common law courts which by an inversion of parties could not be brought into a court of equity, and the question finally determined by one decree without a jury, instead of two verdicts and judgments. No doubt it is highly important to the parties, and, indeed, of public interest, that some mode should exist by law by which all such clouds may be removed, and that valuable estates be brought into the market. We are very far from holding that the Legislature cannot do this. But then trial by jury must be "as heretofore, and the right thereof remain inviolate." By the thirty-third section of the act of June 16th, 1836, Pamphlet Laws, 701, entitled "An act relating to the lien of mechanics and others upon buildings;" whenever a mechanic's claim is filed against a building, it is made lawful for the owner, or any person interested, to call the claimant into court, which is thereupon authorized to proceed in like manner, as if a scire facias had been issued, and duly served and returned. No one has ever thought of questioning the constitutionality of that section, which has been frequently acted upon and found very beneficial. Had there been a provision in the act of 1868, giving the respondent the right to demand an issue, as by the eighty-seventh section of the act of June 16th, 1836, Pamphlet Laws, 777, in questions arising upon the distribution of the proceeds of sheriff's sales, all objections to the act on this score would have been obviated. The learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court below, appears to have thought that because "there is nothing in the law which would prevent the court from sending every such case as this by a general rule to a jury," it may therefore "very well be questioned whether this act does in fact absolutely deprive the parties of a jury trial." But as such a general rule or the award of an issue in any particular case, would be entirely in the discretion of the court, it is clear that the parties have not secured to them, their constitutional right of trial by jury. They would in effect hold it at the mere pleasure of the court.

The contention which has the most plausibility, is that upon the evidence in this case there was no question of fact for the decision of a jury, and that assuming all the facts to be true, the court before whom the trial might be had, would be bound to instruct the jury that the ground rents in question must be presumed in law to be extinguished. Conceding this to be so, there is a fallacy which lurks in this argument. The respondent in his answer demurred to the jurisdiction of the court, and if in law he was right, he could not be affected by any failure in the evidence, which he was not at all bound to produce. No party can be concluded by the decision of a court which has no jurisdiction to decide the controversy. We cannot strike from the act the words "on due proof being made of the truth of the said petition," and insert other words which would confine the jurisdiction to the case, where no evidence should be produced which would save the act from its unconstitutional operation. That would be judicial legislation. We assume in this judgment that the evidence brought the case in law entirely within the purview of the act of 1855. Upon that, however, we give no opinion.

Order reversed at the costs of the appellee.

COLLINS v. THE SOCIETY FOR THE RELIEF OF DISTRESSED AND DECAYED PILOTS, &c.

The act of March 24th, 1851, relating to pilotage is constitutional. The discrimination therein made between different vessels, is a valid exercise of legislative discretion.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered March 6th, 1873.

Three contentions have been made in this case, which it will be necessary to consider, but they can be disposed of briefly.

The first is that the plaintiffs below were not entitled, upon the true construction of the sixth section of the act of March 24th, 1851, Pamph. L. 229, to recover the penalty of full pilotage demanded in their declaration. The established canon of interpretation, that penal statutes must receive a strict construction, has been invoked in support of the argument. It is not pretended, however, that the penalty was not incurred, applying to the act the most rigid rule. "If such vessel be not licensed as aforesaid, then and in such case the master, owner, or consignee thereof, shall forfeit and pay the full pilotage thereof." The subsequent clause appropriating the amount of the penalty to the pilot society is no part of the penal provision, and is to be construed fairly and reasonably to ascertain the intention of the lawmakers just like any other statute. It mattered not to the offender—formed no part of what it was necessary for him to read and understand, in order to avoid the infraction of the law—to whom the Legislature might choose to give it. We have no doubt whatever, that all the forfeiture accruing by virtue of the act, including the full pilotage in question, were intended to be granted to the plaintiffs below.

The second position of the plaintiffs in error is that this grant is contrary to the constitution of this commonwealth, and for this he relies upon the case of the Philadelphia Association v. Wood, 3 Wright, 73. But the principle of that decision is entirely inapplicable here. It was there held that a tax upon a class of persons, such as two per cent. of their gross receipt, upon all agencies of foreign insurance companies in the city of Philadelphia, could not be appropriated by law before it reached the treasury of the State, to a coporation or an individual. But this penalty is in no sense a tax, and has no similitude to one. To say that the Legislature could not appropriate it as they pleased, to the person grieved, the pilot whose services were refused, to an informer or to a charity, would be to contradict the uniform legislation of the State. The statute book is filled with such grants of penalties—one great object of it undoubtedly being to secure better the enforcement of the law, by making it the interest of private persons or corporations to prosecute offenders.

The third contention is that the act inasmuch as it imposes full pilotage upon registered vessels which are mostly engaged in foreign commerce, and only half pilotage upon licensed or coasting vessels, is an infringement of section x. par. 2 of art. 1 of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts, or duties on imports or exports what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws."

There might be devised, no doubt, a system of pilotage fees, and penalties which would be obviously intended to evade this inhibition, and would, therefore, be invalid, but that can no more be said of the act of 1851 than it could of the act of March 29th, 1803. Pamph. L. 560. It is decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in Cooley v. The Board of Wardens, 12 Howard 299, in affirming the constitutionality of the act of 1803, that the States have power to pass pilotage laws, to license pilots to regulate their compensation, and to enforce their laws by appropriate penalties. They may discriminate between the different kinds of vessels, according to their size and character, requiring heavier fees and putting severer penalties upon some than others. If the fees are not an impost or duty, certainly the penalty is not. It is a substitute for the fees which ought to have been paid. In the case of small vessels there is less at risk, and they can be more easily navigated by an ordinary seaman. But it matters not what the reason for the discrimination was, it was in the discretion of the Legislature. "The purpose of the law," said Mr. Justice Curtis in delivering the opinion of the court in the case cited, "being to cause masters of such vessels as generally need a pilot, to employ one, and to secure to the pilot a fair remuneration for cruising in search of vessels or waiting for employment in port, there is an obvious propriety in having reference to the number, size and nature of employment of vessels frequenting the port; and it will be found by an examination of the different systems of these regulations which have from time to time been made in this and other countries, that the legislative discretion has been constantly exercised in making discriminations, founded on differences both in the character of the trade and the tonnage of vessels engaged therein."

Judgment affirmed.

ASSIGNED ESTATE OF TRUITT, BROS. & CO.

1. An accountant who by mistake or fraud omits to charge himself with money actually received by him, may be surcharged therewith in a subsequent account.
2. In an assigned estate the inventory is prima facie evidence of liability.
3. A letter press book is evidence against the owner thereof.
4. A party to the record is not admissible as a witness to prove the handwriting of a decedent whose estate is sought to be charged thereby.

STATEMENT OF CASE.

1. Charles Boggs, now deceased, was the assignee of Truitt, Brothers & Co. The assignment was made September 20th, 1861.

2. The first account was filed December 13th, 1862, was duly audited and confirmed absolutely, June 27th, 1863 On November 21st, 1868, Charles Boggs, the assignee, died, whereupon Davis Boggs, his brother, took out letters of administration.

3. On December 5th, 1868, on behalf of a creditor of Truitt, Brothers & Co., a petition was presented for the appointment of an assignee in the place and stead of said Charles Boggs, deceased; whereupon the court appointed Joseph H. Dunn, who, on the 23d of January, 1869, was awarded a citation against Davis Boggs, the administrator of the late assignee, to show cause why he should not file the accounts of the said Charles Boggs, as assignee.

Davis Boggs, the administrator, filed his answer to the petition and citation of the present assignee, setting forth his inability to file such account, for lack of materials so to do, and his want of knowledge as to the condition of the assigned estate.

Upon his showing, the court appointed an auditor to state a second account. The auditor by his report charged the estate of Charles Boggs, deceased, when exceptions to his report were filed on the part of the administrator of the said decedent, and of the new assignee.

Opinion by PAXSON, J. Delivered March 8th, 1873.

This case bristles "with exceptions." Thirteen have been filed on behalf of Joseph B. Dunn, the present assignee, and fifteen on behalf of the administrator of Charles Boggs, deceased, the former assignee. A considerable number of said exceptions relate to alleged errors of the auditor upon the facts. As the evidence has not been brought up, we have no means of correcting his rulings thereon, if erroneous. This disposes of the 1st, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th exceptions, filed by Mr. Dunn, and of the 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th and 15th exceptions, filed by the administrator of Charles Boggs. In disposing of the remaining exceptions, we will take up first those filed on behalf of Joseph B. Dunn, the present assignee.

The second of said exceptions alleges error in ruling out certain items, because they were received by Mr. Boggs prior to the filing of his first account, although not included therein.

The assignment is dated September 20th, 1861, and the first account was filed December 13th, 1862. Charles Boggs, the assignee, died on November 21st, 1868.

The auditor reports that in his opinion the investigation is limited to transactions between the filing of the first account and the death of the assignee. His reason for this conclusion is, that the terms of the reference do not extend beyond the time referred to. The present assignee presented his petition to the Court of Common Pleas, praying for a citation against the administrator of the former assignee, to show cause why an account should not be filed. The petition sets forth that the petitioner "has reason to believe and avers, that assets of the said estate to a large amount came to the hands of the said Charles Boggs, after the filing of his said account, of which no account whatever has been rendered." To this petition and the citation issued thereon, the administrator filed an answer, setting forth his inability to file such account, for lack of material so to do, and his want of knowledge as to the condition of the assigned estate. Whereupon, an auditor was appointed by the court to state a second account.

I do not think the averment in the petition that assets came into the hands of the first assignee after the filing of said first account, of itself limits the auditor to such items. The order to him is to state an account; the statement referred to in the petition is merely the reason why such account should be stated. In so stating it, everything not previously accounted for should be included.

It was alleged, however, by the learned counsel for the administrator of the first assignee, that as to all matters which were or might have been passed upon by the auditor in the first account, the confirmation of his report is conclusive as to all the world. Moore's Appeal, 10 Barr, 435; Groff's Appeal, 9 Wr. 379; Taylor v. Cornelius, 10 P. F. S. 187; Weber v. Samuels, 7 Barr, 526, and Rhoad's Appeal, 3 Wr. 386, were cited in support of this view. All of these cases refer to matters which were either embraced in the prior account, or were known to parties, and might have been the subject of surcharge in said prior account. None of them reach the case of an accountant who has received divers sums of money, which he has altogether omitted from his account, and of which the auditor has no knowledge. This amounts to fraud. I am not aware that it has ever been held that an accountant, who by either fraud or mistake, omits to charge himself in his account with money actually received by him, may not be surcharged therewith in a subsequent account. To do so would open a wide door to fraud. This exception is sustained.

I think the 11th exception is well taken. The auditor does not give us any reason for declining to charge the former assignee with interest on balances in his hands. This assignee utterly neglected his duties for years; kept no accounts of the estate; wasted the assets in debauchery, leaving his successor in the trust, the creditors, and his unfortunate securities in the dark as to the condition of the estate. This question was fully discussed in Brown's Estate, 8 Phila. R. 197. The auditor would do well to adopt the rule pursued in that case, in allowing a proper balance for contingencies, and a reasonable time for investment.

The 12th and 13th exceptions are also sustained to the extent of charging the said Charles Boggs with the amount of the inventory filed, less the amount accounted for in the prior account. The inventory is prima facie evidence of liabilty. It is for the accountant to discharge himself therefrom. This he may do by showing items already accounted for, or which could not be collected. The auditor has not formally charged the assignee with the inventory. In fact, he has not stated an account at all in the proper sense of the term. These errors of form can be corrected in a supplemental report.

It remains to dispose of the exceptions filed by the administrator of Charles Boggs.

I see no error in admitting in evidence the letter-book containing press copies of letters from Charles Boggs to the creditors. It was the assignee's own book, and was evidence against him. Foot v. Bentley, 44 N. Y. R. 166, does not apply. This disposes of the first exception. The second is dismissed for the reason that this case is not within the bar of the statute, or of any analogy thereto. The 3d and 4th exceptions are virtually disposed of by what has already been said in another part of this opinion. The 5th exception is novel. It is alleged that the auditor should not have surcharged Chas. Boggs with any items for the three years next preceding his death, because of his continued intoxication during that period. This exception is dismissed. Nor do I see the force of the 6th exception. The question as to the endorsement of Charles Boggs, is not one of reasonable doubt, but of the weight of the evidence. I cannot say the auditor was wrong. The 7th, 8th and 9th exceptions all refer to one question, viz.: the admission of the evidence of Charles B. Truitt, Samuel L. Kreutzborg, Joseph H. Dunn and Thomas D. Watson. It was objected that these witnesses were all incompetent by reason of interest, and that they are not admissible under the statute, because their testimony relates to matters prior to the death of Charles Boggs. Of these witnesses, the first and second were the assignors; the third is the present assignee. Each of these is a party to the record, and for that reason incompetent to testify as to any facts occurring prior to the death of Charles Boggs. It is alleged, however, that Dunn was only called to prove the handwriting of Mr. Boggs. But the very writing which Dunn was called to prove, was made or executed prior to the death of Mr. Boggs. The latter is not here to speak in regard to it. We think this case comes within the prohibition of the act of Assembly. But no such objection applies to Thomas D. Watson; he is not a party, nor has he any interest. His testimony therefore, was properly received. The three exceptions last named are sustained to the extent of excluding the evidence of Truitt, Kreutzborg and Dunn, and all of the items referred to, so far as they depend exclusively upon their testimony.

The 7th, 8th and 9th exceptions, filed by the administrator of Charles Boggs, are sustained. The balance of his exceptions are dismissed.

The 2d, 11th, 12th and 13th exceptions, filed by Joseph B. Dunn, are sustained. The balance of his exceptions are dismissed. The report is referred back to the auditor, with directions to amend the same in accordance with this opinion.

In re CHARTER OF THE REV. DAVID MULHOLLAND BENEVOLENT SOCIETY OF MANAYUNK.

Opinion by PAXSON, J. Delivered March 8th, 1873.

We commend the object of this association, but we cannot give the charter our approval for two reasons, viz.:

1st. The membership is not restricted to citizens of this commonwealth, and

2d. It is provided by article 11th, that any member "enlisting in the regular army or navy shall thereby forfeit his membership, and all claims on the society."

We will not approve a charter with such a clause as this. It is against public policy. A corporation which is a creature of the law ought not to prescribe its members for aiding the government which creates and protects it.

THIRTIETH JUDICIAL DISTRICT.
Court of Common Pleas.

In re PETITION of F. H. GIBBS et al.

Under the act of 1857, referring to the granting of charters of incorporation by the Court of Common Pleas, there must be actual subscriptions for stock on which payments have been made before a charter will be granted.

In re petition of F. H. Gibbs et al. to be incorporated as a gas company.

Opinion of the court by LOWRIE, P. J. Delivered March 4th, 1873.

This is a petition of seven persons to be incorporated as a gas company in Titusville, and the conditions and articles of the constitution proposed by them are that their place of business shall be Titusville, the stock shall be $100,000 in shares of $50, and the company shall be subject to the act of 1857, relating to gas and water companies. The application is made under the act of 27th February, 1872, P. L., p. 20, which, with the utmost brevity of words and latitude of meaning, gives the court power to grant charters of incorporation to gas companies, which when so incorporated shall be subject to the act of 1857, already referred to.

But that act always contemplates an association of men already formed, who have subscribed for a specified amount of stock, by contract of each one for so many shares, and that some part thereof is paid down. In the nature of things there must be an association before there can be an incorporation, and in this class of cases there must be stockholders, by each taking a given amount of stock, before the court can incorporate them. In this case no stock is subscribed for, and therefore there are no persons whom we can incorporate as members of a corporation. Such a charter would be mere waste paper, and our record would give no information relative to the persons who would constitute themselves a corporation under it, if it should be granted.

It seems to us that this proposed form of exercising our authority in such cases is not a proper one. The act of 1872 seems to give the court all the power now exercised by the Legislature and the governor in such cases. If this be so, the court ought to judge of the expediency of granting such a charter, so as at least to see that several corporations shall not come into undue collision on the same territory. And it ought to regard the spirit of the act of 1857, by seeing that every person desiring to become a stockholder shall have an opportunity to subscribe for stock, and that the proper amount has been fairly subscribed and a proper proportion paid.

On this petition we can hardly say more than this. But we may suggest that, if a petition be presented asking the court to appoint commissioners to receive subscriptions of stock for this company, every proper question can be considered.

This petition is rejected.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

1. A removal of distilled spirits from the place where distilled to a bonded warehouse of the United States, if made with intent to defraud the United States of the tax due on the spirits, is illegal, and, though the intent was never executed, the spirits removed are subject to forfeiture. Removal to even such a place may be part of a scheme to defraud the government of its duties. Henderson's Distilled Spirits, 44.

2. The 5th section of the act of July 14th, 1870, by which the power of collectors of internal revenue to post-stamp certain instruments of writing and remit penalties for the non-stamping of them when issued, is extended in point of time, applies to notes issued before the passage of the act as well as to notes issued subsequently. Pugh v. McCormick, 61.

3. On a distiller's bond, given under the 2d section of the internal revenue act of July 20th, 1868, conditioned that the obligors "shall in all respects comply with all the provisions of law in relation to the duties and business of distillers," the condition is prospective as well as present, and embraces such provisions of law relating to the duties and business of distillers as may be in force during the term for which the bond is given, whether enacted before or after its execution. United States v. Powell, 493.

4. The "distillery warehouses" which distillers are required by the 15th section of the same act to provide, situated on their distillery premises, are "bonded warehouses," within the meaning of the joint resolution of Congress of March 29th, 1869, which declares that the proprietors of all "internal revenue bonded warehouses" shall reimburse to the United States the expenses and salary of all storekeepers put by it in charge of them. Ib.

5. These expenses properly include per diem wages paid to storekeepers for taking charge of them on Sundays. Ib.

JUDICIAL NOTICE.

(a) It has jurisdiction—

1. Of appeals from the highest State courts, under the 25th section of the judiciary act, only in a limited number of cases, and this court in a pointed way, calls the attention of the bar of the court generally to the fact that much expense would be saved to suitors, if before they advised them to appeal from decisions of these courts to this one, they would see that the case was one of which this court had cognizance under the section. Hurley v. Street, 85.

2. Of a judgment of a State court holding void a contract of which the consideration was the notes of the Confederate States in ordinary use as money during the rebellion, when the judgment holding the contract void was based on a constitutional or legislative enactment passed after the contract was made, and not on general grounds of public policy. Delmas v. Insurance Company, 661.

3. (Other things allowing) of a writ by one defendant, on a judgment against three, the defendant who prosecutes the writ having given notice to his co-defendants of his intention to prosecute it, and there, being a refusal by them to co-operate. O'Dowd v. Russell, 402.

4. As of a "final" judgment, of a judgment in a court of last resort, that a judgment against A. (who had been sued for not faithfully discharging the duties of a vendue-master of a city and been held discharged under the bankrupt act) be reversed. As also as of the same final nature, of a judgment in a court of last resort, that a judgment in an inferior court, holding B. and C. (the sureties of A. on his bond as vendue-master) liable, be affirmed. Ib.

5. Of appeals from proceedings in bankruptcy from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in certain cases. Smith v. Mason, Assignee, 419.

(b) It has not jurisdiction—

6. Under the 25th section of the judiciary act, unless it can be seen from the record that a State court decided the question relied on to give this court jurisdiction. Cockroft v. Vose, 5.

7. Nor under that section, when the decision of the State court is made on precedents of general jurisprudence of this court, or on one of its own similar pre-existent rules; notwithstanding (in the latter case) that the State have subsequently made the rule one of the articles of its constitution. Caperton v. Bowyer, 216; Tennessee Bank v. Bank of Louisiana, 9; Palmer v. Marston, 10; Sevier v. Haskell, 13.

8. Nor under that section, if the judgment of the State court may have been given on grounds which the section does not make cause for error, as well as upon some ground which it does so make. Steines v. Franklin County, 15; Kennebec Railroad v. Portland Railroad, 23.

9. Nor under that section, when nothing appears in the record to show on what grounds the decision of the matter in which the Federal question is alleged to be involved was made. Caperton v. Bowyer, 216.

10. Nor under that section, of necessity, and in the presence of disproof in the record, merely because a certificate of the presiding justice of the highest court of a State may certify that there was drawn in question the validity of an act of the State, on the ground that it was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and that the decision was in favor of its validity. Ib.

11. Nor under that section, unless the record shows that more than one Federal question was decided when the certificate certifying that a certain one which it mentions was, is silent as to any other, and when this court considers that the certificate in what it does mention is disproved by the record, and when, moreover, the case may have been well decided on grounds not Federal. Ib.

12. Nor under that section when the writ is taken on the ground that the provision of the Constitution which ordains that "full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State," has been violated by a refusal of the highest State court to give proper effect to a judicial record of another State, unless it appear that the record have been authenticated in the mode prescribed by the act of May 26th, 1790, "to prescribe the mode in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings in each State shall be authenticated, so as to take effect in every other State." Caperton v. Ballard, 238.

13. Nor where the decision of the State court consists only in granting or refusing to grant a motion for a rehearing in an equity suit. Steines v. Franklin County, 15.

14. Nor (when the State court is composed of a chief justice and associates) unless the writ be allowed by the chief justice himself. Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 26.

II. Of the circuit courts of the United States.

(a) They have jurisdiction—

15. Under the act of March 2d, 1867, of a suit brought by the assignee of a chose in action, when the case has been transferred under that act from a State court into one of them. City of Lexington v. Butler, 282.

16. Of negotiable paper (other things allowing), though the plaintiff be an assignee of it. Ib.

(b) They have not jurisdiction—

17. (Where the suit is between citizens of the same State) of a suit which does not relate to some matter already litigated in the same court by the same persons, and which is not either in addition to, or a continuance of, an original suit. Such second suit is an original and not an ancillary suit. Christmas v. Russell, 69.

COMMONWEALTH ex rel. McLAIN v. LOCK et al.

1. The act of May 3d, 1871, relating to licenses for the sale of liquors, was a perfect law when it left the halls of the Legislature, and is constitutional.
2. The provision allowing the people to vote either for or against license, was not a delegation of legislative power, but only a submission of the expediency of the measure.

Mandamus.

Judgment for respondents on demurrer.

Appeal of Thomas M. Locke et al., commissioners, and Peter A. B. Widener, treasurer of Philadelphia, from interlocutory decree of the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia, granting an injunction.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered March 17th, 1873.

That a power conferred upon an agent because of his fitness, and the confidence reposed in him, cannot be delegated by him to another, is a general and admitted rule. Legislators stand in this relation to the people whom they represent. Hence it is a cardinal principle of representative government, that the Legislature cannot delegate the power to make laws to any other body or authority. The true question in this case is whether the act of May 3d, 1871 (P. L. p. 522), "to allow the voters of the Twenty-second ward of the city of Philadelphia, to vote on the question of granting license to sell intoxicating liquor," is a delegation of legislative power. This must be determined by an analysis of the provisions of the act itself, and depends not upon the numerical order of the sections, but upon the nature of the legislative determination when the act left the hands of the Assembly.

Whatever the Legislature then determined to be is law, for so much was then a fixed and absolute resolve. What did the Legislature then determine absolutely? It enacted in the fifth section, "that any person who shall hereafter be convicted of selling or offering for sale, in the Twenty-second ward of the city of Philadelphia, any intoxicating liquors, spirituous, vinous, malt or other intoxicating liquors, without a license, shall be sentenced to pay a fine of fifty dollars," etc. The provisions of the first, second and third sections are equally imperative and absolute, and may be summed up in a few words, viz.: That a special election shall be held in the Twenty-second ward, at the next annual municipal election, and every third year thereafter; that the constable of the ward shall give a certain notice of such election, at which time the question of license or no license will be submitted to the voters of this ward; that the election shall be held by the same officers, in the same manner, and under the same penalties prescribed by the general election law, and due returns of the election made in a similar manner. The language is imperative, and the law was absolute in all these respects, when the act was approved by the governor.

We come, then, to the fourth section, which provides that whenever, by the returns of election, it shall appear that there is a majority against license, it shall not be lawful for any license to issue for the sale of spirituous and other liquors in said ward, at any time thereafter, until at at an election, as above provided, a majority of the voters of said ward shall vote in favor of a license.

What did the Legislature in this section submit to the people, and what did they not submit? This is quite as clear as any part of the act. Each elector is to vote a ticket for license or against license. He is allowed by the law to say, "I am for the issuing of licenses, or "I am against the issuing of licenses," and thus to express his judgment or opinion.

But this is all he was permitted by the law to do. He declared no consequence, and prescribed no rule resulting from his opinion. Nor does the majority of the votes declare a consequence. The return of a majority is but of a mere numerical preponderance of votes, and expresses only the opinion of the greater number of electors upon the expediency or inexpediency of licenses in this ward. When this is certified by the return, the Legislature, not the voters, declare "it shall (or it shall not) be lawful for any license to issue for the sale of spirituous liquors." Thus it is perfectly manifest, this law was not made, pronounced or ratified by the people; and the majority vote is but an ascertainment of the public sentiment—the expression of a general opinion, which, as a fact, the Legislature have made the contingency on which the law shall operate. When the law came from the halls of legislation, it came a perfect law, mandatory in all its parts, prohibiting in this ward the sale of intoxicating liquors without license; commanding an election to be held every third year, to ascertain the expediency of issuing licenses, and when the fact of expediency or inexpediency shall have been returned, commanding that licenses shall issue or shall not issue. Then what did the vote decide? Clearly not that the act should become a law or not be, for the law already existed. Indeed, it was not delegated to the people to decide anything. They simply declared their views or wishes, and when they did so, it was the fiat of the law, not their vote, which commanded licenses to be issued or not to be issued.

Now in what respect does a vote upon license or no license in a particular ward or township, differ from a vote whether a new township shall be continued or annulled; or from a vote to determine whether a seat of justice shall be continued where it is, or be removed to another place; or from a vote for or against a subscription by a city to the stock of a railroad company; or from a vote of the people of a district for or against a consolidation of it with a city? Yet in all these instances (to which reference will be made hereafter), it has been decided that a determination of these questions by a vote of the people interested in them, and an enactment of law dependent on the result of this vote, are not a delegation of the law-making power to the people, but a submission only of the expediency of the proposed measure. This is simply common sense, for in none of the instances did the Legislature commit to the people the making of the law, but merely the province of determining a matter important to wise and judicious legislation—something upon which the Legislature deemed it proper its own act should await, and then should operate accordingly. The wit of man cannot draw a well-grounded distinction between the result of a vote upon license in a township, and a result of a vote upon the existence of a township, or the removal of a court house, or a subscription to stock, or the consolidation of an outlying district with a city.

The Legislature in the act of 1871, have given to the people a law, not a mere invitation; needing no ratification, no popular breath to give it vitality. The law is simply contingent upon the determination of the fact whether licenses are needed, or are desired in this ward. And why shall not the Legislature take the sense of the people? Is it not the right of the Legislature to seek information of the condition of a locality, or of the public sentiment there? The constitution grants the power to legislate, but it does not confer knowledge. The very trust implies that the power should be acted wisely and judiciously. Are not public sentiment and local circumstances just subjects of inquiry? A judicious exercise of power in one place may not be so in another. Public sentiment or local condition may make the law unwise, inapt, or inoperative in some places, and otherwise elsewhere. Instead of being contrary to, it is consistent with the genius of our free institutions to take the public sense in many instances, that the legislators may faithfully represent the people, and promote their welfare. So long, therefore, as the Legislature calls to its aid the means of ascertaining the utility or expediency of a measure, and does not delegate the power to make the law itself, it is acting within the sphere of its just powers.

It is urged that Parker v. Com'lth, 6 Barr, 507, decided the question before us. That case was overruled soon after it was decided, not in express terms, it is true, but its foundation was undermined when it was held that laws could constitutionally be made dependent on a popular vote for their operation. Besides, the reasoning in Parker v. Com'lth is fallacious in assuming the fact that there was a delegation of legislative power. There is much in the opinion well and ably said. The first eight pages may be passed over, and we are brought then to the marrow of the argument, which is contained in the following sentences: After a summary of the act of 1846, Justice Bell proceeds to say that as a statute it "depends for its validity and binding efficacy, within the several counties named in it, upon the popular vote of designated districts." "Possessing no innate force, it remains a dead letter until breathed upon by the people, and called into activity by an exertion of their voice in their primary assemblies." "If a majority within the particular district should vote negatively upon the question yearly to be submitted to the people, the act as a statute has no existence." If a majority of the votes be cast in the affirmative, then the act is to take effect as a statute."

"It operates not propria vigore, but, if at all, only by virtue of a mandate expressed subsequently to its enactment, in pursuance of an invitation given by the legislative bodies." "As it left the halls of legislation it was imperfect and unfinished; for it lacked the qualities of command and prohibition absolutely essential to every law." I have italicised the portions which show the thought of the opinion and evince the assumption on which the argument rests. If we admit the fact, that the law now before us were of this character, an imperfect and unfinished act, a mere invitation to the people to issue their subsequent mandate, and to breathe into it all its vitality, and thus give to it all its validity and binding efficacy as a law, we might have to concede the conclusion that there was a delegation to the people of the power to legislate. But it is beyond cavil that when the act of 1871 left the halls of legislation it was a mandatory law in all its parts, and the only thing committed to the people was to vote for or against the issuing of licenses, and thereby supply the evidence of expediency. It acts propria vigore, and is called into existence by no subsequent popular mandate. By its command the sale of liquor is forbidden, the popular vote is taken, and its effect declared. This popular vote is but the law's appointed means of determining a result, which the law enacts, in an alternative form, shall be the contingency of its operation. The law did not spring from the vote, but the vote sprang from the law, and the law alone declared the consequence to flow from the vote. The assumption that the act is not a law till enacted by the people is the foundation of the argument, and with its fall the superstructure vanishes. The character of this law is precisely that of hundreds of others, which the legislative will makes dependent on some future act or fact for its operation. To assert that a law is less than a law because it is made to depend on a future event or act, is to rob the Legislature of the power to act wisely for the public welfare, whenever a law is passed relating to a state of affairs not yet developed, or to things future and impossible to be fully known. Such an assertion attacks even the moral government of the Creator. God breathes into his creature the power of judgment and discretion, and then declares to him in His law: "As you determine your act, so shall be the consequences." The law is active and operates only when man determines. Does man or God make the law?

What is more common than to appoint commissioners under a law to determine things upon the decision of which the act is to operate in one way or another? The courts exercise powers dependent on their own discretion. Take the case of granting a license to keep an inn and to sell liquor. The judge determines whether the license is necessary, and if not necessary the law says to the applicant, "No license." The law takes effect just as the judge determines, yet who says it is the court that legislates? What is the difference, in essence, whether the necessity for places for the sale of liquors be determined by the people or the courts? Each in its place is but an instrumentality of the law. The judge speaks, the people speak, but each speaks by the authority of law, and the law commands the consequence. The error of the argument is in attributing the consequence to the voice that speaks, instead of to the law, which makes the people its own mouth-piece, and has beforehand proclaimed the consequence of the utterance. The people, by virtue of the law, declare the expediency of licenses in the ward, and the law itself has already enacted what shall follow this declaration. Though contingent in form, the law is mandatory throughout in all it requires and all it determines. That is not less an act of sovereign power which says to the subject do this, and that shall follow; do that, and another thing shall follow. To the subject a discretion of acting is given, and as he decides, the law pronounces the consequence. It is the sovereign which gives the law, not the subject.

Then, the true distinction, I conceive, is this: The Legislature cannot delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation shall follow, which cannot be known to the law-making power, and must, therefore, be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation. Hence the necessity of the municipal divisions of the State into counties, townships, cities, wards, boroughs and districts, to which is committed the power of determining many matters necessary, or merely useful, to the local welfare. Can any one distinguish between committing the determining power to the authorities of the districts, and to the people of the district? If the power to determine the expediency or necessity of granting licenses to sell liquors in a municipal division can be committed to a commission, a council, or a court, which no one can dispute, why cannot the people themselves be authorized to determine the same thing? If a determining power cannot be delegated, then there can be no power delegated to city councils, commissions, and the like, to pass ordinances, by-laws and resolutions in the nature of laws, binding and affecting both the persons and the property of the citizens. If a determining power cannot be conferred by law, there can be no law that is not absolute, unconditional and peremptory; and nothing which is unknown, uncertain and contingent can be the subject of law.

If, in any case, a question could arise upon a delegated power, it would be in that which is delegated to the councils of Philadelphia to make laws, so-called. Look at the language of the sixteenth section of the act of March 11th, 1789: "The mayor, &c., shall have full power and authority to make, ordain, constitute and establish such and so many laws or ordinances," &c. See, also, the fourth section of the consolidation act of July 2d, 1854: "That the legislative powers of the said city shall be vested in two bodies, to be called the select and common councils." In pursuance of this power rights of person and property are regulated, fines and forfeitures inflicted, and discretionary powers are vested in committees, departments and officers. Can there be a clearer instance of the exercise of powers in their nature legislative, by an act of delegation? Yet who believes that this is unlawful, or that it is really a delegation of the law-making power in the sense of a delegation of it from the halls of legislation to the council chambers? On the contrary, the charter of the city is itself the law which breathes into these quasi legislative acts of councils all their life and power, and which, for useful and necessary local purposes, delegated to councils, not the power of making laws, but the discretion and determining power necessary to regulate the affairs of a great city, that, owing to distance, and want of knowledge and of time, the Legislature cannot determine for itself, but which by its law it directs to be done by others. Just at this point the opinion in Parker v. Commonwealth evidently labors when it touches this instance of delegated power, and attributes the efficacy of corporation laws to the consent of the citizens, and affirms that the relation between the municipality and the members is founded in contract. But it is too clear for argument that ordinances derive their binding force from the law which authorizes them, and not from compact. The power to pass them is delegated, and the true question is what is the nature of the delegated power? As already stated, it is merely a determining power, as to matters committed to the discretion of the councils by law, not a law-making power per se.

Parker v. Commonwealth was decided by three judges to two, with a strong dissent proceeding from the latter. In less than a year afterward a question arose upon a law authorizing the people to determine by a vote whether a new township should be continued or annulled. Commonwealth v. Judges Q. S., 8 Barr, 391. The only attempt to distinguish the case from Parker v. Commonwealth, was by saying in the latter there was an exercise of sovereignty—of the power of enacting a law by ballot; while in the former there was an exercise of a subordinate function only, for the convenience of public business. But we have already shown that the distinction rests on no difference, and the assumption in Parker v. Commonwealth of the delegation of a legislative power being unfounded, the argument fails, and the distinction in the Commonwealth v. The Judges falls with it. The Commonwealth v. Painter, 10 Barr, 214, occurred a year later. The law authorized the electors of Delaware county to determine by ballot whether the seat of justice should be continued at Chester, or be removed to another place, and, in the event of a vote for removal, that a commission should select the site and a court house be erected. The law was held to be constitutional, the court not attempting to distinguish it from Parker v. Commonwealth, excepting to say that the latter does not reach or cover the case in hand. The law, however, was examined in view of Parker v. Commonwealth, and the opinion was delivered by Coulter, J., who had written an able dissenting opinion in that case. Four years later came Moers v. City of Reading, 9 Harris, 188.

The law provided for taking the sense of the people upon a subscription to the stock of the Lebanon Valley Railroad Company, the subscription being authorized or not, as the people should declare by their vote. The law was held to be constitutional, C. J. Black remarking, "It is argued that it is not an exertion of legislative power by the Assembly, but a mere delegation of it to the people of Reading. We cannot see it in that light. Half the statutes on our books are in the alternative, depending on the discretion of some person or persons, to whom is confided the duty of determining whether the proper occasion exists for executing them. But it cannot be said the exercise of such a discretion is the making of the law." This is the precise point which we have endeavored to show was overlooked in Parker v. Commonwealth, and the contrary assumed without proof. It is to be noticed, also, that Moers v. City of Reading, was decided by an entirely new bench of judges. These cases have been followed very recently in Smith v. McCarthy, 6 P. F. Smith, 359. A law for consolidating certain outlying districts with the city of Pittsburg was made to depend upon the vote of the people. It was held to be constitutional, Thompson, Chief Justice, remarking: "We do not regard it within the principle which forbids the delegation of legislative power." There was also the common school system of the State, which, by the act of 13th June, 1835, § 13, was made dependent upon the vote of the people of every district, by election every third year. In many parts of the State, the hostility to the law was intensely bitter, and the school law was not adopted in some districts for more than twenty years, yet it has never been declared unconstitutional.

I have not thought it useful or necessary to notice the supposed distinction between acts of the Legislature as laws and as grants of sovereign prerogative, for the plain reason, that having by an analysis of the act itself, and by abundant precedents, shown that it is a law in its nature and mandatory character, the distinction has no place or application. If it were useful, it might not be difficult to show, that in our form of government, all grants of royal prerogative or of franchises are the product of the exercise of the legislative power only, and by the terms of the constitution, in the first section of the first article, must pass by the grant of the legislative power therein, or not at all. The Legislature cannot delegate the power of passing laws relating to these subjects, more than they can delegate the power to legislate on other subjects.

Nor have I thought it necessary to refer to the decisions in other States, for the plain reason, also, that our own decisions, since Parker v. Commonwealth, rule the case; while that case was the forerunner of the decisions in all the other States (except Delaware), and with its fall, they have lost their chief prop and support.

Decrees affirmed, and special injunction ordered to remain.

REED, C. J., and SHARSWOOD, J. dissented.

Dissenting opinion delivered by READ, C. J.

Nearly sixteen years ago, this court held in Parker v. the Commonwealth, 6 Barr, 507, the act of 7th April, 1846, entitled "An act authorizing the citizens of certain counties to decide by ballot, whether the sale of vinous, and spirituous liquors, shall be continued in said counties," to be unconstitutional and void. The opinion delivered by Judge Bell was a very able one, and was concurred in by Chief Justice Gibson and Judge Rogers. "Mindful," says Judge Bell, "of the ancient institutions of the country, and following the example set by the Federal Constitution, the people of Pennsylvania, when ordaining and establishing a fundamental law for the government of the commonwealth, decreed that the legislative power shall be vested in a General Assembly, to consist of a Senate and House of Representatives, to be elected at stated periods by the citizens of the respective counties. They thus solemnly and emphatically divested themselves of all right directly to make or declare the law, or to interfere with the ordinary legislation of the State, otherwise than in the manner pointed out in art. ix., section 20, which declares, 'the citizens have a right, in a peaceable manner, to assemble together for their common good, and to apply to those invested with the power of government, for redress of grievances or other purposes, by petition, address, or remonstrance.' This provision, which found a place in the constitution of 1790, is reiterated and re-established by the amended constitution of 1838, adopted by a vote of the whole people, thus, conclusively showing that the experience of nearly half a century had worked no change in the sentiment which lodged the legislative authority of the commonwealth in selected and responsible bodies of men, liable to the animadversions of their constituents, as the only safe depository of this portion of the sovereign power. Desiring to interfere no further with the regulated action of these bodies, than in the mode thus expressly reserved, by the right of selecting the delegates composing them, and through the influence which inevitably flows from enlightened public opinion, deliberately and temperately expressed, the people sought to guard against an abuse of the high power they had delegated, by providing a specific mode of election of members of the Senate and House of Representatives; by prescribing the qualifications; by stipulating the separate and independent action of the two chambers; by an appeal to the conscience in the oath or affirmation exacted from each member to support the constitution of the commonwealth, and to perform the duties of his office with fidelity; and by conferring on the chief executive magistrate the prerogative of the veto, designed for the correction of hasty and inconsiderate legislation. The system so established is a system of checks and balances, seeking safety in the declared responsibility of the individual agent and the guardian watchfulness of the co-ordinate branches."

This legislative power thus exclusively vested in the General Assembly, the court expressly held could not be delegated by the Legislature, "not even to the people themselves; for they have forbidden it by the solemn expression of their will, that the legislative power shall be vested in the General Assembly, much less can it be relinquished to a portion of the people, who cannot even claim to be the exclusive depositories of that part of the sovereignty retained by the whole community."

In 5 Watts & Sergeant, 283, Chief Justice Gibson, in a few terse words expressed the true principle. "Under a well balanced constitution, the Legislature can no more delegate its proper function than can the judiciary."

The Legislature of Delaware had on the 19th of February, 1847, passed an act, "authorizing the people to decide by ballot whether the license to retail intoxicating liquors shall be permitted among them" (framed upon the plan of our act of 7th April, 1846), and under an election held under it, in New Castle county, there was a majority against license. The question of its constitutionality came up before the Court of Appeals, in June term, 1847, and is reported in Rice v. Foster, 4 Harrington's Reports, 479. The court, after hearing a most elaborate and exhaustive argument by very distinguished counsel, were unanimously of opinion the law was unconstitutional, as it was a delegation of the law-making power to the people.

It is a striking fact, that two separate courts of the last resort, in two adjoining States, whose constitutions both provide, that the legislative power of the State "shall be vested in a General Assembly, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives," in the same year should have decided on the same grounds the two similar laws to be unconstitutional and void. Two such decisions upon a constitutional question affecting the personal rights of the citizens, and their right to follow certain trades and business, should have an overwhelming authority in the case before us. On the 3d May, 1871, an act was passed entitled "An act to allow the voters of the Twenty-second Ward of the city of Philadelphia to vote on the question of granting licenses to sell intoxicating liquors."

The first three sections simply provide the machinery for a vote at the next annual municipal election, and at the annual municipal election, every third year thereafter by the voters of the ward, on the question of license or no license, by written or printed ballots.

The fourth section enacts, "that whenever by the returns of the election in the Twenty-second Ward, it shall appear that there is a majority against license, it shall not be lawful for any license to issue for the sale of spirituous, vinous, malt, or other intoxicating liquors in said ward, at any time thereafter, until at an election as above provided, a majority of the voters of said ward shall vote in favor of a license."

By whom is this law enacted? Clearly not by the Legislature, but by the voters, without discussion, and in secret, no man knowing how his next door neighbor votes, nor his reason for casting his ballot as he has chosen to do. The question, therefore, of license or no license, is decided by a body whom the constitution has stripped of all legislative power or authority. This is a legislative question, purely, and must be decided by the legislative body itself, openly and publicly, and the yeas and nays may be called at the desire of any two members, and be entered on the journals. The question, shall license be issued in the Twenty-second Ward, could only be decided by the legislative body, who never would have answered it affirmatively. This act is therefore unconstitutional and void, and is covered by the two decisions of 1847.

The act of 1846 embraced only vinous and spirituous liquors; the act of 1871 extends it to malt or other intoxicating liquors, including lager beer, cider, and every possible liquor which may produce intoxication. It is a prohibitory law, and is intended as an entering wedge to the stringent prohibitory laws of Vermont and Massachusetts. But the 5th section, following up the prohibitory action under the 4th section, makes all sales of intoxicating liquors in the Twenty-second Ward criminal offences, punishable with a fine of fifty dollars, and confinement in the house of correction or county jail for the period of six months for the first offence, and for the second and each subsequent offence, a fine of one hundred dollars, and confinement in the house of correction or county jail for the period of one year. Thus the unconstitutional surrender of legislative power to a small body of men, in a contracted locality, enables them to add new crimes to our criminal code, and to inflict on their fellow citizens punishment of unwonted and uncalled for severity.

If this be a constitutional enactment, why may not the Legislature devolve this power upon a minority of the voters, say one-fourth, or make it depend upon the ballot of a single voter? If they can give the power to a majority they certainly can to a minority.

The cases cited in opposition to Parker v. Commonwealth, bear no resemblance to that case, or to the one before us. The case of the common school law, was considered in Parker v. The Commonwealth and distinguished, and the same decision was arrived at as to a similar school law in Delaware by the Court of Appeals in Rice against Foster. The other cases as to the removal of county seats, the choice of sites for public buildings, or the subscriptions to railroad stock, are mere acts of executive administration, not laws. The present case is one of morals, of a strong prohibitory character, proscribing certain trades and business heretofore lawful, creating new crimes, inflicting severe punishments, with a power of repeal, all dependent upon the votes of the citizens of the ward, whom the Legislature has vested with the full law-making power. The object is plain, to force total abstinence upon a population of twenty-three thousand souls. The Legislature never would have passed such an act by a direct vote upon a call of yeas and nays.

In 1870, the population of the city was 674,020, which is rapidly increasing, and it is clear that a prohibitory law proscribing every fluid but the waters of the Schuylkill and the Delaware cannot be enforced, and it is only necessary to look at the history of such legislation in Massachusetts and its capital, the city of Boston.

The first movement for an entirely prohibitory liquor law, was made in the State of Massachusetts, in the summer of 1847, and a petition for that purpose, numerously signed, was presented to the Legislature at its next session, in the wint r of 1848. It was referred to a special committee, who reported a bill which, though warmly supported, failed to become a law. In 1851, the Legislature of Maine passed their prohibitory law, adopting the measure proposed in Massachusetts, with the addition of what is called the destruction clause; Massachusetts passed prohibitory statutes in 1852, 1855, and 1858, the two last of which were the foundation of chapter 86, of the general statutes of that State of 1860, "of the manufacture, sale &c., of intoxicating liquors."

By this chapter, 86, a commissioner is appointed annually by the governor, with the advice and consent of the council, to purchase and sell spirituous and intoxicating liquors of a pure quality, to the several city and town agents appointed under the provisions of the chapter, and to regularly appointed agents in cities and towns of other of the New England States, and to no other person. He is to establish a place of business in Boston, and all liquors kept for sale by him shall be analyzed by one of the State assayers, and his sales shall be made for cash, and at a price not exceeding an advance of five per cent. upon the actual cost, together with the cost of such analysis.

The mayor and aldermen, or selectmen of every city and town, are to appoint on the first Monday of May, annually, for one year, one or more suitable persons, as agents of such places, to purchase and sell spirituous or intoxicating liquors, to be used in the arts, or for medicinal, chemical and mechanical purposes, and no other, and every agent must purchase of the commissioner.

Druggists may sell for medicinal purposes only, pure alcohol to other druggists, apothecaries and physicians, known to be such. "A chemist, artist, or manufacturer, in whose art or trade they may be necessary, may keep at his place of business, spirituous liquors for use, in such art or trade, but not for sale; and any person may manufacture or sell cider for other purposes than that of a beverage, and unadulterated wine for sacramental purposes."

"Ale, porter, strong beer, lager beer, cider, and all wines, shall be considered intoxicating liquors, within the meaning of this chapter, as well as distilled spirits, but this enumeration shall not prevent any other pure or mixed liquors from being regarded as intoxicating."

The county commissioners, and the mayor and aldermen of the city of Boston may, on the first Monday of May, annually, authorize such persons as apply to them in writing, to manufacture spirituous or intoxicating liquors, and to sell the same in quantities not less than thirty gallons, to be exported, or to be used in the arts or for mechanical purposes in the State, such authority to continue for one year from the date thereof.

The 30th section provides penalties for all unlawful sales of spirituous or intoxicating liquors, and the 31st section provides, "That whoever is a manufacturer of spirituous or intoxicating liquor for sale, or a common seller in violation of the provisions of this chapter, shall, for one violation, pay fifty dollars and be imprisoned in the house of correction not less than three nor more than six months; for a second violation, shall pay the sum of two hundred dollars and be imprisoned six months in the house of correction; and for any subsequent violation, shall pay the sum of two hundred dollars and be imprisoned twelve months in the house of correction."

Provision is also made for searching for and seizing liquors intended for sale, forfeiting the same, and selling what is suitable for medicinal, chemical or mechanical purposes, and destroying what is unfit.

By the 61st section, "all payments or compensations for spirituous or intoxicating liquors sold in violation of law, whether in money, labor, or personal property, shall be held to have been received without consideration, and against law, equity and good conscience."

By section 60 "all intoxicating liquors kept for sale, and the implements and vessels actually used in selling and keeping the same, contrary to the provisions of this chapter, are declared to be common nuisances."

Under this statute, and subsequent statutes intended to prevent the sale of all intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and limiting their sale to be used in the arts or for mechanical and chemical purposes, or for medicinal purposes, a continued scene of litigation has been kept up during 41 volumes of the Reports of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, beginning with 11 Cushing. Every volume has its full share, and in one volume there are 36 cases growing out of this attempt,

THE DISTRICT COURT.

The following important act of Assembly has just been passed and approved by the governer.

Be it enacted by, &c. That the act of April fifth, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, entitled "An act regulating equity jurisdiction in Philadelphia county," is hereby repealed, and the equity jurisdiction of the District Court for the City and County of Philadelphia, is hereby restored as before the passage of said act.

TAX ON RAILROAD DIVIDENDS.

We publish to-day the decision of the United States Supreme Court, delivered last week, in the cases of Barnes et al. v. The Railroad Companies. These cases have excited great attention, and the decision holding as it does, that the tax upon the dividends declared by the companies in December of 1869, but not payable until January of the following year (in two of the cases the dividends were not only payable, but were declared also in 1870), was a tax upon the companies themselves, and not upon the individual stockholders, and that they were taxable as income of 1869, has occasioned great surprise. The general impression seemed to be that the reverse ruling of Justice Strong, in the Circuit Court below, would be sustained. A strong dissenting opinion by that judge, concurred in by Chief Justice Chase, and Justices Davis and Field, was also delivered with the opinion of the majority of the court. Owing to the pressure upon our columns by reason of the "local option" decision, which we also publish to-day, we have been compelled reluctantly to crowd out this dissenting opinion. Next week we will endeavor to present it in full to our readers, with more extended comment than we have space now to afford it.

We have been compelled to omit this week several invaluable decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania and of several of the Pennsylvania courts of Common Pleas. We would inform our correspondents and others, who have kindly forwarded us copies of the decisions referred to, that we have these decisions all in type ready for publication in our next and subsequent issues.

It seems that the wills of celebrated men will somehow get into the courts. Recently in this State we have had a law suit over Thaddeus Stevens' will; in New York, they have just concluded the fight about Horace Greeley's, and now the Supreme court of Illinois has rendered a decision in the matter of the will of Stephen A. Douglas. Verily, if a man leaves a will, he cannot rest in peace.

A bill has been reported in the Illinois House of Representatives, providing that "If any officer, State, county, city, town or village shall be intoxicated in the discharge of his official duties, he shall for the first offence, be fined ten dollars; for the second, twenty dollars; and for the third be removed from office."

On Saturday, March, 15th, 1873, Joel B. McCamant, Esq., of Schuylkill county, was, upon motion of James Ellis, Esq., of the same county, admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Mr. McCamant is at present a member of the Constitutional Convention, and is widely and favorably known in the region of the State from which he hails.

FAUST v. HAAS.

A purchaser at a sheriff's sale, who by trick or artifice deters a party in interest from bidding, will be held a trustee ex maleficio for such party.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Schuylkill county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered March 10th, 1873.

It is perfectly well settled, that in the administration of equity in the courts of this State, through common law forms, the judge sits as a chancellor, assisted by the jury, who are to determine the credibility of the witnesses, and the effect of conflicting testimony. But the conscience of the judge as a chancellor must be satisfied of the sufficiency of the evidence, if believed. If it be too vague, uncertain or doubtful, to establish the equity set up, it is his duty to withdraw it from the jury, either by a non-suit or a binding instruction in his charge, as the case may require. McBarrar v. Glass, 6 Casey, 133; Todd v. Campbell, 8 Ibid. 252; Bennett v. Fulmer, 13 Wright, 162; Miller v. Hartle, 3 P. F. Smith, 111; Church v. Ruland, 14 Ibid. 441.

But applying this principle to the evidence in this case, we think that there was quite enough to satisfy the conscience of a chancellor, that Haas should be decreed to be a trustee for Faust. It is an undisputed fact, that the property was bid off at sheriff's sale by Mr. Graeff, as attorney for Faust. The relation in which he stood to Faust, was a confidential one, and he acknowledged the trust. To whom the deed was to be made, was not then finally arranged; but it was afterwards distinctly agreed, Haas being a party, that if the mortgage to the Tamaqua Saving Fund Association could remain, the balance of the purchase money should be raised and paid by Haas, under an agreement that Faust was to have three and six months to pay it back, and was also to reimburse Haas any assessments he might subsequently have to pay on the mortgage. Mr. Graeff testified: "I stated to the parties at the time, that this arrangement ought to be in writing, but I had no time that day to write it; but that I would have the deed acknowledged on Monday, and bring the deed home with me, and draw up the writing, and they were to come on the next Monday, and I was to deliver the deed to Haas." When they came to settle at the sheriff's office, it appeared that there was interest due on a dower right, which was prior to the mortgage, and the attorney of the savings fund insisted that this interest should be paid before he would agree that the mortgage should remain. In consequence of this difficulty, the arrangement was not carried out. But anticipating no such difficulty, Mr. Graeff had directed that the sheriff's deed should be made to Haas, and acknowledged, which had accordingly been done. Haas then raised the full amount of the bid, paid it to the sheriff, and received from him the deed. This was done without the knowledge and consent of either Graeff or Faust. He then claimed, and now claims to hold the property as his own, absolutely. That this was a breach of good faith on the part of Haas, cannot be doubted. It was not merely the violation of a parol agreement. He obtained the legal title by an artifice, by getting possession of the deed without the consent of those who alone had a right to direct to whom it should be delivered. Mr. Graeff, the actual purchaser at the sheriff's sale, and Faust, for whom he had bought. Haas, indeed, by a previous agreement with Faust, by which Faust was to secure him the payment of a judgment which he held on the premises, by an assignment of all his (Faust's) interest in his father's estate after his mother's death, had promised that he would not be a bidder at the sale. "That," says Mr. Graeff, "was clearly the understanding."

Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that Haas was a trustee for Faust, ex maleficio, not within the prohibition of the statute of frauds, which having been intended to prevent fraud, is not itself to be made the instrument of one. It is certainly true, that if a man buys at sheriff's sale, or otherwise, and pays his own money for the purchase, no verbal agreement, before or afterwards, to hold for another, will make him a trustee. Fox v. Heffner, 1 W. & S. 372; Jackman v. Ringland, 4 Ibid. 149; Barnett v. Dougherty, 8 Casey, 371. But where artifice and trick are resorted to in order to procure the property at an undervalue, as per example, by deterring bidders at a sheriff's sale, or in any other way, the rule is different. It will be sufficient to refer to Gilbert v. Hoffman, 2 Watts, 66; McKennan v. Pry, 6 Ibid. 137; Brown v. Dysinger, 1 Rawle, 408; Haines v. O'Connor, 10 Watts, 313; Bugle v. Wentz, 5 P. F. Smith, 369; Zingenfelter v. Ritchey, 8 Ibid. 485; Seichrist's Appeal, 16 Ibid. 237. "Although," says Mr. Justice Agnew, in the case last cited, "no one can be compelled to part with his own title by force of a mere verbal bargain, yet when he procures a title from another, which he could not have obtained except by a confidence reposed in him, the case is different. Then if he abuse the confidence so reposed, he is converted into a trustee ex maleficio. The statute which was intended to prevent frauds turns against him as the perpetrator of a fraud." We think, therefore, the learned judge below erred in directing the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. He should have submitted the case to them upon the whole evidence, with instructions that if they believed that Haas obtained possession of the sheriff's deed mala fide, their verdict should be for the defendant.

In the view we have taken of the case, it follows also, that the evidence offered by the defendant, and rejected, which forms the subjects of the first and second assignments of error, was relevant, and should have been admitted, and that which was offered by the plaintiff, and received, which is complained of in the third assignment, was irrelevant, and should have been rejected.

Judgment reversed, and a venire facias de novo awarded.

HEIST v. HART.

1. In the case of negotiable paper, a contemporaneous parol agreement is inadmissible to vary the effect of the written contract.
2. Though a note given to effect a fraud, is as between the parties a nullity, yet it is good in the hands of a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Bucks county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered March 10th, 1873.

The question raised by the first assignment of error is, whether there was sufficient evidence to submit to the jury that the plaintiff below, the endorsee of the note in suit, before he took it, had notice of the alleged fraud in the sale of the patent right which formed its consideration. It is not pretended that distinct notice of the fraud was given to him, or even that the Heists gave him notice generally that they had been defrauded. Unaccompanied with any allegation that there was a representation or warranty at the time of the contract, that the machine was to produce certain results, the mere statement that it did not work right was no defence to the note. Nor was the fact that Hevner had agreed not to negotiate the note, and to renew it until it could be paid out of the profits, any more available even as between the parties. Such a parole agreement, though made at the time, is inadmissible in evidence, to vary the effect of the written contract in the case of negotiable papers. Hill v. Gaw, 4 Barr, 493; Mason v. Graff, 11 Casey, 498. Hart understood this, for he told Heist that if such was the agreement, the note should not have been made negotiable on its face, and Heist assented to it. The information communicated by the Heists to Hart, so far from notifying him of any defence, was calculated to mislead him to believe that there really was none. A mere general notice that there was some defence, and that the note would not be paid, might be enough to put a party on inquiry. Hart may have been bound to ask the maker what was his defence. When he does so, however, and is only told what is clearly no defence, there is nothing which ought to impeach his bona fides.

The first assignment of error is not sustained.

Nor is there any ground for the second error assigned. Conceding that the production of the assignment of the patent right for Pennsylvania, by Harris & Olion to Hevner, for the consideration of $40,000, and the representation by Hevner that he had paid that sum, when, in fact, the true consideration was only four or five thousand dollars, and that the larger amount had been inserted by Hevner's request, to enable him to impose upon the purchasers of county rights, was a fraud which between the parties, avoided the note, and conceding that the price of this was sufficient to entitle the makers after notice, to require the holder to prove that he had given value; yet, the evidence of Hart, which was entirely uncontradicted, was that he had paid $1,800 for it. The charge of the learned judge below, so far as regarded this point, that if the jury believed the evidence, they should find for the plaintiff, was, therefore entirely correct.

Judgment affirmed.

ESTATE OF ALBERT SOLEY, a minor.

The court will not make any order in favor of a person with whom a ward is residing against the consent of his guardian.

Opinion of the court by PAXSON, J.

In this case the maternal grandfather of the minor asks for an order upon the guardians to pay him $4 per week for the board and clothing of said minor, from February 21st, 1872, to September 11th, 1872.

The guardians are entitled under a previous order of the court, to expend the weekly sum aforesaid for this purpose. The difficulty in this case is, that during the period referred to, the said minor has been residing with his said grandfather in Bucks county, not only without the consent, but against the consent of his guardians. While this state of things exists we will not make any order in favor of the grandfather. To do so would, perhaps, encourage relatives in interfering with the delicate relations of guardian and ward. Let the minor be promptly returned in good faith to his guardians. When that is done, the grandfather will be in a position to ask the aid of this court in enforcing any just claim.

For the present we decline to make an order.

CITY v. WILLIAMSON.

Property in the possession of a married woman is presumed to be the property of her husband. The onus is upon her to show that it is her separate estate, and how and from whom she acquired it.

Opinion by PAXSON, J. Delivered March 15th, 1873.

This case was heard before my brother Ludlow a few weeks since, and resulted in an order upon the defendant to pay $6 per week for the support of his wife, and that he enter security in the usual sum to comply with said order. Instead of doing so, the defendant fled our jurisdiction, and is now in contempt. The Guardians of the Poor thereupon issued a warrant of seizure under the act of Assembly, under which the house and furniture of the defendant were levied upon. On Saturday last a motion was made on behalf of the defendant to quash the warrant. This motion was overruled by the court, upon the ground that the defendant was in contempt, and not entitled to be heard. The motion to quash was thereupon renewed on behalf of Mary McNicholls, who claims to be garnishee. This motion was also overruled. An affidavit was then filed by Mary Williamson, alleging that the property seized under the warrant belonged to her, and not to the defendant. Mary McNicholls and Mary Williamson are one and the same person. This woman formerly lived with the defendant and his wife in Ireland, and was the cause of their domestic troubles. Subsequently she came to this country. The faithless husband and father deserted his wife and children, followed Mary McNicholls to this city, and married her. The whole of these proceedings were reviewed by my brother Ludlow in his very able opinion, which it is proper to say was fully concurred in by all the members of the court. We unite our condemnation to his of the conduct of this defendant. The affidavit filed does not aver the marriage of the affiant with defendant. The learned counsel, however, claimed upon the argument that she was his wife. For the purposes of his case we will hold her to all the consequences of the relation which is claimed for her. One of those consequences is that the property in her possession is presumed to be the property of her husband. The onus is upon her to show that it is her separate estate, and how and from whom she acquired it. This she has not done. The affidavit is a mere assertion that the property is her separate estate, but it contains nothing to negative the presumption of law that the money to purchase it was supplied by her husband. This renders it unnecessary for us to decide what would be the proper practice where a disputed question of fact is raised as the ownership of property seized under a warrant of this description. The warrant of seizure is confirmed.

LEGAL TENDER.

1. A cargo was shipped from Canada to New York, October, 7th, 1864, when gold was 101 per cent. above legal tender notes of the United States. The cargo was wrecked soon after, on the Hudson. On libel in the admiralty of New York, and on appeal from the District Court, the Circuit Court, on the 26th of March, 1870, when gold was only 12 per cent. above notes, gave the libellants a decree for the value in gold of the cargo on the day and at the place of shipment, converting that value, at the same time, into legal tender notes, at the rate at which such notes stood as compared with gold on the day of shipment, that is to say, when gold was 101 per cent. above legal tender notes, or in other words, when it required $201 legal tender notes to buy $100 of gold. On appeal to this court (the difference between gold and notes having now sunk to about 9 per cent.), Held, that this decree was right. The Vaughan and Telegraph, 258.

2. A decree ordering payment in coin of a debt contracted before the passage of the legal tender acts reversed, on the authority of the legal tender cases (12 Wallace, 475). Bigler v. Waller, 298.

LIEN IN ADMIRALTY.

1. While courts of admiralty are not governed by any statute of limitations, they adopt the principle that laches or delay in the judicial enforcement of maritime liens, will, under proper circumstances, constitute a valid defence. The Key City, 653.

2. No arbitrary or fixed period of time has been, or will be established, as an inflexible rule, but the delay which will defeat such a suit must, in every case depend on the peculiar equitable circumstances of that case. Ib.

3. When an admiralty lien is to be enforced to the detriment of a purchaser for value, without notice of the lien, the defence will be held valid under shorter time and a more rigid scrutiny of the delay than when the claimant is the party who owned the property when the lien accrued. Ib.

BARNES, KERNS, AND MAGILTON v. PHILADELPHIA AND READING R. R. CO.

SAME v. LEHIGH VALLEY R. R. CO.

SAME v. LAKE SUPERIOR AND MISSISSIPPI R. R. CO.

SAME v. PHILADELPHIA AND READING R. R. CO.

The defendant, a railroad company, declared a dividend in money upon December 22d, 1869, as part of their earnings, profits, income and gains made, and which accrued between the 1st of July of that year and the 1st of December of the same year, but the dividend was not made payable to stockholders until the 17th of January following. Due return of said dividend being made, the U. S. Revenue authorities assessed under authority of section 122, act of July 13th, 1866, a tax of five per centum on said dividend, as income for 1869, which the company refused to pay. The collector thereupon distrained upon the goods of the company, who denying the legality of the tax, brought an action of trespass against the collector in the State court. This action was afterwards removed to the Circuit Court of the United States, and upon a demurrer by the plaintiff below to a plea by defendants below, judgment was entered for the company. The defendants below sued out a writ of error and removed the cause into this court, which reversed the judgment of the court below, holding as follows:

1. The tax, by the very terms of the act imposing it, is a tax on the railroad company, and not on the individual stockholders.
2. The fact that the same section of the act imposing the tax (section 121) authorizes the company to deduct and withhold from all payments on account of any interest or coupons and dividends, the tax of five per centum, does not alter the character of the tax.
3. Payment of the tax by the company is an absolute requirement, just as much so as if the company were the real owner of the dividends.
4. The dividend being on earnings of the company for a period entirely in the year 1869, is taxable as earnings for that year.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. December Term, Nos. 15, 16, 17, and 18, 1872.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court, at Washington, D. C. March 10th, 1873.

Power to lay and collect taxes for Federal purposes, being vested exclusively in Congress, it becomes necessary, whenever the validity of such a tax is drawn in question, to examine the act imposing the tax, as the question in every case must necessarily depend upon its true construction, unless it appears that the tax is not apportioned as required, or not uniform, or the object taxed is one not taxable for such a purpose.

Railroad companies indebted for any money for which bonds or other evidences of indebtedness have been issued, payable in one or more years after date, subject to interest, or with coupons representing interest, are by the one hundred and twenty-second section of the act of the thirteenth of July, 1866, made liable to the internal revenue tax imposed by that section.

Provisions upon the subject differing essentially from those contained in that section had previously been enacted, but the Congress, on that day, amended the corresponding section in the prior law, by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the section under consideration, which also provides that "any such company that may have declared any dividend in scrip or money, due or payable to its stockholders, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, as part of the earnings, profits, income, or gains of such company, and all profits of such company, carried to the account of any fund, or used for construction, shall be subject to, and pay a tax of five per centum on the amount of all such interest or coupons, dividends or profits, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable, and to whatsoever party or person the same may be payable, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens. (14 Stat. at Large, 139.)

By the act incorporating the railroad company, it was provided that the dividends of so much of the profits of the company as it should appear advisable to the managers, should be declared at least twice in every year, payable to the stockholders subsequent to the expiration of ten days from the time it was so declared.

Apart from that it also appears that the railroad company on the twenty-second of December, 1869, declared a dividend in money amounting in the whole to the sum of one million five hundred and twenty-seven thousand five hundred and thirty-one dollars and fifty-nine cents on their capital stock, as part of their earnings, profits, income, and gains made, and which accrued between the first of July of that year and the first of December of the same year. None of these matters are controverted, but the dividend, though it accrued during the period described and was declared at the date specified, was made payable to the stockholders on the seventeenth of January following, as appears by the record.

Due return of the said dividend, as required by law, was made by the railroad company to the assessor of the first collection district, and the proper revenue authorities assessed a tax of five per centum upon the said dividend, amounting to the sum of seventy-six thousand three hundred and seventy-six dollars and fifty-eight cents, which the railroad company was required to pay within the period prescribed by law.

Payment of the tax having been refused, after due notice given and demand made, the collector and the other two defendants as his deputies, distrained the goods and chattels mentioned in the declaration to secure and enforce the payment of the tax, penalty, and interest, as directed in the warrant of the assessor. Distraint was made in due form, but the corporation plaintiffs, denying the legality of the tax, brought an action of trespass against the collector and his deputies in the State court to test that question, and the record shows that the suit, on the petition of the defendants, was regularly removed into the Circuit Court of the United States for trial. Both parties appeared in the Circuit Court, and the plaintiffs having filed their declaration, the defendants pleaded the general issue, and also a special plea, in bar of the action, setting up substantially the same matters as those set forth in the preceding statement. Issue was joined upon the first plea, but the plaintiffs demurred to the second, insisting that the matters pleaded do not constitute any defence to the action which is the principal question in the case. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs in the Circuit Court, and the defendants sued out a writ of error and removed the cause into this court.

Questions of importance to the parties, it may be conceded, are presented in the record for the decision of the court, but it must be admitted that they are all mere questions as to the construction of the act imposing the tax, as it is not pretended that the object taxed is one not taxable for Federal purposes, nor that the regulations prescribed for the assessment and collection of the tax are subject to any constitutional objections. Stripped of every difficulty of that kind, as the case confessedly is, the great central question which arises is, what did the lawmakers mean when they enacted that "any such company that may have declared any dividend in scrip or money, due or payable to its stockholders, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, as part of the earnings, profits, income, or gains of such company, and all profits of such company carried to the account of any fund, or used for construction, shall be subject to and pay a tax of five per centum on the amount of all such interest or coupons, dividends or profits, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable?"

Congress, it is insisted by the United States, intended to tax that accrued fund in the hands of the railroad company, in whatever form it might be, whether it existed as accumulated interest, or in cou pons representing interest, or in a dividend declared, or in a special fund of any kind, and without respect to the time of payment, or the person or persons to whom it was ultimately payable. Every element of that proposition is denied by the plaintiffs, and as a means of refuting it, they have entered into an extended and critical review of all the principal features of the prior acts providing for the collection of internal revenue duties.

Where a section or clause of a statute is ambiguous, much aid, it is admitted, may be derived in ascertaining its meaning, by comparing the section or clause in question with prior statutes in pari materia, but it cannot be admitted that such a resort is a proper one where the language employed by the Legislature is plain and free of all uncertainty, as the true rule in such a case is to hold that the statute speaks its own construction.

Much criticism is bestowed upon the corresponding provisions in the prior acts, in order to show that Congress never intended to tax the railroad company at all, and that the tax in view of the circumstances, cannot be sustained against the shareholder as a tax on income for the half year specified in the statement, as the dividend was not made payable to the stockholder until the seventeenth of January of the succeeding year, and the court, if the tax could be regarded as one imposed upon the shareholder, would be inclined to concur with the plaintiffs, that a dividend, neither due nor payable to the shareholder within a given year, could not be taxed to the shareholder as income of that year, under the internal revenue laws which were in operation at the time the tax in question was assessed and collected.

Concede all that, and still the court is of the opinion that the concession cannot benefit the plaintiffs, as the tax, by the very terms of the act imposing it, is a tax on the railroad company, to be assessed and collected in the manner and by the means prescribed in the act imposing the tax, and having come to that conclusion it will, not be necessary to examine very critically the machinery enacted in prior laws for the assessment and collection of income taxes against individuals, as the court is of the opinion that those regulations afford little or no aid in solving any material question involved in this record.

Attention was called during the argument to the fact that the railroad company is authorized, by the same section which imposes the tax, to deduct and withhold from all payments on accounts of any interest or coupons and dividends, due and payable as aforesaid, the tax of five per centum, and that the payment of the amount of the tax so deducted from the interest or coupons, or dividends, and certified by the president or treasurer of the company, is made a discharge to the company for the amount of the tax so paid, deducted, and withheld, except where the company may have otherwise contracted.—(14 Stat. at Large, 139,) Attempt is made to invoke that provision, as showing that the tax is a tax on the shareholder and not a tax on the railroad company, but the court is unable to perceive that the argument has any foundation whatever, as the provision does not contain a word inconsistent with the preceding part of the section, which in terms imposes the tax upon the railroad company.

Beyond doubt those two provisions should be construed together, and when so construed they are perfectly consistent, and show to the entire satisfaction of the court that the plaintiffs are liable to pay the tax in controversy. They are so liable because it appears that they, as such company, having been indebted for money, issued bonds, or other evidences of indebtedness, payable with interest, or with coupons representing interest, in one or more years after date, and that they declared a dividend in money due or payable to their stockholders as part of the earnings, profits, income, or gains of such company, and the section provides that such a company, under such circumstances, shall be subject to and pay a tax of five per centum on the amount of all such interest or coupons, dividends or profits, and authorizes the company to deduct and withhold the amount of the tax from the dividend due or payable to their stockholders.

Different regulations for the assessment and collection of the income taxes of every kind were prescribed in the prior laws imposing internal revenue duties, but they were not in all respects satisfactory, and many controversies had arisen, calling in question the action of the revenue officers in their efforts to enforce the collection of that branch of the public revenue. Contrariety of decision had resulted in some instances, and the Circuit Court had decided in one case that a railroad company could not deduct and withhold the amount of such a tax from a dividend due and payable to a non-resident alien, the presiding justice being of opinion that the language of the prior act did not warrant the conclusion that Congress intended to include such holders of the bonds or certificates in the category of persons liable to such an assessment.—(Railroad Co. v. Jackson, 7 Wall. 269; Jackson v. Railway Co., 2 Int. Rev. Rec. 174.)

Congress, accordingly, in order to remove those difficulties, imposed the tax upon the railroad company, and enacted that the company should pay the same whenever and wherever the dividend should be payable, and to whatsoever party or persons the same should belong, showing beyond the possibility of doubt that Congress intended to hold the railroad company absolutely and solely liable for the tax, reserving to the company the right, which is equally unqualified, of deducting and withholding from the dividend the amount of the tax, whether the dividend was due or payable to the stockholder before or subsequent to the payment of the tax, and wholly irrespective of the question whether the stockholder was a resident or non-resident, or citizen or non-resident alien.

Payment of the tax by the company is an absolute requirement, just as much so as if the company were the actual holder of the bonds and the real owner of the dividends, whether they deduct and withhold the amount from the dividends or not, and the fact that the company is permitted to do so, if they see fit, does not in the slightest degree change the relation of the company to the United States, as the taxpayers under that section of the law imposing internal revenue duties.

Confirmation of that view is also derived from the regulations for the assessment and collection of the tax contained in the same section, which require that a return shall be made and rendered to the assessor or assistant assessor on or before the tenth day of the month following that in which said interest, coupons, or dividends become due and payable, and as often as every six months, and that the return shall contain a true and faithful account of the tax, with a declaration annexed thereto, of the president or treasurer of the company, verifying that statement under oath or affirmation.

All these regulations apply to the company, and the provision is that the company, if they make default, either in rendering the return, or in the payment of the tax, shall forfeit as a penalty the sum of one thousand dollars, and that the tax and the penalty shall be assessed and collected as in other cases of neglect or refusal.

Special reference is made by the plaintiffs to the regulation enacted in the one hundred and nineteenth section of the act of the second of March, 1867, that "taxes on income herein imposed," shall be levied on the first day of March in each year, and be due and payable on or before the thirtieth day of April in the same year, as inconsistent with the theory assumed by the United States, but the court is not able to perceive that the objection is entitled to any weight, as the income taxes therein imposed are required to be assessed on the incomes of individuals, and the one hundred and seventeenth section of the same act expressly authorizes the individual to omit from his return of gains, profits, and income the amount of income received from institutions or corporations whose officers, as required by law, withhold a per centum of the dividends made by such institutions, and pay the same to the officer authorized to receive such payments. Important amendments were made by that act to some of the sections of the prior act, but the one hundred and twenty-second section, under which the tax in controversy was assessed, was left in full force and operation, without any change, alteration, or modification of any kind.

Such a dividend as that made by a railroad company is not required to be included in the return made by the shareholder of his gains, profits, and income, but is expressly required by law to be returned by the president or treasurer of the railroad company, as before explained, and the act of Congress in terms provides, that the Company shall be liable to and pay the tax, no matter when or where, or to whatsoever party or persons the dividend may be payable.—(14 Stat. at Large, 139 and 478.)

Prior to that time the rule had been different, as the one hundred and sixteenth section of the act of the third of March, 1865, expressly required that the amount of income received from such institutions by a shareholder, should be included in his return to the assessor, but the power to lay and collect taxes for Federal purposes is vested in Congress, and Congress having repealed that provision and substituted another in its place, requiring the return to be made by the president or treasurer of the company, and having finally authorized the shareholders to omit the amounts received from that source from their returns, the argument would seem to be concluded, unless it be assumed that some one or all of these regulations transcend the power of Congress under the Constitution, which is not pretended.—(13 Stat. at Large, 479; 14 Stat. at Large, 478.)

Argument to show that a railroad company may be taxed for Federal purposes is certainly unnecessary, as the theory is not controverted, and the proposition that the dividends of such a company are the proper objects of such taxation, is also self evident. Congress may tax such a dividend before it is paid to the holders of the securities, either as the property of the company or of the shareholders, at the election of Congress; nor can either party have any just ground of complaint if proper regulations are enacted to apportion and distribute the burden.

Power to tax either the company or the shareholder being admitted, the only question which can arise in this case, is a question of construction, and the court is of the opinion that the act of Congress imposes the tax in controversy upon the railroad company. Having come to that conclusion, it is not necessary to enter into any discussion of the question whether the action of trespass will lie in such a case against the collector of the revenue. He acts under a warrant or other process from the assessor, and it may well be doubted whether he can be regarded as a trespasser, unless it appears that he exceeds his jurisdiction. Several cases decide that the party taxed must pay the tax and bring assumpsit to recover back the money.—(Philadelphia v. Collector, 5 Wall. 731. Assessor v. Osborn, 9 Wall. 574.)

Neither party, however, raised any such question in the court below, nor has it been discussed in this court, and in view of those facts the court is not inclined to decide it at the present time.

Three other cases were heard at the same time which depend upon the same principles as the case just decided. They are as follows: (1) Barnes & al. v. The Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., in which the tax, as in the preceding case, was levied upon the dividend. (2) Same v. The Lake Superior and Mississippi Railroad Co., in which the tax was levied upon the half-year's interest for the period specified in the preceding statement. (3) Same v. The Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Co., in which the tax is also levied upon the interest for the same half-year, as in the next preceding case.

Judgment is reversed in each of the four cases, and the respective causes are remanded for further proceedings, in conformity to the opinion of the court.

BARNES AND KERNS v. HARRISBURG, PORTSMOUTH, MT. JOY, & LANCASTER R. R. CO.
SAME v. PHILADELPHIA & TRENTON R. R. CO.

Though the dividend in these cases was not declared by the railroad companies until after January 1st, 1870, yet it being upon the earnings for a period of time wholly within the year 1869, the same rule applies as in the preceding cases. So, likewise, the tax upon an instalment of semi-annual interest falling due the 1st of January, 1870, follows the same rule.

December Term, Nos. 19 and 20, 1872.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court, at Washington, March 10th, 1873.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States, for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

Internal revenue taxes were assessed against the corporation plaintiffs by the assessor of the first collection district, charged with that duty, and the plaintiffs denying the legality of the assessment refused to pay the tax, and the collector having distrained the goods and chattels mentioned in the declaration, as the means of enforcing payment, the plaintiffs brought an action of trespass against him and his deputy, claiming damages for the alleged unlawful seizure and detention of the goods and chattels.

Enough appears in the record to show that the plaintiffs are a railroad company; that being indebted for money to a large amount, they issued bonds for the same, or other evidences of indebtedness, payable with interest, or with coupons representing interest, in one or more years subsequent to their date. On the tenth of January, 1870, the railroad company declared a dividend in money amounting to the sum of forty-three thousand five hundred and sixty-seven dollars and sixty-three cents on their capital stock, as part of their income and gains made and which accrued between the first of July, 1869, and the first of January following.

Apart from the dividend, an instalment of semi-annual interest also fell due at the same time, amounting to twenty-one thousand dollars, which accrued during the same six months for which the dividend of the income and gains was declared. Due return was made by the railroad company of the amount of the dividend and interest to the assessor of internal revenue for the first collection district, and a tax of five per cent. on the amount was assessed by the proper revenue authorities, which is the tax in controversy, and for which the distraint was made, as alleged in the pleadings.

Detailed statement of the pleadings is unnecessary, as they are the same as in the preceding case, and all the questions presented for decision are the same, except one, which will be made the subject of special examination. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs in the Circuit Court, and the defendants brought a writ of error and removed the cause into this court.

Such a dividend, declared by such a company, in money, due or payable to their stockholders as part of the earnings, profits, income, or gains of the company, it was decided in the preceding case, rendered the company liable to the tax of five per cent. on the amount of such income or gains, as more fully explained in the opinion delivered in that case, and the court is of the opinion that the tax on the semi-annual instalment of interest is within the same principle, and that it must be governed by the same rule.

Suppose that is so, still it is insisted by the plaintiffs that the rule there adopted is not applicable in this case, as the dividend was not declared within the six months specified in the pleadings, and because neither the dividend nor the interest was due or payable to the stockholders until the tenth of January following. Beyond doubt the two cases differ in that respect, and the question in this case is whether the admitted fact that the dividend was not declared within the half-year during which the income and gains were made, takes the case out of the rule adopted in the other case.

Much weight would be due to that suggestion if the tax was a tax upon the shareholder, but the court has already decided that the tax imposed by that provision is a tax upon the railroad company, and the court adheres to that conclusion, which is confirmed by the fact that the object made taxable by that section is not only "any dividend declared," but the language also extends to "all profits of such company carried to the account of any fund, or used for construction," showing that Congress intended that such company shall be subject to and pay a tax of five per centum on the amount of all such interest or coupons, dividends or profits, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable, and to whatsoever party or person the same may ultimately belong.

Tested by these considerations, it is quite clear that it is the fund which accrued within the half-year which Congress intended to tax, and the record shows that every dollar of the fund taxed in this case accrued within the last six months of the year preceding the time when the dividend was actually declared.

Although the dividend was not declared until the tenth of January, 1870, yet it is true that the object taxed is the fund which accrued within the last six months of the preceding year, and it is certain that the fund taxed does not include a dollar of the income or gains of the company for the succeeding year. Concede that, and still it is insisted by the plaintiffs that the dividend cannot be regarded as income and gains of the company for the six months specified in the pleadings, because it was not actually declared as such by the company within that period, but the court is not able to adopt that construction of the act, as it would enable the company to postpone the payment of such a tax for six months, or even for a year, whenever they pleased, by omitting to declare a dividend, which would be inconsistent with the plain intent of Congress, as manifested by the language employed in the section imposing the tax.

Taxes illegally exacted under the revenue laws of the United States may be recovered back, if paid under protest, in an action of assumpsit against the collector, but the person taxed cannot enjoin the collector from enforcing payment, and very grave doubts are entertained whether trespass against the collector is a proper remedy under existing laws. No such error, however, having been assigned in the case, the court will not decide the point at the present time.—(14 Stat. at Large, 475, sec. 10.)

Barnes and others v. The Philadelphia and Trenton Railroad Company, No. 20 on the calendar, was also argued at the same time, and must be disposed of in the same way, as it depends upon the same rule of decision; it appearing that the tax was assessed on a dividend and a fund from profits, income, and gains set apart for construction and repairs.

Judgment reversed in each of these cases, and the respective causes are remanded for further proceedings in conformity to the opinion of the court.

to force its citizens to drink only water. These cases form a very large portion of the legal literature of Massachusetts, and exhibit the folly of enforcing total abstinence, by a law which is broken every day and every hour in the city of Boston.

It is notorious, that liquor may be had in every hotel, restaurant and oyster saloon in Boston. The law is, in fact, a dead letter, the evil being to encourage deception, falsehood and fraud, and to accustom citizens to a daily violation of law.

Messrs. Reuter & Alley, of Boston, are the most extensive brewers in the United States, producing 118,000 barrels of ale per annum.

In a very able article in the British Quarterly Review for April, 1872, on the licensing system, written by a true friend of temperance, we find the following: "Boston is the chief city of the State of Massachusetts, in which the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited. When an investigation was set on foot, into the working of the prohibitory law in Boston, it was found that there were about 2000 places where liquor could be obtained." The author of a new and interesting book on the United States, says, with reference to the prohibitory legislation on liquors: "Wherever an overwhelming temperance sentiment exists, wherever, in short, the majority of the people are opposed to the use of liquors, prohibitory legislation succeeds." In all other cases it has proved a failure. In Massachusetts, the people were spending £2 per head on strong drinks in the face of the Maine liquor law. "We are all for the Maine law," said a man to Mr. Macrea, "but we are agin its enforcement." The law had in fact gone further than popular sentiment would bear it out.

The brewers in Philadelphia produce 600,000 barrels of malt liquor annually, giving employment to nearly one thousand men, and consuming in its manufacture a million and a half bushels of barley, of the value of $1.10 per bushel.

Ale is a healthy liquor, and lager beer is a favorite beverage, particularly of our large German population.

The question of license or no license is to be submitted to the citizens of the city of Philadelphia, at the general election in October, and if the vote is against license, then the city will be under a prohibitory liquor law during the whole centennial celebration, to which we have invited the whole country. On the 4th of July, 1776, every patriot drank to the Independence of the thirteen States. Shall it be, that on the 4th of July, 1876, all we can lawfully offer to our guests on this great anniversary, will be a glass of Schuylkill water, seasoned with a lump of Knickerbocker ice?

I am a strong believer in temperance. For twenty-five years of my life I drank nothing but water, but a dangerous illness made a strong stimulant an absolute necessity, and by the advice of my physician, I am obliged occasionally to resort to it. Some of my friends, older than myself, have drank wine all their lives, and are temperate men. I believe in moral suasion as the true means of advancing the temperance cause, but I do not believe in a prohibitory law, which would reduce us to the condition of Boston.

Court of Common Pleas of Lycoming County.

STACK v. O'HARA.

1. A Catholic priest duly ordained, and appointed pastor of a church, may file his bill against the bishop of his diocese for a wrongful interference with the exercise of his office as pastor.
2. Such an injury is local, and within the spirit and meaning of the act of 1859, relating to the service of bills in equity upon non-resident defendants.
3. On a motion to dismiss a bill for want of jurisdiction, the allegations therein contained must be regarded as capable of being proved.

Opinion by GAMBLE, P. J. Delivered March 10th, 1873.

The question before the court arises upon a motion of defendant's counsel to quash the service of the bill and subpœna issued thereon.

1st. Because the defendant resides beyond and without the jurisdiction of the court.

2d. Because the court had no jurisdiction over the subject matter, or the person of the defendant.

3d. Because the joinder of other parties complainant was without their authority and fraudulent, and could not give to the court jurisdiction; and

4th. Because the said suit in equity is not concerning goods, chattels, lands, tenements, or hereditaments, etc., situate or being within the jurisdiction of the court.

When the subpœna was awarded in this case to be served on the defendant residing or being out of the county of Lycoming, there were eight other parties complainant on the record who claimed to be members of the Church of the Annunciation, situate in this county, contributors in money in aid of the purchase and erection of the church and premises, pewholders in the same and of those for whose use the legal title to the same was held by the defendant, and charged that the defendant had illegally attempted to remove the pastor of said church, and prayed the court to enjoin the defendant from interfering in any way or manner with the exercise by the Rev. M. P. Stack of his office of pastor of said church, except as provided by the laws of the Catholic Church, in which the defendant was a bishop.

After the granting of the preliminary injunction as prayed for, and on the day appointed for hearing a motion to dissolve the same, six of these parties plaintiff presented their petitions under oath, alleging that their names had been used without their authority, and praying the court to dismiss the bill, &c. On the same day affidavits of defendant and others were filed in the cause, and a motion entered by defendant's counsel to dismiss the bill for reasons filed. Two days thereafter the petition of one other of those parties plaintiff similar in tenor was filed. An affidavit filed by the remaining plaintiff, M. P. Stack, denied that their names had been used without authority, &c.

After argument, the court allowed those parties to withdraw as parties complainant, without prejudice to the remaining complainant.

It is contended in this argument that the jurisdiction of the court having attached, was not affected by the withdrawal of these parties plaintiff.

It is also contended that there was a personal service of this bill on the defendant in this county on the 11th day of November, 1872. Without stopping to consider these propositions, I proceed to the one more clearly established in my judgment, namely, that this court has such jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy as to authorize and require the process to issue as directed by the act of Assembly of April 6th, 1859. That act provides that it shall be lawful for any court of this commonwealth, having equity jurisdiction, upon special motion of the plaintiff or plaintiffs in any suit in equity, which has been instituted therein concerning goods, chattels, lands tenements or hereditaments, or for the perpetuating of the testimony concerning any lands, tenements, &c., situate or being within the jurisdistion of such court, or concerning any charge, lien, judgment, mortgage, or incumbrance thereon, &c., to order and direct that any subpœna or other process to be had in such suit, be served on any defendants therein, then residing or being out of the jurisdiction of such court, wherever he, she, or they may reside or be found. By the act of Assembly of June 16th, 1836, the jurisdiction and powers of a court of chancery are conferred upon the courts of common pleas so far as relates to the supervision and control of unincorporated societies or associations and the care of all trust moneys and property.

The plaintiff's bill in this suit claims and avers that he is a regularly ordained priest in the ministry of the Catholic Church, and as such was designated and duly appointed, in the year 1866, pastor of the Non-German Catholics of Williamsport, and charged with the duty of organizing a parish or congregation of such persons, the procuring of means for the erection of a church edifice, the erection of the same, and ministering therein.

That through his diligent exertions, means were collected, and a church edifice known as the Church of the Annunciation was erected and dedicated to worship in 1868, and that he, the plaintiff, is the duly constituted priest or pastor of said church and congregation, entitled to do and perform the faculties and functions of a regularly ordained priest of the Catholic Church, in the said church at Williamsport, and in and among the said congregation.

That on or about the 6th day of November, 1871, he received from the defendant, as bishop of the diocese in which the said Church of the Annunciation is included, a note, charging that his administration of the affairs connected with the said church had been such that he, the bishop, was compelled to remove him and leave the church vacant, and forbidding him to exercise any priestly functions in Williamsport, and avers that the defendant continues to enforce such removal, and forcibly to deprive him of the revenue, rights, and perquisites, and the exercise of the faculties and functions pertaining to his said office of pastor to the said church and congregation.

That he is not aware that he has been guilty of any mal-administration of the affairs of said church, or any act done or duty left undone which could justly subject him to ecclesiastical censure or punishment. That no specification of any offence has been made against him, no hearing or trial of any kind whatever accorded to him. That the action of the defendant and its attempted enforcement of the same in this regard, is unauthorized by and contrary to the laws of the Catholic Church and to the law of the land; and praying that the defendant may be restrained from depriving the plaintiff from the pastorate of said church, or in any manner interfering with the exercise of his office of pastor of the same, except as is provided by the laws of the Catholic Church in which said defendant is a bishop.

If the complaints and charges specified in this bill are established by the proof (and we must so regard them upon this question of jurisdiction), a court of equity alone can give the specific relief prayed for; all that could be recovered in a court at law would be damages, hence, a court of equity is the appropriate tribunal to grant the relief sought for in this suit. But the proceedings of the Court of Common Pleas, when sitting in equity, like actions in the common law courts, are either local or transitory; local when they involve the control over property, real or personal, having its situs within the county; transitory when their decrees are to effect only the conscience of the defendant. When the relief sought is to be accomplished by personal restraint or control, the service of the process on the defendant, within any county, gives jurisdiction to the court of that county without regard to locality. In other words, the jurisdiction is transitory, following the person of the defendant, because the decree is to be enforced only by personal restraint. But when the subject matter of the controversy is local, or the enforcement of the decree may involve the exercise of direct control over property, the jurisdiction is necessarily limited to the court of that county where the property is situated. Thus arose the necessity often of sending the process of the court, in such cases, beyond its territorial jurisdiction, or else denying to parties injured, any adequate remedy. To meet this necessity the act of the 6th of April, 1859, before recited, was enacted, embracing in the most comprehensive language all suits concerning goods, chattels, lands tenements or hereditaments, situated or being within the jurisdiction of the court. The definition of chattels real, given by Coke I., Inst. 118, "are such as concern or savor of the realty, as terms for years of land, the next presentation to a church, &c., and these are called real chattels, as being interests issuing out of or annexed to real estate."

According to the common law of England the appropriate remedy for the disturbance of the right of presentation to a church or ecclesiastical benefice, was an action of Quœre Impedit, which is classed as a local action. (1 Bouvier's Law Dictionary, title Action, p. 52; 3 Blackstone's Commentaries, 246.) In defining local and transitory actions, Blackstone says: "They are local when founded on privity of estate, where posession of land is to be recovered, or damages for an actual trespass, or for waste affecting land, but for injuries that might have happened anywhere, as debt, slander, &c., they are transitory. (3 Blackstone's Commentaries, 294.)

The injury complained of here is local, and could not have happened elsewhere; the complainant avers that he is not only suffering illegal and unauthorized ecclesiastical domination, in being forbidden to exercise his ministerial functions, but also that he has been ousted of the possession and deprived of the use, occupancy, and enjoyment of the church and the means of ministering to the congregation, and asks to be reinstated in the possession and enjoyment of the same. The case as presented in the bill necessarily involves the question of the plaintiff's right to occupy the church building for a qualified purpose, or in other words, his right of possession of real estate within the jurisdiction of this court, a species of title none the less a right from being qualified, and which must be adjudicated in the appropriate local tribunal. To give the relief asked for, the locus in quo must be in the absolute jurisdiction of the court. We think, therefore, that the subject matter of this suit is within the spirit and meaning of the act of 1859, entitled "An act to authorize execution of process in certain cases in equity, concerning property within the jurisdiction of the court, and on defendants not resident or found therein." 1. The 120th, 121st, 122d and 123d sections of the act of Congress, June 30th, 1864, relate to the tax on income, whether derived from any source whatever, imposed by the 116th section, and their sole purpose was, not to impose a new tax, but to provide a different mode of collection from the taxpayer.

2. The tax upon dividends made, and interest payable, by railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation and slack-water companies, for the payment and collection of which provision was made by the 122d section, was a tax on income, within the meaning of section 116, and not a different and independent tax.
3. That the tax upon all income, without regard to its source, derived or received by the taxpayer prior to January 1st, 1870, expired with the close of the next preceding year.
4. The dividends declared by defendants in error, not being payable until after the 1st of January, 1870, were not taxable as income of 1869.

In error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Justice STRONG dissenting. December Term, 1872. Delivered, March 10th, 1873.

I am unable to concur in the construction which a majority of my brethren have given to the acts of Congress relative to the income tax, and consequently I dissent from the judgments which have been directed in these cases. The reasons for this dissent I propose now to give, as briefly as I can.

Whatever may be said of the earlier acts of Congress, that of June 30th, 1864 (13 Stat. at Large, p. 284), as amended by the acts of 1866 and 1867, provided a complete system of taxation upon incomes. The 116th section, which is the first that had reference to the subject (14 Stat. at Large, 477), enacted that there should be levied, collected and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income of every person residing in the United States, or of any citizen of the United States residing abroad, whether derived from any kind of property, rents, interest, dividends, or salaries, or from any profession, trade, employment, or vocation carried on in the United States or elsewhere, or from any source whatever, a tax of five per centum on the amount so derived over one thousand dollars, and that a like tax should be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the gains, profits, and income of every business, trade, or profession carried on in the United States by persons residing without the United States and not citizens thereof. The same section declared that the tax therein provided for should be assessed, collected, and paid upon the gains, profits, or income for the year ending the 31st day of December next preceding the time for levying, collecting, and paying said duty. What that time was directed to be, as well as the duration of the tax, was defined by the 119th section, which enacted as follows: "That the taxes on incomes herein imposed shall be levied on the 1st day of March, and be due and payable on or before the 30th day of April in each year."

No language could be more comprehensive. It embraces income of every description, whether derived from labor or property, and it particularly mentions income derived from interest and dividends, adding the words, "or from any source whatever." It is not to be doubted that it includes income derived from dividends on stock held in railroad companies, and income received as interest on bonds of such companies. This section, I think, is the only one that imposes any income tax. All the other sections, from the 117th to the 123d inclusive, are classified under the title "income," and they relate to it, but they are provisions for the ascertainment of the amount, and for the collection of the tax. None of them impose any new or different tax upon the taxpayer. They all have reference to that income made taxable by the 116th section. That, it was known, might be derived from various sources, and provision was made for ascertaining its amount, as well as for collecting the tax upon every item composing it. The 117th section, as amended by the act of 1867, required that there should be included in the estimate, inter alia, the share of any person of the gains and profits of all companies, whether incorporated or partnership, who would be entitled to the same if divided, whether divided or otherwise, "except the amount of income received from institutions or corporations whose officers, as required by law, withhold a per centum of the dividends made by such institutions, and pay the same to the officer authorized to receive the same, and except that portion of the salary or pay received for services in the civil, military, or naval, or other service of the United States, including senators, representatives, and delegates in Congress, from which the tax has been deducted." But these exceptions recognize the dividends and interest received from such companies, and the gains from the salaries or pay of United States officers, as a part of the taxpayer's income. It is his share of the gains and profits of the companies, or corporations, and not the gains of the companies themselves which the exceptions direct shall not be included. The reason of this is too obvious to escape notice, unless it be forgotten that the 117th section is but part of a system for levying and collecting an income tax. If it be construed, as it must be, in connection with the other sections relating to the same subject, it is plain that its purpose was to ascertain only that part of a person's incomes, the tax upon which the next following section (the 118th) required should be paid by the taxpayer himself to the collector, leaving that part of his income, which consisted of his share of the gains and profits of institutions or corporations whose officers, as required by law, withheld a per centum of its dividends, and paid the same to the officer authorized to receive it, to be ascertained, and the tax thereon to be collected by the companies themselves. A special mode of collecting the tax on such dividends, interest, and government salaries was intended to be provided, and was actually provided.

Passing by the 118th and 119th sections, which relate to the manner of making returns, of that part of a taxpayer's income, the tax upon which he is required to pay directly to the collector, I come to the 120th, 121st, 122d, and 123d sections. They all relate to that portion of the taxpayer's income excepted by the 117th section from the return which he is required to make to the assessor by the 118th section. They provide for the collection of the tax upon that portion. The 120th imposes a duty of five per centum on all dividends in scrip and money thereafter declared due, wherever and whenever the same shall be payable to stockholders, policy-holders, or depositors, as part of the earnings, income, or gains of any bank, trust company, or savings institution, and of any fire, marine, life, or inland insurance company, either stock or mutual. This tax the banks and other institutions described were required to pay, and they were authorized to withhold from all payments made on account of any dividends or sums of money that may be due and payable as aforesaid, the said duty of five per centum. It is unnecessary to notice particularly the 121st section.

The 122d section enacted "that any railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation or slack-water company, indebted for any money for which bonds or other evidence of indebtedness have been issued, payable in one or more years after date, upon which interest is stipulated to be paid, or coupons representing the interest, or any such company that may have declared any dividend in scrip or money due or payable to its stockholders, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, as part of the earnings, profits, income, or gains of such company, * * * shall be subject to and pay a tax of five per centum on the amount of all such interest or coupons, dividends or profits, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable, and to whatsoever party or person the same may be payable, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, and said companies are hereby authorized to deduct and withhold from all payments on account of any interest or coupons, and dividends, due and payable as aforesaid, the tax of five per centum, and the payment of the amount of said tax so deducted from the interest or coupons, or dividends, and certified by the president or treasurer of said company, shall discharge said company from that amount of the dividend, or interest, or coupons on the bonds or other evidences of their indebtedness so held by any person or party whatever, except where said companies may have contracted otherwise."

The 123d section enacted that there should be levied, collected, and paid on the excess above one thousand dollars of all salaries of officers of the United States, a tax of five per centum, and it required paymasters and disbursing officers to deduct and withhold said tax when making payment to such officers.

All these sections, I think, relate to the tax upon income, whether derived from interest, dividends, or from any source whatever, imposed by the 116th section, and their sole purpose was, not to impose a new tax, but to provide a different mode of collection from the taxpayer. The dividends, interest, and salaries mentioned in them were not required by the 117th and 118th sections to be included in the general estimate, or in the return made to the assistant assessor, because their amount was as certainly ascertainable by the corporations or officers required to collect the tax, as it could have been by any return of the taxpayer, and it was more easily and certainly collectable.

I need not say more upon this branch of the case. If there could be a doubt in any mind that the tax for the collection and payment of which provision was made in the 122d section, was a part of that imposed upon income by the 116th, it must be set at rest by the decision in Jackson v. The Northern Central Railway, a case tried in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Maryland, and subsequently removed here. The primary question in that case was whether the tax on interest payable by railroad companies (namely, the tax spoken of in the 122d section) was chargeable against non-resident aliens, and it was ruled by the chief justice that it was not. The ruling was based upon the position that the tax on such interest was the same as that imposed by the 116th section of the act of 1864, viz., a part of the income tax, and that as the 116th section did not include non-resident aliens, the tax on interest spoken of in the 122d was not chargeable against them—the deduction of five per cent. being only a mode of collecting the income tax. This decision was subsequently affirmed in the Supreme Court, 7 Wallace, 262, and the language of the court was as follows: "The decision was placed mainly upon the ground that, looking at the several provisions bearing upon the question, and giving to them a reasonable construction, it was believed not to be the intent of Congress to impose an income tax on non-resident aliens; that they were not only not included in the description of persons upon whom the tax was imposed, but were impliedly excluded by confining it to residents of the United States and citizens residing abroad [an exclusion only found in the 116th section], and that the deduction from the prescribed income of the interest on these railroad bonds, when paid by the companies, was regarded as simply a mode of collecting this part of the income tax. We concur in this view." I understand this case as determining several things: First, that the 116th and 122d sections of the act of 1864 are parts of one system, devised for income taxation; Second, that the tax on railroad dividends, and on interest of railroad indebtedness, is not a different tax from that imposed upon income generally; and, Third, that the 122d section was intended merely to provide a special mode of collection for a part of the tax.

This decision was made, it is true, before the act of 1864, as amended by the act of 1866, had been again amended by the act of 1867, but the later amendment made no other change in the law than extending its provisions so as to embrace dividends and interest payable to non-resident aliens. Regarding it, then, as an incontrovertible proposition, that the tax mentioned in the 122d section is not a different tax from that imposed by the 116th; that it is a part of the tax levied upon income generally, no matter from what source derived, and that the purpose of the section was to provide a special mode of collection of the tax upon income consisting of railroad interest and dividends, I cannot comprehend why it did not expire with the expiration of the tax upon other income. When that expired was determined by the 119th section, which was in the following words: "The taxes on incomes herein imposed shall be levied on the first day of May, and be due and payable on or before the thirtieth day of June of each year, until and including the year 1870, and no longer." Whatever else this clause may mean, it manifestly embraces in terms taxes on income from any source; all income upon which the act imposes a tax. It excepts none. It does not speak of taxes on income, a return of which is required to be made by the taxpayer to the assessor, but its language is "taxes on incomes herein imposed." As the 119th section imposed no tax, the reference must be to the income tax imposed by all parts of the act; to all of them, as well as those upon railroad dividends, &c., as well as those imposed upon dividends of telegraph, manufacturing, or other companies, or upon income from any source.

The clause is also a clear enactment that the income to which it refers should not be subject to a tax, unless derived or received prior to January 1st, 1870. No one who carefully reads the whole act can doubt that the 119th section must be construed in connection with the 116th, and that it speaks of the income made taxable by that section. That enacted, as has already been noticed, that the tax thereby imposed, including the tax on income derived from dividends and interest, should "be assessed, collected, and paid upon gains, profits, and income for the year ending the 31st day of December next, preceding the time for levying, collecting, and paying said tax." Incontestably, therefore, though the last annual tax was required to be levied on the 1st of March, 1870, it was required to be a tax on the income of the year 1869. Hence it is plain, the provision that the taxes on income should be levied on the 1st of March in each year, until and including the year 1870, and no longer, must mean that the income of 1870 should not be subject to taxation.

I think, therefore, these two propositions are beyond any reasonable doubt, or I should so think, were it not that a majority of my brethren are of a different opinion.

1. The tax upon dividends made, and interest payable, by railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation, and slack-water companies, for the payment and collection of which provision was made by the 122d section, was a tax on income within the meaning of the 116th section, and not a different and independent tax.

2. That the tax upon all income, without regard to its source, "derived" or "received" by the taxpayer prior to January, 1st, 1870, expired with the close of the next preceding year.

These conclusions are demanded, I think, alike by the letter of the act of Congress and by its spirit. To my mind they seem to be the only reasonable construction that can be given to it. I see nothing to warrant the belief that Congress intended to impose a burden upon income from one species of property, greater or longer continued than that imposed upon income from other property, or that they intended to discriminate against Federal officers and compel them to pay a tax on their salaries, after taxes upon all other salaries had ceased. The dividends received by a shareholder of a railroad company, or a canal, turnpike, or slack-water navigation company, or of a banking, trust, or insurance company, are, in every sense, as much his income as are the dividends he may receive from any other company; for example, a bridge, or a manufacturing corporation. So is the interest received for loans to a railroad company as truly income of the bondholder, as is the interest received by him from permanent loans to any other corporation, or to natural persons. Was it the intention of Congress to enact that one who lent his money to a telegraph company, or to a mining or manufacturing company, should be exempt from a tax upon his interest received after December 31st, 1869; but that one who lent to a canal or railroad company should continue to pay the tax indefinitely and for all time? Is such a reasonable construction of the act of 1864 and its amendments? I cannot believe it. I cannot attribute to Congress any such injustice. The act shows no intent to make any such discriminations. Yet such discriminations are made, if the tax mentioned in the 122d section, as well as that mentioned in the 123d, did not expire when the tax on other income expired.

I come now to the question—important to be considered in view of the pleadings in these cases—whether the tax mentioned in the 122d section was a tax upon the railroad companies, or a tax upon the stockholders and bondholders of those companies. In regard to this there ought to be no doubt. If it was a tax upon the railroad company, then the income of the stockholders and bondholders, derived from their dividends and interest, was exempt from all income tax, although the 116th section taxed income derived from any source, including interest and dividends. Such income was not to be returned to the assessor, and if not taxed in the mode designated in the 122d section, it was not taxed at all. To such an absurdity the construction that the section lays a tax upon the railroad company for its income, inevitably leads.

But look now at the language of the section. It required any railroad company indebted for any money for which bonds or other evidence of indebtedness have been issued, bearing interest, payable one or more years after date, or any such company that should declare any dividend as part of the earnings, profits, or gains of such company, should be subject to, and pay a tax of five per centum on all such interest, dividends, or profits, whenever and wherever the same should be payable, and to whatsoever party or person the same should be payable, and authorized the companies to deduct and withhold from all payments on account of any interest or dividends, due and payable as aforesaid, the tax of five per centum. It further enacted that the payment of the amount so deducted from the interest or dividends should discharge the company from that amount of the dividend, or interest, due to the stockholder or bondholder. It is too clear for argument that this was a collection of the tax from the stockholder, or creditor, and not from the company, and we have, in effect, so decided in the tonnage-tax cases to-day. Not a dollar was to be taken from the treasury of the company. The tax was to come wholly from the share, or the bondholder. The company was constituted the mere tax collector, and was made liable only in default of its duty as such. If authorities are needed in support of so plain a proposition, they may be found in Jackson v. Railroad Company, cited above, and in Haight v. Railroad Company, 6 Wallace, 15—both construing this act. Indeed, in some of the States this mode of collecting a tax from shareholders and bondholders of corporations has of late been frequently adopted, and, so far as I know, it has never before been thought that the tax in such cases was a tax upon the companies, instead of a tax upon their shareholders or creditors. As well might it be claimed, that when a tax collector is charged with the amount of the duplicate of taxes he is empowered by his warrant to collect, the taxes are laid upon him, and not upon those from whom he is required to collect them.

But the opinion of the majority of my brethren, that by the 122d section Congress intended to tax the railroad companies for their gains, profits, and income, and not to tax their bondholders and shareholders, leads to a very remarkable result. The interest due from the companies to their creditors—interest which accrued in 1869—is treated as income of the companies for that year, and they are taxed for it. Such is the effect of the judgments entered. The companies are compelled to pay an income tax, not upon what they received, but upon what they were obliged to pay to their creditors. A construction of the act of Congress that leads to such a result cannot be right. It seems to me the fact, that the tax was exacted out of interest payable by the companies, as well as from dividends declared and payable by them, demonstrates that Congress had in view, in the 122d section, not the income of the companies, nor a tax upon them for it, but the income of share and bondholders, and a tax upon them. Railroad companies were taxed upon their gains in another section (the 103d). They were not intended to be taxed in this.

Holding it, then, to be very clear that this section imposed no new tax, and that its design was merely to provide a mode of collection of a part of the income tax imposed by the 116th section upon the holders of the bonds and stock of railroad companies, the question is not, in my judgment, what the majority of the court considers it to be, whether the income upon which the tax in controversy in these cases was attempted to be levied, was the income of the railroad companies for 1869, but whether it was the income of the stockholders and bondholders for that year. In two of the cases the dividends were declared in December, 1869, but were made payable in January, 1870. They were not, therefore, receivable until 1870. In all the other cases the dividends were declared, and the interest fell due in the year last mentioned. True, the dividends were out of profits made by the companies in 1869, and the interest on the debt due by them accrued in that year. But were the dividends and the interest income of the stockholders and bondholders then? Plainly, that which was the income of the companies in one year may not have been the income of their shareholders or creditors until the next. If it was not their income until 1870, it was not taxable against them, and the tax claimed in these cases is, as I have shown, a tax upon them. That nothing was income of the taxpayers until it was receivable by them is most apparent. The act itself sufficiently shows this. It was income "derived" or received, either actually or potentially, that alone was made taxable. The tax was levied "whenever" and wherever the dividends or interest should become payable. The companies were required to render returns to the assessors, or assistant assessors, on the tenth day of the month following that in which the interest, coupons, or dividends became "due and payable." (Vide sec. 122.) The tax was an excise. It was taking out of the income a part of it, and it must, therefore, have been a tax upon something received, or receivable—something out of which the tax could be paid when exacted. And such was the uniform construction given to the act of Congress by the government, until after the tax had expired. Prior to the act of 1864 there was a tax on dividends of three per cent., and when by that act the rate was raised to five per cent., the commissioner of internal revenue issued a circular, dated July 1st, 1864, declaring that 'all dividends payable on and after July 1st, 1864, no matter when declared, are subject to the duty of five per centum." I have no doubt, therefore, that the dividends declared, and the interest accrued, must be regarded as income of the stockholders, or bondholders, for the year in which they became payable. It is quite immaterial, then, that the profits of the companies were made, or that the interest on their debt accrued, in 1869. They were not the taxpayers, and the tax was not levied upon their income. It was levied only upon that part of their gains or the interest due from them, which had become payable to, and, therefore, income of their shareholders and bondholders. Those persons have paid taxes upon the full income of six entire years under the act of 1864. The judgments in these cases compel them to pay a tax upon their income for six years and a half, when all other persons whose income was derived from interest or dividends in other companies, were relieved at the expiration of six years. In my judgment, the act of Congress warrants no such injustice.

I think the judgments in all the cases should be affirmed, and I am authorized to say that the chief justice and Justices Davis and Field concur in this dissent.

DOBBINS v. URLGUS.

1. Attachment executions are collateral processes to the regular actions between the parties for the same debt or duty, and are not incompatible with them, except so far as they actually interfere in their enforcement, or endanger the rights of some of the parties.
2. As collateral process they are under the control of the courts, as in other cases, where several remedies are employed for the same debt or injury.
3. An attachment execution will not be set aside, because process had been issued to collect the debt secured by the judgment, or a mortgage, its cumulative security, before the attachment was levied.
4. The rule is, that the plaintiff may have as many forms of execution as the law may afford, and pursue them all at the same time, until satisfaction be obtained upon one of them.
5. If there appeared to be an attempt to look up the assets of the defendant, and oppress him by attaching an amount of property far beyond the sum of the debt, or to multiply costs against him, the court would interfere, and set aside such oppressive writs.

Rule to set aside all execution.

Opinion of the court by Ross, P. J.

This rule was applied for, and the defendant now asks that it shall be made absolute, because process had been issued to collect the amount secured by the judgment, and the mortgage, its cumulative security, at the time this writ issued.

The defendant contends that the plaintiff has no right to more than one form of execution at a time; and until it appears that the execution proper will not produce satisfaction, he cannot resort to another execution, or process in the nature of an execution.

In dealing with questions which arise under our statutes, in relation to attachment executions, it is well to bear in mind the remark of C. J. Lowrie, in Kase v. Kase, 10 C. 130, that "an attachment execution procedure is such a complete departure from all common law forms, that we ought hardly to think of applying to it the apparent analogies of common law practice, until we have proved their fitness." An attachment execution is neither an original writ, nor is it of the same species, even if it belongs to the same genera, as an execution proper. Its real nature and character is well defined by Coulter, J., in Fitzimmon's Appeal, 4 Barr, 250, who says: "The whole process of attachment is but auxiliary to the old mode of execution, for the purpose of reaching what could not be touched or reached in that way. It bears, in all its features, unequivocal marks of being designed to aid the enforcement, and not to extinguish the effects of judgments." Adopting the same view, C. J. Lowrie, in Kase v. Kase, supra, declares that "attachment executions are collateral processes to the regular actions between the parties for the same debt or duty, and are not incompatible with them, except so far as they actually interfere in their enforcement, or endanger the rights of some of the parties. As collateral process, they are under control of the courts, as in other cases, where several remedies are employed for the same debt or injury." Vide, 5 W. & S. 222; Tams v. Wardle, 2 C. 102; Newlin v. Scott, 4 Wr. 309; Pontius v. Nesbitt et al.

The general rule unquestionably is, that the plaintiff may have as many forms of execution as the law may afford, and pursue them all at the same time until satisfaction is obtained. 4 Wr. 309; Davis v. Scott, 1 Miles, 52. and vide, authorities, supra. This rule has been extended to attachment executions. In Tams v. Wardle, supra, it was expressly ruled that the plaintiff might have an attachment execution, although an alias fieri facias was pending unexecuted and unreturned; and in Pontius v. Nesbitt, supra, it was held, that a second attachment execution might issue upon the same judgment, while a former one was still pending. These authorities would seem to abundantly demonstrate the right to issue an attachment execution, pending execution process upon the same judgment, or a cumulative security. No hardship can result to any one from this practice; for, as said by C. J. Lowrie, in Kase v. Kase, supra, "The particular process is under the control of the court, so far as to see that it is not used incautiously." If there appeared to be an intent to look up the assets of the defendant, or oppress him by attaching an amount of property far beyond the sum of the debt, the court would promptly intervene. Until such a state of facts be shown, the plaintiff can sustain his attachment process, and thus protect his debt by attaching sufficient property to satisfy it. It is not alleged here that the process was impetrated with any vexatious or oppressive intent; but the motion to set aside was based upon purely technical grounds.

It is apparent from what has been said, that the rule must be discharged.

EDMINSTER v. HARRIS.

The question whether a note or other security for debt is received as payment, is for the jury.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Bradford county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered March 17th, 1873.

If there had been any evidence in the case that the plaintiff had accepted Harris and Saltmarsh as his debtors, it would still have been a question for the jury. Hart v. Boller, 15 S. & R. 162. The fact that Edminster being one of the company, and also a creditor, agreed to an arrangement by which an assessment was to be made on the different members, and payments to be made, or notes given to Harris and Saltmarsh sufficient to pay all the debts—did not in law amount to a release of the company and an agreement to look to Harris and Saltmarsh alone. Even if the entire amount had been raised and paid to those gentlemen, where is the evidence that the plaintiff was to be responsible for their fidelity or solvency, beyond the amount of his assessment, which he was bound to pay under the agreement, and which if not paid would be a set-off to his claim in this suit? The plaintiff on the witness stand expressly denied that he had ever agreed to look to Harris and Saltmarsh, and we think on the whole case it should have been submitted to the jury to determine whether there was any such agreement.

WEST PHILA. PASSENGER RAILWAY CO. v. SAMUEL C. PERKINS et al., PUBLIC BUILDING COMMISSIONERS,

1. The franchise of building and using a railroad is private property, of which the owner cannot be deprived, except by clear and unquestionable authority, exercised within the reserved powers of the constitution.
2. The act of 1870, authorizing the erection of public buildings, does not empower the commissioners to take up the tracks of the Market street railway.
3. The right to lay railway tracks having been exercised, the grant of power therefor is exhausted.
4. A railway company accepting without legislative sanction the use of tracks, changing its line as originally laid, would imperil a forfeiture of its franchises.

Opinion of the court, by ALLISON, P. J., Delivered March 22d, 1873.

The motion made and argued by the defendants asks the court to dissolve the preliminary injunction granted on the 14th of October, 1872. The order restrained the defendants, until hearing, from removing, cutting, or in any manner interfering with or disturbing the track of the passenger railway of the West Philadelphia Passenger Railway Company, upon Market street, between Merrick and Juniper streets, as the same now exists, or from abridging or preventing their use or enjoyment.

The averments of the bill are not denied; on the contrary, they are fully confessed by the defendants, and the motion before us rests solely upon the act of Assembly, approved the 5th of August, 1870 (P. L. of 1871, page 1548), to provide for the erection of public buildings to accommodate the courts, etc., in the city of Philadelphia.

The defendants claim that this act confers not only the authority, but imposes upon them the duty of erecting the proposed buildings upon the ground now covered by the track of the railway of the plaintiff, and assert their intention to proceed to take up said track upon Market street, between Merrick and Juniper streets.

Have they the authority, as the case now stands, to carry into effect this purpose?

The act of August 5th, 1870, gives forth no uncertain or doubtful utterance. The commissioners have full power to procure plans for the buildings, employ all necessary agents to construct them, to do "all other acts necessary in their judgment to carry out the intent of said act in relation to said public buildings. They may make all needful contracts which are made valid and binding in law upon the city, and they shall have authority and are empowered to vacate so much of Market and of Broad streets as they may deem needful." It does not appear from the bill filed by the plaintiffs that there has been any formal execution of this power to vacate the portions of those streets which lie between Merrick and Juniper streets; but in the most practical manner they are about to take them from the public as highways, and to take them from the plaintiffs also for the use of the railway, thus cutting their track in two, and depriving them of all lawful connections between the portions of the track which extend eastward and westward from the site of the buildings to be erected.

There are, however, important considerations set up in the bill against this admitted purpose of the defendants. The plaintiffs claim a grant from the Legislature, approved May 14th, 1857, to use the portion of Market street in question for the construction of their railway (P. L. 1858, page 585). This grant gives to them the authority to construct a double or single track of railway from the intersection of Till, now Fortieth street and Washington or Market street, extending eastward along said Washington and Market street to Delaware Third street; a power which was carried into effect shortly after this act became a law. The railway built under this authority has been in constant use from the first hour of its completion, the corporation has therefore lost none of its powers or franchises by failure to use them; nor is it pretended that there has been any relinquishment or surrender of such powers by the company.

Upon the faith of this grant, the plaintiffs have expended their money, built and stocked their roadway, and have ever since been subject to constant and heavy outlay in the working of their road. That the property thus acquired, both as to corporate franchises and actual investment of capital, is of great value, will not be questioned. All this is the private property of the plaintiffs, which they are entitled to hold and to enjoy, as against all claimants, except such as can show a superior title; even against the State itself, unless it is taken away from them by clear and unquestionable authority, and by the exercise of a right within the reserved powers of the constitution, expressed or implied. But it is upon the constitution that the plaintiffs plant themselves in resisting this attempt to take from them their property under the act of Assembly, which is claimed by the defendants as their protection and justification.

Private property may not be taken for public use unless compensation is first made or secured to the owner. This has not been done, or attempted even to be done by the defendants; they have not sought to condemn this property that they may use it for a public purpose; they do not claim that, under the general laws of the commonwealth, the city or the State is bound to make compensation, or that by any known legal machinery, the defendants can make good out of the public treasury the loss which will fall upon them by the substantial destruction of their corporate franchises and capital invested. Of what force then is the direction contained in the act of 1870, to vacate portions of Broad and Market streets, and to use them as the site of the new public buildings? The answer is easily found in the constitutional prohibition referred to. As it stands, it is a dead letter, so far as it involves the destruction of the rights of property of the plaintiff, or the appropriation of such property, without paying or securing just compensation to the plaintiffs.

It is true that defendants have proposed to give a new line or route of railway to the plaintiffs, as a substitute for that which they intend to take from them. This route diverges from complainants' tracks at their intersection with Merrick street, and is carried around the north and south side of the site of the new buildings, intersecting again with the present railway at Broad and Juniper streets. These lines of railway have already been constructed by the defendants. This would be satisfactory, if it were not for two substantial objections—first, the plaintiffs have not the power to accept the offer of the defendants; and, second, the defendants possess no such rights as they propose to confer on the plaintiffs. The authority to lay a railway on Market street having been exercised under the grant of power by the Legislature, such power is exhausted. This right cannot be exercised over again, under the original grant, and new and different tracks be laid down in place of those already constructed; much less can a track or tracks upon different streets not specially authorized, be accepted or used for railway purposes in lieu of the present railway on Market street.

It is equally clear that the law under which the defendants are proceeding to construct public buildings, does not confer upon the city of Philadelphia the right either to build a railway upon the streets surrounding the ground to be occupied by the buildings, nor does it authorize the Market street company to construct such railway, or to acquire or use any corporate franchises thereon. This offer, therefore, though showing a proper desire on the part of the defendant to protect the plaintiffs from injury to their corporate rights and property, must be regarded as wholly failing in its purpose, and in any event would be subject to the acceptance of the plaintiffs. Such acceptance, being without legislative sanction, could not be attempted even to be carried into effect by plaintiffs without peril of forfeiture of the unquestionable rights which they now possess.

The order of the 14th of October, 1872, is therefore continued until final hearing, or until the further order of the court. Should a satisfactory arrangement be entered into, under proper legal sanction, by the parties to this suit, a modification or abnegation of the order may be applied for hereafter.

Register's Court.

In re WILL OF FRANCIS SMITH, deceased.

A republication of a will when reduced to writing, must be proved in the same manner as testamentary dispositions.

Appeal from the decree of the register of wills, admitting the will to probate.

Opinion by PEIRCE, J. Delivered March 22d, 1873.

This case comes up on two grounds: 1, For an issue to test the validity of the will; and 2, upon the insufficiency of the probate made before the register.

The decedent made his will 26th August, 1864, and signed his name to it. He made a codicil to it dated 17th April, 1858, and made his mark to it. Republication of it was subsequently made in the following words:

"I, Francis Smith, have this twenty-first day of June, 1870, had the above will and codicil read to me, and I do hereby republish the same, and being blind and unable to see, I have directed and authorized Edward Olmstead to sign to this republication my name. FRANCIS SMITH,

By Edward Olmstead, at his request.

Signed in our presence by Edward Olmstead, for Francis Smith, he being incapable from blindness to sign his name, and so signed at the request and by the direction of the said Francis Smith.

John Horn, Jr. Benjamin F. Levy.

The witnesses to the republication of the will and codicil, upon their oath and affirmation, say, that they were present and did see and hear Francis Smith, deceased, the testator therein named, republish and declare the same as and for his last will and codicil thereto, and that at the doing thereof he was of sound disposing mind, memory, and understanding, to the best of their knowledge and belief.

Was this a sufficient proof of a republication, made under the peculiar circumstances, and with the formalities of this republication?

The act of 1833 directs that every will shall be in writing, and unless the person making the same shall be prevented by the extremity of his last sickness, shall be signed by him at the end thereof, or by some person in his presence and by his express direction, and in all cases shall be proved by the oaths or affirmations of two or more competent witnesses, otherwise such will shall be of no effect.

That there may be a parol republication of a will since the act of 1833, was decided in Campbell v. Jamison, 6 Barr, 498. The proof made before the register in this case, goes no further than the proof of a parol republication. But the republication having been reduced to writing, by direction of the testator, as is alleged, and executed in the peculiar manner provided by the act, when signed by another person for him, we think, should be proved, as such testamentary dispositions are required to be proved.

It is essential to the probate of a will, to which the alleged testator did not sign his name, that it should be proved by two witnesses, that he was so infirm by reason of his last sickness as to be unable to write his name, and that it was signed for him by some person in his presence, and by his express direction. Greenough v. Greenough, 1 Jones, 489; Asay v. Hoover, 5 Barr, 21; Cavett's Appeal, 8 W. & S. 21; Ruoff's Appeal, 2 Casey, 219.

It was said at the argument of this case, that the will and codicil were proved independently of the proof of this republication, and thatr, therefore, it was not necessary to make proof of the republication. But republication may be an important part of a testamentary disposition; and, therefore, where republication of a will has been made, and especially when made in writing and annexed to the will, it forms a part of the instrument. A will is said to be ambulatory until the death of the testator; that is, it is subject to alteration, revocation, republication, and to incidents independent of any direct acts of the testator on it himself, such as marriage, birth of children, death of beneficiaries, &c.

Thus, before the act of 1833, republication of a will, carried with it the after acquired real estate of a testator. A republication of a will, which forgives debts due from children, discharges a bond taken between the making of the will and its republication. Hutchinson's Appeal, 11 Wright, 84.

A codicil duly executed, revives and republishes the will to which it refers, unless there is an expressed intent to the contrary; and this although there was a second will between the first will and the codicil thereto; and although the codicil to the first will contained no words of republication of the first will, or of revocation of the second will. Neff's Appeal, 12 Wright, 501.

A will speaks for certain purposes from its date, and from the date of every republication of it. And in a case such as this, where the mental capacity of the testator to make a will is brought in question, the state of the testator's mind at the time of republication may be a question of the most vital importance.

Therefore, as probate of this republication has not been made in the manner required by law, it must be sent back to the register, to take further proof of it.

It would not be proper to consider at this time the other question, of the mental capacity of the alleged testator to make a will, as the further proof to be taken by the register may give a new direction to the proceeding, or may otherwise have a bearing on the questions involved in the case.

The appeal is sustained, and the instrument of writing purporting to be the last will and codicil of the decedent, and the republication thereof, is remitted to the register of wills, with instructions to take further proof of said alleged republication, as is herein indicated.

COMMONWEALTH v. POWELL.

A visitor at a public place of amusement is entitled to any unoccupied seat which has not been bona fide sold. He cannot obtain a right to a seat so sold by the proprietor's neglecting to mark it taken.

Motion for a new trial.

Opinion of the court by PAXSON, J. Delivered March 22d, 1873.

This case raises an interesting question touching the rights of persons visiting places of amusement. The defendant is a special officer at Wood's Museum. On the evening of last Thanksgiving day, the prosecutor, George Keen, purchased a ticket of admission to said museum; he entered, and took his seat in that portion of the building for which the ticket had been sold. At that time there were few persons in the house, and the ushers were commencing to mark the seats as "taken." The one selected by the prosecutor had not been so marked, but immediately upon his taking it, he was informed by the defendant, that the said seat had been sold, and requested at the same time to occupy another and equally eligible one in the vicinity. This the prosecutor refused to do; whereupon the defendant forcibly removed him. For doing so, the defendant was prosecuted, and convicted of assault and battery.

A visitor at a theatre or other place of amusement is entitled to a seat. This right to some extent depends upon the character of his ticket. If for a reserved seat, he has a right to that particular seat. If not reserved, then to any one he may find unoccupied, and which had not previously been sold to another. I instructed the jury, that if the prosecutor selected a seat in that portion of the building called for by his ticket, and that there was nothing upon the said seat to indicate that it was "taken," and no notice had in fact been given prosecutor prior thereto, that it had been sold to some one else, he had a right to occupy it, and the act of the defendant in ejecting him therefrom was an assault and battery. Subsequent reflection has satisfied me that it is not so much a question of notice as of whether there had been an actual bona fide sale of that particular seat to a third party. If so, no neglect on the part of the proprietor of the museum in marking said seat as "taken," could give the prosecutor a right to that which some one else had previously bought and paid for. It will be seen that my instructions were too broad. The jury may have been misled. For this reason the defendant must have a new trial. Next to being right, nothing affords me so much pleasure as to correct a mistake.

The rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted is allowed, and the same rule is now made absolute.

ENGLAND.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER. HILTON v. AUKESON, November 21st, 1872.

1. An owner or occupier of lands, though bound to take care that his cattle do not wander from his own land, and stray upon the land of another, is under no legal obligation to put up or maintain a fence so as to prevent the cattle of his neighbor straying upon his land; such an obligation can only be founded upon a statutory obligation, or some agreement or covenant.

2. The plaintiff was the occupier of a field, which was separated from a field in the occupation of the defendant by a hedge or fence. In consequence of this fence being out of repair, the plaintiff's cattle strayed into the field of the defendant, and were seized by him as a distress damage feasant. Upon an action brought by the plaintiff for this seizure of the cattle, the pleadings raised the issue of whether or not the defendant was bound to repair the hedge through which the cattle escaped, and the only evidence of liability consisted in the practice for fifty years and upwards, of the defendant and his predecessors to repair such hedge.

3. Held, that this was in itself no proof of such liability.—27 J. T. N. S, 519.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURTS.

CIRCUIT COURT, U. S., DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA.

Decision per SAWYER, Cir. J.

1. It is a general rule that forfeitures are not favored, and that provisions in contracts for forfeitures are strictly construed.

2. These principles apply to forfeitures in policies of insurance for non-payment of premiums when due. Forfeitures provided for in policies of insurance are for the benefit of the party insuring, and may be waived by such party.

3. Where, subsequent to the accruing of a forfeiture, under the conditions of a life policy for non-payment of premiums, the insurer, with knowledge of the facts, by its own acts, or those of its agents, recognizes the contract as still subsisting, and manifests an intent not to take advantage of the forfeiture, and does not act prior to the death of the assured, indicating a purpose to claim a forfeiture, the court will be justified in finding a waiver of the forfeiture.

4. In such cases the liability of the insurer accrues on the death of the assured, and it is too late afterwards to claim for the first time, the benefit of a forfeiture. —Pacific Law Reporter, Feb. 25, 1873.

PATENTS.

I. General principles relating to.

1. In patents for design, the thing patented is the peculiar and distinctive appearance of an article to which the appearance is given; the sameness of effect upon the eye. Gorham Company v. White, 511.

2. If, in the eye of an ordinary observer, giving such attention as a purchaser usually gives, two designs are substantially the same, if the resemblance is such as to deceive such an observer, and sufficient to induce him to purchase one, supposing it to be the other, the one first patented is infringed by the other. Ib.

3. Where in a patent for an improvement in the process of manufacturing cast iron railroad wheels, only vague and uncertain directions could be given as to the degree of foreign heat to be applied in any particular case, there, when a patentee in his specification establishes a maximum and a minimum, the ascertainment of the proper intermediate degree may be left to the skill and judgment of the operator practicing the process. Mowry v. Whitney, 620.

4. It is as true of a process invented as an improvement in a manufacture, as it is of an improvement in a machine, that an infringer is not liable to the extent of his entire profits in the manufacture. Ib.

5. In such a case the question to be determined is, what advantage did the infringer derive from using the invention, over what he had in using other processes then open to the public and adequate to enable him to obtain an equally beneficial result? The fruits of that advantage are his profits, and that advantage is the measure of profits to be accounted for. Ib.

6. When a patent is for an entire process made up of several constituent steps or stages, the patentee not pretending to be the inventor of those constituents, his claim to the process as an entirety does not secure to him the exclusive use of the constituents singly. What is secured is their use when arranged in the process. Ib.

7. The profits recoverable from an infringer are the measure of the patentee's damages, and though called profits are really damages, and unliquidated until a final decree is made. Ib.

8. Interest upon unliquidated damages is not generally allowable, and should not be allowed before a final decree for profits. Ib.

9. What language will transfer an extension and renewal of a patent made under the acts of July 4th, 1836, and May 27th, 1846. Nicolson Pavement Company v. Jenkins, 452.

II. Mode of vacating.

10. The ancient mode of annulling or repealing the king's patent was by scire facias, generally brought in the chancery where the record of the instrument was found. Mowry v. Whitney, 434.

11. In modern times the Court of Chancery, sitting in equity, entertained a similar jurisdiction by bill when the ground of relief is fraud in obtaining the patent, and in this country it is the usual mode in all cases, because better adapted to the investigation and to the relief to be administered. Ib.

12. But scire facias could only be sued out in the English courts by the king or his attorney general, except in cases where two patents had been granted for the same thing to different individuals, and the sixteenth section of the act of July 4th, 1836, concerning patents for inventions, is based upon analogous principles. Ib.

13. Both upon this authority and upon sound principle, no suit can be brought to set aside, annul, or declare void, a patent issued by the government, except in the class of cases above mentioned, unless brought in the name of the government or by the authority or permission of the attorney general, so as to be under his control. Ib.

The Key City, 653.

2. Acts of Assembly—1873.

A supplement to an act to permit the voters of this commonwealth to vote every three years on the question of granting licenses to sell intoxicating liquors, approved twenty-seventh March, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two.

Whereas, Under the provisions of the first section of the act approved twenty-seventh March. one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, there is or may be some doubt as to the time of holding elections on the question of license or no license, in certain cities and boroughs wherein the municipal elections hereto fore by law fixed do not occur upon the same day, as in the townships of the county wherein said cities or boroughs are located.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That now it is hereby declared to be the true intent and meaning of said act, that the election under the provisions of the first section thereof, should be held in all the election districts and precincts of any county, including the cities and boroughs therein situated, upon the same day, and whenever by law the municipal elections in any city or borough occur at a different date from the municipal elections in the townships of the county in which said city or borough or boroughs may be holden, the election upon the question of license in said city or borough, or boroughs, may, and shall be held upon the day now fixed by law for holding township elections in such county, and by the proper officers thereof, under the provisions of the first section of the act to which this is a supplement.

SECT. 2. Whenever upon the passage of this supplemental act, the day of township elections in any county may have passed, in which county there were any city, borough or boroughs in which the annual municipal elections have not been held, the qualified voters in said city, borough or boroughs in any such county, may vote upon the question of license on the day of the annual municipal election for such city, borough or boroughs, for the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, when such annual municipal election occurs on or before the third Friday of March, and triennially thereafter; but when such municipal elections in any such city, borough or boroughs do not occur on or before the third Friday of March, then in any such case the election upon the question of license shall be held on said third Friday of March, and not later. The votes for or against license in any such borough or boroughs shall be added to and counted with the votes for and against license polled in the townships of the county in which said borough or boroughs may be located, the same as if cast on the same day as the township elections. And the votes for and against license in any city shall be counted and certified to the court or board of license commissioners, as the case may be separate from the vote of the townships and boroughs in any county wherein said city may be located, and if a majority vote of such city is against license, then no license shall be granted for such city, but if a majority vote of such city is for license, then license may be granted for such city.

SECT. 3. The proper election officers of each election district in any such city, borough or boroughs, are hereby authorized and required to hold and conduct an election upon the day or days mentioned in the law to which this is a supplement, or in this supplemental act, and the election officers shall be entitled to pay therefor as for like services in holding other elections: Provided, The election occurs on a day different from the municipal election.

SECT. 4. If an election in any city, ward, or borough has been already holden under the act to which this is a supplement, or under any special act, wherein the question of license or no license has been voted upon, though not upon the day of any municipal election in such city or borough, such election is hereby declared to be legal and valid.

SECT. 5. In all cases where elections have heretofore been held in any township, ward, or borough, or in any district of any city or county of this commonwealth, under the provisions of any special act heretofore passed, authorizing the citizens thereof to vote on the question of granting license for the sale of liquors the qualified electors of such wards, districts, or boroughs shall not be debarred from voting under the provisions of the act to which this is a supplement, by reason of their having voted as aforesaid, or by reason of any provision or limitation in any special act whatever; but all the qualified voters of every county and city in the State, shall be entitled to vote on the question of granting license, in such manner and under such restrictions as are provided in this act, and the act to which it is a supplement.

SECT. 6. That the act entitled "An act to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors in the county of Allegheny," approved April third, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, was not intended to repeal the act to which this is a supplement, but the same is hereby declared to be in as full force and effect as if the act approved April third, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, had never been passed, and that the election provided for to take place under and in pursuance of said act of March twenty-seventh, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, shall be held on the third Friday of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, and every third year thereafter in the several wards, boroughs and townships in said county of Allegheny, not excepted in said act.

SECT. 7. That all elections held in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, under this act, and the act to which this is a supplement, eight days' notice of said election shall be sufficient, and that all elections held thereafter under this act, and the act to which it is a supplement, notice of said election shall be given as is required by the provision of the act to which this is a supplement: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to repeal or affect any special law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, or the granting of licenses in any district wherein the same is prohibited by existing laws; and it is further declared to be the true intent and meaning of section three, of the act to which this is a supplement, that so much of said section as prohibits the issuing of license by any court or board of license commissioners, in any district where there is a majority against license, shall apply to all officers authorized by existing laws to issue licenses for the sale of spirituous, vinous, malt, or other intoxicating liquors, or any admixture thereof.

SECT. 8. That the qualified electors of the city and county of Philadelphia shall be entitled to vote on the question of granting licenses, in such manner and under such restrictions as are provided in this act and the act to which this is a supplement, at the first municipal election held in the city and county of Philadelphia, for the year eighteen hundred and seventy-three, and every three years thereafter, at the annual municipal elections.

THE PHILADELPHIA AND READING RAILROAD COMPANY, Plaintiffs in Error, v. THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA.

1. Each State has the power, at its discretion to tax its own internal commerce, and the franchises, property, or business of its own corporations, so that inter-state intercourse, trade, or commerce be not embarrassed or restricted.
2. The act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania of August 25th, 1864, imposes a tax on the freight transported in or through the State, and so far as it applies to articles carried through the State, or taken up in the State and carried out of it, or taken up without the State and brought into it, is unconstitutional and void.

In error to the Supreme Court of the State of Pennsylvania.

Opinion of the court delivered by Mr. Justice STRONG, at Washington, March 10th, 1873.

This is a writ of error to the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and we are called upon to review a judgment of that court affirming the validity of a statute of the State, which the plaintiffs in error allege to be repugnant to the Federal Constitution.

The statute was enacted on the 25th of August, 1864, and was entitled "An act to provide additional revenues for the use of the commonwealth." Its first section enacted "that the president, treasurer, cashier, or other financial officer of every railroad company, steamboat company, canal company, and slackwater navigation company, and all other companies now or hereafter doing business within this State, and upon whose works freight may be transported, whether by such company or by individuals, and whether such company shall receive compensation for transportation, for transportation and toll, or shall receive tolls only, except turnpike companies, plank road companies, and bridge companies, shall, within thirty days after the first days of January, April, July, and October of every year, make return in writing to the auditor general, under oath or affirmation, stating fully and particularly the number of tons of freight carried over, through, or upon the works of said company, for the three months immediately preceding each of the above mentioned days; and each of said companies, except as aforesaid, shall, at the time of making such return, pay to the State treasurer, for the use of the commonwealth, on each two thousand pounds of freight so carried, tax at the following rates: "first, on the product of mines" (and other articles), "two cents;" "second," on another class of articles, three cents, and on a third class five cents. The section further enacted, that "when the same freight shall be carried over different but continuous lines, said freight shall be chargeable with tax, as if it had been carried but upon one line, and the whole tax shall be paid by such one of said companies as the State treasurer may select and notify thereof; corporations whose lines of improvements are used by others for the transportation of freight, and whose only earnings arise from tolls received for such use, are authorized to add the tax hereby imposed to said tolls, and collect the same therewith, but in no case shall tax be twice charged on the same freight carried on or over the same line of improvements. Provided that every company now or hereafter incorporated by this commonwealth, whose line extends into any other State, and every corporation, company, or individual of any other State holding and enjoying any franchises, property, or privileges whatever in this State, by virtue of the laws thereof, shall make returns of freight, and pay for the freight carried over, through, and upon that portion of their lines within this State, as if the whole of their respective lines were within this State."

It is the validity of this statute which is now assailed, and the case we have before us presents the question whether, so far as it imposes a tax upon freight taken up within the State and carried out of it, or taken up outside the State and delivered within it, or, in different words, upon all freight other than that taken up and delivered within the State, it is not repugnant to the provision of the Constitution of the United States, which ordains "that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," or in conflict with the provision that "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any imposts, or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws."

The question is a grave one. It calls upon us to trace the line, always difficult to be traced, between the limits of State sovereignty in imposing taxation, and the power and duty of the Federal Government to protect and regulate inner State commerce. While, upon the one hand, it is of the utmost importance that the States should possess the power to raise revenue for all the purposes of a State government, by any means, and in any manner not inconsistent with the powers which the people of the States have conferred upon the general government, it is equally important that the domain of the latter should be preserved free from invasion, and that no State legislation should be sustained which defeats the avowed purposes of the Federal Constitution, or which assumes to regulate or control subjects committed by that Constitution exclusively to the regulation of Congress.

Before proceeding, however, to a consideration of the direct question whether the statute is in direct conflict with any provision of the Constitution of the United States, it is necessary to have a clear apprehension of the subject and the nature of the tax imposed by it. It has repeatedly been held that the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of a State tax is to be determined, not by the form or agency through which it is to be collected, but by the subject upon which the burden is laid. This was decided in the cases of Bank of Commerce v. New York City, 2 Black, 620; in the Bank Tax Case, 2 Wallace, 200; Society for Savings v. Coite, 6 Wall. 594; and Provident Bank v. Massachusetts, 6 Wallace, 611. In all these cases it appeared that the bank was required by the statute to pay the tax, but the decisions turned upon the question, what was the subject of the tax, upon what did the burden really rest, not upon the question from whom the State exacted payment into its treasury. Hence, where it appeared that the ultimate burden rested upon the property of the bank invested in United States securities, it was held unconstitutional, but where it rested upon the franchise of the bank, it was sustained.

Upon what, then, is the tax imposed by the act of August 25th, 1864, to be considered as laid? Where does the substantial burden rest? Very plainly it was not intended to be, nor is it in fact, a tax upon the franchise of the carrying companies, or upon their property, or upon their business measured by the number of tons of freight carried. On the contrary, it is expressly laid upon the freight carried. The companies are required to pay to the State treasurer for the use of the commonwealth, "on each two thousand pounds of freight so carried," a tax at the specified rates. And this tax is not proportioned to the business done in transportation. It is the same whether the freight be moved one mile or three hundred. If freight be put upon a road and carried at all, tax is to be paid upon it, the amount of the tax being determined by the character of the freight. And when it is observed that the act provides "where the same freight shall be carried over and upon different but continuous lines, said freight shall be chargeable with tax as if it had been carried upon one line, and the whole tax shall be paid by such one of said companies as the State treasurer may select and notify thereof," no room is left for doubt. This provision demonstrates that the tax has no reference to the business of the companies. In the case of connected lines thousands of tons may be carried over the line of one company without any liability of that company to pay the tax. The State treasurer is to decide which of several shall pay the whole. There is still another provision in the act which shows that the burden of the tax was not intended to be imposed upon the companies designated by it, neither upon their franchises, their property, or their business. The provision is as follows: "Corporations whose lines of improvements are used by others for the transportation of freight, and whose only earnings arise from tolls charged for such use, are authorized to add the tax hereby imposed to said tolls, and to collect the same therewith." Evidently this contemplates a liability for the tax beyond that of the company required to pay it into the treasury, and it authorizes the burden to be laid upon the freight carried, in exemption of the corporation owning the roadway. It carries the tax over and beyond the carrier to the thing carried. Improvement companies, not themselves authorized to act as carriers, but having only power to construct and maintain roadways, charging tolls for the use thereof, are generally limited by their charters in the rates of toll they are allowed to charge. Hence the right to increase the tolls to the extent of the tax was given them in order that the tax might come from the freight transported, and not from the treasury of the companies. It required no such grant to companies which not only own their roadway, but have the right to transport thereon. Though the tolls they may exact are limited, their charges for carriage are not. They can, therefore, add the tax to the charge for transportation without further authority.—(Vide Boyle v. The Reading Railroad Company, 54 Penna. State, 310; Cumberland Valley Railroad Company's Appeal, 62 Penna. State, 218.) In view of these provisions of the statute, it is impossible to escape from the conviction that the burden of the tax rests upon the freight transported, or upon the consignor or consignee of the freight (imposed because the freight is transported), and that the company authorized to collect the tax and required to pay it into the State Treasury is, in effect, only a tax gatherer. The practical operation of the law has been well illustrated by another when commenting upon a statute of the State of Delaware, very similar to the one now under consideration. He said, "the position of the carrier under this law is substantially that of one to whom public taxes are farmed out—who undertakes by contract to advance to the government a required revenue, with power by suit or distress to collect a like amount out of those upon whom the tax is laid. The only imaginable difference is, that, in the case of taxes farmed out, the obligation to account to the government is voluntarily assumed by contract, and not imposed by law, as upon the carrier under this act; also, that different means are provided for raising the tax out of those ultimately chargeable with it."—(Chancellor Bates in Clarke v. Phil., Wil. and Balt. R. R. Co.)

Considering it, then, as manifest that the tax demanded by the act is imposed, not upon the company, but upon the freight carried, and because carried, we proceed to inquire whether, so far as it affects commodities transported through the State, or from points without the State to points within it, or from points within the State to points without it, the act is a regulation of inter-state commerce. Beyond all question the transportation of freight, or of the subjects of commerce, for the purpose of exchange or sale, is a constituent of commerce itself. This has never been doubted, and probably the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was the prominent idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution, when to Congress was committed the power to regulate commerce among the several States. A power to prevent embarrassing restrictions by any State was the thing desired. The power was given by the same words and in the same clause by which was conferred power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. It would be absurd to suppose that the transmission of the subjects of trade from the State to the buyer, or from the place of production to the market, was not contemplated, for without that there could be no consummated trade either with foreign nations or among the States. In his work on the Constitution, sec. 1,057, Judge Story asserts that the sense in which the word commerce is used in that instrument, includes not only traffic, but intercourse and navigation. And in the Passenger Cases, 7 How. 416, it was said: "Commerce consists in selling the superfluity, in purchasing articles of necessity, as well productions as manufactures, in buying from one nation and selling to another, or in transporting the merchandise from the seller to the buyer to gain the freight." Nor does it make any difference whether this interchange of commodities is by land or by water. In either case the bringing of the goods from the seller to the buyer is commerce. Among the States it must have been principally by land when the Constitution was adopted.

Then, why is not a tax upon freight transported from State to State a regulation of inter-state transportation, and, therefore, a regulation of commerce among the States? Is it not prescribing a rule for the transporter, by which he is to be controlled in bringing the subjects of commerce into the State, and in taking them out? The present case is the best possible illustration. The Legislature of Pennsylvania has in effect declared that every ton of freight taken up within the State and carried out, or taken up in other States and brought within her limits, shall pay a specified tax. The payment of that tax is a condition, upon which is made dependent the prosecution of this branch of commerce. And as there is no limit to the rate of taxation she may impose, if she can tax at all, it is obvious the condition may be made so onerous that an interchange of commodities with other States would be rendered impossible. The same power that may impose a tax of two cents per ton upon coal carried out of the State, may impose one of five dollars. Such an imposition, whether large or small, is a restraint of the privilege or right to have the subjects of commerce pass freely from one State to another without being obstructed by the intervention of State lines. It would hardly be maintained, we think, that had the State established custom-houses on her borders, wherever a railroad or canal comes to the State line, and demanded at these houses a duty for allowing merchandise to enter or to leave the State upon one of those railroads or canals, such an imposition would not have been a regulation of commerce with her sister States. Yet it is difficult to see any substantial difference between the supposed case and the one we have in hand. The goods of no citizen of New York, New Jersey, Ohio, or of any other State, may be placed upon a canal, railroad, or steamboat within the State for transportation any distance, either into or out of the State, without being subjected to the burden. Nor can it make any difference that the legislative purpose was to raise money for the support of the State government, and not to regulate transportation. It is not the purpose of the law, but its effect, which we are now considering. Nor is it at all material that the tax is levied upon all freight, as well that which is wholly internal as that embarked in inter-state trade. We are not at this moment inquiring further than whether taxing goods carried because they are carried is a regulation of carriage. The State may tax its internal commerce, but if an act to tax inter-state or foreign commerce is unconstitutional, it is not cured by including in its provisions subjects within the domain of the State. Nor is a rule prescribed for carriage of goods through, out of, or into a State any the less a regulation of transportation, because the same rule may be applied to carriage which is wholly internal. Doubtless a State may regulate its internal commerce as it pleases. If a State chooses to exact conditions for allowing the passage or carriage of persons or freight through it into another State, the nature of the exaction is not changed by adding to it similar conditions for allowing transportation wholly within the State.

We may notice here a position taken by the defendants in error, and stoutly defended in the argument, that the tax levied, instead of being a regulation of commerce, is compensation for the use of the works of internal improvement constructed under the authority of the State and by virtue of franchises granted by the State; in other words, that it is a toll for the use of the highways, a part of which, in right of her eminent domain, the State may order to be paid into her treasury. We are asked, if the works were in her own hands, if she were the owner of them, what provision in the Federal Constitution would forbid her to increase her revenue by an increase of the charge of transportation over them? When in the hands of creatures exercising her franchises, what clause in any instrument forbids her to tax the franchises, and to authorize the tax to be added to existing tolls and franchises?

That this argument rests upon a misconception of the statute is to our minds very evident. We concede the right and power of the State to tax the franchises of its corporations, and the right of the owners of artificial highways, whether such owners be the State or grantees of franchises from the State, to exact what they please for the use of their ways. That right is an attribute of ownership. But this tax is not laid upon the franchises of the corporation, nor upon those who hold a part of the State's eminent domain. It is laid upon those who deal with the owners of the highways or means of conveyance. The State is not herself the owner of the roadways, nor of the motive power. The tax is not compensation for services rendered by her or by her agents. It is something beyond the cost of transportation or the ordinary charges therefor. Having no ownership in the railroads or canals, the State has no title to their income, except so far as she reserved it in the charters of the companies. Tolls and freights are a compensation for services rendered, or facilities furnished to a passenger or transporter. These are not rendered or furnished by the State. A tax is a demand of sovereignty; a toll is a demand of proprietorship. The tax levied by this act is therefore not a toll. It is not exacted in compensation for the use of the roadway; and if it were, the right to make terms for the use of the roadway is in the grantee of the franchises, not in the grantor. But, in truth, the State has no more right to demand a portion of the tolls which the grantees of her franchises may exact, than she would have to demand a portion of the rents of land which she had sold. She may tax by virtue of her sovereignty, and measure the tax by income, but the income itself is beyond her reach. All this, however, is abstract and apart from the case before us. That the act of 1864 was not intended to assert a claim for the use of the public works, or a claim for a part of the tolls, is too apparent to escape observation. The tax was imposed upon freight carried by steamboat companies, whether incorporated by the State or not, and whether exercising privileges granted by the State or not. It reaches freight passing up and down the Delaware and the Ohio rivers, carried by companies who derive no rights from grants of Pennsylvania, who are exercising no part of her eminent domain; and, as we have noticed heretofore, the tax is not proportioned to services rendered, or to the use made of canals or railways. It is the same, whether the transportation be long or short. It must therefore be considered an exaction, in right of alleged sovereignty, from freight transported, or the right of transportation out of, or into, or through the State—a burden upon inter-state intercourse.

If, then, this is a tax upon freight carried between States, and a tax because of its transportation, and if such a tax is in effect a regulation of inter-state commerce, the conclusion seems to be inevitable, that it is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. It is not necessary to the present case to go at large into the much debated question whether the power given to Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States is exclusive. In the earlier decisions of this court, it was said to have been so entirely vested in Congress, that no part of it can be exercised by a State. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 1; Passenger Cases, 7 How. 283. It has, indeed, often been argued, and sometimes intimated by the court, that so far as Congress has not legislated on the subject, the States may legislate respecting inter-state commerce. Yet, if they can, why may they not add regulations to commerce with foreign nations beyond those made by Congress, if not inconsistent with them, for the power over both foreign and inter-state commerce is conferred upon the Federal Legislature by the same words. And certainly it has never yet been decided by this court, that the power to regulate inter-state, as well as foreign commerce, is not exclusively in Congress. Cases that have sustained State laws alleged to be regulations of commerce among the States, have been such as related to bridges or dams across streams wholly within a State, police or health laws, or subjects of a kindred nature, not strictly commercial regulations. The subjects were such as in Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. 713, it was said, "can be best regulated by rules and provisions suggested by the varying circumstances of different localities, and limited in their operation to such localities respectively." However this may be, the rule has been asserted with great clearness, that whenever the subjects over which a power to regulate commerce is asserted, are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. Cooley v. Port Wardens, 12 How. 299; Gilman v. Philadelphia, supra; Crandall v. The State of Nevada, 6 Wall. 42. Surely transportation of passengers or merchandise through a State, or from one State to another, is of this nature. It is of national importance that over that subject there should be but one regulating power, for if one State can directly tax persons or property passing through it, or tax them indirectly by levying a tax upon their transportation, every other may, and thus commercial intercourse between States remote from each other may be destroyed. The produce of western States may thus be effectually excluded from eastern markets, for though it might bear the imposition of a single tax, it would be crushed under the load of many. It was to guard against the possiblity of such commercial embarrassments, no doubt, that the power of regulating commerce among the States was conferred upon the Federal Government.

In Almy v. The State of California, 24 How. 169, it was held by this court, that a law of this State imposing a tax upon bills of lading for gold or silver transported from that State to any port or place without the State, was substantially a tax upon the transportation itself, and was, therefore, unconstitutional. True, the decision was rested on the ground that it was a tax upon exports, and subsequently in Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall. 123, the court denied the correctness of the reasons given for the decision, but they said at the same time, the case was well decided for another reason, viz.: that such a tax was a regulation of commerce —a tax imposed upon the transportation of goods from one State to another, over the high seas, in conflict with that freedom of transit of goods and persons between one State and another, which is within the rule laid down in Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. 35, and with the authority of Congress to regulate commerce among the States.

In Crandall v. The State of Nevada, where it appeared that the Legislature of the State had enacted that there should "be levied and collected a capitation tax of one dollar upon every person leaving the State by any railroad, stage coach, or other vehicle engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers for hire," and required the proprietors, owners and corporations so engaged to make monthly reports of the number of persons carried, and to pay the tax, it was ruled that though required to be paid by the carriers, the tax was a tax upon passengers for the privilege of being carried out of the State, and not a tax on the business of the carriers. For that reason, it was held, that the law imposing it was invalid, as in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. A majority of the court, it is true, declined to rest the decision upon the ground that the tax was a regulation of inter-state commerce, and therefore beyond the power of the State to impose, but all the judges agreed that the State law was unconstitutional and void. The chief justice and Mr. Justice Clifford thought the judgment should have been placed exclusively on the ground that the act of the State Legislature was inconsistent with the power conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, and it does not appear that the other judges held that it was not thus inconsistent. In any view of the case, however, it decides that a State cannot tax persons for passing through or out of it. Inter-state transportation of passengers is beyond the reach of a State Legislature. And if State taxation of persons passing from one State to another, or a State tax upon inter-state transportation of passengers is unconstitutional, a fortiori, if possible, is a State tax upon the carriage of merchandise from State to State, in conflict with the Federal Constitution. Merchandise is the subject of commerce. Transportation is essential to commerce; and every burden laid upon it is pro tanto a restriction. Whatever, therefore, may be the true doctrine respecting the exclusiveness of the power vested in Congress to regulate commerce among the States, we regard it as established, that no State can impose a tax upon freight transported from State to State, or upon the transporter, because of such transportation.

But while holding this, we recognize fully the power of each State to tax at its discretion, its own internal commerce, and the franchises, property, or business of its own corporations, so that inter-state intercourse, trade or commerce be not embarrassed or restricted. That must remain free.

The conclusion of the whole is that, in our opinion, the act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, of August 25th, 1864, so far as it applies to articles carried through the State, or articles taken up in the State and carried out of it, or articles taken up without the State and brought into it, is unconstitutional and void.

The judgment of the Supeme Court of the State is therefore reversed, and the record is remitted for further proceedings, in accordance with this opinion.

Justice Swayne. I dissent from the opinion just read. In my judgment, the tax is imposed upon the business of those required to pay it. The tonnage is only the mode of ascertaining the extent of the business. That no discrimination is made between freight carried wholly within the State, and that brought into or carried through or out of it, sets this, as I think, in a clear light, and is conclusive on the subject.

I am authorized to say, that Mr. Justice Davis unites with me in this dissent.

THE ERIE RAILWAY COMPANY, Plaintiff in Error, v. THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In error to the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Opinion of the court by STRONG, J. Delivered March 10th, 1873.

The question presented in this case is the same which we have considered and answered in the case of The Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company v. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, No. —, decided at this term. The plaintiff in error is a New York corporation, which by acts of the Pennsylvania Legislature of February 16th, 1841, and March 26th, 1846, was authorized to construct its railroad through a portion of that State, paying for the privilege annually the sum of ten thousand dollars, and subjected to taxation on so much of its stock as equalled the cost of construction of that part of its road situate in Pennsylvania, in the same manner and at the same rate as other similar property was, or might be, subject.

Under the act of Assembly of the State, of August 25th, 1864, a tax was levied upon freight carried upon that portion of the road situate in Pennsylvania, either taken up within the State and carried out, or received by the company in another State for the sole purpose of being brought within it, and actually so brought. The single question now is, whether that act, so far as it taxes such freight, is constitutional. For the reasons which we have given in the case first above referred to, we hold that it is not, and consequently the judgment of the Supreme Court of the State, affirming the validity of the act, must be reversed.

The judgment is reversed, and the record is remitted for further proceedings, in conformity with this opinion.

R. A. Lamberton and John W. Simonton, Esqs., of Harrisburg, James E. Gowen, Esq., of Philadelphia, and William W. McFarland, Esq., of New York, for the companies, plaintiffs in error.

James W. M. Newlin, Lewis Waln Smith, and F. Carroll Brewster, Esqs., of Philadelphia, and Wayne MacVeagh, Esq., of Harrisburg, for the State of Pennsylvania, defendant in error.

EASTERN DISTRICT.

Supreme Court of Pennsylv'a.

ETTINGER v. KEMMERER.

1. Before the declarations of a third person, alleged to be an agent of one of the parties can be received, there must be sufficient evidence of the agency, and that the declarations were within the scope of his authority. His declarations are not evidence of his agency.
2. If facts proposed to be proved were apparently irrelevant at the time of the offer, yet, if they become relevant by subsequent testimony, the error is cured.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Lehigh county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered March 24th, 1873.

The first error assigned is, that the court erred in not allowing the defendants to ask Ettinger, one of the defendants, who was on the stand as a witness, what E. J. Young said to him in reference to the character and ownership of the mineral right, and the ownership of the share of stock purchased by defendants. Before the declaration of a third person, alleged to be an agent of one of the parties, can be received, there must be sufficient evidence to go to the jury of the fact of agency, and that the declarations proposed were within the scope of his authority. Had it been shown that E. J. Young was the agent to sell, his declarations at the time of the sale, and as an inducement to the purchaser, would have been admissible. We must look at the state of the evidence at the time the offer was made and rejected. What the witness Fritz subsequently testified, supposing it to have been sufficient, cannot be invoked to convict the judge of error, there having been no renewal of the offer after his testimony. Now what Ettinger said, which was all that was before the court at the time of the offer, was clearly insufficient. He said he bought the share of Kemmerer, not of Young, though Young had spoken to him. "Young tried to sell ore stock; he said he was trying to sell Kemmerer's stock." Young's own declarations could not prove his agency. Clark v. Baker, 2 Wharton, 340.

The second error assigned is, that the court erred in allowing the plaintiff to ask the defendant, Ettinger, whether he bought the stock for the purposes of speculation, and whether he sold a portion, or all, and at what price, and whether he received the pay for it, and whether it is not now in the hands of other parties to whom he transferred it. The objection was general, so that if any part of the offer was admissible, there was no error in overruling the objection. It may have been irrelevant to show for what purpose the defendant had purchased the stock, but the rest of the offer was clearly relevant. No rescission of the contract was set up, and if it had been, it was material to show that the defendant had confirmed the contract after knowledge, and so far as damages resulting from the fraud, it was important as tending to show the extent of such damages. Whether the defendant knew of the lien and title when he made the contract, was a question upon which there was evidence in the cause. Even if the facts proposed to be proved were irrelevant as far as appeared at the time of the offer, yet if they became relevant by subsequent testimony, the error of the admission was cured.

The third error assigned is, that the court erred in allowing the plaintiff to prove that the lease was read at different meetings of the company, and explained in German, in the absence of evidence that the defendants or either of them were present. There was evidence that the defendant, Ettinger, was at the meeting of January 11th, 1868. He admitted that he was there, heard them talk about a lease, although he says he did not hear it read. The witness Rudolph testified that it was read at that meeting. According to the defendant's own testimony, he attended other meetings. There was no error, therefore, in the admission of this evidence.

The fourth error is, that the court erred in allowing plaintiff to introduce in evidence lease B, dated July 9th, 1869. There was evidence to be adverted to presently, that George N. Reaton, who executed this paper, had purchased the title of the original lessor, Garret N. Demott. One of the objections raised to the plaintiff's title was, that the company had forfeited all their rights under this lease from Demott, and this instrument was relevant to show that this forfeiture, if it existed at the time of the contract, was subsequently waived.

The fifth assignment is to the admission of the letter of Neighbor to plaintiff, pasted on lease A. Neighbor was a lawyer, who had been consulted on the title, who gave it as his opinion, that the title of Demott was good, and that Demott had sold the same to Reaton. As this letter was attached to the lease, every presumption existed that it was read with the lease as part of the document, on January 11th, 1868, when the defendant, Ettinger, was present. There was no error, therefore, in its admission. This also disposes of the ninth assignment.

The other errors assigned to the answers of the court may be considered together. They involve the question, whether if the representations made by the plaintiff, as to the title and character of the subject matter, to the defendant, were false and fraudulent, still, if the defendant knew all the facts, or had the means of knowledge directly within his reach, he could avail himself of this defence? Now it will be observed that the falsehood relied on, was not specified facts, but rather a fraudulent concealment of facts. Thus it was said that the company owned the lands, when in point of fact they only had a lease for five years, from April 1st, 1869. He, Kemmerer, said nothing about any one else having a right to receive a royalty besides him on the ore. He didn't say any one else had any ownership except him. Applying, therefore, the answers of the court to this state of the evidence, we find no error.

Judgment affirmed.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

We publish on page 110 the opinion of Allison, P. J., in the divorce case of Pennington v. Pennington.

REPORT OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

Just before the convention adjourned for its present recess, Hon. Wm. H. Armstrong, chairman of the judiciary committee of that body, presented the report of the committee. It is an exceedingly lengthy document and one deserving of the greatest possible consideration from the bar and the public generally. Numerous radical changes are made in our present judiciary system, some of them excellent, and others of them quite the reverse. On the whole, however, the report evinces great care in its preparation, and an earnest desire upon the part of the gentlemen composing the committee, to provide adequate remedies for the present evils of insufficient courts, delays in legal proceedings, etc., from which the people of this State have been suffering for a long time past. We propose in this and subsequent articles to draw attention to the principal features of the report, commending those which in our judgment are good, and condemning those that we think the contrary.

The report in substance provides as follows:

The judicial power of the commonwealth shall be vested in

I. A SUPREME COURT,

to consist of seven judges, nominated by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate; to hold their offices twenty-one years, and not to be reappointed; to be at least forty years of age; the present judges to retain office until their terms expire, and two new judges to be appointed to make up the number seven—vacancies to be filled by appointment for a full term—each judge to be chief justice in turn, as at present. The Supreme Court to have original jurisdiction in cases of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto as to State officers, and commonwealth revenue cases only. The Court of Nisi Prius to be abolished. The appellate jurisdiction is to extend to all cases where the amount involved shall exceed the sum of $2,000; to cases where it is certified that the constitutionality of any State or Federal law is involved, and to all judgments of the Circuit Court in the exercise of original jurisdiction; also, to cases under the appellate jurisdiction of the Circuit Court, where the amount involved shall exceed the sum of $500, or where the judgment of the Circuit Court shall not be unanimous, or where any of the judges of the Circuit Court certify that there is a question which ought to be submitted to the Supreme Court. Five judges to be a quorum, and the concurrence of four shall be necessary to a decision. No case to be affirmed by a divided court.

II. A CIRCUIT COURT, to consist of nine judges, eight of whom are to be elected at large in the State, and the ninth to be a Supreme Court judge, assigned to preside over the court when it is sitting as an appellate court in banc; the judges to be at least thirty-five years of age; their term of office to be sixteen years, one judge going out every two years; five judges to be a quorum in banc. The Circuit Court shall have original jurisdiction in each county, of cases of habeas corpus, mandamus and quo warranto; in election cases when directed by law; and in all civil cases in law and in equity, where the sum involved is over $500. It shall have appellate jurisdiction in each appellate district in all civil cases which cannot be carried by direct appeal, certiorari, or writ of error to the Supreme Court, and like jurisdiction in such criminal cases as may be conferred by law. Their decisions are not to be published by authority of the State. For the purpose of appellate jurisdiction, the State shall be divided into six circuits, viz.:

First Circuit (at Philadelphia)—Philadelphia, Chester, Delaware and Montgomery.

Second Circuit (at Harrisburg)—Dauphin, Lebanon, Lancaster, York, Adams, Franklin, Fulton, Bedford, Huntingdon, Juniata, Perry, Cumberland, Berks and Schuylkill.

Third Circuit (at Pittsburgh)—Allegheny, Washington, Beaver, Fayette, Greene, Somerset, Bedford, Fulton, Indiana, Armstrong, Butler, Lawrence, Westmoreland, Berks and Schuylkill.

Fourth Circuit (at Franklin)—Erie, Crawford, Mercer, Venango, Clarion, Forrest, Warren, Elk, Jefferson and McKean.

Fifth Circuit (at Williamsport)—Lycoming, Union, Snyder, Northumberland, Montour, Columbia, Sullivan, Clinton, Centre, Tioga, Potter, Clearfield and Cameron.

Sixth Circuit (at Wilkesbarre)—Luzerne, Carbon, Monroe, Pike, Wayne, Susquehanna, Bradford, Wyoming, Lehigh and Northampton.

For the purpose of original jurisdiction, each county shall be a sub-circuit, in which at least one term of the Circuit Court shall be held by one of the judges thereof, at the county seat every year, if required. The Legislature is to regulate the terms of the courts, and may increase the number of justices.

III. COURTS OF COMMON PLEAS.

Jurisdiction of present courts to remain as now, unless changed by law. Present judges to retain their commissions until their terms have expired. All district courts now established, are abolished, and their jurisdiction vested in, and the judges transferred to the courts of common pleas. The judges to be elected for ten years, and may be removed by the governor, on the address of two-thirds of each branch of the Legislature, and must be thirty years of age, and practising attorneys for five years previous to their election. Associate justices not learned in the law, are abolished.

In Philadelphia there are to be four courts of common pleas, and in Allegheny two, each court consisting of three judges, having exclusive jurisdiction of cases commenced therein. Criminal courts shall be held by common pleas judges, as at present. The present common pleas districts shall continue as they are until changed by law. Additional judges are to be elected as follows: two in Philadelphia; one in the third district; one in the fifth; two in the tenth; one in the twelfth; one in the fourteenth; one in the seventeenth; one in the nineteenth; and one in the twenty-eighth.

In Philadelphia, there shall be only one prothonotary for all the common pleas courts of that city, to be appointed by the judges for six years, and one chief clerk for each of the four courts. There shall be separate dockets for each court, except the judgment docket, which shall contain the judgments and liens of all the four courts, and of the first Circuit Court. Prothonotaries, clerks, and their subordinates to be salaried and paid out of the city treasury, into which all fees are to be paid.

4. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

Justices of the peace to be elected for five years; their number not to exceed one for every township, borough or ward; they may be removed upon judgment of a court of record, upon complaint of ten citizens, and due proof of misconduct or unfitness for office. In cities of over 200,000 population, there shall be in lieu of present aldermen, one police court for every 30,000 population, to be held by judges learned in the law, who have been admitted to practice at least five years, and who are to be paid by fixed salaries, all fees being paid into the city treasury. Such police judges to be elected for seven years, on a general ticket, by all the qualified voters of the city.

5. ORPHANS' COURTS.

There shall be an orphans' court, and court of quarter sessions for each county, as at present. In Philadelphia there are to be elected three judges, and in Allegheny two judges, and in any county of over 100,000 inhabitants, the Legislature may provide for the election of one or more judges, who shall be orphans' court judges, and in whom shall be vested the present orphans' and registers' court jurisdictions.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

All laws relating to courts shall be general and of uniform operation. The Supreme Court shall prescribe a general system of practice in all the courts of the State, which shall be uniform in all courts of the same grade. In every case tried before them, the judges shall reduce the whole opinion and charge of the court to writing, and file the same of record. The Supreme Court shall appoint one reporter of its decisions for six years.

The change from an elective to an appointive judiciary, is, in our judgment, a bad one. Where the terms are long, the salaries competent, and the position one of great honor, the people can certainly be entrusted with the selection of their own judges. There have been fewer mistakes made in electing judges in this State, than there were under the old system of appointment. We trust the convention will not take this step backward. The committee have failed to report a proper system of providing as many judges as the necessities of the people require. The only way to have a simple, uniform, self-adjusting system, is to have the number of judges regulated by the population of the various judicial districts, as is substantially the case in France at the present day. Filling vacancies for the full instead of for the unexpired term, is another objection. The abolition of the present district courts, is, we think, a good feature, as it tends to more uniformity in our judicial system. The creation of circuit courts may or may not be a benefit to the people, accordingly as their judgments are final or not in most of the cases brought before them. To this feature of the report, we will give our serious consideration, and may possibly commend it, if it seems in the end to tend towards a more speedy administration of justice; at present we are not inclined much in its favor. The abolition of the aldermanic system in Philadelphia is a blessing, though the courts substituted for them should be constituted in a somewhat different manner. The appointment of the prothonotaries by the courts themselves, is a wise change, but should be supplemented by some provision limiting their powers over moneys received and held by them as officers of the courts.

We cannot commend strongly enough the provision requiring liens and judgments in Philadelphia to be entered in one central office, instead of in each separate court office, as at present. There are many other points that we are desirous of noticing, but our want of space compels us to stop for the present.

MINORITY REPORTS.

Six minority reports from members of the Judiciary Committee of the Constitutional Convention, were presented along with the majority report. Mr. Kane dissents from the majority on the following grounds: 1st. He is against the appointment of the judges, and in favor of their election by the people. 2d. He is opposed to the establishment of a circuit court.

Mr. Saml. A. Purviance is also opposed to a circuit court, and to the limitation of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and to the substitution of police courts, for aldermen, in large cities.

Mr. Jas. L. Reynolds, is also opposed to a circuit court, and to the appointment of judges.

Mr. Dallas, is also opposed to such appointment, and to the report because it fails to provide for a non-partisan judiciary, or for minority representation; and further, because it fixes the terms of common pleas judges at ten years instead of fifteen; and because it establishes a circuit court; because it fixes a money limit to the right of appeal; because it creates four common pleas and a separate orphans' court in Philadelphia; because it makes no provision for official reporters, and because it limits the age at which judges may be eligible.

Messrs. Dallas and Cuyler join in proposing some sections in reference to the Philadelphia courts.

Mr. Broomall is in favor of leaving the judiciary system "substantially as it is."

We will pay our respects to these reports in a future issue.

In the Constitutional Convention, the committee to whom was referred the Declaration of Rights, have reported in favor of leaving that part of the constitution substantially as at present. James W. M. Newlin, Esq., a member of the committee, has filed a dissenting report, in favor of changing the sections upon trial by jury so as to allow the parties to waive a trial if they so desire, and so as to allow three-fourths of the members of a jury to render a verdict, and in favor of so altering the latter part of section seven as to make it read, "And in all trials for libel, both civil and criminal, the truth, when published with good motives, and for justifiable ends, shall be a sufficient defence, and the jury shall have the right to determine the law and the facts under the direction of the court, as in other cases." The substance of both changes is good.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

A TREATISE ON THE LAW OF JUDGMENTS, including all final Determinations of the Rights of Parties in Actions or Proceedings at Law or in Equity. By A. C. Freeman, Counsellor at Law, Sacramento, 1873. 8vo, pp. xxxiv, 540. San Francisco, A. L. Bancroft & Co., Law Book Publishers, 1873. Price, $6.50. Received from the Publishers.

"This is the first law text book ever published on the Pacific coast." Such is the announcement on the circular of that enterprising book firm, Messrs. A. L. Bancroft & Co., of San Francisco, and to judge from appearances and a cursory examination of the work, we should say that the first original law text book of the Far West is a decided success. The mechanical part of the work is very well done, the paper, typography and general "make-up" being excellent. A treatise on the law of judgments has been wanted, and this will serve to supply that want. The only modern text book we have on the subject, is the English work by Ram, of which an American edition has been published within a few years past, but as this new work is much more comprehensive in its scope and character, and has the advantage of being by an American author, it will no doubt supersede the former. We hope its merits will be such that it will certainly do so; for we must say, we always like to see an American work take the place of an English one.

"The author of this book believes that its publication is amply justified by the importance of the subject of which it treats, by the frequency with which a correct understanding of that subject is essential to a proper and consistent administration of the law, and by the absence of any other work which even professes to treat of the matters considered in this."

We think he is fully justified in publishing it, and hope it may have an extended sale.

THE UNITED STATES JURIST, for April, edited by James Schouler. Washington, D. C.

The present number, besides the usual amount of legal information, digests of recent decisions, etc., contains an article on "Jurisprudence as an Element of Social Science," by Emory Washburn, and a pleasant, well written, though hardly just review, of the life and character of Chief Justice Taney. The Jurist is always a welcome visitor among our exchanges.

THE AMERICAN LAW REVIEW, for April, 1873.

We have received from the Commissioners to Revise the New York Statutes, Part III. of their "First Draft." It is a large octavo volume of 761 pages, and contains the statutes relating to courts and officers of justice, and proceedings in civil cases. We have but time this week to notice its receipt.

CHAS. B. WEBER v. SUPERVISORS OF UPPER SAUCON TOWNSHIP

1. The act of Assembly of April 14th, 1868, imposing a tax upon the owners of ore beds in a particular township of Lehigh county, is constitutional.
2. Durach's Appeal, 12 P. F. S. 491, settled the principle involved in this case. In that case it was held that while the Legislature cannot, under the name of taxation, take private property for public use without compensation, and that, therefore, a special tax on individuals or particular properties would be unconstitutional, yet in the exercise of the power of taxation, persons and things may be legitimately classified, some kinds may be assessed, and others not; and that even special exemptions are not unconstitutional.
3. The court has no power to pronounce a tax unconstitutional, merely on the ground of injustice or inequality.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Lehigh county.

Opinion of the court by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered March 24th, 1873.

Hammett v. Philadelphia, 15 P. F. Smith, 146, was twice argued, each time before a full bench, and was a well considered case. The principle of it has since been reaffirmed in Washington Avenue, 19 P. F. Smith, 352. It did not question the constitutional right of the Legislature to confer upon municipal corporations the power of taxing properties benefited by local improvements for the cost of making or maintaining them, but placed upon it the just and salutary restriction that it should be limited to the special benefits conferred by the improvements, and not extend beyond them; that the Legislature could not authorize a tax to be levied on particular property in a designated locality for a general purpose, to which the whole community ought equally to contribute. Such a tax was in effect only a mode of taking private property for public use without making compensation. An examination of the facts will evince that the judgments in those cases have this extent—no more. The opinion in Hammett's case had been published immediately after the first argument though not reported until after the second. It was cited, and was the main reliance of the appellant in Durach's Appeal, 12 P. F. Smith, 491, which settled, however, the principle which seems to us to be decisive of the main question raised on this record, to wit: the constitutionality of the tax imposed upon the owners of ore beds in Upper Saucon township, Lehigh county, by the act of Assembly of April 14th, 1868 (Pamph. L. 1127). It was then held that while the Legislature cannot, under the name of taxation, take private property for public use without compensation, and that therefore a special tax on individuals or particular properties would be unconstitutional, yet in the exercise of the power of taxation, persons and things may be legitimately classified—some kinds may be assessed and others not—and that even special exemptions are not unconstitutional. There is no provision in the constitution that taxation shall be equal Sound policy requires that it should be so as far as possible. But perfect equality is not possible. Indeed, if this were necessary there could be no taxation, except such as would include every person and every thing, which would manifestly be impracticable and unjust.

It is gravely contended, however, that this court has the power to set aside unjust, unequal and improper legislation relating to taxation, and Philadelphia Association v. Wood, 3 Wright, 73, is relied on as establishing this position. There are many things contained in the opinion in that case entirely aside from the point decided, and therefore mere obiter dicta. All that was determined was that an act of Assembly which required all agencies for foreign insurance, trust and annuity companies in the city of Philadelphia, to pay two per cent. of their gross premiums to an association for the relief of disabled firemen, was not taxation at all, it was taking the property of A. and giving it to B., whether for a charitable or any other mere private purpose it mattered not. No doubt after money raised by taxation has reached the public treasury, it may be appropriated by the Legislature to charities or individuals. It was admitted, indeed, that the tax in that case would be clearly constitutional, if it had been levied for and paid into the public treasury, and the idea that the court could pronounce a tax unconstitutional on the mere ground of injustice or inequality, was expressly repudiated.

It has been urged, however, grounded upon an opinion expressed by Chief Justice Lowrie in the case last cited, that it is not competent for the Legislature to provide for the collection of taxes by action in the courts; that it would turn the courts into tax collectors. But all personal actions are processes for the collection of money, and the courts are no more collectors of taxes in the one case than they are collectors of private claims in the other. It is the sheriff who is the collector when it is adjudged that the tax or debt is due, and surely there is nothing incongruous in that. He is the best and most efficient of all collectors, and never objects to the performance of that function, for he is well paid for it. All that the courts are required to do is to decide whether the debt or tax is payable by the defendant, and what the amount of it is. That is a purely judicial transaction. This mode of enforcing the payment of taxes may be unusual, but what provision of the bill of rights or of the constitution of government does it infringe? As well might it be maintained that fines, forfeitures and penalties could not thus be enforced, and of examples of these the statute book is full. So municipal liens for taxes and assessments have been collected by actions of scire facias in the courts, and no one has ever thought that it was unconstitutional. No doubt the Legislature might provide a summary process in all cases of public claims. But what right has the citizen to complain if instead of this he is secured a trial by jury to ascertain his liability before he can be compelled to pay? He would have better ground to complain if it had been denied to him.

It is also maintained, and in this contention it must be admitted that there is much plausibility, that there are difficulties in carrying this act of Assembly into execution, by reason of the want of any provision for the ascertainment and assessment of the amount payable by each owner of an ore bed. It would have been better if the Legislature had provided that the owner should make a return of the number of tons hauled over the public roads, and in default of his doing so, authorized the supervisors to assess the amount. But can we set aside an act of Assembly, because its machinery is lame and imperfect? Our duty is to execute the legislative will in the way prescribed, when that way is constitutional, though a much better way might have been devised. We are bound to give the act a reasonable construction, ut ne magis valeat quam perat. When the owner refuses or neglects to pay the tax, the Legislature has imposed upon the township the burden of proving by evidence, satisfactory to a jury, all that is required to fix liability upon the owner of the ore bed. This may be unwieldy, but it is surely not unjust to the taxpayer. He can save himself from the costs of a suit, by a tender, in time, of the amount actually due. It is not a case where a valuation of property is required. It is a fixed rate upon the number of tons, and that the owner may be presumed to know, or to have the means of ascertaining, whether he is a landlord, or himself the actual occupant. It is not, indeed, expressly provided that the supervisors shall ascertain and assess the amount. But they must do so in order to maintain their suit, and recover a judgment; and they must do more; they must prove it by competent evidence. In this case, as appears by the affidavit of claim filed, there was a demand of a certain sum, and the plaintiff in error did not deny in his affidavit that the amount was correct.

Nor can it be doubted that the plaintiff in error is liable for the tax. He admits himself to be the owner of the ore bed, and in the sense of the tax laws of this commonwealth, the owner of lands is always the landlord, and not the tenant, when they are occupied under a lease. See act of April 6th, 1802, sect. 8, 3 Smith, 516; act of April 3d, 1804, sect. 6, 4 Smith, 203; act of April 15th, 1834, sect. 46, Pamph. L. 518; Caldwell v. Moore, 1 Jones, 58.

It is unnecessary to consider the contention, that the imposition of this tax impairs the obligation of the contract between the landlord and tenant, for it is too clear for argument, that a tax upon the subject matter of a contract, by whichever party it is made payable, can never produce that effect.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur in this opinion, except as it relates to the extension of Hammett v. The City, beyond the case itself.

JOHN M. READ,
H. W. WILLIAMS.

WEBER v. REINHARD.

The act in question imposes a tax upon the owners of ore beds. A rate is given, a command to pay, and then a suit and costs ordered for non-payment, without any provision for assessing or ascertaining the tax. There being no due process of law provided for the ascertainment of the taxpayer's duty, the infliction of the penalties of a suit and costs, to collect what has not been laid on the citizen by lawful process, is in violation of the bill of rights, which provides that no one shall be deprived of his property, unless by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land. The act is, therefore, unconstitutional.

Dissenting opinion by AGNEW, J. Delivered March 24th, 1873.

With my views of the act of Assembly in this case, I cannot assent to the judgment just given. The point I make upon this act is, that, when no specific tax is laid, but a rate only, the citizen is not charged with the tax, until the subject of taxation is assessed and the tax is laid upon him. Here is an act which imposes upon the owners of ore beds in a single township, a tax, at a rate of a cent and a half a ton, payable every six months, for every ton of ore mined and hauled away from their banks, over the public roads of the township, without providing for any assessment or mode of ascertaining the tax before payment, or for any redress or appeal from an unjust and exorbitant demand by the collector, and which, in default of payment of an unadjusted and unknown sum, subjects the citizen to the penalty of a suit and costs to enforce collection. The fundamental error in the opinion just read, is, in my judgment, the confounding of a rate fixed by the act, with the tax itself. It confounds the measure of a duty with the duty. The law furnishes a rate, but the rate is only the measure of the tax, when applied to the subject of taxation. As to each citizen, his tax is not laid until the subject is ascertained, and the rate applied to it. To escape from this dilemma, the opinion falls into a second error, by assuming in the next place, that the remedy for non-payment is itself an assessment. The words of the act are, "and in default of payment, the same to be collected as debts of like amount are collected by law." Here the law provides for collection, not assessment, in default of payment, and assumes that a debt or duty exists, which has not been laid on the taxpayer. I concede that a tax may be assessed by a judicial proceeding, though it be an onerous mode of assessment. But the vice of this law is that it establishes no mode of assessment, judicial or otherwise, but first commands payment of an unascertained sum, and then in default of payment, commands collection by a suit, and the infliction of costs. It is the most elementary principle of law, that there can be no remedy for a breach of duty, until the duty is ascertained. Under this act, no tax is individuated, and no duty imposed before collection. The act of 1844, in relation to State taxes, will serve to illustrate this subject. That act directed moneys at interest to be taxed, and fixed at the rate of three mills. Warrants of assessment were issued, and the citizen was required to make a return of the subjects of taxation to the assessor, and if he failed or refused, the act then directed the assessor to ascertain those subjects, and assess the tax from the best light he could obtain. Thus a tax was laid on the citizen, and the duty of payment attached. The proceeding to levy the United States income tax was similar. It is evident, that neither the three mills rate, nor the five per cent. rate was a tax, and without a proceeding to assess upon each individual his specific tax, that no tax was laid upon him, and no duty rested upon him to pay it. Had the State, or the United States, after fixing the rate only, ordered payment, and in default of payment, commanded the collector to distrain for the tax, or to bring a suit to recover it, every one could perceive the outrage on the rights of the citizen. No tax had been laid upon him, and payment would be impossible. Were any one in reply to the hardship, to say to him, well, gather up your bonds, notes and other securities, make a calculation, and assess yourself, every one would perceive its absurdity. yet that is precisely the present case. A rate is given, a command to pay, and then a suit and costs ordered for non-payment, notwithstanding not a citizen has been assessed, and not a tax ascertained. I say, that this act has not provided due process of law to ascertain the citizen's duty, and, therefore, that the infliction of the penalties of a suit and costs, to collect what has not been laid on the citizen by lawful process, is in violation of the bill of rights, which provides that no one can be deprived of his property, unless by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land. The words "or of the law of the land," have been decided to mean the same thing as "due process of law." Vettar v. Wilt, 10 Wright, 450; Craig v. Kline, 15 P. F. Smith, 413.

It is too clear for argument, that the tax of an individual is the result of the rate applied to the subjects of taxation which belong to him, and consequently, that he is not taxed until the rate is applied to his property by some legal mode of adjustment. Then it is equally clear, that until his tax is legally adjusted, no duty of payment can arise, and consequently no proceeding to collect the alleged tax, is justifiable, until the tax is so adjusted and laid. The order to collect, whether by distress or by suit, before the tax is legally laid, is therefore without due process of law. Had the act directed an assessment even by a magistrate, the duty of payment would have existed, and then payment could be enforced by suit, though it be onerous to do so. But here the law visits the citizen with the duty of payment first, and assessment afterward, if a suit to collect in default of payment can be called an assessment.

It is said, the citizen may avoid suit by a tender. But a tender implies a tax to be tendered. No sum has been laid on the citizen which he is bound to pay, or the collector is bound to receive. The tender is impossible. If he tender what he believes to be just, the collector may deem it insufficient. And again, the law has made no provision, either for a return or for an account to be kept. Then it is said, the country will supply a proceeding to remedy the defect in the law. I grant, that in judicial proceedings, a court through its general powers, may supply defects of legislation. But taxation is not a judicial proceeding, and the courts have no power to supply an assessment. The case is not in the power of the court until suit is brought to collect the tax; but then it is too late, for the suit cannot be lawfully maintained until the duty has been imposed on the citizen by the assessment. If there be no mode of assessment, the law-making power only can supply it. Look at this law how you will, it is as clear as the noonday, that it has provided only a rate and no mode of laying the tax on the individual taxpayer; that it first orders payment, and in default of payment, inflicts the penalty of a suit with costs, for not performing an unimposed duty. Imagine a collector calling on a mine owner for his tax, without duplicate, assessment or known tax. How much is it? says the citizen. I don't know, says the collector. How, then, can I pay? That's your business, says the collector. No, it is not; the law did not require me to make a return, or keep an account, or assess myself. Well, I want your tax, says the man in authority. Here are five dollars. No, I want thirty dollars, rejoins the officer. I can't pay that. Well, I'll collect the tax by suit, and compel you to pay the costs. This is called taxation. I call it arbitrary exaction, without due process of law. It is evident, this act is the product of that vicious practice prevailing among legislators to object to no local bill a member from the district chooses to champion as his local measure, a custom in violation of the oath of office, and of the duty of the representative to the people of the State. I would say to those who procured this act, in the language of this court in Philadelphia Association v. Wood, 3 Wright, 73: "Considering, then, that this imposition is so extraordinary in its character, of such doubtful constitutional validity, so dangerous in its tendencies as a precedent, and so unusual in the form of its enforcement, we most respectfully decline, for the judiciary department of the government, the enforcement," &c.

Court of Common Pleas, of Philadelphia.

PENNINGTON v. PENNINGTON.

1. The act of 1854 narrows the cause of divorce in the husband's case to cruel and barbarous treatment.
2. Cruel and barbarous treatment is actual personal violence, or the reasonable apprehension of it, or such a course of treatment as renders cohabitation unsafe.
3. The act of 1855 did not enlarge the powers conferred on the courts to grant divorces, except to enable them to determine cases when the offence had been committed in another State.
4. A libel that alleges the respondent has given herself up to adulterous practices, and has been guilty of adultery, is good.

Opinion by ALLISON, P. J. Delivered March 29th, 1873.

This case has been before us in several aspects. At the instance of the husband, a divorce was decreed upon testimony taken before an examiner. Upon the application of the wife, the decree was set aside upon proof of the fact that the parties had never in fact separated; upon testimony called in support of alleged fraudulent service of requisite notice upon respondents, and that part of the testimony was taken at a place different from that set forth in the original notice without the knowledge of respondents, and upon alleged material defects in the libel. From this decree the libellant appealed, and was non prossed in the Supreme Court; the record was brought back on remittitur, and is now before us upon demurrers to the libel. The three specifications or assignments of causes of demurrer take exception to the sufficiency or ground for divorce, as set out in the libel. The application for divorce is on the part of the husband, under the act of 8th of May, 1854, in which it is made a cause for annulling a contract of marriage, at the instance of the husband, "where the wife shall have, by cruel and barbarous treatment, rendered the condition of her husband intolerable, or life burdensome."

The libel alleges a marriage with respondent, about the 7th of April, 1850, and assigns for cause that the respondent, Christiana Pennington, before and subsequent to the 1st of March, 1870, "offered such indignities to his person as to render his condition intolerable, and life burdensome, and thereby forced himself to withdraw from her."

This is not an exact or literal following of the act of 1854, which gives a remedy to the husband, which he did not before the passage of the act possess. It will be noticed that the pleader has entirely omitted to charge in the language of the law that the treatment which he received from his wife was cruel and barbarous, and has inserted as a substitute for cruel and barbarous treatment, indignities to his person, which rendered his condition intolerable and life burdensome; to which he has added, and thereby forced himself to withdraw from her. The last clause, if intended to meet the requirements of the act of 1854, is wholly unnecessary, as will be seen by a careful reading of it. Nothing is said about the husband being compelled to withdraw from association or cohabitation with his wife; this, therefore, may be regarded as mere surplussage, it being immaterial whether the husband remains with or withdraws himself from his wife, if it be shown that her treatment was cruel and barbarous to the extent of rendering his condition intolerable, or life burdensome.

The framing of this portion of the libel seems to have been based on the act of the 1st of March, 1815, which makes it a ground of divorce of the wife from the husband, where it could be shown that he had offered such indignities to her person as to render her condition intolerable, or life burdensome, and thereby forced her to withdraw from his house and family; for it will be seen that the ground of complaint set out in this libel, is that of indignities offered to the person of the husband. The pleader not did venture to follow the act of 1815, by alleging in the language of that act, a withdrawal by the husband from the house and family of the wife, if, indeed, a wife cohabiting with a husband, or living under the same roof with him, can in any proper sense be said to have a house and family from which the husband could withdraw himself but whether this be so or not, the act of 1854 is entirely silent upon this point. It may here be remarked, that if this was an essential part of a libel filed by a husband under the act of 1854, construing the acts of 1815 and 1854, as in pari materia, his allegation is evasively stated. The phrase to "withdraw himself from her," is by no means equivalent to the charge, that one was forced to withdraw from "the house and family" of the other. One implies a discontinuance of cohabitation and association, the other, a separation from the house or dwelling in which the parties had up to that time resided, and from the family as well. This, however, is explained by the fact that at the time the libel was filed, the parties were living under the same roof. There had been no actual separation, and the wife's testimony is, that even cohabitation was maintained during all the time the proceedings for divorce were in progress.

But although the act of 1815 cannot be made to apply to a case in which the husband is the actor in a suit for divorce, yet inasmuch as the law of 1854 was in force when this libel was filed, it can be supported, notwithstanding the misapprehension of the pleader, if he had brought the case fairly within the requirements of the latter act. This we think he has not done; the point seems to have been expressly ruled in Jones v. Jones, 16 P. F. Smith, 497. The court say, it is evident the Legislature, in the act of 1854, intended to narrow the cause of divorce in the husband's case to cruel and barbarous treatment, leaving out indignities to the person, which are causes of divorce for the wife, under the act of 1815, under the belief, no doubt, that for the latter the husband needed no protection by a severance of the relation. This distinction, which is clearly stated by Mr. Justice Agnew, is made a material one, and grows out of the different acts of Assembly, intended to meet different classes of cases, the court holding, that while the act of 1854 intended to give relief to a husband who was treated with cruelty and barbarity by his wife, so that his condition was rendered intolerable or his life burdensome, it does not give him a standing in court, or entitle him to a divorce from his wife, where he complains merely of indignities to his person, which may fall far short of cruel and barbarous treatment, even though he may consider personal indignities as rendering his condition intoleruble and life burdensome. Personal annoyances and indignities may be made up of acts that are cruel and barbarous, but in many instances they may not even approximate to actual personal violence, or the reasonable apprehension of it, or such a course of treatment as endangers life and health, and renders cohabitation unsafe. This definition of cruel and barbarous treatment laid down by Judge King, in Butler v. Butler, 1 Parson's Equity Cases, 344, has been often approved, and is adopted by the court in Jones v. Jones, above cited.

I think it well to add to that which is already stated, that it has been questioned, notwithstanding the case of Jones v. Jones, whether under the act of March 9th, 1855, the complaint is not in this case well stated. This act does not seem to have been called to the attention of the court when considering Jones v. Jones. It empowers the Common Pleas to entertain jurisdiction of all cases of divorce for "the cause of personal abuse," or such conduct on the part of either husband or wife as renders the condition of the other party intolerable and life burdensome, notwithstanding the parties were at the time of the occurring of said causes, domiciled in another State. We do not regard this as an enlargement of the powers conferred on the courts of this commonwealth to grant divorces, except that it enables them to determine causes, the offence having been committed in another State. The term personal abuse must be considered in its application to prior laws, making personal abuse or injury amounting to legal cruelty, as defined in Butler v. Butler, and indignities to the person of the wife referred to in the act of 1815, a ground for divorce upon her application, and to cruel and barbarous treatment of the husband, which, under the act of 1854, entitles him to file his petition praying for a divorce. This, we think, is the entire scope and purpose contemplated by the act of 1855.

If this is not the true rendering of this act, then we must hold that under the term personal abuse, the husband or the wife may obtain a divorce, when the wife has not even been compelled to withdraw from the house and family of her husband, and when her life and health have not been endangered. And so also the husband may be divorced from the wife, when her treatment of him has not been barbarous or cruel.

This would be an enlargement of all prior legislation on this subject, and would give to both parties an advantage to which they are not entitled, under the acts of 1815 and 1854, on the single ground that the personal abuse was inflicted out of our own State. This is so unreasonable, that we cannot believe it to be the true intention of the Legislature.

The demurrers filed to this portion of the libel are sustained. But the libel also charges that the respondent has given herself up to adulterous practices, and has been guilty of adultery. This is a distinct and substantive ground for divorce, which has not been objected to, and though stated in general terms, is, perhaps, well pleaded under the long recognized practice which requires timely notification to respondent of persons, time, place, and circumstances to be proved on the trial of the cause in support of the charge.

N. B.—Since writing the foregoing opinion, my attention has been called to the case of Sterling v. The Commonwealth, 2 Grant, 162, in which I find a similar view is taken of the act of 1855, by Judge Agnew in the Quarter Sessions of Beaver county, in an opinion delivered by him in 1857, he says: "It is clear the Legislature did not intend in the act of 1855, to substitute as causes of divorce, the well defined expressions, cruel and barbarous treatment, and indignities to the person, contained in the acts of 1815 and 1854, by the indefinite term 'personal abuse,' but to rehearse existing causes, in order to reach the object of the law, by giving jurisdiction, notwithstanding the parties were at the time of the occurring of said causes, domiciled in another State."

THE PHILADELPHIA AND READING RAILROAD COMPANY, Plaintiffs in Error, v. THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA.

1. A State may tax the franchises of its carrying companies, and the tax may be proportioned either to the value of the franchises granted, or to the extent of their exercise.
2. The gross receipts of a company may be taken as a measure of the value of its franchises, or of their enjoyment, and a tax may be laid thereon.
3. The act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania of February 28th, 1866, imposing a tax on the gross receipts of certain companies incorporated under its laws, is constitutional.

In error to the Supreme Court of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Justice STRONG delivered the opinion of the court, March 10th, 1873.

By an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, passed on the 23d day of February, 1866, entitled "An act to amend the revenue laws of the commonwealth," a tax was imposed upon the gross receipts of certain companies. The second section is as follows: "In addition to the taxes now provided by law, every railroad, canal, and transportation company incorporated under the laws of this commonwealth, and not liable to the tax upon income under existing laws, shall pay to the commonwealth a tax of three-fourths of one per centum upon the gross receipts of said company; the said tax shall be paid semi-annually upon the first days of July and January, commencing on the first day of July, 1866; and for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the same, it shall be the duty of the treasurer, or other proper officer of said company, to transmit to the auditor-general a statement, under oath or affirmation, of the amount of gross receipts of the said company during the preceding six months; and if such company shall refuse, or fail, for a period of thirty days after such tax becomes due, to make said return, or to pay the same, the amount thereof, with an addition of ten per centum thereto, shall be collected for the use of the commonwealth, as other taxes are recoverable by law from said companies."

Under this act a tax was levied upon the plaintiffs in error of three-quarters of one per cent. of the gross receipts of the company during the six months ending December 31st, 1867, and the question now is whether the act imposing it is in conflict with the third clause of the eighth section, article first, of the Constitution of the United States, which confers upon Congress power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;" or whether it is in conflict with the second clause of the 10th section of the same article, which prohibits the States, without the consent of Congress, from laying any imposts, or duties on imports, or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing the inspection laws." It was claimed in the State courts that the act is unconstitutional so far as it taxes that portion of the gross receipts of companies which are derived from transportation from the State to another State, or into the State from another, and the Supreme Court of the State having decided adversely to the claim, the case has been brought here for review.

We have recently decided in another case between these parties that freight transported from State to State is not subject to State taxation, because thus transported. Such a burden we regard as an invasion of the domain of Federal power, a regulation of inter-state commerce, which Congress only can make. If then a tax upon the gross receipts of a railroad, or a canal company, derived in part from the carriage of goods from one State to another, is to be regarded as a tax upon inter-state transportation, the question before us is already decided. The answer which must be given to it depends upon the prior question, whether a tax upon gross receipts of a transportation company is a tax upon commerce, so far as that commerce consists in moving goods or passengers across State lines. No doubt every tax upon personal property, or upon occupations, business, or franchises affects more or less the subjects and the operations of commerce. Yet it is not every thing that affects commerce that amounts to a regulation of it, within the meaning of the Constitution. We think it may safely be asserted that the States have authority to tax the estate, real and personal, of all their corporations, including carrying companies, precisely as they may tax similar property when belonging to natural persons, and to the same extent. We think also that such taxation may be laid upon a valuation, or may be an excise, and that in exacting an excise tax from their corporations, the States are not obliged to impose a fixed sum upon the franchises or upon the value of them, but they may demand a graduated contribution, proportioned either to the value of the privileges granted, or to the extent of their exercise, or to the results of such exercise. No mode of effecting this, and no forms of expression which have not a meaning beyond this, can be regarded as violating the Constitution. A power to tax to this extent may be essential to the healthy existence of the State governments, and the Federal Constitution ought not to be so construed as to impair, much less destroy, anything that is necessary to their efficient existence. But, on the other hand, the rightful powers of the national government must be defended against invasion from any quarter, and if it be, as we have seen, that a tax on goods and commodities transported into a State, or out of it, or a tax upon the owner of such goods for the right thus to transport them, is a regulation of inter-state commerce, such as is exclusively within the province of Congress, it is, as we have shown in the former case, inhibited by the Constitution.

Is, then, the tax imposed by the act of February 23d, 1866, a tax upon freight transported into or out of the State, or upon the owner of freight, for the right of thus transporting it? Certainly it is not directly. Very manifestly it is a tax upon the railroad company measured in amount by the extent of its business, or the degree to which its franchise is exercised. That its ultimate effect may be to increase the cost of transportation must be admitted. So it must be admitted that a tax upon any article of personal property, that may become a subject of commerce, or upon any instrument of commerce, affects commerce itself. If the tax be upon the instrument, such as a stage coach, a railroad car, or a canal, or steamboat, its tendency is to increase the cost of transportation. Still it is not a tax upon transportation, or upon commerce, and it has never been seriously doubted that such a tax may be laid. A tax upon landlords as such affects rents, and generally increases them, but it would be a misnomer to call it a tax upon tenants. A tax upon the occupation of a physician or an attorney, measured by the income of his profession, or upon a banker, graduated according to the amount of his discounts or deposits, will hardly be claimed to be a tax on his patients, clients, or customers, though the burden ultimately falls upon them. It is not their money which is taken by the government. The law exacts nothing from them. But when, as in the other case between these parties, a company is made an instrument by the laws to collect the tax from transporters, when the statute plainly contemplates that the contribution is to come from them, it may properly be said they are the persons charged. Such is not this case. The tax is laid upon the gross receipts of the company; laid upon a fund which has become the property of the company, mingled with its other property, and possibly expended in improvements or put out at interest. The statute does not look beyond the corporation to those who may have contributed to its treasury. The tax is not levied, and indeed such a tax cannot be, until the expiration of each half year, and until the money received for freights, and from other sources of income, has actually come into the company's hands. Then it has lost its distinctive character as freight earned, by having become incorporated into the general mass of the company's property. While it must be conceded that a tax upon inter-state transportation is invalid, there seems to be no stronger reason for denying the power of a State to tax the fruits of such transportation after they have become intermingled with the general property of the carrier, than there is for denying her power to tax goods which have been imported, after their original packages have been broken, and after they have been mixed with the mass of personal property in the country. That such a tax is not unwarranted is plain. Thus, in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheaton, 419–441, where it was ruled that a State tax cannot be levied by the requisition of a license upon importers of foreign goods by the bale or package, or upon other persons selling the same by bale or package, Chief Justice Marshall, considering the dividing line between the prohibition upon the States against taxing imports and their general power to tax persons and property within their limits, said that "when the importer has so acted upon the thing imported, that it has become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, it has perhaps lost its distinctive character as an import, and has become subject to the taxing power of the State. This distinction in the liabilities of property in its different stages has ever since been recognized. (Waring v. The Mayor, 8 Wallace, 122; Perviar v. The Commonwealth, 5 Wallace, 479). It is most important to the States that it should be. And yet if the States may tax at pleasure imported goods, so soon as the importer has broken the original packages, and made the first sale, it is obvious the tax will obstruct importation quite as much as would an equal impost upon the unbroken packages, before they have gone into the markets. And this is so, though no discrimination be made.

There certainly is a line which separates the power of the Federal government to regulate commerce among the States, which is exclusive from the authority of the States to tax persons, property, business, or occupations within their limits. This line is sometimes difficult to define with distinctness. It is so in the present case, but we think it may safely be laid down that the gross receipts of railroad or canal companies, after they have reached the treasury of the carriers, though they may have been derived in part from transportation of freight between States, have become subject to legitimate taxation. It is not denied that net earnings of such corporations are taxable by State authority without any inquiry after their sources, and it is difficult to state any well founded distinction between the lawfulness of a tax upon them and that of a tax upon gross receipts, or between the effects they work upon commerce, except perhaps in degree. They may both come from charges made for transporting freight or passengers between the States, or out of exactions from the freight itself. Net earnings are a part of the gross receipts.

There is another view of this case to which brief reference may be made. It is not to be questioned that the States may tax the franchises of companies created by them, and that the tax may be proportioned either to the value of a franchise granted, or to the extent of its exercise; nor is it deniable that gross receipts may be a measure of proximate value, or if not, at least of the extent of enjoyment. If the tax be in fact laid upon the companies, adopting such a measure imposes no greater burden upon any freight or business from which the receipts come, than would an equal tax laid upon a direct valuation of the franchise. In both cases the necessity of higher charges to meet the exaction is the same.

Influenced by these considerations, we hold that the act of the Legislature of the State imposing a tax upon the plaintiffs in error, equal to three-quarters of one per cent. of their gross receipts, is not invalid, because in conflict with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States. And under the decision made in Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall. 123, it is not invalid, because it lays an import or duty on imports or exports.

The judgment of the Supreme Court is therefore affirmed.

C. S. C. U. S.

Supreme Court of Pennsylv'a.

WM. McLOON'S ADMR. v. HENRY K. CUMMINGS.

1. When a ship disabled by the perils of the sea puts into an intermediate port to repair, is there condemned and sold, and the voyage broken up, the expenses so incurred are the subject of general average.
2. When the cargo of a disabled vessel is sent to the port of destination, the parties are bound by an adjustment fairly made by a despacheur at such port, according to the rules and usages there established.
3. Where the parties continue to exercise control over the cargo, the rate of contribution is to be adjusted upon the basis of the value of the cargo at the port of destination.
4. Though there be no express coin contract, yet in an action on a liability incurred in a foreign country, upon a gold standard, the verdict should be for gold.

Certificate from Nisi Prius.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered March 17th, 1873.

On the trial at Nisi Prius, three points were reserved. The first was: "Whether when a ship had been disabled by the perils of the sea, puts into an intermediate port to repair, and the vessel is there condemned and sold, and the voyage broken up, the expenses so incurred are the subject of general average?

Henry K. Cummings chartered the ship "Juliette Tumdy," of the owner, Wm. McLoon, for a cargo of coal from Baltimore, Maryland, to San Francisco, California. Storms and stress of weather injured the vessel, caused her to leak badly, and drove her for safety into the port of Rio de Janeiro, where, after the proper protests and necessary surveys, she was condemned as unseaworthy and sold, and the cargo was forwarded by her captain to San Francisco, in the "Shatemuc," under a charter party. It is evident that the vessel was disabled by the perils of the sea, and her voyage broken up; and the deviation into a port of distress was voluntary, in order to save the vessel and cargo, as far as possible, and the lives of those on board. The expenses which followed, were necessarily incurred to ascertain the ability of the vessel to proceed in her voyage, and to save the cargo from loss, and the cargo as thus saved, was forwarded to the port of destination. The expenses incurred at Rio de Janeiro were extraordinary, and were necessarily incurred by the captain, as the common agent for all interested, and therefore included the shipper.

General average has been defined to be: "a contribution by all the parties in a sea adventure, to make good the loss sustained by one of their number, on account of sacrifice voluntarily made of part of the ship or cargo to save the residue, and the lives of those on board from an impending peril; or for extraordinary expenses necessarily incurred by one or more of the parties for the general benefit of all the interests embarked in the enterprise." Star of Hope, 9 Wallace, 228; McAndrews v. Thacher, 3 Wallace, 365; Nelson v. Belmont, 21 New York, 38. The right to general average extends to the loss of the ship, when the cargo is saved in whole or in part, as well as to the loss of the cargo, when the ship is saved. Gray v. Waln, 2 S. & R. 229; Cage v. Richards, 1bid, 237; Barnard v. Adams, 10 Howard, 270; 3 Wallace, 365–6; 9 Wallace, 204. We see no reason to doubt, therefore, that the cargo in this case would be subject to general average, if it had any value left when it arrived at San Francisco, and the cargo was sold for the charges.

The third point reserved was: "When the cargo is so sent to the port of destination, whether the parties are bound by an adjustment fairly made by a despacheur at such port, according to the rules and usages there established?"

We are inclined to affirm this as a general principle of maritime law. There are many reasons for this rule, some of which arise in the fact that this port is that of the intended market, upon which the calculation of the shipper is founded, and is also the end of the ship's voyage as contemplated by the owners. Besides, the want of uniformity in the customs and rules of ports in different countries, render it essential that a certain port should be adopted as the place of adjustment, and the only practicable rule which can be followed in the midst of variety, is to take that port for which the cargo is destined, and where the voyage is terminated. The circumstances and customs of this port, it is to be presumed, were in the minds of the parties, in entering into the charter party, while the market for the cargo there, is to be presumed to be the best. Yet conceding this to be a general rule, we must except the cases of fraud or gross mistake, and of a voyage broken up and ended; where from the facts in the case, or the mutual acts of the parties or their agents, a final separation between the vessel and cargo has taken place, and the relations of the parties have actually terminated. In the last case the port of disaster would, generally speaking, become the place of adjustment. Such, we think, is the result of the authorities referred to.

This leaves us to consider the second reserved point, which becomes the hinge of the case, viz.: "Whether the rate of contribution is to be adjusted upon the basis of the value of the cargo at the place of repairs, or at the port of destination, if the cargo is sent on by another vessel, at a rate of freight exceeding that stipulated to be paid under the original contract of affreightment."

It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff, that the voyage was broken up at Rio de Janeiro, the vessel and cargo actually separated, and that the relations of the parties finally terminated there.

Is this so? McLoon, the owner of the vessel, and plaintiff, seems not to have thought so in the first instance. He had the first adjustment made at Boston, February 1st, 1868, and the second at San Francisco, September 17th, 1868. None seems to have been made, or thought of, according to the rules of the port of Rio de Janeiro. We must, therefore, examine the facts to determine whether in the contemplation of the parties, their relations finally terminated at Rio de Janeiro, and the separation of the cargo became so complete, that the port of destination ceases to be a common point for the adjustment under the charter party, and that of distress became the end of their adventure.

First, it may be noticed that the charter party contains no covenant or proviso enabling the owner of the vessel to terminate his voyage at Rio, or any intermediate port. It does not contain even the common exception of the perils of the sea. He must stand, therefore, only upon the law as it would arise upon the facts of his deviation into the port of Rio. But conceding the deviation to be justified, it is a well settled principle of maritime law, that in the case of a disaster by a peril of the sea, rendering the vessel unable to proceed upon her voyage, the master or captain becomes the common agent of all the parties in interest. The subjects of these interests are the vessel, the cargo, and the freight. It is therefore the duty of the master, if the vessel cannot proceed, to re-ship the cargo, if he can, to the port of destination, so as to protect all interests. For this purpose he must exercise a large discretion, according to the circumstances. In the absence of owner and shipper, and alone, as he usually is in a distant port, he must do what he fairly and conscientiously believes is for the interest of all. These are general principles, borne out by the authorities. 3 Kent Com. 210, 212; 2 Parsons on Ship. 234; Lamont v. Lord, 52 Maine, 388, et seq.; Thwing v. Wash. Ins. Co., 10 Gray, 457 to 460; Winter v. Del. Ins. Co., 6 Casey, 334. In forwarding the cargo to the port of destination, the master may act for both owner and shipper. If he can save part of the freight to the owner, he will be considered as his agent, as well as the agent of the shipper. But if he can save nothing for the owner of the vessel, he will not be the agent of the owner, but of the shipper alone.

The foundation of this exception is, that an authority arising from implication only, will not be presumed, where the act of the master is clearly injurious to the interests of the owner of the vessel. These being governing principles, a separation of the relation between the owner and the shipper would be deemed to have taken place in this instance, if the only facts to be considered were the condemnation and sale of the vessel at Rio, and the proceeding of the cargo by the captain at a greater rate of freight from Rio to San Francisco, than the freight agreed upon in the charter party from Baltimore to San Francisco. The stress of the argument for the plaintiff rests upon this view of the case. But these are not the only facts, while upon the whole evidence, its weight carries the adjustment to the port of San Francisco. In addition to the fact already stated, that the charter party is without a saving covenant, leaving the question of deviation into Rio open to a controversy, which the owner of the vessel or the captain, as his agent, might prefer to avoid; the following elements are to be found in the evidence. Captain Perry, the master of the Juliette Tumdy, entered into a charter party with Captain Foule, master of the "Shatemuc," without disclosing a principal, the vessel was to be consigned to the charterers' agent at the port of discharge, and freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo in cash. The bill of lading by the Shatemuc was signed by Wright & Co., as agents for Captain Perry, cargo to be delivered at San Francisco "unto order or to assignees," he or they paying freight as per charter party. Wright & Co., for Captain Perry, endorsed this bill to the order of John S. Wright, Esq., agent of New York; and it was transmitted to New York, where John S. Wright, agent, endorsed it, deliverable to Wm. B. Cummings & Co. Captain Perry testifies, that the bill of lading, charter party for the "Shatemuc," and all the papers were forwarded to the plaintiff, McLoon; and in answer to a question why the bill of lading was not forwarded to San Francisco to meet the arrival of the "Shatemuc" there, said he was told by Mr. Wright, that the adjustment would be made in Boston, and the average would be forwarded to San Francisco. He also testifies, that in all he did, he acted upon his own judgment for what he thought to be the best interest of all concerned. Now in all this it is clear he so acted as to preserve to McLoon the power to control the cargo at the port of destination, so far as to protect any interest he deemed himself to possess there. In this his acts were met by McLoon and ratified. On the arrival of the "Shatemuc" at San Francisco, Wm. B. Cummings & Co., to whom Wright, of New York, finally endorsed the bill of lading, had no authority to receive the cargo. On the 14th March, Captain Foule, after the arrival of the "Shatemuc," notified Wm. B. Cummings & Co. of his readiness to deliver the coal on payment of the freight, delivery of the bill of lading, and bond for payment of the general average incurred for charges at Rio. Captain Foule on the 19th March, telegraphed to McLoon, "Where are the Shatemuc's bill of ladings to Tumdy's cargo?" McLoon replied by telegraph March 21st, "Deliver your cargo to Wm. B. Cummings & Co., upon their giving bond to pay general average. Bill of lading on the way." Wm. B. Cummings having telegraphed to Henry K. Cummings, the arrival of the "Shatemuc" without papers or bills of lading, the latter on the 19th March, wrote to McLoon. McLoon replied March 24th, saying he had received a dispatch from Captain Foule, and telegraphed him to deliver cargo to Wm. B. Cummings, upon his giving general average bond, also that he supposed H. K. Cummings would have paid the general average on cargo here (Boston), but if not should have to send the paper to San Francisco. These facts show plainly that none of the parties recognized the port of Rio de Janeiro as the place of final separation of interests, that Captain Perry considered himself as still acting for McLoon, to enable him to control the cargo, and that McLoon ratified his act by assuming to control the delivery of the cargo on his own terms, and himself adopted San Francisco as the place of adjustment, failing to secure it at Boston. Under these circumstances, the separation of interests was not complete at Rio de Janeiro, but they continued together until the arrival of the cargo at San Francisco, and its sale there to pay the freight for charges from Rio to San Francisco. The reasons of McLoon for retaining control are not very apparent, but they may have arisen from a belief that San Francisco would be the best market for the cargo. It is certain, however, that he so acted as to control the cargo after it left Rio, and on its arrival at the port of destination. Having done so, the value of the coal at that port, is the true criterion in the adjustment, and the evidence as clearly shows that its entire value was consumed by the freight and charges.

The proof is satisfactory that the adjustment at San Francisco was made "in accordance with the usage and customs of that port," and that the principle adopted there is "that what is saved shall pay, and nothing remains where charges consume the whole value." The custom at San Francisco is to deduct at San Francisco, from the value of the cargo at that place, the freight, special charges, and commission of five per cent." In this state of the case, the entire cargo being lost to the shipper, there was nothing upon which general average could be charged. The judge at Nisi Prius was therefore right in confining the recovery to the special charges on the coal.

The remaining question is, whether the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict for the difference between gold and the national currency in legal tender notes. The judge directed the verdict to be rendered for the sum recovered in gold. We think this was right in view of the nature of the transaction and the contract to be implied from it. It is argued that there was no express coin contract, and, therefore, the judgment should have been for currency, adding the premium paid for gold, as the actual expenditure of the plaintiff. But the expenses were incurred in a foreign country upon a gold standard, and the draft drawn by the master of the "Juliette Tumdy," at Rio de Janerio, on the plaintiff, as her owner, was for gold. Gold, therefore, was the basis of the transaction, and of the adjustment. The liability of the parties should be measured by that standard, gold coin also being one of the legal standards of money in the United States, and, therefore, directly applicable as a measure. The expenditure being founded on a gold basis, and being a foreign transaction, the contract to be implied from it must follow the same nature, especially in view of there being a legal national currency, whereby it can be measured. The settlement of such a foreign transaction on a uniform and proper basis, must result in due proportion of contribution among all interests. It is only in the payment in this country in a currency of less value, the alleged loss arises, and that arises between the two species of legal currency, the result of local causes, and not attributable in any way to the adjustment upon the foreign gold basis. The right of the party paying the draft seems to be that of receiving the proportions which others pay, and which he has advanced upon the basis of the transaction, which was gold and not legal tenders. The fluctuations between the two species of lawful money in the interval between adjustment and payment, ought not to be permitted to prejudice the judgment which is founded on the gold basis itself, a uniform and unchanging standard. If gold were now at twice the premium paid by the plaintiff, he would be entitled to his judgment payable in gold, and the loss would then fall on the defendant. Gold being the measure of the debt, it seems to us should be the measure of the payment also. When all interests are measured by a common legal standard, no injustice is done to any one. The payment therefore should follow the nature of the liability.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF PHILADELPHIA v. LOCKHARDT, to use of Pyle and Hansell.

1. A contract may be assigned so as to vest in the assignee the equitable right to the proceeds, although the money may not have been due or earned at the time of the assignment. Nor does the fact that the debtor is a municipal corporation, change the right to assign money not yet earned.
2. Notice of the assignment of a school building contract with the city of Philadelphia, was served upon the city controllers of public schools, and not upon the city controller or city treasurer. Held: to be sufficient.

Error to the District Court of Philadelphia.

Opinion by MERCUR, J. Delivered March 19th, 1873.

The admission in evidence of the written contract under which the school house was built, is assigned as error.

The objection to its admission is predicated upon the fact that the instrument in its commencement purports to be an agreement between "the controllers of public schools of the first district of Pennsylvania," of the first part. It is, however, signed and attested, on the part of the first part, by the mayor of the city, and duly sealed with its corporate seal. A short time after its execution, the contract was duly approved by ordinance of councils. The sureties given by Lockhardt for his performance of the contract, were at the same time and in like manner, approved. From time to time during the progress of the work, the city paid the instalments as they severally became due, according to the terms of the contract. After its completion, the city took possession of the house, and have continued in the possession and enjoyment thereof. After all these recognitions and ratifications of the contract on the part of the city, it is too late for her to successfully deny that she was a party to the contract.

The fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth assignments are based upon the act of 28th May, 1715, which provides for the assignment of bonds, specialties, and notes in writing. The form of the suit in this case, however, does not admit of the application of that act. That act provides a mode of assignment by which a suit may be brought in the name of the assignee only. This action is brought in the name of the original party to the contract, for the use of the assignee. This assignment is not made according to the act of 1715. This suit is not brought under it. The plaintiff is unaffected by its provisions. The claim to recover is not put upon an alleged agreement made with the equitable plaintiff, but upon the one made with Lockhardt, from whom they have an equitable assignment.

The remaining alleged errors that were pressed, relate to the assignment made by Lockhardt to Pyle and Hansell, and notice thereof to the city.

It is contended by the plaintiff in error, that when Lockhardt made said assignment, he had no interest to assign. That it was made four days only after the execution of the contract, and before he had done anything under it. We think this position is not sound. It is well settled that a contract may be assigned so as to vest in the assignee the equitable right to the proceeds, although the money may not have been due or earned at the time of the assignment. It is often done by builders and other contractors to enable them to procure the materials necessary to fulfil their contracts. This was the case in Lott v. Morris, 4 Simons, 607, in which the assignment was held good. Nor does it make any difference if instead of a debt now due, the assignment is of money which is expected to become due at a future day, to the assignor. Crocker et ux. v. Whitney, 10 Mass. 316.

In Patton v. Wilson, 10 Casey, 299, it was held that an equitable assignment of unliquidated damages arising from a tort, and for the recovery of which an action was pending, was binding between the parties. Nor does the fact that the debtor is a municipal corporation, change the right to assign money not yet earned. Brackett v. Blake, 7 Metc. 335; Field v. The Mayor of New York, 6 N. Y. 179.

The only remaining question is that of notice to the city. Did she have such notice of the assignment and letter of attorney from Lockhardt to Pyle & Hansell, and their claim under it, as to prevent the subsequent payment by the city to Lockhardt, from being interposed against a recovery in this action.

No objection is taken to the form of the notice given, but to the official upon whom it was served. It was urged upon the argument that the assignees should have given notice to the city controller or to the city treasurer. There is much force in the suggestion, that if the assignees had given written notice of their rights to the city controller, he would have retained the warrant, subject to the order of the assignees. It would be well if the law designated that officer as the person to whom notice should be given in such cases. In the absence, however, of any such law, we think notice to other officials equally valid. The jury found that notice had been given to the board of controllers of public schools, and to the councils and to the city solicitor. This the learned judge held upon the point reserved, was notice to the city.

By the act of March 3d, 1818, § 6, 7th Smith's Laws, 55, it is made the duty of the controllers to examine all accounts of moneys disbursed in erecting, establishing, and maintaining the several schools within the district. The act of 15th February, 1832, § 1, P. L. 80, makes five members of the controllers a quorum for the making of orders for the payment of money, and the transaction of business generally. There would then seem to be great propriety in giving notice to this board, which was most directly interested in looking after the subject matter for which the money was to be paid. In Danville Bridge Company v. Pomeroy et al., 3 Harris, 151, it was held, that notice to the engineer of a company appointed to supervise and direct the work of an alteration in the structure by the builder, was notice to his principals. In Trenton Bank v. Canal Co., 4 Paige, 127, it was ruled that notice to the agent, when it is the duty of the agent to act upon such notice, or communicate it to his principal, in the proper discharge of his duty as agent, is notice to the principal, and applies to the agents of corporations as well as of others. In this case, these official branches of the city having been notified, we must hold the notice sufficient to charge the city therewith. The court committed no error in entering judgment in favor of the plaintiff below upon the point reserved.

Judgment affirmed.

Recent Acts of Congress.

An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions. Approved March 3d, 1873.

This act enlarges and liberalizes the former acts, re-enacting nearly all former provisions as well as extending many of them. Among the new provisions are the following: All persons who have lost a leg above the knee, and are so disabled thereby that they cannot use an artificial limb, shall be rated in the second class, and receive $24 per month. All persons who have lost the hearing of both ears receive $13 per month. Section 5 provides that the rate of $18 per month, may be proportionately divided for any degree of disabilities established, for which the section 2 makes no provision. The old law provided for no rate between $8 and $18. In the organization of the pension bureau, important changes are made. The new law provides for the appointment by the President of a deputy commissioner of pensions, with a salary of $2,500 per annum The efficiency of the bureau is also increased by a provision for the appointment of a duly qualified surgeon, as medical referee, who shall have charge of the revision of reports of examining surgeons.

THEODORE F. JENKINS,
ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

Last week the Legislature of Illinois, by a vote in the House of 101 to 30, and in the Senate of 29 to 6, passed an act, providing "that any woman, married or single, of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, and possessing the qualifications prescribed for men, shall be eligible to any office under the general or special school laws of this State." Mrs. Bradwell, the editor of the Chicago Legal News, is consequently jubilant, and thanks, "in the name of the women of Illinois," the senators and representatives who voted for the bill. As the bill has been approved by the governor, the holding of office by women in Illinois, will soon be un fait accompli. The Constitutional Convention of this State, has passed to a second reading, a provision similar to the law just mentioned, and will probably incorporate it in the new constitution. We hope so at any rate!

In New York city, on Monday last, a novel and interesting case was decided by Judge C. F. Daly, in the Court of Common Pleas. The suit was commenced by Rannuld, Francois & Co., of that city, who are the sole agents in this country for the importation and sale of the sparkling champagne, so well known to lovers of good wine, as Piper Heidsick, against one Baron Davis, as defendant, for the purpose of obtaining a perpetual injunction, restraining the defendant from selling spurious wine with a counterfeit label, or trade mark, intended to represent the label or trade mark upon the genuine Piper Heidsick. The defendant interposed a demurrer to the complaint, on the ground that the plaintiffs had not complied with the United States law, as to trade marks. This demurrer was overruled, with leave to answer, on payment of costs. The time to answer having expired, judgment was yesterday entered for the plaintiffs, for the costs, and perpetually enjoining the defendant from keeping or selling any wine with the counterfeited label. The plaintiffs brought their action as a test case, and will now proceed vigorously against persons selling wine with counterfeited labels, as well as against persons found printing or using counterfeited labels.

In New York city they have been having an argument this week, before U. S. Circuit Judge Woodruff, upon the writ of habeas corpus sued out on behalf of George McDonnell, accused of complicity in the recent frauds upon the Bank of England. We notice the names of Messrs. Brooke and Dos Passos, mentioned as counsel for the prisoner. These gentlemen, we believe, were both formerly connected with the Philadelphia Bar.

The Constitutional Convention re-assembles in this city upon next Tuesday, 15th inst. The Judiciary Report will come up for consideration at an early day.

OUR STUDENTS' RECORD, vol. 1, No. 1.—Published monthly by the Reynolds Grammar Schools, Philadelphia, May, 1873.

To judge from the first number now before us, the Record will be a sprightly, first-class paper, and in every way worthy of the support of our city school children and their parents. Its purpose is excellent, its contents enjoyable, and its editorial management evidently "tip-top." We wish it long life, and trust it may certainly develop that "feminine" Benjamin Franklin, which it already half promises.

This work is a real little gem, gotten up in a neat and convenient form for the practitioner, and commending itself at first glance to the good wishes of the purchaser, by the excellent taste and good judgment displayed in its typographical and mechanical execution. The copy sent us is bound in dark flexible Turkey morocco, and looks handsome enough for a prayer book, instead of a lawyer's companion. The work must be of great service to the Pacific Bar, since it has already reached a second edition. As the California Code contains all the "modern improvements," the work is also useful to legislators and lawyers of this section of the country.

Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia.

COMMONWEALTH v. HAWKINS.

The defendant, a notary public, was elected a member of councils of Philadelphia. The act of incorporation of that city, prohibited any person holding office from or under the State, from being a member of councils. An act of Assembly was passed February 18th, 1873, declaring the meaning of the act of incorporation to be, that the holding of the offices of notary public and member of councils at the same time, was not incompatible, and prohibiting any member from being removed from office by reason of his being a notary public. The court held:

1. A notary public is a person holding office or employment from or under the State.
2. The act of 1873 was a retroactive expository act, and is, therefore, unconstitutional. It is clearly a usurpation by the Legislature of the functions of the court.

Quo warranto.

Opinion by FINLETTER, J. Delivered April 5th, 1873.

The complaint was filed December 2d, 1872, and charges that the defendant on December 10th, 1870, was duly commissioned by the governor of the commonwealth to the office of notary public, and from that time to the present, holds and exercises that office. That on the second Tuesday of October, 1871, he was returned as a member of common council by the qualified voters of the Fourteenth ward, and is now acting in that capacity. That by the consolidation act, it was provided that the legislative powers of the city of Philadelphia, shall be vested in two bodies, to be called the select and common councils * * * * Provided, That no member of the State Legislature, nor any one holding office or employment, from or under the State at the time of said election, shall be eligible as a member of said councils.

On the 18th day of February, 1873, the defendant pleaded as follows: "For a plea in this behalf, the said Henry C. Hawkins, saith, that by an act of the General Assembly of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, approved the 29th day of January, A. D. 1873, entitled an act relating to the office of notary public in the city of Philadelphia, it was enacted and declared:

"That the true intent and meaning of the act of Assembly, entitled an act to incorporate the city of Philadelphia, approved the 2d day of February, A. D. 1854, is not to prevent any member of the select and common councils of the city of Philadelphia, from holding at the same time the office of notary public."

SECT 2. That the holding of the office of notary public shall not be incompatible with holding at the same time, the office of member of either branch of the councils of the city of Philadelphia; and no member of the present councils of the city of Philadelphia shall be held to be disqualified, on account of the holding of the office of notary public; nor shall he be removed from the office of member of councils, by reason of any such disqualification.

To this plea the plaintiffs demur: "First. That the alleged act of the General Assembly of this commonwealth, set forth in said plea, cannot remove the disqualification of the defendant. Second. That the said alleged act of the Legislature is unconstitutional, and therefore void, because it is an assumption of the judicial power of the commonwealth."

The act of 1873, in terms, declares the holding of the office of notary public, under the law theretofore, to be a disqualification to hold "the office of select or common council." Its undisguised purpose is to cure the alleged defect in the title of defendant to a seat in councils. Notwithstanding this, it is still our duty to consider all the questions involved.

By the act of consolidation, it will be seen that no one holding office or employment from or under the State, when elected, shall be eligible as a member of councils.

Notaries public are of great antiquity. The Stat. 41 Geo., 3 c. 79, was passed to regulate them. It required that they should serve seven years' apprenticeship, and be duly admitted to act. Here they are commissioned by the governor "as notaries public for the commonwealth." Before entering upon their duties, they must "take and subscribe an oath or affirmation that they will support the constitution of the State," and give bond with two sureties. They are required to attest their acts by a "public notarial seal, upon which shall be engraved the arms of the commonwealth;" "to keep fair registers of all official acts by them done in virtue of their office." Their attestations are received as evidence of the facts therein certified. The act of 1840 speaks of "the office of notary public, and makes it subject to the provisions of the act "taxing certain officers." Even the act of 1873, describes it as "the office of notary public." In Commonwealth v. Pile, 6 Harris, 521, it is recognized as "the office of notary public."

In every aspect, therefore, we are compelled to regard a notary public as "holding office or employment from or under the State," and by the act of consolidation ineligible as a member of councils.

The act of 1873 defines the intent and meaning of the act of 1854. It declares that the holding of the office of notary public shall not be incompatible with holding at the same time the office of member of councils. It declares, also, that no notary public shall be removed from the office of member of councils by reason of any such disqualification. Undoubtedly, if this act be constitutional, it removes the disability of the defendant.

The Supreme Court has settled decisively all the questions which can arise in this inquiry, in 2 Watts & Serg, 271; 4 Watts & Serg, 227; 1 Jones, 494; 3 Harris, 18; 4 Harris, 256; and 7 Wr. 515. It speaks in no doubtful language and gives no uncertain sign. It will be seen, therein, how steadily and firmly every encroachment upon the judiciary has been resisted.

From these cases it is clear that the Legislature has no authority to pass retroactive expository acts. Nor can it command the decision of a court in a particular way, or forbid the legitimate consequences of a judgment.

The act of 1873 strides far beyond all others of like character. It not only interprets the act of 1854, and commands us to decide a particular case in a particular manner, but it also forbids the operation of our decree in a particular cause.

Without doubt, we desire to treat with great respect the action of the Legislature. We may not question, that within its proper province it is omnipotent. We can, however, only see in the act under consideration, a needless assumption of authority. In order that a particular individual may exercise the offices of notary public and member of councils at the same time, the Legislature has undertaken to say that the act of 1854 did not mean what, in express and fitting language, was declared to be its intent and meaning, and what has been acquiesced in by every one for nineteen years. It has also said that the judgment of the court in a matter within its jurisdiction, shall not be enforced. In other words, it has usurped the prerogatives of a preceding Legislature, and the functions of this court. It may be possible that the object to be attained might extenuate the inconsiderate exercise of such power. It cannot justify it.

Apparently the act of 1873 has no other purpose than to anticipate and annul the decision of the court in a case pending. When such legislation exists without necessity or excuse, the Legislature not only overrides the judiciary, but becomes a terror and a dread to the whole community.

IN EQUITY.

GEO. KEEFER, Trustee, &c., German Reformed Congregation, v. JOSEPH EMERICK, Trustee &c., Evangelical Lutheran Congregation.

1. This court will so deal with its equity powers as to make them serve all the purposes of justice to which they can be made applicable.
2. A dispute between two unincorporated church organizations, as to the use of the church edifice, is within the equity powers of the courts.
3. A church congregation, limited in the use of a building to the holding of divine service, was restrained from holding a Sabbath school there.

Appeal from Common Pleas of Northumberland county.

Opinion of the court by AGNEW, J. Delivered March 17th, 1873.

This bill, on behalf of a German Reformed congregation, was to enjoin an Evangelical Lutheran congregation from holding Sunday schools in the church building. These congregations built a church for common use, and on the 8th April, 1848, adopted a "canon law," as they called it, for the government of its use by the two bodies. By the first article of this canon, the church was to be and remain a German Reformed and Evangelical Lutheran Church, under the name of "Emanuel's Church." The third and fourth articles provide for funerals and burials in the burial ground, from which it appears a graveyard was to be used in connection with the church. The thirteenth declares, that each congregation shall have equal right to the church property, and each pastor shall so arrange his divine service, as not to interfere with the pastor of the other denomination. The fifteenth article provides that it shall be allowed to hold divine service in two languages, in English and German.

The master finds, that divine service only was to be held in the church, and that by common understanding of both congregations, no meetings other than those for divine service could be held in it, and that, for a period of over twenty years, no other than meetings for public worship or preaching the Gospel were held there; that a union Sunday school, organized and kept up by the congregations, was held for many years in a school house close by the church. A short time ago, the Lutheran congregation withdrew from the union Sunday school, and established one of their own, in the audience room of the church, in opposition to, and without the consent of the German Reformed congregation.

This bill is to prevent this unauthorized and continued use of the audience room for the Sunday school. The master finds, that Sunday schools were not in existence, or thought of in this neighborhood at the time of the union of these congregations, and adoption of their rules; that both congregations understood, and rigidly adhered to the understanding, that a "preaching service" only was to be maintained in the church, and that singing schools, prayer meetings, and the like, were forbidden to be held there. He concludes by saying, he is satisfied from the articles of association, and the testimony in the cause, the preaching of the Gospel only was understood by the members of both congregations to be the "divine service" mentioned in the articles. In the court below, the controversy was not upon the facts reported, but upon the meaning of the terms "divine service;" the defendants holding that they embraced Sabbath schools. The witnesses agree, that the German word Gottesdienst, used in the articles of union, means, in English, divine service; and the court below decided that this included Sunday school service. That prayer and praise, and, indeed, oral as well as written instruction in religious matters, by laymen, are used in Sunday school service, is true, and in a general sense it may be said to be divine service. Indeed, the Reverend Samuel J. Milliken did say in his testimony, that the more extensive use of the term divine service, includes the performance of any duty arising out of our obligations to God; but in the more restricted sense, it is used to signify acts of religious worship. This would give two significations to these words. Like words of art, the sense in which they have been used by the parties, must, therefore, be sought for. It is the duty of courts to interpret the language of written instruments; but in doing this, they always follow the meaning attributed to the terms by those whose custom it is to use them. Therefore, when a contract is capable of two different interpretations, that which the parties themselves have always put upon it, and acted upon, especially as here for a long series of years, a court will follow, because it is the true intent and meaning of the parties which are to be sought for in the language they use. However right it may be to view, as the court did, the Sunday school as a most useful institution in instructing youth in the knowledge and worship of God, and their duties to mankind, this praiseworthy view cannot change a written contract. We cannot engraft on a contract for one thing, an agreement for a different thing, though the fruit of the scion be even better than that of the natural stock.

These congregations never so understood or acted upon their agreement of union. They built their church for divine worship, by prayer, praise and the preaching of God's word. Its use was to be congregational worship, not school instruction. Their worship was to be led by pastors, who should regulate their appointments in due regard to mutual harmony, and was not to be the instruction of youth, even though part of it were in divine things, led by individual laymen. There are reasons, also, why a chamber or audience room, dedicated to public congregational worship, should not be thrown open to thoughtless, giddy, sometimes vicious youths, to deface and soil it. We think the court erred in deciding the case according to the general meaning of the words "divine service," as testified to by some of the witnesses, instead of confining their signification to the sense in which the congregations understood it when they entered into the agreement, and afterwards practiced upon it.

A doubt has been suggested, as to the jurisdiction of the court below in such a case, but, we think, without a solid ground. As unincorporated associations, the parties fall directly within the fifth equity head of the act of 16th June, 1836, conferring on the Supreme and Common Pleas courts jurisdiction in the supervision and control of unincorporated societies or associations and partnerships. Foley v. Toney, 4 P. F. Smith, 190, is in point, opinion by the present chief justice. The number and relations of these parties, and the subject and nature of the injury, also, make the case as one for the peculiar jurisdiction of equity. The number of the members of each congregation, and the uncertainty in their identity and connection with the congregation, make a remedy at law neither convenient nor certain. There would be some difficulty in moulding a common law action to remedy the perverted use. The subject of the use is also peculiar. Such congregations are not governed by the ordinary rules of tenancy in common. It has been decided, there can be no partition of a church or a graveyard held by two congregations precisely as these two hold their property. Brown v. Lutheran Church, 11 Harris, 495. The language of Woodward, J., is forcible and just, in which he shows the sacrilegious character of a proceeding that would sell the altar and the graves; that a church cannot be divided; and that the policy of the State has always been to protect the resting-places of the dead. A sale is the only mode of partition in such a case; and what, he asks, would these graves, of inestimable value to surviving relatives, fetch in the market? This case, therefore, does not on this ground fall within the principle of North Pennsylvania Coal Company v. Snowden, 6 Wright, 488.

The nature of the injury, too, is to be noticed. It is not an act of wrong or injury to the property itself, nor is it an ouster from possession, or wrongful withholding of the possession by one congregation from the other, but a mere perversion of its use; and here again it differs from the North Pennsylvania Coal Company v. Snowden, and from Tillmes v. Marsh, 17 P. F. Smith, 507. In those cases, the bills were what is termed an ejectment bill—a bill to obtain possession and enforce rights under a legal title. Here the injury consists in a perversion of the right of the congregation, a misuse of its privileges under the articles of union, and it is continuing in its nature. It involves a series of injurious acts of misuse, and therefore can have no adequate remedy at law, if an action for damages could be conveniently sustained. This brings the case directly within the letter and spirit of the fifth head of equity, in the second branch of powers contained in the act of 1836, to wit: The prevention or restraint of the commission or continuance of acts contrary to law, and prejudicial to the interests of the community, or the rights of individuals." The congregation defendant, is not only an unincorporated association, and thus within the control of the court, but the congregation plaintiff is composed of individuals, whose rights are prejudiced by the defendants, and therefore entitled to the exercise of the restraining power of the court. In either way jurisdiction attaches. The right of the plaintiffs is not disputed, which takes the case out of the rule that the court will not enjoin upon a disputed title till it is settled at law. It is only the illegal acts of the defendants that are the subject of dispute, and they are clearly contrary to law, as we interpret the agreement of union. The disposition of this court has been not to deal with these equity powers in a narrow spirit, but to make them serve all the purposes of justice to which they can be made applicable. In Wesley Church v. Moore, 10 Burr, 280, Chief Justice Gibson remarked, that "The equitable jurisdiction conferred by these statutes is a valuable, indeed, indispensable one, and ought to be extended by every interpretation of which the words are susceptible." The same opinion has found utterance in subsequent cases. Kirkpatrick v. McDonald, 1 Jones, 393; Yard v. Patton, 1 Harris, 282. The actual exercise of this valuable power of restraint has been sustained in numerous and analogous cases, which may be briefly noticed, presuming that in the same clause is found the supervision and control of partnerships, following directly after the supervision and control of unincorporated societies and associations, subjects analogous in the unincorporated membership and the close and confidential relations of the members of each class. Thus in Stockdale v. Ulery, 1 Wright, 486, a partner was restrained from pawning or pledging the notes of the firm for his own debts. So a partner may be restrained from doing acts prejudicial to the estate of a deceased partner. Holden's Adm'r v. McMackin, 1 Parsons, 284. And a person may be restrained from doing business contrary to a lawful agreement not to do so. Palmer v. Graham, 1 Parsons, 476. So to restrain the use of a party wall before payment of a moiety of the cost. Sutcliff v. Jones, 1 Parsons, 494. To prevent the holder of a legal title from conveying it away contrary to equity O'Neil v. Hamilton, 8 Wright, 18. To restrain associates from denying the right of one chosen by a publishing company as the editor of a paper, and preventing his publication of it. Peacock v. Chambers, 10 Wright, 434. To prevent a usurpation of power by a portion of a body which should be a unit, as the Common Council of Philadelphia. Kerr v. Trego, 11 Wright, 292. To restrain an unlawful sale under execution of the property of the wife for the debt of the husband. Lyon's Appeal, 11 P. F. Smith, 15. Without further citation, Kerns' Appeal, 12 P. F. Smith, 428, may be instanced as a case in point. There a deed was made of a church property to trustees, for the use of two congregations, with a provision for division in a certain manner, if conducive to the interests of the parties. One congregation took exclusive possession. Held to be a dispute between members of an unincorporated society in relation to their rights and privileges, and not merely as tenants in common of real estate, and equity had jurisdiction to restore the excluded party to their rights. Sutter v. Trustees of First Reformed Dutch Church, 6 Wright, 503, is also an authority on this point. The decree of the court below, dismissing the bill, is, therefore, reversed, and the bill restored, and report of the master confirmed; and it is hereby ordered and decreed, that the defendants named in the bill of the plaintiffs, be enjoined and restrained perpetually from using the said church described in the bill, for the purpose of holding Sunday or Sabbath schools therein, and that the defendants pay the costs.

I concur in the construction given to the articles or canons in this case, but I dissent from the decree on the ground that the evidence does not show that any such injury has arisen, or is likely to arise from the act complained of, as warrants the interposition of a court of equity to restrain it by injunction.

HENRY W. WILLIAMS.

McHOSE v. FULMER.

Where a vendor fails to comply with his contract, by reason of not being able to procure an article of the same quality as called for, and by reason of the limited production of the article, its market price cannot be ascertained, the measure of damages is the actual loss which the vendee sustains in his own manufacture, by having to use an inferior article, or by not receiving the advances on his contract price upon any contracts, which he had himself made, in reliance upon the fulfilment of the contract.

Error to the Court of Common Pleas of Lehigh county.

Opinion by SHARSWOOD, J. Delivered March 24th, 1873.

When a vendor fails to comply with his contract, the general rule for the measure of damages, undoubtedly is, the difference between the contract and market price of the article at the time of the breach. This is for the evident reason, that the vendee can go into the market and obtain the article contracted for at that price. But when the circumstances of the case are such that the vendee cannot thus supply himself, the rule does not apply, for the reason that it ceases. Bank of Montgomery v. Reese, 2 Casey, 143. "It is manifest," says Mr. Chief Justice Lewis, "that this (the ordinary measure), would not remunerate him when the article could not be obtained elswhere." If an article of the same quality cannot be procured in the market, its market price cannot be ascertained, and we are without the necessary data for the application of the general rule. This is a contingency which must be considered to have been within the contemplation of the parties, for they must be presumed to know whether such articles are of limited production or not. In such a case, the true measure is the actual loss which the vendee sustains in his own manufacture, by having to use an inferior article, or by not receiving the advances on his contract price upon any contracts which he had himself made, in reliance upon the fulfilment of the contract by the vendor. We do not mean to say, that if he undertakes to fill his own contract with an inferior article, and in consequence, such article is returned on his hands, he can recover of his vendor, besides the loss sustained on his contract, all the extraordinary loss incurred by his attempting what was clearly an unwarrantable experiment. This legitimate loss is the difference between the contract price he was to pay his vendor, and the price he was to receive from his vendees. This is a loss which springs directly from the non-fulfilment of the contract. The affidavits of defence are not as full and precise upon this point as they might and ought to have been; but they state that the defendants below had entered into such contracts, and that they were unable to get the same quality of iron, which the plaintiffs had agreed to deliver, and this, we think, was enough to have carried the case to a jury.

Judgment reversed, and procedendo awarded.

Recent Acts of Congress.

The following is a brief statement in addition to that already published in this journal, of the several acts passed at the recent session of Congress, which are of general interest to the profession:

An act to fix the time for holding the annual session of the Supreme Court of the United States, and for other purposes. Approved January 24th, 1873.

This act designates the second Monday of October as the day for commencing the annual session of the United States Supreme Court, in future.

An act to amend an act entitled An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2d, 1867. Approved February 13th, 1873.

This act declares that whenever a corporation created by the laws of any State, whose business is carried on wholly within the State creating the same, and also any insurance company so created, whether all its business shall be carried on in such State or not, has had proceedings duly commenced against such corporation or company before the courts of such State, for the purpose of winding up the affairs of such corporation or company, and dividing its assets ratably among its creditors, and lawfully among those entitled thereto, prior to proceedings having been commenced against such corporation or company under the bankrupt laws of the United States, any order made, or that shall be made by such court, agreeably to the State law, for the ratable distribution or payment of any dividends of assets to the creditors of such corporation or company, while such State court shall remain actually or constructively in possession or control of the assets of such corporation or company, shall be deemed valid, notwithstanding proceedings in bankruptcy may have been commenced and be pending against such corporation or company.

An act to declare the true intent and meaning of the act approved June 8th, 1872, amendatory of the general bankrupt law. Approved March 3d, 1873.

This act declares that it was the true intent and meaning of the act of June 8th, 1872, that the exemptions allowed the bankrupt by the said amendatory act shall be the amount allowed by the constitution and laws of each State, respectively, as existing in the year 1871, and that such exemptions be valid against debts contracted before the adoption and passage of such State constitution and laws, as well as those contracted after the same, and against liens by judgment or decree of any State court; any decision of any such court rendered since the adoption and passage of such constitution and laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

An act to regulate the taking of testimony in certain cases. Approved March 3d, 1873.

This act provides that no witness shall be compelled to testify under letters rogatory, issued or to be issued from any court in any foreign country, in any suit or proceeding in which the government of such foreign country shall be a party of record or in interest, except for the purpose of answering specific written interrogatories, issued with and accompanying such letters rogatory, and addressed to such witness: Provided, that when counsel for all the parties attend the examination, they may consent that questions in addition to those accompanying the letters rogatory may be put to the witness, unless the letters rogatory exclude such additional interrogatories, and that no witness shall be required on examination under letters rogatory, to make any disclosure or discovery which shall tend to criminate him.

Recent Decisions.

NEW YORK.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS OF NEW YORK CITY. General Term. Before Judges C. F. Daly, Robinson, Larremore, and Loew. April 7th, 1873.

The steamer St. Louis, running between New York and New Orleans, was spoken off Sandy Hook, when coming into this port, by John W. Murray, a pilot licensed under the State law. The vessel refused to take him on board, and he brought suit before Judge Quinn, in the First District Court, to recover his pilotage fees. Mr. John E. Parsons, for the defendants, argued that the St. Louis was "a coastwise steam vessel," within the meaning of the act of Congress of 1871, providing that "all vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, when navigated within the jurisdiction of the United States, shall be subject to the rules and regulations established by the United States, for the government of steam vessels, and that every coastwise sea-going steam vessel; subject to such rules and regulations, and to the navigation laws of the United States, not sailing under register, shall, when under way, except upon the high seas, be under the control and direction of pilots licensed by the United States Inspectors of Steamboats," and therefore was not required to take a pilot under the State law. The United States statute provides that in the case of the vessels indicated, no charges by State or municipal action shall be levied, but it expressly excepts "coastwise steam vessels," from the operation of this saving clause. Judge Quinn gave judgment for the plaintiff, and defendants appealed to this court, where the judgment was affirmed. Chief Justice Daly, in rendering the decision, says that where this statute refers to a "coastwise sea-going vessel not sailing under register," it must mean one that is enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, and a vessel sailing from one part of the coast of the United States to another, or which is employed in the whale or coast fisheries, and does not refer to a registered vessel, that may trade or sail to any port of the world, as it was expressly declared "not sailing under register." That the State pilot law of 1867, in no way conflicts with the provision of the United States act, the obligation of taking a pilot licensed by the State board, being only imposed upon masters of foreign vessels, vessels coming from a foreign port, and vessels sailing under register. A coastwise vessel is one sailing by the way of or along the coast. In a certain sense the St. Louis was a vessel of this description, but was not necessarily limited to running by way of or to and from ports upon our coast. She was a registered vessel, and, being so, was privileged to go to or stop at foreign ports, and on the voyage in question, had stopped at Havana. That she was under control and direction of her master, who was a United States pilot, did not effect the question.

3. The granting or refusal by the highest court of a State of a motion for the rehearing of an equity suit, is not a subject for review by the Supreme Court of the United States; in fact not being within its jurisdiction. Steines v. Franklin County, 15.

4. When a Supreme Court of a State is composed of a chief justice and several associates, writs of error to the court under the 25th section of the judiciary act, must be signed by the chief justice. Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 26.

5. A notice by one of three defendants to his co-defendants of his intention to prosecute a writ of error, and a refusal by them to co-operate, is equivalent to the old proceeding of summons and severance and the one defendant can take his writ accordingly. O'Dowd v. Russell, 402.

6. The Supreme Court will not reverse a decree because a deposition showing the amount of damages has been improperly received; there being other evidence that the damages were as great as this court finally awarded. The Steamer Webb, 406.

7. Cannot pass on the weight of evidence on error to the circuit courts, when acting under the act of March 3d, 1865, as a jury. Dirst v. Morris, 484.

8. A failure of the Court of Claims to find a fact as a party alleges it to be, will not justify the bringing of all the evidence on the subject to the Supreme Court; though on a refusal of the Court of Claims to make any finding on the subject, the Supreme Court may remand the case for such finding. Mahan v. United States, 109.

9. Though error may have been committed by a court below on the then state of statutory law, yet where a statute has been passed since that court gave their judgment, changing the then existing law, so that if the judgment were reversed and the case sent back, the court would now and in virtue of the new statute, have to rightly give the same judgment that they gave before erroneously, this court will affirm. Pugh v. McCormick, 361.

(b) In admiralty

10. Although the general rule is that a party who does not appeal cannot be heard in opposition to the decree, still where it appeared—the suit below being a libel for collision against a tug and her tow — that an appeal from the District Court to the Circuit Court had been taken from the entire decree, by the owners of the tow, who had ordered the tug, and who had undertaken her defence as well as their own, and thus represented the entire interest of the losing party in the suit, an appeal by the tug from the Circuit Court to this court was entertained here, though the tug had not in form appealed from the decree of the District Court. The Mabey and Cooper, 204.

11. A decree in admiralty in the District and Circuit Courts for a greater amount than the sum for which the sureties were bound on their bond to release the vessel, reformed by the Supreme Court so as not to exceed that sum. The Steamer Webb, 406.

12. Where exceptions of form are taken on a libel in admiralty in the District Court, but are not found in the record of an appeal to the Circuit Court, or from the Circuit Court to the Supreme Court, and do not appear to have been brought to the attention of the Circuit Court, or acted on in any manner by it, they must be held in the Supreme Court to have been waived. The Vaughan and Telegraph, 258.

II. In Circuit and District Courts.

13. Where a mortgagor has filed a bill of revivor against the personal representatives, and not including the heirs of a mortgagee, who had bought the mortgaged property under a proceeding supposed to be a valid sale of foreclosure, but which was, in fact, a proceeding wholly void, and has had the bill dismissed and a decree that he is himself still owner, and that he pay the balance unpaid of the mortgage money, though the fact that the decree did not order the heirs of the mortgagee purchaser to convey, cannot be taken advantage of on error, yet the execution of the decree for payment may be stayed until the outstanding title have been brought back Bigler v. Waller, 297.

14. Where a charge is merely ambiguous, a party dissatisfied with it ought, before the jury leave the bar, to ask the court to make it clear. He should not take his chance with a jury, and then, after the verdict is against him, claim the benefit of the ambiguity on error. Improvement Company v. Munson, 442.

III. In district courts.

15. Decrees in admiralty in rem should not exceed the amount for which the sureties were bound on stipulations for a discharge of the vessel from the marshal's custody. The Steamer Webb, 406.

ABRAHAM C. BROWN et al. v. THE FAIRMOUNT GOLD AND SILVER MINING CO.

1. A supplement to a charter of incorporation, will not be binding until accepted by the body which composes the corporation.
2. An acceptance by the board of directors, unless they be specially empowered thereto, is not sufficient.
3. A supplement to a charter increasing the price of stock subscribed for, would impair the obligation of a contract, and is, therefore, unconstitutional.

Motion for an injunction.

Opinion of the court by ALLISON, P. J. Delivered April 5th, 1873.

The corporation defendant was created by an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, approved May 1st, 1866, and by the same authority, a supplement to the charter was passed the 5th of February, 1873.

This supplement declares that the board of directors, at any stated or other meeting called for the purpose, shall have authority to assess from time to time, at their discretion, on the stock then issued, or thereafter to be issued, such sum or sums of money as they may think necessary to pay existing liabilities of the company, and to carry on its business; notice of such assessment is required to be given in two daily newspapers published in Philadelphia, once a week, for three weeks.

It states further, that the board shall have power to sell such shares at public sale, for non-payment of assessment, after ten days' notice, and notice of the sale is to be published once in two papers, at least five days previous to the time fixed for the sale.

The supplement has never been submitted to the stockholders for acceptance or rejection, but was, according to paragraph 10 of the answer, accepted by the board of directors for the company. Under the charter, defendants claim to possess this power.

This presents one of the vital questions which are raised by the bill and answer. The case of the Commonwealth v. Cullen, 1 Harris, 133, seems to settle the law in our State conclusively against this position, on which the defendants justify their action. The principle is broadly affirmed, that substantive alterations of a charter, without request or assent of a corporation, are unauthorized interferences with the franchises, and that such assent must be given by the body who compose the corporation, and where this body is the stockholders, the directors or trustees have no power to accept or reject such alterations.

It therefore, follows, that to make valid as the act of the corporation, an act altering a charter, it should be passed at a meeting of the corporators, duly convened for that purpose, after notice to all the members. The most ample opportunity should be afforded for deliberation upon the proposed alteration; nor can a minority be deprived of this right by the arbitrary will of a majority.

This fundamental right of the stockholders was totally ignored by the directors; the amendment was procured without previous notice to or consultation with the body of the corporators, and it is charged in the bill, and is not denied in the answer, that the supplement was obtained without the consent, or even the knowledge of the large majority of the stockholders. The statement in the answer upon this point, is not responsive to the charge, it is not pretended that that previous approval was had, but only that it is acceptable, now acceptable to and desired by a large majority of the holders of shares, and to the holders of a majority of the shares. How this has been ascertained, is not stated, nor is there proof of its correctness. But though it be true, what becomes of the right of consultation, of the assembled body after notice, and time and opportunity for deliberation. The answer in this case is that the board of directors have chosen to wholly ignore it, and to assume to themselves the exercise of this important prerogative, without the color of law even to sustain them. The charter will be explored in vain for evidence of any such power. Article 3, in all of its six sections, contains nothing from which it may be inferred, and certainly there can be found no express grant of the kind. The duties and powers are those of ordinary management and control, nothing more.

The charter makes provision for the annual meetings of the stockholders. Special meetings are to be called by the board, of their own motion, or on written request of stockholders representing one-third of the capital stock of the company. The entire charter shows that the power to pass on important questions is reserved to the corporators, and it is declared that the business of the company shall be conducted and managed by a board of seven directors. But the acceptance of a material alteration of the charter, can in no proper sense be covered by the power to conduct and manage the business of the corporation. Yet such is the claim set up in the answer, which has not even a shadow of right on which to plant itself, and in no case could its exercise be justified, except where there was a clear power given by the charter, or where, as in the case of St. Mary's Church, 6 S. & R. 517, a select few representing all those interested in the objects of the association, are erected into and vested with all the powers of a corporation. In such case, they constitute of themselves the corporate body, and, therefore, wield the whole corporate authority, and are of necessity competent to apply for and accept changes in their organic law.

It was also claimed, that although the charter contains no grant of power such as has been sought to be exercised in this case by the directors, yet, having exercised it for the benefit of the company, it is binding on those for whom they have acted. But before such a principle can be successfully invoked, it must be shown that there has been acquiescence or assent by those who are to be effected. This cannot be claimed to be the case here, for as soon as the plaintiffs obtained knowledge of the existence of the supplement to the charter, and the attempt to levy assessments under it, they at once filed their bill praying an injunction to restrain the directors from exercising any authority by virtue of its supposed grant of power.

Upon the general doctrine of acceptance of a charter, whether it be as to an original grant, or as addition thereto, the decisions are clear, that there must be an acceptance of the chartered rights and obligations, before they can bind the members of the body. When granted to persons who have not solicited it, it is said to be in fieri, until after acceptance, and acceptance cannot be thrust on the members, nor will it ever be presumed, unless it be from open and plain recognition of the grant, or from a continual exercise of the corporate power.

This doctrine is broadly stated in Commonwealth v. Cullen, and also in the case of Shorts v. Unangst, 4 W. & S. 45. Nor will the carrying a charter round among the members privately, procuring their signatures without meeting or notice, constitute the assent of the society, nor bind any who are not parties to it. Swedes Church, Kingsessing, King, P. J., 1847; Bright. Sup. 1849, 125. Upon this point, are also Angell & Ames, 52, and Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheaton. There is not a pretence in this case, that the essential formalities have been complied with, nor is there any fact from which it can be inferred that they have been waived by the plaintiffs, or that the supplement, either directly or indirectly, has been accepted by them, which makes their right to the injunction for which they pray, clear.

But the bill charges that the supplement is in violation of the constitution of the State, in that it is a law impairing the obligation of contracts. This is denied by the answer, and we are requested by the parties to pass on this question.

The charter fixes the number of the shares at 20,000, and the value of each share at $10. Only 8,200 of the shares have been sold, the balance remaining under the control of the board, for which certificates have not been issued.

The plaintiffs do not aver in what way they became owners of their stock, whether as original subscribers, or by purchase from stockholders, but they aver that it is all paid up, and that defendants received the full par value for each and every share that was issued.

This, they contend, is a full compliance with their agreement with the company regarding the subscriptions for stock in the nature of a contract with the corporation. They hold it to be beyond the power of the Legislature to change the terms of the agreement by which, after a full compliance with the obligations under which they placed themselves, they can now be compelled to pay another price for their stock, and that price, by the terms of the supplement, is without limit, the directors having authority to assess it with such sums of money as they may think proper and necessary to pay liabilities, and to carry on the business of the company. In the case of the Commonwealth v. Cullen, Judge Bell says: Substantive alterations of the charter of an insurance company, are not to be taken as parcel of a private charter without the previous concurrence of the corporators, manifested in some way recognized by law. Unless so sanctioned, they are esteemed as unauthorized interferences with a solemn compact between the public and the individuals composing the corporations, and therefore obnoxious to the constitutional prohibition touching the obligation of contracts. This is the broad doctrine of the Dartmouth College case, in 4 Wheaton. In Brown v. Hummell, the trustees elected under the provisions of a will, and an act of incorporation, had vested rights under the act, and that a subsequent act, divesting them of their privileges and franchises, was unconstitutional and void, because it impaired the solemn contract of the State as contained in their original charter. Judge Coulter says: "Being a contract on the part of the State, it was beyond the reach and control of subsequent Legislatures. If this principle applies to a purely religious and eleemosynary corporation, how much more clear is it, that it governs chartered contracts, where the purpose is pecuniary merely, and where there is an undoubted agreement for the payment of money for a specified consideration.

A subscription for stock in a joint stock incorporated company is a contract, and the interest thereby acquired is a good consideration to support an action for the amount subscribed against the subscriber, Wordsworth on Joint Stock Companies, 317. Balt. T. Co. v. Barnes, 6 Har. & Johns. 57; Man. Co. v. Davis, 14 Johns. (N. Y.) 238, and in our State, are the cases of Ogle v. Somerset, 13 S. & R. 256; and Commonwealth v. Gill, 3 Whart. 228.

So strictly is a subscriber for stock held to his contract with the corporation, that he will not be permitted to withdraw and abandon his shares without the consent of the corporation, unless expressly empowered to do so by the act of incorporation. Twin. Co. v. Imlay, 1 Southard, 285; and U. Society v. Bank, 7 Conn. 456.

In the original charter of this company, there is no power of assessment of shares of stock, or of sale after forfeiture, and the principle is well settled, that the extent of the liability of a party to pay assessments, is to be measured by the extent of his engagements. Angell & Ames, 493. It is a corollary of this proposition, that where there is no engagement, there is no obligation to pay assessments. At page 489 of Angell & Ames, the doctrine is thus stated: "A corporation has no power to assess the shares of a member, unless such power has been conferred by the charter, or unless the members have obligated themselves by some act or promise on their part, to pay assessments."

Without spending more time on this part of this case, we think the objection taken to the right of the Legislature to alter the terms of the contract between the members and the corporation, is well taken; that it is an attempt to make a new contract as to the price, which the plaintiffs who object, agreed to pay for their stock, and that it so impairs the obligation of the contract, that it falls within the constitutional prohibition.

The injunction as prayed for, is granted.

THE PHILADELPHIA AND READING R. R. CO. Plaintiffs in Error, v. THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA.

A State tax upon the gross receipts of a carrying company, transporting goods from one State to another, is unconstitutional.

Dissenting opinion by Mr. Justice MILLER. Delivered March 10th, 1873.

The principles announced in the case of the tax on the ton of freight, and the argument by which those principles are supported, meet my full approval. They lie at the foundation of our present Federal Constitution. The burdens which States possessed of safe and commodious harbors, imposed by way of taxes called imposts upon the transit of merchandise through those ports to their destination for consumption in other States, were the cause as much as any one class of grievances of the formation of that Constitution; and the reluctance of the little State of Rhode Island to give up the tax which she thus levied on the commerce of her sister States through the harbor of Newport, then the largest importing place in the Union, was the reason that she refused for nearly two years to ratify that instrument.

The clauses of the Constitution which forbid the States to levy duties on imposts, and which gave to Congress the right to regulate commerce, were designed to remedy that evil, and have always been supposed to be sufficient for that purpose. The one is the complement of the other, and something more. The first forbids the States to levy the tax on goods imported from abroad. The second places the entire control of commerce, with the exception of such as may be begun and completed within a single State, under the control of Congress. That commerce which is carried on with foreigners, or with the Indian tribes, or between citizens of different States, is under the jurisdiction of the general government.

The opinion which affirms the tax of so much per ton on freight carried from one State to another to be a tax upon transportation, and therefore a regulation of the commerce among the several States forbidden by the Constitution, receives the approbation of all the members of this court except two. And it is there declared that any tax upon the freight so transported, or upon the carrier on account of such transportation, is within the prohibition.

Is the tax in the present case also within the evil intended to be remedied by the commerce clause of the Constitution?

It seems to me that to hold that the tax on freight is within it, and that on gross receipts arising from such transportation is not, is "to keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope." If the State of Pennsylvania, availing herself of her central position across the great line of necessary commercial intercourse between the east and the west, and of the fact that all the ways of land and water carriage must go through her territory, is determined to support her government and pay off her debt by a tax on this commerce, it is of small moment that we say she cannot tax the goods so transported, but may tax every dollar paid for such transportation. Her tax by the ton being declared void, she has only to effect her purpose by increasing correspondingly her tax on gross receipts. In either event the tax is one for the privilege of transportation within her borders; in either case the tax is one on transportation.

That the tax on gross receipts comes not only ultimately, and in some remote way, but directly out of the freight transported, it is hardly worth while to argue. The railroad company makes precisely the same calculation in making its business profitable in relation to the cost and expenses of transportation, and the price to be demanded for it, in regard to this tax, that it does in reference to the tax on the ton of freight, and it imposes this additional burden for the benefit of the State in fixing the price of transportation.

The tax does not depend on the profits of the companies. It is the same whether the profits or the losses preponderate in a given year. A road may do a large carrying trade at a loss, but the State says, nevertheless, "for every dollar that you receive for transportation I claim one cent or half a cent."

It is conceded that railroads may be taxed as other corporations are taxed on their capital stock, on their property, real and personal, and in any other way that does not impose necessarily a burden on transportation between one State and another. But a railroad or canal company differs from corporations for banking, insurance, or manufacturing purposes in this, that while their business is only remotely, or incidentally, connected with commerce, the business of roads and canals, namely, transportation of persons and property, is itself commerce. So much of said commerce as is exclusively within the State is subject to its regulations by taxation or otherwise, but that which carries goods from or to another State is exempted by the Constitution from its control.

I lay down the broad proposition that by no device or evasion, by no form of statutory words, can a State compel citizens of other States to pay to it a tax, contribution, or toll, for the privilege of having their goods transported through that State by the ordinary channels of commerce. And that this was the purpose of the framers of our Constitution I have no doubt; and I have just as little doubt that the full recognition of this principle is essential to the harmonious future of this country now, as it was then. The internal commerce of that day was of small importance, and the foreign was considered as of great consequence. But both were placed beyond the power of the States to control. The inter-state commerce to-day far exceeds in value that which is foreign, and it is of immense importance that it should not be shackled by restrictions imposed by any State in order to place on others the burden of supporting its own government, as was done in the days of the helpless Confederation.

I think the tax on gross receipts is a violation of the Federal Constitution, and, therefore, void.

I am authorized to say that Justices Field and Hunt concur in this dissent.

Recent Acts of Congress.

An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation within the United States.

No railroad company whose road forms any part of a line of road over which animals shall be conveyed from one State to another, shall confine them for a longer period than twenty-eight consecutive hours, without unloading for rest, water and feeding for a period of at least five consecutive hours, unless prevented from so unloading by storm or other accidental causes. In estimating such confinement, the time during which the animals have been confined without such rest; on connecting roads, shall be included. Animals so unloaded shall be properly fed and watered during such rest, by the owner or person having the custody thereof, or in case of his default in so doing, then by the railroad company, or owners, or masters of boats or vessels transporting them; and they shall have a lien upon such animals for food, care, and custody furnished. A penalty of not less than one hundred, nor more than five hundred dollars, is imposed. When animals are carried in cars or vessels in which they have proper food, water, space, and opportunity for rest, they need not be unloaded.

SECT. 2. The penalty shall be recovered by civil action in the name of the United States, in the Circuit or District Court of the United States, holden within the district where the violation was committed, or the person or corporation resides, or carries on business.

SECT. 3. Any person or corporation entitled to a lien under the act, may enforce the same, by a petition filed in the district where the food, care and custody shall have been furnished, or the owner or custodian of the property resides; and the court shall have power to issue all suitable process for the enforcement of such lien by sale or otherwise, and to compel the payment of all costs, penalties, charges, and expenses of proceedings under this act.

LEARY v. UNITED STATES.

1. If by the terms of a charter-party the entire vessel is let to the charterer with a transfer to him of its command and possession and consequent control over its navigation, he will generally be considered as owner for the voyage or service stipulated. But if the charter-party let only the use of the vessel, the owner at the same time retaining its command and possession, and control over its navigation, the charterer is regarded as a mere contractor for a designated service, and the duties and responsibilities of the owner are not changed. In the first case the charter-party is a contract for the lease of the vessel; in the other it is a contract for a special service to be rendered by the owner of the vessel.
2. Stipulations in a charter-party that the general owners shall keep the vessel in good condition during the existence of the charter, and receive on board certain goods at the request of the government (the charterer), and refuse to receive other goods without its assent, held, to be conclusive evidence that the possession and control of the vessel had not passed to the charterer but had been retained by the general owner.
3. In a charter-party by which a vessel was hired by the government for the purposes of plying in the harbor of Port Royal, in South Carolina, or for such other services as the government might designate, it was stipulated that in case the vessel, while executing the orders of the government, should be destroyed or damaged, or by being compelled by the government to run any extraordinary marine risk, the owner should be indemnified. In complying with the orders of the harbor master in Port Royal, the vessel struck upon the fluke of a sunken anchor in the harbor, and was sunk. Held, that the risk which the vessel thus incurred was not an extraordinary marine risk within the meaning of the charter-party, but an ordinary risk which every vessel runs that enters a harbor, and which every marine policy covers.

Appeal from the Court of Claims.

On the 19th of November, 1862, one Leary, owner of the steamer Mattano, chartered her to the United States, for the purpose of plying in the harbor of Port Royal, South Carolina, or for any other service the government might designate.

By the terms of the charter-party Leary engaged that the vessel during the existence of the charter, should be kept tight, stanch, well fitted, tackled, and provided with every requisite, and with men and provisions necessary; that the whole of it (with the exception of room necessary for the accomodation of the crew and the storage of cables and provisions) should be at the sole use and disposal of the government during the existence of the charter, and that no goods or merchandise should be laden on board otherwise than from the government or its agent, on pain of forfeiture of the amount that may become due on the charter; that he, Leary, would receive on board the vessel, during the charter, all such goods and merchandise as the government might think proper to ship. The government on its part agreed to charter and hire the vessel at $250 a day, for each day that it might be retained under the charter, the government to supply the coal; and that in case the vessel, while executing the orders of the government, should be destroyed or damaged by a hostile force from any quarter, or by being compelled by the government to run any extraordinary marine risk, then Leary was to be indemnified; in case of loss, the value of the vessel being fixed at $26,000, "and in case of damage the amount to be assessed by a board of survey, to be convened on her, after her arrival at Port Royal, South Carolina, or other friendly port, at the expense of the government."

While under the charter, the vessel was lying at one of the wharves in the harbor of Port Royal. On the 12th of May, 1863, the military harbor master ordered her out to make room for another steamer. The captain of the Mattano objected to going out, as the tide was very low, and as he believed there was a considerable breeze from an unfavorable quarter. The harbor master ordered the Mattano peremptorily to back out, and her captain let go his lines and did so. In thus backing out she struck upon the fluke of a sunken anchor imbedded in the sand, and sunk in fifteen minutes.

This anchor, against whose fluke the vessel struck, was a mooring anchor, and had been placed where it was by the United States quartermaster, to moor big ocean steamers, prior to November, 1863, and had a buoy attached to it which showed its position, but about the 1st of January, 1863, the buoy had gone adrift in a gale of wind, and had never been replaced, and there was nothing at the time of the accident to warn vessels of the position of the sunken anchor. No one could have pointed out where the anchor was at that time. The captain of the Mattano knew of the existence of the anchor, but thought he was a long way outside of it. There was no unskilfulness in executing the order to back out.

The Mattano was removed from where she sank by a wrecking-boat sent there by the secretary of war, and under orders from the quartermaster, about July 4th, 1863, and the cost of this service was paid by the United States. A gale of wind, which came on after she sank, did damage to her by carrying off her upper works, wheel-house, and joiners' work clear to the hull. No board of survey was convened to assess the damage done to the vessel.

After the vessel had been raised by the United States, Leary took possession of her, carried her to New York, and there had her put in order in such a way as to leave her fit for a towing or carrying vessel, but not fitted for passengers. These repairs were completed on the 10th of December, 1863, and cost Leary for her restoration $18,265.25; and she was worth then $12,000 less than before the accident. From the time this occured, 12th of May, 1863, until the time the repairs were completed, December 10th, 1863, there were two hundred and fourteen days. The repairs were made as rapidly and as economically as possible. She was chartered again to the defendants in May, 1864, at $100 a day.

On this case the Court of Claims decided that the disaster was a usual marine disaster, such as was covered by ordinary marine policies of insurance, and not such extraordinary marine risk as was contemplated in the charter-party; and that as the owners neglected to protect themselves against such perils by insurance, they would have to bear the loss. The court accordingly dismissed the petition, and hence the appeal to this court.

Messrs. Chipman, Hosmer, and Durant, for the appellants, argued in substance:

1st. That the United States were the owners of the injured vessel, by the terms of the charter-party, during the continuance of the service stipulated, and were consequently responsible for the damages sustained by the vessel whilst engaged in that service.

2d. That the damages to the vessel were occasioned by her running an extraordinary marine risk under compulsion from the United States, and for indemnity against such damages the charter-party stipulated, and they sought a reversal of the decree accordingly on those grounds.

Mr. G. H Williams, attorney general, and Mr. C. H. Hill, assistant attorney general, contra.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

There is no doubt that under some forms of a charter-party the charterer becomes the owner of the vessel chartered for the voyage or service stipulated, and consequently becomes subject to the duties and responsibilities of ownership. Whether in any particular case such result follows, must depend upon the terms of the charter-party considered in connection with the nature of the service rendered. The question as to the character in which the charterer is to be treated, is, in all cases, one of construction. If the charter-party let the entire vessel to the charterer with a transfer to him of its command and possession and consequent control over its navigation, he will generally be considered as owner for the voyage or service stipulated. But on the other hand, if the charter-party let only the use of the vessel, the owner at the same time retaining its command and possession, and control over its navigation, the charterer is regarded as a mere contractor for a designated service, and the duties and responsibilities of the owner are not changed. In the first case the charter-party is a contract for the lease of the vessel; in the other it is a contract for a special service to be rendered by the owner of the vessel.

In examining the adjudged cases on this subject, we find some differences of opinion, especially in the earlier cases, as to the effect to be given to certain technical terms used in the charter-party in determining whether the instrument parts with the entire possession and control of the vessel, but no difference as to the rule of law applicable when the construction is settled. All the cases agree that entire command and possession of the vessel, and consequent control over its navigation, must be surrendered to the charterer before he can be held as special owner for the voyage or other service mentioned. The retention by the general owner of such command, possession, and control is incompatible with the existence at the same time of such special ownership in the charterer. Christie v. Lewis, 2 Brod. & Bing., 410, 434; Marcardier v. The Chesapeake Insurance Co., 8 Cranch, 39, 49; The Schooner Volunteer and Cargo, 1 Sumner, 551, 556; Drinkwater v. Freight and Cargo of Brig Spartan, Ware, 149, 154; Donahoe v. Kettel, 1 Clifford, 135; Holt on Shipping, 461–471.

If now, in the light of these observations we look at the charter-party in this case, we shall find little difficulty in disposing of the first ground for reversal presented by the appellants. The vessel here was chartered for the purpose of plying in the harbor of Port Royal, in South Carolina, or for such other service as the government might designate, and the provisions which the charter-party contains on the part of the owners sound only in covenant. By it they engage that during the existence of the charter, the vessel shall be kept tight, stanch, well fitted, tackled, and provided with every requisite, and with the necessary men and provisions; and that the whole of the vessel, with the exception of the necessary room for the accommodation of the crew, and the storage for the cables and provisions, shall be at the sole use and disposal of the government; that no goods or merchandise shall be laden on board otherwise than from the government, or with the assent of its agent, on pain of forfeiture of the amount that may become due on the charter; and that the owners will receive on board all lawful goods and merchandise which the government may think proper to ship. In consideration of these stipulations, the United States agree that the owners shall receive the sum of $250 per day for each day the vessel is retained under the charter, and that they will supply the vessel with coal; and in case the vessel, whilst executing the orders of the government, shall be destroyed or damaged by a hostile force, or by being compelled to run any extraordinary marine risk, that the owners shall be indemnified.

The stipulations here designated on the part of the owners, imply the possession and command of the vessel by them, and would be inconsistent with such possession and command by the government.

Stipulations that the general owners shall keep the vessel in good condition during the existence of the charter, and receive on board certain goods at the request of the government, and refuse to receive other goods without its assent, would be out of place and inappropriate if the government were, at the same time, special owners of the vessel for the service stipulated, having the vessel in its entire possession and control. Great weight was given to similar clauses by the King's Bench, in Saville v. Campion, 2 Barnewall & Alderson, 511, and by the Supreme Court of New York, in Clarkson v. Edes, 4 Cowen, 477. In each of these cases they were held conclusive that the possession and control of the vessel had not pas ed to the charterer, but had been retained by the general owner.

The fact that the service stipulated in the present case was to be rendered for the government, cannot alter the natural import of the terms used in the charter-party, or change its construction, although in a doubtful case that fact might be entitled to much consideration.

2. The second ground presented by the appellants for a reversal of the decree is readily answered. The risk that the vessel incurred in complying with the orders of the harbor-master was not an extraordinary marine risk within the meaning of the charter-party. The term extraordinary is there used to distinguish an unusual risk which the vessel might be compelled to run by order of the government, from those risks which would be covered by an ordinary marine policy, and which might be expected to arise from the service in which the vessel was engaged. The contract of the government was not intended to apply to the usual risks attendant upon the performance of a service such as was here mentioned, but risks outside and beyond them.

The risk incurred was of a possible collision with a sunken anchor in the harbor. This was an extraordinary risk which every vessel must run that enters a harbor, and is one which every marine policy covers.

Decree affirmed.

ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

"TRUTH IS BITTER."

It is a notorious fact in the history of legislation of late years, in many of the large States, that our Legislatures contain a large percentage of unscrupulous and corrupt persons, whose only aim is to accumulate as much wealth as possible during their terms of office, without any regard to the justice or injustice of the laws which they help to pass. Most especially is this the case with the members of the lower branches of the Legislatures. The members from the large cities, particularly are, with but few exceptions, the most reckless and unscrupulous in those bodies. Our Pennsylvania Legislature is not an exception to the general rule in this respect, and we all know here in Philadelphia, that the representatives from this city, of both political parties, are as a general thing, recognized and regarded by their colleagues in the House, and by the outside public, as the head and front of nearly all the most iniquitous measures which are passed, either surreptitiously or otherwise, through the Legislature. Of course there are honorable exceptions to the rules, and fortunately, those exceptions are well known to their constituents; and it is a matter of great regret, that the misdoings of their less honorable fellow members should draw down the denunciations of the people upon the whole body, both good and bad, instead of upon the evil doers themselves.

We have been led into these reflections, in perusing the report of the legislative proceedings at Harrisburg, the evening before the adjournment, when the members of the lower House, following a disgraceful and undignified custom, indulged themselves in all sorts of strange antics, bidding defiance to all order and self-respect, and behaving like a parcel of lunatics or madmen. These amusements, as the telegraphic despatches inform us, "consisted of calling the most incompetent members to preside, and then overwhelming them with absurd questions and ridiculous motions. In one case, the member who assumed the chair, was driven out of it by repeated discharges of papers and documents from all parts of the House. As some of these missiles weighed half a pound each, and they were thrown with great force and velocity, the fun of dodging them was more exciting than pleasant."

Finally, as a sort of intellectual relief to the entertainment, "Mr. Brockway offered a resolution appointing a committee to invite Hon. A. K. McClure (Senator from Philadelphia), and the balance of the Liberal Republican party, to address the House on the corruption of all the political parties in existence. The resolution was agreed to. Messrs. Brockway, Josephs and Tittermary were appointed the committee, and proceeded in quest of Senator McClure. He was soon found and was escorted into the hall. As he entered, the members of the House rose and greeted him and the committee by whom he was escorted, with a volley of paper missiles, consisting of a general assortment of all the legislative documents of the session, in addition to cigar boxes, newspapers, and large printed files of bills."

After running the gauntlet the entire length of the hall, the Senator took his place upon the Speaker's stand, amid applause, which was half earnest and half jeering. He proceeded to deliver a short address, in which he concentrated the ablest, most bitter, and at the same time, most truthful estimate of the character of the men before him, that we have ever read. As a specimen of polished sarcasm, it is a master-piece; as an example of how to "Catch a Tartar," it is probably unequalled. His words were as follows:

"Mr. Speaker and Commoners of the State of Pennsylvania: I thank you for the distinction you have conferred upon me by your invitation to address you on the subject of reform. I know of no other body of men, either of the present or past, that needs instruction on the necessity of both public and private morality so much as the House of Representatives of this State, now before me (laughter), or that has so broadly and deeply experimented in the line of individual and official profligacy. (Laughter and applause.) I am not surprised, however, that it is so, when I consider that of the members serving in this House from my immediate locality, many were not even nominated, and few, if any, were ever elected. (Shouts of laughter.) I sent you reform bills, which cost me many days of anxious thought and labor to perfect, but you danced not when I piped to you, neither did you weep responsive to my mourning over the degeneracy of the body politic. I must admit, however, that you were prompt executioners, for every bill that looked toward reform was negatived with a yell as fast as rules would allow. But in political, as often in moral and religious cycles, the darkest hour is just before the dawn of day, and it is gratifying that, after you have consummated all the harm you can possibly inflict upon the State, you have by a unanimous resolution called for a confession. (Laughter.) It was well to pause thus, just for the sake of novelty or reference, so that when the tempest breaks, you can point to this becoming act of contrition for the wrongs done to your constituents, and to the Commonwealth. (Applause and sarcastic shouts.) Most of you, who have for three months been serving in the places to which other persons were elected by the people, have discounted the retributive wave of popular reprobation by creating offices by legislative enactments, to which you hope to retire; and those unprovided for, hope to be placed on the indefinite pay-roll of the pasters and folders of the House, in accordance with the prevalent custom here to pension decayed statesmen. (Shouts of laughter.) That you seek liberal counsels to have good seed sown in the chaos of virtue that surrounds you, is a hopeful sign of the times, and, if you do not cheat us more than 30,000 in Philadelphia next fall, the places that know you now, will know most of you no more forever. (Laughter.)

"But I turn to the faint silver lining on the deep cloud of your record. One act of this House gladdened the hearts of the whole people of the State, and reinspired hope throughout the length and breadth of the commonwealth. I refer to your vote, in the midst of disorder—that, at a Philadelphia fire, would be called a riot,—on Monday evening last, fixing an early day for your final adjournment. (Laughter and applause.) I have heard of no citizen of the State who did not heartily approve of that act. (Laughter.) I am happy to point to it as the oasis in the withered desert that you have made about you, and accord you credit for it. Hoping, gentlemen, if I may be pardoned the use of the term (laughter), that the length of your lives may correspond with the measure of your virtues, and that you will be succeeded by better men than yourselves, I bid you good night."

The Judiciary Report.

THE NORTHAMPTON BAR.

The following memorial was presented by Hon. Chas. Brodhead, in the Constitutional Convention upon Tuesday last:

To the Honorable the Delegates to the Convention to Revise and Amend the Constitution of the State of Pennsylvania.

The undersigned members of the bar of the county of Northampton, respectfully represent,

That feeling a deep interest in your action in reference to the judiciary system, you may report we have examined with much care the report of the majority and minority of your Committee on the Judiciary.

The plan of the majority, it appears to us, is too cumbersome, and would, if adopted, be productive of delay, trouble and expense in the administration of justice. The Circuit Court system proposed, would be found very inconvenient in practice. It is only required to sit once a year in each county, when exercising original jurisdiction. This would cause great delay in bringing cases to trial, or obtaining judgments in proper cases, which required expedition. The judges of the Circuit Court, in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction, are authorized to issue writs of certiorari to justices of the peace. Thus, a defendant in a $10 suit before a justice in this county, might take a certiorari, tie up the judgment for probably a year or more, and take the plaintiff near a hundred miles to Wilkesbarre, for its disposal, at a cost of $50 to $100. One of the judges of the Supreme Court would be occupied for much of his time, acting as chief justice of the Circuit Court in banc, and be thus necessarily prevented greatly from attending the sessions of the Supreme Court.

There are other numerous objections to this complicated project. The plan reported by the Hon. Daniel Kaine, from Fayette, from the minority of the committee, is, in our judgment, far better. By it the business would be confined, except as to appeals and writs of error to the Supreme Court, to convenient districts within easy reach of the members of the legal profession of each county. Three judges alternating as presiding judge in each county, would secure a more favorable feeling towards the bench than the continued presiding of one judge, as now. A judge holding court continuously, for a number of years in one district, necessarily comes in collision with practitioners by his decisions and rulings, and thus often an unpleasant state of antagonism is created between the bench and the bar. These three judges, sitting in banc, can compare notes, canvass questions which have arisen before each, discuss and examine the law applicable to every point tried before them, and their final decision would in most cases be accepted by the parties, and the Supreme Court be thus relieved of a very large amount of business.

The plan is simple, and its adoption, with some slight alterations, which we have suggested to the delegates from this district, would, we believe, prove useful and beneficial to parties, suitors, the bar and the courts.

We are also of opinion, that all the judges should be appointed by some non-partisan power, and not be elective, as now. Respectfully submitted,

H. D. Maxwell.

I concur fully, except as to election of judges. Edward T. Fox.

I concur in the above, and that all the judges should be elected by the people.

James W. Lynn.

We concur, with the exception that the judges of the Supreme Court should be elected, and all other judges appointed by the Supreme Court and the Governor, and confirmed by two-thirds of the Senate.

ALLEGHENY HEARD FROM.

At a meeting of the Allegheny county bar, held at Pittsburgh, on Friday, April 10th, 1873, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That our representatives in the Constitutional Convention, be requested to oppose the formation of a Circuit Court, as proposed by the Judiciary Committee, or of any intermediate court between the Court of Common Pleas and the Supreme Court."

Officers of the meeting: Hon. Moses Hampton, President; Hon. James P. Sterrett, Vice President; Wm. C. Moreland and J. G. MacConnell, Secretaries.

The Constitutional Convention re-assembled in this city upon Tuesday last. The judiciary article does not seem to meet with much favor; still another minority report, this time by Judge Woodward, being filed, and memorials from the Northampton and Allegheny county Bars being presented, urging the non-adoption of the article as reported. It is important to ascertain the wishes of the Pennsylvania Bar in reference to the proposed changes in the Judiciary System. Let us hear from some of its members. Our columns are open for communications upon the subject from all parts of the State.

THE BAR AND THE CENTENNIAL.

In the Gazette of March 7th, last, we noticed the preparation by Elwood Wilson, Esq., of a handsome volume for bar subscriptions to the Centennial. The following is a list of the members of the Bar, who have so far subscribed their names in the memorial volume, for one share each of the Centennial Stock:

Horace Binney, Henry G. Freeman, Henry J. Williams, Eli K. Price, James Page, Isaac Norris, Joseph M. Pile, Edward Coles, Samuel Chew, Frank M. Etting, J. Sergeant Price, Joseph R. Rhoads, George M. Conarroe, Samuel H. Perkins, Samuel C. Perkins, Samuel Wetherill, George L. Ashmead, Benjamin H. Haines, William E. Whitman, Charles Chauncey, Isaac Myer, Jr., R. Rundle Smith, George D. Budd, C. Stuart Patterson, Edwin T. Chase, Joseph A. Clay, H. G. Clay, G. R. Jefferson, Elwood Wilson, Jr., William M. Meredith, Charles S. Pancoast, Wm. Rotch Wister, R. R. Montgomery, Pierce Archer, Jr., W. W. Montgomery, Cadwalader Biddle, Asa I. Fish, Chas. Hart, James H. Stevenson, R. L. Ashhurst, Edward H. Weil, Peter McCall, Henry M. Phillips, Thomas J. Diehl, Isaac Gerhart, George Bull, William F. Johnson, Walter J. Budd, David Webster, Charles Gilpin, Egbert K. Nichols, William S. Price, Theodore Cuyler, James R. Booth, John Fallon, Thompson Westcott, Henry T. Coleman, J. The committee still have the volume in charge for personal presentation, and it will on Monday of each week, be at the office of Frank M. Etting, Esq., No. 506 Walnut street, where signatures and subscriptions will be received.

By order of the committee,
J. SERGEANT PRICE,
Secretary.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE LAW NEWS of St. Louis, comes to us this week changed from an eight page weekly, to a forty-eight page monthly. The publishers announce that they have made the change "after careful deliberation." The News has always had our good wishes, and we hope it may continue to prosper as it has done in the past. We think, however, the change from a weekly to a monthly, is not a good one, as in the present state of legal journalism, the profession desire to have information furnished to them as soon as possible, and do not as a general thing, care to wait a month for a correct copy of an important decision.

THE SOUTHERN LAW REVIEW for April, 1873, Nashville, Tenn.

This is quite a bulky number, containing, exclusive of its advertisements, 224 pages of legal essays, news, and digests of decisions; a continuation of the article on "English and French Law," by W. F. Cooper; an article on "Private International Law," by R. Hutchinson, of Memphis, Tenn.; one on "Rules of Evidence as Affected by Religious Belief," by Henry B. Tompkins, of Savannah, Ga.; one entitled "Presentment for Payment," by John W. Daniel, of Lynchburg, Va.; and one on "The Rebellion Viewed Through Legal Spectacles," by R. McPhail Smith, Nashville, Tenn., are among the contents of this number. The Review also has an extended Digest of English Law Reports; a selected Digest of State Reports, etc., etc.

A TREATISE ON THE LAW OF PERSONAL PROPERTY, by James Schouler, author of a Treatise on the Law of Domestic Relations. Boston, Little, Brown, & Co., 1873. 8vo.. pp. 776.

Law books in this day, get before the courts and bar in two different ways. The authors of some of them send copies to every eminent judge or lawyer whose name is known throughout the land, and to every newspaper which is likely to speak well of the book. Polite answers come, of course, to the letters, and the ordinary platitudes of eulogy figure in the newspapers. Both are then collected and sent through the post office to the bar of the whole United States. This is one way by which books become known, and for a while acquire reputation and sell. If they are really good books, they will keep on selling. But there is another way, which the modest author, who is still conscious of merit, adopts. He sends his book forth, and leaves it to speak simply for itself. It is advertised but not be-praised. It makes no noise. It is seen on the shelves of the Johnsons, the Kays, John Campbell, and other law booksellers. Lawyers look at it; some who are interested in the subject of it buy and read it. Of these certain ones cite it. The courts examine and refer to it, and by degrees, sometimes pretty slow ones, but for that reason the more sure, it comes to be recognized as a book of value; a standard book. It was thus that Sugden on Powers, Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers, Mitford on Pleading, and some other text books, have won their way to the universal confidence of courts and bar in two hemispheres. It is through the same way that Mr. Cooley's admirable book on Constitutional Limitations has become almost a book of judicial authority.

Mr. Schouler, whose name has now become a respected one in the courts, has seen good, we are happy to have observed, to follow the old fashioned and respectable plan. We forget how long ago it was that his book on the Domestic Relations first appeared, but it is now some time since. It made very little noise, and was, perhaps, received with something like disfavor; for most lawyers, who through the charming pages and praises of Chancellor Kent, had been made familiar with the writings of good old "Tapping Reeve" on the same subject, were rather, we suppose, disinclined to see the thing handled by a young performer. Mr. Schouler did not cause his book to be heralded or noticed. We fancy that he gave but few copies away to any one; certainly he sent none to us. But the book was there for any and all who were interested in the discussion of its subject. It was cited now and then; for a while, indeed, cited but seldom, afterwards more freely. The circle of readers has grown wider and wider, until at last without any outlays by any one, the book has come in a quiet way to be largely regarded as the best work on the subject; a carefully and intelligently prepared work on a topic of deep and constant interest.

We have now a new volume from Mr. Schouler. One, we predict, which will elevate him to the rank of one of the best known and most frequently quoted of our American text writers. He has in the the first place taken a good subject. His book fills a void. The growth of personal property has been immense in the United States, not only in the last twenty-five years, but in the last fifteen; indeed, since the war. His book is, therefore, on a subject of the most practical kind. Questions on its subject are arising daily and hourly in all our courts, Federal and State, throughout the land. Mr. Schouler's opening chapter, contains a philosophical chapter on Property and its Origin, in which the author—whose mind is obviously of a comprehensive cast, where the sociologic question finds kindred soil—dissenting from the views of Grotius and Blackstone, presents, in our judgment, a theory far more true and accordant with fact. He next considers the Nature and General Incidents of Personal Property; that sort of property in general; chattels, real and personal; heir-looms and emblements; fixtures; personal property in expectancy; joint and common owners; partners; members of limited partnerships and joint stock companies, and ship owners; members of corporations; interest and usury, and the conflict of law relating to personal property. This last chapter is particularly interesting. The author in entering on its subject, notes the gratifying fact, that "American jurists have done more thus far than those of England, to bring into harmony and blend together the jarring system of independent nations, by unfolding principles for universal recognition, as the ground-work of an international law, upon which a lasting superstructure may be made." In entering upon it himself, Mr. Schouler proceeds with great caution, heaving his lead and taking soundings the whole time. We are much struck with his careful manner. He pays a tribute of respect to the recent work of Dr. Wharton on the Conflict of Laws, and states fully his views in advocacy of the lex rei sitæ,—the views of Savigny and other writers, advocates of the civil law—"whose manifest tendency," says Mr. Schouler, "is to a repudiation of the doctrines that movables follow the person, and the substitution of a new principle that the lex rei sitæ controls the transfer of movables as well as immovables, whether the local law be founded on legislative enactment or a legal judgment." Mr. Schouler is careful how he commits himself as a partisan or a theorist in the matter. Speaking like a true lawyer, he says, "Writers of high repute would, indeed, gladly pilot us over to the lex rei sitæ as the true haven. But the courts still tarry. And it must be conceded, that while the rei sitæ doctrine furnishes a test the simplest possible, and the easiest of application, that test is, nevertheless, the most prominative of international selfishness." It is a singular incident, that very soon after the lines quoted had been penned, and while Mr. Schouler's book was yet probably on its way through the press, his disinclination to follow "writers," even of high repute, "while the courts tarried," received a very positive approval from the highest court of our country in the case of the State Tax on Foreign Held Bonds, 15 Wallace, yet unreported, where the Supreme Court of the United States, overruling the decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in Maltby v. Reading & Columbia Railroad, 52 Pennsylvania State, 140 (which declared a tax might be laid on the interest of corporation bonds issued within her borders, though held by persons resident out of them), asserted to the full extent the old maxim "mobilia ossibus inhœrent;" and largely on the ground presented by Mr. Schouler, that if any other doctrine were allowed the "international selfishness" of each State would lead it to support itself at the expense of the citizens of other States.

Our space does not allow us to speak more fully of Mr. Schouler's book. Recognizing the fact that the increase of every sort of personal property has become immense, even since the last good text books were written on the subject, he gives a chapter to almost all its "Leading Classes," these forming a third and final division of his volume. He takes especially ships and vessels; money; debts in general; debts secured by lien; debts secured by pledge; collateral security; debts secured by mortgage; chattel mortgages; bills and notes; miscellaneous negotiable and quasi negotiable instruments; shares of stock; patents and copyrights; fire and marine insurance policies; personal annuities and life insurance policies; legacies and distributive shares.

A careful reference to the best authorities, characterizes the volume in every part, and while the author is obviously one who thinks for himself, he not less obviously remembers that he is writing a treatise on a practical branch of the law, and that all speculation and theorizing must be rigidly subjected to the decisions of the courts of the country. Mr. Schouler observes, that a second volume devoted to the subject of the "Title to Personal Property," and covering especially the important topics of gift and sale, is necessary to complete the present work according to his original plan; but intimates that he will leave its preparation to others. We trust that, contrary to his anticipation, he will himself give the work to the profession.

Supreme Court, New York.

AT CHAMBERS—NEW YORK CITY.

In re GOODWIN.

The relator was expelled from an incorporated society, for alleged violation of its by-laws, in the use of improper language at one of its meetings. Upon application, the court granted a mandamus to restore him, on the ground that the words alleged to be in violation of the by-laws, were not reduced to writing, or acted upon by the meeting at which they were spoken, as required by the rules in Cushing's Manual, which were declared by the same by-laws, to govern the debates of the society.

Mandamus.

Opinion by FANCHER, J. Delivered April 8th, 1873.

The respondents were incorporated by an act of the Legislature of the State of New York, passed May 2d, 1829, and are owners of real and personal estate of large value. The relator was, on the 12th of November, 1846, elected a life member of the corporation, and continued to hold such relation to the corporation until June 6th, 1872, when he was expelled for an alleged violation of the by-laws of the corporation. The relator alleges that his expulsion was without proper cause, but the respondents assert that the cause of expulsion was sufficient, and that the proceedings of the corporation which involved the expulsion were authorized by their charter and by-laws, and they further contend that their proceedings are not open to revision on mandamus. By virtue of his membership, an interest in the property of the corporation was vested in the relator, and he cannot be deprived of it without his consent or due process of law.

When he became a member of the corporation, he assented to the by-laws adopted for its government, and he has no right to complain if there has been a fair and proper administration of the by-laws in his case; but if the by-laws have not been observed, he has been improperly expelled, and this court has the power, and should exercise it, to reinstate by mandamus. The People ex rel., Price v. American Institute, 2 Leg. Obs. 170. The People v. Medical Society of Erie, 24 Barb. 577. It is alleged that at a meeting of the Institute, held on the 5th of October, 1871, a resolution was adopted, authorizing the trustees to purchase or lease the premises known as the Empire City Skating Rink, on the Third avenue. The relator, with others, opposed the resolution at that meeting prior to its adoption; and he also at the subsequent meeting, held on the 2d of November, made an unsuccessful motion for an amendment of the minutes of the October meeting, relating to the action of the institute as to the rink. At the meeting of November 2d, 1871, a committee was appointed to investigate certain charges against the relator, presented at that meeting. From an examination of the charges, it appears that he was accused of using language at the meeting in October, "calculated to excite confusion and dissension among the members, in violation of by-laws, article 22, section 16," also, that at said meeting "he did not, in speaking upon a certain question under debate, confine himself to the question, but wandered therefrom into indecorous language;" also, that he "imputed improper motives" in that debate to certain members, and accused members of being improperly influenced in the matter of the resolution as to the rink.

The investigating committee reported that it found the charges sustained. At a subsequent meeting, a special committee was appointed under the by-laws to try the charges, and the relator was summoned to appear for trial. The trial was had, and the trial committee in May, 1872, reported in favor of expelling the relator from membership in the institute. The resolution was laid over to the meeting held on the 6th of June, 1872, when it was resolved to vote by white and black balls on the proposed resolution of expulsion. The vote was accordingly taken in that manner, when sixty-four voted in favor of and fifteen opposed the resolution, and it was declared adopted. The question is whether or not these proceedings were in accordance with the by-laws of the corporation. Article 24, section 20, of the by-laws reads as follows: "The rules in 'Cushing's Manual' shall govern all debates, except in cases herein specially provided for." "Cushing's Manual" points out the procedure when action of a deliberative body is taken for disorderly words. The member is called to order, and his words reduced to writing by the clerk. The assembly then determine whether the member has been guilty of any offence, and whether further proceedings to punish him shall be had. The following paragraph follows: "232. If offensive words are not taken notice of at the time they are spoken, but the member is allowed to finish his speech, and then any other person speaks, or any other matter of business intervenes, before notice is taken of the words which gave offence, the words are not to be written down, nor the member using them censured. The rule is established for the common security of all the members, and to prevent the mistakes which must necessarily happen if words complained of are not immediately reduced to writing." This rule was not observed in the proceedings against the relator. It does not appear that his supposed violation of the rules of debate were noticed by any action at the October meeting, where the offensive words were spoken. The first action was at the meeting in November following. As the meeting at which the words were spoken did not take any action concerning them, it was not competent for a subsequent meeting to take action in regard to them. There was no by-law of the corporation to authorize any action in the matter at such subsequent meeting. The rule quoted from "Cushing's Manual" applies to the case, and section 20 of article 24, contains the law applicable to the offensive words of the relator. Section 6 of the same article contains a provision under which the relator might have been called to order at the time the words were spoken; the penalty for which would have been that the relator should take his seat, provided the presiding officer declared him to be out of order. The same section contains further provisions as to the course of proceeding in case a member thus pronounced out of order should refuse to take his seat. But the return of the respondents does not set up that the relator was called to order, and refused to take his seat after being declared out of order, and it shows that the proceedings touching the relator were not of that character, and are not protected by the 6th section of article 24. It is clear that the proceedings against the relator leading to his trial and expulsion, and which began in the November meeting, were unauthorized by the by-laws of the corporation, and his expulsion was, therefore, improper. The motion for a mandamus must be granted.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

[Our thanks are due to John M. Shirley, Esq., State Reporter, for advance sheets of vol. 51, New Hampshire Reports, from which we extract the following head notes.]

SUPREME COURT OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.—S. obtained goods of the plaintiffs by means of a fraudulent sale, and under such circumstances that they were entitled as against him to treat the transaction as wholly void. Directly after getting the goods into his posession, S. made an assignment of all his property to the defendant, under the provisions of ch. 126, Gen. Stats., who thereupon took possession of the same, including the goods in question. Held, that the plaintiffs might recover the goods in an action of replevin against the assignee.—Farley et al. v. Lincoln.

Satisfaction of the judgment recovered in an action of trespass for the conversion of chattels, passes property in such chattels to the defendant; and the defendant's title thus acquired, takes effect by relation from the time of the conversion.—Smith v. Smith.

TENNESSEE.

The SUPREME COURT OF TENNESSEE have decided (2 So. Law Rev. 414), in Fritz v. The State, that lager beer is not a spirituous or vinous liquor, within the meaning of the State liquor law, which prohibits the sale of spirituous and vinous liquors on Sunday, and it follows that an indictment will not lie for the sale of fermented liquors on Sunday.

Also, in Wisner et al., Executors, v. Maupin et ux., that there may be a trial of an issue devisavit vel non on a copy of the original will, the correctness of the copy not being in dispute.

ALABAMA.

[Our thanks are due to John W. Watts, Esq., State Reporter, for head notes of decisions of the Supreme Court of Alabama, rendered at January Term, 1873. We make the following selections from them.]

PETERS, J.—An agent, who receives the funds of his principal to purchase lands for him, cannot repudiate his trust and purchase the land for himself with his own and his principal's funds, and then set up the statute of frauds in his defence, because his agency did not rest upon written authority.—Firestone v. Firestone.

SAFFOLD, J.—A will revoked by tearing off the names of the testator and some of the witnesses, cannot be republished, except by a resigning and attestation in writing.

The existence of a subsequent will, without proof of its contents, is sufficient to revoke a former one.—Barker v. Ball.

PETERS, J.—A guardian should not be charged compound interest, unless he is guilty of fraud, or gross neglect, which amounts to fraud.—Childress v. Childress.

PECK, C. J.—1. One who undertakes to contract as an agent, and either has no authority, or so contracts as to impose no legal obligation on his principals, is himself personally liable.

2. The honest belief of such a person that he has authority, and acts in good faith, yet, if in fact he has no authority, does not thereby relieve him from responsibility.—Belisle v. Clarke, Hart & Co.

SEVENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Court of Common Pleas, Montgomery County.

STREEPER'S EXECUTORS v. ZIMMERMAN.

1. To determine the validity of a gift, its subject matter must be considered. If capable of manucaption, it must be either actually or constructively delivered. If it be not, then it is still executory, and being without consideration, is void, either as a gift inter vivos, or a donatio causa mortis. A chose in action may, however, pass by assignment, for the debt itself cannot be delivered, and the only delivery that can be had must be of this character.
2. A gift must be executed, for, if it remains executory and there be no consideration, it is void.
3. If the donor has perfected his gift in the way in which he intended, so that there is nothing left for him to do, and nothing which he has authority to countermand, the donee's right is enforced as a trust, and the consideration is immaterial.
4. Nothing can take effect as an assignment which does not manifest an intention to relinquish the right of dominion on the one hand, and create it on the other.
5. An agreement, under seal, to make a gift, imports a consideration, and may therefore be enforced.
6. The natural love and affection of a grandparent for his grandchild, when that grandchild had been affectionate and attentive to him and his wife in their declining years, is not a sufficient consideration to support an executory gift inter vivos. Kindness and filial devotion are not the subjects of a quantum meruit.
7. A moral obligation is not a vague or undefined claim, arising from nearness of relationship, but it is an imperative duty, which could be enforced by law or in equity, were it not for some positive rule, which, with a view to some general benefit, exempts the party in that peculiar instance from legal liability.

Sur case stated.

Opinion of the court by Ross, P. J. Delivered February 1st, 1873.

The defendants in the case stated, on the first day of April, 1864, executed and delivered to the plaintiff's testator, a bond conditioned for the payment of $500 one year after date, with interest at five per cent. George Streeper, the testator, died September 10th, 1864, leaving a last will dated August 3d, 1864, of which will the plaintiffs were constituted the executors. After the testator's death, this bond was found among his papers, it having remained in his possession since its execution and delivery. Payment was not demanded until 1871, when it was refused, and this action was instituted.

The ground of defence consists principally of an endorsement made upon the bond by the testator in his lifetime, which is in these words: "July 22d, 1864, I request my executors to give this bond to Anna Meriah Zimmerman, for her grate kindness that she shown to me and her grandmother."

"GEORGE STREEPER," [L. S.]

"GEORGE STREEPER."

"This is not to interfere with what I will to her. This she is to have beside that."

GEORGE STREEPER.

Anna Meriah Zimmerman, named in this endorsement, was the granddaughter of the testator, whose proper name was Anna Maria, and who was intermarried with the defendant. The testator bequeathed to her a legacy of $400 in his will. It is admitted by the case stated, that the bond was never delivered to her in pursuance of the endorsement, but that it remained in the possession of George Streeper until his death.

Under these facts can a recovery be had upon the bond?

It must be remembered that the endorsement is not intended to release the defendant, the obligor, from his liability upon the bond. If it has any effect whatever, it is to make a gift of the bond to Mrs.

Zimmerman. This fact must not be overlooked or disregarded, for it underlies the case, and governs the facts presented for our determination.

To constitute a valid gift inter vivos, certain essentials are requisite, and the first inquiry which presents itself is, whether the endorsement upon the bond, undelivered to Mrs. Zimmerman, constituted a valid gift.

To determine the validity of a gift, its subject matter must be considered. If capable of manucaption, it must be actually or constructively delivered. If it be not, then it is still executory, and being without consideration is bad, either as a gift inter vivos, or a donatio causa mortis. Yard v. Patton, 1 Harr. 278; Kennedy v. Ware, 1 Barr, 445; Whitehill v. Wilson, 3 Pa. Rep. 405; Jones v. Drake, 6 Philada. Rep. 416; In Painter's Estate, 6 Wr. 156; Cressman's Appeal, 6 Id. 147. A chose in action may, however, pass by assignment, for the debt itself cannot be delivered, and the only delivery that can be had must be of this character.

A gift must be executed, for if it remains executory, and there be no consideration, it is void. Kennedy v. Ware, supra. In order to execute a gift of a chose in action, there must be a delivery of the evidence of the debt, or an assignment of it.

"A gift," says C. J. Gibson, In re Campbell's Estate, 7 Barr, 101, "is a contract executed, and as the act of execution is the delivery of possession, it is of the essence of the title. It is the consummation of the contract, without which it would be no more than a contract to give, and without efficacy for want of consideration. If made on a sufficient consideration, it would be a binding agreement, but then the nature of the contract would be changed, and there still would be no gift. The gift of a bond, note, or any other chattel, therefore, cannot be made by words in futuro, or by words in presenti unaccompanied by such delivery of possession as makes the disposal of the thing irrevocable. "This doctrine is cited and approved in Painter's Estate, supra."

So strictly is the validity of a gift made dependent upon its execution, that it was ruled in Pennington v. Gitting, 2 Gill & John. 209, that an intended gift by a parent to a child of certain bank stock, of which the certificate was handed to the contemplated donee, but no transfer of it was made on the books of the bank, which was the recognized mode of passing an interest in the shares, was executory, and could not be enforced. To the same purport are the cases of Deepfield v. Elwes, 1 Bligh Rep. 529; and Fortesque v. Barret, 3 Mylne & Keen, 36; Lonsdale v. Lonsdale, 5 C. 407; Adams' Eq. 234, note.

It is clear from these authorities, that unless there be a delivery, either of the chose in action, or the assignment of it to the donee, the gift is not executed, and the donee requires no rights under it.

But it is said that while the undelivered bond, with its endorsement, may not constitute a gift to the donee, yet it is in effect a declaration of trust, which converts the executors into trustees of this fund for her benefit. It is said that an equitable assignment of a chose in action is a declaration of trust, with an agreement to permit the assignee to sue in the assignor's name. Butler's Coke Litt. 232, and note 1.

But how can this undelivered endorsement be termed an assignment? It never passed out of the control of the testator; it never conferred a complete and present right upon the assignee. It would unquestionably have been competent for the testator, at any time after he made these endorsements, to have cancelled them. His power over the endorsements up to the hour of his death was complete and ample; and up to that hour, the donee had acquired no rights. Yet the converse of all this is essential to constitute an assignment. Vide 3 Lead. Eq. Cases, H. J. W.'s notes, 361, where it is said: "It is necessary, in order to constitute an assignment, either legal or equitable, that there should be such an actual or constructive appropriation of the subject matter assigned, as to confer a complete and present right in the assignee, even when the circumstances do not admit of its immediate exercise * * * * The characteristic of an assignment is the relinquishment of all legal or equitable interests by the assignor, and the creation of a new and independent right in the assignee." Rogers v. Hosack, 18 Wend. 319; Cowperthwaite v. Sheffield, 3 Comstock, 243. "If the donor has perfected his gift in the way in which he intended, so that there is nothing left for him to do, and nothing which he has authority to countermand, the donee's right is enforced as a trust, and the consideration is immaterial." Adams' Eq. 233. A delivery then of the bond, with the endorsement, was essential to vest rights in the donee. Until that was effected, the testator had done nothing to relinquish his legal or equitable interest. The whole matter was yet in his power, and subject to his control. He could have cancelled the endorsement without prejudice to any legal or equitable right of his intended beneficiary. It is well settled that nothing can take effect as an assignment which does not manifest an intention to relinquish the right of dominion on the one hand, and create it on the other. 3 Lead. Eq. Cas. 363; Dickinson v. Phillips, 1 B. 454; Rogers v. Hosack, supra; Hall v. Jackson, 20 Pick. 194.

This doctrine is thoroughly sustained by our own authorities. In Lonsdale v. Lonsdale, 5 C. 407, it was ruled that an assignment of choses in action, under seal, without valuable consideration, designed to take effect at the death of the assignor, where such choses in action were not delivered until after the assignor had become insane, passed no title to the assignee. This would seem to rule the point now under consideration. The same question was ruled by Judge Chapman in Jones v. Drake, 6 Philada. Rep. 417, in an able and elaborate opinion. Vide Grant v. Levan, 4 Barr, 424; Critchfield v. Critchfield, 12 Harr.; Plumstead's Appeal, 4 S. & R. 545.

If then, this endorsement was without consideration, not having been delivered, it passes no title to the donee. In order to avail herself of it, she must show it to have been made upon a sufficient consideration. The next inquiry, therefore, is, was the endorsement made upon a sufficient consideration?

It is said that the seal imports a consideration, and that from the sealing of the endorsement, the law presumes it to have been made upon sufficient consideration. "It is not now to be doubted," says Bell, J., in Yard v. Patton, 1 Harr. 285, "that though a parol unexecuted promise to make a gift inter vivos, without consideration, is void, an agreement, under seal, to do so, may be enforced as a legal obligation." Vide Campbell's Estate, 7 Barr, 100; Mack's App. 18 P. F. S. 233; Shenk v. Endless, 3 W. & S. 256; 1 Johns. Ch. Rep. 329. But in all these cases, it will be found that the sealed instrument was delivered to the donees. If delivery had been proved in this case, I should, in consequence of the endorsement being under seal, have no difficulty in concluding that the seal imported a consideration. But as there was no delivery, the fact that it was under seal, does not establish the existence of a consideration. This is squarely ruled in Lonsdale v. Lonsdale, and that authority renders further elaboration upon this point superfluous. But feeling the import of consideration derived from the attachment of the seal, how, or by what means do the facts in the case establish it? The endorsement by its own terms purports to be made "for her grate kindness that she shown to me and her grandmother." This expression excludes the idea that any valuable consideration was the moving cause for the endorsement. Kindness and filial devotion are not the subjects of a quantum meruit. The natural love and affection of a grandfather for his grandchild, when the grandchild has been attentive and affectionate to him and his wife, in their declining years, seem to have induced the testator to make the endorsement upon the bond. But there are not sufficient considerations upon which to enforce a gift inter vivos. For this, there is abundant authority. Yard v. Patton; Kennedy v. Ware; Mack's Appeal, supra; Shorb v. Shultz, 7 Wr. 207; Lyon v. Marclay, 1 Watts, 271; 18 Johns. 145; Whitehill v. Wilson, supra; Campbell's Estate, supra.

The only adjudicated case in Pennsylvania which intimated a contrary doctrine, is Wentz v. DeHaven, 1 S. & R. 312, and that was ruled on the authority of the dictum of Lord Mansfield. But upon this point it is distinctly overruled in Kennedy v. Ware, and Campbell's Estate, supra, and can be regarded as no authority.

But it is said there was a moral obligation which will support the endorsement, by affording a sufficient consideration. A moral obligation which will support a promise to pay, or to give, has a distinct legal character. A moral obligation is not a vague or undefined claim, arising from nearness of relationship, but it is an imperative duty, which could be enforced at law or in equity, were it not for some positive rule, which, with a view to a general benefit, exempts the party in that particular instance from legal liability. Kennedy v. Ware. Its nature is well illustrated by the case of a contract debt, barred by the statute of limitations, the collection of which cannot be enforced by legal remedies, but which will support a subsequent promise to pay the debt thus tolled by the statute. Where does the case stated show any imperative duty on the part of the testator to Mrs. Zimmerman? She must show, in order to enforce the endorsement, that there was a consideration, or its equivalent, in moral obligation. Nothing, however, is established by the case stated, except the executory gift. It is simply the case of an unexecuted intention to give at a future period, and is, therefore, under the authorities cited, void.

It was not seriously contended upon the argument, that the endorsements should be considered in the light of a testamentary disposition, nor could that view be maintained. A testator can execute but one will which can speak after his decease, and this testator made his will some time after the endorsement had been executed.

The fact that two of the executors are willing to surrender the bond, is not material. They cannot release assets of the estate as executors; after the fund comes into their hands as legatees, they may, in that character, act as they believe justice and equity require.

It is apparent from what has been said, that the plaintiffs can recover.

It may be questionable whether the defendant could have availed himself of the grounds of defence upon which the collection of the bond was resisted. It was never cancelled; nor is it pretended that the testator made a gift of it to him. She unquestionably owes the sum secured by it; and the question is not as to his liability to pay, but as to whom the payment is to be made. I have, however, decided the main question, in order that future litigation may be avoided.

The whole case is well summed up by C. J. Gibson, in Campbell's Estate: "All agree that the possession was not parted with; and it cannot be disputed that his intentions might be abandoned, and his directions countermanded. It was his property while he lived; and as the direction was a testamentary one, it became inoperative at his death. It was a mere authority, which expired with him."

And, now, February 1st, 1873, judgment is directed to be entered upon the case stated in favor of the plaintiffs, for the principal of the bond, with interest thereon at five per cent. from its date to the date of the institution of this action, and at six per cent. after that date.

B. N. Charn, Esq., pro plaintiffs.
Geo. N. Corson, Esq., pro defendant.

DUNCAN et al. v. MARY T. B. JAUDON, and THE NATIONAL CITY BANK, Appellant, v. MARY T. B. JOUDAN.

1. If a cestui que trust waive a breach of trust on the part of her trustee, it will not, therefore, be presumed that a subsequent breach is made with her consent.
2. Though a trustee under a will, in making investments, depart from the rule prescribed by the testator, yet, if it be acquiesced in by the party in interest, and there is no interference by the court having charge of the trust, the right of action to the cestui que trust for an illegal disposition of the property thus substituted, is not effected by reason of this departure.
3. A person with whom a trustee pledges stock, which by its face is held in trust, is bound to take notice of the trust, and on a sale of the stock by him, or on his account, will be liable to the cestui que trust for the proceeds thereof.

Appeals from the Circuit Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

Opinion of the court by Mr. Justice DAVIS.

The object of these suits is to reach the proceeds of certain trust property, which it is charged was disposed of by Samuel Jaudon, the trustee, in violation of his trust, to the advantage and gain of the plaintiffs in error. The trust in question has its foundation in the will of Commodore Bainbridge, who died in Philadelphia, in 1833. Among other things, the testator directed certain trustees, whom he named, to invest a portion of his estate in trust for his daughter, the complainant below; to pay the interest on the investment to her during her natural life, and at her death to divide the property equally between her children. These trustees, at their own request, in 1835, were discharged from the duties of their appointment by the Court of Common Pleas of Philadelphia, and Samuel Jaudon appointed in their stead. The trustee thus substituted received, at the time of his appointment, with other effects of the estate, certain State bonds, which he sold, and invested the proceeds in the stock of the Delaware and Raritan Canal Company. One hundred and seventeen shares of this stock were appropriated to the use of this appellee, and stood upon the books of the company in the name of Samuel Jaudon, as her trustee, and certificates for said shares, showing on their face that this was so, were issued and delivered to him, and the dividends for a long period of time were regularly paid by him to the cestui que trust.

At different times during the years 1865-66-67, these shares of stock were pledged as security for loans obtained by Samuel Jaudon from the appellants in these cases, on his own private account, and were afterwards sold by them to extinguish this private indebtedness. The legality of these respective transactions form the subject matter of these suits.

It is too plain for controversy that Samuel Jaudon committed a gross breach of trust in allowing these shares of stock to be disposed of and applied in the manner they were; but as he is insolvent, and the specific property cannot be reclaimed, the inquiry arises whether the appellants, with whom the shares were pledged and for whose benefit they were sold, or the cestui que trust, shall bear the loss occasioned by his misconduct.

It is argued that the appellants bear a different relation to this stock from what would be the case if the investment in it had been authorized by the terms of the will. It is true the will directed investments to be made in government or State stocks, and on this account the conversion by Jaudon of the State stocks on hand into canal stock, was a wrongful act and a breach of trust. But the cestui que trust was at liberty to approve or reject this unauthorized proceeding, and her decision on the subject concerned no one not interested in the trust estate. She elected to approve it after she learned of the occurrence, and by doing this adopted the new investment, and waived the breach of trust. But her waiver on that occasion did not bind her to observe the same line of conduct in case of further violation of duty. It would be absurd to suppose because she ratified this transaction, she intended to assent to future breaches of trust. Indeed, it is quite clear from the evidence, that she acquiesced in the arrangement, because her relatives who had charge of the estate advised it. In the nature of the case, she could not have had that sort of information on such a subject on which to base a correct judgment, and, therefore, necessarily relied for the security of her rights on the counsel of older and more experienced persons in whom she placed confidence. It is due to the trustee to say that the change of investment was a family arrangement, in order to obtain a greater income, and that the stock selected for this purpose was one of the best of its kind that the market afforded.

Although it is wrong in any case for trustees under a will, in making investments, to depart from the rule prescribed by the testator, yet if it is done, and acquiesced in by the party in interest, and there is no interference by the court having charge of the trust, the right of action to the cestui que trust for an illegal disposition of the property thus substituted, is not effected by reason of this departure. It is still an estate held in trust for the beneficiary under the will, and to be protected equally with an investment made strictly in accordance with the terms of the will. It follows, then, that the relation of those having dealings with the trustee, based on shares of stock held in this way, is not changed by reason that the original purchase was not in accordance with the directions of the testator.

This brings us to a consideration of the particular transactions on which the claim for relief in these cases is founded. The dealings of Jaudon with the City Bank, based on the stock in question, commenced in 1865, and extended through a period of two years. During this time ten separate loans were made to him on the pledge of forty-seven shares of the canal stock. The securities were returned to Jaudon whenever he paid up the amount of a loan, and re-delivered to the bank each time a new loan was effected. In December, 1867, when the last loan matured, the bank, being unwilling to renew it, and Jaudon unable to pay it, sold the stock by the direction of Jaudon, and applied the proceeds of the sale to the liquidation of his indebtedness.

The dealing with Duncan, Sherman & Co. was confined to a single transaction. This was a loan in July, 1867, at ninety days, on the pledge of seventy shares of similar stock. This stock, on account of Jaudon's inability to meet his engagement at the expiration of the time limited for payment, shared the same fate as the stock pledged to the bank. In both cases the certificates, which were the evidence of the hypothecated stock, recited that "S. Jaudon, trustee for Mrs. Mary T. B. Jaudon," was entitled to a certain number of shares in the capital stock of the company, transferable on the books of the company by him or his legal representative, on the surrender of the certificate. Each certificate, when the stock was pledged, was accompanied by a blank power of attorney, on a separate piece of paper, signed by "S. Jaudon, trustee of Mary T. B. Jaudon." In the case of the bank, the negotiations were conducted with the cashier, who, although uninformed of the purpose for which the funds were wanted, knew that the certificates taken in pledge disclosed the fact that Jaudon held the stock, not in his own right, but as trustee.

William B. Duncan acted for his firm in making the loan. Jaudon told him he had good securities to offer for the money he desired. Duncan, wishing to oblige him, being satisfied of their sufficiency, without inspecting them, turned the business over to his cashier, who completed it. The evidence leaves no room for doubt that each and all of these loans were to Jaudon in his personal character and for his individual use, and that the money obtained was applied to discharge liabilities incurred in the purchase, or carrying "of Broad Top coal stock," a speculative stock of no established reputation, in which he was at the time dealing on his own account.

It is true, when he borrowed the money, he had no expectation of resorting to the trust funds to repay it, but his good intentions in this respect furnishes no excuse for his conduct. It was wrong for him, under any state of circumstance, to pledge the stock in order to obtain money for his personal wants. He held a fiduciary relation to it, and yet used it as if it were his own, and bargained for the consequences which followed, although the necessity for the ultimate sale of it was not anticipated by him at the time he pledged it. If the law allowed the property of the cestui que trust to be treated in this manner, there would be little encouragement to vest an estate in trustees for the benefit of others. It is argued that the several transactions of Jaudon with the bank and Duncan, Sherman & Co. were really on his part for the purpose of reinvesting the trust funds. How can this be, when he had not a thought at the time he got the money, of failure to pay it? His speculations, then, were on his own account, and, like all sanguine men who deal in stocks, he had full faith that the venture in which he was engaged would prove remunerative. The idea of reinvestment was an afterthought, occurring at the time he found himself unable to pay, and obliged, as he supposed, to part with the property of his cestui que trust. And even then it did not assume the shape of a settled purpose, but only an intention to offer the injured party Broad Top security, in which he was operating for the canal stock, which he was about to appropriate to his own necessities. It is natural that a trustee who makes use of trust property to pay his own debts, without a deliberate design to defraud, should intend, at some future time, to put the party wronged by him, in as good a position as before; but can such an intention be treated as a purpose to reinvest the trust funds in the securities in which the trustee is privately speculating? If it can, personal property in the hands of trustees, be the declaration of trust ever so specific, is in a very unsafe condition. The stock was not sold because it was desirous to change the investment, but for the simple reason that it had been pledged, and it was pledged for the sole object of enabling Jaudon to obtain money to advance his personal ends. If, therefore, there had been occasion for making a reinvestment, and authority to do it, the transactions in question had no reference to any such object.

But why change the investment, when the canal stock, one of the most stable of its kind in the country, was paying on the average a semi-annual dividend of five per cent. If it were allowable under the will to invest in the stock of private corporations at all, few more desirable than this were accessible. Experience had shown that it was safe and yielded a large income, and no prudent trustee, having once invested in it, and had his conduct approved, looking alone to the interests of his cestui que trust, would take the hazard of selling it and purchasing another. But there was no authority to sell it, even were it desirable to do so, or to deal with it so that a sale might become necessary. If Jaudon thought so, there was no foundation for his belief, and he is compelled to admit, although his whole testimony is an effort to justify his conduct, that he never had any conversation with his cestui que trust on the subject of changing this stock.

It was treated by all concerned, during the long course of years in which it was held in trust, as a most desirable investment, and no thought of substituting other securities for it was ever entertained by any one, until the idea occurred to Jaudon as a means of escape from the embarrassment in which he was placed by the unlawful use he made of it. The cestui que trust not only never gave consent to pledge or sell it, but had no reason to suppose that the trustee would attempt anything of the kind; nor has she said or done anything, fairly interpreted, which tends even to relieve the trustee from the legal responsibility which pertains to the administration of the trust estate.

It follows, then, that the use of the stocks by Jaudon, in his transactions with the bank and Duncan, Sherman & Co., was, on his part, a flagrant breach of trust, without either justification or excuse. If so, are they blameless? They cannot be, if they had actual or constructive notice that the trustee was abusing his trust, and applying the proceeds of the loans to his own use. As we have seen, the loans were for no purpose connected with the trust, but for Jaudon's own benefit; and the face of the papers given as collateral security for the debts thus incurred, informed the parties dealing with him, that he held the stock as trustee for Mrs. Mary T. B. Jaudon, and inquiry would have revealed the fact, that the use to which the stock was put was unauthorized.

The duty of making such inquiry was imposed on these parties, for it is out of the common course of business to take corporate stock held in trust, as security for the trustee's own debt. The party taking such stock on pledge, deals with it at his peril, for there is no presumption of a right to sell it, as there is in the case of an executor. In the former case, the property is held for custody; in the latter, for administration.

It matters not, whether the stock is pledged for an antecedent debt of the trustee, or for money lent him at the time. It is unlawful to use it for either purpose.

In Lowry v. Commercial and Farmers' Bank of Maryland (Taney's Circuit Court Decisions), which was a case of misappropriation of corporate stock by an executor, Chief Justice Taney held, "that if a party dealing with an executor has, at the time, reasonable ground for believing that he intends to misapply the money, or is, in the very transaction, applying it to his own private use, the party so dealing is responsible to the persons insured." And the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in a recent case (Shaw v. Spencer and others, 100 Massachusetts, 389), in its essential features like the case at bar, decides, that if a certificate of stock, expressed in the name of "A. B., trustee," is by him pledged to secure his own debt, the pledgee is, by the terms of the certificate, put on inquiry as to the character and limitations of the trust, and if he accepts the pledge without inquiry, does so at his peril. In that case, the cestui que trust was not named in the certificate, and the court remarked, that if it were so, the duty of inquiry would hardly be controverted.

If these propositions are sound, and we entertain no doubt on the point, the liability of the appellants for the conversion of the stock belonging to Mrs. Jaudon, cannot be an open question. They either knew, or ought to have known, that Jaudon was operating on his own account, and are chargeable with constructive notice of everything which, upon inquiry, they could have ascertained from the cestui que trust.

If this inquiry had been pursued, they could not have failed to discover the nature and foundation of the trust, and that the trustee had no right to pledge the stock for any purpose. The bank, in its dealings with Jaudon, was guilty of gross negligence, and, in consequence of this, inflicted serious injury upon an innocent person. It may be that the cashier never inquired of Jaudon, what he wanted with the money; but nine successive loans to him in one year, each time on the pledge of the same trust security, was evidence enough to satisfy any reasonable man, that the money was wanted for private uses, and not for any honest purpose connected with the administration of the trust.

Duncan, Sherman & Co., although intending no wrong, cannot escape their share of responsibility. Duncan loaned the money to Jaudon to oblige him, and, in the very nature of the transaction, he did it for Jaudon's private accommodation. On making the application, Jaudon told him he had securities to offer, naming them, and, naturally, he supposed they were Jaudon's own property. It is his misfortune that he turned them over to his cashier, with directions to accommodate Jaudon, without having personally examined them. If he had made this examination, we are persuaded the cestui que trust would have had no occasion to be dissatisfied with his conduct.

It is needless to argue, that Duncan is bound by the notice communicated to the cashier when he received the certificate and concluded the business with Jaudon.

Without pursuing the subject further, we are satisfied that the decrees below should be affirmed.

GARDNER v. THE GOODYEAR DENTAL VULCANITE CO. et al.

It cannot be admitted that one party to a suit can pay the fees of counsel on both sides, both in the court below and on appeal, without being held to have such control over both the preparation and argument of the cause, as to make the suit merely collusive in both courts.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island. On motion.

Mr. Chief Justice CHASE delivered the opinion of the court, March 3d, 1873.

The original suit in equity was brought by the Goodyear Dental Vulcanite Company against Gardner, to enjoin him from the use of certain patented subjects belonging, as alleged, to the company, and for an account. The case was heard upon a bill, answer, and testimony, and there was a decree in favor of the company in the Circuit Court for the district of Rhode Island, in September, 1870. Upon appeal to this court, the decree below was affirmed on the 6th of May, 1872, but the opinion has not been read. The defence was conducted by counsel originally employed and paid by Newbrough, under whom Gardner was licensee. On the 1st of July, 1869, before the decree in the Circuit Court, Newbrough and the company compromised all matters of difference between them, with the understanding that this suit should go on to the final hearing and determination both in the Circuit Court and in this court on appeal, as if the compromise had not been made.

The company, however, paid the counsel employed for the defence, as well as for themselves in Circuit Court, and subsequently in this court. These facts appear from the record and from the admissions of the company, in the ninth article of their answer to the motion to dismiss the appeal. They are the only facts which we think it necessary to notice.

It may be that the company has not become the legal or equitable owners of the opposing interests involved in the suit. There may be, and doubtless are, large opposing interests, of which they are neither the legal nor equitable owners. But it cannot be admitted that one party to a suit can pay the fees of counsel on both sides, both in the court below and on appeal, without being held to have such control over both the preparation and argument of the cause, as to make the suit merely collusive in both courts. It can make no difference that the counsel fees were charged to the party apparently, though not really liable to pay them, and payment from the other party procured through him. This, indeed, is a circumstance against the party who pays the fees, rather than in his favor.

The motion to vacate the decree of affirmance, heretofore made, and to dismiss the appeal, must, therefore, be granted, and an order made to recall the mandate which has been issued to the Circuit Court. We take occasion, however, to say, that we see nothing in the conduct of the counsel who actually represented the company, which merits blame, or which ought to affect in any degree the high esteem in which they have been held. Neither of them appears to have had any knowledge of any arrangements made by their client with the opposing party.

Henry Baldwin, Jr., and Hon. J. S. Black, for motion.

THIRD JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Court of Common Pleas of Lehigh County.

BALLIET et al. v. SCHOOL DISTRICT of THE CITY of ALLENTOWN.

1. Upon the continuance of a cause, the party obtaining it must pay the costs of the term as a condition precedent, unless the primary cause of it be occasioned by his adversary.
2. Where a party materially changes his pleadings, so as to create good cause for surprise, and surprise is alleged, and a continuance is allowed, the costs of the term will fall upon him who has changed his pleadings.

Sur rule to show cause why the plaintiffs shall not pay the costs.

Opinion of the court by LONGAKER, P. J.

The plaintiffs declared upon a written contract for the erection of a school house, and added a count for extra work, as well as the common counts in assumpsit. The defendant, after plea filed, ruled the plaintiffs (as provided by a rule of court) to file a bill of particulars. May 31st, 1872, a bill of particulars was filed, alleging that the entire work was done by the day, and enumerating the number of days worked, and the price of work per day. June 13th, 1872, the cause was called for trial; and, thereupon, the defendant demurred to the bill of particulars, upon the ground that it was in conflict with the narr., and that the plaintiffs have not specified what extra work was done, nor where, and when done. The demurrer was sustained. The plaintiffs were then allowed to amend the bill of particulars, as well as the pleadings, by alleging a rescission of the written contract, and declaring that the whole work was done for quantum meruit. On account of this amendment, the defendant alleged surprise. The court were of the opinion that there was good cause for surprise, and allowed a continuance, without making any disposition of the costs for the term. At a subsequent term the above rule was entered by the defendant.

It is a well settled practice, that upon the continuance of a cause, the court will usually require the party asking it, to pay the costs of the term; and these costs will not be refunded in case he shall ultimately prevail. Brightley on Costs, p. 92. It seems to be equally well established, that he who by reason of some cause, not produced by his adversary, is allowed a continuance, must pay the costs as a condition precedent. Ewing v. Byers, 2 Yates, 128. Such cause may be the absence of a material witness, who could not have been subpœnaed by using proper diligence, or the witness may have been subpœnaed, but does not attend on account of sickness, or from some other legal cause; or the ground of the continuance may be the sickness of the party litigant, or it may arise from some one of the other many causes which will afford good reason for a continuance. These causes frequently arise from circumstances entirely beyond the control of the party asking for, and to whom the continuance is allowed; and yet, while he obtains this indulgence, it is his misfortune to be compelled to pay the costs of the term.

An amendment of the pleadings in a material part is usually held to be good cause for surprise, and a party surprised is entitled to a continuance; and, although he who is surprised seeks a continuance, he seems to form an exception to the rule; that the party asking it must pay the costs of the term as a condition precedent. The reason for this exception is, that the primary cause for the continuance, from which the surprise originated, has been occasioned by the party who has amended the pleadings. If there had been no amendment, no surprise or cause for a continuance on such ground, would have arisen. This exception operates with no greater hardship, than where a continuance occurs, either from the sickness of a witness, or the sickness of a party. litigant; the reasons for the rule and the exception are pari passu.

An allegation of surprise, and a continuance therefor, is analogous to that stage in an action, where the plaintiff of course, or by reason of some mistake in the pleadings, suffers a non suit, or asks, or takes a discontinuance; or it may be likened to a proceeding in equity, where the complainant, by reason of some omission in his bill, seeks to remedy the defect by an amendment; and, in such cases, it has been held, that the plaintiff must pay the costs. In Porter v. English, District Court of Allegheny, 1 T. & H. Pr. 87, it is held: "In a bill in equity after answer, the plaintiff will be allowed to amend his bill, on paying the costs occasioned by such amendment." So after demurrer, general or special, it is usual to give the adverse party leave to amend, upon the payment of the costs. Archbold's Pr. 234; 1 Peters, 443; 1 T. & H. Pr. 426. So, also, a writ of execution may be amended, upon the payment of the costs. 3 T. R. 657; 1 T. & H. Pr. 577.

When the plaintiff finds he has misconceived his action, sued a wrong party, or for some defect in the pleadings, or for some other reason he will not be able to maintain it, he may, with some exceptions, enter a discontinuance on the payment of the costs; but no discontinuance will be allowed until the costs are paid: 1 T. & H. Pr. 412-415; Lacroix v. Macquait, 1 Miles, 156. A plaintiff has been allowed to discontinue, upon the payment of the costs, even after demurred, argued and allowed, where there was a mistake in the pleadings: Archbold's Pr. 234; 2 Lev. 124, 209; 1 Saunders, 23. The court now usually gives the party leave to amend upon the payment of the costs 2 Saunder's, 73.

The case at bar is to be received in this light: The defendant, being sustained in its demurrer to the bill of particulars, the plaintiffs conceived it to be necessary to amend their pleadings, in order to sustain their action; and the amendment was so radical as to require a very different line of defence from the cause of complaint first declared upon. By the amended pleadings, the written contract was alleged to have been rescinded, and the cause was to proceed upon the allegation, that the work was done for quantum meruit, and not specifically upon a written contract, as first declared upon, with a count claiming for extra work. If the plaintiffs, after the demurrer was sustained, had felt assured that they could not maintain their action, it became optional for them to discontinue, to suffer non suit, or to amend. Had either of the first two remedies been selected, their subjection to the payment of the costs would have followed. Their pleadings, however, are amendable, and because they availed themselves of the latter remedy, rather than either of the former remedies, there arises no good cause to relieve them from the payment of the costs for the term. The authorities cited abundantly warrant the opinion, that the costs of the term should be paid by the plaintiffs.

The rule, therefore, is made absolute.

Stiles & Erdman, for plaintiffs.

Runk & Harvey, for defendant.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Head notes of decisions of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, to appear in vol. 51, N. H. Reports. (Received from John M. Shirley, State Reporter.)

CROSS v. BROWN.

1. A negotiable note, payable on demand, was endorsed thirteen months after it was given, the consideration for the endorsement being an agreement to support the payee. In an action by the endorsee against the maker, it was held, that the maker might set off a debt due to him from the payee at the date of the endorsement.

2. The maker of a negotiable note, who has been appointed administrator of the estate of the payee, may defend against the suit of an endorsee by showing that the endorsement was invalid as against the creditors of the payee; that the avails of the note are needed to pay debts of the payee, and that he, as administrator, claims the note to apply it for that purpose.

3. One claiming property of a deceased person, under a transfer invalid as against creditors, is not affected by a decree of the Probate Court charging the administrator with the property.

4. The allowance by the Probate Court, after notice by publication, of the private claim of an administrator against the estate, is conclusive upon one claiming property under a transfer from the intestate which was fraudulent as against creditors.

BLAISDELL v. PORTSMOUTH, GREAT FALLS & CONWAY RAILROAD.

1. A license to do certain acts upon land does not convey any interest in the land; it amounts to nothing more than an excuse for acts which would otherwise be trespasses.

2. Any license pertaining to land may be revoked, so far as it is not executed; otherwise, a mere license might operate to convey an interest in land.

3. A license to build a railroad upon one's land would excuse any acts properly done under the license while the same was in force, but such license might be revoked at pleasure, as to everything in the future.

4. Possession held under a license cannot be adverse.

5. The decease of either party to such a license, or the conveyance by either of the rights affected by the license, operates as a revocation.

GAMMON v. PLAISTED et al.

The plaintiff sold to A. and B. his stock of goods, consisting in part of spirituous liquors, and took the note of A. for the price. A. afterwards sold his interest in the stock to B., and the plaintiff thereupon gave up A.'s note, and took the note of B. for the amount. This note was afterwards surrendered, and the note in suit, signed by B., with a surety, taken in its place. Held, that the surrender of A.'s note furnished no sufficient consideration for the note of B., and that the note sued must fail for want of consideration; also, that the plaintiff could not apply money paid generally upon the notes to extinguish that part resting upon an illegal consideration so as to leave the balance good

MOBILE AND MONTGOMERY RAILROAD v. ASHCROFT.

SAFFOLD, J.—1. In an action against a railroad company, for injuries to the person, it is competent to prove, that about two weeks before the accident complained of, the cars had run off the track twice during one trip.

2. When, in such an action, the absence of a bell rope from the passenger car, was alleged as contributing to the injury, evidence that very soon after the accident, the rope was permitted to be covered up with meal sacks, is admissible to prove carelessness, and also to verify the statement of the witness, that it was too short, by showing his attention was particularly called to its condition.

CARPENTER et al. v. MURPHREE & JONES.

SAFFOLD, J.—1. In a suit by transferees on a promissory note against two makers, a personal plea by one, that the other signed it after its execution, in pursuance of a verbal agreement, under which the payee released him and accepted the other, to whom he sold property, crediting him with the amount of the note, is good.

2. Such contract is not required to be in writing.—Judgment reversed.

SAFFOLD, J.—A complaint in detinue, which describes the property sued for as "one chest or box of tools, containing one complete set of carpenters' tools, embracing all tools used in the carpenters' trade; one complete set of carving tools, embracing all tools used for scroll work or carving; two complete sets of drawing tools, used for drawing plans of buildings by architects; also, one set of turning tools, used by carpenters in turning lathes," &c., contains a sufficient description of the property.—Affirmed.

MASON et al. v. SMITH et al.

PETERS, J.—1. A codicil to a will is an addition to it, by which its dispositions are explained, added to, or changed. 4 Kent, 531; Marz. 1.

2. It is to be construed in connection with the body of the will.

3. An expression in the codicil, of a determination to alter the will in one particular, negatives an intention to alter it in any other particular. 9 Cush. R. 291.

4. In case of a revocation by a codicil, whether by implication or express words, the uniform rule is, not to disturb the dispositions in the body of the will further than is absolutely necessary to give effect to the codicil. 1 Jarm. Will. 160.

5. And if the codicil substitute another legacy for that in the body of the will, the substituted legacy is to be paid out of the same fund, and upon the same conditions as that prescribed in the body of the will, for the original legacy, if there are no especial instructions given in the codicil on these points. 2 Ves. Jr. 449.

6. S., in the body of his will, gave to J. B. & B. W. Mason, a considerable legacy, and then added in the same clause, these words, to wit: "And for and in consideration of the above, the said J. B. & B. W. Mason, will see that Sarah A. Manifee, my sister, will be amply provided for, should she ever be so unfortunate as to have any cause for such protection, and to Sallie A. Boyd, they, Jas. B. & B. W. Mason, will pay four thousand dollars, one-half at the settlement of my estate, and the other half twelve months thereafter." Held, That the legacy to Mrs. Boyd is a charge on the legacy to J. B. & B. W. Mason, and if they accept the legacy to them, they become personally liable to pay the legacy to Mrs. Boyd.

7. A codicil added to such a will (in which will the whole residue of the testator's estate is already disposed of), in these words, viz., "I hereby revoke the donation in the body of my will, to Sallie A. Boyd; and give her a proportionate share, with the rest of my nieces," only revokes the sum to be paid to Mrs. Boyd, and directs a different method to fix its amount, but it does not change the fund out of which it is to be paid, or the time and manner of its payment. It must be paid as the original legacy, for which it is substituted.—Decree affirmed.

JUDGE WOODWARD'S PANACEA.

In this issue, we publish the minority report submitted by Judge Woodward, in the Constitutional Convention last week. The report presents for the consideration of the members of that body, a complete article on the judiciary. As Mr. Woodward occupied for fifteen years a seat in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania (part of the time as chief justice), and is well known otherwise to the bar of the State, his panacea for the existing evils in the administration of justice in this State, will attract more than ordinary attention. We have ourselves carefully examined it, and have compared it with the voluminous report of the majority of the Judiciary Committee, and the many suggestions offered by minority members of the Committee, and by prominent lawyers and judges in the State.

We think, on the whole, it fails in providing a complete, rational judiciary system. Instead of simplifying the machinery of justice it retains the numerous courts at present, existing, and agrees with the majority of the committee in advocating a circuit court system in addition thereto (though as to that system we are willing to hear the argum nts of its advocates before deciding to oppose it). One great objection to the plan it proposes, is the provision requiring all the judges of the State "to be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." This we are decidedly opposed to, believing as we do, that by the election of judges, we are just as likely, and more so, to get honest and competent ones, as if they were appointed. It strikes us as a little singular, that Judge Woodward, who himself owed his elevation to the bench to a vote of the people, should now advocate the appointment of judges, but he has, no doubt, just cause for his convictions upon the subject.

Another serious defect in the plan, is the want of a means of obtaining as many judges as the population of the State and its growing interests from time to time require. This can only be done by basing the number of judges in a district upon the population it contains, and until there is some such provision incorporated in our constitution, the evils of insufficient courts, and interminable delays in judicial proceedings, will never be fully remedied. Judge Woodward leaves everything in this regard to the Legislature, retaining the same serious evil of legislative tinkering and interference, of which the bar and public so bitterly complain.

The provision transferring the jurisdiction of registers of wills in large cities to Probate Courts, is an excellent one in idea, but we think the means suggested would not fully answer the purpose for which it was intended. The provisions prohibiting the Legislature from vesting in the judges the power of appointing certain municipal and civil officers, not judicial, and directing that all accounts filed in the courts should be audited by the judges, and not by auditors appointed by them, are very good, and we hope to see them, or something like them, adopted.

This is all we have time at present to say in reference to the plan, except that outside of the suggestion of a circuit court system, and a few probate courts, it leaves the present judiciary system, with many of its evils, still existing.

THE GRAND JURY SYSTEM.

The Berks County Bar.

The following petition was presented yesterday in the Constitutional Convention, by Judge Van Reed, of Berks county.

To the Honorable the Delegates of the Constitutional Convention of Pennsylvania.

The petition of the undersigned members of the Bar of Berks county, respectfully represents, that they firmly believe that the grand jury system has long since its establishment outlived its necessity or usefulness; that they believe it to be an impediment in the administration of justice, entailing an unnecessary amount of labor and expense upon the citizens, and no longer in any way necessary for their safety; they would therefore recommend its abolishment, to your honorable bodies.

THE JUDICIARY.

The following is the minority report of Ex-chief Justice Geo. W. Woodward, a member of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Constitutional Convention:

Of the Judiciary.

Section 1. The judicial power of this commonwealth shall be vested in a supreme court, in circuit courts, in courts of common pleas and district courts, in courts of oyer and terminer and general jail delivery, in courts of quarter sessions of the peace, in orphans' courts, in justices of the peace, and in such other courts as the Legislature may from time to time establish.

Sect. 2. The judges of all the above named courts of record, and of such other courts of record as the Legislature may establish, shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. They shall be men of good moral character, learned in the law, who have attained the age of thirty years, and who have had at least five years' practice in some of the courts of record of this commonwealth. The said judges shall appoint clerks for their respective courts, and exact adequate security for a faithful discharge of duties, and all necessary criers and tipstaves; but it shall not be competent for the Legislature to impose upon said judges the choice or election of any other officers, commissioners, inspectors, superintendents or other agents, whether civil, municipal, or corporate, nor to assign to said judges, or any of them, any extra judicial duties whatever; and said judges shall hold no other office, whether Federal, State, municipal or corporate; nor receive any fees, rewards, perquisites, emoluments, or travelling expenses, whilst holding and exercising the office of judge of any of the aforesaid courts. The General Assembly may for cause, entered upon their journals, upon due notice and opportunity of defence, remove from office any judge, upon concurrence of three-fourths of all the members elected to each House. Associate judges not learned in the law, shall be continued upon the bench of the Common Pleas until the expiration of their respective commissions, and thereafter the said office shall be and remain abolished.

Of the Judges of the Supreme Court.

Sect. 3. The judges of the Supreme Court, until otherwise ordered by law, shall consist of five; shall hold their offices for the term of fifteen years, if they shall so long behave themselves well; the oldest in commission shall be the chief justice of said court, and three of their number shall be necessary to constitute a quorum. They shall be paid a salary to be fixed by law, which shall be larger than the salary of any other judicial officer of the State, and which shall not be diminished by taxation or otherwise, during their continuance in office. They shall be justices of oyer and terminer, with the powers of committing magistrates in every county of the commonwealth; and one or more of their number may be empowered by law to hold courts of oyer and terminer in any county, and to try civil issues which they may order in any cause depending before them, but the Court of Nisi Prius, as now established by law, is abolished. The original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall not be extended by the Legislature to any cases except habeas corpus, quo warranto, mandamus, and revenue cases, in which the commonwealth is a party in interest; and the court may exercise its original jurisdiction in such cases, by one of its number, but shall sit in banc for the hearing of causes that come up by writs of error or appeal, at such one place as the Legislature may fix by law; and the judges of said court shall reside at the place so fixed, but may, for adequate reasons, adjourn its sessions for a single term, or less than a term, to any other suitable and convenient place. The jurisdiction and process of this court shall extend throughout the State.

Of the Circuit Courts.

Sect. 4. The Legislature shall, at its first session after this constitution takes effect, erect the several counties of the State into a convenient number of circuits, not exceeding twelve; each circuit to consist of contiguous or adjacent counties, and to be as nearly equal in population and legal business as may be possible; and for each of said circuits the governor shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a circuit judge; and the said circuit judge shall, during his term of office, reside within the circuit for which he was appointed, shall hold his office for the term of twelve years, if he shall so long behave well, and shall receive a salary, to be fixed by law, at less than the salary of a judge of the Supreme Court, but more than the salary of a judge of the Court of Common Pleas or District Court, but which salary shall not be diminished, by taxation or otherwise, during his continuance in office.

The Circuit Court, in each circuit, shall consist of the said circuit judge as its presiding officer, and of all the law judges within the circuit. They shall arrange for holding as many terms of court in banc each year, as the business may require. The terms of the court in banc shall be held in any county of the circuit as the court may appoint, and shall be held by any five of the judges of the circuit as they may agree among themselves; and of the number holding a term in banc, three shall be a quorum. If the circuit judge is unable, for any cause, to preside at a term in banc, the judge whose commission is oldest, of those holding the term, shall preside.

The said Circuit Court shall have no original, but only an appellate jurisdiction. All civil cases in law or equity, decided by the courts of common pleas or the district courts, or in any of the courts of civil jurisdiction, that may be created by law, shall be removable by way of appeal, into the proper Circuit Court, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law; and the evidence upon which the inferior court rendered its decree or judgment, shall be fully certified, if required by either party, into the Circuit Court, by the judge who rendered the decree or judgment; and thereupon the Circuit Court shall, after due hearing and consideration, affirm, modify, or reverse the said decree or judgment. If a new trial be awarded as part of the judgment of the Circuit Court, the same may be had before the judge who tried the cause, or before the circuit judge in the same county, or any other county of the circuit, as the court may appoint; and the same cause may come again before the Circuit Court for review, and when a final judgment or decree shall be entered by the Circuit Court, the same shall conclude the rights of all parties to the record, unless the said Circuit Court, or one of the judges who sat at the hearing, shall allow a writ of error to remove the cause into the Supreme Court; and if such allowance be made, a writ of error shall issue out of the Supreme Court to the said Circuit Court, and be proceeded in as in other cases. Whenever the Supreme Court, in any case, shall award a writ of venire facias de novo, the new trial shall be had in the court where the cause originated, and shall be again removable into and reviewable by the Circuit Court, as in other cases, with right to a second writ of error, if allowed, as aforesaid. In no case shall a judge of the Circuit Court take part in the decision of a cause tried before him in the Common Pleas or District Court, though he may sit at the argument as an assessor.

The circuit judge, besides performing the duties of president of the Circuit Court, may hold special courts, criminal or civil, in any county of his circuit, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law; and all motions for new trial, or in arrest of judgment, in criminal cases tried in the Court of Oyer and Terminer, shall be removable, by way of appeal, into the Circuit Court, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law; and the judgment of the Circuit Court, in such cases, shall be conclusive and final.

The Circuit Court shall be a court of record, and have a seal such as the Legislature may prescribe, and the lien of its decrees and judgments shall be regulated by law.

OF THE COURTS OF COMMON PLEAS AND DISTRICT COURTS.

SECT. 5. The courts of common pleas and district courts shall remain as now established, until otherwise ordered by law. The judicial districts shall be rearranged by the Legislature, so as to equalize the labors of the law judges as nearly as may be, and to bring the law judges of the several districts within the proper circuits: and if any additional judges shall be provided for by law, they shall be appointed in the manner herein prescribed. The jurisdictions of the courts of common pleas and of the district courts shall remain as they now are, except in counties where the jurisdiction of the Orphans' Court may be vested in courts of probate. The judges of the district courts shall be appointed for the term of ten years, and shall have the same jurisdiction in equity cases as may belong, for the time being, to the courts of common pleas. The judges of the courts of common pleas shall be appointed for the term of ten years, and shall be justices of oyer and terminer, and of the courts of quarter sessions of the peace, with the powers of committing magistrates.

OF PROBATE COURTS.

SECT. 6. In counties whose population shall exceed one hundred thousand, the Legislature may establish courts of probate, to consist of one or more judges, who shall be learned in the law, appointed in the manner hereinbefore provided for other judges, whose term of office shall be ten years, if they so long behave themselves well, and whose salaries shall be fixed by law.

The said courts of probate, when established, shall exercise all the jurisdictions and powers now vested in the Orphans' Court, the Register's Court, and the register for probate of wills and granting letters of administration; and thereupon the jurisdiction of the Common Pleas, in Orphans' Court proceedings, shall cease and determine, and the Register's Court, and the office of register of wills and granting letters of administration, shall be abolished.

SECT. 7. The several courts of probate shall appoint all necessary clerks, to be paid a salary fixed by law, shall have a seal, and be a court of record; but all auditing of accounts filed in said courts, shall be performed by the judges and clerks thereof, without expense to parties, except where all parties in interest in a pending proceeding, shall nominate an auditor, whom the court may, in its discretion, appoint; and in such case, the auditor's fees shall be paid by the parties

All proceedings of said courts of probate shall be removable into the Supreme Court for review, by appeal or certiorari, as the Supreme Court may prescribe.

Register of Wills, Philada.

In the matter of the LAST WILL OF FRANCIS SMITH, deceased.

The regular practice, when the Register's Court wishes to have additional testimony upon any point of a case before them, is to refer the matter back to the examiner, to take such additional testimony, and report the same to the court.

Opinion by WM. M. BUNN, Register of Wills. Delivered April 15th, 1873.

Upon the 21st of April, 1871, a paper, purporting to be the last will of Francis Smith, deceased, and bearing date August 26th, 1864, was offered for probate before me. Together therewith, there were offered a paper purporting to be a codicil thereto, bearing date April 17th, 1868, and a paper purporting to be a re-publication of said will and codicil, bearing date June 21st, 1870. The said papers were duly admitted to probate before me, as the last will, and codicil thereto, and the re-publication of the same, of the said Francis Smith, deceased, and letters testamentary thereon were regularly granted, no caveat against the admission to probate of said papers, nor against the grant of letters testamentary having been filed. Afterwards, to wit, November 15th, 1871, an appeal from the decision of the register admitting said papers to probate, was entered by Sarah Smith Morgan and Henry F. Smith, children of the decedent, and asking that an issue might be granted to try the validity of said papers. This appeal was heard before the Register's Court, which, upon the 22d of March, 1873, rendered a decree in the following words:

"And now, March 22d, 1873, this case having been heard and argued by counsel, after due consideration thereof, the appeal is sustained, and the instrument of writing purporting to be the last will and codicil of the decedent, and the re-publication thereof, is remitted to the register of wills, with instructions to take further proof of said alleged re-publication."

(Signed) WM. S. PEIRCE.

The decree is so worded, that I am unable to ascertain its full extent. The appeal being "sustained," the presumption would be that the probate of the will, codicil and re publication were set aside, and that the letters testamentary were vacated, and I was at first inclined to think that the court so intended, since the "instrument of writing purporting to be the last will and codicil of the decedent, and the re-publication thereof," were remitted to me by the court; but upon further examination of the decree, together with the opinion of the court, I have concluded that the court, instead of regularly referring the matter back to the examiner to take additional testimony as to the re-publication, preferred to remit it to the register for that purpose. I am confirmed in this view, since the court declare that "it would not be proper to consider at this time the other question of the mental capacity of the alleged testator to make a will, as the further proof to be taken by the register may give a new direction to the proceeding, or may otherwise have a bearing on the questions involved in the case." The court evidently desire to have fuller information as to said re-publication before setting aside the probate of said will, codicil and re-publication, and I have accordingly, at the suggestion of the court, taken additional testimony of said re-publication, and I hereby refer the said additional testimony, together with the said will, codicil and republication thereof, back to the court, for their further action thereon. From the testimony taken before me as to said re-publication, it appears to me that the testator, at the time of said re-publication, expressly authorized the signing of his name by Mr. Edward Olmsted, in his presence, and that at the doing thereof, he was of sound, disposing mind, memory and understanding; and I see no reason for setting the probate of any of the said papers aside, or for vacating the letters testamentary thereon granted.

After the decree of the Register's Court had been rendered, the appellants filed with me a formal caveat against the admission to probate of any of said paper writings, and a request to me to direct a precept for an issue to the Court of Common Pleas, for the trial of the matter of fact touching the validity of said writings. As the whole matter is still before the Register's Court, upon this reference back to them, it is unnecessary for me to take any action upon said request.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

AGENCY.

1. A travelling merchant, who is authorized to sell all the goods of his principal that he can sell, within his business circuit, on a commission of ten per cent., is to be regarded as the general agent of his principal, and clothed apparently with the power of fixing the price, and the time and mode of the delivery of the goods, and the payment of the price, unless a different usage in such trade be shown. Daylight Burner Co. v. Odlin, 56.

2. And third persons will not be affected by a limitation on his authority, which is not brought to their notice, or in relation to which they are not put upon inquiry. Ib. 56.

3. Therefore, when such agent has sold goods on credit, which are forwarded by his principal by express, and marked "cash on delivery," the expressman, having no notice of any limitation of the agent's authority, may, upon the order of the agent, deliver the goods without pay ment of the price. Ib. 56.

4. It was held, also, that whether the entry of "cash on delivery" put the expressman on inquiry, was a proper question for the jury. Ib. 56.

5. Ordinarily, the cashier of a bank has no authority to discharge its debtors without payment, or to bind the bank by an agreement that a surety should not be called upon to pay the note he had signed, or that he would have no further trouble from it. Cochecho Nat. Bk. v. Haskell, 116.

6. If, upon inquiry by the surety, the cashier, knowing that he is a surety, inform him that the note is paid, intending that he should rely upon his statement, and the surety does so, and in consequence changes his position by giving up securities, or endorsing other notes for the same principal, or the like, the bank will be estopped to deny that such note is paid. Ib. 116.

7. The suggestion of the defendants' counsel, at the first trial of this cause, that a decision of the questions of law then raised would end the case, was held, on a second trial of the cause, not to have the character of the agreement which the court could specifically enforce. Ib. 116

8. Where a suit is brought by an attorney of this court in regular standing, his authority will be presumed until the contrary is shown. Lisbon v. Holton, 209.

An act in relation to bonds of indemnity given to the sheriff of the city and county of Philadelphia, in his official capacity, for executing writs.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c. That hereafter, all bonds given to the sheriff of the city and county of Philadelphia, in his official capacity, as indemnity for executing writs of replevin, foreign, domestic, and other attachments, and all other bonds of indemnity given in any cause, shall be justified before the judge of the proper court, and approved by said judge; and when the prothonotary shall certify said justification and approval to the sheriff, shall become the property of the successful party in the original suit, without recourse to the sheriff, who may have executed said process, or received said bond as indemnity.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

From HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Chief Justice, Supreme Court, Pa.

"I have examined the Legal Gazette Reports which you did me the favor to send me, with great satisfaction. It is well gotten up, and neatly printed and bound. The variety of matter contained in it, emanating indiscriminately from courts in every portion of the State, renders the volume useful in every section to both lawyers and judges, and to them I cheerfully commend it." March 1st, 1872.

From HON. WM. S. PEIRCE,
Court of Com. Pleas, and Orphans' Court, Phila.

"It is presented to the public in good style, and so far as I have had opportunity to examine my own decisions, they are accurately reported, and the syllabi are concise and correct, and I am sure from the known ability of the Reporter, that they are so with respect to the other decisions."
Philada., March 1st, 1872.

From HON. JAMES LYND,
District Court, Phila.

"I have received and examined with interest and pleasure the first volume of Legal Gazette Reports. It contains much valuable matter, carefully edited and handsomely published. As multitudinous as the decisions of the Supreme Court seem to be, the number of quite important points that never reach that tribunal is very large; and the early publication, therefore, of cases disposed of in the courts of first resort is greatly to be commended. Permit me to express a hope that the Legal Gazette Reports will prove as profitable to the publishers as it will be serviceable to the bar and judiciary of our State." Philada, March 2d, 1872.

From HON. JOSEPH ALLISON,
President Judge 1st Judicial District, Pa.

"The work is in all respects most creditable to its Editor and Publishers, not only as to its external merit, but as a valuable addition to the reports of decided cases. The work affords abundant evidence of great care in its preparation, and is every way worthy of a favorable reception by the legal profession." Philadelphia, Feb. 23d, 1872.

From HON. THOS. K. FINLETTER,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts, Phila.

"I have examined volume one, Legal Gazette Reports, and am much pleased with the execution of the work. Many of the cases contained therein are familiar to me, as being argued and determined in the courts in which I sit, and I can testify to the fidelity and accuracy with which they are reported. I think that the volume will be a valuable addition to the Pennsylvania Reports." Philadelphia, March 21st, 1872

From HON. JAMES RYON.
President Judge 21st Judicial District, Pa.

"I have examined this volume with great pleasure. The volume is neatly gotten up and the other work executed in fine style. It contains a large number of legal decisions both of the Common Pleas and Supreme Courts which can be found in no other work, and is essential to every law library." Pottsville, Pa., March 4th, 1872.

From HON. JOHN TRUNKEY,
President Judge 28th Judicial District, Pa

"I have received and examined the volume of Legal Gazette Reports, and believe the work will prove very useful to the profession. I have preserved a file of the Legal Gazette, for its reports of cases, but would not be without this volume, which is so much more convenient for reference. The work is highly creditable to the Reporter and Publishers. It seems to contain so much information upon questions of practice, that, I think no practitioner can afford to be without it." Mercer, Pa., March 7th, 1872.

From HON. HENRY W. WILLIAMS,
President Judge 4th Judicial District, Pa.

"I have given some time to an examination of it, and am of opinion that in variety of matter and general interest to the profession, it is fully equal to any volume of our authorized reports. This is due in great degree to the exercise of judgment in the selection of cases." Wellsboro, Pa., April 25th, 1872.

From HON. JAMES T. MITCHELL,
District Court, Phila

"The volume is handsomely got up, and to those who have not a full set of the Legal Gazette will be necessary to complete the Pennsylvania series. and the bar will buy it with a good grace even in this day of multiplied reports, as it contains only cases that have not been elsewhere reported." Feb. 23d, 1872.

From HON. B. F. JUNKIN,
President Judge 9th Judicial District, Pa.

"I am convinced of its great value to the profession. It contains many decisions, involving questions which seldom reach the regular State Reports. You have done much for the bar and bench and they owe you a reward. The volume is neat and accurate." Bloomfield, Pa., April 2d, 1872.

From HON. A. W. ACHESON,
President Judge 27th Judicial District, Pa.

"It is replete with valuable information, and I think must be favorably received by the profession." Washington, Pa., April 6th, 1872.

From HON. J. B LIVINGSTON,
President Judge 2d Judicial District, Pa.

"I have carefully examined the 1st vol., "Legal Gazette Reports." The matter contained therein, taken as it is from the decisions and practice of different courts throughout the State, will render this work indispensable to the practicing attorney as well as the judiciary. The book is well gotten up, neat in appearance, the syllabi accurate and index complete. I have no doubt it will soon find a place in the library of every practising attorney in the Commonwealth." Lancaster, Pa., April 8th, 1872.

From HON. J. C. BUCHER,
President Judge 20th Judicial District, Pa.

"From the examination I have made, I am convinced that they (the Reports) will be of great value to the practitioner and indispensable to all who desire a complete record of all the Pennsylvania cases." Lewisburg, Pa, March 10th, 1872.

From HON. HENRY P. ROSS,
President Judge 7th Judicial District, Pa.

"The volume has so much to commend it, both in its external appearance as a book, with regard to paper, type and general typographical execution, and in the great practical utility of its contents, that any expression of individual opinion as to its merits seems to be superfluous. I hope it will be the first of a series, and that its successors will present as many valuable cases as carefully edited as this initial volume. Such a series will be an indispensable element in the library of every lawyer." Norristown, Pa., March 22d, 1872.

From HON. JAMES A. LOGAN,
President Judge 10th Judicial District, Pa.

"To me this seems an exceedingly valuable volume. Its decisions must prove of great assistance to both bench and bar, throughout the State. I regard as the peculiar excellence of these reports the class of well considered "lower court" decisions, which aside from their great aid to the profession must so largely tend to establish a most desirable uniformity of practice in the different districts in the State." Greensburg, Pa., March 28th, 1872.

From HON. SAML. A. GILMORE,
President Judge 14th Judicial District, Pa.

"I was so well satisfied of the value of the cases reported in the Legal Gazette, that I took care to file away that paper as it came to hand. This was inconvenient for reference, but is now obviated by the Legal Gazette Reports. Most of the cases are important and so well elaborated as to make them quite satisfactory. To a judge who has something to do with all the jurisdictions, the book is very convenient and to the bar we would suppose almost indispensable." Uniontown, Pa., March 27th, 1872.

From HON. WM. ELWELL,
President Judge 26th Judicial District, Pa.

"Your plan of preserving cases originally appearing in the Legal Gazette, by the publication of them in book form, will I have no doubt be very acceptable to the profession. The first volume of the Legal Gazette Reports is well executed, and will be found to be an indispensable adjunct to the library of every practicing lawyer in the State." Bloomsburg, Pa., March 7th, 1872.

From HON. JAMES R. LUDLOW,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts, Phila.

"Every valuable contribution to our legal literature ought to be a gratification to the profession, for additional knowledge is thereby contributed to the common stock, and is preserved for future use. Your volume contains many important cases, carefully selected, and must be of great service to the profession. Practical experience teaches me the worth of this publication, and its real value should secure for it an extended circulation." Philadelphia, April 13th, 1872.

From HON. THOS. H. WALKER,
Judge 21st Judicial District, Pa.

"I must express my satisfaction with the volume. The entire work does credit to the taste and ability of the reporter; the type is neat, the decisions are carefully arranged and accurately indexed. There are many important opinions collected in the book, and the legal profession will find it a valuable addition to our Supreme Court reports. The chief merit of the Legal Gazette is not only to furnish an early publication of the decisions of the Supreme Court, but also to embrace in a permanent form those of the Common Pleas Judges of our State for constant reference and easy access. The work has been successfully commenced and its continuance is essential to the labor of the bench and bar." Pottsville, Pa., April 13th, 1872.

From HON. SAML. S. DREHER,
President Judge 22d Judicial District, Pa.

"I am much pleased with these reports. They contain much valuable information, and from the high character of the judges whose opinions are reported, I feel safe in following them. The book is well printed, well bound, and so far as I have been able to read it since my return home, I find the syllabi full and accurate." Stroudsburg, Pa., March 26th, 1872.

From HON. GARRICK M. HARDING,
President Judge, 11th Judicial District, Pa.

"In point of mechanical execution the Legal Gazette Reports are not surpassed by any modern legal publication, and in point of useful service to the profession, the Reporter and the Publishers have done a work in every way praiseworthy." Wilkes Barre, Pa., March 2, 1872.

From HON. JOHN DEAN,
President Judge 24th Judicial District, Pa.

"Some copies of the paper have been lost or mislaid, in which were reports of cases of great value to me, and just as I was thinking of writing to you, to ascertain if you could replace them, your present valuable work is received." Hollidaysburg, Pa., March 8th, 1872.

From HON. E. M. PAXSON,
Common Pleas and Orphans' Courts, Phila.

"Its mechanical execution reflects much credit upon Messrs. King & Baird, the printers, whilst your own industry and care in the arrangement and report of the cases are equally apparent. I regard your book as a valuable addition to the library of every lawyer, and trust it will meet with such success as to make its continuation a certainty." Philadelphia, May 1st, 1872.

From HON. A. B. LONGAKER,
President Judge 3d Judicial District, Pa.

"The cases are well selected and important. It is a most valuable volume for the bench and bar, and very deservedly so as regards various points of practice. Every practitioner ought to have it." Allentown, Pa., April 20th, 1872.

"LAW LITERATURE.

In the Legal Gazette, from July 1869 to January, 1872, appeared numerous cases, decided in the Federal, State, and city courts in Philadelphia, and in the courts of several of the judicial districts of Pennsylvania. Mr. John H. Campbell, editor of the Legal Gazette, who reported these cases, has collected them into a handsome volume of 588 pages octavo. Most of them are now first placed in this permanent form, and many were exclusively reported for the Gazette. A great many important subjects are to be found here. A syllabus to the opinions delivered in each case, with a table of cases, lists of opinions and judges, and a full and clear index combine to make this volume, entitled "Legal Gazette Reports," of the greatest value to the profession; it is the first of a series from the same reliable source by the same competent editor. The work has been in a manner made historical by the arrangement of the opinions according to the dates of their delivery. In two cases, of great importance and interest, the charges to the jury are given in full. One of these is the notorious poison case, the Commonwealth v. Schoeppe, in the Ninth Judicial district of Pennsylvania, before Judge James H. Graham, June 3d, 1869; the other is the Middleton Will Case, Otterson et al. v. Middleton, in the Court of Common Pleas, Philadelphia, before Judge Ludlow, charge to the jury delivered December 15th, 1871. Accompanying the latter is a fac-simile, by a new process of photo-printing, of the six signatures of the testator, Edward P. Middleton, including the one alleged to be a forgery, but declared to be authentic by the verdict of the jury. The trial, it may be remembered, excited much interest, and continued from November 14th to December 15th, 1871. Among other cases of considerable interest here is the decision of the Supreme Court, delivered by Judge Sharswood, on the 30th of last December, on the claim of Miss Burnham to vote at the general election in Philadelphia last October, when it was legally declared that women are not entitled to vote in Pennsylvania. Several important patent cases are reported in this volume, and among other subjects are the dissolution of the old Volunteer Fire Department, the right to tax national bank stocks, the invalidity of the water-reservoir ordinance, the liability of passenger railway companies for street repairs, the House of Correction dispute, and many cases upon wills and Orphans' Court practice of value to both city and country lawyers. The cases reported clearly and fully have been judiciously selected, and in each instance, the preliminary statement is a condensed view of the main facts in each case."

THE CLEVELAND, PAINESVILLE, AND ASHTABULA R.R. CO., Plaintiff in Error, v. THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA.

1. The power of taxation of a State is limited to persons, property, and business within its jurisdiction. All taxation must relate to one of these subjects.
2. Bonds issued by a railroad company are property in the hands of the holders; and when held by non-residents of the State in which the company was incorporated, they are property beyond the jurisdiction of that State. A law of Pennsylvania, passed on the 1st of May, 1868, which requires the treasurer of a company, incorporated and doing business in that State, to retain five per cent. of the interest due on bonds of the company, made and payable out of the State to non-residents of the State, citizens of other States, and held by them, is not, therefore, a legitimate exercise of the taxing power of the State. It is a law which interferes between the company and the bondholder, and, under the pretence of levying a tax, impairs the obligation of the contract between the parties.
3. The exemption from taxation by the State of Pennsylvania, of bonds thus issued to and held by non-residents of that State, citizens of other States, is not affected by the fact that the bonds are secured by a mortgage, executed simultaneously with them, upon property situated in that State. A mortgage there, though in the form of a conveyance, is a mere security for a debt, and transfers no estate in the mortgaged premises. It simply creates a lien upon them, and only confers upon the holder, or the party for whose benefit the mortgage is given, a right to proceed against the property mortgaged, upon a given contingency, to enforce the payment of his demand. This right has no locality independent of the party in whom it resides.
4. The tax laws of a State can have no extra-territorial operation; nor can any law of a State, inconsistent with the terms of a contract made with or payable to parties out of the State, have any effect upon the contract whilst it is in the hands of such parties or other non-residents of the State.

In error to the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. Nos. 31, 32, 33. December Term, 1872.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff in error, the Cleveland, Painesville, and Ashtabula Railroad Company, was incorporated by an act of the Legislature of Ohio, passed in 1848, and authorized to construct a railroad from the city of Cleveland, in that State, to the line of the State of Pennsylvania. Under this act, and its supplement passed in 1850, the road was constructed. By an act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, passed in 1854, the company was authorized to construct a railroad from the city of Erie, in that State, to the State line of Ohio, so as to connect with this road from Cleveland; and also to purchase a railroad, already constructed, between those points. This grant of authority was subject to various conditions, which the company accepted, and under its provisions the road between the points designated was constructed, or the one already constructed was purchased, and connected with the road from Cleveland, so that the two roads together formed one continuous line between the cities of Cleveland and Erie. The whole road between those places was ninety-five and a half miles in length, of which twenty-five miles and a half were situated in the State of Pennsylvania, and the rest, seventy miles, were situated in the State of Ohio. The company, so far as it acted in Pennsylvania under the authority of the act of her Legislature, has been held by her courts to be a separate corporation of that State, and as such, subject to her laws for the taxation of incorporated companies. 7 Casey, 371. But there was only one board of directors, who managed the affairs of both companies as one company, and had the entire control of the whole road between Cleveland and Erie.

In 1868, the funded debt of the company amounted to two millions and a half of dollars, and was in bonds of the company secured by three mortgages: one for five hundred thousand dollars, made in 1854, one for a million of dollars, made in 1859, and one for a million of dollars, made in 1867. Each of the mortgages was executed upon the entire road from Erie, in Pennsylvania, to Cleveland, in Ohio, including the right of way, and all the buildings and other property of every kind connected with the road. The principal and interest of the bonds first issued were payable in the city of Philadelphia; the principal and interest of the other bonds were payable in the city of New York. All the bonds were executed and delivered in Cleveland, Ohio, and nearly all of them were issued to, and have been ever since held and owned by, non-residents of Pennsylvania and citizens of other States.

On the 1st of May, 1868, the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania passed an act, entitled "An act to revise, amend, and consolidate the several laws taxing corporations, brokers, and bankers;" the eleventh section of which provides as follows: "The president, treasurer, or cashier of every company, except banks or savings institutions, incorporated under the laws of this commonwealth, doing business in this State, which pays interest to its bondholders or other creditors, shall, before the payment of the same, retain from said bondholders or creditors, a tax of five per centum upon every dollar of interest paid as aforesaid; and shall pay over the same semi-annually, on the first days of July and January, in each and every year, to the State treasurer, for the use of the commonwealth; and every president, treasurer, or cashier, as aforesaid, shall annually, on the thirty-first day of each December, or within thirty days thereafter, report to the auditor general, under oath or affirmation, stating the entire amount of interest paid by said corporation to said creditors, during the year ending on that day; and thereupon the auditor general and State treasurer shall proceed to settle an account with said corporation, as other accounts are now settled by law."

The treasurer of the company, under this act, made a report in May, 1869, showing that, during the previous year, the company had paid interest on its funded debt of two and a half millions of dollars, at the rate of seven per cent., amounting to one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. Upon this report, the auditor general and State treasurer "settled an account" against the company, finding that it owed to the State the sum of $2,336.50 for the tax on the interest which the company had paid.

In reaching this conclusion, these officers apportioned the interest upon the debt owing by the company, according to the length of the road, assigning to the part in the State of Pennsylvania an amount in proportion to the whole indebtedness which that part bears to the whole road. There was no law, however, in existence, at the time, directing or authorizing this proceeding.

From the settlement thus made, the company appealed, under the law of the State, to the Court of Common Pleas of one of her counties, specifying various objections to the settlement, and among others, substantially the following:

That the greater portion of the bonds of the company having been issued upon loans made and payable out of the State, to non-residents of Pennsylvania, citizens of other States, and being held by them, the act in question, in authorizing the tax upon the interest stipulated in the bonds, so far as it applied to the bonds thus issued and held, impaired the obligation of the contracts between the bondholders and the company, and is, therefore, repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and void.

The contest in the Court of Common Pleas took the form of a regular judicial proceeding, a declaration having been filed by the attorney general on behalf of the State against the company as for a debt, and the company having joined issue by a plea of non-assumpsit and payment. The Common Pleas sustained the validity of the alleged tax against the objections of the company, and verdict and judgment passed in favor of the State. On error to the Supreme Court of the State, the judgment was affirmed, and the case is brought here for review, under the second section of the amendatory judiciary act of 1867.

The question presented for our determination is, whether the eleventh section of the act of May, 1868, so far as it applies to the interest on bonds of the railroad company, made and payable out of the State, issued to and held by non-residents of the State, citizens of other States, is a valid and constitutional exercise of the taxing power of the State, or whether it is an interference, under the name of a tax, with the obligation of the contracts between the non-resident bondholders and the corporation. If it be the former, this court cannot arrest the judgment of the State court; if it be the latter, the alleged tax is illegal, and its enforcement can be restrained.

The case before us is similar, in its essential particulars, to that of Jackson v. The Railroad Company, reported in 7th Wallace. There, as here, the company was incorporated by the Legislatures of two States, Pennsylvania and Maryland, under the same name, and its road extended in a continuous line from Baltimore in one State, to Sunbury in the other. And the company had issued bonds for a large amount, drawing interest, and executed a mortgage for their security upon its entire road, its franchises and fixtures, including the portion lying in both States. Coupons for the different instalments of interest were attached to each bond. There was no apportionment of the bonds to any part of the road lying in either State. The whole road was bound for each bond. The law of Pennsylvania, as it then existed, imposed a tax on money owing by solvent debtors, of three mills on the dollar of the principal, payable out of the interest. An alien resident in Ireland was the holder of some of the bonds of the railroad company, and when he presented his coupons for the interest due thereon, the company claimed the right to deduct the tax imposed by the law of Pennsylvania, and also an alleged tax to the United States. The non-resident refused to accept the interest with these deductions, and brought suit for the whole amount in the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Maryland. That court, the chief justice presiding, instructed the jury, that if the plaintiff, when he purchased the bonds, was a British subject, resident in Ireland, and still resided there, he was entitled to recover the amount of the coupons without deduction. The verdict and judgment were in accordance with this instruction, and the case was brought here for review.

This court held that the tax, under the law of Pennsylvania, could not be sustained, as to permit its deduction from the coupons held by the plaintiff would be giving effect to the acts of her Legislature upon property and effects lying beyond her jurisdiction. The reasoning by which the learned justice, who delivered the opinion of the court, reached this conclusion, may be open, perhaps, to some criticism. It is not perceived how the fact, that the mortgage given for the security of the bonds in that case covered that portion of the road which extended into Maryland, could affect the liability of the bonds to taxation. If the entire road upon which the mortgage was given had been in another State, and the bonds had been held by a resident of Pennsylvania, they would have been taxable under her laws in that State. It was the fact that the bonds were held by a non-resident which justified the language used, that to permit a deduction of the tax from the interest, would be giving effect to the laws of Pennsylvania upon property beyond her jurisdiction, and not the fact assigned by the learned justice. The decision is, nevertheless, authority for the doctrine, that property lying beyond the jurisdiction of the State is not a subject upon which her taxing power can be legitimately exercised. Indeed, it would seem that no adjudication should be necessary to establish so obvious a proposition.

The power of taxation, however vast in its character and searching in its extent, is necessarily limited to subjects within the jurisdiction of the State. These subjects are persons, property, and business. Whatever form taxation may assume, whether as duties, imports, excises, or licenses, it must relate to one of these subjects. It is not possible to conceive of any other, though, as applied to them, the taxation may be exercised in a great variety of ways. It may touch property in every shape—in its natural condition, in its manufactured form, and in its various transmutations. And the amount of the taxation may be determined by the value of the property, or its use, or its capacity, or its productiveness. It may touch business in the almost infinite forms in which it is conducted—in professions, in commerce, in manufactures, and in transportation. Unless restrained by provisions of the Federal Constitution, the power of the State, as to the mode, form, and extent of taxation, is unlimited, where the subjects to which it applies are within her jurisdiction.

Corporations may be taxed, like natural persons, upon their property and business. But debts owing by corporations, like debts owing by individuals, are not property of the debtors in any sense; they are obligations of the debtors, and only possess value in the hands of the creditors. With them they are property, and in their hands they may be taxed. To call debts property of the debtors is simply to misuse terms. All the property there can be, in the nature of things, in debts of corporations, belongs to the creditors, to whom they are payable, and follows their domicile, wherever that may be. Their debts can have no locality separate from the parties to whom they are due. This principle might be stated in many different ways, and supported by citations from numerous adjudications, but no number of authorities, and no forms of expression, could add anything to its obvious truth, which is recognized upon its simple statement.

The bonds issued by the railroad company, in this case, are undoubtedly property, but property in the hands of the holders, not property of the obligors. So far as they are held by non-residents of the State, they are property beyond the jurisdiction of the State. The law which requires the treasurer of the company to retain five per cent. of the interest due to the non-resident bondholder, is not, therefore, a legitimate exercise of the taxing power. It is a law which interferes between the company and the bondholder, and under the pretence of levying a tax, commands the company to withhold a portion of the stipulated interest, and pay it over to the State. It is a law which thus impairs the obligation of the contract between the parties. The obligation of a contract depends upon its terms, and the means which the law in existence at the time affords for its enforcement. A law which alters the terms of a contract, by imposing new conditions, or dispensing with those expressed, is a law which impairs its obligation, for, as stated on another occasion, such a law relieves the parties from the moral duty of performing the original stipulations of the contract, and it prevents their legal enforcement. The act of Pennsylvania, of May 1st, 1868, falls within this description. It directs the treasurer of every incorporated company to retain from the interest stipulated to its bondholders, five per cent. upon every dollar, and pay it into the treasury of the commonwealth. It thus sanctions and commands a disregard of the express provisions of the contracts between the company and its creditors. It is only one of many cases where, under the name of taxation, an oppressive exaction is made without constitutional warrant, amounting to little less than an arbitrary seizure of private property. It is, in fact, a forced contribution, levied upon property held in other States, where it is subjected, or may be subjected, to taxation upon an estimate of its full value.

The case of Maltby v. The Reading and Columbia Railroad Company, decided by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in 1866, was referred to by the Common Pleas in support of its ruling, and is relied upon by counsel in support of the tax in question. The decision in that case does go to the full extent claimed, and holds that bonds of corporations held by non-residents are taxable in that State. But it is evident, from a perusal of the opinion of the court, that the decision proceeded upon the idea that the bond of the non-resident was itself property in the State, because secured by a mortgage on property there. "It is undoubtedly true," said the court, "that the Legislature of Pennsylvania cannot impose a personal tax upon the citizen of another State, but the constant practice is to tax property within our jurisdiction which belongs to non-residents." And again: "There must be jurisdiction over either the property or the person of the owner, else the power cannot be exercised; but when the property is within our jurisdiction, and enjoys the protection of our State government, it is justly taxable, and it is of no moment that the owner, who is required to pay the tax, resides elsewhere." There is no doubt of the correctness of these views. But the court then proceeds to state, that the principle of taxation, as the correlative of protection, is as applicable to a non-resident as to a resident; that the loan to the non-resident is made valuable by the franchises which the company derived from the commonwealth, and as an investment rests upon State authority, and therefore ought to contribute to the support of the State government. It also adds, that, though the loan is, for some purposes, subject to the law of the domicile of the holder, "yet, in a very high sense," it is also property in Pennsylvania, observing, in support of this position, that the holder of a bond of the company could not enforce it except in that State, and that the mortgage given for its security was upon property and franchises within her jurisdiction. The amount of all which is this: that the State which creates and protects a corporation, ought to have the right to tax the loans negotiated by it, though taken and held by non-residents—a proposition which it is unnecessary to controvert. The legality of a tax of that kind would not be questioned, if in the charter of the company the imposition of the tax were authorized, and in the bonds of the company, or its certificates of loan, the liability of the loan to taxation were stated. The tax in that case would be in the nature of a license tax for negotiating the loan, for in whatever manner made payable, it would ultimately fall on the company as a condition of effecting the loan, and parties contracting with the company would provide for it by proper stipulations. But there is nothing in the observations of the court, nor is there anything in the opinion, which shows that the bond of the non-resident was property in the State, or that the non-resident had any property in the State which was subject to taxation, within the principles laid down by the court itself, which we have cited.

The property mortgaged belonged entirely to the company, and so far as it was situated in Pennsylvania, was taxable there. If taxation is the correlative of protection, the taxes which it there paid were the correlative for the protection which it there received. And neither the taxation of the property, nor its protection, was augmented or diminished by the fact that the corporation was in debt or free from debt. The property in no sense belonged to the non-resident bondholder, or to the mortgagee of the company. The mortgage transferred no title; it created only a lien upon the property. Though in form a conveyance, it was, both at law and in equity, a mere security for the debt. That such is the nature of a mortgage in Pennsylvania, has been frequently ruled by her highest court. In Witmer's Appeal, 9 Wright, 463, the court said: "The mortgagee has no estate in the land, any more than the judgment creditor. Both have liens upon it, and no more than liens." And in that State, all possible interests in lands, whether vested or contingent, are subject to levy and sale on execution; yet it has been held, on the ground that a mortgagee has no estate in the lands, that the mortgaged premises cannot be taken in execution for his debt. In Rickert v. Madeira, 1 Rawle, 329, the court said: "A mortgage must be considered either as a chose in action, or as giving title to the land and vesting a real interest in the mortgagee. In the latter case it would be liable to execution; in the former, it would not, as it would fall within the same reason as a judgment bond or simple contract. If we should consider the interest of the mortgagee as a real interest, we must carry the principle out, and subject it to a dower and to the lien of a judgment;" * * and that it "is but a chose in action, a mere evidence of debt, is apparent from the whole current of decisions." Wilson v. Schoenberger's Executors, 7 Casey, 295.

Such being the character of a mortgage in Pennsylvania, it cannot be said, as was justly observed by counsel, that the non-resident holder and owner of a bond secured by a mortgage in that State, owns any real estate there. A mortgage being there a mere chose in action, it only confers upon the holder, or the party for whose benefit the mortgage is given, a right to proceed against the property mortgaged, upon a given contingency, to enforce, by its sale, the payment of his demand. This right has no locality independent of the party in whom it resides. It may undoubtedly be taxed by the State, when held by a resident therein; but when held by a non-resident, it is as much beyond the jurisdiction of the State as the person of the owner.

It is undoubtedly true that the actual situs of personal property, which has a visible and tangible existence, and not the domicile of its owner, will, in many cases, determine the State in which it may be taxed. The same thing is true of public securities consisting of State bonds and bonds of municipal bodies, and circulating notes of banking institutions; the former, by general usage, have acquired the character of, and are treated as property in the place where they are found, though removed from the domicile of the owner; the latter are treated and pass as money wherever they are. But other personal property, consisting of bonds, mortgages, and debts generally, has no situs independent of the domicile of the owner, and certainly can have none where the instruments, as in the present case, constituting the evidences of debt, are not separated from the possession of the owners.

Cases were cited by counsel on the argument from the decisions of the highest courts of several States, which accord with the views we have expressed. In Davenport v. The Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company, 12 Iowa, 539, the question arose before the Supreme Court of Iowa, whether mortgages on property in that State, held by non-residents, could be taxed, under a law which provided that all property, real and personal, within the State, with certain exceptions not material to the present case, should be subject to taxation; and the court said:

"Both in law and equity, the mortgagee has only a chattel interest. It is true that the situs of the property mortgaged is within the jurisdiction of the State; but the mortgage itself being personal property, a chose in action attaches to the person of the owner. It is agreed by the parties that the owners and holders of the mortgages are non-residents of the State. If so, and the property of the mortgage attaches to the person of the owner, it follows that these mortgages are not property within the State; and if not, they are not the subject of taxation."

In People v. Eastman, 25 Cal. 603, the question arose before the Supreme Court of California, whether a judgment of record in Mariposa county, upon the foreclosure of a mortgage upon property situated in that county, could be taxed there, the owner of the judgment being a resident of San Francisco, and the law of California requiring all property to be taxed in the county where situated; and it was held that it was not taxable there. "The mortgage," said the court, "has no existence independent of the thing secured by it; a payment of the debt discharges the mortgage. The thing secured is intangible, and has no situs distinct and apart from the residence of the holder. It pertains to and follows the person. The same debt may, at the same time, be secured by a mortgage upon land in every county in the State; and if the mere fact that the mortgage exists in a particular county gives the property in the mortgage a situs subjecting it to taxation in that county, a party, without further legislation, might be called upon to pay the tax several times, for the lien for taxes attaches at the same time in every county in the State, and the mortgage in one county may be a different one from that in another, although the debt secured is the same."

Some adjudications in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania were also cited on the argument, which appear to recognize doctrines inconsistent with that announced in Maltby v. Reading and Columbia Railroad Company, particularly the case of McKeen against the County of Northampton, 13 Wright, 519, and the case of Short's Estate, 11 Harris, 63, but we do not deem it necessary to pursue the matter further. We are clear that the tax cannot be sustained; that the bonds, being held by non-residents of the State, are only property in their hands, and that they are thus beyond the jurisdiction of the taxing power of the State. Even where the bonds are held by residents of the State, the retention by the company of a portion of the stipulated interest can only be sustained as a mode of collecting a tax upon that species of property in the State. When the property is out of the State, there can then be no tax upon it for which the interest can be retained. The tax laws of Pennsylvania can have no extra territorial operation; nor can any law of that State, inconsistent with the terms of a contract, made with or payable to parties out of the State, have any effect upon the contract whilst it is in the hands of such parties or other non-residents. The extra territorial invalidity of State laws, discharging a debtor from his contracts with citizens of other States, even though made and payable in the State after the passage of such laws, has been judicially determined by this court. Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Whea. 214; Baldwin v. Hale, 1 Wallace, 223. A like invalidity must, on similar grounds, attend State legislation which seeks to change the obligation of such contracts in any particular, and on stronger grounds, where the contracts are made and payable out of the State.

It follows that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania must be reversed, and the cause be remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion; and it is so ordered.

THE PITTSBURG, FORT WAYNE, AND CHICAGO R. R. CO. v. THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA. 32.

THE DELAWARE, LACKAWANA, AND WESTERN R. R. CO. v. THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA. 33.

These cases involve the same question considered and decided in the case of Cleveland, Painesville, and Ashtabula Railroad Company v. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The tax levied in these cases upon the bonds of non-residents of the State is three mills on the dollar, to be paid out of the interest. In the case decided, the tax levied was five per cent. upon the interest of the bonds. The difference in the mode of the assessment does not affect the principle decided.

Upon the authority of the case cited, the judgments in these two cases must be reversed, and the causes be remanded for further proceedings; and it is so ordered.

THE DORSEY HARVESTER REVOLVING RAKE CO. v. MARSH, GRIER & CO.

1. Patents granted by a State or the general government, are to be taken as prima facie evidence that they were regularly granted.
2. Though the acceptance of a charter is essential in constituting a body politic, it will be presumed from facts, consistent only with such hypothesis, as where the corporation obtains and produces the letters to prove its existence.
3. Under the act of Assembly of Pennsylvania, of February 2 th, 1867, a corporation of that State may purchase and sell patents granted by the United States, and of rights and licenses under said patents, if they be related to the purpose of the corporation; such purpose may be inferred from the name of the corporation.
4. A provisional officer who is invested by law with the functions of the commissioner of patents, is properly described as commissioner, so far as the efficacy of his official acts are concerned.
5. A re-issue of a patent may by an amended specification restrict or enlarge the patent to the real invention.
6. The test of a description in a patent is whether a person skilled in the art to which the invention appertains, can construct and use it.
7. A machine having substantially the same mode of operation, doing the same work in the same manner, and accomplishing the same results as a patented invention, is an infringement.
8. The defendants having conducted their business under the impression that it was no invasion of the rights of others, and as a sudden stoppage would be ruinous; the court entered a decree for a injunction and an account, but ordered the injunction should not issue until further order if the defendant within thirty days should file a bond in such form and amount, and with such security as the court should approve.

Opinion of the court per MCKENNAN, Cir. J. Delivered April, 1873.

The bill in this case is founded upon an extended patent to Owen Dorsey, for an improvement in harvester rakes, dated March 4th, 1870.

Every material allegation of the bill is denied in the answer; and the validity of the patent and the sufficiency of the complainant's proofs have been contested in an argument of unusual minuteness of elaboration. It has failed to convince me that the complainant is not entitled to a decree, and the reasons for the conclusion reached by me can, perhaps, be more briefly and lucidly stated, by an examination of the points of that argument, in the order in which they were presented.

The suit is brought by the complainant as a corporation, and its existence as such is denied in the answer. It is proved by the exhibition of letters patent, issued under the great seal of the State of Pennsylvania, signed by the governor, and countersigned by the secretary of State. That the governor had authority to cause these letters to be issued is indisputable, and if they do not warrant a presumption that they were rightfully issued, and therefore that what the law prescribes as necessary to be done to that end had been done, it is difficult to perceive what significance they have. To the acts of public officers within the general scope of their power, some degree of faith and credit is due, and it is no stretch of presumption to consider that they have faithfully performed a duty imposed upon them by law, with a proper observance of all its preliminary conditions. Therefore, it has been held, and is settled law, that patents granted by a State or the general government are to be taken as prima facie evidence that they were regularly granted, and that they import conformity to the prerequisitions of the laws authorizing their allowance. Trenton R. R. Co. v. Stinson, 14 Pet. 458; Rubber Co., v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. 797.

Nor has the second branch of the objection, that the acceptance of the charter is not shown, any better foothold. This fact is undoubtedly essential in the process of constituting a body politic, and it must therefore, be proved where the existence of the corporation is put in issue. But it is well settled that it will be presumed from facts, which are consistent only with such hypothesis, without proof of any express declaration to that effect. Thus, where a law is enacted applicable to a designated corporation, the mere passage of the law will not sufficiently prove its adoption by the corporation. But where it appears that the law was enacted upon the application of the corporation, its acceptance is a necessary inference from that fact. And so where a general law is in existence, authorizing the creation of a corporation by letters patent, to be issued by a public officer upon the preliminary performance of certain things by the persons to be incorporated, and letters patent are duly issued, reciting the performance of the required conditions, and investing the corporation with the franchises of a body politic, and these letters are obtained and produced by the corporation for the very purpose of establishing its existence, can any doubt remain that they were granted at the instance of the alleged corporation, and were accepted by it? The possession by a grantee of a deed for his benefit, is everywhere sufficient prima facie evidence of its acceptance by him. Why, therefore, will not the same facts authorize a like presumption as to a corporation? The proofs here leave no doubt that the complainant was duly constituted a corporation according to law.

It is further denied that the complainant has any right to acquire and hold the patent in question. The corporate faculties of the complainant are not to be ascertained by reference exclusively to the statutes authorizing its creation. Notice will also be taken of any supplementary or general statute pertinent to the inquiry. Now the Pennsylvania statute referred to in the complainant's letters patent, authorizes the creation of a corporation upon the fulfillment of certain prescribed conditions, and they are recited to show that these conditions have been complied with, and as a consequence it is declared that the applicants are constituted a body politic, "with all the rights powers, and privileges," conferred upon it by "all the laws of the commonwealth." The creation of the corporation was thus complete, but its powers are not to be sought in these acts alone. The supplementary act of February 27th, 1867, extended the scope of the original act, so as to embrace companies thereafter formed for the purchase and sale of patents granted by the authority of the United States, and of rights and licenses under said patents. The right to acquire and hold patents is here clearly given to corporations organized under the original act, thus amplified. If the patent in controversy is related to the purpose of the complainant's organization, the right to take and hold it is expressly conferred upon it. It is not requisite that this purpose should be proved by direct evidence, but it may be inferred from the name of the corporation alone. So it was held in Blanchard's Gun Stock Turning Factory v. Warner, 1 Blatch. 271, where it was inferred that the corporation, plaintiff "had power enough to purchase an invention which would tend to facilitate the purposes of its incorporation, as indicated by its corporate name," in the absence of proof of any law expressly conferring it. But in this case the law expressly authorizes the purchase and tenure by the complainants of a patent, which is cognate to the purpose of its incorporation. That it is founded upon the Dorsey patent I think is manifestly indicated. It adopts the name of Dorsey's invention set forth in his patent as part of its own, but to individuate the patent more distinctly, it superadds Dorsey's name, so that its corporate style, "The Dorsey Revolving Harvester Rake Company," denotes exclusively Dorsey's invention. I think, therefore, the inference is both legitimate and obvious, that the purpose of the complainant was to operate in reference to the Dorsey invention, and that it has the right to acquire and hold his patent.

The third point is purely verbal. The bill alleges that the Dorsey patent was duly extended by the commissioner of patents, and the proof is that the extension was granted by S. H. Hodges, acting commissioner, and it is, therefore, urged that the bill must be dismissed because the proof does not support the averment. The gist of the averment is, that the patent was extended by an officer having authority to grant it, and if the proof substantially supports it, there is no discordance between them. A provisional officer who is invested by law with the functions of the commissioner of patents, is properly described as commissioner, so far as the efficacy of his official acts is concerned, and for this purpose only is it necessary to describe him at all. The validity of his act, not the verbal accuracy of his title, is the essential subject of inquiry.

The fourth and fifth points may be considered together. They affirm that the acting commissioner did not acquire jurisdiction to consider Dorsey's application for an extension, and that his patent was not extended until after the expiration of the original term.

The actual incumbent of a public office is presumed to be in the lawful possession of it, and no affirmative proof of his title

THE JUDICIARY SYSTEM OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Just now the Pennsylvania Constitutional Convention is engaged in discussing the best means of revising the judiciary system of the State. That the evils in the administration of justice are great, no one familiar with the courts can deny, for, from one end of the State to the other, are heard continual complaints of the insufficiency of courts, the want of the requisite number of judges, the frequent delays in bringing causes to trial, the great loss of time to suitors and witnesses, and numerous other grievances, which amount to a practical denial of justice. That something must be done is an admitted fact; but the great question is, what is the best remedy?

The Judiciary Committee reported an elaborate scheme, (a summary of which we gave in our issue of 4th ult.), its principal feature being the establishment of circuit courts, intermediate between the courts of common pleas and the Supreme Court; Ex-Chief Justice Woodward submitted a minority report, in which he also coincided in the view that circuit courts were necessary; but the Convention on Tuesday last, in a very summary manner, decided that there should be no such intermediate courts as the ones suggested. This action leaves the system of courts, pretty much as at present, and now comes the question, can we not by increasing the number of justices, simplifying the modes of procedure, and increasing the facilities of the courts already in existence, get a solution of the problem now agitating the minds of the Pennsylvania bar? For our part, we think we can, and we propose to show in a few words how it can be done.

And first, we must begin at the foundation: the aldermen and justices of the peace. Let those ancient worthies, more especially in the large cities, be swept bodily out of existence, and substitute in lieu thereof, minor courts, call them justices', police, or what you will. Let the judges of these minor courts be elected in threes in large cities, so as to have all classes of the people represented and politics eschewed; let their districts be based upon population, and be formed sufficiently large as to make it troublesome for petty local politicians or ward rulers to be nominated, and yet not so large as to prevent the people from making the proper discrimination in casting their votes; let the judges sit together, and have all the proceedings before them conducted orally; no written pleadings being tolerated. Let the judges be learned in the law, of at least thirty years of age, and five years' legal practice, and let them receive competent salaries and no fees; transfer to them the jurisdiction in matters of contract up to $250, their judgments to be final up to $25, or even more, and also transfer to them jurisdiction over the numerous petty misdemeanors which now block up the calendars of the courts of quarter sessions, and prevent the judges of those courts from getting through with their business. By thus relieving the courts of common pleas and criminal courts of an immense number of trifling cases, we can secure the more speedy administration of justice in those courts, and justice in small cases, which are the most numerous, will be really brought home to the doors of the people, and be obtained rapidly and cheaply.

Second, as to the common pleas courts, which, excepting perhaps a few orphans' courts in large cities, should be the only intermediate courts between justices and the Supreme Court, we would have the number of judges greatly increased by electing them, in regard to the population of the district—having one judge for every 30, 35, or 40,000 population, as may be determined upon, and making every county, containing the requisite population, a separate district. Let the judges all be elected on the same day, and by some minority plan, in order to secure a non-partisan bench; let their terms of office be ten years, commencing in the year after the promulgation of the decennial census returns; vest in them, final jurisdiction over many of the cases that now go to the Supreme Court, and thus relieve that court; give them good salaries, and where there is a large number of judges in a district, let them sit in rotation, in chambers of three, or five judges, as most convenient. All references to examiners, auditors, masters, etc., should be totally abolished, and no non-judicial appointments of any kind should be exercised by the judges. The purity of the ermine is its greatest beauty.

And, lastly, the Supreme Court. By making the Common Pleas judgments final in many cases, there would not be the difficulty now experienced, in hearing and determining cases in this court. The judges should be elected all at the same time, and by a minority plan, and for long terms. Their number should also be regulated by the population of the State, say one judge for every half-million inhabitants. Let them sit in two chambers, if necessary for the dispatch of business, and by all means, let them be permanently located in one place, and not be perambulating through the State, like the old Court of Common Pleas in England.

By amplifying the above summary, and providing for the details of its execution, we can no doubt get a rational judiciary system. Cheap, rapid, certain administration of justice is what the people want, and we think our plan would give it to them. Messieurs of the Convention, we submit it to your careful examination.

We have received from Messrs. A. L. Bancroff & Co., San Francisco, the first volume of Sawyer's Reports of Cases in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States for the Ninth or California Circuit. In our next issue we will notice it and other publications received.

The Constitutional Convention have decided this week two good things—to have no Circuit Courts, and to have the judges of all the courts elected.

Register's Court of Philada.

MARTHA WINPENNY'S ESTATE.

1. In granting administration, the primary object is the interest of the estate, and where the discretion to appoint is not expressly controlled by statute, it should be exercised with that view.
2. Two brothers applied for administration pendente lite, where there was a dispute as to which of two wills of decedent was entitled to probate. One brother, Bolton, was named as executor in both wills; the other brother, John, was entitled to the residue of the estate under both wills, and letters were granted to him as having the greatest interest in the estate.

Sur reference to the Register's Court, without appeal, of application for administrator pendente lite,

Opinion of the court by ALLISON, P. J. Delivered April 26th, 1873.

The act of the 15th of March, 1832, sect. 22, Purdon, vol. 1, p. 410, pla. 27, provides that wherever letters of administration are by law necessary, the register having jurisdiction shall grant them in such form as the case shall require, to the widow, if any, of decedent, or to such of his relations or kindred as by law may be entitled to the residue of his personal estate, or to a share or shares therein, after payment of his debts. And in all cases of an administration with a will annexed, where there is a general residue of the estate bequeathed, the right to administer shall belong to those having the right to such residue; and the administration in such case shall be granted by the register to such one or more of them as he shall judge will best administer the estate.

The power of the register to grant letters of administration, is regulated by statute; he is, therefore, not at liberty to exercise a discretion contrary to the commands of the statute; but where the law has given no directions, temporary administration may be granted to any fit person. In such case, the register is free to exercise a sound discretion (Elmaker's Estate, 4 Watts, 39), which is not to be controlled or reversed if performed with proper caution, and with a regard to the specialties of the case, as they are presented for his consideration and decision. But where there is no good reason for a departure from the well defined principles governing the grant of general administration, it is better to adhere to them as the safest guide in the exercise of the power with which the law clothes the register. The citations from the act of 1832, show that the person or persons who are entitled to the residue of the estate, are, subject to the enumerated classes, to be favored, and unless good cause be shown to the contrary, are entitled to the grant of administration. Upon a contest for letters pendente lite, where harm cannot come to the estate, we do not see why the same principle should not be applied. The person entitled to the residue of the estate has the greater interest in the proper discharge of the duties of the office, which, for the time being, are in part the same as those of ordinary administration; he must file an inventory, take care of assets, collect and pay debts. He is, until suit ended, to take care of the estate and to see that it suffer no harm, though he cannot pay legacies or make distribution. Commonwealth v. Mateer, 16 S. & R. 416; Adams v. Shaw, 1 Schoales & Lefroy, 254.

The objection most strongly urged against the party entitled to the residue of the estate, is that if administration pending the controversy is given to him, it will subject the estate to double costs in the settlement of the accounts; but as this loss, if any, can fall only on the remainderman, and he does not object, but on the contrary claims to have letters given to him, it surely does not lie in the mouth of Bolton Winpenny, the executor to urge this against the claim of John Winpenny, to whom the residue of the estate is given. He may believe, and probably does so believe, that the costs of the settlement of an additional account may be far below that which he thinks he can save to the estate, by having its management during the suit, in his own hands.

But there are good reasons why Bolton Winpenny should not have the letters pendente lite awarded to him. He stands in one view, as a litigant with the estate, not for himself, but for his children and sisters. In that which is claimed to be the last will, $1,000 is given to a minor son of the executor, and the whole of the residue absolutely to John Winpenny. In the will produced by Bolton, before the register, legacies of $1000 each are given to two of his children; half the residue to his three sisters, for life, with remainder only as to this half, to John. In Elmaker's Estate, it is said, that where a party stands as a litigant to the estate, the court have constantly declined putting a person so situate in possession of the property, by granting administration to him pending suit. The charge against Bolton Winpenny, is that he has suppressed the last will, which gives less of the estate to his family than does the will produced by him, and in the case above cited, the court further say, that the least taint of fraud is a conclusive objection; it works a legal incompetency to perform the duties of the office. It may be answered, that John Winpenny is also a litigant, but the reply to this is, that he is standing solely on the defensive; he makes no war on the estate; he has an interest, it is true, as between the two wills, but there is much greater propriety in putting the estate in charge of one whose duty as well as interest it is to resist assaults upon it, in place of giving it to another, who is likely to try to tear down rather than to build it up.

In England, the law seems to be administered in accordance with the course suggested as the proper one to be pursued. Sir John Nichols, in the case of the Earl of Warncliffe v. Greville, 1 Phillamore, 123, and in Wetdrill v. Wright, 2 Phillamore, 242, recognized the principle, that by statute and by practice, the management of property pendente lite is given to the person having the greatest interest in it, and in Stratton v. Ford, 2 Lee, 49, Sir George Lee refused administration pending suit to the executors, and decreed it to the nominee of the residuary legatee, who had the greatest interest. It is laid down in Dodd & Brooks' Probate Practice, 398, that the primary object is the interest of the estate. The court is not to be guided by the wishes and feelings of the parties, or even the deceased, but to look to the benefit of the estate, and to that of all the persons interested in the distribution of the property.

In either case, John Winpenny, the applicant, is the only person entitled to the residue of the estate, both personal and real.

TOWNSEND v. ROY.

1. A purchaser at an orphans' court sale in partition, paid, by leave of court, only so much of the purchase money as was not distributable to himself, and three others, whom he represented: Held, if there were a resulting trust in favor of the persons so represented, it should be asserted by them in the appropriate mode, and within the time limited by the act of April 22d, 1856.
2. A defendant in ejectment may set up an outstanding title in a third person, but it must be an outstanding legal title. That the plaintiff holds the legal title in trust for a third person, cannot avail the defendant.
2. One who recovers in ejectment, claiming the whole estate, cannot set up the record as evidence that he is in possession as a cestui que trust for an undivided portion, and thereby escape the operation of the act of 1856.

Opinion by LYND, J. Delivered April 26th, 1873.

Rule for new trial, and motion for judgment upon a point reserved.

This was an ejectment. The title of the plaintiff was under a sale in partition in the Orphans' Court, of the estate of Michael Roy, deceased. The proceedings were regular and usual, except that the purchaser, instead of paying to the trustee, appointed by the court to make the sale and conveyance, the entire purchase money, paid, by leave of court, so much of said sum as was not distributable to himself and three other heirs of Michael Roy, deceased, whom, as was alleged, he represented.

The defendant maintained that as to these three heirs, each of whom was entitled to one-seventh, there was a resulting trust, and that the verdict should have been in favor of the plaintiff for an undivided four-sevenths only of the premises.

We are of opinion that the purchaser took, by the sale, a legal title to the whole property, and any resulting trust for other parties must be asserted by them in the appropriate mode, and within the time limited by the act of April 22d, 1856.

A defendant in ejectment may set up an outstanding title in a third person, but it must be an outstanding legal title. That the plaintiff holds the legal title in trust for such third person, certainly could not avail the defendant.

But the defendant happens to be one of the three heirs, whom the purchaser, at the sale in partition, claimed to represent as above stated; and he maintains that he can set up, at least, his own equitable title to the one-seventh of the said property; and hence, that the verdict for the plaintiff should, at most, have been for an undivided six-sevenths.

Unfortunately for this position of the defendant, his own evidence discloses that he came into possession of the premises by proceedings in ejectment, commenced on the twenty-third day of March, A. D. 1864, in which he claimed the whole premises.

But the deed in partition was delivered and recorded June 14th, 1853, and the resulting trust in favor of defendant could not, therefore, under the provisions of the act of 1856, be enforced after the 22d day of April, 1858. Prima facie, therefore, the ejectment commenced in 1864, was too late; the record was not of itself evidence that the action was to enforce the said resulting trust, nor that the possession acquired under said action was acquired in pursuance of said trust.

On the contrary, as he claimed the whole premises, when the resulting trust in his favor was as to one-seventh only, it is evident from the record that his action was not brought to enforce the resulting trust.

Upon all the evidence, then, the defendant is not a cestui que trust in possession; his possession is that of a mere stranger, and he must yield to the plaintiff's legal title.

At the trial, the question as to whether there was a resulting trust in favor of the defendant was reserved. The views just expressed show that the reservation was immaterial. Hence, the motion for judgment upon the point reserved is dismissed, and the rule for a new trial is discharged.

THIRTIETH JUDICIAL DISTRICT.
Crawford County Common Pleas.

COMMONWEALTH v. MORLEY AND TAYLOR.

1. In criminal trials before justices of the peace with a jury of six, their records must show in some reasonably intelligible form a case within their jurisdiction, and that all the elements of a fair legal trial have been observed, and that a definite and authorized judgment has been entered.
2. A greater degree of precision is required in these criminal cases than in the ordinary civil cases that are tried before them.
3. A certiorari in such cases cannot issue without at special allowance by the court or the district attorney.

On a charge of larceny against the defendants, made and tried before a justice of the peace and brought up by the defendants by certiorari.

Opinion of the court by LOWRIE, P. J. Delivered April 8th, 1873.

This is a case of complaint before a justice of the peace, against the defendants for stealing, and a trial and conviction by a jury of six, and a sentence thereon, and it is brought here by a certiorari. Many errors are assigned to the proceedings, and we proceed to consider such of them as are necessary to the proper trial of the case.

The acts of Assembly under which this cause was tried are those of 1st May 1861 (P. L. 682), and 5th April, 1862 (P.L. 274), extended to this county by that of 1st April, 1863 (P. L. 215), and it is these acts that we are called upon to interpret and apply to this case, and we shall endeavor to do it briefly and clearly.

1. It may be stated as a general principle, that in proceedings before justices of the peace, the law is not usually so exacting as to demand the precision of form that is usual in the higher courts; it is satisfied if their records show in some reasonably, intelligible form, a case within their jurisdiction, and that all the elements of a fair legal trial of it have been observed, and that a definite and authorized judgment has been entered. Even where a form of proceeding and of recording it is partially or wholly prescribed by act of Assembly, it is not a literal but only a substantial conformity to it that is demanded. The great variety of cases as well as of official qualifications and training, forbids a demand of formal rigidity. 2 T. R. 23; 3 Burr, 1785; 1 East. 649; 11 Harris, 521; 10 Casey, 403; 4 P. F. Smith, 93.

2. But a greater degree of precision is required in cases where justices of the peace are invested with a jurisdiction that is new, than in those that are within their general civil jurisdiction. When such a special jurisdiction is conferred on justices of the peace, they must proceed strictly within the limits assigned by the law conferring it, and substantially according to the forms prescribed for it, and their record of the case must show that they have done so. 4 P. F. Smith, 230; 12 Id. 133. Even if it be a proceeding for the forfeiture of a hog under the stray laws, this is required; 8 Id. 496; and not less than this can be required when men are not charged with crimes. It is the same as is required in the short ejectments by landlords against tenants; 5 S. & R. 174; 2 Barr, 294; 9 Id. 213; and it is the same as is required of any court invested with such special authority.

3. The laws under which this case was tried, give justices of the peace authority to try cases of larceny, if the property stolen shall not exceed $10 in value, and the complaint here is of larceny of a barrel of vinegar of the value of about $10, and of this the defendants are convicted. As about $10 is plainly not the same as not exceeding $10, the record does not show that the justice had authority to try the case, and therefore this is a fatal error. It might perhaps have been cured if the jury of six had found the value to be not exceeding $10.

4. There can be no larceny except of things belonging to some person, but this record does not aver that this vinegar had any owner, it merely described it as stolen "out of car No. 1295 (L. S. R. R. car.)" This is also a fatal error.

5. The justice's jurisdiction does not appear unless his record show that the act was done in this county. Here it is not said where the larceny was committed, and therefore this is an error.

6. The jurisdiction of the jurors does not appear, because it is not stated in the proceedings that they were good and lawful men, citizens of the township, borough, or city, in which the case was tried and having the qualifications of electors therein, and this also is error.

There are some other defects in this record, which we do not specify, because they were not sufficiently discussed before us, and some of them may be cured by the presumption of regularity where nothing appears to the contrary. Some things that ought to have been done do not appear, and this may be because all that was done is not fully recorded. In no case is it proper to record a case against any one, without giving his or her christian name, if it can be learned, and not merely the initial letter of it, and so the jurors ought to be named. 6 Barn. & Cr. 247.

In these cases justices of the peace ought to be very strict in following the law under which they act, though some things which they do may not need to be recorded. When they send up their proceedings on a certiorari, they ought to send up every part of them, including the complaint, warrant, venire facias, and all the relevant acts of the justice and parties. A justice does not properly obey the certiorari by sending merely a copy of the short notes entered on his docket (when he keeps short notes), but from these notes he must make up a full record of all the proceedings actually had by and before him, and certify this to the court, with the complaint and writs, in return to the certiorari.

It is proper to remark, moreover, that it is irregular to issue a certiorari in such cases as this, without a special allowance by the court or by the district attorney. We may possibly, hereafter, find it proper to make a rule of court that such allowance may be granted by a judge at chambers.

These proceedings are to be reversed, because (among other reasons) of a curable defect in the statement of the offence, and therefore we must send them to the district attorney, that the statement may be amended, and then remit the cause to the justice of the peace for a new trial.

The sentence of the justice is reversed, and a new trial awarded, and the proceedings of the justice are referred to the district attorney, that the complaint may be duly amended, and then remitted to the justice for further proceedings, according to law.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Head notes of decisions of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, to appear in vol. 51, N. H. Reports. (Received from John M. Shirley, State Reporter.)

ALLUVION.

Land formed by alluvion, on the bank of a river not navigable, by the gradual wearing away of the opposite bank, is to be divided, ordinarily, among the riparian owners entitled to it according to this rule: Ascertain the length of the old shore line, and of the part of it belonging to each proprietor; then measure off for each proprietor a part of the new shore line in proportion to what he held in the old shore line; and then draw lines from the boundaries at the ancient bank to the points of division on the new shore, as thus ascertained. In this way, if such land is formed in the bend of a river, and the new shore line is just one-half the length of the old one, each proprietor will take of the new shore line just one half the extent of his former shore line. Batchelder v. Keniston, 496.

CHANCERY.

A bill in equity, brought to redeem stocks pledged to the defendants, may be sustained, although they may have sold the stocks; and in case it be out of their power to return the stocks, the court may, in a proper case, decree compensation. Merrill v. Houghton, 61.

A court of equity will not suspend proceedings at law to enable the defendant to obtain an adjustment of partnership concerns that he may set off a balance due him from the plaintiff, unless the bill shows that a balance will be due to him on taking a partnership account. Robinson v. Wheeler, 384.

is required to support his official acts. This is a familiar maxim. Accordingly, it was held in Winans v. The York & Maryland Line R. R. Co., 17 How. 41, that "the court will take notice, judicially, of the persons who, from time to time, preside over the patent office, whether permanently or transiently, and the production of their commission is not necessary to support their official acts." So, therefore, the contingency upon which the examiner in chief is authorized to assume the duties of commissioner, is primarily to be taken to exist from his actual discharge of these duties. That this presumption is conclusive, in a contest between third parties, is, I think, a logical result of the principle affirmed and applied in the Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. 796. But at any rate the burden of showing the non-existence of the prescribed contingency is upon the party who denies the validity of the ostensible officer's act. That burden the respondents here have not sustained. They have shown only that the commissioner was at the patent office part of the day on which the extension was granted, not later than 11½ o'clock A. M.; while it appears that the commissioner, in writing, informed the chief examiner of his intended absence at the time of the decision of Dorsey's application, and that the case was actually decided by the chief examiner. There was an actual abdication by the commissioner of his official functions, and an exercise of them by the chief examiner; and, as this was done with a distinct reference to the provisions of the act of Congress, the inference that they were strictly observed is legitimate and fair.

The granting of an extended patent is a judicial act. Authority to that end is conferred upon the commissioner of patents by act of Congress. The manner in which it is to be exercised, and the time within which it may be exercised, are prescribed by the act. The extension must be granted before the term of the original patent expires; but when it is granted in apparent conformity to the act of Congress, the decision of the officer has the attributes of a final judgment. It is not subject to appeal or revision. This is the clear import of numerous decisions of the Supreme Court. In Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. 516, the court say: "When the commissioner accepts a surrender of an original patent, and grants a new patent, his decision in the premises, in a suit for infringement, is final and conclusive, and is not re-examinable in such suit in the Circuit Court, unless it is apparent upon the face of the patent that he has exceeded his authority; that there is such a repugnancy between the old and new patents that it must be held as matter of legal construction; that the new patent is not for the same invention as that embraced and secured in the original patent." And this doctrine is asserted with equal distinctness, in reference to the granting of an extended patent, in the Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. 798. It is there said: "The law made it the duty of the commissioner to examine and decide. He had full jurisdiction. The function he performed was judicial in its character. No provision is made for appeal or review. His decision must be held conclusive until the patent is impeached in a proceeding had directly for that purpose, according to the rules which define the remedy, as shown by the precedents and authorities upon the subject."

It is plain, from these authorities, that in a suit by a patentee against an infringer, it cannot be shown that the commissioner who granted the patent exceeded or irregularly exercised his authority, except by matter apparent on the face of the patent, and that it is conclusively valid until it is successfully impeached in a direct proceeding properly instituted for that purpose.

We have, then, a case where a patent has been extended with every apparent legal sanction; which it is sought to invalidate by parol evidence contradictory of its purport, and claimed to show that it was granted at a time and place contrary to law. This is a forbidden inquiry in this case, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to notice the evidence presented in relation to it.

The invention of Dorsey belongs to the widely useful class of mechanical devices designed to facilitate the harvesting of grain. His special object was to produce a device which would automatically separate the standing grain in suitable gavels, press it against the vibrating knives of a reaping machine, and sweeping it in the arc of a circle, deposit in the rear of the machine, out of the way of the team, when it passed around again. By no pre-existing invention was this double effect produced. The function of discharging the cut grain had been performed by a rake sweeping over the platform of the machine, and separating and gathering the standing grain to the cutters by a revolving reel. These were the more recent and approved automatic devices for these purposes, preceeding the invention of Dorsey. But in all the literature of the art, which has been so exhaustively exhibited, no instance is shown in which the gathering office was performed by a rake.

To effectuate his object, Dorsey constructed a continuously revolving rake, with arms attached by a pivot to a shaft or head around which they revolve, and so as to allow of their being elevated or depressed by an inclined cam way on which they rest. Guided by the cam, the rake is caused to fall in front of the cutter-bar into the standing grain, thereby separating it for each gavel, pressing it against the cutting knives, and sweeping it over the platform in the arc of a circle, depositing it behind the horses and out of their track on their next round.

The novelty of the operation consists in the performance of the functions of gathering the grain to the cutters and discharging it from the platform by the same instrumentality, and in the mechanical means employed to guide and cause it to rise and fall to perform these functions together. And in these features the complainant's invention is distinguishable from the various devices exhibited by the respondents. I do not propose to consider them in detail, but content myself with saying, that in none of them is a rake employed to separate and gather to the cutters the standing grain, nor is there in any of them a similar pivotal attachment of a rake arm, by which it is capable of rising and falling in its revolving movement; and in all of them, except in Seymour's and Palmer and Williams', the cut grain is discharged directly behind the cutter. I can have no doubt, therefore, of the novelty of the invention.

It is urged that the patent in controversy is void, because the reissue is not for the same invention described in the original.

That a reissued patent cannot be allowed for an invention different from the one of which the original patent is the basis, is undoubtedly true. But it is equally true, that any feature of the invention, which is actually a part of it, that was only suggested or indicated in the specification or drawings, may be distinctly described in an amended specification and protected by a reissued patent, and that accordingly the claims of the patent may be restricted or enlarged to cover the real invention.

It is a just rule that patents are to be construed liberally, so as to sustain the right of the inventor. Mere verbal discrepancies, therefore, are entitled to but little consideration, especially where in view of the mechanism devised, the functions it was designed to perform, and its mode of operation, there is substantial accordance between the original and reissued patents. Nor is it any objection to a renewed patent that part of the original invention is omitted. This an inventor may do, because the public may use it, and there is nothing in the policy or terms of the patent act which forbids it. Carver v. The Braintree Manufacturing Co., 2 Story, 438.

I do not think, however, that it requires any great liberality of construction to harmonize the original and reissued patents. The main ground of the objection is, that in the reissue the invention is described as a continuously revolving, gathering and discharging rake, which decends into the standing grain in front of the cutters, so as to gather the grain for each gavel, and that the gathering function thus defined is not suggested or indicated in the original patent. In the latter it is said "the rake-head is brought by a sweeping descent upon the front edge of the platform, and in so doing draws the uncut grain towards the cutters." And again, describing the operation of the rake, "by continuing its movement the rake reaches over the heads of the grain, and gradually descending by the guide-rail, draws the wheat towards the cutters; by this means I dispense entirely with the reel used on harvesters for drawing the grain to the cutters." Now the reference here to the gathering function of the rake is distinct. It is expressly stated to be a substitute for the reel, the sole function of which is to gather the grain to the cutters. And it operates so as to reach over the heads of the grain and descending gradually draws or gathers the grain to the cutters. Every step in the process is not as fully described as in the amended specification, but it is obviously implied that the rake, reaching over the heads of the grain, was intended to descend below them into the grain, as it could thus only perform its appointed duty of drawing it to the cutter. And in so operating it must necessarily effect a separation of the grain between the rake-head and the cutter-bar from that standing in the rest of the field. The description, therefore, plainly points to a rake adapted to gather the grain to the cutter, as well as to discharge it from the platform, and, in so performing its intended office, necessarily passes down into the grain in front of the cutters, and divides it so as to form the succeeding gavel in the standing grain.

Again, it is objected that the original and amended specifications are vitally irreconcilable in this: that in the former is described a rake attached to the end of a diametrical arm; "each pair of arms, formed of metal or wood, with an opening at their half length of a longitudinal form, so as to allow them to pass over the end of a vertical turning shaft;" and that this description is omitted in the latter. Diametrical arms are undoubtedly one form of embodiment of the patentee's conception, but they are not the only one to which the principles of his invention is susceptible of application, nor is it so declared. His patent covered equivalent, although formally different, mechanical devices, which operated in the same way and to the same end with diametrical arms. Hence it was legitimate to modify the specification so as to secure protection broadly to the real invention of the patentee against any form of infringement. This is well and accurately illustrated by Acting Commissioner Hodges, in his opinion, where he says, in reference to the distinctive merit of the invention: "It lies in attaching the rake arm by a pivot to a shaft around which it revolves, and may be made at the same time to rise and fall upon the pivot. By this construction the rake may be guided in the direction desired. These are the essential features of the invention, and equally so whether the arms are diametrical or merely radial. After trying the latter, Dorsey adopted the former, because he found he could use the limb opposite the rake as means for guiding it. But the combination of the revolving movement of the arms and their swinging movement upon their pivots, which alone gave him the power to direct the path of the rake at will, was common to both, and constitutes the merit of the contrivance."

Nor does the objection apply with any greater effect to the claims of the reissue. It has been already shown that the original and amended specifications describe a continuously revolving rake, with a pivotal connection to the shaft on which it revolves, which performs the functions of gathering and discharging the grain, so arranged as to enter the uncut grain in front of the cutter, and discharge the cut grain in the arc of a circle, and so as to separate the grain which is to form the next gavel in the standing grain.

It follows, therefore, that the claims of the reissue which embrace the device and combination of devices by which these functions are performed, are in entire harmony with the specification,

Another objection to the validity of the patent is, that the patentee has not so described his raking device and its arrangement as to enable an ordinary mechanic to make, construct, and use the same. Absolute precision as to details is not required in the specification. It is only intended as a guide; but it is not the sole instructor. Nor is it addressed merely to ordinary mechanics; but the test of its sufficiency is, whether a person skilled in the art to which the invention appertains can construct and use it. The special skill of the mechanic, derived from familiarity with the art, may be applied in aid of the instruction given by the specification; and this skill may be exerted to modify any direction in the specification as to the matters of mere adjustment or adaptation of the invention to its intended use, else the authority to employ it at all is of but little value. "It will, perhaps, rarely happen, even where the utmost vigilance and care are observed, that the machine or structure will be so accurately described as that the description can be literally and strictly followed in every particular. The skilful mechanic will see that in some particulars there is some vagueness, and some discretion is required; but that fact will not invalidate the patent." 3 Fish. 555. But it is a complete answer to the objection that the thing which, it is argued, cannot be done, has actually been done. In 1858 Adam Reese acquired a license to use the Dorsey invention, and, in substantial accordance with the specification and drawings, he made and applied it to over fifteen hundred machines, which worked successfully. Against such a practical demonstration, argumentative speculation, reinforced though it may be by the untested opinions of experts, will be of little avail.

In the Union Sugar Refinery v. Matthiessen, 2 Fish, 626, Mr. Justice Clifford said to the jury: "You will regard the well-known substantial equivalent of a thing as being the same as the thing itself; so that, if two machines have the same mode of operation, do the same work in substantially the same way and accomplish substantially the same results, they are the same; and so, also, if the parts of two machines, having the same mode of operation, do the same work in substantially the same way, and accomplish substantially the same result, these parts are the same, although they may differ in name, form, or shape."

The invention of Dorsey consists of a rake with its arm attached by a pivot to a shaft, with which it revolves, and so that it will rise and fall as the arm passes along the surface of a cam by which this latter movement is regulated and controlled. It operates with a continuous revolution, descending with the inclination of the cam in front of the cutter-bar, thence sweeping backward in the arc of a circle to the rear of the platform, where it is elevated by the cam to clear the frame of the machine, and passing again to the front, repeats the movement. Its functions are to descend into the standing grain in front of the cutter, thus separating the grain which is to form the next gavel, to draw or gather it to the cutter, and when cut, on to the platform, and then to sweep it across the platform in the arc of a circle, and to discharge it on the ground out of the way of the return of the machine in cutting its next swarth. These are the characteristic features of the invention.

Now the alleged infringing devices embodied in the defendants' machines, "have substantially the same mode of operation, do the same work in substantially the same way, and accomplish substantially the same results" as those claimed by the complainants. In the defendants' machine is to be observed a rake head with an arm attached to a crown-wheel or head with which it revolves, and to which it is pivotally connected, so that it will rise and fall under the guidance and control of a cam-way. It revolves continuously, descending into the grain in front of the cutter, separating the gavel, gathering it to the cutter and traversing the platform in the arc of a circle, discharges the grain in the rear by a side delivery, out of the way of the return of the machine, and then rising, clears the machine and renews the operation. It is obvious then, that the functions and mode of operation of both devices are substantially the same. In their construction the differences are formal rather than substantial. Instead of a vertical post, the shaft and head of which are of one piece and revolve together, to which the rake-arm is attached, as in the Dorsey invention, the defendants employ a vertical iron shaft which passes through the centre of a metal head, to which the rake-arm is attached, and which revolves around this shaft instead of with it, but the mode of operation and the results accomplished by both devices are the same. In Dorsey's drawings and model a diametrical rake-arm is shown; in the defendants' machine the rake-arm is radial, but both are pivoted at the same point to the central revolving head, and are alike guided and governed by the cam in their rising and falling movement. The defendants use a cam formed in the segment of a circle while Dorsey's cam is a complete circle; but I think the part of the latter at its lowest inclination where the defendants' cam is open, exerts no essential agency in guiding the rake in its traverse on the platform, and that, therefore, the difference in form between the two is immaterial.

Upon the whole case, I am of opinion the complainant is entitled to a decree, but it ought to be so framed as not to subject the defendants to any avoidable loss or injury. The complainant is not a manufacturer of reaping machines, so far as appears, and will be adequately protected by the payment of a just compensation for the use of the Dorsey invention. The defendants have an extensive establishment and a large capital invested in it for the manufacture of machines, and seem to have conducted their business under the impression that it was no invasion of the rights of others. A sudden stoppage of it would be disastrous to them, and would not benefit the complainant.

A decree will, therefore, be entered for an injunction and an account, but no injunction will issue until the further order of the court, if the defendants within thirty days from the date of this decree, file a bond in such form and amount, and with such security, as the court or a judge thereof may approve, to secure to the complainants the profits and damages which they may ultimately be decreed to pay.

George Harding, Esq., for complainants.
David Wright, Esq., for respondents.

JOHN M. MARIS et al. v. THE UNION PASSENGER RAILWAY COMPANY.

1. The act of March 13th, 1873, enabling the Union Passenger Railway Company to lay tracks on Market street, is constitutional.
2. The use of the streets of municipal corporations are subject to the control of the Legislature.
3. Consequential damage is not within the prohibition against taking private property for public use without compensation.

Opinion by ALLISON, J. Delivered May 3d, 1873.

The bill in this case is filed by a large number of persons, who state that they are citizens, tax-payers, and some of them owners and occupants, and all of them occupants of premises, situate either upon Market street or upon Front street, in the city of Philadelphia.

They pray that the Union Passenger Railway Company may be restrained by injunction, from constructing an extended line of their railway upon Market street, between Ninth street and Front street, and connecting the line of their proposed tracks by a loop at and extending into Front street.

The defendants propose to make such extension of their railway, under the authority of an act of the Legislature of this State, approved the 13th day of March, 1873, which in its title and enacting clauses, read as follows:

"A further supplement to an act to incorporate the Union Passenger Railway Company of Philadelphia, approved April 8th, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four, authorizing said company to extend their railway into and lay double tracks on Market street, from Front street to Ninth street, in the city of Philadelphia, to connect the new tracks with their present railway, to cross and intersect other railways at grade, to connect the new tracks with their present track by a curve or curves, and to connect with other railways without the consent of the councils of said city."

"Whereas, the interests of the public demand that no corporation should have the monopoly of carrying passengers over the streets of a city between points which require the advantages of competition.

"SECTION 1. That in addition to the powers and franchises heretofore granted to the Union Passenger Railway Company of Philadelphia, the said corporation shall have the following rights, privileges and franchises, to wit: To lay a double track of railway and railroad on Market street, in the city of Philadelphia, from any point or points west of the eastern curb of Front street to any point or points east of the western curb of Ninth street, in said city; to connect both of said double tracks with the present railway of said corporation now laid on Seventh street and on Ninth street, in said city; to cross all railways and railroads now or hereafter to be laid on Market street, between Front street and Ninth street, at grade, and to intersect the same at grade; to run the cars of said corporation and to carry passengers along and over the route hereby authorized; to remove the cobble-stones and beds of highways as may be necessary for the laying of the tracks hereby authorized; to put in said tracks all necessary loops, curves, frogs, and switches to connect the two tracks hereby authorized to be laid with a curve or curves, and to do all other things useful and necessary for extending the present route and railway of said corporation from Ninth street to Front street on said Market street.

"SECT. 2. The powers hereby granted may be exercised without the consent of the councils of the city of Philadelphia, and all laws and ordinances inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed."

The prayer for injunction rests on two grounds: First, that the act of March 13th, 1873, contains more than one subject, and that the same is not clearly expressed in its title. And second, that the occupancy of Market street, between Ninth and Front streets, by two additional passenger railway tracks, will seriously impair the usefulness and convenience of the street for business and commercial purposes; and that it is not competent for the Legislature to authorize such abridgment of access to the premises of complainants.

We are of the opinion that the exception taken to the act for the cause first assigned is not well taken. The title professes to give authority among the other powers enumerated to connect with other railways; in the body of the act no such right is given, unless it be held to apply to the other railways of the defendants on Seventh and Ninth streets; this power had already been recited in the title, and is given in the first section. But to the recital objected to is added the additional clause, "without the consent of the councils of the city;" it may, therefore, be regarded as a repetition of the power of making connection with Seventh and Ninth streets railways, but with the added privilege of doing it independently of the consent of councils. It does not of necessity follow that the words "other railways" must be interpreted to mean railways that do not belong to the defendants; such a meaning could be given to them, but we are to maintain the act if it can be done; and where two interpretations can be given, one for and the other against it, it is our duty to accept the one which will uphold the law rather than that upon which it is sought to be overthrown. But if the entire strength of the position of the complainants be conceded to them, we are not prepared to say that the objection ought to prevail.

The second ground upon which the prayer for relief by injunction rests, is more clearly untenable than the first. In the case of the Philadelphia and Trenton Railroad Company, 6 Wharton, 25, the law was so clearly and soundly stated that it has remained unshaken by subsequent decision ever since. In Pennsylvania, highways are the property of the people of the whole State, who may dispose of them by their representatives at their pleasure. Over them, Judge Gibson remarks, the State holds despotic sway; nor is there any difference between the streets of a municipality, and common roads and highways. The public sovereignty over them is universal, where such sovereignty is not excluded by legislative grant; and though streets may be placed under corporate regulations in certain respects, yet they are subject to the paramount authority of the Legislature, in the regulation of their use by carriages, rail-cars, or other means of locomotion yet to be invented. Upon this broad and comprehensive doctrine, the court rests the denial of the claim of the individual citizen to compensation under the constitutional prohibition against taking private property for public use, for anything which falls short of an actual taking. Matters of annoyance and inconvenience are not within the constitutional interdict; they say it consists in the obstruction of the right of passage which is personal, or in a depreciation of the value of property, by decreasing the enjoyment of it, but no part of it is taken from the owner. And though the State usually compensated consequential damages, it is of favor not of right. For such compensation the citizen must depend on the forecast and justice of the Legislature.

This is the established law of Pennsylvania, too well settled, we believe, ever to be shaken by judicial authority. What then becomes of the complainants' assignment of annoyance and partial deprivation of the enjoyment of their property for business purposes? We are compelled to say that it is no reason for granting the injunction for which they pray; it is a hardship which the law places upon them and for which it affords no remedy; certainly none that a court of equity can grant in the manner in which it is here brought.

The Legislature having, therefore, absolute dominion over Market street, except as they had in part stripped themselves of it by previous grant to the Market street railway company, the right of the defendants to lay their road upon the street, under their grant from the Legislature, cannot be questioned, provided it is done in such a way as not to interfere with the corporate franchises of the Market street company, with which the plaintiffs have no concern. We are, therefore, required to dissolve, and do hereby dissolve, the injunction heretofore granted at the instance of the plaintiffs.

THE MARKET STREET PASSENGER RAILWAY v. THE UNION PASSENGER RAILWAY COMPANY.

1. The right of the Union Railway to cross and intersect the tracks of the Market Street Railway, is limited to only such crossings as are absolutely necessary.
2. An express grant to one road to cross and recross another at pleasure, without necessity to justify it, is an infringement of corporate franchises which the Legislature has no right to make.
3. Necessity will not justify such a grant without making provision for compensation.

Opinion by ALLISON, P. J. Delivered May 3d, 1873.

The views briefly expressed in the foregoing opinion, are, in part, applicable to the present case. There is, indeed, but one material point upon which they differ—that relates to the alleged interference with the chartered rights of the plaintiff. The ground of complaint under that head is that defendants propose to lay their track upon and across the track of the plaintiff; the affidavit of the surveyor shows that 178 feet of the track of the complainants' road will be traversed by the track of the defendants' road, each using their separate track, including rails, frogs, &c.; but this, it is charged, is to superimpose another road, to the extent of 178 feet on the Market street railway; that no such power is expressly given by the act of 1873, and that, therefore, no such right has been attempted to be conferred, and if given, could only be exercised after making compensation.

A reference to the act shows that it is declared to be a right of the defendants to cross all railways and railroads, now or hereafter to be laid on Market street, between Ninth and Front streets, at grade, and to intersect the same at grade.

The plan submitted by the defendants, showing the track of the proposed extension of their road, has been approved by the board of surveyors, and it is there made to appear that the proposed crossings or intersecting of the railway of the plaintiffs, by that of the defendants, by curves and by obtuse angles, are seven in number. This, we think, cannot be done. First, because we do not interpret the right to cross and intersect other roads to mean a general and unlimited right to cross, but only such crossing as is absolutely necessary to enable the defendants to build their road on Market street. Now the plan shows that no such necessity exists; that there is room on each side of the plaintiffs' tracks for the tracks of the proposed road, and there is, therefore, no absolute need of interference with the roadway of the plaintiffs; this, as we take it, is not a question of convenience merely, but one of necessity. If a necessity be shown, and the right is clear, however great the hardship, the hardship must be endured. Nor can this claim of right to cross be at all likened to the crossing of other roads at the intersections of streets, or the use of the track by vehicles; for every corporation that accepts a grant to lay a railway in a street, takes it with the clear, though it may be an implied condition, that it is to be subject to such use; by such a grant, there is taken from the public only so much use of the highway as is necessary for the proper working of the road; every other privilege which belonged to the public, remains unaffected by the grant. But in the second place we are of the opinion, that an express grant to one road to cross and recross another at pleasure, without necessity to justify it, is an infringement of the corporate franchises, which the Legislature have no right to grant; nor is it conceded that a necessity will even justify it without making provision in either case, for compensation for injury to such corporate franchises.

This doctrine was sustained in 5 Green, 72, Jersey City R. R. v. Jersey City Horse R. R., where the rails were continuously used for the business of the defendants. Here it is a continuous use of the bed of plaintiffs' road, and a continuous obstruction of the track. For the same general doctrine see also 32 Barber, 358, 45 Baker, 138. It is approved by Judge Redfield, in his Law of Railways, vol. 1, page 541, sections 6, 13, 646. At page 638, he says he had no doubt the company building the track must be regarded as having a property in it. Such tracks must be regarded in the nature of private property, and that it cannot in any proper sense be regarded as devoted by the makers to public use. And in Grover v. Powel, 21 Stockton, 211, it was held that a partial destruction or diminution of the value of corporate franchises is a taking of private property.

The right in this case to cross seven times, carries with it the right to cross seventy times, whereby the value of the road of the plaintiffs, which they hold under contract with the State, would be to a great extent destroyed. For it will not be forgotten that the charter of the plaintiffs stands not alone in the doctrine recognized in the Dartmouth College Case, that the grant as a pure donation of corporate franchise, accepted by the grantees, is a binding contract; there was a money consideration paid for it, in the purchase of the omnibus line, under direction of the Legislature, and a further outlay of money, annually expended, for paving the streets upon which the railway is laid. But there is a third reason for restraining the defendants from building their road in the manner proposed; the act does not in terms even give the right to cross the track of the plaintiffs as it is now constructed. It reads railways and railroads now or hereafter to be laid on Market street. This act must be read as it was passed, without punctuation, and certainly without supplying words necessary to make clear the right claimed by the defendants. If it read now laid or hereafter to be laid, this point would not arise; but the punctuation and the word laid have been omitted, and it speaks, literally interpreted, of railroads and railways now to be laid, or thereafter to be laid. This probably was not the intention of the draftsman of the act, but in a charter we look to the letter of the law alone; no grant of corporate power can be taken, unless it be by plain words or by necessary implication, especially where such power trenches on individual or corporate rights previously acquired. Com. v. Erie & N. E. Railroad Company, 3 Casey, 351. Upon the question of the right to construct the loop at Front street, we are with the defendants, but for the reasons assigned the injunction is continued.

SECT. 52. To the University of Pennsylvania, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, upon condition that it shall raise the sum of one hundred thousand dollars in addition thereto; the entire appropriation to be expended in the erection of a general hospital in connection with said institution, in which at least two hundred beds, free for persons injured, shall be forever maintained: Provided, That no portion of the State appropriation to said university shall be paid by the State treasurer before the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, and until satisfactory evidence is furnished to the auditor general and State treasurer, upon the oath or affirmation of the proper persons, that the required subscription of one hundred thousand dollars has been subscribed and paid in, or secured to be paid by subscription, to said university.

SECT. 59. For the pay of the expenses of the Constitutional Convention, including the pay of the members, clerks and officers thereof, and the printing therefor, the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be settled by the auditor general; and the amount of the salaries of the members and clerks, and the pay of the officers and employees thereof, shall be fixed by the said Constitutional Convention, and the money shall be paid by the State treasurer, on the warrant of the president of the said convention, countersigned by the chief clerk of the convention; and any statute inconsistent herewith be and the same is hereby repealed.

SECT. 62. For the expenses of three commissioners to represent the commonwealth of Pennsylvania at the Vienna Exposition, the sum of six thousand dollars, or two thousand dollars each; said commissioners to be designated by the governor, from those appointed under joint resolution, approved March 19th, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three; the amount herein appropriated to be paid said commissioners when so designated by the governor: Provided, Said commissioners shall be required to proceed to Vienna on or before the first day of May next, and make report to the governor by the first of December next, of all such matters as may be of interest to the citizens of the commonwealth.

General Appropriation Bill. Approved April 9th, 1873.

An act to provide for the incorporation of iron and steel manufacturing companies.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, &c., That when any three or more persons may desire to form a company, under the provisions of this act, for the purpose of making iron or steel, or of manufacturing iron or steel in any shape or form, either of these metals exclusively, or in combination with other metals or with wood, and shall have subscribed as capital stock for that purpose, a sum not less than twenty thousand dollars, and actually paid in to such person or persons as they may have appointed to receive the same, ten per centum of the capital stock so subscribed, it shall and may be lawful for them to prepare a certificate in writing, in which shall be stated the corporate name of said company, and the amount of the capital stock thereof, the number and value of the shares into which said stock has been divided, the amount of stock subscribed, the amount actually paid in and to whom paid, the names and residence of the subscribers, and the number of shares subscribed by each, the name of the county in which the chief operations of the company are to be carried on, and the names of the president and directors who shall manage the affairs of said company until the next election, which shall be signed and verified by the affidavit of the president and directors therein named.

SECT. 2. That the said certificate shall be filed in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth, who shall enter thereon the date of the filing of the same, and submit it to the attorney general of the commonwealth for examination; and if the attorney general shall find the certificate to be properly drawn, signed, and acknowledged, according to the provisions of this act, then the secretary of the com monwealth shall cause a true copy thereof to be recorded at length in a suitable book to be kept in his office for that purpose, and the governor shall issue letters patent under the great seal of the commonwealth, declaring the subscribers to the stock of said company, and those who may thereafter become subscribers or holders of the said stock, to be a body politic and corporate, in fact and in law, by the name, style, and title stated in the certificate as aforesaid.

SECT. 3. That every such company shall have power to make and use a common or corporate seal, and to change, alter, or amend the same at pleasure, and by their corporate name shall be competent in law to sue and be sued in any court of this commonwealth; and they shall have power to make and establish such rules, regulations, and by-laws, not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of this commonwealth, as they may deem necessary or convenient for the government of the corporation and for conducting or managing their business, providing for the election or appointment of a treasurer and secretary, and such other officers and agents as the business of the company may require.

SECT. 4. That the capital stock of every such company shall consist of not less than twenty thousand dollars, nor more than one million dollars, and shall be divided into shares of not more than one hundred dollars each; and all subscriptions to the capital stock shall be paid in such instalments, and at such times as the directors may require; and if default be made in any payment, the person or persons in default shall be liable to pay, in addition to the amount so called for and unpaid, at the rate of one per centum per month for the delay of such payment, and the directors may cause suit to be brought for the recovery of the amount due, together with the penalty of one per centum per month as aforesaid; and no stockholder shall be entitled to vote at any election, or at any meeting of the stockholders, on whose share or shares any instalment or arrearages may have been due and unpaid for the period of thirty days immediately preceding such election or meeting. The shares of the capital stock of every such company may be transferred on the books of the company, in person or by attorney, subject to such regulations as the by-laws may prescribe. The amount of the capital stock may be increased or diminished at any general election or special meeting of the stockholders, by a vote of two-thirds of all the shares of the stock held by such company: Provided, Every such increase or diminution shall be certified by the president and secretary, within thirty days, to the secretary of the commonwealth and to the auditor general.

SECT. 5. That the business of every such company shall be managed by the president and board of directors, who shall be selected annually by stockholders from among their number, at such time and in such manner as the by-laws may prescribe, and shall continue in office until their successors are duly chosen: Provided, The board of directors shall not consist of less than three members, including the president, and a majority of the board shall be citizens of this commonwealth. All elections by the stockholders shall be by ballot, and every share of stock shall entitle the holder thereof to one vote in person or by proxy.

SECT. 6. That every such company shall have the right to purchase, lease, hold, mortgage, and sell real estate and mineral rights, to prove and open mines, to mine and prepare for market, or for their own use and consumption, iron ore and other minerals, and to erect and construct furnaces, forges, mills, foundries, manufactories, and such other improvements and erections as they may deem necessary, and to manufacture iron and steel, in all shapes and forms, either of these metals exclusively, or in combination with other metals, or with wood, and to transport all of said articles, or any of them, to market, and to dispose of the same, and to do all such other acts and things as a successful and convenient prosecution of said business may require: Provided, They shall not at any one time have more than five thousand acres of land within this commonwealth, including leased lands.

SECT. 7. That every such company may make and issue bonds, with or without coupons attached, bearing interest not exceeding eight per centum per annum, and sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of the same, upon such terms and conditions as they may deem advisable; and such bonds and the interest thereon may be secured by a mortgage or mortgages upon the corporate franchises, real and leasehold estate: Provided, They shall not issue bonds for a greater sum than three times the amount of the capital stock paid in.

SECT. 8. That every company incorporated under the provisions of this act, shall pay into the treasury of the commonwealth, a bonus of one quarter of one per centum upon the original amount of the capital stock, and upon any increase thereof, in five equal annual instalments, and such taxes as are or may be required by law; and the stockholders shall only be individually liable for debts due to the laborers for services, and in that case for no period exceeding six months.

SECT. 9. That the president and directors of every such company shall annually lay before the stockholders a full and complete statement of the business and affairs of the company, for the preceding year; and it shall also be their duty to make report to the auditor general annually, at such time and in such form as he may prescribe, of the operations of the company for the preceding year, to the end that he may ascertain the amount of tax due by said company to the commonwealth; and such report shall be verified by the oaths or affirmations of the president and treasurer of such company; and any such company which shall neglect or refuse, for sixty days after notice given, to report to the auditor general as aforesaid, shall be liable to a penalty of five hundred dollars, for the use of the commonwealth, to be sued for and recovered as debts of like amount are or may be by law recoverable.

SECT. 10. That whenever any persons, forming a company under the provisions of this act, shall state, in the certificate required by the first section of said act, that they are willing that the stockholders shall be individually liable for all debts of the company, as fully as if they were members of a partnership, then, and in that event, the stockholders of such company, whether holding the certificates of stock in their own name, or being the parties beneficially interested therein, shall be jointly and severally liable, in their individual capacities and estates, for all debts, contracts, or other liabilities of the company, contracted or incurred during the time such stockholders respectively own their stock, or are beneficially interested therein: Provided, That all companies incorporated under this act, upon the condition aforesaid, and whose stockholders shall thereby assume such individual liabilities as aforesaid, shall be subject to only one-half the taxation now or hereafter imposed by the laws of this commonwealth upon such incorporated companies.

SECT. 11. That it shall and may be lawful, for any corporation organized under this act, to appropriate any stream or streams, spring or springs, flowing through or along, or rising upon any lands belonging to and owned by such corporation, in the vicinity of their works, for the purpose of supplying the same with steam or water power, upon the said corporation filing, in the office of the prothonotary of the Court of Common Pleas of the county in which such works may be located, a draft or drafts, showing the stream or streams, spring or springs, which may have been appropriated for the purposes aforesaid; whereupon it shall not be lawful for any other corporation or individual, to divert or use the water of any stream or streams, spring or springs, thus appropriated, so as to diminish the usual accustomed and natural flow thereof: Provided, That every corporation thus appropriating any stream or streams, spring or springs, shall, after using the waters of the same for their manufacturing necessities, return the same into the usual and accustomed channel, whereby the waters of such stream or streams, or spring or springs, have theretofore been accustomed to flow off or along the lands of such corporation.

SECT. 12. The incorporation of any association of persons, under the provisions of this act, shall be held and taken to be of the same force and effect as if the powers and privileges conferred, and the duties enjoined, had been conferred and enjoined by special act of the Legislature; and the franchises granted shall be construed according to the same rules of law and equity as if it had been created by special charter, and no modification or repeal of this act will affect any franchise obtained under the provisions of the same.

SECT. 13. That it shall and may be lawful for any incorporated company of this commonwealth, to subscribe and take shares of stock in any company incorporated under the provisions of this act, or to purchase the bonds or stock, or guarantee the payment of said bonds and the interest thereon, or either principal or interest.

SECT. 14. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act, be and the same are hereby repealed, so far as they may relate to or affect any company incorporated under the provisions of this act, or the stockholders of any such company: Provided, This shall not apply to laws imposing taxes upon such corporations.

Approved March 21st, 1873.

An act to increase the pay of jurors in this commonwealth.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act the pay of jurors in this commonwealth shall be two dollars a day, with mileage as now allowed by law: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply where the pay of jurors is now fixed by law at more than two dollars per day.

Approved February 28th, A. D. 1873.

An act to facilitate the settlement of estates of decedents.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That where moneys or other estate of a decedent have been or shall be attached in the hands of executors or administrators, the garnishee may, after the third term, apply by petition to the court out of which the attachment issued, asking the court to grant a rule on the plaintiff and defendant to appear and show cause why the attachment shall not be proceeded in within such time as the court may order and direct; and upon hearing had, it shall be lawful for the court, upon neglect or refusal of the plaintiff to proceed as required to make an order on the record discharging the garnishee and the property in his hands from all liability for such debt or demand: Provided, That this act shall not apply where the property sought to be attached shall not be yet due and payable by the garnishee.

Approved February 28th, A. D. 1873.

A supplement to an act providing for the taking of game.

SECT. 1 Be it enacted, &c., That the true intent and meaning of section eight of an act approved the twenty-first day of April, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and sixty-nine, entitled "An act providing for the taking of game," is, that the same applies to the trapping or snaring, in any manner, of any bird or birds mentioned in said section, subject, however, to the proviso therein contained.

Approved March 12th, A. D. 1873.

An act to authorize railroad corporations to secure the payment of their bonds and obligations by a mortgage upon their property, rights, and franchises.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for any railroad corporation of this commonwealth to secure the payment of any and all bonds and obligations which they have heretofore made and issued, or may hereafter make and issue, by a mortgage bearing a rate of interest not exceeding seven per centum per annum upon the whole or any part of their property, rights and franchises, subject to any prior incumbrances thereon: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to empower any railroad company to issue bonds in excess of the capital stock actually paid in.

Approved March 13th, A. D. 1873.

An act authorizing assignees of insurance policies to sue in their own name.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the assignee or assignees of the whole or any part of any policy of life, fire, or marine insurance, his executors or administrators, to bring suit, in the name of the assignee or assignees, for his, her, or their interest in any policy of insurance, against the company issuing the same, upon the happening of the contingency provided against.

Approved March 14th, A. D. 1873.

THE LATE CHIEF JUSTICE.

In the United States Circuit Court shortly before 3 o'clock, on Wednesday, District Attorney McMichael came into court and addressed his honor, Judge Cadwalader, saying:

"It is my painful duty to announce to the court the death of the chief justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Intelligence has reached this city that he expired this morning. His long and honorable career of public service is a matter of familiar history. As governor of Ohio, senator of the United States, and secretary of the treasury at a time when our finances needed the greatest skill in their management, he displayed such distinguished ability as gave him a national reputation. In the still more important position which he held at the time of his death, his high qualities have been equally conspicuous. He was learned, able, and just, and although for some time past impaired in health by disease, his strong intellect rose superior to his physical infirmities and enabled him to continue in the discharge of his judicial duties. His death will be mourned by the profession which he adorned, and the country which he so faithfully served."

Judge Cadwalader said he fully subscribed to the remarks of the district attorney, and without repeating what had been so well said, he would add that the opinions of Chief Justice Chase displayed a degree of ability rarely equalled.

In respect to the memory of the chief justice, he adjourned the court, and directed a minute of these proceedings to be entered upon the record.

HUGH NELSON McALLISTER,

One of the delegates at large to the Constitutional Convention now sitting in this city, died Monday morning last, at 4.30 o'clock, in the 65th year of his age. The deceased delegate was chairman of the committee on election, suffrage and representation, and a member of the committee on railroads and canals. He was a native of Juniata county, Pennsylvania. After graduating at Jefferson College, Cannonsburg, where he received the highest honors of his class, he finished his studies at the law school at Dickinson College, and soon after commenced the practice of the law in Bellefonte, where he rapidly rose to distinction in his profession, and where in the latter part of his life he was regarded as the leader of the bar in the part of the State in which he practiced. His great energy of character, unquestioned integrity, and large public spirit were well known.

As one of the original projectors of the Farmers' Agricultural College of Pennsylvania, and a member of its board of trustees, he devoted much of his time and means to that institution, and materially assisted to insure its present great success. He was also for many years a leading member and elder of the Presbyterian Church. Though frequently solicited to accept official position, the deceased never would consent to be a candidate for public office, and only came to the convention from the highest sense of his duty to the State of which he was a citizen. As an advocate of real and judicious reforms, and particularly as chairman of the election committee, his zeal and fidelity were conspicuous, and the unusual and severe strain thus imposed upon an already impaired constitution, evidently hastened his death. The deceased leaves a widow and two daughters, both of whom are married and reside at Bellefonte.

It was our fortune to be associated with Mr. McAllister, upon both of the committees of which he was a member, and we can testify to the indomitable energy of character, the thorough earnestness of purpose, and the perfect straightforwardness he evinced in the performance of the duties allotted to him. In his death, the convention loses a trustworthy and valuable member.

INTERESTING TO STUDENTS.

The District Court and Court of Common Pleas of this city, have approved the following course of study submitted by the board of examiners for applicants for admission as attorneys.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

REPORTS OF CASES DECIDED IN THE CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS OF THE UNITED STATES, FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT; embracing Cases at Law, civil and criminal, in Equity, Admiralty and Bankruptcy, and cases on appeal from the American Consular and Ministerial Courts in China and Japan. Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Counsellor at Law. Volume 1, 8vo., pp. xiii., 786. San Francisco, A. L. Bancroft & Co., Publishers, Booksellers and Stationers, 1873. Received from the Publishers.

This is the first volume of a series of reports of cases in the United States courts of the Pacific coast. It will, of course, be a necessity to all practitioners in the various Federal courts throughout the country. Independent of its being needed to complete sets of United States reports, it is intrinsically valuable, as containing a great many important and useful cases. In another column, we publish some of the head notes of the cases reported in the volume, from which our readers can judge themselves of the value of Sawyer's Reports. The book itself is gotten up in the usual style of Messrs. Bancroft & Co., well printed, well bound, and altogether a highly creditable production.

LA REVUE CRITIQUE DE LÉGISLATION ET DE JURISPRUDENCE DU CANADA, for April, 1873.

The present number of this excellent quarterly contains an article on the Navigation Laws of Canada, by D. Girouard; one by J. C. Hatton, on Foreign Marriages, and one by S. Pagnuelo, entitled "Législation à Québec." The Review also contains a collection of head notes of recent Quebec and other Canada decisions, as well as of New Brunswick, St. Lucia and English cases. It is well worth reading.

Recent Decisions.

UNITED STATES COURTS.

[Head notes of cases reported in 1st Sawyer's Reports, 9th (California) Circuit—Received from A. L. Bancroft & Co., Publishers, San Francisco.]

ABSCONDING DEBTOR.

1. An absconding debtor is one who is about to leave the State, either openly or secretly, with intent to hinder, delay or defraud his creditors of their just debts. Norman v. Manciette, 484.

2. A debtor who is about to remove from this State without the consent of his creditors, and without a mind to return, is presumed to be acting with such intent, and prima facie is an absconding debtor. Id.

3. The Legislature has power to authorize the arrest and imprisonment of such a debtor, so as to enable his creditors to enforce the establishment and collection of their debts by legal proceedings in the tribunals of this State. Id.

ADMIRALTY.

The lien of domestic material men will be enforced against proceeds in the registry in preference to the demand of a subsequent mortgagee of the vessel, notwithstanding that since the repeal of the 12th rule in admiralty, such liens cannot be enforced in this court by a proceeding in rem., nor in the State courts by any proceeding which involves the exercise of admiralty jurisdiction. Francis v. Barque Harrison, 353.

1. An appeal, or writ of error, in the name of a steamboat, or any other than that of a human being, or some corporate or associated aggregation of persons, cannot be sustained. Steamer Spark v. Lee Choi Chum, 713.

2. So, also, appeals in the name of a firm without stating the names of the individuals composing the firm, are nugatory. Id.

BANKRUPTCY.

An adjudication in bankruptcy relates to the filing of the petition, and works a dissolution of an attachment before then levied upon the bankrupt's goods from that date. Zeiber v. Hill, 268.

In a petition in bankruptcy, the debt and the act of bankruptcy constitute the cause of action, and the defence thereto may go to either or both of these matters, but if there are several defences they must be separately pleaded. In re Ouimette, 47.

1. A payment or other disposition of property by a debtor after petition in bankruptcy filed against him, is not a preference within the meaning of sections 23, 35 and 39 of the bankrupt act, but simply an unlawful meddling with the property of the assignee, and therefore a nullity. In re Randall, 56.

2. Objection to the proof of debt must be made by the assignee, unless the court for cause otherwise directs. Id.

ALABAMA.

[Head notes of decisions of the Supreme Court of Alabama, rendered at January Term, 1873. Received from John W. Watts, Esq., State Reporter.]

CONFESSION.

PECK, C. J.—1. Before a confession can be received as evidence in a criminal case, it must be shown to be voluntary. If obtained by operating on the hopes or fears of the prisoner, it ought to be rejected.

2. Where a negro boy eighteen years old, of ordinary intelligence, is in custody on a charge of burglary, if the person with whom he has been living for about two years, says to him: "Tom, this is mighty bad; they have got 'the dead wood' on you, and you will be convicted;" and at the same time says something about "owning up," and further: "that he could have nothing to do with any one who had acted so badly, and if he had anything to say as to his helping him in the difficulty, to do so;" and if the prosecutor also says to him: "You are very young to be in such a difficulty, there must have been some one with you who was older, and I, if in your place, would tell who it is, that it is not right for you to suffer the whole penalty, and let some one who is guiltier go free, that it may go lighter with you;" and thereupon he makes a confession, it ought to be rejected as involuntary, and improperly obtained. Newman v. The State.

CONSIDERATION.

SAFFOLD, J.—The consideration of a promissory note given for borrowed money, is not the check on a bank by which it is to be drawn, but the money obtained by the borrower, and when this money was Confederate currency, the note is without consideration in a suit upon it by the payee against the maker. Whitfield v. Tulford.

MARRIAGE.

PETERS, J.—The contract of marriage in this State is indissoluble by agreement of the parties, and can only be dissolved by divorce or by death, or to a certain extent by the exceptions to prosecution for bigamy. (Con. Ala. 1867, article 4. § 30; Rev. Code §§ 2357, 2599, 3600.) McConnice v. The State.

TOURNAMENTS.

SAFFOLD, J.—1. At a tournament held by an agricultural association during one of its annual fairs, the most successful knight was to receive a prize of $400, to be awarded by judges who were to decide upon their own observation, and information given by heralds.

2. Such awards are in the nature of awards at common law, and should be governed by the same rules in respect to setting them aside.

3. If the judges, or arbitrators, having made an award, reverse it and make another the same evening or the next morning, before their duties can be reasonably said, under the circumstances, to have terminated, the latter is their award.

4. The judges, in making their awards as to the skill and address of the knights, are not at liberty to examine any witnesses except such as were charged with the duty of ascertaining the facts, nor should the court do so in a suit brought on the award.

5. When the judgment cannot be different, this court will not reverse for errors committed.—Alabama Agricultural Association v. Trimble.

UNSTAMPED INSTRUMENT.

PETERS, J.—Where there is no charge of a fraudulent purpose to evade the revenue law of the United States, a failure to affix the proper stamp to an instrument, at the time it is signed and issued, does not render the instrument void; but it cannot be used as evidence in any court, until a legal stamp or stamps denoting the amount of tax shall have been affixed thereto, as prescribed by law. (14 U. S. Stats. at Large, p. 98 and §§ 158, 163; also pamphlet acts of Congress, 1871-72, p. 245, No. 205, § 36.) Miller v. Underwood.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

[The following are abstracts of the opinions of the judges in the case of Screws v. Ragland, involving the consideration of the recent political troubles in Alabama.]

PECK, C. J.—1. Every officer who, by the constitution or laws of the State, is required to be elected by the people, derives his right to the office by his election, and the evidence of his election in the first place usually is the certificate of the proper officer, or if he is an officer who by the constitution or laws is required to be commissioned by the governor, then, his commission is the evidence. This evidence, the certificate or commission, is not conclusive, but prima facie evidence only, which may be overcome or destroyed by better evidence, to wit: by the judgment of a competent court, if he is an executive or judicial officer; if a legislative officer, a senator or representative of the General Assembly, then, such evidence is the determination of the legislative body of which he claims to be a member, to wit: The Senate or House of Representatives, declaring him to be, or not to be, a member of said body. Each house of the General Assembly is, by the constitution, made the sole judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members. (Act 4, § 6 of the Con.)

2. When, therefore, either house declares that a certain person is a member of its body, that is final and conclusive and no court can go behind it.

3. The Senate and House of Representatives each, since their organization under the proposal of the attorney general of the United States, made for that purpose, has declared that certain persons, who had one certificate of election, were elected by the people, and certain other persons, who had certificates of election, were not elected by the people; and the first named persons have been declared and recognized as members of the respective houses. This is conclusive upon us, and we have no power to review or revise what has thus been done. These persons, if elected by the qualified electors, were members of the General Assembly from the day of their election, and being members, then the two bodies who convened and organized at the court house in Montgomery, had a majority in both houses, and having such majority, when recognized by the governor, were a constitutional General Assembly, and were competent to do any act, as a General Assembly, except such acts as can only be done by a majority of two-thirds of the members of each house. They could elect a public printer or a senator to the Congress of the United States.

4. I do not regard it necessary that the General Assembly should convene and organize in the capitol building, neither the constitution nor any law of the State requires this. They are required to convene in Montgomery, not in the capitol building; nor in the organization is it necessary that the lieutenant governor, or the speaker be present. These officers preside—the lieutenant governor over the Senate, and the speaker over the House of Representatives—after they are organized, not necessarily before.

5. The statement of facts, in this case, settled and agreed upon by the parties, shows, that on the 10th day of December, 1872, after the bodies that convened and organized at the court house in Montgomery, claiming to be the General Assembly, was recognized by the governor, as the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, elected Arthur Bingham, the public printer of the State.

6. We hold, that notwithstanding the peculiar circumstances attending the meeting and organization of said bodies, and their recognition by the governor, said election was not void, but valid; and that as said Bingham has given his official bond, which was approved of by the governor, and has received a commission as public printer, &c.; he is to be regarded as the public printer of the State, and entitled to all the privileges and emoluments of said office, and authorized to discharge the duties of the same, consequently, the decision of the City Court denying the mandamus prayed for by the petitioner in his petitions, is free from error and must be affirmed at petitioner's cost.

PETERS, J.—I concur not only in the reasoning, but also in the conclusion of the opinion of the chief justice, which has just been read in this case.

1. The State printer is an officer elected by the General Assembly at the time appointed by law. That time had arrived when the election of Mr. Bingham was made in this case. After the election of the State printer by the General Assembly, he is required to give bond as prescribed by the statute, and to take the constitutional oath of office. (Rev. Code §§ 123, 127; Constitution of Ala., 1867, Art. xv., St.)

2. When this is done he becomes one of the executive officers of the State. And although he is not one of those officers specially required to be commissioned by the governor, yet the governor alone can approve his bond. And if as evidence of his approval and of the proper qualification of the officer so appointed to discharge the functions of his office, he is commissioned by the governor, this court cannot say that such commission has been inadvertently issued, and step in and aid the chief executive of the State in the manner of performing his duties, or perform them for him. (Rev. Code, §§ 148, 126.) We must presume that the governor knows his own duties and how to perform them; and that he would not approve the bond and commission any person as State printer, without the proper evidence of his appointment by the proper authority, and particularly when this is done during the session of the General Assembly and with their full knowledge; and while that body, having control for the time being of the sovereign power of the State, over the very question in controversy, acquiesces in such approval and commission.

3. When this is the case, the courts have no other alternative than to acquiesce also. This is necessarily so, at least until the General Assembly, which speaks the legislative mind of the people of the State, shall decide otherwise. Then it will become the duty of the governor and of this court to conform to this declaration of legislative will; otherwise a State printer may be made by this court against the will of the General Assembly and the commission of the governor. This is not a power vested in this tribunal. An office created and filled by the General Assembly is a revocable franchise given by statute. It may also be taken away or abolished by the statute, unless it is protected by a constitutional provision. (Perkins v. Corbin, 45 Alabama, 103.)

4. Such office is not a vested right which is above legislative control. Then in what way the Legislature shall bestow it, or in what manner that body shall put an end to it, is a matter over which they exercise the sole, unlimited, sovereign power. (45 Ala. 103, supra.) If I had much greater doubt about the regularity of the organization of the legislative body that elected Arthur Bingham State printer, on the 10th day of December last, than I do, I would still feel a very grave reluctance to declare such election void.

5. The constituent elements of the same body are still acting in the capacity of the General Assembly of this State, and they have not, and do not repudiate the election thus made. It is their affair. If they are content with it, they have the powe and the right to be so content. In this matter they alone speak the sovereign will, and in this they must be followed by the courts. No judgment of this court or any other, so long as they act within their constitutional limits, can reverse or interfere with their decisions.

6. In such a matter they are a law unto themselves. They are the sole judges of the thing to be done and the manner in which it should be done. Their action, however irregular it may be, when compared with former usages, is the law with them, and it is equally the law of this court. Until they choose to change their action it must be final with this tribunal. Courts cannot regulate Legislatures, but Legislatures can regulate courts. It is the duty of the courts, so far as they can, to find out the legislative will and to follow it in their judgments. Guided by this maxim, I can do no more than to concur with the venerable chief justice of this court in declaring Arthur Bingham State printer, until it is the will of the General Assembly to determine otherwise. The legislative body may make mistakes. They may do wrong. They may commit what the over fastidious may pronounce serious blunders. They are but men, and humanity is never, in a legislative sense, infalliable. But this court can only interfere to control their mistakes, should such mistakes occur, when they involve a disregard of some constitutional restraint or limitation of their powers in this enactment of a law. Beyond this, courts cannot go. Non nastrum est tantus componere lites. (See Challefaux et al. v. Ducharnei et al., Wis. 554; Kottam et al. v. Ayer, 3 Strob, 92; Drake ex rel. v. Mahany, 137 Mich. 481; The State v. Johnson, 17 Ark. 407; Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, and Luther v. Borders, Haw. U. S. R. 1, et seq.)

7. The judgment of the court below is free from error and should be affirmed.

SAFFOLD, J.—I concur with the chief justice in the following propositions:

1. That it is not indispensable to the organization and existence of the General Assembly that it should meet in the capitol, or be presided over in the Senate by the lieutenant-governor, and in the House of Representatives by the speaker, or to be recognized by the governor.

2. That the members thereof derive their authority to act as such from their election by the people, and not otherwise.

3. But I maintain that there are cases in which there is no General Assembly, notwithstanding a majority of each house may meet at a time and place appointed by law, and organize and assume to be the General Assembly; and that the present is such a case.

4. We know now who are entitled as members thereof to compose the General Assembly, because it has been ascertained by an undoubted General Assembly. It appears from the finding that the prior assemblage at the capitol lacked the indispensable requisite of a General Assembly, to wit: a majority of the members of each house. This was the only defect of that assemblage, either in form or substance. But it is vital and fatal to its claim to be the General Assembly.

5. The assemblage at the United States court room, lacking every mere form in its organization, had, as has been subsequently ascertained, a majority of the duly elected members of each house. In refusing to attend at the capitol, and in organizing at another place, its members staked their defence upon the truth of their claim to be a majority of each house. The result of a proper investigation vindicated this claim, and prevented the other body from constituting the General Assembly. Necessity is a law. But the validity of acts, dependent alone upon it, fails, if there was not the necessity. The court house assemblage might have been held to have been the Legislature, if nothing else had transpired within a reasonable time.

6. Appeal was made by each claimant to the President of the United States for recognition. One body was meditating the impeachment of the governor for refusing to recognize it, and both were proceeding to declare vacant the seats of members who belonged to the other. Nothing but force would have decided the dispute, if it had not been for the intervention of the President through the United States attorney general. In obedience to his suggestion, the House of Representatives readily organized and awaited the organization of the Senate which was effected some time afterwards. The most important of the contested seats have been determined in this new organization, by the whole number of members undoubtedly entitled to seats, and others are awaiting its action. Notwithstanding this inquest determine that the court house assemblage had a majority of each house, I insist it was not the General Assembly.

7. A Legislature to be such must, of course, have all the powers which it may exercise. Some of the powers require to be exercised by two-thirds of each house. Can a bare majority in favor of such exercise in a particular instance, expel the minority opposed, or refuse to let them meet with them? may the majority, wherever congregated in the city of Montgomery, assume on the instant to be the Legislature, and pass a law? These extreme cases suggest the right, both of the minority and of the people to have their voice in the passage of laws, or the performance of other duties by the Legislature.

8. The rule I deduce for determining the right of the majority to hold a session of the Legislature and the right of the minority to be present, without which the majority cannot legislate, is this—the minority must be absent either necessarily or wilfully, without fault on the part of the majority, to enable the latter to hold such session. If they are sick, or unable from any cause to come, or if they are refractory and will not come, the majority may proceed without them. But if their absence proceeds from a reasonable belief that the body claiming their attendance has no right to do so, their objections ought to be removed through conference with them, or they should be placed in fault by such attempt, so that they may be brought in by compulsion. When a large number are absent, their attendance ought to be compelled, because the people have a right to the influence they may exert, and also to have all doubts about the validity of the Legislature removed.

9. In this instance the conference was held, and resulted in the proper organization of the Assembly according to all the forms of law. No necessity exists now for regarding the court house assemblage as the General Assembly, and without such necessity it ought not to be so regarded. The undoubted General Assembly has been in session more than a month, with the question of the validity of the claims of the former assemblages to be such, constantly before it, and it has been unable to formally ratify or repudiate either, while the acts of both, with some exceptions, have been ignored or revised.

10. The Convention Parliament which restored Charles II., met without the summons of the king, and the first thing done after the king's return, was to pass an act declaring it to be a good parliament, notwithstanding the defect of the king's writs. Blackstone says the meeting was for the necessity of the thing which supersedes all law, for if they had not so met, it was morally impossible that the kingdom should have been settled in peace. So, at the time of the Revolution in 1688, the lords and commons, by their own authority, met in a convention and disposed of the crown and kingdom. This assembling was upon a like principle of necessity as at the restoration; that is upon a full conviction that King James II. had abdicated the government, and that the throne was thereby vacant, which supposition of the individual members was confirmed by their concurrent resolution when they actually came together. The convention was declared to be really the two houses of parliament, notwithstanding the want of writs, or other defects of form, by statute 1 Wm. and M. St.; 1 ch. 1; 1 Blackstone's Comm. p. 151. 152.

11. In the People v. Hatch, 33 Ill. 9, a portion of the members of the Legislature came together and assumed to act as the Legislature after it had been adjourned by the governor under a misapprehension of a disagreement. The members had been disconcerted by the prorogation, and for twelve days had taken no action. This was considered an acquiescence in the action of the governor and the subsequent Assembly was declared by the court not no have been a meeting of the Legislature. In that case every ingredient of validity seems to have existed. A meeting at a time and place appointed by law—no dispute as to membership. A session begun and not actually terminated. An admitted mistake of the governor in proroguing the body. Disconcertion of the members rather than acquiescence.

12. How easy will it be when the parties into which the members may be divided are nearly equal, for a sufficient number of seats to be contested to raise genuine doubts about who are entitled to them? The State is liable to be convulsed on the most frivolus occasions, and long afterwards private citizens may be greatly injured without fault of theirs by judicial determination of the validity of laws which they were unable in any way correctly to determine for themselves. Such doubt and difficulty now exist in the State: and to the beneficent interposition of the Federal authority alone, are we indebted for the privilege of deciding this case before a civil tribunal, rather than having it submitted to the cruel arbitrament of intestine strife.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Head notes of decisions of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, to appear in vol. 51, N. H. Reports. (Received from John M. Shirley, State Reporter.)

Consideration.

The defendant, being the teacher of a high school, undertook, at the request of the school committee, to examine candidates for admission to said school as scholars therein, and truthfully to report to the committee concerning their qualifications. The plaintiff submitted himself to such examination, and was found properly qualified; but the defendant maliciously, deceitfully, and falsely reported to the committee that the plaintiff was not so qualified; by reason whereof the plaintiff was excluded from the high school and deprived of its benefits. Held, that the plaintiff might maintain an action on the case against the teacher to recover his damages, occasioned by reason of such false and malicious report. Hammond v. Hussey, 40.

Contract.

The plaintiff contracted in April to work for the defendants one year, at $25 per month, or $300 for the year, and had drawn his pay monthly, at the rate of $25 per month from the city treasury, until October, when he was discharged without sufficient cause. Held, that he was entitled to recover of the city, upon a quantum meruit for work and labor, what his services were reasonably worth during the whole period he worked, deducting what he had received. Clark v. Manchester, 594.

Divorce.

Courts have power to set aside or vacate decrees of divorce for fraud or imposition, as in the case of other judgments, and will exercise that power where such fraud or imposition is clearly established. Adams v. Adams, 588.

Dog.

Under General Statutes, ch. 105, sect. 8, the owner or keeper of a dog is liable to the person injured by it for double the damages sustained, whether such owner or keeper had notice of the vicious habits of the animal or not. Orne v. Roberts, 110.

Evidence.

Where three parties are entitled to recover of a town, after demand, a reward for the arrest of criminals, such demand may be made by one of them, and need not be made expressly in behalf of each of the parties engaged in the joint undertaking which entitled them to the reward. Abbott v. Strafford, 148.

Mortgage.

Where, on a mortgage of a stock of goods in a country store, it was agreed, verbally, that the mortgagor should continue in possession of the store and goods, and sell the goods as before for his own benefit, and he did so—it was held, that such an arrangement was inconsistent with the avowed object of the mortgage, and rendered it fraudulent and void as to the mortgagor's creditors. Putnam v. Osgood, 192.

Note.

A negotiable note, payable on demand, was endorsed thirteen months after it was given,—the consideration for the endorsement being an agreement to support the payee. In an action by the endorsee against the maker, it was held that the maker might set off a debt due to him from the payee at the date of the endorsement. Cross v. Brown, 486.

Probate Court.

The primary probate jurisdiction of everything pertaining to the settlement of estates is exclusively in the place of the domicile of the deceased. Leonard v. Putnam, 247.

The rights and powers of guardians are considered as strictly local, and as not entitling them to exercise any authority over the person, or personal property of their wards in other States. Ib. 247.

Railroad.

A railroad corporation, claiming to act under legislative authority, removed a natural barrier situated north of E.'s land, which theretofore had completely protected E.'s meadow from the effects of floods and freshets in a neighboring river. In consequence of this removal, the waters of the river, in times of floods and freshets, sometimes flowed on to E.'s land, carrying sand, gravel, and stones thereon. Held, that this was a taking of E.'s property, within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition; and that the Legislature could not authorize the infliction of such an injury without making provision for compensation. Eaton v. B. C. & M. R. R. 504.

Wife.

Under the provisions of Gen. Stats., ch. 164, sect. 1, married women shall hold all property at any time earned by them to their sole use, free from the interference or control of any husband. Cooper v. Alger, 172.

Money due to a married woman for services rendered after the passage of that statute, is her property, whether it be due on account or on note, just as much as though it had been paid in money. Ib. 172.

Will.

A bequest of "all my accounts" does not pass a deposit in a savings bank; but a bequest of "all my personal property of whatever kind, except my notes, bonds, and accounts"—held, to include such a deposit. Gale v. Drake, 78.

Acts of Assembly—1873.

An act relating to the revenues of the commonwealth.

Whereas, In order to meet the increased expense resulting from the late war, and to extinguish the loan of three millions of dollars created for that purpose, as well as to place the credit of the commonwealth on a secure basis, it became necessary to establish an anomalous and somewhat burdensome system of taxation:

And whereas, The revenue raised by taxing the capital or the industry of the State, ought not to exceed the amount necessary to meet the ordinary expenses of government and reduce the debt at a reasonable rate:

And whereas, In the act of February twenty-third, eighteen hundred and sixty-six, imposing a tax on the gross receipts of railroads and carrying companies, as well as in the revised tax laws of eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, it was clearly expressed to be for the purpose of extinguishing the loan created by the act of May fifteenth, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, known as the war loan, which purpose is now substantially accomplished; therefore,

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That all laws or parts of laws, now in force in this commonwealth, under and by virtue of which taxes for State purposes are levied and assessed upon horses, mares, geldings, mules and cattle, shall be and they are hereby repealed, so far as they give authority to impose State taxes on the same: Provided, That this section shall not take effect until the next meeting of the board of revenue commissioners of this commonwealth.

SECT. 2 That so much of the sixth section of the act entitled "An act to revise, amend, and consolidate the several laws taxing corporations, brokers and bankers," approved May first, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, as imposes a tax upon the net earnings or income of incorporated companies liable to the tax on capital stock under the fourth section of said act, be and the same is hereby repealed, said repeal to take effect from and after the first day of November, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to release any taxes which accrued prior to the first day of November aforesaid, nor in any way to affect suits heretofore or hereafter brought in the name of the commonwealth for the collection of such taxes, and the penalties and interest attached thereto, nor to release private bankers, brokers or incorporated companies having no taxable capital stock, but for such purposes the section hereby repealed shall continue in full force and effect.

SECT. 3. That so much of the eighth section of the act last aforesaid, as imposes a tax upon the gross receipts of railroad, canal, and transportation companies, be and the same is hereby repealed, said repeal to take effect from and after the first day of July next: Provided, That any company which has been exempt from the tax on tonnage by any special law, shall be liable to pay the tax of three-fourths of one per centum upon their gross receipts; and that this act shall not be construed to release any taxes upon gross receipts accruing prior to the first day of July next, nor in any way to affect suits heretofore or hereafter instituted in the name of the commonwealth for the collection of such taxes, and the penalties and interest attached thereto.

SECT. 4. That every company, except bank or savings institutions incorporated under the laws of this commonwealth, and authorized to issue bonds or other evidences of indebtedness, and which pays interest to its bondholders or other creditors, shall pay to the State treasurer, for the use of the commonwealth, semi-annually, on the first days of July and January in each and every year, beginning with the first day of July, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, a tax equal to five per centum upon every dollar of interest paid as aforesaid: and it shall be the duty of any company aforesaid to make semi-annual reports to the auditor general, under oath, showing the total amount of the indebtedness of said company, and the amount of interest paid to their bondholders or other creditors.

That the eleventh section of the act approved May first, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, entitled "An act to revise, amend and consolidate the several laws taxing corporations, brokers and bankers," is hereby repealed, said repeal to date from and after the first day of July next, saving, however, to the commonwealth the right to collect any taxes accruing under said section prior to the date of repeal aforesaid.

Approved March 21st, A. D. 1873.

Court of Common Pleas of Mercer County.

COMMONWEALTH v. SAAL.

1. The Legislature may create new offences and prescribe the mode of ascertaining the guilt of persons charged therewith.
2. An offence triable by jury, at the time of the adoption of the constitution, cannot, without the consent of the accused, be submitted to any other tribunal.
3. A trial by jury means a jury of twelve men, who must unanimously concur in the guilt of the accused, before a legal conviction can be had.
4. The act of May 24th, 1871, giving jurisdiction to a justice of peace, and a jury of six persons in Mercer county, to try those charged with selling liquor without a license, in so far as it compels the accused to submit to such jurisdiction, is unconstitutional.

Certiorari.

Opinion by TRUNKEY, P. J. Delivered April 11th, 1873.

Information was made before D. A. Thalimer, justice of the peace, charging that Peter Saal had sold liquor without license, in violation of the act of May 24th, 1871. By the sixth section of the act, jurisdiction is given to a justice of the peace and a jury of six persons concurrent with the Court of Quarter Sessions. The defendant, without his consent, was tried before such justice and jury and convicted—and was sentenced by the justice. He complains that he has been deprived of the constitutional guaranty, "That trial by jury shall be as heretofore, and the right thereof remain inviolate."

It is scarcely necessary to remark, that a trial by jury means a jury of twelve men, who must unanimously concur in the guilt of the accused before a legal conviction can be had. No less number can satisfy the requirement in the bill of rights.

The right of trial by jury, as it existed when the constitution was adopted, has been preserved—not extended. The first constitution, adopted in 1776, secured the right in similar phrase, and with like effect as in that of 1790, amended in 1838. Then, neither usage nor right required every litigated question of fact to be submitted to a jury. We will not speak of the various civil proceedings, affecting rights of property in courts of equity and other courts. Summary convictions for petty offences have been had for centuries in England, and in Pennsylvania since her settlement. By virtue of the undefined police power, vagrants, a very comprehensive term, were always liable to summary conviction. In this State, a man may be charged as a pickpocket, or professional thief, and arrested in church or other public place, and tried before a police magistrate, who may commit him to prison not exceeding ninety days. As honest a man, or as great a rogue, as ever entered church or theatre, may be seized and summarily convicted and sentenced to imprisonment at labor for three months. Byers et al. v. Com., 6 Wr. 89. The Legislature may create new offences and prescribe what mode it pleases of ascertaining the guilt of those charged with them. The act of April 14th, 1851, forbidding the sale of certain liquors on the Subbath day, in Allegheny county, under a penalty to be imposed by summary conviction, is constitutional. Van Swartow v. Com., 12 Har. 131. Authorities need not be multiplied. Those cited show that the Legislature has the undoubted power to create new crimes, prescribe new penalties with new modes of conviction, and to extend the application of many old laws, under the police power, for summary proceedings. The right of trial by jury, as a safeguard of the citizen, is sacred as to all offences thus tried when the constitution was adopted; but, for others, it seems a shadow, not substance.

In Van Swartow v. Com., supra, Judge Black says, "The purpose of the constitution undoubtedly was to preserve the jury trial where the common law gave it, and in all other cases to let the Legislature and the people do as their wisdom and experience might dictate." I do not think he intended to apply the right strictly to where it was given by the common law, but would include cases where the right had been previously enjoyed. In the same opinion, he remarks, "Every class of cases triable by jury in 1790, are still triable in no other way, at least this statute has not diminished the number. * * * Summary convictions were well known before the formation of the constitution, and they are not expressly or impliedly prohibited by that instrument, except in so far as they are not to be substituted for a jury where the latter mode of trial had been previously established." In Byers et al. v. Com., supra, it is said that none of the constitutions contemplated any extension of the right beyond the limits within which it had been enjoyed previous to the settlement of the State or the adoption of the constitution. These cases, and all others bearing on the question which I have seen, recognize the right in any class of cases where it existed when the constitution was adopted. The point was not made in the cases cited as to a statutory offence to which the right then existed, but the care in the dictums give them much force, especially when they accord with the letter and spirit of the bill of rights.

In the Court of Appeals of New York, in the case arising under "An act for the prevention of intemperance, pauperism and crime," passed April 9th, 1855, it was held that the proceeding in a court of special sessions, authorized by the said act for the trial of an offender, was unconstitutional and void, on the ground that the accused was thereby deprived of the right of trial by jury. Justice A. S. Johnson says, "We find that from 1830, at least, misdemeanors by violations of the excise law were not triable in courts of special sessions at all, but in courts of general sessions, or of oyer and terminer, which were courts proceeding according to the course of the common law. * * * It does not at all affect this argument to say at an earlier period jury trial was not a right in such cases. The course of the law is to enlarge private right, not to restrict it. When jury trial was given for the first time in such cases, it was bestowed because the Legislature desired to extend its protecting influences, and when afterwards the new constitution was adopted, jury trials in cases where it was then accustomed, received the sanction and protection of organic law. Writings are to be construed as of the time when they are made, and 'heretofore,' in this clause, means before 1846, and cannot, to limit its meaning, be carried back to 1777, and confined to the cases which at that earlier period were triable by jury. The act provides that offences prosecuted personally against the offender, and for which he is punishable by fine, by forfeiture, and sometimes by imprisonment, shall be tried by any one of the numerous inferior magistrates, either without a jury at all, or a jury of six men. * * * This is not what the constitution meant by jury trial. That must be, within the terms of the constitution, a jury of twelve men. * * * The whole provision, which was made only with a view to this kind of trial (before inferior magistrates), and not for the purpose of holding the offender to answer elsewhere, must fall." The People v. Toynbee, 2 Parker's C. C, 490.

This decision of a neighboring State, upon a question analogous to the one now pending, is entitled to great weight. The constitution of New York was adopted in 1846, and the court held that its guarantee of a jury trial included statutory offences thus triable at that time, though they had not been at a former period, and were offences unknown to the common law. How stood the law prior to the adoption of the constitution of Pennsylvania? Was it a misdemeanor to sell liquor without a license, and if so, how triable? Modifications of the law, or in the severity of the penalty, in no wise can affect the question.

Selling spiritous, vinous or malt liquors, without license, was not a common law offence. Under the old English statutes, keeping an ale house without license was not indictable, for they provided that the prescribed penalty should be inflicted upon conviction before justices of the peace. These statutes were not in force in Pennsylvania, nor were they imitated in the mode of trial.

The act of 1710 1 Sm. L. 73. prohibited keeping a dram shop without license, under the penalty of five pounds. By a supplement, passed August 26th, 1721, 1 Sm. L. 127, no person, without license, could sell or barter with, or deliver any rum, wine, &c., to be used or drank on or near the premises, or retail or sell any spirits by less quantity than one quart, nor any wine by less quantity than one gallon, nor any beer, ale or cider, by less quantity than two gallons, under like penalties as prescribed by the act of 1710. By act of 19th March, 1783, if any person sold any rum, wine, brandy or other spirits in less quantity than one quart, he should forfeit and pay for every offence the penalty of ten pounds. Two of these acts were in force long before 1776, and the other before 1790. Under them the penalty was enforced by indictment. Upon the question of the sufficiency of an indictment, in 1818, Justice Duncan said: "This form of indictment having prevailed for eighty years, been adopted by successive attorney generals, the provisions of the several acts being nearly if not altogether in the same words, the court will not say that all the prosecutions during that long period of time are erroneous; for it is admitted that this has been the only form. * * * The only remedy is by indictment." Com. v. Baird, 4 S. & R. 151. The colonial Legislature prescribed the offence of selling intoxicating beverages without license, and the offender was punishable only by indictment and conviction by a jury. So stood the law before, and at the time the constitution was adopted. All persons charged with selling intoxicating beverages without license were tried by jury. This was their right in 1776, in 1790, and in 1838. If since taken away from that class of cases, to that extent the right does not remain as it did before. I speak of the specific offence of selling liquor without license. Other offences may be created, as selling on Sunday, to men when intoxicated, and the like, in which there would be no right of trial by jury. Under the colonial law, at one time, persons guilty of selling to minors were liable to a penalty inflicted upon summary conviction before justices of the peace. Of course in such a case the right does not exist, and the Legislature could now cause the offence to be tried in the same way.

In all the supplements and changes in the law since the year 1710, I have heard of none which attempted to deprive the accused of a jury trial, except the act of May 24th, 1871; and never was the penalty under any former act so severe. By this local act, the minimum for the first offence is a fine of $100, and for the second a fine of $200 and imprisonment for ninety days; the maximum is in the discretion of the court, or a justice of the peace. Below the grade of murder of the first degree, it is difficult to find any other crime, named in our statutes, where the maximum of fine, or imprisonment, is not fixed by law. Mercer county is favored with a singular exception. So highly penal a misdemeanor is no petty offence. As we have seen, it is not one created since the adoption of the constitution; and it is one of a kind then tried by jury. The only question here is as to the validity of that part of the act which compels the accused, against his will, to be tried by a justice of the peace and jury of six persons. For this misdemeanor, under former acts, the penalty was moderate and certain, or confined within certain limits. The act before us authorizes fine and imprisonment without stint. The former secured to those charged as offenders a trial in a court of record according to the course of the common law—this provides that the accused may be tried before a court not of record without the safeguard of a jury trial. It is not the business of a court to judge of the wisdom or policy of a law; nor of the propriety of a provision whereby a prosecutor may choose the justice of the peace, and the neighborhood, charge a person with violating a highly penal statute, and compel him to submit to a summary investigation. But it is necessary to consider what the law was, and what the new act is, that we may judge of its validity. No act of Assembly can be pronounced invalid, by any court, unless it clearly, plainly and palpably, violates the constitution. I cannot hesitate nor doubt in concluding, that so much of the sixth section of the act as compels a defendant to be tried before a justice of the peace, violates the guaranty, "That trial by jury shall be as heretofore, and the right thereof remain inviolate."

To avoid any misapprehension, I will add that this decision does not interfere with the right of a defendant to plead guilty before the justice, or demand a trial by the justice and a jury of six persons. When he does so, the justice will proceed in like manner as in other criminal cases wherein jurisdiction has been given to justices for final disposition at the request of the defendant. But when the defendant refuses to plead, and refuses a trial before the justice, then the justice will hear the case, and if cause appear, hold him to answer at the next term of the Court of Quarter Sessions, as in other criminal cases. For the offence charged against Peter Saal, the justice may yet give him a hearing, and thereupon discharge, hold to bail, or, in default of bail, commit him for trial at the next term of the court.

Acts of Assembly—1873.

An act to establish an insurance department.

SECT. 1. Be it enacted, &c., That there is hereby established a distinct department, to be known as the insurance department, which shall be charged with the execution of the laws of this State in relation to insurance.

SECT. 2. The chief officer of said department shall be denominated the insurance commissioner of Pennsylvania; he shall be appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the Senate, within thirty days after the passage of this act, for the term of three years, and until his successor is duly qualified, and shall receive the annual salary of three thousand dollars: Provided, That the person first appointed commissioner under this act, shall enter upon the duties of his office on the first Monday of May next; in case of a vacancy in said office by death, resignation or otherwise, the governor shall fill such vacancy for the unexpired balance of the term; he shall employ, from time to time, with the approval of the governor, not exceeding, in addition to deputy, three clerks to discharge such duties as he shall assign them, whose compensation shall be paid them by the State treasurer, at the same rate and in the same manner as the clerks in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth; he shall appoint one of the said clerks to be his deputy, who shall perform the duties attached by law to the office of principal, during the absence or inability of his principal, who shall receive an annual salary of eighteen hundred dollars, payable as aforesaid; within fifteen days from the date of his appointment, the commissioner shall take and subscribe the oath of office prescribed by the constitution, and file the same in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth, and shall also give to the commonwealth a bond in the penalty of ten thousand dollars, with two sureties, to be approved by the governor, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office.

SECT. 3. All books, papers, records and securities whatever, in the office of the auditor general, relating to the business of insurance, shall on demand be delivered and transferred to the insurance commissioner, and be and remain in his charge and custody.

SECT. 4. There shall be assigned to the said commissioner, by the commissioners of public buildings and grounds, a suitable room or rooms for conducting the business of said department; and the said commissioner shall, from time to time, with the approval of the commissioners aforesaid, procure the necessary furniture, stationery, and other proper conveniences for the transaction of the said business, the expenses of which shall be paid on the certificate of the commissioner and the warrant of the auditor general.

SECT. 5. It shall be the duty of the insurance commissioner;

First. To see that all the laws of this State respecting insurance companies, and the agents thereof, are faithfully executed, and for this purpose he is hereby invested with all the powers now conferred by law upon the auditor general in relation to the licensing of the agents of foreign insurance companies; to file in his office any charter of a company, now or hereafter required by law to be filed, and upon application, to furnish a certified copy thereof.

Second. He shall, as soon as practicable, in each year, calculate, or cause to be calculated, the net value on the thirty-first day of December, of the previous year, of all the policies in force on that day, in each life insurance company doing business in this State, organized by authority of this State, and of every other life insurance company doing business in this State that shall fail to furnish him, as hereinafter provided, a certificate of the insurance commissioner of the State by whose authority the company was organized, or by the State in which it may elect to have its policies valued and its deposit made, in case the company is chartered by the government of the United States, giving the net value of all policies in force in the company on the thirty-first day of December, of the preceding year, which calculation of the net value of each policy shall be based upon the American experience table of mortality, and four and one-half per cent. interest per annum: Provided, That when any life insurance company shall have a cash capital of not less than five hundred thousand dollars, fully paid in and safely invested, the reserve to provide for the liabilities on all policies of such company not participating in the profits of the company, shall be computed by the American experience table of mortality, with interest at not less than four and a half nor more than six per centum per annum, in the discretion of the commissioner, and with reference to the rates of premium charged by such company; the net value of a policy at any time, shall be taken to be the single net premium which will at that time effect the insurance, less the value at that time of the future net premiums called for by the table of mortality and rate of interest designated.

Third. In case it is found that any life insurance company doing business in this State, has not on hand the net value of all its policies in force, after all other debts of the company and claims against it, exclusive of capital stock, have been provided for, it shall be the duty of the insurance commissioner to publish the fact that the then existing condition of the affairs of the company is below the standard of legal safety established by this State, and he shall require the company at once to cease doing new business, and he shall immediately institute proceedings to determine what further shall be done in the case; and it is hereby made the duty of the insurance commissioner, after having determined, as above, the amount of the net value of all the policies in force, to see that the company has that amount in safe legal securities, after all its other debts and claims against it, exclusive of capital stock, have been provided for.

Fourth. He shall accept the valuations made by the insurance commissioner of the State, under whose authority a life insurance company was organized, when such valuations have been properly made on sound and recognized principles and legal basis as above: Provided, The company shall furnish to the insurance commissioner of this State, on or before the first day of March, in each and every year, a certificate from the insurance commissioner of such State, setting forth the value, calculated on the data designated above, of all the policies in force in the company on the previous thirty-first day of December, and stating that after all the other debts of the company and claims against it at that time were provided for, the company had, in safe securities, an amount equal to the net value of all its policies in force, and that said company is entitled to do business in its own State; and every life insurance company doing business in this State during the year for which the statement is made, that fails promptly to furnish the certificate aforesaid, shall be required to make full detailed lists of policies and securities to the insurance commissioner of this State, and shall be liable for all charges and expenses consequent upon not having furnished said certificate.

Fifth. For every company doing fire insurance business in this State, he shall calculate the re-insurance reserve for unexpired fire risks, by taking fifty per centum of the premiums received on all unexpired risks that have less than one year to run, and a pro rata on all premiums received on risks that have more than one year to run; and in marine and inland insurance, he shall charge all the premiums received on unexpired risks as a re-insurance reserve.

Sixth. Having charged against a company the re-insurance reserve, as above determined, for fire, inland and marine insurance, and adding thereto all other debts and claims against the company, he shall, in case he finds the capital stock of the company impaired to the extent of twenty per centum, give notice to the company to make good its whole capital stock within sixty days; and if this is not done, he shall require the company to cease to do new business within this State, and shall thereupon, in case the company is organized under authority of this State, immediately institute legal proceedings, as required in this act, to determine what further shall be done in this case. Any company receiving the aforesaid notice of the insurance commissioner, to make good its whole capital stock within sixty days, shall forthwith call upon its stockholders for such amounts as will make its capital equal to the amount fixed by the charter of said company; and in case any stockholder of such company shall neglect or refuse to pay the amount so called for, after notice personally given or by advertisement, in such time and manner as the said commissioner shall approve, it shall be lawful for the said company to require the return of the original certificate of stock held by such stockholder, and in lieu thereof to issue new certificates for such number of shares as the said stockholder may be entitled to in the proportion that the ascertained value of the funds of the said company may be found to bear to the original capital of the said company; the value of such shares for which new certificates shall be issued to be ascertained under the direction of the said commissioner, and the company paying for the fractional parts of shares; and it shall be lawful for the directors of such company to create new stock and dispose of the same, and to issue new certificates therefor to any amount sufficient to make up the original capital of the company. Whenever the capital stock of any joint stock fire or marine insurance company of this State becomes impaired, the commissioner may, in his discretion, permit the said company to reduce its capital stock and the par value of its shares in proportion to the extent of impairment: Provided, That in fixing such reduced capital no sum exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars shall be deducted from the assets and property on hand, which shall be retained as surplus assets: And provided, That no part of such assets and property shall be distributed to the stockholders: And provided further, That the capital stock shall not be reduced to an amount less than that required by law for the organization of the company.

Seventh. It shall be the duty of the insurance commissioner after he has notified a life insurance company, organized under the authority of this State, to cease doing new business until the net value of its policies in force is equal to that called for by the standard of safety established by the State, at once to cause a rigid examination in regard to all the affairs of such company; in case it shall appear that there is no fraud or gross incompetency or recklessness shown to exist in the management, he may, upon publishing the facts in the case, permit such company to continue in charge of its business for one year: Provided, There is, in his opinion, reason to believe that the company may eventually be able to re-establish the legal net value of all its policies in force. At the end of the year named above, he may renew the permission, in case, on examination, he is satisfied that the company is likely to retrieve its affairs.

Eighth. Whenever the insurance commissioner shall have reason to believe that any insurance company of this State is insolvent, or fraudulently conducted, or that its assets are not sufficient for carrying on the business of the same, or during any non-compliance with the provisions of this act, he shall communicate the fact to the attorney general, whose duty it shall then become to apply to the Supreme Court or the District Court, or any Court of Common Pleas in this commonwealth, or in vacation, to any of the judges thereof, for any order requiring said company to show cause why their business should not be closed; and the court or judge, as the case may be, shall thereupon hear the allegations and proofs of the respective parties, or appoint some suitable person as examiner, to perform such duty, and report upon the facts to said court or judge; if it appears to the satisfaction of said court or judge, that such company is insolvent, or that the interests of the public so require, the said court or judge shall decree a dissolution of such corporation, and a distribution of its effects; but in case it shall appear to said court or judge, that said corporation is able to comply with the provisions of this act, and that it is not insolvent, a decree shall be entered annulling the act of the commissioner in the premises, and authorizing such company to resume business.

Ninth. The insurance commissioner shall publish the result of his examination of the affairs of any company, whenever he deems it for the interest of the public so to do, in one or more publications of this State; suspend the entire business of any company of this State, and the business within this State of any other company, during its non-compliance with any provision of this act, or whenever its assets appear to him insufficient to justify its continuance in business, by suspending or revoking the certificate granted by him; report to the attorney general any violation of law relative to insurance companies, their officers or agents; furnish to the companies the necessary blank forms for the statements required; preserve in a permanent form a full record of his proceedings, and concise statement of the condition of each company or agency visited or examined; at the request of any person, and on payment of the fee, to give certified copies of any record in his office, when he deems it not prejudicial to the public interest; report annually to the Legislature the receipts and expenses of his department for the year, his official acts, the condition of companies doing business in this State, and such other information as will exhibit the affairs of his department; adopt and renew, from time to time, with the approval of the governor, a seal of office, an impression of which shall be filed in the office of the secretary of the commonwealth; and it shall be his duty to see that no company is permitted to enter into new contract to insure lives in this State, who continue to do fire, marine or inland insurance business.

Tenth. The insurance commissioner, for the purposes of examination authorized by this act, is hereby empowered, either in person or by one or more examiners by him commissioned in writing, to require free access to all books and papers within this State of any insurance company, or the agents thereof, doing business within this State; to summon and examine any person being within this State, under oath, which he or any examiner may administer, relative to the affairs and condition of any company; for probable cause to visit at its principal office, wherever it may be, any insurance company not of a State in which the substantial provisions of this act shall be enacted, and doing business in this State, for the purpose of investigating its affairs and condition, and to revoke its certificate in this State, granted as hereinafter described, if it does not permit an examination; to revoke or modify any certificate of authority, when any conditions prescribed by law for granting it no longer exist. The insurance commissioner is hereby empowered to institute suits and prosecutions, either by the attorney general or such other attorney as the commisioner may designate, for any violation of this act; and the commissioner shall be made a party to any proceedings instituted for the purpose of closing up the affairs of any company, when the same shall not be in the name of the commonwealth.

SECT. 6. The commissioner may employ an actuary to make the valuation of life policies, at the compensation of not exceeding three cents for each thousand dollars of insurance, to be paid by the company for which the valuation is made; and there shall be paid by every company to which this act applies, the following fees towards defraying the expenses of enforcing its provisions: For filing certified copy of charter, twenty-five dollars; for filing the annual statement or certificate in lieu thereof, twenty dollars; for each certificate of authority and certified copy thereof, two dollars; for every copy of any paper filed in the department, the sum of twenty cents per folio, and for affixing the official seal to such copy and certifying the same, one dollar; for official examinations of companies under this act, the actual expenses incurred.

SECT. 7. The insurance commissioner shall, on or before the tenth day of each month, make report to the auditor general, showing the entire amount of fees received by him during the month preceding, and pay over the same to the State treasurer; and in case the necessary expenses of said department exceed the amount of fees collected under this act, exclusive of the tax upon premiums, the excess of such expense shall be annually assessed by the commissioner, in just proportion, upon all the insurance companies doing business in this State, and the commissioner is empowered to collect such assessments and pay the same into the State treasury; and all the necessary expenses of the commissioner in the execution of this act shall be paid by the State treasurer upon his certificate and the warrant of auditor general, out of the fund thus created.

SECT. 8. Within ninety days after the first Monday of May next, it shall be the duty of every insurance company of this State to file with the commissioner a certified copy of its charter, together with a certificate, stating the time of its organization, the location of its principal place of business, and the names and residence of its officers; and the commissioner shall proceed, as soon as practicable thereafter, to institute an examination into its affairs, in accordance with the provisions of this act; and any company failing to comply with the requirements of this section, shall be subject to a fine of one hundred dollars for each month's delay, to be collected as other fines and penalties under this act.

SECT. 9. It shall be unlawful for any person, company or corporation, to negotiate or solicit within this State any contract of insurance, or to effect an insurance or insurances, or pretend to effect the same, or to receive and transmit any offer or offers of insurance, or receive or deliver a policy or policies of insurance, or in any manner to aid in the transaction of the business of insurance without complying fully with the provisions of this act.

SECT. 10. No person shall act as agent or solicitor in this State, of any insurance company of another State, or foreign government, in any manner whatever relating to risks, until the provisions of this act have been complied with on the part of the company or association, and there has been granted to said company or association, by the commissioner, a certificate of authority showing that the company or association is authorized to transact business in this State; and it shall be the duty of every such company or association, authorized to transact business in this State, to make report to the commissioner in the month of January of each year, under oath of the president or secretary thereof, showing the entire amount of premiums of every character and description received by the said company or association in this State, during the year or fraction of a year, ending with the thirty-first day of December preceding, whether said premiums were received in money, or in the form of notes, credits or any other substitute for money and pay into the State treasury a tax of three per centum upon said premiums; and the commissioner shall not have power to grant a renewal of the certificate of said company or association until the tax aforesaid is paid into the State treasury.

SECT. 11. Companies to which certificates of authority are issued, as provided in the preceding section, shall, from time to time, certify to the commissioner the names of the agents appointed by them to solicit risks in this State; and no such agent shall transact business until he has procured from the commissioner a certificate, showing that the company has complied with the requirements of this act, and that the person named in said certificate has been duly appointed its agent.

SECT. 12. Every insurance company, including individuals, partnerships, joint stock associations and corporations conducting any branch of insurance business in this State, must transmit to the insurance commissioner a statement of its condition and business, for the year ending on the preceding thirty-first day of December, which statement shall be rendered on the first day of January following, or within sixty days thereafter, except that foreign companies shall transmit their statement of business, other than that done in the United States, prior to the following first day of July, which statements must be in form, and state the particulars required by the blanks prescribed by the commissioner; and the insurance commissioner may require, at any time, statements from any company doing business within this State, or from any of its officers or agents, on such points as he deems necessary and proper to elicit a full exhibit of its buiness and standing, all of which statements herein required must be verified by the signatures and oaths of the president or vice president, with those of the secretary or actuary. No company having neglected to file a statement required of it within the time and manner prescribed, shall do any new business, after notification by the insurance commissioner, while such neglect continues; and any company or association neglecting to make and transmit any statement required, shall forfeit one hundred dollars for each day's neglect.

SECT. 13. No insurance company not of this State, nor its agents, shall do business in this State until he has filed with the insurance commissioner of this State a written stipulation, duly authenticated by the company, agreeing that any legal process affecting the company served on the insurance commissioner, or the party designated by him, or the agent specified by said company to receive service of process for the said company, shall have the same effect as if served personally on the company within this State, and if such company should cease to maintain such agent in this State so designated, such process may thereafter be served on the insurance commissioner; but so long as any liability of the stipulating company to any resident of this State continues, such stipulation cannot be revoked or modified, except that a new one may be substituted, so as to require or dispense with the service at the office of said company within this State, and that such service of process according to this stipulation,

CHIEF JUSTICE CHASE.

A very large meeting of the bar of Philadelphia was held on Saturday, May 10th, in the United States Court room, for the purpose of paying respect to the memory of the late Chief Justice Chase. Assistant District Attorney Valentine called the meeting to order, and Hon. John Cadwalader, of the United States, Circuit Court, was selected as chairman.

Upon assuming the duties of the position, Judge Cadwalader said that the deceased had exhibited truly great intellectual power, capacity for organization, great administrative efficiency, and rigidly pure morality. The office of secretary of the treasury, is a most difficult and responsible one, under our complicated system of government, in the sunshine of peace and the calm of prosperity. What, then, are its difficulties and responsibilities in the whirlwind of civil war? In the storm of our country's career, the deceased chief justice held the rudder and saved the ship of State from wreck. We cannot consider the character of Mr. Chase's efforts, without considering results, and to him we are indebted for a currency which has the confidence of the people, and with which every one is satisfied. The judge spoke of the deceased as chief justice, and awarded him high praise for his course on the bench.

Hon. James R. Ludlow, was then called to act as secretary.

District Attorney William McMichael, offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the bar of Philadelphia has heard with profound regret, of the death of Hon. Salmon P. Chase, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Resolved, That in his career, we see the great opportunities offered to the citizen under our free institutions; and in the integrity and ability with which he discharged the various offices intrusted to him, we behold an example worthy of admiration.

Resolved, That he filled the high position of chief justice with great dignity, learning and impartiality, and was the worthy successor of the eminent jurists who preceded him.

Resolved, That the chairman appoint a committee of five to communicate the proceedings of this meeting to the family of the deceased.

Mr. McMichael made a few remarks respecting the deceased, in which he said:

It was my pleasure to meet Mr. Chase during the time he was secretary of the treasury. His personal appearance was then very impressive. Tall, stalwart, and with a face heightened by superior intelligence, there was that in his presence which indicated a leader of men. I saw him again two years ago upon the bench, and frequently since in the Supreme Court room at Washington. The change which had taken place in his appearance, was marked and affecting. Disease had laid its heavy hand upon him. His tall form was bent, his face furrowed, his step weakened by premature age, but his strong intellect overmastered his physical infirmities.

Hon. Benjamin Harris Brewster, said he had been requested to second the resolutions; the large assemblage, and the number of gentlemen whom he saw present, prepared to speak, forewarned him that what he should say must be brief. These occasions were eminently proper, and should be encouraged, because they admonished men that they were mortal, and that they must answer while they were here, and to the great hereafter, and those who were left behind them, for the purity and integrity of their private and public acts.

This gentleman had been connected with some of the most important epochs in the history of the country; he had graced many exalted positions as a statesman, and when he was promoted to the bench. In government, the judicial function was one that could not be supplied by any other, and sometimes it was called upon to supply all others, and hence men submit to it with reverence. It was the last which should be exposed to blame; its character was solemn; to be venerated and obeyed for the love of justice, which is the harmony of virtues.

This gentleman had been advanced to the highest place in this or any nation. His intellectual and moral qualities fitted him for it, and his labors while there, have justified the selection. He has left behind him, in his opinions, memorials which testify for him. He well knew he had been preceded by most illustrious men, John Marshall, who came from among those who surrounded Washington's administration; the great and upright Roger B. Taney, a man who in many of the traits of his character, resembled the good Sir Matthew Hale, and who, like him, had left for the benefit of mankind, the learning, labor and wisdom of a long judicial life.

Chief Justice Chase was not an old man when he died, but he had been long enough in his station to teach the country that he was equal to it. It was because of this, the Philadelphia bar were here to testify their respect for him as a lawyer and a man; to reverence his memory; to do honor to his fame, and to lament his loss.

Judge Peirce followed Mr. Brewster, traced the career of the late chief justice, from his boyhood's life in Washington, to his elevation to the supreme bench, through the important and responsible positions of governor of Ohio, senator of the United States, and secretary of the treasury, and said that he afforded—in the ability and integrity he had shown in all of them—a bright example to the youth of the country. The speaker attributed his success to the fact that he had put his trust in the Almighty, and had found in him a sure reliance. He had been placed, at a dark period of the country's history, in a position of extraordinary trial. Money was needed to carry on the government, and the bankers of New York turned their backs upon him; but he found a young man in Philadelphia for the emergency, and in the hands of this man the object was accomplished. It was to the honor of Mr. Chase and the wisdom of the banker, that success crowned the effort. As was said by one of the speakers at a bar meeting yesterday: "If death be an evil, it is a universal one." But it cannot be an evil, as it comes from God, and He can do no evil. Death comes to relieve us of the cares and responsibilities of life, and it had found a shining mark in the late chief justice.

Mr. Isaac Hazlehurst spoke of the singular fidelity which Mr. Chase had shown in all the positions he had filled.

Addresses were also made by William L. Hirst, Judge M. Russell Thayer, General Horatio Hubbell, and ex-Chief Justice Thompson.

The resolutions were adopted, and, on motion of H. C. Townsend, copies were directed to be sent to the Supreme Court of the United States, and to the Federal courts of this district.

The following committee was appointed: Chief Justice John M. Read, Ex-Chief Justice James Thompson, Judge J. I. Clark Hare, Judge Joseph Allison, Judge M. Russell Thayer, Judge William S. Peirce, William McMichael, Esq., Hon. Benjamin H. Brewster, William L. Hirst, Esq., Isaac Hazlehurst, Esq., George W. Harding, Esq., Daniel Dougherty, Esq., Horatio Hubbell, Esq., Aubrey H. Smith, Esq.

JUDGE KING.

A meeting of the Philadelphia Bar was held on Friday, May 9th, in the Supreme Court room, to do honor to the memory of Hon. Edward King, who for such a long period occupied the position of president judge of the Court of Common Pleas of this county.

The meeting was called to order by Hon. Benjamin Harris Brewster, who nominated Ex-chief Justice Thompson as chairman, and the nomination was ratified. David Webster, Esqr., was called to act as secretary.

The ex-chief justice said: We are again admonished of that unchangeable rule, that "It is appointed unto all men to die," and as certain as it comes, it is sure to carry sadness to many hearts.

It is a melancholy duty that we are assembled to perform, and yet it gives us an opportunity to commemorate the virtues, deeds and learning of the deceased.

I believe that the late judge was one of most eminent judges that ever was upon the bench; he could, with truth, be called the father of the equity system, and his opinions were always read with the force of authority. Nor was he less prominent in the administration of the criminal law, and in neither department—it is no discredit to any living representative of them—had he ever a superior. He has gone down to his grave without a whisper against his reputation; and, without enlarging, I can simply say, as the Graham said to his faithful follower: "Farewell to thee, O Fidelity! farewell, O Fidelity! to thee;" and so we can say to him "Farewell, O Fidelity! farewell to thee!"

William L. Hirst offered the following:

The Bar of Philadelphia assembles to day to express and record their profound respect for the memory of the distinguished jurist, the Hon. Edward King. He has been called away in the ripeness of age and the fulness of honors. For more than a quarter of a century his name was a household word. A pure and learned judge, an honorable man in private life, possessed of pre-eminent brilliancy of intellect, earnest and devoted in the discharge of his high judicial functions, holding the scales of justice with unfaltering impartiality, eminent in his own and other States as authority, respected and honored as one of the greatest of American judges, he has left behind him a name which will shine in the annals of the judiciary of America among the brightest and purest jurists of the age: therefore,

Resolved, That the Bar of Philadelphia on this solemn occasion desire to offer their testimony to the private and public virtues of the deceased, and to his eminent usefulness as one of the greatest and best of judges and citizens. Among the honored names that have given to Philadelphia her position among her sister cities, the name of Edward King stands high on the roll of honor. By the force and inherent powers of a mind, clear, profound, active, and looking only to the honest merits of a controversy, he attained distinction as a judge who ennobled and adorned the bench, elevated and organized the administration of justice, and secured the confidence and affection of the people.

Resolved, That a committee of nine be appointed by the chair to communicate to the relatives of the deceased, a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions.

Mr. Hirst supplemented the resolutions, after they had been received, by appropriate eulogistic remarks.

Mr. Hazlehurst desired to say a word upon the melancholy occasion which had convened this meeting. He had the good fortune to be acquainted with the late Judge King from his very earliest professional life. His first argument was made before him. In the relations of life he was kind and affectionate. Of very simple manners, his character was marked with manliness, integrity and honor. He was singularly free from ostentation or presumption, and, entirely free from guile; he honestly endeavored to fulfil the obligations which his high office imposed upon him. He has left in the reports of his day the proofs of his great learning and industry, and of his eminent qualifications for his exalted judicial position. His opinions upon almost every branch of the law are marked with wonderful clearness and force. He created the equity practice of his court. Should the junior members of the bar desire to know who Edward King was, they can find the question answered in the Judicial Reports of his day. From the case of the Commonwealth v. Grear, in 1826, to the case of Leach v. Leach, in 1851, they will find a rich field of judicial instruction.

As the author and compiler of the criminal code of this State, he has earned for himself the highest reputation, "It is a document of wisdom and industry." And now, said Mr. Hazlehurst, what more need be said? Events are rapidly succeeding each other. We are surrounded by realities. The chief justice of the American Union lies to-day dead in our commercial metropolis—our late president judge died yesterday in our midst. Two stars have sunk below the horizon. They moved in different spheres, but they were both particular and bright. These profound jurists, in addition to their great professional qualities, have left us the legacy of an unspotted personal character. There was a time when such a commendation would have been out of place. It is something now. Mr. Hazlehurst only desired to place upon the records of this meeting this his testimony.

Eli K. Price, Esq., said that his memory overreached all the judicial life of Judge King. All the most important acts in his profession had been performed by Judge King. When Judge King was appointed he had made no mark; he was undistinguished in the profession. He was well entitled to his position upon political grounds, which then ruled the governor. He was one of the three most prominent politicians when the Democracy was paramount over the city and the State, and the opponents thought to make capital out of the appointment, but he had not long been upon the bench before the public opinion was changed. There were none appointed upon the bench who possessed greater natural ability or greater integrity. No trace of political bias or partiality could be discerned in his judicial conduct. Mr. Price then continued at some length paying the highest tribute to the distinguished dead.

Judge Ludlow said:

Over forty-seven years ago, by an appointment of the governor, Judge King became the President of the Common Pleas.

For twenty-five years he sat in that court, and when it is remembered that the tribunal over which he presided is, and always has been, the constitutional court of this country, second to none in rank except the Supreme Court, with a jurisdiction of value beyond and above any other subordinate tribunal, a jurisdiction which embraces the whole range of causes, civil and criminal, it can at once be understood how vast was the responsibility imposed upon our late president.

How well the various duties devolving upon this magistrate were performed, is a matter of history, while the profession can point with a jealous and just pride to the record of Judge King's judicial decrees as contained in the reports. This great judge, more than any other single man, moulded the administration of equity and criminal courts, while in every department of the law within his jurisdiction, his published opinions will forever stand the proudest monuments of his keen appreciation of the most recondite principles of law, his practical sound sense, and of the strength, breadth and grasp of his judicial mind.

The voice of eulogy cannot reach him now; he has no lineal descendants to be gratified by words of praise, but he has successors upon the bench which he adorned, and they delight to do him honor, and will proclaim his fame with honest, earnest and just words.

Without fear of contradiction, it may be truly said that Judge King was fitted to fill the most exalted judicial station; his judicial character will compare favorably with that of any other jurist living or dead, while it is to be regretted that his powers, during the last twenty-one years of his life, were devoted rather to solitary literary pursuits than to the development and elucidation of legal principles as applied to the laws governing the municipality, the State, and the nation.

Other jurists will adorn the bench, or attain eminence at the bar. Most fortunate will that man be who, when he departs, shall leave behind him the reputation for integrity, learning, and ability which justly belongs to Edward King.

Mr. McCall said that Judge King was naturally qualified for the position which he so long and so ably filled. His mind was clear, capacious, and capable of taking broad and liberal views. He was, indeed, a great magistrate. Whether deciding upon matters of life or death, or of the ownership of large amounts of property, or whether moulding with plastic hand the system of equity, he showed the master mind. His opinions were so clear and broad, the principle of the case was so beautifully eliminated, that he stands to-day the model judge. As to the moral side of his character, what man has ever accused him with justice of want of integrity? While a strong party man off the bench, even the bitterest of his political opponents did not charge him with a jot or tittle of partiality to his party while on the bench. Outside of the profession he was a man of extensive and varied parts. After his retirement he did nothing of a public character except to create our criminal code, which is an enduring monument in itself of his genius and learning. He came forward again when sectional difficulties threatened the nation's life, and last when of late years he became an active member of the board of city trusts.

Hon. Benjamin Harris Brewster spoke substantially as follows:

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen:—I had intended to abstain from speaking here, although requested to do so, for I was deputed to arrange and organize this meeting by those who are the personal representatives of the distinguished deceased. I was selected under circumstances which were painfully agreeable to me—selected because he was my earliest, firmest friend in life. When I first came to the bar I made his acquaintance, and the friendship which was then given by him when in the zenith of his power to me, an obscure boy, lasted through his long and useful life.

A very young man, obscure in his profession, and with prominence and notoriety as a politician only, he came to fill a place which had been filled by Judge Rush, a man of the most vigorous legal intellect and high character; a place which had been filled by Judge Hallowell, a trained lawyer, enjoying the confidence and respect of the people. The bar at that day was the most brilliant in the country, for among them stood out such men as Horace Binney, John and Thomas Sergeant, and Charles Chauncey, of the elder bar, and Joseph and Charles J. Ingersoll, John M. Lowber, Thomas Kittora, George M. Dallas and David Paul Brown, of the junior bar.

Judge King assumed that high obligation, and presented himself before such a bar unsheltered and unprotected by associates, for he stood alone, being the only lawyer on the bench, in the presence of this profession, many of the members of which were opposed to him politically, none of whom had confidence in his legal attainments, and thus unaided he solemnly resolved to do his duty, "so help me God," as he told me, with great impressiveness, soon after. And he kept his word, for that profession, so critical in its judgment, almost immediately after his elevation to the bench, bestowed on him the loudest praises, and continued to show him honor to the last.

His private life was not a happy one. He was a childless man. After the death of his first wife, he married a young and charming woman, who was the honor, the grace, and the joy of his life. I knew all these things, for he did me the honor to make me the familiar, the friend of his house. She died. The blow he thus received he carried through life. True, as his pursuits upon the bench became more onerous, his attention became distracted, but when he went to his home, and when he left the bench, the shadow settled down upon his life, and he bore it with him till he lay down to die.

At one time he was very near being chosen a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States. It would have been well for the country if he had been so chosen, for he would have left his mark on the jurisprudence of the whole country as he did in the more secluded spheres in which he moved, for he was such a man as was Robert Grier and John Bannister Gibson, those noble representatives of Pennsylvania.

Edward King was removed from that bench he had so worthily occupied by the act of the law, and when he came down from his position as a judge, truly he felt his occupation gone. He went to his dark and lonesome home, and sat down in solitude with his grief. But he was a thorough man, and he rallied, and with the zeal and earnestness of a boy took up the study of languages. He soon became a linguist, speaking all the modern tongues. Thus armed with a proper knowledge he travelled in England, on the Continent, and in other lands, and by this means sought to dispel the solemn cloud that made life to him a midnight of sorrow. But he returned home, and such melancholy settled upon him as made it painful for his friends to see him.

He was pure, upright, benevolent, a true friend, a just and fearless magistrate. And now, in closing, I can say nothing better of this dead judge than has been happily said by Francis Wharton in the preface to his American Law of Homicide. Mr. Wharton says in the preface to the work printed in 1855:

"I cannot, however, omit here to express the acknowledgments which I feel are due to a great master of criminal law, whose labors in that field, I fear, are now closed. Edward King was president of the Court of Common Pleas in Philadelphia from 1826 to 1852, during which period the entire criminal practice of that jurisdiction, with very few exceptions, passed under his supervision and was moulded by his hands. By him the accepted exposition of the statute discriminating murder into two degrees was first framed, and wherever in the numerous States in which that statute has been adopted, the learning of that branch of homicide is considered, it is upon his simple and yet most luminous commentary on that once vexed question that both counsel and courts finally repose. Of the same manly and just power of comprehension and perspicuousness of style, the charges and opinions at the close of the volume, on riotous homicide, may be taken as still more signal illustrations, and I am glad to have the opportunity of saying now what I was unwilling to say at the time of its publication, when Judge King was on the bench, and in the meridian of his intellectual faculties and reputation, that whatever credit the first edition of my work on criminal law is entitled to is due in part to his opinions, which were interspersed in its pages, but chiefly to the general tone of sentiment I gathered from him during a period of two years, in which I occupied an official position which brought me in constant intercourse with him while in the exercise of his judicial functions. Ten years have passed since then; many changes have taken place. In the vicissitudes of life, particularly of judicial life, new objects of official respect and personal admiration have arisen before the bar. Before another opportunity like the present would enable me to speak, death itself might come in to close the power of the one to hear, or the other to tender such a tribute as the present, and I am admonished, therefore, to take this moment of recording the acknowledgment, and as I conceive, those of all who are interested in the administration of penal justice, to a judge who, I think, has done more than any other living man to establish in our midst a wise, liberal and humane system of criminal jurisprudence." Mr. Brewster closed with: "It is to give expression to such sentiments as these that we have met here to-day."

After an address from Hon. William D. Kelley, and the appointment of Messrs. Wm. L. Hirst, Judge James R. Ludlow, Benj. Harris Brewster, Judge John Cadwalader, Eli K. Price, Wm. D. Kelley, Isaac Hazlehurst, and the officers of the meeting, as the committee provided for in the resolutions, the meeting adjourned.

In the Court of Common Pleas on Saturday morning, 10th inst., Judges Allison, Ludlow, Paxson and Finletter on the bench. Henry M. Phillips, Esq., in some appropriate remarks, announced to the court, the death of Judge King.

In response, Judge Allison said:

It is eminently proper that the death of Judge Edward King should not, in this court, be allowed to pass unnoticed. Judge King here began his career as a judicial officer, and here he continued to discharge the important duties of his high office for more than a quarter of a century. How well he performed those duties, and to what eminence he attained, let the imperishable record which he has left behind him, bear testimony.

It speaks for him now that he is dead, and will continue through advancing years to stand, as the monument of his intellectual greatness; the evidence of his industry and attainments as one of the most accomplished and most able lawyers of his age.

To say that Edward King was a great lawyer is to do for him no more than the simplest justice; and to add to it that this country has furnished to the profession of the law, but few indeed who could take their place by his side and claim to be his peers, is to keep within the bounds of strict truth. Had he chosen to seek for posthumous fame in the same way in which Kent and Story have attained it, can any one who knew Edward King doubt how successfully he would have achieved it; his acute and comprehensive intellect, his broad views of law as a science, his profound learning and his great industry, would have made his name as much respected in Westminster Hall to-day, as are those of our countrymen, in whose transatlantic fame we take a just and honest pride. His mind was a wonder to those who in his strongest and better days were privileged to witness its operations; and in the combined qualities of activity and of comprehensive grasp, I think I have never known its equal. In every department of the law he was great. In the principles of the common law and in its adaptation to the varied conditions of his own day and country, he was perfectly at home.

In criminal jurisprudence how he towered above his compeers, and with what trust and confidence we turn to the solid basis upon which he rested and applied its great principles as the protection of the life and liberty of the citizen; and of him it may be said, with as much justice as Lord Campbell in his Lives of the Lord Chancellors of England, says of Finch, afterwards Earl of Nottingham, that he was not only a "consummate lawyer," but that he was the "Father of Equity." Who, but Edward King first dug up the foundation stones of the science of equity, arranged and placed them in their order, and constructed for us in Pennsylvania the solid and beautiful and important temple under whose shadows we now securely rest?

It is to the result of his labors in a great measure that we now turn, as to a strong tower—a sure defence for the protection of the sacred rights of property against the repeated and combined assaults of over-grown wealth and the lust of over-grown power. The legal profession owe to his memory the most profound respect, as well as a weight of obligation they can never repay, nor will the men of our State, of this or other generations ever fully know how much they are indebted to him for having settled upon an enduring basis, that system, once discarded but now of necessity adopted as a part and a most important part of the law of our commonwealth.

As a tribute to his greatness as a lawyer, because of the personal obligation I feel myself under to him for the help his labors have been to me, and because I regard him as a benefactor to the legal profession and to the public as well, I bear this willing tribute to his memory, and believing, as I do of him, I have thought it not only becoming but right, that from this judgment seat, where he so long and with such distinguished ability presided, and which he so greatly adorned, and following him, as his successor in office, but at a far-off distance from his greatness, that I should speak for him now that he cannot speak for himself, and express the hope that his name and fame, the profession of the law will not allow to pass into forgetfulness after we shall have laid him in his grave. As Philadelphians, as Pennsylvanians, as lawyers, we should bear his memory in grateful recollection.

In order to allow members of the bar and others to attend the funeral on Monday, the Courts of Common Pleas and Quarter Sessions were adjourned until Tuesday morning.

The Constitutional Convention have been engaged this week in further discussion of the report of the Judiciary Committee. The report has been materially modified, and we think for the better. The cumulative system of voting is applied to the election of judges, the number of Supreme Court judges is increased to seven, each county of 30,000 inhabitants or over, is made a separate judicial district, and the present aldermanic system of Philadelphia is abolished—all excellent and much needed reforms.

We have received from a member of the Philadelphia bar, some interesting sketches of the late Judge King, published as far back as 1844. We regret that, want of space compels us to crowd them out.

Troubat & Haly's Practice, vol. I, p. 296, treats of a "former discharge under the insolent laws of another State, meaning of course the insolvent laws."

Recent Decisions.

UNITED STATES COURTS.

[Head notes of cases reported in 1st Sawyer's United States Reports, 9th (California) Circuit—Received from the Publishers, A. L. Bancroft & Co., San Francisco.]

BANKRUPTCY.

Where a creditor has attempted to obtain a preference over other creditors, by fraudulently increasing the amount of his claim, the whole claim will be rejected. In re Elder, 73.

The District Courts of the United States, sitting in bankruptcy, have power to restrain by injunction, the sheriff of a State court, from proceeding to sell the property of a voluntary bankrupt, under an execution issued out of a State court, upon a judgment obtained before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy. In re Mallory, 88.

It has also the power to declare the lien of a judgment of a State court void as against the general creditors, if such lien is an unlawful preference under the bankrupt act. Id.

The ordinary tribunals are not deprived, by a mere force of an adjudication in bankruptcy, of jurisdiction over suits against the bankrupt. The proceedings in such suits may be arrested or controlled by the Bankruptcy Court, when necessary for the purposes of justice; but in the absence of such interference, the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals remains unimpaired, and their judgments are valid. In re Davis, 260.

Where a petition in bankruptcy is filed in the name and on behalf of a corporation, without proper authority, the register acquires no jurisdiction to adjudge the corporation a bankrupt. In re Lady Bryan & Co., 349.

Under the provisions of the thirty-seventh section of the bankrupt act, the filing of a petition on behalf of a corporation, can only be "duly authorized by a vote of the majority of the corporators, at any legal meeting called for the purpose." Id.

A "corporator," within the meaning of the act, is one of the constituents or stockholders of the corporation. Id.

A surviving partner will be adjudged bankrupt on an act of bankruptcy committed by him in the course of the administration of the assets of the dissolved partnership, notwithstanding that the separate estate of the deceased is sufficient to pay all his debts, joint and separate. In re Stevens, 390.

COMMON CARRIER.

Although the bill of lading states that a package was received in good order, the carrier may, nevertheless, show that it was secretly defective or insufficient. The Oriflamnae, 176.

A common carrier is not, under all circumstances, entitled to know the contents of packages tendered for carriage, and a mere failure to ascertain whether the package contains anything dangerous, there being no reasonable ground for suspicion, does not, of itself, constitute negligence. Parrott v. Barney, 423.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Under the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, and the act of May 31st, 1870 (16 Stat. 140), to enforce it, all persons declared citizens of the United States by the fourteenth amendment, are entitled to vote in the States where they reside, at all elections by the people, without distinction of race, color or previous condition of servitude; but the several States, notwithstanding the amendment, have the power to deny the right of suffrage to any citizen of the United States on account of age, sex, place of birth, vocation, want of property or intelligence, neglect of civic duties, crime or other cause not specified in the amendment. McKay v. Campbell, 374.

CONTRACT.

When a vendor of grain, bound by the contract to deliver, from time to time, upon requisitions made by the purchaser, refuses to deliver upon requisitions made in pursuance of the contract, and notifies the purchaser that he regards the contract as rescinded, and that he will deliver no more grain under it, the purchaser may treat the contract as wholly broken, and sue for and recover the damages upon the entire contract, without making further requisitions. United States v. Robinson, 19.

CORPORATIONS.

A stockholder or creditor of a corporation, cannot maintain a suit for an injury to the corporate rights, unless it appears from the bill that the corporation refused to take proper measures to protect or redress the same. Newby v. Oregon Central R. R. Co., 64.

COVENANT.

No covenant is implied from the use of the words in a deed, "bargain, sell and quit claim." Lamb v. Kamm, 238.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE.

Misdemeanors may be prosecuted in the National courts by information. United States v. Waller, 701.

DAMAGES.

The actual damage sustained, directly resulting from the infringement of a patent, is the amount to be recovered. Carter v. Baker, 512.

The plaintiff is entitled to recover the profits realized by the wrong doer from the infringement of a patent, as a part of the damages. Id.

EXPERTS.

The testimony of experts is to be considered like any other testimony; is to be tried by the same tests, and receive just so much weight and credit as the jury may deem it entitled to, when viewed in connection with all the circumstances. Carter v. Baker, 512.

JURISDICTION.

There must be an actual seizure before any judicial proceedings are instituted, to condemn a vessel for violation of the navigation laws of the United States. United States v. The Fideliter, 153.

If seizure is not alleged in the libel, the objection may be taken for the first time in the Appellate Court. Ib.

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

In the absence of some agreement to the contrary, the tenant is responsible for all waste, however or by whomsoever committed, except it be occasioned by act of God, the public enemy, or the act of the reversioner himself. Parrott v. Barney, 423.

A covenant in a lease, to surrender the premises at the expiration of the term, in as good condition as the reasonable wear thereof will permit, damages by the elements excepted, does not protect the tenant from liability for waste, resulting from accidents occurring without his fault. Id.

A covenant in a lease, requiring the tenant to occupy the premises for a specific purpose, as an express office, does not impose on the landlord and exempt the tenant from all the risks incident to such business, not resulting from the wrongful acts or negligence of the tenant. Id.

MARRIAGE.

The laws of California (Hit. Dig. 4, 466) and of Oregon (Or. Code, 783, 785), require that the consent of the parties to become husband and wife, must be declared in presence of a person authorized by such laws to solemnize marriage, and two witnesses, and without the observance of these formalities, the marriage relation cannot be created or entered into, in either of such States. Holmes v. Holmes, 99.

Where citizens of a State purposely go beyond its jurisdiction, and not within the jurisdiction of another State—as at sea—and there contract marriage otherwise than in accordance with the laws of such State, the transaction is a fraudulent evasion of the laws to which the parties owe obedience, and, therefore, void. Id.

MORTGAGE.

A mortgage of personal property, accompanied by an oral agreement or understanding between the parties thereto, that the property should remain in the possession of the mortgagor, and be disposed of by him in the course of his business, and the proceeds thereof applied to his own use, is a conveyance or assignment of such property in trust for the person making the same, and, therefore, void as against the creditors existing or subsequent of such mortgagor (Or. Code, 655). Catlin v. Currier, 7.

PATENT.

An infringement involves substantial identity. If the invention of the patentee is a machine, or an improvement on a machine, the patent will be infringed by a machine which incorporates in its structure and operation the substance of the invention; that is, by an arrangement of its mechanism, which performs the same service or produces the same effect, in the same, or substantially the same way. Carter v. Baker, 512.

PROMISSORY NOTE.

The mere delivery and receipt of the promissory note of the debtor or a third person, does not constitute payment, but it must also appear that the creditor expressly agreed to take such note as payment. In re Ouimette, 48.

RECEIPT.

The word "demand" on a receipt, ordinarily relates only to claims arising ex-contractu, and not to those arising ex-delicto. Hanson v. Fowle, 539.

TENANT IN COMMON.

A deed by a tenant in common, for his interest in a particular part of the land held in common, although void as against his co-tenant, is good against himself and those claiming under him. Lamb v. Wakefield, 251.

WATER.

Plaintiff, in excavating a tunnel in a mountain to its mining claim, on the public land of the United States, struck a subterranean flow of water, which it appropriated and enjoyed for several years. Defendants ran a tunnel from a distant point into the mountain, to a point some thirty feet in altitude, directly below the point where the plaintiff obtained the said water; and, thereupon, the water, which before flowed through plaintiff's tunnel was intercepted, and discharged through defendants' tunnel, and by them appropriated to their own use: Held, That diversion and appropriation of the water was wrongful, and that complainant was entitled to an injunction. Cole S. M. Co. v. V. & G. H. W. Co., 470.

WIFE.

A chose in action accruing to a woman during converture, survives to her, unless the husband reduce it to his exclusive possession during his lifetime; therefore, when a legacy was given to the wife, and she and her husband joined in a power of attorney, authorizing O. to collect and receive the same for her use and benefit, the receipt of the money by O., during the life of the husband, was not the possession of the latter, except for the use of the wife, and the right to recover the same from O., survived to her. Chappelle v. Olney, 401.

WITNESS.

Under the act of February 25th, 1868 (15 Stat. 37), a person may be compelled in a judicial proceeding to testify to matters tending to criminate himself, but no use can be made of such testimony against the witness in a criminal proceeding. United States v. Brown, 531.

shall be sufficient personal service on the company. The term process includes any writ of summons, subpœna, or order, whereby any action, suit or proceedings shall be commenced, or which shall be issued in or upon any action, suit or proceedings brought in any court of this commonwealth having jurisdiction of the subject matter.

SECT. 14. That any person or persons, or corporation, receiving premiums, or forwarding applications, or in any other way transacting business for any insurance company or association not of this State, without having received authority agreeably to the provisions of this act, shall forfeit and pay to the commonwealth the sum of five hundred dollars for each month or fraction thereof during which such illegal business was transacted, and any company not of this State doing business without authority, shall forfeit a like sum for every month or fraction thereof, and be prohibited from doing business in this State until such fines are fully paid.

SECT. 15. The taxes, fines and penalties provided in this act shall, in case of non-payment, after notice from the commissioner, be collected as taxes upon corporations or individuals are now collected by law, and for this purpose the insurance commissioner shall have all the powers now conferred by law upon the auditor general in the settlement of accounts, subject, however, to the approval of the State treasurer, and to the right of appeal as in other cases.

SECT. 16. The provisions of this act shall not be applicable to insurance companies incorporated by other States, or by the United States, or by foreign governments, until from and after the first day of January, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four; nor shall it apply, excepting the eighth section of this act, to fire insurance companies of this State organized and conducted on the purely mutual plan, with premium notes as the basis of security, and without capital stock, guaranty capital or accumulated reserve in lieu of capital stock, but the mutual companies aforesaid shall, at all times, be required to answer such interrogatories as the insurance commissioner may require, in order to ascertain their true character and condition, and for this purpose he may, at any time, institute an examination into their affairs, as in the case of companies subject to the general provisions of this act.

SECT. 17. That it shall not be lawful for any city, county or municipality to impose or collect any license fee or tax upon insurance companies or their agents, authorized to transact business under this act.

SECT. 18. That an act to revise, amend and consolidate the several laws regulating the licensing of foreign insurance companies, approved April eleventh, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, is hereby repealed, said repeal to date from the first day of January, Anno Domini one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, saving, however, to the commonwealth the right to collect all taxes and fees accrued under said act.

Approved April 4th, 1873.

REGISTER'S NOTICE. To all Legatees, Creditors, and other persons interested:

Notice is hereby given that the following named persons did, on the dates affixed to their names, file the accounts of their Administration to the estates of those persons deceased and Guardians' and Trustees' accounts, whose names are undermentioned, in the office of the Register for the Probate of Wills and granting Letters of Administration, in and for the City and County of Philadelphia: and that the same will be presented to the Orphans' Court of said City and County for confirmation and allowance, on the third FRIDAY in May, A. D. 1873, at 10 o'clock in the morning, at the County Court House in said city.
