The fertility of the Royal British Bank case in difficult legal questions is not yet exhausted. On Saturday last Mr. Commissioner GOULBURN delivered an elaborate judgment in the Court of Bankruptcy, refusing a proof tendered by Mr. Harding, the official manager, against a bankrupt's estate, upon the ground that the bankrupt had been placed upon the list of contributories by the chief clerk of Vice-Chancellor KINDERSLEY, instead of by the Vice-Chancellor himself; and that this was an improper delegation of the judicial function. The case has been brought by appeal before the Lords Justices, and will be heard by them on the second day of next term. We subjoin an abridgment of the judgment of the Commissioner.

"The case involved a question of the utmost importance—namely, whether orders might be made, and judicial acts done, by the chief clerks of the vice-chancellors, in the absence of the judges themselves, and whether the subsequent assent of the vice-chancellors, not even signified by their signature, was sufficient to give validity to such orders. Should this doctrine be upheld, extremely mischievous consequences would ensue. By the first Winding-up Act (11 & 12 Vict. cap. 45) the list of contributories was to be made out by the official manager, and settled by the Master; and everything was carefully required to be done by the Masters, who had original jurisdiction given them for the purpose. The legislature had strictly pointed out the mode in which this most important judicial act was to be performed. Such an act ought to be done by a competent authority, and one that could exercise a judicial discretion. But since the Winding-up Acts passed, the legislature had abolished the office of Masters in Chancery, and transferred their duties to the judges. The Act making the change (the 15 & 16 Vic. c. 80) empowered the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors to sit at chambers, and directed that the orders 'made' by them should be ordinarily 'drawn up' by their respective clerks—the one involving the exercise of a judicial mind, the other being a mere matter of form. Then power was given to the judges to appoint two chief clerks each 'for the purpose of assisting in the general business of each court, and the causes and matters belonging thereto.' These were very general words, but it could not be held that they extended to the exercise of the judicial authority; for that would be to give to the chief clerks, persons without position or rank in the profession, an authority beyond what had been exercised by the Masters. The object clearly was, that these chief clerks should be put in the place of the clerks of the Masters, as the Vice-Chancellors were substitutes for the Masters. Could the Master, before the passing of the 15th and 16th Vict., have devolved the performance of judicial duties upon his clerk? Was there any instance of a Master being absent from the settling of a list of contributories, devolving the duty on his clerk, and satisfying himself with signing it after, and signing it with a wrong date, as had been done in this case? No such instance could be found; and had such a practice prevailed, it would have increased the outcry against those functionaries very much. Then the question arose, whether, where the list had been settled by the chief clerk, it could be said to be legally and properly and rightly settled; for if this bankrupt's name was not legally put upon the list of contributories, of course his estate would not be liable for this call. The Court thought that it had not been legally put there, and that the original defect could not be cured by the subsequent alterations and erasures in the documents that had been put on the file. These were but attempts to make that appear to be right which was in its origin and substance clearly wrong. The words of the Masters Abolition Act, "assisting in the general business of each court, and in the causes and matters belonging thereto," could not mean that the clerk was to sit for the judge, and determine all matters judicial or otherwise, subject only to the right of either party to call for the presence of the judge if he thought fit. But it was said, the practice of the Court of Chancery had sanctioned this. If this were a practice of any long standing, he could comprehend the argument; but it had sprung up within a few years; the Act had only been passed in 1852; and five years was hardly long enough to give sanction to a practice which gainsaid and contradicted the express enactments of the statute. But no length of practice could justify such a course. It was a principle of our law that the judicial authority could not be delegated. In this case judicial authority was delegated to an individual who was not appointed by the Act, thus getting rid, in a matter of such vital importance to the suitor as the settling of a list of contributories, of that check and control which the law meant to give to the suitor—namely, the judicial mind of a person in the first rank of the profession, with all the experience and learning which belonged to those eminent persons who presided in the Courts of Equity."

The resolution of the societies of the Inner and Middle Temple in favour of the compulsory examination of all aspirants to the Bar must soon be adopted, or, at least, acquiesced in by the two other learned bodies who have hitherto shown themselves reluctant to admit this beneficial change. The absurdity of the present practice, which gives to candidates the option either of attending lectures or of passing an examination, is too manifest to need exposure. Of course it was only intended as a gradual transition from a system of mere empty form to one of life and reality, and is one of many examples of the sort of compromise with inertness to which active reformers find it necessary to submit. The innovation which, a few years ago, "added the necessity of passing a certain number of hours in a lecture-room to the necessity previously and still existing of eating a certain number of dinners in a hall," however trifling and useless in itself, was valuable as the earliest step in a course of improvement which we may now hope to see carried into full effect. It is very desirable that public attention should be drawn to what is called by the Daily News the "eminently ridiculous system" now existing, and we were glad to see in that Journal on Wednesday an article on this subject, from which we subjoin an extract. The tendency of legislation has undoubtedly been, and still is, to increase the number of judicial and other appointments open to, if not exclusively reserved for, barristers; and society is therefore most intimately concerned to see that the best conceivable means be taken to secure efficiency, instead of contenting itself with the requirements of dining, hearing, but not necessarily marking, lectures, and of so many years' "standing," which by no means invariably implies advancement in either the study or practice of the law.

"Whether for better or for worse, it is incontestable that a great change is taking place in the professional position of the English Bar. The amount of business transacted in the Superior Courts has necessarily been much diminished by the establishment of local courts. Concurrently with this, partly in fact as necessarily incident to this, the number of minor judicial and other offices for which members of the Bar alone are eligible has vastly increased. The country is covered with county court judges and stipendiary magistrates, the sole statutable requisite for these offices being a standing of seven years at the bar. The present tendency of our legislation is to increase still further this amount of bar patronage. The cry for paid legal chairmen of quarter sessions has more than once been raised, and is certain to be raised again. A bill for the establishment of public prosecutors was introduced in the last Parliament, and, with due modifications, will very probably pass in the present Parliament. Every extension of our colonial empire makes a fresh piece of patronage for the bar. From Hong Kong to the Bay Islands, from New Zealand to Nova Scotia, the habitable globe is thickly dotted with chief justices, puisne judges, recorders, and attorney-generals, who have each and all worn the stuff gown of the British barrister.

"Now, put these two things together—the diminished practice of Westminister Hall and the greatly increased official patronage thrown open to the bar—and the result deserves serious consideration. The old reply to the argument for a compulsory test of legal fitness in the candidate for the bar was this: If a man wants to live by his profession, he must learn his profession. He will get no practice unless he possesses some knowledge. In any case the reply was a most unsatisfactory one. The professional knowledge thus acquired by the British barrister was of that narrow, bread-making kind, which contented itself with satisfying the daily exigencies of daily work. The English advocate gained consummate skill in the contracted sphere of such legal knowledge as the every-day practice of the English bar absolutely required; but in all beyond this—in general juridical accomplishments, in acquaintance with civil law, with public law, with law as a science, and not as a mere trade—he was and is lamentably deficient. It could not be otherwise. He had no general legal education—he had merely that special instruction which the instincts of money-making and the impulses of advancement taught him to acquire. At best, then, this reply was always a most unsatisfactory one, but it is far more unsatisfactory now. In the present state of the English bar, numbers crowd to it not so much from any chimerical hope of living by its practice, as from the better grounded expectation of participating through interest or connection in its patronage. Their principal objects are those home and colonial appointments, which hold out such a lure to men who are more desirous of a respectable competency than of a brilliant career. Now, what security is there—what likelihood is there—that men of this class will be at any pains adequately to educate themselves? And are our legislators prepared to say that the interests of home or colonial suitors can be rightly trusted to judges who have received no adequate legal training, either educational or practical? The sole remedy is the institution of a compulsory examination for all candidates for admission to the bar."

LEEDS DISTRICT COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

(Before Mr. Commissioner AYRTON.)

Jones v. Wright.—April 28, 1857.

ABSCONDING DEBTORS ACT—DEBT "OWING" AND "PAYABLE"—WARRANT—DIRECTION—ARREST.

To authorise an arrest, the debt must be "payable" as well as "owing;" therefore a warrant ought not to be granted on a bill of exchange on the last of the three days of grace. The messenger alone can execute the warrant, and the Court has no power to direct it to any one else.

The plaintiff had drawn a bill upon the defendant for £30, which the latter had accepted, payable in London. The plaintiff indorsed the bill for value to the Derwent Iron Company. The bill was due on the 22nd of April, and consequently the three days of grace expired on the 25th. On the morning of that day the defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff, asking him to renew the bill, and stating that defendant was going upon the continent for some months on business, but the bill would be provided for in his absence. The plaintiff, without giving any answer to the letter, made an affidavit that the defendant was indebted to him "in the sum of £30 for principal money, upon a bill of exchange, dated &c., drawn by this defendant upon, and accepted by, the said John Wright, payable at a day now passed," &c., and in 6*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* for goods; and that defendant was about to quit England, &c.; and setting out the defendant's letter. Upon this affidavit Mr. Commissioner Ayrton granted a warrant to arrest the defendant, which was directed to "T. W. N., Messenger of the Court of Bankruptcy for the Leeds District, and to Samuel Clark, his assistant." The warrant was indorsed "Bail for 72*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*, by order of the said J. B. P." (the plaintiff's attorney).

The messenger himself was not aware that the warrant had been granted until after it was executed; but Clark, his assistant, arrested the defendant on the afternoon of the 25th of April. The defendant offered bail and found sureties (to whom, however, the plaintiff's attorney objected), but Clark could not find any form of bail bond, and the defendant remained in custody until Monday evening, the 27th April. On that day, Bond, for the defendant, obtained a rule nisi, under the 8th section of the Act (14 & 15 Vict. c. 52), for his discharge, upon an affidavit, stating the above facts, and the defendant's belief that the Derwent Iron Company were the holders of the bill at the time of the arrest. This the plaintiff did not deny. No capias had been issued. The rule was made returnable to-day.

Bond moved to make the rule absolute. Besides the warrant being wrongly indorsed for bail for double the amount of the debt, "by order of the plaintiff's attorney," instead of for such a sum as the Court should direct, "by order of the Commissioner issuing it," there were two substantial grounds upon which he claimed the defendant's discharge: First, there was no debt; and secondly, no valid arrest. According to the first clause of the Act there must be a debt of £20 "owing to such creditor, and payable from the person against whom such application shall be made," before the Commissioner can grant a warrant. Here the bill was due on the 25th, and the defendant had all that day to pay it (Byles, on Bills, 165); and if the plaintiff had refused his request to renew, the defendant might have paid the bill by means of the Telegraph Company. The allegation in the plaintiff's affidavit, that the bill was "payable at a day now past" was untrue; and if he had sworn according to the truth, the warrant would not have been granted. If not guilty of perjury, the plaintiff has committed a gross contempt of this court, in procuring a warrant by means of concealment and fraud. And again, the debt, if owing and payable, was not payable to "such creditor," for the plaintiff was not the holder of the bill. The Derwent Iron Company might have obtained a warrant upon it on Monday morning. They, and not the plaintiff, can alone at this moment give a discharge.

Secondly, there was no arrest. The 1st section of the Act authorises the Commissioner to direct his warrant to "the messenger of the Court," and to no one else, and he alone can execute it. The 99th section of the Bankrupts' Act (12 & 13 Vict. c. 106) gives the Commissioner power to direct his warrant to "a messenger of the Court and his assistants, or to such person or persons as the Court shall think fit;" and the 119th section to "any person or persons it shall think fit;" but then the party is only to arrest the bankrupt, and bring him before the Court; here the messenger may take bail or receive a deposit. The reason for the distinction is therefore obvious. Suppose, instead of £36, the debt had been £360, or £3600, and the defendant had been ready to "deposit" it, he (and, indeed, the plaintiff also) ought to have the security of the messenger's responsibility, and not to be obliged to place such a sum in the hands of a common bailiff; and in this very case the defendant had offered bail, which was not accepted, because the messenger's assistant could not prepare a proper bail bond, which the messenger himself could, of course, have done. The decisions are all one way (Blatch v. Austin, 1 Camp. 63; Sly v. Stevenson, 2 C. & P. 464; R. v. Whalley, 7 C. & P 245); and the Court of Exchequer acted upon them so lately as the 21st ult., in a case of Rhodes v. Hall, only just reported in the newspapers.

Preston, for the plaintiff.—There was no intention to deceive the Court. The plaintiff knew that the bill would not be met, and thought it was under his own control. The defendant's letter justified him in making the affidavit, for the bill was substantially dishonoured. The acceptance was general (1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 78), and the plaintiff was not bound to wait. On the second point, he stated that it was the practice for the deputy to execute the warrant, and that no harm could come of it.

Bond, in reply.—The plaintiff was not the holder, and therefore the 1 & 2 Geo. 4 does not apply. On the other point, "a blot is no blot until it is hit."

Mr. Commissioner AYRTON.—This is an important statute, and we must take care that no abuses are permitted under it. On both these questions its provisions are clear. I did not know, when I granted the warrant, that the bill was not in the plaintiff's hands. Saturday was the last day, but the defendant had all that day to pay the bill, and he might have done so. At all events, the plaintiff could not know that it had been dishonoured; therefore he could not properly swear that the debt was due, nor could he have commenced an action. Then the Act plainly requires the warrant to be directed to the messenger. I have no authority to direct it to any one else, and no one else could execute it. The rule to discharge the defendant must be absolute.

THE CIRCUIT COMMISSION.

The following memorial has been presented to the Commissioners by the Lancaster Law Society:—

Prior to the year 1835, the assizes for the whole County Palatine of Lancaster were held at Lancaster. For reasons which now no longer apply, the assize business of the southern division of the county was in that year removed to Liverpool. Lancaster had then no railway or telegraphic communication with any part of the county; now it possesses both on all sides of it; while the accommodation for the judges and their suites, and the courts and offices for the assize business, are the most commodious in the Kingdom.

The personal experience of the Members of the Lancaster Law Society, confirmed as it is, by that of other members of the profession in other localities—establishes in their minds the truth that a moderate sized town like Lancaster, while it presents ample accommodation for all who have need to resort to the assize town, does not produce the many inconveniences which arise in a town of large extent, like Liverpool. Among these inconveniences may be enumerated the difficulty of keeping together witnesses, who, in a large town, are continually attracted from their necessary attendance in court by objects of interest; the wide area over which the lodgings of the members of the bar are scattered, and the consequent labour and time occupied in delivering briefs, appointing and attending consultations, &c.; the distance from the courts at which fitting accommodation for the humbler class of witnesses—always the most difficult to control—is to be had. The rapid and economical communication by railway has added a new feature of eligibility (as places for holding assizes) to many towns of moderate size, and to none more than to Lancaster, upon which, as upon a common centre, many lines of railway converge.

The Society urge the eligibility of Lancaster as a very convenient and central place for a new and enlarged assize district. They propose that the assize business for that part of the County Palatine which is now transacted at Lancaster, should still be continued there,—this consists of the Hundreds of Blackburn, Leyland, Amounderness, and Lonsdale North and South of the Sands, all of which, except Lonsdale North of the Sands, find ready and immediate access to Lancaster by the Lancaster and Preston Railway, and the parts of those Hundreds the most remote from Lancaster, are not distant more than an hour and a half's journey. The Hundred of Lonsdale North of the Sands in which the town of the Ulverstone is situate, will in July next be within an hour's journey to Lancaster, by the opening of the Ulverstone and Lancaster Railway.

The Society believe that great public advantage would result if the following county court divisions were added to the Lancaster assize district, and they point out the ready access which these districts now have to Lancaster:—

Name of County Court District.	Time of Journey.	Means of access to Lancaster.
Ambleside	1h. 30m.	Kendal and Windermere, and Lancaster and Carlisle Railways.
Kendal	45m.	Lancaster and Carlisle Railway.
Kirkby Lonsdale	1h.	Lancaster and Carlisle and North Western Railways.
Settle	45m.	North Western Railway.
Skipton	1h. 30m.	North Western Railway.
Keighley	1h. 50m.	Leeds and Bradford Extension and North Western Railways.
Such part of the Clitheroe district as is in Yorkshire.	1h. 30m.	North Western Railway.

The district thus pointed out is, for the most part, but thinly inhabited by a purely agricultural population, and notwithstanding the great apparent area of country embraced in it, would not create any very important addition to the assize business already transacted at Lancaster.

It is believed that other of the county court districts of Yorkshire, traversed by the Leeds and Bradford Extension Railway, would find a greater convenience in transacting their assize business at Lancaster, with which they have direct railway communication, than at York, which is more distant, and with which the railway communication is less direct.

SCOTCH MERCANTILE LAW.

(From the Mercantile Test.)

The merchants of Scotland have already discovered the loss they have sustained in parting, last session of Parliament, with their good old Scottish rule of mercantile law, which declared that a transfer of goods, without delivery, was no transfer at all.

The Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce has taken up this important matter and referred it to a special committee, with instructions to report on the subject without delay.

Our readers may remember, that, during the last session of Parliament, two bills were introduced: one to assimilate sundry parts of the law of England to the law of Scotland; the other to assimilate certain portions of the Scottish law to the law of England; and that both these bills passed into law.

Now, one of those two Acts has destroyed the most valuable safeguard which the creditor possessed against the machinations of fraudulent traders in Scotland, and it has provided no substitute. Before it passed into law, every creditor in Scotland had this valuable security, that, whatever goods were in the trader's possession, the law assumed to belong to him and to his creditors when he failed. It was impossible to transfer goods effectually, and at the same time to retain possession, because the law of Scotland held that such possession raised a false credit; and, following the rule of the Roman law, it sacrificed that property to the false credit which it had created.

The object of the bill was to assimilate that portion of the law of Scotland to the law of England, which allows the transferror to retain possession of the goods transferred, provided the transfer be recorded in a public register within twenty-one days after its date. The bill was, however, unskilfully prepared. It adopted the law of England in so far as it allows the transferror to retain possession of the goods after the transfer, but it omitted to provide the essential safeguard of public registration.

The value of the English system of registrations of these documents is practically illustrated every week in the Mercantile Test, by the publication of all English bills of sale; whereas, in Scotland, under this new and defective law, there is no possibility of ascertaining whether the goods in a trader's shop be his own, or are conveyed in security to a creditor.

Whether the English plan of registration, or the good old rule of the Scottish law, be the better remedy, is a matter for the serious consideration of mercantile men. The English plan is effectual in so far only as, by registration, you can bring bills of sale to the actual knowledge of mercantile houses, who, by that warning, are enabled to avoid giving credit to traders whose necessities compel them to grant bills of sale; but in so far as this cannot be accomplished—and it can only be accomplished to a limited extent, even registered bills of sale are, to those houses, secret transactions; whereas the law of Scotland, as it stood until last session, cut at the very root of the fraud; it punished the very attempt, by declaring that all goods in an insolvent debtor's possession should belong to the creditors at large, and so prevented the possibility of fraud by means of bills of sale.

We have reason to believe that the English Chambers of Commerce would co-operate with the mercantile bodies of Scotland, in passing an Act of Parliament for the United Kingdom, adopting the old Scottish rule, which was the Roman law, rendering all bills of sale void without actual delivery of the goods at the time. With this view, we venture to suggest that the opinion of every known mercantile body in the United Kingdom should be immediately obtained on the subject; for if a majority of those bodies were favourable, an Act of Parliament adopting the Scottish rule would be obtained without any difficulty.

COURT OF CHANCERY, May 7—STRONGE v. HAWKES.— The last innings of this complicated game was played out this morning. The entanglement of the facts, accounts, and calculations of and arising out of the dispute can be likened only to a Chinese puzzle, and the endeavour to give any description is as hopeless as would be the effort to unravel a ball of cotton which had been submitted to the playful manipulation of a kitten. The mass of paper displayed on the tables, and the number of counsel who made their appearance, must have been appalling to such of the bystanders as were expectant litigants in Chancery. If the quarrel should eventually invade the repose of the House of Lords, there is in that august assembly at least one noble and learned ex-chancellor who will revel in its intricacies and involvements, and, having done so, will, in advising the House, commence his judgment with the favourite words, "There is no difficulty in this case." When the minutes were at last settled, after an hour and three-quarters discussion—Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE said, it was quite impossible to overstate the obligation the Court, the parties, and counsel were alike under to the laborious, the prolonged, and valuable aid the Lord Justice Turner had bestowed on the preparation of the minutes, without which there seemed little hope that the litigation could have been brought to a close.—Lord Justice TURNER briefly acknowledged the compliment; and the winning counsel having joined in a murmur of thankfulness, the Court of Chancery was relieved from its oppressive incubus.—Times.

GAOL PREFERRED TO FREEDOM — WORSHIP-STREET. — Emma Ayres, alias Spinks, a well-dressed, respectable-looking young woman, was charged with the following strange offence: —A few weeks ago the prisoner, whose personal appearance disarmed all suspicion, took a ready-furnished lodging, from which shortly after the carpet was missing. She was charged at this court with making away with it, acknowledged she had pledged it, and was summarily convicted and sentenced to three months imprisonment. In consequence of the incarceration of its mother, it became necessary to do something with the prisoner's illegitimate child, and the union officer was desired to communicate with the prisoner in gaol, that information might be obtained as to her place of settlement. He therefore made inquiry for Emma Ayres at the prison, and was introduced to a woman who responded to that name, and acknowledged she had been sentenced to three months' imprisonment for the carpet; but she displayed such hesitation, and her account of her former life and settlement was so inconsistent with what had been previously learnt, that a suspicion of something wrong was excited, and, the woman being in consequence subjected to a close questioning, the result of her very unwilling answers was the discovery that while in custody at this court—this woman being under a sentence of only seven days for disorderly conduct or some such slight offence—the prisoner Ayres was also locked up in the women's cell, and, the two women getting into friendly conversation, they ultimately agreed, for their mutual convenience, to exchange names and sentences. It was impossible for the officers of the gaol to know either woman from the mere commitments, and as no prisoner would generally take a longer term of imprisonment than he or she could help, a sufficient guarantee is mostly obtained against false personation; both women therefore, when they answered to the commitments, were received for what they appeared to be, and at the end of the seven days for which the other woman Matthews, was sentenced, Ayres, who had passed by that name, was discharged in due form, while Matthews willingly remained to complete the three months of Ayres. On asking her motive for voluntarily inflicting upon herself such a long term of needless punishment, it turned out that she was a woman in distressed circumstances, and, being far advanced in the family-way, with no prospect of being properly attended to in her confinement, she was glad to make this arrangement with the prisoner, to insure those medical and other comforts so indispensable at such a critical time. The prisoner was recommitted for the remainder of her term.

RE RICHARDS, AN ATTORNEY.—In this case a rule had been granted to strike an attorney, named Thomas Francis Richards, off the roll of this Court, upon the ground that he had been convicted of embezzlement in May, 1856, before the Assistant-Judge at Westminster.—Mr. Sarjeant Pigott and Mr. Huddleston now appeared to show cause against the rule.— Lord Campbell: If the judgment remains unreversed, is he to remain one of the officers of this Court?—Mr. Serjeant Pigott submitted that the question for the Court, in the exercise of its discretion, was, whether, under all the circumstances, it would be safe to allow him to remain.—Lord Campbell said it was a fixed rule in such a case for the party to be struck off the roll; it would be unbecoming that such a person should be allowed to appear to be on the roll.—Mr. Serjeant Pigott submitted that it was a question for the discretion of the Court, under the circumstances.—Lord Campbell: Not where a judgment of felony stands unimpeached.—Rule absolute.

WINDING-UP UNDER THE JOINT STOCK COMPANIES ACT, 1856. — At the Court of Bankruptcy, on Thursday, In re The London and Birmingham Iron and Hardware Company (Limited), the first application was made for an order to wind up a joint-stock company under the provisions of the Act of 1856. The Commissioner considered sufficient evidence had been produced to warrant his directing the company to be wound up, and made the order accordingly.

RE NEIL MORRISON, INSOLVENT.—Application was made to have the petition dismissed, as the insolvent did not wish to be heard.—The Commissioner refused the application, observing that it was time some steps were taken to prevent the abuse of the Protection Acts by persons filing petitions without any intention of proceeding upon them.

ROYAL BRITISH BANK.—At the Court of Bankruptcy, on Monday, Mr. Linklater said, there appeared to be some apprehension in the mind of the public that the examinations of the directors and officers of the bank had been without object; but he trusted they would not be without beneficial result. He believed there was already quite sufficient upon the records of the court to insure a certain conviction if a prosecution were instituted. It remained with the Government alone to determine who should be the objects selected for the punishment which undoubtedly some of the persons implicated in the inquiry merited. It was the opinion of more than one of the profession that the disclosures which had taken place in the court showed abundantly sufficient ground for instituting a criminal prosecution, and that the law was adequate for the purpose.

THE NEW SCALES OF CHANCERY COSTS.—In the case of Reade v. Bentley, heard a few weeks ago by V. C. Wood, the plaintiff's solicitor certified that the value of the property in dispute was under £1000, in order to bring the case within the lower scale of charges fixed by the new Orders. The case arose out of an agreement between a well-known novelist and equally celebrated publisher, and the question was, whether a contract for the publication of a certain work amounted to a disposition of the copyright. The Vice-Chancellor thought that the case came within the higher scale of costs, as it was not one of the cases specified by the Orders as subjects of the lower scale.

We understand that a determination has been taken to admit English barristers to practise as barristers and attorneys in the Canadian Courts. The only condition imposed will be that of unexceptionable character.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

BOND DEBT—STATUTES OF LIMITATION—PAYMENT OF INTEREST BY TENANT FOR LIFE—"PARTY LIABLE" WITHIN THE 5TH SECT. OF THE 8 & 4 WILL. 4, C. 42—CONSTRUCTION OF "CHARGED UPON," AND "PAYABLE OUT OF," LAND WITHIN THE 40TH SECT. OF THE 3 & 4 WILL. 4, C. 27.

Roddam v. Morley, 5 W. R. 510.

The operation of the Statutes of Limitation upon bond debts has been very fully discussed in this case, which was originally heard before Wood, V. C., and subsequently on appeal, by the Lord Chancellor, assisted by Williams and Crowder, JJ. The decision of the Appellate Court—the judgment of the Lord Chancellor coinciding with the joint opinion of the common law judges —may be considered as settling the law upon this important subject, although the decision of the Vice-Chancellor has been reversed on the main point. The questions involved were simply, first, whether a payment by a tenant for life, under the will of a person who had given a bond, was sufficient to prevent the bar of the statute; and, secondly, whether a bond debt was a charge upon land, or, in the words of the 40th section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, was "charged upon, or payable out of, any land," within that section. On the latter question — on which there is no express authority—all the learned judges fully agreed. "A bond," said Wood, V. C. (4 W. R. 348), "was no charge upon land; it simply gave to the creditor against the heir* a remedy which had been extended against the devisees, the property being in their hands." It was not necessary for the Court of Appeal expressly to affirm this part of his Honour's decision, as the Vice-Chancellor's decree was reversed upon the other question; but the Lord Chancellor and the common law judges all fully concurred with the Vice-Chancellor on this point. The other question resolves itself into two: first, whether payment of interest by the tenant for life was an acknowledgment made "by the party liable by virtue of such indenture," within the meaning of the 5th sect.? and secondly, if it was, what were its consequences (if any) as against the devisees in remainder? Wood, V. C., held that an acknowledgment by the tenant for life was an acknowledgment within the section, but that it preserved the remedy of the creditor, by virtue of the statute, against such party only, and did not set free the creditor's right of action generally. Mr. Justice Williams, in his opinion, in which Mr. Justice Crowder concurred, thus states the test for discovering who is the party liable within the 5th section:—"It is obvious, we think," said his lordship, "that any party who could plead the limitation given by the 3rd section to an action brought against him on the bond, is capable, under the description of the party liable in the 5th section, of making an acknowledgment so as to prevent the operation of the 3rd section in his favour. The devisee for life, if sued on the bond jointly with the heir, might plainly take advantage of the 3rd section, and plead separately, that twenty years had elapsed since the cause of action; and to such a plea it would be a good replication to state an acknowledgment by him under the 5th section within twenty years." The Lord Chancellor considered that it could never have been contemplated by the Legislature that an acknowledgment must have been made by all the parties liable, in order to be effectual against any. It was, therefore, held on appeal that the tenant for life was capable of making an acknowledgment within the 5th section to prevent the bar of the statute; and as to the consequences of such acknowledgment, it was held to set free the right of action generally against all the devisees, and not only against the party who actually made the acknowledgment.

* On this point, see the valuable observations of the Lord Chancellor in Morley v. Morley (4 W. R. 76), where his Lordship discusses historically, and enters very fully into the nature of the rights of the bond creditor against the descended and devised lands of the obligor.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Ford v. Heely, 5 W. R. 516.

In Corder v. Morgan (18 Ves. 344), a case which is well known to conveyancers, Sir William Grant decreed specific performance against a purchaser under a power of sale in a mortgage deed, without the concurrence of the mortgagor, though the mortgagor was under a covenant to the mortgagee to join in the conveyance. His Honour was of opinion that the covenant whereby the mortgagor undertook to join was a mere contract between the mortgagor and mortgagee, to the benefit of which the purchaser was not entitled, there being nothing in the nature of the contract between the mortgagee and the mortgagor, which prevented the latter giving, and the former exercising, the power of sale. Such a case does not often occur in practice; though many questions arise as to the construction of powers of sale, or the manner in which they are to be exercised by mortgagees. In Ford v. Heely the mortgage contained a power of sale by the mortgagee in default of payment of principal and interest, or any part, first giving three months notice to the mortgagor; and the purchaser was to be relieved from the necessity of inquiring, and from any liability in the event of his not inquiring, as to the circumstances of the sale. The mortgagee contracted to sell before three months expired since notice was given to the mortgagor; and it appeared that the mortgagee had taken an authority from the mortgagor, by a separate instrument, dispensing with the necessity of notice, the mortgagor, however, having previously conveyed his estate for the benefit of creditors. The purchaser refused to complete his contract, and the vendor filed his bill for specific performance.

STUART, V. C., did not impeach the law as laid down in Corder v. Morgan; but he considered that there could be no valid contract for sale by the mortgagee until the event happened upon which the power arose; the event including, according to his Honour's view, not only the default in payment, but the expiring of the term of notice; notwithstanding that the power stated in express words, that it was the clear intention of the parties to enable a sale to be made of the mortgaged premises by the mortgagee alone, whose receipt was to be a good discharge for the purchase-money. The Vice-Chancellor, therefore, was of opinion that the question as to the concurrence or non-concurrence of the mortgagor was not at issue. It would appear, that, if it had been, the Court would have decreed specific performance, even though, at the expiration of the three months, the mortgagor had refused concurrence; but the three months notice not having been completed, specific performance was not decreed at the hearing, but the decree was merely that the plaintiff had a right to have the title investigated, further consideration being adjourned.

OBLIGATION TO DISCLAIM—COSTS.

Re Primrose's Settlement, 5 W. R. 508.

This was a case which ultimately went off on a question of jurisdiction under the Trustee Act, but not before it had elicited from the Master of the Rolls a very emphatic declaration on a point of great practical importance. It very frequently happens, that persons about whose title to property no doubt exists, are unable to assert it effectively without obtaining a disclaimer from others who have no real interest, but whose concurrence is necessary to enable the true owner to deal with the property. Until the present decision no very explicit authority existed as to the duty of disclaiming in such a case, and the mode in which the Court would enforce it. The circumstances of the case raised the question in a simple form. One of two trustees of stock had become bankrupt, and been convicted of felony, and his place had been supplied by a new trustee, regularly nominated under a power in the settlement. As the Bank never recognises trusts, a transfer of the stock could not be obtained without the consent of the bankrupt trustee, and a disclaimer from his assignees. The parties interested accordingly applied to the assignees to sign a disclaimer, but they, although they did not actively dispute the fact of the stock being held on trust, refused to sign the requisite disclaimer. A petition for a vesting-order thus became necessary, and the petitioner prayed that the assignees might pay the costs occasioned by their refusal to disclaim. In the first instance, the question whether there was any jurisdiction under the statute to give costs against the assignees was scarcely touched, and the Court decided against them on grounds which have a very wide application. The following passage from the judgment lays down the principle applicable to all such cases:—"The general question involved is one of great importance, and applies, not merely to assignees, but to all members of the community. Where property is so circumstanced that the beneficial owner cannot get it without some act by a stranger, which involves no risk or responsibility on his part, in such a case the Court will not permit him to say, 'I make no claim, but I will create every passive obstacle which I can. I will make no adverse claim, but I will do nothing to assist your rights.' If such passive resistance drives the rightful owner to this Court, and his application is solely rendered necessary thereby, I take the rule to be, that the person creating such obstruction must pay the costs."

Ultimately it was held that in this particular case the Court had no jurisdiction to give the costs against the assignees; but in stating this conclusion his Honour distinctly adhered to the general observations on which his judgment had first been given, and which are embodied in the passage above cited. The case, therefore, loses nothing of its importance by the final result, and will be a valuable authority in the many cases which occur in actual practice, where persons, who have no beneficial interest, refuse to give proper and necessary aid to those who are the rightful owners of the property which has to be dealt with.

PRACTICE—REVIVOR—NEXT FRIEND.

Trezevant v. Broughton, 5 W. R. 517.

This case affords an illustration of the liberal spirit in which the Court now deals with the 52nd section of the Chancery Improvement Act. A feme sole plaintiff, in a suit relating to property settled to her separate use in the event of marriage, married before decree. Under the old practice a bill of revivor would have been necessary; but the Court made an order under the statute, not only to revive the suit against the husband, but to enable the plaintiff to name a next friend by whom to prosecute the cause.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

SALE OF GOODS — LAW AS TO THE MAXIM OF CAVEAT EMPTOR.

Hall v. Conder, 5 W. R., C. P., 491.

This was an action for the breach of an agreement respecting a patent, and is here noticed on account of the incidental statement in the judgment of the Court of the law upon a very interesting point, which, strange to say, has, until comparatively recent times, remained in some degree of obscurity. It is, as to whether, on sales, a warranty, either with regard to title or quality, is implied; and if either, to what extent? Upon this topic, Mr. Justice Williams thus expressed himself: "With regard to the sale of ascertained chattels, it has been held that there is not any implied warranty of either title or quality, unless there are some circumstances beyond the mere fact of a sale from which it can be implied. The law on this subject was fully explained by Parke, B., in giving the judgment of the Court of Exchequer in Morley v. Attenborough (3 Exch. 500), which, as far as title is concerned, he thus sums up: 'From the authorities in our law, to which may be added the opinion of Tindal, C. J., in Ormerod v. Huth, it would seem there is no implied warranty of title on the sale of goods; and that, if there be no fraud, a vendor is not liable for a bad title, unless there is an express warranty, or an equivalent to it by declaration or conduct; and the question in each case, where there is no warranty in express terms, will be, whether there are such circumstances as to be equivalent to such a warranty.' The law is quite as firmly established, that, on the sale of a known ascertained article, there is no implied warranty of its quality (Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 Mee. & W. 399); but there is another class of cases in which it has been held, that a party is not bound to accept and pay for chattels unless they are really such as the vendor professed to sell and the vendee intended to buy, of which Young v. Cole (3 Bing., N. C., 724), and Gompertz v. Bartlett, are strong instances; in the latter case, Lord Campbell says, it is precisely as if a bar was sold as gold, but was in fact brass, the vendor being innocent."

INTERPLEADER ISSUE—JUS TERTII, WHEN AVAILABLE AS A DEFENCE.

Green v. Stephens, 5 W. R., Exch., 497; Edwards v. English, Id., Q. B., 507.

In both of these cases a question arose as to whether the defendant in an interpleader issue may defeat the claimant by setting up jus tertii. In the first of them, the goods in question had been seized under a fi. fa. on a judgment obtained by the defendant against one C. S., and they were claimed by the plaintiff as landlord; the issue directed being, "Were the goods seized the goods of the plaintiff as against the defendant?" The defendant set up, as an answer to this claim, the ownership of a third party in the goods; but it was held, that, as between the defendant and the landlord, the latter was entitled, and that the real ownership was immaterial for the decision as to this point, as the landlord was entitled to the actual possession, and was therefore able to maintain his side of the issue.

In the second case (Edwards v. English) the issue was, whether certain goods claimed by the defendant, as execution creditor, belonged to him or to the plaintiff, who claimed as assignee under a bill of sale from one H. On the trial the defendant set up as an answer to such claim a previous bill of sale to another person, which (not having been registered under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 36) was void as against the creditors. It was held that such bill was no answer to the claim.

Both of the above cases should be carefully distinguished from Gadsden v. Barrow, 9 Exch. 514, with which, at first sight, they seem to clash. There it was held competent for an execution creditor, made defendant in an interpleader issue, to set up the title of a third party, and defeat the claimant by establishing a prior bill of sale of the goods in question to such third party, upon the claimant's proving they had been assigned to himself. But this case differs from the first of the cases we have mentioned above, in the circumstance that the prior bill of sale was a valid one in omnibus; and it differs from the second, in the nature of the issue directed, which was not whether the goods in question were the goods of the claimant as against the execution creditor (as in Green v. Stephens), but whether the claimant was or was not entitled to the goods.

PRIORITY OF EXECUTION—LEVARI FACIAS, LAW AS TO.

Sturgis v. The Bishop of London, 5 W. R., Q. B., 499.

The question in this case was, in effect, whether the rule of law which requires a sheriff who has different writs of fi. fa. in his hands to execute them in point of priority, according to the dates at which they were delivered to him to be executed, and not according to the dates they bear, applies to writs of levari facias delivered to the bishop with a view to the sequestration of the profits of a benefice. It was held that the rule applied equally to both species of writs.

CONTRACTING AS AGENT WITHOUT AUTHORITY—DAMAGES, HOW ASSESSED.

Simons v. Patchett, 5 W. R. 500.

This was an action much resembling Collen v. Wright,* noticed in our last number, being brought against the defendant on a contract he had entered into with the plaintiff, that one R. would buy from him a ship at a certain price—the defendant bonâ fide, but by mistake, supposing himself to have the required authority. The question in this case was, as to the principle on which the damages should be assessed in such actions, and the general rule was laid down by Lord Campbell, that they ought to be equal to the loss which naturally flows from the breach of contract. Hence, in the present case, the defendant was held liable both for certain expenses the plaintiff had incurred on the ship on the strength of the contract, and also for the difference between the price contracted for and that at which the plaintiff actually sold her.

HIGH BAILIFF OF COUNTY COURT — ACTION AGAINST FOR ACTING AS ATTORNEY IN A PROCEEDING IN THE COURT.

Warden v. Stone, 5 W. R., Q. B., 501.

This was an action for a penalty of £50, under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 30, brought against the high bailiff of the County Court at Lancaster, for having been concerned as attorney or agent for certain parties in a proceeding in the Court—viz. by applying to the judge for, and issuing, a warrant under 14 & 15 Vict. c. 52, to arrest an absconding debtor. The trial took place at Liverpool, and the plaintiff had a verdict, but leave was reserved to the defendant to enter a nonsuit, if the proceeding in question should be held not to be "a proceeding in the county court" within the meaning of the above section.

The Court said (without calling on the counsel for the defendant) that it could not be considered such a proceeding, inasmuch as, though one in which the county court judge is authorised to do an act, he does it only as a special commissioner under the Act of Parliament, and not as a county court judge; the proceeding was ancillary merely to the capias ad respondendum in the superior court, and was had in camerâ only, not in curiâ.

It may be observed, that in the recent case of Pybus v. Gibb, 26 L. J., Q. B., 41; 5 W. R., Q. B., 44, the Court held that the effect of the Absconding Debtors Act, giving power to the judge to grant warrants for their arrest, taken in connection with the other legislative provisions tending to increase the jurisdiction of the courts and the responsibilities of their officers, operated so as to prejudicially affect the liability of their sureties, and consequently to absolve them. This case was pressed upon the court as an argument that the action against the high bailiff was maintainable; but they held that the two decisions were perfectly harmonious.

ARTICLED CLERK—SERVICE UNDER UNSTAMPED ARTICLES—AFFIXING STAMP ON PAYMENT OF A PENALTY.

In re Welch, 5 W. R., Q. B., 505.

This was another application under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 88, for service of a clerk to be allowed to count from the date of his articles, though they had not been stamped till after the service under them had expired, and, consequently, no affidavit of execution had been filed, as required by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 8. It appeared by the affidavits, that the applicant, who had been articled to his father, had left it to him to get the indenture stamped and inrolled; and it was alleged by the father, that immediately after his son had been bound to him, he fell into pecuniary difficulties, which he did not name to his son, who continued to perform the duties of the office for five years. The Treasury had allowed the articles to be stamped on payment of the penalty. Lord Campbell said: "Under the special circumstances of the case, we will allow the application." But the Court again repeated the warning given by Mr. Justice Erle, in Ex parte Williams † (5 W. R., B. C., 376), that the late Act was not intended to give parties a right to have their articles stamped whenever they pleased.

BASTARDY ORDER—EFFECT OF ATTORNEY APPEARING WITHOUT AUTHORITY.

Regina v. Higham, 5 W. R., Q. B., 507.

A rule had been obtained to set aside an order of affiliation on three grounds:—1. That, at the hearing of the case before the magistrates, the party charged had been represented by an attorney whom he had not authorised to appear on his behalf.

† See No. 18, p. 420.
* See No. 11, p. 270.

2. That the residence of the mother of the bastard was insufficiently described in the order in question. 3. That it did not appear from the order, that the evidence had been taken in the presence of the party charged, or of any attorney duly authorised to appear for him.

The Court discharged the rule, but amended the statement of the residence of the mother under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 7. And they appear to have considered the cause shown against the rule (so far as regarded the first and third grounds above stated) sufficient—viz. that, the summons having been served, it was immaterial that the attorney appeared without the defendant's sanction, or that the evidence had not been taken in his presence; and that the party would be left to his remedy, if any, against the attorney, for such unauthorised interference. (See the case of Bayley v. Buckland, 1 Exch. 1, as explained in Lush's Pract., 2nd edit., p. 186).

Examinations at the Incorporated Law Society.

Easter Term, 1857.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the superior courts, the examiners recommended as deserving of equal honorary distinction the following gentlemen:—

Henry Kirke Hebb, of Lincoln, who served his clerkship to Mr. Joseph Moore, of Lincoln, and Messrs. Scott, Tahourdin, and Shaw, of Lincoln's Inn Fields.

Walter Bullar Ross, of Ipswich, who served his clerkship to Mr. Simon Batley Jackaman, of Ipswich, and Messrs. Aldridge and Bromley, of South Square, Gray's Inn.

William Henry Walsh, of Oxford, who served his clerkship to Mr. William Sale, of Manchester, and Messrs. Pownall, Son, and Cross, of Staple Inn, Holborn.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded a prize of books to be presented to each of those candidates.

The examiners have also certified that the following candidates passed examinations very little inferior to those who have been reported for prizes:—

Henry William Bradford, of Westmeon, Hampshire, who served his clerkship to Mr. James Templer, of Bridport, and Messrs. Clowes, Son, and Hickley, of King's Bench Walk, Temple.

Henry William Bainton, of Beverley, Yorkshire, who served his clerkship to Mr. James Baker Branton, of Beverley, and Mr. John England, of Beverley and Hull, and Mr. James Sidney Hargrove, of Lincoln's Inn Fields.

Thomas Berridge, of Melton Mowbray, who served his clerkship to Mr. Sommersby Edwards, of Long Buckby, and Mr. George Capes, of Field Court, Gray's Inn.

John Lasham Press, of Hingham, Norfolk, who served his clerkship to Mr. Edward Palmer Clarke, of Wymondham, and Mr. John White, of Barge-Yard Chambers, Bucklersbury.

By order of the Council,

Robert Maugham, Secretary.

Law Society's Hall, 7th May, 1857.

Trial by Jury.

The non-attendance of jurymen at the Nisi Prius sittings is a growing evil, to which at last the serious attention of the judges is becoming awakened; and more stringent measures will probably be resorted to to compel the discharge of a duty which is habitually neglected by the majority of those who are bound to perform it. Jurors are so hardly to be found, that the sheriff's officer is frequently obliged to rush into the public thoroughfares in search of parties who will consent to enter the box; and he thinks himself fortunate if he catches some stray jurymen without a large amount of search and trouble. A few days since the Barons of the Exchequer delivered their sentiments on the subject, in a case where a motion had been made to set aside a verdict on the ground of irregularity in the mode of filling the jury box. To give the full particulars of the case would not be quite fair, inasmuch as serious charges were made against the sheriff's officer, which were disproved on oath by that functionary, and were not substantiated in the opinion of the Court. Some observations, however, which fell from the bench may be transcribed here, as they are of general application, and may tend to check an increasing malpractice. The Chief Baron, in referring to the course taken to complete the jury, stated that there was a set of persons known to the sheriff's officer, who were ready, and even anxious, to attend and perform the functions of tales men when they were required. It was not for the interests of justice that such a class should exist, as a class, to furnish those who were to serve on juries. The law contemplated the selection of juries in the manner prescribed by the Act of Parliament, from those placed in the sheriff's books, with a view to competency and impartiality. If, however, there were a class of persons waiting on the proceedings of courts of justice, and desirous of coming in to derive the small emoluments arising from the office, exposed as that class were to great temptations, he could not approve of such a practice. Baron Pennefather strongly censured the sheriff's officer for collecting jurymen from the bystanders, as it did not appear on oath that he had summoned the entire forty-eight persons whose names were on the panel. Baron Richards complained much of the limited number of persons whose faces were seen again and again in the box; and stated that the larger share of Nisi Prius business was in fact transacted by a small knot of jurymen.

The practical result of these severe observations from the learned Barons will probably be, that the leniency which has heretofore prevented fines from being regularly imposed on absent jurors, will give way to a wholesome strictness in this particular. If good round penalties are enforced punctually, there will be no longer reason for complaint.

One of the strongest reasons why a jury box should not be occupied again and again by the same jurors, is suggested by the stories current in Dublin as to the influence acquired by certain leaders at Nisi Prius over the minds of some of these professional jurors. Some passages from the Freeman's Journal of yesterday, apropos of this subject, may be appended:—

"Any person tolerably familiar with Nisi Prius, knows that three-fourths of the verdicts, in common jury cases, are found by a select class whose faces are as familiar as those of the presiding judges. The leaders of the Nisi Prius bar take advantage of this old acquaintance. They wink—they nod—they assume the wreathed smile, the indignant frown, or the wheedling compliment, just as either may suit the peculiar tempers to be operated on. You could not, for a moment, mistake the identity of these fortunate administrators of justice. There they are from year to year, and from term to term, trying the half-a-dozen or dozen cases each day, and dividing between them, at the end, the grateful spoil. This transfer of justice to a select few arises, in a great degree, from the reluctance of traders to waste time, which might be more profitably employed, in the four courts. They take their chance of a fine to escape confinement in a jury box. Hence the duty of trying cases devolves on a select body, who are always present to answer to their names on the panel, or to fill up the tales. They are in the Hall, or in the galleries, or the passages, waiting for a new jury to be called, and ever at hand to prevent the frustration of justice by their anxious solicitude to enter the box. It is not about the twelfth of a guinea they care. They have at heart rather the public interests than the humble proportion of the fee which falls to each. This practice may turn out a smart class of common jurors, but it leads to many inconveniences. We have heard the verdicts of Dublin common juries in doubtful cases much complained of. The defeated party, of course, will complain under any circumstances; but it is nevertheless a fact, that many verdicts are open to censure from the character of the juries, which have not sufficient intelligence to sift complicated facts and draw just conclusions from contradictory evidence. Dublin should afford the highest class of jurors, common and special; and if men would only accept a little of that trouble which trial by jury necessarily imposes, and answer to their names when called on the panel, they would discharge very important duties to the community—duties of which they should be rather proud than anxious to evade, for the jury box is a fine school of discipline for the free citizen—and instead of having our most valuable rights determined by men of straw, we should have confidence in verdicts found by men of practical knowledge, intelligence, and judgment."

CHANCERY—ROSSBOROUGH v. BOYSE.

This long contested and very extraordinary case re-appeared in the Lord Chancellor's list yesterday. It will be remembered that landed estates to the value of over £10,000 a year, as well as personal property of very large amount, were all devised by the will of the late Cæsar Colclough, of Tintern Abbey, county Wexford, to his wife (now Mrs. Boyse, the defendant), and after that lady had been in peaceable occupation and enjoyment for several years, it came into the heads of some collateral relatives of the deceased to dispute the validity of the will, on the ground of alleged "undue influence" exercised over the testator by his wife. After some litigation an issue was directed, and, after a protracted trial at the Assizes, a verdict was obtained setting aside the will. A new trial was sought for, but the Lord Chancellor refused to grant it, and put the plaintiff Rossborough in possession of the estates. Subsequent orders have been obtained, the result of which has been to impound in the Court of Chancery a very large amount of money, representing the mesne profits of the estates. The entire case was brought before the House of Lords last year, and in March last a luminous and comprehensive judgment was pronounced by L. C. Cranworth, varying the decree of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, defining with more exactness than had before been attempted the nature and limits of "undue influence," and intimating a strong opinion as to the validity of Mr. Colclough's will. The result now is, that a new trial has been directed, and the cause remitted to the Lord Chancellor here, to give such directions as to changing the venue, or otherwise, as he may think fit.

The Solicitor General, with Brewster, Q. C., and Lawson, Q. C., now appeared for the defendant, and sought for an order restoring Mrs. Boyse, the devisee, to the possession of the estates, and directing the plaintiff to refund the rents received by him, &c. Whiteside, Q. C., and Fitzgerald, Q. C., opposed any such order being made before the new trial should take place; which will probably be in about two months.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that the reversal of his decree rendered it necessary that he should direct a new trial of the issue, and that the defendant must be restored to the possession of the estates. Until the final determination of the case, however, no account would be directed as to the mesne rents and profits enjoyed by Rossborough.

An application was also made this day on behalf of the plaintiff to have the venue changed from Wexford to Dublin. The arguments had not, however, concluded when the Court adjourned.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—While admitting, as freely as any of the Commissioners are disposed to assert it, that some change is necessary in either the principles or the practice of conveyancing, I have been somewhat startled at finding, that in their Report, instead of boldly meeting and explaining their views on what I may characterise "the hinge" of their plan (namely, the mode of indexing), the Commissioners have shirked the matter by saying, in paragraph 80, "A provision which it is most important to attend to is the mode of indexing the property registered; this must be left to a great extent to the registrar."

Now, it appears to me, that on the practical nature of the index or indexes depends entirely, and not partially, the usefulness and success of the plan the Commissioners recommend. They tell us, that they seek to make the title to real property as simple as that, to stock, and they then proceed to propose a registrer of the title to land similar, according to their account, to the register of title which already exists in respect of the public funds.

But how it is possible to apply such a system of registry to land I cannot, for the life of me, conceive; and her Majesty's Commissioners, from their silence on the subject, would seem to be in a similar state of darkness and ignorance. They tell us indeed, at great length, what ought to be registered, but not one single word as to how it is to be done.

Under these circumstances, it appears to me to be almost futile to attempt to comprehend the plan; but as some of your readers who are supporters of it may perhaps have greater powers of comprehension than the writer, I would ask of them an explanation of the course to be pursued under the following circumstances:—

Suppose A. B. to be the owner in fee-simple of a farm of 500 acres and a number of detached cottages, situate in the parish of C., in the county of D.—Is the principle of the registry of stock to be applied, and the property indexed to A. B.? or is the principle of the ship registry, and A. B. to be indexed to the property? How is an intending purchaser to search on the register for the ownership of such property in the case of A. B. having lost or mislaid his certificate of registry, or (even supposing that he had not been so careless) what is there to assure the purchaser that no other person is registered as owner of the same property? in short, how is the security, which the debtor and creditor system of entry adopted with regard to stock affords to a purchaser, possibly to be applied to land?

These are matters as to which it would have become the learned Commissioners to have afforded some little information, the fact being, as cannot be too often repeated, that it is not the principle of registration which needs so much to be explained and enforced, as the manner in which that registration is to be carried out.

With reference to the unlimited powers proposed to be bestowed upon the registrar, I should think it is unlikely that Parliament will be willing to confer them upon a person who must of necessity be irresponsible; but, granting the willingness of Parliament to do so, I would ask where, in the wide creation, the individual is to be found who could perform the Herculean duties of examining into each individual case, and deciding upon the best and most practicable plan of indexing it so as to disclose to all the world simply and effectually the dealings by way of sale, mortgage, or lease of all sorts of parts, shares, and proportions which day by day occur in the most trivial properties.

When these matters are explained the Commissioners may expect a more general adhesion to their plan; but in the meantime I cannot help thinking that it is crude and undigested, and made by persons who have not much practical acquaintance with the difficulties with which they propose to deal; and on referring to the names of the Commissioners, I find that, with the exception of Mr. Wilson and Mr. Cookson, this remark applies. Whether either of these gentlemen is the one mentioned in the last paragraph of the report, I am unaware; but I hope, whoever he may be, he will give to the world his reasons for his non-concurrence. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, 5th May, 1857. A CONVEYANCING CLERK.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—I think it but right to point out an anomaly which exists in the practice of attorneys appearing in the Insolvent Debtors Court, in Portugal-street, and the Bankruptcy Courts; for you are aware, that, in the former, counsel can only appear for the creditor to oppose an insolvent, whereas an attorney is permitted to appear and oppose in the latter; and I imagine the sooner the distinction is removed the better, for it cannot certainly be less important in the one than in the other. I hope, therefore, you will use your endeavours to remove this obstacle to the appearance of attorneys in both courts equally.

Yours respectfully,

JOHN NURSE CHADWICK.

King's Lynn, May 4, 1857.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—In the year 1839 appeared the first volume of "Bythewood's Conveyancing," published by one Sweet, and edited by another.

The promise then made (eighteen years ago), and renewed in a catalogue issued by Mr. Sweet to the profession as recently as last month, is "The remaining volumes will be published as expeditiously as may be consistent with a due regard to accuracy."

Of this edition Vols. 1 to 7, Vol. 9, and Vol. 11, alone have been published: thus not only leaving a book, which is one of the first requisites of a lawyer's office—a collection of conveyancing—incomplete, but greatly lessening the value of what is published, for it is without an index, and so you have to find out, as best you can, any particular point wanted.

Is it too much, after this lapse of time, to remind both editor and publisher that promises raise expectations of performance, and that it is just possible people may come to the conclusion it is wiser to wait until a book is complete ere they buy any portion, rather than chafe under inconveniences of so long a duration.

Law publishers generally, presuming upon the incessant occupation of their subscribers, are not remarkable for a strict punctuality in these things; but it is probably impossible to find a second case to place by the side of this glaring example.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

THE SHADE OF BYTHEWOOD.

Review.

Concise Precedents of Wills, with an Introduction and Practical Notes. Second Edition. By J. T. CHRISTIE, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. W. Maxwell, Bell-yard.

It is very well known to professional men that the most fertile of all sources of litigation is the manufacture of inartificial wills. It is curious that the particular class of instruments which involve beyond all comparison more intricacy and difficulty than any others, should be those which schoolmasters, who have picked up a few legal terms which they do not understand, most frequently select to display their legal skill; and it is not at all surprising that the result should be a goodly collection of cases on the exposition of unintelligible wills. Even the most experienced draftsman sometimes breaks down in the attempt to provide for the numerous contingencies which may affect the state of a testator's family by the time when his bounty comes to be distributed; and few can venture, without the aid of carefully studied precedents, to draw a will containing anything beyond the simplest limitations. The marked tendency of the Courts to greater strictness of interpretation renders it now more than ever necessary that the language introduced into a testamentary instrument should be both precise, and accurately adapted to the rules of construction which judicial decisions and statutory enactments have established. But it is not necessary to say much to prove the value of a compact book of concise precedents for wills. As long ago as 1835, a very successful attempt to supply this want was made by two of the most eminent of modern conveyancers, Mr. Hayes and Mr. Jarman; and the value of their contribution to the solicitors' library has been attested, not only by the sale of a series of four editions of their own book, but by the appearance of rival productions devoted to the same object. The first edition of the work which we are now reviewing issued from the press in 1849, contemporaneously with the fourth edition of Hayes and Jarman. The title-page bears a name of not less celebrity in conveyancing matters than those of the joint authors of the earlier work. It is not, however, the veteran draftsman himself, but his son, Mr. J. T. Christie, to whom the profession owes this collection of wills, which has now reached its second edition, and has come out with a large accession of bulk. The convenience of multiplying precedents, so as to have something near to what may in most cases be wanted, will probably induce many practitioners to place "Christie's Concise Precedents" by the side of "Hayes' and Jarman's Concise Forms of Wills." Still, it may not be useless to point out the peculiarities of the two works, so as to enable the solicitor to turn to the one or to the other, according to the nature of the want which he desires to supply.

The two books have been constructed on different principles. The idea of the first was to produce a portable volume of short forms, not copied from drafts, but originated with a view to general applicability, and illustrated by succinct statements of the law upon points of frequent occurrence. Mr. Christie, on the other hand, has adhered to the old practice in precedent books of printing drafts from important wills prepared by conveyancers of the highest eminence, or which have been tested by the scrutiny of many a lynx-eyed lawyer on occasion of actual transactions under the powers which they contain. The advantage of the first system is, that the collection of forms, having been made with reference to the circumstances which most commonly occur, is composed of wills less special in their frame, and more readily adaptable to the requirements of an average testator, than those which are taken from real drafts. Against this, Mr. Christie's plan offers, in some cases, the security which is afforded by the criterion of actual business; while the reliance of the solicitor who uses Hayes and Jarman must be placed on the reputation of the authors, and the extreme care and skill with which every point on the construction and operation of wills is explained in its appropriate place in the foot-notes, which are models of condensation, and all compact of law. The same complete, though brief, analysis of the law, suggested by each particular precedent in the text, is not attempted by Mr. Christie, who has rested his claims more on the forms which he has selected, than on the commentary with which he has enriched them. Notes, however, will be found pretty thickly strewn over his pages; but they consist more generally of practical, and sometimes rather obvious advice, than of exhaustive summaries of legal questions, such as we find in Hayes and Jarman.

We have picked out at random a few subjects on which to compare the principles of annotation adopted by the respective authors of these two serviceable manuals. Here is one example. Each contains a note on certain clauses by which powers are conferred on trustees of allotting portions of land directed to be sold to any of the beneficiaries in lieu of their shares of the proceeds. Mr. Christie's observation is, that "the clause will often be found useful, as without it no secure arrangement could be made for allotting the real property among children, however desirable such an arrangement might be." In Hayes and Jarman we have, as a note to a similar clause, a short reference to certain decided cases on the discretionary powers of trustees. The same sort of contrast is observable throughout. For example, in the page of Christie next preceding that from which we have quoted, is a note to the effect, that, "when an important discretion is reposed in trustees, particular care should be taken in the selection of the persons in whom the testator proposes to repose such confidence"—a piece of undeniably sound advice. Turning, in the same way, to the nearest pages in the other book, we have, just before the note we have mentioned, an elaborate though brief account of the law of conditions in reference to marriage; and, just afterwards, a similar examination of the numerous cases relating to the appointment of new trustees under a power, and the reason for the particular form of the clause selected. Once more, to test our general observations by a particular instance, let us refer to this last subject in the pages of Mr. Christie. We shall find it noticed at page 197, in a general note, not attempting any discussion of the authorities, but impressing on the reader the importance of this, and also of the other, common trustee clauses. This is, or was, true enough of the new-trustee power, but it happens to be a mistake, though a very harmless one, with respect to the clause which entitles a trustee to reimburse himself his expenses in the trust; the fact being that instead of affording "protection, without which no prudent person would undertake a trust," as Mr. Christie says, it only expresses a right which the trustee would equally enjoy whether the clause were there or not. But we have not referred to this note for the purpose of taking exception to its accuracy so much as to illustrate the principle on which the author has proceeded. Speaking generally, we may say that the notes in this work are didactic; those in Hayes and Jarman legal. Mr. Christie's "Precedents," as we have already stated, are selected; while those in the "Concise Forms" are composed. We may add that each book is preceded by an introduction on the law as altered by the Statute of Wills. These are not less characteristic than the precedents and notes. In the one case it is a systematic resumé of the law, fortified with copious references. In the other—that now under review—we find a collection of recommendations, more or less useful and accurate, with a rather rambling discussion of many of the points which have arisen out of the last Statute of Wills. With these observations our readers will be able to judge for themselves, when it will be especially desirable to consult Hayes and Jarman, and in what cases additional aid may be expected from the "Precedents" of Mr. Christie.

Law Amendment Society.

FOURTEENTH SESSION.—THIRTEENTH GENERAL MEETING.

MAY 4th, 1857.

ACTON S. AYRTON, Esq., M.P., took the Chair at eight o'clock.

George Gatton Hardingham, Esq., was ballotted for, and elected.

Mr. E. WEBSTER read a paper on the "Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854," in which he pointed out defects in the clauses of the Act, and doubts which were entertained as to their accuracy. He remarked that it left the word "candidate" entirely undefined, and was regardless of chronological order. Was the person who issued an address, and did not go to the poll, a candidate or not? He proceeded to show the defects in the Act as to the duties of the election auditor, adding that there were doubts as to whether he was a ministerial officer, and characterising the terms in which that functionary was described as "puerile." The language of the Act was so vague as to make the heart of the stoutest candidate tremble; and the blundering character of it had also extended to the payment of expenses. He feared that words had slipped into the Act unintentionally. Had the Act been prepared with ordinary care, no doubt could have existed; and considering that it was penal, ambiguity was all the more to be condemned. The definition of "an election agent" was also vague and unsatisfactory. He next declared that the terms "bribery," "treating," and "undue influence," afforded evidence of the want of design and arrangement, by which the Act was characterised. Without entering into all the questions raised by the statute, he urged, in conclusion, that it had been prepared without a becoming regard to the public welfare, and he therefore trusted that it would be brought under the attention of the Legislature with the view of its being amended.

Mr. DAVID POWER fully admitted the ability of the paper, but thought that Mr. Webster had fallen into some mistakes in the construction of the Act, especially as to the meaning of the word "candidate."

Mr. C. WORDSWORTH pointed out, that, under the Act, a candidate could incur expense without incurring immediate liability; that the advertising mentioned did not include placarding, which, therefore, was not under the control of the auditor; and that a candidate would be liable for fees, although he might never have intended to go to the poll.

The society adjourned till Monday, the 18th, at eight o'clock.

The address of the council, read on the 27th ult., contained the following passage on the subject of

CRIMINAL LAW:—

When the council last addressed the society, at the commencement of its present session, a panic was prevalent in the country on the subject of our criminals, and a general disposition was manifested in favour of returning to a wholesale system of transportation. The Criminal Law Committee reported against any such retrograde step, believing that transportation at the best was but a clumsy substitute for a vigilant and judicious administration of secondary punishment at home, and that a return to it in the present state of our colonial empire could only be attended by disastrous consequences. The committee recommend an increase of the terms of penal servitude, and a stricter and more discriminating application of the ticket-of-leave system.

THE MERCANTILE LAW CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

This committee are engaged in the preparation of a Bankruptcy Bill, in pursuance of the resolution adopted by the conference. A deputation will shortly wait on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to urge on him the necessity of transferring the compensation now charged on the fees of court to the consolidated fund.

MR. REILLY'S PAPER ON "JURIDICAL OATHS."

The learned reader quoted at some length from the Report of the Indian Law Commissioners as to the existing practice both in the Supreme Court and in the Company's Courts, and as regards as well Mahomedans as Hindoos, and he then read the following paragraph from the Report:—

"These reasons appear to justify a preference of an affirmation not containing any reference to religious sanctions. But such an affirmation, though less objectionable than one containing such a reference, appears to us to have no positive utility, and we therefore think it best to dispense with oaths and affirmations altogether."

Mr. Reilly then proceeded as follow:—

Here, we see, is a case where the oath, intended to facilitate and steady the motion of the machine of justice, has become a clog. It would be absurd to insist on its retention in such circumstances. Perhaps it was an unavowed reason with the Commissioners for their proposal, that the habitual disregard of an oath by the lower classes of the natives of India is notorious, and it was evident that the ceremony failed to accomplish there the only object for which it existed.

The case is exceptional, and does not militate against the general conclusion to which these observations have tended—that an oath may both reasonably and usefully be maintained as part of the judicial institutions of a people that acknowledges those primary doctrines of natural religion from which the ceremony derives its significance and its efficacy.

From this conclusion we naturally pass on to the question on which the Common Law Commissioners disagreed—the question, as they state it, "whether the religious sanction should be made the indispensable condition of testimony in cases where that sanction is admitted to have no existence." They proceed to illustrate and argue on it thus:—"The following case has been put. A witness is provided whose testimony is essential to one of the parties to the suit. He is examined as to his religious belief, and at once admits that he has no belief in a state of rewards and punishments. As the rule now stands, he would be excluded, yet his disbelief is not the fault of the party calling him, and to whom his testimony is essential. The penalty of the unbelief of the witness is paid, not by himself, but by the innocent suitor. Under these circumstances it has been argued, that, though the evidence, if received, would be wanting in the important sanction of religion, it would, on the other hand, still possess the not inefficacious sanction of morality and law, and there would be the additional security for truth arising from the admission itself on which the witness is now excluded. For it is said that nothing but a sense of truth would induce a man to admit in a court of justice a disbelief, which must render him odious in the eyes of the mass of his fellow-men." And they conclude thus, as I have mentioned:—"As we have been unable to agree on any recommendation on this point, we think it inexpedient to pursue the subject further."

The mere fact that there was an irreconcilable difference of opinion among the men who composed that commission is a proof of difficulty; in the absence of that proof, it might be thought that the question was easy of solution.

An oath is turned to a wholly wrong purpose when it is applied to the exclusion of evidence—when the instrument intended for the better discovery of truth is used for the shutting out of knowledge. Now this exclusion is operated here entirely by the requisition of an oath. There is nothing in the law to exclude such a witness as this, on account of his views on matters of religion, except the rule that every witness must be sworn. This, at least, is the ground upon which their exclusion is put by L. C. J. Willes, in Ormychund v. Barker.

"On the other hand," he says, "I am clearly of opinion that such infidels, if any such there be, who either do not believe in a God, or, if they do, do not think that he will either reward or punish them in this world or in the next, cannot be witnesses in any case, nor under any circumstances, for this plain reason—because an oath cannot possibly be any tie or obligation upon them."

But surely this is to cast away the substance for the shadow. Such maxims as in judicio non creditur nisi juratis have an imposing air, and are often cited as if they embodied some great natural principle, some direct and necessary inference from the constitution of man and the conditions of his existence, while in truth they are but statements of special rules of English law. The maxim, whether in its Latin or in its English form—"no testimony whatever can be legally received except upon oath"—simply amounts to this: that, as a matter of fact, and by a rule of positive law, an English tribunal is precluded from listening to an unsworn witness. The maxim then may be set aside without compunction when it prevents the tribunal from duly exercising its functions.

It seems clear that the objection to a witness on this ground should go, not to his competency, but to his credit. The jury can judge of that in each instance; and, to adopt the argument of the Commissioners, the avowal of disbelief is in itself strong evidence of a desire to tell the truth without regard to consequences. The presumption that such a witness is necessarily to be disbelieved is unfounded and illiberal. L. C. J. Willes, dealing his vigorous blows at Coke's proposition, that an infidel cannot be a witness, says, "It is a little, mean, narrow notion, to suppose that no one but a Christian can be an honest man;" a declaration which seems fairly capable of extension beyond the cases of those Gentoos of Calcutta in whose favour it was pronounced by the learned judge. Besides, it is not true, as this observation would seem to imply, that only honest men are admitted as witnesses, and that every one who is willing to take an oath is an honest man.

Then look at the consequences of this rule. The Commissioners refer to one in the case of the innocent suitor losing his cause by the exclusion of the evidence. In a criminal case, the most serious damage might be done to the public interests, and great scandal might be brought upon the administration of justice, by the shutting out of important testimony for the prosecution; while, in another instance, the penalty might fall still more heavily upon the accused. And, in this last case, it would be an absurd result of what has been granted to the prisoner as an indulgence, if, by the operation of the rule, he were not allowed to have even the benefit of unsworn testimony. An unwilling witness, too, might, by bringing himself within the rule, avoid giving evidence.

Where the excluded testimony is that of one of the parties, and is necessary for his success, the rule operates directly to produce in him a civil disability—an incapacity for sustaining a suit.

Lastly, as it has been observed by Mr. Best—

"Whatever might have been formerly urged in favour of the exclusion in question, it seems inconsistent to retain it at the present day: since the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 22, has allowed the unsworn testimony to be received of the members of certain barbarous and uncivilised races in the British colonies, who are described in that statute as "destitute of the knowledge of God, and of any religious belief."

For the reasons which have been thus sketched out, it would seem to be most just and expedient that no witness should be excluded on account of his not being under the influences through which an oath operates; and this would be quite consistent with the retention of oaths for cases in which they were applicable. The principle, that the oath should not be allowed to operate as an obstacle to the admission of testimony, would, if adopted also in the cases of infant witnesses, tend to secure the punishment of offenders who, under the present rule, must escape. The law now is, according to the language of the judgment in Brasier's case:—

"That an infant, though under the age of seven years, may be sworn in a criminal prosecution, provided such infant appears, on strict examination by the Court, to possess a sufficient knowledge of the nature and consequence of an oath; for there is no precise or fixed rule as to the time within which infants are excluded from giving evidence; but their admissibility depends upon the sense and reason they entertain of the danger and impiety of falsehood, which is to be collected from their answers to questions propounded to them by the Court; but if they are found incompetent to take an oath, their testimony cannot be received."

It would seem to be the more reasonable and the safer rule, that the first question should be as to the degree of the child's mental capacity; its fitness to state intelligently the matters of fact which it is called to prove; and that, upon the result of that inquiry, its admissibility as a witness should wholly depend. Then the question, whether or not the child is in a condition to appreciate the nature of an oath, and therefore to be sworn, should be treated as subsequent and secondary, the evidence being, in the event of the non-administration of the oath, subject to such deduction from its value as the jury may think ought to be made on that account.

A consideration of the increase of value which the oath confers on any statement to which it is attached would lead to the conclusion, that all the parties to a judicial proceeding indifferently should be allowed the benefit of the oath. In a criminal case, then, ought not the accused to be permitted to make any statement for his defence upon oath? If he voluntarily presents himself to be sworn, and subjects himself to cross-examination, there seems no sufficient reason why the tribunal should not be enabled to avail itself of this means of getting at the truth, while the parties would be put on an equality. Both plaintiff and defendant in a civil case, and the prosecutor in a criminal case, may have the advantage of their own sworn testimony. The benefit, with its corresponding risks, would properly, it seems, be extended to the accused. This would be the natural complement to the legislation which has allowed his witnesses to be sworn. At present, any part of his defence which rests upon his own statement goes to the jury from himself, or through his advocate, with comparatively little effect. There is a dislike among us to the system of interrogation brought to bear on the accused in some other countries. That dislike is, perhaps, too strong and undiscriminating; but, at any rate, the voluntary examination of the prisoner on oath would not necessarily lead to the introduction of that system, and with proper safeguards and restrictions would doubtless be found an efficacious instrument for getting at the truth of the case.

The learned reader concluded his paper by discussing the form of the testimonial oath in use in our courts, which he considered susceptible of improvement.

The next Meeting will be held on Monday, the 11th instant, when Mr. S. M. Leake will read a paper on "Some Points in the Theory of the Law of Property." (The Modes of Division of Property; particularly the Mode of Division by Successive Intervals of Use.)

Law versus Life.

Some creatures, with soft paws and sharp claws, have been reputed to possess nine lives. Recent science, however, has vindicated the economy of nature from the embarrassment which would thus ensue. No tabular statements have as yet ruled the question of superior longevity between rats and rabbits; but the timid deer was, in classic times, famed for length of days far exceeding the fiercer carnivori who preyed upon his kind; and, as a corresponding fact, recent statistics seem to be settling that lawyers are a short-lived race. A society has for some time existed for the purpose of reducing everything to a tabular form. We live in a tabulated state of atmosphere; our bread is tabulated even to its adulterations; but the great question of human longevity was the first, perhaps, which invited that incubation of numbers which statisticians love. Anciently, the astrologers had this process to themselves, and history is full of the marvels of their practice. No doubt, they had facts and figures in abundance, and an experience which might have begun from the tower of Babel. Now, the statisticians have succeeded to this prolific department of speculation; and a serious question occurs, which of the two deserve most reliance? Instead, however, of the hoar antiquity which the starry doctors boasted, the most recent of statistical luminaries* on this question can only quote, with modest diffidence, "the results of two years' experience for the metropolis, and of one year for the whole of England and Wales," which he admits to be "obviously insufficient."

For some, however, of the inductions employed in these results we have a wider substratum of facts. It may be assumed as conclusively established that learned lives are long. Not, indeed, that a long life is necessary in order to be "learned" for the purposes of the theorem, but that the professions which require studious preparation include circumstances favourable to longevity. The "black graces," physic, divinity, and law (we assign to them the relative priority of their average duration as determined by our statisticians), keep the house of life with surer bars than trade, commerce, and even, if we understand the purport of the statement rightly, than idleness. Law, however, is found to be at a disadvantage as compared with her sisters, and that disadvantage has gone on slightly increasing, according to existing figures, during the last three centuries. Their patients must allow "the faculty" the credit which attaches to the fact that they are able to maintain to the longest average pitch the lives in which they are most interested—viz. their own. This seems to show that a pill-box has "something in it" after all, and confirms the adage that a man is a fool or a physician at forty. Here, if a post-mortem parallel were admissible, might be adduced the famous speculation of the grave-digger in "Hamlet," as to how many ordinary men "your tanner," when coffined, will outlast. According to this, Parr's life pills ought to consist of oak bark; and, whenever profits justify the outlay, it might be a wholesome bonus to present a box of them "as a supplement gratis" to the regular subscribers to this journal. The calculations, however, to which we refer hardly include the class for whom it is chiefly intended. The judicial bench and the bar have furnished nearly all the cases cited, but the obituary of these columns is likely to supply a basis for more comprehensive views.

If it were desirable to illustrate ignorance by conjecture, we might, in the clear field which absence of ascertained fact opens for such amusement, speculate as to the reasons why a bishop has the odds of a judge in respect to longevity. It is probable that the life of eminent counsel and judges is on the whole more sedentary than that of a prelate or of a baronetted physician to half the peerage. Even the Long Vacation is insufficient, on this view, to break the spell and duly shake up forensic stagnation. A judge, at any rate, must "sit" a good deal. Minos himself, in the shades below, would have been hardly better off than Theseus: sedet æternumque sedebit infelix must have been as applicable to one as to the other. There may be something, too, in the fact that the judicial bench and the bar retain the wig which clergy and doctors have cast off. It is certainly the client's interest to alter, if possible, this state of things, and cultivate the growth of a race of legal Nestors. A Chancery counsel, cut off untimely in the thick of a suit, has sometimes bequeathed a heap of vexed questions and knotty points to his successor. We may, however, venture a hint to our own body, the solicitors:—It seems clear, that, somehow or other, learned attainments help to keep a life from dropping; hence, the more deeply read our solicitors become, the better chance they will have of prolonging their days, and running out a lease of ninety-nine years. And here again, as regards the client, the inconvenience of a premature decease is even greater. Every one knows the dead lock which ensues when the man who carries the key to the mysteries of an intricate estate in his head suddenly departs this life, and leaves a dead mass of old law stationery behind him, from which some one else must pick out and put together all which had a familiar and orderly air to him. When a busy solicitor in full practice dies, the clue of many a maze is in an instant gone, only to be retraced by laborious probing and plodding. Of course the thing must happen. We cannot immortalise that useful variety of the human species, the solicitor, however much the client may wish it; but we may induce the latter to prefer those whose law is based on systematic study; for reading men, it seems, live long.

At the same time, the statistics to which reference is here made deal only with the most distinguished ornaments of their respective professions. When we are told that "the mean duration of life attained by them (distinguished physicians) exceeds by four years and a quarter the mean duration of life of bishops and archbishops, and by four years and a half the mean duration of judges and other high legal functionaries," the possibility must not be left out of sight, that, if we included the facts which illustrate the opposite extreme, they might fetch up the mean average of legal longevity. The clerical profession is an apt illustration of our meaning: there the mortality amongst ardent young curates in great towns must perturb considerably a calculation based on the toughness of men rurally beneficed. A similar wear and tear is probable amongst junior practitioners of the medical profession. Hence our estimate of the value of the results hitherto attained is not high; and whenever we encounter, as we probably soon may, statistics showing the average length of wheat straws in Great Britain and her colonies, with columns distinguishing the length cut in straw from the length left in stubble, and comparing with the latter the average length of oat stubble left in Scotland, we shall be disposed to go into the question with equal seriousness.

Chancery Costs.

The subject of the remuneration of solicitors for the performance of their arduous and responsible duties, although of paramount importance to themselves, who have paid a heavy duty to Government, and incurred great expenses in qualifying themselves for the exercise of a profession, under the reasonable expectation, that, by devoting themselves honestly and assiduously to its duties, they would be able to maintain an honourable position in society, is not less so to the public, whose best and dearest interests are, and must be, confided to those very men.

The proposition that the effect of inadequate remuneration for services performed must be to reduce the profession to a class of unscrupulous men, who may be compelled to pay themselves in an indirect way, at the expense of the client, the price of that labour which those upon whom has devolved the duty of giving its value have denied them, is so self-evident, that it is unnecessary to do more than mention it.

The physician, the engineer, the architect, in short, the members of every other profession, are, by law, entitled to fix their own rate of remuneration, and if there be no contract, they can depend upon a jury of their countrymen to give them adequate remuneration for their services, having regard to the skill and ability displayed. The solicitor is precluded from this by reason of the peculiar relation in which he stands towards his client, and of the difficulty which persons not acquainted with the duties he has to perform must necessarily have in estimating the true value of his services. It has resulted, therefore, that, in the case of solicitors, officers acquainted with the practice of the courts are appointed, under the sanction and authority of the courts, to assess the sum to be paid; but if the courts in exercising this authority rely upon officers who have not had any experience in that procedure which has been created since they ceased to practise, and who do not, as formerly, avail themselves of the aid of the practitioners of the day, they lose sight of the first principles of justice; and the consequence is, that the solicitors sustain an immediate injury, by which, ultimately, the public must be the sufferer.

The recent Orders, establishing a new scale of fees, are preceded by a recital, that "of late years various alterations have taken place in the practice and procedure of the Court of Chancery, whereby certain of the fees heretofore allowed to the solicitors of the court have ceased, and others of such fees have become inapplicable to the duties which the solicitors have to perform; and it is desirable that a new and revised list of fees should be made."

They, therefore, purport to proceed to adjust the remuneration of solicitors to the new duties they are called upon to perform; but we shall presently show, not only that this has not been fairly carried out, but that proper means have not been adopted to effectuate it.

Before, however, discussing the details, it is but fair to make it generally known that the alterations and improvements in the practice and procedure of the Court of Chancery, which have been so advantageous for the suitor, and so detrimental to the pecuniary interests of solicitors, were proposed, and have been mainly carried out by the co-operation of the leading solicitors, on the faith that the remuneration of the profession would be fairly adjusted to meet the changes which were to be made.

When all these reforms were contemplated, a letter was addressed by the late Lord Langdale—a judge distinguished for his high sense of justice—to an eminent solicitor, who has taken a very active part in effecting these reforms; and, as it bears strongly upon our subject, we here insert it at length. It is as follows:—

"SIR,—I observe that your attention has been particularly drawn to the mode in which solicitors are remunerated, and, as I entirely agree with the opinions which you have expressed, that the real interests of the solicitor coincide with the interests of his client, and that it is a mischievous system to pay for what is not done by way of compensating for the omission to pay for what is done, I am in hopes that you will not think it too much trouble to communicate to me, for consideration, such observations as have occurred to you as the means which might be adopted in practice for securing to the solicitor a just reward for the services which he has really performed, according to a true statement of them in his bill of costs.

"The subject appears to me to be of very great importance; and I think that an investigation of it, with a view to an improvement of the present practice, cannot now be avoided. If the suggestions for an improved system could emanate from the solicitors themselves, the result would probably be more satisfactory than it can be made by any other means. But, whether anything so desirable can be obtained or not, it seems necessary, under present circumstances, that the subject should be now inquired into, and reconsidered.

"I am very far from thinking that honourable solicitors are, on the whole, overpaid; it is, indeed, highly probable that in many cases they are considerably underpaid; and a taxed bill ought to be consistent with both justice and truth,—with justice to the solicitor as well as the client; and with truth in the statement of the services for which just charges are allowed; and if you can spare the requisite time, and have no personal objection, I should feel obliged if you would, either individually or in concurrence with any other solicitors, communicate to me such information and observations as may appear to you to be material for a full and satisfactory consideration of the subject. I am, Sir, yours faithfully, 11th November, 1840. (Signed) LANGDALE."

His lordship's observations, that a just reward should be secured to the solicitor for the services which he really performs, and that the suggestions should emanate from the solicitors themselves, do not admit of a doubt of his views upon the subject; but it does not appear that those who have settled the new scale of fees entertained the same opinion. It is rather remarkable, however, that the present Master of the Rolls has not signed the Orders.

Let us now consider the position in which the solicitor stood with regard to remuneration for his services before the recent alterations, how those alterations have curtailed that remuneration, and how the recent Orders have adapted new fees to the new circumstances.

The old mode of remuneration was, no doubt, founded upon a vicious principle. The solicitor was paid by the length of proceedings required by the course of practice, but unnecessary for the real interests of the client, and was not paid for matters which occupied his time, and demauded much thought and skill; but by this means upon the whole of the business the solicitor was, or was supposed to be, fairly paid for services actually performed.

When the length of some proceedings was diminished, and others, which were prepared at very little expenditure of labour, were abolished, and either no fees or inadequate fees were allowed for those matters to which the solicitor is obliged to devote much time and care, it followed that he was not fairly remunerated for his services; and what he had a right to expect from the courts was, that he should be restored to his former position, by being paid according to the skill and labour he devotes to the interests of his client.

In saying this we do not, of course, assert that he is to be paid by way of compensation for the loss of profit upon useless proceedings abolished, but simply that he should be paid at the old rate for work actually done.

That such should have been the basis of the new scale of fees, and that such object could have been attained, if the solicitors had been properly consulted upon the subject, or even the chief clerks to the judges, who have had personal experience of the working of the new system, we do not entertain a doubt; but apparently a different conclusion has been come to by the judges who have signed the Orders, notwithstanding all remonstrances made to them upon the subject.

They did, indeed, we are informed, submit the proposed scale to seven solicitors, but coupled with an injunction that they should not communicate with each other, nor show the scale to any other person, who might have been competent to give useful advice or information upon the subject. These seven gentlemen, by leave of the Chancellor, were afterwards permitted to communicate with each other and with other solicitors; and five of them, assisted by three or four other solicitors, sent in suggestions to the commissioners to whom the matter was referred.

All these labours were, however, doomed to be but of little use, for the proposed scale, with a few trifling alterations, was adhered to. The solicitors showed, by a careful analysis of the business of two eminent firms, that 50 per cent. ought to be added in the new scale to the fees formerly allowed, to pay them for work actually done according to the old rate. The recent General Orders fix a higher and a lower scale of fees, according as the matter in litigation does or does not amount to the value of £1000. Now, even upon the higher scale, the addition made to the fees formerly allowed does not amount to more than 12½ per cent., so that, on that scale, solicitors have a less remuneration by 37½ per cent. for their labour than they had under the old system.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, May 7.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

The only paragraphs of professional interest were:—

"Her Majesty commands us to recommend to your earnest consideration measures which will be proposed to you for the consolidation and improvement of the law.

"Bills will be submitted to you for improving the laws relating to the testamentary and matrimonial jurisdiction now exercised by the Ecclesiastical Courts, and also for checking fraudulent breaches of trust."

PRIVILEGE OF REPORTERS.

Lord CAMPBELL gave notice, that, on Friday next, he should move for a select committee to consider whether the privilege now enjoyed by reports of the proceedings of courts of justice may be safely and properly extended to reports of the proceedings of the two Houses of Parliament, and of any and what other assemblies or public meetings, under any and what conditions or restrictions. And, also, for a select committee to consider and report on the expediency of altering the present mode of administering oaths to witnesses to be examined by committees of the House.

On the motion of Earl GRANVILLE, Lord Redesdale was re-appointed Chairman of Committees.

Friday, May 8.

Lord CAMPBELL moved for a committee pursuant to the above notice; which, after a few words from the LORD CHANCELLOR, was agreed to, and nominated.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, May 7.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Mr. HAYTER gave notice that leave to bring in the following bills would be moved for:—On May 8, to amend the Acts of the 16th & 17th of the present reign, with a view to substitute in certain cases other punishments in lieu of transportation. On May 14, to amend the oaths taken by members of the two Houses of Parliament. On May 15, to make fraudulent breaches of trust criminal. On May 14, for the incorporation of insurance companies and mutual societies.

Sir E. PERRY gave notice that on May 14, he should move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law of property as it affects married women and their separate earnings.

THE ADDRESS.

Mr. W. EWART regretted that no allusion was made in the Speech from the Throne to the question of a Ministry of Justice. Reference was made to many law reforms, but he could not see how those reforms were to be accomplished unless they were to have a source or fountain from which they might be derived. The foundation of all law reform was, in his opinion, the establishment of a Ministry of Justice.

Lord PALMERSTON said, that an address was moved and agreed to last session with respect to the establishment of a Department of Justice. We have under our consideration the best means of accomplishing that object, and I trust we shall be able to propose to the House some arrangement which shall effect the purpose contemplated in the address. As to a Reform of the Representation, his Lordship thought it would be inexpedient to enter upon so large a subject during the present short session, but pledged himself next session to bring forward a measure of Parliamentary Reform.

Friday, May 8.

Sir G. GREY brought in his Transportation Bill.

PARLIAMENTARY PRIVATE BUSINESS.

The Committee of Selection and Standing Order Committee were re-appointed, on the motion of Col. Wilson Patten, on Friday, May 8, and a motion to the following effect was made—viz. "That the Committee of Selection have power to appoint the meeting of all Committees on Private Bills, provided seven clear days elapse between second reading and committee, and three clear days' notice be given in the Private Bill office.

Parliamentary Practice on Private Bills.

All the requirements of the Standing Orders having been complied with, as regards the preparation and publication of the notices and the plans, sections, and books of reference, and the necessary copies being ready for deposit, the only thing which remains to be done before the 1st of December is to lodge the documents at the various places set forth in the Standing Orders (H. C. 28 to 35 inclusive, and H. L. 182, s. 6).

It may be as well to mention, that, in the case of railway bills, wherever any deposit of plans and sections is required (excepting Admiralty deposits, and the small parochial deposits) a published map, to a scale not less than half an inch to a mile as regards English and Scotch Bills—and not less than a quarter of an inch to a mile as regards Irish Bills—with the line of railway delineated thereon, must, in all cases, accompany the plans and sections. In practice, the usual course is to lay down the line on sheets of the Ordnance map. Taking, for example, a Railway Bill, by which any tidal water would be affected, the deposits would be as follows—viz. one entire copy of all the plans, sections, books of reference, published map, and Gazette notice at—1, the Board of Trade; 2, Parliament office (House of Lords); 3, Private Bill office (House of Commons); and a copy of the plans and sections and Gazette notice at the Admiralty. These would be the London deposits.

The county deposits would consist of the same documents as those enumerated above for the Parliament office, &c., with the addition, that there must be a duplicate copy of the plans and sections to accompany them; so that for each county deposit there would be prepared two copies of the plans and sections, one book of reference, one published map, and one copy of the Gazette notice. The copies of the Gazette notice, for deposit, are usually ordered at the time of sending back the last corrected proof of the notice for insertion in the Gazette; and the copies are struck off from the same type as that prepared for publication.

These last-named documents, which are usually called the county deposits in distinction from the London deposits, must be deposited with the clerk of the peace for every county, riding, or division of a county in England or Ireland—or in the office of the principal sheriff's clerk of every county, district, or division of a county in Scotland—in which any works are proposed to be made, maintained, varied, extended, or enlarged, or in which any lands or houses are situate which are proposed to be taken. Where there is a county of a city included in a county, and there are two clerks of the peace, two sets of deposits are made; for example, in the case of a railway through the city of Exeter, county deposits would be made with the clerk of the peace for the county of Devon, and with the clerk of the peace for the county of the city of Exeter also.

Besides the London and county deposits, a copy of so much of the plan, section, and book of reference as relates to each parish in or through which the work is intended to be made, maintained, varied, extended, or enlarged, or in which any land proposed to be taken is situate, must be deposited with the clerk of each such parish in England (or, in the case of any extra-parochial place, with the clerk of some adjoining parish); with the schoolmaster of each parish in Scotland, and if there is no schoolmaster, with the sessions' clerk, and in the case of royal burghs, with the town clerk; and with the clerk of the union within which such parish is situate, in Ireland.

A copy of the notice, as published in the Gazette, must accompany every deposit of plans and sections, or parts thereof.

The above sketch of the deposits for a Railway Bill will show the most extensive deposit which can in any case be required. The only difference in the number and style of deposits for any second-class Bill other than a Railway Bill, such as the above, is, that no Admiralty deposit will be required (unless the Bill affects any tidal water), and no Board of Trade deposit will be required in any event. As regards first-class Bills, where lands are proposed to be taken compulsorily, the deposits will be—one copy of plan, book of reference, and Gazette notice, in the Parliament office and Private Bill office respectively; and duplicate copies of plan, and one book of reference, and Gazette notice, with the clerk of the peace, or sheriff's clerk (as the case may be) for every county, or division of a county, in which land will be taken; and the before-mentioned rule laid down for parish deposits in respect of a Railway Bill will apply also to both first and second-class Bills in all cases where land is to be taken and plans deposited.

No fees, except those charged by the Houses of Parliament, are paid in London for deposits; but as regards country deposits, fees to the clerks of the peace are always paid, and to the parish clerks also. It is always best to write, a day or two previously, to the parish clerks, and fix the day for depositing documents, as in the rural districts great difficulty may be experienced when there are many parish deposits, unless appointments are made. A receipt must be taken for each deposit, and filed.

All the above deposits must be made on or before the 30th day of November previous to the application for the Bill; and if the 30th falls on a Sunday, then on the 29th November. They must not be made before 8 a.m. nor after 8 p.m.

The deposits being made, the next step is the preparation and service of the landowners' notices; but the mode of doing that part of the work has been treated of before.

The Subscription Contract, therefore, will claim our next attention. All second-class Bills require a Subscription Contract to be entered into, subject to two exceptions—viz. 1, when the projected works are proposed to be made out of funds, or on the credit of surplus capital of an existing company or corporate body; and 2, in cases where no private benefit or advantage is sought by the Bill, and the works are proposed to be made out of funds to be raised on the credit of the tolls and duties authorised to be taken by the proposed Act. Both these exceptions will be treated of hereafter.

The main requirements of the Standing Orders (H. C. 56 to 59) as regards new companies are—that the contract in the case of railways should be entered into subsequent to the commencement, and, as regards other Bills, subsequent to the close of the previous Session of Parliament; that it should be signed by subscribers to three-fourths the amount of the estimate of the undertaking made by the engineer; that it should contain the christian and surname, description, and place of abode of each subscriber, and the name of the party witnessing the same, the total amount of subscription, and the sum paid up. Each subscriber must covenant for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, for payment of the amount subscribed, to be recoverable by action at law.

The Subscription Contract can easily be made sufficiently large to embrace all the requisites of, and to supersede, a subscribers' agreement. So it will be better to assume that this kind of deed will be adopted. The contract is made between two parties: the subscribers and directors, of the first part; and the trustees, whose names are inserted for the purpose of enforcing the covenants contained in the contract, of the second part. It usually recites the circumstances of the application for a Bill, and contains an ample power to the directors to carry out all the objects therein specified (which must tally with those in the parliamentary notice, unless some of those objects are abandoned), and to do all things necessary for obtaining an Act of Parliament; or to curtail or vary the number of objects; or enter into agreements with third parties; in short, to do any acts which in their discretion may be advantageous to the undertaking. The shareholders must all covenant with the trustees for the payment of their subscriptions.

Where a contract is expected to be numerously signed, a clerk usually attends at the different towns where the subscribers reside, and notice of the day and hour of his attendance is previously given to the parties.

Where an existing railway company proposes to execute works, the contract need only be executed by subscribers to three-fourths of the amount of the additional capital required.

If the work is to be executed wholly or in part by means of funds or money to be raised on the credit of any present surplus revenue belonging to any society or company, or under the control of the directors of any public work who are promoters of the Bill, a properly authenticated declaration, setting forth the whole details, may be substituted for the subscription contract, either in respect of the whole amount of the engineer's estimate, or of such portion of it as is not provided for by the subscription contract, provided that the surplus fund be not less than the whole or such portion of the estimate.

Lastly, in the case of turnpike roads, ferries, or any other works (provided that no private pecuniary advantage is contemplated by the proposed Bill), an estimate of the probable amount of tolls, rates, and duties to be received under the powers of the proposed Act, and a declaration that the works are to be executed out of money to be raised on the credit of such tolls, rates, and revenues, signed by the agent soliciting the Bill, are allowed to be deposited in lieu of a subscription contract.

As regards the contents and details of the estimate, that is a matter solely in the hands of the engineer. The solicitor must be instructed in good time what the total amount will be, so that he may be enabled to advise the directors as to the subscription contract; but, with the exception of the preparation of the form of the estimate, the solicitor has nothing to do with it.

The subject of the next paper will be the preparation of the Bill, and deposits on or before Dec. 31.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The Stock Exchange was disturbed yesterday by an announcement that the Bank directors would discontinue advances on the security of stock. In other respects the money market has all the week presented a more favourable aspect than for several weeks past. The supply of money has been more free, and the heavy payments falling due have been well met. The English Funds closed this afternoon with an advance of 1 per cent. in the course of the week, the last price of Consols for money being quoted 93⅜ to ½ per cent. Foreign Securities have advanced in proportion. Turkish 6 per cents. have recovered their late depression.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 2nd May, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,776,230, being a decrease of £12,425, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £9,558,827, showing an increase of £3,592 when compared with the previous return. Gold continues in demand both in Paris and Hamburg, but the rate of discount at Hamburg has receded, and the exchanges on the continent generally are reported rather more favourable to England. A large supply of gold by the Anglesea has been delivered, and a larger supply is believed to be near. Its arrival will revive the expectation of permanent ease in money; but as previous large arrivals have been absorbed without material abatement in demand, it would be over confident to rely upon any very favourable change till it becomes apparent that the demand which has so long been felt inconvenient, is satisfied or greatly diminished.

The late severe weather has given rise to great apprehension for the safety of the next silk crop. The failure of last season inflicted heavy loss on the cultivators, and greatly increased the price. The present cold weather has produced a further advance. Accounts received from the southern countries of Europe, and from the Levant, are not unfavourable; but if cold weather should continue to check vegetation, further severe loss will be sustained, and the price will again advance.

At a meeting held at Paris on the 28th of April, of the shareholders of the Credit Mobilier of France, the President made a report, which shows results of extraordinary magnitude. It states that the Credit Mobilier subscribed £10,000,000 to the last Government loan. It gave accommodation on railway securities, on one occasion, to the extent of £1,160,000, the average being £600,000 for every fortnight. The report then touches on the financial situation of the company. The tota lprofits of the year are stated to have been £609,999, which gives a dividend of 23 per cent., to be paid in July next.

The President, M. Pereire, seems to be one of the most active and influential opponents of the proposed plan for doubling the capital of the Bank of France. This plan meets with opposition from several capitalists of great influence. The Emperor has convened and presided over a Council of State, which has met on two successive days and had an animated discussion, with much difference of opinion. Great success, and a remarkable increase in the amount of business, has attended the operations of the Bank of France since the establishment of the Imperial Government. In the year 1852, the amount of business was represented by advances to the extent of £95,800,000. In 1853, the advances rose to £155,500,000. In 1855, they were £188,120,000. In 1856, the advances increased to the sum of £228,105,576, and the profits are said to have increased in a still larger proportion. This satisfactory progress, on the foundation of its present capital, and the remarkable development of recent prosperity, makes the question of the important change now proposed of the greatest interest to the shareholders, to the Government, and to the capitalists of France.

LONDON, MAY 16, 1857.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILLS.

The CHANCELLOR has returned to his projects of law reform, which he has re-introduced with some variations, both of form and substance. It is quite impossible for the most ingenious perversity to concoct a scheme for the administration of testamentary matters which would not be some improvement on the existing courts. Although, therefore, the Government Bill is far short of what is required, we hope that it may pass, if only as a step to further improvements. It is obvious that all probates ought to be universally conclusive as to every species of property to which the will relates. When once the validity of a testamentary instrument has been investigated after due notice to all parties concerned, it ought never again to be called in question, except by way of appeal from the first decision. Anomalies like that presented by the recent case of Boyse v. Rossborough, where the same will was held valid by an English Court and invalid by the corresponding tribunal in Ireland, are a disgrace to our jurisprudence. It is equally absurd that a testator should be held by one Court to have been incompetent to bequeath his personal property, while another Court, of equal authority, pronounces the devise of his real estates valid. To some extent, the CHANCELLOR'S Bill gets rid of these strange absurdities. The independent Diocesan Courts are to be merged in a single Court of Probate, of which the old local officials are to form the district officers. The grave questions which used to arise as to the necessity of a Canterbury probate, the locality of property, and the nature of bona notabilia, will thus be put an end to. A further and more considerable reform is the extension, in certain cases, of the probate jurisdiction to real estate. Where a will is proved in solemn form, the probate is to be evidence of the validity of the disposition of real as well as personal estate; and the grant of letters of administration, by an order founded on the invalidity of an alleged will, is in like manner to be available to establish an intestacy in favour of the heir-at-law. These provisions will, no doubt, be serviceable, but their chief merit consists in the fact that they can scarcely fail to lead to the only rational system,—that of constituting the executor or administrator a real, as well as a personal, representative. Why a grant in common form should not also be made applicable to realty is more than we can comprehend; but duly remembering the tenacity of life which belongs to the ecclesiastical courts, we are reluctant to urge objections to any measure which offers to remove any part of the defects of the present jurisdiction.

The principal change introduced into the Bill, as compared with that of the last session, is in the constitution of the court before which contentious suits are to come. This is, avowedly, a concession to the objections of Lord Campbell; and, perhaps, also to the clamour of the Times. It strikes us as a matter of no importance whatever. The present judge of the Prerogative Court is to do the work instead of one of the Vice-Chancellors, as originally proposed. The Times will no doubt, with its usual sagacity in legal matters, inform the public that their wills have been saved from the devouring jaws of the Court of Chancery; but, except that an additional judge will have to be paid, the court which is to decide in the first instance will proceed in the same way, at the same cost, and with the same evidence as that originally proposed. The only change is in the appellate jurisdiction, a direct appeal to the Privy Council being substituted for the successive appeals to the Court of Appeal in Chancery and to the House of Lords. In the ultimate tribunal we think this an improvement, but the expense in ordinary cases will be seriously increased; as experience has shown that a decision by the Lords Justices, which may be obtained at little cost, is generally sufficient to satisfy a suitor without a reference to such formidable courts as the Judicial Committee or the House of Lords. However, as the Bill stands, the judgment of Sir J. Dodson is to be conclusive on all who are not prepared to carry their complaint to the supreme tribunal.

In the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill two important alterations have been made. The worst faults of the measure introduced in February were, that it left the action of criminal conversation untouched, and that it gave an entirely novel power to husbands and wives of effecting a quasi judicial separation by mutual consent, and returning to the liberty of the unmarried state, for all purposes except that of contracting a second marriage. This strange provision has, we are glad to see, been omitted from the new bill, the CHANCELLOR having, we presume, discovered that there was not an individual in the country besides himself who could be found to approve of the license which he proposed to bestow. On the other point, the Bill, though still defective, contains a clause which may be expected greatly to discountenance crim. con. proceedings. It is proposed, that, after the passing of the Act, no such action shall be maintained unless the plaintiff shall have previously obtained a final decree of divorce à vinculo. This just reverses the present rule, and instead of the action being an essential preliminary to a divorce, the divorce is to be a condition precedent to the action. The effect will probably be to work the practical abolition of the action altogether; but to prohibit an acknowledged nuisance by express enactment would have been more statesmanlike than to shuffle it out of the way by imposing a condition which will, in most cases, suffice to prevent it. Such as they are, the CHANCELLOR'S bills have now a fair chance of passing; and though we cannot profess ourselves satisfied with their provisions, there is no doubt that they will be some improvement on the existing law.

THE PRIVY COUNCIL ON THE LAW OF DOMICIL.

A decision of the Privy Council delivered during the course of this week by LORD WENSLEYDALE has several points of interest. The case belonged to that puzzling and intricate class which turns on questions of domicil; and the judgment, if it deserved notice on no other grounds, would repay a careful study, by the legal acumen and the clear reasoning which it displays in dealing with a very difficult point. But it has other claims to our attention. It incidentally touches on many nice questions in the general law of domicil; it elucidates and strengthens portions of the received English law; and it throws some light on the degree of legal uncertainty that may exist in other systems than our own.

The question at issue was, whether the will of a lady should be admitted to probate, under the following circumstances:—The testatrix was the daughter of a General Calcraft, an officer in the East India Company's service, and was born in India, in the year 1795, and thus had by birth an Anglo-Indian domicil. She came with her father and sister to England in 1805, and remained there twenty years. In 1825, she left her father, and travelled with her governess through different parts of the Continent. In 1834, General Calcraft died, and the testatrix was joined by her sister. The two sisters settled in Paris in 1838, and the testatrix resided there until her death in 1853. She made a will in 1842, in the English form; and the validity of this will was the subject-matter of dispute. The will was clearly invalid if it was necessary that it should have been made according to the forms prescribed by the French law. There could also be very little dispute as to the fact, that the testatrix had, according to the general principles of international law, acquired a French domicil. It is a settled point of English law that the form and solemnities of a will must be governed by the laws of the country where the deceased is domiciled. The real question, therefore, was, whether the French law required that the will of a domiciled stranger should be made according to the solemnities which are prescribed by the municipal law of France in the case of wills made by French citizens.

The question must necessarily have been answered in the affirmative if the municipal law of France had been silent as to the position of domiciled strangers. It is a fundamental maxim of the law of domicil, that the legal acts of a domiciled stranger must comply in form with the rules prescribed by the law of the country where he is domiciled. But, by the 13th Article of the Code Napoleon, it is provided that a foreigner, who shall have been admitted by authorisation of the Emperor to establish his domicil in France, shall enjoy there all civil rights so long as he shall reside there. The testatrix had not received this authorisation, and it therefore became necessary to decide what was her position. The Judge of the Court below held, that this Article of the Code implied that an Imperial authorisation was necessary, before a domicil could be established; and, consequently, that the testatrix, never having taken the requisite means to procure a French domicil, and, therefore, never having changed her domicil at all, could make a valid will according to the English form. The Lords of the Privy Council reversed this decision. They construed the Article of the Code as meaning that a stranger receiving an authorisation was to enjoy all civil rights, but that a stranger not receiving an authorisation might still gain some of the rights which would accrue to him under the general law of domicil. They referred to several French cases, showing that this was the interpretation put upon the Article in the French Courts, and also showing that the capacity to make a will was one of the rights for the acquisition of which an authorisation was not necessary. This was sufficient to decide the case before them, and they accordingly pronounced a final judgment against the will.

In a case depending so largely on the proper exposition of the French law, it was, of course, material to have the opinions of eminent French lawyers to guide the English Courts. Accordingly, when the case was heard before the Judge of the inferior Court, five French lawyers were examined on behalf of those who sought to establish the will, and three on behalf of those who attacked its validity. Their opinions do not appear to have inspired the Lords of the Privy Council with much respect. Lord WENSLEYDALE remarked, that the five who supported the will all agreed in saying that the testatrix had not, under the rules of general international law, gained a French domicil. That she had, was so clear to him and his colleagues, that they could not feel much confidence in lawyers whom they considered so palpably mistaken. Further, not only they, but the lawyers on the other side, seemed either ignorant of, or indisposed to admit, the rule, that, in inquiring into the validity of a will, it is the domicil at the time of death that has to be ascertained, not the place of residence at the date when the will was made. This rule, long since laid down, has received so decisive a sanction from this judgment, that, in England at least, it can never hereafter be called in question. We cannot forbear to remark that nothing could be much more badly drawn than the Article of the Code which had to be interpreted. It is one of the simplest maxims of legislative expression, that the legislator should always set clearly before him what will be the negative force of an affirmative provision. That the framers of the Code should not have considered the position of a stranger who did not obtain an authorisation of domicil, is certainly remarkable. We should never think of denying that the Code Napoleon is a very masterly production; but we suspect that Englishmen who praise it unreservedly, judge it by a more lenient standard than they would apply to any great effort of English legislation.

This case suggests the practical question how wills ought to be drawn when an English subject is residing abroad, and it is uncertain, as it so often is, whether a new domicil has or has not been gained. As the communication with the Continent becomes more extended, and as English families accustom themselves more and more to reside for considerable periods abroad, it becomes every day more likely that such a question may be forced on the consideration of an English professional adviser. We believe that there is a simple and easy way by which the validity of the will may be made indisputable. Not only the law of France, but the law of all the chief continental nations, considers as valid a holograph will—a will that is entirely written, dated, and signed by the testator. If, then, the testator makes or copies a will in his own handwriting, and it is subsequently witnessed according to the provisions of the English Wills Act, it must be valid, whether the testator has or has not lost his English domicil.

Legal News.

The present session of Parliament, although likely to be of short duration, will, we believe, be marked by the introduction of many most important measures of law reform. It is said that the resolution which was unanimously affirmed by the House of Commons in February last, recommending the constitution of a separate and independent department of justice, has received, during the short vacation afforded by the general election, the most earnest consideration of the Government. We are enabled to state upon what we believe to be reliable authority, that a measure to establish such new department will be shortly submitted to Parliament by the Attorney-General, and that its main features will be as follows:—The LORD CHANCELLOR for the time being will be ex officio the Minister or recognised head of the new department of justice, and will preside in a Committee of the Privy Council, to be composed of the Lord President of the Council, and other members including the law lords and ex-judges, probably the majority of those at present constituting the legal committee. To this Committee, under the presidency of the LORD CHANCELLOR, as Minister of Justice, will be intrusted the supervision of the civil and criminal jurisprudence of the country, and generally its administration by existing tribunals. In addition, there will be two Under Secretaries of State belonging to the department—one charged with the superintendence of civil, and the other of criminal justice. These officials will be assisted by a competent legal staff, whose time will be exclusively devoted to the business of their respective branches. They will have to collect and arrange judicial statistics, and to revise, under the control of the Committee, current legislation; each as it affects the interests under his charge. It will be their duty also to point out errors or defects in the administration of the law, and suggest appropriate remedies. We believe that machinery will be adopted in connection with the department, by which the huge mass of our enacted and unenacted or judge-made law will be consolidated and systematically arranged. But this part of the general plan must of course depend in some measure upon the course which Parliament will adopt on consideration of the report of the select committee on the mode and language of legislation. If a committee, assisted by an officer of the House, be appointed for the purpose of revising current legislation, and of directly or indirectly consolidating our statute law, we presume that the business of the new department of justice will be confined rather to the matter of legislation, than to its manner and language. It is also intended that the committee shall sit as a Court of Appeal, to hear and decide criminal cases on questions of fact, in which there is at present no appeal. The effect would be to substitute judicial investigation for the frequently loose and uncertain, and always secret and irresponsible, system now existing, which, in point of fact, confers upon the HOME SECRETARY exclusive jurisdiction in questions affecting life and death, and imposes upon him a duty which it must be most difficult and painful for him to discharge. This plan, speaking generally, has unquestionably many recommendations to the support of Parliament. It avoids the expense and inconvenience of the appointment of an additional legal member of the Cabinet, who would practically supplant, or, at all events, frequently clash with, the LORD CHANCELLOR as the head of the law. It is, moreover, the recognition of a principle of central supervision, for which all law reformers—especially BENTHAM, ROMILLY, and BROUGHAM—have energetically laboured, and which has been found of eminent advantage to the jurisprudence and judicial administration of continental Europe.

The Bill to render criminal fraudulent breaches of trust, it is said, proposes to extend the definition of larceny so as to make the fraudulent conversion of trust-property a misdemeanour. To prevent a multitude of prosecutions, which might be instituted from ignorance or mistake, or from the private pique or disappointment of cestuis que trust, it provides that no prosecution shall be instituted unless directed by a judge of one of the superior courts, or by the Attorney-General. The measure will deal with another class of trustees—viz. the directors and officers of joint-stock companies, and proposes to enact that fraudulent representations, false entries in account books, and false balance-sheets, issued for the purpose of deceiving the public, shall also be misdemeanours.

The new Joint-Stock Banks Bill will extend the principle of limited liability to those institutions, in conformity with the system which has been found secure and highly advantageous in our Colonies and the United States of America. It is proposed that the liability of each shareholder should be limited to 100 per cent. beyond the amount of his shares. Thus, every holder of ten shares of £100 each will be liable, in case of failure, to pay the sum of £2,000, and a reserved fund corresponding to the amount of subscribed capital will thereby be rendered available.

The difficulty in dealing with insurance companies, which form the subject of another Government measure, arises from the constitution of mutual associations. We are informed that one of the main objects of the new bill will be to assimilate the position of proprietors in such companies to that of ordinary shareholders in other insurance companies. As the two last-mentioned bills are likely to be laid on the table of the House of Commons before our next publication, it is unnecessary now to enter more particularly into their provisions.

CONSEQUENCES OF AN ATTORNEY'S NEGLIGENCE.

Two actions, arising out of one dispute between an attorney and his client, have been tried this week before Lord CAMPBELL, and in both cases judge and jury seem to have concurred in verdicts which appear to us extremely questionable. In the case first tried, however, the only clear objection to the verdict is, that the plaintiff ought, perhaps, to have recovered the costs of a writ of summons, whereas his claim was altogether disallowed. This, then, is a very small matter. But in the second case, a verdict has been found against the attorney for negligence in prosecuting an action on a bond, and the jury have given £644 damages. The balance due on the bond was ascertained by the Master at £744, and it was contended on behalf of the client that this sum might have been recovered if the attorney had prosecuted the action with due diligence. We do not think any person not vehemently prejudiced against lawyers can acquiesce in this as the correct inference from the facts proved. The jury's estimate of the probable squeezability of the defendant in the action differs altogether from our own. It is true, that one of his creditors did extract from him a sum of nearly £300, but that success was due to the happy accident of an arrest being effected on the very morning of the debtor's marriage. The ceremony had been performed when the officer appeared to claim his prisoner, and in this exigency the father of the lady was induced to pay the debt. The problem presented by Lord CAMPBELL to the jury appears to have been this: Assume that judgment might have been obtained in August for £744, and a ca. sa. duly lodged for that amount about the day of the debtor's marriage—what is the value of the probability that the father of the actual or potential wife, having paid one debt of £300 to liberate the person of his son-in-law, would and could have paid another debt of £744 to prevent the first outlay being thrown away? This probability the jury, by some inscrutable process of arithmetic, have estimated at £100 less than absolute certainty. We think that the deduction of £100 is rather less rational than a verdict for the full amount, and in either case should look with some confidence to the result of a motion for a new trial. It must be owned that the omission to obtain a reference to the Master of a mere matter of account, and the quiet allowance of ten applications for time to plead, form, together, a remarkable example of supineness in the attorney, of which the client may very reasonably complain. But we do not think that any diligence could have attained a different result; and this opinion will, we believe, be shared by all who read the subjoined details of the case.

In the first case, Chapman v. Van Toll, the plaintiff, William Chapman, an attorney at Richmond, sued the defendant, a widow lady named Van Toll, to recover the sum of 48*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* for work and labour done as an attorney. The defendant pleaded only the general issue.

It appeared that the sum of £1,000 had been lent to a Captain Roberts on the security of his bond, and the defendant, wishing to recover the amount still due, placed the matter in the plaintiff's hands. He instructed his London agent, Mr. George Helder, to take the necessary proceedings, under the advice of a special pleader. A writ was issued in July, 1855, and two days after its service—viz. on the 16th, Captain Roberts wrote a letter to the defendant, in which he said he had repaid the sum of £450, and that only £550 was due; and that he was ready to hand over that amount, through his solicitors, on receiving a proper receipt. This letter was forwarded to the plaintiff, and by him to his agent; but, instead of availing himself of the provision in the 3rd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, which gave him power to apply to judge and get the account referred, he delivered a declaration, and proceeded to trial in the regular course. The cause was set down for trial at Guildhall on the 14th of December; but after the briefs had been delivered to counsel, it was arranged that the record should be withdrawn, and that it should be referred to the Master to state the account. This was accordingly done, and the Master certified that £741 was due; but when execution was issued, nothing could be obtained. Roberts for a time left the country, and on his return he became a bankrupt, but had paid nothing.

The defence was, that when Captain Roberts wrote the letter of the 16th of July, admitting his liability, it was the duty of the plaintiff to get the matter referred under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and that his not having done so was negligence, which disentitled him from recovering.

The plaintiff and his agent were recalled, and asked to explain why they did not apply to a judge under the Act. They stated that they saw Captain Robert's solicitors, and that they got time to plead, and pleaded several pleas, denying liability.

Lord CAMPBELL said, the question for the jury was, whether the plaintiff had been guilty of negligence, such as to render his services wholly useless to the defendant, in not adopting a most salutary enactment, which enabled either party, without delivering a declaration and going to trial, to make an application to a judge to have the case summarily decided, or to have it referred. His Lordship read the 3rd section of the Common Law P ocedure Act, 1854, which enacted, that, "If it be made to appear, at any time after the issuing of the writ, to the satisfaction of the Court or a judge, upon the application of either party, that the matter in dispute consists wholly or in part of matters of mere account which cannot conveniently be tried in the ordinary way, it shall be lawful for the Court or judge, upon such application, if they or he think fit, to decide such matter in a summary manner, or to order that such matter, either wholly or in part, be referred to an arbritrator appointed by the parties, or to an officer of the Court, or, in country causes, to the judge of any County Court, upon such terms as to costs and otherwise as such Court or judge shall think reasonable." His Lordship said, this was a most salutary enactment, and there could be no doubt that this case came within it. It was a question of mere account, and was not fit to be tried by a jury, but could be much better disposed of by a single judge. This was a case in which a judge could have made an order of reference. It was an action on a bond, and the only question was how much was due upon it. If it had been referred to the Master, the whole matter would have been over by the end of the month. But, instead of that, a declaration was filed, and notice of trial was given; and it was not till the trial was coming on that it was discovered that it was not a fit case for a jury, and it was referred. His Lordship thought there certainly was evidence of negligence; but some explanation had been made of it, which deserved the attention of the jury. Irrespective of that, it did not appear that the plaintiff was at all to blame. His Lordship did not think the plaintiff was entitled to the costs incurred after the writ was issued.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

Mr. Pollock submitted that the plaintiff was entitled to recover his costs down to the service of the writ.

Lord CAMPBELL.—Not if his services were wholly useless.

The jury said that was their opinion.

Lord CAMPBELL said he thought the verdict was a salutary decision, and it would show that it was not only the duty, but the interest, of attorneys to avail themselves of this enactment, which enabled parties without delay or expense to have matters of account adjusted.

Verdict for the defendant.

In the second case, Van Toll v. Chapman, the plaintiff sued the defendant to recover damages for the loss which she had sustained by his negligence when acting as her attorney.

It appeared that the plaintiff when very young had been married to a Mr. Van Toll, in 1851. Her husband had a considerable fortune, but his habits were very extravagant, and in order to protect her interests, he was induced to pay a sum of £1000 into the London and Westminster Bank to her credit. Captain Julius Roberts, of the Royal Marine Artillery, professed to be the plaintiff's friend, and undertook to invest this money for her benefit. The plaintiff accordingly signed a check in his favour for the £1000; but instead of investing this money, Roberts kept it himself, and to secure the amount, he sent her his bond for £2000, dated the 24th of November, 1852. A portion of the money was repaid; but as the plaintiff lost her husband in 1854, she was anxious to recover the balance remaining due. She accordingly, in the early part of July, 1855, placed the matter in the defendant's hands, with instructions to sue Roberts and get the money. The plaintiff's contention now was, that as soon as the defendant was made aware that Roberts acknowledged his liability, he ought to have applied to a judge under the 3rd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and to have had the matter of account at once referred to the Master. Had that course been taken, there were reasonable grounds for believing that the plaintiff might have obtained judgment and execution in a few weeks, and so have got the debt paid. Evidence was given to show that if judgment had been obtained against Roberts in August, the whole, or at least a portion, of the defendant's claim might have been satisfied. A person named Tate had brought an action against him on the 25th of June, and Roberts on the 2nd of August had agreed to a judge's order for the payment of £394 odd on the 12th of August. He was married on the 15th of August, and being arrested that morning for another debt of £378 odd, his father-in-law paid the amount. It also appeared that he had drawn a sum of £150 out from an insurance society.

Mr. Hawkins called the defendant and his agent, and they both stated that they were not at the time aware of the provision in the Common Law Procedure Act which had been referred to.

Captain Roberts also was put into the box, and stated, that if he had been pressed for money at the period in question he could not have paid; and that the only chance he had of being able to meet his liabilities was by having time given to him. He stated that he had been employed by the Government in fitting up gunboats, but, being ordered abroad, he had given up his commission and been allowed to retire on half pay.

Lord CAMPBELL repeated what he said on the previous trial, that where the defendant's liability was admitted, and the only matter to be decided was one of mere account, it was the duty of an attorney to proceed under the 3rd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854. It would therefore be for the jury to say what damage, if any, the plaintiff had sustained by reason of the defendant's negligence in not adopting that course.

The jury retired to consider their verdict, and on their return into court found for the plaintiff, damages £644.

ROYAL BRITISH BANK.

On Thursday, Mr. Commissioner Holroyd gave judgment in this case. He said, according to the Act of Parliament under which this inquiry has been conducted, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, s. 25, a report of the cause of the failure of the company is to be made by this Court to the Board of Trade, and the Court is to be at liberty to state any special circumstances relating to the formation or management of the affairs of the company; but by the terms of the Act this report is to be made after the company have passed their last examination. Now, the last examination has been adjourned to the 24th of June; but, notwithstanding the above provision, I think the Court ought at once, ex mero motu, to direct copies of the examinations to be transmitted to the Attorney-General, so that the Government may be advised by its law officers as to instituting criminal proceedings. To wait until the last examination might occasion inconvenience, if not defeat the ends of justice. I do not believe that a scene of greater recklessness, fraud, and criminality of conduct in the management of a banking establishment was ever exhibited in a court of justice than is disclosed by the examinations taken under the adjudication of bankruptcy against the Royal British Bank; and I may observe that these examinations will be admissible in evidence against the parties in case of a prosecution. His Honour referred to the various provisions of the Act for the regulation of Joint-stock Banks, and of the deeds of settlement, and then proceeded:—Nothing can be more clear and explicit than the provisions in the charter as to the duties of the directors and other officers of the company; and where a duty is thrown on a body consisting of several persons, each is individually liable for a breach of duty, as well for acts of commission as of omission,—that is, each individual of the body who does not do what in him lies to discharge his public duty, contracts by his negligence individual guilt; and where parties are required by law to certify as to a particular fact, it is not necessary to show that they knew at the time that the contents of the certificate were false. It is not necessary to go in detail into the facts brought to light during this most painful inquiry, or to single out any particular persons as delinquents; that will be for elsewhere and hereafter; but having regard to the course pursued in the management of the affairs of the Royal British Bank, in defiance of the Act and of the charter, I think the directors and general managers are open to some one or more of the following charges:—1st, Commencing business before all the shares were subscribed for, and at least half the amount paid up, and repaying part of the sum paid up without leave of the Board of Trade; 2nd, Making, declaring, and publishing false statements and balance-sheets of the assets and liabilities of the bank, and of the amounts and nature of the capital and property and value thereof, and of the profits and losses of the company; thereby concealing the actual state and position of the affairs of the corporation, and giving a semblance of solvency where the reality had ceased to exist; and sending false reports and balance-sheets and profit and loss accounts to the proprietors, as required by s. 4,—3rd, Declaring dividends when no profits had been made, but, on the contrary, when the affairs of the corporation were greatly embarrassed and large losses had been incurred, and when, according to the terms of the charter, not a farthing ought to have been allowed for dividend.—4th, Conspiring to raise the price of the shares of the company by illegal means and with a criminal view. To give a fictitious price to the shares of a company by means of false reports and publications, or by declaring dividends when there are no profits, or by the company buying their own shares, is a fraud levelled against the public. —5th, Conspiring, when in a state of insolvency, and when the losses of the company had exhausted the "surplus or reserve fund" and one-fourth part of the paid-up capital, to obtain a supplemental charter from the Crown by false representations and by false reports and balance-sheets, and making dividends when not justified in so doing, and thereupon issuing new shares or obtaining deposits for new shares at a premium, with intent to cheat the public and in contempt of the prerogative of the Crown.—6th, Making such repeated gross misapplication of the funds of the bank by large loans to some of the directors and other persons on terms of the utmost risk, in total disregard of the discretion vested in the directors by the charter, with consequent serious loss to the corporation; embarking in a hazardous speculation by laying out large sums of the bank money upon an undertaking quite foreign to the business of banking—the Welsh mines—and thereby also incurring heavy losses; not exercising proper superintendence and control over the general manager in conducting the business and affairs of the company; and though the directors found that the losses of the company had exhausted all the "surplus or reserved fund," and also one-fourth of the capital actually paid-up, failing to call a special general meeting of the proprietors and to submit to the meeting a statement of the affairs of the company. I may here add, that the petition for the original charter contains false representations as to the payment of the deposit on shares. With respect to the auditors of the company, it appears that they neglected the duty of properly examining and auditing the accounts of the directors, for, without examination of the books, vouchers, and documents relating to such accounts, they signed them as correct, when, in fact, the accounts were fallacious, and concealed the real financial state of the bank at the time. The auditors were in a situation to know the falsehood of that which they signed as correct, but neglected to avail themselves of the means of knowledge within their power. Now comes the question as to the criminal responsibility of the directors and other officers of the corporation. Upon this point no doubt can be entertained. His Honour then stated the grounds of his opinion, and referred to many authorities in support of it, and added that he should direct the proceedings under the bankruptcy to be forthwith brought to the special notice of Government in the way already pointed out.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT, 1854.
17 & 18 VICT. c. 31.

The Court of Common Pleas—to which exclusive jurisdiction is given in cases of dispute arising out of the working of railways—has recently pronounced some decisions upon the above Act which are of extreme importance to railway companies and to those concerned in advising them.

In the first case (In re the Caterham Railway Company, 1 C. B., N. S., 410) the Court refused to interfere to compel the company possessing the main line to charge the same rate for passengers to Caterham as they charged for passengers to Epsom—another branch on the same line extending over the same number of miles, but not traversing the same portion of their railway; they also declined to entertain a complaint on the part of the branch line that an insufficient number of trains stopped at the junction, and stopped at inconvenient places—it not being shown that there was a want of reasonable accommodation afforded to the public; but they intimated an opinion that the absence of a covered station at the junction, was a want of due and reasonable accommodation which would induce them to interfere.

In the next case (In re Barret, Id. 423), the Court refused to grant an injunction, at the suit of an individual, to enforce the running of "through trains" by the Great Northern and the Midland Railways between King's Cross Station and a remote village in Yorkshire, there being ample accommodation by the North Western line, at the same expense, though by a somewhat longer route.

In the third case (In re Ransome, Id. 437), the Court restrained the Eastern Counties Railway from giving an undue preference to a coal merchant at Peterborough, dealing in coals brought by land carriage from Yorkshire and Staffordshire, by charging him lower rates for the carriage of his coals than they charged another coal merchant at Ipswich, for whom they carried coals (sea-borne to Ipswich) over the same portions of their line; the object of the company being to enable the former to compete with the latter—an object the Court thought not warranted by the Act. The Court, at the same time, recognised the right of the company to vary their charges (as they also did in the fourth case, In re Oxlade, Id. 454) where the difference was justified by difference of circumstances, ex. gr. the interests and convenience of the company themselves.

In the last case (In re Marriott, Id. 499), the South-Western Railway Company were injoined to permit an omnibus proprietor to drive into their station-yard, for the purpose of taking-up and setting-down passengers at their booking-office, it appearing that they allowed another proprietor that privilege, and that there were no special circumstances to justify the exclusion of the complainant.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

RE JOHNS.

Mr. Lucas submitted that the bankrupt could not pass on his present accounts, which were unvouched to the extent of £1,800.

The COMMISSIONER—They are better vouched than accounts that were passed the other day by the Court of Review.

Mr. Lucas—I think it right to add that the official assignee (Mr. Johnson) is not satisfied.

The COMMISSIONER—I do not care for that—he ought to be here. I shall pass the bankrupt.

RE CAMPIN.

In this case the following point arose:—The official assignee is entitled to 5 per cent. upon debts and 1 per cent. upon property. A sum of about £160 was passed into his hands, £130 being in bills drawn upon customers, and the remainder in cash. The official assignee having only to pass the bills through the Bank of England, to whom they were paid on presentation, it was submitted that they ought not to be classed as debts. There was another item which was in this position:—Prior to the bankruptcy the bankrupt had agreed to sell certain stock; that sale had since been completed, and it was contended that the transaction ought to be regarded as a cash transaction.

The COMMISSIONER held that the cash (£30) was a different thing from the bills. The bills might or might not have been paid on presentation. The official assignee had sometimes much trouble in such cases and no remuneration, and he was not to be deprived of the full percentage because the bills in this case were paid on presentation. The bills must be regarded as a debt. No legal sale of the stock having been completed, the official assignee would be entitled to his percentage of 1 per cent. upon that transaction as one of property.

MR PHINN.—Lord Campbell, seeing Mr. Phinn in his place in the front row, said he was very glad to see him back again; but he could not ask him to move, as it was the last day of term. His lordship, according to ancient custom, then called upon the juniors in the back row to move.

IN RE JOHN WILLIAMS KNIPE, AN ATTORNEY.—Mr. Garth moved to make a rule absolute to strike an attorney of Worcester, named John Williams Knipe, off the roll for misconduct.—Master Turner, to whom the matters had been referred, then read his report to the court.—Mr. Garth said notice had been given to the gentleman who had appeared for Mr. Knipe before the Master that his report would be read this day, but he believed the attorney did not appear either by counsel or in person.—Lord Campbell said that after the able and clear statement contained in the Master's report it appeared to the court that Mr. Knipe was not a fit person to remain on the roll of the court. The rule must therefore be made absolute to strike him off.

THE IMPROVEMENTS AT GUILDHALL.—We are happy to have it in our power to record the unqualified approbation expressed by the gentlemen of the bar of the alterations recently effected by the corporation in their courts. Instead of the gloomy, ill-ventilated, inconvenient, and almost unapproachable closet, a light, commodious, and easily accessible robing-room and reading-room to boot have been provided—alterations which have not been attained at any sacrifice of the space allotted to either of the courts, but have rather been introductory of improvements in the hall, and the general arrangements of the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas. Two additional courts have also been constructed in the buildings near to the Guildhall and this court, which will be found very useful when double courts are sitting. With respect to the arrangement of these new courts, there is much to approve of; but we should say that if a barrister had been consulted he would have recommended the Bar to be located in a position to and from which there would be free access and retreat. At present these seats are placed in one of the courts at the extreme further corner; and in the other the plan is little, if at all, better. We fear that when the dog-days come these buildings will be found to be insufferably hot, as they are lighted from lanterns only. The authorities and officials must, therefore, take care and "raise the wind" in earnest.—Times.

LEOPOLD REDPATH'S CHARITIES.—The Rev. J. G. Rowe, curate of Greenhow, in the north of England, had written to this bankrupt, among other persons, shortly before his failure, soliciting a subscription for the erection of a church. The bankrupt immediately sent him £20. Mr. Rowe felt that he could not in his conscience retain the money, as it must have been the result of frauds, and he returned it to be placed to the credit of the estate.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed Mr. John Terrell Shapland, of South Molton, solicitor, a Commissioner to administer Oaths in Chancery in England; J. W. Johnston, Esq., has been appointed Attorney-General, and M. J. Wilkins, Esq., Solicitor-General, for the province of Nova Scotia; and Nicholas Gustave Bestel, Esq., Second Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of the Colony of Mauritius.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

DOUBLE REMEDY—PROCEEDINGS AT LAW AND IN EQUITY AS TO SAME SUBJECT-MATTER.

Gedye v. Duke of Montrose, 5 W. R. 537.

It is a well-established principle of courts of equity, that, where the Court entertains jurisdiction, it has power to decide upon the whole case before it, and will restrain parties from prosecuting their legal claims in a court of law, in respect of the same subject-matter which is litigated in equity. So that, where the Court has the means of estimating damages in a case of specific performance or injunction, it will not confine the operation of its decree merely to the relief peculiar to courts of equity, but will award compensation or consequential damages. We find, therefore, in such cases as Hogue v. Curtis (1 Jac. & Walk. 449), that, where the plaintiff in equity is also proceeding at law for substantially the same thing, a court of equity will restrain the proceedings at law until the plaintiff has elected before which tribunal he will proceed. Under the old practice, the usual mode in these cases was for the defendant, on putting in his answer, to move that the plaintiff might elect, and for an injunction in the meantime, with a reference to the Master to ascertain whether the plaintiff was proceeding for the same matter both at law and in equity. In Frank v. Basnett (2 Myl. & Ke. 618) the plaintiff obtained a decree for specific performance of an agreement, by which the defendant was to convey to the plaintiff certain pieces of land, and the plaintiff was to build a bridge. Pending proceedings in the Master's office relating to the conveyance, the defendant brought an action against the plaintiff for damages by the non-erection of the bridge. The Court restrained this action. "No action," said Lord Lyndhurst, "could be brought upon the contract up to the time of the decree, and after the decree some time must necessarily elapse before the direction of the Court could be carried into effect." If there had been improper delay in carrying out the decree, his Lordship considered that the right course for the aggrieved party would have been to have moved for liberty to bring an action, which no doubt the Court would always grant, if it were itself unable to do complete justice. In Gedye v. Duke of Montrose the suit was for specific performance of an agreement to assign the lease of a house; and an interlocutory order was made for delivering up possession to the plaintiff, and also for executing the assignment, which was to bear date as of the time when possession was first claimed under the agreement. The plaintiff, subsequently to this order, brought an action of trespass against the defendant, the declaration stating that the defendant had entered the plaintiff's house and expelled him from possession, and also containing other counts as to breaches of the agreement similar to the allegations in the bill in equity. The defendant moved that the plaintiff might make his election in which court he would proceed, and that in the meantime all further proceedings might be stayed. Wood, V. C., made the order prayed, being of opinion that the case was entirely concluded by authority. "It was by an accident," said his Honour, "that, having obtained the assignment which was executed as of a date previously to the trespass complained of, it had the effect of conferring on the plaintiff a legal title anterior to such alleged trespass, and enabled him to frame his action for trespass, which he could not have done while the case rested in contract only." And, without any reference to chambers to ascertain the identity of the subject-matter of litigation, the Vice-Chancellor came to that conclusion from a comparison of the allegations in the bill and in the declaration.

APPORTIONMENT—TENANT FOR LIFE ENTITLED TO REVERSION IN FEE—4 & 5 WILL. 4, c. 22.

Re Clulow's Estate, 5 W. R. 544.

Under the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 22, all rents service reserved on any lease by a tenant in fee, or for any life interest, and all rent-charge, &c., made payable or coming due at fixed periods, are to be apportioned, so that on the death of any person interested in such rents, &c., or on the determination, by any other means, of the interest of any such person, he or his executors shall be entitled to a proportion of such rents, &c., according to the time which has elapsed from the commencement or last payment thereof. In Browne v. Amyot (3 Hare, 173)—where the question arose between the heir and personal representative of a tenant in fee simple—Wigram, V. C., held that the statute applied to cases in which the interest of the person interested in such rents and payments was terminated by his own death, or by the death of some other person, but did not apply to the case of a tenant in fee, or provide for apportionment of rent between the real and personal representatives of such person whose interest was not terminated at his death. The ground of his Honour's decision was, that, upon the construction of the Act, the death of the person interested in the rent or other payment must be understood as a death occasioning the determination of the interest, which was not the case where an owner in fee simple died. Wood, V. C., followed this decision, and somewhat enlarged its application, in the recent case of Re Clulow's Estate. In that case, upon the death of a person who was entitled under a will as tenant for life in possession, with the reversion in fee in himself as the right heir of the testator, a question arose as to apportionment between his executors and co-heirs. It was contended, on behalf of the former, that the case was within the provisions of the statute, the interest of the tenant for life having determined by his death. The Vice-Chancellor, however, held, that, as the tenant for life had also an immediate reversion in fee expectant upon his own death without issue, there had been no breach in the succession so as to entitle the executors.

BANKRUPT—ORDER AND DISPOSITION—STOP ORDER.

Bartlett v. Bartlett, 5 W. R. 541.

In this case the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, which we noticed among the Recent Decisions in Chancery (ante, p. 312), as introducing a novel interpretation of the order and disposition clause in the Bankruptcy Act, has been overruled by the Lords Justices. The facts were shortly these. The owner of a reversionary share in a fund in court assigned it to one Tucker, who duly obtained a stop order. Tucker afterwards mortgaged the share, and became bankrupt before the mortgagees had obtained a stop order upon it. The question was, whether the share passed to the assignees in bankruptcy as being in the reputed ownership of Tucker, or whether the mortgagees were entitled to assert their interest in it. The Vice-Chancellor decided in favour of the mortgagees, mainly on the ground that a stop order was necessary only by way of notice on questions of priority, and was not required to take a fund out of the order and disposition of the bankrupt. This view was supported by what the Vice-Chancellor considered the well-established rule, that the reputed ownership clauses do not apply, unless there is a consent of the true owner, not merely to the possession by the bankrupt, but a consent to an actual sale or disposition by him. The Lords Justices considered that the neglect of the mortgagees to obtain a stop order was a consent to the reputed ownership of their mortgagor within the meaning of the statutes, and that the necessity of notice, or of its equivalent in the case of a fund in court—viz. a stop order—is the same in cases of bankruptcy as in questions of priority between successive incumbrancers. Another point which had been somewhat relied on in the court below—namely, that the Act applied only to visible property—was also disposed of on the appeal. The following observations of L. J. Turner, put the principle in a very clear light:—"The object of the rule as to order and disposition, is, to prevent credit being obtained on the ground of property being in the possession of the bankrupt, to which he was not really entitled. Now it is clear that credit can be obtained on property which is not in his visible ownership, as well as on that which is. This being so, the question is, whether the bankrupt can be said to have had reputed ownership of the property in question? How is the true owner to prevent reputed ownership, except by giving notice to the person holding the fund? This is the case with debts—can a different rule apply to legacies? If the owner does not take the proper steps to prevent reputed ownership, he must be taken to consent to it."

NOTICE—SOLICITOR.

Jones v. Williams, 5 W. R. 540.

One of the points decided in this case is of some interest. It was a question of notice on a bill to settle priorities; and one of the circumstances relied on as constituting notice, was, the allegation that the mortgagee was the client of the mortgagor, who was a solicitor. There was, from the nature of the case, no question that the solicitor himself had notice; but it was contended that the allegation that the defendant was his client, which was supported only by an equally vague admission in the answer, was not sufficient to establish the existence of the relation of solicitor and client in the particular transaction of mortgage. The Master of the Rolls held, that the general admission that the defendant was the client of the mortgagor, was primâ facie proof that the relation existed in the mortgage transaction, and was sufficient to throw on the defendant the burden of showing that such was not the case, and, in the absence of any evidence to that effect, to fix him with notice of what his mortgagor knew. There were, however, other facts which amounted to constructive notice, and on which the decision was partly founded.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

JOINT-STOCK BANKS—RIGHT TO SUE SHAREHOLDER.

Fell v. Burchett, 5 W. R., Q. B., 520.

This was another of the numerous questions of law which have arisen out of the affairs of the British Bank. It was whether a shareholder is liable to an action at the suit of a creditor with a current account at the bank to recover the amount due to him at the time of stoppage, or whether the common law right of action for such purpose is taken away by the provisions contained in the 9th, 10th, and 47th sections of the Joint-Stock Banking Act, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 113, under which banking copartnerships are to be sued in the name of their public officer, and the judgment realised (in failure of assets) against individual shareholders in such manner as therein directed. It was contended for the plaintiff that the intention of the Legislature was to give creditors a remedy against the company, and, at the same time, to keep alive the common law remedy against the shareholders, by action against them individually; but Lord Campbell replied that it was the duty of the Court, if possible, to put the true construction on the 6th section of the Act (which incorporates these banking copartnerships), taken in connection with the 7th section, which says (in contradiction of the common law doctrines) that the members of such incorporation are to be liable as if the company had not been incorporated. "Agreeing," said his Lordship, "that it is a very badly-drawn statute, still it is our duty to make, if possible, sense out of nonsense, and to reconcile that which is irreconcilable." He, accordingly, proceeded to intimate that, in his opinion, the meaning of the 7th section was to guard against what might be taken to be the legal effect of the 6th section, and to take care that all the shareholders should (notwithstanding the incorporation) be liable to the debts of the company, such liability to be enforced according to a certain course pointed out in the after part of the Act; and that it was not intended to allow the multiplication of actions to which the construction contended for by the plaintiff would lead. In this judgment, and on similar grounds, Erle and Crompton, JJ., concurred.

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—SIGNED BILL, PRACTICE AS TO—DIFFERENCES OF OPINION IN THE COURTS.

Haigh v. Ousey, 5 W. R., Q. B., 523.

It may be remembered that, a few weeks ago,* we noticed the case of Pigot v. Cadman (5 W. R., Exch., 353), in which the Court of Exchequer, in accordance with their previous decision in Ivimey v. Marks (16 Mee. & W. 850), and with the reasoning of Lord Eldon in the earlier case of Hill v. Humphreys (2 Bos. & P. 243), held that the insufficient statement of some of the items in an attorney's bill delivered vitiated the whole bill, so as to support a plea, on action brought, that no signed bill had been delivered a month before action, pursuant to 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37. This same question (connected with another on the same subject) came before the Court of Queen's Bench in the above case; and, as will be seen, that court has arrived at a directly opposite, and, as it seems to us, a more sensible, conclusion. In consequence of its importance to our readers, we shall state the judgment somewhat more fully than is our custom in these notices.

The facts of the case were as simple as possible. An action was brought upon an attorney's bill, and the defendant pleaded that no signed bill had been delivered pursuant to the Statute. At the trial, the plaintiff proved a due delivery of a signed bill of fees, charges, and disbursements, but it was objected that some of the items were insufficiently stated, as not showing the court in which the business was done; and that consequently (on the authority of the cases to which we have above alluded) the bill was bad altogether. The plaintiff had a verdict, but leave was given to the defendant to move, for which a rule nisi was obtained accordingly. On showing cause against this rule, it appeared that two questions were for the decision of the court—firstly whether the items in this particular bill were sufficiently stated; and, secondly, supposing they were not, whether such insufficiency vitiated the whole bill.

Upon the first question, it appears to have been taken as a fact that the items charged sufficiently showed that the business had been done in one of the superior courts of law, but not in which of the three. And it was urged on behalf of the defendant that this, by the rule laid down in Ivimey v. Marks, was not enough; for, according to that, there must appear in the bill both the particular court and the name of the action in which the business charged for was done; as otherwise the client cannot properly judge or be advised whether he shall submit the bill for taxation, and run the risk of less than one-sixth being taken off. From this doctrine, however (as applied to the present case), the Court of Queen's Bench dissented. "For," said Lord Campbell, "I allow that the bill ought to give to the client reasonable information, so that he may consult his attorney as to the fairness and reasonableness of the charges;" but (as laid down by Patteson, J., in Keene v. Ward, and by Campbell, C. J., in Cook v. Gillard) all that is required is, that the client should have given to him in the bill sufficient information for obtaining advice as to taxation, and for the use of the taxing officer on proceeding to taxation. "Now, applying this test to the present case," said his Lordship, "I think the bill tells the defendant all that the Legislature intended that it should. By the Act, attorneys and solicitors are put under such stringent regulations that they cannot conduct their business as others do. It may be, and perhaps is, well that there should be some regulation for the protection of clients; but the attorneys would have great reason to complain of vexatious regulations tending to prevent their obtaining reasonable and just remuneration for their care and skill. I do not think it was intended that the bill they are required to deliver should be such that another attorney looking at the bill may be able to say, without making any inquiry, whether the charges contained in it are reasonable and fair." It was a different thing when there was a different scale of costs for the three courts; but now, when they are all alike, it is enough to show that the business charged for was done in one of the superior courts.

It will be observed that so far as this part of the judgment of the Court is concerned, the Queen's Bench was not called upon to agree with, or depart from, the opinions expressed by the Exchequer. For in the case of Pigot v. Cadman, above alluded to, the point for decision was a different one altogether; and the case of Ivimey v. Marks, when closely examined, was not on "all fours" with the present case; inasmuch as there, the bill was for business partly in Chancery and partly at common law; and, in respect of that at common law, the bill did not show any court for any part, nor make it apparent whether a superior or inferior court was intended.

But with regard to the second question above mentioned—viz. whether supposing the bill to be insufficient in this or any other respects, in reference to one or more items, such insufficiency vitiated the whole bill—it became necessary for the Queen's Bench, before deciding in favour of the plaintiff, deliberately to disregard the decisions of the Exchequer in both of the cases above-mentioned; and this they did, without hesitation, and unanimously. "Is the plaintiff's right to recover," said Lord Campbell, "for the part of the bill which is allowed to be unobjectionable, to be barred on account of its containing other items which it is said are objectionable? Such a doctrine would be most unjust." "It is not consistent either with reason or justice," said Mr. Justice Wightman, "that, if an item, be wrongly stated, the plaintiff is to lose his claim for all the rest." "I think it absurd to say," said Mr. Justice Erle, "that one item being insufficiently stated, vitiates the whole bill." And Crompton, J., added his entire concurrence. It was intimated, however, by the Court, that, notwithstanding these sentiments, they would have considered themselves bound by the decisions in the Court of Exchequer to the contrary, if that Court alone had decided the law as to this point; but that was not so, for it had been decided the other way by Abbott, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, at Nisi Prius (Drew v. Clifford, 2 Car. & P. 70); and the question being brought before the full Court of Common Pleas, in the subsequent case of Waller v. Lacy (1 M. & Gr. 54), it had been disposed of in the same manner, upon the authority of that case.* Hence, they considered themselves at liberty to adhere to their own judgments as expressed in Keene v. Ward, and in Cook v. Gillard, and accordinglythe rule to enter a non-suit or a verdict for the defendant was discharged.

It may be further remarked, that, in the recent case in the Exchequer of Roy v. Turner (4 W. R., Ex., 126), Lord Wensleydale, in deciding affirmatively the first of the above questions—viz. as to the necessity for stating the particular court in which the business was done—said that the Court did so on the authority of Ivimey v. Marks, but added that he himself doubted whether that case had been properly decided. He thought the rule should be (where there was both Chancery and common law business), that the bill ought to show whether the items had reference to one or to the other, so as to enable a person, without the aid of professional knowledge, to understand, not in what particular court it was done, but whether it was in a court of law or in a court of equity, as the scale of taxation in the courts of law differs from what it is in the courts of equity.

It results, then, upon the whole, that the Court of Exchequer—now that Mr. Baron Bramwell has changed his opinion, and that Lord Wensleydale has left the court—considers that a bill must state the particular court in which the business charged for is done; but the Court of Queen's Bench sees no necessity for such strictness. And also, that, on the question whether a single bad item vitiates the whole bill, these two courts are still more decidedly at issue, while the opinion of the Queen's Bench is fortified by some decisions in the Common Pleas, though not very recent ones.

EXECUTION BY CA. SA.—DEBT UNDER £20.

Hodges v. Callaghan, 5 W. R., C. P., 531.

This was an application to rescind an order of Cresswell, J., for the discharge of the defendant, who had been arrested on a judgment. The writ had been specially indorsed for £34, and by consent, without the defendant having appeared to the writ, the sum owed was reduced by instalments to £11. This reduced sum not being paid, the plaintiff signed judgment for the full amount, and issued thereon the ca. sa. on which the defendant had been arrested. The Court refused to interfere, remarking that (under the circumstances) the only judgment the plaintiff was in a condition to sign was as for the default of the defendant's appearance, under s. 27 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, and only for the sum actually due.

The nearest case to the above is that of Blew v. Steinau (11 Exch. 440), where the action having been brought for £30, and after writ the defendant having paid £20 on account, the plaintiff signed judgment for the whole amount, and arrested the defendant thereon till he paid the balance. Here it was held that the ca. sa. was not a nullity, inasmuch as it pursued the judgment, but that it was irregular to issue it when less than £20 remained due.

Professional Intelligence.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Summary of the Proceedings of the Council.

Since the last Report (p. 331, ante), the subjects which have engaged the attention of the Council of the Society are briefly as follow:—

The inquiry into the state of business in the common law courts, and the details relating to the proposed changes in the terms, circuits, and sittings. On this subject letters were sent to all the Provincial Law Societies, requesting their opinions on the following points of inquiry:—

1. The advantages to be gained by having three circuits in the year instead of two.
2. The periods of the year at which the circuits should take place.
3. The discontinuing assizes at small towns, and transferring the business to adjoining places.
4. Re-arranging the assizes, and appointing some to be held at large towns now without assizes.
5. The best means of arranging such changes, with reference to the time of holding quarter sessions, &c.
6. The re-distribution of the circuits, either by increasing the number of circuits, or by re-arranging the length of each circuit, and equalising the duration of each.

Answers on these points have been received from several of the Societies.

A deputation from the Council appointed to attend the Common Law (judicial business) Commissioners.

The examination for Easter Term took place on the 30th of April, when 111 candidates were examined, of whom eighty-eight were passed, and twenty-three postponed. Three of the candidates were awarded prizes, and four received certificates of merit.

Several questions have been raised regarding the qualification of articled clerks to be admitted on the Roll of Attorneys.

1st. Whether a Master of Arts could be admitted after three years' service, like a Bachelor of Arts or Bachelor of Laws, under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 7. This point has been decided in the negative by a Judge at Chambers.

2nd. Whether a gentleman in deacon's orders could be articled, examined, and admitted on the Roll of Attorneys and Solicitors. There is no statute or decision expressly on the subject, but as deacons cannot be called to the bar nor become proctors, the question will be submitted to the Court.

Two of the cases brought by the Society before the Court for malpractice have been decided against the parties complained of, and they have been removed from the Roll.

Some points on the usages of the profession in conveyancing practice have been submitted to the consideration of the Council, particularly regarding the charges relating to covenants for the production of title deeds.

The new buildings for the enlargement of the library and the more convenient dispatch of the business of the Society, and the discharge of its duty as Registrar of Attorneys, are proceeding satisfactorily. Additional rooms will be provided for the accommodation of the members, both town and country, and for meetings on arbitrations, and the security of deeds and documents in fire-proof rooms.

The following new members have been proposed and approved:—

Alfred Berton Cowdell, Abchurch-lane, London.
Henry Anton, Cannon-street, City.
Robert Henry Pearpoint, Half Moon-street, Piccadilly.
William Stanley Stone, 41, Pall Mall.
George Francis Eland, 4, Trafalgar-square.

TRINITY TERM EXAMINATION.

The Examiners have appointed Tuesday, 2nd of June, to take the examination. The testimonials must be left at the Incorporated Law Society on or before Thursday, 28th May.

CHANCERY VACATION NOTICE.

The chambers of the Vice-Chancellor, Sir R. T. Kindersley, will be open for the transaction of vacation business on Tuesday the 19th, and Wednesday the 20th, days of May instant.

DUBLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)

THE LAWS OF SAVINGS BANKS—LOCAL MANAGEMENT.

Some weeks since we took an opportunity of calling the attention of your readers to the very unsatisfactory state of the laws relating to savings banks, and of considering some propositions that have been made for a change of system, and, in particular, for giving to depositors Government security for their deposits. Every week fresh instances arise to testify to the truth of what has been advanced against savings banks as they stand; and these instances of defalcation, arising under local unpaid management, are the best arguments that can be used against all irresponsible interference. This week it is announced that the depositors in the Rugby Savings Bank have been robbed to the extent of £1300, and doubtless the full amount of the deficiency is not yet apparent. In this, as in many other instances, the defaulter has been at work tampering with the books for a long series of years, and has been so long connected with the institution as to have stood high in the estimation of all its well-meaning, but inefficient, honorary supervisors. It is, however, gratifying to find that some interest is awakened on a subject so deeply affecting the welfare of the working-classes. Not many days since, we find that a large number of trustees and managers of savings banks, from all parts of the kingdom, met together in London to consider the question of an amendment of the laws. The result at which this important conclave arrived was, it appears, a determination to support any measure which the Government may introduce, so framed as to give Government security to the depositors, while at the same time it shall not supersede, or materially interfere with, local management. Now it appears to us, that while these two objects of solicitude are both very excellent and desirable, they are still of such a nature as to be wholly incompatible with each other. Were it possible to enjoy at once the freshness of early spring and the ripe fruits of autumn, it would be highly agreeable, no doubt; but both are, from the nature of things, incapable of combination. Hardly less impracticable would it be to combine Government security with local unpaid management. Why should the Government, or rather the nation represented by the Government, be liable for losses which may, and of course will, happen through the negligence of gentlemen who make it a relaxation, not a business, to attend once a week at the savings bank? It would be wrong to undervalue the voluntary services so freely given in every town and village of the kingdom to local objects of beneficence; but the fallacy pervading the arguments of those who advocate local management is to treat savings banks as mere local charities. They should be regarded simply as offices where business is transacted between people who want three per cent. interest for their small sums of spare cash, and Government, which, for divers reasons, receives deposits of money at that rate of interest. Local philanthropists may, if they choose, represent to their poorer neighbours the advantages to be derived from prudent and thrifty habits; but when they claim to act as honorary bankers, they mistake their vocation. A dispensary is probably as useful in the country towns as a bank for savings; but local benefactors happily there content themselves with paying-up an annual subscription, and then advising the blind, the halt, and the maimed, to enter its doors. Were they to insist on personally dispensing medicine, and performing amateur surgery on their poorer townsfolk, the result might be safely predicted. A competent Æsculapius is not more necessary for the dispensary than is a responsible receiver of cash for the savings bank; and it would be contrary to all principle and authority for Government to be liable for the defalcations of any person not appointed by Government. In short, banking for the million is not a business safely and properly to be left to volunteer, unpaid agency. It should be performed by competent, responsible officers, who should devote to it, not one or two hours a week, but six hours a day. Local efforts might supply means, but "local management" is as incompatible with Government security as Government security is incompatible with a high rate of interest.

The remarks of your correspondent "P." on the subject of savings banks are entitled to very respectful consideration, as they emanate from one who has had the advantage of large experience. His account of one particular bank—perhaps that with which he is immediately connected—is such as to reflect very great credit on the managers of that bank. Still, the admitted fact that numerous institutions of this kind are being properly conducted does not in the least weaken the case made out against a system which allows any of them to become instruments in the hands of swindlers. It is very true, that the majority of depositors are honourably dealt with; but it is not the less incumbent on the Legislature to protect the victimised minority. Our complaint is urged on behalf of the one depositor who is defrauded; we are indifferent as to the ninety and nine depositors who are in safety. It might just as well be argued, that, because the "Union" and the "Westminster" are well managed, we have no right to complain of the sham audit of accounts, which no existing law prevented the Royal British Bankers from annually performing, and of their sham balance-sheet and dividend, which no criminal court has taken cognisance of.

That benefits have been derived by the general public, on the whole, from savings banks, no sane person would feel disposed to deny. The subject is here discussed, not for the purpose of decrying the principle of savings banks, or of attempting to abolish them, but with a view to increase their efficiency, and extend their operations. Until an entire change of system is introduced, public confidence can never be restored; and the aggregate amount lodged in these depositories will remain stationary, if it do not annually decrease. Wonderfully increased as is our national wealth, and higher than ever as is the rate of wages, it is clear that deposits in savings banks ought to have increased also, and nothing but a well founded public supicion of them would have retarded their progress in so marked a manner. It is said in "faint praise" of them, that savings banks are the best, if not the only, depositaries for savings. This is the best reason that they should be placed on a secure basis, while it sufficiently accounts for the degree of use that has been made of them, notwithstanding their admitted defects. The subject should be considered, and amendment urged, until—in the words of your correspondent "P."—"perfect and entire Government security for each and every deposit," is obtained.

A MINISTER OF JUSTICE.

The Right Hon. J. Napier is known to many of your readers as a prominent member of her Majesty's opposition, and a high authority in the House on all matters connected with Ireland, as well as a steady debater on every question affecting law amendment. Representing in Parliament the University of Dublin, for which he is returned entirely by the votes of the clergy, Mr. Napier very naturally turned his attention a few years since to the laws relating to clerical residences, dilapidations, &c.; and his Consolidation Acts now on the Statute Book are, notwithstanding some complaints, sufficiently entitled to the character of useful, if not brilliant, examples of "law amendment." Mr. Napier, having satisfied the legal wants of his clerical constituents, has now turned his attention to those of his lay fellow-subjects; and is fully entitled to the credit of having fixed upon a definite want, the want of a distinct Minister of Justice, and of having taken active steps to supply that want. When, during the last session of the old Parliament, he brought this subject before the House, and carried an address to the Throne, in a most able and convincing speech, Mr. Napier did not, for the mere sake of display, propound an impracticable reform: he gave utterance rather to a very general conviction among thinking people, that, without a Minister of Justice, all other legal reforms will be useless. It is now a stale device to charge the proposer of law amendment with vagueness in the details of his plan. When no better objection can be urged, it is a favourite practice with certain obstructives to object that the minutiæ are not elaborated. They doubtless objected to the Police Bill of Sir R. Peel, because it was silent as to the amount of the pay and cut of the uniform of the projected army of peace-keepers. Call them or him what you will, and give them what precedence you choose, the great want so forcibly enunciated, is of a public department solely charged with, and responsible for, the administration of civil and criminal justice. The plan recommended by the Law Amendment Society appears less open to objection than any other that has been proposed. It does not interfere with the dignity and importance of that "marble chair," which every lawyer aspires to fill, and so aspiring, of course, will not consent to see shorn of its splendour. This plan, moreover, will admit of one member of the board devoting himself to criminal law, for example, and other members to other branches. A non-legal member might be added, possibly, and, like the "lay lord" of the Admiralty, he might temper the professional zeal of the rest with some of that plain common sense, which undeniably useful in all schemes of law reform and all measures of law administration.

But if a Department of Public Justice is required for England, how much more must it be required for Ireland! In England, you have a Home Secretary on the spot; an Attorney-General ever present, and ever active; and, above all, a Lord Chancellor in the Cabinet, and a high officer of state. In Ireland, the case stands very differently. The Chancellor may be called a purely legal and non-political officer. His patronage and influence are extremely limited, and he is an exalted personage only within the precincts of his own court. The Attorney-General is necessarily in Parliament, and, therefore, half the year away from home. His chief duty for three-fourths of the legal year is in some sort, and sometimes, to overlook Irish Bills, and at all times to help to make and keep together a "house." The Irish Secretary's duties it would be difficult to describe; but if he regularly attends in his place in Parliament during the session, and in Dublin acts as an amiable and conciliatory reflex of the Lord Lieutenant, especially in the dinner-and-ball-giving-line, no one could complain that he neglects his duty. If the plan proposed by the Law Amendment Society be ultimately adopted, it might, perhaps, be advantageous that one member of the Board of Justice should distinctly represent Ireland. Were a man of Mr. Napier's attainments charged with the supervising care of Irish legislation, as well as consulted on the general business that would come before the Board, there can be no doubt that the statute book would be more free from blunders, and the streams of justice less tainted with partiality.

INCOME-TAX.

SIR,—By chapter 6 of last session (Royal assent, 21st March, 1857), the Income-tax is reduced from 1*s.* 4*d.* to 7*d.* for the year commencing from the 5th day of April, 1857. Some dividends are payable in July, can you inform me whether the Bank of England will, or, perhaps, more correctly, whether the Bank of England can, charge Income-tax on part of the July dividends at 1*s.* 4*d.*, and on the residue at 7*d.*?

Is it not clear that the reduced rate of Income-tax (at 7*d.*) only can be deducted from the July dividends—thus differing from the deduction on account of interest on a mortgage which accrues de die in diem? Your's &c., ENQUIRER.

Review.

The New Parishes Acts, 1843, 1844, and 1856; with Notes and Observations, &c. By JAMES CHRISTIE TRAILL, M.A., Barrister-at-Law. Maxwell, Sweet, and Stevens & Norton. 1857.

That a protégé of the Marquis of Blandford should betray his conservative bias, even in editing an Act of Parliament, is perhaps natural enough, and we are somewhat amused by the ingenious vent through which Mr. Traill's political creed has been permitted to ooze. Certainly it would have baffled our own acuteness to find either system in, or defence for, the bungling efforts which have been made during the past forty years to place the establishment of the Church of England on a footing adapted to the religious appetite of the age and the increase of population; but the attempt is made in the above work to show that 800 years ago we were undergoing precisely the same partial and successive improvements with regard to the then formation of our parochial system; and that what some persons might be pleased to consider the shortcomings and shortsightedness of modern times have, in truth, arisen from a praiseworthy imitation of the Anglo-Saxon policy in this behalf.

In order to understand Mr. Traill's theory as to this resemblance, it will be necessary to present to our readers a very rapid sketch of the manner in which, according to Wharton, Selden, Bede, and other authorities, this country became originally parcelled out into parishes.

It would appear, then, that in the early Saxon times every king on embracing the Christian faith, accepted also a bishop to preside ecclesiastically over his heptarchy. For this prelate, of course, a church was built, and an episcopal residence established in its vicinity. Those portions of each separate kingdom or diocese (for they were in those times co-extensive) which lay most remote from the bishop's eye, were gradually evangelised by itinerant priests sent from the cathedral residence. These missionaries, however, did not always return, but would sometimes settle in the more promising solitudes, and there build churches and houses for themselves; but still they continued to render spiritual allegiance, and an account of the offerings they received from their respective flocks, to the mother church of the diocese. To this origin must be ascribed many of our parishes; but others owe their existence to the piety or worldly wisdom of the Thanes, who would often, in imitation of their Sovereign, build churches on their own estates—perhaps on much the same principle, that, in our day, a suburban freeholder first builds his "new town," and then keeps it respectable by erecting a district church in the middle. The Saxon, however, was beset by greater obstacles than the modern speculator, for he could only obtain for his new church the bishop's sanction, and the ministration of a clerk in holy orders, by turning some portion of the revenues thereof into the episcopal coffers. But as this necessity naturally tended to abate the zeal of these lay founders, they were, after a time, permitted to assign to the minister of the church they had established, the whole of its profits and revenues; and the bishops were the rather moved to this liberality when they perceived that one effect of these individual efforts was, to relieve themselves from the necessity of building and serving churches in the more distant parts of their dioceses; and from this period churches became self-supporting in this country, so far as any assistance from the bishop's purse was concerned.

But by degrees, and as the practice of sub-infeudation and alienation became more prevalent, so as to increase the number of landowners while the size of their estates was diminished, another stage is perceptible in the distribution of parishes. For the immense tracts of country, for which a single church only had at first been erected, becoming split up into smaller parcels, a church or chapel for each of these was built by every sub-lord or proprietor with pious tendencies. These last, however, which are designated by Mr. Traill as churches of the second foundation, were not at first permitted to withdraw from the "senior" church of the district, to the partition of which they owed their existence, all the ecclesiastical functions. Their ministers could neither baptize nor bury; nor—what was of more consequence—did they enjoy more than one-third of the tithes and other good things appertaining to the local limits of their charge. But in course of time these restrictions were removed, and they acquired a title, not only to full parochial rights, but also to whatever emoluments flowed into them jure ecclesiæ.

In the course of church-development, above (most slightly) sketched by us, Mr. Traill perceives four distinct stages. The first of these was the erection of churches by the bishops on the confines of their dioceses, and serving them with itinerant priests. The second was the settling in these churches of a permanent minister. The third was the establishment of churches of the second foundation by lay founders, in subjection to the churches founded by the bishops. The fourth was the investment of these last with full parochial rights and an independent income.

Such, according to our author, was the type. Let us now, as briefly as possible, state, in like manner, the several stages of the anti-type.

The parochial division of the country remained unchanged from the Conquest downwards, in reckless disregard of the existing condition of the country in point of population, till the year 1818, when for the first time a systematic attempt at church extension was made through the medium of the Church Building Commissioners, appointed in that year. The method adopted by them was to build, or assist in building, churches where they seemed most required; and then, on certain conditions, to assign to them districts carved out of the parishes in which such churches were situated; or out of the adjoining parishes, if need were. This manner of action, however, was found, by experience, to produce insufficient results; and also to give rise to much complexity and difficulties, on which it would take us too long here to enter. But in the year 1843, a deus ex machinâ descended in the person of the late Sir Robert Peel, who, with his peculiar clearness of view, perceived that the Legislature had all this time been travelling in a wrong track; that, instead of aiding the habitantes in siccis to build a church, and trusting to the future for the necessary income for a minister, and consequent assignment of a district of which it was to be the place of public worship, the proper plan was to plant a minister in a populous district requiring spiritual care at the outset, and, assigning to him his charge forthwith, to bid him perform Divine service in any building he could meet with fit for the purpose, until such time as a church could be procured. In a word, the Church Building Commissioners first provided the church, but the Ecclesiastical Commissioners first provided the clergyman. The rule of the former was to rear churches or chapels in certain districts, all more or less in subjection to the mother church of the parish to which they locally belonged. The principle of the latter was, and is (for the recent statute introduced by the Marquis of Blandford, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 104, is only in confirmation and extension of the principle first enunciated by Sir R. Peel, and put into action by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37), to constitute and endow, by aid of the funds at the disposal of the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty, districts comprising such local limits as may be convenient, without regard to existing parishes—the minister whereof is not, indeed, in all cases, provided with a church, but enjoys a certain income, and is, from the commencement of his duties, independent to a great extent of the incumbent of the parish or parishes with which his district happens to be locally connected; while, from the time when he can acquire a church, he becomes altogether independent of such incumbent.

We do not feel that any apology is required to our readers for inflicting on them the above condensed statement, both because the subject itself is one pre-eminently interesting, and also because without it the parallel between ancient and modern church extension, in which Mr. Traill delights, could not be understood. We will let him detail it in his own words:—

"Now, if we compare the several stages or gradations in the development and extension of the ancient and modern parochial systems, one with the other, the points of resemblance between them will appear to be very striking. In the first place, the efforts made by the modern system to adjust itself to the wants of the country, by the establishment of chapels, which were at first mere chapels of ease, but in course of time became parochial chapels and acquired a more independent position, have a marked affinity with what we have termed the two first stages in the development of the old system. While, in the second place, the character which the Church Building Acts imparted to the modern system, by the assignment of districts to churches or chapels more or less in dependence on the parish church (for their incumbents were, in most instances, precluded from the full performance of the offices of the church, and entitled to a portion only of the fees or offerings), corresponds very closely with that period which we have called the third stage in the development of the ancient system, and which was marked by the subdivision of the parishes first founded, and the establishment of churches of the second foundation in subjection to those of the first foundation, which latter, for a considerable time, continued still in possession of all the offerings and oblations. In the next place, we shall perceive that Sir Robert's Peel Act effected, to the extent of its operation, a change in the modern system analogous to that we have described as the fourth or last stage in the extension of the old system, by investing the parishes formed under its provisions with independent parochial rights, and endowing them with the fees and offerings arising within their limits."—Page, 31.

To our unimaginative minds the above passage appears fanciful, and the comparison itself of little value; and yet it is the hobby of one who thoroughly understands his theme, and who plays with the complications of his subject in the very wantonness of learning. We cannot doubt that Mr. Traill knows a good deal about the Church Building Acts; and that, we take it, is no small praise. We also judge him to be a modest man, and our opinion is based upon the following passage in his Introduction:—

"During the continuance of this Commission" (that for building new churches) "twenty-one Acts of Parliament have been passed, having sole reference to its powers and duties. These are so complex and conflicting in their nature as to have defied all endeavours to arrange or classify them, or render them at all intelligible to the general reader. And all attempts to consolidate them into one Act have failed, in consequence of the difficulty of finding any one with sufficient time and practical knowledge on the subject to undertake the management of such a Bill in its progress through Parliament."

But surely our author desponds here too quickly. We cannot believe that no Hercules could be found; nor can we endure the sentence that this mass of incomprehensible Acts is to remain untouched, till those latter days when a general codification of our statute law is attempted. We derive, indeed, some slight consolation from an opinion expressed by Mr. Traill, that in consequence of the determination of the Church Building Commission, and the transfer of all its powers, duties, and authorities to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, "The Church Building Acts may be said to be already virtually in the course of repeal;" but we would petition for something more definite. "Does the high quest a knight require?" There is Lord Blandford ready to father (we must adopt the cacophonic nomenclature of the day) a Church Building Acts Consolidation and Amendment Act, 1857; "Or will the venture suit a squire?" If so, we know of none apparently more capable for the task than the writer under our notice.

Juridical Society.

This Society met on Monday last, when Mr. S. Martin Leake read a paper on "Some points in the Theory of the Law of Property." Mr. Charles Clark took the chair. The following is a brief, and necessarily very condensed, summary of the contents of the paper:—

The theory and object of a legal institution is to be sought rather in its ultimate and perfect state, than in its origin or imperfect development. In the dawn of civilisation property can only appear in its simplest form, dependent for its creation and its protection upon the individual labour and strength of the owner: only in an advanced state of civilisation does it appear in mature and complicated forms. The Roman and English systems are those in which the law of property has been most highly elaborated and most extensively applied, and therefore appear the most suited for attempts at scientific deduction. In pursuance of this mode of inquiry, the general design of the paper was, assuming the necessity of exclusive property as universally established in civilised life, to set forth the theoretical principles of the division of property (not as the recognised principles or maxims of any one system, but as the standard principles of all), and then to proceed to examine how far these speculative principles were supported by the practical doctrines of the Roman and English systems, and, at the same time, with the aid of the suggested principles, to criticise and arrive at some judgment of the scientific value of these systems. A few preliminary observations on the nature of property in general would be found necessary by way of introduction.

Since the power of man over things extends no farther than to use them according as they are in their nature usable, things are not matter for consideration in law, except in regard to the use or treatment of which they are capable. Hence no right to things can exist beyond the right to use them according to their nature; and this right is property. The right is practically realised in the innumerable acts and modes in which a person may treat a subject of property, all which may, for convenience sake, be compendiously included in the term use.

The entire property in a thing (in the subdivisions and parts of which entirety the law of property is found) is the right to the whole use of a thing. But things differ in use according to their nature; and according to the varied nature of the subjects of property, the law must necessarily adapt itself. Some things, as food, are consumed, and perish in the use. Some, as beasts of burden, are perishable from causes independent of the use, but afford a continuous use so long as they endure. Some, as land, are absolutely indestructible, and supply a continuous, constant, and uniform use for ever. The deficiencies and necessities of the subjects of property often require great modifications in the theory. In order to eliminate these variations from the present inquiries, land may be taken as the standard or type of all subjects of property—i. e. a subject indestructible in its nature, of which the use is unlimited in duration, and constant and uniform in quality: a subject possessing all qualities in the highest degree which other subjects of property possess only partially and in a limited degree. The principles of the division of property in such a subject will form a certain standard method of division, whence, by easy transitions and with obvious modifications, rules may be readily arrived at for the division of all other subjects of property, in accordance with their more temporary and casual nature.

The entire property in land, then, consists in the use of it for ever, together with, as an incident of property, the concurrent power of disposing of that use, or of any portion of it. The land being indestructible, and the actual use being uniform and incapable of acceleration, the owner, whose life is limited, has no power of exercising his full right specifically. By means, however, of the power of transferring the use to another, it may be converted or exchanged into something of a more rapidly consumable nature; and so the entire property may be made available even during the life of the individual owner. This power of disposition may also be exercised at the moment of death, by means of a last will and testament. But besides this, a kind of ulterior ownership is provided in most systems of law, by the distribution of it at death, according to the law of inheritance. The entire property in land, therefore, consists in the use for ever, realisable specifically only through the law of inheritance, and which the individual owner can only fully enjoy through his power of disposal, whereby he can exchange his property in the land for property in some subject capable of more rapid and immediate consumption.

The entire property is divisible in three distinct ways:—

1st. By actual specific partition of the land itself, the subject of property—a method of division too plain to require comment. It results in creating as many separate subjects of property as there are divisions made of the original subject. Joint tenancies and tenancies in common are instances of this mode of division, though somewhat obscure, in consequence of the divisions of the subject, yet arithmetically certain, being not real, but fictitious.

The second mode of division consists in dividing the current use into concurrent and contemporary portions, without dividing the subject itself. For example, one proprietor may have a right to dig minerals, or a right of common, or a right of use, for some purpose only in the land, the use of which for all other purposes belongs to another proprieter. This mode of division gives rise to what in English law are called easements, and are classed under the ambiguous term incorporeal rights.

The third mode of division was the point to which the attention of the society was more particularly called. Property may be divided by a division of the continuous uniform duration of use into successive intervals of time. The owner may then dispose of the use of the land during one or more successive or separate intervals of time, to one or more persons, retaining his right of use during the residue of the time, or he may dispose of his entire property by the appropriation to different persons of separate intervals of use in succession. The use during an interval, being by hypothesis uniform and invariable, differs not at all in kind, but only in duration, from the use for ever; and so the right of use, or the property, is the same in kind as what has been called the entire property. The right of use during a limited interval of time, together with the power of disposing of that use, thus constitutes a separate and distinct property, independent of all other property or properties subsisting in the same subject-matter, and also equally independent of the owners of them.

After an examination in detail of the principles of this mode of subdivision of property by successive intervals of use, the learned reader proceeded, in pursuance of the plan proposed, to inquire how far the principles suggested could be detected in the Roman and English systems of law.

The jus civile, a common law of Rome, recognised but one form of proprietary right, called dominium. Dominium was held to be an exclusive and unlimited right to the thing itself, not merely to its use. No severance or subdivision of this right was possible; there could be but one dominus, and he held the entire dominium. This simple but strict doctrine was found inadequate to the necessities of life, and demanded relaxation. A new kind of rights was devised supplementary to the dominium, and existing concurrently with it. Thus, ususfructus, usus, servitutes, and other limited rights of use were introduced. They were all comprised in one class of rights called jura in re, and were regarded as totally distinct from dominium. The owners of such rights were treated as mere tenants at will of the dominus, and the relation between them as one of mere personal contract. Though occupying the land, and exercising their rights to an extent involving the whole beneficial use, they were not considered to be in possession, but only to have a quasi possession of their incorporeal right; in opposition to which the proprietor arrogated to himself the title of corporis dominus.

A statement of the modern form of the Roman law, as exhibited in the code civil of France, presented the same doctrines. Substitutions or subdivision of property by successive intervals of use being strictly forbidden.

Thus, in theory, the Roman law does not at all recognise the subdivision of property in land by successive intervals of use; on the contrary, it positively denies any such doctrine. The Roman practical law, on the other hand, contradicted the theory. This contradiction between the practical law and the inflexible à priori theory produced great anomalies in the positive law, and difficulties in its application.

The English law of real property cannot be so simply stated. The study of it is commonly approached by the path of history. Its progress is pursued by the student from the feudal system through the courts of justice and the statute book to the present time; and it cannot be fully explained or soundly learned otherwise than by tracing its gradual development amongst the historical events which have produced it. But here, for the present purpose, and merely as matter of speculation, if the pure theory of the subdivision of property already laid down be taken as the fundamental form of the English law, it is possible, by the addition of a few positive rules of historical and technical origin, as supplementary and exceptional to the theory, to give a fair representation of the English law. The positive rules to be imposed on the pure theory will, moreover, by this method, show themselves in a more prominent and exceptional light than when regarded in a purely historical context; and their theoretical value will be thus more readily estimated.

Accordingly, we find recognised in the English law the entire property in the form of estates in fee-simple, or the right of use for ever, descendible according to the general law of inheritance; and, as subdivisions of property by intervals, estates limited for life, either the life of the owner, or the life or lives of any other persons; estates limited for terms of years lasting for an interval certain; estates limited to arise or to determine on conditions or contingencies uncertain; and, lastly, charges and incumbrances on land, which are nothing more than intervals of use, the duration of which is measured by the quantity of the use to be derived. All these several varieties of subdivisional estates or intervals may be limited and disposed of as distinct properties, and not only in present enjoyment or possession, but also in succession or remainder. The paper, after tracing the theory into further details of the English practical law, proceeded to state some of the positive rules which must be subjoined to the theoretical basis, in order to bring it into exact accordance with the actual practical law.

The special laws of inheritance called entails, the rule against perpetuities, the rule that contingent remainders must be supported by an estate of freehold, were successively exhibited and criticised in their scientific bearing upon the theory.

A contrast was thus presented between the English and Roman systems of law in the point in question, greatly to the advantage of the former in respect of theory. The English law was found to have freely settled itself down on a purely rational basis, while the narrow and artificial rules of the Roman law, and even of those modern European states whose law is based on the Roman, were inadequate to supply the wants and desires engendered by true liberty.

The learned reader then went on to comment at some length upon the present state and prospects of the English system of real property law, and conveyancing, and concluded with a notice of the proposed scheme of registration, which, as a scientific scheme, apart from all question of its social merits, promised to unite the benefits of the Roman system in simplicity of title and transfer, with a free scope for the various applications and purposes of which property is rendered capable by the principles of subdivision of the English law.

Chancery Costs.

The Orders carefully take away every source of profit not represented by work done; thus, all fees for abbreviations and close copies, of course, are abolished, and there is not a single item allowed which is not justified by the work done; so that it is not open to be remarked, when the inadequacy of any particular fees are pointed out, that they are compensated for, as under the old system, by other allowances. We would call attention to the following fees, as showing that a fair remuneration has not been provided for by the Orders.

Instructions for claims, original summonses and special cases, are limited to 13*s.* 4*d.*, whatever may be the amount of labour bestowed in getting up materials, and pains taken in assisting counsel in shaping the case and insuring the accuracy of the statements made.

The prudent solicitor, who looks to getting a livelihood by his profession, would probably devote what time he could afford to give for the 13*s.* 4*d.* allowed, and the consequence would be, that amendments would become necessary, occasioning a serious expense to the client, and, what is worse, the client's case would be damaged by the want of care in getting it up. On the other hand, the careful and conscientious solicitor would devote that time which he might more profitably employ upon other matters in properly getting up the case, and thus, at an actual loss to himself, would do his duty to his client. But, can it be for a moment said that the judges, in putting the matter upon such a footing, are doing justice either to the suitor or the solicitor?

The same observations apply to the instructions for briefs, which in all cases of bills are limited to 1*l.* 1*s.*; on claims, including observations, to 13*s.* 4*d.*; and on interrogatories for the examination of parties, also to 13*s.* 4*d.*; when it is obvious that the labour and skill required must vary in every case. In proceedings at law, a fairer course is adopted, and the master exercises a discretion in the amount to be allowed, after considering the circumstances of each case.

The scale is silent as to whether it is to apply to bills to be paid by clients personally, although it may be inferred that it was so intended, from the paragraph at the end of the head "instructions," which directs that the taxing-master in certain cases shall have regard, amongst other things, "to the fund or person from which or by whom the costs are to be paid."

If this be not intended, and the solicitor is to be allowed to charge his client for any work done, not provided for by the orders, but necessary for the furtherance of his suit, then the system is revived of subjecting the successful party to a heavy amount of extra costs—a system long since exploded, as wrong in principle, and remedied by the Order of the 8th May, 1845.

If, on the other hand, the solicitors' charges are to be limited to the new scale in all cases, even in a bill to be paid by a client personally, it then results that solicitors are condemned by the judges, or by those on whom they have relied for assisting them in the exercise of a most important jurisdiction, to go unremunerated for a great part of the services which a client may require at their hands—a penalty to which no other class of individuals in this country is subjected.

These observations are applicable to a great many of the allowances on the higher scale; but, as we have already shown, they bear upon the lower scale to so great an extent that it really becomes a serious question whether the judges have not exceeded their jurisdiction, in making provisions which virtually impose upon solicitors the duty of transacting a great portion of the business of the suitor in formâ pauperis.

The principle upon which the system proceeds is so inherently and manifestly wrong, that it will scarcely bear discussion, and must in the end tend to the prejudice of the suitor. It applies to one-third, if not to one-half, of the business of the court; and by the effect of it, a suitor who has £1,000 at stake, is either precluded from the advantage of having his case conducted effectually, or is to be entitled to call upon his solicitor to devote his talents and his time, and expend his money, in paying clerks and stationers to do work for him, without paying him for it. This proposition, however unreasonable it may seem, we affirm is the result of the recent Orders—so far, at all events, as the lower scale is concerned—and is established by the language of the Orders themselves.

Formerly, when solicitors complained that the fees allowed to them in some instances were inadequate, the answer was that there were other matters for which allowances were made which compensated for the labour bestowed for such inadequate fees; but this answer cannot be given any longer, as allowances of that description have all been taken away, and each item must now stand upon its own basis.

How, then, can the lower scale be justified, which, instead of increasing, reduces the charges to be made for work actually done? It is true that it is estimated, that, taking the whole of a suit, the lower scale will afford the same, or perhaps a trifle more, profit than the fees have done since the recent alterations, entirely founded upon a calculation that there will be a certain number of affidavits in a suit, the charges for the perusal of which will make the increase; but this, as we have before remarked, does not meet the justice of the case. The complaint of solicitors is, that the alterations in the procedure have reduced the rate of remuneration of the solicitor for work actually performed by him, by taking away such items as afforded him a profit, to compensate for those for which he was only partially paid, or not paid at all. Unless, therefore, proper charges are allowed for the items not paid for, justice is not done to the solicitor.

We must protest against the principle adopted throughout the lower scale with a very few exceptions, that work necessary and proper to be done for the interest of the client, is to be done either for nothing, or at a rate which would not more than pay the commonest handicraft wôrkman for his time. If the scale had been limited to suits under £500, it might have been less objectionable, on the supposition that the Court of Chancery is too expensive a court for such matters, although even such a supposition is under the new system unfounded, under which an ordinary claim not involving accounts and inquiries may be disposed of in a few weeks for £50 or £60. That a higher rate of remuneration should be afforded for suits of a larger amount is reasonable enough, as there is a greater responsibility incurred by the solicitor; but it is manifestly unjust, that, even when sums under £1000 are at stake, skill and labour and responsibility should not be paid for at their real value.

In illustration of the foregoing remarks, we would call attention to the following fees on the lower scale:—

In the case of instructions for, and drawing bills and answers, examinations, and affidavits, upon the higher scale, taking the very language of the Orders: "The taxing-master is to be at liberty to take into consideration the special circumstances of each case, and, at his discretion, to make such allowance for work, labour, and expenses properly performed and incurred in or about the preparation of the bill or answer, examination, affidavit, or petition, as shall appear to him to be just, having regard to the length of the document, the nature of the suit, the interests of the parties, and the fund or person from which or by whom the costs are to be paid." But, in the lower scale, however just such allowance may be, it is not to be made.

For drawing concise statements for the judges' chambers, whatever skill or time may be bestowed upon them, the solicitor is to have fourpence per folio for drawing, although it is admitted by the allowance on the higher scale that one shilling per folio is the proper charge. The same observation is applicable to most of the other fees when the sum allowed is less than on the higher scale, except when the pecuniary responsibility is greater, as, on payment of money into court, in which cases it is right that there should be a difference in the scale. When, however, we come to such items as these:—

1. For drawing special notice of motion	2	0
2. For drawing such observations for counsel to accompany brief (except on claims) as may be necessary and proper, per sheet	nil.
3. For attending on the day, on which a cause or petition is in the paper for hearing	6	8
4. Attending Court on special motion, each day	6	8

we cannot believe that these items have been brought under the notice of the judges. Is it possible that for drawing a notice, which may require great skill, consideration, and labour, and whatever may be its necessary length, in a matter in which a sum amounting to nearly £1000 is at stake, the Lord Chancellor and the judges should have come to the conclusion that the paltry sum of 2*s.* is a proper allowance for it.

The observations by a solicitor who is in personal communication with his client, and knows the intimate details of a cause, are often most important and necessary for counsel's guidance; but, nevertheless, either the suitor must dispense with this advantage, or, if the Orders are to be carried out, the solicitor is to devote his skill, time, and labour, and pay his money for copies to a stationer, or his clerk, in cases where, in the terms of the Order, observations are necessary and proper, without receiving a single farthing.

With regard to the 6*s.* 8*d.* allowed for attending court, the former sum of 10*s.* was always a most inadequate allowance for the anxious work of devoting a whole day, to the neglect of all other business, to attend the court. This was only compensated for under the old system by profit arising from other allowances requiring but little labour; but now they are taken away, it would have been but consistent that a reasonable sum should have been allowed for such a duty; but, instead of this, it is reduced to 6*s.* 8*d.*, and thus a solicitor is to be paid 8*d.* more than a common journeyman carpenter for his day's work.

On the other hand, if the solicitor is not at his post when the cause is called on, and his counsel are absent, a decree may be taken against his client which may occasion his ruin, the only remedy being an action for damages against the solicitor. It surely cannot be right that the sum the solicitor is paid for the performance of a duty involving such consequences should not be in any way commensurate with the responsibility to which he is thus subjected.

We constantly hear the judges complaining, and very recently the V. C. Wood commented upon, the absence of solicitors from the court when causes were called on; but, is it not reasonable that men should not be willing to sacrifice the earnings of a whole day to get 6*s.* 8*d.* or 10*s.*, even if they should be liable to some risk in so doing? The blame is surely not with them, but with those who place them in such an unjustifiable position.

There are other instances in which, instead of the fees having been increased, they have been diminished, on the lower scale, whereby the rate of remuneration has been reduced for services actually rendered, as for instance the preparing advertisement, and attending to get same approved and signed, has been reduced from 13*s.* 4*d.* to 6*s.* 8*d.*

The perusal of affidavits of claimants under Order 36 of 16th October, 1852, and attending at chambers, has been reduced from 1*l.* 1*s.* to 10*s.* 6*d.*

We are informed that the Lord Chancellor clearly expressed an intention that the rate of remuneration should not be diminished; we cannot, therefore, but believe that the details of the new scale have not been properly brought to his attention and that of the other judges; and we venture to express a hope that the whole matter will be reconsidered, and put upon such a footing as to provide for the best interests of the suitor, by enabling solicitors to retain the honourable position they have hitherto hold, which they cannot do if deprived of fair remuneration for the performance of their responsible and difficult duties.

PROBATE AND DIVORCE BILLS.

The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table a bill for amending the law relating to Probates and Letters of Administration, which he said was substantially the same as that of last session, though a few alterations in accordance with the suggestions of many of their lordships had been introduced. He also laid on the table a bill relating to Marriage and Divorce.

Lord CAMPBELL said that if persons who had to take out probate were to be subjected to a Chancery suit, he should oppose the Bill; and with regard to the Divorce Bill, if it permitted the parties any day to dissolve the marriage, he should oppose that Bill also.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that in the Testamentary Bill he had made several alterations, more out of regard for the opinion of others than for his own, by which the Court of Probate would be separated in every way not only from the Court of Chancery, but from every judge in that court. With regard to the Divorce Bill, he had struck out that clause to which his noble and learned friend objected, as it met with no great concurrence in any part of their Lordships' House.

Lord CAMPBELL said he hoped he should be able now to support the Bills.

They were then read a first time. The Probate Bill was fixed for a second reading on Monday next, and the Divorce Bill on Tuesday.

Monday, May 11.

TRANSPORTATION AND PENAL SERVITUDE BILL.

Sir G. GREY, in moving the second reading of this bill, said —By the provisions of the Act passed in 1853, in consequence of the insuperable difficulties which were then experienced in carrying into effect sentences of transportation, all sentences of transportation for periods less than fourteen years were abolished, and penal servitude for periods of shorter duration than the corresponding sentences of transportation was substituted. The option was left to judges of passing sentences of transportation or of penal servitude for periods exceeding fourteen years. This bill proposed to abolish altogether sentences of transportation, and to place the law relating to sentences of transportation for terms of fourteen years and upwards upon the same footing as sentences for less than that term. He proposed to give facilities, which do not now exist, for sending out of the country convicts sentenced to penal servitude after they have undergone a preliminary portion of their punishment in separate imprisonment, and subsequently in associated labour in this country. Another provision was, that the sentences of penal servitude substituted for sentences of transportation, instead of being of considerably shorter duration than the sentences of transportation, shall be made co-extensive in duration with those sentences; and that a discretion shall be given to the Court to pass sentences of penal servitude below the former minimum period of transportation—seven years—but exceeding the ordinary period of imprisonment for two or three years, which might have been inflicted under the previous law; thus allowing the Court to pass sentences of penal servitude for four, five, six, or seven years in lieu of seven years' transportation. But the most important provision of all was that which enabled convicts to be sent out to any colony willing to receive them. By the terms of the 6th section of the Act of 1853, it was doubtful whether Parliament did not intend to confer upon the Government the power now asked for. At all events it was doubtful whether sentences of penal servitude could be carried out in Western Australia; the law officers of the Crown arrived at the conclusion that under the existing law it was not competent for the Government to send thither convicts under sentence of penal servitude. It is proposed by this Bill to select from the convicts under sentence of penal servitude those who may be physically fit for removal to Western Australia, or any other colony which hereafter may be found willing to receive and able to employ them. To which it has been objected that if men are sentenced to penal servitude, and some work out their period of punishment at home, while others are sent abroad, there will arise an uncertainty as to the sentence. But this objection applies quite as much to the former system of transportation, and to that which now exists, as to the plan set out in this Bill; for the practice formerly was, not to send out of the country convicts who were sentenced only to seven years' transportation—those persons serving a certain portion, usually one-half, of their punishment in this country, and then, if well behaved, receiving their discharge. This practice was, however, condemned by a resolution of this House, and the Government endeavoured to send out all their convicts to Van Diemen's Land and New South Wales. The supply sent was without reference to the wants of the colonies, and led to the total break-down of the system under an attempt to introduce the element of absolute certainty into our sentences. But, even while the Government were endeavouring to carry out the resolution of the House, the fact was, that all our convicts were not sent from this country; for during the ten years from 1843 to 1852 inclusive, there was a difference of 17,041 between the numbers of those sentenced to transportation, and of those who actually were sent abroad; there was, therefore, as much uncertainty under the former system as there will be if the proposed plan be adopted. With regard to the practical carrying out of the sentence, and ordering a criminal for transportation, it is manifest that the discretion must lie with the Government, and not with the judge; for, the latter cannot know, without examination, whether a man brought before him is a fit person to be sent to a distant colony, nor what demand may exist at the time for such description of persons in any particular colony. As to certificates-of-leave, the Bill leaves the law exactly as it now is; but the number of convicts under sentence of transportation, and who can be dealt with as the system is now administered, is very much reduced. In tickets-of-leave the system recommended by the committee of the House, which thought it desirable that a stimulus to good conduct should be held out in the case of long sentences, has been adopted; but at the same time he thought, that, while the remission of the remainder of a sentence by means of a ticket-of-leave is a power that ought to be retained, the general rule ought to be an absolute remission rather than a qualified one. In the Bill now on the table some alterations, as compared with that introduced into last Parliament, have been made.

The Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Friday next.

Wednesday, May 13.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION BILL.

Mr. CRAUFURD, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that at present, whenever a creditor recovered a judgment in any of the courts of England, Scotland, or Ireland, no execution could issue upon it except within the jurisdiction of the court in which it was obtained. In the case of a judgment obtained in England, for example, the debtor could evade it by crossing over to Ireland, and before the creditor could touch either his person or property he must raise a fresh action in one of the Irish courts, and prove his judgment. He was seeking to remedy this by providing that when a judgment was issued by a competent court an official notification of it to the courts of the other two kingdoms should be sufficient warrant for them to enter up the judgment and issue execution. He had introduced into the measure several amendments suggested by the Attorney-General for Ireland, which he hoped would make it more acceptable in that country, and also certain amendments applicable to Scotland.

Mr. M'MAHON opposed the Bill as a violation of the established principles of law and jurisprudence. The Bill would impose upon England and Ireland some of the worst features of the Scotch law, and make the judgment of a Scotch court more forcible in England than the judgment of an English court. In Scotland, when a decree was given in absence, 40 years was allowed to dispute it. To transfer such a judgment to Ireland would be to make it irreversible. One of the first maxims of the English law was, that no man should be condemned without being heard in his own defence, but in Scotland a dishonest creditor had no difficulty in obtaining a judgment in the absence of his debtor. But there was a still further anomaly in the Scotch practice. In the English or Irish courts, when a man got notice of an action, all he had to do was to instruct an attorney to put in an appearance; but in Scotland the agent employed was liable for all the costs of the action; consequently no writer to the signet in Scotland would appear for a stranger until he had got security, not only for his own costs, but for the costs of the other side also. To import such extraordinary hardships as this into the English and Irish procedure would be anything but law reform, and he hoped the House would pause before it gave its sanction to the Bill.

Mr. WHITESIDE said that that part of the Scotch practice which the Bill sought to import into England and Ireland was opposed to all natural justice. The last time this bill was under consideration the Attorney-General for Ireland had succeeded in introducing an amendment—the requiring a copy of the judgment to be registered instead of a mere extract from it—which the mover of the Bill declared to be destructive of its principle and detrimental to its working, and yet that provision was introduced into the Bill now to be read a second time. By this Bill every judgment heretofore obtained in any one of the three kingdoms might be registered and made available in the others. A judgment, therefore, which had been obtained in Scotland might be taken at once to Dublin, and by the law of Ireland, having been registered in the Court of Common Pleas, it might be taken to another office and registered against the real estate of the debtor, and then, if it were for more than £100, the creditor might go to the Rolls and get a receiver appointed over the landed property of the debtor before he had ever heard of it. Neither would expense be saved by the Bill. First, a copy of the judgment had to be obtained, then a judge's order for proceeding to the other court with it, and then it had to be registered, the cost of all of which could not be under £5 or £6, but by a Bill which he had succeeded in passing some time ago the same process might be gone through for exactly 1*l.* 10*s.* The Bill would open the way to all sorts of fraudulent executions and unjust preferences. As he read the Bill, all that a creditor had to do in the Scotch courts was to give some proof that his debtor had received notice of the action at some stage before judgment was given; he might go on with his action, and just before judgment was given might pop a letter into the post to his debtor, and that would be sufficient notice, and he would get his judgment as a matter of course.

The LORD ADVOCATE said, that this measure was supported by the Law Amendment Society and by Lord Brougham. It was no attempt to do something for the benefit of Scotland or the Scotch, for, while it enabled Scotch creditors to recover debts in England and Ireland, it gave equal facilities to English and Irish creditors in Scotland. England, Scotland, and Ireland had each its own system of jurisprudence, or at least separate jurisdictions, and, so far as the decrees of their courts were concerned, stood to each other in the relation of foreign countries. This was not only an anomaly, but a discredit to our jurisprudence. The remedy for this state of things was entirely a matter of detail; the principle of this Bill must be admitted. The hon. and learned member for Wexford had made some very strong observations in regard to the law of Scotland. He would, on investigation, find in Scotland a system to which the division of law and equity was unknown. He would find that ecclesiastical courts had long been abolished; that land rights had been registered for many centuries; that the principle of County Courts, only the other day introduced into England, had obtained for a long period; and that the thirteen judges not only sat at common law, but did all the work which in England was performed by the separate Courts of Chancery, Admiralty, and Bankruptcy, and the Consistorial Courts. Decrees made after citations, and decrees made in absence, under the Scotch law, could now be enforced in the courts of England; and if there were thought to be defects in the law of Scotland, the proper course would be to amend that law. The chief defect in the law of Scotland was the principle of founding jurisdiction upon arrestments; and he thought, that, if this Bill passed, it would be a good opportunity for considering whether that mode of founding jurisdiction should continue.

The House divided, when the numbers were:—

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The English Funds have maintained their recent improvement throughout the week, and made a small advance. The Government brokers have made daily purchases of Exchequer Bills, first at par and latterly at 2s. to 4s. premium. This is said to be an investment of Savings' Bank money. Foreign Securities have been in request at full prices. The demand for money in the discount market has been active throughout the week, but without any remarkable pressure. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 9th May, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,341,590, being a decrease of £434,640, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £9,808,127, showing an increase of £249,300 when compared with the previous return.

Reports from the corn markets in town and country show that great efforts have been made to support an upward movement, and to establish higher prices for grain. A partial advance did take place. Protracted adverse winds, and a temperature remarkably unfavourable for vegetation helped the movement. The pleasant change of weather now prevailing and the expectation that large arrivals from abroad are at hand have given a downward tendency to prices, not likely to be recovered for some time. The arrivals have not yet been large, but all the continental ports are supposed to be open, and the shipments of the season on the way.

The disclosures made in investigating the affairs of the Royal British Bank have naturally led to excessive distrust in all matters relating to bankers and banking. As success in commercial operations depends very much on credit and confidence, too large a measure of caution and doubt is likely to embarrass undertakings really based upon a reasonable foundation of honesty and careful management. The first meeting of the Unity Joint Stock Mutual Bank has lately been held, under the presiding influence of Mr. Sheriff Mechi. The balance-sheet discloses several questionable and perhaps unjustifiable items of expenditure, notwithstanding which, the amount carried to profit and loss, after making provision for bad and doubtful debts, and payment of interest on customers balances, is such as to furnish another strong proof that high rates of profit attach to the business of banking. The report of the auditors states that the subscribed capital, amounting to £150,000, was all well and faithfully paid, and deposited in the London and Westminster Bank. It is also stated that at the commencement business progressed favourably, the amount of deposits steadily increased, and at the end of four months, a profit of about £9,000 had been realised. But the failure of the Royal British Bank, and the want of confidence created by that event, at once turned the tide. Very shortly the deposits decreased £100,000, and such was the panic, that shareholders and customers drew out their funds, the shareholders rushed into the market to relieve themselves from their liability; and if the chairman and some of the directors had not on their own responsibility bought shares, the quotation would have gone lower, the bank would have been placed in an embarrassing situation, and an enormous sacrifice would have taken place.

The council of state relative to the affairs of the Bank of France has resulted in the publication of proposals, and conditions for the renewal and modification of its charter. The charter is to be prolonged till 1897. The capital is to be doubled. The amount raised except the reserve fund is to be advanced to the Government against 3 per cent. rentes, which are to be taken by the Bank at 75. Some relaxation is to be allowed in the existing rule by which the Bank is prohibited from charging any higher rate of discount than 6 per cent. This measure may have good influence on the money market in case a considerable proportion of the money to be paid for the new shares should be brought forward from dormant capital.

ATTORNEY'S LIABILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE.

In our number of last week, we gave an outline of two cases illustrating the liabilities and dangers to which attorneys may be exposed at the hands of a jury, and we now revert to the subject as one of considerable importance. Our readers may remember, that, in the first case, that of Chapman v. Van Toll, the plaintiff, an attorney at Richmond, sued a widow lady to recover a sum slightly under £50, for work and labour done by him as an attorney. The defendant had lent £1,000 to a Captain ROBERTS on the security of his bond. A portion was repaid, but Mrs. VAN TOLL was unable to obtain payment of the residue, and applied to the defendant to assist her in recovering it. He instructed his London agent to take the necessary proceedings, under the advice of a special pleader, and a writ was issued against Captain ROBERTS. Two days after its service, Captain ROBERTS wrote to the defendant, acknowledging that a balance was still due to her, but denying that it was so large as she asserted. The plaintiff and his agent were unfortunately ignorant of the clause in the Common Law Procedure Act, which permits an immediate reference to the Master when nothing more is in dispute between the parties than a mere question of account. A declaration was filed, the proceedings went on in the regular course, and the cause was set down for trial. Before the parties came into court it was arranged that it should be referred to the Master to state the account. The attorney sued his client for the costs of these proceedings; and whether or not his negligence disentitled him from recovering was the point at issue in Chapman v. Van Toll. The jury, under the direction, and with the approbation, of Lord CAMPBELL, the presiding judge, found a verdict for the defendant. They would not even allow the plaintiff's costs down to the service of the writ. We cannot see how this could possibly be right, because the Act expressly says that the immediate reference to the Master shall only be made after the issuing of a writ, and the services of the plaintiff down to the period when the writ was issued were not only useful but indispensable. However, on the main question we do not wish to say much against the verdict. The punishment inflicted on the attorney for a not very culpable negligence was certainly severe. But it is one of the risks to which a professional man knowingly exposes himself, that he is liable to suffer if he omits to give his clients the benefit of any of the great changes which the Legislature makes in our legal system. No cautious man would ever think of conducting an action without looking closely to the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act. When a whole series of proceedings are, under the existing law, totally unnecessary, the public have perhaps a right to expect that the legal adviser who institutes them should pay for them. Mr. CHAPMAN'S was a hard case, for he appears to have been guilty of no greater ignorance than the pleader who drew the pleadings; but still, hard cases must sometimes occur, and a hard case is not necessarily an unjust one. Whatever argument can be found to impeach this verdict will no doubt be urged in the most forcible manner by Sir FREDERICK THESIGER in support of the rule nisi which he obtained in the case yesterday.

But the next case was one of palpable injustice. In the second suit the parties were reversed, and the client now sued the attorney. She insisted that by his negligence she had lost the amount due to her on her bond, for Captain ROBERTS was a bankrupt at the time when judgment was actually obtained; whereas, if the judgment had been obtained six months before, as it was assumed it might have been, had an immediate reference been made to the Master, Captain ROBERTS would have been able to satisfy the debt. The evidence to prove this was of the most unsatisfactory description. It appeared that ROBERTS was married about a month after the time when the writ was issued, and that on his being arrested by another creditor immediately after his marriage, his father-in-law paid off the debt for which he was arrested. It also appeared, that, at some period or other after the issuing of the writ, he had drawn from an insurance society a sum of £150. Captain ROBERTS was called by the defendant, and swore positively, that if he had been pressed by the plaintiff directly after the issuing of the writ, he could not have paid the debt, and that his only chance of meeting his liabilities was by having time given him. These were the facts; and the jury had therefore to calculate the difficult problem of the difference between the likelihood of the debt due to Mrs. VAN TOLL having been paid at one or other of two periods by a man penniless at both. There was certainly the chance that if ROBERTS had been pressed in the first flush of his wedded happiness his pitying father-in-law might have been willing to assist him further than he actually did. The question, therefore, resolved itself into an estimate of a sum which a father will give to secure his daughter a quiet honeymoon, and the jury seem to have had the most liberal views on the subject. The amount claimed by the plaintiff was £744, and the amount of damages given her by the jury was £644. There is a story of a judge saying of an intricate case, "A jury will settle this case, but how they will settle it God only knows." Human reason is incapable of ascertaining how the jury arrived at the sum of £644. They estimated the probalility of a father-in-law paying £744 for a son-in-law who had already cost him £378 as £100 less than absolute certainty. This is a wonderful piece of arithmetic, and may incline us to think that few of the jurymen were troubled with marriageable daughters. However, if Mr. CHAPMAN'S counsel be successful in supporting the rule nisi which has been granted for a new trial, this embarrassing question of probabilities may exercise the ingenuity of another jury.

Now, we think this case is worth notice, because it is evident that the sufferer suffered simply on account of his being an attorney. The jury considered themselves the avengers of society. Here they had caught one of their enemies making a mistake, and he should pay for it. They knew the history of the trial of the previous day. They had studied the address of Lord CAMPBELL, and learned that in the opinion of that eminent judge Mr. CHAPMAN had received a salutary lesson. If they got hold of an attorney who wanted salutary lessons, they were not going to lay the rod lightly on his back. We may guess how they enjoyed the office. Lord CAMPBELL, in his life of Lord KENYON, recently published, complains that Lord KENYON never combated the prejudices of juries, and especially encouraged rather than checked "that ignorant dislike of attorneys which so often works to the perversion of justice." What else but this dislike could have been at work when a jury estimated at £644 a probability which would have been handsomely measured by a £10 note? These verdicts, with a moral to them, intended to show the noble and patriotic feelings of the twelve high-minded men in the box, are a serious drawback to the many advantages of trial by jury. Vindictive verdicts hurt more than the individual against whom they are directed. They confuse the popular sense of justice, and undermine the general respect for law and legal institutions. Here the jury probably thought they were doing a very fine thing in making an attorney smart. In reality they have only gratified a foolish and vulgar prejudice, and men can never gratify their prejudices without doing harm both to themselves and others.

PROSECUTION OF THE BRITISH BANK DIRECTORS.

The judges of England—whether of the superior or inferior courts—are absolutely free from suspicion of any species of corruption. Their public life is a daily fulfilment of the promise nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus aut differemus, rectum vel justitiam. Still there are those who, loyally attached to justice, are yet not indisposed to flirt with popularity. Every frequenter of Westminster Hall knows at least one of the bench who is never so happy as when he can engraft some bit of clap trap on a judgment in which Solomon himself would have "concurred"; and who often contrives to indorse with his judicial approval the popular sentiment of the day. To this class, however, Mr. Commissioner HOLROYD does not belong. He has no particular ambition to win applause, and is not very likely to be influenced by the current of other men's opinions, or to be swayed by the wishes of the many. Hence, we especially rejoice in the indignant tone of his judgment in the case of the Royal British Bank, of which we gave some account in our last impression; and hence, also, his opinion that the directors were not merely criminals in foro conscientiæ, but were liable to prosecution, derives additional weight. The opinion of the Commissioner, it appears, has been adopted by the law officers of the Crown. Sir RICHARD BETHELL has announced his determination to try, without a moment's delay, whether the law, as it now stands, is not strong enough to meet the case; and if, as we heartily hope, the experiment should prove successful, the Nemesis of triumphant fraud will have been to a considerable extent satisfied.

That Mr. HOLROYD has come to a right conclusion with regard to the liability of the directors to criminal proceedings, few, we think, will deny. It certainly struck us with surprise that he made no allusion, in his judgment, to the 30th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, by which it is made a misdemeanor under that Act, punishable with imprisonment with or without hard labour, for the space of three years, for any member of a company adjudged bankrupt to have made, or be privy to the making of, (in contemplation of the bankruptcy), any false or fraudulent entry in any document with intent to defraud the creditors or defeat the object of the bankruptcy law; but as he has not done so, we can only conclude, that, in the present case, his opinion is, that the common law offence of which we are about to speak is that which has been committed. Now, with regard to this offence, the very kernel of the matter is contained in that proposition which is to be found in The King v. Holland, in the fifth volume of the "Term Reports," viz. that where a public duty is thrown on a body, consisting of several persons, each is individually liable for a breach of that duty; as well for acts of commission as of omission—that is, each individual of the body who does not do what in him lies to discharge his public duty, contracts, by his negligence, individual guilt. Hence, all that is requisite to fix with such guilt, and consequently with criminal responsibility, the governing body of the British Bank, is to establish, in the first place, that a public duty was thrown on them collectively by law; and, then, that in relation to that duty there was conduct amounting to misfeasance or nonfeasance. It is not the incorporated but the associated character of the parties to be prosecuted, which is important. And it happily appears to be law, that where concurrence in nonfeasance or participation in misfeasance can be traced home to any individual of a body on which public duties are thrown, such individual may be punished, as a misdemeanant, for such his own default. And if the body of which he is a member should happen to be a corporation, an indictment may be charged against him individually, instead of against the corporation. Such is the obvious conclusion to be drawn from the case in the "Term Reports," and such is the law laid down by Mr. GRANT in his valuable treatise on the law of corporations. The whole question, then, resolves itself into this: Can it be said that any public duty attached to the British Bank, and have acts of nonfeasance or misfeasance, with regard to that duty, been brought home to any of its directors or managing officers?

So far as regards the first of these questions, we own we think the reasons given by Mr. HOLROYD unanswerable. The bank was a company established by charter or letters patent from the crown, for the purpose of carrying on the business of banking—a business governed by the lex mercatoria adopted into our common law—and in the right conduct of which business, when carried on by a company with transferable shares freely negotiable in the market, the public is clearly interested. For it is a matter of universal concern that such a business as this should be properly managed, in as much as any person may buy shares therein, and general ruin and misery may be occasioned by any malversation on the part of its managers. Such, or to a like effect, was the line of argument adopted by the Commissioner, and we feel sure that it must commend itself to every unprejudiced person. The other ingredient required to the criminality of the directors individually—viz. that acts of nonfeasance or misfeasance (of which they were cognisant or participators) were committed in regard to this public duty, is a matter not of law but of fact, and can scarcely be dealt with by us in these columns. It is not our function to judge any one, and we would not willingly lend any additional weight to the objection which has been suggested against instituting a Government prosecution, namely, that the case of the directors had been already prejudged by the press, and that, in consequence, it might be feared that they would not have a fair trial. That such a fear, if genuine, is most groundless, we must, however, assert our belief; and, indeed, the late trial of the BACONS is, of itself, amply sufficient to vindicate the criminal tribunals of the country from such an imputation. In these days of journalism it is a sheer impossibility (we doubt whether it would be advisable) to suppress all observations on a case interesting to the public before its final decision; but it should be some consolation to those charged with crime to reflect that when the day of trial actually arrives, it is far more probable that the guilty may escape, owing to the prudery of our existing law of evidence, than that the innocent will suffer from any out-of-doors' rumours.

Legal News.

The session promises a fair crop of useful measures. If the Government could contrive to pass good bills on the subjects it has already taken up, we should for our own part be very well content. The Attorney-General has stated the leading features of his bills for making fraudulent breaches of trust criminal, and for the winding-up of joint-stock banks, and both bills were read a first time last night. The former subject is one of extreme difficulty, and the bill when printed will demand the most careful consideration of every lawyer, and we hope that it will be thoroughly discussed in our columns. The Joint Stock Banks Bill will provide the necessary legal sanction to the compromise in the case of the Royal British Bank. Mr. Malins reminds the House that a bill substantially the same as that of the Attorney-General came down from the Lords last year, and was defeated in the Commons through the opposition of Irish members. If this bill had passed, says Mr. Malins, all the miserable litigation in the case of the Royal British Bank would have been obviated.

The present state of business in the offices of the Court of Chancery, demands the most serious attention of the authorities as well as of every practitioner in that court. Causes are now heard and disposed of by the judges with a celerity that leaves nothing to be desired, but the expedition thus attained in court is to a great extent nullified by delays in the various offices. It is most unfortunate that the hopeful reforms introduced a few years back should be thus impeded in their working, and that any pretence should be afforded for the outcry lately raised against the Court of Chancery in connection with the Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill. We have received a letter upon this subject from a firm of extensive practice, and we think that the following extract from it deserves consideration:—

"In the Accountant-General's office the delay is very great, and much greater than ought to exist. You have to wait several days for checks or powers of attorney when one ought to be abundant.

"We are sorry to say that there is as great delay at the Taxing Offices. At present, appointments to tax can only be obtained for the middle of June.

"Lastly, the Chief Clerks are full for a fortnight or three weeks after the opening of the offices. Every solicitor knows how this new system works, and no one can doubt but that these gentlemen are over-worked; the staff is too small; there wants an additional Chief Clerk if it is intended that this part of the business should give satisfaction.

"We are now fast approaching the long vacation, and unless something be done we expect complaints will arise from all quarters."

As regards the Accountant-General's office there may be room for difference of opinion as to the utility of various regulations; but so long as the rules exist, it is no just ground of complaint against the clerks that they observe those rules, nor ought the delay which such rules occasion to be referred to as proof that the department is over-worked. It may nevertheless be quite true that the system of the office might be greatly simplified, and also that, if it is to remain unchanged, more clerks are necessary to work it. We apprehend, however, that upon the justice of the two other complaints brought forward in the above extract, the entire profession is of one mind. Some, indeed, may think that more judges are wanted, some that the judges are enough and that they should have more clerks, others that the staff both of judges and of clerks should be increased. It would certainly appear that the present condition of the Judges' Chambers is not what was contemplated by the originators of the plan for abolishing the Masters' offices. It was an essential feature in that scheme that the judge should be in chambers accessible on appeal from his clerk immediately, and without any cumbrous and costly forms. Now it is obvious, that, however willing the judges may be to carry out this principle, they cannot do so if obliged to sit every day in court. They make decrees at a rate of speed of which no one can complain, but the working out of those decrees, so far as depends upon the judge, must be provided for in the afternoon when the court has risen and it might be supposed that the day's work was done. If the judge is expected to take an active part in chamber business, it is clear that he must dedicate more of his time to it. But if it be thought that all or nearly all matters worthy of the attention of the judge may best be discussed in court, the necessity for appointing another chief clerk to each of the existing judges becomes altogether undeniable. Whether by judges or by clerks, the business ought to be so done that complaints such as we have now published should not be heard. The delay thus arising is naturally ascribed by the public to faults in the procedure of the court, whereas it really proceeds from a mistaken and most pernicious economy, which denies to the offices a staff adequate to the work they have to do. This is not the first and is not likely to be the last complaint, and we much fear, that, as the pressure of business increases from week to week, the obstructions in the Judges' Chambers will become greater, and the public will grow confirmed in the belief that procrastination is ineradicable from the Court of Chancery. There seems to be no doubt that the Taxing Masters have more work to do than they can accomplish without great delay, and if this be so—and the fact is not difficult to ascertain—by all means appoint more Masters. The Minister or Department of Justice, when we have one, may be expected to look into all these matters; but in the meantime it is the duty as well as the interest of the solicitors to trace to their true origin delays which, in the absence of explanation, are pretty certain to be ascribed to them.

IN THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

Chapman v. Van Toll; Van Toll v. Chapman.

On motion of Sir F. Thesiger, rule nisi granted for new trial in each action, on the grounds of mis-direction and verdict against evidence in both, and on the ground of excessive damages in Van Toll v. Chapman.

Argument of Sir F. Thesiger was that gross negligence not shown, and gross negligence necessary. He contended that the case of Van Toll v. Roberts was not one within the 3rd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, so as that the attorney was guilty of negligence in not having gone before a judge to get the matter referred. This was not a matter "which could not conveniently be tried in the ordinary way," to bring it within the section. There must be difficult and complicated matters of account to bring the case within it. There was, therefore, no gross negligence.

Purvis v. Landill (12 Cl. & Fin. 21), was referred to, and the words of Lord Campbell were that "gross ignorance or negligence was necessary."

MANCHESTER LAW ASSOCIATION.

The following memorial, numerously signed by solicitors practising in Manchester, has been presented to the Lord Chancellor, and to the Attorney and Solicitor-General, with the sanction of the Association:—

"That inasmuch as, by the law of this country, judgments and Crown debts, when duly registered, become a binding lien upon all the lands of the debtor, it is necessary upon every sale or mortgage to search the register to be satisfied that there is no judgment or Crown debt registered against the vendor or mortgagor.

"That similar searches must be made to ascertain that he has not incumbered the land with annuities, and that he is not an uncertificated bankrupt or an insolvent, and that the property is not affected by any lis pendens.

"That, Crown debts not requiring re-registration, the search for them must be continued back for an indefinite period; and that prior to 1839 the difficulty and expense of the search increase, as the registers are kept partly at the Queen's Remembrancer's Office, and partly at Carlton Ryde.

"That, if the land is situate in the county palatine of Lancaster, in addition to the searches already mentioned, the register at Preston must be searched.

"That it is not sufficient to search against the immediate vendor or mortgagor, but the search must be extended to all persons who have had any interest in the land for some time back.

"That the expense of these numerous searches forms a serious item in conveyancing costs, and with the delay they occasion tends to impede the free transfer of land, and in the case of small properties especially the expense is felt to be an intolerable hardship.

"That, in order to avoid this expense, purchasers very frequently prefer the risk of not searching at all.

"That from practical experience your memorialists feel justified in asserting that the incumbrances found upon search are not one per cent. upon the number of searches made, and they therefore submit that a comparison of the hardship inflicted upon a large portion of the population, with the casual benefit derived by a very small minority, points to the expediency of entirely liberating land from the liens adverted to.

"That the maxim 'vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt' may fairly be applied to judgment creditors; and that they have no equitable claim to be protected at the expense of purchasers and mortgagees.

"Your memorialists think, however, that, as a compensation to the judgment creditor, he should be provided with a more efficient remedy than the writ of elegit, under which the creditor's remedy is confined to the rents and profits, and that a debtor's real estate, including equities of redemption (which are exempted from the operation of an elegit), should be made saleable after due notice; and they also suggest, that the judgment creditor should have the power of enforcing from the debtor a discovery of what the property of the debtor consists, for which power the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, sec. 60, affords a precedent. They conceive that a scheme might readily be devised by which these objects might be attained without unduly pressing upon the debtor, and they venture to suggest that the Bankruptcy Courts should be the tribunals to grant the order for sale.

"As respects the claim of the Crown, your memorialists refer with pleasure to the sentiments of the late eminent conveyancer, Mr. Preston, who many years ago maintained, that, 'in a country like Great Britain, it is far better that the King, or now in more accurate language the public, should lose the debts of those who have been trusted, than that the industry of honest and bonâ fide purchasers should be sacrificed by the misfortunes or dishonesty of Crown debtors.'

"As regards annuities, your memorialists submit that it should be made imperative on the annuitants, by indorsing a memorandum on the principal title deeds, or by insisting on the deeds being delivered over to a trustee, or by some other similar expedient, to insure that any person dealing with the property should have notice of the incumbrance.

"Your memorialists think the Court would seldom find difficulty in protecting suitors in Chancery against fraudulent sales; and even assuming the possibility of an occasional fraud resulting from the closing of the lis pendens register, yet that exceptional cases ought not to stand in opposition to the public interests.

"Your memorialists also submit, that it would be but a fair set off against the privileges which creditors enjoy as against the public under the 'reputed ownership' provisions of the bankrupt and insolvent laws, if sales by bankrupts or insolvents, who are permitted by their creditors to appear to the world as owners of property, were declared valid as against the creditors.

"Your memorialists have observed with satisfaction the enactment contained in sec. 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, as indicating a disposition in the Legislature to afford protection to bonâ fide purchasers.

"Your memorialists, therefore, pray that your Lordship will be pleased, in conjunction with the law officers of the crown, to bring the subject of this memorial under the consideration of the Government, with a view to the entire abolition of the various latent liens upon land to which your memorialists have referred."

SAFE CUSTODY OF ORIGINAL WILLS.

The following letter has been addressed to the Editor of the Times:—"Among the evils of the testamentary jurisdiction hitherto exercised by the Ecclesiastical and Manorial Courts have been the multiplicity of registries where original wills are deposited, and the occasional insecurity of their custody. It was to be hoped that the Lord Chancellor's bill would have furnished a remedy for both these evils, and that it would have provided that all original wills should be transmitted to the General Registry, whereby security of deposit would have been combined with convenience of reference. It is proposed, however, that copies only of the wills, of which probate is to be granted by the District Registrars should be transmitted to London, while the originals are to remain in the custody of the District Registrars. This arrangement seems to be highly objectionable in principle, and in practice it will be fraught with the greatest danger, as there is no provision whatever in the Bill for the construction of district registries. The Bill speaks, indeed, of "the Public Registry of the District," but its framers have entirely overlooked all provision for a building which shall answer such a description. If, however, there are to be thirty-seven District Registrars, to whom a very large proportion of original wills will be confided, the public interest demands that as many district registries should be constructed, dry, fireproof, and readily accessible. A back room in the District Registrar's office, liable to fire, and exposed to spoliation, would prove but a sorry substitute for the existing diocesan registries which the cathedrals supply, and which although sometimes damp, are always secure from robbery and fire. The construction of thirty-seven district registries will, it must be admitted, entail a heavy charge upon the State, but the alternative would be monstrous, unless, indeed, the principle which is applied in the 84th clause to all past wills should be extended to all future wills. There seems to be no good reason why all original wills should not be transmitted to the General Registry, while the copies should be retained in the office of the District Registrar. There would also result from this arrangement an incidental advantage, that every original will would pass under the eye of the principal Registrars in London."

SUMMARY DILIGENCE ON BILLS QF EXCHANGE.

(From the Mercantile Test.)

We have now to invite the attention of our mercantile readers, on both sides of the Tweed, to a subject in which their pecuniary interests are deeply concerned. They will remember that, in the session of Parliament before last, Lord Brougham introduced a Bill into the House of Lords, by which it was proposed to adopt, in the law of England, the Scottish system of summary diligence for recovery on bills of exchange. By that system, as our mercantile readers well know, an action at law is entirely excluded. The law of Scotland, following the Roman law, and the law of all European nations—England alone excepted—holds that, when a man signs a bill of exchange, he acknowledges the debt, and gives a warrant of attorney to sign judgment in case the bill is not paid when it falls due. The Scottish system likewise provides, with due regard to the interests of the debtor, for staying proceedings, wherever he has an honest objection to the payment of the bill.

The Bill so introduced by his Lordship, proposed to give jurisdiction in summary diligence not only to the superior courts of common law in England, but to the county courts concurrently with the superior courts. This plan, which had been tested, not only by the experience of a century and a half in Scotland, but in the experience of many continental nations for even a longer period, was well received by both Houses of Parliament. But for a weighty reason fully disclosed in the parliamentary return now before us, professional jealousy was aroused; and by way of opposition or amendment, a Bill was introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Henry Singer Keating, a member of the bar, adopting in part the principle of Lord Brougham's Bill, but making it still imperative to issue a writ of summons in every case for payment of a bill of exchange.

Lord Brougham's Bill, which passed the House of Lords three times with the unanimous approbation of all the law lords, was taken charge of in the House of Commons by Mr. Atherton, the eminent Queen's counsel. Mr. Atherton supported the Bill with great ability and energy at every stage of its progress; but professional interests prevailed against it, and Mr. Keating's Bill was preferred, and passed into law.

Mr. Keating's Act has been in operation for one year; and we have now to draw the attention of our readers to a Parliamentary return, just printed, which shows the manner in which the Act works for the profession of the law on the one hand, and for the merchants of England on the other.

By this return it appears that the number of writs issued in the English courts under Mr. Keating's Act, during the year 1856, was 23,166, and that the number of orders for leave to appear and defend was 852.

The average cost of each of those writs of summons is 2*l.* 15*s.*, and the subsequent expense of obtaining judgment where the defendant does not appear, is £1, making together 3*l.* 15*s.* The sum total thus paid by the mercantile community to their English attorneys last year, for obtaining those 23,166 judgments on bills of exchange, was £86,776. Whereas in Scotland, the average expense of obtaining a judgment on a bill of exchange, instead of 3*l.* 15*s.*, is only 17*s.* 8*d.* We give the items of the cost:—

Notary's Charges for Protest and Stamp	£0	5	0
Paid recording Protest	0	6	0
Solicitor's Fee obtaining Judgment	0	6	8
	£0	17	8

And the cost of obtaining 23,166 judgments on bills of exchange in Scotland, instead of £86,776, as it is under Mr. Keating's Act, is only £22,972.

The mercantile community have thus been compelled to pay to their attorneys in England during the year 1856, £63,804 more than they pay for the same thing to their solicitors in Scotland.

If the House of Commons had passed Lord Brougham's Bill, which adopted the Scottish system in its purity, instead of Mr. Keating's, the merchants of England would have been saved that large sum of money last year, and in every year in all time coming, until Mr. Keating's Act shall be repealed. The merchants of the United Kingdom, at their great conference held in London last January, feeling the expensive character of Mr. Keating's Act, passed a unanimous resolution, not only in favour of adopting the entire Scottish system of summary diligence on bills of exchange, but in favour of applying it to money bonds, and to all other pecuniary obligations.

Lord Brougham's Bill amply provides for all the defects in Mr. Keating's Act. It has had the benefit of careful revision by Mr. Atherton and Sir Erskine Perry, and of re-revision by his Lordship himself. It may, therefore, be regarded as perfect a measure as legislative talent and experience can make it; and the time seems now to have arrived for considering whether the new Parliament should not be asked to adopt his Lordship's bill as an amendment on Mr. Keating's Act.

FROM THE NEW YORK CORRESPONDENT OF THE "TIMES."

The Cunningham trial has commenced. The public interest felt in the investigation is heightened by the simultaneous appearance of another crime in the rural districts, shrouded in equal mystery. Like all the great tragedies of life, from the first fall to Mrs. Manning and Mrs Cunningham, love was at the bottom of this. A labourer in the town of Newburg, going out early in the morning to finish sowing a field remote from any house, discovered in one of the furrows the nearly naked body of a handsome woman, the skull fractured, blood exuding from the nostrils, ears, and mouth, and the throat showing marks of strangulation. The few under-clothes that were on were arranged in an unskilful and unwomanly manner, showing that some masculine hand had probably tied them on after death, for the purpose of misleading and baffling inquiry. A cameo brooch found near the body was the only other clue to the mystery. The body was brought to Newburg, where, soon one, and then another, and another, without concert, recognised it as the body of a Miss Bloom. Inquiry was made, and it was found that Miss Bloom had disappeared since the preceding Tuesday, when she left (at 9 o'clock at night) in company with one Jenkins. Jenkins (a married man) confessed that he had driven her, at her own request, five or six miles in the country, about midnight had put her down within 200 feet of the house to which she was going, and returned instantly to Newburg. Miss Bloom's sister was sent for, and at once recognised the body. The features were much discoloured, but a marked scar over the left eyebroy, a sore upon the elbow, a mole above the right knee, and a very unusual formation of the little toe of the right foot were proofs of identity stronger even than the resemblance between the living and the dead face. The under-clothes and the cameo she had uever seen before. A surgical examination supplied a motive why a married man should wish to commit such a deed. Jenkins was arrested, and the deceased Miss Bloom was buried at the public expense in the midst of the assembled village. Scarcely, however, had the funeral train left the church when the supposed deceased reappeared, to divide with the actual victim the wonder of the crowd. The extraordinary piece of circumstantial testimony was overthrown, and the accused Jenkins was set free. I doubt whether the annals of criminal jurisprudence afford a more remarkable instance of the uncertainty of circumstantial evidence.

DEATH OF MR. JAMES FRESHFIELD.—By the decease of this able and indefatigable lawyer, at the age of fifty-six years, the profession has lost one of its most distinguished members, and a career of great and well-deserved success has prematurely closed. It is known to all our readers that the late Mr. James Freshfield was a man of remarkable abilities, of unwearied industry, and intense devotion to business; and that he had enjoyed throughout his life the best opportunities of displaying the great capacity he possessed. We believe that in the City the professional reputation of the deceased was almost unrivalled. He had a mind of rare judicial power, and upon all questions of mercantile law there was no sounder authority than Mr. Freshfield. But it was as the confidential adviser of the Bank of England that this eminent lawyer was best known both by the profession and by the commercial world. He was appointed solicitor to the Bank jointly with his father in the year 1830, and ten years afterwards, on the retirement of the elder Mr. Freshfield, the appointment was renewed to the deceased jointly with his brother Mr. Charles Freshfield. It will be readily understood by every one who is moderately acquainted with the history of the Bank of England during the twenty-seven years that the deceased had acted as its solicitor, how heavy was his responsibility, how urgent the need of prompt and sagacious judgment, and how grave the consequences of miscarriage. To advise the Bank upon all questions that needed the opinion of a lawyer during the commercial vicissitudes of so long a period was the work of no ordinary intellect. There can be little doubt that Mr. Freshfield sacrificed health and life by excessive devotion to the profession in which he had made himself so eminent. If a life of such unintermitted toil be necessary to attain to the place he occupied, we cannot, looking to the untimely close of his career, insist strongly that he should be an example to younger men; but, undoubtedly, the foundation of his success was laid in an assiduous study of his profession, which the legal aspirant would do well to imitate. One proof of his familiarity with legal questions may be found in our own journal of the 14th March, where we published his very valuable letters to Baron Rothschild on the proposed alteration in the law as to sales and pledges. Little did we then anticipate that a life so useful, energetic, and honourable would terminate so soon; and we are sure our readers will share our deep regret at the untimely close of a career so honourable.

THE NEW COURT AT THE GUILDHALL.—Two days' experience of this court has not removed, but strengthened, the objection we took the liberty of raising to its construction. There is but one door into it, and the seats for the bar are placed at the extreme further corner. The jurymen, witnesses, and spectators, and especially the latter, congregate round this door and will not disperse themselves over the seats provided for their accommodation. The result is, that it is difficult to communicate with any one out of court, and most troublesome for the bar, who are constantly going in and out, to force their way through the dense mass of humanity. Surely a second door might be broken into the court in the wall near the seats occupied by the bar. This would obviate the inconvenience above pointed out, and, moreover, would open a direct communication with the other Court of Exchequer. As it is apparent that the Lord Chief Baron intends to remove the seat of government to this building, it will always be in use; and on that score alone it is highly desirable that it should be rendered as perfect as circumstances will admit of. One more word, and we lay aside criticism. The whole roof is one huge skylight, and, though the glass is thick, and darkened somewhat, the rays of the sun still pour down both light and heat on the devoted barristers in most inconvenient excess. It would be desirable to erect some screen on the roof which might counteract this annoyance, which was alluded to yesterday by one of the learned counsel when addressing the jury. Subject to these remarks, we again tender the thanks of the public to the corporation for their recent improvements in and about the city courts, which reflect great credit upon their architect, Mr. Bunning.—Times.

IN RE J. NORTON, BANKRUPT.—Mr. Commissioner Evans said that the accounts were unvouched to a large amount. The question seriously arose what was to be done in such cases? The other day he refused to pass a bankrupt on similar accounts. On an appeal, however, to the Lords Justices, they in half an hour made themselves acquainted with the accounts, and passed the bankrupt's examination. In this case he was not satisfied, neither were the assignees, who, being conversant with the minutiæ of the bankrupt's business, possessed peculiar means of judging of the accuracy of his accounts. It was said that better accounts could not be furnished. That might be so, but blank sheets of paper might as well be placed before him as those now furnished. The assignees objecting, he should adjourn the bankrupt's examination sine die. In the event of the Superior Court passing the bankrupt upon such accounts he hoped it would say why, because in such a case he did not see the use of people coming here to object to accounts.

IN RE A. B. CAISTOR, BANKRUPT.—The bankrupt's father-in-law made a long statement. The bankrupt had married his daughter with every prospect of happiness. Some time after the marriage he ascertained, to his great surprise, that the bankrupt was leading a most dissipated life, spending his evenings with the lowest characters in the lowest taverns. He then ascertained from his daughter that this had been his course for about four years. The bankrupt's failure had, he contended, been occasioned by dissipation and idleness. The bankrupt, in reply, alleged, as the chief cause of any misconduct of which he had been guilty, that his father-in-law laboured under a mistake that he had conferred upon him an honour in accepting him as his son-in-law, and his wife had driven him to seek comforts and society abroad by prohibiting him from smoking his pipe at home. Whenever he thus infringed she threw open every window in the house. His wife had made his house a home more for her father than for himself, they (his father-in-law and his wife) being frequently occupied in private conversation and discussion. The Commissioner said it would have been better if these family quarrels had not been brought before the court. He could regard only the bankrupt's conduct as a trader, as exhibited by his books and such other evidence as had been laid before him.

DRAFTSMEN OF PARLIAMENTARY BILLS.—The sum total paid by the several public departments during the year 1856, for drafting or settling the drafts of Parliamentary Bills was 6,384*l.* 7*s.* 2*d.*, which was thus allotted:—2,682*l.* 10*s.* for the Home Department; 54*l.* 12*s.* War Department; 372*l.* 4*s.* 6*d.* Admiralty; 91*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* Board of Trade; 550*l.* Board of Health; 21*l.* 18*s.* Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues; 5*l.* 15*s.* Office of Public Works and Buildings; 425*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* Crown Agent in Scotland; 1,600*l.* 15*s.* Statute Law Commission; 29*l.* 8*s.* Post-office; 500*l.* Chief Secretary's Office, Ireland.

ELECTION PETITIONS.—The usual recognizances have been entered into to prosecute petitions against the returns for the undermentioned places:—Mayo, Cambridge, Athlone, Huntingdon (county), Rochdale, Sligo (borough), Pontefract, Wareham, Marlborough, Great Yarmouth, Maidstone, Sunderland, Maldon, Oxford, Tewkesbury, Lanark (county), Totness, Bury, Dublin (city), Lisburn, Bury St. Edmund's, Berwick-upon-Tweed, Newport, Leitrim, Beverley, Taunton, Finsbury, Lambeth, Bodmin, Dover, Weymouth, Galway, Bath, Cashel, Newcastle-under-Lyne, Shrewsbury, Galway (town), Glocester (city), Chatham, Norwich, Cashel, Lymington, Ipswich, South Division of Northamptonshire, Staffordshire, Portsmouth, Lyme Regis, Queen's County, Drogheda, Herefordshire, Sandwich, Bridport, Portsmouth, Huntingdon, Clare (county), Sligo (county), New Windsor, East Sussex.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS (3 & 4 WILL. 4, c. 27)—ACKNOWLEDGMENT BY CO-OBLIGOR OF BOND.

In re Seager's Estate—Seager v. Aston, 5 W. R. 548.

In Roddam v. Morley (ante, p. 438) we had occasion to offer some remarks upon a question nearly akin to that which was the main subject of contention in the present case. In re Seager's Estate, the facts were shortly these:—William Seager, being entitled to a legacy charged on land, and payable on the decease of a tenant for life, in 1824 assigned it to secure a debt; and for the same debt he gave a bond of even date, in which he himself was bound as principal, and Sarah Seager as surety. No payment or acknowledgment in respect of the debt had been made since 1828 by the principal, or any one claiming under him; but, in 1846, the surety made a payment on account of the interest due. One question was, whether such payment kept the debt alive as against the principal debtor. The tenant for life, upon whose death the legacy became actually payable, died in 1851. Stuart, V. C., considered that the effect of the 40th section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, was to bar the assignee by way of mortgage of the legacy, if he did not sue within twenty years after the death of the tenant for life. The contention of the principal debtor was, that the twenty years began to run from the date of the assignment. His Honour was of opinion that the rights of the mortgagee were unaffected either by the operation of the statute of limitation, or by the 14th section of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, which enacts that part payment by one co-contractor or co-debtor is not to prevent the bar of the statute in favour of another co-contractor or co-debtor. He was further of opinion that the last-mentioned enactment did not apply to the case of an assignee by way of mortgage.

PRACTICE—ORDER IN CHAMBERS—PAYMENT OUT OF COURT—INJUNCTION—PENDENCY OF APPEAL.

Joad v. Ripley, 5 W. R. 551; Lister v. Leather, Id. 550.

In Joad v. Ripley, Stuart, V. C., refused to allow an application at chambers for payment out of court of a sum of interest exceeding £300. The proper construction of the recent order relating to the practice is, that, wherever the amount asked to be paid out exceeds £300, whether it consists of principal or interest, the application must be by petition in court.

Lister v. Leather was a motion for an injunction, which was made pending an application to the Queen's Bench for leave to appeal to the Exchequer Chamber from a judgment of the Queen's Bench discharging a rule nisi for a new trial, the plaintiff at law and in equity having obtained a verdict in the trial directed by the Court of Chancery. It was urged by the defendant, on the motion for an injunction, that a court of equity would not grant an injunction while an action in relation to the same subject-matter was still pending at law. Wood, V. C., however, granted the relief prayed, observing, that, "upon motions for an injunction, if there was any dispute as to infringement, the Court never interfered; but where there had been long and uninterrupted enjoyment (as there had been in this case), it would be considered such primâ facie evidence of title as to justify the Court in protecting the patent right by an injunction until its validity had been established by an action at law." The appeal, moreover, under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, could not be allowed on matters of evidence, but only on questions of law; as to which, in the present case, all the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench were unanimously in the plaintiff's favour. Lister v. Leather shows, therefore, that courts of equity do not feel bound to await the result of whatever proceedings at law may be instituted to contest patent rights, of the validity of which a court of equity has the means of satisfying itself. At the same time, the general rule stands good—viz. that, where there is a denial of infringement by the defendant in equity, the Court will not grant an injunction until the plaintiff has shown a title at law.

MORTGAGEE—EJECTMENT—STATUTES OF FORCIBLE ENTRY—COSTS.

Owen v. Crouch, 5 W. R. 545.

This was a case of some practical interest as to the rights of mortgagees. The question raised was, whether, under the circumstances, the mortgagee was entitled to add the costs of an action of ejectment to his security. The mortgagor who had been in possession died, and for some time the property which consisted of two houses was left untenanted and in a dilapidated state. A stranger who occupied adjoining premises seized the opportunity to effect an entrance into the deserted tenement, which he then let to lodgers of his own. In this state of things the mortgagee applied to a magistrate, and with the assistance of the police was restored to the possession, but shortly afterwards was ousted by a violent entry on the part of the former intruder, who set up a pretence of title under an alleged contract with the mortgagor. Under these circumstances the mortgagee commenced an action of ejectment, in which he recovered judgment and obtained possession; and the question which was now raised was, whether these costs were properly chargeable as mortgagee's costs, or whether the action ought to be regarded as an unnecessary proceeding, entailing improper expenses, which ought to be disallowed. The argument for the representative of the mortgagor was, that the possession ought to have been recovered by proceedings under the statutes of forcible entry, which boast the respectable antiquity of the 15th year of Richard II., and the 8th of Henry VI. The summary remedy provided by these enactments was, however, rather complicated; and the Court held, that, notwithstanding the privilege of calling out the posse comitatûs to reinstate him in possession, the mortgagee was not bound to take that course, and that, as between him and his mortgagor, he was justified in adopting the more expensive proceeding by ejectment, and was entitled to add the costs to his security. On another point the judgment was against the mortgagee, who claimed also to be allowed the costs of defending an action of trespass brought against him by the intruder whom he had disturbed. These costs were held not to be so connected with the mortgage as to form part of the ordinary mortgagee's costs, the Vice-Chancellor observing, that it was an action brought by a violent neighbour with no more reason than if it had been against an entire stranger. Such costs could not be regarded as having been incurred in a just protection of the property, and were accordingly disallowed to the mortgagee.

UNDUE INFLUENCE AT PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS, OFFENCE OF—PROSECUTION UNDER CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT, 1854.

Regina v. Barnwell, 5 W. R., Q. B., 557.

This case arose (and it is the first which has arisen) upon that provision of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 5), which—after enacting that the offence of "undue influence" at an election of a member of Parliament, shall be committed by any person, who, either directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, shall make, or threaten to make, use of any force, violence, or restraint, or inflict, or threaten the infliction, by himself or others, of any injury, damage, harm, or loss, or in any other manner practise intimidation on or against any one, in order to induce or compel such person to vote or refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting at any such election—proceeds to make it a misdemeanor to be guilty of using undue influence, and also makes the offending party liable to a penal action. In the present instance, a rule nisi had been obtained on the part of one T., calling on the defendant to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against him, for having been guilty of the offence above defined at the late election for the borough of Denbigh.

It appeared by the affidavits on which the rule nisi had been granted, that the complainant, a baker at Denbigh, had been in the habit of supplying bread both to the defendant and also to two charities, over which the churchwardens for the time being had a control; and that the defendant, in order to induce T. to vote for one of the candidates, and to abstain from voting for the other, had threatened, in the event of his refusal, to withdraw his private custom, and, if he should be elected churchwarden for the next year, to take away also the privilege of supplying the said charities with bread. The affidavits on the other side, without denying specifically every allegation, yet substantially denied the charges, and retorted the charge of intimidation upon the other party; and on showing cause, it was contended on behalf of the defendant that every man has a right to give his custom to whom he pleases, and, therefore, a threat to take it away could not be an exercise of undue influence; and that, at all events, the case was left doubtful on the affidavits, and, therefore, the party aggrieved must be left to his remedy by indictment, or to an action for the penalty. It was upon this latter ground that the Court ultimately discharged the rule (without costs); and, in doing so, they intimated that the conduct charged, if substantiated, was sufficient to constitute the statutable offence; and that it would have been much to be desired that the affidavits filed by the defendant had more distinctly and categorically denied the charges.

ARTICLED CLERK—SERVICE ALLOWED TO DATE FROM EXECUTION OF ARTICLES, AND NOT INROLMENT.

Ex parte Williams, 5 W. R., B. C., 559.

It will be remembered that this gentleman applied for an order on the Master to inrol his articles, though unstamped, and that this was refused.* In consequence of a delay of the Court in delivering its decision, he was prevented from affixing the stamp on paying the penalty, under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 81, and then causing the articles to be inrolled within the six months from the date of the articles allowed by 7 & 8 Vict, c. 86, s. 1; and hence, the consequence followed that the service counted only from the inrolment, and not from the execution of the articles, unless the Court should order otherwise. But Coleridge, J., under the circumstances, and as the delay arose from the act of the Court, directed the Master to allow the service to date from the execution of the articles.

FORM OF ORDER OF REFERENCE AT NISI PRIUS—POWER OF ARBITRATOR TO ADMINISTER AN OATH—AMENDING PARTICULARS OF DEMAND AFTER COMPULSORY REFERENCE.

Simmonds v. Moss, 5 W. R., B. C., 559; Gibbs v. Knight, Id., Exch., 562.

The first of the above cases shows the importance of attending carefully to the form of an order of reference at Nisi Prius, and of seeing that it contains an express power to the arbitrator to administer an oath. On the trial of the above action, it was referred to one of the jurymen to certify to the judge the amount of the balance due to the plaintiff, and the order contained no such clause, for which reason the reference had been proceeded with, without swearing any of the witnesses; and on this ground it was now sought to set the certificate aside; but the Court said that the arbitrator in the present case had acted quite rightly, for he had no power to swear the witnesses. The authority of an arbitrator to do so depends altogether on 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 42, s. 41, and the rule or order must contain terms expressly giving him the power. It is apprehended, that, on the other hand, to swear witnesses without authority would be such mala praxis on the part of the arbitrator, as to vitiate his award, unless the objection were waived. In the form given in Chitty's "Forms," 1856, p. 869, there is no clause giving this power; but the omission is rectified in the usual printed forms sold to the profession.

Another case, involving the practice on references ordered by the Court, may be here noticed. In Gibbs v. Knight the cause had been compulsorily referred by a judge's order, as it involved mere matters of account, and, after such order, the plaintiff applied to be allowed to amend his particulars of demand. It was urged, in opposition, that where a cause is referred by consent, the particulars cannot be afterwards ordered by the Court to be amended (Morgan v. Tarte, 11 Exch. 82); but the Court replied that there was a substantial difference in this respect between compulsory and other references, and they amended the order as desired, without calling on counsel in support of the rule.

PRACTICE—ACTION ON A JUDGMENT—COSTS, HOW APPLIED FOR.

Lomax v. Berry, 5 W. R., Exch., 563.

By 43 Geo. 3, c. 46, s. 4, it is enacted, that, in all actions on judgments recovered in England or Ireland, the plaintiff is not entitled to any costs of suit unless the Court in which the action on the judgment is pending, or some judge of the same Court, shall otherwise order. In the above case, an ex parte application for costs on behalf of the plaintiff had been made at chambers; and a question being raised, whether the order could be made without a summons, Mr. Baron Channell referred the matter to the Court, that the practice might be settled, as it appeared that many of the judges had been in the habit of granting ex parte orders. It was now contended, on the one side, that there was no need for a summons, as costs in such actions were usually only given in two cases—viz. 1st, Where it was found necessary to turn the judgment debt into a judgment of a higher amount, in order to be able to have execution against the person of the debtor; and, 2ndly, Where the defendant had pleaded to the action on the judgment nul tiel record; and that, in both of these cases, the ground on which costs were given appeared on the record. On the other hand, it was urged that the defendant might be able to show that there was no necessity for bringing the action on the judgment (a proceeding which, when unnecessary, the provision was designed to prevent), and that, therefore, he ought to have an opportunity of doing so; and the practice was laid down, accordingly, both in Chitty's "Archbold," by Prentice, and in Lush's "Practice," by Stephen. The Court held the practice so laid down to be correct; and Martin, B., took occasion to observe that the general rule of Easter Term, 1857,* as to indorsement on writs in reference to judgments by default, in actions on contract brought to recover £20 or less, might perhaps be usefully extended to actions on judgments.

It may be observed, in confirmation of the necessity for a summons, before obtaining costs in such actions, that in Wood v. Silleto (1 Chitt. 473), it was expressly laid down by the Court, that the plaintiff is not to be allowed his costs if he might have issued execution, or realised all he would be entitled to recover in the action, without suing on the judgment; and, accordingly, it has been held, that there must be an affidavit explaining why execution was not issued, and this even when the defendant falsely pleaded nul tiel record (see Revell v. Wetherell, 3 C. B. 821). Moreover, V. Williams, J., observed, in the case of Slater v. Mackay (8 C. B. 553), that the Courts, in dealing with this statutable provision, must be guided by the particular circumstances of each case, and not by any general rules.

BANKRUPTCY—ARRANGEMENT CLAUSES—REFUSAL TO ACCEPT COMPOSITION.

Tindall v. Hibberd, 5 W. R., C. P., 566.

Several cases have recently arisen out of the arrangement clauses of the Bankruptcy Consolidation Act, 1849.* The present action was brought by the creditor of a bankrupt, who had duly made an arrangement under the superintendence of the Court, in respect of a cause of action accruing before the bankruptcy, and the defendant pleaded the certificate mentioned in the Act. To this the plaintiff replied that the arrangement entered into was (among other things) that the defendant should pay 5*s.* in the pound, and that the plaintiff had not been so paid. And to this the defendant rejoined, that the 5*s.* in the pound had been tendered to the plaintiff and refused by him. To this rejoinder a variety of answers (by way of demurrer and surrejoinder) were placed by the plaintiff on the record; but the argument chiefly turned on the question whether it was essential to the validity and effect of the certificate given under the arrangement clauses, that every creditor should accept the composition which had been agreed to by the proper proportion of the creditors according to the Act. And it was held that this was not essential, for that otherwise an obstinate man would have it in his power to defeat the whole arrangement.

SERVICE OF RULE ON ATTORNEY—WHEN INSUFFICIENT.

Edwards v. The Kilkenny and Great Southern and Western Railway Company, 1 C. B., N. S., 409.

It was moved in this action to make absolute a rule for execution against a shareholder in the above company. The rule had not been served personally on the shareholder; but, on receiving notice of it, he referred it to his attorney, and the attorney, on receiving the rule, said no cause would be shown. The Court, however, said that service on the attorney would not do, for the statute required the rule to be served upon the party, or at his place of abode; and they, therefore, discharged the rule.

BASTARDY ORDER—SERVICE OF SUMMONS IN FOREIGN COUNTRY.

The Queen v. Lightfoot, 6 Ell. & Bl. 822.

This was an application to quash an order of affiliation and maintenance made at petty sessions in Yorkshire. The objection raised was, that the summons on the putative father to attend the magistrates had not been properly served; and it appeared that the defendant, being a British subject resident in Scotland at the time of the application against him, and with no place of abode in England, had been there personally served with the summons in time to have appeared on the day appointed for the hearing. This, however, he did not do either in person or by attorney, and the matter being gone into nevertheless, the order now appealed against was made. The judges of the Queen's Bench differed in opinion as to the sufficiency of the service in Scotland. Crompton, Coleridge, and Erle, JJ., thought it insufficient—the summons and service being in the nature of process, and of no force beyond England and Wales; and Scotland being in effect a foreign country for the purposes of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101 (under which the bastardy proceedings were had). On the other hand, Lord Campbell was of opinion that the summons having been personally served, had been duly served; for that otherwise great inconvenience and injustice might arise (particularly in the border counties) by the father residing in the Scotch parish for the purpose of defying the law, and throwing the burthen of maintaining the child on the mother. However, the majority of the judges holding a different opinion, the order was quashed.

RIGHT OF APPEAL UNDER 12 & 13 VICT. C. 92, S. 25.

The Queen v. The Justices of Warwickshire, 6 Ell. & Bl. 837.

One W. being convicted before two justices of cruel treatment of an animal, contrary to the provisions of 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, was adjudged to pay for such offence the sum of 2*s.* 6*d.* as a penalty, and the sum of 2*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* for costs, the latter sum to be paid to the prosecutor. Against this decision, W. gave notice of appeal, and entered into recognisances with two sureties to prosecute his appeal at the next general quarter sessions; but previously to their coming on, W. gave notice that he had abandoned the appeal, and died. The Court of Quarter Sessions, however, had made an order previously to his death for payment of the costs of the appeal; and the present was an application to the Court of Queen's Bench, on behalf of his bail, to be relieved from these costs. It was held by the Court that W. had no right to appeal, and, therefore, that the Court of Quarter Sessions had no jurisdiction to make any order for the costs thereof. The appeal given under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 25, against a decision of magistrates, applies only where the sum adjudged to be paid on conviction exceeds £2, and the sum "adjudged to be paid" refers to the sum in which the party is convicted, and does not include the costs. The bail were consequently relieved, as prayed for.

Professional Intelligence.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

A meeting of the managing committee was held on the 13th; the secretary reported that a statement of the proceedings of the last meeting and of the annual general meeting had been sent to the Law Times and to THE SOLICITOR'S JOURNAL, in accordance with the resolutions passed at the last meeting; that the publisher of the Law Times had written to say that the statement, excepting the last paragraph, could appear in the Law Times as an advertisement, but not otherwise; that the secretary had replied that he had no instructions to advertise the statement; that the proceedings had been inserted in THE SOLICITOR'S JOURNAL, but not in the Law Times.

An article from the Law Times of the 2nd May was read, containing a further attack upon the Association, which the editor represented as having been systematically perverted to personal purposes, and adding that he would be content to abide by the verdict of a committee of investigation consisting of members of the Association, two being appointed by himself.

Communications from provincial members to the effect that the article contained statements quite erroneous, and recommending the acceptance of the proposal for the appointment of a committee of investigation, were read.

The draft of a letter from the secretary to the editor of the Law Times was read, agreeing to the appointment of the proposed committee, and defining its objects; and the managing committee resolved that the same, when settled by a sub-committee, should be forwarded to the editor of the Law Times.

A further communication with the Incorporated Law Society, relating to the new scale of equity costs, was reported, and a reply was read, stating that nothing further had been done beyond the preparation of a case for the opinion of counsel as to the right of solicitors to recover interest in certain cases.

An article on the same subject, by one of the members of the committee, was also read; and the committee resolved that the writer be requested to prepare a communication to the Lord Chancellor on the matter.

The subject of costs on criminal prosecutions was further considered; and several communications—among which were letters from Mr. Mass, of Hull; Mr. Waters, of Winchester; the Hull Law Society; the Yorkshire Law Society; the Plymouth Law Society; the Suffolk Law Society, and the Justices Clerks' Society—were read, and it appeared that so far as the expenses of prosecutors and witnesses before magistrates were concerned, the Home Office had the matter in hand. With reference, however, to obtaining a fair and proper scale of costs in prosecutions, the committee resolved that it would be expedient to communicate with the Incorporated Law Society, the different local law societies, and the provincial members of the Association, and, after having agreed on a general scale, to take steps for the purpose of obtaining the sanction of the Home Secretary to its adoption throughout the kingdom, under the provisions of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55.

Communications between the managing committee and the Law Amendment Society in reference to a proposed bill for the amendment of the bankruptcy law were reported.

Letters were read from provincial members relating to the Report on Registration of Titles, and inquiring what course the committee intended to take in reference to any bill introduced into Parliament to carry out the plan propounded in the Report; and the committee resolved, with a view to assist them in arriving at a decision, to issue a circular inviting opinions and suggestions on the subject.

The committee considered a question of professional etiquette submitted by a provincial solicitor.

The following new members have joined the Association since the annual meeting held on the 15th April last.

EXAMINATION PRIZES.

We are informed, that, in order to promote and encourage the efficient study of the law, the Honourable Society of Clifford's Inn have resolved to give an annual sum of Twenty Guineas to provide one or more testimonials for such of the candidates as, in passing their examination during the year, for the purpose of being admitted on the roll of attorneys and solicitors, shall, in the opinion of the examiners, merit distinction. The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have been requested and empowered to apply this sum in the purchase of books for such candidates, or in any other manner they may deem suitable. This annual gift to be distinguished as "The Prize of the Honorable Society of Clifford's Inn."

This communication, we understand, has just been made by Joseph Arden, Esq., the Principal of Clifford's Inn.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.

The next meeting will be held on Monday, the 25th instant, at 8 o'clock p.m., the Hon. V. C. Sir John Stuart, President of the society, in the chair, when Mr. Fitzjames Stephen will read a paper on "The Interrogation of Persons accused of Crime." The society meets on the 2nd and 4th Monday of every month until the 4th Monday in July.

THE JUDGMENTS AND EXECUTIONS BILL.

Mr. Craufurd's determined efforts to have his Judgments and Executions Bill passed into law excite a good deal of interest, and no small amount of difference of opinion. For four successive sessions Mr. Craufurd has introduced his measure; and at one stage or another, that measure has hitherto been invariably defeated, or else abandoned. Mr. Craufurd is not, however, a man who is easily baffled in his favourite pursuit; and so much energy and perseverance as he has exhibited rarely fails, in the long run, to triumph over all difficulties. It seems that the second reading of his Bill has been carried by a considerable majority. The minority was, as usual, mainly composed of Irish members, who show on every occasion the strongest possible aversion to the measure, even at the hazard of calling forth from the English press strong animadversions and hints as to the disinterestedness of their opposition. Taking the list of Irish members who voted on the division, it will be found that one only supported the Bill, while all the rest opposed it. This unanimity is so very remarkable, that it seems to have puzzled the English journalists to account for it; and they can suggest no clue but this—that M. P.'s and others are afraid of giving their English creditors greater facilities for obtaining repayment of their debts. Now, a better reason can soon be found, if we inquire into the Irish laws relating to judgments. A judgment creditor in Ireland possesses very ample and extensive remedies against the property of his debtor. He can register his judgment in the Registry of Deeds Office against any specific lands belonging to the latter; and a judgment duly registered has all the legal effect and operation of a mortgage; and obtains by virtue of the Act a priority over all subsequent charges and dealings whatsoever. As the judgment creditor possesses such ample powers, the courts of law are very stringent in requiring personal service of process. If, however, Mr. Craufurd's Bill pass into a law, it will enable any person obtaining a judgment behind the back of the alleged debtor, under the lax process allowed by the Scotch law, to come over here, register his judgment, and obtain all the security of a mortgage for some demand which may probably have no genuine existence.

It must be clear, therefore, that to give to a judgment obtained in Scotland all the effect of one obtained in Ireland, will be unfair and highly objectionable. Scotch law is a perfectly distinct system, and should be for all purposes treated as such. As between England and Ireland the case is very different. As the laws of these two countries are almost identical, there can be no injustice in allowing a judgment creditor in one of them to proceed on his judgment against the person or property of his debtor on the opposite side of the channel. The only ground of objection that has been urged against the measure as it affects England and Ireland is this, that the costs occasioned by the double procedure will be lost to the legal profession. The absurdity of this argument must be apparent to any one who reflects that the injury (if it can be so called) will be perfectly reciprocal. On the whole, the attorneys in London will lose quite as much as the attorneys in Dublin. A large proportion of the landed gentry of Ireland spend most of their time in England; and many of these leave creditors here, who surely will not object to obtain increased facilities for enforcing payment from their absentee debtors; and in all these cases under the proposed measure, the judgments obtained in Ireland can be rendered available in England, without the expense and delay of further proceedings in the Superior Courts at Westminster. Of course a reciprocal advantage will be enjoyed by natives of Cheltenham or Harrowgate, against such estates in Ireland as they may discover to appertain to defaulters in their books. In this respect there will be a fair interchange of benefits; and any objection to the diminished costs of law proceedings can only emanate from the admirers of that unreformed system of pleading and practice which made the names of British courts of law odious, if not infamous, all over the civilised world. If a circuitous and costly mode of procedure is to be retained merely because it is circuitous and costly, let us revive the mysteries of "oyer" and "express colour" in pleading, and restore practice to what it was when the venerable Tidd indited his ponderous volumes.

CHANCERY—ROSSBOROUGH v. BOYSE.

This important case came before the Court on an application to have the venue changed from Wexford (where the large estates, the ownership of which is in dispute, are situate) to Dublin. The circumstances under which a new trial was directed have been already alluded to (No. 19, page 442, ante). On behalf of the defendant who sought to have the venue changed, it was urged that local prejudices were so strong as to render Dublin the more likely scene for an impartial trial; and that the latter city would be more convenient for the numerous witnesses, on both sides, who will have to come over from England. On the part of the plaintiff, it was urged by F. Fitzgerald, Q. C., that the existence of prejudice against the defendant in the county of Wexford was not sufficient to justify the Court in granting the motion; and that it had not been shown that any considerable inconvenience to the witnesses would result from the new trial taking place there.

The LORD CHANCELLOR stated that he felt bound to refuse the motion, no case having been cited in which the Court had changed the venue on general allegations of prejudice; and that a change of the venue might be construed into an aspersion of the jurors of Wexford—a class of persons who were, on the defendant's own admission, likely to decide the question at issue in an upright and conscientious manner. The former verdict, moreover, had been set aside by the House of Lords, not on the ground of any misconduct on the part of the jurors, but because the legal effect of the evidence had not been sufficiently explained to them by the presiding judge. As the case stood, it appeared to him that if the judgment of the House of Lords were to be followed, and the evidence given at the new trial were to be the same as was formerly given, it would become the duty of the judge to direct a verdict establishing Mr. Colclough's will. The motion would be refused; but, as it was to some extent warranted by the judgment of the House of Lords, refused without costs.

In the same case, an application was subsequently made on the part of the plaintiffs Rossborough and wife, that they might be permitted to remain in possession of the estates, or that a receiver might be appointed. This motion was refused with costs. An injunction will, therefore, issue to restore Mrs. Boyse (the devisee under the will) to the possession of the estates.

INCUMBERED ESTATES COURT.

In re M. Cooke—(Before Commissioner HARGREAVE).

In this case a very serious question arose between the "Irish Land Company," of Manchester, and Mr. W. Francis Eyre, of Paris. Both parties had placed implicit confidence in the late John Sadleir, M.P., and had advanced him considerable sums of money on the supposed security of incumbrances on the estates of M. Cooke. The question was, which party was to suffer by reason of certain frauds and forgeries committed by Sadleir in the course of his dealings with them? It appears that in the year 1852 Sadleir persuaded a General Smith, in whom were vested several family charges on the estate, to transfer them to him in consideration of a sum of £14,000, which was, however, considerably under their real value. Being then substantially the only creditor on the estates, Sadleir became the purchaser of them; but before completing his purchase he negotiated for the sale of these, with others of equal value, to the Land Company for a sum a little under £50,000, which sum the company paid over to him forthwith. By his consent, the company were then substituted as purchasers in the books of the court, taking credit as against the above-mentioned incumbrances, as to which they were to stand in his shoes, and which were duly transferred to them. The conveyance of the estate was not, however, completed; and now, on the final adjustment of the schedule, the Land Company—the primâ facie owners—were greatly astonished to find that the benefit of these charges was claimed by Mr. Eyre, to whom Sadleir had agreed to assign them—to whom Sadleir had handed forged deeds of transfer and collateral securities—and from whom the full value in cash had been received by that consummate deceiver. Commissioner Hargreave, in a very elaborate judgment, held, that the Land Company were entitled to the benefit of the charges to the extent of the £14,000 (and interest) paid by Sadleir to General Smith, but that to the residue of the charges Mr. Eyre's equity attached, of which the company were fixed with constructive notice through their solicitor, who was aware of a certain payments of interestto Mr. Eyre on the amount advanced by him to Sadleir.

Lynch, Q. C., Sherlock, and Murphy, appeared for the Land Company, with Morrogh and Kennedy, solicitors. Deasy, Q. C., Clarke, Q. C., and Hamilton, appeared for Mr. Eyre, with D. Mahony, and Bircham, Dalrymple, and Co., of London, solicitors.*

INCOME TAX.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—The question of your correspondent, "Enquirer," will be fully answered by quoting part of a letter written under the authority of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, addressed to Mr. Thomas A. Rush, and inserted in the Times newspaper of the 21st April last, as follows: "The dividends of the Turkish Loan fall within the rules of charge in schedule C. of the Income Tax Act, and according to such rules, the whole of the dividends which will become due on the 10th instant will be liable to assessment for the year commencing the 6th April, 1857, at the rate made payable for that year by the 20th Victoria, chap. 6—viz. 7*d.* in the pound—in the same manner as the whole of the half-year's dividends which will be due on the 5th of July next in respect of the Three per Cent. Consols." Any arrangement less favourable to holders of Three per Cent. Consols would be manifestly unjust, because, when the additional income tax, commencing from the 5th April, was imposed, the dividends in the following July were subjected to half-a-year's deduction at the increased rate of charge.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant, P.

Trial of Charles B. Huntington for Forgery. Prepared for publication by the Defendant's Counsel, from full Stenographic Notes taken by Messrs. ROBERTS and WARBURTON. New York. 1857.

The trial of C. B. Huntington for forgery—the report of which is now before us—occupied, in an extraordinary degree, the attention of New York some four months ago. The prisoner was a sort of Transatlantic Redpath, who suddenly emerged from poverty into a condition of the most extravagant luxury; and, after a few months, was tried and convicted on one out of no less than twenty-seven indictments, charging him with forgeries to the amount of £100,000 and upwards; and it was stated on his trial, and indeed made part of his defence, that his frauds had in point of fact reached a very much larger amount. There are many points of view in which the story is well deserving of attention; and such of our readers as have the and inclination to peruse a very thick and characteristically ill-bound and unpleasantly printed 8vo volume, will be well rewarded for their trouble. It would be foreign to the purpose of this journal to notice, in any detail, the moral and social aspects of the state of things which the report discloses; but it throws a light on the character of the administration of criminal justice in America, which is particularly instructive at a time when American law and lawyers are so often held up as patterns for our own imitation. We do not think that the proceedings in Huntington's case are by any means likely to confirm that impression. Whatever charges may be justly brought against English criminal law—and no doubt they are many—there can be no question at all that the general purity of its administration is quite above suspicion. The counsel for the Crown do not press for a conviction; the jury are not subjected to undue influences; and the judges exercise an effective control over the proceedings, and over the criticisms of the press, whilst the trial is pending. All these are no doubt very elementary, but they are also altogether indispensable, requisites for the due administration of the law; and we are sorry to say, that, if Huntington's trial is a fair specimen of American procedure, the United States cannot be said as yet to have attained fully to any one of them. No less than fifteen pages of the report are occupied by challenges to jurors, every one of whom was asked whether he had read accounts of the charges against the prisoner in the papers, and had formed or expressed any opinion upon their truth, and twenty-five of them were set aside on the ground that they had. The prisoner also exhausted his right of peremptory challenge. Even when thus carefully sifted, the jury were by no means protected from undue influences. The trial lasted for more than a fortnight, and the jurors separated every evening receiving an admonition from the judge not to read reports of the previous day's proceedings, or comments on them. The counsel assumed, as a matter of course, that this advice was disregarded; and the newspapers reflected on the conduct of the judge who gave it, in articles beginning with ironical regrets that the Star Chamber could not be revived, followed up by insinuations that a jury would be quite incompetent to discharge their duty properly unless they read the papers. The difficulty of securing impartiality under such circumstances is sufficiently obvious; but it would almost seem as if the counsel for the State considered such a state of mind as a very doubtful advantage. In opening the case against the prisoner, the district attorney (or public prosecutor) for the State of New York used the following language:—"This is a criminal action between the people of the State of New York and the prisoner at the bar. The people who are now thronging at yonder door—who are in this court-room—who are in this great metropolis—they are my clients—they are the plaintiffs. I deem it my duty to invite your attention to this distinction—that you may not forget the great plaintiff who is without in the sight of the unit defendant." Lord Coke tells us that when he was presented to Queen Elizabeth as "Your Majesty's Attorney qui pro dominâ reginâ prosequitur," she answered that she should wish the phrase to run "qui pro dominâ veritate prosequitur;" but it would seem that the people of New York are more exacting clients than the Queen of England.

The judge himself was reduced to playing a very undignified part in the proceedings, and would appear to have been treated with very little real respect by the counsel; for, besides taking eleven exceptions to his summing-up, they systematically excepted to his ruling throughout the whole trial; and as he had apparently no discretion about reserving the points, it is impossible to guess how long the final settlement of the question may have been delayed, if indeed it is not still pending. The most remarkable feature, however, in his conduct is, that he summed up exclusively upon questions of law, entirely omitting all reference to questions of fact; and when he announced his intention to take that course, the prisoner's counsel not only expressed his satisfaction, but said that he thought that judges ought to be forbidden by express enactment to give the jury any directions, or to lay before them any observations, on the bearings of the facts put in evidence. It is the obvious tendency of these views of the relative importance of the functions of judges and advocates to, make criminal trials mere matter of popular sentiment, than which no step can be more directly opposed to individual liberty.

It is not, however, to these illustrations of the general character of American Criminal Courts that Huntington's trial owes its principal interest even to lawyers. It is, beyond all comparison, the most remarkable instance that ever fell under our notice of the abuse of the defence of insanity. That Huntington committed the forgery for which he was indicted was proved beyond the possibility of doubt; and his own counsel declared, that, besides the forgeries for which he was indicted, he had committed others, amounting in all to the utterly incredible sum of £4,000,000; that, in addition to this, he had for some years been deeply engaged in getting up "bogus" or fictitious banks and cemetery companies, and that he had spent the produce of his frauds in the most frantic extravagance. From all this they argued that he had a sort of monomania for forgery; that "his brain was so organised" that he could not help getting up bubble companies, and forging acceptances: and that, for this reason, he was not a responsible agent, being "morally insane."

* This report is neccasarily meagre and defective, as the case could only be intelligibly stated by very far exceeding our limits.

Neither the judge nor the counsel on either side appear to us to have taken the true view of the subject of what is called moral insanity; for, whilst on the one side it was maintained that a person fully aware of the nature and consequences of his conduct, and capable of controlling his actions, might yet be irresponsible, the other side seems to have committed itself to the denial of the existence of a particular form of disease. It is remarkable that on this, as indeed on almost every other subject referred to in the trial, English cases were quoted as of the very highest authority; but, in our opinion, neither the counsel nor the judge perceived their true bearing. Both of them seem to have thought that the object of the law is to provide some definition of insanity, and to relieve all who fall within it from responsibility for their acts. In our opinion, no view of the law can be more completely false. Responsibility and sanity are by no means co-extensive. Many mad people are responsible, and many sane people are irresponsible. The legal doctrine is perfectly clear and consistent, and is simply this—that all persons are responsible for their actions who are not prevented by disease or weakness from knowing the difference between right and wrong, and who are voluntary agents. And it is only because it is strong evidence to show that one or the other of these conditions fails, that madness is any sort of excuse for crime. A madman stands on the same footing as an infant. Madness, like infancy, is evidence of irresponsibility, but it is not conclusive evidence of it. This principle is the only one which can keep the provinces of law and medicine distinct and apart; for if it be once assumed that all madmen are ipso facto irresponsible, the consequence will be that physicians, and not lawyers, will have to decide who is to be punished for crime, and who is not. Madness is a disease; and it is one of the great characteristics of modern medical investigations, that a vast number of connections have been discovered between diseases formerly considered quite independent of each other; and, as medical knowledge is enlarged, the old names constantly acquire new and more extensive meanings. This is peculiarly true of all diseases which affect the mind: many feelings which were formerly considered to arise entirely from peculiarities of character are now traced back to physical causes; nor do we feel at all inclined to doubt that a predisposition to commit particular crimes is frequently the result of disease; and if there is sufficient similarity, in the symptoms and treatment peculiar to such cases, to those which attend mere pronounced forms of madness, we do not know why physicians should not call them by that name. Criminal law is in no way interested in, or affected by, the circumstance. Even if the most extreme doctrines of materialism were proved to be true, and all crimes whatever were shown to be forms of disease, the discovery, however important in other respects, would be perfectly indifferent to criminal law. Its object is the prevention of crime, and it operates by fear; and fear is not destroyed by showing that it arises from physical causes. If committing murder is a mere symptom of disease, hanging is the appropriate remedy—punishment can be described in medical language as well as crime.

Where this extreme view is not maintained, the case is plainer. A man is equally bound to resist a wish to do wrong, from whatever cause it may arise. If his brain is so organised that he has a disposition to steal, that is no better excuse for stealing than the fact that his stomach is so organised as to incline him to eat. The true question is not whether his wishes are insane, but whether they are irresistible. Huntington's counsel maintained that his tendency to forge was "in its nature irresistible, though it might be resisted." When any one can explain what this state of mind is like, we shall be able to say how far it excuses crime; but, as at present advised, we should be inclined to say, by all means let men be aided in resisting such "tendencies," by punishing those who do not resist them.

There are some other peculiarities in Huntington's case which are interesting to English lawyers. Our readers will doubtless have a general recollection of that wilderness of absurdities from which we were happily delivered by the enactment which makes it unnecessary in indictments for forgery to charge an intent to defraud any particular person. It is curious to find that the whole of this obsolete law is still in full force in America. We must also remark on the extreme lenity of American sentences for mercantile crime. In this country, Huntington would infallibly have been transported for life; nor would his sentence have been at all too severe. In New York he was sentenced only to four years and ten months' imprisonment, which term was substituted for the full amount of five years, in order that "he might not come out in the winter."

PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, after giving a history of the unsuccessful attempts at legislation upon this subject from 1832 to his own Bill of last session, said, that, in the present Bill, he proposed that the judge of the Prerogative Court should be the first judge of the new Court of Probate, with a salary of £4,000, which was also the salary of the judge of the Court of Admiralty; and as that judge would receive a retiring allowance of £2,000 a-year, he proposed to award to the judge of the new Court of Probate a retiring allowance of the same amount. As disputed matters of fact would have to be determined by juries, there would be little work for the new judge to do; he therefore meant to propose, in another Bill, that the same judge should also be one of the judges of the Matrimonial and Divorce Court. Twenty years ago, Dr. Lushington had stated before a committee of the House of Commons that the whole Admiralty, testamentary, and matrimonial business might be perfectly well discharged by one judge, which opinion he still retained. He thought, therefore, he was justified in stating that the great probability was that one judge would be sufficient to discharge all the duties of the new court as well as of the Admiralty and Consistory Courts. When the office of judge of those Courts was abolished, he thought that the judge of the Court of Probate should be placed upon the same footing as to salary with the judges in Westminster-hall, and should receive £5,000 a-year; and when a vacancy occurred in the new court he proposed that the judge of the Court of Admiralty should also be the judge of the Court of Probate. He proposed that evidence should be taken in the new court viva voce, that the rules o evidence adopted in the common law courts should be acted upon in the Probate Court, and that all questions of disputed facts should be tried by a jury, unless the parties to the proceedings wished otherwise. He proposed that to this Court all contentious questions of probate should be referred; but that where property was sworn under £200 personalty, or £300 realty, the judges of County Courts should be empowered to try questions as to whether the testators were of sane mind, and whether the wills had been duly executed; and that the finding of such judges should be conclusive. With regard to probates of wills of persons in the country, he proposed to provide a means of enabling persons to prove wills which did not involve very large amounts in the various dioceses. With this object he proposed the establishment of thirty-six or thirty-seven districts, coinciding, as far as was practicable, with the existing diocesan districts. Of course, for this purpose, the registrars would be the officers of the Court of Probate, and not of the Ecclesiastical Courts, and they would have power to grant probate only in cases where there was no contest, and also only when it was sworn that the testators died within the limits of the districts, and that their property was below the value of £1,500. Under the existing system, if a will was proved in a particular diocess, and the testator possessed property out of that diocess, such probate was absolutely void. If there was any property in a particular diocess, and, nevertheless, the will was proved in the Prerogative Court, such will was not absolutely void, but was voidable. To obviate the present anomalous state of things, he proposed that any persons who chose might prove wills in the London court, whether the testators died in the country or not. He also proposed that every month there should be remitted to the London court from each of the provincial districts a list of all the wills proved in such districts, together with a copy of each will, which should be kept under proper direction in the Probate Court of London. He also proposed that at certain stated periods lists of all the wills proved in London, with the names of the testators, the executors, and such other particulars as experience might suggest, should be printed, with proper indexes, and transmitted to all the district registrars, and to certain places where they might be conveniently consulted. He also proposed that at the Probate Office in London there should be a department in which all persons who thought fit to do so might deposit their wills, so that at their deaths their surviving relatives might have no difficulty in knowing where to find them. He also proposed, whenever there was any contest about the validity of a will, on the ground that the testator was insane, or that the will had not been executed with due formality, that the Court should cite not only those who were interested in contesting the validity of the will as to personal estate, but likewise those interested in the real estate, so that that which was substantially the same question as to both should be decided once for all. There was another minor provision which he was desirous of explaining. At present, whenever it was necessary to prove a devise in the common law or equity courts, the original will must be produced, which was frequently only a matter of form. He therefore proposed, that whenever a lawsuit was going on in which it was necessary to give evidence of the devise of the real estate, notice might be given by one party to the other that he meant to rely on the probate, and that that should be primâ facie evidence of the devise, unless, on the other hand, notice should be given that the original will must be produced. In such case it should be in the discretion of the judge to decide which party should bear the costs of the production of the original will. As several persons would necessarily be deprived of office under the present Bill, he proposed that they should be compensated, unless they should be appointed to corresponding offices under the new arrangement. In dealing with persons who had devoted themselves for many years to the discharge of their duties, to remove them without some compensation would be extremely hard—and he believed such a course would not be in conformity with the practice. He proposed that every officer should be paid a salary except the district registrars—and what would be the services to be rendered could not be told—whose remuneration should continue to be made, as it had heretofore been, without complaint, by fees to be settled by the judge of the court, assisted by the Lord Chancellor and a judge of the common law courts. As to the proctors, he proposed to retain them, providing at the same time against exorbitant charges by fixing their fees by authority and subjecting their costs to taxation, as in the courts of common law. He saw no necessity for letting in any other class of practitioners, and he proposed, in conformity with the recommendation of the commissioners, and with the two petitions which had been presented by Lord Overstone—one from upwards of a hundred of the first merchants in London, and another from an equal number of the most respectable firms of solicitors—to continue the proctors as at present. Having thus briefly stated the outline of the measure, and expressed his readiness to discuss the details in committee, his lordship concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

The Bishop of BANGOR declared that the present diocesan courts discharged their duties in a very satisfactory manner, and that the change proposed with regard to them would cause a great deal of confusion and trouble in the country.

The Bishop of LONDON, in supporting the bill, said that while abundant provision was made for the various offices, those holding ecclesiastical offices were overlooked; and he hoped this defect would be remedied in committee.

Lord CAMPBELL said he would cordially give his vote for the second reading of the bill. In the bill of last session he had been desperately afraid that a disputed probate would involve individuals in an interminable Chancery suit. He rejoiced, however, to find that his learned friend now avoided the very appearance of approaching the Court of Chancery. It seemed to him that the Court of Probate would now be established in a most satisfactory manner. But there was one point which, as he conceived, touched the dignity of his brother judges in the common law courts. It was proposed that this new judge of the Court of Probate should take precedence immediately after the Vice-Chancellors, and, therefore, before all the puisne judges. Now, he thought, this ought not to be. The new judge was ultimately to receive £5,000, the same salary as the puisne judges, and he did not consider it would be any disparagement to him if he took precedence among the puisne judges according to seniority.

The Bill was then read a second time.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of this Bill. Having traced the history of the marriage laws for a long series of years, he referred to the Royal Commission appointed in 1850 (on which he had mainly based his measure) to take the subject into consideration. He proposed to create a competent tribunal to do that which could at present only be effected through the agency of three, and that at great cost to the parties. That tribunal would investigate the case once for all. Evidence would be taken vivâ voce before a jury, except in special cases; and the court would consist of the Lord Chancellor, one of the Chief Justices, and the judge of the Court of Probate. He proposed that the wife, equally with the husband, should be entitled to a divorce à vinculo matrimonii in cases where there had been incestuous adultery, or where bigamy had taken place. A clause had been introduced into the former Bill prohibiting the intermarriage of the adulterer and adultress. This clause he thought to be fraught with evil, and therefore he had not reintroduced it. An action brought by a husband for damages for criminal conversation should be grounded on a divorce first obtained. Where there had been a divorce à mensâ et thero, for cruelty or unwarrantable desertion, alimony should be paid to the wife as now; but it would be placed, if the Court thought fit, in the hands of a trustee. In the case of such a divorce the wife should stand on the same footing as an unmarried woman; her property should be her own, and her husband should have no right to touch it.

The Archbishop of CANTERBURY said that he should vote for the second reading, but would oppose the clause which permitted the guilty parties in cases of adultery to be united in marriage.

Lord LYNDHURST thought that the provisions of the Bill were of the most simple kind; and he could conceive no tribunal better calculated to carry out its object than that which had been proposed. He strongly remarked upon the great inequality which the bill left between the two sexes—no extent of adultery on the part of the husband entitling the wife to a divorce; and he contended that where a man deserted his wife wilfully that should entitle her to a divorce à vinculo matrimonii. He also objected to that part of the bill which made a divorce necessary before an action could be brought for criminal conversation, inasmuch as a Roman Catholic, not being able to obtain a divorce, could not bring such an action; and he trusted that this and the other defect would be remedied in committee.

Lord WENSLEYDALE said that he would not oppose the Bill, but thought it required many amendments.

The Earl of MALMESBURY said that he should propose in committee the reintroduction of the clause to prevent the intermarriage of the adulterer and adultress.

The Duke of NORFOLK declared that it was the universal feeling of the Roman Catholic Church that marriage were indissoluble. He would oppose the Bill at every stage.

Lord CAMPBELL supported the Bill. He asked whether it was intended to apply to Ireland.

Viscount DUNGANNON moved that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months.

Lord REDESDALE supported the amendment.

The LORD CHANCELLOR in reply said, that, as a matter of course, a similar Bill would be introduced for Ireland.

Clause 1 was agreed to.

On Clause 2 being read,

Lord ST. LEONARDS moved an amendment to strike out the words "testament and" and "others," in order to prevent any alteration in the law as to real estate.

Lord ST. LEONARDS has given notice that he will draw the attention of the House to the state of the law in equity charging trustees for breaches of trust; and to propose an amendment of the law for the relief of trustees acting bonâ fide and without any benefit to themselves. (No day named.)

DIFFERENT CLASSES OF DEBTS.

In answer to Mr. G. CLIVE,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he had often thought that the difference between specialty and simple contract debts in the administration of the estates of deceased persons should be abolished. That distinction existed in courts of law but not of equity. It was his intention, immediately after the Whitsuntide recess, to introduce a bill to remedy that and some other evils.

FRAUDULENT BREACHES OF TRUST BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved for leave to introduce a Bill to make fraudulent breaches of trust criminally punishable. He said that he had undertaken a task of no ordinary responsibility, because, while the necessity of such a measure had long been felt, all had admitted the difficulty and had shrunk from the duty of framing it; and because he proposed to pass an Act which should affect in a manner entirely novel to our laws one of the most ordinary relations of life. This measure was brought in to meet an acknowledged defect in which our law stood in contrast with the jurisprudence of every other civilised country. He knew no code in Europe in which fraudulent breaches of trust were not held to be proper subjects of criminal interference. But in our law there was this peculiarity, that fraud or theft when accompanied by breach of trust, was divested of its criminal character. If a man stole £500 he would be punished by the criminal law; but if a man upon his death-bed called in a friend, and told him that he had appointed him executor to his will, and committed to him all his property for the benefit of his widow and children, and the friend accepted the trust, proved the will, and then robbed the widow and the orphans of their property, the law said that he was not a criminal, but a debtor. But the anomaly did not rest there. Our ordinary tribunals refused to recognise the act as creating a debt; and, adding mockery to the injury they had sustained, told them that they must go to the Court of Chancery. That was the evil with which he proposed to deal. Our law had never been happy in general definitions. It confined itself, as did our Acts of Parliament, to dealing with a vast number of instances; but we never attempted to meet an evil by a comprehensive definition, which should accurately define the offence, and leave particular instances to fall within its scope. Our common law refused, save in only one or two instances, to recognise the ordinary distinction between trustee and cestui que trust, and accordingly if property were committed to a trustee, our law, founding itself upon our definition of theft, said, "How can a man take away, how can he carry away, from himself? He is already in lawful and complete possession, therefore he is unable to commit a theft." Observe the difference between the jurisprudence of England and that of Scotland. In Scotland, theft might be defined thus—Fraudulenta convertatio rei alienæ invito domino. Our law, however, said that trust property was not res aliena, but res sua, and, therefore, a fraudulent trustee did not take the property of another, but only that which was legally his own. He had, in the bill which he was asking leave to introduce, framed several clauses to meet the different forms of breaches of trust. He would, in the first place, deal with the fraudulent conversion by a trustee of the property committed to his charge. Now, it was essential that there should be trustees, and also that the honest, well-meaning trustee should be protected in the discharge of his duty, and the dishonest one discountenanced and punished. Great difficulties existed with regard to the performance of his duty by a trustee; and in introducing a measure to make breaches of trust criminally punishable, it was necessary to take great care that a trustee should not be liable to be dragged into a criminal court and made the subject of a public examination without sufficient cause, but merely to gratify a feeling of passion or revenge on the part of the cestui que trust; and he had thought it necessary to introduce into the Bill a particular clause to guard against the possibility of that evil, which enacted that no proceeding or prosecution should be commenced against a trustee without the previous sanction of some one of the judges of one of the courts at Westminster or in Ireland, or of the Attorney-General. That provision was analogous to the provision in the Act for the abolition of arrest for debt, which enacted that a person might be arrested for debt upon an order made by a judge in chambers upon affidavits that the debtor was about to leave the country. The next question to which he would beg the attention of the House was as to the nature of the trust a breach of which should be rendered criminally punishable. Breaches of trust were of various kinds, and of which he adduced a variety of instances. In addition to direct trusts there were also what were called in legal phraseology resulting trusts,—that was to say, trusts remaining upon property after the direct trusts had been satisfied. Now, if a trustee, after satisfying the direct trust, found that he had a surplus and applied it to his own benefit, it would be a violation of the resulting trust, and ought to be punished, for he must be well aware that the property was not his. There were, however, constructive trusts, which were trusts created by the law itself, and, being so, they might arise without the knowledge of the trustee; and therefore he did not propose to make breaches of that description of trusts criminally punishable. Those were the general provisions of the Bill which related to one part of the subject,—namely, property held by one person for the benefit of another; but he had thought it right not to stop there. There were other breaches of trust of a more dangerous character, because of more extended influence, committed by persons who did not stand in exactly the relation of a trustee, and which required the introduction of some particular law, in order to meet delinquents who at present might remain untouched. He alluded to those persons who, in the prosecution of those great undertakings which were almost peculiar to this country, had formed companies and had placed themselves in the position of directors or managers of those companies. In those cases, in which such persons fraudulently and openly appropriated sums of money, there could of course be no doubt as to their liability to prosecution; but these appropriations were for the most part much too cleverly executed to render it necessary that they should have recourse to a proceeding so clumsy as a direct and manifest fraud. Their appropriations of money were, as the House was well aware, effected through the medium of false accounts and fraudulent representations. He had therefore introduced into the Bill a series of clauses under whose operation the act of keeping false accounts, of making false entries, or disguising the nature of those transactions by means of untrue representations, should be made criminal. He had also framed two other clauses, which would embrace in their operation that extensive system of fraud which was produced through the medium of false representations, coupled with acts to give a colour to those representations, such as fraudulent statements of the affairs of a company, or the payment of dividends out of a fictitious capital. Whether the law as it stood was or was not sufficient to meet such cases, there could be no harm whatsoever in making the particular mode of robbery to which he referred subject to direct criminal prosecution. While speaking upon that point, he might perhaps be allowed to advert to an answer which he had given to a question of a hon. gentleman, whether he would not institute criminal proceedings against certain persons who were concerned in transactions by which the public mind had, of late, been much occupied. Although he was not then prepared to state to the House that he would certainly institute such prosecution, he had since made himself acquainted with the nature of the case, and having read the documents which had been laid before him by the solicitor to the assignees, he had now no hesitation in saying that he would try, without a moment's delay, whether the law, as it now stood, was not strong enough to meet that case. He had further to state that the Bill proposed to deal not merely with the trustees, directors, and managers of companies, but also with assignees of bankrupts and insolvents, to whose case the same principle would be extended as to the former class. With reference to bankers and agents, the law now stood in the position which he was about to state. The Act of 42 Geo. 3 (the introduction of which measure had been occasioned by frauds committed by a stockbroker named Walsh), so far as agents, brokers, and bankers were concerned, was limited altogether to meet the case in which the instructions to the agent happened to have been given in writing; and it excluded trustees, mortgagees, and other persons occupying positions of that description from its operation. It had been succeeded by the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, which, while it introduced certain amendments into the wording of the Act, had made but little substantial alteration—so far as related to the particular subject of his remarks—in its provisions. But the Bill which he had framed proposed to extend the law to all cases of property committed to the charge of agents, although they might not have received any instructions in writing. The next subject to which he would allude was one to which he would invite the particular attention of the House. He might first of all state, that he unquestionably recognised that principle of the English law which provided that no man should be put upon his trial and found guilty upon evidence procured from his own confession made in a civil proceeding. That was a principle which should, in his opinion, be preserved, and he had, therefore, continued the exemption from liability to criminal prosecution, on the ground of evidence given before a civil tribunal in a civil case; but he did not propose to include within the scope of that exemption the extraordinary provision contained in the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, to the effect that a person who had become fraudulently possessed of property should not have a voluntary confession made in any proceedings instituted against him in a court of bankruptcy or insolvency made available in his case for the purpose of a criminal prosecution. There were in the bill other clauses providing that criminal liability should not be permitted to interfere with the civil rights of the party. There was also another clause which provided that in the case in which a civil suit had been instituted against a trustee to recover property which he had fraudulently appropriated, no criminal proceeding should be taken during the progress of that suit without the leave of the judges before whom it happened to be pending. Those were the principal features of the Bill. And he, in conclusion, expressed a hope that the present session might be signalised by such an instalment of legal reform as would remove a great opprobrium to our jurisprudence, and would lead to an improved state of things, while it tended to place our legislation on a more respectable footing than that upon which it now stood.

Mr. MALINS said, that he had long been of opinion that breaches of trust under aggravated circumstances should be rendered liable to criminal prosecution; and he might add, that the present Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas had, when Attorney-General, introduced a Bill by which it was intended to carry out objects similar to those which his hon. and learned friend had in view. It would require the greatest care and all the assistance which hon. and learned gentlemen on both sides of the House could give the Attorney-General to make the measure as effective as possible in punishing fraudulent trustees and protecting the honest against being treated as criminals when they had acted from the best and purest motives.

Mr. HADFIELD hoped the Attorney-General would be cautious in adopting extreme measures with regard to trustees. It was already one of the most difficult things to get suitable trustees to act. The office of trustee frequently involved greater cares and anxieties than those involved in a man's own personal affairs, and, considering the enormous sums which they were frequently called upon to pay out of their own pockets, he doubted whether, as a body, trustees did not lose more money than was misappropriated and perverted to their own use by the dishonest class of trustees.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in reply to Mr. Napier, said that the Bill would apply both to Ireland and Scotland.

Leave was then given to bring in the Bill.

INSOLVENT JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL asked leave to bring in a bill to amend the Acts of Parliament under which public companies were liable to be made bankrupt; and also to amend the Winding-up Acts. The spirit of the enactment he proposed was precisely similar to one introduced last session, with the exception that it would apply to banks and insurance companies. There at present existed a great conflict with respect to the manner of obtaining a remedy in case of insolvency, which might be done under a fiat of bankruptcy or by winding up under the Winding-up Acts. If a joint-stock bank became insolvent, there were, of course, two things to be effected: There was the payment of its creditors; and there was also the task of deciding the proportion each shareholder should contribute to make up the deficiency. All this might have been committed to one tribunal; but if a public bank became bankrupt the winding up of the estate might belong to the Court of Bankruptcy, and the deciding on the proportion to be contributed by the individual shareholders might devolve upon the Court of Chancery, under the Acts of 1848 and 1849. A conflict had in this manner arisen between the two jurisdictions of Bankruptcy and Chancery, of which there had lately been a most painful and distressing illustration in the case of the Royal British Bank. In that case all the separate Courts of Chancery had been occupied in determining the conflicting claims of the official manager under the Winding-up Acts, and of the official assignee under the subsequent fiat. In the case of the British Bank, the creditors were 6,000 in number, and the shareholders 300; and such was the state of the law, that every creditor had a separate right of action against every shareholder; and there might thus be 6,000 times 300 suits, and the accumulated costs of the innumerable actions must be added to the original loss. He would therefore propose a remedy of the following description: Let an advertisement be inserted in the public prints calling the shareholders together, and enabling them to appoint one or more of their number for the purpose of making some arrangement with the persons to whom they were liable, and for the purpose of obtaining the amount of contributions from the shareholders that might be requisite for the payment of the debts. Immediately after that advertisement appeared, he proposed to protect the shareholders from their present liability to actions, provided that they submitted themselves to such terms as the Court might think right. At present, the shareholders were placed in a position of great difficulty, for, while the property of the company was taken away from them by bankruptcy, they were liable for the company's debts. He, therefore, proposed that the commissioner should have power to give protection to the shareholders. One provision of the bill was, that a certain proportion of the creditors should have power to bind the whole in accepting any composition, and that when such an agreement was come to, the shareholders might apply for and obtain protection from individual suits. These provisions would be applicable to all existing as well as future companies. They supplied an important omission in the bill of last year.

Mr. MALINS referred to a similar bill which he had brought in last year, and which, if passed, would have saved the public from great calamity. He suggested one improvement in the measure submitted by the Attorney-General, that, when a company was brought under the jurisdiction of the court, the right of the creditors to bring actions against individual shareholders should immediately cease, as in the case of an ordinary bankruptcy. To prevent shareholders absconding to avoid their liability, he would provide for stopping them by a judge's order, as might now be done with an ordinary debtor. Had not the right of suing shareholders existed in the case of the Royal British Bank, the whole affair might have been wound-up, the calls made, and the debts discharged, long ago. The bill which he introduced last session would have provided for this.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he thought the bill would carry out the view expressed by Mr. Malins.

Sir H. WILLOUGHBY wished to know how the fees were to be dealt with.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, he hoped that a measure would shortly be brought in on the subject of bankruptcy and insolvency, by which the question of fees would be dealt with. He did not venture to deal with that matter in the present bill.

The resolution was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The House of Commons seems to have come to a resolution to lose no time in getting through the business. Ten committees on opposed Private Bills met during the past week, and five more are fixed for next week. There are some questions which are brought out regularly session after session, like an old play with new properties—and amongst other old favourites, "Broad and Narrow Guage," the unfathomable "Liverpool Dock story," "The Drainage Districts Bills," and "The Mineral District Railways," such as Taff Vale, Rhymney Valley, &c., are not forgotten.

The broad and narrow guage fight is between the old competitors the South Western and Great Western Railway Companies, although the latter company do not appear under their own colours, but under the title of the "Southampton, Bristol, and South Wales Railway Company." The two companies, Great Western and South Western, have stations side by side at Basingstoke and at Salisbury, and it is understood, from the statement of counsel in opening the case, that amicable arrangements had been entered into for the interchange of traffic at Salisbury and that the contracts were all but completed for avoiding the inconvenience of a break of guage there. The Southampton Bristol and South Wales Railway Company however sprung up at the moment previous to signing the treaty, and Mr. Brunel, the Great Western engineer, being concerned for the new company also, left all arrangements to take their chance at the last moment, and war has broken out again. This at least was stated by the South Western counsel. The object of the Southampton Bristol and South Wales Bill is to continue the broad guage line from Salisbury to Southampton, although there is a narrow guage line at present accommodating that district; and a short line of four miles is projected by the South Western Company for shortening the distance between those points.

The South Western Company are being heard first on their own case, and in opposition to Mr. Brunel's line, and it is expected that many interesting points may arise owing to the question of railway competition forming one very prominent feature, and the duties of railway companies in carrying out exchange of traffic forming another.

It must have been a familiar sight to the habitués of the committee lobby for the last twelve years to see one of the largest rooms crammed year after year with commercial men, whose chief occupation appeared to be gazing on the monster cartoons which surround the walls; and this amusement generally continued for a space extending over two months. The old story and the accustomed sight have commenced de novo and the "Liverpool Dock Committee Room," exhibits the same faces, and will probably bring to light an oft-told tale, inasmuch as the evidence taken before committees for eleven years! past has been referred to them. It must not be supposed that the Liverpool people have wasted time or money, as it is believed that they have contrived to settle commercial arrangements by private legislation, step by step, which will be beneficial to the whole civilised world as regards the Port of Liverpool.

The Nene Drainage will probably come on next week, and is more immediately interesting to parties situate in districts which are dependent on private enterprise for drainage. The bill is greatly opposed, as it is not uncommon for landowners to be very jealous on the taxation question. There are twenty-three petitioners against the bill.

A group of Bills, which will involve the toll question to a great extent, is the mineral group before mentioned. There is an Ely Tidal Harbour Bill, which involves a desperate competition between the Bute and Clive interests at Cardiff—the former family being much interested in the Bute Docks, and the latter in the new harbour. Incidental to this question, the tolls in the Rhymney Valley and Taff Vale will come under discussion. Group 1, which consists of a metropolitan group, is not yet appointed. The group consists of Bills for making short lines in and about London, including one in South London, and a short cut from Richmond to Kew.

The Kent Railway Companies, "like the troubled sea," are never at rest, and the East Kent Company, who own the new direct authorised line from Rochester to Dover, are endeavouring to assert their entire independence by carrying a line from Rochester to London, without using the South Eastern Company. The South Eastern Company have a competing line, and there must be another contest.

These Bills are not yet appointed.

Money Market.

CITY, Friday Evening.

The funds have been more variable during this week than for some time past. On Monday there was improvement both in English and Foreign securities. Subsequently the tendency has been downward, resulting in a decline of ¼ per cent. in consols. Foreign Securities were proportionably heavy. The demand for discount has been very active for the purpose of carrying over accounts to the next settlement of consols. Generally, the demands for money have been numerous but without any great degree of pressure. The Government brokers continue their daily purchases of £30,000 exchequer bills. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 16th May, 1857, which we give below it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,244,925 being a decrease of £96,665, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £9,853,609, showing an increase of £45,482 when compared with the previous return.

It has been stated that the directors of the Bank of France are engaged in making fresh purchases of gold, but the fact is not clearly ascertained. A very heavy failure has occurred in the Paris money market. The defaulter, M. Thurneyssen, is a family connection of M. Pereire, the President of the Crédit Mobilier.

In Mark Lane there was on Monday a further decline in the price of grain, since which more steadiness has been apparent. From the country, reports have been variable. At Manchester, Birmingham, and other markets where large consumption exists, there has been some recovery. In the agricultural districts prices have followed the decline in Mark Lane. Arrivals from abroad have been tolerably large at Liverpool. If the opinion should prevail that the price of grain is likely to be too much depressed, such fears will be relieved by a statement lately published, to the effect that, in spite of free trade, and the importation of forty million quarters of wheat, the average price during the ten years ending with 1856, has been but one shilling a quarter less than during the ten years which ended with 1846, and two shillings greater than in the ten years which ended with 1836, when protection was in its greatest strength.

The last accounts from India and China have imparted fresh activity to the demand for silver and gold for exportation to the East. The amount of the precious metals exported from this country to India and China in the present year, up to the end of April, is £5,553,240. During the corresponding period of last year the amount was £3,202,984, and the excess of this year is believed to have increased during the present month. Previous intelligence, together with the state of the exchange, led to the conclusion that further exportation would not be in demand, but this view is not confirmed by recent arrivals. Silver is in active request for shipment to India, and about £200,000 in gold is said to have been drawn from the Bank, to supply the demand in Scotland. These circumstances make it appear that the drain of bullion, and the high rate of interest which have so long ruled the money market in this country, are still in operation. Reports from the maufacturers of cotton and wool represent great flatness to exist in their trades. Since the late change of wind, the importation of cotton at Liverpool has been very large. If the price declines in consequence of this large supply, it is probable that operations at Manchester will become more active.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, MAY 30, 1857.

THE JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

The Bill which has been introduced by the Attorney-General nominally for the amendment of the Winding-up Acts, but mainly for the purpose of legalising the intended compromise in the case of the Royal British Bank, was read a second time without opposition on Thursday evening. The Attorney-General professed his readiness to consider any amendments which might be suggested in committee, and as very considerable alterations will be needed to make the measure at all satisfactory as a piece of permanent legislation, it is to be hoped that the Bill will not be hurried through its stages without full consideration.

The mischief to be remedied is notorious enough; and probably there is not a member in the House, or a lawyer out of it, who would say that the law ought to remain in its present anomalous condition. It has been denounced in the strongest terms from the bench, and popular feeling has approved the outcry against the slovenly and disgraceful legislation which has been the means of preventing a satisfactory settlement of the demands of the creditors of the swindling bank.

The existing law may be very shortly summed up: The shareholders in a joint-stock bank are individually liable to make good every farthing of the debts of the concern. By the Joint-Stock Companies Act, every creditor is entitled to take proceedings, under which he can issue execution for the full amount of his debt, against any one of the shareholders. Under the Winding-up Acts, the shareholders may get their liabilities relieved by the application of the corporate assets to the debts of the concern so far as they may suffice for the purpose, and may have the remaining deficit supplied by means of rateable calls upon the various members. At one time the Courts of law seemed to consider that the pendency of winding-up proceedings was a sufficient reason for withholding their assent to executions against individual shareholders. Unfortunately, though no doubt correctly in point of law, they have now adopted the practice of permitting executions to be levied notwithstanding that the official manager may be in course of getting in contributions, with every prospect of being able to provide 20*s.* in the pound. The consequence of this, in the case of the Royal British Bank, together with the litigation which arose out of the bankruptcy, has been, that shareholders have been put to flight, and that the excessive eagerness with which some creditors have pressed on their remedies has rendered it rather problematical whether the official manager will be able to raise a sufficient sum by calls to pay off the whole liabilities. The law has thus worked ruin to the shareholders who have remained to face their liability, and has, at the same time, seriously diminished, if not altogether destroyed, the prospect which the creditors would otherwise have had of obtaining full satisfaction, through the medium of the Winding-up Acts.

This is the first evil which the Legislature has to repair, and to which the bill of the Attorney-General is directed. The proposal is, that representatives of creditors shall be elected in the winding-up proceedings, or that that function shall be performed by the assignees in cases where there may have been a previous adjudication of bankruptcy. Very extensive powers of binding all parties to a compromise are to be conferred upon them, and no execution is thereafter to issue against individual shareholders without the leave of the court which has the conduct of the liquidation. This arrangement seems to lean as unfairly towards the side of the debtors as the existing law does in the other direction, and the result would generally be, that the creditors, being deprived of their compulsory power, would be compelled to submit to a compromise, even in cases where the shareholders were well able to pay in full. If the members of a defaulting company which has commenced business on the principle of unlimited liability are to be relieved from the pressure of individual executions, some provision should be introduced either requiring them to give ample security for the payment of calls in the winding-up, or, in default, rendering all dispositions of their property fraudulent and void as against the official manager. There ought also to be a clause, as suggested by Mr. Malins, to enable creditors to arrest any shareholder who may be about to abscond, and also summary powers to prevent a fraudulent removal of property. It is right enough to relieve the debtors from the harassing process which the law now allows; but at the same time care should be taken that their property may be forthcoming, so far as necessary, for the purpose of meeting the calls which may be assessed on each particular contributory. The bill as it stands does not provide this security, and we hope that the point will not be neglected in committee.

A more serious mischief is the conflict of jurisdiction between the Courts of Chancery and Bankruptcy, which the Government Bill leaves without a remedy. Until last year it was generally supposed that the Winding-up Acts had by implication repealed the statute under which a company might be declared bankrupt. At any rate that Act had remained a dead letter until it was unluckily revived in the case of the Royal British Bank. The effect has been to squander £17,000 in establishing the privilege of the Court of Bankruptcy to distribute the assets which would otherwise have been divided by the official manager. At the same time it is found necessary to continue the winding-up proceedings, for the sake of raising the contributions which the Court of Bankruptcy has no power to levy. In many winding-up cases which occurred before that of the British Bank, as, for example, in Mr. Boyd's Australian bubble, enormous sums were raised in liquidation, which certainly never would have been got in if the struggle between the Courts had occurred in those cases, and there is every reason to believe, that, had the matter been allowed to go on in the ordinary course, the depositors in the Royal British Bank would have recovered 20*s.* in the pound. It is obvious, indeed, that the whole liquidation ought to be in the hands of one Court. There is no earthly reason why an official assignee should distribute the assets of the corporation, while an official manager has the task of dividing the amount which may be raised by calls. The extent of the calls must depend on what the assets may realise; and it is clear that nothing but cost and confusion can arise from the intervention of rival jurisdictions in the liquidation of the same estate. It is clearly, therefore, the duty of the legislature to prevent such conflicts in future, and the only remaining question is which Court should be employed. The main objection to the winding-up procedure is, that it gives the creditors no voice in the matter, and that the official manager may be as dilatory as he pleases. The remedy for this is to associate with him a representative of the creditors, and this is one of the provisions of the Government Bill.

The objections to the bankruptcy jurisdiction are more serious. The delicate business of settling lists of contributories and enforcing calls, is one for which the Court at Basinghall Street has not the requisite machinery, and which is altogether foreign to its ordinary business. If it is the better Court for the purpose, by all means let the whole jurisdiction of the Chancellor be transferred to it; but we can see no excuse for allowing the two Courts to run races for the possession of an estate after the unseemly fashion exhibited in the recent struggle. The Attorney-General's Bill, however, leaves this absurdity untouched, only so far mitigating the evil as to make the assignees by virtue of their office the representatives of the creditors in the winding-up. This is a blot which ought not to be suffered to remain.

ATTORNEY'S LIABILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE.

This branch of the law must always be of much interest to our readers, and at the present time has been brought into prominence by the case of Mr. Chapman, of which we spoke last week. We therefore think it a fitting opportunity to enter at some length into a consideration of the reported decisions on the subject, which—whatever be the ultimate result of the rules now coming on for argument—are well deserving of serious attention.

In order to take a comprehensive view of the legal position in which attorneys and their clients stand to each other in reference to the manner in which the former act professionally for the latter, it is necessary to separate carefully those cases in which the attorney seeks to recover from those in which the client is the plaintiff. The relationship of attorney and client may give rise to both causes of action; in both of which the law throws the burthen of proof upon the plaintiff. Hence the two distinct classes of cases to be found in the books upon this subject: the one relating to actions by attorneys on their bills of costs; the other to actions by clients to recover damages alleged to have been suffered from negligence in the conduct of their concerns.

Now, with regard to the action for costs, the rules which the law lays down are few and simple. In most cases, moreover, they work equitably; but there are instances in which their application has been harsh upon the attorney. The law says that an attorney who charges a client must show that he has done something for his money in his behalf of a useful description, and that if it can be shown by the plaintiff that work for the employer was in fact done, the burden of proof then becomes shifted, and the client must show the utter uselessness of what he is charged for. It is on this last point, of course, that most of the reported cases turn, and the decisions here are satisfactory. Thus, in Templer v. M'Lachlan (2 N. R. 136), it was laid down that negligence cannot be set up by the client unless it were such that he thereby lost all possibility of benefit from the work done. So in Johnson v. Alston (A.D. 1808, 1 Camp. 176), the defence set up was, that the client had directed his attorney to plead in abatement the non-joinder of a co-defendant, which had not been done. But Lord Ellenborough very properly answered, that, by the client's own confession, the plea was only for delay, and therefore he had no ground for complaint. So in Dax v. Ward (A.D. 1816, 1 Stark. 409), the defence set up was, that the plaintiff, having been employed to bring an action, sued out the writ in a name alleged by the defendant in such action to be the wrong one, who consequently pleaded in abatement; that the plaintiff as attorney replied that he was known by the name in which he was sued; and that the plaintiff himself was not present at the trial, nor was a witness he had subpœnaed to prove the replication. Here also the same judge held, that, as there were other circumstances conducing to the loss of the cause independent of the conduct of the attorney—viz. the absence of the witness—the defence set up was no answer to the action. In Pasmore v. Birnie (A.D. 1817, 2 Stark. 59), it was said in answer to an action against assignees for business done in bankruptcy, that the proceedings had been taken on an erroneous representation by the plaintiff, that an English commission extended to the Isle of Man, whither the bankrupts had absconded, leaving nothing available in this country, in consequence of which the commission had proved useless. But the same judge again held that this did not go to the root of the present claim, though it might, perhaps, be ground for a cross action. In the next case we shall notice, the law laid down by Abbott, C. J., was, on the whole, satisfactory; but the counsel for the plaintiff elected to be nonsuited, and the case does not appear to have been tried again. This was the case of Montriou v. Jeffereys (A.D. 1828, 2 Car. & P. 113), in which the circumstances were these:—The plaintiff had been applied to by the defendant and some other persons to attend for them, the next day but one, before the magistrates—they having been summoned for non-payment of tithes, and relying on a modus as their defence. The plaintiff, being elsewhere engaged, instructed one K., an attorney and clerk to the magistrates, to request the postponement of the case for a few days till evidence could be procured. This he did, but the case was nevertheless proceeded with, because the lessee of the tithes refused to accede to any delay. The plaintiff then advised the defendant to appeal to the sessions, which he did; but the appeal was dismissed, on the ground that the defendant should have gone into his case at the hearing, or shown the magistrates that it was beyond their jurisdiction; and because it appeared, that, though K. informed the magistrates that a modus was intended to be set up, he had not previously prepared any bond or formal notice of the defence, as required by 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 6, to be used in such cases—a statute which it was admitted had been read both by himself and the plaintiff. Abbott, C. J., on summing up, said, that, to sustain the defence of negligence, it must be shown that the expenses charged for had been incurred by the inadvertence of the plaintiff; and that it appeared he and his agent K. had looked into the Act, and had not complied with its provisions as to the defence of a modus. "No attorney," said the judge, "is bound to know all the law; God forbid that it should be imagined that an attorney, or a counsel, or even a judge, is bound to know all the law, or that an attorney is to lose his fair recompense on account of an error, being such an error as a cautious man might fall into; but if you think, in this case, the plaintiff has brought expense on the defendant by omitting to give proper information either to him or to the justices, you will find for the defendant. Again, in Edwards v. Cooper, in the same year (3 Car. & P. 277), the expenses sued for had been incurred in an arbitration, the award wherein was set aside because the attorney of one of the parties had signed the submission without the authority of his client. It was now said, as an answer to the action, that the plaintiff ought to have required to see this attorney's authority before proceeding with the reference, but the Court held that no honourable or even any cautious man could have supposed that such an objection as that above mentioned would have been taken to the award.

Hill v. Featherstonhaugh (A.D. 1831, 7 Bing. 569) was also an action on an attorney's bill. The defendant had lent money to one T. on the security of Bank Stock, and, having some suspicion as to the safety of the security, employed the plaintiff to look into the matter. The plaintiff accordingly made some inquiries, copied some deeds, and put a distringas on T.'s stock, for which services he now sought to recover £15. It was said that the distringas charged for was unnecessary and useless, one having been lodged already by the defendant himself. Tindal, C. J., left it to the jury to consider whether the work done was of any use to the defendant, and the jury having found a verdict for the defendant, the Court refused to disturb it. On the argument of the rule, Tindal, C. J., said, "I have always thought that if an attorney, through inadvertence or inexperience, incurs trouble which is useless to his client, he cannot make it a subject of remuneration, the meaning of which is a reward for useful labour. Thus, if a surgeon were to make his patient undergo an unnecessary operation, or a course of medicine which plainly could be of no service, he could not make it a subject of charge." "It is a proper question for the jury," said Bosanquet, J., "whether what has been done was necessary for the object the employer had in view."

The case of Bracey v. Carter (A.D. 1840, 12 A. & E. 373) is not, perhaps, inconsistent with the principle which, in these actions, lays the burden of proving useful work on the attorney; and yet it pushes that principle to the limit of harshness. It decides that if an attorney conducting a suit commits an act of negligence in the course of it, by which all the previous steps become useless in the result, he cannot recover for any part of the business done. On the other hand, Bulmer v. Gilman (A.D. 1842, 4 Man. & Gr. 108) establishes the equitable doctrine, that a misunderstanding as to a doubtful point of law will not deprive the attorney of his fair remuneration for his labour. "That cannot be considered as gross negligence," said Cresswell, J., "concerning which persons of competent skill may entertain a doubt." The most recent case, we believe, reported upon this branch of the subject is Long v. Orsi (A.D. 1856, 18 C. B. 610). Here the plaintiffs had received from the defendants instructions to commence for them actions on certain foreign bills of exchange drawn on a firm in Paris, and (as they wrote) "now in our hands." The plaintiffs, without seeing the bills, and concluding that the defendants were entitled to sue on them as indorsees, commenced proceedings; but it afterwards turned out that the bills were not specially indorsed as required by the law of France; and this action was accordingly discontinued, and another instituted. It was held that the costs of the abortive proceedings could not be recovered.

If, then, the case of Chapman v. Van Toll be considered with reference to the above principle of law, and to the cases we have cited in support of it, it would seem that it differs from all of them in this—viz. that the course taken by the attorney was not erroneous, but, at the very worst, injudicious. The proceedings taken were regular and proper, but a very recent provision gave him the option of adopting an alternative. The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, is full of alternatives of procedure. Is an attorney bound to decide at his peril, when an application is to be made to a judge to try a cause without a jury—or when an equitable pleading is to be used, or a writ of injunction or a mandamus sued for? If so, then the profession is indeed a thorny one.

If we turn to the second class of actions, those, namely, in which the client seeks to recover from the attorney, we shall find another principle laid down in the broadest terms, and recognised over and over again in the reported cases. It is that the negligence requisite to sustain such action must be gross. In the words of the Court, on more than one occasion, the ignorantia must be crassa; the culpa, lata. The examination of this division of our subject must, however, be postponed to another occasion.

Legal News.

The Lord Chancellor's two Bills have passed through Committee, and so far the prospect of carrying the long-desired reforms embodied in them appears hopeful. We believe that Lord Cranworth's speech on introducing the Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill was liable to misunderstanding, and, in some quarters, was misunderstood. Some persons have spoken and written since as if the Bill proposed to maintain the proctorial monopoly absolutely untouched. It will be seen, however, from the epitome of the leading provisions of the Bill, which we elsewhere publish, that the proposed arrangement is the same as in the Bill which was superseded by the dissolution. The proctor and advocate are to retain the exclusive property of the common-form business of the Court of Probate, but the contentious business is to be thrown open to solicitors and to the bar. We shall not repeat the arguments which have been so often urged against this monopoly, either as extending to the whole of the business, as has been hitherto the case, or to nine-tenths of it, or thereabouts, as is now proposed. If the monopoly be immediately and entirely abolished, it will not be easy to resist the claim of the proctors for compensation; and it will again be very difficult to meet in the House of Commons the arguments that will be urged against the granting of such compensation. The measure as it now stands is a compromise of no very satisfactory character, and to which many strong objections may be urged; but this is a reproach which it may share with many other Bills which have nevertheless effected a considerable improvement upon the pre-existing state of things. Whether a better measure can be obtained from the present Parliament we will not at this moment undertake to say. If further improvement be possible we shall welcome it most heartily; but, if not, we shall consider Lord Cranworth's Bill, as it now stands, a valuable reform, and we shall confidently anticipate that the shortcomings of the present legislation will be corrected in future years. But there is one provision in the Bill as it now stands which appears to us open to a good deal of question. It was originally proposed that appeals from the judge of the Probate Court should go before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But by the Bill as amended the appeals are to be referred to the House of Lords. Now, looking at the present constitution of that House as a judicial tribunal, and considering that there is no immediate probability of improvement, we really do not see that it is desirable to devolve upon it fresh functions, and we cannot suppose that this proposition will be favourably received in the House of Commons.

The debate in the House of Lords on Thursday night upon the Divorce Bill is interesting as a proof that some arguments may always be produced in support of the weakest case. We really did not anticipate that even the ingenuity of Lord Wensleydale could invent so many reasons against the abolition of the action of crim. con., nor that his lordship's well-known reverence for all existing institutions and procedure could possibly comprehend that most odious and offensive feature of our legal system. Lord Wensleydale claims for this form of action an antiquity far higher than the chancellorship of Lord Loughborough, and even suggests that it may have been coeval with the law of England. Of course we know that there could be no higher recommendation to the sympathies of that learned person. Perhaps, too, the exclusion in these trials of the testimony of those to whom the facts must necessarily be best known, gives them an additional claim to the regard of one of the greatest masters of the technicalities of English law. Lord Wensleydale not unnaturally laments the proximate extinction of one of the last relics of a system in which he had throughout a long life revelled, and in which he had attained the highest eminence. It seems, however, that the action is to be abolished, even though the great Alfred could be proved to have invented it, and that adultery is to be declared a misdemeanor.

The Lord Chancellor lately handled a solicitor in a way which goes far to prove that his Lordship is by no means so deficient in vigour as some of his depreciators have asserted. The occasion arose out of a pauper suit, Nunn v. Edge, in which Vice-Chancellor Stuart dismissed the bill, and from whose decision there was an appeal. The Lord Chancellor dismissed this appeal, and, in the course of his judgment, made some severe observations upon the plaintiff's solicitor for writing an insolent letter, and also for bringing the appeal. As regards the second point, we cannot see that the censure was deserved, because the responsibility of advising an appeal belongs to the counsel in the cause; and it will be seen from the report, which we give below, that Mr. Malins very properly interposed to claim for himself the largest share of whatever blame attached to the prosecution of the appeal. With a female client, poor, pathetic, and probably lacrymose, a junior counsel confident and enthusiastic, and a leading counsel approving, or at least acquiescing in the course proposed, it is rather difficult to tell of what material the solicitor should be composed who is to decline, under such circumstances, to proceed. One cannot help feeling, too, that the frequency of successful appeals from the judge whose decision was impugned has a tendency to encourage the further litigation of cases which really are free from all reasonable doubt. However that may be, the conduct of the solicitor in the present instance appears to have been free from blame, and this was, in effect, admitted by the Lord Chancellor, when Mr. Malins had intervened between his censure and its object. Upon the other point adverted to by Lord Cranworth, the writing of a letter which he characterised as insolent, it is impossible, without further explanation, to form a judgment.

The Lord Chancellor affirmed the decree of V. C.

Stuart dismissing the bill. He said that he considered the conduct of Mr. Patrick, the plaintiff's solicitor, highly reprehensible in writing the insolent letter he did before filing the bill, and in persevering in the suit after its dismissal by the Court below. He must also complain of the too great facility afforded to the institution of suits in formâ pauperis, and, though it would be fruitless as far as the defendants were concerned, the appeal would be dismissed with costs.—Mr. Malins, with some warmth, said, that he must take his full share of his Lordship's censure respecting the appeal, as his Lordship was aware that it could not have been prosecuted without his (Mr. Malins's) signature. As had been stated by Lord Eldon, counsel could hardly help sanctioning an appeal when it was desired by the parties themselves; and in the present case, considering the destitute condition of the plaintiff, and the sanguine view she took of her own case, he felt he could not do otherwise than give her the opportunity of having it reheard. Under these circumstances, he trusted his Lordship would withdraw the censure he had cast upon the solicitor in the case. As to the advising of the suit, his junior counsel was very young at the bar, and had, perhaps, been too enthusiastic as to the result of the case—a fault that a little experience would soon cure.—The Lord Chancellor replied, that he did not blame Mr. Patrick so much for the appeal as he did for writing the letter he had alluded to. Mr. Cary had most ably done everything he could for his client's interest, and doubtless would, when more experienced, learn to look upon such cases as the present one in a less enthusiastic manner.

A case has been before the Court of Queen's Bench this week in which a principle frequently insisted upon in these columns was distinctly recognised by the judges, although peculiar circumstances forbade its application in that instance. Lord Campbell declared, that, for the sake of the client, it was important that the solicitor should be remunerated according to the time and skill bestowed by him. The Master had, on taxation, measured the allowance solely by the number of folios contained in the work, and this in a case of very unusual character, and which peculiarly demanded thought and labour and ability. It was impossible to imagine a stronger instance of the injustice of the existing practice, and Lord Campbell's condemnation of it will go far to restore to him with the profession the popularity which he may have lost by his recent ruling upon the question of an attorney's liability for negligence. The case of Reg. v. Wooller, out of which this taxation arose, was, it will be remembered, a prosecution for murder, which terminated in the acquittal of the accused. That the exertions of the attorney for the defence should be rewarded by the taxation of his bill is a strong but by no means an unparalleled example of the ingratitude of men for the greatest services. It is told of a penurious admiral that he rewarded with sixpence a sailor who had jumped overboard to save him from drowning. When the sailor complained of the small value of the medal awarded to him for his humanity, he was answered by a shipmate that the admiral must be supposed to know best the value of his own life. We think that the same apology is the only one that can be made for Mr. Wooler's conduct. Pending the publication of a more formal report, we borrow from one of the daily papers the following details of the case:—

"This was a rule for the Master to review his taxation of an attorney's bill of costs. The defendant, Joseph Smith Wooller, had been indicted for the crime of wilful murder and acquitted. The attorney who had conducted his defence then sent in his bill, amounting to £1,097, and the defendant took steps towards having the bill taxed. The Master taxed off a small portion of the bill, and the chief portion so taxed off related to a charge made by the attorney for an analysis of the evidence. The Master had allowed the attorney so much a folio; but the attorney obtained this rule for the Master to review his taxation, on the ground that he was entitled to be remunerated, not according to the length of the document, but in proportion to the time and skill employed in its preparation. Mr. Henderson now showed cause against the rule, and from his statement it appeared that the attorney had accepted payment of the bill as taxed, and the Court thought he was precluded from making the present application. Lord Campbell, however, expressed a strong opinion that under such circumstances an attorney was entitled to be paid according to his activity and labour, and not according to measurement. His Lordship observed, that it was a reproach to our law that solicitors should be so recompensed for their invaluable services. Mr. Overend, as one of the counsel in the case, said immense advantage had been derived from the document in question. Lord Campbell said, that for the sake of the client it was important that a solicitor should be entitled to remuneration according to the time and skill bestowed in discharge of the trust confided to him. The rule must be discharged, but without costs."

LEGAL EDUCATION AND THE INNS OF COURT.

(From the Daily News.)

For that branch of the legal profession consisting of attorneys and solicitors, a very excellent and effective system of compulsory education has been for some time in operation, with the most signal benefit to the general status and professional qualifications of those who are brought under its operation. No young man can now take out a certificate as an attorney or solicitor without having passed such an examination in law as supplies an effectual guarantee that he has a competent knowledge of the profession in which he proceeds to practise. With the bar the case is different. In that branch of the profession from which are derived all the more responsible administrators of our law—home and colonial—no steps whatever are taken for ascertaining, by the test of examination, whether they possess any and what qualifications for the functions they may hereafter be called on to fulfil. For the majority of these offices, which in number and importance are continually increasing, seven years' barristration is the statutable sine quâ non; but there is nothing apart from the test of actual practice in this country—a test often not resorted to, and, in the case of colonial appointments, at best very fallacious—to show how far a seven years' standing at the bar is, or is not, a valid qualification for office. This is a state of things utterly unparalleled in any other country, and calculated to create a very well-grounded public anxiety. It is a matter not of private but of public concern. It is not, it cannot be, a question in which four private societies like the Inns of Court can be entitled to an exclusive right of judgment. The question is one of imperial dimensions. That the law should be well administered throughout the whole range of the British dominions is a point of vital interest to the British Legislature. In the present state of legal practice, and with the existing multiplicity of minor judicial appointments, the only effective way of providing for this most important point is the institution of a compulsory examination, so wide in its range and so stringent in its requirements as to furnish something like a real security that men of incompetent knowledge and imperfect training shall no longer be entrusted, as they too often have been, with the exercise of judicial functions either abroad or at home. The claim of the benchers of the four Inns of Court to interpose, by virtue of their monopoly, in the manufacture of barristers, between the public requirements and their accomplishment, is simply a repetition of the old obstructions which all corporate bodies, especially when mixed up with education, have ever opposed to the progress of reform.

Let the public consider for a moment how this matter stands. In every civilised country but our own compulsory examination is absolutely necessary as a preliminary qualification for the practice of advocacy. Up to 1851, all that was required of the English barrister was, that he should have kept a certain number of terms by eating a certain number of dinners. Then came the institution of readerships, with an optional examination, which has merely added the necessity of passing a specified number of hours in a lecture-room to that of consuming a specified number of dinners in hall. The Commissioners, whose elaborate report was published in 1855, were unanimous in their condemnation of this miserable mockery of legal education. They were equally unanimous in the recommendation of changes which would have effected a great improvement on anything we have hitherto had, and have laid broad and deep the foundation for something like an adequate scheme of legal education. The four Inns of Court were to be constituted into a legal university, under the style of "The Chancellor, Barristers, and Masters of Law." A Senate of thirty-two members, eight from each Inn of Court, was to form the governing body. There were to be two different descriptions of examination—the first, preliminary to being admitted to studentship; the second, preliminary to being called to the bar. The range of this second examination was to be liberal and comprehensive. It was to embrace, in one branch, public or constitutional law and legal history, jurisprudence and the Roman civil law. In another branch were to be included common law, equity, and the law of real property. A satisfactory examination in some one subject out of each of the above branches was requisite for a pass or common legal degree; proficiency in all the subjects of either branch was to insure a certificate of honour; proficiency in all the subjects of both branches was to give a title to the degree of Master of Laws.

THE SHREWSBURY CASE.

The claim of Lord Talbot to the Earldom of Shrewsbury is now, at length, fairly before the House of Lords, and it will come on for hearing at the earliest possible opportunity. As it directly involves the first and oldest earldom in the land, and indirectly affects estates of the annual value of £40,000, our readers will readily believe us when we say that the Shrewsbury case will rival in interest and importance the great Douglas and Berkeley cases.

The printed document formally asserting the claim on the part of his lordship has been laid upon the table of the Upper House. It consists of forty-one pages of genealogical and other matter, and is intitled "The case of the Right Hon. Henry John Chetwynd, Earl Talbot, claiming to be Earl of Shrewsbury." It states that the claimant having presented a petition to her Majesty, praying that the title, dignity, and peerage of Earl of Shrewsbury might be declared and adjudged to belong to him, and that a writ of summons to Parliament might issue to him by the title and dignity aforesaid, her Majesty was pleased to refer the said petition, together with the Attorney-General's report thereon, to the House of Peers on the 9th of May, 1857, who, on the 11th of May, referred it to the Committee of Privileges to consider and report thereon.

It first recites the terms and limitations of the patent under which the earldom was originally conferred in 1442 upon John Talbot, the great Earl of Shrewsbury, and General of the English Army in the wars with France, and carries down the pedigree step by step, through seven generations, from father to son, in a direct line, until the elder branch of the first Earl's family became extinct on the death of Edward, eighth Earl, without issue male, on the 8th of February, 1617.

It then shows how, on the failure of the elder line, the earldom descended upon the heirs male of Sir Gilbert Talbot, of Grafton, K.G., as representative of Gilbert, third son of the second Earl, and was enjoyed by them successively down to the year 1856, when it became extinct by the death of Bertram Arthur Talbot, the late Earl, at Lisbon.

It further recites that Earl Talbot now claims to be entitled to the earldoms of Shrewsbury, Wexford, and Waterford, as nearest heir male of the said Sir Gilbert Talbot, through the second marriage of his son John, and, consequently, as nearest heir male of the body of the first Earl, and that he begs leave to lay before this most hon. house the present case in support of his claim. The case, which is signed by Sir F. Thesiger, Sir F. Kelly, and Mr. T. Ellis, barrister-at-law, as counsel for the claimant, alleges that Sir John Talbot, of Albrighton, married, as his second wife, Elizabeth Wrottesley, by whom he had issue two sons, of whom the elder died young, while the line was continued by the younger son, John, of Salwarp, who married Olive Sherrington, and whose son, Sherrington Talbot, left, by his second marriage with Mary, daughter of John Washbourne, three sons, of whom the two elder died without leaving issue; and that the line of descent was continued by the third son, William, some time Bishop of Durham. He was the father of Charles Talbot, Lord Chancellor of England, who was raised to the peerage in 1733 as Lord Talbot, and whose son, created Earl Talbot of Ingestre in 1784, was grandfather of the present claimant.

We understand that the opponents of his Lordship's claim are three in number—first, the Duke of Norfolk, as guardian of the interest of his infant son, to whom the late Earl bequeathed his magnificent property at Alton Towers; secondly, the Princess Doria Pamphili of Rome, as only surviving child of John, sixteenth Earl; and, thirdly, Major Talbot, of Castle Talbot, county Wexford, as a rival claimant to the title.

In the event of Earl Talbot being able to establish his claim to the earldom of Shrewsbury to the satisfaction of the Committee of Privileges, his Lordship will become Premier Earl of England, and also of Ireland, as also Earl of Wexford and Waterford; and then, we imagine, a further suit will have to be entered upon before the Court of Chancery for possession of the Shrewsbury estates at Alton, and other placesin the counties of Stafford, Oxford, Worcester, and Berks. In case, however, the House of Lords should decide that his Lordship's claim is "not proven," the other claim—namely, that of Major Talbot, will be submitted for their Lordships' decision. The gallant Major, as we understand, traces his pedigree up to William, fourth son of George, the fourth Earl, who was made a Knight of the Garter for his valiant conduct at the Battle of Stoke, June the 16th, 1447.—Times.

REBUILDING OF NEWGATE GAOL.—The Court of Aldermen having determined on the re-building of Newgate Gaol on the cellular system, the plans proposed for that purpose by Mr. Bunning, their architect, have been adopted, and the works commenced by the demolition of the present north wing of the prison, containing wards in which several prisoners were usually congregated together, and also the condemned cells. The portion of the intended building now in progress will consist of five stories above the basement, and contain 130 separate cells, with access thereto on each story above the ground floor by means of galleries on either side of a central corridor, the entire height and length of the building, covered with a ground glass roof. The basement story will contain punishment cells, baths, and store-rooms. Airing yards will be attached to the building, and adequate accommodation provided for the officers in charge of the prisoners. The system of the cells and the system of ventilation will be similar to that which has been successfully adopted at the City Prison, Holloway, which was also erected from Mr. Bunning's design. The building will be entirely fire-proof; and instead of the prisoners being, as now, taken from the van in view of the public, the plan for the new building is so arranged that the van will be driven into the gaol and the gates closed on the prisoners before they alight. In the re-building of the gaol the governor's house and the external walls will be retained, so that the architectural appearance of the present structure will not be interfered with. The amount of the contract for the works now in progress is £12,550, and the contractors are Messrs. Browne and Robinson, of College-hill, City.—Times.

DEATH OF MR. HALL, M.P., FOR LEEDS.—A vacancy has occurred in the representation of Leeds by the death of Mr. Robert Hall, who was returned, after a severe contest, as one of the members for that borough at the late election. Mr. Hall, who was Recorder of Doncaster and Deputy-Recorder of Leeds, suffered severely from an accident, about two years ago, on the Great Northern Railway, near Leeds, and although he so far recovered as to be able to resume his professional labours, his constitution was permanently injured, and has given way at last to the labour and excitement consequent upon his recent struggle for parliamentary honours. He entered with great vigour into the political contest in which he was engaged for the representation of his native town, and was unceasing, for more than a week before the day of election, in his efforts to win his way, often addressing two or more meetings of the electors in different parts of the borough the same day. After the election, when his hopes were crowned with victory, his thought that he received injury from sitting in the House of strength appeared to give way, and he suffered from the reaction which followed the severe activity of the contest. He also Commons near one of the openings for the admission of air. He died at Folkestone on Tuesday morning, aged 56. Mr. Hall was born in Leeds in the year 1801. He was educated at the school of Heath, near Halifax, at the Leeds Free Grammar School, and at Christ Church College, Oxford, where he obtained the rank of first class in classics, and second class in mathematics. Mr. Hall's death will be much lamented by his townsmen,—not merely by his own political friends,—but by all who knew either his professional or his private character. He has been removed at the very moment of attaining the object of many years' ambition, the representation of his native place in Parliament.

DEATH OF MR. DAVIES, M.P.—Mr. Davies, M.P. for Carmarthenshire, died suddenly, at the University Club, on the evening of Friday week. He was a barrister-at-law, and for many years chairman of the Cardiganshire Quarter Sessions, and was first returned for Carmarthenshire in 1842. He was in the sixty-sixth year of his age.

Mr. Henry Singer Keating, Q.C., M.P. for Reading, has been appointed her Majesty's Solicitor-General, in the room of Mr. Stuart Wortley, whose ill-health has caused him to resign that appointment.

A resolution was passed on Thursday at the Bank Court associating Mr. Henry Freshfield with Mr. Charles Freshfield in the appointment of solicitors to the Bank of England, the latter having held the appointment jointly with the late Mr. James Freshfield, junr., for the last seventeen years.

Mr. Thomas Edlyne Tomlins, of 10, Lincoln's-inn-fields, solicitor, has been appointed by his Honour William Foster Stawell, Esq., Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the Colony of Victoria, a Commissioner to take and receive, in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the verification of memorials and the acknowledgment of deeds relating to property in the Colony of Victoria, and also to take and receive affidavits in any cause, matter, or thing depending in the Supreme Court of Judicature of that Colony, 13th March 1857.

Charles Drake of Bungay, Suffolk, Gent., has been appointed a Commissioner to administer Oaths in Chancery.—May 8, 1857.

Alfred Henderson, Bristol, Gent., has been appointed one of the Perpetual Commissioners for taking the Acknowledgments of Deeds to be executed by Married Women in and for the city of Bristol and county of Somerset.—May 22, 1857.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

PRACTICE—WILFUL DEFAULT.

Mirehouse v. Herbert, 5 W. R., 583.

In order to obtain a decree against an executor for an account with wilful default, the old practice was to require that a case should be made and proved showing some amount of such default, and the decree was then made at the hearing for an account of what the executor had received, or what but for his wilful default he might have received. If, however, the bill made no case for wilful default, or if from defect of evidence or other cause no decree was obtained at the hearing for such an account, it was not competent for the plaintiff to apply for such an addition to the decree when the cause came on upon further directions, no matter how clear or how extensive might be the defaults disclosed in the course of taking the accounts. Lord Eldon's rule was, that, in order to obtain an inquiry as to wilful default against an executor or trustee, you must allege a case for such an inquiry—must pray for it—and prove one act, at least, of wilful default, and that, doing so, you may have a general decree for wilful default. The ordinary case is, where a decree as to wilful default is asked for by the prayer, but where the evidence fails to make out a case for such relief at the hearing. There are many authorities in such a case for the position that the charge cannot be made complete and the decree for wilful default taken on further directions. Green v. Badley (7 Beav. 274), and Garland v. Littlewood (1 Beav. 527), are examples of this. The same principle applied where a bill contained charges of fraud which were not established at the hearing. If, in such a case, a common decree for account is taken, the fraud cannot afterwards be inquired into at a later stage of the suit. Lord Cottenham so decided in Dunstan v. Patterson (2 Ph. 341); and there are many other authorities to the same effect. The reason for this rule is stated by Lord Langdale in Passingham v. Sherborn (9 Beav. 432), who says, that, when charges are contained in the bill, and no notice of them is taken in the decree, the presumption is, either that they were abandoned on the hearing, or so presented to the Court as to induce it to abstain from making any order in respect to them. If there be any error in the decree, it cannot be corrected on further directions, but only on a rehearing. The hardship of compelling the defendant to reshape his defence is also frequently referred to among the grounds of the practice. It was even attempted so far to strain the principle as to contend that interest on balances could not be charged on further directions without an express direction in the decree; but it is held that this may be done even in a case where the particular relief is not only not proved to be proper at the hearing, but is not even prayed by the bill (Hollingsworth v. Shakeshaft, 14 Beav. 492).

Two of the most modern cases on the subject, decided just before the recent statutes, follow the general rule we have stated as to wilful default, though in one a relaxation is suggested in cases where some suspicion not amounting to proof of a specific default has been established at the hearing. Thus, in Jones v. Morrall (2 Sim., N. S., 241), Lord Cranworth laid down the rule as follows:—"If the pleadings do not raise the point, it cannot be raised either at the hearing or on further directions; but if the plaintiff's pleadings do raise it, it is his duty, if he can make a case for it, to get a declaration by the decree, or if he cannot make a sufficient case for an immediate decree, to get an inquiry of such a character, that, on the result, the Court may, on further directions, make a declaration."

Again, in Coope v. Carter (2 D. M. & G. 297), Lord Justice Knight Bruce, after stating the course of the Court to be in accordance with Lord Eldon's rule, says, "This, however, may arise: a case of wilful default may be alleged, and a prayer may be founded upon it, but the evidence may raise only a case of suspicion in the mind of the Court on the question whether an act of wilful default has been committed. In such a case, I conceive that the Court, if it is likely that further evidence may be obtained, ought to direct an inquiry short of directing wilful default, in order to ground upon that a new order, and to direct an inquiry as to wilful default at a future stage."

In the case placed at the head of this note, V. C. Stuart has decided that the rule as to not interpolating a charge of wilful default subsequently to the hearing is, in effect, abrogated by the New Orders. After noticing the old practice, his Honour observed—"There was a defect in justice arising from this course of proceeding, inasmuch as wilful default is not easily proved till the accounts have been investigated; when, therefore, it appeared, in prosecuting a suit in the Master's offices, that there had been wilful default, it was unjust that the defendant should be allowed to get off unless a new suit was instituted. The New Orders have provided a remedy for this obvious injustice. Under the present practice, if there has been a common administration decree, and if, during the progress of the suit under that decree, it appears that an executor or trustee has been guilty of any misconduct, the judge in chambers may model the order made under the decree, so as to meet the justice of the case; and, if necessary in open court, such an alteration may be made in taking the accounts as to enable the suitor to obtain justice in a form more speedy, cheaper, and better for all parties than under the old system."

These observations seem to extend the power of directing inquiries as to wilful default, even to a case where it is not charged by the bill; and it is obvious that such a power must be exercised in a summons-suit, if cases of wilful default are to be considered as proper subjects for such proceedings, which may be questioned. However, the dictum was probably not intended to encourage the suppression of charges of default till after the decree, and it must still be regarded as the proper and prudent course, notwithstanding Mirehouse v. Herbert, to state, and, if possible, prove, a case of wilful default at the hearing whenever it is in contemplation to seek relief on that footing.

INTEREST IN A LIFE POLICY—14 GEO. 3, c. 48.

Shilling v. The Accidental Death Assurance Company, 5 W. R., Exch., 567.

The question raised in this case was whether a policy of life assurance could be lawfully effected by A., for his own benefit, in the name of B., A. having at no time any interest in the life of B. It was contended, on the one side, that this was a "gaming and wagering policy" within 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, which declares that no valid policy can be made by any person on the life of another, wherein the person for whose benefit the policy is made shall have no interest. On the other hand, it was insisted that it appeared by the policy itself that B. was the person assured; and that the company was estopped from saying that the party assured was any other than he who appeared to be so by the express terms of the instrument. It was the opinion of the Court that A. could not effect a valid policy on the life of B., representing that he was authorised by B. to effect a policy on his life and for him, when, in truth, it was for the benefit of A.; for this was a species of transaction by way of wager on the life of another, which the statute intended to prohibit. On the other hand, they thought there was no objection to A., with the knowledge and consent of B., effecting a policy on B.'s life—he (A.) paying the premiums, and the sum assured being payable to B.'s executors.

In connection with this case, may be read with advantage that of Dalby v. The India and London Life Assurance Company (15 C. B. 1) which overruled the case of Godson v. Boldero (7 East, 72), and decided that the statute above mentioned does not prevent A. from recovering on a policy he has effected on the life of B., provided that at the time of effecting the policy he had an interest in B.'s life, although such his interest had ceased before the death happened.

PRACTICE AS TO STAMPS ON BILLS OF EXCHANGE—RULING OF JUDGE WHEN CONCLUSIVE—EFFECT OF NONSUIT.

Sharples v. Rickards, 5 W. R., Exch., 568.

This was a rule which had been obtained to set aside a nonsuit, and for a new trial. The action was on a bill of exchange drawn by the defendant in foreign parts, and indorsed over to the plaintiff. At the trial, the bill was produced without any stamp; and it was ruled by the judge, and acquiesced in by the plaintiff's counsel, that, on this ground, the bill was inadmissible, by reason of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 82, imposing a stamp on foreign bills indorsed over in this kingdom; and that consequently the plaintiff had failed to establish his case. Upon this ruling the plaintiff's counsel agreed to be nonsuited. Upon the argument, several points were incidentally determined:—1. It was held that the burden of proving that the indorsement had taken place in this country, and not in that in which the bill had been drawn, lay on the defendant. 2. It was held that the decision of the judge rejecting the evidence tendered was liable to be reviewed by the Court, and a new trial on that ground might be granted, notwithstanding the 31st section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, enacting that "no new trial shall be granted by reason of the ruling of any judge that the stamp upon any document is sufficient, or that the document does not require a stamp;" for that such provision had reference exclusively to evidence admitted (not rejected), and that the dictum of the late Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, in Siordet v. Kuczinski (17 C. B. 251), to the effect that the ruling of a judge on questions relating to the sufficiency of a stamp is final, was intended to apply only to cases of admission and not of rejection. 3. It was held, that the new trial being rendered necessary by the mistake of the judge, the rule to set aside the nonsuit must be made absolute without throwing any costs upon the defendant. 4. It was held, that, under the circumstances, the nonsuit could not be deemed to be a voluntary one. 5. The Court doubted whether (the only pleas being a denial of presentation and of dishonour, and that the defendant had due notice of dishonour) the plaintiff was bound to produce the bill at the trial at all, in order to entitle himself to a verdict. As to this last point, the case of Chaplin v. Levy (9 Exch. 531) was mentioned, where the only plea being a denial of the acceptance, and the acceptance being proved by the written admission of the defendant's attorney, the production of the bill itself at the trial was held to be unnecessary.

ARBITRATOR'S CHARGES—REVIEW OF TAXATION OF COSTS.

Webb v. Wyatt, 5 W. R., Exch., 570.

This was an application for a review of taxation of costs allowed in respect of the charges of an arbitrator. The only question in the cause (which was entered for trial at Lewes) related to a right of way near Hastings, and the case was consequently referred to a barrister, that there might be a view of the locus in quo. The arbitrator charged for three days, at ten guineas a day, whereas, in point of fact, the inquiry itself was concluded in the course of one morning. He also charged five guineas for the view, three guineas for the award, and some travelling expenses, making up a total of 43*l.* 3*s.* This amount the Master reduced by ten guineas, allowing only for two days, instead of three. The object of the present application was to have the charges still further reduced, and the Court acceded to it, remarking that care must be taken that references did not become a vexation, instead of a benefit to suitors, and that the charges made appeared to be excessive. Martin, B., added, that it was very desirable there should be some understanding with respect to the charges for country references, similar to that which prevails in town causes.

EFFECT OF ERRONEOUS FINDING OF A JURY ON AN INQUISITION TAKEN ON A WRIT OF ELEGIT.

Barnes v. Harding, 5 W. R., C. P., 570.

From this case it appears that where there has been an inquisition before a jury on a writ of elegit to determine as to the lands, &c., in the possession of the judgment debtor, and the jury find a verdict on such inquiry against evidence, no fresh writ of elegit can issue unless a rule has been previously obtained to set aside the erroneous finding of the jury.

The reason given by the Court for this practice was, that the first verdict, while it remained undisturbed, would be evidence between the same parties; and, therefore, it does not seem inconsistent with the cases which decide (Hunger v. Frey, Moore, 841; Foster v. Jackson, Hob. 57), that, if it should appear after the inquisition has been returned that the execution debtor has other lands respecting which no evidence was offered to the jury at the time of the inquiry, another writ may issue suggesting that fact.

SECONDARY EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY OF DEPOSITIONS TAKEN BEFORE THE MAGISTRATES.

Regina v. Cockburn, 5 W. R., C. C. R., 570.

In some cases secondary proof of oral testimony is admissible, upon the principle, that, under the circumstances, it is the best evidence according to the rules of marshalling evidence recognised by the common law. In some few cases such secondary proof is rendered admissible by statute. Thus, by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 17, in cases where any person is brought before justices, charged with any indictable offence, the depositions taken on oath, and read over to and signed by the witnesses and the magistrates, may be read at the trial of such person, provided the person deposing be then dead, or so ill as to be unable to travel. Respecting this provision, it has been observed, that it is not intended to annul the common law maxim that a deposition taken under the above circumstances may also be received if the witness be fraudulently or forcibly kept out of the way by the prisoner himself, and that the provision is open to objection in that it fails to express whether it was intended that it should supersede the practice of postponing the trial where the witness was suffering only under a temporary illness, and also to define the amount of proof which would authorise the reading of the deposition, or what species of evidence on the part of the prisoner will render it inadmissible.

In the above case, the conviction of the prisoner for larceny was appealed against on the ground that the depositions of the prosecutor had been improperly received; but as no counsel appeared on either side, the Court contented themselves with saying the conviction was right, without giving any reasons, or laying down any general rules for the interpretation of the section as to the above points. It may, however, be observed, that it was sworn at the trial that the witness whose deposition was admitted was then suffering under a paralytic seizure, but that he might be brought to the court without danger to life; and it also appeared that on the day preceding the trial he had been seen in the public street.*

HOMICIDE ON THE HIGH SEAS BY FOREIGNERS NOT TRIABLE IN ENGLAND.

Regina v. Lewis, 5 W. R., C. C. R., 572.

From this case it appears to be law, that, if a foreigner is killed by a foreigner on the high seas, no offence has been committed which is cognisable by the law, or in the courts of this country. The contrary was contended, on the ground of 9 Geo. 4, c. 31, the 7th section of which authorises the trial in England of British subjects committing homicide abroad; and the 8th section enacts, that where any person "feloniously stricken" on the seas dies in England (as the deceased did in the case before the Court), the case may be dealt with where the death happened as if the offence had been wholly committed there. The Court, however, held that these two sections must be taken together, and that they both had reference to the same class of persons—viz. British subjects.

It would, apparently, make no difference if the party killed were a British subject. Sed quære.

Cookman v. Rose, 5 W. R., Q. B., 576.

This was an application for a prohibition to the judge of the Norfolk County Court, who had committed the defendant to prison for forty days, under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, ss. 98, 99, for non-payment of the instalments ordered upon a judgment summons. The judgment had been obtained by the plaintiff against the defendant in June, and in the following month the defendant had obtained his discharge from the Insolvent Debtors Court, after filing a schedule in which the debt for which the plaintiff had obtained judgment was included.

The question here was as to the effect of the repeal, contained in 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, of so much of the 102nd section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95 as enacts that no protection order or certificate granted by a Bankrupt or Insolvent Court shall be available to discharge a defendant from any commitment under the order of a county court judge. Before the date of this statute, it had been determined by several cases (Abley v. Dale, 11 C. B. 388; Ex parte Christie, 4 E. & B. 714; George v. Somers, 16 C. B. 532) that the county court judge's power to commit for contempt by non-payment of instalments, under 9 & 10 Vict. c.

* Vide supra, p. 131, where a case as to the reception of a dying declaration as evidence is noticed.

95, s. 99, was not affected by a discharge from the Bankruptcy or Insolvent Court. In the judgment of none of these cases was any mention made of section 102; but the Court of Queen's Bench, in the case now under notice, considered that they must be held nevertheless to have proceeded on that section, and that, as it had been now quoad hoc repealed, the power of commitment no longer existed. And the Court remarked, that, though the 102nd section was not mentioned in the judgment in Abley v. Dale, it had been prominently contested in the argument. "We are of opinion," said the Court, in making absolute the rule for a prohibition, "that we give effect to the expressed intention of the Legislature, by holding that an order for discharge granted by the Court for the relief of insolvent debtors, comprising a judgment debt of the county court, does take away from that county court the power of committing to prison a defendant by a warrant on a judgment summons issued for non-payment of that debt. Although such commitment may be in some cases a punishment for supposed misconduct, it is founded also on a judgment debt, which is granted only at the instance of a judgment creditor. We do not assume to overrule decisions which have been already given upon the Acts as they formerly stood; but we take those Acts and decisions with 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, and consider that we are now deciding consistently with them."

Notwithstanding the concluding sentences of the above judgment, we must be permitted to entertain a doubt whether the decision thus arrived at is not, in effect, an overruling of Abley v. Dale, and the other cases following it. It appears difficult to read the judgment of Jervis, C. J., without feeling that the 98th and 99th sections were the material ones in the opinion of the Court; and that they gave their judgment without reference to the words in the 102nd section, now repealed. However, there can be no doubt that the present decision is an equitable and a popular one; and it will put an end to an unseemly trial of strength between the two tribunals.

FRAUDULENT BREACHES OF TRUST—CROWN PROSECUTIONS AND PROSECUTORS.

The Bill introduced by Sir Richard Bethell, for making fraudulent breaches of trust criminally punishable, excites in legal circles a degree of interest proportioned to its intrinsic importance; while it also is regarded with some curiosity as being the first actual attempt at law reform by an Attorney-General who has certainly said more on the hustings, and has probably done less in Parliament, than any of his predecessors. Perhaps it is hardly fair to contrast the speeches at Aylesbury with the performance at St. Stephen's just at the present time, when the first law officer has actually introduced two law amendment Bills, and promises to introduce another after Whitsuntide. We should rather accept thankfully what is given to us by way of an instalment, while we wait patiently for further and greater benefits. That there is every disposition on the part of the Legislature to pass such a Bill into law, cannot be doubted; while, at the same time, much anxious consideration will, very properly, be bestowed on the measure, in order that it may be effective, without adding to those perils and dangers which already beset the most honest and well-meaning trustees on discharging the duties of their thankless office. There is little fear that the proposed measure will prove oppressive to others than those for whom it is intended. Errors in judgment will rarely or never be mistaken by any jury for fraudulent conduct of the kind sought to be prevented; and very distinct evidence will be required in every such prosecution of the fraudulent intent, before a jury will be willing to convict; for few persons of the juryman class but are themselves trustees for others, or induce others to be trustees for them; and this universality of trusteeship is the best safeguard against oppressive applications of the proposed measure.

In the course of his speech, on introducing his Bill, Sir R. Bethel took occasion (it seems) to observe, that, after long delay and consideration, and after due perusal of "documents laid before him" by the assignees' solicitor, he had come to the conclusion that prosecutions ought to be instituted against the Royal British Bankers. Now it seems somewhat remarkable, that the Queen's Attorney-General cannot be put in motion until the principles of criminal law have been applied to the case, and fully treated of by a Commissioner of the Bankruptcy Court—until an equally careful inquiry has been made by a solicitor concerned, not for the Crown, but for the assignees—and until all the evil-doers have had abundant opportunity of taking refuge on foreign shores, and most of them have actually availed themselves of that privilege. Some of the London journals have indeed intimated it as their opinion, that a leading counsel in the equity courts is not the right man to fill an office requiring some degree of familiarity with the principles and practice of criminal law. This is, however, a minor inconvenience, and one more than counterbalanced by the advantages of a system which usually (if not always) assigns the first law office under the Crown to the most eminent advocate of the day. To go back no further than the last year, an example will serve to show that some delay in prosecuting bank swindlers may be exhibited by a common-law as well as by an equity lawyer. After the decease (or supposed decease) of John Sadleir, and the consequent closing of that choice institution, the Tipperary Bank, some months elapsed before the Attorney-General here had finally made up his mind to prosecute. During all or most of this time, James Sadleir was daily to be found at his usual haunts. At length it was announced that the Crown was about to prosecute. Sadleir thereupon, without loss of time, withdrew from the public gaze, and modestly sought the comparative quiet of a lodging in Paris, where he still remains, disbursing the depositors' money with great satisfaction to himself, and doubtless thankful that the Crown officers gave such ample notice of their intention to bring him to justice! If it be urged that it is not the legitimate business of an Attorney-General to take any steps until the papers have been regularly laid before him for his opinion, we can only express our regret that no chief and responsible officer is charged with the duty of instituting prosecutions in proper cases, speedily, and without giving notice to the criminals. Very modern usage must have turned her Majesty's Attorney-General into an exalted semi-judicial kind of potentate; for the very title of the office testifies that it was established for a very different purpose, and must, at one time, have been filled up from the other branch of the profession. The Attorney-General must originally have been the initiator of proceedings on behalf of the Crown, and not merely, as he is at present, a dignified adviser on "documents laid before him." It seems to us that it would be a recurrence to old usage, as well as a change likely to prove highly advantageous to the public, were one at least of the two superior law offices, to be filled by a real "attorney" or "solicitor," whose express duty it would be to commence proceedings such as we have alluded to, and who, we may be sure, would be most unlikely to delay a prosecution until all the principal criminals were safe on Continental travels. We may be told that there are Crown Solicitors charged with the performance of such duties as the above: these officials are, however, personally respectable—not men of the kind required for the successful conduct of State prosecutions. For the prosecution of a gang of bank directors, the highest class of professional talent would be required: the Crown Attorney ought to be an overmatch in acuteness and legal knowledge for those acute and learned advisers who would, in such a case, conduct the defence. The office in question should therefore remain as it now is—an office of high rank and large emolument; and, consequently, it would be an object of ambition to the very best men in the profession. All that the Crown now offers to the ablest solicitor is a seat in some circumlocution office, with little to do, and one, or perhaps two, thousand a year as remuneration; it follows that no solicitor of high eminence ever dreams of leaving his practice, and entering the public service. But were the Attorney or the Solicitor-General to be all that the title of the office imports, not only would the character and tone of the profession be raised by this stimulus to honourable ambition, but there would be made available for the purposes of public justice a kind of practical ability that has rarely hitherto been brought to bear against the criminal, and the importance of which cannot be over-estimated where Camerons and Sadleirs are to be captured and punished.

Since the union between England and Scotland many causes have been gradually operating to produce an assimilation of the laws of the two countries; and, on the other hand, several causes have been operating, though recently with less force, to retard the process.

A comparatively poor nation uniting itself with a much richer one on equal terms is at first naturally jealous of every movement that seems to threaten the destruction of its national identity, while, at the same time, the richer nation is impatient of any interference with its peculiar constitution on the part of its less powerful patron. And there can be no doubt that, for a long time, many Scotchmen viewed with particular concern any changes proposed to be made on their legal system, rightly judging that the preservation of it was the best security for the preservation of their separate nationality. The most jealous of these patriots suspected a design for the destruction of this nationality, and even believed that Englishmen rejected all legal reform that was suspected to have a Scotch origin.

But it was plain that this narrow-minded jealousy was doomed to yield to the natural current of events which was sweeping over it. As the united nations increased in wealth and importance, and the relations between them became more intimate and complicated, new laws were called for, which received a tone from the opinions which were brought to bear upon them in the united Legislature. The Scotch system itself had been to some extent affected by the circumstance that English judges administered Scotch law in the ultimate Court of Appeal, and the mercantile portion of the community had begun to feel the evils which arose from the administration of dissimilar systems of mercantile law in different parts of what had truly become, or was fast becoming, the same country. The consequence has been, that, while for a long time the subject of the assimilation of the laws of the two countries attracted little notice even from the legal profession, and the progress made was almost imperceptible, the question has of late years attracted so large a share of public attention that the progress has been rapid and strongly marked, and associations have been everywhere formed for the purpose of accelerating and directing the movement, which has had the additional desirable effect of promoting to a large extent legal reform in the two systems, independently altogether of the question of assimilation.

If the feeling of jealousy to which we have referred has lingered longer in Scotland than in England, it must be pleaded in mitigation that Scotchmen have not always been able to make themselves heard in England upon real grievances; but of late there has been a great improvement in this respect, and it must be consolatory to the most inveterate grumblers, to find Englishmen establishing County Courts not differing greatly in constitution from the ancient Sheriff Courts of Scotland, and agitating for the abolition of the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts over matters civil, for the reform of the law of divorce, and for the establishment of a system of registration of land rights, on principles which have been admitted and acted upon in this part of the kingdom for centuries. While Englishmen who have watched the rapidity and extent of the changes which have taken place in Scotland of late years, and the eagerness with which further reform is still called for, will be satisfied that proposed improvements, from whatever quarter they come, will meet with no unreasonable opposition from this portion of the empire.

All experience proves, however, that in the present position of the two countries all changes made upon the existing law of either for the purpose of assimilation ought to be adapted to the institutions existing in the respective countries for the administration of the law; and as a means of securing this result associations of the different branches of the legal profession, independently of their higher value as reforming associations, become very important, seeing that they furnish machinery for eliciting opinion on questions of practical difficulty, which often escape the attention of those who may be more exclusively engaged in promoting legal reform in Parliament. The distance of Scotland from the seat of government often renders it difficult to make known in the proper quarter the views of the practical portion of the profession upon measures of reform which may be in progress; and it has not unfrequently happened that changes have been effected, the extent of which has only become understood when they have passed into law. In these circumstances we feel satisfied that the establishment of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, when it comes to be better known in this portion of the kingdom, will be regarded with peculiar satisfaction, as furnishing an accessible medium for the ventilation of the opinions not merely of the legal profession, but of the public generally, upon all questions of legal reform of public interest. For it is plain, that, although legal associations may have the means of collecting the opinions of their own members on such questions, they cannot reach the numerous small bodies of the profession scattered over the kingdom, nor even the larger bodies in the more important towns, with the necessary rapidity, while this journal seems precisely fitted to meet this want. Besides, there are many members of the profession who, on account of their age or the multitude of their avocations, will not take the trouble of attending the meetings of such associations for the purpose of informing themselves of the progress of events, who may be informed by this means of matters of interest, and thus valuable opinions may be elicited that would otherwise have been lost. If such a journal had existed when jury trial in civil causes was first introduced into Scotland, we believe that the measure would not have been encumbered with those unknown forms which were not necessary, and which only increased the difficulty of engrafting the measure upon the existing system, and rendered it long unpopular. There are other grievances to which this observation would apply with equal force, to some of which we may refer more particularly on another occasion.

But the value of the journal is by no means limited to the advantage which may be derived by either nation from the discussion in its columns of projects of exclusive legal reform. It helps to widen the whole basis of such questions, and to collect and disseminate the opinions not only of those more directly interested in any measure that may be under discussion, but also of those who may have some knowledge of the subject, either from practical experience of a similar system or from general study, and who, from looking at the question ab extra, may be expected to do so without feeling the disturbing influences which often bias the judgments of those who look at a point with minds long trained to take that view which practice makes familiar. Upon such questions as the proposed change on the law of divorce in England, the amalgamation of the courts of law and equity, and the establishment of a register of land rights, including the registration of securities upon land, we believe that the opinion of Scotchmen who have had practical experience to direct their judgment must be valuable, even although they may not be able to realise the difficulties with which Englishmen may have to contend in dealing with them. And we should not be astonished to find unexpected light thrown upon these subjects by French or American correspondents.

On the subject of registration we propose to make a few observations from time to time, directed chiefly to the practical working of it, which must be the great difficulty to overcome in a country where the relations of life have become so complicated, and, consequently, the transactions in land so numerous, as in England; and upon this point Scotchmen will probably be more disposed now to sympathise with those in England who regard the practical difficulties as insuperable, when they find, as they are certainly beginning to do, that in their own comparatively small country the multitude of transactions has had the effect of rendering it practically a difficult matter to furnish a search which will disclose all burdens with certainty. It must be admitted, too, that the expense of a search is so great here as to induce conveyancers, in many cases, where the transaction is small in amount, to resort to other means for securing their clients against the effect of prior burdens on the property.

It is obvious that the whole value of a system of registration of land rights depends upon its absolute certainty, and the possibility of securing this certainty at a reasonable cost. The Scotch system has ceased to fulfil these essential conditions perfectly, and the consequence is, that a feeling of uneasiness has fallen upon the conveyancers of the whole country. It must not be supposed, however, that although we make these confessions the faith of Scotch conveyancers has been to any extent shaken in the soundness of the principle of registration. They regard the present difficulties as referable merely to defects in organisation and office arrangements, and they are now setting themselves vigorously to discover and apply a remedy.

The Court of Session has met to-day without any change in its constitution, and with a heavy arrear of business to work off. But matters cannot be allowed to remain long in their present position. One section of the legal profession in Edinburgh has already taken up the question. The Society of Solicitors before the Supreme Courts has appointed a committee of its body to consider the question, and their report has already appeared. The Society of Writers to the Signet has taken the same course, and it is understood that the report of their committee is also ready. The bar will probably soon follow the example. The question of principle, which is likely to cause the keenest discussion, is whether the privilege which pursuers at present possess of choosing the court to which they are to resort is to be preserved to them. Without entering into any detail of the constitution of the Court of Session, we may just state, with the view of enabling our readers to understand the question, that the Court is composed of inner house and outer house judges, the former eight in number, constituting two courts of equal jurisdiction and power in every essential particular, called respectively the first and second division, and engaged almost exclusively in disposing of appeals from the outer house judges, who sit in separate courts of equal jurisdiction. The first division happens to have been for many years the more popular court, and the consequence is, that appeals have been heaped upon them till the accumulation has left them several years in arrear of business. An Act was passed some years ago authorising the inner house to extend its sittings, but this power has been sparingly exercised, probably because it was foreseen that it would only aggravate the evil which the Act was intended to remedy. The sittings of the outer house judges were permanently extended by the same Act; but, nevertheless, there are similar grievances to complain of in their courts. It is believed to be the general opinion of the bar that the power of selecting the judges should be taken away from litigants, and arrangements made for an equal or equitable distribution of business. This opinion is not, we believe, generally adopted by the other branches of the legal profession in Edinburgh, though no doubt it has many supporters. But this is not the only quæstio vexata in regard to the Supreme Civil Court in Scotland: the length of the vacations is justly felt to be excessive. The inner house rises on the 12th, and the outer house on the 20th of March, for the spring vacation, and neither Court sits again till the 20th of May. The whole Court rises again for the autumn vacation on the 20th of July, and the outer house does not sit again till the 1st, and the inner house till the 12th of November. It is true, that the judges have many duties to perform in vacation as criminal judges and otherwise, but they are far from being fully worked, and those who are accustomed to the very different state of affairs in England will probably consider that the public in Scotland has a just ground of complaint on this head.

PROCTORIAL MONOPOLY.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—I observe the Lord Chancellor alleges as a reason for excluding our profession from practising in the new Court of Probate that solicitors have petitioned in favour of such exclusion.

If solicitors do not wish to practise in the new court, I apprehend they need not do so, even if they were permitted; and, therefore, if any solicitors really support the exclusion, I apprehend it must be because they have some interest opposed to that of the generality of the profession.

As petitions have so much influence on the Chancellor, perhaps a petition signed by those solicitors who desire the privilege of practising in the new Court of Probate might obtain their object.

Yours obediently,

London, May 27, 1857. A SOLICITOR.

ATTORNEY'S LIABILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE.

The following remarks on this subject by an eminent solicitor deserve attention:—

I cannot understand (at least, I suppose I do not, because, if I do, I cannot but think them monstrous) the recent cases before Lord Campbell of an action by and against an attorney, where the question was whether his not availing himself of the 3rd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, was negligence.

Certainly, I have nothing to say for the attorney or his agent themselves after their own admission on the trial that they were ignorant of the provisions of the Act; such ignorance is inexcusable.

But it cannot, I should think, be negligence in a legal sense (however gross it may be in an ordinary one), for an attorney to be ignorant of the provisions of an Act, of which, if he had known them, it would not have been his duty to avail himself.

Was that his duty in this case? All that appears on the report is that the defendant had given a bond for £1,000, and that he said he had paid £450 on account.

Is this "a matter of mere account which cannot conveniently be tried in the ordinary way," which are the words of the section?

If the plaintiff did not dispute the alleged payment, there was nothing to be tried. If she did, was it not a proper question for a jury. Quâcunque viâ, how can it be within the section?

But, further, I contend that the question is not whether the case was really within the 3rd section of the Act or not; but whether it was so clearly within it as to render it the duty of an attorney to know that it was so. If it be reasonably doubtful, that doubt is itself a defence of Mr. Chapman.

Again, supposing the case to be clearly within the Act, what is the proper measure of damages? Surely, it is simply how much of defendant's own means, which would otherwise have been available for satisfaction of plaintiff's claim, have been withdrawn or lost by the delay; not, what was her chance of extorting money from the relatives of the lady whom defendant was about to marry, by arresting him on the wedding-day—a proceeding utterly abhorrent to any honourable mind, and differing from robbery only in its being without the pale of legal responsibility.

Yet this, so far as I can understand the reported case, seems to have been considered the duty of an attorney by the Lord Chief Justice of England!

Reports of Professional Insurance Offices.

LAW FIRE INSURANCE SOCIETY.

This Society held their annual general meeting on the 26th May, 1857, at the Society's office, Chancery-lane, London, at which the Report of the directors was read, and unanimously adopted.—It was nearly as follows:—

Your directors submit the usual comparative statement of the transactions of the Society in the year 1856, with those of the one immediately preceding it.—The sum insured in the year 1856 was £19,319,306; in the year 1855, £18,404,885; being an increase of £914,421.—The premium received in the year 1856 amounted to £21,715; in the year 1855, to £20,667; being an excess of £1,048.—The aggregate amount of duty paid to Government in the year 1856 was £28,929; in the year 1855, £27,525; showing an increase of £1,404.—It may be in the recollection of the shareholders that the amount of claims for loss made upon, and paid by, the Society during the year 1855 considerably exceeded that of any previous year; but that the average for the ten years during which the Society had then been in existence, was below that which the experience of other fire offices had exhibited. It will be seen by the transactions for the year 1856, that the ratio of loss to premium is similar to that of the years antecedent to 1855; and the directors think this affords an additional confirmation of the opinion they have always entertained, and from time to time expressed, of the excellent character of the risks of which the Society's business is composed.—The items of receipt and expenditure will be as usual read to the meeting, from the detailed accounts examined and signed by the auditors of the Society; from these accounts it will appear that the excess of receipt over expenditure for the year 1856, after payment of £6,250 interest to the proprietors, was 7,700*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.* in favour of the Society.

The following epitome of the balance-sheet will show the position of the affairs of the Society, on the 31st December, 1856:—

Shareholders paid-up Capital		125,000 0 0
Amount of Reserved Fund at end of 1855		33,926 12 6
Receipts for 1856	65,664 0 5
Payments for 1856, exclusive of Interest to the Proprietors	51,713 19 1
	13,950 1 4
Interest to Shareholders, 1856	6,250 0 0
Balance of General Insurance Account in favour of the Society at end of 1856		7,700 1 4
LIABILITIES.
Balance in hand due to Commissioners of Stamps for Duty for Christmas Quarter, 1856	8,419 17 5
Balance of unclaimed Interest and Bonus due to Shareholders	1,763 13 0
		10,183 10 5
Total Balance at end of 1856		£176,810 4 3

This Balance is composed of the following items—viz.

Government Securities—Cost	66,394 12 9
Mortgages and other Securities	81,000 0 0
Freehold Property in Chancery-lane	9,836 0 8
Houses in Gloucester-gardens	7,133 11 11
London Joint-Stock Bank on Deposit	5,000 0 0
Sundry Balances—Bankers, Agents, &c.	7,445 18 11
	£176,810 4 3

Your directors, governed by the favourable results of the Society's business for the past year, have determined on appropriating the sum of £6,250 as a bonus to the shareholders; they, therefore, declare an interest for the year ending at this meeting of 2*s.* 6*d.* per share, being 5 per cent. upon the paid-up capital of the Society, and also, in addition to such interest, a bonus of 2*s.* 6*d.* upon each share. The balance, 7,700*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*, of the general insurance account in favour of the Society for the year 1856, after deducting therefrom the amount of such bonus, £6,250 will be carried to the reserved fund, the growth of which has afforded such satisfaction to the proprietors, and which fund, thus increased, will amount to 35,876*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.*

SOLICITORS' AND GENERAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

The eleventh annual general meeting of the proprietors of this office was held on May 25th, at the Gray's-inn Coffee-house; Mr. S. E. Doune presided. The report of the directors stated, that, during the year ending that day, "the society has issued 236 policies, assuring £123,039, the annual premiums on which amount to £3,785, and has granted three annuities amounting to 36*l.* 13*s.* 7*d.* per annum. The claims which have arisen in the same period amount, with the bonuses, to £11,870, which sum is reduced to £10,870, a re-assurance in £1,000 having been effected in another office on one of the lives assured. From the commencement of the society to the present time the premiums received in respect of lapsed and discontinued policies have sufficed (after deducting the sums paid as consideration for the surrender of policies) to pay upwards of 55 per cent. of the total losses experienced. The income of the society derivable from premiums is now £25,240, and from investments £4,458, making an annual income of £29,698. The number of policies in force (exclusive of thirty-two annuities, amounting to £1,346 per annum) is 1,577, assuring the sum of £783,336, and producing, as before stated, an annual revenue of £25,240." The report, after some conversation, was adopted. Baron Watson, R. Malins, Esq., M.P., and Sir F. Kelly, M.P., were elected as new trustees of the society, and the directors retiring by rotation were severally re-elected. Mr. Druce was elected a director. A motion was made that £500 be paid to the directors for their past services; but an amendment was proposed to extend that sum to £700, which, after a brief discussion, was carried by a large majority. The retiring auditors were re-elected; and thanks having been voted to the scrutineers and the chairman, the meeting separated.

At a preliminary meeting, convened for the purpose, a resolution was come to recommending that henceforth the valuation and division of profits should be made quinquennially, instead of triennially.

Pending Measures of Law Reform.

PROBATES AND ADMINISTRATION BILL.

(As amended in Committee.)

This Bill proposes to abolish the testamentary jurisdiction of ecclesiastical and other courts in England, and that the same shall be exercised in the name of her Majesty in a court to be called the Court of Probate, of which there shall be one judge, who must have been an advocate of ten years' standing, or a barrister-at-law of fifteen years' standing. It is proposed to establish district registries (sec. 13), and that the clerks and officers of the Prerogative Court shall be transferred to like offices in the Court of Probate (sec. 16), existing diocesan registrars being entitled to be district registrars at the same places. The Court (sec. 23) to have throughout all England the same powers as the Prerogative Court now has within the province of Canterbury; and all duties which, by statute or otherwise, are imposed on or should be performed by ordinaries generally, or on or by the Prerogative Court, in respect of probates, administrations, or matters or causes testamentary within their respective jurisdictions, are to be performed by the Court of Probate; but no suits for legacies, or suits for the distribution of residues, shall be entertained by the Court. The registrars, &c., are to have power to administer oaths, and there are also to be commissioners to administer oaths, &c. The procedure and practice of the Court of Probate, except where otherwise provided by the Act, or by the rules or orders to be from time to time made under it, so far as the circumstances of the case will admit, are to be according to the present procedure and practice in the Prerogative Court. The witnesses (sec. 31), and, where necessary, the parties, in all contentious matters where their attendance can be had, are to be examined orally by or before the judge in open court; but the parties are to be at liberty to verify their respective cases, in whole or in part, by affidavit, but so that the deponent in every such affidavit shall, on the application of the opposite party, be subject to be cross-examined orally in open court, and after such cross-examination may be re-examined. The rules of evidence observed (sec. 33) in the superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster are to be applicable to and observed in the trial of all questions of fact in the Court of Probate; and (sec. 34) it is to be lawful for the judge of the Court of Probate to sit with the assistance of any judge or judges of any of the superior courts of law at Westminster, who, upon the request of the judge of the Court of Probate, may find it convenient to attend for that purpose.

Sec. 35 empowers the Court of Probate to direct an issue on any question of fact arising in any suit or proceeding under this Act to be tried in any of the superior Courts of Common Law, in the same manner as an issue may now be directed by the Court of Chancery. An issue is to be so directed in any case where an heir-at-law, cited or otherwise made party to the suit or proceeding, makes application to the Court of Probate for that purpose, and in any other case where all the parties to the suit or proceeding concur in such an application; and where any party or parties, other than such heir-at-law, make a like application, the other party or parties not concurring therein, and the Court shall refuse to direct such issue, such decision of the Court shall be subject to Appeal, as therein provided. Where an issue is directed, all motions for new trials shall be made in the court of common law.

Sec. 37 gives an appeal to her Majesty in Council, and such appeal is to be referred to the House of Lords; but no appeal from any interlocutory order of the Court of Probate is to be made without leave of the Court first obtained.

Advocates (sec. 38) are to be entitled to practise in all matters and causes whatsoever in the Court of Probate; and serjeants and barristers-at-law to practise in all contentious matters and causes in the said court. All persons who at the time of the passing of the Act shall have been admitted as advocates shall be entitled to practise as counsel in any of her Majesty's courts of law or equity in England, in like manner in all respects, and with the same rank and precedence, and with the same eligibility to appointments under Acts of Parliament or otherwise, as if they had respectively been duly called to the degree of barrister-at-law on the days on which they respectively were so admitted as advocates.

By sec. 40, every person who at the time of the passing of the Act is actually practising as a proctor in Doctors' Commons may be admitted a proctor of the Court of Probate, without payment of any fee or stamp duty; and, except as therein otherwise provided, the admission of persons to be proctors of the court shall be in the discretion of the judge, subject to the rules or orders to be made under the Act. And the proctors for the time being of the Court of Probate shall have the same rights, and be subject to the same obligations and liabilities, in respect of the transaction of the common form business, as the proctors of the Prerogative Court now have and are subject to in respect of the common form business of that Court; provided that nothing therein contained shall give any proctors now practising, or any persons hereafter admitted, any title to compensation in case the transaction of the business of the Court of Probate be thrown open to any other class of persons. It shall be lawful for the judge of the Court of Probate to admit any persons to practise as proctors in all or any of the district registries of the court, but nevertheless parties may apply to such district registries without the intervention of proctors.

Sec. 41 provides, that every person who at the time of the passing of the Act is actually serving or has served as an articled clerk to a person entitled to act as a proctor in the courts at Doctors' Commons, or in any ecclesiastical court in England, and who has not been admitted as a proctor, shall be entitled, at any time within one year after his having completed his full term of service as such articled clerk, to be admitted a proctor of the Court of Probate.

In all contentious causes and matters (sec. 42) solicitors and attorneys are to be at liberty to practise in the Court of Probate, with the same rights and subject to the same obligations and liabilities as proctors of the court.

Sec. 43 provides that probates and administrations may be granted in common form by district registrars in certain cases; but (sec. 45) the district registrar is not to grant probate or administration in any case in which there is contention as to the grant, until such contention is terminated or disposed of by decree or otherwise, or in any case where it otherwise appears to him that probate or administration ought not to be granted in common form. In cases of doubt (sec. 46) as to grant, he is to transmit a statement of the matter to the registrars of the Court of Probate, who are to obtain the direction of the judge in relation thereto. District registrars (sec. 47) are to transmit to the principal registry a list of the grants of probate and administration made by such district registrar, and also a copy of every will to which any such probate or administration relates. District registrars (sec. 48) are to preserve original wills.

Where it shall appear (sec. 50) by affidavit of the person applying for probate or administration, that the personal estate in respect of which such probate or administration should be granted, exclusive of what the deceased possessed as a trustee, but without deducting anything on account of the debts of the deceased, is under the value of £200; and that the deceased, at the time of his death, had no real estate, or that the value of his real estate was under £300, the judge of the county court having jurisdiction in the place in which it shall be sworn that the deceased had at the time of his death his fixed place of abode, shall have the contentious jurisdiction and authority of the Court of Probate in respect of questions as to the grant and revocation of probate of the will or administration of the effects of such deceased person, in case there be any contention in relation thereto; and the registrar (sec. 51) of such county court is to transmit certificate of decree for grant or revocation of probate. The affidavit of the facts giving the county court jurisdiction is to be conclusive (sec. 53), unless disproved while the matter is pending. Sec. 54 gives an appeal from the judge of the county court to any of the superior courts of common law, in like manner as is provided by the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61. There is to be an option (sec. 55) of applying to Court of Probate in every case. Where a will affecting real estate (sec. 57) is to be proved in solemn form, or is the subject of a contentious proceeding, the heir and persons interested in the real estate are to be cited. Where the will (sec. 58) is proved in solemn form, or its validity otherwise decided on, the decree of the Court is to be binding on the persons interested in the real estate. The heir in certain cases (sec. 59) is not to be cited, and where not cited he is not to be affected by probate. Probate or office copy (sec. 60) is to be evidence of the will in suits concerning real estate, save where the validity of the will is put in issue.

Sec. 62 proposes that there shall be one place of deposit under the control of the Court of Probate, in London or Middlesex, in which all the original wills brought into the Court, or of which probate or administration with the will annexed is granted under this Act in the principal registry thereof, and copies of all wills the originals whereof are to preserved in the district registries, shall be deposited and preserved.

Sec. 66 enables the Court, pending any suit touching the validity of the will, or for obtaining, recalling, or revoking any probate or any grant of administration, to appoint a general administrator of the personal estate of such deceased person without the right of distributing the residue of the personal estate; and the Court may appoint, under sec. 67, a receiver of real estate pendente lite.

All pending suits except appeals are to be transferred to the Court of Probate; and power is given (sec. 80) to judges whose jurisdiction is determined to deliver written judgments in causes standing for judgment within six weeks after the commencement of the Act. Depositories are to be provided (sec. 86) for the wills of living persons, who may deposit their wills therein, upon payment of certain fees. The Act is not to affect the stamp duties on probates and administrations (sec. 87). The judge of the Court of Probate is to fix a table of the fees to be taken by officers of court and by officers of county courts (sec. 90). None of the fees payable to the officers of the Court of Probate or of any county court in respect of business under the Act, except the fees of the district registrars for their own use, the fees of proctors, &c., are to be received in money, but by stamps (sec. 92).

Sec. 96 gives power to the Commissioners of the Treasury to grant to any judges, registrars, and other persons holding office in existing courts, who may sustain any loss of emoluments by reason of the passing of the Act, and who are not transferred or appointed by or under the Act to offices in the Court of Probate, such compensation as having regard to the tenure and nature of their respective offices and appointments, notwithstanding the provisions of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 77, s. 25, &c., the said Commissioners deem just and proper.

The remaining clauses principally relate to the compensation of particular individuals, and to the management of the fee fund. The following is the definition of common form business in the interpretation clause:—

> Common form business shall mean the business of obtaining probate and administration where there is no contention as to the right thereto, including the passing of probates and administrations through the Court of Probate in contentious cases when the contest is terminated, and all business of a non-contentious nature to be taken in the Court in matters of testacy and intestacy, not being proceedings in any suit, and also the business of lodging caveats against the grant of probate or administration.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

Sect. 2 proposes to enact that as soon as the Act shall come into operation, all jurisdiction now exercisable by any ecclesiastical court in England in respect of divorces à mensâ et thoro, and in all matters matrimonial, shall cease to be so exercisable, except so far as relates to the granting of marriage licences.

Sects. 3, 4, and 5 relate to the enforcement of prior decrees or orders, pending suits, and the jurisdiction of the present judges in relation to causes standing for judgment.

By sect. 6 all jurisdiction over causes matrimonial is to be exercised in the name of her Majesty in a court of record to be called "The Court of Marriage and Divorce," to consist of (sect. 7) the Chancellor, the Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and the Judge of her Majesty's Court of Probate, constituted by any Act of the present session; any three of them, of whom the judge of the Court of Probate shall be one, to be a quorum.

The judge of the Court of Probate is to be called (sect. 8) the Judge Ordinary of the said court, and is to have full authority, either alone or with one or more of the other judges of the said court, to hear and determine all matters arising therein, except petitions for the dissolving of a marriage, and applications for new trials of questions or issues before a jury, and, except as last aforesaid, such Judge may exercise all the powers and authority of the said court; and (sect. 9) during the temporary absence of the Judge Ordinary, the Lord Chancellor may authorise the Master of the Rolls, or either of the Lords Justices, or any Vice-Chancellor, or any judge of the superior courts of law at Westminster, to act as Judge Ordinary of the said Court of Marriage and Divorce, and the Judge so acting is to exercise all the jurisdiction which might have been exercised by the Judge Ordinary alone.

Sects. 10, 11, and 12 relate to the sittings, the seal, and the officers of the court.

Sect. 13 proposes that all persons who have been admitted to practise as advocates or proctors respectively in any ecclesiastical court in England are to have the exclusive right of practising in the court in all matters which the Judge Ordinary may, without the concurrence of any other judge, hear and determine; and the advocates and proctors, and also all barristers, attorneys, and solicitors entitled to practise in the superior courts at Westminster, are to be entitled to practise in the court in all cases of petitions for the dissolving of a marriage, subject to such regulations as may be made by the said court.

By Sect. 14, in all suits and proceedings other than proceedings to dissolve any marriage, the court is to give relief on principles conformable to those on which the ecclesiastical courts have heretofore acted, but subject to the provisions contained in this Act, and to the rules and orders under it.

Sect. 15 enables any wife to present a petition to the said court praying for a divorce à mensâ et thoro on the ground that she has been deserted by her husband, and that such desertion has continued without reasonable excuse for two years or upwards and the court, on being satisfied of the truth of the allegations of such petition, may, if it shall see fit, decree a divorce à mensâ et thoro accordingly, and may make any order for alimony which it may deem just, and may (sect. 16) direct payment of alimony to wife or trustee.

Under sect. 17 a wife divorced à mensâ et thoro is to be considered as to property a feme sole; and also (sect. 18) for purposes of contract and suing.

By sect. 19, on adultery of wife or incest of husband, a petition for dissolution of marriage may be presented.

Sect. 22 enables the Court to pronounce a decree declaring a marriage to be dissolved; but the Court is not to be bound to pronounce such decree if the petitioner shall, in the opinion of the Court, have been guilty of unreasonable delay in presenting or prosecuting his petition, or of cruelty towards the other party to the marriage, or of having deserted the other party before the adultery complained of, and without reasonable excuse.

Under sect. 23 the Court may, on decree, on the petition of a husband, make it a condition that the petitioner shall, to the satisfaction of the Court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money, or such annual sum of money for any term not exceeding her own life, as, having regard to her fortune (if any), to the ability of the husband, and to the conduct of the parties, it shall deem reasonable.

Sect. 24 gives the Court power, before making its final decree, to make interim orders, and to make provision, in the final decree, with respect to the custody, maintenance, and education of the children.

Questions of fact (sect. 25) may be tried before the Court and a jury, as at Nisi Prius; or the Court may (sect. 26) direct issues to try any fact.

The remaining part of the Bill relates for the most part to procedure only. The 32nd section enacts that witnesses shall be sworn and examined orally in open court; provided that parties shall be at liberty to verify their respective cases in whole or in part by affidavit, but so that the deponent in every such affidavit shall, on the application of the opposite party, or by direction of the Court, be subject to be cross-examined orally in open court, and after such cross-examination may be re-examined by the party by whom such affidavit was filed; and by sect. 34 the rules of evidence observed in the superior courts of common law at Westminster are to be applicable to and observed in the trial of all questions of fact in the Court of Marriage and Divorce.

It is proposed (sect. 41) that there should be an appeal from the Judge Ordinary to the full Court; and (sect. 42) an appeal thence to the House of Lords in case of petition for dissolution of a marriage; but no such appeal to the House of Lords shall be had on any matter except on a question of law to be stated in a case to be prepared by the party appealing and approved of by the Court.

By sect. 43 liberty is given to parties to marry again when the time limited for appealing shall have expired, and no appeal shall have been presented, or when any such appeal shall have been dismissed, or when in the result of any appeal any marriage shall be declared to be dissolved.

By sect. 44, after the Act shall have come into operation, no action shall be maintainable for criminal conversation unless the person bringing the same shall have first obtained, under the provisions of this Act, a final decree dissolving his marriage.

The following clause has been added upon the motion of Lord St. Leonards: Where a wife is deserted by her husband, and that desertion has continued without reasonable excuse for one year or upwards, and the wife is maintaining herself by her own lawful industry, it shall be lawful for the wife to make application to any justice of the peace, and show cause that she has reason to fear that her husband or her husband's creditors will interfere with her earnings, and thereupon it shall be lawful for the justice to give to the wife an order restraining the husband, or creditor, from interfering with the wife's earnings or property in manner aforesaid; which order shall be in force for six months from the date thereof, unless sooner discharged or varied by an order of two or more justices of the peace in petty sessions, and while in force shall protect the wife and her earnings and property aforesaid against all actions, &c., by the husband or creditor; and any such wife shall be at liberty to apply for a renewal of such order at the expiration of the former order; and any person acting in wilful disobedience to any such order, shall be liable to a fine, and in default of payment, to imprisonment.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 22.

PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

The House went into committee on this Bill.

Clause 1 was agreed to. Upon clause 2,

Lord ST. LEONARDS moved an amendment, the object of which was to withdraw real estates from the jurisdiction under this Bill.

The LORD CHANCELLOR opposed the amendment, and said that the Bill would not involve the necessity of probate of real estate in ordinary cases; but he proposed, that, when there was a contest, probate should be conclusive both as to real and personal estate.

The committee divided. The numbers were:—For the amendment, 35; against it, 56—majority, 21.

The clause was then agreed to, as were also clauses 3 and 4.

On clause 5, Lord WYNFORD observed, that, on the previous discussion, the Lord Chancellor had represented that it was the opinion of Dr. Lushington that one judge would be sufficient for all the duties—Admiralty, matrimonial, and probate. He was informed, however, that the opinion of that learned gentleman had since been modified, and that he was inclined to think that one judge would not be adequate for the purpose. He, therefore, wished to know whether it was intended to leave the present clause as it now stood?

The LORD CHANCELLOR was afraid that he had unintentionally gone beyond what his learned friend authorised him to say. The learned gentleman was now inclined to think, without expressing a confident opinion on the point, that one judge would not be sufficient, in consequence of the increase of Admiralty business. It was, however, unnecessary to make any alteration in the present clause.

This clause was then agreed to; and clauses 6 to 22 inclusive, with some amendments.

Upon clause 23, which provides that the Court shall have throughout all England the same powers as the Prerogative Court within the province of Canterbury,

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply to suggestions of Lords ST. LEONARDS and CAMPBELL, acknowledged the desirability of making probates everywhere interchangeable; but said, that they would first make this Bill perfect for England, after which there would be no difficulty in framing an Act to extend to Scotland and Ireland.

The clause was then agreed to; as were clauses 24 to 36.

On clause 37, Lord ST. LEONARDS proposed that the appeal should be to the House of Lords instead of to the Privy Council. To which the LORD CHANCELLOR assented, and the clause as thus amended was agreed to.

Clauses 38 to 95 were then agreed to, after certain verbal alterations.

On clause 96, the Bishop of LONDON observed, that no provision was made for the payment of the Chancellor and Registrar of the diocess of London; and he hoped, that, before the report was brought up, the noble and learned lord would provide for the payment of those important officials, not only in the diocess of London, but in other dioceses.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that, although he could not admit the propriety of imposing a tax on the probate of wills in order to maintain ecclesiastical officials, he would consider the suggestion of the right rev. prelate.

The clause was then agreed to, as were also the remaining clauses of the Bill, and the schedules.

Monday, May 25.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The House went into committee on this Bill.

Clauses 1 to 5 inclusive were agreed to. On clause 6, The LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply to Earl GREY, said, it was not his intention to propose that questions arising under the present Bill should be decided by county court judges.

Earl GREY said, it seemed to him to be a bad practice to constitute courts of persons whose time was at present fully occupied by other business. It was perfectly clear, that, if the tribunal was constituted as now proposed, one of two things must happen—either such a scale of fees would be created as would debar all persons who could not command a large sum of money, or the court must very soon be choked up by the mass of business that would come before it. He thought that kind of divorce which simply implied separation ought to be made more accessible than this Bill made it to the humbler classes of society. The right course would be, to allow a wife, in cases of cruelty, to apply to the ordinary tribunals for a separation, instead of being compelled to go to a special tribunal appointed for that purpose. The ordinary tribunal might have the power to hear the case, and then report the result to some central authority that might be constituted, that authority being enabled to grant divorce à mensâ et thoro.

Lord CAMPBELL thought that the court proposed by the Bill was the best that could be formed for that purpose; and he doubted whether the new court would be at all overborne by the weight of business.

The clause was then agreed to; as were also clauses up to 13.

After clause 14, Lord St. LEONARDS moved to insert a clause giving a woman deserted by her husband for one year or upwards a short and summary remedy for the protection of her property, by application to a justice of the peace, whose order, restraining the husband from interfering with her property, should be in force for six months, unless appealed against and renewable.

Lord CAMPBELL thought the amendment would produce great confusion. The object was most laudable, but the means were utterly futile.

The proposed clause was agreed to on a division—Contents, 52; non-contents, 44: majority, 8.

Clause 15 was, upon the motion of Lord St. LEONARDS, negatived.

On clause 19 the Earl of DONOUGHMORE moved, as an amendment, that a wife should be placed upon the same footing as her husband with regard to divorce à vinculo matrimonii.

Lord LYNDHURST supported the amendment.

The LORD CHANCELLOR and Lord CAMPBELL opposed it; and, on a division, it was rejected.

Lord LYNDHURST proposed an amendment to the clause, to the effect that wilful and malicious desertion for five years should be a sufficient ground on which a dissolution of marriage might be pronounced.

The LORD CHANCELLOR opposed the amendment as one which would lead to the greatest difficulties.

Lord CAMPBELL thought the amendment was contrary to the principle of the Bill, which was to change, not the law of divorce, but the administration thereof.

On a division, the majority against the amendment was 89.

On clause 21, the Earl of MALMESBURY moved an amendment prohibiting persons from petitioning for divorce who should be proved to have notoriously cohabited together before marriage.

The LORD CHANCELLOR saw no objection to the introduction of a provision to meet such cases, and said he would consider the subject before the report was brought up.

The clause was then agreed to, as was also clause 22.

On clause 23, the Bishop of OXFORD called attention to the circumstance that the Bill made no provision for the allowance of alimony to a wife who obtained a divorce against her husband.

The LORD CHANCELLOR expressed his readiness to consider the propriety of altering the clause.

The Earl of DERBY gave notice that Lord St. Leonards would bring forward on the report a clause constituting adultery a misdemeanor, and imposing a fine on the adulterer.

On the 43rd clause, giving liberty to parties to re-marry, the Bishop of OXFORD moved that it be omitted.

The Archbishop of CANTERBURY proposed, as an amendment, that the liberty of re-marriage should be restricted to the party on whose petition the marriage shall have been dissolved; which was carried.

Lord CAMPBELL moved, it being then nearly 1 o'clock, that the House should resume; which was agreed to.

PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

On the bringing-up of the report of amendments, Earl STANHOPE objected to the transfer of the right of appeal from the Privy Council (as it originally stood in the Bill) to the House of Lords. If the amendment was adhered to, he thought their appellate jurisdiction ought to be placed on a more satisfactory footing than at present.

The Earl of MALMESBURY presented a petition from the proctors of Doctors' Commons against the Bill, signed by 87 out of 104 proctors, setting forth that the Bill if passed would reduce the supposed amount of their profits from £90,000 to £15,000 a-year.

Lord WYNFORD instanced the more liberal manner in which another class of practitioners were to be treated, compensation being guaranteed to the office-holders in the different episcopal courts throughout the country. A great many of those offices were held by persons who had never practised in any court whatever.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, he intended by an alteration of the 96th clause in the Bill to restrict compensation to persons who had actually discharged duties.

The report was then received.

TRANSPORTATION AND PENAL SERVITUDE BILL.

This Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Friday, June 5th.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The House having resolved into committee on this Bill, the Bishop of OXFORD asked permission to move a proviso at the end of the 43rd clause to enable clergymen on conscientious objections to refuse to perform the marriage service over any person who had been married and divorced during the lifetime of the party from whom he or she had been divorced. Which was lost on a division by a majority of 52.

On clause 44, relating to the action for criminal conversation, the LORD CHANCELLOR stated his reasons for leaving the action of crim. con. untouched, as in a former Bill, but enabling it to be brought after divorce was obtained, thus making it a condition precedent that the wife's guilt should be established.

Lord LYNDHURST objected to the principle of the law as it now existed, and proposed therefore, by way of amendment, to strike out words in the clause, the effect of which would be to abolish altogether the action of crim. con.

Lord WENSLEYDALE opposed the amendment, believing the action of crim. con. to be coeval with the law of England, and its principle recognised by several of the continental nations. And he objected to the postponement of the action until after a divorce was obtained, because it would preclude Roman Catholics from obtaining any redress for injuries of this nature.

Lord CAMPBELL considered the action of crim. con., as now existing, a discredit to the law of this country, which was almost the universal opinion of the English bar and of the English people. He should vote for the amendment, with the understanding that some substitute should be brought forward, treating the offence as a crime.

Earl GRANVILLE suggested, as their lordships seemed agreed that there was great objection to the present system of bringing an action for damages, and also that there was difficulty in finding a sufficient substitute, that the amendment should be now withdrawn, on the understanding that the whole subject should be considered on the report.

The Earl of DERBY suggested that the words now proposed to be left out should be omitted, and that the first words of the proposition of Lord St. Leonards should be embodied in the Bill, so that the effect of the clause would be to provide that it should not be competent for any person to bring an action for damages for criminal conversation, but that whoever should commit adultery with a married woman should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said that he would have no objection to that, and the clause as amended was agreed to.

The remaining clauses and the preamble were agreed to.

The House resumed, and the Bill was reported.

Friday, May 22.

TRANSPORTATION AND PENAL SERVITUDE BILL.

Several members urged the postponement of the third reading; which was resisted by Sir G. GREY, and the Bill ultimately passed.

Monday, May 25.

THE GRAND JURY SYSTEM.

Sir. F. THESIGER gave notice that on Tuesday, the 9th of June, he should ask for leave to bring in a Bill to dispense with the attendance of grand juries at the Central Criminal Court and courts of quarter session within the police district, except in certain cases.

THE INNS OF COURT.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in reply to Mr. WARREN, said that her Majesty's Government had expected that the Inns of Court would have voluntarily adopted the measures recommended by the commission for securing the great object of providing for the effectual education of students for the bar. He was sorry, however, to say that there was a division between the different Inns of Court upon the subject. The Inner and Middle Temple were desirous of carrying out the plan proposed by the commissioners, but Lincoln's-inn and Gray's-inn were opposed to such a course, a resolution to that effect having been passed by a majority of one vote. If that state of things should continue, it would be the duty of Government to introduce a Bill upon the subject, but they did not intend to do so until next session.

Thursday, May 28.

JOINT-STOCK BANKS.

Mr. HEADLAM asked whether Government intended to introduce a measure during the present session to regulate the construction of joint-stock banks, and more especially to apply the principle of limited liability to such establishments?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER answered in the affirmative.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES, &c., BILL.

This Bill was read a second time, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL having expressed his readiness to consider any alterations which might be proposed in it in committee.

PRIVATE BILLS.

FRIDAY EVENING.

The last week has been rather a dull one as regards business. The House did not sit on Tuesday, out of compliment to her Majesty's birthday; and Wednesday being the Derby day, hon. members gave themselves a holiday, and no doubt a House could have been made without much trouble on Epsom Downs. The committees followed the example of the House, except "the Liverpool group," "the Broad and Narrow group," and "the Lancaster and Carlisle group," which stuck to their work as usual. The Broad and Narrow Gauge Committee are going into the whole of the old question. The South-Western case is closed, and the counsel for the opposing landowners and the Salisbury Market-house Company have been heard against the South-Western Bill; and the first witness for the Southampton, Bristol, and South Wales Company has been called. Several witnesses have been examined on behalf of the South-Western Company, including some of the leading City men engaged in colonial trade, one of the great questions being whether Southampton will ever become a port for colonial produce, so as to compete with London and Liverpool. The arrangements between the broad and narrow gauge have also occupied much attention. It may safely be calculated that, inclusive of the Whitsuntide holidays, another fortnight or three weeks must elapse before the committee decide on the two schemes.

The Liverpool Group Committee have been mainly occupied on the Mersey Conservancy Bill, which, in plain English, is a contest between Manchester and Liverpool. If the Mersey Bill is passed, the effect will be, that the power of regulating the port will remain in the hands of the corporation, but the funds, amounting to a very large sum, will be devoted to the improvement of the port, and taken out of the private management of the corporation of Liverpool. Sir James Graham is in the chair, and no doubt the whole matter will be sifted to the bottom; but the question is, whether there will be sufficient time left to get the Bills through second reading in the Lords before the 21st of July, which is the last day for so doing. The cause of Manchester being interested in the question is, that Manchester goods are liable to the port dues of Liverpool, and the manufacturers are trying hard to obtain emancipation.

The question before the Lancaster and Carlisle Committee involves, in fact, a death struggle between the Great Northern, and North-Western, and Midland Companies. The length of line in dispute is of small importance as regards distance, but the object aimed at by the Great Northern is to get on to the North-Western line, and so book through from the Great Northern Station in London to Glasgow and Edinburgh. If the Great Northern succeed, they will have by far the shortest route to Scotland, and doubtless there will be a ruinous competition, similar to that which took place a few months back, when both companies, Great Northern and North-Western, were carrying passengers to Peterborough and back, first class, for three or four shillings. At the first blush, the Great Northern Bill looks like, what is called in Parliamentary language, a "cuckoo's-nest scheme," or, in other words, an attempt by one company to lay their eggs in another bird's nest. With such an able and industrious chairman as Sir James Buller East, there is no fear but that ample justice will be done. Mr. Beckett Denison, of Big Ben notoriety, and son of the chairman of the Great Northern Company, appears indefatigable in his attempts to follow up all the ins and outs of the story, and there was no little amount of clever fencing between the learned gentleman and some of the old hands, who have been in the witness-box any number of times during the last ten or fifteen years.

The group of Road Bills is progressing steadily, and the Ely Tidal Harbour Group may almost be said to be "dragging its slow length along," although in reality such is not the case, as the interests at stake are very heavy, and the case involves a large amount of evidence which cannot be hurried over.

All the committees have adjourned over Whitsuntide, and will not meet again till Thursday. Committees on six new groups will meet on the 4th of June — viz. the Kent Railway group, an Irish railway group, a Scotch railway group, and a railway group which may be called a colliery group, as the Bills mostly involve interests affecting the coal districts. There is also a gas and water group, and a remarkably mottled group, commencing with a Canadian railway and land company, and winding up with a Bill relating to Salford borough. There is also a Bill in this group relating to the recovery of sunken vessels, so the committee cannot complain of a dearth of variety of evidence. Four committees, not on railways, are appointed for the week commencing the 8th of June. One group, N, relates principally to metropolitan improvement and local gas and water; P comprises the Tweed Fisheries; Q the Weaver Navigation; and R the Watchet Harbour Trusts. The railway groups 1 and 8 are fixed for the week commencing 15th June. 1 comprises Bills relating to Metropolitan Railways, and a Reading Junction Railway; and 8 is composed of Manchester Railway Bills.

The grand week of parliamentary business will commence with June 8th, when it is supposed that as many as twenty committees will be sitting at the same time.

BARNES, DIANA (widow of EDWARD BARNES, late of Tirley, Gloucestershire, Gent.), now residing at a private lunatic asylum, called Sandywell-park, near Cheltenham.—Her heirs or next of kin to come in and prove their kindred before E. Winslow, Esq., Master in Lunacy, at 45 Lincoln's-inn-fields. DIANA BARNES has been twice married, first, to J. DIPPER, jun., Southwick, Tewkesbury, Gent., who died about thirty-eight years since; and, secondly, to said E. BARNES. Her maiden name was TOMKINS. She had a sister, MARY, who married JOHN BROMAGE, and died, leaving issue a daughter, named DIANA BROMAGE, and a son, R. TOMKINS, locksmith, at Rugeley, and who died in 1856.
CAMPBELL, JAMES (who died in Jan. 1856), rope manufacturer, Red-bank, Manchester.—His next of kin, or their legal personal representatives, to come in and prove their claims on or before June 22, at office of District Registrar, 4 Norfolk-st., Manchester.
EVANS, BLANCHE (who died in March, 1841), St. Melon's, Monmouthshire, spinster.—Her next of kin at time of her death, or their legal personal representatives, to come in and make out their claims on or before June 24, at V. C. Stuart's Chambers.
SCOTT, JOHN, Ballarat, Co. Grenville, Victoria, storekeeper, and formerly of Stewart Inn (or Stewarton?), Glasgow, baker.—His heirs or heiresses at law are requested to communicate immediately, by letter or otherwise, with Messrs. Grace & Yoole, town clerks, St. Andrews, Scotland, who will furnish the heirs with information regarding the said JOHN SCOTT'S estates.—St. Andrews, May 18, 1857.
SERGESON, JOSEPH (who died in Feb. 1857), Liverpool, grocer.—Next of kin to come in and prove their claims on or before June 22, at office of District Registrar, 1 North John-st., Liverpool.
TOMLINS, FRANCIS.—Next of kin to come in and prove their claims on or before May 6, 1858, at V.C. Kindersley's Chambers. FRANCIS TOMLINS was the son of WILLIAM TOMLINS, coach-builder, in Brunswick-st., Hackney-rd. He left London for Swan River in 1829, and was residing, in 1836, at Hobart Town, and entitled to a small portion of money in the Court of Chancery.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The course of the market in the English Funds this week has been nearly the same as last week. There was a gradual improvement for the first three days which has been all lost subsequently, therefore there is not any noticeable variation from this day week. Throughout the week the demand for money both in the Stock Exchange and in the discount market has been active and increasing. The variation in the French Funds has been similar to that in the English Funds, other Foreign Funds have been steady without animation. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 23rd May, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,031,480 being a decrease of £213,445, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £9,804,827, shewing a decrease of £48,782 when compared with the previous return.

Count d'Argout the governor of the Bank of France retires after holding that post of high responsibility more than twenty years. A letter has been published by M. Pereire the President of the Crédit Mobilier, in reply to certain statements in the London daily press relative to his supposed family connection with M. Charles Thurneyssen, and reflecting on his management of the Crédit Mobilier; and M. Pereire complains of what he designates as insinuations, and unfounded reports.

The Africa from New York has brought £307,000 nearly all in gold, and there have been several other arrivals of specie of considerable amount. It is estimated that the Indus will take out with the mail to China, on the 4th June, £700,000 or more in silver and gold.

The returns of the Board of Trade for the month of April have been issued this week, and shew a large increase when compared with the corresponding month of last year. The increase is more than £560,000, being at the rate of nearly 6 per Cent. additional to the returns of that month. The largest increase is under the heads of cotton yarn, and iron and steel. Reports from the manufacturers of Manchester, Leicester, Huddersfield, and other places, say there is no improvement in the demand for goods, and that stocks are augmenting in their hands.

In the Corn Market at Mark-lane an advance of from 2s. to 3s. per quarter has been established. Reports from the country markets generally show some advance, and flour also is higher in price. In barley and oats prices tend upwards. The supply of grain from abroad since the late favourable change in wind and weather has only been to a moderate extent. The prospect of harvest is represented as being good in England. In France all accounts concur in describing the growing crops as excellent. The last reports from the provincial corn markets announce that they are well supplied with wheat. The farmers feel the necessity for clearing out their granaries in expectation of an abundant harvest. The appearance of the vines in the wine-growing departments has greatly improved of late. Nevertheless, the price of wine is not decreasing, but the holders of stock are more willing to sell. Large quantities of foreign wine continue to arrive in the South of France.

A railway from the Danube to the harbour of Kostendje, in the Black Sea, is said to be the intended result of plans which have been many years before the Porte. The river approaches within forty miles of the coast, and is then turned off by high lands to the north, and flows a distance of two hundred miles of very bad navigation before it falls into the sea. A canal was projected, but was found likely to prove difficult and expensive if not impracticable. The cost of the railway is expected to be moderate. The advantage to the trade of the Danubian Principalities will be very great. The question of the administration of those provinces remains undecided. The unionists complain of persecution. England acts with Austria in opposition to the union, and both are understood to agree with the views of the Porte. France acts in support of the union, in favour of which there is a strong expression of opinion by the people themselves, without any movement on the other side sufficiently manifest to demand attention.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, JUNE 6, 1857.

FRAUDS BY TRUSTEES AND DIRECTORS.

The Bill of the Attorney-General, to make better provision for the punishment of frauds committed by trustees, bankers, and other persons intrusted with property, is one of the boldest, and, we think, also one of the most masterly, of modern attempts at the improvement of the criminal law. In every respect it is a great innovation on existing precedents. It proposes to enlarge the operation of the law, not by merely including within its grasp a special offence by this or that particular description of offenders, but by embracing in large and apt words the whole body of criminals whose immunity has hitherto been the standing reproach of our jurisprudence. The old maxim, that a person in a fiduciary position could not by breach of trust commit a crime, will, if this Bill should pass, be utterly and at once swept away. If a man appropriates money intrusted to his care, he will, by the present law, incur a debt, and may be compelled to make restitution. By Sir Richard Bethell's Bill he will be guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable with penal servitude for seven years, or with such measure of fine or imprisonment, or both, as the Court may see fit to award. Receivers of misappropriated trust property, with knowledge of the fraud, will be subject to the same condemnation; and every fraudulent appropriation by bankers, merchants, brokers, attorneys, or bailees, of fiduciary property, as well as every fraudulent sale under a power of attorney, will subject the offender to the penalties of the Act. Besides these large general clauses, an attempt is made to reach the especial devices by which such swindles as the Royal British Bank are commonly worked. As a general rule, the acts of the very worst directors, unless they are also the very clumsiest, are just outside of the definition of fraudulent appropriation. Even Mr. Humphrey Brown could scarcely be said to have appropriated the moneys of the bank in the strict sense in which the term must be interpreted in a penal statute. But he and a good many others would have been hit by the clauses of this Bill, which make it a criminal offence to be privy to the falsification of the books of a company, or wilfully to concur in any materially false written statement, with intent to defraud shareholders, or to induce any person to become a shareholder, or to make an advance to the company. Fictitious dividends and carefully cooked balance-sheets have been the great engines of fraud in the management of joint-stock companies. All modes of auditing have proved ineffectual to secure bona fides in these important particulars when directors have been minded to cheat their constituents and the public. One board has surpassed another in roguery, until general discredit was thrown on the whole system, and the most upright managers of companies could scarcely escape the suspicion which was engendered. The Bill strikes at the root of the evil, and, by making the machinery of misrepresentation itself the crime, it will, we believe, effectually check the growth of dishonesty on the part of directors and officers. He would be a very ingenious and a very bold man who should concoct and carry out a systematic scheme of joint-stock fraud in the face of such enactments as are now proposed; and though every Act is said to have a gap for a coach-and-six, we confess ourselves unable to guess where directors will find the practicable breach. The extension of the definition of trust property, so as to include not only the original subject of a trust, but all property into which it may have been converted, and anything acquired by the proceeds, seems equally to shut out fraudulent trustees from all chance of escape.

It is impossible not to see that the vigorous sweep of the Bill is due to the unusually large generality of the language employed, and it deserves to be carefully and anxiously considered, whether, in aiming at energetic action, the Attorney-General may not have endangered some who would not be properly included in the class of criminal trustees. The first clause, which relates to offences by trustees in general, is sufficient to embrace almost every breach of trust for which the Court of Chancery would order restitution, if committed in violation of good faith and with intent to defraud; and though of course there is no hardship in punishing a man who uses his trust with a fraudulent intention, it would be a rather nervous position for any trustee who had made an improper investment, or committed some other trifling irregularity, to feel that his only security against a prison consisted in satisfying a jury of the purity of his intentions. It is almost impossible to frame a criminal statute without making the intent enter into the essence of the definition of the crime; and yet this is just the sort of thing on which twelve jurymen are very apt to err, though generally it must be owned on the side of leniency. Still there must always be so many cases in which trusts will be found not to have been quite accurately carried out, that there would, if the clause stood alone, be some possibility of half the trustees in the kingdom, who might happen to fall out with their cestuis que trust, being brought to the bar of the Old Bailey. Take the case of a trustee keeping money in his hands longer than he ought to do, and not separating it from his general account. The Court of Chancery is strict enough in such cases, by charging interest or compelling the restoration of the profits made by the money. But, under the first clause of the proposed statute, it might be submitted to a jury in every such instance, whether there was not an intent to defraud; and if found in the affirmative, a trustee who had been rather careless than criminal would be liable to the punishment of a convict. The possibility of such a result is, we think, sufficient justification for the provision that no prosecution shall be commenced under that clause without the sanction of a Judge or of the Attorney-General. As a general rule, we do not like the plan of giving the functions of a grand jury to the law officers or the judges; but this is an exceptional case, and we do not well see how honest trustees could otherwise have been effectually protected from malicious prosecutions. As the Bill stands, there is no doubt that all who have not acted fraudulently will be perfectly safe, and the judges will certainly ignore every indictment founded on flimsy pretexts. It is material to observe that the clauses against directors and members of joint-stock companies are not within this provision, but the offences described are too definite to need it. The 2nd clause, which makes it an offence for bankers, merchants, brokers, attorneys, and agents, in violation of good faith, and with intent to defraud, to employ trust-property for their own use, is not apparently within the scope of the special protection, unless, indeed, the phrase in the 12th section, "a prosecution for any offence included in the 1st section," be intended to embrace all prosecutions for offences which might be classed under clause 1, although the actual proceedings may be taken under clause 2. This is a point which ought to be made more clear, and it will deserve consideration whether the safeguard ought not to extend to the 2nd as well as to the 1st section of the statute. These matters will doubtless be fully considered in committee; but, subject to a few such questions of detail, we have no hesitation in pronouncing the Bill the most able project of criminal law reform which has been brought forward for many a year.

ATTORNEY'S LIABILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE.

It will be remembered, that, in our last impression, we examined into the chief of those reported cases, in which the attorney suing on his bill has been met by the objection that the services charged for were altogether useless. In further pursuance of the subject, it now becomes necessary to investigate those cases in which the attorney himself is sued by his client for negligence.

The doctrine, that, in order to ground such an action, there must appear to have been gross negligence or ignorance, was first satisfactorily laid down by Lord Mansfield in the case of Pitt v. Yalden (A. D. 1767, 4 Burr. 2060). And the following observations made by that most accomplished lawyer, contain much that is of moment with regard to the present question.

"Attorneys ought to be protected when they act to the best of their skill and knowledge. Every man is liable to error, and I should be very sorry it should be taken for granted that an attorney is answerable for every error or mistake, and to be punished for it by being charged with the debt which he was employed to recover for his client. An attorney ought not to be liable in cases of reasonable doubt. The attorneys were country attorneys, and might not, and probably did not, know that this point was settled here above."

The case of Reece v. Righy (A.D. 1821, 4 Barn. & Ald. 202), does not appear inconsistent with this doctrine; though we should have thought the negligence had been condoned by the plaintiff himself. The defendant had been retained to sue C. for a debt. In support of that case F. was a material witness. This witness the plaintiff had undertaken to have in court at the proper time; and had directed the defendant not to subpœna him. On the day of trial, the plaintiff's foreman told the defendant that F. was ready to be examined in an adjoining coffee-house. The defendant, on this, without inquiring further, but relying on the plaintiff's previous assurance, suffered the cause to be called on. F. was not forthcoming, and the plaintiff was nonsuited. It was left to the jury to say whether, under the circumstances, the defendant had used reasonable care and diligence in not previously ascertaining if F. had arrived, and if he had not, in not withdrawing the record. The jury found for the plaintiff, and the Court refused to disturb the verdict. So, gross negligence appears to have been committed in Swannell v. Ellis (A.D. 1823, 1 Bing. 347), where the defendant had been employed to bring an ejectment against a tenant of the plaintiff, for breach of a covenant to repair. The question of repair had been referred at Nisi Prius to a surveyor, and the defendant neglected to attend the reference; in consequence of which the plaintiff had to pay costs in the ejectment, to the amount of £60, and also sold the premises for £100 less than he would otherwise have done. The plaintiff obtained a verdict for £160. This verdict the Court refused to set aside; although it was urged that the £60 would have fallen on the plaintiff at all events, and that there was nothing to show, that, had the reference been proceeded with, any repairs would have been found to be necessary, or any award made in favour of the plaintiff. But Park, J., said, the question of repairs had been referred to a surveyor, who was prevented from ascertaining them by the negligence of the defendants, and "that the jury were not confined to the £100 loss incurred on the sale of the premises." With submission to Mr. Justice Park, we think that, in this case, the damages ought to have been reduced.

Ireson v. Pearman (A.D. 1825, 8 B. & Cr. 799) was another action for negligence. It appeared that the defendant had been employed by a purchaser to inspect the title to an estate; and that he laid before counsel an abstract stating that one T. M., under whom the vendor claimed, was seised in fee of the premises, and omitted to set out certain deeds by which it appeared that he was not so seised. This was held to be negligence sufficient to support the action; "for, although it may not be part of the duty of an attorney to know the legal operation of conveyances, yet it is his duty not to draw wrong conclusions from the deeds laid before him, but to state the deeds to the counsel whom he consults; or he must draw conclusions at his peril."

It was on the principle laid down by Lord Mansfield in Pitt v. Yalden, that Laidler v. Elliott (A.D. 1825, 3 B. & Cr. 738) was decided in favour of the attorney. Here the negligence relied on, was the failing to charge one H. in execution within the proper time, according to the course of the Courts; in consequence of which he was superseded, and the plaintiff lost the benefit of his imprisonment. But the Court held the action was not maintainable, because it had been settled that there must be crassa negligentia to make an attorney liable; and that here the question, whether or no H. was supersedeable depended on the construction of a Rule of Court (H. T., 26 Geo. 3) which was of doubtful construction. Again, in one of the leading cases upon this subject, that of Godefroy v. Dalton (A. D. 1830, 6 Bing. 460), the same conclusion was arrived at; and some useful observations are made in the judgment of Tindal, C. J. The circumstances of this case were as follows:—The defendant had been employed by the plaintiff to conduct an action for negligence against one Jay (another attorney); and had, under the advice of counsel, produced the prothonotary's book, containing the minute of a certain judgment by default (the suffering of which was the negligence complained of), instead of the record or authenticated copy of the judgment itself. This was held not to be such negligence as would sustain the action. "It would be extremely difficult," said the Chief Justice, "to define the exact limit by which the skill and diligence which an attorney undertakes to furnish in the conduct of a cause is bounded; or to trace precisely the dividing line between that reasonable skill and diligence which appears to satisfy his undertaking, and that crassa negligentia or lata culpa mentioned in some of the cases, for which he is undoubtedly liable. The cases, however, appear to establish in general that he is liable for the consequences of ignorance or non-observance of the rules of practice of the Court; for the want of care in the preparation of the cause for trial, or of attendance thereon with his witnesses; and for the mismanagement of so much of the conduct of a cause as is usually and ordinarily allotted to his department of the profession. Whilst, on the other hand, he is not answerable for errors in judgment upon points of new occurrence, or of nice or doubtful construction, or such as are usually intrusted to men in the higher branch of the profession of the law."

As to the action mentioned in the preceding case, which Dalton had been employed to bring, it came before the Court the following year (Godefroy v. Jay, 7 Bing. 413), on a rule to reduce the damages; and it then appeared that the negligence complained of, was allowing judgment to go by default against Godefroy in an action on the case brought against him by one D.; in consequence of which, he had to pay about £37 to D. This judgment by default had been suffered by Jay, under the idea that it could be set aside at any time, owing to an irregularity in the proceedings. The jury found for Godefroy; and assessed the damages at £45; upon what principle of calculation does not appear. This verdict the Court refused to disturb.

Kemp v. Burt (A.D. 1833, 4 Barn. & Adol. 424), is another instance, in which the doctrine laid down by Lord Mansfield in Pitt v. Yalden was preserved in its integrity. The negligence relied on here was, that the defendant, being retained by the plaintiff to sue a surveyor of roads for trespass, commenced an action which he was advised by counsel to discontinue, because certain other parties should have been joined; and afterwards commenced another action in which the plaintiffs were nonsuited owing to the limitation of time prescribed in 8 Geo. 4, c. 126, under which the proceedings were taken. A special pleader had advised, that, in the case of the trespasses sued for, the limitation did not apply; and it was held that no actionable negligence had been committed.

On the other hand, Stannard v. Ullithorne (A.D. 1834, 10 Bing. 491), shows that an attorney undertakes that his client shall not enter into any covenant or stipulation that may expose him to a greater degree of responsibility than is ordinarily attached to the business in hand; or, at all events, that he does not do so till the consequences have been explained to him. The point decided in Williams v. Gibbs (A. D. 1836, 5 A. & E. 208, 2 Har. & W. 241), was, that it is negligence for an attorney to bring an action within a court of limited jurisdiction, knowing that the circumstances which gave the right of action arose out of such court's jurisdiction. In Shilcock v. Passman (A.D. 1836, 7 Car. & P. 289), the negligence relied upon was, that, the plaintiff being a prisoner in execution for twelve months for a debt not exceeding £20, and having retained the defendant to effect his discharge, proper measures for that purpose had not been taken; and it appeared, that, owing to an omission on the part of the defendant to give notice and make application when he might have done so, the plaintiff was detained in prison longer than he would otherwise have been. These three cases seem to fall, properly, within Lord Mansfield's ruling, so as to make the attorney liable.

In Purves v. Landell (A.D. 1846, 12 Clark & F. 91), the principle above referred to was again enunciated by Lord Brougham, who said, that it was of the very essence of the action for negligence that there should be gross ignorance—that the man who had undertaken to perform the duty of an attorney or an apothecary (as the case might be) should have undertaken to discharge a duty professionally for which he was very ill qualified, or which he had so negligently discharged as to damnify his employer, or deprive him of the benefit which he had a right to expect from the service. And Lord Campbell (in the same case) said, "against the barrister, luckily, no action can be maintained, but against the attorney it may, if guilty of gross negligence, but not for a mistake merely. You can only expect from him that he will be honest and diligent. It would be utterly impossible that you could ever have a class of men, who would give a guarantee binding themselves, in giving legal advice and conducting suits of law, to be always in the right."

We now arrive at the case of Hunter v. Caldwell, (A.D. 1847, 10 Q. B. 69), which is peculiarly important, because it distinguishes the province of the judge from that of the jury in these actions. Here the negligence was, that the defendant did not properly file certain writs of summons which had been sued out against one H., so as to keep alive the action of the plaintiff against him. It was held that the question of negligence by not complying with the practice of the Court was a question of fact for the jury; but that it was proper to direct the jury positively as to the premises from which they were to draw their conclusion. The judge should inform the jury for what species or degree of negligence the attorney was answerable, and what duty was cast upon him in the case before them; and, having done this, was to leave them to say whether, considering all the circumstances and the evidence of practitioners, the attorney had performed his duty; and whether, if he had not, the neglect was actionable.

It is to the office thus thrown on the jury that (for our parts) we specially object in this species of action. A jury of tradesmen are quite incompetent to decide upon the question, whether actionable negligence has been proved. Still more are they without the means of assessing the damages, with any regard to justice. The Courts are, however, very unwilling to interfere with the amount they choose to give; and hence it is that there are so few cases in the books, from which we may collect the principle on which the damages should be assessed. Yet enough are reported to show the urgent need for some superintendence over a jury in this respect. Thus, in Hawkins v. Harwood (A.D. 1849, 4 Exch. 503), the attorney had failed to instruct counsel properly, and in time; in consequence of which the record had to be withdrawn when the cause was called on; and the jury gave £150 damages, though the loss which had been occasioned to the plaintiff was only £18, the expenses of his witnesses; and to this sum the damages were, of course, reduced by the Court. So also in Parker v. Rolls (A.D. 1854, 14 C. B. 691), in which an attorney had prepared a parol agreement to secure the payment of a weekly sum of five shillings in consideration of past cohabitation,—the jury gave a verdict for £70, which was afterwards reduced to £35. To these instances, we hope we shall be able to add that of Van Toll v. Chapman, if, indeed, the verdict is allowed to stand at all. But surely in this case, at all events, a new trial will be ordered. The same arguments which we have advanced in favour of Mr. Chapman in reference to the action brought by him, are here also to the point; while, again, there are excuses for his conduct which more especially apply to the action brought against him. For, granted that he cannot recover for what the result has shown to be useless, is there really any pretence for charging that lata culpa, that crassa ignorantia, which is necessary to ground substantive proceedings? When the action of Van Toll v. Roberts was pending, a few months only had elapsed since the passing of the Procedure Act of 1854. We believe that, at the time, no work had been published elucidatory of the radical changes effected in the general course of practice by that and the preceding Act of 1852, of greater pretensions than the ephemeral editions of the Acts themselves. Were these a sufficient guide to a practitioner in working a new mode of proceeding? Nay, he would find in the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852, an express enactment that nothing therein is to affect the provisions of 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11, as to suing upon bonds and obtaining a judgment for the penalty as a security for damages in respect of future breaches; while, on the other hand, the class of actions chiefly aimed at in the 3rd section of the Procedure Act of 1854 are clearly not actions on bonds at all, but cases of opposing and complicated accounts. It is true, that if he had thoroughly looked into the matter, he might have discovered, that, though a bond to pay money by instalments may be sued upon under the statute of William, (Willoughby v. Swinton, 6 East. 550), an ordinary bond for payment of money at a certain time is not within the Act (Smith v. Bond, 10 Bing. 125). But is a mistake of this nature to be visited with a penalty of six or seven hundred pounds? Or rather, can it be said—arising, as it did, on the construction of a new Act—to be actionable ignorance at all? On the whole, we look forward with confidence to the result. An attentive study of the reported cases does not leave any great ground of dissatisfaction with the general principles enunciated by the Courts, after full argument in banc. Attornies but share, it has been laid down fairly enough, the responsibilities which attach to surgeons; and, indeed, to all who profess to sell skilled labour. It is with the application of these principles in the crowded and excited arena of the Nisi Prius court, that we are chiefly disposed to quarrel. It is no disrespect to the judges to say that they are not always competent, in the hurry of the moment, to deal satisfactorily with the complications of facts which often arise in these cases.

Legal News.

The elaborate judgment of Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, in which he refused to recognise an order of Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, on the ground that it had been made by the judge's clerk and not by the judge himself, has been set aside by the Lords Justices with very little ceremony or hesitation. The order of the Vice-Chancellor, whether properly made or not, can only be got rid of by a rehearing before him, or by an appeal to the Lords Justices. This simple and obvious principle at once sweeps away the mountain of learned argument which the Commissioner had so laboriously accumulated. Of course, the question as to the propriety of the present mode of proceeding in the Judges' Chambers remains exactly where it was. It may be true that the clerk takes upon himself functions which suitors have a right to expect the judge in person to discharge. But we cannot see that Mr. Commissioner Holroyd is called upon to interfere to remove this any more than various other blemishes which may be discovered in our legal and social system. There are people who look to the press as able and ready to right every wrong, and think that a prompt and aptly worded appeal to one of our daily contemporaries is the most likely cure for all the ills of life; and one cannot help suspecting that some of the learned Commissioners in Bankruptcy are disposed to set up as rival practitioners in this line; and not only to extend their ordinary jurisdiction as widely as possible, but to attempt an interference which is really without precedent or excuse. The interior economy of the Chancery Judges' Chambers concerns Mr. Holroyd in his public capacity no more than the dowry of the Princess Royal; and it may be hoped that the summary overruling of his judgment by the Lords Justices may induce him to confine himself to that legitimate sphere in which his labours have proved so valuable.

The Whitsuntide holidays have suspended the progress of the various law-reform measures; but now we shall soon see the Lord Chancellor's two Bills before the House of Commons, and it will speedily be known whether that great achievement of erecting new courts of probate and divorce is really destined to illustrate the present session. Lord Brougham has reappeared in the House of Lords rather too late to take the part which properly belongs to him in the discussion of the measures which have been occupying the attention of the Peers. In the Commons, Mr. Malins has brought in a bill to enable married women to dispose of reversionary interests in personal estate; and his proposal has the support of the Attorney-General. It will probably receive the approval of the profession and the acquiescence of the House of Commons; but whether it has sufficient force of merit to carry it through the House of Lords is by no means certain. That the law upon this subject is complicated and embarrassing we suppose nobody will deny; but if that were always sufficient reason for passing an Act to alter and amend the law, the task of the new Parliament would be a weighty one—so weighty, indeed, that the feeling would become unanimous to devolve upon some more suitable body functions which a popular Legislature is by no means well qualified to discharge. Another question of great difficulty has been lately raised by the case of The Queen v. Bryan, and if the interference of Parliament is to be invoked to mark more clearly the dividing line between a criminal false pretence and what we may, perhaps, venture to call "tradesmanlike falsehoods," we will say that this is a legislative problem which demands the most skilful handling. The majority of the judges who decided this case in the Exchequer Chamber appeared to think that the law as laid down by them was as severe as a lax general morality would permit. The degree of license afforded by this exposition of the statute to what is called in some quarters "smartness" would seem to be dictated by the same principle as certain indulgences granted by the Mosaic law "because of the hardness of the hearts" of the people to whom its precepts were addressed.

In the Courts, one of the most noticeable events of the week has been the appearance of the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown in the Queen's Bench. The occasion was probably well chosen, inasmuch as neither the judges nor any of the counsel most habituated to the court were likely to know more of the subject under argument than Sir Richard Bethell himself; and therefore he need have felt no fear of making any false step which could damage his splendid reputation. We dare say that the judgment of the Court when given in the case will be entirely satisfactory and exhaustive; but if so, the judges must supply from their own resources a good deal of elucidation of an obscure topic.

An action has been tried in the Queen's Bench this week on an attorney's bill, and some account of the case will be found in another column. The defence of negligence was successfully set up, and it certainly appears that the proceedings taken and charged for should not have been taken at all unless they were taken earlier. The amount in dispute in this instance was small, and there was a conflict of testimony upon the facts, so that probably it is not a case which the Court would be disposed to entertain further.

PETITION OF PROCTORS TO THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

The following petition was presented by Lord Malmesbury on the 28th ult:—

That two Bills are now pending in your Right Honourable House, intitled respectively "A Bill to amend the Law relating to Probates and Letters of Administration in England," and "A Bill to amend the Law relating to Divorces and Matrimonial Causes in England."

That, without offering any opinion upon these several measures, your petitioners earnestly desire to submit to the consideration of your Lordships that certain provisions in the aforesaid Bills would, if passed into law, be most injurious to their professional practice, and would be inconsistent with the justice and equity by which your Lordships are influenced in legislation.

That the office of Proctor is of great antiquity, having been recognised as early as the year 1236, and having been regulated by the Canons of 1603; and that the duties of those holding the said office have been expressly regulated by statute, and amongst other Acts, by the Acts 3 James 1, c. 5, and 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, of which the last mentioned made express provision for the protection of proctors, and confirmed and guaranteed them in the enjoyment of exclusive practice.

That, under these several regulations and Acts of Parliament, your petitioners exercise the right of practice in the Ecclesiastical Courts of England, in which are transacted the larger portion of the business relating to the grants of probate of wills and letters of administration, and in which the larger portion of matrimonial causes have hitherto been heard and determined; a right of practice which the Parliament of England has handed down and guaranteed to your petitioners, for nearly seven centuries with exclusive rights and privileges.

That, to acquire their exclusive right of practice under the authority of the Acts of Parliament aforesaid, your petitioners have paid large sums of money on being articled and admitted; have served under articles for seven years; and, at a further large expense and sacrifice, have become notaries public. That many of your petitioners have also paid large sums of money, or have laid themselves under heavy pecuniary obligations, for the purchase of their practices, or are under engagements to pay annuities to former practitioners or to the widows of deceased partners, or have made family arrangements dependent on the continuance of the present practice, and under the assurance of Acts of Parliament by which the same was guaranteed to them.

That the above-mentioned Bills now pending in your Right Honourable House would operate most injuriously, and in some instances will be utterly destructive of the professional practice of your petitioners, and may in many instances interfere with the aforementioned obligations and arrangements, thereby involving many other persons besides your petitioners in the difficulties and hardships which these measures may inflict, if passed into law in their present shape.

That, under the 42nd clause of the Probate and Letters of Administration Bill, all solicitors and attorneys are to be admitted to practise in all contentious matters in the courts in which your petitioners have hitherto had exclusive practice. That the effect of such an enactment would be to deprive your petitioners of a large portion of such contentious practice, without any compensation or corresponding boon.

That, by the 43rd clause of the said Bill, registrars of district courts, some of which are to be newly constituted, are empowered to grant probates and letters of administration in cases where the property may be under £1,500; a measure which would deprive your petitioners of the largest portion of their practice in all non-contentious business, inasmuch as the number of grants of probate and letters of administration under that sum amount to at least 79 per cent. of the entire number granted annually.

That, by the 89th clause of the same Bill, any business that may remain to any of your petitioners will be subject to still further diminution of profit, the said clause being so constructed as to repeal all that portion of the 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, whereby the office of proctor was made and guaranteed to be an independent and exclusive office, and proposing instead thereof to place the proctors in the position of agents to attorneys and solicitors in relation to all matters testamentary.

That, by clause 40 of the same Bill, any proctor of any ecclesiastical court is entitled to be admitted a proctor of the Court of Probate—a provision under which your petitioners' exclusive privileges would be still further prejudiced, inasmuch as a numerous class of practitioners in minor courts, who have gained their present status by shorter terms of service and cheaper means, would be permitted to practice in those courts in which your petitioners enjoy, at the present time, exclusive right of practice.

That, by the same section (s. 40), the transaction of business in all district registries of the Court of Probate may here after be thrown open to "any person," or to "any class or classes of persons," at the discretion of any judge of the court who may "think fit to make any rule or order of the court to such effect;" an enactment which, your petitioners submit, would be without any valid precedent, and would speedily be so construed as to be destructive of any privileges remaining to your petitioners.

That, at the present time, a limited number of the senior proctors possess the exclusive privilege of taking articled clerks, a privilege which those of your petitioners who have not already acquired the same will acquire in due course by seniority. That such advantage, whether in possession or prospect, will be lost to all your petitioners should these Bills pass into law as they now stand, inasmuch as all attorneys and solicitors will have the right of practice in contentious suits, and their clerks, from their admission, will be entitled to many of the exclusive privileges now enjoyed by your petitioners.

That your petitioners desire to represent to your Right Honourable House that the effect of these measures will be not only to deprive your petitioners of their privileges, but unjustly and causelessly to degrade them from the position of officers of the ecclesiastical courts and of independent practitioners in an honourable profession to that of mere agents of attorneys and solicitors; and they humbly submit to the consideration of your Lordships that such an arrangement is neither calculated to benefit the jurisdiction nor the public, inasmuch as it permits that which the Act 53 Geo. 3, c. 127, was expressly devised to prevent—namely, a system under which practice was secured to certain firms by large "allowances" made to attorneys and solicitors, out of charges levied on the suitors.

That your petitioners further desire to submit, that, whilst the present number of proctors exercising exclusive right is no more than 114, the attorneys and solicitors who will be entitled to share their practice, should these Bills pass into law, number upwards of 10,000; and they especially solicit your Lordships' attention to the fact, that, whilst your petitioners have paid, and continue to pay, large sums of money for the purpose of securing the practice they possess, the Bills before your Lordships contain no provisions whereby any payment of any sort is required from the numerous body proposed to be admitted to share their practice, either in the shape of contribution to the Revenue of the State, or of contribution to any fund which might hereafter be made available for the purposes of compensation to those who will suffer from these proposed enactments.

And your petitioners would further humbly represent that no substantial reasons can be shown for the extinction or withdrawal of any of the privileges your petitioners enjoy on the faith and by virtue of the confirmation of several Acts of Parliament. That no imputation or suggestion has at any time been made of any want of competency efficiently to conduct the business of the courts to which these Bills relate. That, on the contrary, the evidence of the highest authority attests your petitioners' professional skill, their intimate acquaintance with the laws applicable to marriage questions and testamentary jurisdiction, as well as the undeniable character of the exclusive rights of which these Bills would deprive them without any compensation.

And your petitioners further submit, that it would be opposed to the equity of Parliament to subject your petitioners for whatsoever object to the penalties and personal individual losses these measures would inflict. They submit to your Lordships, that, in the Report of her Majesty's Commissioners appointed to inquire into the practice "of the Court of Chancery, and the law and jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical and other courts in relation to matters testamentary," it was expressly declared by Her Majesty's Commissioners, that, "in common justice to the proctors, compensation should be made to them if their business is thrown open;" and your petitioners further submit, that the justice and equity of this Report has been repeatedly acknowledged, and more especially in a Bill submitted to Parliament on this subject in the session, 1855 by her Majesty's then Attorney-General Sir Alexander Cockburn, her Majesty's principal Secretary of State the Right Honourable Sir George Grey, and by her Majesty's then Solicitor, and now Attorney-General, Sir Richard Bethell, on behalf of her Majesty's present Government.

Your petitioners therefore humbly pray your Right Honourable House to take the premises into your consideration, and to introduce such provisions into the before-mentioned Bills as will continue to your petitioners the sole exclusive right of practice hitherto enjoyed by them in all the testamentary and matrimonial courts, or as will secure to them and to their families just and adequate compensation for the losses which will be inflicted on them, should the proposed Bills pass into law as they now stand.

ACTION ON ATTORNEY'S BILL.

Power and Pilgrim v. Burchnall.—QUEEN'S BENCH.

Mr. Edwin James and Mr. Merewether were counsel for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Serjeant Ballantine for the defendant.

The plaintiffs were attorneys in Warwickshire, and they brought their action against the defendant, a farmer in that county, for £19, the balance of a bill of costs.

It appeared that in May, 1854, the defendant had some dispute about the payment of a church-rate, and he determined to indict some parties for perjury, and instructed the plaintiffs to adopt proceedings. The defendant also gave them instructions as to appealing against the rate, and he desired them to take the opinion of counsel as to appealing or indicting the parties. The plaintiffs prepared a case, and sent it to counsel in London for an opinion. The case was returned with an opinion on it to the plaintiffs, and it was afterwards sent back for a further opinion. This occupied so much time, that the period for giving notice of appeal had expired. The appeal, however, was entered and respited according to the opinion of counsel, and by the instructions of Burchnall. Some time afterwards Burchnall gave the plaintiffs authority to settle the matter. In November, 1854, the plaintiffs sent in their bill of costs, and on the 7th of the next month Burchnall paid £15 on account. Several letters were written to Burchnall for payment of the balance; but, as he did not pay, the action was brought. The defence was, that the plaintiffs did not act with due diligence, but had been guilty of negligence.

The only question was, whether Burchnall had given the plaintiffs unlimited instructions to prosecute the appeal on the 7th of June.

The plaintiff Pilgrim swore that the instructions were not given on that day to appeal, but merely to take the opinion of counsel on the matter.

On the part of the defendant it was urged that the plaintiffs, knowing that the quarter sessions were on the 26th of June, ought to have given notice of appeal before they sent up the case to counsel, because they ought to have known that by the day they could get the opinion back, the time for giving notice of appeal would have expired. Upon this, it was contended that there had been negligence, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the costs of the case and opinion, and of entering and respiting the appeal. These costs, it was said, amounted to more than the sum claimed. The defendant paid 3*l.* 15*s.* 5*d.* into Court.

The defendant was called, and stated that he told the plaintiffs, on the first interview, to take the matter to the sessions, and that Mr. Pilgrim told him that there was plenty of time.

On cross-examination, the defendant said that he denied that he had signed the rate. The book was afterwards produced, and his signature appeared to it; but he would swear that he was not at the meeting on that particular day, and he had determined to indict the parties who had sworn he was there. One of those gentlemen was a farmer of large property, and farmed his own estate. Mr. Power, the plaintiff, had advised him to compromise, and not to go to expense.

Mr. Justice WIGHTMAN, in summing up, said, an attorney was bound to bring a competent degree of skill, and to give such attention, at all events, that he did not occasion loss to his client by want of diligence or neglect; and the question here was, whether the defendant had lost anything by reason of the want of skill or want of due diligence. If he had not, then the defendant ought to pay, because the bill had already been taxed by the proper officer.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant.

Before J. H. KOE, Esq., Q.C., Judge.—April 24, 1857.

PRACTICE—REMOVAL OUT OF ORDINARY JURISDICTION—RULE 44.

This was an undefended action to recover the sum of 10*l.* 10*s.* for goods sold and delivered. The defendant, who is an excise officer, three or four days before the court-day, informed the plaintiff that he had been ordered to be removed to another place, out of the ordinary jurisdiction of the court; whereupon the plaintiff filed an affidavit with the registrar, under Rule 44, upon which a plaint was entered, and a summons issued, and served on the defendant's wife two days before the return day thereof.

His Honour held that it was not material to prove that the defendant was about to remove with intent to delay his creditor, but that "he was about to remove out of the ordinary jurisdiction" either voluntarily or involuntarily.—Judgment for plaintiff.

The Overseers of St. Andrew, Hertford, v. Pratchett.

BANKER'S NOTE, PURCHASE OF—PRE-EXISTING DEBT—WHAT IT MEANS—QUERY, ARE PAROCHIAL RATES SUCH?

This was an action brought to recover the sum of £10, "money paid by the plaintiffs, and money received by the defendant." The following are the circumstances of the case, as appeared by the evidence:—On the 21st July, 1856, between twelve and one o'clock, the assistant overseer applied to the defendant for payment of certain parochial rates, which were paid with a £10 country bank-note, the assistant overseer giving in cash the balance between the £10 and the amount of the rates. The bank remained open till four o'clock of the same day, and did not re-open the following day, but stopped payment. Notice was given to the defendant, on the 22nd, of the dishonour of the note, and subsequently the note was sent to the defendant, to prove under the bankruptcy, which he returned. The plaintiffs, in order to pass their parochial accounts, paid the amount of the rates.

Defendant's attorney objected that there had been a purchase of the note, with all its risks, as it was not given on account of a pre-existing debt, inasmuch as a parochial rate, which was recoverable by statute in a special, and not in an ordinary, way, could not be deemed a debt. Much stress was also laid upon the recent case of Lichfield Union v. Greene (8 Jur. N. S. 247).

Cur. adv. vult.

May 25.—His Honour, in an elaborate judgment, reviewing all the cases bearing on the subject, decided, that, although a parochial rate was not a debt in its strict legal sense, yet it was a pre-existing liability, which was sufficient to exclude this transaction from being considered as a purchase of the note.—Judgment for plaintiffs, with costs.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—JUNE 4.

When their Lordships entered the court, Lord CAMPBELL called first upon Mr. Keating, the newly-appointed Solicitor-General, to move.

Mr. Keating said he felt he could not move as Solicitor-General, as his patent had not yet been laid before his Lordship, in consequence of some delay.

Lord CAMPBELL—We may consider that to be done which ought to be done.

Mr. Keating said he would move as senior counsel, not as Solicitor-General. He then moved for a rule, calling upon Mr. Harrison Padmore to show cause why the whole matters connected with his bill of costs, in the case of Essex v. Stanley, should not be referred to the Master to inquire into and report upon. It appeared that the defendant, Major Stanley, who was an officer in the Indian army, and had also served in the Turkish Contingent, had got into the debt of a native money lender at Bombay who brought actions against him. On his arrival in England last year he saw an advertisement in a newspaper stating that a Mr. Padmore, a solicitor, residing in Duke-street, Charing-cross, would give advice to persons labouring under pecuniary difficulties, and obtain immediate protection for their persons and property, at one-third the usual charges, to be payable by instalments; and instead of intrusting his affairs to his regular solicitor, Major Stanley sought the advice of the advertiser. He called at his office and saw a person named George, who undertook to defend the action. In this way the bill of costs had been incurred; it was referred by judge's order to the Master for taxation; and he made a report, which went to show that Padmore had nothing whatever to do with the business in Duke-street, but merely lent his name to George and some other parties to enable them to carry it on, and suggested that further inquiry should take place.

The Court granted a rule nisi.—Daily News.

WIFE'S CHOSE IN ACTION—REDUCTION INTO POSSESSION.

Allday v. Fletcher, 5 W. R. 584.

There are few rules of law more arbitrary and inconvenient than those relating to choses in action; and there is no doctrine of equity less allied to reason than that of reduction into possession. The general principle which governs a husband's rights in his wife's choses in action is sufficiently definite, and may be stated without much qualification; but one of the terms included in the definition—viz. reduction into possession—has given rise to endless subtle distinctions, which render the whole subject very embarrassing. In Allday v. Fletcher, a legacy, charged upon land and payable upon the death of the tenant for life under the will, was assigned by the legatee, a married lady, and her husband, for valuable consideration. The assignment purported to be "by way of security," but the deed did not contain any covenant to pay, nor a proviso for redemption on repayment by the assignors. The assignee died before the tenant for life, and therefore before the legacy became payable, having appointed Fletcher, who was tenant in tail in remainder under the said will, his residuary legatee and executor. Fletcher, in such capacity, paid debts to an amount greater than the personal estate, and, subsequently, the tenant for life of the land on which the legacy to the married woman was charged, died; whereupon Fletcher became tenant in tail in possession of such land. The suit was instituted by the legatee (the married lady) for the purpose of getting the legacy settled upon her and her issue; and the questions were, whether the legacy was reduced into possession by the husband, and passed by the assignment; and if not, whether, under the circumstances, it must not be deemed to have been raised and applied in the payment of the debts of the assignee, whose executor and residuary legatee Fletcher was. The judgment of V. C. Stuart went mainly upon the form and effect of the deed of assignment, which he considered to be merely a mortgage, and consequently that there was no reduction into possession of the legacy by the husband. The Lord Chancellor, however, treated the transaction simply as an advance to the husband, the intention being that the assignee was to be repaid by the receipt of the legacy; but he thought the question as to whether the assignment was absolute or conditional was of no importance. There is no doubt as to what is the effect of an assignment by a husband and wife of a legacy payable to her in futuro. If the husband die while the legacy is in reversion, the assignment has no operation against the wife; but it has where the husband survives until it becomes a legacy in possession. In the present case, therefore, upon the death of the tenant for life, the right to receive the legacy was in Fletcher, as representative of the assignee; and Fletcher's was not only the hand to receive, but also to pay; for the legacy was charged upon his land. That he was entitled to pay himself there could be no question; and the Lord Chancellor was of opinion, under the circumstances of the case, that the presumption that payment had been made was irresistible. The Vice-Chancellor was of opinion that if the assignment had been absolute, and not "by way of security," the husband would thereby have reduced the wife's legacy into possession; but, on appeal, the plaintiff contended that even an absolute assignment could not have that effect in the case of a legacy payable upon the death of a person then living.

RAILWAY COMPANY—LANDS CLAUSES ACT, CONSTRUCTION OF.

Grosvenor v. The Hampstead Junction Railway Co., 5 W. R. 614.

A nice question arose in this case as to the construction of the 92nd section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, which enacts that no party shall be required to sell to the promoters of an undertaking a part only of any house, building, or manufactory, if the owner be willing and able to convey the whole. The plaintiffs in the suit, who were trustees of a charity, had purchased land for the purpose of building almshouses thereon, according to a stipulated plan. The stipulation was, that the central portion of the building was to be erected within five years, and the remaining parts as soon as the funds of the charity would permit. In pursuance of this agreement, the plaintiffs entered into possession, and made contracts with builders, following the terms (as to the mode of building and times of completion) of the agreement to purchase. The central portion was duly completed, and part of the remainder. The defendants' company then served a notice on the plaintiffs, requiring, for the purposes of their line, a portion amounting to ten perches of the land. The plaintiffs served the usual counter notice, requiring the company to take the whole of their land or none, on the ground that the portion mentioned in the company's notice was intended for the erection of a wing of the building, according to its original design. The question for the Court was as to whether the plaintiffs were protected by the 92nd section of the above-mentioned Act.

V. C. Wood decided in favour of the company, as he considered that the result of the whole scheme for building the almshouses and establishing the charity was that the central building was to form a complete and integral portion in itself, and being also of opinion that under the agreement for sale the plaintiffs were not bound to erect any other building than the centre. His Honour, however, considered that whatever would pass with "a house" in a conveyance, was part of a house within the meaning of the 92nd section.

PRACTICE—19 & 20 VICT. C. 120.

Re Brealy's Settled Estates, Id. 613; Re Hadwen's Settled Estates, Id. 614.

These two cases are decisions involving merely points of practice under the Act to facilitate Leases and Sales of Settled Estates. By the 37th section, a married woman applying to the Court, or consenting to an application under the Act, is to be examined apart from her husband; and by the 38th section, the examination is to be made either by the Court, or by some solicitor appointed for that purpose. In Re Brealy's Settled Estates, the Master of the Rolls considered that where an application under the Act was about being made to the Court, the proper course was first to examine the married woman before the petition was presented. In the second case, his Honour restricted this rule to the case where the married woman was herself the petitioner, being of opinion that, where she was only a respondent, it was sufficient for some one to appear for her and consent, her own consent having been taken previously to the hearing of the petition. It appears that the Court will not appoint the solicitor acting in the matter to take the consent.

Since the foregoing was written there has been another petition under the same Act (Re Procter's Settled Estates, June 5), in which V. C. Stuart took a different view of the meaning of the 37th section. His Honour was of opinion that the consent of the married woman should be given at the hearing of the petition, or if any difficulty was thrown in the way of such a construction by the words "she shall be first examined apart," he thought that it might be proper to move for leave to present a petition, and the married woman might consent upon the motion; but the Vice-Chancellor considered that a consent not taken in any matter or proceeding pending would be nugatory.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

FALSE PRETENCES, OBTAINING MONEY UNDER — WHEN INDICTABLE.

Reg. v. Sherwood, 5 W. R., C. C. R., 577; Reg. v. Bryan, Id. 598.

These two cases decide important points as to prosecutions for obtaining money under false pretences. In the first of them, it appeared that the prisoner was a coal-dealer, and that the charge arose out of his selling a load of coal which he well knew weighed 14 cwt. as and for a load of 18 cwt., and receiving payment as for the latter weight. It was proved that the misrepresentation was made for the purpose of defrauding the buyer of the difference in price between the actual and the represented weight of coal. The prisoner was indicted under 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 29, s. 53, which, after reciting that "a failure of justice frequently arises from the subtle distinction between larceny and fraud," provides, that, to obtain by "any false pretence" any money with intent to cheat or defraud any person of the same, shall be a misdemeanor. And it was now contended for the prisoner that his case was not within the statute, because the enactment in question was not intended to apply to sales; and, moreover, because it was in the power of the person deceived to test the accuracy of the representation. And the case of Reg. v. Reed (7 C. & P. 848) was relied upon, as being opposed to (but not expressly overruled by) the later cases of Reg. v. Burgon (4 W. R. 514), Reg. v. Roebuck (Id. 525), Reg. v. Eagleton (Id. 17), and Reg. v. Kenrick (5 Q. B. 49); by which it was laid down that a false pretence was not the less so merely on account of the existence of a contract. The Court, however, did not hesitate, in the present case, expressly to overrule the decision arrived at in Reg. v. Reed, remarking that that case was decided before the provision in question had undergone the ventilation which the subsequent cases above referred to had occasioned. Pollock, C. B., however, took a distinction between real transactions of buying and selling (which he did not think within the Act) and those in which (as in the case before the court) the seller after the bargain and sale demands payment, and fraudulently represents the quantity delivered to be greater, and his demand consequently larger, than it really is. The conviction was therefore affirmed.

In the second case (Reg. v. Bryan), the prisoner had represented to a pawnbroker that certain spoons which he offered in pledge were "of the best quality," and "equal to the best of those made by the Messrs. Elkington," whereas he knew they were of inferior quality. Upon this representation, the prisoner obtained an advance of money exceeding the value of the spoons. It was now contended for him that the case differed from that just mentioned of Reg. v. Sherwood (which was argued on the same day, immediately preceding that now under notice), in that there, there was a misrepresentation of quantity; here, only of quality; and, moreover, that the goods were of the same species—i. e. plated spoons—as they were represented to be, though the plating was of an inferior quality; and that if every lie of this sort told in the course of a bargain were indictable, there would be no limit to indictments. The judges differed in their opinions. Lord Campbell thought the conviction could not be supported, inasmuch as a mere representation of the quality of an article sold was not within the statute, any more than it was indictable for a buyer to depreciate the quality, and assert that it was inferior to what it really was. Such an extension of the criminal law would be most alarming. So thought Coleridge, J., saying, "if puffing by the seller would be indictable, depreciation by the buyer should be equally so. 'It is nought, it is nought, saith the buyer; but when he goeth his way he boasteth.'" Cockburn, C. J., also concurred, saying that it made all the difference whether the vendor represents the article to be merely better in quality than it really is (as in the case before the Court), or whether (as in the case of Reg. v. Roebuck) he says the article is of a precious metal, whereas it is of a base metal. Pollock, C. B., agreed that the conviction could not be supported, and repeated his opinion that the Act was not intended to apply to the ordinary commercial dealings between buyer and seller, though there might be cases to which the statute would apply connected with the transaction of buying and selling, as if an article were concocted expressly for the purpose of deceit, and sold as what it was not, even with regard to quality only. Erle, Crompton, and Crowder, JJ., and Watson and Channell, BB., were all of opinion, on grounds generally similar to those already noticed, that the conviction was not sustainable; but Bramwell, B., was of opinion that the conviction ought to be affirmed, because he inclined to think that the statute extended to cases where the fraud was not the immediate mode of obtaining the money, but the contract was obtained by fraud, and the money handed over to the person in pursuance of that contract; and that the "obtaining by false pretence" mentioned in the Act, meant a fraudulent obtaining, whether directly or mediately; in short, wherever one person makes a bargain by fraud, and so by the fraud gets possession of the property of another. To this last opinion Willes, J., adhered, chiefly in deference to what he knew had been the impression of the late Chief Justice Jervis on this point of criminal law.

POLICE-MAGISTRATE, APPLICATION AGAINST.

Reg. v. Dayman, 5 W. R., Q. B., 578.

We noticed, a few weeks ago,* a fruitless application to the Queen's Bench under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44 (in lieu of the ancient practice of mandamus), in order to compel a police-magistrate to adjudicate. The above case was under the same provision; and it was sought to make Mr. Dayman hear and adjudicate upon a complaint, in order to entertain which it was necessary first to decide that a certain street was a new street. The magistrate, however, decided it was not a new street, and the Court refused to make him proceed with the complaint, for, said Lord Campbell, the affair has become res judicata. "We are not a court of advice: we sit here to determine matters in controversy between suitors, and we cannot give our opinion before or after judgment." In this decision Wightman and Crompton, JJ., concurred; but Erle, J., thought the case one for interference, because the magistrate's decision had proceeded on a cardinal fact upon which his jurisdiction depended, and therefore only amounted to a declaration that in his opinion he had no jurisdiction to entertain the matter of the complaint.

EVIDENCE, POINT AS TO—LIS MOTA, DOCTRINE OF, CONSIDERED.

Gee v. Ward, 5 W. R., Q. B., 579.

This was a question of evidence. By the law governing the production of evidence, no declaration can be admitted as evidence of reputation which has arisen post litem motam—i. e. which was made after a controversy arose touching the matter to which such declaration relates. It has been a question of some nicety, to what date this exclusion must be referred; and it appears to remain unsettled whether, in order to exclude a declaration on this ground, there must not be, not merely facts which may lead to a dispute (according to the ruling of Alderson, B., in Walker v. Beauchamp, 6 C. & P. 552), but a suit, or controversy preparatory to a suit, actually commenced, or dispute arisen, and that upon the same pedigree or subject-matter which constitutes the question in litigation (see Davies v. Lowndes, 6 M. & Gr. 471). At all events, a declaration of pedigree will not be excluded as having arisen post litem motam, because made with the express view of preventing disputes—a doctrine first established in the Berkeley Peerage Case (4 Camp. 401); and, in accordance with this doctrine, the point which arose in the case above noticed was decided. The question at the trial was, whether the plaintiff or the defendant was heir of one G., who died in 1854. And it appeared that in 1806 an inquiry as to the heir-at-law of G., then a lunatic, was directed by the Court of Chancery; and it was now sought to put in the deposition of the grandmother of G., taken at such inquiry. The argument in this case ultimately turned upon the question whether depositions in a prior Chancery suit are excluded by the rule under consideration; and the Court of Queen's Bench admitted the declaration as to the pedigree made by the grandmother of G., in accordance with the rule laid down by Mr. Phillips in his book upon "Evidence" (vol. 1, p. 213, 9th ed.), which they held to express the law correctly—viz. that the having a distinct object in view in making the declaration, even though the object can only be gained by afterwards using the declaration in evidence, is not sufficient to exclude the declaration—"as, for example," says Mr. Phillips, "if the father or mother make a pedigree for the purpose of preventing disputes in the family."

HABEAS CORPUS AD TESTIFICANDUM, WHEN IT WILL NOT LIE.

Binns v. Moseley and Cobbett, 5 W. R., C. P., 583.

A habeas corpus ad testificandum, under 44 Geo. 1, c. 102, was applied for to bring up Cobbett, a prisoner in the Queen's prison, to the Court of Common Pleas, in order that he might move for a new trial in the above action of ejectment, in which he was a defendant. The Court, however, held that the statute did not apply to such a case, being intended only to meet the case of prisoners whose evidence is required.

ATTORNEY'S BILL—MISJOINDER OF DEFENDANTS, EFFECT OF.

Wilkins v. Alexander & George Steele, 5 W. R., C. P., 610.

This was an action on an attorney's bill brought against the two defendants jointly; and the verdict was "for the plaintiff as against George, and for the defendant as against Alexander." The judge said this was a verdict for the defendants, whereupon the plaintiff applied to him to amend the declaration by striking out the name of Alexander, which he declined to do; but he reserved leave to move to enter the verdict for the plaintiff, if the Court thought the judge at Nisi Prius had power to amend. The Court, however, thought he had no such power. The 222nd section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, had no application; and it was needful to look only to the 37th. But that section gives power to amend only where the defendant has been erroneously joined by a mistake, and not where he has been joined in order to try whether he was liable or not. Moreover, "even if the Act of Parliament gave the power, this is not a case in which it ought to be exercised. It would be a very dangerous practice, and would lead to parties being unjustly made defendants, if such amendments were made. If there is any misconception, and the application is made in the course of the trial, then it is a fit case for the judge to exercise his discretion; but not when the plaintiff goes to the jury against both defendants." The Court proceeded to intimate that the course for the plaintiff to adopt (if he thought proper) was to bring a fresh action against the single defendant; and, indeed, it would seem, from Robson v. Doyle (3 Ell. & Bl. 396), that even if they had considered the case one for amendment, they would not have interfered after trial, except by way of allowing a new trial, striking out of the record the name of the defendant wrongly joined.

ENGLAND AND IRELAND—THE BENCH AND THE BAR.

The appointment of Mr. H. S. Keating as English Solicitor-General is one of those circumstances which now and then arise to indicate the growing appreciation of Irish talent on the other side of the Channel, and consequently to tempt young aspirants away from the ranks of the profession here to a wider arena, where each combatant for honours has more elbow-room for the conflict, and where there are higher rewards in prospect for those who are successful in it. The recent elevation of those distinguished judges, Martin and Willes, one from the far north, the other from the extreme south of Ireland, had a great effect in stimulating the ambition, as well as in allaying the anti-English prejudices of young Irish lawyers in general. The merited success of Serjeant Shee in the common law courts, of Mr. Cairns, in Chancery, as well as of a large number of less distinguished natives of the Emerald Isle, does not pass unnoticed by observers who regard the "signs of the times." From these premises, however, it would not be easy to arrive at the conclusion which at first, perhaps, might present itself to the reader's mind. By frequent migrations, the legal profession in England may be yearly becoming composite as to its nationality; but let it not be imagined that the great prizes in Ireland are becoming more accessible to importations from Westminster Hall. Indeed, it is somewhat remarkable, that, never since Earl Strongbow landed on these shores, would the appointment of an English lawyer to the Irish Bench meet with more determined and general opposition than it would at the present time. This feeling cannot be considered unreasonable, when it is remembered that strict reciprocity is all that is contended for by what may be called the anti-English party. For some centuries past English lawyers have, from time to time, been brought over here to preside in the Court of Chancery; but no instance has been recorded of any Irish practitioner receiving a judicial appointment in England. Lord St. Leonards was the last, as he was the greatest, English Lord Chancellor of Ireland. A less eminent man than he is would have been received with colder welcome; but however this may be, it is generally considered that Lord St. Leonards was the last of the series of imported chancellors—unless, indeed, her Majesty, by appointing an Irish practitioner to the English bench, reconcile the profession here to what they would otherwise consider to be the direst of insults. Against such interchange of appointments no sound objection can be urged, while many reasons can be given in its favour. But to any attempt to revive the old one-sided system, the Irish profession, and indeed the entire nation, would offer a fierce, and probably an effectual, resistance.

Connected with this topic, and so intimately connected with it as always to be mentioned with it in conversation, is a passage in the life of the late Lord Plunket, on which, had more light been contemporaneously thrown, much bitterness and ill-feeling might have been prevented. The bar here are fond of narrating how that Plunket, while in the zenith of his parliamentary and forensic reputation as an advocate and a lawyer, was nominated to the office of Master of the Rolls in England; and how (so the story goes) the English bar made such an outcry, that the appointment was immediately revoked. This story, if substantiated, would certainly go far to justify the general aversion to judicial importations from England; and we have made every effort to arrive at some basis of authority for the story, but without success. Lord Plunket was undoubtedly, at one time, on the point of becoming Master of the Rolls; and it may further be conceded that some change of plan prevented his ever actually occupying the Rolls House; but we have undoubted authority for asserting that no movement, actual or threatened, on the part of the English bar, interfered with the scheme, which must have been abandoned with his consent for reasons altogether foreign to any question between the two bars. It may appear strange that so groundless a tradition as this should have flourished to this day, and should be even now daily repeated and commented on; but it would seem that some fictions have more vitality in them—more tenacity of existence—than have many truths, and, therefore, require much of reiterated contradiction and disproof before finally vanishing. We may be permitted to close these remarks with one proposition, and with two practical suggestions. The proposition is—that, considering the close proximity into which England and Ireland are brought by steam and telegraph, by commerce, by unity of government and language, by mixture of races, by the investment of capital in Ireland, and by numerous other and ever-multiplying ties, it is desirable that the laws should be framed and administered alike for both kingdoms.

To further this object, care should be taken, that, for purposes of legislation, both kingdoms should be treated as one; separate statutes for Ireland (many of them purely experimental) should no longer be tolerated. It would not, however, suffice to have the laws framed alike if they are to be differently expounded and administered. To insure uniformity, the Crown should not only select the judges of assize from the judicial benches of both countries, but should, on principle, fill any vacancy occurring on either of those benches by promoting the ablest and most suitable man who can be found on either side of the channel. The public welfare demands the amplest freedom of selection; nor did the common law, in its wisdom, place any restriction whatever on the Crown in its choice of a new judge: it remained for the narrow minds who have dominated in later times to impose a virtual restriction on all, as well as a legal restriction on some offices—in fact, to exclude from the English bench all who, however well qualified, are not members of the English bar.* The great, the only canon of selection should be, to choose the man most able for the vacant office.

THE TIPPERARY BANK.

When this celebrated institution first came under the operation of the Winding-up Acts, it was generally expected, that, from the long list of shareholders, a very large sum of money would be recovered applicable towards the discharge of the liabilities of the bank. The post of official manager became therefore an object of ambition to a crowd of candidates, whose respective merits and capabilities were discussed at great length before the Master in Chancery in whose hands lay the power of selection. A gentleman of ability was chosen for the office, who has worked indefatigably at his task; but apparently with small success. The coveted position has involved him in labour and litigation, the only result of which seems to be, that the "list of contributories" is dwindling away to a degree which forbids all hope of anything beyond a nominal dividend. The more wealthy shareholders have, with but one exception, contrived to expunge their names from the list, on various ingenious pretexts; while the whole body of English shareholders have also been solemnly adjudged to have escaped liability, by reason of their having been fraudulently drawn into the concern. The net result of all this expunging process appears by a recent advertisement in the journals of this day, wherein Master Murphy "peremptorily" required a very scanty list of contributories to bring in £250 per share. How many of them will respond to the invitation remains to be seen. We should not, however, calculate that more than three or four of them have the ability to comply, even if they were inclined to do so. Among the rest the name of Mr. Antony Norris, Solicitor, of London, appears in his capacity of personal representative of John Sadleir, "deceased," holding 150 shares. Mr. James Sadleir, the late managing director, figures as holding no less than 1,788 shares. From these specimens of contributories, the creditors of the bank will be able to form some idea of the amount of further dividend which they are likely to receive.

SAVINGS BANKS.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—The proposed Savings Bank Bill being before the public, permit me to ask space in your journal for the purpose of making some remarks on this measure.

Two leading principles should govern all enactments relating to savings banks—the first, that there should be perfect and entire Government security for every deposit; the second, that neither the Government nor the Government funds should bear any cost, charge, or expense whatever in respect to savings banks, or in respect to depositors in savings banks or their moneys.

The first principle is so generally received and adopted as an indispensable attribute to savings banks, that it would not be necessary to say anything on that subject if this Bill did not so greatly fall short in giving that security. I am more struck with this defect from having had occasion to examine first the Bill brought forward by Mr. Disraeli, during the government of Lord Derby, and, afterwards, that proposed by Mr. Gladstone. I write from memory, but I feel no doubt that each of these Bills comprehended all savings banks, whether already established or to be established, under one rule, to the effect of making it compulsory on all to extend Government security to every deposit.

Bearing in mind the comprehensive plan of those Bills, one is surprised to find how small a part of the defects of savings banks already established is touched by the present measure. These defects are—firstly, that these banks do not afford complete Government security to the depositors; and, secondly, that they have brought, and will continue to bring, a large amount of loss and charge on the Government funds.

In regard to these banks, the present Bill does not contain any provision to diminish the said amount of loss and charge, nor to prevent its increase in future.

By the 14th section, trustees and managers of any savings bank already established may obtain the security of Government for the depositors in such savings bank, upon condition that its solvency is proved by the production of the pass-books of the depositors, or by such other evidence as shall be satisfactory to the National Debt Commissioners.

It is impossible to foresee what other evidence will satisfy the Commissioners; but I will venture to say, that if the production of ALL the pass-books be made the condition upon which obtaining Government security will depend, that condition is not likely to be fulfilled, nor Government security to be obtained. And I will also venture to say, that, without the production of all the pass-books, and comparing the entries therein with the books and accounts in the bank, no complete and conclusive evidence of solvency, and of the entire absence of fraud and malversation, can be obtained.

Under this view of the case, it appears improbable that any large proportion of the savings banks already established will be able, even if willing, to fulfil the conditions on which the security of the Government can be obtained for the depositors.

Except the provision in the 14th section, no stipulation is contained in the Bill for the security of the funds of savings banks already established, which funds amount to more than thirty millions of money. Those who expected to find in this Bill a remedy for the unsatisfactory state of this immense mass of property will feel greatly disappointed.

The regulations for the establishment of fresh savings banks appear sound and good, so far as they go; but it will be a fallacy to suppose that any examination of accounts by inspectors and auditors will entirely prevent fraud. Suppose the case of a trustee, or manager, or actuary receiving a series of deposits, and entering all the sums properly in the respective pass-books, but omitting to make corresponding entries in the bank books, and embezzling the money. The keenest and most extensive audit of the bank books will not discover any trace of the fraud if the pass-books are not also before the auditor, which I consider impossible, because a savings bank of moderate business will have from five thousand to ten thousand pass-books, all of which cannot be got sight of, either in one day, or in any reasonable time.

If a system of entire security cannot be established, it should be made as perfect as possible. The best security will be found by employing officers under bond with sureties for a good amount. Unpaid trustees and managers will not give such security, but actuaries and other paid officers will; therefore, the receipt of deposits or other money by trustees and managers should be strictly prohibited, and be confined to the officers giving security. It should not be left to the National Debt Commissioners or the Comptroller-General to enforce this important regulation, because their doing so may be thought invidious or distrustful of the unpaid officers whose services are useful and valuable. This regulation should be inserted in the Bill, and thus be taken away from the judgment of all parties concerned.

These remarks apply to the first of the two leading principles I have ventured to lay down for the government of savings banks. At a future opportunity I will draw the attention of your readers to the second of those principles, and will endeavour to show that there is no reason why the national funds should suffer from loss or damage which may occur either through fraud, or by reason of variations in the price of funds; and I will point out a mode in which indemnity against all such charges may be found.

* The Crown has legal power to appoint any person to the office of Lord High Chancellor and Master of the Rolls, or to any of the Common-law Judgeships. Under several modern Acts of Parliament, the following judicial offices can be held only by barristers-at-law of a certain number of years standing:—Lords Justiceships of Appeal, Vice-Chancellorships, and County Court Judgeships. Of course, Irish barristers are legally eligible for all these offices; but, notwithstanding this, the present Irish Attorney-General (J. D. Fitzgerald) characteristically attempted last year to pass a Bill establishing the office of Vice-Chancellor in Ireland, with a clause limiting the qualification to fifteen years' standing at the Irish Bar.

I am, Sir, your most obedient servant, P.

SIR,—It may, perhaps, come within the scope of your office to offer, from time to time, some information respecting our brother professionals in the various colonies belonging to this country, pointing out the advantages and disadvantages under which they labour, contrasting their methods of procedure, &c., and adding thereto suggestions for the guidance of any member of the profession who may be advised to try his fortune amongst them.

Should you entertain this idea, I for one should be glad to hear of the respective advantages of the Canadian and Australian Colonies, with any suggestions which you may think would be of service to a young solicitor going abroad.

Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England. A new Edition adapted to the Present State of the Law. By R. MALCOLM KERR, LL.D., Barrister-at-law.—Murray, Albemarle Street.

If the multitude of editions were conclusive evidence of the merits of a book, "Blackstone's Commentaries" must be, what its most enthusiastic admirers pronounce it, the greatest popular law book which was ever written. We think, ourselves, that its merits have been rather exaggerated, though it cannot be denied that it is indispensable to the student, and very convenient as an index raisonnée of the law even to the man of business. But its value does not consist in the lucid arrangement of subjects, in the profound appreciation of law as a science, nor in any very remarkable accuracy and research as to the origin and growth of our legal system. The last claim is very commonly put forward on behalf of the author; but though considerable learning is no doubt displayed, the pure text of "Blackstone" contains many speculations which are questionable as to matters of fact, and very far from sound in their philosophy. "Blackstone's" strongest claim to pre-eminence is due to the grace and spirit of his diction, which no other legal writer has rivalled, but his reputation is perhaps owing, in a still greater degree, to the circumstance that he stands alone. With the exception of Serjeant Stephen's "Commentaries," which are themselves based on the text of "Blackstone," there is not a single book in the English language which even attempts to rival the old "Commentaries" as a complete popular picture of English jurisprudence.

This is quite enough to account for the great popularity, and to justify the repeated new editions, of the work without indorsing all the Tory defences for the law as it was, which the admirers of Sir William Blackstone are in the habit of describing as the highest philosophy. One thing is certain, that if this lavish praise is deserved, all the changes which have turned topsy-turvy the system of which "Blackstone" was the panegyrist must have been blunders. Either the philosopher was often at fault, or the law-reformer has been going very wrong indeed.

We have not made these observations for the sake of disparaging what is undoubtedly a very valuable book, but merely as a foundation for a rational judgment on the principles which ought to guide a modern editor in handling the old materials. The excessive reverence for the original text was, until of late years, such that no one ventured to do more than append to it a note, about every six or eight lines, to say that the reader must bear in mind that Blackstone's account of the law has no more reference to the actualities of the present time than if it related to antediluvian jurisprudence. This mode of editing was most mischievous and distracting, especially to the student who wandered from the text to the note and back again, until he found himself in hopeless confusion, and utterly unable to retain in his memory the result either of the law that was, or the law that is, which had thus ingeniously been mixed up together. There is no course open, therefore, for an editor who desires to produce a readable sketch of the law of England, founded on the text of "Blackstone," except to interpolate his own additions among the venerable sentences of the old commentator, and to strike out pretty freely those portions of the original text which modern legislation has superseded. Accepting this necessity, the editors of "Blackstone" have varied much in the extent of the liberty which they have taken with the text. Of all who have devoted themselves to the subject, Serjeant Stephen has treated it with the boldest and most masterly freedom; while the author of the edition now under review is most remarkable for the cautious fidelity with which he has adhered to the original, wherever it was not absolutely obsolete and wrong. "Stephen's Commentaries" form, in fact, a new work, only connected with the earlier one by the circumstance that much of the old matter is used up in the pages of the new treatise. Mr. Kerr's "Blackstone" is strictly what its title-page imports—a new edition of the author adapted to the present state of the law. Thus the old and unscientific division of the subject into Rights of Persons and Rights of Things, is maintained out of reverence to the author, and the sequence of the subordinate topics is in no instance interfered with. So rigidly has Mr. Kerr adhered to his principle of altering the text no more than the change in the law absolutely required, that he has not hesitated to sacrifice to it one of the great merits of the original work—viz. the easy and graceful flow of the narrative. This strikes us as a mistake on the part of the editor. When a passage had to be altered to accommodate it to the enactments of the last 100 years, surely it would have been better to have re-cast it into a readable shape than to have destroyed its beauty and rhythm by tagging on half-a-line of incongruous diction in one place, a whole line in another, and capping a sentence every here and there with a solid mass of condensed statute law, which harmonises about as well with the language of the author as a modern hat would with the costume of one of King Charles's cavaliers. It is not easy so to assimilate the tone of an old writer as to introduce extensive alterations in his text without destroying its elegance and finish; but Mr. Kerr has not made the attempt, or, if he has, his capacity for the task is very much below that of average editors. His conception of his editorial obligations seems to have been to take the old text, and add the greatest possible amount of modern statutes, with the smallest possible elimination of the old phraseology. This was adhering to the letter rather than to the spirit of his duties, and the result is a book much less like the original in the qualities for which that was most admired than would have been produced by a more liberal interpretation of the editor's functions. It is one thing to preserve as far as possible the spirit and character of the author while adapting his statements to the present state of the law. It is quite another thing to keep as many of Blackstone's words as could be retained. The present editor has, we think, been more successful in the latter than in the former object. His most elegant method of adding to the narrative the law which has grown up since Blackstone's time is to take one of the old Professor's pleasant sentences, and to couple it with an "and also" to any amount of dry head-note which could be extracted from the appropriate page of the statute book. Mr. Kerr appears to have laboured at his task with great industry, and we are bound to admit, that, so far as we can discover, the law has been accurately brought down to the present time. But this is not all that one looks for in a popular treatise. An architect who should "adapt" a fine old mansion to the luxury of modern life by tacking on a room in front, opening out a window at the side, and building an excrescence in the rear, all in the purest suburban gothic, would perhaps make the house a much more useful and commodious affair than it was before; but he would not improve its elegance, nor could he claim credit for having treated the old stones with any more real reverence than if he had pulled the building to the ground, and re-erected it on a model framed in the spirit of the original builder.

This analogy will furnish a not unfair illustration of Mr. Kerr's contributions to the text of Blackstone. At the same time, if much of the elegance of the original work is sacrificed, the new edition offers a summary of the existing law at a cost very much below the ordinary charges for legal text-books. Why Mr. Butterworth should be unable to produce a copy of "Stephen's Commentaries" at the same reasonable price which Mr. Murray asks for an equally well-printed copy of "Blackstone" we cannot explain; but it strikes us that the law publishers would consult their own interest no less than the pockets of purchasers by a very considerable reduction of the exorbitant charges which they are in the habit of making for the works which they produce.

Juridical Society.

This society met on Monday evening, the 25th May. Richard Jebb, Esq., took the chair, in the absence of Sir John Stuart, V. C., who was unable to be present at the commencement of the meeting, and apologised for not being punctual, having been detained until a late hour at chambers.

Mr. FITZJAMES STEPHEN read a paper on "The Practice of Interrogating Persons Accused of Crime." He commenced by remarking that there was no rule so inflexibly observed in English criminal procedure as that which forbids the interrogation of persons accused of crime. There were few in which the English practice was so unlike that of other nations, and probably none which excited so much controversy since its wisdom was first called in question by Jeremy Bentham. Though the practice was peculiar to this country, there was much difficulty in finding express authority for the proposition that it would be illegal to interrogate the prisoner. Blackstone, Stephen, Hale, Hawkins, Foster, Russell, Phillips, Starkie, Taylor, and even in the elaborate discussion of the subject introduced into Mr. Best's treatise on the "Principles of Evidence"—a book for the ability of which the learned Reader expressed admiration, though he dissented from many of its principles—there was only a general statement, based on no explicit authority, that to interrogate the prisoner is illegal. There were, however, three well-recognised principles, each of which had some connection with the practice, and might, with more or less justice, be taken as an authority for it. The two first are expressed in the celebrated maxims, "Nemo tenetur prodere or accusare seipsum," and "Nemo debet esse testis in propriâ causâ;" and the third, in the doctrine that torture is unknown to the common law. But neither of these doctrines condemned the practice of interrogating the accused; and the way in which by their united operation it is excluded is a curious illustration of the manner in which English law assumed its present shape. The maxim "Nemo tenetur prodere seipsum" was first quoted in certain cases referred to in 3 Bulstrode, and seems to be as old as 10 Elizabeth. It was first employed in the case of prohibitions issued to the spiritual courts against examining the parties upon oath in cases involving forfeiture; and the familiar application of the maxim in later times has been to protect witnesses against answering questions which might have a tendency to involve them in criminal charges, but it had never been held to mean that such questions are not to be asked. Indeed, it was matter of every-day practice to ask persons whether they have committed crimes; and if they claim the protection of the maxim in question, to urge upon the consideration of the jury the fact that they had not ventured to deny the imputation which it conveyed. It might also be observed, that, though the law does not compel an answer to such a question, the ordinary witness's oath "to tell the whole truth" constitutes a conscientious obligation to do so, which the law not only allows to be imposed, but itself imposes.

The maxim "Nemo debet esse testis in propriâ causâ" appeared at first sight to have a closer connection with the practice under consideration. A criminal trial is, in form, the trial of an issue joined between our sovereign lady the Queen and the prisoner at the bar, and it would be very hard to overrate the importance of the influence which this circumstance had over every part of our criminal law. The prisoner, it might be urged, is a party to the action, and was accordingly an incompetent witness; and no doubt this view of the case was, to a certain extent, recognised by the late Act to amend the "Law of Evidence" (14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 3). It would be observed that the language of the Act assumed, but did not extend or create, incompetency. There were, however, circumstances which went far to show that the analogy between civil and criminal proceedings was not quite complete, and that it must not, especially in respect of the prisoner's evidence, be pressed too hard. One instance might be mentioned which showed that the maxim and the practice under consideration were not really inconsistent. It was true that a prisoner could not be called as a witness either for or against himself; but it was by no means true that he could not give evidence either for or against himself. On the contrary, he constantly did give such evidence, and sometimes it was the most material evidence in the case. He is always allowed to tell his own story to the jury, and in doing so it was competent to him to state any number of facts upon his own unsupported authority, on which facts the judge makes comments. No one could pass a day in a criminal court without hearing instances of this practice; but no one ever heard a judge tell the jury that the prisoner's unsupported statement was not evidence, and that they must dismiss it from their consideration; yet it would be his duty to do so if the maxim that no one is to be a witness in his own cause were rigorously applied to criminal cases. In illustration of this, the learned reader referred to a case which he heard tried at Warwick, at the Winter Assizes of 1855. On that occasion the counsel for the prisoner began to state to the jury, to use his own words, "as the prisoner's mouthpiece," facts of which he could offer no evidence. He was stopped by the judge (Mr. Justice Cresswell), who said that though the prisoner might make such a statement, his counsel might not; and that if the case was to be rested on such a defence, it must be made by the prisoner in person — which was accordingly done. Couple this practice with the fact that at common law the prisoner's witnesses in capital cases were not upon oath, and we have a strong argument to prove that the statement of the prisoner stands now upon nearly the same terms as the rest of the evidence in his favour stood upon before the statute of Anne. If, therefore, the prisoner might give evidence in his own cause notwithstanding the maxim, the maxim cannot forbid his interrogation, though the rule "Nemo tenetur prodere seipsum" must justify him in refusing to answer.

The third principle which may be supposed to militate against the interrogation of the accused is, the principle that torture is unknown to the common law. Failing to find any express or implied authority which is entirely satisfactory on the subject, recourse must of necessity be had to the practice of the courts; and there can be no room for doubt, that, for at least a century and a half, they have acted upon the supposition that to question a prisoner is illegal. Some earlier precedents showed, however, that such had not been by any means the uniform theory of English lawyers; that, on the contrary, the opinion arose from a peculiar and accidental state of things which had long since passed away; and that our modern law was in fact derived from somewhat questionable sources.

The earliest form of trial known in England was the Saxon trial by ordeal. This was gradually superseded by the Norman trial by combat, which gave way by degrees to the trial by jury, and was finally abolished, after a long period of dormancy. To say that each of these forms of trial involved the questioning of the accused was to say far too little. Each of them was his emphatic answer to the question—urged upon him either by common report in the form of a grand jury, or by a private appellant or accuser—whether he was or was not guilty. The character of the ordeal speaks for itself. The oath of the appellee ran in these terms:—"Hear this, O man! whom I hold by the hand, who callest thyself John by the name of baptism, that I, who call myself Thomas by the name of baptism, did not feloniously murder thy father, William by name, nor am anywise guilty of the said felony." Trial by jury was originally a trial by witnesses, and it was not till the reign of Henry IV. that the two functions were completely separated. These witnesses were called compurgators, and the very name implies that the prisoner was called upon to deny the charge. Indeed our own practice of calling upon the prisoner to plead could not be reconciled with an absolute adoption of the rule, that a man is not to be questioned as to his guilt; and one of the most consistent and earliest advocates of that principle (Col. Lilburne) long refused to plead upon that very ground. We had, however, apart from these considerations, an unbroken line of precedents in favour of the practice in question, from the earliest periods of English history down to 1698.

Mr. Stephen then proceeded to adduce instances—among others the trial of Sir N. Brambre, Lord Mayor of London, for treason, in 1388; of John Hall, in 1400, for the murder of the Duke of Glo'ster; of Sir William Stanley, in 1494, for treason; of Sir T. Moore, in 1535; of the Duke of Norfolk, in 1571; of Udale, in 1599: also of Throckmorton and others—which showed that the system of interrogating prisoners existed in those times; and then traced the cases down to the trial of the Rev. Mr. Hawkins, for theft, before Sir Matthew Hale, then Lord Chief Baron, who is reported to have questioned the prisoner—as did also Holt, L. C. J., in the trial of Harrison, in 1692, for murder (see 12 State Trials, 859).

The first case where it appeared that a prisoner objected to answer was that of Colonel Lilburne, who, being called on to plead, said—"Sir, by the Petition of Right, I am not to answer any questions concerning myself." The judge corrected him by saying that he should not be compelled to answer—i. e. that he should not be put to the torture, which, as Mr. Jardine has proved, was in constant use in the Star Chamber Practice, not merely in cases of State offences, but when persons were accused of ordinary crimes, such as robbery and horse-stealing.

The judges of the 18th century administered the most cruelly severe penal code that ever existed. They made the procedure as lenient, because the Legislature made the laws as bloodthirsty, as possible. No other nation in Europe hung men for grand larceny, but no other nation in Europe refused to receive a confession if it was induced by a threat.

The recollections of the Star Chamber—the infamy of the judges of the later Stuarts—the illegality of torture, then peculiar to England—the gradual reduction of the law to system characteristic of the 18th century, and the anomaly of penal laws of atrocious severity administered by judges at once humane, and in a certain direction powerful—all these taken together remove any difficulty in understanding how the practice of not interrogating accused persons came to be based upon the grounds on which it is commonly rested.

To the principle thus established there were two very considerable exceptions. In the case of parliamentary impeachments, the proceedings have frequently been conducted by articles and answers, differing only in form from interrogatories. In the cases of Lord Stafford, Colonel Fiennes, and Lord Macclesfield, one answer was construed as admitting so much of the corresponding article as it did not deny; and, on the other hand, justices of the peace were required, by the repealed statute of 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 13, and 7 G. 4, c. 64, to take the examinations of persons accused, and the informations of witnesses, and though this practice is now altered by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 101, it was held in several late cases that the repealed statutes entitled the magistrates to question persons brought before them on criminal charges. In one case this was held to be irregular, but in that instance no other general principle was appealed to.

The learned reader then referred at length to some French cases to show how the system of interrogating prisoners was sometimes grossly abused in France, and proceeded as follows: Whether a prisoner is defended by counsel or not, his silence is very unfavourable to him if innocent. When he is defended, he suffers almost equally from the unskilfulness or from the ingenuity of his counsel. If his advocate, from forgetfulness or want of skill, fails to explain a suspicious circumstance, it weighs heavily with the court and the jury; if he puts forward a complete and consistent answer, the jury look upon it with suspicion, because it proceeds from a man whose profession it is to frame plausible explanations of inconvenient facts. If, on the other hand, the prisoner is undefended, his position is at times absolutely pitiable. I cannot describe the difficulties under which such a man labours without resorting to a familiarity of illustration which I hope you will excuse. The common run of criminal trials passes somewhat thus: Ten or twelve awkward clowns, "looking," as a very eminent advocate once observed, "like over-driven cattle," are crowded together in the dock. Their minds are confused by formulas about challenging the jury, standing on their deliverance, and pleading to the indictment; the case is opened, and the witnesses called by a man to whom the whole process has become a mere routine, and whose very coolness must confuse and bewilder a densely-ignorant and most deeply-interested hearer. After the witness has been examined comes a scene which most of us know by heart, but which I can never hear without pain. It is something to the following effect:—Judge: Do you wish to ask the witness any questions? Prisoner: Yes, Sir; I ask him this, my Lord—I was walking down the lane with two other men, for I'd heard ——. Judge: No, no; that is your defence—ask him questions. You may say what you please to the jury afterwards, but now you must ask him questions. In other words, the prisoner is called upon, without any previous practice, to throw his defence into a series of interrogatories, duly marshalled, both as to the persons to be asked and as to the subjects to be inquired into—an accomplishment which trained lawyers often pass years in acquiring most imperfectly. After this interruption has occurred three or four times in the course of a trial, the prisoner is not unfrequently reduced to utter perplexity and forgetfulness, and thinks it respectful to be silent. Hardly any ignorant person can tell a story of the simplest kind without endless and maundering, irrelevant and extremely wearisome details; and hardly any judge has the patience to sift out the grain of wheat from the bushels of chaff which are on such occasions put before him. A few questions would constantly clear up the whole, but the prisoner may not be questioned, and his liberty is constantly sacrificed to a groundless fear of invading it. I have seen judges again and again give the broadest hints to prisoners, which, if they had been put in an interrogative form, might have been invaluable, but which, as they were made, were thrown away upon ignorance, fear, and stupidity. Let any one try to get an account of the simplest transaction from his servants or children without asking them questions, and he will appreciate in a moment the value of which interrogation would be to the prisoner. No one who has sensitive nerves himself can fail to be aware, that, on important occasions, a very slight cause may make him forget the most important part of what he has to say; and there is little doubt, that, when innocent men are convicted, it frequently arises from the fact, that, from ignorance or confusion, they have omitted to ask questions or to give explanations which might have cleared their character. In one of the cases referred to above, this would very possibly have been the case but for a well-timed question from the judge. Sir M. Hale asked a man why he objected to have his house searched? He immediately gave a satisfactory explanation. If he had, from ignorance or nervousness, forgotten this point, it might have weighed heavily with the jury.

One of the most distinguished advocates of the existing practice has observed, that "few things tell more strongly against a prisoner than his non-explanation of apparently criminating circumstances." The absence of any suggestion, either from the judge or jury, as to what circumstances require explanation, tells far more heavily against him if he is not defended, and that very skilfully. Even if he is defended, his silence exposes him to a degree of suspicion from which he was free when defences by counsel were not allowed. At that period the obligation to make a defence was an incomplete, and to the prisoner an unfavourable, substitute for interrogation, because it had a strong tendency to convict the guilty, though none at all to exculpate the innocent. The cases of Throckmorton and Udale show that if the prisoner's defence was made piecemeal to every branch of the charge, the trial slid of necessity into a prolonged interrogatory—a form of procedure which both of these able persons requested as a favour and indulgence to their weak memories. If, on the other hand, the prisoner defended himself, the jury would not listen to a mere contention that the evidence was consistent with his innocence, without a distinct assertion that in point of fact he was innocent. If Eugene Aram's defence had been pronounced by a barrister, he might very probably have been acquitted. But, coming as it did from the prisoner himself, the judge at once directed the attention of the jury to the fact that it was more like the ingenious reasoning of an advocate conscious of a bad cause than the bold denial of guilt which might be expected from an innocent man. Paley, who heard the trial, said of him that no man ever got himself hanged so cleverly. In Mr. Best's work it is observed, with great truth and force, that any item of the evidence is, in effect, a question to the prisoner. This is undoubtedly true, and it seems to me to follow inevitably that it is only fair to point out the fact to him in an unmistakeable form.

The practice of interrogation would have the further advantage of relieving honest advocates from a painful dilemma, and would prevent dishonest ones from setting up groundless defences. The duty of counsel at present is to find out any possible hypothesis by which the evidence may be made consistent with the prisoner's innocence, and to press that hypothesis upon the jury with all his power; for his criterion is, not that the prisoner is innocent, but that he is not proved to be guilty. I need not dwell upon the delicate cases of conscience to which this duty may give rise, but there can surely be no reason why this function should not be narrowed to that of showing that the prisoner's account of the evidence is consistent with innocence. It seems to me that the determination of the line of defence to be adopted ought, on every account, to be left to the prisoner. A prisoner was not long ago convicted, and on being called on in the usual manner, said, "My lord, I have three witnesses in court to prove I was not there." "Yes," said the judge, with considerable sternness; "and do you know why your counsel did not call those witnesses. It was because he did not believe them. Neither should I have believed them." No doubt the judge and the counsel were quite right in their opinion, but it is surely a strange morality which insists that one man shall invent a probable falsehood (I do not wish to use the word offensively) for fear that another should tell an improbable one which he had already invented. Let us suppose, for example, that in a late case, deservedly celebrated as a model of criminal procedure—I mean the trial of Palmer—the prisoner had been asked quietly and simply the following questions:—Did you buy any strychnine? If so, what did you want with it? Did Cook give you a cheque for his winnings? Did you send it to his agents, and did you receive it back from them? If so, where is it? This last question was, in fact, though not in form, asked by a notice to produce, and the absence of an answer was one of the strongest circumstances against the prisoner.

It is usually objected that the sympathies of the judge would be enlisted against the prisoner by allowing him to ask him questions. This is, no doubt, a great and real danger; but we must remember that in England a judge has much less to do with the trial than in France—that we have the advantage of the strongest possible public sentiment against such unfairness, and that interrogation may be conducted in a friendly as well as in an unfriendly spirit. It might, however, be observed, that if we are to assume the existence of injustice and prejudice in judges, those qualities now find ample means of gratifying themselves. Under our existing system, a partial charge to the jury would do the business effectively. Interrogation has not been, in this country, the favourite weapon of unjust judges. In the horrible case of Lady Lisle, whilst the judge was raging and blaspheming like a wild beast, though he frequently interrupted the prisoner's defence with oaths and curses, he never questioned her once. A just and humane judge would not condescend to fence with a common criminal, and the practice might, if necessary, be prohibited in political cases. At any rate, no such objection would apply to the jury. The jury might suggest questions, and the judge might put them. Even the counsel for the Crown might be trusted with such a power to question the prisoner only upon points which other witnesses had shown to be within his knowledge. Did you do such a thing? Were you at such a place?—and as to the motives of the conduct which he admitted. In a word, his defence might be elicited by means of questions, instead of leaving him to make it for himself, or allowing his counsel to make it for him; liberty, of course, being left to the defendant or his counsel of adding whatever he pleased.

We must suit our reforms to our institutions. Trial by jury no one proposes to modify. We must, therefore, admit no evidence the force of which ordinary minds cannot appreciate; and the mere facts that a person cannot give a consistent account of the manner in which his time was spent, or that he tells falsehoods about collateral matters, when under the burden of an accusation, are circumstances so remote from the question of guilt or innocence that they ought not to be placed before such a tribunal as a jury. They have, no doubt, some reference to guilt, and so have early education and general character; but it would be as foolish to ask twelve shopkeepers or farmers whether these things were consistent with innocence, as it would be to weigh out the drugs of a prescription in a grocer's scales. On the other hand, the power of giving some general account of the circumstances which have produced a criminal charge is so usually the characteristic of innocence, and so seldom the companion of guilt, that its existence ought to be placed before juries as distinctly as possible. Further, our present procedure does, in fact, place the prisoner's statement before the jury, but it does so in a manner so clumsy and indirect as to give no great benefit to any one, and to inflict the greatest possible inconvenience upon the innocent.

The next meeting of this Society will be held on Monday, the 8th instant, at 8 o'clock P.M., the Hon. Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart, President of the Society, in the chair, when Mr. W. M. Best will read a paper on "The Common Law of England, with an Examination of some False Principles of Law Reform."

Questions at the Examination.

TRINITY TERM, 1857.

I. PRELIMINARY.

1. Where, and with whom, did you serve your clerkship?
2. State the particular branch or branches of the law to which you have principally applied yourself during your clerkship.
3. Mention some of the principal law books which you have read and studied.
4. Have you attended any, and what, law lectures?

II. COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

5. State the distinction between actions of contract and of tort; and between simple contract and specialty debts.
6. What is the proper mode of suing on a bill of exchange or promissory note, with respect to indorsing the writ of summons, the time for signing judgment for want of appearance, and obtaining leave to appear and defend?
7. Which of the parties to a bill of exchange is primarily liable to pay it; and how is this liability affected by the bill being accepted for accommodation?
8. What is the difference between libel and slander?
9. By whom are replevins now granted; and in what court may an action of replevin be commenced?
10. Where an action is brought in a superior court to recover a less sum than £20, due upon a contract, what course must be taken to enable the plaintiff, if he succeeds, to recover his costs; and on what scale will such costs be taxed?
11. In what manner may judgment be signed for non-appearance to a writ specially indorsed; and where one of two defendants upon whom such a writ has been served appears, and the other does not, how may the plaintiff proceed?
12. In what cases is a master responsible in damages for a tortious injury done by his servant; and how may his liability be altered by the fact of the injured party being also his servant?
13. What step is it necessary for an attorney to take before he can bring an action for his bill of costs?
14. What notice to quit is generally required in order to determine a yearly tenancy, and to what period of the year must it refer?
15. At what time after verdict may a successful party sign judgment and issue execution?
16. In what cases, and under what circumstances, may a party appeal from the decision of a superior court upon a motion for a new trial, or to enter a verdict pursuant to leave reserved; and what notice of appeal must be given, and to whom?
17. In what manner may a judgment obtained against a registered joint-stock company be enforced against a shareholder?
18. With what exceptions may the parties or their wives be examined as witnesses in their own causes?
19. Is it necessary to call an attesting witness to prove any, and what, species of written instrument?

III. CONVEYANCING.

20. By what means are the respective species of property usually conveyed or transferred?
21. If land be conveyed, and no mention of the buildings thereon, nor of mines or minerals thereunder, would such buildings, mines, and minerals pass by the conveyance? What is the rule in such cases?
22. Suppose a pool or piece of water be granted, what passes to the grantee?
23. Under what authority may an estate tail be now bar'd, by whom, in what manner?
24. What are emblements, and when is a lessee of a tenant for life entitled to emblements, and when not?
25. What is the difference between a jointure and a dower, and how does each arise?
26. A. holds a lease for several lives, and he makes underleases; upon the death of one of the lives, he wishes to surrender the existing lease, and to have a new lease for the existing lives, with the addition of one in the place of the deceased. Would it be necessary that the under-lessees concur in that surrender, or not?
27. A testator appoints C. and D. executors of his will; C. renounces, and D. proves the will alone, and has probate; D. dies in the lifetime of C.; how stands the representation to the testator, and how is an assignment to be obtained from a legal representative?
28. The mortgagee in fee dies without devising the security, the mortgagor is desirous to pay the money; the heir-at-law of the mortgagee is unwilling or incapable to reconvey; to whom may the mortgagor pay the money, and of whom obtain the reconveyance?
29. As to the registering of deeds affecting property in registered counties, what may be the consequence from delaying to register such deeds?
30. Title-deeds abstracted, but not in the vendor's possession but in the hands of other persons, how are such deeds to be examined, and at whose expense?
31. What is the distinction between estates in remainder, and estates in reversion?
32. Two persons, A. and B. (not partners), are to give bond to C. for the payment of a certain sum of money; what should be the obligation so that if B. die and leave A. surviving, C. may have a claim upon B.'s estate?

33. Suppose A. and B. are partners, and give their joint bond to C., and A. or B. die, what remedy would C. have against the survivor, and the estate of the deceased?

34. Suppose one of the joint and several obligors to be merely a guarantee for the other, what should such guarantee require from the co-obligor for his security?

IV. EQUITY AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

35. Mention some of the ordinary cases in which the Court of Chancery exercises jurisdiction as distinguished from the courts of law.

36. When a mortgagee enters into possession of the mortgaged estate, what is the proper proceeding to be taken by the mortgagor desirous of redeeming the mortgage; and is there any, and what, limit to the period within which such proceeding must be commenced?

37. If a legal estate be outstanding in an infant, or a person of unsound mind, as a trustee, state the nature and effects of the summary proceeding to be taken under the Trustee Act for getting in the legal estate.

38. Refer to any recent Act of Parliament under which the Court of Chancery (notwithstanding the absence of a power in the settlement) can authorise a sale or lease of settled estates without a special application to Parliament.

39. State shortly the circumstances in which the Court is, by the Act referred to, authorised to exercise jurisdiction, and the mode of proceeding.

40. What are the several modes in which the parties, plaintiffs and defendants, in a suit in Chancery, may adduce evidence to verify their respective cases for the hearing of the cause?

41. How should an affidavit to be used in the Court of Chancery distinguish facts or circumstances which are within the deponent's own knowledge, from those which are deposed to from his information and belief; and is it necessary to show, upon the affidavit, what are the deponent's means of knowledge or source of information.

42. If no interrogatories be filed requiring an answer by a defendant to a bill, is he at liberty within any, and what, time to put in a voluntary answer?

43. Where a defendant is not required to answer interrogatories, what is considered to be the effect of not putting in a voluntary answer?

44. State the respective amounts of principal money and in annual payments which, if payable out of a fund under the control of the Court to a married woman, entitle her to elect whether the amount shall be paid to her husband, or be made the subject of settlement.

45. If the married woman elect that the amount shall be paid to her husband, what is the mode of proceeding, and what evidence is necessary to obtain the order for such payment?

46. If before distributing the residue of a deceased's estate, an executor or administrator be desirous of being indemnified from unascertained debts and liabilities, is there any, and what, summary proceeding which he can take for this purpose without instituting a suit?

47. By what instruments can a father appoint a guardian to his children, and what are the ordinary powers and duties of such guardian?

48. In the absence of a guardian so appointed, what is the summary course of proceeding after the father's death for the appointment of a guardian, and procuring an allowance for the infant's maintenance.

49. State shortly the mode of proceeding by which a trustee may be relieved from the responsibility of administering trust-funds without instituting a suit?

79. State what, if any, are the conditions which the Court of Queen's Bench requires before granting a rule in a criminal information at the instance of a private prosecutor?

Pending Measures of Law Reform.

FRAUDULENT TRUSTEES BILL.

A trustee (s. 1) of any property, who shall, with intent to defraud, appropriate, &c., such property, or any part thereof, to his own benefit, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. A banker, merchant, broker, attorney, or agent (s. 2), being intrusted as such with the property of any other person, who shall, with intent to defraud, employ, &c., for his own use such property, or any part thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. Any person (s. 3) intrusted with any power of attorney for the sale or transfer of any property, fraudulently selling, &c., such property, or any part thereof, to his own use, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Sects. 4, 5, and 6 are similar clauses, applying to bailees and directors, &c., of companies. By s. 7, if any director, manager, public officer, or member of any company, shall wilfully destroy or falsify any of the books, &c., belonging to the company of which he is a director or manager, public officer, or member, or make, or be privy to the making of, any false or fraudulent entry, or any fraudulent omission in any book of account or other document, with intent to defraud the shareholders, creditors, or other persons interested in the property or effects of such company, every director* so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and whosoever (s. 8) being a director, manager, or public officer of any company, shall wilfully make or publish, or concur in wilfully making, &c., any written statement which he shall know to be false in any material particular, with intent to defraud any member, shareholder, or creditor of such company, or with intent to induce any person to become a shareholder or partner therein, or to intrust or advance any money or property to such body corporate or public company, or to enter into any security for the benefit thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Sect. 9 defines the punishment of offenders. Nothing in this Act contained (s. 10) shall enable any person to refuse to make a full discovery to a bill in equity, or to answer any question in any civil proceeding in any court; but no answer to any such bill or interrogatory shall be admissible in evidence against such person in any proceeding under this Act. No remedy (s. 11) at law or in equity shall be affected; and convictions are not to be received in evidence in civil suits. No prosecution (s. 12) is to be commenced without the sanction of some Judge or the Attorney-General. Receivers of property (s. 13) fraudulently disposed of, against this Act, are to be guilty of a misdemeanor.

The word "trustee" (s. 16) includes the heir and personal representative of any trustee, and also all executors and administrators, and all assignees in bankruptcy and insolvency, bailees of goods, and every person holding or having the disposition of any property for the benefit of another; and the word "property" includes every description of real and personal property, money, debts, and legacies, and all deeds and instruments relating to or evidencing the title or right to any property, or giving a right to recover or receive any money or goods; and such word "property" also denotes not only such real and personal property as may have been the original subject of a trust, but also any real or personal property into which the same may have been converted or exchanged, and the proceeds thereof respectively, and anything acquired by such proceeds.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

This Bill is intituled a Bill to amend the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, for facilitating the winding up the affairs of joint-stock companies unable to meet their pecuniary engagements, and also the "Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849."

The 1st section proposes to enact that in all cases in which an order is made for the winding up of any company, it shall be lawful for the judge by advertisement to call meetings of creditors to appoint their Representatives (other than the official manager), to be elected by two-thirds in value of the creditors present, who would be entitled to vote in the choice of assignees under a bankruptcy. The proceedings of such meeting to be conducted before the judge as in the election of assignees in bankruptcy, but the judge may reject or remove any unfit person, and upon such rejection or removal a new choice of a Representative shall be made in like manner; and from and after the issuing of any such advertisement, all the creditors of the company shall be deemed parties to the winding up; but in case such company has been adjudged bankrupt, the assignees of the estate and effects of such bankrupt company shall be (without such advertisement or meeting) the Representatives of the creditors for the purposes of this Act, and exercise the same rights and powers as are thereby given to such Representatives; and if any such Representatives of the creditors shall have been appointed in the matter of the winding up of any company before the appointment of assignees under the adjudication of bankruptcy against the same company, then the rights of such Representatives shall upon the appointment of assignees determine, and the same rights shall thereupon become vested in such assignees.

Under s. 2, where a company is bankrupt, and no winding-up order has been made, the assignees may, with the leave of the Court of Bankruptcy, compromise with shareholders so as to bind all the creditors; and the said Court shall, at the request of the assignees for the time being of such company, give to the several shareholders and members, or such of them as shall be so discharged, a certificate setting forth the circumstances of such discharge, and such certificate shall thenceforth operate as an absolute release.

The said Representatives of creditors (s. 3) may concur in proceedings and in compromises which the official manager may propose to make either with the debtors or creditors or with the contributories; and all the creditors of the said company, whether their debts have been then proved or not, shall, subject to the provisions thereinafter contained, be fully and effectually bound by the acts of such representative as to all matters authorised by this Act. But (s. 4) the compromise, &c., to be subject to consent of creditors, if required by the judge, and (s. 5) proceedings under this Act are subject to appeal. Creditors' rights (s. 6) against third persons are not to be prejudiced. After advertisements (s. 7) for Representative, creditors not to sue at law without leave of judge, and time is not to run against them.

Under s. 8, the Court may require security from a shareholder, for payment of such sum as it shall require, having regard to the debts and liabilities of such company.

Sect. 9 gives creditors liberty to attend proceedings and inspect books of company. By s. 10, orders for payment of money are to be incumbrances in Ireland within 13 & 14 Vict. c. 29.

Sect. 11 gives the judge power to appoint commissioners for receiving evidence. This Act (s. 12) is to be taken as a part of the "Joint-Stock Companies Winding-up Acts, 1848 and 1849," and (s. 13) the words "shareholder" and "member" are to include all contributories or alleged contributories.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, June 4.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The report of this Bill, with amendments, was received, after some observations by Lord BROUGHAM condemnatory of the new species of divorce invented by their Lordships, and which he intimated his intention of opposing.

The Bill was ordered to be recommitted on June 9th.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS TO WITNESSES.

Lord CAMPBELL, in moving the consideration of the report of the select committee on this subject, said the committee unanimously recommended the discontinuation of the practice of tendering oaths to a witness who came to speak only to matters of opinion. But where there were contested facts and conflicting evidence, the committee considered that it was just as necessary to administer an oath to witnesses who came to depose to matters of fact in a committee of their Lordships' House on a private Bill as it was in any court of law in the kingdom. He concluded by moving—"That select committees in future shall examine witnesses without their having been previously sworn, except in cases in which it may be otherwise ordered by the House;" and "That all committees on private Bills shall examine witnesses on oath, except in cases in which it may be otherwise ordered by the House."

The resolutions were put and agreed to.

Friday, May 29.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. LOWE moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Joint-Stock Companies Act of 1856. This measure was intended to cure certain difficulties which had arisen in the construction of the Act of last session; and to compel companies to come in under the Act which had not yet done so, and thereby to prevent two distinct systems of law from co-existing on the same subject.

Leave was granted, and the Bill was read a first time.

Thursday, June, 4.

PROPERTY OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Mr. MALINS, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to enable married women to dispose of reversionary interests in personal estate, stated that its object was to give married women the right to dispose of personal property in reversion in the same manner and with the same ceremonies as they had now the right to dispose of real property.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought that this Bill would remove a great anomaly, which was not, in truth, a legitimate deduction from the law of England, but which had grown up out of a decision now too old and too frequently followed to be reversed by anything but parliamentary interference. The result of this anomaly was that a married woman might be the owner of the reversion of £40,000 or £50,000 contingent on her outliving her husband, and yet not be able to raise a shilling for her immediate use.

* There appears to be an oversight here in not again repeating the words "manager, public officer, or member." From the preceding part of the section, the intention of the draughtsman was manifestly to make them capable of the same crime as a director, though, in the concluding words of the clause, it is said only that "every director so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

Leave was given, and the Bill was read a first time.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

This Bill went into committee pro formâ, when certain amendments were introduced, and it was ordered to be recommitted on Monday next.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

This Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Monday next.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The House met again on Thursday last, and committees on fifteen groups of opposed Bills have been sitting.

The Mersey Conservancy Bill is still occupying the attention of the Liverpool Committee, and is likely to last another week. If the preamble of that Bill is proved, the other Bills in the group will virtually be negatived. The "Drainage" Committees, as usual, have their hands full. "The Mordon Cars Drainage Bill" is still under consideration, and after many days sitting the promoters have nearly completed their case. The opponents, no doubt, will occupy a long time. The same story may be told of the North Leeds Drainage Bill, in which case the opponents have only just commenced. Those "gentlemen of England" who live in hilly counties little know the amount of litigation and parliamentary contests which are involved in settling the drainage of districts where there is no outfall for the water.

In the Railway Committees, some cases appear to have become stock pieces, and are likely to run as many days as a favourite drama at a minor theatre.

The Broad and Narrow Gauge fight is going on as steadily as ever, though it is supposed that the Southampton, Bristol, and South Wales (Broad Gauge) Bill evidence will be completed about Tuesday afternoon. Then will come the case of the opposing landowners, which will occupy some two days. Then the committee will consider the case of the Severn Ferry Bill, the "Bristol, South Wales, and Southampton," which is the middle link of the broad gauge case, before giving any decision. The Committee on Group 5 have passed the Wimbledon and Dorking Railway Bill in the teeth of the London and Brighton, and London and South Western Railway Companies, who were the only opponents. The scheme is for making a line from Wimbledon to Epsom, and the committee have taken the broad view that the public will be benefited, and have set their faces against vested interests. The Ely Tidal Harbour and Railway Bill is still in progress. It commenced a fortnight since, and the promoters' case is not yet concluded. The Shropshire Union Railway and Canal Bill, which contains power to lease the canal (for the purposes of abandonment) to the North Western Railway Company, is being sharply contested. And in Group 11, the struggle between the Great Northern and North Western Companies which is taking place over the Lancaster and Carlisle and Ingleden Railway, does not diminish, in spite of the heat of the weather, and the dryness of the case.

The railway mania has strongly attacked Ireland, and the Great Southern and Western, and Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland Companies are struggling hard respectively for powers to connect their two railways by a junction, commencing at Tullamore. The contest between them is as to the point in the Great Southern and Western, from which one end of the junction shall commence, and each company is striving to have its own way in the matter.

The committee on the Kent Railway Group met on Thursday, and the first Bill considered was the Herne Bay and Faversham branch. This branch is supposed to be a feeler put forth by the East Kent Railway Company for a short cut to Ramsgate and Margate. The opponents, as usual, are the South Eastern Railway Company; who, it is well known, have a railway which affords the passenger a beautiful view of parts of Surrey and Sussex en route to Dover or Canterbury. The fineness of views, however, in these commercial days, hardly compensates the railway traveller for being carried about to every part of the county except the part he wishes to go to, viz.—the centre of Kent. A million of money has been sunk first and last in the Kent fights, and it is hoped that the committee will break down the monopoly which exists in the county as regards railways.

In group 6, Mr. Redpath's delinquencies are causing a great deal of trouble, as the Great Northern Railway Bill, the purport of which is to provide a means of paying off the £200,000 for which the Company have become liable in consequence of Mr. Redpath's taste for old china and country houses and articles of vertue, is strongly opposed by some of the holders of guaranteed preference shares. In fact it is a shareholders' quarrel.

The Election Committees are about to be nominated; as the Chairmen's panel was struck on Thursday night, and the reports on the recognizances have gone in, we may shortly expect notice of the committees being named.

There is a talk of some of the Committees rising on Thursday—the Cup day at Ascot—but it is hoped that hon. members will have some consideration for the expense of keeping up all the witnesses now in London longer than necessary.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The English Funds have shown little variation during the present week. There has been a better feeling to-day than yesterday, and Consols have closed at ¼ per cent advance. Compared with this day week the price is about the same. The French Three per Cents have been variable. The result is a depression of about ¼ per cent. in the week. Other Foreign Securities have been heavy and generally depressed. The purchase of Exchequer Bills by the Government is discontinued, and those securities for the month of June are quoted at 3s. to 4s. discount. Uncertainty as to the intentions of the directors of the Bank of England regarding loans was dispelled on Tuesday by the announcement that they will make advances during the approaching shutting of Consols at 6½ per cent. These advances will be made upon Government securities of all kinds, and upon India bonds. This accommodation will be discontinued as soon as the books are re-opened. The receipts of bullion have been large. The Parana from Mexico and the West Indies alone brought £632,500, and the arrivals reported from Australia amount to more than an equal sum. On the other hand, it appears the Indus for China and the East Indies has taken all that could be prepared in time, amounting to about £700,000, and that orders for the next mail are equally extensive. The heavy payments of this week, including those incidental to the settlement at the Stock Exchange, which took place yesterday, have been well met, but not without evidence of an extensive demand for money on the part of speculators for the rise. Generally the demand for money has been remarkably active. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 30th May, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,077,475, being an increase of £45,995, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £10,032,402, showing an increase of £227,575 when compared with the previous return.

The arrivals of grain from abroad have been plentiful, and have checked the advance in price previously reported. Accounts from foreign corn markets show that stocks of grain are not large, and that prices are firm. Spain and Portugal are again requiring the importation of grain. The winter and spring demand ceased some time back. Within the last fortnight it has revived, but their harvest is soon coming. The excise statements for the first quarter of the present year have been issued, by which a considerable increase is shown in the quantities retained for home consumption of malt, paper, and spirits. Spanish wine and British spirits arrive in large quantities in France. The accounts from the vine-growing districts of France are more favourable than from those of Spain and Portugal, and hold out some expectation of relieving the people of France from the necessity of using the wine and spirits of other countries to replace the deficiencies in their own produce.

A return published by the Board of Trade of the declared value of British and Irish produce exported from the United Kingdom during the first quarter of the present year, gives the following view of the order in which some of our customers take rank. British possessions receive about £8,000,000 of our produce. The United States above £6,000,000. Germany, including Prussia and the Hanse Towns, nearly £2,700,000. France, about £1,600,000. Holland, £1,300,000. Brazil, nearly £1,300,000.

ENGLISH TESTATORS ABROAD.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly has obtained leave to introduce a Bill for the purpose of giving validity to the wills of British subjects resident abroad. The present state of the law leads so often to the frustration of the indisputable intentions of testators, that some sort of remedy seems desirable, if it lies within the compass of English legislation to provide one. It is easy to collect instances showing how hardly the rules of law may operate. Sir Fitzroy Kelly mentioned the case of an Irish gentleman who in the year 1827 was residing in Portugal, and who, in order to protect his property there, had become naturalised. He died, leaving property both in Portugal and in Ireland. With regard to the property in Portugal, he had executed a will according to the forms of the Portuguese law; and, in order to dispose of his personalty in Ireland, he executed, under the direction of an English solicitor, a second will in strict conformity with English law. A prudent man could scarcely have done more; and yet the second will was clearly invalid. The testator had acquired a Portuguese domicil, which he retained to the time of his death. He could, therefore, make no will except in accordance with the law prevailing in the place of his domicil. It is, in fact, impossible, when probate of the will of a British subject resident abroad is applied for in an English court, to escape from the vexatious and expensive process of determining the domicil of the testator. This is the real burden to which the persons intended to be benefited by the testator are subjected. They must show that the testator either has or has not lost his domicil, according as the will has been executed in compliance with the law of some foreign country, or with that of England. Now, to prove the domicil of a deceased person is a process often difficult, and always costly. A gentleman resident at Boulogne lately left the bulk of his fortune to found a charity at Southampton. The will was made according to the English form, and probate was opposed on the ground that the testator had acquired a French domicil. A special examiner was appointed to take evidence on the subject, and he was occupied in collecting testimony during fourteen days in England, and forty-two days in France. Fortunately, the estate was large, or sixty days of a special examiner would have gone some way to eat it up. If, therefore, any enactment of the English Legislature could clear up all doubts, lay down a broad and intelligible rule, and save this vast preliminary expense, without at the same time producing more confusion than it removed, all British subjects would receive a great benefit from such a measure being passed. The question is, whether it is possible to alter our municipal law without deviating from the fundamental and accepted rules of the private international law of Europe.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly proposes to enact that all wills, codicils, and testamentary papers executed by a British subject in accordance with the prescribed form as laid down by the law of England, and duly attested, should be held valid in this country, no matter where the testator might have been domiciled at the time at which the instrument happened to have been drawn up. To this proposal the Attorney-General objects with great force, that this special provision of the English law would be a violation of a general maxim that has prevailed in Europe from the earliest times, the maxim "Mobilia sequuntur personam." If a man dies in a foreign country, where he has resided for some time, the distribution of his personal property falls naturally within the jurisdiction of that country. Even if we may attribute the origin of this rule to a time when personalty had nothing of the fixed and almost local character which it sometimes assumes in modern society, yet it would be most inconvenient that any one nation should derogate from a maxim universally recognised, and handed down through a long succession of ages. Unless the leading nations of the world could introduce a common change by express agreement, the evil of breaking the unity of jurisprudence on this point would be much greater than the advantage of giving effect to the intentions of a few testators. Without such an agreement, it would be impossible to avoid a collision between the decisions of the tribunals of different countries. Supposing an Englishman domiciled in France died possessed of property in the French and also in the English funds, and under the provisions of the proposed enactment made a will according to the English form, the result would be that the will would be operative according to our exceptional law, but of no validity according to the French law. Thus a conflict of law would arise, bringing with it great perplexity and confusion, and the remedy would be worse than the disease. It must be remembered that at present all the countries of the civilised world stand as much bound to us as we to them, not to disturb the great maxims of general jurisprudence; and that if we introduced an exceptional change, our example might be followed, and we should find that we could no longer be sure that these maxims were anywhere in force.

The most desirable expedient would be to make the English law of domicil more precise. It is very difficult to do this, because domicil is more often a question of intention than of fact. But the course of English decisions has made it extremely hard to say what are our rules as to domicil, so far as such can and do exist. It would be possible to codify these rules and to present them in the intelligible and accessible shape of a declaratory Act of Parliament. At present, a foreigner may as well go and dig in the sand as try to ascertain out of text-books and reports what the English law of domicil is. Practically, there is no great prospect of any change being effected; and Sir Fitzroy Kelly has introduced his Bill, we presume, rather to ventilate the subject than from any hope of seeing his measure passed into law this session. And, we think, that for the future the reasons against the proposed change balance those in favour of it. If Englishmen resident abroad, and especially English lawyers resident abroad, who are likely to be called on to advise their fellow-countrymen in such matters, would but adopt the precaution to which we alluded, when we last commented on the English law of domicil, there could be no difficulty or mistake. If a British subject writes his will in his own handwriting, and then executes it according to the English form, it will be valid in every court of every European country, whatever may be his domicil, and wherever his property may be situated. This is an easy rule to learn, and one easy to comply with; and if it were but generally known and observed, there would be no necessity for any interference on the part of the English Parliament.

FALSE PRETENCES.

It would not be easy to give a stronger illustration of the ambiguities which lurk under what is apparently the plainest possible language than that which is afforded by the fact, that twelve of the fifteen judges put (in the case of Reg. v. Bryan) almost as many different constructions on the following words:—"If any person shall by any false pretence obtain from any other person any chattel, money, or valuable security." Lord Campbell says, that if the seller of an article misrepresents its quality to the buyer, that is not a false pretence, even if the misrepresentation takes the form of a direct specific lie. The Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas adds, that if you misrepresent the species that is a different thing. The Lord Chief Baron thinks that the statute would apply if a dealer were to make up articles expressly for the purpose of deceit and sell them as something very different in quality from what they really were. He further thinks, that puffing on the one hand, and cheapening on the other, between seller and buyer, do not fall within the rule, but that it is hard to lay down a satisfactory principle. Mr. Justice Coleridge was of the opinion of the Lord Chief Baron. Mr. Justice Cresswell confined himself to an appeal to authorities. Mr. Justice Erle laid down that the test was, whether the representation applied to a matter of opinion or a matter of fact. Baron Bramwell inclined to think that to obtain a contract by a lie was a false pretence, and that, if that were not so, the language of the Act must be restricted to cases where there was no contract. Mr. Justice Willes took the same view as Baron Bramwell, but in a stronger form; and Justices Crompton and Crowder, and Barons Watson and Channell, agreed with Lord Campbell.

Leaving out the minor shades of opinion, we have four principles more or less distinctly enunciated as the tests by which we may decide whether a wilful untruth put forward with intent to defraud, and which, in fact, does defraud, is or is not a technical "false pretence." Lord Campbell's principle is, that the falsehood must apply, not to the quality, but to the species. Mr. Justice Erle's is negative—that it must not apply to a matter of opinion. Mr. Justice Willes' is positive—that any false statement of a fact intended to defraud, and succeeding in defrauding, is a false pretence; and Baron Bramwell's is hypothetical—that if any class of fraudulent falsehoods is to be exempted from the operation of the statute, all falsehoods by which contracts are obtained must be so exempted, which appears to him a sort of reductio ad absurdum.

We confess that we are quite unable to understand how there should be any sort of difficulty in the question, if it is regarded merely as a matter of principle, and if the practical conveniences or inconveniences which may follow are left out of sight. Lord Campbell's principle seems to us to import into the statute an exception which is altogether arbitrary. What conceivable reason can there be why a definite false statement as to quality should be innocent, whilst one affecting species should be a crime? Both Lord Campbell and Chief Justice Cockburn would have to maintain that a man would not be punishable who obtained money on bullion by representing, with a successful intent to defraud, that it contained 90 per cent. of gold, when, in fact, it contained only 1 per cent.; whereas he would be punishable if, with a similar intent, he represented cheese to be Cheddar cheese, when, in fact, it was Gloucester cheese. Indeed, clear as it seems at first sight, nothing can really be more vague than the line which separates difference in quality from difference in species. It would not, for example, be a false pretence to call a snuff-box, three-parts of which were copper, a gold snuff-box, because that is a question of quality; but it would be a false pretence to represent a gold box made for some other purpose, as a gold snuff-box, because that is a question of species.

The opinion of Mr. Justice Willes, on the other hand, falls in very well with those of Mr. Justice Erle and Baron Bramwell. In this view of the subject a specific fraudulent successful falsehood is criminal, unless it refers to what is merely matter of opinion. For example, to induce a person to buy a horse, by stating that he is six years old, when he is only four, would be a false pretence; whereas, it would not be a false pretence to procure the purchase by averring that he was the best horse in England, or even by affirming generally that he was a good horse when he was known to be vicious. Indeed, it is hard to answer Baron Bramwell's argument, that, unless this is the true rule, the only alternative is to exempt from punishment all cases in which a contract has been obtained, and to hold the statute to apply only to cases which, but for the technicalities relating to possession, would have been theft. This appears to us to be, beyond all question, the plain reasonable construction of the statute; and the exception imported into it by Lord Campbell would never, as it seems to us, have been thought of, unless the object had been to avoid an inconvenience which is supposed to be likely to follow from adhering to the plain intention of the Legislature; and this, we think, is an encroachment by the judges on the province of Parliament.

The inconvenience of which the majority of the judges are so much afraid is, that by the construction of the law adopted by Mr. Justice Willes, puffing on the part of the seller, or chaffering on the part of the purchaser, would be rendered criminal. Much, however, of the force of this argument, would seem to be removed by the consideration pointed out by Mr. Justice Willes—namely, that there must not only be a specific misrepresentation of an existing fact (in itself a matter very different from puffing), but also an intent to defraud, and an actual obtaining of possession by means of the misrepresentation, coupled with the intention, the existence of each of which three constituent parts of the offence must be found by the jury; and it is most unlikely that men in the class of petty jurymen, being themselves almost always engaged in business, would find that the ordinary exaggerations of traders on one side or the other were meant to defraud, and did, in fact, defraud. Such puffing is as unlike specific misrepresentation of a fact as anything can well be. "I can assure you, Sir, that this article is of excellent quality: it is as good as any that are made in London."—would be clearly a mere puff; but if the assertion were "This book is of such an edition, and I bought it myself at such a sale," why is the vendor to go unpunished, whilst a publican who sells one sort of ale as another sort is to be punishable? Under any rule there will be sure to be plenty of hard cases; but that which Lord Campbell proposes, appears to us to have the disadvantage of resting on no principle whatever, and of making a purely arbitrary exception to a parliamentary enactment. This rule would, in practice, produce an endless series of those anomalies which are, perhaps, the most powerful of all agents in weakening and discrediting the criminal law.

Legal News.

It will be seen, from the great length of our parliamentary report, that the past week has been unusually prolific in the discussion of measures of professional interest. The Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill has entered the House of Commons, and the Divorce Bill promises to follow it speedily. The Joint-Stock Companies Bill has undergone no material amendment in committee, and is now ready for the consideration of the Peers, to whom those who object to the details of the measure must address themselves. The Fraudulent Trustees Bill has been read a second time, but the real discussion of the measure could only take place in the committee appointed for last night. The debate, on the second reading was chiefly remarkable for a speech by Mr. Rolt, who, we believe, essayed, for the first time, in the House of Commons, powers which are in daily exercise in the Court of Chancery. Sir F. Thesiger has brought forward a proposal for abolishing grand juries within the jurisdictions of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates, on the ground that a preliminary investigation, much more satisfactory than that of a grand jury, takes place in most, and might be rendered necessary in all, cases. This proposition has often been made before, and has been ably advocated by Mr. Humphreys, the well-known solicitor, in a pamphlet to which we drew attention in these columns. Sir F. Kelly is the author of a Bill for altering the law so recently enunciated by the Privy Council as to the wills of Englishmen domiciled abroad. In the House of Lords, on Thursday night, Lord St. Leonards stated the provisions of a measure which he thinks should accompany the proposed legislation against fraudulent breaches of trust. The object of the Bill is to mitigate, in several respects, the severity of the Court of Chancery towards honest but incautious or indulgent trustees; and it would appear from the statement of its author to be an exceedingly bold innovation upon the doctrines of the Court.

In the course of this discussion the subject of the dispatch of business in the Chancery offices was brought forward, and a conversation occurred of so much importance that we here extract it—

"Lord LIFFORD said he had the misfortune to be mixed up with a great number of trusts, and he had learnt from experience the necessity which existed in some cases of placing property in the hands of the Court of Chancery, and thereby exposing it to the legal robbery of that Court. In the case to which he especially referred there was very great difficulty and delay connected with the appointment of a guardian to a minor. It was as impossible for the Lord Chancellor to be aware of all the iniquities of the various departments of his court, as it was for the Emperor of Russia to be aware of all the evils that arose under the Russian police system. The present state of things was worse than that which existed formerly. The evils arose, he believed, in a great degree from the want of a sufficient number of chief clerks at judges' chambers. He inquired whether it was the intention of the Government to propose any addition to the staff of the Vice-Chancellors and of the Master of the Rolls in chambers.

"The LORD CHANCELLOR protested against the language applied to the Court of Chancery. As to delay in the appointment of a guardian, though he was unacquainted with the particulars of the case, he was convinced that the blame did not rest with the Court, but with those who represented the infant. He would undertake to say that no persons who wanted a guardian appointed need wait more than two or three days. He had often heard the Court of Chancery blamed for things which it afterwards turned out were attributable to the fact that those who represented the parties concerned did not choose to bestir themselves. He did not at present contemplate any increase of the staff, because he had not sufficiently investigated the subject to adopt such a course. It was monstrous to say that the delays which took place at present were equal to those which occurred under the old system; the former were delays of days, while the latter were delays of months. He had heard recently of cases in which parties could not obtain a hearing in the Master's office under a week or a fortnight; but information which he had received convinced him that most of the complaints which had been made, if not entirely unfounded, were at all events greatly exaggerated. At the same time, there was such an increase of business at the offices, that it would, he believed, be necessary to increase the staff of the judges, in order that matters out of court might be disposed of with sufficient rapidity. In the case of the Accountant-General's office there had just been an addition made of one clerk in each department—an increase of the staff which the higher functionaries assured him would enable the business to be transacted satisfactorily. He thought that in judges' chambers the staff would have to be similarly increased, so that persons would be able to go there after giving a day's notice, or even without any notice at all.

"Lord BROUGHAM observed, that, in order to lay the axe to the root of the evil, Parliament must abolish the Master's office, and increase the number of Vice-Chancellors."

It will be observed that the Lord Chancellor suggests that the delays complained of are probably attributable to "those who represented the parties," that is, the solicitors; and this exactly agrees with what we remarked some few weeks ago, that the solicitors were sure to be blamed for the delays, and, therefore, should bestir themselves to find out the real cause of them. As might be expected, the complaints which reach the Chancellor are not loud, nor does he view the emergency as very pressing. The assurance given to him by the authorities of the Accountant General's Office would be very comforting to all solicitors who will have much business to do during the next two months, if only they could confidently rely upon it. We shall endeavour to ascertain how far actual present experience bears out the representations which have been made to the Lord Chancellor. We believe that he understates the existing difficulties, and under-estimates the amount of additional strength required in the offices to get through the work properly; but it is, at any rate, satisfactory to find that the want of a larger staff in the judges' chambers is distinctly admitted by the Government.

We owe an apology to Mr. Commissioner Holroyd for attributing to him a judgment which was delivered by his brother commissioner, Mr. Goulburn, and in which that learned person very elaborately argued that an order made in the chamber of Vice-Chancellor Kindersley was invalid, because the judge's clerk acted in the matter, and not the judge himself. The question arose out of the affair of the Royal British Bank, in connection with which Mr. Holroyd has delivered a judgment which we hope may prove better founded than that of Mr. Goulburn.

RE ——, AN ATTORNEY.

The following letter has been addressed to the Editor of the Daily News:—

SIR,—I see occasionally in your columns, under the above heading, proceedings in the superior courts, which appear to me closely to resemble others which take place in Bow-street and similar localities; and I never could understand why the parties in the former cases should always be designated ——.

If Mr. William Sikes is "in trouble," in consequence of being supposed to know more than he ought about the damage done to Mr. Brown's back-kitchen window, and the temporary absence of that gentleman's silver spoons, Mr. Sikes's name, and the circumstance, are duly published in the police reports, to the great disquietude of his friends and the possible injury of his character. So, too, if my friend Mr. Botchem, while professionally attending on Mr. and Mrs. Jones, makes, or is supposed to make, a mistake which eventuates in the permanent personal disfigurement of that gentleman, or the death of his amiable lady, you never fail, when the case comes into a court, to let everybody know that Mr. Botchem, 20, Blunder-street, Manglebone, is accused of malpraxis or manslaughter, and all B.'s patients and the public, who have no idea what difficulties the case may have presented, decide that B—— is either a fool or a villain, and he may take his brass-plate off his door, and himself off to the diggings, for his ruin here is complete. And if the Rev. — Goodfellow, the much venerated rector of Humour-on-the-Ooze, on an occasional visit to town, and having well dined with his friend Robinson, makes himself conspicuously entertaining on the way home to his hotel, how certainly does his name, and all the facts of the case, with the policeman's embellishments, appear in the reports, to the great scandal of the Rev. G.'s parish, and the greater disgust of his diocesan.

Of course everybody knows who is ordinarily designated old ——, and no doubt all the —— (scratches) belong to the same family; but in simple fairness to Messrs. Sikes, Botchem, and Goodfellow, I think we ought to be told the earthly patronymics of these particular incarnations.—I am, &c.,

DECISIONS IN BANKRUPTCY.

(From the Economist.)

Though it is said that Mr. Commissioner Holroyd does not belong to a class of judges who have an ambition to win popularity, who are ever making attempts to mix up their judgments with some appeal to popular sentiments, yet we cannot but think that he has of late felt the influence of a prevailing general opinion, and has in consequence been at least unusually careful, if not severe, in his judgments in the Bankruptcy Court. His legal denunciation of the conduct of the directors of the Royal British Bank attracted universal attention, and was deservedly admired for its research and its conclusions. On Tuesday he pronounced, in the case of a bankrupt named Thomas Ryder, another elaborate judgment, which ended in his refusal to grant the bankrupt a certificate, allowing him, however, protection for twenty-one days to enable him to appeal. The just grounds for this decision were, that the bankrupt, though a trader, had gambled in time bargains on the Stock-Exchange; had traded recklessly, and had made untrue representations of his circumstances to obtain credit. No person, except the bankrupt, is likely to find fault with the judgment; and we have only to praise it. Like the same learned gentleman's judgment as to the Royal British Bank, it will do a great deal of good. Such judgments give an importance to proceedings in bankruptcy which they have hitherto wanted. The withholding of a certificate, in conjunction with weighty reasons for the decision, is nearly equivalent to degrading a man for life; and we know no ordinary punishment more severe. It will increase the sense of responsibility in all commercial men, and make them more careful. They will at once learn that the process of whitewashing is neither so easy nor so certain as it has been at least generally represented. In fact, these two judgments of Mr. Commissioner Holroyd mark a change, if not in the actual administration of the law in bankruptcy, in what it was supposed to be, and will certainly effect a beneficial alteration in the popular opinion on the subject. If the Bankruptcy Court hereafter supplies the trader, as it is intended to supply him, with the means of getting rid of obligations brought on him by unavoidable misfortunes, and not by misbehaviour, it seems likely to lose its character of being often a help to fraudulent success, and to become a terror to reckless and gambling traders. Though it be made a merit in the learned Commissioner that he takes no notice of popular feeling, there is evidence in these two judgments that it has had considerable influence over him. It is not possible for any man living, though he may himself not be conscious of the effect, to escape the influence of a well-weighed conclusion generally adopted, such as that which some late facts have forced the public to adopt of commercial morality. He might as well hope to live out of the common atmosphere. While in a judge it is excessively weak to flirt with popularity, and allow every temporary general feeling to find an expression in Westminster Hall, it is only a proof of his good sense that he learns the wants of society from prevailing opinions, and, as in this case, recognises, we think, if he does not acknowledge, the general conclusion that judgments in bankruptcy have very often been much too lenient. Continually we find the police magistrates and judges punishing offences with unusual severity, because they are rife at the moment. In so doing, they defer to what is, or is supposed to be, a want and an opinion of society, and justify the statement that a judge should be influenced by circumstances and by popular sentiments. For several months, we may say now for years, the public, startled by many very grave offences, have been alarmed at the laxity of commercial morality, and have demanded severe commercial laws. Such circumstances have influenced the minds of judges, and under its influence they very properly hunt up laws that bear on the subject, and apply them with severity. The improvement in such cases really begins with the facts which alarm everybody—a public sentiment is begotten by them, and it influences the judges, leads to greater care in judgment, and probably to more severe decisions. The great merit and great utility of the judge is, not that he despises and overlooks this improved sentiment, but that he recognises it, and acts in conformity to it. His elaborate judgments and the public sentiments go together, and enforce each other. As one result, we may expect an improvement in the morality of commercial men; but by those who would set the judges apart from other mortals, and make them pure abstractions of the law, administering its abstract rules, this improvement will be mainly ascribed to the law itself, while it is tolerably plain, from the judge acting in obedience to a public sentiment, without any new law, that the improvement really begins with it.

THE BRITISH BANK PROSECUTION.—The prompt and energetic steps taken by Messrs. Linklater and Hackwood, to whom the Attorney-General has intrusted the conduct of the prosecution of the directors and general manager of this bank, have led to the capture of Mr. Humphrey Brown. We learn that he is now in custody upon two warrants, by each of which he is required to put in bail for £4,000, with two sureties for £2,000 each. Sureties for £8,000, besides his own recognisances for £8,000, will therefore be required before he is released. The Hon. John Stapleton, M.P. for Berwick, and the others who have been arrested, have already given bail to a similar amount. Within a short time, it is believed that all the parties implicated will be secured. Those who have not yet been apprehended are under strict surveillance abroad, and will be brought to this country as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made. Three ex-officio informations have been filed at the Crown-office by the Attorney-General, but it is not expected that the trials will take place uutil next November.—Times.

PROCLAMATION OF OUTLAWRY.—At the Sheriff's Court, on Thursday, the following persons were called upon to surrender under penalty of outlawry:—The Hon. Brownlow Thomas Montague Cecil, Stephen Temple, Thomas Ingram, Richard Chapman King, the Hon. George James Finch Hatton (commonly called Viscount Maidstone), William Sowdon, Josiah Bartlett, Sussex Lennox, Esq. (commonly called Lord Sussex Lennox), Sir Robert Jukes Clifton, Bart., John Frederick Hill, John Hall Walton Harris, Frederick Jones, and the Hon. Horace Pitt.

Mr. William Blanshard, of the Northern Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Doncaster, in the room of the late Mr. Robert Hall, M.P.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

TRUSTEE RELIEF ACT—TRUSTEES' COSTS.

Re Wooaburn's Will, 5 W. R. 642.

Until the decision of the full Court of Appeal in this case, an impression generally prevailed in the profession that the Court of Chancery had no power to give costs against a trustee who vexatiously paid money into court under the Trustee Relief Act. The Act itself contains no provisions as to the manner in which costs of proceedings under it are to be dealt with. Except in the case of legacies not previously severed from the testator's estate, the general rule is, that the costs of paying in a fund under the provisions of the Act, are borne by the fund itself; and trustees frequently deduct from the fund the costs of paying it into court before they part with it. In such a case, it has been doubted whether the cestui que trust had any other remedy than by a suit for the purpose, though the circumstances were such that the Court would have refused the costs of the trustees had the trustees not deducted their costs previously to paying in the fund. In re Heming's Trust, (5 W. R. 33), trustees paid money into Court which belonged to one cestui que trust whose title was unquestionable, and in no way impugned by the trustees. The object of the trustees appears to have been altogether vexatious; and yet Wood, V. C., only refused them the costs of their appearance for payment out of court. Indeed, nothing more seems to have been asked by the counsel of the cestui que trust, owing, no doubt, to the notion that has generally prevailed—viz. that the Court had no jurisdiction to make the trustees pay costs under the Act. The case of Re Woodburn's Will, however, definitively settles the law upon the subject, and puts an end to all doubt as to the jurisdiction of the Court in such cases; the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices having affirmed an order of the Master of the Rolls, by which he ordered a trustee who had vexatiously paid a trust fund into court under the Act, to pay the costs of the cestuis que trust, who had petitioned that the money might be paid out to them. The Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices all appear to have considered that the Act itself gave the Court jurisdiction to make such an order; and Lord Cranworth thought, even if it were not so, that the Court had such a power, "as it was a necessary incident to contentious litigation that those who caused it should be made to pay the costs." How far this decision will operate in deterring trustees from availing themselves of the provisions of the Trustee Relief Act remains to be shown by experience. There is little doubt that in some instances it will have the effect of inducing trustees to institute a suit, where they would now resort to the machinery of the Act.

15 & 16 VICT. c. 80—TIME FOR CLOSING EVIDENCE—LEAVE TO FILE FURTHER AFFIDAVITS.

Scott v. The Corporation of Liverpool, 5 W. R. 641.

By the 38th section of the Chancery Amendment Act, the evidence on both sides, in any suit, is to be closed within such time after issue joined as the Lord Chancellor prescribes by a general order, but with power to the Court to enlarge the same as it might see fit; and after the time fixed for closing the evidence, no further evidence, whether oral or by affidavit, is to be received without special leave of the Court for that purpose. By the 32nd General Order of 7th August, 1852, the evidence on both sides, in any cause, to be used at the hearing, whether taken orally (and including the cross-examination and re-examination of the witnesses) or by affidavit, is to be closed within nine weeks after issue joined, except that any witness who has made an affidavit intended to be used at the hearing, shall be subject to cross-examination within one month after the expiration of the nine weeks. The General Order of 13th January, 1855, reduces the time for closing evidence to eight weeks, which is the time now allowed. In Thompson v. Partridge (4 De G. Mac. & Gor. 794), which was an appeal from a decision of Stuart, V. C., the Vice-Chancellor had made an order extending the time, to enable the defendant to file his affidavits, upon the ground simply that the plaintiff had not filed his affidavits, and therefore that the defendant had had no opportunity of seeing them, until a day or two before the expiration of the period for closing evidence. The Lords Justices, on appeal, reversed the order, as, according to their Lordships' construction of the 38th section of the Chancery Amendment Act, the words "without special leave" were to be understood as meaning "without leave on special grounds," and they considered that the grounds upon which the application was made did not come within the category, because the defendant had full notice by the bill of the case to be made against him, and there was no allegation of surprise. In Scott v. The Corporation of Liverpool, the application was to be allowed to file further affidavits, in answer to affidavits filed by the plaintiff, the time for taking evidence having closed. The ground of the application was that the plaintiff's affidavits, filed only the day before the time would expire, contained serious imputations upon two of the defendant's witnesses, of which the case made by the bill gave no intimation whatever. Stuart, V. C., granted the order asked, his Honour considering that the defendant had been surprised, and that he had a right to defend the character of his witnesses, which had been impugned by the plaintiff.

INFANT SUING IN FORMA PAUPERIS.

Lindsay v. Tyrrell, 5 W. R. 617.

This case, besides re-establishing an old rule of practice—viz. that an infant who sues by next friend cannot sue in formâ pauperis—was noticeable as an instance of the Master of the Rolls discharging an order which the Lord Chancellor had made ex parte after the application had been refused at the Rolls. Of course the leave of the Chancellor was obtained before the motion to discharge.

SET-OFF—ASSIGNMENT—NOTICE.

Cavendish v. Geaves, 5 W. R. 615.

This case, though it lays down no new principles, is valuable, as containing a very clear summary of the doctrine of equitable set-off as applicable to the case of a banker and customer, or, indeed, to any case of debtor and creditor.

The material facts were, that the bank, which, after various changes in the firm, ultimately became bankrupt as Strahan, Paul, and Bates, had advanced certain sums on bonds executed by one of their customers. The obligees in the bonds were two of the original partners, and after their death the legal right to recover on them vested in Sir John Dean Paul, as executor of the survivor of the original obligees. After the bonds were given, several changes took place in the firm, and on each occasion the bonds were assigned, so far as they could be—that is, in equity—to the new firm. The only notice of these assignments given to the customer was by the entry, in his pass-book, of the payments of interest to the new firms, instead of the old one; but this was held sufficient. When the bank got into difficulties, the bonds were privately assigned to the defendants to make good a deficiency in certain trust funds; but no notice of this transaction was given to the customer. Meanwhile, he was keeping a drawing account at the bank, and, upon the failure, claimed to set-off a considerable balance standing to his credit against the debt on the bonds. The defendants resisted the set-off, on the ingenious ground that there were no cross debts between the same parties, either in contemplation of law or equity, because the bank which was indebted on the drawing account had neither the legal claim on the bonds which was in Sir J. D. Paul, as executor, nor the equitable title which they had parted with to the defendants. The Master of the Rolls, however, held that this was a sophism, and laid down the general doctrine in the following terms:—If a customer borrows money of a bank, and gives a bond, and a balance is afterwards due to him on his general account, he has a right of set-off against the bank, both at law and in equity. If the firm is altered, and the bond assigned to the new firm, and notice of the assignment given to the debtor, the debtor has no legal right of set-off, because the assignment of the bond is inoperative at law, and the obligee of the bond and the indebted firm are different persons; but in equity the customer may set-off his balance against the bond. If the bond is assigned by the bank to a third person without notice to the customer, he has the same rights against the assignee which he had against the bank; but if notice of the assignment is given, no right of set-off will exist for any balance which may subsequently accrue. These rules will solve nearly all the questions which commonly arise as to equitable set-off, so far as they are questions of law.

CONVERSION—RECONVERSION.

Meredith v. Vick, 5 W. R. 639.

This decision supplies a hiatus in the chain of authorities on the subject of the constructive conversion and reconversion of real estate into personalty and the converse. The primary rule that an interest in the proceeds of property directed to be sold is treated by a Court of equity as personalty, and so descends, is well known. So also is the qualification, that, if a person absolutely entitled to such an interest elects to take it as land, it loses its constructive character of personalty, and once more becomes descendible to his heirs. What amounts to such an election to reconvert is often a very difficult question of mixed fact and law; but it has been pretty well settled that it is not necessary that acts implying an intention to retain the property as land should be proved as to every part. Thus, to live on one portion of an estate under such circumstances, and to receive the rents from certain of the tenants, would be evidence to show an election to reconvert the whole property, and not merely the particular portions the rent of which was received. In Meredith v. Vick the question took a new and curious form; there was a residuary trust for sale of realty, and payment of the proceeds to A. Under this A. became entitled, immediately on the testator's death, to the proceeds of certain freeholds. These he elected to take as land. By the ultimate failure of prior limitations a copyhold estate ultimately fell into possession to the trustees of the residue, and became subject to the power of sale, but before this had happened A. was dead. Was the copyhold to be considered as real or personal property of A.? The heir argued that reconversion of part was reconversion of the whole; that the freeholds and copyholds both came to A. under the same gift; and that, as the freeholds were reconverted by election, that operated to reconvert the copyholds also. The Master of the Rolls, however, refused to apply evidence of reconversion, derived from acts done on an estate in possession, to another estate in reversion, which passed to the same beneficiary under the same gift.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

ATTORNEY—SERVICE OF RULE UPON.

Re ——, An Attorney, 5 W. R., Q. B., 622.

An application was made for leave to serve a rule made against a country attorney, at his last place of abode, and upon his London agent; and this was granted on an affidavit that the attorney had gone out of the way to avoid service.

It does not appear, from the report of the above application, what description of rule it was which could not be served. And yet this is material, for a distinction exists, with respect to the mode of service, according as the rule is one which, if disobeyed, subjects the party to attachment for contempt of court, or is one which is not intended to have that effect—as, for example, a rule ordering the plaintiff to find security for costs. In the first class, the Courts will seldom allow anything but personal service; though there has been, of late, some disposition to allow a constructive personal service where the party ruled is an attorney, and it is distinctly made out that he has knowledge of the rule, and keeps out of the way to avoid being personally served (see Green v. Prosser, 2 D. P. C. 99; Alner v. Newton, Id. 582). In the latter class of rules, however, the service need never be personal; but if the party ruled is represented by attorney, the service is made upon him; and if such attorney is represented by an agent in town, such agent is the party to be served. The application above noticed was, however, probably made in consequence of, and relying upon, the general principle by which the Courts are governed, that rules and other interlocutory proceedings must not be defeated by the party on whom they are to be served keeping out of the way. Thus, in Thomas v. Lord Ranelagh (5 D. P. C. 258), Mr. Justice Coleridge made absolute a rule to compute, which had been served on a female servant at the residence of the defendant, though the process-server had been informed by her that her master was out of town, and had been so for a month previous, and that she did not know when he would return. In the recent case of Mason v. Muggeridge (18 C. B. 642), however, the affidavit of the service of a rule summoning the defendant to appear before the Master, in order to be examined as to the debts due to him (under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854), which alleged service on the defendant's wife, without saying it had come to the defendant's knowledge, was held insufficient. It may be doubted if an attachment would have been granted even if such allegation had been inserted.

ARTICLED CLERK—STAMPING ARTICLES UNDER 18 & 19 VICT. C. 81—APPLICATION REFUSED.

Re Hand, 5 W. R., Q. B., 622.

This was another of those applications which have been so numerous of late, to allow the service of an articled clerk to date from the execution of the articles, though they had not been stamped at the proper time, on payment of the penalty, under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 81. The applicant had been articled in 1852, but his master had neglected to stamp and inrol the articles, in consequence of which the clerk had rebound himself to the same master, in 1854, by properly stamped articles. Mr. Justice Coleridge disposed of the application by saying there was nothing to show that the applicant was ignorant of the articles being unstamped, adding—"Though even if he were, it might not help you."

ATTORNEY—PRIVILEGE FROM ARREST EUNDO, MANENDO ET REDEUNDO.

Jones v. Marshall, 5 W. R., C. P., 623.

The defendant in this case, an attorney, had been arrested on a ca. sa. upon a judgment which had been obtained by the plaintiff, while attending at the Lord Mayor's Court, at the request of a client (who had occasion to put in bail in such court), for the purpose of explaining to him what he had to do. The present was an application for his discharge, on the ground of his being an attorney privileged from arrest eundo, manendo et redeundo the courts of justice. The application had been already made at chambers, to Willes, J., who had dismissed the summons with costs, unless the defendant made a successful application to the Court; and a rule nisi was obtained accordingly. It was, however, now discharged with costs; the Court being of opinion that the privilege relied on applied only to exempt from arrest those representing the parties in a suit, and not to the case of an attorney brought into court only for a collateral purpose, and attending there on behalf of some one who was not a party.

It may, however, be remarked, that there are decisions which carry the privilege further than as above confined; and which show that it extends to all cases in which the attorney or barrister (for their position as to this is the same) is taken into court in the exercise of his professional duty (see Newton v. Constable, 2 Q. B. 157). The privilege arises from his being, in contemplation of law, always in court for the interests of his client (see Thomson v. Moore, 1 D. P. C., N. S., 283); and it would be difficult to show, that, in the above case, he was not in the exercise of such duty. If the client at whose request he attended had been about to justify bail, there is express authority to show the privilege would have prevented the arrest (Rimmer v. Green, 1 M. & S. 638, and Meekins v. Smith, 1 H. Bl. 636); and it is apprehended that it can make no difference in principle that the client was about to put in bail.

BRANCH BANKS, LAW AS TO—ACTION TO RECOVER SUM IMPROPERLY PAID ON A CHEQUE.

Woodland v. Fear, 5 W. R., Q. B., 624.

This was an action brought by the public officer of a banking company to recover against the defendant the amount of a cheque paid to him under the following circumstances:—The bank had two branches, the business of which was kept quite distinct; the one at B., and the other at G. The defendant had presented at B. the cheque in question, which had been drawn by one H. on the branch at G. Before the cheque was received at G. from B., H. had drawn out all his balance, which also, at the time the cheque was presented by the defendants, was insufficient to pay it; but it was proved, that, if H.'s cheque had been presented at G., it would nevertheless have been honoured.

Under these circumstances the Court of Queen's Bench held the plaintiff was entitled to recover. They thought, that, as regarded their separate customers, the different branches of the bank were in the nature of separate companies; that H. did not stand in the relation of customer to the branch at B., as he kept no account there; and that the cheque in question was cashed, not on his credit or by his agent, but on the credit of the defendant alone. That being so, the plaintiff would be in a position to maintain the action, provided no laches could be shown on the part of the establishment at B.; and they did not in fact appear to have been guilty of any, as they forwarded the cheque by the first post to G. "To hold," said Lord Campbell, in delivering the judgment of the Court, "that the customer of one branch, keeping his cash account there, has a right to have his cheques paid at all or any of the branches, is to suppose a state of circumstances so inconsistent with any safe dealing on the part of the bankers, that it cannot be presumed without direct evidence of such." The bank at B. appears to have paid the cheque, "not as bankers, or on the credit of H., but to have paid it on the credit of the defendant, as much as if they had given him change for a bank-note, which both parties may have believed to be genuine; in which case, if it turned out to be forged and worthless, an action could clearly be maintained to recover back the money so paid."

TOWN-CLERK, DUTIES OF, IN RESPECT OF THE LIST OF VOTERS—POOR-LAW AUDITOR.

Regina v. Allday, 5 W. R., Q. B., 625.

A poor-law auditor disallowed a sum paid to the town-clerk by the overseers of the parish of Birmingham, for part of the expenses of making (viz. for procuring copies of) the list of voters for the borough, and a rule had been obtained to quash this disallowance. Against this rule it was now shown for cause, that, by 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 48, the duty of copying the list of voters is cast upon the town-clerk by law, and is taken into account in settling his salary. And it was submitted that the question had been already decided against this officer in the case of The Town-Clerk of Kingston-upon-Hull (2 Ell. & Bl. 182). The Court, accordingly, now discharged the rule, with costs, saying there was nothing charged for and disallowed which could not have been done by the town-clerk or his clerks, and that it could not, therefore, be considered as a disbursement out of pocket for which he was entitled to make a charge in addition to his salary.

EXAMINATION AT THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Trinity Term, 1857.

At the examination of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors of the Superior Courts, the Examiners considered the following gentlemen as the only candidates under the age of twenty-six who deserved honorary distinction of the first class:—

EDWARD BALDEN, of Birmingham, who served his clerkship to Mr. Samuel Balden, of Birmingham, and Messrs. Hughes, Kearsey, Masterman, and Hughes, of 17, Bucklersbury, London.

WALTER BROWNE, of Lenton, Nottinghamshire, who served his clerkship to Mr. Hugh Bruce Campbell, of Nottingham.

The Council of the Incorporated Law Society have accordingly awarded a prize of books to each of those candidates.

The Examiners have also certified that the following candidates passed examinations very little inferior to those who have been reported for prizes:—

JOSEPH FALLOWS, jun., of 198, Piccadilly, London, who served his clerkship to Mr. Joseph Fallows, of 198, Piccadilly.

WILLIAM STEWART FORSTER, of Lewisham, who served his clerkship to Messrs. Frere, Goodford, and Cholmeley, of Lincoln's-inn.

WILLIAM HENRY RANDLES, of Ellesmere, who served his clerkship to Mr. George Salter, of Ellesmere.

The number of candidates who lodged satisfactory testimonials of service was	103
Of these, 6 did not attend, 1 withdrew, and 9 were not passed	16

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Whereas it is proper that the accounts kept by the Accountant-General of this Court should be examined and compared in order to settle the same; and whereas it will require considerable time to perfect such examination, and it is necessary that a time should be appointed for closing the books of accounts of the said Accountant-General for the purposes aforesaid, I do order that the books of the said Accountant-General be closed from and after Thursday the 20th day of August next, to Wednesday the 28th day of October next inclusive, excepting upon the days and for the purposes hereinafter mentioned, in order to adjust the accounts of the suitors with the books kept at the Bank; and that during that time no draft for any money except as hereinafter provided, or certificate for any effects under the care and direction of this Court, be signed or delivered out by the said Accountant-General, or any stocks or annuities accepted or transferred by him relating to the suitors of this Court; and that no purchase, sale, or transfer be made by the said Accountant-General, unless the order, request, or registrar's certificate be left at his office on or before Monday the 10th day of August next; and that no order for payment of any money out of Court, which may be then in Court, be received at the Accountant-General's office after Wednesday the 12th day of August next. Provided, nevertheless, that the office of the said Accountant-General shall be open on Wednesday the 14th, Thursday the 15th, and Friday the 16th days of October next, for the delivery out of any regular interest drafts which have become payable in respect of the October dividends, and of any other regular interest drafts which shall have become payable during the closing of the office as aforesaid. And to the end that the suitors may have notice hereof, and apply to the Court as there shall be occasion, to have money paid to them out of the Bank, or stocks, or annuities transferred to them before the said 20th day of August next, I do order that this Order be entered and affixed up in the several offices of this Court. (Signed) CRANWORTH, C.

KENT LAW SOCIETY.

On Monday last, the 8th instant, the Annual Meeting of this Society was held at the Ship Tavern, Greenwich. Among the members present were Messrs. Smith and Tucker, Messrs. A. & W. Bristow, of Greenwich; Mr. Cole, of Sevenoaks; Mr. Robinson Latter, of Bromley; Mr. Case, Messrs. Monckton, Sen. & Jun., and Mr. Hoar, of Maidstone; Mr. Hilder, Mr. Wates, and Mr. Sharland, of Gravesend; Mr. Tassell, and Mr. Bathurst, of Faversham; Mr. Furley, Mr. Sankey, and Mr. Plummer, of Canterbury; Mr. Hulke, of Deal; Mr. Daniel, of Ramsgate, &c., &c.. Messrs. Wildes, Farrar, Bathurst, and Norton, were elected members of the Society.

The Secretary read reports upon the different Bills now before cussion thereon they were referred to sub-committees to watch the same.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS—THE LORD CHANCELLOR'S BILL.

It must be gratifying to all who are interested in the amendment of the law, and the abolition of old-standing abuses, to find the long-contested question of ecclesiastical courts reform apparently on the eve of a satisfactory settlement. For a quarter of a century statesmen, lawyers, and the general public have been as nearly unanimous as could possibly be in reprobating the existing procedure, and more agreed than they ever were before on any subject in demanding the abolition of courts so thoroughly vicious in principle and in practice, as to find no disinterested defenders. At no period of history but this, and in no place but the British Islands, could so monstrous an abuse continue to flourish, after being universally condemned by all but those interested in its continuance. All efforts to reform or supersede the ecclesiastical courts have hitherto failed; and great caution, and at the same time great determination, must be exercised by the Government, or the present scheme will fail as did its predecessors. We have seen, or we could not have believed, that so small a number of men, fortified by the usage of centuries, as their best defence, but having the "sinews of war" largely available, should have successfully maintained their position for so long a time.

Now, opinions may differ as to whether the interests of the profession and those of the public are in other respects identical; but no one can doubt their complete identity of interest on the present question. The solicitors, as a body, are at present excluded from business for which they are in every way qualified, and which (unlike much business transacted now) is really remunerative to the practitioner. Nearly every member of the community is deeply interested, on the other hand, in the abolition of a monopoly which inevitably deprives his family on his death of a considerable portion of whatever property he may be able to leave for them. It remains to be seen whether a knot of two or three hundred individuals is once more to set at defiance the interests and convictions of an entire nation.

These remarks are suggested by the present state of the controversy; for the proctors in particular are leaving no stone unturned to retain their monopoly, or, failing that, to gain large compensation for the loss of their "Diana of the Ephesians." That they possess means of securing the advocacy of some portion of the press is perhaps not much to be wondered at. Some time since it was regarded as suspicious that the parliamentary interests of the Dublin proctors were so well looked after, and various explanations of the fact were current here. At the present moment no lack of energy in their defence is exhibited by these gentlemen; and they supply the want of available arguments by a "Defence Fund," to which each one of them contributes according to the amount of his year's business. On these, and on other grounds, therefore, it behoves your readers to make every exertion in order that the Lord Chancellor's Bill may be safely carried through the Lower House. Dangers innumerable beset its progress; secret, as well as declared, enemies will strain every nerve to defeat it; and the welfare of the many may yet be sacrificed to the selfish schemes of a determined few.

CHANCERY.—BERRY v. BERRY—PARAPHERNALIA.

A curious question arose in the course of this suit, which is one for the administration of the estate of the late Mr. J. M. Berry, a gentleman of large fortune, and a son-in-law of the Right Hon. T. C. Smith, the Master of the Rolls. This question related to certain jewels, of very great value, now in the possession of Mrs. Berry, widow of the deceased, and which the personal representatives of that gentleman sought to recover from her.

In giving judgment, the Lord Chancellor stated:—

"That the late Mr. Gibbons, of Ballynegall, in the county Westmeath, by his will, made in the year 1846, devised certain of his estates in such manner that Mr. J. W. M. Berry became entitled for life, with a jointuring power in favour of his wife, and after his estate the same properties were limited to go in the ordinary course of such settlements. The same will, after giving Mrs. Gibbons the power of taking any portion of the testator's personal chattels, according to her choice, bequeathed all the residue of his property to J. W. M. Berry; and it expressed the testator's hope that the estates which were so left should be disposed of so as to accompany the estates which were then settled. After the death of Mr. Gibbons, administration was granted to Mr. J. W. M. Berry. Mr. Gibbons had been the owner of the jewels now the subject of the present proceedings, and, after his death Mrs. Gibbons had had possession of them until the year 1851. In that year Mr. J. W. M. Berry, upon the occasion of his marriage, went to reside at Ballynegall House. His death took place in the month of December, 1855, when, having died intestate and without issue, his mother had obtained administration of his property. The jewels, which had been in the possession of Mrs. Gibbons, and afterwards placed, for safe custody, in the Bank of Ireland, were stated to have been given by Mrs. Gibbons, in the year 1851, to Mr. J. W. M. Berry, who was then owner of the estates, and worn by Mrs. Berry. They were of great value, estimated as worth several thousand pounds, and a list of them, in the handwriting of Mr. Gibbons, was produced, which had since been kept along with them. As to the ownership of these jewels, the question had been raised whether they were the property of Mr. J. W. M. Berry, given to him by his mother, she having taken them under the will of Mr. Gibbons, or, if so, whether Mr. J. W. M. Berry had given them to his wife, who now had them in her possession. Mrs. Berry, in whose favour the power of jointuring had been exercised, was, by her settlement, barred from taking any portion of the effects of the deceased, so that, if it was established that, subject to Mrs. Gibbons's life interest in the jewels, or in any other event, they became and continued the property of Mr. Berry, it was contended that they would now go to his mother, as sole next of kin of her late son."

After reviewing the facts of the case, the Chancellor dismissed the petition without costs, decreeing that Mrs. J. W. M. Berry was entitled to the jewels absolutely as paraphernalia.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)

As the Lord Chancellor has frequently, in the course of the discussion upon the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, referred to the law of Scotland, as the source of principles and forms of procedure proposed to be imported into the law of England, it may be neither uninteresting nor uninstructive to your southern readers, first, to give a general view of the existing law of divorce in Scotland, and of the course of procedure in divorce cases; secondly, to point out what appear to be defects in the working of the Scotch system; and, thirdly, to contrast the Scotch system with that proposed to be introduced into England, and to remark upon the particular points in which the one system may appear to be preferable to the other.

Marriage being regarded by the law of Scotland as a simple consensual contract, except that it cannot be put an end to by mutual consent, the Courts of law there, as an almost necessary consequence, have always had the power of dissolving it by divorce. And as the advantages accruing upon divorce to those who may be in a position to demand it are very great, and as the forms of procedure for obtaining it are, on the whole, simple and inexpensive, actions of divorce, as might have been expected, are of frequent occurrence in the Courts of law in Scotland; and we have, in consequence, a good deal of experience on the subject here, which this journal may, perhaps, be the means of making more widely available in England than it has hitherto been, by eliciting discussion and explanation.

Divorce is permitted on either of two grounds—adultery, or wilful desertion for a period of four years. We shall, for the present, limit our observations to divorce on the first of these grounds.

Adultery is not only a ground on which divorce may be pronounced, but it is also considered by the law of Scotland as a crime, and any one guilty of it may be prosecuted and punished as a criminal, at the instance of the public prosecutor. It is true, however, that for many years adultery has not been made the subject of a criminal prosecution. Baron Hume, our greatest author on the subject of crimes, says:—"I think there is no room to doubt the wisdom of our law when it places this high breach of moral and social duty in the list of crimes, instead of classing it, as seems to be done in the English practice, in the rank of a mere civil trespass." And "to this provision of our law it was, perhaps, in a great measure owing (a thing not a little honourable to our practice, and which it were to be wished that we had still to boast of) that down to a late period the notion of the high wrong as commensurable with damages, or a pecuniary solatium, had never been heard of in any civil court."

We are happy to say that actions of crim. con. have never been common here; and if, as seems to be probable, they are now about to be abolished in England, whence, no doubt, we originally derived them, we trust that some Member of Parliament will take care that they are also abolished here.

Until the year 1830, an action of divorce required to be brought, in the first instance, before the Commissary Court, which is now matter of history, and could only be brought before the Court of Session, the Supreme Civil Court, (the constitution of which was explained shortly in a previous number) by way of appeal. But in that year the Commissary Court, which was appropriated for the trial of these and certain other causes, was abolished, and such causes are now brought before one of the Lords Ordinary of the Court of Session, and if either of the parties are dissatisfied with his judgment, they have it in their power to submit it to the review of either division of the court. None of the inferior courts have any jurisdiction in these cases.

The law of Scotland has never recognised any distinction between the case of the husband and that of the wife, and an action of divorce is equally competent at the instance of the one as of the other.

The action is commenced by a writ, which is called a summons, in which the pursuer (plaintiff) sets forth distinctly and articulately the facts which are offered to be proved in support of the case, and concludes by craving to have the marriage dissolved, and decree of divorce pronounced. This writ is, of course, served on the defender (defendant) in the usual way; and if the action is meant to be resisted, defences are lodged, which may either consist of a simple denial of the pursuer's averments, or may contain such averments of fact and pleas in law as the defender means to rely on in defence to the action.

On the case being brought before a Lord Ordinary, as before mentioned, his first duty is to call the pursuer before him, and administer to him what is called the oath of calumny. The summons is read over to him, and he is then required to make oath, if the husband, "that he has just cause to insist in this action of divorce against the defender, his wife, because he believes she has been guilty of adultery, and that the facts stated in his libel, which has been read over to him, are true; that there has been no concert or collusion between him and the said defender, in raising this action, in order to obtain a divorce against her. Nor does he know, believe, or suspect that there has been any concert or agreement between any other person on his behalf, and the defendant or any other person on her behalf, with the view or for the purpose of obtaining such divorce."

The wife takes the same oath, mutatis mutandis.

The object of administering this oath is, as the terms of it sufficiently show, to exclude, if possible, all collusion between the parties, and to prevent them from availing themselves, without any proper cause, of the forms of law to procure a divorce; and it is manifestly of the utmost importance that collusion should be prevented. It is not usual or requisite in instituting judicial proceedings in Scotland, that they should be founded on affidavits as to the truth of the averments relied on, except in a very few special cases, which hardly form exceptions to the general rule. Supposing the pursuer to have successfully passed the ordeal of this oath, the averments of the parties in point of fact and law are finally adjusted, and put on record, and it is then the duty of the judge to examine the pleadings, in order to satisfy himself that the case is relevant; that is, that the facts averred are sufficient, if proved, to support the conclusions of the action, and to justify him in decreeing the divorce as craved. If he is satisfied on this point, he pronounces an interlocutor finding "the libel relevant," and allowing the parties a proof of their averments; the expression being synonymous with summons. The proof is taken on commission by a sheriff principal, who is generally styled sheriff commissary, because the old jurisdiction of the commissaries has been to a certain extent transferred to him. These sheriffs commissary ought to be, and, indeed, generally are, experienced lawyers. After both parties have led all the evidence they may have to bring, the proofs and the whole case are again laid before the Lord Ordinary, who hears the counsel for the parties, and pronounces such a judgment as he may think just. Should he find the adultery proved, the judgment pronounced is in the following terms:—"Finds facts, circumstances, and qualifications, proved relevant to infer the defender C. D.'s guilt of adultery with E. and F. mentioned in the libel and proof. Finds him guilty accordingly, and therefore divorces and separates the said C. D., defender, from the said A. B., pursuer, her society, fellowship, and company, in all time coming. Finds and declares that the said C. D., defender, has forfeited all the rights and privileges of a lawful husband, and that the said A. B., pursuer, is entitled to live single or marry any free man as if she had never been married to the said C. D., defender, or as if he were naturally dead."

This judgment may be brought under the revision of either division of the inner house of the Court of Session, and from thence may be carried by appeal to the House of Lords.

Such is the ordinary procedure in an action of divorce on the ground of adultery when the case is defended. When it is undefended, the procedure is nearly the same, and differs from the procedure in ordinary undefended causes in which decree is pronounced as craved as a matter of course if the defender does not appear and answer, the pursuer not being called upon to substantiate his averments in any way, the presumption being that the defender has nothing to say for himself if he has had due notice of the action, and does not object. For obvious reasons, a different practice has been established in actions for divorce, the pursuer in these being obliged to prove their cases whether the actions are defended or not.

Our limits forbid further notice of this subject at present. On a future occasion we shall resume it by endeavouring, as already indicated, to point out certain particulars in which, as it appears to us, experience has shown that the Scotch course of procedure, though generally satisfactory, is defective and capable of improvement, and which we think that those now legislating on the subject would do well to notice for the purpose of avoiding.

Review.

The New Joint-Stock Company Law, with Instructions how to form a Company; and herein of the Liabilities of persons engaged in so doing. By CHARLES WORDSWORTH, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-law, &c., &c. Shaw & Sons. 1856.

"One of the most remarkable circumstances or features of our age is, the energy with which the principle of combination, or of action by joint forces, by associated numbers, is manifesting itself. It may be said, without exaggeration, that everything is now done by societies," so writes Dr. Channing, and thus quotes Mr. Wordsworth, as an appropriate motto for the above treatise. It is not our intention here to discuss the good or the evil which the development of the principle has worked in this country, or to enlarge on the fact that the "joint forces" of knavery on the part of the promoters or managers, and of credulity on the part of the shareholders, have not unfrequently impelled a promising project in a direction towards Basinghall-street or the Court of Chancery. We would rather wish, on the present occasion, to say a few words on the legal position of trading partnerships, which have been suggested to us by the appearance of Mr. Wordsworth's Manual.

A certain mistiness prevails as to the character of companies which are quasi incorporated; and this among circles in which it could not have been reasonably expected to exist. No term whatever has been of late more frequently in the public mouth than "limited liability." The subject has been exhausted by essayists. Mr. Lowe has explained it in the House; the Times, after its custom, has delivered itself of sparkling and inaccurate leaders; the Law Amendment Society has reported upon it. And yet, with all these various aids, the unprofessional mind, at all events, has remained in a somewhat perplexed condition.

This uncertainty arises, we apprehend, from a forgetfulness of the way in which some elementary principles of the common law respecting corporations have been qualified with regard to certain associations by the course of legislation. Twenty years ago the registered joint-stock company—a species which now flourishes in such profusion—was unknown to the law. Prior to the date of the Joint-Stock Companies Act of 1844, though joint-stock companies in abundance existed, there were but two conditions of liability under which, in this country, combined capital could be brought into action in trading enterprises—for to these alone our remarks are intended to apply. One of these arose when two or more persons agreed between themselves to become partners in such an undertaking, either by way of a private firm, or in shares transferable without the consent of the copartners. The other arose when two or more natural persons became in law one artificial person; in other words, when such persons procured themselves to be "incorporated." If the first of these methods of partnership were chosen, certain well-known consequences followed by law. Each partner became the agent of the rest. Each member of the partnership became responsible, both in his person and his property, for its liabilities to their whole extent. Each member was obliged to sue and be sued, if contracts in which the partnership was party had to be put in action. On the other hand, if the second method were chosen, and a charter of incorporation obtained from the Crown—either in the exercise of the Royal prerogative mero motu, or moved thereto by the authority of an Act of Parliament—other consequences followed, which resulted from the partnership being then looked upon by the eye of the law as a single though artificial person. The corporate property, not the persons or property of the members, became the fund on which the creditors had to rely. No implied agency arose with regard to the acts of any individual member or members—for the partnership was bound only by its own acts, properly authenticated (as the general rule) by its common seal; and if it became needful to put in action a contract, the plaintiff or the defendant was the corporation itself; and if cast in the suit, the judgment was against such corporation by name. It is not surprising that such opposite characteristics should have suggested the device of a cross between the two species of partnerships. It is only strange that such a compromise should not have been attempted much earlier than it was. The grievance which most pressed was the last peculiarity of the *un*incorporated partnership to which we have alluded. When there were many members it was felt intolerable that all must be joined in legal proceedings; for, up to very recent times, a mistake in the proper parties to an action was often of vital consequence. Hence it was that the first step in the direction towards quasi incorporated companies was to confer by private statute, on certain associations, the power of suing and being sued through their secretary or public officer. Then it was thought that another incident belonging to a corporation might advantageously be engrafted on certain unincorporated partnerships, consisting of a considerable number of members—viz. that the judgment should be against the company in lieu of the partner-defendants to the action; and that execution should only issue on such judgment against the private property, or against the person, of the individual partners, after due effort had been made to satisfy the judgment out of the common property. This stage of public feeling caused the statute of 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 73, to be passed, by which her Majesty was empowered to grant to any company or body of persons, associated for any trading or other purposes whatever, letters patent conferring on them any privilege which, according to the common law, it would be competent to the Crown to grant by way of charter of incorporation. In this statute, there is moreover contained a provision that such letters patent may limit the common law liability of the members for the engagements and liabilities of the company to which they belong; and this has given rise to considerable complication, for the Board of Trade (through which department of the State these letters patent are obtained) in some cases expressly reserve the unlimited liability of the chartered company as at common law, and in others fix such liability at twice or three times the amount of its nominal capital. A few years after this statute came the first Joint-Stock Companies Act to which we have alluded (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110), intended chiefly to embrace partnerships of more than twenty-five persons, and those whose capital is divided into shares transferable without the express consent of all the copartners. To such companies the Act extended certain of the privileges of an incorporated partnership—as, in particular, the right to sue and be sued through the medium of a single individual, and that the judgment should be against the company instead of the members; but, on the other hand, the common-law liability of the members was expressly reserved, and such companies were subjected, for the first time, to a system of registration, and placed generally under the supervision of an officer appointed by Government. So matters remained (so far as the progressive assimilation of unincorporated to incorporated trading partnerships is concerned) till the Limited Liability Act of 1855, and the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856; of the latter of which measures Mr. Wordsworth truly says, that it made "a change the importance of which can in no degree be estimated, and the effects of which, on the mercantile community of this country, can in no degree be foretold."

Since this Act the state of the law in reference to trading undertakings carried on with combined capital seems to be as follows: They may be—1. Unincorporated common law partnerships. In these each member is, in his person and to the extent of his whole property, liable for the whole of the debts and engagements of the firm or company to which he belongs. 2. Partnerships incorporated by royal charter or by special Act of Parliament. In these the corporate property is the only fund available to creditors—the individual members are not liable at all. 3. Partnerships quasi incorporated—i.e. with letters patent—under 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 73. In these each member is liable according to the terms of the patent—in some cases, in his person and property, and to the extent of the whole of their debts and engagements as at common law; in others, in his person and property to a defined amount exceeding the nominal capital; in others, again, only to the extent of his shares. 4. Partnerships of seven members or more, established, with limited liability, under the Joint-Stock Companies Act of 1856. We will state the position of each of the members of these last, in the words of Mr. Wordsworth himself:—

"This Act has also been called, whilst passing through Parliament, a Limited Liability Bill. This seems to be a misnomer. The company being constituted a corporation" [this is by s. 3, which enables seven persons or more, by complying with the requisitions of the Act as to registration and otherwise, to form themselves into an incorporated company, with or without limited liability], "its funds only are liable to creditors: the shareholders are in no respect liable to them, however much they may severally owe to the concern on their respective shares. Instead, therefore, of a limited liability measure, it might be more properly termed a 'No Liability Act.' It is only in the event of a company being unable to carry on business and wound up, that any question can arise as to the liability of shareholders, and that the provisions of ss. 61, 62, 63 will come into operation. But it is very often the case that all the capital subscribed by the shareholders is paid up at once, or is paid up before the time for winding up arrives; in such case, and supposing the company to be what is called 'limited,' there is no liability of any kind on the part of a shareholder, either to creditors, or to his co-shareholders."

The reader who has followed us through the comparison we have instituted between unincorporated and incorporated partnerships will perceive that the consequence of this statute has been to effect an assimilation between the two, under certain conditions. At least, it enables any seven persons, "associated for any lawful purpose," to acquire one of the most important characteristics of a corporation, without either charter from the Crown, Act of Parliament, or letters patent, but simply by their own act and deed. A most important change indeed, and one that seems, among other incidental results, to diminish pro tanto a hitherto important branch of the Royal prerogative.

There are subordinate complications of the subject on which we have not cared to touch, as not being within the compass of our space; for example, companies may establish themselves under the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856, without availing themselves of the exemption from liability; and these companies will be in much the same legal position as those registered originally under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. Moreover, we might have said something as to the peculiar position in which banking and insurance companies are placed, both of them being excluded altogether from the operation of the Act of 1856, and the latter (those, of course, now newly to be formed) being deprived of the benefit of being registered at all; for the Act of 1844 is repealed, even as regards insurance companies (at least, so we understand the better opinion to be), owing to a blunder between the draftsman of the Bill and a member of Parliament, who would insist on the insertion of words to that effect, when there was no time to remedy the error. On these topics, however, as before observed, we cannot dwell; but we must find room to signify our approval of Mr. Wordsworth's Manual. It is, indeed, little more than an annotated edition of the Act itself. But the notes are full and practical, and cannot fail to be most useful to those who are ambitious to understand—"How to form a company, and herein of the liabilities of persons engaged in so doing."

HOUSE OF LORDS.

PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

In reply to a question from Earl STANHOPE, the LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not anticipate, that, under the 37th clause of the Bill, there would be any increase of the judicial business of that House. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the sanity or insanity of testators would be decided by a jury. If, however, there should be any complaint of misdirection, the matter might be brought before the Privy Council from the court below by writ of error.

The Earl of DONOUHMORE expressed his regret that no compensation was to be granted to proctors. He thought the proctors of York had an especial claim to compensation, for their court was abolished, and no substitute was provided, and the whole of the business which they had been in the habit of transacting would be entirely destroyed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, there had been exceedingly few petitions from the proctors on this subject; and that he believed arose from an honest feeling on their part that compensation in their case was impracticable. He thought no valid objections had been raised, and he therefore moved the third reading of the Bill.

The Bill was then read a third time, and passed.

Tuesday, June 9.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The House went into committee upon this Bill, which had been recommitted.

The LORD CHANCELLOR remarked that the 17th clause, as it now stood, provided that any wife deserted by her husband for two years should have a right to divorce à mensâ et thoro. Since the bill was printed, he had received a number of letters from husbands stating that a corresponding benefit ought to be given to them. He saw no reason why that request should not be complied with, and, therefore, he proposed to introduce words in line 12 giving a husband the same remedy if deserted by his wife as the clause now gave to a wife if deserted by her husband. Last session, great discussion took place as to whether, in the case of unjustifiable desertion, there ought not to be divorce à vinculo matrimonii, as was the law in Scotland. The committee decided in the negative, but their lordships thought that some relief ought to be given; and it was at his own suggestion, that, instead of being entitled to divorce à mensâ et thoro for desertion, a wife was to be simply enabled to petition the Court, and obtain an order for alimony. Since that time, he had changed his mind upon the point, and his objection to alimony was, that the husband might come back and deprive his wife of the relief granted by the Court.

Lord CAMPBELL did not object to the husband having the same right as the wife to obtain from a competent court on reasonable evidence a separation, equivalent to what was known to the law as a divorce à mensâ et thoro. With married persons there should be community of property as well as of persons; but when a new status was acquired by divorce à mensâ et thoro, the community of property ought to cease. The wife's property would then be protected, and they would hear no more of the cruel instances of husbands returning and sweeping away everything belonging to their deserted wives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Earl FITZWILLIAM said, a woman who was separated occupied a different position from a woman who was divorced. The general public did not understand the legal distinction between a divorce à vinculo and divorce à mensâ et thoro. He would, therefore, move to substitute the word "separation" for divorce à mensâ et thoro.

After a short conversation, the amendment, proposing to substitute the words "judicial separation" for "divorce à mensâ et thoro," was put and agreed to without a division.

Lord ST. LEONARDS said, he thought the alteration just made in the language of the law very objectionable. Every law student could easily ascertain what a divorce à mensâ et thoro was, but in none of the law books would he find any mention of "judicial separation." The alteration of words, however, did not alter the substance, and he still objected to the effect of the clause. He fully agreed that if a woman were abandoned by her husband she ought to have alimony, but he thought that if the husband came back to her, and was willing to fulfil the duties of a husband, alimony should cease, provided the Court that granted it considered the case a proper one for such a termination. The simple question was, whether a divorce à mensâ et thoro should be granted to any wife who had been deserted by her husband without sufficient excuse, or to a husband who had been deserted by his wife without sufficient cause. In his opinion the clause would open a wide door to abuse; and, believing it to have been the intention of the committee to adhere as nearly as possible to the law as it stood, while giving increased facilities to all classes of society for obtaining redress, he would move that this clause be struck out.

Their Lordships then divided—Contents, 76; non-contents, 37: majority, 39. Clause 17 was accordingly retained.

On Clause 22 the LORD CHANCELLOR said, their Lordships having come to the conclusion that there should be no action for criminal conversation, Lord St. Leonards had proposed that adultery should be made a misdemeanor. He had considered the case, and what occurred to him as the best mode of proceeding was not to constitute adultery a misdemeanor, there being many things which would make the working of such a law extremely difficult, and almost impracticable: for instance, they must make exceptions in cases in which it was not known to the adulterer that the woman was married; otherwise the law might be made a means of extorting money. The two objects which they ought to keep in view were, first of all, to make the commission of adultery less frequent; and, secondly, to take care that in proceedings for divorce à vinculo matrimonii there should be a bonâ fide resisting party. What he now proposed, with the view of effecting those objects, was, that any person who was seeking to obtain a divorce à mensâ et thoro, should not be at liberty, as he now was, to proceed against the wife alone, in the absence of the adulterer, unless the Court thought there were special reasons for making an exception, and should not be allowed to proceed against the adulterer alone in the absence of the wife; but that in every case in which a husband sought a divorce à vinculo matrimonii, on the ground of the adultery of the wife, the proceedings should be by petition to the court, making both defendants, and bringing the whole matter before the court, so that there would be a bonâ fide resistance. In proposing that there should be a fine not exceeding £10,000, his object was to indicate that the fine should not be a mere nominal one. What he now proposed, then, was, that in every case of this kind, instead of an action for criminal conversation, the facts should form the subject of a trial by jury; and that if the proceedings resulted in a decree of divorce against the wife, the adulterer should pay all the costs, and that the Court should impose on the paramour any fine that it thought proper, not exceeding £10,000.

Lord BROUGHAM entirely approved the substitute proposed for the action of crim. con. He preferred the infliction of a fine to making adultery a misdemeanour, on account of the danger of conspiracy which beset the latter course, and against which he was afraid that no sufficient security could be provided.

Earl GREY supported the clause; but he thought a fine alone was not a sufficient punishment. To the rich man a fine was nothing, and imprisonment ought to be added.

Lord CAMPBELL suggested that there should be no limit to the fine, but that it should be left to the court to apportion it according to the circumstances of the case and the means of the offender.

The clause was then agreed to.

The LORD CHANCELLOR proposed a clause after clause 25, providing for the imposition of a fine on adulterous parties.

The Bishop of OXFORD proposed, as an amendment, that the adulterous parties should be liable to "fine and imprisonment, or fine or imprisonment," and that it should be lawful to apply the fine to pay the whole or a portion of the costs of the proceedings.

The LORD CHANCELLOR could imagine nothing more revolting to the mind of a man whose wife had been unfaithful to him than the reflection that he could not obtain a divorce without subjecting her to imprisonment.

Lord BROUGHAM objected to the amendment, which gave a court power to inflict a heavy punishment of imprisonment without the intervention of a jury.

The Bishop of OXFORD observed, that, by a new clause which would be proposed, there would be a trial before a jury.

The committee then divided, when there appeared—For the amendment, 43; against it, 38: majority, 10.

The amendment was consequently carried, and the clause as thus amended was agreed to.

Upon clause 45, the clause in which, on the motion of the Archbishop of CANTERBURY, words were inserted prohibiting persons divorced after being proved guilty of adultery from marrying again,

The LORD CHANCELLOR proposed an amendment, the effect of which was to enable the respective parties on whose petition the marriage was dissolved to marry again, thus restoring the clause to its original intent: the noble and learned Lord contending, that nothing could be more scandalous than an Act of Parliament which would put the woman or the man in a position in which they must remain single, and thus necessarily forced by law into a state of prostitution.

The Archbishop of CANTERBURY opposed the amendment.

The Bishop of OXFORD said, the question was, whether they would give the party, by an act of sin, the opportunity of doing that which without an act of sin could not be done. When a man stole a piece of furniture they thought nothing of transporting him, and separating him from his wife; but when he committed the greater sin of adultery, they permitted him to marry again. The House divided—For the Lord Chancellor's amendment, 46; against, 24: majority, 22.

Lord WENSLEYDALE then moved to add a proviso that either party should not marry the person with whom the adultery was proved to have been committed, and the Court in its decree for a divorce was to name that person.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE protested strongly against preventing women who had been divorced from marrying again. They allowed, he said, the burglar a chance of reform, and why, therefore, refuse it to the erring woman?

Lord CAMPBELL supported the proviso.

The committee divided—For the proviso, 28; against it, 37: majority, 9.

The remaining clauses were then agreed to, and the House resumed.

Lord REDESDALE gave notice that at a future stage of the Bill he should, with a view to meet the cases of Roman Catholics and other persons who had a conscientious objection to applying for a divorce à vinculo, move the insertion of a provision enabling persons presenting a petition for a divorce à mensâ et thoro to make the adulterer a party to the suit, and to petition that that divorce should be followed by penalties similar to those imposed in consequence of a divorce à vinculo matrimonii.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

Lord LYNDHURST gave notice that either on the report or the third reading of this Bill he should again propose the amendment which he moved when the Bill was in committee.

The Earl of DONOUGHMORE gave notice that at one or other of these stages he should repeat the amendment which he proposed to the 19th clause of the Bill as it originally stood.

TRUSTEES RELIEF BILL.

Lord ST. LEONARDS rose to propose an amendment of the law for the relief of trustees acting bonâ fide and without any benefit to themselves. Breaches of trust were of various natures; nine-tenths of them were produced through the instrumentality of cestui que trust, who besieged the unhappy trustee, and forced him to do something not within the scope of the trust deed. Under these circumstances certain persons, imagining that parties would be unwilling to become trustees, had entertained the idea of forming public companies for performing the duties of trustees. But a company would not hand over funds to parties without a degree of proof which no private trustee who was a friend of the family would think of asking for. Believing, therefore, that it would be most injurious to society that any company should undertake the duty of trustees, he was most anxious that the law should be placed in a position to induce private persons to undertake the office. With a view to this end, he proposed to lay upon their Lordships' table a Bill which related solely to trustees acting bonâ fide and without making profit to themselves, and it proposed to remedy, as to persons so situated, the results of certain acts of commission and of omission. As the law stood, if a trustee, by allowing a trust fund to remain in an improper state of investment, was the cause of a loss to his cestui que trusts, he was mulcted in that loss; but if on the other hand there was some gain to them also, he was not allowed to set-off the gain against the loss. The first clause in the Bill proposed to remedy that state of things, by allowing the loss to be balanced so far as it could be by the gain. The second clause provided that if a trustee should make any over-payment to a tenant for life with the knowledge of the remainder-man, the latter should not be permitted after the death of the tenant for life to proceed against the trustee in respect of such over-payment. Another liability to which trustees were subject arose in the case where they made payments to a person authorised to receive moneys under a power of attorney, and it happened that at the time of making the payment the party giving the power was dead. This was a manifest injustice when the trustee was not aware of the principal's death: this he proposed to remedy. He also proposed, that, in cases where there was a difficulty as to the question of investment, a trustee should not be liable in respect of any question which might arise upon that point where he had acted under the authority of the opinion of a Queen's Counsel. The Bill also contained provisions with reference to faults of omission, where a trustee allowed trust moneys or property to remain in the same state of investment as they were left by the testator appointing the trustee. With reference to these, he had inserted provisions freeing the trustee from liability, except where the testator expressly declared that the state of investment should be changed, or a tenant for life or remainder-man gave notice desiring it to be changed. He had also inserted a provision enabling trustees to obtain upon petition the opinion of courts of equity upon points of law. These were the chief provisions of the Bill which he laid upon the table.

Lord BROUGHAM would give this measure his considerate attention. He thought the best course of proceeding was not to attempt to throw the net too wide, so as to include all breaches of trust, but to extend the provisions of what was termed the Bankers Act to attorneys, stewards, paid agents, and all persons who stood in the relation of trustee, and to make malversation an offence subjecting them to prosecution, so that they would not be gainers by their offence. In this extension, he would include directors of companies committing a breach of trust either for their own benefit or for the benefit of those with whom they were connected.

Lord CAMPBELL regarded the bill now introduced as a very proper accompaniment of the penal measure introduced in the other House. It was as desirable that trustees who acted honestly should be protected, as it was that those who were guilty of frauds should be punished.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, his noble and learned friend appeared to him to have undertaken a task which was impossible. He understood him to say that his object was to protect innocent trustees. Now, if the rules for the regulation of the conduct of trustees operated harshly, let them be altered either by the Court or by the Legislature; but let it not be declared that it was the duty of trustees to pursue a certain course, and at the same time that if they did not pursue it, they should be exempted from all serious consequences. The effect of that would be to declare that what had been a breach of trust hitherto should not be so in future.

The Bill was then read a first time.

Monday, June 8.

MORTMAIN LAWS.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in answer to Mr. HADFIELD, said that he did not think the Government would be able to deal with the subject this session; but that if the Bill to amend the Mortmain Laws, of which his learned friend had given notice of his intention to re-introduce, was the same Bill he had brought in last session, he would support it.

MINISTRY OF JUSTICE.

Mr. BAINES, in reply to Mr. WARREN, said, that the Government did not deem it advisable to propose the re-appointment of the Committee appointed to consider the recommendations contained in the last Report of the Statute Law Commission during the present session, because they had now under their consideration—in consequence of an address agreed to by the House—the question of the establishment of a Department of Public Justice. If such a measure were ultimately determined upon, the supervision of current legislation, with a view to its correction and improvement, would doubtless be included in the functions of the proposed department.

PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

This Bill was brought down from the Lords, and read a first time.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

This Bill passed through committee.

FRAUDULENT TRUSTEES, &c., BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. Serjeant KINGLAKE called the attention of the Attorney-General to the fact that the 1st clause attempted to deal, for the first time, with what were called ordinary breaches of trust, where the trustee employed the trust money for his own benefit, and with the intention of defrauding the parties entitled, but it did not touch the act that was the cause of the fraud. He would suggest to his hon. and learned friend whether it would not be better at once to apply the axe to the root of the evil, and remove those facilities which the present state of the law afforded to trustees of using trust moneys for their own benefit, by making it a criminal act to use trust money in any way for other than trust purposes? The Bill touched fraud, and fraud alone, but left untouched the act which was the fertile cause of the fraud. If they meant to protect the honest trustee, they would interdict the act in which the fraud alone could originate. Again, no person could, under this Bill, be tried on an indictment for intent to commit fraud, unless a court of equity, a judge, or the Attorney-General decided that there were grounds for instituting such a proceeding. This was unfair to the accused, and would place the judge or the Attorney-General in an invidious position, by calling upon him to prejudge the case.

Mr. ROLT said, he would only trouble the House with a few observations illustrative of the objections he entertained to that part of the Bill which dealt with offences committed by trustees. His first objection was, that the Bill as it stood would infallibly lead to deterring gentlemen of character and responsibility from accepting the office of trustee in cases of complicated trusts. The offence of a trustee under the Bill was that of a person appropriating money or other property of which he was by law the owner, but which in fact belonged to another, and appropriating it for his own benefit, against good faith, and with intent to defraud. Those latter words would either reduce the Act to a nullity, or be of no effect at all. He did not know how the intent to defraud was to be proved. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, a breach of trust was committed with an intention to replace the money. The distinction which he drew was between offences in cases in which a person was intrusted with money, and those in which they were intrusted with stock and such securities. In the latter case, the offence of breach of trust was far greater, inasmuch as it partook of forgery and theft; while in the former it was only in the nature of criminal insolvency, which offence could be dealt with by the Courts of Bankruptcy and Insolvency. He objected to dealing with this kind of offence by an exceptional law, merely because of the occurrence of recent cases of great frauds, which had created a kind of panic with regard to this offence. Take the case of a trustee, whose duty it was to collect money under a trust, and not to invest it until a certain event had happened. In that case, it was his duty to keep the money separate from his own, and yet the most innocent person might mix it up with his own. That was not a criminal, though it might be a legal, breach of trust. The next step was, that such a man drew the money, and applied it to his own purposes; but even that might not be a criminal offence, because he intended to restore it; but if he failed to do so, then he became criminally, and grossly criminally, insolvent. Let the law of criminal insolvency be properly adjusted, and this offence would come under that head, and be properly dealt with. Another case to which the Bill applied was that of a man who, being engaged in merchandise, made his will, directing his property to be realised at his death, and who, dying sooner than he expected, left adult and infant children, the adults being trustees under his will; and they finding that if the property was realised at once, the assets for division would be small; but that if the trade was carried on, there was every chance of their becoming considerable, and failure followed. That was a case which might fall within the category of this Bill. But even if it did not, the enactments of the Bill were such that they might lead to accusations and imputations on trustees which would render it impossible for any sensitive man to undertake the duties of a trust. There were other branches of the Bill which were open to similar objections, and he thought that the part which referred the question of indicting for an offence committed under the Bill to the consideration of the Attorney-General or some one of the judges, would not remove a difficulty which existed in carrying it out. The Bill required careful consideration; and if the objections to which he had adverted could not be lessened in committee, he felt confident that the Bill would lead to the creation of some Government board or some legal tribunal for the fulfilment of all trusts, neither of which, he thought, would be beneficial to the country.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in reply to Mr. Serjeant KINGLAKE, said, that he did not exactly know how he was to interdict the source of this crime, so long as the relation between trustee and cestui que trust existed; and if he did attempt to interdict its source, he should fall under the censure of his other hon. and learned friend, whose only alarm was lest the Bill should lead to the annihilation of the office of trustee, and to the appointment of a Government officer or board, which should supersede all private trustees. If the learned Serjeant would try, by a palpable enactment, to interdict the source of this crime, he should be happy to consider it. As to the other point to which the learned Serjeant had referred—namely, the 12th clause of the Bill—he did not know how to meet the difficulty, except by placing it in the power of a law officer of the Crown or a judge to examine, upon affidavit or otherwise, into a charge of fraudulent breach of trust, and to ascertain whether there was reasonable ground for such a charge. His hon. and learned friend (Mr. Rolt) had said that this Bill had been introduced in consequence of recent events; but he had carefully guarded himself against that imputation in bringing in the Bill. The existing state of things was a blot on our jurisprudence which had been very long felt. He was aware that the Bill would require amendment, but he trusted that it would leave the House as something worthy to be added to the legislation of the country, and that it would meet a great evil, and remove a great opprobrium which rested on the jurisprudence of this country.

The Bill was then read a second time.

THE JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

This Bill went through committee pro formâ, for the purpose of introducing amendments.

MARRIED WOMEN'S REVERSIONARY INTEREST BILL.

This Bill was read a second time; Sir E. PERRY giving notice that in committee he should propose an amendment enabling married women to retain their right to reversionary property.

Tuesday, June 9.

CRIMINAL LAW.

Mr. M'MAHON gave notice that he should, on June 30, move for leave to bring in a Bill to allow new trials in criminal cases, and in other respects to amend the criminal law.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. BAINES (in answer to Mr. POWELL) said, that the report of the Statute Law Commission was now ready, and would be laid upon the table in a few days; and that it was the intention of the Lord Chancellor, in a very few days, to bring in a series of Bills, which have been prepared under the advice of the Commissioners.

GRAND JURIES (METROPOLIS).

Sir F. THESIGER moved for leave to introduce a Bill to dispense with the attendance of Grand Juries at the Central Criminal Court, and at courts of General and Quarter Sessions, holden within the Metropolitan Police district, except in particular cases. He observed that some might view with apprehension the attempt to interfere with a venerable institution, regarded as essential to the fair and safe administration of criminal justice, and as an important safeguard to the liberty of the subject. But the alterations which had of comparatively late years taken place in the criminal law had largely diminished the usefulness of that institution in all cases, and in many rendered its necessity extremely questionable. This subject had attracted much of public attention for several years past. In 1849, the late Sir John Jervis introduced a Bill, which contained various provisions for the purpose of rendering the intervention of grand juries in criminal trials unnecessary. That Bill was referred to a select committee, by whom the evidence of several persons of great experience on the subject was taken, all of whom were unanimous in the opinion that grand juries should not be summoned within the metropolitan district. In 1852, the late Recorder of London, in a charge to the grand jury of the Central Criminal Court, said, that "it was unnecessary for them to have been called together to deal with the majority of the cases for trial which had undergone preliminary inquiry before the police-magistrates." In 1852 he (Sir F. Thesiger), as the Attorney-General of Lord Derby's Government, brought in a Bill to abolish grand juries in the metropolitan district, but it was withdrawn, in consequence of the early dissolution of Parliament in June. The observations he had made applied to grand juries in general; but he did not desire to interfere with grand juries in the country, and therefore proposed to confine his measure only to the metropolitan district. Grand juries, in their origin, performed the duties of public prosecutors; they presented crimes to the justices in eyre, and had the power of committing prisoners. From the time of Edward III., the functions of grand juries declined from their original jurisdiction, and they were changed into a tribunal only for preliminary inquiries as to whether there was a primâ facie case against prisoners charged with offences; but in the metropolitan districts there were police-magistrates of great legal knowledge, acting in sight of the public, who, in the case of accusations against persons charged with offences, made careful investigations, and decided whether there were sufficient grounds for sending parties accused for trial. One would have thought that was sufficient; but after that another preliminary inquiry took place before twenty-three gentlemen, who, with closed doors, and under an oath of secresy, and in the absence of the accused, considered and decided whether there was a primâ facie case against the prisoner. If the grand jury found a true bill, their labour was superfluous; and if they threw out a bill, their interference was generally mischievous. Witnesses were often tampered with, and induced to suppress evidence before a grand jury which had been given before a magistrate, and that could be done with perfect security, in consequence of the secresy of the tribunal. These circumstances had caused grand juries to be called "the hope of London thieves," for they gave an opportunity for the guilty to escape, and were no protection to the innocent. With regard to the throwing out of bills, that was not half the evil which occurred in the metropolitan district. There was hardly a session of the Central Criminal Court, or the Middlesex Sessions, without persons preferring indictments for misdemeanors, such as conspiracy, perjury, keeping gaming or disorderly houses, and so on, for the purpose of revenge or of extorting money. There was a provision in the Central Criminal Court Act which laid down that no indictment, except for perjury, should be preferred at the Central Criminal Court, unless the party accused was in custody, or the prosecutor bound in recognisances; for which purpose, it was necessary for him to go before a magistrate. But as the Central Criminal Court only was mentioned in the Act, persons went to the Middlesex Sessions, preferred bills of indictment, and then removed them into the Central Criminal Court; so that no recognisances were necessary. The consequences of these proceedings were very alarming to the public. An innocent person might have the nerve to stand a public trial, and some such persons might be found who would pay large sums to buy off prosecutors and witnesses. If a party accused was guilty, he might do the same thing, and thus persons were found who made a trade of prosecutions. The remedy he proposed for this state of things was simple. He proposed that no case should be tried at the Central Criminal Court, or in the other courts within the metropolitan district, without a previous investigation by a police-magistrate, and that after that no inquiry by a grand jury should be necessary; and he proposed to dispense with the attendance of grand juries at the sessions in the metropolitan district altogether. There would be many subordinate advantages in this alteration. The saving of time and expense would be great. By his proposition, it would be arranged, that, before the sessions came on, the clerk of the indictments should prepare lists of cases, which would come on in their order, so that persons engaged in them would be able to know at what time it was necessary for them to attend. Without trespassing further on the House, it would suffice to say, that all persons who had paid attention to the subject—judges, grand juries themselves, barristers, solicitors, and magistrates—all concurred in opinion, that, within the metropolitan district, there was no necessity for assembling grand juries, but that, on the contrary, they were detrimental to public justice.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said his hon. and learned friend would have the cordial support of the Government in carrying his measure. It was a matter of regret, that, under cover of one of our most venerable institutions, means should have been used by which it became an instrument of obstruction and corruption in the administration of justice. The reason that the Government had not introduced a measure on this subject was, that they were desirous of introducing it in connection with the appointment of a public prosecutor, not as a particular officer, but as part of a general system, and which, but for the illness of the late Solicitor-General, would ere this have been before the House.

Mr. BOWYER did not rise to oppose the motion. At the same time, admitting the abuses which existed in the grand jury system, it behoved the House to consider with care such a change in the fundamental law of England as was proposed by the Bill. It was an innovation which allowed a man to be brought to trial for felony without the intervention of a grand jury, and merely at the will of a magistrate, removable at the pleasure of the Crown. All the greatest legal authorities of England had declared that no man could be put in jeopardy for life or limb otherwise than by the finding of 24 jurors—the finding of a bill by 12 jurors, and the conviction by 12 others. It had been said that in the case of proceedings before a grand jury, corruption might arise; but might not the same thing arise in proceedings before magistrates? The only way of preventing such corruption was the appointment of a public prosecutor, whose duty it would be to see persons brought to justice, and that no tampering took place.

The motion was then agreed to, and leave given to bring in the Bill.

WILLS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD.

Sir F. KELLY, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to give validity and effect to the wills of British subjects made abroad, said that as the law at present stood, in case a British subject made his will in strict conformity to the law of England, if it should turn out after his death that he had gone to reside abroad, and had continued permanently to reside in any foreign country or colony, the laws of which differed materially from the laws of England, his will would be liable to be set aside, and the property would pass to the next of kin or whoever might be entitled to it according to the law of the country to which he might be held to belong. It was well known that by the Act of 1837, which applied to personal as well as real property, any subject of the realm could make a will, provided it was executed by himself and attested by two witnesses, and thus dispose of his property. But this law was partially and most unduly controlled by certain proceedings and formalities in the courts of law, which had produced a state of things requiring alteration and remedy. He then instanced the cases of Stanley v. Burns, Collier v. Revas, and Bremer v. Bremer. He need not say that the decision in the latter case had excited the greatest alarm among British residents in France. As soon as it was known that he had given notice of his intention to bring forward this Bill, he had letters without number from British residents in France on the subject, and he had also had communication with many members of the legal profession in this country, and with some in France, and no one had yet been able to suggest to him the shadow of a reason why the will of a British subject, executed and attested according to British law, was to be set aside because the testator was residing in Paris or in Constantinople. Among the many mischiefs which would arise from this decision would be, that, whenever a British subject died abroad there would arise the most perplexing and intricate question, "Where was the testator domiciled?" And no sooner would it be decided that the domicile was in a foreign country than the question would arise, "What was the law of that foreign country?" Thus, if a British subject resided in Paris, and then at Milan, and then at two or three places in Germany, they would have to inquire into the law of France, of Austria, and of every state in Germany where the testator happened to have resided. These evils were so great, that he hoped the House would see the necessity of immediately putting an end to them. He proposed by this Bill, to enact that all wills and codicils made by British subjects and duly attested according to the law of England, should be entitled to probate in this country, and should be valid and effectual in this country wherever the testator might have been domiciled. He did not propose to interfere with the law of any foreign country, or with the validity of any will executed in any country according to the laws of that country. The Bill contained a proviso, which he had introduced with some reluctance, that the Bill should only apply to wills made after the Bill had been passed. The hon. and learned gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

Mr. MALINS agreed with his hon. and learned friend that the evil was one of immense magnitude. The decision in Bremer v. Bremer was one that had taken the profession by surprise. The testatrix had resided for fifteen years in France, but was in every other respect an English subject, and yet, by this decision, was regarded as a foreigner.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, the subject was not only interesting to lawyers, but was one of general importance, and one upon which every gentleman who heard him was perfectly able to appreciate, and to form his opinion. While stating that Government would offer no opposition to the introduction of the Bill, he would take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to the difficulties attending the subject. Hon. members would agree with him that it was extremely desirable for the residents of every country to preserve untouched and unimpaired those maxims of law which were of general application. There was a general maxim which had prevailed in Europe from the earliest times, from the time of the first establishment of the Roman law, which was, Mobilia sequuntur personam. It was in consequence of that maxim that the question of the rights of succession fell naturally within the jurisdiction of the courts of the country where the testator was resident at the time of his death. That was an universal rule in all countries in civilised Europe, and accordingly they claimed of us, and we conceded to them, that the courts of the country should determine on the rights of succession to, and the distribution of, personal estate of persons dying in that country. It necessarily followed that those courts had a right to determine questions of intestacy. Now, if there was a general consent to withdraw that right, as proposed by the Bill of his hon. and learned friend, then there would be no objection to it. But whilst there was a want of this common consent, he should hesitate very much to make England the exception. What Sir F. Kelly dilated upon as an inconvenience, was one which his Bill would not, in the smallest degree, touch. The inconvenience was the uncertainty of the law of domicile. He thought what the intention of the Legislature should be directed to was, the laying down of a rule by which questions of domicile should be determined, rather than an attempt to make a departure from that general maxim. Now, while they were desirous of relieving themselves from that inconvenience, and of preventing some cases of hardship which would always accompany the establishing and abiding by a general rule, let him beg of them to observe some of the evils which their exceptional legislation might introduce. Suppose a person died in France, possessed of personal property in both countries, that he had £20,000 in the French funds, and £20,000 in the English funds—the result would be, that they would be claiming a right to give effect to a will operative under their exceptional law, but of no validity at all according to the French law. The French tribunal would insist upon the distribution of the property as if there were an intestacy. There would be ten times the difficulty, ten times the amount of inconvenience, by their departing from an universal system in attempting to set up a peculiar rule of their own. He had been earnestly desirous to see rules of procedure and rules of administration made common to us and the other nations of Europe, now that the interchange between the countries of Europe was so easy, so rapid, and so general, and that the decisions of the Courts of one country might be accepted by the Courts of another. But if we set up our own peculiar law in opposition to the general law, we should interpose a great obstacle to the attainment of this end. It was not the wish of the Government for one single moment to withdraw this question from the consideration of the House, but he trusted they would treat it on general principles. Unless they improved not only the jurisprudence of this, but of other countries, they would only increase the mischief.

Mr. SLANEY asked if the Bill would have the effect of putting the law of England in direct opposition to the law of other countries, because if a man died in France his property, according to the law of that country, would be distributed in certain proportions.

Sir F. KELLY did not contemplate interfering in any way with the law of any foreign country. If an English subject made a will, and an English court of competent jurisdiction granted probate of it, the French courts, for instance, would give it full effect. That was the rule of most other countries, by what was called the comity of nations. But if the foreign law under any peculiar circumstances would not recognise or give effect to an English probate, the course which he was proposing would not in any way interfere with the administration of the law in that country. The Bill only contemplated dealing with property locally situated within the jurisdiction of our own courts. The question raised was not one of law, but of policy, with regard to which every hon. member was competent to form an opinion. The case was this. Suppose a gentleman made a will in this country, by which he divided amongst his daughters his personalty, amounting, say, to £20,000 or £30,000, his son being provided for by a real estate of £20,000 a year. Now, suppose that that gentleman went abroad on account of his health, with the intention of residing permanently in a southern climate—as the law stood, the will would be set aside, being in the English form and the testator having lost his English domicile. The heir-at-law would thus take not only the real estate but the personalty. The object of the Bill was to remedy that state of things.

Mr. BOWYER regretted that the approval of the Attorney-General had expressed of the Bill was only a modified one. The only objection to which the measure was really open was, that it did not go far enough. He hoped it would be enacted, that, if a document was executed according to the lex loci it should be valid everywhere; for if they did that, they would at once dispose of at least two-thirds of all the difficult questions that arose with regard to domicile. At the same time, it would be very convenient and desirable to give English subjects abroad the option of executing their wills either according to the lex loci, or in the English form. As matters stood no one was safe who did not follow the example of Lord Brougham, and execute a will in both forms.

Leave was then given.

CONVEYANCE OF LAND FOR CHARITABLE USES.

Mr. ATHERTON, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the mortmain law relating to the conveyance of lands for charitable uses, observed that the measure related to lands which had been devoted to charitable or religious uses, and to those which might hereafter be devoted to such uses. The hon. and learned member, after referring to the evils which existed previous to the passing of the Mortmain Act, said the main object of that Act was to prevent those death-bed bequests of lands to charitable and religious uses which prevailed in the earlier mortmain times. That Act provided that no land should be dedicated to charitable uses except by deed, and with that part of the law he did not propose to interfere. Lord Hardwicke's Act imposed certain restrictions with reference to the dedication of land to these purposes by deed — to conveyances to charitable trusts made upon a full and valuable money consideration—and to transfers made without a money consideration. These two dedications stood on a very different footing; and in this view he was supported by the recommendation of the committee which sat in 1852. He proposed to make a distinction between deeds already executed and deeds hereafter to be excuted. With respect to any past deed he proposed to dispense with the provision that it should have been executed in the presence of two witnesses—that it should have been inrolled within six months after its execution—and that the deed should be without reservation, trust, or agreement, for the benefit of the grantor or person claiming under him. But he proposed to make it a condition that deeds already executed should have been, or should hereafter be, inrolled within twelve months after such execution. It was of great importance that there should be some means of ascertaining how much land had been withdrawn from circulation, if the term might be used, and dedicated to charitable purposes, and also the object and nature of the trusts created. With respect to the conveyance of lands without valuable consideration, he proposed that the deed should be executed twelve months before the death of the grantor. He also proposed to dispense with certain requirements under the Mortmain Act, and to allow a conveyance of land to charitable uses to be good, although it might contain the reservation of a nominal rent, of minerals, of an easement in favour of the grantor, and some other conditions of a similar nature. One object of the Bill was to enable deeds already executed and not inrolled to be, under certain restrictions, subjected to that formality. In fact, the title to many charity properties was in a very unsettled state, through the non-compliance with the statute of Geo. II. These titles it was desirable to clear, and the clearance was therefore one of the objects of the Bill. Such were the main points of the Bill which he now asked the leave of the House to bring in.

Leave was given to bring in the Bill.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES BILL.

Mr. WHITESIDE opposed the third reading. He was quite sure the Attorney-General could not be aware of the injustice the measure would perpetrate. The object was not to reconcile any conflict between the Bankruptcy Court and the Court of Chancery, but to enable the shareholders in the Tipperary and British Banks to get rid of their liability. Under an old Act of the Irish Parliament every shareholder in a joint-stock bank was liable to the whole extent of his property. When the Agricultural Bank of Ireland failed some years since, Sir M. O'Loghlen, the Master, decided that the Act applied; and every creditor got twenty shillings in the pound. When the Tipperary Bank failed, the creditors thought they had the same remedy; but the Lord Chancellor of Ireland dismissed the Bill. An appeal against that decision was now pending in the House of Lords, and a petition had been presented to the House by these appellants, praying that their existing rights might not be interfered with. He hoped that if the Attorney-General determined to proceed with the Bill, he would at least insert a clause to exempt Ireland from the operation of it.

Mr. MALINS said that the Bill before the House was founded in justice and common sense, and he was surprised to hear that any one opposed it.

Mr. BAGWELL contended that the Bill would cut off the creditors from their just rights. In the case of the Tipperary Bank he thought it was a gross robbery.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in answer to a question from Mr. Spooner, said the Bill would not affect the appeal of the creditors of the Tipperary Bank in any one particular. If they chose to give up their right of appeal, they could do so; if they chose to prosecute it, there was nothing in this Bill to prevent them.

The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

Thursday, June 11.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

The House went into committee on this Bill.

Mr. AYRTON suggested the insertion of some general clause, providing that shares in all companies should be transferred by an instrument in writing, not a deed.

Mr. LOWE said the Bill was strictly limited to the case of joint-stock companies which had come in under the Act of last year. Such a provision as had been suggested could not, therefore, properly be introduced into the present measure. The subject, however, should receive his attention.

The Bill was reported without amendment to the House.

PRIVATE BILLS.

(From a Correspondent.)

The last week has been a revival of the old times of 1846. Twenty committees were sitting at once, and in all directions solicitors and their clerks were to be seen rushing about the lobby, searching in vain for their counsel; and as it generally happens in times of extreme pressure, a learned gentleman who was wanted in room 20 was addressing a committee in room 1, and his junior in the case was addressing a committee in room 15, and the committee in room 20 was impatient; and, in fact, there was a perfect chaos as regarded business. Still, things always come right somehow, and the business is got through before the end of the session.

The great broad and narrow gauge fight between the Southampton, Bristol, and South Wales Company and the South Western is over, the latter company having succeeded in beating their opponents. Our readers will remember that the Southampton, Bristol, and South Wales Company endeavoured to get power to extend the broad gauge from Salisbury to Southampton. Twelve days have been occupied in the contest, and to the surprise of all parties the committee decided against the broad guage without calling on the South Western Company for their reply. A very important decision was given by this committee as regards the proof of the bona fides of the subscription contract under the 121st Standing Order. The usual practice has been for the opponents to call the subscribers and examine such of them as they suspect of having lent their names without paying their money, and by this means to impeach the contract. The South Western Company however, did not take this step, but they gave notice to the chairman, Sir John Mill, that he would, on cross-examination by their counsel, be questioned as to the contract, and warning him to produce all books and papers necessary. Sir John Mill, however, did not do so, and after the point had been argued by counsel on both sides the chairman decided that the promoters of the new line should put some of the directors into the box to prove the general bona fides of the subscriptions, and that the opponents might cross-examine them. This course was pursued, and the decision will, no doubt, be used as a precedent on future occasions.

The preamble of the North Level (miscalled last week the North Leeds,) Drainage Bill is declared proved, with a slight exception, after a protracted fight; and the case will be finally settled on Monday, in all probability; when the Committee will commence on the Norfolk Estuary Bill.

The Committee on the Kent Group have granted a small piece of territory to the East Kent at starting, by passing the Herne Bay and Faversham line; and now that Company and the South Eastern are fighting hard for the independent line from London to Rochester.

In the Liverpool Room, the Mersey case is concluded, and the "Birkenhead Docks Construction" Bill is being heard. No decision can be expected for several days.

The Lancaster and Carlisle and North-Western battle, which, as was before stated, is a contest between the Great Northern and North-Western Companies, is still raging fiercely.

The Mid-Sussex Railway Bill has been passed by Sir John Trollope's Committee. The Report, however, states that out of the subscribed capital—£117,500—the contractor, Mr. McCormick, subscribes £114,000.

The Ely Tidal Harbour case is concluded. The rival parties have come to terms. The Committee have passed the Bill, and will take the Taff Vale Bill on Monday next.

The Tweed Fisheries Bills are occupying no little of the attention of our Northern friends, and the evidence is of a kind which makes one think of mountain streams, and warm, cloudy days.

The fight between the Great Southern and Western, and Midland Great Western Railways of Ireland Companies, does not flag at present, and it is almost a pity that the two companies could not have settled their point of junction without such a ruinous expenditure of ready money, which article, generally, is not found to be a drug in the Emerald Isle. The Redpath Bill (Great Northern Capital) has passed the Committee, and the Company will be enabled to replace the money which they were robbed of. By the bye, some one put an e final to the word "virtù" last week; and your readers will agree that the word, as regards Mr. Redpath, should be kept as distinct as possible from "virtue."

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The English Funds have been firm during the week, and closed this afternoon at an advance of from $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Foreign Securities also show a tendency to improvement. Turkish 6 per cents. have advanced to 96 per cent. for the account. The demand for money is moderate. Neither the Bank of England nor the Bank of France has made any alteration in the rate of discount. The arrivals of bullion during the week have amounted to about £500,000. The demand for silver continues very active both in France and England, for exportation to the East. From the Bank of England return for the week ending 6th June, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £18,785,980, being a decrease of £291,495, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £10,290,649, showing an increase of £258,247, when compared with the previous return. The monthly return of the Bank of France, which was completed to yesterday, and signed, for the first time, by M. de Germiny, the new governor, is considered to be favourable.

The advices from the south of Europe concur in representing that the silk crop has again failed, in an equal degree with last year. Being the sole resource of a large number of persons, great privation will be felt. Special efforts had been made to secure a favourable result by purchasing eggs in the most promising districts, and the loss and destitution is thereby increased. The last advices from China also speak of a failure in the first crop of Canton silk.

At the recent meeting of a deputation of railway shareholders with Lord Stanley, president, and Mr. Lowe, vice-president of the Board of Trade, many very important statements were made. It was stated that the railway property amounts to £300,000,000 and that the average rate of profit is not more than £3 12s. 4d. per cent. It was stated, that in the case of the Chester and Holyhead line, it was required by the Government that an iron tubular bridge should be constructed at a great expense, when a wooden bridge would have been equally serviceable. It was stated, as a matter of great regret, that the plans of Lord

Dalhousie, twelve years ago, were not carried out, which were understood to be the establishment of a responsible board to take cognisance of railways; and Lord Stanley observed that it was obvious the department over which he presided thought so, because the proposition was made by those who were at the head of that department; but he would remind the deputation that when Lord Dalhousie made a proposition to that effect, it met with the most strenuous opposition from the railway proprietors, and he would say that it was not at all likely that Parliament would transfer the power it now possessed to the Board of Trade. He would ask the deputation whether they believed that the railway interest would prefer submitting itself to the control of the Board of Trade, rather than to Parliament. It was replied that railway proprietors did not look at their position in 1857, as they did in 1845. If there were a Board of Trade that took cognizance of railways, it would be a body they could confer with, and one that would be responsible to the country. It might be brought in aid of the Parliamentary Committees, and might exercise a practical control over them. Railway proprietors did not wish to abrogate the authority of the 654 members of the House of Commons, but to adopt some plan similar to that which Lord Dalhousie suggested. Lord Stanley considered that great advantage would result from such a plan. It could by no means be the wish of the Government to deteriorate the property of the railway proprietors, but it could not be denied that whatever deterioration that property had suffered, was mainly the result of unwise conduct on the part of railway companies themselves.

It appears that the extraordinary flow of specie to India and China receives large additions direct from the gold fields. During the month of March, the totals sent from Melbourne included £32,000 to India, and £45,500 to China.

THE TRUSTEES RELIEF BILL.

Lord St. Leonards has introduced into the House of Lords a measure intended to be the complement of that introduced by the Attorney-General into the House of Commons. If fraudulent trustees are to be criminally punished, it seems only just to relieve trustees as much as possible from the consequences of errors into which they may have innocently fallen. No one can deny that the rules of the Court of Chancery often press with great severity on trustees who have committed, technically speaking, breaches of trust, but who have acted uprightly and even carefully, and have had no other wish than to consult the interests of the friends or relations for whom they have consented to act. If such cases could be classed under definite heads, and if it came clearly within the province of Parliament to relax rules which are only the creations of a particular court, it seems in every way desirable that relief should be afforded by statute to trustees placed in such a position. If trustees are not to be paid, and if the office of trustee is to be a private one, every facility should be given that would be likely to induce honourable and wealthy men to undertake the burden. In principle, therefore, the Bill has much to recommend it. Its details will be exposed to much necessary criticism; but as there is small chance of its becoming law this session unless the Government consent to incorporate its provisions with their own Bill, and as no pledge to that effect has yet been given, it is more important to keep before us the general drift of the measure, than to analyse and estimate its several parts. We will endeavour, therefore, to state as briefly and simply as possible what it is that Lord St. Leonards proposes to effect, and what is the nature and extent of the relief which he is prepared to accord.

Let us first take the faults of commission from the consequences of which the Bill would exempt a trustee. They are three:—The first case provided for is that of a trustee who commits a breach of trust without any possible benefit to himself; and yet, when in the result there is both a profit and loss, finds himself bound by the rules of equity to bear the loss, and receive no compensation from the profit. Lord St. Leonards stated, in illustration, the facts of a remarkable case:—A gentleman residing in the East Indies advanced £2,000 on loan to the East India Company, with interest at 10 per cent. The gentleman died, having made a will by which he directed all his property to be converted into money, and the money to be invested, the interest to be paid to his wife during her life. The trustee did not convert the East India Company's bond, but paid the 10 per cent. interest to the widow. The person entitled in remainder, after a lapse of several years, filed a bill against the trustee, calling upon him to repay what he had paid in excess to the widow, and the Court held that he was bound to do so. But it happened, that, at the time when the bond was actually disposed of, it fetched £800 more than it would have done at the time of the testator's death, and yet the trustee was not permitted to take credit for this £800, but was obliged to pay it over, together with the sum representing the excess of interest paid to the widow. The Bill, therefore, provides that a trustee, under such circumstances, shall be allowed to set the gain against the loss. It also prevents the remainderman from suing for the excess of interest received on property unconverted, and paid to the person entitled to the life interest, if the remainderman has been cognisant of the fact that the property was unconverted contrary to the directions of the instrument under which it was held: and further, when the remainderman is not cognisant, it permits the trustee to recover the sums he has paid innocently in excess from the persons to whom he has paid them. The second case provided for is that of a trustee who makes a payment under a power of attorney, and finds himself liable by reason of the death of the person giving the power. The Bill annuls the rule which makes him responsible, and declares that he shall not be liable, if at the time of payment he was ignorant of the fact that the person granting the power was dead. Lastly, the Bill contains a provision with reference to the investment of trust money. Generally speaking, trustees are induced to change investments and exceed their powers by the persuasion of those interested in the funds, and yet they are exposed to responsibility for so dong years after the change has been made. The Bill exempts trustees from responsibility if they have given notice to the remaindermen of their intention to change the investment; but it also imposes a very curious additional duty on the trustee, for it requires him to take the opinion of a Queen's counsel actually practising at the Chancery bar as to his power, under the terms of the trust, to make the change; and then, if the Queen's counsel says the trustee is justified, he is so, whether the Queen's counsel is right or wrong in his opinion. The notion of throwing a statutable shield over the blunders of Queen's counsel, while the opinions of stuff gowns are still to have no value but that of good sense and legal knowledge, is so strange, that we are sure Lord St. Leonards will not seriously defend it when his Bill comes to be minutely criticised.

It is one main feature of the Bill to cast upon remaindermen the duty of looking after their own interests, and this appears very conspicuously in the first provision having reference to errors of omission. The obligation to do certain acts, as, for instance, to convert property, is now very frequently cast upon trustees, not by the directions of the instrument creating the trusts, but simply by a rule of equity. The Bill provides that when there is no direction, and the trustee innocently, without fraud, and without benefit to himself, fails to do the act, he shall be protected. By subsequent provisions trustees are relieved from the responsibility they incur by not suing for bad debts, and also from that attaching to them when they fail to call in money on bond, although they have received no positive directions to do so. It is also provided that an executor may bar, as against himself, the claims of creditors who do not send in their demands after his giving such a notice as the Court of Chancery would give if the estate were administered by the Court; and also, that executors shall be at liberty to distribute the whole of an estate, if all rents have been paid and covenants performed, without keeping a reserve to meet the chance of future liabilities. Lastly, the Bill gives trustees a power to obtain on petition, without filing a Bill, a decree of the Court of Chancery upon any point which may arise in the administration of the trust estate.

Such is the outline of a measure which deserves respectful attention, as coming from so great a legal authority, and from a person who has been Chancellor in two countries. We do not wish to examine the merits of its several provisions until there is a prospect of the Bill passing, in some shape or other. But, as a general criticism, we cannot help feeling that there was much truth in a remark made by the Lord Chancellor, that the better way would be to define those duties of trustees which they could be justly called on to fulfil, and then hold them bound to the performance of those duties—not to cast a burden on them by law, and then indemnify them by law if they fail to bear it.

THE STATUTE LAW COMMISSION.

Among the many projects of Law Reform of which the English public has lately heard so much, there is none that appears in so unpromising a condition as that which relates to the consolidation of our Statute Law, at least if one may form a judgment from the published Reports of the Commissioners. Their third Report has just made its appearance, and is about as unsatisfactory a performance as we have seen for a very long time. It consists of little more than five pages, including nearly half a page which is occupied with the names of the Commissioners, and yet it is long enough to chronicle the failure or indefinite postponement of many of the schemes deliberately adopted by the Commissioners, and published in their two former Reports, while it does not record the success of one. The Commissioners inform us that they have found it expedient, on further consideration, to modify the plan of consolidation proposed in their Report of July, 1855. Accordingly, we find that the Bill for the consolidation of the statutes relating to the National Debt, which was drawn, and subsequently "revised and completed," by Mr. Anstey, and the Bill prepared by the same gentleman for consolidating the Statute Law relating to Prisons, have both been postponed or abandoned. Mr. Lonsdale having been made a county court judge, we are told that five other gentlemen were intrusted with the work originally assigned to him; the result being the eight Bills relating to indictable offences, which were laid on the table of the House of Lords by the Lord Chancellor at the end of the session of 1856. It is stated that these Bills had been revised and settled with great care by Lord Wensleydale, the late Chief Justice Jervis, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, and Mr. Greaves; but the Commissioners now tell us, that, on again revising these Bills with a view to their introduction into Parliament in the present session, they have been "led to modify to a certain extent the views which they entertained when they first gave instructions for their preparation." In other words, the labours of Mr. Lonsdale, for which they took credit in their first Report, of the five other gentlemen who have since endeavoured to discharge the duty which, single-handed, he undertook, and of the four distinguished persons who finally settled these Bills, are to end in nothing, because the Commissioners have discovered at the last moment that they have been proceeding upon a wrong principle. This important discovery is, that improvement in the Statute Law must accompany consolidation — "not improvements which are the subject of any differences of opinion, or would raise any discussion, but merely remedying such defects as may be said to be accidental." How it could have taken so many years to arrive at such a conclusion, or why the labour of so many able men should have been thrown away because it was not arrived at sooner, will be a mystery to all but those who have been accustomed to watch the proceedings and read the Reports of these astute Commissioners. The notion of consolidating, and thereby perpetuating, the obvious blunders and defects of our statutes, as well as the enactments which it was the manifest intention of the Legislature to pass, is so absurd, that it is hard to understand how such men as Lords Lyndhurst and Brougham, and others whose names appear appended to these Reports, could bring themselves to avow it, much less to offer it as an apology for such a waste of public time and money.

Another and very different kind of excuse is pleaded for not having presented to Parliament Mr. Wingrove Cooke's Bill for consolidating and amending the Copyhold Commissioners' Acts, which was prepared by that gentleman more than two years ago. In this case, it has been deemed expedient by the Lord Chancellor to "effect certain desired amendments of the law by a short separate Act, which should afterwards be incorporated by consolidation with the other Acts." Curiously enough, Mr. Cooke was the only gentleman of all those originally employed, whose commission, in express terms, extended to amendment; and, therefore, we presume, on the score of a rigid consistency, the Commissioners thought it proper to confine him to the most scrupulous consolidation, having already found fault with the works of other gentlemen who were instructed merely to consolidate, because they did not do something towards amendment.

Mr. Rogers's Bill for the consolidation of the statutes relating to masters and servants, which the report of 1855 told us had been revised and completed, and was then "under consideration," is now, after a lapse of two years, "in an advanced state of preparation"! The Bills consolidating the statute law relating to landlord and tenant, ecclesiastical and collegiate leases, and stamps, are also still under consideration; and thus, in short, not one of all the projects for consolidation, which were so magniloquently enunciated in 1855, has yet resulted in the passing of a single Bill through either House of Parliament.

We are bound, however, to admit, that, whatever deficiency this new Report has disclosed as to the performances of the Statute Law Commissioners, it abounds, like both its predecessors, in promises of future achievements. Though not one of all the Bills, about which the Commissioners have been labouring for years, has passed into law, nothing daunted by past failures, they have issued instructions for the preparation of eleven new Bills on Mercantile Law; while thirty new Bills on the Law of Property have been actually drawn and delivered by the draughtsmen; in addition to which numerous other Bills on various subjects have been prepared under the sanction, if not by the express direction, of the Commissioners, and at the cost of the public.

It is greatly to be feared that such proceedings will have little other effect than to increase the evils which they were intended to remedy. How it could be otherwise it is difficult to imagine, when it is borne in mind that the Commissioners, who are supposed to direct and revise all these efforts towards consolidation, have not themselves arrived at any fixed principles on the subject. After the appointment of so many Commissions and Special Committees, and the publication of so many Reports and Blue Books—the present Commission having been at work for two years, with the assistance of Mr. Bellenden Ker, who had been a paid Commissioner of a similar board for some years before—it is lamentable to find that we have got no further than the notable discovery that obvious blunders should not be incorporated in Bills prepared with the view of consolidation; and it is equally grievous to learn that nothing has yet been actually accomplished beyond the expenditure of large sums of money, with the expectancy of a vast addition of Acts retaining many of the faulty characteristics of those which they are designed to supersede.

All the efforts which have been hitherto made have been too purely empirical; and so long as the task of consolidation is intrusted to the hands of the present Commissioners, we cannot anticipate any marked improvement in this respect. Indeed, we regard with more than suspicion a list of such distinguished names as we find included in this Commission. It is, no doubt, very imposing to have such an array, and it may be considered a satisfactory answer to all gainsayers; but it is impossible to regard the parade of these high names to such a Report as that now before us in any other light than that in which one looks upon the names which are sometimes to be seen on the prospectuses of bubble companies, where the rank of the directors lends a weight to schemes that otherwise would be likely to meet with nothing but repudiation from the public. If, indeed, this new Report of the Statute Law Commissioners is the production of the Law Lords and other distinguished lawyers whose names are appended thereto, the cause of law reform in England, and especially of that branch of it to which their commission extends, appears more hopeless than ever. But if, on the contrary, their names are merely lent for the purpose of giving sanction and authority to the attempts of a paid Commissioner, or rather, to the undirected and incoherent efforts of his subordinates, it is right that the public should be undeceived before it gives way to despair of accomplishing that which it has been led to suppose has been too great a task for those most able and competent to deal with it.

Legal News.

In the House of Lords this week the Transportation Bill has passed through committee, and may now be looked upon as virtually passed. It vests a very large measure of discretion in the Home Secretary—a step to which it is easy to enumerate objections, but for which we see no alternative. There has been a further debate upon the Divorce Bill, and the activity of the opponents of the measure is not even yet exhausted.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have this week delivered, by the mouth of Dr. Lushington, a judgment which deserves attention as declaring, on the authority of that high tribunal, a principle of professional remuneration, which cannot be too earnestly insisted on, alike in the interest of litigants and of lawyers. In the famous Dyce Sombre case, the proctor supporting the will in the Prerogative Court, and afterwards on appeal, had printed the whole of the proceedings, thereby saving a vast deal of time and trouble to every one concerned in the litigation. The registrar on taxation very properly allowed the charges which would have been legitimately made in case all these voluminous pleadings and depositions had been written. Against this most equitable decision, Mrs. Dyce Sombre appealed to the Judicial Committee, contending that nothing should have been allowed beyond the expense of printing.

Dr. Lushington, in giving judgment, said that "the question was, whether substantial justice had not been done between the parties. So far from there having been any increase of expense by reason of the alteration in the mode of proceeding, the actual expense had been much less. However objectionable it might appear to allow charges for work not actually performed, yet the result of disallowing them would be, that the proctor would be deprived of his fair remuneration for all his time, pains, and labour. It is well understood that charges of this kind are not merely the pay for the particular work or labour to which they are allotted, but they are the proctor's remuneration for the general conduct of the case—for his time and his trouble, for becoming, as he must be, perfect master of the case in its minutest details. He must make himself acquainted with all the points of the case, and be prepared to answer any question which his counsel may put to him."

Now, we do not think that a fairer or clearer statement could have been made, either of the duty of a professional man, whether proctor or solicitor, concerned in the conduct of an important cause, or of the principle of remuneration which should be applied in the taxation of his bill of costs. We do hope that this declaration of the opinion of the Judicial Committee will not be without effect, both upon the public mind and on the future deliberations of other judges who have not hitherto shown themselves sufficiently impressed with the justice and the importance of the rule thus laid down. We have frequently pointed out, that, under the old practice, the allowances to solicitors in Chancery were substantially adjusted on this principle. It might certainly occur, that, if the same standard were indiscriminately applied to all cases, the solicitor would sometimes receive remuneration beyond what the difficulty of the particular suit warranted; but even then it might be contended that one easy suit was counterbalanced by another of great labour and complication; and that, on the average of causes, the skill and industry expended by the solicitor were by no means overpaid. But in anxiety to obviate a possible injustice to the suitor, the judges have certainly inflicted a positive injury upon the practitioner. Under the new scale of Chancery costs, it has been abundantly provided that there shall be no risk of over-payment in any case; but very insufficient precaution has been taken against the equally pernicious evil of under-payment. If the fees allotted to the successive steps of a proceeding which is permitted to run its course are barely adequate to remunerate those who have the conduct of it, nobody can expect that solicitors will actively exert themselves to abridge or simplify litigation, and thus still further to reduce the charges which they will be authorised to make. The substitution of printing for copying voluminous documents is only one of many expedients which may occur to a skilful and experienced practitioner for placing his client's case in moderate compass and in the clearest aspect before the Court. Another example of the same kind was the analysis of evidence prepared by the attorney for Mr. Wooler, on his client's trial for murder, which we know, on the authority of the counsel, was of most material assistance to them. In both these instances the Courts have emphatically recognised the principle of encouraging the exercise of skill and judgment by adequately rewarding it. We trust that the words of Lord Campbell and of Dr. Lushington will have their due weight, and that a time will soon come when solicitors will not be visited by the taxing officers of any court with heavy penalties for every manifestation of ingenuity, of superiority to routine, and of regard for the convenience of judges, and for their clients' real interests.

Some of our Irish contemporaries lately expended a good deal of eloquence in celebrating the obsequies of Mr. Robert Holmes, a venerable ornament of the bar, who was reported to have died in London, at the ripe age of ninety-two. Mr. Holmes, it appears, is not dead, but in the enjoyment of excellent health; and he has lived to witness, besides many other striking scenes, the solemnities in honour of his own decease. As the late Sir Charles Napier counted his two deaths, so Mr. Holmes, when he reaches the world of spirits, will have to boast that his funereal games have been twice celebrated. This eminent lawyer has had an opportunity of understanding what is meant by the phrase "contemporary posterity," which, we believe, is of very modern origin. If any fact has been incorrectly stated by his biographer, he will himself have an opportunity of setting it right; and thus, when he does really die, he will carry with him into the shades the exact words of the voice of fame, instead of merely hearing that faint echo of her tones, which alone usually cheers the pale ghost of the illustrious dead. But although the occasion for publishing the facts is rather unlucky, it may nevertheless interest many of our readers to be told that there is now living in London a patriarchal Irishman who was called to the bar, in Dublin, at the rather advanced age of thirty, who during fifty succeeding years acquired and preserved the highest professional reputation, and who for twelve years subsequently has dwelt in retirement in this metropolis, in the enjoyment of an ample fortune, and of the remembrance of a career of stern integrity, and brilliant and fairly-earned success.

Mr. Holmes appears to have belonged to the party of the most active and uncompromising foes of Government. Some attempts were made early in his forensic life to buy off his opposition at the price of a silk gown, but this offer he refused, both at that time and afterwards, when he had attained at the outer bar a place more distinguished than any which the Crown had power to confer. There were at the Irish Bar many Queen's Counsel, but only one Robert Holmes; and if we are to credit our contemporary, the Evening Freeman, he left no equal, nor has his match in power arisen since. We trust, however, that this description of Mr. Holmes, as the sole relic of an age of greatness, is only one of the rhetorical embellishments proper to the supposed occasion. But if it be true that no rival has yet appeared to dispute pre-eminence with this famous advocate, it may be worth his while just to consider whether it would not be wise to die at once, while all men are saying with one voice that they shall never see his like again. At any rate, if he were to depart life now, he would be sure to enjoy in the columns of the Evening Freeman what Pliny calls the last finish of prosperity, laudator eloquentissimus, and we should certainly take care to transcribe the oration into our own columns, and thus add our own humble note to the trumpet tones of fame. The full-hearted panegyric of our contemporary, although somewhat precipitate in its utterance, is honourable alike to the author, to the audience, and to the subject of it. The last Irish marvel was the story, very generally believed, that John Sadleir was alive, in defiance of the Coroner for Middlesex. Now our metropolitan county has its revenge, for it can produce Mr. Robert Holmes, able to read the history of his own life, actions, and decease in the columns of the Irish newspapers.

We believe that the announcement of the nomination of Mr. J. Hope Shaw, of Leeds, to fill the vacant place in the council of the Incorporated Law Society, will be received with general satisfaction both in town and country. It is very desirable that provincial solicitors should assist in the deliberations of the council, and also that the Law Institution should be made in every way the means of promoting that perfect understanding and harmony of action among the profession everywhere, which, we believe, will best secure the general good of all practitioners.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.—JUNE 15.

Mansell v. The Queen.

The plaintiff in error, Thomas Mansell, had been indicted for murder at the last Maidstone Assizes, before Baron Bramwell, and found guilty on that indictment. He then brought a writ of error into the Queen's Bench, but that Court disallowed the errors assigned, and confirmed the conviction. Having obtained the fiat of the Attorney-General, the prisoner brought another writ of error into this Court, in order to have the decision of the Queen's Bench reviewed; and the record having been transferred into this Court, the prisoner was brought up for the purpose of assigning errors upon it.

Mr. F. Russell appeared for the prisoner, and Mr. Welsby for the Crown.

A short discussion took place as to the proper course to be pursued in the assignment of errors in criminal cases, the result of which was that the Court directed that errors should be formally assigned by the prisoner this day, that the papers should be delivered to the judges on Thursday, and that the argument should take place on the following Tuesday.

The prisoner was accordingly remanded until Tuesday, the 23rd instant.

APPLICATION FOR RENEWAL OF AN ATTORNEY'S CERTIFICATE.

Sir F. Thesiger applied on behalf of Mr. Emanuel W. Violet for a renewal of his certificate to practise as an attorney. He had practised for twenty-nine years in the neighbourhood of Bristol, but in 1849 he got involved in pecuniary difficulties, and was obliged to avail himself of the Bankruptcy Court. His affairs were there inquired into at considerable length, and the investigation resulted in his being imprisoned by Mr. Commissioner Law for sixteen months for a breach of trust. After he obtained his liberty, he entered the service of Mr. Phelps, a respectable solicitor, as managing clerk, and his conduct had ever since been most exemplary. The learned counsel then read several affidavits in support of his application, and expressed a hope that the Court would think that Mr. Violet had suffered sufficiently for his offence, and might now be permitted to continue his practice as an attorney.

Mr. Garth, on the part of the Incorporated Law Society, opposed the application, and entered into an account of several distinct breaches of trust of a very serious nature which had been proved against Mr. Violet in the Bankruptcy Court.

Lord Campbell said it was impossible, in the face of these facts, to renew the applicant's certificate. The Court would be very much pleased to extend mercy to him, but it must likewise have mercy for the public, and some consideration for the honourable body of attorneys to whom he wished to be restored. They must look to the honour of that profession as well as to the honour of the bar; and he thought that an attorney found guilty of such fraudulent breaches of trust ought not again to have an opportunity of deceiving the public, and mixing with the honourable members of the profession which he had disgraced.

The other Judges expressed the same opinion.

CROSSE v. DYNELEY.—SENTENCE.

This was a complaint brought by Mr. Crosse, a proctor of the court, against Mr. Dyneley, one of the deputy-registrars, accusing him of being "overbearing and insolent in his demeanour, and inconsistent and unreasonable in his requirements, as well to him personally as to such practitioners generally as were compelled to have recourse to him." The facts of the case have been already reported. Sir John Dodson now delivered judgment. He considered that Mr. Dyneley's conduct was deserving of very serious reprehension. There was not the slightest foundation for the grave charges he had brought against Mr. Crosse, and not against Mr. Crosse only, but against Mr. Decimus Dyke, the Queen's Proctor, and other proctors of the court. It was quite clear that the registry and proctorial matters were, as he said, in a "sad state." Many proctors had sworn, that, when they had business to transact, they were in the habit of inquiring who was the registrar for the week; and if it was Mr. Dyneley, they delayed their business until another registrar took his place. That was a very calamitous state of things. No doubt a great part of the difficulty arose from an anxious desire on Mr. Dyneley's part to do his duty, to be particularly accurate, and so forth; but that feeling, praiseworthy as it was, seemed to have been carried to an excess. The Court could not but accede to Mr. Crosse's prayer—it could not but censure Mr. Dyneley, and admonish him to abstain from such conduct in future. He thought it ought likewise to admonish Mr. Crosse to abstain from such language in future as that he had used to Mr. Dyneley. With regard to the application to condemn Mr. Dyneley in the costs, he could scarcely accede to that request. In the first place, the costs could not be very important; and Mr. Crosse had himself made the first attack. He (Sir J. Dodson) should certainly admonish Mr. Dyneley to be more guarded in his conduct; and if it was repeated, he should be under the necessity of taking more stringent measures.

Mr. Crosse moved, that, as Mr. Dyneley was absent, a monition should issue, directing him to be more guarded in his conduct in future.

The Court supposed that would hardly be necessary; but if Mr. Crosse insisted upon it, a monition must issue.

Mr. Crosse said he felt compelled to insist on the monition.

The Court—If you wish it, you must have it; but it does not show a good spirit.

Mr. Crosse said he had been persecuted, and must persevere.

The monition was ordered accordingly.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—JUNE 15.
(Before Commissioner GOULBURN).

TRADER DEBTOR SUMMONS.

A trader debtor summons came on for hearing, by which the plaintiff, a wine merchant, sought to recover £750 from a person named Guistiniani, and called on the defendant to show cause why he should not enter into a bond, in the usual form, for securing payment of the debt.

The defendant was examined, and stated that he was an agent in this country for the Turkish Government, also a banker and merchant. He was in correspondence with the Minister for Foreign Affairs and Marine at Constantinople relative to the building of a fleet of ten steamers to be fitted out in accordance with the treaty of Paris. An English admiral was to forward to his firm the description of steamers to be built. At first the estimate for the ten was £500,000, but it had been reduced to £300,000 or £400,000. He had lived for about eight months in a house at Twickenham, belonging to Sir Wm. Clay, of which the rent was £750 a year. He had also lodgings at Oxford-terrace, at £150 a year. He was not married. He had a housekeeper at Twickenham. One of the parcels of wine supplied to him by the plaintiff, which was taken as security for a debt, was sent to Oxford-terrace, and was subsequently removed to Twickenham. He would not admit that a bill of his for £7,500 had been dishonoured. His house had long been carrying on a large trade.

Mr. Van Sandau, who appeared for the defendant, assured the Court that he was a man of the highest character and respectability, and there could not be the slightest imputation upon his solvency or integrity.

His Honour said the plaintiff had apparently taken alarm at the way in which the wine had been dealt with; and finding that the defendant was paying rent to the amount of £900, had come to the conclusion that he could not go on long at that rate. The Court would make an order, calling on the defendant to enter into a bond, but would give time for an appeal to the Lords Justices. He hoped the Court of Appeal would lay down some rule which might regulate these courts in the evidence which they ought to hear in these cases. He thought the plaintiff was fully justified in asking for security in this case. The defendant was living in a quasi-palace, at Twickenham, for which he was to pay a rent of £750 a year. He had also a place nearer town, in Oxford-terrace, the rent of which was £150 a year. It was not to be believed that a merchant, as this man professed himself to be, and to have very extensive dealings, did not know what was meant by a dishonoured bill. The order would be that the defendant should enter into a bond within fourteen days, unless it were shown that the defendant was prosecuting an appeal.

SALOMONS v. MILLER (in Error).—The hearing of this cause, on the joint petition of the plaintiff and defendant, has been ordered to stand over till next Session.

SITTINGS AT NISI PRIUS.—On the first day of the sittings after Trinity Term, the Cause List contained an entry, in the Queen's Bench, of 69 causes, of which 22 were remanents, and 24 were marked for special juries—In the Common Pleas, of 86 causes, of which 10 were marked for special juries.—In the Exchequer, of 57 causes, of which 25 were remanents, and 25 were marked for special juries.

CALL TO THE BAR.—Edward Clive Bayley, Esq., of Calcutta, only son of the late Edward Clive Bayley, of St. Petersburg, merchant, was, on June 12th, called to the degree of the Utter Bar by the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple.

BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND).—£2,327 was the total amount of fees received in the Irish Court of Bankruptcy for meetings in 1856, together with the 7*s.* 6*d.* fee on such meetings; and £2,164 was the amount of fees received to the credit of the Bankruptcy and Compensation Fund. £1,004 was the sum received by the Secretary of Bankruptcy in Ireland.

Mr. ROBERT HOLMES.—We are happy to state that there is no truth in the report of the death of Mr. Robert Holmes, the eminent Irish barrister; he is alive and well, and residing with his son-in-law, Mr. Lenox Conyngham, in Eaton-place.—Observer.

RE HUMPHREY BROWN.—The following letter has been addressed to the editor of the Times in reference to the paragraph we extracted from that paper in our last week's number:—

"Sir,—We perceive, with very considerable surprise, a paragraph in The Times of this morning to the effect that the steps taken by Messrs. Linklater, the solicitors to the prosecution, had 'led to the capture of Mr. Humphrey Brown.' We beg to say that Mr. Brown was not captured, but voluntarily surrendered himself yesterday; and to add, that he has had abundant opportunities of escaping had he been anxious to do so, but that under our advice he had from the first determined to surrender. The only reason of the delay has been his desire to be prepared with the required bail (fixed, as you are aware, at a very heavy amount), so that his incarceration might be as short as possible; and this was of the more importance, as Mr. Brown is suffering from an internal complaint which might render a protracted confinement fatal.—We are, Sir, your obedient servants, TUCKER, GREVILLE, AND TUCKER. 28, St. Swithin's-lane, June 12."

Mr. Humphrey Brown was removed to the Queen's Bench Prison on Saturday last, in default of having perfected bail for £8,000, the amount ordered to be given by him. The attorneys for the prosecution have consented to accept eight sureties at £1,000 each, instead of four at £2,000 each, as originally ordered. Mr. Hugh Hill, Q.C., and Mr. Lush, have, we believe, been retained by Mr. Brown for his defence.

REFUSAL OF CERTIFICATE TO A BANKRUPT BANKER.—At the Bristol Bankruptcy Court, on the 15th instant, a certificate was refused to George Worrall Jones, banker, Crickhowell. In his judgment, his Honour (Mr. Commissioner Hill) observed that the Bankrupt Law was not meant to hold out its benefits to persons who systematically set at nought all the safeguards against ruin which honest traders had devised for their own protection and that of their creditors, and which now formed the established usages of commerce. In this case it was quite clear that the bankrupt had neglected these safeguards, and he must therefore now bear the consequences of the conduct he had pursued. His claim to a certificate was disallowed; but, in consideration of his advanced age, and that his services would be required in realising the estate, protection would be granted, liable to its discontinuance on its being shown to the Court that it was no longer deserved. The deficiency apparent on the bankrupt's balance-sheet is little short of £40,000, and the dividend is not expected to be more than 1*s.* 6*d.* or 2*s.* in the pound.—Daily News.

ALLEGED FORGERY BY AN ATTORNEY.—LIVERPOOL, Tuesday.—At the police court to-day, Mr. John Shattock, a solicitor, was brought before Mr. Mansfield, on remand, charged with having forged an acceptance of 36*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* in the name of Messrs. Little and Murray. From the evidence it appeared that the accused was attorney to the prosecutors, and in the course of his professional occupations had on several occasions on their behalf to go to London and other places; that in May last he signed the names of Little and Murray to the acceptance alleged, which was passed into the hands of a Mr. Cole at Bristol, where it was discovered to be a forgery. For the defence it was urged that permission had been given to the accused to attach the name of the firm to the acceptance, the expenses of the accused being larger than could be met by Mr. Little, then in London. The counsel for the defence characterised the prosecution as most cruel and oppressive, inasmuch as the bill had been met, and no person had suffered, and that the object of the promoters was quite vindictive. The payment of the money was admitted by the witnesses for the prosecution, but Mr. Mansfield could not do otherwise than commit Mr. Shattock for trial, and other charges were remanded for seven days.—Daily News.

ROYAL BRITISH BANK.—It will be in the recollection of the public that Mr. Apsley Pellatt, late M.P. for the borough of Southwark, was one of the original directors of the Royal British Bank. It appeared from his examination in the Bankruptcy Court that he was a party to some improper proceedings in connection with the formation of the bank; but he left it in the year 1850, without taking anything from it, and without sharing in the plunder. We understand Mr. Pellatt's case has been considered by the law officers of the Crown; and that, after a full consideration of all the circumstances, it has been determined not to make any charge against that gentleman.—Times.

Mr. Knowles is, it is said, about to resign the office of Attorney-General to the county Palatine of Lancaster, in consequence of his intention to retire from the Northern Circuit.—Times.

Mr. Charles Wordsworth, Mr. Robert Lush, Mr. John Locke, M.P. (the City Pleader), of the Home Circuit, and Mr. Phipps, of the Northern Circuit, have been appointed her Majesty's Counsel.

Charles Cooper, Esq., Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of South Australia, was knighted on June 18.

The Sub-sheriff of Tipperary has proclaimed James Sadleir, late of Clonacody, an outlaw.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

SUCCESSION DUTIES ACT—TENANT IN TAIL IN REMAINDER.

Wilcox v. Smith, 5 W. R. 667.

In this case an important question was raised as to the construction of the 2nd section of this Act, and one which, if it had been decided against the Crown, would have materially affected the revenue arising from the succession duties. The Act came into operation in May, 1853, and the question raised in Wilcox v. Smith was, whether the case of a remainderman, under a will executed prior to that date, but who did not become tenant in possession until a subsequent time, was within its provisions. Kindersley, V. C., held, after a very elaborate argument upon the construction of the statute, that the case was within the language of the 2nd section, and therefore decided in favour of the Crown.

LEASES AND SALES OF SETTLED ESTATES ACT (19 & 20 VICT. C. 120)—PRACTICE.

Re Reedley's Settled Estates, 5 W. R. 649; Re Hooper's Settled Estates, Id. 670; Re Procter's Settled Estates, Id. 643.

The practice under the 37th and 38th sections of this Act still continues unsettled, and we accordingly find a marked difference of procedure in different branches of the Court. The Master of the Rolls (see ante, 518) requires that the consent of a married woman, as provided by the 37th section—at all events where she is the petitioner—should be first taken before a petition under the Act is presented. In Re Reedley's Settled Estates, Kindersley, V. C., appears to have adopted the same view. Stuart, V. C., however, in several instances, has made orders on petitions under the Act, where the consent of the married woman had not been obtained previously to the hearing. His Honour considers that the practice at the Rolls ought not to be followed, inasmuch as it requires a consent to be taken in a matter not before the Court. In Re Hooper's Settled Estates, Wood, V. C., adopted a middle course, by suggesting that the examination of the married woman should be made after the presentation, and before the hearing, of the petition, which appears to us to be a convenient and reasonable construction of the Act. In Re Procter's Settled Estates, Stuart, V. C., after conferring with the Master of the Rolls and the other Vice-Chancellors, ordered that the leases, which it was the object of the petition to enable trustees to grant, should be settled at chambers, without the intervention of any of the conveyancing counsel of the Court, unless it were found at chambers to be necessary or desirable to have such assistance.

EXECUTOR—WILFUL DEFAULT—PLEADING.

Sleight v. Lawson, 5 W. R. 589.

In this suit, which was for administration of the estate of a testator who resided in Jamaica, the bill charged that the personal estate was of a certain large amount, as appeared by an inventory made by two of the executors, and that, when realised, the amount produced was more than sufficient for, but that the whole amount was not applied in, the payment of the testator's debts and funeral and testamentary expenses; and further, that, if the particulars mentioned in the inventory had not been realised by the executors, they had been guilty of wilful neglect or default. The prayer was for an account of the personal estate received by the executors, or which, but for their wilful neglect or default, might have been received, and of the application thereof. There was no allegation in the bill as to any particular instance of wilful default, and Wood, V. C., therefore refused an inquiry as to wilful default. "In this case," said his Honour, "there was a general charge in the bill that the defendants had received assets, and that, if they had not received them, then that the defendants were guilty of wilful default—not calling their attention to any one particular item. Some particular item, such as 'slaves' or 'sugar,' ought to have been pointed out upon which to ground the inquiry, and the attention of the defendants called to it. At the same time, it was not necessary that the plaintiff should actually establish wilful default at the hearing, or else have his bill dismissed." This decision proceeds on the principle that the bill is distinct notice to the defendants of the case which they are called upon to meet, so that they may be able to shape their defence accordingly. The same principle finds frequent illustrations in the reported cases, especially where the bill charges fraud, breach of trust, or wilful default. In such cases vague general allegations are most likely to be made, and would be unjust towards the defendants, if, upon such allegations, courts of equity were to leave defendants at the mercy of such evidence as the plaintiff might manage to get up before the hearing of the cause. In suits where wilful default is charged against executors, Lord Eldon laid down the rule in terms similar to those in which V. C. Wood stated it in the present case—"You must not only allege a case for such an inquiry, and must pray for it, but you must prove at least one act of wilful default." The rule thus stated was generally followed under the old practice; though, since the Chancery Amendment Act, and the consequent Orders, a disposition to modify it has sometimes been evinced by the Court (see Mirehouse v. Herbert, ante, 498). Commenting on Lord Eldon's rule, Knight Bruce, L. J., in Coope v. Carter (2 De G. Mac. & Gor. 292) remarked that a case of wilful default might be alleged, and a prayer founded on it; but the circumstances appearing by admission or proof might only raise a case of suspicion in the mind of the Court as to whether or not an act of wilful default had been committed; and in such a case his Lordship thought that he ought to direct an inquiry, not directly as to wilful default, but upon the results of which he might ground a new order, and at a future stage direct an inquiry as to wilful default. Coope v. Carter, however, is sometimes cited as an authority, that, on further directions, it is not proper to direct such an inquiry; a proposition expressly laid down in two cases decided by Lord Langdale. In Garland v. Littlewood (1 Beav. 527) the bill specifically alleged wilful default, but at the hearing only the common accounts were directed. On the cause coming on for further directions, it appeared from the Master's report that the executors had made wilful default; and yet Lord Langdale held that no inquiry on the subject could then be directed. In Green v. Badley (7 Beav. 274) the bill alleged specific breaches of trust and wilful default against trustees and executors; but, at the hearing, the common accounts only were directed: and there also Lord Langdale would not, upon further directions, direct inquiries with the object of substantiating the charges as to the breaches of trust. The same reason exists for refusing such inquiries on further directions where the pleadings would have warranted them at the hearing, as for refusing them at the hearing where the pleadings do not specifically raise the question of wilful default. If no specific default is alleged, the defendant is not called upon to go into evidence to rebut general allegations, and he, therefore, is entitled at the hearing to resist any relief prayed on the ground of such general allegations; and so, when a decree is made for a common account, the defendant acts upon the footing of such decree; and it has been considered to be improper to allow the plaintiff, while the defendant was performing his duty under the decree of the Court, to go on making up against the defendant a new case, for the purpose of obtaining substantially a new decree when the cause came on for further directions. V. C. Wood's decision in Sleight v. Lawson tends to remove any doubt that might have been thrown upon the rule as stated by Lord Eldon, on account of the remarks of Knight Bruce, L. J., in Coope v. Carter; though it certainly appears to be at variance with the views entertained by V. C. Stuart, as to the effect of the Chancery Amendment Act and the New Orders on the practice of the Court, as stated by Lord Eldon. In Mirehouse v. Herbert, his Honour seemed to entertain no doubt, that, though a decree had been made at the hearing for a common account only, yet the judge in Chambers might so shape his order as to meet the case of wilful default.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

MASTER AND SERVANT—CONVICTION UNDER 4 GEO. 4, C. 34, S. 3.

Re Baker, 5 W. R., Q. B., 623; Exch. 661.

In this case an application was, in the first instance, made to the Queen's Bench for an habeas corpus under the following circumstances:—Baker had been in the service of certain potters, and whilst the contract of service (which was not in writing) was still in force, gave notice to his masters that he should leave; and did leave accordingly. Upon this he was charged before the magistrates, under 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, s. 3, which gives power to a magistrate, on its being made to appear to him that a potter (or other servant of the same kind) has not fulfilled his contract of service, to commit him to prison with hard labour for any period not exceeding three months, and to abate a proportionable part of his wages for such period, or, in lieu thereof, to punish the offender by abating his wages or discharging him from the service. The magistrate found Baker guilty of misconduct by absenting himself from service as above mentioned, and sent him to prison for one month. Upon his discharge, the original period of service being still unexpired, he refused to return to his master, but hired himself to another person in the same trade. For this offence he was again convicted and remitted to gaol for another month. It was now contended on his behalf, that, never having returned to his master's service after the first conviction, no fresh offence had been committed under the Act by his refusing to return, and hiring himself elsewhere. It was, in fact, one continued absence, for which he had been already punished, and, therefore, the case was not within the jurisdiction of the magistrates. The conviction was also impugned because of some defects in its form, which were not entertained by the Court; and as to the main question, they supported the conviction, and refused the habeas corpus prayed for, because they thought, that, when the prisoner was liberated after his first imprisonment, and did not return, there was a fresh offence under the statute; for the prisoner then absented himself unlawfully; he committed a new offence, as he was still liable to serve, and did not return to his service. Accordingly the habeas was refused.

The writ, however, was afterwards issued out of the Court of Exchequer, and Baker was brought up accordingly before that Court, together with a return setting forth his conviction. In support of a motion for his discharge, the same grounds were urged in his behalf as on the previous application to the Queen's Bench. But the counsel in support of the conviction argued for its validity on a ground on which it was ultimately quashed. He drew the attention of the Court to the power given to the magistrate to abate, &c., the wages of the offender during the period of his imprisonment, and he inferred from this that it was meant that during and after such period the contract of service should remain in force. Pollock, C. B., however (with Barons Bramwell and Martin), thought that the insertion of this power made it imperative on the magistrate to adjudicate as to the question of abatement, and that his having failed to do so on this occasion vitiated his conviction. The Chief Baron, however, went much farther, and stated his opinion to be, that it was not the intention of the Legislature in the provision in question that a workman should be sent to prison more than once for not fulfilling his contract; and he added, that he thought it better to express his opinion as to this, as a Bill was in preparation for the amendment of the enactment. "It appears to me," said his Lordship, "to be contrary to the English law, and at variance with the principles according to which that law is administered, that a man should be punished over and over again for a matter which would admit of only one compensation by suit. And I also think that this mode of enforcing labour is about as bad as possibly could be devised. The treadmill is, in my opinion, a very improper instrument for enforcing the labour of the people of England, from day to day, and from month to month." The only dissentient in this Court to the discharge of the prisoner was Mr. Baron Watson, who disposed of the point taken by the other Barons by considering the conviction might be supported under an earlier statute on the subject (6 Geo. 3, c. 25), still unrepealed; that that Act providing for imprisonment only, without saying anything about wages. The prisoner was discharged from custody in accordance with the view taken by the majority of the Court.

ATTORNEY—PRINCIPLE OF HIS REMUNERATION—TAXATION OF COSTS.

Ex parte Marshall (Re Wooler), 5 W. R., Q. B., 652.

This was an application for the review of the taxation of costs, made by the Master of the Crown office, in the late prosecution of Mr. J. S. Wooler for poisoning his wife. And the case is important, because it elicited from Lord Campbell a strong and satisfactory expression of his well-known opinion as to the principle on which an attorney's remuneration should be regulated—viz. in proportion to the skill and labour he has bestowed. The question came before the Court upon a rule calling on Wooler to show cause why the taxation should not be reviewed—such taxation having been made on a different calculation—viz. by the length of the documents charged for, and by that alone. It appeared that Wooler, on being apprehended on the above charge, had retained Mr. Marshall (an attorney at Durham) to defend him; and, for the purposes of the defence, it became necessary to prepare an analysis of the evidence of the prosecution, showing its inaccuracies and inconsistencies. This task was accordingly undertaken by Mr. Ford (one of the firm of the London agents of Mr. Marshall), and was accomplished by him after a week's hard labour. When finished, it extended to more than 800 folios, and materially served the purposes of the defence. The bill of costs delivered to Mr. Wooler contained an item of 31*l.* 18*s.* for drawing the above analysis, calculated at the rate of one shilling a folio; but the Master would allow only 4*d.* a folio, and consequently taxed off about £21. Some correspondence on the subject took place between the parties; and an application was made at Chambers for a review of the taxation; which was refused by Mr. Justice Erle, because he thought the Court ought to say whether an attorney who brings great skill to bear upon his client's case is to be remunerated as if it were a common item. Ultimately, the attorney for Wooler gave notice that he intended to apply to the Court for a review, but in the meantime demanded and accepted the payment of the sum for which the Master had given his allocatur. As the event turned out, this was a most injudicious step; for though it was urged in support of the application for a review, that the money found due by the allocatur had been received "without prejudice," the Court held, that, the money having been paid, the matter could not now again be opened up. Lord Campbell, however, said—"I regret that we must discharge this rule, because I think an attorney ought not always to be paid according to folios, but that he should be remunerated according to his skill and labour bestowed upon the case." The rule was discharged without costs.

CORONER'S REMUNERATION—INQUEST "DULY TAKEN," MEANING OF—SUPERINTENDENCE OF JUSTICES.

Reg. v. Justices of Gloucester, 5 W. R., Q. B., 655.

This was an application by the coroner of the county of Gloucester to be allowed his fees for holding two inquests—one on the body of a woman found dead in her house; the other on the body of a child scalded to death. It appears that the personal remuneration of coroners depends upon 25 Geo. 2, c. 29, by which the fee of 20*s.* is directed to be paid to him when an inquisition is "duly taken;" and upon 7 W. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 68, by which he is to be paid a further sum of 6*s.* 8*d.* "for every inquest holden by him on the justices passing his accounts as correct, over and above any sums he may have expended." There is also the case of Reg. v. Justices of Kent (11 East, 229), which decides that (with respect to the fee payable under the statute of Geo. 2) the justices are the proper persons to decide whether or no the inquest is "duly taken" in any particular instance. In that case the magistrates had disallowed the fee, because it appeared that the inquisition had been taken in respect of the death of a man who died suddenly, but (as the jury returned) by the visitation of God; and this, though the coroner had been called on by respectable inhabitants of the place to execute his office before he interfered. But Lord Ellenborough said, that there were many instances of coroners having obtruded themselves into private families, to their great annoyance and discomfort, without any pretence of the deceased having died otherwise than a natural death (which was highly illegal); and that the justices were the persons to judge whether in any particular instance the inquisition had been duly taken; and that, there being no ground to suppose they had exercised their judgment as to the inquest in question with any undue bias, the Court would not interfere with their decision. And this ruling was afterwards (and since the passing of 7 W. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 68) reconsidered and upheld by the Court in the case of The Queen v. Justices of Carmarthenshire (10 Q. B. 796), in which Lord Denman delivered an elaborate judgment, the effect of which was to throw upon the justices the duty of deciding in every instance whether the coroner was entitled either to his fee of £1 under 25 Geo. 2, c. 29, or to his additional fee of 6*s.* 8*d.* under 7 W. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 68. But according to this judgment the repayment to him of sums he has paid to witnesses, experts, and others is not dependent upon the inquest being "duly taken"—i. e. taken not merely according to due form of law, but under such circumstances as made it proper that it should be taken. The concluding observations of Lord Denman are well worth attention—"All temptations to hold inquests unnecessarily are removed by making the coroner's own remuneration depend on the decision of the justices, formed on an examination of all the circumstances. But those who obey his authority, as they must do, in giving their attendance, and taking part in any inquest, have their remuneration certain; while, if he errs through inconsideration or officiousness, he is not punished to such an extent as might tend to make him improperly slow in the execution of his office, which might be the case if he held every inquest at the peril, not merely of losing his own time and labour, but, being saddled with all the expenses of the inquiry."

In the present case the justices disallowed the fees of £1 and 6*s.* 8*d.* on both of the above inquests, considering them not to have been duly taken. And the Court of Queen's Bench—adhering to their own previous view, as shown in the two cases we have mentioned, as to the justices, and the justices alone, being the persons to decide whether the inquisition had been duly taken within the meaning of the Act—refused the rule as to the fee of £1, but they allowed it as to the 6*s.* 8*d.* It does not appear from the report what was the ground of the distinction thus made; but from the arguments and dicta in the previous case of The Queen v. Justices of Carmarthenshire, it may be collected, that their reason was that the words in the statute 7 W. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 67, are not on "every inquest duly taken," but on "every inquest held."

It seems to us that the judgment of Lord Denman, substantially adopted by the Court in the case under notice, leaves this matter (doubtless a very important one) upon a satisfactory footing enough. It is very necessary that no obstructions of a vexatious kind should be opposed to the performance of the coroner's duty. But it is scarcely less so that the privacy and grief of families should not be obtruded upon unless in cases where the interests of society require the sacrifice. There cannot perhaps be a better safeguard than the confiding the question as to the coroner's personal remuneration to the justices at sessions. We think, however, that they should have discretion both as to the fee allowed by 25 Geo. 2, c. 29, and the additional bonus authorised by 7 W. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 67. But, as we understand the report of the above case, their discretion would seem to be confined to the fee payable under the former statute.

Professional Intelligence.

Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.

A meeting of the managing committee was held on the 10th inst. The Secretary read his letter to the editor of the Law Times, accepting the Editor's offer to submit the question pending between him and the association to a committee of investigation, and specifying the allegations which the committee understood to be made against them, and requesting to be informed if any were omitted.

The Secretary reported that the letter had been sent on the 21st of May, together with a statement of the proceedings at the last meeting of the managing committee; that, in the Law Times of the 23rd May, the statement of the proceedings had been published, except the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 6th sentences, which had been suppressed; but that the letter had not been published, nor had the Secretary received any answer to, or acknowledgment of, it.

A paragraph in the Law Times of the 30th May was read referring to the letter, and misrepresenting its purport, stating that the Editor had not had time to reply specifically, and expressing a hope that he would have leisure to do so in the following week.

An article in the Law Times of the 6th June was read, commenting upon the letter, which was again misrepresented, repeating, in a varied form, the charge against the managing committee, and demanding a specific reply to such charge; also offering to discuss the details of the evidence by which the Editor was prepared to support the charge in the columns of the Law Times, and afterwards to go to arbitration, before the committee of investigation, upon such facts as were disputed, and upon the general question as to the truth or falsehood of the charge.

It was, therefore, resolved that a letter be written by the Secretary to the Editor of the Law Times, expressing the opinion of the managing committee, that the former letter of the Secretary had been misrepresented, and that if, instead of misrepresenting it, the Editor had permitted his readers to judge of it for themselves, by giving to it, as the committee had requested, the same publicity that was given to the challenge of which it was intended to be a public acceptance, he would, in the opinion of the committee, and, as they thought, of the public also, have acted more in accordance with the principles of justice and fair dealing; and insisting that the former letter of the Secretary was a direct acceptance of the Editor's proposal in its entirety; and concluding by repeating the request that the Editor would nominate the two members of the society whom he desired to place upon the committee of investigation, and that he would give to both the letters the same publicity that he had given to his charges against the managing committee.

A draft circular to the members of the society upon the recently published Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the subject of Registration of Titles was read, and referred to a sub-committee.

Letters were read from the Incorporated Law Society and Mr. Moss (Hull), in reference to costs in criminal prosecutions; also a letter from the Liverpool Law Society, communicating a resolution of the society that it would be highly desirable for the society to give their support and concurrence to the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association in any steps that might be adopted for securing a uniform and liberal scale of costs.

A draft circular, addressed to the Provincial Law Societies, requesting further information with a view to enable the committee to prepare the general scale, and particularly for copies of bills of costs in ordinary cases, as taxed and allowed at the different assizes and sessions, was read and settled for circulation.

A communication from the Liverpool Law Society was read, in reply to the circular of the managing committee on the subject of bankruptcy administration, inclosing an extract from a paper prepared by the society for the Mercantile Law Conference, 1857, and a copy of the answers of the society to the questions of the Bankruptcy Commissioners. The Secretary stated that these papers had been communicated to the Law Amendment Society.

A draft circular to the committee and corresponding members, to accompany the annual report, was read, revised, and adopted.

Mr. Charles Reynolds Williams, of 62, Lincoln's-inn-fields, was unanimously elected a member of the committee.

The following new members have been elected:—

Mr. H. Abbot, Bristol.	Mr. C. Greville, Bristol.
,, W. Brittan, ,,	,, G. Greville, ,,
,, A. Brittan, ,,	,, J. J. Leman, ,,
,, C. Bevan, ,,	,, H. A. Palmer, ,,
,, A. Cox, ,,	,, J. D. Wadham, ,,
,, H. Duplelx, 61, Lincoln's-inn-fids.

The name of Mr. John Ingram, of Brighton, was accidentally omitted from the list of new members sent with the last statement of the proceedings of the committee.

DUBLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)

Exchequer.—Harrison v. Sandes—Etiquette of the Bar.

In this case, the very strict rules enforced by the bar on circuit appeared to have given rise to great inconvenience, and some loss, to a suitor, without any default on his part. The suit was a proceeding on scire facias to revive a judgment, and the case was entered for trial at the Galway Spring Assizes. Unfortunately for the plaintiff, the junior brief had been delivered by his attorney to a gentleman who was not regularly admitted a member of the circuit bar, but was only proposed for it—or, in technical language, was a probationer. In the accidental absence from Court of this gentleman, the case was called on, and Fitzgibbon, Q.C., who was leader in the case, was commencing, in the absence of his junior, to open the pleadings, when counsel for the defendant objected to his doing so, on the ground that such was the exclusive privilege of the junior bar. Fitzgibbon thereupon requested another barrister to open the pleadings, pro formâ, for the absent counsel; but, as the latter was not admitted a member of the circuit, no junior would consent to do so. The case was consequently struck out, and a bill of costs of the day, amounting to more than £50, had been furnished by defendant's attorney. The application now was to set aside a rule that had been obtained to stay plaintiff's proceedings until the costs were paid.

The Court ordered that the rule should be set aside, but without costs, on the ground that the case was prematurely struck out, having been so before the jury were sworn, and therefore before the time at which the services of plaintiff's junior counsel were actually required. The Lord Chief Baron observed, that the plaintiff might very well have opened the pleadings himself, and that, in his opinion, the objection would more properly have come from some member of the bar who was not engaged for the defendant, so that his zeal for the interests of the bar might not have been mixed up with that for the interests of his client.

Criminal Appeal Court—Informations given in Evidence against the Informer.

The Queen v. M'Hugh.

This case came before the Court under the following circumstances:—Condy M'Hugh was indicted, with several others, at the last assizes for the county Donegal, for unlawful confederacy, under the statute rendering such confederacy illegal. The principal evidence against the prisoners was an approver of the name of M'Glynn. The Crown proposed to give in evidence against M'Hugh, as distinguished from the other prisoners, an information made by him when he was inclined to act as a witness for the Crown. For that purpose, the resident magistrate of Glengis, county Donegal, was called, who stated that when the prisoner was in custody he made a voluntary statement to him, after being asked the offence with which he was charged. Shortly after, the prisoner again sent for Mr. Cruise, and stated that he would become a witness. His informations were accordingly written, and an oath administered by Mr. Cruise. The prisoner remained in gaol as a Crown witness. He subsequently refused to adhere to his information, and was then tried along with the other parties. It was argued on behalf of the prisoner, that the information should not be received as a confession, and therefore was not voluntary, and also it being under oath rendered it inadmissible. Baron Pennefather received the evidence, but reserved the point. The case was argued before the Court of Criminal Appeal on the point reserved—namely, whether under the circumstances, as above stated, the Judge properly received the information in evidence.

The Chief Justice pronounced the judgment of the Court, to the effect that the information made by the prisoner ought not to have been received in evidence against him. The trial was therefore illegal, and the prisoner should be discharged.

THE COURT OF DELEGATES.

A Court of Delegates is to the majority of our readers known only as a thing of the past. For a series of years the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—a tribunal which, with all its defects, undeniably comprises a more brilliant array of judges than any other court—has been the Court of Appeal open to suitors dissatisfied with the decisions of the Arches. The "Delegates" are best known to this generation through the humorous descriptions in "David Copperfield," and by means of old editions of "Blackstone."

But Ireland is in many respects behindhand in the march of improvement; and in this among the number. The appeal here lies from the very able judge of the Prerogative Court to an appellate tribunal, compounded of heterogeneous materials, and open to a variety of objections. In ordinary cases, perhaps no sound objection can be urged against the nomination of members of a Court of justice by the Crown. But in a case like that of Wilson, now daily undergoing discussion—where a large sum of money is involved, and where the Crown is one of the parties litigant—there is a manifest impropriety in the ultimate decision being left to a knot of persons selected by the Crown. On the present occasion, this Court consists of two venerable common law judges and two advocates. The latter are undoubtedly men of standing in their profession; but we cannot forget that one of them has just been electioneering on behalf of Government candidates; and that the other has recently been advanced to a well-paid and not over-worked office under the Crown. It would, we think, be more becoming were other hands charged with the task of judging in, Re Wilson, between the Crown and the subject. Another ground of objection is, that the offices of advocate and judge are incompatible; and more especially where the same advocates and proctors practise in both courts; and the judge of to-day appears as a holder of briefs to-morrow.

In taking a cursory view of the Court of Delegates, we were struck not only by the anomalous position of these advocate-judges thus appointed by the Crown, pro hâc vice, to determine whether the Crown be or be not entitled to a vast amount of property, but also by another fact which appeared to us quite inconsistent with the proper constitution of a Court of justice. The office of Registrar of the Delegates Court is filled by Mr. H., second partner in the firm of T., H., & O., proctors; and it so happens that the proctors for one of the litigant parties in this great suit are the aforesaid firm of Messrs. T., H., & O. For the sake of appearances, the name of Mr. H. may very probably be omitted from the proceedings; but this circumstance (if such be the case) cannot really lessen the impropriety of any partnership whatever existing between the officer of a court and a practitioner in that court. That both the officials and the practitioners are upright and honourable men we have no doubt whatever; but the administration of justice should be above suspicion; and we think that it ought to be impossible for judges to receive briefs from proctors, as well as for proctors and registrars to share the profits of any business transacted either in the appellate or in the inferior court.

In the last number of the Journal, we gave a short sketch of the procedure necessary to be adopted in Scotland to obtain a divorce, on the ground of adultery. We now propose to make some remarks on the practical working of the system, and to point out in what respects it appears to be worthy of imitation, and in what respects we think it defective, and capable of improvement.

In the first place, a system of procedure, to be a good one, must be cheap, so as to be within the reach of every class of the community. The expense of carrying through a suit to a successful termination must, of course, vary with the circumstances of each individual case; and all that can be required of any system is, that it does not create unnecessary expense. The Scotch system is not open to objection on this head. A poor man, if he has a "probabilis causa litigandi" (which is judged of by certain legal gentlemen appointed for that purpose), is entitled to sue in formâ pauperis, or, in other words, is placed on the Poor's Roll of the Court of Session. He is then entitled to have the gratuitous assistance of certain counsel and agents, appointed annually by their respective bodies to attend to the cases of the poor. He is excused from paying the fees of court. The sheriffs who take the proof are paid by Government; so that the only expense for which he has to provide is that of bringing up his witnesses for examination, and which would seem to be a necessary expense under any system. We can, therefore, truly say that the doors of justice are open to the poorest; and it is by no means uncommon to find parties suing in formâ pauperis. Indeed, the poorer classes more frequently take advantage of the facilities which the law affords for obtaining a divorce than their richer neighbours; probably because they care less for the exposure, which, to a greater or less extent, necessarily follows in such cases.

The Scotch system of procedure seems also very well to fulfil another requisite of a good system—namely, in the precautions which it takes to exclude collusion between the parties. The oath of calumny, of which we gave the form in our last communication, is administered to the plaintiff by a Judge of the Supreme Court. After which he carefully examines, first, the pleadings, and then the proof, in order to satisfy himself that the case is relevant, and clearly made out.

So far, therefore, the Scotch system of procedure would appear to fulfil the ends for which it was designed; but it appears to us to be open to the serious objection that the witnesses are not examined, nor the evidence led in presence of the Judge who is to decide the case. The mode at present adopted, of taking the proof by commission, and reporting it in writing to the Judge, was in force, until recently, in all cases in Scotland, trial by jury being of very modern introduction; and it has, no doubt, been continued in this particular class of cases from an idea that the details of such cases were not fit for discussion in open court. This may be to some extent true, and may be an evil; but it appears to be an insignificant one compared with miscarriage of justice, which we are quite satisfied must, in many cases, take place when the Judge or jury have not an opportunity of seeing the demeanour of the witnesses when under examination. But the evil might be easily avoided by adopting the course followed in trials for rape in the criminal court; that is, by trying the case with closed doors, no one being permitted to be present but those engaged in the case ex officio, and members of the bar. For ourselves, we should much prefer having the case tried by a jury in open court; but in this we are well aware that we do not speak the opinions of the majority of (more especially the older) lawyers in Scotland, with whom trial by jury in civil cases has always been unpopular to a degree which no English lawyer can understand.

Out of this form of taking proof, other evils of a serious nature arise, from which the system in England will not suffer, since it appears to be taken for granted there that the proper way of trying questions of divorce is before a jury. It is a part of our practice, that, when the action is at the instance of the husband, he is bound to furnish his wife with funds to enable her to conduct her defence; and the Judge, from time to time during the progress of the case, orders such sums to be paid as he may consider necessary for that purpose. The reason for this of course is, that, during the subsistence of the marriage, the husband has, by law, the entire control and disposal of the common funds; and it is but fair, and indeed necessary, for the ends of justice that the wife should obtain a part of them, in order that she may be put in a position to establish her innocence, which otherwise she might be unable to do. As may be supposed, where the husband has to pay for both sides, there are numbers of practitioners ready and willing to undertake the defence of the wife whether innocent or guilty, and such cases accordingly not unfrequently fall into the hands of counsel and agents, who, to say the least of them, are no honour to the profession. It is of course their interest to create as much delay and expense as possible. There is no sufficient power in the sheriffs to compel the parties to lead their proof continuously, or to dispose of questions of law arising upon the proof; or if it exists, it is not exercised; because, as an appeal lies to the supreme Judge, the sheriff, acting as a mere commissioner, feels naturally reluctant to interfere in the conduct of the case, or to undertake responsibility to any further extent than is absolutely necessary. The consequence is, that the witnesses are brought up on diet after diet, and the examinations are conducted at a length, and with a degree of irrelevancy, which would not be ventured upon before a Judge in open court. All this would be put a stop to by a trial in open court before a Judge, either with or without a jury, and the intolerable evils of the present system would be got rid of. There are some minor evils in the course of procedure which might be corrected if any changes were made in the law of divorce, but those above mentioned are the gravest.

Before leaving the subject of divorce, there is one point in it which has given rise to a great deal of discussion in the House of Lords, which, therefore, it may be well to notice; and that is, whether or not the divorced party should be permitted to marry the person with whom the adultery has been committed. The law of Scotland on this point is somewhat peculiar. An old Scotch Act, 1600, c. 20, with the usual brevity for which all our old Acts are distinguished, runs in these words:—"Our Soveraigne Lord, with advyce of the estaites of this present Parliament, deemes all marriages to be contracted hereafter by any persons devorced for their owne cryme and fact of adulterie from their lawfull spouses, with the persons with whom they are declared by sentence of the ordinar judge to have committed the said cryme and fact of adulterie, to be in all time coming null and unlawfull in themselves, and the succession to be gotten by sik unlawfull conjunctions to be unhabile to succeed as heires to their said parents." There is no other Act prohibiting such marriages; but it will be observed, that, by this Act, it is only marriages "with the persons with whom they are declared by sentence of the ordinar judge" to have committed adultery that are declared to be null; and accordingly the sentence pronounced in these cases (the ordinary form of which was previously given) does usually specify the name of the person with whom the adultery was committed. But this is not necessary—the judgment is perfectly good without it, and it is omitted when the parties desire it, and there is then no bar to the marriage of the parties. We have never heard, and are not aware, that the morals of the community have suffered from this laxity of practice.

We shall be happy if the slight sketch which we have given of the law and practice in divorce cases in Scotland shall have furnished any hints which may be of use in the consideration of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, or which may induce some public-spirited man to undertake the reform of our own law on the subject.

SAVINGS BANKS.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—I will now endeavour to show that there is no reason why the national funds should suffer from loss or damage which may occur to savings banks, either through fraud, or by variations in the price of funds; and I will point out a mode in which indemnity against all such charges may be found.

The legal establishment of savings banks dates from the year 1817 (57 Geo. 3, c. 130). The Acts of that and the following year were intended to encourage and support the establishment of savings banks, then new and little known in this country. The Act of 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 92) repealed the former Acts, made further enactments, and more particular and exact regulations. The Act of 1833 (3 Will. 4, c. 14) enabled savings banks to grant annuities. The important Act of 1844 (7 & 8 Vict. c. 83) made various amendments in the previous law. It reduced the rate of interest allowed by Government to 3*l.* 5*s.* per cent. per annum, and fixed the maximum rate to be paid to depositors at 3*l.* 0*s.* 10*d.* per cent. per annum, or 2*d.* per day on £100, leaving to trustees and managers power, with the approbation of the National Debt Commissioners, to make payments to depositors at a lower rate; which power is generally, but not in all cases, acted upon, the object being, that the difference between 3*l.* 5*s.* per cent. paid by Government and the rate paid to depositors be equal to the expenses of management, which vary in different banks.

Under these rules of management a growing charge on the Consolidated Fund accumulates. The Government undertakes to repay, when demanded, the full amount deposited. The Government, or their agents, the National Debt Commissioners, buy stock in the public funds when deposits accumulate, and sell when demand for payment occurs. And it has been found that the occasion for buying operates when the price of funds is high, and for selling when the price is low. To the loss arising from difference in price must be added the broker's charge for buying and selling. In the early years of savings banks it was the national policy to make those establishments favourably known to the people at large by paying liberal interest, and by liberally bearing the risk of buying and selling stock, but it probably was not foreseen how large an amount of charge would accumulate thereby.

Savings banks, with entire Government security, do not now require any such extraordinary support; and I intend to show that depositors are fairly entitled only to such interest as is paid by Government on Exchequer Bills, deducting therefrom charges of management, and loss by fraud or otherwise.

It surely is sufficient advantage to depositors if Government undertakes the management of their money without any charge, except, so to say, costs out of pocket, and pays interest to them at the same rate as to other parties who advance their money to the State.

That the Consolidated Fund, derived from taxes paid by all men according to their degree, should continue charged with the burden, which is, in fact, a bonus upon savings bank deposits, admits no other defence than has in past times been used to justify similar payments as a bonus upon the cultivation or exportation of certain articles. The rate of interest paid on Exchequer Bills is a safe guide—it is liable to variation from time to time, and the charges and losses incurred by management of savings banks vary; therefore the rate of interest paid to depositors should also vary. The annual accounts of savings banks terminate on the 20th of November. The National Debt Commissioners should have power, under the Act of Parliament, with the concurrence of the Lords of the Treasury, to take account of the charges and losses incurred during the past year, and as soon as convenient, say in the month of January following, fix and make known the rate of interest to be paid for the then current year, such rate to be the same as is payable on Exchequer Bills, less a deduction sufficient to make good, as nearly as can be ascertained, the charges and losses sustained in the previous year. And in case it should subsequently appear that the amount of the said charges and losses has been taken too high or too low, power should be given to vary the rate to be fixed in any succeeding year accordingly.

If any mode can be suggested by which the amount of charge and loss can be correctly settled and deducted from interest during the current year, it will be preferable, because more exact. The deduction is not likely to be felt keenly by depositors. The deposits of about four-fifths of the whole number of depositors in savings banks are from under one pound up to fifty pounds. The average of these deposits is probably under fifteen pounds. Suppose the average to be twenty pounds, a deduction from interest, at the rate of five shillings per cent. per annum, would be a charge on each such deposit of one shilling in the year, which, added to the present usual deduction for management, would probably be found to amount to more than sufficient to pay all charges and losses.

Depositors whose deposits do not exceed fifty pounds form the class to whom savings banks are especially valuable, and for whose benefit, as appears by the language of the Legislature, their establishment was chiefly intended. The essential requirements of such depositors are Government security for their small savings, and prompt repayment when required. The question, whether the interest allowed in twelve months on a deposit of twenty pounds be twelve shillings or eleven shillings, is comparatively of less importance.

As it is clear that payment of the additional one shilling will, in the aggregate, form a heavy burden on the Consolidated Fund, the charge cannot be borne by Government without inflicting injury and injustice on the payers of taxes; and I have pointed out a mode in which I think indemnity against such charge may fairly be found.

I am, Sir,

Your most obedient servant, P.

The Lives of the Chief Justices of England, from the Norman Conquest till the death of Lord Tenterden. By JOHN Lord CAMPBELL. In 3 vols. Vol. 3. Murray. 1857.

The third volume of Lord Campbell's "Lives of the Chief Justices" concludes the second of the very remarkable works which he has lived to finish. We are, upon the whole, inclined to think that it is the most successful of his efforts. Two of the three Judges whose lives it contains were the author's contemporaries, and one of them was his intimate friend. He is, therefore, enabled to invest his book with a degree of reality and vividness which adds much to its interest. In writing of men whom he knew, and of times that he remembers, Lord Campbell is saved from the literary sins which most easily beset him, and has an opportunity of exercising the gift of vivid and vigorous perception of the picturesque side of a character which he certainly possesses, notwithstanding his taste for making jokes. He gives us three vigorous portraits of men, each of whom represented one phase of the English judicial character; and, as law is an art as well as a science, our readers, we hope, will thank us for attempting shortly to reproduce their most striking features.

Lord Kenyon was a very clever, very vulgar, and very narrow-minded man, of whom it is hardly too much to say, that, by the help of a bad education and an utter absence of originality and imagination, he acquired a peerage and £250,000. He was born in North Wales, in 1732, and at the age of fourteen was transferred from school to the office of an attorney at Nantwich, where he remained till the death of his elder brother made him heir-apparent to his father's small property, and induced him to try his fortune at the bar. He got into considerable business by acting as "devil," first to Dunning, and afterwards to Lord Thurlow, who, in due time, rewarded him by the Chief Justiceship of Chester, a seat in Parliament for the borough of Hindon, and the Mastership of the Rolls. His career in this prominent position was far from being a brilliant one. He broke down miserably in the defence of Lord George Gordon for high treason, in which he was associated with Erskine, and his highest achievement in connection with Parliament was, that, in order to be able to vote as an "inhabitant" at the great Westminster election, in 1784, he slept for several nights in the stables of the Rolls, which were within the liberties. His services, however, such as they were, were splendidly acknowledged, for he received a sort of promise, that, upon Lord Mansfield's retirement, he should be his successor. The great Chief Justice no sooner heard this than he shut himself up at Caen Wood for two years, steadily refusing to resign, until he received a hint that Parliament would be applied to if he continued to allow his contempt for his successor to interfere with the discharge of the duties of his office. When elevated to the rank of Chief Justice of England, and a peer of the realm, Lord Kenyon seems to have distinguished himself as one of the narrowest, most timid, and most ignorant of the narrow, timid, and ignorant persons whose prejudices and follies were for a time made almost venerable by the panic against the French Revolution. "He never brought forward any Bill for the improvement of the law, nor did he attend to the judicial business of the House of Lords;" and he opposed, in the most puerile way, every liberal measure brought before the House by others. Even in the Court of King's Bench he was always exposing himself. He knew five or six such scraps of Latin as "modus in rebus," "stare super antiquas vias," and "latet anguis in herbâ," which he paraded so frequently, that even George III. advised him to "stick to his good law, and leave off his bad Latin." His severity against what was then considered libellous was monstrous. An unfortunate attorney named Frost having used intemperate and improper language at a coffee-house when far from sober, was imprisoned in Newgate, pilloried, forced to find sureties, and, by Lord Kenyon's special addition to the sentence passed by the other Judges, struck off the rolls of the court. So, too, the publisher of the Courier newspaper was fined £100, and imprisoned six months, for saying that the Emperor of Russia had made himself ludicrous and contemptible by forbidding the exportation of Russian produce to this country. But to our own days, Lord Kenyon's most marvellous manifestation is undoubtedly to be found in his method of dealing with forestallers and regraters. Merchants were actually imprisoned and heavily fined for buying oats in the morning, and selling them at an advanced price in the afternoon—and that by a Judge whom Lord Campbell himself has seen, and who had read Adam Smith. It is due to Lord Kenyon's memory to add, that he had several estimable and some useful qualities. He was extremely honest, and very laborious. He was sagacious and keen in a very high degree, and may, on the whole, be considered as a not unfavourable specimen of the sort of effects which an exclusive devotion to the most technical forms of English law produces upon a narrow but active mind, destitute alike of education and of genius.

Lord Ellenborough was a very different and a far more formidable person than his predecessor, and may be taken as the representative of qualities of a very different order from any which Lord Kenyon could claim, and which perhaps afford a surer and certainly a far more honourable title to success. Edward Law was the youngest of the twelve children of Edmund Law, the Bishop of Carlisle. He was educated at the Charterhouse, and at Peter House, Cambridge, where he obtained high honours, both classical and mathematical. The whole of his character bears the traces of his education. To the end of his life he was distinguished by the bold and somewhat harsh, but manly, just, and upright, qualities which are so often developed and so strongly fostered by the course of education at English public schools and universities. "He used to say," we are told, that, when at the head of the Charterhouse, "he felt himself a much more important character than when he rose to be Chief Justice of England and a Cabinet Minister." Indeed, it is impossible, in reading his life, not to think of him to the last as a sort of captain of the school. "Ellenborough," says Lord Campbell, with all the energy of typography, "was a real CHIEF, such as the rising generation of lawyers may read of and figure to themselves in imagination, but may never behold to dread or to admire." After pleading under the bar for five years he joined the Northern Circuit, and at once entered upon business, owing partly to his pleading, and partly to his local connection. After enjoying the lead there for a considerable time, he rose to fame and fortune by being intrusted with the defence of Warren Hastings, which he conducted with great judgment and success, though he did not in any degree rival the extraordinary eloquence of the managers for the Commons. The distinction thus acquired procured him the first rank in his profession. He became the rival, and, as far as business and reputation went, by no means the unsuccessful rival, of Erskine, and in 1801 was sworn in as Attorney-General. The only one of his efforts in this capacity to which his biographer refers is one which he himself witnessed in his youth: it was the trial of Governor Wall for the murder of Armstrong, a soldier, who was alleged to have died of a flogging which he received under a sentence of questionable legality. The trial took place twenty years after the offence, and ended in a conviction upon what Lord Campbell considers most inadequate evidence. "I should not like," he says, "to be answerable for such a conviction." The Government wished to pardon the prisoner, but were overawed by the fury of the mob, and he was hung in pursuance of his sentence. Soon after this occurrence, Law became Chief Justice, with the title of Lord Ellenborough. His character in some respects was well adapted for the position. By the testimony of men not partial to him, he was one of the justest of mankind, being thoroughly possessed with a strict and somewhat harsh, but inflexible and genuine, desire to carry out the law; but he was arrogant, bad-tempered, and, as a criminal judge and legislator, scandalously severe. He resented, as a wicked and revolutionary measure, the attempt to remove the punishment of death from the offence of shoplifting, and brought in a Bill creating no less than ten new capital felonies. It was, however, in the criminal courts that his most characteristic qualities were displayed. Lord Campbell particularly celebrates his conduct at the trial of Colonel Despard and his associates for high treason; and his career terminated with the trial which ended in the memorable acquittal of Hone, the bookseller.

In the House of Lords, Lord Ellenborough was by no means so distinguished as in the King's Bench. Nothing can exceed the violence of some of his displays there. With the exception of the single Act to which we have referred, no measure of importance could be attributed to him. Indirectly he did something for the reform of the cruelty of the criminal law, as his single legislative effort drew attention to its exaggerated severity. He died in 1818, about two months after his resignation of his office.

Lord Tenterden was a far less remarkable person than his predecessor; in fact, his life presents so little interest or incident, that, with all his power of being amusing, Lord Campbell can only recommend it as a sort of moral lesson. Mr. Abbott was one of the very quietest and most unpretending of human beings. He was an admirably neat and logical pleader, but he never addressed a London jury, and hardly ever succeeded with a country one. He was the son of a barber at Canterbury; distinguished himself at the Cathedral school there, and was sent to Oxford by a subscription from his fellow-townsmen. He had intended to take orders, but was dissuaded by the father of one of his pupils, Justice Buller, who recognised his fitness for law, and quoted appositely, though somewhat profanely, a case from the Year Books, in which it was held, that "it is actionable to say of an attorney that he is a damned fool; for this is saying that he is unfit for the profession whereby he lives; but aliter of a parson, pur ceo que on poet estre bon parson, et damned fool." He rapidly rose into practice as a pleader, and was unobtrusively elevated first to a puisne judgeship, and afterwards to the dignity of the Lord Chief Justice. The same peculiarities which made him a poor advocate, made him a singularly good judge He was so passionless, that his mind was totally free from bias upon any subject. Lord Campbell looks back with a sort of fond regret to the Court of King's Bench as it was in his days. He describes it thus: "Best was succeeded by Littledale, one of the most acute, learned, and simple-minded of men. For the senior puisne we had Bayley. He did not talk very wisely on literature, or on the affairs of life, but the whole common law of this realm he carried in his head, and in seven little red books. These accompanied him day and night; in these every reported case was regularly posted; and in these, by a sort of miracle, he could at all times instantaneously turn up the authorities required. The remaining puisne was Holroyd, who was absolutely born with a genius for law, and was not only acquainted with all that had ever been said or written on the subject, but reasoned most scientifically and beautifully on any point of law that he touched."

Like his two predecessors, Lord Tenterden made no great figure in Parliament. He brought forward one or two Bills for the reform of the law; but his political opinions may be compendiously described by saying that he believed in all that is refuted in Bentham's Book of Fallacies; his fame rests principally on his book on the "Law of Shipping"—almost the first English law book which was written on a better model than that which Lord Campbell happily describes as the process of shaking up a number of detached points in a bag, drawing them out at random, and tacking them together with "so," "but," and "nevertheless."

We have been compelled to do very scanty justice to some aspects of Lord Campbell's book. It is full of amusing gossip and curiously characteristic anecdotes. We will conclude our notice with a story of each of its three heroes. Here is a specimen of Lord Kenyon's learning—"Above all, gentlemen, need I name to you the Emperor Julian, who was so celebrated for the practice of every Christian virtue, that he was called Julian the Apostle." And here one of his eloquence—"This is the last hair in the tail of procrastination, and it must be plucked out."

Lord Ellenborough, on hearing a dull speech in the House of Lords, rose, and went out, saying, "I am answerable to God for my time, and what account can I give at the day of judgment if I stay here any longer?"

Lord Tenterden, when dying, seemed to recover his composure, and, raising his head from his pillow, he was heard to say in a slow and solemn tone, as when he used to conclude his summing up in cases of great importance, "And now, gentlemen of the jury, you will consider of your verdict." These were his last words.

Juridical Society.

This Society met on Monday evening last, Sir J. Stuart, V. C., in the chair, when Mr. W. M. Best read a paper on "The Common Law of England; with an Examination of some False Principles of Law Reform." The following is a short summary of the paper:—

Great are the evils which arise when the needful reforms in the laws of a country are neglected for several generations. A reaction against the whole legal system of the land takes place in the public mind, and both the good and bad which it contains run the risk of being consigned to destruction. Such is the state of England at the present day. Various schools of legal reform have sprung up, with all of which, however differing from each other, it is the established practice to disparage the existing law, and among whom it is an axiom, that the common law is a mere collection of rude customs strung together in a barbarous age. The common law of England has deserved better of her children than this; and the above axiom will be found, on examination, the offspring of ignorance and presumption.

By the common law of England, is to be understood the ancient customary law of the country, which became finally settled about the fourteenth century. It is one of the great fallacies of the day, that there are in Westminster Hall two systems of law antagonistic to each other. Our Courts of law and equity administer the same system, the only differences between them lying in their procedure, and that the former administer strict law, while the latter are supplemental tribunals, which not only have no power to repeal the law, but, in truth, carry its principles into effect by relaxing the operation of the law in certain peculiar cases only where its strictness might work hardship. This accords with the definitions of judicial equity given by Grotius and Lord Bacon.

The substantive law of a country divides itself into three parts—the constitutional law, the civil law, and the criminal law. It is a common fallacious notion of the day that the law and constitution of a country are not intimately connected. They must harmonise with each other, as the most ordinary suit at law may involve a most important constitutional question. And here it is that our system has such an immense advantage over the law of Rome, which had no constitution but the simple relation of sovereign and subject; and it is impossible to deny that our constitution and law, taken together, constitute one of the few systems in the world where strength of government is united with a large amount of personal liberty.

The common law embodies several great principles of sound legislation—viz. that no human law can be perfect, and, therefore, needs alteration from time to time; and this is provided for among us by the unwritten form and consequent expansive power of the common law, and the presence of the Legislature. It is also framed on the principle of the great Athenian legislator, that the proper laws for any people are, "the best that they can bear." The enlarged views of its founders are also visible in their laws against mortmain and perpetuities; its condemnation of contracts in restraint of marriage and of trade; and, what is very remarkable at so early a period, various laws showing a liberal commercial spirit. Another feature is, that the common law is based on the principle that all the members of the community are members of one family; that the law can have no real interest apart from them; and that it is the right and duty of all to uphold and assist in her execution—a strong contrast to the usages of most other lands, and to the maxims of our day, which represent the law as a tyrant, and its enforcement mere matter of police.

Then, with respect to the criminal law. The common law is not a sanguinary code, as generally represented. There were not above twelve or fourteen offences punishable capitally by the common law. About the fifteenth century, the practice began of creating numerous capital offences, and this continued, till, at the beginning of the present century, they amounted to nearly 200. A reaction then took place, and the number is now reduced to nearly what it was at the common law. Whether that punishment might, in the present day, be further reduced, or even abolished, is a question; but this would clearly have been impossible in early times. The arguments against the right to inflict capital punishment are absurd. Those founded on the value and sanctity of human life prove too much, because, if true, life could not be taken to repress the most dangerous insurrection. Capital punishment is the ultima ratio between sovereign and subject, as war is the ultima ratio between State and State; and no instance can be produced of any country which renounced it; for, although Catherine of Russia, the state of Louisiana, and some others, abolished the punishment of death by the ordinary course of law, they did not abolish the right to resort to martial law, or the right to take life for military offences. The statistical papers by which the Society for the Abolition of Capital Punishment profess to show that fewer executions take place in some countries than in England, are therefore imperfect—they should further tell how many times each country has been placed under martial law, and how many lives, guilty and innocent, were sacrificed under it. The argument that the punishment of death is irrevocable, also proves too much; for any punishment may, in the end, be the cause of death. The common law division of offences into misdemeanors and felonies, typifies a distinction existing in the nature of things, and something similar is to be found in the laws of every country—the former simply meaning that a party has misbehaved, the latter an offence inconsistent with the safety of society, and involving forfeiture, not merely of goods, but of social position, and perhaps of existence. Against these latter, the common law waged a war of extermination; but modern legislators, by breaking down, in many instances, the line of demarcation between them and misdemeanors, have destroyed in the minds of the people the old instinctive horror of felony. Now, what were the notions respecting criminal law by which the present age sought to replace the common law? According to some, punishment, not having hitherto extinguished crime, ought to be abolished; according to others, every criminal is ex vi termini insane; others think all crimes result from ignorance—a position true in some instances, but absurd and mischievous when applied to grave violations of natural law. Others contend that it is the duty of the law to reward as well as punish; but the true reward of obedience to the law is the protection it affords. Other fallacies are, the making the reformation of the criminal who has broken the law the primary, and the safety of those who have not broken it the secondary, consideration. The practice of assuming the law to be a tyrant, and the criminal a martyr, has vested a most unconstitutional power in the Secretary of State, who considers himself justified in trying every criminal cause over again in his office, on ex parte statements, often deliberately false, without oath, publicity, cross-examination, or any of the ordinary tests of truth. It is also a great mistake to hold out to a prisoner the remission of any portion of his sentence as a reward for good conduct while undergoing the temporal punishment of his crime. If a criminal is really the reformed and converted character he professes to be, he will be most willing to undergo his sentence as an expiation of his offence against society.

The principal evils in the English system, for which reform has been so loudly and so justly called, are traceable to the abandonment of the principles of our ancient law. The subtle and technical spirit of our pleadings did not appear until the reign of Hen. 6, as stated by Lord Coke (Co. Litt. 304), before which time the pleadings were plain and simple. Our ancient statutes were short, clear, and intelligible, two-thirds of a quarto volume containing all from Magna Charta to the end of Hen. 6—two centuries and a half. About the middle of the reign of Hen. 5, the style began slowly to alter, and gradually grew worse and worse, till, by the end of the reign of Hen. 8, recital, repetition, and confusion reached the form and ascendancy they have retained ever since. Again, great complaints are made against legal reports; but the roots of the mischief lie in judges not deciding sufficiently on principle, and running after mere dicta, or other semblance of authority; and also, that, after the discontinuance of the Year-books in 1536, the judges discouraged reporting, until the latter end of the eighteenth century, when they allowed one, and but one set, for each court. Since that time they have erred in the opposite direction, by receiving reports as authority before they acquire a character for general accuracy. Our laws on the subject of marriage and divorce are also much attacked; but the system in operation at the present day is of modern origin. By the common law, marriage was indissoluble to rich and poor alike. This was in accordance with Scripture and the canon law, and the reasoning of Puffendorf (Jus. Nat. & Gent. lib. 6, cap. 1) shows that marriage is also an institution of natural law, and by that law indissoluble, except perhaps in a few disputed cases. Even supposing marriage only a civil contract, as contended by many at the present day, is it universally true that every civil contract can be dissolved by the parties at pleasure? Must not the position be taken with the limitation that the rights and interests of third parties or of society are not interfered with by the dissolution of the contract? Many other abuses, which formerly disfigured our law, and exposed it to no small obloquy, were not only unknown to the common law, but crept into our system in defiance of its provisions—as, for instance, the arrests on mesne process for mere pecuniary claims, the fictions in ejectment, the multifarious ways of commencing suits before the Uniformity of Process Act, the absorption of local jurisdictions by the Courts at Westminster, &c.

The reader then proceeded to consider the principal systems by which their respective admirers propose to replace the common law of England. With this view he alluded to the Roman law, and the great efforts made by the universities and others to establish its ascendancy in this country, and the illusory nature of their arguments; especially when they represent the common law of England as derived from their own, and the arrogant assumption that their law is the sole repository of the true principles of jurisprudence. He also went into an examination of the celebrated codes of Louisiana, and made some remarks on the views of Bentham. Generations, he next observed, have their fashions and faults in legislation; and the peculiar characteristic of the present is a tendency to legislate for extreme cases, without regard to the general operation of laws, or the collateral consequences of legislation; violating two of the well-established principles of jurisprudence—"Ad ea quæ frequentius accidunt jura adaptantur," and "Vix ulla lex fieri potest quæ omnibus commoda sit, sed si majori parti prospiciat utilis est." The reader adduced several instances in illustration, among which were the following:—Juries sometimes give wrong verdicts; therefore it is proposed to abolish trial by jury, forgetting that no infallible tribunal can ever be constituted. So indictments for certain paltry misdemeanors are occasionally made the means of extortion, and great offences sometimes escape punishment for want of prosecution. The natural remedy for all this seems, to strengthen the laws against groundless prosecutions, and the executive exercising its right to prosecute. But the spirit of the nineteenth century says, "Sweep away the grand jury, take all private prosecution out of the hands of the subject, and intrust the punishment of all crimes to the executive." Just look at this proposition. A public officer commits some act of violence or fraud—grossly illegal, but very acceptable to the powers that be. By the law, as it now exists, the injured party may indict him before a body, the constituent members of which are unknown up to the last moment, and, if they find a bill, all the power of the Crown cannot protect him from exposure, if not punishment. Suppose this altered, and that the law could only be put in force after obtaining the permission of a magistrate, the paid servant of the executive, the injured party might calculate his chances of justice. Besides, as matters stand, inasmuch as any person may prosecute for crime, the man who commits one is never secure, for he knows not from what quarter the blow may come. Change this—the unprincipled and wealthy man has only to guage the intellect and honesty of the representative of the executive in his neighbourhood to learn to what extent he may outrage the rights of his fellow-citizens with impunity.

The common law of England is one of the most wonderful systems ever beheld, if the state of society when it arose, and the difficulties that lay in the way of its formation, are taken into the account. It is the production of men to whose memories justice has not yet been done, and stands out in fine relief against the dark ground of ignorance, prejudice, superstition, and scholasticism that at the time disfigured the rest of Christendom. It doubtless had many faults—that is the fate of all systems—but most of them were the offspring of the times, and many have been since removed. But the system itself is founded on knowledge of the national character, which it has contributed to form in its turn, and the general features which run through it—firmness, gentleness, freedom, confidence, in a word, manliness—are all its own. The present generation sits in judgment on that system, and has to determine whether it is to be cast aside for some other.

Sir J. Stuart, V. C., Baron Bramwell, Mr. W. T. S. Daniel, Mr. F. Stephen, Mr. W. D. Lewis, Mr. Charles Clark, and other members, took part in the discussion which ensued.

The following are the officers for the current year:—

President.

Sir John Stuart, V. C.

Vice-Presidents.

Sir Richard Bethell, Att.-Gen.	W. D. Lewis, Esq.
The Hon. Baron Bramwell.	Right Hon. Robert Lowe.
Thomas Chambers, Esq.	Lord Stanley.
The Hon. Baron Channell.	The Hon. Baron Watson.
W. T. S. Daniel, Esq., Q.C.	J. W. Willcock, Esq., Q.C.
Hon. Mr. Justice Erle.

Treasurer.

Harris Prendergast, Esq.

Council.

W. M. Best, Esq.	J. Smale, Esq.
M. Chambers, Esq., Q.C.	Samuel Turner, Esq.
Charles Clark, Esq.	John Westlake, Esq.
The Hon. G. Denman.	Joshua Williams, Esq.
S. M. Leake, Esq.

Honorary Secretaries.

Patrick Colquhoun, Esq. | J. N. Higgins, Esq.

Mr. P. A. Smith will read a paper, on Monday next, "On Methods of Self-education, recommended or adopted by some English Lawyers in the last two Centuries."

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, June 12.

TRANSPORTATION AND PENAL SERVITUDE BILL.

The Earl of HARROWBY, in moving the committee on this Bill, said that considerable excitement had been created by the ticket-of-leave system, but he believed that the real cause of grievance was the abolition of transportation. We were now, instead of sending 4,000 or 5,000 of the worst of our population annually to a distant colony, obliged to dispose of them at home, and how to do so was the object of the present Bill. Even in the case of Western Australia there were some objections to it as a place for the reception of criminals. It had its advantages, no doubt: good climate, and the people anxious to receive convict labour. But the population of the colony (about 7,000) was an obstacle to the reception of any considerable number of convicts. Their Lordships were aware, that, when in 1853 it became patent to all that some limit must be put to the system of transportation, it was arranged that the punishment of transportation should be limited to those offenders who were sentenced to transportation for a term of fourteen years or upwards. This led to two unfortunate results—it prevented the transportation in some instances of those who were best fitted for transportation, and it limited the supply of convicts, although there might be and was a demand for a greater number in the colonies than could be sent out. In fact the number of criminals yearly sentenced to transportation for fourteen years and upwards did not exceed 400. From which number, if women and convicts physically or otherwise unfit were deducted, not more than 250 could be sent away. The main object of the Bill was to provide against the recurrence of this state of things; to allow the transportation of those best fitted for transportation, and most likely to become useful and respectable members of society elsewhere; and to remedy the evil which might arise by too large an aggregation of males in a particular colony, by enabling the Government to send out the wives of convicts who had entitled themselves by their good conduct here to that indulgence. To effect these purposes the Bill proposed to leave the ultimate determination whether a convict should be punished by penal servitude or transportation in the hands of the Secretary of State. The judge, in passing sentence, would tell the prisoner that he was placed at the disposal of the Crown, that he would be punished by transportation or penal servitude. He (Lord Harrowby) knew that some objected to placing this power in the hands of the Secretary of State; but he confessed that he did not see where that discretion could be placed better than in the Secretary of State. It was a high office, amenable to Parliament, and possessed of the means of knowing where and to what extent convicts could be sent abroad. Such a discretion could not be vested in the judges; for they had not the requisite information to guide them, and they were the only personages to whom, with the exception of the Secretary of State, the authority could be given. Having thus explained the great features of the Bill, he moved that their Lordships go into committee on the Bill.

Lord CAMPBELL did not oppose going into committee, but he could not refrain from expressing the regret with which he had perused the provisions of this Bill. He thought that they might now consider transportation as permanently abandoned; and instead of being a punishment for the worst offenders, it was to be reserved for those who were considered the most meritorious. An order of merit was to be established, and the badge of it was to be a ticket for transportation. Our penal colonies had formerly been the envy of all who had given any attention to the subject, and we had ourselves pitied the situation of France and other continental states deprived of such a means of relief. But now this was all at an end, and only the least bad of our criminals were to be sent abroad; selected, not by the judge who knew the facts and had been present at the trial, but by the Secretary of State, who would be utterly ignorant upon the subject. Formerly, when he passed a sentence of transportation for fifteen years, he sincerely believed that it would be, and it generally was, carried into effect. The result gave efficacy to the punishment. But now all that would be known would be, that it would not be carried into effect unless the convict by his good conduct rendered himself worthy of it. If he were to speak the truth in passing sentence, he should say to the prisoner, "I sentence you for fifteen years to the discretion of the Home Secretary." He must say that this was to place the administration of justice in a deplorable situation, and he could not but express his sorrow that the Government should think such a state of things inevitable.

Earl GREY supported this Bill, on the simple ground that they were now retracing, as far as possible, the step taken in 1853, and enabling the Government for the future to make use of transportation as a means of relieving this country from the presence of a number of persons who were very dangerous to society

The Earl of CARNARVON thought it had been too hastily assumed that there was no place within the British empire which was suitable for the formation of a new colonial settlement. Admitting the objections to Hudson's Bay, Vancouver's Island, and the Falkland Isles, he would point to Northern Australia, where there were two distinct districts, either of which might be converted into a penal colony—one called Carpentaria, well wooded and watered, and abounding in rich pastures; the other, 300 miles long by 150 wide, including the whole of the Cambridge Gulf, and forming the basin of the Victoria river. There were some important changes which were essential to secure the satisfactory working of the transportation system. One of the great evils in Western Australia was, that the Government sent out hardened and incorrigible criminals, instead of sending only men who were likely to behave well and to assist in the development of the resources of the colony. This called for an immediate remedy. Further, in order that any system of transportation might succeed, there must be an equalisation of the free and the convict population; and to secure this, proper inducements to settle must be presented to persons of capital and enterprise. Due provision must also be made for the transportation of an adequate number of females; all our colonial history proving that the female element was indispensable to colonial prosperity.

Viscount DUNGANNON believed the Bill would be nugatory, for it left untouched the source of all the mischiefs which were now complained of—namely, the ticket-of-leave system.

The Earl of DERBY said, that, under the existing system, the punishment of transportation might be commuted into punishment at home. The alteration proposed to be made was, that, instead of transportation being commuted to penal servitude, they would have penal servitude at home commuted to transportation at the discretion of the Secretary of State. Was transportation to be considered an aggravation or a mitigation of punishment? As far as could be collected from the Bill, it was not intended to send out great criminals or incorrigible offenders, but the well-disposed and those whose physical capacity fitted them for becoming colonists; and they would have this advantage over free emigrants, that their wives and families would be sent out at the expense of the Government. The Bill left it altogether to the discretion of the Secretary of State as to what portion of the sentence should be carried out at home, and what in the colony; which was totally different from the principle of the former measure—that the strictly penal portion of the sentence should be carried out in this country, and that after a certain period merit and good conduct would entitle the criminal to a mitigation; but in all cases there was a minimum of penal servitude, which should be enforced. As this Bill stood, however, the Secretary of State might from the very first hour of the sentence declare that the penal servitude should not be carried into effect, but that the individual should be sent at once to Bermuda, Gibraltar, or Western Australia. The Bill substituted the will and caprice of the Secretary of State for the former well-considered graduated scale of punishment, and failed in two very important particulars—in the means of disposing of the well-disposed, and finding a place for the incorrigible. No doubt great evils had resulted from granting tickets of leave to incorrigible offenders; and great advantages must arise if some place could be found within the limits of the British empire, not too far from the control of the Government, where this class of criminals might be kept under surveillance. He did not desire to send to the colonies all the most incorrigible offenders—of that the colonists might complain; but he thought something might be done with those who were not incorrigible. It seemed to him that the Government had rather too hastily abandoned the idea of founding a new penal colony. In Western Australia the influx of convict labour had been most advantageous. Again, on the northern coast of Australia there were several places perfectly eligible, if not at once for the reception of convicts under punishment, at least for the reception of persons who had undergone a portion of their sentences in this country, and might be sent out as free men, to act as pioneers of civilisation, and who could maintain themselves with some little assistance from the home Government. The Bill did not provide for those who had gone through their sentence with a good character, nor for the incorrigible; it left everything in the greatest uncertainty, and placed a great and dangerous discretion in the hands of the Secretary of State. He did not say that discretion would be abused, but judges and juries and all persons concerned in the administration of justice would be left in complete uncertainty as to the effect of the sentences pronounced. He had stated his principal objections; but he did not intend to propose any amendments to a measure the carrying out of which must be left entirely to the discretion of the Government.

The Marquis of SALISBURY said, that the insecurity of life and property after the establishment of the ticket-of-leave system was so great, that committees of both Houses of Parliament were appointed to investigate the matter, and they agreed in the necessity of the reinstatement of transportation. But the Bill entirely lost sight of the object for which the subject had been brought under the consideration of Parliament, as it did not contain a word about the ticket-of-leave system. Instead of leaving the nature of the punishment to the discretion of the Secretary of State, it should be for the judge to decide, as he had the best opportunity of becoming acquainted with the character of the man.

Lord DENMAN considered that the term of punishment imposed by the judge ought invariably to be inflicted. He believed that many of the colonies would be still willing to receive convicts, if they were allowed to make their own arrangements for their disposal. The feeling of the country decidedly was that the system of transportation should be re-established, and against the granting of tickets-of-leave.

Lord WENSLEYDALE admitted it was most important that the sentence pronounced by the judge should be carried out in every case.

The House then went into committee; and the several clauses of the Bill were agreed to.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The report of the amendments to this Bill was brought up.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he had some amendments to propose:—The first was, that the term "judicial separation" should be substituted for a divorce à mensâ et thoro, and that the same power be given to a sentence of judicial separation as now belonged to a divorce à mensâ et thoro. In reference to the 17th clause, he proposed to give to a husband or wife, against whom a decree of judicial separation had been pronounced on the ground of desertion, the power of applying to the Court for a reversal of the sentence, if it could be proved that the absence had been involuntary or unavoidable. Another amendment which he proposed was, that, in cases (which might happen) where persons who had been judicially separated chose to come together again, in order that it might be known that the woman had ceased to be a feme sole, the parties should enter a notice to that effect in some book to be kept by the Court. He also proposed to add a clause exempting Jewish marriages from the operation of the Act.

The Bishop of OXFORD moved the insertion of an amendment after the 27th clause, giving the new court the power which was now occasionally exercised by their Lordships' House, of settling the property of the parties in cases of divorce for adultery.

Lord REDESDALE gave notice that on the third reading of the Bill he should move the omission from the 3rd clause of the words "and of divorce," with a view of excepting the divorce à vinculo altogether from the operation of the Bill.

The Bishop of OXFORD gave notice, that, in the event of this amendment not being carried, he should move that the Bill be read a third time that day six months. The Bill contained several amendments of the law which he should be glad to see carried into effect, but he could not consent to purchase them at the cost of the very serious injury to the morals of the people which the introduction of this law of divorce would bring about.

Earl NELSON also gave notice that he should again move the amendment which had just been negatived, or one to a similar effect.

The third reading is fixed for June 23.

Monday, June 15.

TRANSPORTATION AND PENAL SERVITUDE BILL.

The report of the amendments to this Bill was received.

Friday, June 12.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

This Bill was read a third time, and passed.

GRAND JURIES (METROPOLITAN POLICE DISTRICT) BILL.

This Bill was read a second time.

Monday, June 15.

FRAUDULENT TRUSTEES, &c., BILL.

This Bill passed through committee pro formâ, and was ordered to be recommitted on Friday next.

LEASES AND SALES OF SETTLED ESTATES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. WHITESIDE obtained leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Act of 1856, to facilitate leases and sales of settled estates.

ELECTION PETITIONS.

Mr. ADDERLEY obtained leave to bring in a Bill for Regulating the Presentation and Withdrawal of Election Petitions.

Tuesday, June 16.

GRAND JURIES (METROPOLITAN POLICE DISTRICT) BILL.

The House having gone into committee on this bill,

Mr. AYRTON moved, on clause 1, that the chairman report progress. He stated that the bill required amendment in every clause.

Upon a division his motion was negatived; and after some further discussion the House was counted out.

Thursday, June 18.

MARRIED WOMEN'S REVERSIONARY INTEREST BILL.

The House having gone into committee upon this Bill, upon clause 1,

Mr. DOBBS said the Bill as it stood would interfere with all contracts subsisting between persons already married, and was, therefore, an ex post facto law. He proposed, as an amendment, instead of "it shall be lawful for any married woman," to insert the words "it shall be lawful for every married woman who shall be married after the passing of this Act."

Mr. MALINS said the amendment would destroy every virtue of the Bill, which only applied to a married woman's personal property the same rule as applied to her real property.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

Sir E. PERRY moved the insertion in the same clause of words to the effect that the proceeds of the sale of the reversionary interest should be placed at the disposal of the married woman as if she were a feme sole.

Mr. MALINS said the amendment was quite unnecessary, because the wife could refuse to agree to the sale unless the proceeds were disposed of as she wished.

The amendment was not pressed to a division.

The clause and following clauses were then agreed to.

Friday, June 19.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Fraudulent Trustees, &c., Bill.—Committee.

Grand Juries (Metropolitan Police District) Bill.—Committee.

(From a Correspondent.)

The committees have been very busy during the last week, and have earned their reward in the gradual diminution of business, though with an uncomfortable prospect of only having cleared the way for the election committees on which many of the members of the present committees will have to serve.

Sir James Graham is getting through the Liverpool story by degrees, but no time is as yet confidently named for a decision.

The Committee on Water Bills are proceeding with the Norfolk Estuary Bill, and will then attack the Nene Valley Drainage, which is the most heavily opposed Bill of the session as regards petitions. The Tweed Fisheries Bills are still engrossing much attention, and the salmon which are jumping about in shady pools have little idea of the vast amount of evidence which is being given, and oratory of counsel expended, in their cause. The committee on a small quasi railway group, which included two Bills relating to Watchet Harbour, and the West Somerset Mineral Railway Bill, a scheme in connexion with the Harbour, have concluded their duties by passing "the Watchet Harbour Bill," and rejecting the Watchet Habour Trust Bill.

The South London Railway Bill has been rejected, and the Reading Railways Junction Bill, and the South Eastern Railway (Reading) Bill, competing schemes, have been occupying the attention of that committee. The decision is given in favour of the Promoters of the Reading Railways Junction, in other words the "Staines, Wokingham, and Woking Railway Company," which company is empowered to effect a junction with the Great Western narrow gauge system at Reading. This will give the Staines, Wokingham, and Woking Railway Company an uninterrupted line, without break of gauge, to the North by the Great Western narrow gauge system.

The East Kent and South Eastern quarrel has been suddenly brought to a check by the Committee adjourning till Monday, in order that the South Eastern should give a pledge to make the line from Rochester to London, with a west-end terminus. Railway pledges are not matters for speculation, and we must reserve the notice of this question for next week.

The Earl of March has done his best to stop another broad and narrow gauge fight over the district between Salisbury and Southampton, by specially reporting that the committee were unanimous in rejecting the broad gauge Bill, because there was no necessity for a second railway between Salisbury and Southampton, and that they rejected the narrow gauge short line between Romsey and Redbridge, because there was not sufficient traffic to support a railway. This report virtually is a strong recommendation to the House not to send the same scheme, if again brought forward, to a committee.

The Taff Vale Bill, which embraces some of those inexhaustible subjects which coal and iron owners never can agree on, is before the committee on group 7, and the vote on the preamble will not be taken this week.

The Great Irish Railway fight is over. The committee have decided in favour of the extension proposed by the Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland in preference to that proposed by the Great Southern and Western Railway Company, and have sanctioned the Tullamore Extension.

The Milford Improvement Bill is still before the committee. The picture of the docks and new building—as shown in the drawings in the committee-rooms—is very pretty, and it is only fair to say, that, looking at the beautiful terminus at Paddington, it is reasonable to hope that Mr. Brunel can accomplish things equally great at the extreme point of the broad gauge system.

The Election Committees are on the eve of appointment. The Committees on Mayo County, Cambridge Borough, and Rochdale, will be appointed on the 22nd of June; and the committees on Pontefract, Marlborough and Wareham Boroughs will be appointed on the 23rd. The committees on the last-named six petitions will probably sit about Thursday next.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The leading occurrence in the money market during the present week is the resolution of yesterday, by the Directors of the Bank of England, to reduce the rate of discount and interest on loans from 6½ to 6 per cent. The last two weekly returns from the Bank, and the return of the present week, show a large amount of increase in the stock of bullion. Nevertheless, the resolution to reduce the rate of accommodation was not very generally expected. It has been productive of little practical influence on the price of Public Securities. The English funds have varied during the week from ⅛ to ¼ per cent., and closed ⅛ per cent. better than on this day week. There has been greater activity in Foreign Securities, chiefly in the Russian funds, and the Turkish 6 per Cents., both of which show an advance of 1 per cent. The Bank of France is expected to take the same course as the Bank of England in reducing their rate of discount, and has already lowered the premium for the purchase of gold. The discount houses in Lombard-street have reduced their rate conformably to the example of the Bank of England. From the Bank of England return for the week ending 13th June, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £18,772,185, being a decrease of £15,795; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £10,909,255, showing an increase of £618,606, when compared with the previous return. The demand for money is active, but without any particular pressure. The drain of silver to the East continues unabated, and is a subject which occupies general attention. It is expected the next mail-packet will take out a larger amount than any which has gone before.

The view expressed on this subject in the Bombay Times, to the following purport, deserves attention:—The world has never seen a conquered country governed with the wisdom and honesty which characterise the English rule in India. The resources of Scinde and the Punjab beginning to be developed rapidly; the immense demand for produce which the Russian war caused in India; the growth and prosperity of the cotton trade in the last few years—not to mention the introduction of railways, the triumph of which is yet to come—these circumstances account for the fact that the average amount of the precious metals retained in the country during the last seven years is £5,500,000, against a previous average of sixteen years amounting to £2,000,000.

Thus India is said to be £40,000,000 sterling wealthier in the precious metals alone than in 1850, which means that the bulk of this sum is required now more than then to supply the people with money. The mints of India are continually at work. The prosperity pointed out means, in its ultimate results, an improvement in the condition of the people—that every one requires and obtains for his personal use more rupees than formerly. This is the reason why such a large demand continues for silver where none is produced, and where it is the sole currency.

Reports of the grain crops throughout Europe are highly encouraging. But the arrivals of grain and flour from abroad are small, and prices in foreign markets firm. Under these circumstances, the late advance in our markets has been fully maintained and rather increased.

A letter from Constantinople, published in the Augsburg Gazette, states that our Government has directed their commissioner in the Danubian Principalities to enter into communication with the Turkish Government, with the view of forming a commercial establishment at the mouth of the Danube; offering to provide the necessary funds for clearing the Sulina mouth of the river, on condition that England shall participate in the navigation dues to be levied by Turkey.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

THE INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

The election of Mr. J. Hope Shaw, of Leeds, to fill the vacant place in the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, took place at the annual meeting held on Tuesday last. The vacancy thus filled up was caused by the death of Mr. Bryan Holme, one of the original founders of the Society, and a man of as much eminence in metropolitan as his successor in provincial practice. Mr. Hope Shaw's name and character are widely known in the Northern Counties, but for the information of other districts it may be proper to state that he has twice held the office of Mayor of Leeds, and is a magistrate of that town, an honour which we regret to say is seldom bestowed on solicitors in actual practice. At the time of the foundation of the Society, the communication between London and the country was slow. Long and tedious journeys were not usually taken without strong occasion; and the result was, that provincial solicitors were practically disqualified for places at the Council board. It is to be remembered that the duties of this Council are various and important. They have to consider the practical operation of all proposed changes in the law; to prepare petitions, and produce from the body of solicitors the most competent witnesses in support of the representations they may think fit to make. We believe it is not going too far to say that the most powerful and decisive opposition to the registration of deeds came from the Incorporated Law Society; and on this, and many other occasions, the Council have performed services very onerous to themselves, and very valuable to the profession generally.

Now it is quite beyond dispute that the general interests of the body of solicitors would be best promoted by the deliberations of a Council fairly representing every class of practitioners, both in town and country. But it is essential that the members of the Council should attend, or at least be ready if called on to attend, the weekly meetings; and in former times it was utterly impossible that country solicitors should undertake this duty. Whatever, therefore, may have been the original design of the Law Institution, and whatever opinion may be formed as to the mode in which the objects of its foundation would be best attained, it is certain that the management of the Society must fall very much into the hands of the London members of the Council. But admitting, as we do, that this is an imperfection inseparable from the nature of the Institution, we do not the less contend that the evil is capable of mitigation, and that advantage should be taken of the vastly-increased facilities of communication between town and country, to infuse into the management a leaven of provincial ideas and interests. This sound principle, we believe, has been for some time past advocated at the Council-board, and at length an opportunity has been found of putting it into practical effect. We regard the election of Mr. Hope Shaw as an occurrence of happy augury, both to the Society and to the profession generally, believing that this is the first step in a line of policy which cannot fail to enlarge the scope of the Society's usefulness, and thereby to serve the whole body for whose benefit it subsists.

It is at once a misconception of fact and an error in judgment, to represent that there is, between country and town solicitors, any real antagonism of interest. If once we begin to talk of classes existing in one and the same profession, it will appear, on a moment's consideration, that these classes are not two only, but very many. It is possible that a country solicitor, who has had small intercourse with the capital, may know but little of any London practitioners, except his own and some other agents. Hence, by always speaking as if the terms solicitor and agent were in the metropolis co-extensive, there is a chance of persuading some few persons to adopt and reason upon the assumption that the business of every London office depends wholly or principally upon agency. We shall presently show that this assumption is entirely contrary to fact; but, supposing it were well founded, we could not possibly desire to find a stronger argument in support of our own opinion that solicitors everywhere have absolutely the same interest. Surely, the London agent, who depends for his business upon the prosperity of his country clients, would not be so insane as to risk his own as involved in their destruction. It is true that imaginative people may conceive a London agent as a miracle of cunning and audacity, as willing to stake the chance of rising on the ruin of his country friends against the other chance of sharing in a common downfall. We think that this conception of the character of the London solicitor would not occur to any one who frequented the courts and the judges' chambers; but it is quite impossible to say what hidden depths of design might be discovered by an analyst of the legal heart thoroughly competent for the investigation. Perhaps one of our professed anatomisers of human passion will gratify the jaded appetite of the reading world by writing a novel upon this subject. Or, if the theme appear more suitable for play or poem, we commend it seriously to the meditation of workers in these domains of art. We have recently discovered that the profession counts in its ranks at least one votary of the Muses, and we beg to suggest "The Ambitious Agent" as an exercise of his poetic power.

The notion of the agent deliberately planning the ruin of his principal is so extravagant, that the bare suggestion of it transports the mind into regions of thought altogether alien to this Journal. Returning, therefore, as composedly as we can to dry business and sober common sense and matter of fact, we have to say that the truth is very far indeed from being as favourable to our own argument as we have been supposing. We believe that in all London there are not more than fifty or sixty offices whose business depends mainly on agency. Now, as the metropolitan solicitors amount in all to about three thousand, the class of agents, which is sometimes represented as comprehending the whole body, forms really but a small part of it. Perhaps, if there be still remaining any country practitioner who receives these fancy sketches of London life as truth, the ill-used provincial may be roused to put this question: "If these agency houses, of which I have heard so much, form really but one-fiftieth part of the profession in London, what is the business of the other forty-nine fiftieths of which I never heard before?" The answer to this inquiry ought to be, that the great body of the profession in the capital does exactly the same sort of business, and does it in the same way, as their brethren throughout England. It would be easy to point out London practitioners who, in the nature of their business, and in their connections and sympathies, differ far more widely than do the representatives of town and country. Perhaps the two most opposite types of character to be found in the whole profession are, on the one hand, the agency practitioner, versed in the procedure of all courts; and, on the other, the confidential adviser of noble houses, knowing little of Chancery and nothing of common law forms, but familiar with mortgages, settlements, and the management of estates. And yet these entirely dissimilar avocations are pursued, not at the distance of two or three hundred miles, but within the same court or square, and possibly under the very same roof. Then, again, there are the City offices, forming a class as entirely distinct from the agency houses as any that can be found throughout the kingdom. Take, for example, the late Mr. James Freshfield, and compare the field of duty in which he laboured—first, with that of Mr. Holme, who was once at the head of one of the largest agencies, and then with that of Mr. Holme's successor in the Council of the Law Society—Mr. J. Hope Shaw. Take, again, another variety of City practitioners, among whom Mr. Lawrance and Mr. Linklater are two of the most conspicuous, and say whether we should seek to match these specimens among the London agency houses, or whether their parallel is not rather to be found in Hull, Manchester, and Liverpool. But we have said more than enough in a case where the facts are plain, and the inference from them is indisputable. As many as are the classes and the wants of society, so many must be the varieties that might be counted up, if we had time, in the functions that devolve upon the solicitor. But to pretend that any one class of practitioners is, or can properly allow itself to become, insensible to the importance of upholding the interests of every other class, is to propagate a gross and palpable delusion. It is certainly not a compliment to the intelligence of either lawyer or layman to attempt to mislead by such very inadequate contrivances.

OFFICIAL TRUSTEES.

The Law Amendment Society has been recently engaged in discussing a project of Serjeant Woolrych, for the appointment of official trustees. In the acquiescent spirit with which the Society is apt to welcome any scheme which professes to be an improvement on the existing law, it has adopted, by a unanimous vote, the proposition of the learned Serjeant. We cannot but think that the Society has in this instance forgotten the virtue of discretion in its eager pursuit of reform. The primâ facie arguments in favour of official trusteeships are obvious enough. It is hard to find thoroughly competent and upright persons who are willing to undertake the thankless office of a trustee. When you have been able to select persons worthy of all reliance, it is impossible to say how soon the estate may not devolve on an unprincipled heir or executor, or be transferred to successors in the trust, who may not be adorned by all the virtues of the original trustees. From these causes it is undeniable that instances of fraudulent malversation are of sufficiently frequent occurrence to constitute in the aggregate a serious national evil. One remedy for this mischief, and we believe a tolerably effectual one, will be found in the Bill of the Attorney-General, which promises shortly to become law. Rather strangely, this has been regarded by Serjeant Woolrych more as an aggravation than a remedy, and it seems to be imagined that the dread of a prosecution will have an injurious effect. It is thought that the increased reluctance of fit men to undertake a fiduciary office will more than counterbalance the benefit which may be expected from the new law in keeping trustees of less rigorous integrity within the limits of honesty. We are satisfied that this is an entire delusion. The position of any trustee of common honesty will be far better after Sir Richard Bethell's Bill has passed than it is now. No one who has not acted in a trust can appreciate the difficulty of resisting the importunities of tenants for life and others to concur in irregularities which cannot be committed without involving the trustee in the risk of serious loss. The prohibitions of a criminal statute, so far as they touch such transactions at all, will arm the trustee with an unanswerable reply to all such solicitations. It is common enough for a trustee to be urged to commit a breach of trust which may be really beneficial to all the parties interested; and if he refuses, on the plea that he may at some future time be held accountable, he is set down as an unaccommodating stickler, and quarrelled with accordingly. But no one could be shameless enough to press a trustee to do an act for which he might ultimately be brought to the bar of the Old Bailey; and though the proposed statute will not in any case reach a trustee who acts without a fraudulent intent, the mere general fact that breaches of trust are made amenable to the criminal law will, in a multitude of cases, silence the importunity which is the greatest of the difficulties that beset the office of a trustee. After a brief period of panic has passed by, men of integrity will, we believe, be less reluctant than hitherto to take upon themselves the duties of a trust; and the statute, so far from increasing the necessity for an official substitute, will, we have no doubt, diminish the difficulty of finding suitable private trustees. At the same time, it will obviously tend to check the appropriations of those who are really dishonest; and, therefore, whatever may be the necessity for a scheme like that of Serjeant Woolrych, it is certainly not increased by the intended severity of the Attorney-General's measure. Even were this otherwise, it would perhaps be better to increase the supply of eligible trustees by providing them with a fair remuneration, than to supplant them by paid officials. There is some vagueness about the plan as at present sketched out; and it is not clear whether it is intended that the Government shall pledge its credit for the honesty of the official trustee; although, without this condition, there will be nothing like an absolute assurance against defalcations of the very kind which the project is designed to prevent.

Supposing, however, that this should be one of the terms of the proposed legislation, we should undoubtedly escape the single risk of fraudulent appropriations of trust funds; but the scheme goes much further than is necessary to secure this object. If the official trustee were merely made the recipient and disburser of all trust moneys, without loading him with the discretionary and other duties of the trust, the same security would be obtained at a far less expense of labour, and consequently at far less cost to each estate. For it is clear that the official, whoever he may be, must be paid, and paid in proportion to the work performed; and if any trustee would take the trouble to estimate the value of his time spent upon his fiduciary task, he would soon satisfy himself that the payment of an official to do the same business would involve a heavy per-centage on most trust estates. So far, therefore, as protection against dishonesty is required, a mere public depositary is all that would be wanted. But there are other difficulties which trustees have to deal with, They have, in the interpretation of wills, and the administration of estates, to decide judicially on the rights of the beneficiaries; and if they do so without appealing to the Court of Chancery, they do it at their own risk. Where the trustees are men of substance, no system could be more beneficial to their cestuis que trust. But would an official trustee undertake such a responsibility? Clearly not; and it would either be necessary to invest him with strictly judicial powers to make his own construction ipso facto binding, or else to permit him, of course at the expense of the estate, to refer every doubtful point to the Court of Chancery. The former alternative is out of the question, as nothing can be more monstrous than to give such judicial powers to an administrative officer without requiring him to hear the arguments of the parties interested, and, in fact, making him to all intents and purposes a Court of Trusts.

We have at present the Court of Chancery fulfilling the very functions which the official trustee is intended to perform; its officer, the Accountant-General, being as secure a depositary for trust moneys as it is easy to imagine. But it will be said, the expense is great. No doubt it is considerable; and though it admits perhaps of some reduction, it will never be possible, on any system, to get a large amount of intricate business accurately and safely done without heavy expense. Assuredly, the establishment of a new Court of Chancery, under a new name, without the knowledge and experience which have made the old tribunal almost perfect in the decision of trust questions, is not likely to lead to more efficient or less costly work; and it strikes us that the Law Amendment Society would do much better service by endeavouring to discover some mode of improving the chamber-machinery of our courts, so as to increase the speed and lessen the cost of an administration suit, than by devising a second court, which would have all the evils, and few of the good qualities, of the Court of Chancery. The alterations of the practice by recent legislation have been a great step in this direction; and the further reform of the judges' chambers, and the reduction or abolition of court fees, is all that is needed to make the system as perfect as any official mode of administering trusts can be. This is the direction which the efforts of reformers ought to take; and that they may do so, we trust that the zeal of the Law Amendment Society will cease to consume itself in discussing such visionary speculations as Serjeant Woolrych's project for the appointment of official trustees. One fact alone is enough to show how crude his plan at present is. He contemplates, in the first instance, the appointment of one official trustee, to be afterwards aided by a few country associates. When it is considered that this functionary will have to do for each estate all that is now done by private trustees, judges, chief clerks, counsel, solicitors, accountants and their clerks put together, it must be very obvious, that, if even the number of estates under his care should be no more than the Court of Chancery has now upon its list, he would have the work of some hundreds of active men thrown upon his single shoulders. The truth is, we should soon have an official staff whose salaries would devour estates with even greater facility than the enemies of the Court of Chancery are in the habit of attributing to that much maligned tribunal.

Legal News.

In the House of Commons, on Wednesday, most of the sitting was consumed in a vain attempt, by Mr. Craufurd, to force his Bill through Committee, against the opposition of the Irish members. The perseverance of the author of the Bill, and the opinion of the majority of the House, was successfully resisted during a contest of several hours; and it appears most probable that Mr. Craufurd will not again find even so favourable an opportunity as he has had this week, and therefore that his measure stands adjourned to another session. The tactics of the Irish members were simple in the extreme. There were four motions for reporting progress, and upon each of them abundance of loose talk, and a division. Colonel French began his opposition by urging the absence of many Irish members as a reason for postponing the Committee. We must assume, from the course which the proceedings took, that many of them entered the House during the discussion. Otherwise, the conception we obtain of the retarding power of Irishmen is absolutely startling. If a small detachment of Hibernian representatives can suspend the action and disappoint the will of the House of Commons, we shall be ready to believe that the concurrence of the whole body could repeat the miracle of Joshua. It is, at all events, quite clear that Irish obstructiveness is too strong to be overcome by a private member. If the Government mean this Bill to pass, they ought to take charge of it; and, at any rate, they should not leave the House to waste, in utterly profitless discussion and wrangling, several hours of valuable time.

In the Exchequer Chamber, on Saturday last, an appeal was heard from the Court of Exchequer; and it appeared that the case had been argued in that Court before two judges only, Barons Martin and Bramwell, who differed in opinion. We have before drawn attention to occurrences somewhat similar to this, as proving that if, as some persons contend, there are too many common-law judges, the existing arrangement of their duties must be singularly ill-contrived. In the case to which we refer, it is not unlikely, or, at any rate, not impossible, that in a full court a decision might have been obtained by a majority of three judges to one, and that this result would have been satisfactory, and no further litigation would have been thought of. As it was, the parties were compelled to resort to the Exchequer Chamber, where the case was heard by five judges, and judgment has been reserved. Now, it is part of our legal theory that the Exchequer Chamber is a court of higher authority than the courts whose decisions it reviews. But, inasmuch as the judges who sit there are of merely equal rank with the judges of the inferior courts, the greater weight ascribed to the judgments of the Court of Error must be due to the number, not to the rank of its component members. But if two judges of the Queen's Bench and three of the Common Pleas are to review judgments which usually proceed from four Barons of the Exchequer, there is little but a faith in odd numbers to satisfy us that the higher tribunal is entitled to more respectful consideration than the lower. In the case which gives occasion to these remarks, it happened that both courts were below the numerical strength which the law contemplates; and, therefore, the usual proportion between the numbers of judges acting in them was nearly observed. It is to be noted, that, during the past week, three judges of the same court have sat at one time at Nisi Prius, and this again would seem to imply some doubt whether there are too many judges. However, it is probable that we shall soon hear what the Commission appointed to consider this subject have to say upon it.

We give below the report of another action against an attorney for alleged negligence, which was tried on Thursday, and wherein the jury arrived at a conclusion to which we do not think we should have clearly seen our way. In this case of Carr v. Chapple, negligence was imputed to the defendant in respect that he improperly assented to terms of compromise of an action. It was sworn on behalf of the defendant that counsel advised this compromise, and also that the plaintiffs in the action assented to it; but this latter statement was contradicted by the plaintiffs themselves. The Judge left it to the jury to say whether the defendant had been guilty of negligence in assenting to the terms of compromise; and the jury found a verdict against him, with £200 damages. Now, so far as we can judge from the report in the daily papers, it would seem that, by very unwise and careless management, a married woman had been deprived of between £200 and £300 that was settled on her. At one stage of the affair, when an investment was made in worthless houses, the trustees appear to have been very culpable; but it is not stated that Mr. Chapple was concerned for the parties at this time. At a later period, an ejectment was brought by the owner of the land on which the houses stood, and

Mr. Chapple or his clerk suffered judgment to be signed against his clients by default. Here, then, were two distinct occasions on which somebody deserved censure, but in neither case were the jury called upon to adjudge the penalty. There was also a third occasion on which negligence was imputed to the defendant, but with regard to which it might be contended, with great force of reason—first, that the defendant had really taken a prudent course; and secondly, that, whether he had or not, he did his best to form a sound opinion—had acted on the advice of the counsel in the case, and, according to his own witness, with the approbation of the parties interested. The jury, however, were not disposed to stand on trifles. Here was a married woman who had lost her little fortune, and, as it came out in the course of the trial, was living separate from her husband. Here, also, was an attorney, a legitimate victim of common juries, who had certainly been guilty of one act of negligence, although not that in respect of which they were to award damages. It is not very surprising that this jury should have followed the example set them in the case of Van Toll v. Chapman. In both cases a lady had lost money, and an attorney had acted carelessly. To restore the lady's money to her would be a pleasant thing to do, and to treat an attorney with questionable justice would not be very disagreeable. We fear that this will not be the last instance in which the recent precedent will be followed; and it is much to be deplored that the case of Van Toll v. Chapman must now stand over until November, without any earlier opportunity of obtaining a judicial revision of the verdict in that case. The prospects of any attorneys who may happen to be defendants at the coming assizes in actions of this character are not encouraging. All that can be done is to take care that every such case shall be thoroughly discussed next term, so that some sound principles may, if possible, be laid down for the guidance of future juries.

ACTION AGAINST AN ATTORNEY FOR NEGLIGENCE.

Carr and Another v. Chapple.

Mr. Serjeant Thomas and Mr. Dunbar were counsel for the plaintiffs; and Mr. Milward for the defendant.

This action was brought to recover compensation for a loss sustained through the alleged negligence of the defendant, who is an attorney carrying on business in Great Carter-lane.

It appeared that the plaintiffs, Mr. John Carr and Mr. Richard Farrow, are the trustees of a settlement executed in June, 1847, on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Hocheday, by which a sum of £300 Consols, the property of the lady, was settled on herself. In December, 1855, at the suggestion of her husband, she determined to purchase some leasehold houses in Bermondsey from a person named Keyes for £300. The trustees assented, and sold out the stock, which produced £277; the husband made up the difference, and the purchase was completed. It was soon found that the property was utterly worthless, not producing enough to pay the ground-rent, and had been purchased by Keyes for £50. Mrs. Hocheday consulted a Mr. Farrer, who was managing clerk to the defendant, and on his advice determined to bring an action in the name of the trustees against Keyes. The cause was set down for trial at Guildhall, on the 10th of December, 1855. The plaintiffs and their witnesses were in attendance, but, after waiting all day, they were informed the cause had been settled. It afterwards appeared that the terms were, that the defendant Keyes should pay £200 on or before the 11th of June, 1856, and the plaintiffs re-assign the cottages on payment of that sum. On the 26th of June an ejectment was brought by the landlady of the houses, and judgment allowed to go by default. No portion of the money had been paid, so that Mrs. Hocheday had lost everything.

The plaintiffs and Mr. Hocheday were examined: they stated they were never consulted as to the terms of the compromise, and never consented to it. Mrs. Hocheday admitted that something was said about a compromise by Keyes's agent, and she said she would not object, provided she got £200, and each party paid their own costs. She further said, it was by defendant's advice she allowed judgment to be marked in the ejectment.

For the defence, Mr. Farrer, managing clerk to the defendant, was called. He stated he had had the entire management of the case. Mr. Chapple never interfered at all. When it was proposed to compromise the action against Keyes, he consulted the counsel engaged, and they advised his proposal should be accepted. He then saw Carr, Farrow, and Mr. and Mrs. Hocheday, and they all agreed to accept the terms. They never expressed any dissatisfaction with the terms until October, 1856, when the present action was commenced. He was not told of the ejectment having been brought until the time for appearing had elapsed. As the plaintiffs were now unable to fulfil their portion of the agreement by re-assigning the houses, great difficulty was experienced in recovering anything from Keyes, but he had no doubt something would eventually be got. He was endeavouring to enforce the agreement when this action was commenced.

Hocheday, the husband, who has been separated from his wife for some time, confirmed Mr. Farrer's statement as to the conversation with the plaintiffs and Mrs. Hocheday, and swore they all three expressly assented to the compromise.

Mr. Justice Wightman said the question he would ask the jury was, whether the defendant had been guilty of negligence in assenting to these terms of compromise; if they were of opinion that he had, they would then consider the amount of damages; if they thought he had done what, under the circumstances, was the best for his clients, they ought to find for him.

The jury, after a short deliberation, said they found for the plaintiffs for the amount of the Judge's order.

Verdict for the plaintiffs—Damages, £200.

LIVERPOOL COUNTY COURT.

The following letter has been addressed to the Editor of the Northern Times:—

"SIR,—Here we are with another adjournment this week! On Tuesday last Mr. Conway sat in the absence of the Judge; but the cases for the three following days were adjourned until the 29th and 30th of July next, being a period of THREE CALENDAR MONTHS from the days they were entered in the court! Is this right? Is this court a boon to the public, or is it a nuisance? 'The remedy is obvious,' says the Daily Post; 'let the Government appoint an additional judge.' The remedy is equally obvious, say I; let the judge appoint a deputy, and pay him according to the Act of Parliament. One judge of ordinary stamina is sufficient for the present business, and therefore the country ought not to be saddled with the expense of an additional one. Let the judge, whoever he may be, confine himself to his own duties in his own court, and not ramble off to the Quarter Sessions four times in the year to the hindrance of his own suitors. The Judge of this court is, without doubt, a very good judge, and he has been so much lauded that we can now hardly bring ourselves to find fault with him. But there is reason in the roasting of eggs, and our love for the man must not lead us to forget what is due from him to us. If the constitution of the judge should unfortunately be so weak and delicate that he cannot execute the duties of his office, then, in honour, he ought to resign. But I would fain hope this is not so, and that his appointment of a deputy would remedy the inconvenience arising during his severe illness.—I am, &c., A SUITOR.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—JUNE 25.

(Before Mr. Commissioner GOULBURN).

Re Giustiniani.—In this case, the facts of which have already appeared (ante, p. 557), his Honour decided to accept the offer of the defendant for the payment of £700 into court, to abide the determination of the Lords Justices on the question whether a bond ought to be given.

Obituary.

THE LATE JOHN WARD, ESQ.

We have to record, while we deplore, the loss of a distinguished member of the profession, of whom we subjoin a brief biographical sketch, extracted from the Durham Chronicle of June 19.

"Mr. Ward was born at Durham on the 10th September, 1771. His youth was marked by indications of talent and decided predilection for the acquirement of knowledge in preference to the enjoyment of juvenile exercises. At the usual period he was placed at the Grammar School, under the mastership of that distinguished classic, the late Dr. Britton; where he attained a proficiency in Greek and Latin literature, his extraordinary power of memory rendering the acquisition of knowledge facile and enduring. He was also a proficient in most of the modern languages. The studious habits which were thus formed, and the dedication of many midnight hours to literary pursuits, enabled him to lay up an ample store of knowledge, the overflowings of which were not unfrequently communicated to the public; and we may, perhaps, be permitted to express a hope that these may not remain in obscurity.

"Of the profession of the law, which Mr. Ward had adopted, he was a distinguished ornament. Open, candid, and sincere in all his converse with his brethren, he won their opinion and secured their esteem. Perhaps few individuals have passed the ordeal of sixty years' practice as an attorney with greater honour, reputation, and success. His mind was of such an order that he naturally, we might almost say constitutionally, repudiated the petty warfare and contentious disputations incident to the common law; his forte lay in his knowledge as a property lawyer; in this he excelled, and amid its weighty and intricate ramifications obtained the highest confidence: by gentlemen at the bar his opinions in this important branch were received with decided respect and deference; and parties not personally acquainted with him can scarcely form an adequate idea of the amount of public professional honour and estimation which he enjoyed in his native place, especially in the immediate circle of his clientship. This is the more worthy of remark when we consider that no peculiarly advantageous or adventitious circumstances marked his entrance into life; his success lay in his own right hand and his own sound heart. The propriety of his judgment often marked him as an arbitrator on very difficult occasions, and we never knew an instance where his judgment was arraigned. As a testimony beyond our own, we select from a mass of similar evidences the following tribute of respect and estimation by one of the oldest and most eminent solicitors in the North of England:—

"Mr. Ward was one for whom in early life I entertained the highest esteem. He was a pattern amongst the dissolute; and I have to this hour looked upon him as a Polar star. Nothing in his life ever occurred to cast a shade over his character—there never was an imputation or stain upon him."

"In the year 1813, Mr. Ward was united to Miss Frances Leveson Gower, a lady allied to a noble family, whose energy in raising and supporting religious and educational institutions was remarkably successful, and whom he survived nearly eight years, terminating his career on Friday, the 12th June, 1857.

"During the solemn period of decay his confidence has never been shaken, and his faith remained firmly fixed on 'the Cross.' A son and daughter survive him, who, on Thursday, the 18th June, paid the last reverential tribute of filial piety to the mortal remains of an inestimable parent."

FORGING A COUNTY COURT PROCESS.—A somewhat singular case was heard before the Exeter magistrates a few days ago. A respectable tradesman, named William Downey, of Topsham, was committed for trial on a charge of forging the name of Mr. John Daw, registrar of the Exeter District County Court, to what purported to be a county court summons. It was stated that persons travel about the country and make a good living by selling documents in imitation of county court summonses, which are printed in Holywell-street, London. These are purchased by small tradesmen, who send them to tardy debtors in order to frighten them into payment. To make the process complete, it is necessary to forge the signature of the registrar. This Downey did, and posted the letters in Exeter, so that it might appear to the debtors that they came from the office of the registrar. By the County Courts Act the offence is one of felony. It was stated by Mr. Daw that he believed the prisoner did it in ignorance of the consequences. The magistrates committed Downey for trial at the ensuing Quarter Sessions.

COMMITMENTS BY COUNTY COURTS.—A case was mentioned by Mr. Dowse, on June 18, to Mr. Commissioner Phillips, and the discharge ordered, in the matter of G. Hall, where the insolvent had been committed by the Bloomsbury County Court, after his discharge by this Court. He did not attend the judgment summons. The discharge, though ordered, has not been sent, as the warrant of commitment is for contempt in not attending, and not for "non-payment." Unless parties who are summoned show their discharge or protection they will be committed, and therefore the decision is of considerable importance to parties, or they will find themselves in gaol.—Daily News.

"TOUTS."—On Wednesday, at the police-court, Mr. Dodd, solicitor, complained to Mr. Mansfield, stipendiary magistrate, of the system of touting pursued by some of the attorneys practising at the Court, instancing a case in which a "touter," employed by Mr. Cobb, had waited upon one of his (Mr. Dodd's) clients in prison, for the purpose of endeavouring to secure the case. Mr. Mansfield expressed regret that there should be any difference between the legal gentlemen of that Court, and intimated that in future no one would be allowed to have access to the prisoners except a professional man himself; and that, in order that a person in Bridewell, who wished to employ a professional man, might have an opportunity of knowing the names of the advocates, a list of attorneys practising at the police-court should be placed in a prominent position in the cells.—Liverpool Albion.

ROYAL BRITISH BANK.—The following letter has been addressed to the Editor of the Daily News:—

"SIR,—A very significant paragraph appears in the Times of this morning, 'that the Bill to effect a compromise between the creditors and shareholders in this unfortunate swindle is opposed in the House of Lords by Lord St. Leonards and others among the law lords, and will accordingly remain in abeyance until after the appeal of the Tipperary shareholders shall have been heard.' A pretty prospect this, certainly. Here have we been deluded from month to month, and told by Mr. Linklater that 16*s.* 6*d.* if not 18*s.* in the pound, would certainly be realised. Everything was to be productive in the highest degree; the Welsh mine was to realise £40,000 at least, the balance against Mr. Brown to be reduced to a mere nothing, and the shareholders to contribute their 6*s.* 6*d.* without delay and without compulsion. Now, what is the actual state of things? Scarcely more than enough to pay the law expenses has been recovered from the estate since the last dividend; the Welsh mine, instead of realising £40,000 is said to be offering at £15,000, and it is doubtful if it is worth one shilling, for it is said to be working at a great weekly loss. Add to this, that the directors who were to contribute so largely themselves, and to influence others to do likewise, and Mr. Humphrey Brown in particular, whose services were so indispensable to enable the assignees to realise the value of his own assets, are all in custody on charges of fraud and felony, and the expenses of their prosecution, if carried out on the same scale as everything else has been, will certainly swamp every shilling this estate can for the future produce. A very pretty conclusion truly, sir; and I think most of your readers will be of the same opinion, and think with me, that those who sold their debts when they had the opportunity of doing so, have realised in a remarkable degree the truth of the old adage, 'That a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.' I am, &c., AN UNFORTUNATE DEPOSITOR."

THE PAY OF MINISTERS OF THE CROWN.—In the new number of the Journal of the Statistical Society, published on Saturday, is an elaborately prepared and very important article by Dr. Farr, on the "Pay of Ministers of the Crown;" Dr. Farr's object being to arrive at some natural standard by which the salaries of the principal Ministers of the Crown should be regulated, which he concludes should be the incomes of the highest classes of professional men. But what are these? His inquiries respecting the incomes of the most eminent physicians and surgeons of the present day show that only about ten are receiving £5,000 a-year and upwards. The incomes of the heads of the Church range from £4,200 to £15,000 a-year. Dr. Farr passes over both these classes, and adopts for his standard the average earnings of the most eminent barristers and judges. He finds that the incomes of twenty-four barristers ranged from £5,000 to £20,000, and those of the same number of judges from £4,800 to £8,000. He concludes, therefrom, that the salaries of the principal Ministers of the Crown are below the "natural standard," which he thus derives from the average earnings of the professional class whose duties approach the nearest to those exercised by members of the Government.

THE LATE EXTRAORDINARY ASSAULT CASE AT BIRMINGHAM.—The indictment preferred by Mr. Hodgson, the ex-Mayor of Birmingham, against Mr. H. Collis, a solicitor of that town, for a violent assault committed on the 4th of June, was tried June 24, before Mr. Recorder HILL, at the borough sessions. Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Cockle appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. Spooner and Mr. Mills for the defendant. It will be recollected, that, owing to a misunderstanding in connection with the Duke of Cambridge's visit to Birmingham, Mr. Collis took offence at a letter written by Mr. Hodgson, and, not obtaining its withdrawal, committed a violent assault upon him in his own office. The jury found the defendant "Guilty" of the third count of the indictment, charging him with an assault, and inflicting actual bodily harm. The Recorder postponed judgment until the following day, when Mr. Collis entirely withdrew all observations upon Mr. Hodgson's veracity; and he was sentenced to pay a fine of £50, and imprisonment with hard labour until paid. The penalty was immediately paid by the defendant, and he was discharged.

ROYAL BRITISH BANK.—Mr. Bloxam, the chief clerk, decided (June 24) that Mr. Empson, solicitor of Moorgate-street, who had on various occasions had his name made use of for the purpose of transferring shares in the company, was not to be placed upon the list of contributories as liable, subject to the right of the official manager to appeal against the decision.—Daily News.

Mr. John Shattock, attorney, was, on Tuesday, again brought up on remand, charged with forging Messrs. Little and Murray's name to a bill of exchange for 30*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.* Mr. Aspinall appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. Buck defended the prisoner, who was committed for trial. On Thursday the prisoner was committed on a further charge of uttering a forged bill of exchange for £35, purporting to be accepted by Richard Coleman, and upon which he had obtained an advance of £20 from Henry De Medina, attorney, King-street, Finsbury-square, London.—Liverpool Albion.

ELECTION OF SHERIFFS.—Alderman Lawrence, and Mr. Allen, citizen and stationer, were elected to serve the office of Sheriffs of London and Sheriff of Middlesex for the ensuing year.

NEW QUEEN'S COUNSEL.—Mr. Skinner and Mr. Huddlestone, of the Oxford Circuit, have been appointed Queen's Counsel.

William Fry Channell, Esq., one of the Barons of her Majesty's Court of Exchequer; and Henry Singer Keating, Esq., her Majesty's Solicitor-General, received the honour of knighthood on June 18th.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

LANDS CLAUSES ACT—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Regent's Canal Company v. Ware, 5 W. R. 617.

This case has determined a point on which there had been some conflict of judicial opinion—viz. the extent to which a notice to take lands under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, with subsequent proceedings under it, places the landowner and the company in the relative position of vendor and purchaser, and entitles the one or the other to the usual remedy by way of specific performance.

The question was first raised in the case of Stone v. The Commercial Railway Company (4 My. & Cr. 122). The contest there arose from the fact that the company had issued a precept to the jury in which the description of the lands did not agree with that in the previous notice, and the landowner applied for an injunction to restrain the proceedings upon it. The Court granted the injunction; and, in the course of the judgment, Lord Cottenham expressly laid it down, that, the moment the company had given the notice, the relative situation of vendors and purchasers was constituted; and that the company had no power afterwards to reduce the amount of land to be taken.

This was not, however, a bill for specific performance. But in the subsequent case of Walker v. Eastern Counties Railway Company, where, in consequence of the delay of the company after they had given their notice, the landowner filed a bill for specific performance—V. C. Wigram gave a large interpretation to Lord Cottenham's dictum, and held that the notice alone constituted a contract; and that, although the purchase-money remained to be ascertained by the mode prescribed by the statute, the plaintiff was nevertheless entitled to a decree for specific performance. The same point again occurred, or was considered to have occurred, in Adams v. London and Blackwall Railway, where V. C. Wigram overruled a demurrer by the company to a bill for specific performance. On appeal, this judgment was reversed by Lord Cottenham (2 Mac. & G. 118), partly on the ground that V. C. Wigram had taken an erroneous view of the facts alleged; but, though Lord Cottenham expressly abstained from any direct observations on Walker v. Eastern Counties Railway, he at the same time explained in a much more limited sense the language which he had himself employed in Stone's Case. After stating that the Vice-Chancellor's view appeared to be, that the notice by itself constituted the relation of vendor and purchaser, and that the Court could enforce the performance of all the incidents to that relationship, he qualified the doctrine as follows:—"It is, I think, quite true, that, to a certain extent and for certain purposes, the compulsory taking of land under the Railway Acts places the companies and the owners in the relative situation of purchasers and vendors; such, for instance, as to fixing between them the land to be taken. This was all that was decided in Stone's Case; but it by no means follows, that this Court will therefore take upon itself the specific performance of such sales. If, indeed, the proceedings lead to an agreement, the Court might do so; for then, although originating in the compulsory power, the purchase would be to be effected under a private agreement, and so other cases may arise; but whether it would do so if the case depended entirely upon the notice of taking the land not followed by any agreement, or, indeed, by any claim on the part of the owner (for such is the present case, as stated by the bill), the amount of purchase-money, therefore, not being ascertained, is a question upon which I do not think it necessary to express any opinion, because I think that the circumstances of this case call for a decision founded on very different principles." This was the state of the question when the present case came before the Master of the Rolls. In this instance, the notice had been followed by an award, under an arbitration pursuant to the Lands Clauses Act, so that the price was definitively ascertained; and the bill for specific performance was filed, not by the landowner, but by the company. There were some other specialties in the case; but the judgment of the Master of the Rolls was given independently of them. His Honour considered, that the observations in Adams v. Blackwall Railway substantially overruled V. C. Wigram's view. At the same time, he held that the present case, where not only had the notice been given, but the price also had been fixed, fell within the exceptions noticed by Lord Cottenham [printed in italics in our extract from his judgment], and that the relation of vendor and purchaser had become complete, so as to enable the Court to decree specific performance. This is the first instance of such a decree in favour of the company; and although there were peculiar circumstances arising out of the fact, that the land was taken under a special clause introduced into the Company's Act, in the interest of the defendant, it appears to have been his Honour's view that the company was equally entitled with the landowner to relief by way of specific performance, although the possession of their statutory powers of enforcing the completion by other means might, in an ordinary case, have a bearing on the question of costs.

COST-BOOK COMPANY—PARTIES.

Sibley v. Minton, 5 W. R. 675.

The very anomalous position, in a legal point of view, of cost-book companies has frequently given rise to the utmost difficulty in dealing with suits relating to such companies. Courts of equity generally refuse to take judicial notice of the characteristics of the cost-book system (see Fenn's Case, 4 De G. Mac. & Gor. 285; and Hawkins' Case, 4 W. R. 224); and whenever it is attempted to be explained in the pleadings or at the bar, it is sure to receive the most contradictory interpretations, according to the exigencies of the case. In the majority of instances, where companies upon the cost-book principle are started out of the jurisdiction of the Stannaries Court, the real object of the promoters is to avoid the restrictive provisions of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, or rather to persuade the public that they do so, and to create a species of transferable scrip, which may pass from hand to hand without registration. But if there be any peculiarity of the proper cost-book system which is more definite, and, in Cornwall at all events, more general than another, it is the registration of all the co-adventurers or shareholders and their transferees. Without such registration it is evident that the position of the adventurers both inter se and as regards creditors, must be still more complicated and embarrassing than it need otherwise be, especially where the company is beyond the jurisdiction of the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries. If the names of all the persons liable to one another and to the public may be known by looking at the cost-book, it will be much easier to ascertain the rights of all parties, than it can be in the case of a company where the shareholders are unknown, and there exists no means of discovering who they are. Sibley v. Minton decides, that, in certain cases, cost-book companies are to be regarded merely as ordinary partnerships; so that even if they succeed in avoiding some of the restrictions imposed by statute upon joint-stock companies, they pay a corresponding penalty in being exposed to all the inconveniences, for the purpose of relieving companies from which the Joint-Stock Companies Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. 110) was passed. In the present case, the bill was filed by a shareholder in a cost-book mining company, to restrain the company, its committee, and also a creditor of the company, from proceeding at law against the plaintiff in equity. It appeared that an action was brought, at the instance of the committee, against the plaintiff in equity, who was the holder of shares in the company, upon which he had not paid up all the calls. The shareholders in the company were about 1,000 in number, and were, as were also the committee, a continually fluctuating body; and the defendants in this suit were three persons who constituted the committee of management when the request was made to the creditor (the other defendant) to proceed against the plaintiff. It was objected, that the committee did not represent the company for the purpose of the suit, the company being a mere partnership, and the plaintiff not suing on behalf of himself and of all the other shareholders. The bill also prayed that the plaintiff's liability might be ascertained, and for an account. Kindersley, V. C., in his judgment, treated the company as a monster partnership, and, therefore—an account, in which all the partners were interested, being necessary—he held that all the partners must be parties to the suit. It is impossible to see how, upon the established principles of the Court, his Honour could have decided otherwise; and yet there could hardly be a more striking illustration of the very unsatisfactory character of the legal status of cost-book companies, when they come before our ordinary tribunals. It would, of course, be utterly impracticable to conduct a suit, and enforce an equity, against a thousand individual defendants, whose rights as against the plaintiff, and liabilities to him and to one another, might possibly vary in each particular case; and, supposing all the different equities declared by the decree, it would be simply ridiculous to attempt taking an account of the partnership dealings as between the plaintiff and the thousand defendants, his co-adventurers. This decision is another illustration of the embarrassment arising from attempts to apply the cost-book principle to companies that ought properly to be constituted in the ordinary manner, under the Joint-Stock Companies Acts.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—ENTIRETY OF CONTRACT—DIFFERENCE, AS TO ENFORCEMENT, BETWEEN NEGATIVE AND POSITIVE AGREEMENT.

Stocker v. Wedderburne, 5 W. R. 671.

In this case, a very interesting question on the doctrine of the Court as to specific performance was raised by demurrer to the plaintiff's bill. There was an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants to form a company for the purpose of working certain patents belonging to the plaintiff, which he was to assign to the company; in consideration of which certain sums of money, and other benefits, were to be secured to the plaintiff, he engaging to render particular services, and to devote his time and labour to the company. The suit was for the specific performance of this agreement. Wood, V. C., allowed the demurrer, upon the ground that the agreement constituted one entire contract, as to the plaintiff's part of which the Court could not enforce the specific performance, and therefore that he was not entitled to enforce what he could not himself be compelled to observe. His Honour considered that the Court had no power of making the plaintiff perform that part of the agreement which related to his future services; and that upon breach the defendants would be left to sue him at law upon the covenant. The case of a party entitled to the benefit of a negative covenant coming for an injunction is thus noticed in the judgment:—"The terms on which the Court granted such an injunction were, that the party seeking it should act up to and perform his part of the agreement; and if it was shown that he had failed to do so, the Court always had the power of dissolving the injunction, and thus doing complete justice between the parties."

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

Pidgeon v. Legge, 5 W. R., Exch., 649.

It is a general rule of law that a person may be guilty of a tort (or wrong independent of contract) by authorising or causing it to be done by another. And it is another rule, that a master is generally liable for a tort committed by his servant acting in the execution of his orders: the latter rule, indeed, being identical with the former in cases in which the relationship of master and servant exists between the defendant in the action and the person actually doing the wrong. The difficulty of applying these rules under particular circumstances gives rise to much litigation; the question to be solved usually being, whether he who did the tortious act complained of was, in contemplation of law, "acting in the execution of the orders" of the defendant? If he was so acting, then the case falls within the major proposition above referred to—the defendant authorised or caused the act to be done—and this, whether the general relationship of master and servant existed between him and the person actually doing it or not. If he was not so acting, then (though such relationship may have existed) the defendant is not liable. As an illustration of the state of facts first supposed, may be instanced the case of one who directs the sheriff to take a wrong party in execution (see Jarmain v. Hooper, 6 Man. & Gr. 827), or of a coachman, who, in order to extricate his master's carriage from a crowd, strikes and injures a bystander (Croft v. Alison, 4 Barn. & A. 590). As an illustration of the state of facts secondly supposed, the case of Pidgeon v. Legge, above noticed, may serve as an example. In this case the defendant kept an inn, and the plaintiff, a chimney-sweeper, being in the house in a dirty condition, and refusing to leave the premises, was, at the request of the defendant, forcibly turned out by the police. In the course of his ejection he offered resistance, and a struggle ensued, in which his leg was broken. It was held by the Court that a master is not responsible for the acts of his servants committed in excess of his orders; that in this case the defendant's direction to the police to turn the plaintiff out was justifiable, and that it could not be held, that, in giving such direction, he had either authorised or caused the violence of which the plaintiff complained. The rule of law was further illustrated by Bramwell, B., thus:—"Suppose a master tells his servant to turn a boy off the wall of his garden, and the servant is aggravated, and, while the master looks on, he gives the boy a box on the ear, it is clear the master would not be answerable for that; so neither is the defendant answerable for the violence used by the policeman when exasperated by the resistance of the plaintiff."

The above distinctions suppose, of course, the act ordered to be a lawful one. If it were unlawful, then the person ordering it to be done would be liable not only for the misconduct of those whom he employs, but—if these subcontract—of all concerned in the actual commission of the injury (see Knight v. Fox, 5 Exch. 721). It is also to be noted, that an act complained of may have been done in the execution of the orders of the defendant so as to make him liable, if it was committed in the course of negligently executing such orders, and not (as in the case above noticed) in excess of them. Accordingly, it was said by the Court, in the above case, that the defendant would probably have been liable, if the police, in carrying the plaintiff out, had negligently knocked his head against the door-post.

ABUSE OF COUNTY COURT PROCESS.

Reg. v. Evans, 5 W. R., C. C. R., 652.

The subject involved in this case is a very important one; it being most necessary to guard against the county courts being made the means of extorting money from the poorer and illiterate classes of the people, either by directly forging the process of the court, or by collecting debts, &c., as if in virtue of its authority. It appears that Evans sent to one J. R., who owed him some money, a letter or application headed with the Royal arms, and the letters "V. R.," to the effect, that, unless he paid him his debt, proceedings would be taken in the county court to recover the same; and that such letter concluded, "Frederick Mugliston, clerk to the court, instructed by J. Evans;" and that afterwards (on the sum owed being paid) he further demanded from the wife of J. R. certain money which he alleged to be due as county court expenses. The prisoner was convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment, with hard labour, for two months; but it was now contended that no offence had been committed under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 57 (the provision under which the proceedings had been taken), by which it is felony to forge the seal or any process of the court; or knowingly to serve or enforce any such forged process; or to deliver, or cause to be delivered, any paper falsely purporting to be a copy of a summons or other process of the court; or to act, or profess to act, under any false colour or pretence of the process of the court. It was under the last branch of this provision that the conviction in the above case was ultimately affirmed, with the disapproval only of Mr. Baron Bramwell. It was held that the prisoner had clearly pretended to act under the process of the county court, such his intention being conclusively established by his subsequent demand of "county court expenses." On the other hand, it was argued, that the mere sending of the above application by itself was not acting under colour of process, or within the meaning of the statutable offence. And Mr. Baron Bramwell retained his opinion, that such offence could only be committed by acting, by a false colour and pretence, under a genuine document.

ATTORNEY—LIEN FOR COSTS—PURCHASE OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

Smith v. Selwyn, 5 W. R., Q. B., 682.

It may be remembered that some time ago* a case came before the Court of Queen's Bench, in which notice was incidentally taken of the rule that an attorney cannot pendente lite purchase from his client the cause of action, and in which it was laid down that the right of setting off one judgment against another is one which may be subject to prior rights, as, for example, to the lien of the attorney for his costs. In the above case a rule was moved for calling on the defendant to show cause why a judgment obtained against him for £78 should not be set-off against part of a sum of £152, directed by a judge's order (which had been made a rule of court) to be refunded by the plaintiff to the defendant. The order above referred to had been made to set aside a judgment for that amount, which the plaintiff had previously obtained against the defendant, and for which he had taken out execution. The substantial answer to this application was, that the £152 had been, after the order had issued, but before it was made a rule of court, assigned by the defendant to his attorneys; but it was contended, on the authority of Simpson v. Lamb, above referred to, that validity to such assignment should not be given, because it was made while the proceedings in the action might still be regarded as pending, inasmuch as the costs had to be taxed and the judge's order to be made a rule of court. The Court, however, distinguished the two cases; and they said, that, in fact, the suit was not pending when the assignment was made; for "though there may be an appeal to set aside a judge's order, yet so long as it stands it settles the rights of the parties." Mr. Justice Crompton remarked, "It might as well be argued that a debt could not be assigned after final judgment."

ARTICLED CLERK—FORM OF RULE FOR ALLOWING ARTICLES TO BE INROLLED, AND SERVICE TO BE COMPUTED FROM THEIR DATE.

Ex parte Lewis Hand, 5 W. R., B. C., 687.

This was a motion for a rule, that, in the case of the applicant, "service be computed from the date of the articles, Feb. 25, 1852; and that the articles of Jan. 19, 1854 be vacated; and that the first-named articles, being properly stamped, be inrolled." As the application was successful, and as the form of the rule may be useful, we give it ipsissimis verbis. It was made under the statute to which we have often referred (19 & 20 Vict. c. 81), allowing articles to be stamped after six months upon certain terms, by the permission of the Treasury. And it was shown by the affidavits that the applicant had been unaware of the omission of his master to stamp his articles until the six months after their date had expired. It appears from this, and several other cases, to be an inflexible rule that the affidavits in these applications must contain allegations showing that there was no neglect of the clerk, or knowledge in him of the omission in time to rectify it within the six months; and, therefore, it is to be hoped that they will not for the future be attempted unless the facts of the case will admit of such statements being made. On the other hand, the Courts seem not to be influenced adversely by any negligence or ignorance of the master, however culpable. Thus, on the same day as that in which they disposed of the case of Mr. Hand, they acceded to another application of the same kind, in which it appeared that neither the applicant nor his master knew of the existence of the statute requiring the articles to be inrolled within six months from their date.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

The Annual General Meeting of the Members of the Incorporated Law Society took place on the 23rd instant, at their hall in Chancery-lane: Edward White, Esq., the President, in the chair.

The following gentlemen, who went out of office in rotation, were re-elected:—

Benjamin Austen.	Edward Rowland Pickering.
Keith Barnes.	William Stephens.
John Coverdale.	John James Joseph Sudlow.
James Leman.	William Williams.
William Henry Palmer.	John Young.

In lieu of the late Mr. Bryan Holme (who was the first promoter of the institution), Mr. John Hope Shaw, of Leeds, was elected a member of the Council.

Mr. Edward Leigh Pemberton was elected President, and Mr. John Young, Vice-President, of the Society.

The auditors elected for the ensuing year are—Charles John Bloxam, Henry Charles Chilton, and Robert Manley Lowe.

The Annual Report of the Council was then read by the Secretary; and a resolution was passed, that it be received, approved, and entered on the minutes; and that such parts of it as the Council think fit be printed and circulated amongst the members. The following are the subjects comprised in the Report:—

1. The alterations effected in the Law and Practice.
2. The new Bills in Parliament.
3. The proposed practical improvements in the administration of justice.
4. Professional usages in conveyancing practice.
5. The remuneration of solicitors with reference to the recent Order sin Chancery.
6. The concentration of the Courts and Offices in the vicinity of the Inns of Court.
7. The proposed extension of legal education and examination.
8. Malpractice cases and encroachments on professional rights and privileges.
9. The registration of attorneys, re-admissions, and the renewal of certificates.
10. The affairs of the Society; the state of its funds; the sale of land not required for the purposes of the Society; the new building; the library; lectures; new members, &c.

The Report stated that 78 new members had joined the Society, making the present number 1,600; of whom 1,273 are town, and 327 country, members. The Council expressed their opinion that it would be advantageous that a limited number of members of the Society, resident and practising in the country, should be members of the Council.

The Auditors' Report, signed by Mr. Few, jun., Mr. Beaumont, and Mr. Lowe, was then read and approved by the meeting. It appeared that the income of the last year was 6,662*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*, and the payments 5,348*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.*, leaving a surplus of 1,314*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*

The best thanks of the meeting were presented to Mr. White, the President, for his able superintendence of, and zealous and constant attention to, the various affairs of the Society, and the important interests of the Profession. Thanks were also voted to the Vice-President and Council for their valuable exertions during the past year.

PREROGATIVE COURT—UNDUE INFLUENCE (Wheeler v. Gore).

In Wheeler v. Gore—a case in which the validity of a will was in dispute—the difficult subject of "undue influence" came again under consideration. The decision of the Right Hon. Judge Keatinge, establishing the will, like the great judgment recently given by the House of Lords in Rossborough v. Boyse, shows the increasing unwillingness of the Courts to set aside a will duly made by a testator, in full possession of his reasoning powers, on the ground of alleged "undue influence;" or, in other words, they allow a sane testator to dispose of his property to the person whom he likes best, without regard to the claims of his relatives.

In the present case, it appeared that Mr. R. J. Wilson, the testator, who died in 1856, unmarried, had, by a will executed with every formality in the presence of respectable witnesses, and while the testator was in full enjoyment of his understanding, bequeathed the greater part of his property to the promovant, Mrs. Wheeler, whom he described as his "dear and esteemed friend." The next of kin of the deceased impugned this will, on the ground that it was made against the wish and intention of the testator; that he was in a very bad state of health; that Mrs. Wheeler was in constant attendance upon him; that he was unable to dispense with her services; and that she induced him to make the bequest by a threat of abandoning him.

His Lordship, in delivering judgment, detailed the history of the parties, and the strong intimacy that existed between them, and adverted to the fact that the testator was a man of good sense and business habits. Several circumstances were stated, showing, that, by the testator's wish, when his health was failing, the promovant had given up her house, and made great personal sacrifices to attend upon him; for which services he frequently expressed his gratitude, and promised to provide for her liberally. It appeared that the will had been executed with every legal formality; and it had not been proved that the bequest to Mrs. Wheeler resulted from any fraud or duress of any kind or description. He therefore considered that it was the duty of the Court to establish the will; each party paying her own costs.

PARLIAMENTARY AND OTHER OATHS.

The Parliamentary Debates during the past week have been to a very great extent occupied by the subject of the oaths to be taken by members of the Commons House; and the London journals have, in consequence, devoted much of their space to the consideration of that apparently all-important topic. Any one might suppose that the chief business to be transacted in Parliament was oath-taking; for all projects of law amendment seem to fade into insignificance by the side of the mighty question so anxiously debated—what is to be sworn by new members before they be permitted to take up the position in the Legislature assigned to them by their constituents? The precious hours and days of a too brief session are thus occupied to the exclusion of topics which we venture to consider of infinitely greater importance to the well-being of the State. This protracted, and ever-renewed, conflict may reasonably excuse some remarks, not on parliamentary oaths only, but on all oaths taken on admission to any calling or rank of life. Not only are new legislators compelled to swear, but also new barristers, new attorneys and solicitors, new officials in many public and judicial departments. From observation of what takes place on these occasions, we have reason to fear, that, in most instances, the required form of words is gabbled over and assented to with small attention to their import—with an impatient concurrence, yielded because it must be done. As stamp duties and fees are submitted to as fiscal exactions, as a kind of legalised black-mail from which we cannot escape, so swearing is submitted to as an infliction, time-honoured, planted in the doorway of our new profession—devised by the questionable wisdom of our ancestors, to render the admission more select, and to render the admitted somewhat more conscientious and scrupulous than they would otherwise be. For some reason or other the law is a profession the entrance to which is plentifully hedged about with oaths. Practitioners in many other honourable and scientific professions have no oaths to take; and we never heard that they were less zealous or less honourable in consequence thereof. That such oaths have become a farce and an absurdity is plainly demonstrated by the Indemnity Bill, annually passed for the protection against penalties of persons who have omitted to comply with the swearing laws.

Oaths are evidently of two kinds—such as relate to past or present transactions, and such as are designed to influence the future conduct of the swearer. The first class of oaths are, for the purposes of justice, highly useful: solemnising the mind, and repressing the imaginative powers of the witness. He knows, moreover, that the law has prescribed distinct penalties, to which false swearing may render him liable: he, therefore, in the witness-box (unless he be a hardened sinner), confines himself to facts, and reserves the exercise of imagination for parliamentary committees on railway and other bills, where oaths are not in vogue, and the use of the long bow is, therefore, extensively practised. But as to oaths of office and the like, designed to regulate future conduct, we cannot point to one benefit arising from their use, or suggest one argument for their continuance. Their defenders must admit, that, at the best, they resemble mere empty forms. It will not be alleged that the legislator is more wise, the statesman more patriotic, the barrister more convincing, the attorney more acute, by reason of any number of oaths taken and subscribed. It cannot be believed that the moral and intellectual qualities are heightened or improved by the act of applying the lips to the well-known leathern-bound volume (whose true use is when open, not shut) at the conclusion of an usher's parrot-like recitation? Take the case of a Judge or a Commissioner appointed by the Crown to an office of high importance, requiring the exercise of large powers of mind, and of still higher moral qualities. The selection of such an one should be in itself a sufficient guarantee of his fitness; and, unless he possess the requisite qualities, it is most improbable that oath-taking would secure any better discharge of his duties. To impose any oath in such a case is not only superfluous, but objectionable; as implying that acceptance of office is not a sufficient pledge that its duties will be honourably and properly performed by the acceptor.

These considerations lead to the conclusion that all these oaths, not judicially required for purposes of testimony, ought to be abolished. The oath of allegiance requires a separate mention. This oath has not merely the negative qualities of some others. Under some conceivable circumstances, it might become a positive injury and mischief. Enjoying all the benefits of a temperate, well-balanced, and efficient form of government, it is hardly worth while to speculate on the possible consequences of a change, of which not the slightest symptom is visible. An inquiry into the nature of an oath of allegiance would be, therefore, rather curious than useful. In olden times, before the principle of hereditary monarchy had been infringed upon, an oath of allegiance to the sovereign, his heirs and successors, had its use and its significance. But when the Lords and Commons (who had, of course, sworn allegiance to King James) declared the throne "vacant," and elected an individual to fill it, the hereditary rule was so far modified as to be virtually broken through; and the oath of allegiance could not thereafter be construed as implying more than a promise of submission to the sovereign de facto, so long as he or she should continue on the throne. To take a familiar illustration. The chairman of a public meeting, while he continues such, is entitled to the support and co-operation of all present in the maintenance of his authority; the majority of those present may, however, claim the right of dispensing with his services, and electing a new chairman. A similar right was established by those who effected the Revolution of 1688, if we may take the opinon of the best modern historians and critics. But, though the constitution is essentially changed, the oath continues; and the admirers of both must, of necessity, reconcile them, by construing the latter into a mere promise of submission to the existing Government, until the time when it shall be superseded by another. This, we apprehend, can hardly be accepted as a fair interpretation of very plain, unqualified words; and a full consideration of the subject will, we think, lead to the conclusion, that this oath ought to be abolished, as being inconsistent with the spirit of our present constitution—as being so worded as to be, by tender consciences, unexplainable in the mode above suggested. Our proposition therefore is, that, without disturbing any political rights or disabilities—for with them this Journal has nothing to do—abundant reason appears for doing away with all oaths, except such as are confined to the legitimate object of oaths—the verification of testimony.

LEASES AND SALES OF SETTLED ESTATES ACT.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—Last autumn I consulted Mr. Bacon, Q. C., as to the late Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act, and was advised by him that the same strength of case was requisite to found a petition to the Court of Chancery as would formerly have been required by Parliament before passing an enabling Act.

Can any of your readers who have conducted petitions say how far this view has been adopted by the Court? Judging from the advertisements which have appeared, I should fancy not; but no cases have been reported to enable me to deduce any principle.—Yours faithfully, RUSTICUS.

Review.

A Manual of the Law of Principal and Agent. By EZEKIEL CHARLES PETGRAVE, Attorney-at-Law. Stevens & Norton. 1857.

A qualm of bashfulness seized Mr. Petgrave after the last of his sheets had received its final imprimatur, and he had sat down at leisure to compose a few prefatory remarks. His fears arose (as we learn from those remarks), first, from the consciousness that he was an attorney, and not a barrister; and, secondly, from the fact that he had "written the work some years ago, having recently made, amidst numerous other engagements, a few additions." Now, with regard to the first source of his apprehensions, we beg to offer our solemn protest against the exclusive privilege of the bar it infers to exist. No reason whatever can be suggested why the field of literature should be confined to the horse-haired branch of the profession. If a man knows juridical secrets worth communicating to the public, let him by all means deliver himself of them forthwith; whether he has acquired the right to practise by eating mutton in Hall, and digesting it in the somniferous atmosphere of the lecture-room, or by taking part in the actual practice of his profession for several years, and undergoing the tolerably severe test of proficiency prescribed at the end of such period by the Examiners. If any of those who have passed through this last ordeal become authors, we can promise them, in the columns of this journal at least, an attentive consideration, influenced by no feeling except what is excited by the merits or demerits of the work itself—an offer, we will take leave to observe, not to be slighted in these days of favouritism and puffing. But we must not lose sight of Mr. Petgrave.

We have said that his first ground for apprehension is, in our eyes, altogether a mistaken one; but his second was well founded. It is, in truth, a great pity that he did not delay the publication of his treatise, till he could find leisure thoroughly to revise and settle it according to the existing law. It is, no doubt, very hard work to keep oneself au courant the incessant changes produced by piece-meal legislation. Nay, to adopt the pious ejaculation of Lord Tenterden, "God forbid that it should be imagined that an attorney, or a counsel, or even a judge should know all the law!" But still every person who takes upon him to expound any particular branch of it to those less learned than himself, is bound to take this trouble; at all events, with regard to his special subject. And this necessary industry Mr. Petgrave has failed to exert. Thus, in the very second page of his work, we find the following statement:—

"The enactment of the 1st section of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 14, is, that no acknowledgment or promise by words shall be deemed sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, unless such acknowledgment or promise shall be made in some writing to be signed by the party chargeable thereby. In consequence of these last words, it has been solemnly decided, that an acknowledgment signed by an agent on behalf of a debtor is not sufficient (Hyde v. Johnson, 2 Bing. N. C. 780)."

Now, it happens, unfortunately, that this blot in the law had been hit and remedied by the Legislature, nearly a year before the publication of this book, by a statute of which we much fear Mr. Petgrave never heard. We mean, of course, the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97), by the 13th section of which, (referring to the above provision of 9 Geo. 4, among others), it is provided that an acknowledgment or promise made or contained by or in a writing signed by an agent of the party chargeable thereby duly authorised to make the same, shall have the same effect as if such writing had been signed by such party himself.

Again, in Mr. Petgrave's statement as to the duties and obligations of agents employed to receive or deliver goods, we find a similar preference for the law of a few years ago to that which now swells the statute book. He takes occasion, in reference to this topic, to make the following remarks:—

"Carriers by water generally stipulate in their bills of lading that they shall be discharged from liability for losses occasioned by the 'act of God, the king's enemies, fire, &c.;' the first two of which exemptions they enjoyed at common [sic.], and that from loss by fire under 26 Geo. 3, c. 86, s. 2. In their charterparties they also stipulate that they shall be protected from various risks. They are further protected by stat. 26 Geo. 3, c. 86, from making good loss or damage to any gold, silver, diamonds, watches, jewels, or precious stones, sustained by any robbery, embezzlement, making away or secreting thereof, unless the owner or shipper has, at the time of shipping, declared the nature and value thereof in writing. 6 Geo. 4, c. 155, s. 53, exempts them from liability for damage arising from the want of a duly qualified pilot, unless incurred by their own refusal or neglect to take one on board; and by s. 55, from liability for loss incurred through the default or incompetency of a licensed pilot. Where their common law liability remains, it is much narrowed by the following Acts—viz. 7 Geo. 4, c. 15, which exempts them from making good losses incurred by the misconduct of the masters and mariners, without their privity, to a greater extent than the value of the ship and freight; 26 Geo. 3, c. 86, s. 1, which extends the above enactment to all cases of loss by robbery by whomsoever committed; and 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, which extends it to all cases of loss occasioned without their default or privity."—P. 57.

In the above passage, 6 Geo. 4, c. 155, is, by a clerical error, put for 6 Geo. 4, c. 125; and 7 Geo. 4, c. 15, for 7 Geo. 2, c. 15; and—these emendations made—the whole of the five statutes mentioned therein were repealed three years ago by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120; while provisions of the same general description were substituted in an Act of the same session—viz. "The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854." Moreover, in a passage immediately preceding that last quoted—while discussing the effect of the Carriers Act, 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 68—not a word is said as to the position of railway, and canal navigation companies, considered as common carriers; nor any reference to the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, by which they are expressly made liable for neglect or default, notwithstanding any notice attempting to limit their liability.

Mr. Petgrave, however, appears (and we have much pleasure in recording the fact) to have noted up cases with much more industry than he has Acts of Parliament. We could not, indeed, venture to pass a decided judgment on his work, in this respect, without more detailed study of its contents than we have had an opportunity of making. But the results of an investigation of a few passages selected at random have been satisfactory. Thus, at p. 148, in speaking of the liability of agents on contracts in writing, and after remarking on the somewhat peculiar footing in this respect of bills and notes, and that an agent signing either in his own name without any qualification of his liability, will be personally responsible, though he has himself no interest in the transaction, Mr. Petgrave thus proceeds:—

"Where a bill was drawn on the cashier of a company on account of the company, and the cashier accepted it in his own name, he was held personally liable on his acceptance (Thomas v. Bishop, 2 Str. 955; and see Jenkins v. Morris, 16 Mee. & W. 877). Justice Story expresses his doubts whether this principle of the personal liability of the agent was not carried too far in this case; but in more recent English decisions the principle has been carried quite as far (Story, s. 269, n.; Mare v. Charles, 25 L. J., Q. B., 119). Thus, where a bill of exchange, purporting to be for value received in machinery supplied to the mining company, was addressed to the defendant, who accepted the same thus: 'Accepted for the Company, A. B., Purser;' it was held that defendant was personally liable. Lord Campbell said: 'This case falls within the principle of Thomas v. Bishop, which may have been doubted on the other side of the Atlantic, but has always been looked upon as good law here' (Nicholls v. Diamond, 23 L. J., Exch., 1. See also Owen v. Van Uster, 10 C. B. 313; 20 L. J., C. P., 61). But it was considered, that, on an acceptance by a purser of a company, under similar circumstances, the words per proc. relieved him from responsibility."

The statement here given of the law on this point strikes us as being both clear and accurate; and it is fortified with very recent authorities, though, by some carelessness in the preparation for the press, Nicholls v. Diamond and Mare v. Charles have been transposed; per quod, Lord Campbell is made to sneer at the American lawyers as a Baron of the Exchequer, instead of as Lord Chief Justice of England. To the decisions noticed by Mr. Petgrave, the case of Aggs v. Nicholson (1 H. & N. 165) might, moreover, have been added with advantage; but that case was only published in October, 1856, and may perhaps be excusably ignored by a writer who brought out his book early in the following year.

On the whole, we think the above passage a favourable specimen of Mr. Petgrave's powers; and the rather that it is, in the main, original, and not merely abridged from Mr. Justice Story: for the tenacity with which our author, as the general rule, clings to the skirt of his model, must be occasioned either by distrust in his own powers, or from his never having been properly instructed in the difference between meum and tuum. It is true, that, in the preface, the obligations under which he lies to the American jurist are acknowledged to a certain extent; and that it is somewhat difficult to draw the line between plagiarism and honest borrowing. Indeed, we do not know that Mr. Petgrave has appropriated the result of another man's labour and talent, more than many other writers whose reputations have not thereby suffered; nor is it our duty, as caterers for the Profession, to be over nice, provided a good treatise is, somehow or other, achieved.

Mr. Petgrave has considerable powers as a legal writer. He is terse in his diction, and clear in his statements. He has the art of seizing upon the true point of a complicated case, and expressing it shortly—often by a single sentence; and this is a power which is by no means common, while it is one which is singularly conducive to the production of a valuable law book. All these capabilities for his task make us the more regret the deficiencies and mistakes which we have felt bound to mention. We commend Mr. Petgrave for the way in which he has written his work, but we blame him for publishing it without further revision.

Pending Measures of Law Reform.

LORD ST. LEONARDS' TRUSTEES RELIEF BILL.

S. 1. Where a trustee, executor, or administrator acting bonâ fide has committed a breach of trust, and profit has accrued to the parties beneficially interested in the estate in consequence of the same, such profit shall be set off against the loss, to the relief of such trustee, &c.; but as between or amongst the parties beneficially interested the profit and loss shall be distributed as the justice of the case may require.

S. 2. Where a trustee, &c., has bonâ fide made over-payments to person entitled for life, if with privity of remainderman, the trustee is not to be charged; but where the right of the remainderman is enforced against the trustee, the person receiving the over-payment is to be liable to refund.

S. 3. A trustee, &c., making payment under a power of attorney is not to be liable by reason of the death of the party giving such power, provided that the fact of the death at the time of such payment was not known to such trustee, &c.

S. 4. Where a trustee, &c., shall, in investing a fund, have bonâ fide acted upon the written opinion of one of her Majesty's counsel actually practising at the Chancery bar, given upon a case fairly stated, and shall, before such investment, have communicated such opinion to all the adult cestuis que trust (whether under coverture or not), and to the guardians, or parents, or persons standing in loco parentis of all the infant cestuis que trust, and to the committee of the estate of any cestui que trust being a lunatic or person of unsound mind, and such adult cestuis que trust and other persons shall not have objected to such proposed investment, though they had a reasonable time allowed them for that purpose, such trustee, &c., shall not be liable as for a breach of trust in respect of such investment.

S. 5. If a testator do not direct an act to be done which in equity ought to be done, a trustee, &c., is not to be liable for breach unless there has been crassa negligentia; but nothing in the Act contained is to exempt a trustee, &c., from payment of interest on balances in his hands, where he would now be liable to payment of such interest.

S. 6. No trustee, &c., is to be liable for omitting to sue for a debt, if there be ground for believing that payment would not be obtained.

S. 7. No trustee, &c., is to be liable for omission to sue on bond, &c., for money lent in lifetime of testator or intestate, unless required so to do by the will, or by the next of kin or other persons interested.

S. 8. Where an executor or administrator, liable as such to the rents, covenants, or agreements contained in any lease or agreement for a lease granted or assigned to the testator or intestate whose estate is being administered, shall have satisfied all such liabilities thereunder as may have accrued due up to that time, and shall have set apart a sufficient fund to answer future claims in respect of any fixed sum agreed by the lessee to be laid out on the property, although the period for laying out the same may not have arrived, and shall have assigned the lease or agreement for a lease to a purchaser thereof, he shall be at liberty to distribute the residuary personal estate of the deceased amongst the parties entitled thereto, without appropriating any part of the testator's personal estate to meet any future liability; and the executor or administrator so distributing the residuary estate shall not afterwards be liable in respect of any subsequent claim under the said lease or agreement for a lease; but nothing therein contained shall prejudice the right of the lessee, or those claiming under him, to follow the assets of the deceased into the hands of the person or persons amongst whom the said assets may have been distributed.

S. 9. Where an executor or administrator shall have given notice for creditors and others to send in their claims against the estate of the testator or intestate, such executor or administrator shall, at the expiration of the time named in the notice, be at liberty to distribute the assets of the testator or intestate, having regard to the claims of which he has then notice, and shall not be liable for the assets so distributed to any person of whose claim he had no notice at the time of distribution; but nothing in the Act contained is to prejudice the right of any creditor to follow the assets into the hands of the persons who received the same.

S. 10. A trustee, &c., may apply by petition, or by summons upon a written statement, to any judge at chambers, for his opinion and advice in the management, &c., of trust-property; and the trustee, &c., acting upon the opinion given by the judge, from which there is to be no appeal, shall be deemed to have discharged his duty as such trustee, &c., in the subject-matter of the application; but this Act is not to indemnify any trustee, &c., from any act done in accordance with such opinion, if such trustee, &c., shall have been guilty of any fraud, or wilful concealment or misrepresentation in obtaining such opinion; and the costs of such application as aforesaid are to be in the discretion of the judge to whom the same is made.

S. 11. No breach of trust or duty shall be protected by this Act where the trustee, &c., shall, directly or indirectly, derive from the act constituting such breach of trust any personal benefit.

MARRIED WOMEN'S REVERSIONARY INTEREST BILL.

S. 1. After the passing of this Act, it shall be lawful for every married woman by deed to dispose of every future or reversionary interest, whether vested or contingent, of such married woman, or her husband in her right, in personal estate, as if she were a feme sole; and also to release her equity to a settlement out of any personal estate to which she, or her husband in her right, may be entitled in possession, save that no such disposition or release shall be valid unless the husband concur in the deed by which the same shall be effected, nor unless the deed be acknowledged by her as after directed.

S. 2. Deeds are to be acknowledged by married women in the manner required by the Fines and Recoveries Act for disposing of interests in land.

S. 3. The powers of disposition given by this Act are not to interfere with any other powers which, independently of this Act, may be vested in, or limited or reserved to a married woman.

S. 4. The powers of disposition hereby given to a married woman shall not enable her to dispose of any interest in personal estate which may have been settled upon her by any settlement or agreement for a settlement made on the occasion of her marriage.

S. 5. This Act not to extend to Scotland.

WILLS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD BILL.

S. 1. Wills of British subjects, made according to the law of England, are to be valid, although such subjects may have been resident or domiciled abroad.

S. 2. Administration of the goods of British subjects dying intestate is to be granted to the persons entitled to the same by the law of England, notwithstanding such subjects shall, at the time of their deaths or at any other time, be or have been resident or domiciled elsewhere than in England, in like manner as if such subjects had died domiciled in England.

S. 3. This Act is not to apply to any will or administration of any person who shall be dead at the time of the passing thereof.

S. 4. Act not to apply to Scotland.

GRAND JURIES (METROPOLITAN POLICE DISTRICT) BILL.

S. 1. The attendance of a Grand Jury shall not be required at the Central Criminal Court, or at any of the General or Quarter Sessions within the Metropolitan Police District.

S. 2. No charge is to be tried at the Central Criminal Court, &c., unless previously investigated before a justice; and the officer of the Court is to prepare an information describing the offence as fully as in an indictment; and every information so filed shall be in lieu of an indictment found by a Grand Jury.

S. 3. The Attorney-General may direct an information to be filed, whether the charge has been previously investigated or not.

S. 4. Nothing hereinbefore contained shall apply to any charge of treason or misprision of treason; but in such cases a special commission shall issue, and all proceedings thereon shall be taken as if this Act had not been passed.

S. 5. This Act is not to apply to the procedure for the trial of any person against whom a verdict has been found of murder or manslaughter upon a coroner's inquisition.

CHARITABLE USES BILL.

The preamble recites the 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, and 9 Geo. 4, c. 85, and that doubts had arisen whether under the former it was possible to make valid assurance for charitable uses of hereditaments of copyhold tenure.

S. 1. No past or future deed or assurance for charitable uses of any hereditaments of any tenure whatsoever, or of any estate or interest therein upon valuable consideration, is to be void within the meaning of the first-recited Act, if such deed is made to take effect in possession immediately from the making thereof, and without any power of revocation, and has been at any time prior to the passing of this Act, or shall be within twelve months after the passing of this Act, or within six months after the making such deed, inrolled in Chancery.

S. 2. No past deed, &c., for charitable uses of any hereditaments of any tenure whatsoever, or of any estate or interest therein, not upon valuable consideration, is to be void by reason of not being indented, or of non-compliance with the formalities in 9 Geo. 2, c. 36, or of specified stipulations for the donor's benefit, or (as to copyholds) for want of deed, if deed, &c., be inrolled, as provided in s. 1.

S. 3. No future deed, &c., for charitable uses of any hereditaments, &c., not upon valuable consideration, is to be void by reason of not being indented, or of specified stipulations for donor's benefit, or (as to copyholds) for want of deed.

S. 4. Where charitable uses of any past deed not inrolled are declared by any other deed, &c., the inrolment of such other deed is to be sufficient; but if neither of such deeds has been inrolled, then it shall not be necessary for the purposes of the first-recited Act or of this Act to inrol such deed; but every such deed shall nevertheless be void unless such other deed shall within twelve months be inrolled.

S. 5. Where charitable uses of any future deed shall be declared by any other deed, the inrolment of such other deed within six months is to be requisite.

S. 6. Nothing in this Act is to render void any deed already valid by virtue of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 85; or to give effect to any deed already avoided at law or in equity, or to affect any suit at law or in equity actually commenced for avoiding such deed; and no deed, &c., thirty years old, nor as to which it shall be proved to the clerk of inrolments that the acknowledgment thereof by the grantor of the lands or hereditaments to which the same relates cannot be obtained within twelve months after the passing of this Act, shall, for the purposes of the first-recited Act or of this Act, require acknowledgment prior to inrolment.

S. 7. Hereditaments conveyed to trustees for charitable uses are to vest in the successors of original trustees duly appointed.

S. 8. Payments in lieu of fines, &c., as to copyholds, and (s. 9) for purposes of enfranchisement, are to have the same force as admittance.

S. 10. Nothing in the last three preceding sections of this Act is to extend to any property subject to the provisions of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 28, "To render more simple and effectual the titles by which congregations or societies for purposes of religious worship or education in England and Ireland hold property for such purposes."

S. 11. This Act is not to extend to Scotland or Ireland, nor to prejudice the two Universities, or the Colleges of Eton, Winchester, or Westminster.

LEASES AND SALES OF SETTLED ESTATES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

S. 1. The 20th and 21st ss. of the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, are hereby repealed.*

S. 2. The 26th sect. of the said Act shall stand as follows:—The Court shall be at liberty to exercise any of the powers conferred on it by this Act, whether the Court shall have already exercised any of the powers conferred by this Act in respect of the same property or not; but no such powers shall be exercised if an express declaration that they shall not be exercised shall be contained in the settlement; and the circumstance of the settlement containing powers to effect similar purposes shall not preclude the Court from exercising any of the powers conferred by this Act, if it shall think that the powers contained in the settlement ought to be extended.

TRANSPORTATION AND PENAL SERVITUDE BILL.

This Bill was read a third time, and passed.

STATUTE LAW COMMISSION.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had to call the attention of their Lordships to a subject of very great importance. He would conclude the observations he had to make by asking their Lordships to give a first reading to eight Bills, the object of each of which was the consolidation into a single statute of the whole of the law relating to important portions of the criminal law. Those Bills had been prepared by the members of the Commission appointed in 1854 for the purpose of considering the expediency and possibility of consolidating the statute law of this country—a subject that had at all times occupied the attention of lawyers. The first point which the Commission took into consideration was the different modes by which the object they had in view might be attained; and finally they came to the conclusion that it was better far to attempt to do something than to speculate on what might be the best manner of curing the evil. The difficulties which they had to encounter were enormous. It was suggested, that they should at once proceed to systematise and consolidate some portion of the law. That appeared plausible, and no doubt was the correct mode of framing a code of laws; but then the duty laid on the Commission was not to frame a code of laws, but to consolidate the law as it now existed. After various discussions, and having attempted, in the first instance, to take up what were called groups of statutes, and made some progress in that work, they found that it would not do, and that the only way to make any impression on the statute-book was to take different subjects, and consolidate all the laws relating to each of those subjects. This was not only attended with great difficulty, but with great danger; for it was impossible to be sure that every statute, or part of a statute, relating to a subject could be found and consolidated, and that some would not remain undiscovered, and therefore unconsolidated. In order, therefore, to proceed with certainty, the Commission employed some gentlemen of great information and research to commence a registration of the statutes, beginning with the statutes of the previous year. These gentlemen went to work, marking every enactment and every section, and every previous enactment to which any section referred, either in the way of repeal or modification. This implied great labour; but he was satisfied, that, if the Statute Law Commission did nothing else but complete this work, they would do something that was extremely valuable; for without such a process it would be impossible to make any progress in the consolidation of the law. The Commission had the assistance of a very learned member of the bar, Mr. Coulson, and they proceeded to divide the statutes into classes, ranged according to the extent of their operation; those relating to the united kingdom being placed in one class, those applying to England alone in another; and so on, making in all thirteen classes. In that operation they had not proceeded beyond her Majesty's reign; but of the Acts passed during the last twenty years it was found that one-third did not apply to what might properly be called the law of the country, such as the Appropriation Acts, and all Acts the force of which expired after a limited period. Taking out those statutes, the Commissioners proceeded to ascertain how many of the remainder applied to the United Kingdom. They found that only one-third so applied; and therefore three-fourths of the statutes which had been passed during the twenty years of her Majesty's reign could form no portion of the statute law book, if that book were to consist merely of laws which regulated the conduct of her Majesty's lieges. It might be said, that, the examination not having been concluded, no consolidation could be made. The Commissioners had considered that point, and had come to the conclusion, that, upon some subjects of a popular nature, of which consolidation would be eminently useful, it would be undesirable to postpone action, merely because some prior enactments might possibly be overlooked. They had, therefore, selected a number of subjects, and among others the criminal law, bearing in mind a recommendation of a committee of their Lordships' House in 1854, that the formation of a criminal code should be postponed, but that a consolidation should be effected. Besides the criminal law, they selected several other subjects in which they considered consolidation could be made tolerably perfect, depending as they did upon recent statutes—such as the laws relating to bills of exchange, to patents, to ecclesiastical leases, savings banks, &c. In all, they had consolidated sixty-five statutes, besides nine others which were now in the hands of the gentlemen who assisted the Commission. It must be understood, that, although the Commission employed the best skilled draftsmen they could find, yet they had not asked Parliament to sanction any Bills which had not been gone through with the utmost care by those members of the Commission best qualified to judge of their merits. The Bills relating to the criminal law had been gone through by the noble and learned lord at the table (Lord Campbell), by the late Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, by a gentleman who was of the utmost assistance to the Commission, Mr. Greaves, and by Sir F. Kelly. These Bills he laid upon the table at the close of the last session; but in the interval, before re-introducing them this session, it occurred to him that improvements might be made in them. They had been framed to include all indictable offences; but some offences became indictable after one or two previous summary convictions, and he thought it would be better to alter the shape of the Bills, and make them relate to offences whether indictable or punishable by some other modes. He had gone through these Bills with Mr. Greaves, and he now asked their Lordships to read them a first time. They did not include all the subjects embraced in the Bills of last year, some of which he thought could be deferred without much inconvenience, especially criminal procedure, which ought not to be dealt with pending the inquiries now being made by the Government in consequence of an address presented last session to her Majesty by the House of Commons upon the subject of the department of criminal justice. They had also postponed dealing with the subject of treason and offences against the State, which were not of a pressing nature. The eight Bills which he now asked th

House to read a first time related to larceny (including burglary), offences against the person, malicious injuries to property, forgery, offences relating to the coinage, the game laws—which, although relating to a species of larceny, it had been thought best to deal with in a separate Bill—libel, and the laws relating to accessories to offences. These Bills were not mere consolidations, as the Commissioners had not felt themselves justified in overlooking the decision of the House in 1854, that in any Bills which might be prepared, it was desirable that the amendments which had been suggested by the Criminal Law Commissioners, and which had met with universal approval, should be embodied. Those alterations, he thought, would lead to no difference of opinion. There were several other Bills quite ready to be laid before Parliament, but he thought it would be more convenient that they should be introduced in the other House. He thought he ought to tell their Lordships further, that, in proceeding with their work, the Commissioners had come to several conclusions which did not occur to them at first. There were many ancient statutes, for example, which could not, and ought not, to be consolidated—for instance, Magna Charta, the Act Quia Emptores, and other old statutes of the same class, which formed the basis, rather than the superstructure, of the statute law. There were also a number of statutes expressed in such curious language, and framed in so different a style from that of modern times, that if the Commissioners were simply to consolidate them, retaining, as much as possible, the old language, they would produce a piece of patchwork which it would not be creditable to lay before Parliament. One of the subjects to which that observation applied was the law relating to landlord and tenant (upon which a Bill had been prepared with singular care and skill), in reference to which there had been enactments from the time of the Plantaganets down to the reign of Queen Victoria. There were a great number of other statutes, which, though comparatively modern, had yet been amended by one or two subsequent Acts; for example, in 1838 was passed an Act regulating the mode of framing, and in some respects of construing, wills; but, in consequence of some difficulties which arose in carrying it into operation a few years afterwards, an amending Bill was introduced and carried through Parliament; and the Commissioners came to the conclusion, that it would be absurd pedantry to consolidate such modern statutes, thinking it better that the original statute and the subsequent Act amending it should be taken together. So with respect to the statute abolishing fines and recoveries. Again, there were a number of statutes which could not be repealed, and which it would be equally absurd to consolidate; for instance, before the passing of the Wills Act in 1838, there was a law of Charles II. which regulated, up to that time, the formalities necessary with respect to wills. That law must still remain in force with regard to all wills made before 1838, but it would be hardly worth while to consolidate it. So with respect to the Tithe Commutation Act, which was fast working itself out. There were other statutes in the same position; but after all deductions there still remained a very great number of subjects which the Commissioners had no difficulty in dealing with, and with which they were determined to proceed until their labours were concluded. It had been said that the Commissioners had done nothing at all. If it was meant that they had introduced no Bills which had become law, the statement was perfectly true. They could not possibly have done so. The difficulties had been great, but he trusted that they had now found their way to do good service; and if their Lordships would render their assistance in laying before the public that which would, at all events, be a useful specimen of the labours of the Commissioners, he was in hopes, that, in the course of a few years, they might be able to reduce the forty or fifty volumes of statutes now in existence to two or three. The noble and learned Lord concluded by moving the first reading of his eight Bills.

Lord BROUGHAM entirely approved the course which had been taken by his noble and learned friend. Great misrepresentations had been made with respect to the Statute Law Commission, and he was glad that his noble and learned friend had described exactly what the Commissioners had done, and how far their labours of consolidation had proceeded. The statement of the noble and learned Lord as to the value of the services of the Commissioners was by no means exaggerated; and if he were asked to mention one or two of the Commissioners who were more especially entitled to the thanks of the country, he would mention the names of Mr. Bellenden Ker, Mr. Coulson, and Sir Fitzroy Kelly.

Lord CAMPBELL said he was sure their Lordships would willingly give these Bills a first reading. But he hoped the noble and learned Lord would be contented with that during the present session, because it was desirable to see the work of consolidation as a whole, and to detect inaccuracies which, even with the utmost care, might still be discovered. He had never doubted that the whole statute law might be consolidated; but such statutes as that of the reign of Edward III. with regard to treason, ought to be given ipsissimis verbis in which they were originally enacted.

The Bills were then read a first time.

Tuesday, June 23.

VEXATIOUS SUITS.

Lord BROUGHAM obtained leave to introduce a Bill similar to that which he had introduced in the last and preceding session, to prevent vexatious litigation.

The Bill was read a first time.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On the motion of Lord STANLEY of ALDERLEY, this Bill was read a second time.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, this Bill was read a third time.

On the question that the Bill do pass,

Lord REDESDALE moved an amendment upon clause 3, to take from the new Court the power of granting divorce à vinculo: which was negatived by a majority of 57.

The Earl of DONOUGHMORE then moved an amendment, the effect of which was that a wife might obtain a divorce à vinculo, even if the adultery of which she accused her husband had not been incestuous.

Lord CAMPBELL opposed the amendment, on the ground that it was not expedient that divorce should be granted upon the suit of the wife unless the conduct of her husband had been such as to render cohabitation impossible. The first instance in which a divorce à vinculo had been granted upon the prayer of the wife was in the time of Lord Thurlow, where a divorce had been granted upon that ground.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

Lord LYNDHURST proposed an amendment, the effect of which was to enable a woman to obtain a divorce if she had been deserted by her husband for more than five years without reasonable cause.

The amendment was negatived without a division.

The LORD CHANCELLOR then moved, in the absence of Lord St. Leonards, to strike out from the Bill the words "fine or imprisonment," the effect of which was to remove all power of imprisonment of either party, but to enable the Court to impose a fine on the adulterer, or to make him pay costs. In most cases a husband would not care to obtain a divorce, if he thought that by so doing he would subject his wife to imprisonment; and as to imposing a fine upon her, that was at once nugatory.

The Bishop of OXFORD considered that the words proposed to be struck out formed the greatest security for purity of life among the lower orders.

Their Lordships then divided, when the amendment was carried by a majority of 20.

Earl NELSON moved an amendment upon the 54th clause, providing that in case of the remarriage of divorced persons such marriage should take place in the office of the registrar, or in some building registered under the Marriage and Registration Act, and according to the form and provisions of that Act. The object of this amendment was to provide, that, as this matter had been argued on purely civil grounds, so the remarriage, if it took place, should be only a civil marriage, and that clergymen should be relieved from the performance of such marriages.

The Lord CHANCELLOR opposed the amendment, on the ground that parties when divorced should be placed in the same position as unmarried persons, and were, therefore, entitled to be married in the same manner as her Majesty's other subjects.

Their Lordships divided, when the amendment was lost by a majority of 28.

The Bishop of EXETER moved that a proviso be added to Clause 54, to deprive the implicated parties of the power of having their marriage celebrated by the Church, and, consequently, of the benefit to be derived from making it a religous ceremony, which was rejected by a majority of 14.

On the motion of the LORD CHANCELLOR, the last clause of the Bill was struck out.

The question having been put that the Bill do pass,

The Bishop of OXFORD protested against the Bill, which, as he believed, was contrary to God's Word, and to the law of the Church of England, and would be fruitful of future crime and misery.

After a few words from Viscount DUNGANNON against the Bill,

Their Lordships divided, when the numbers were—Content, 46; non-content, 25: majority, 21. The Bill was, therefore, passed.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, explained that its principal object was to remove a doubt as to whether the Act of Parliament passed in the beginning of the reign of William IV., rendering lawful educational charities for Roman Catholics, was retrospective or not. It had been decided that it was retrospective; but some ingenious gentleman had since raised a doubt on the subject, and it was now proposed to pass this Bill to remove any such doubt. The Bill also provided that it should be lawful for the trustees of Roman Catholic charities to inrol them within a year after the passing of this Act, with the same effect as if they had been registered from the beginning. And that, in the case of trusts, partly lawful and partly unlawful, the Court of Chancery should investigate and decide what part of the trust should be applied to lawful uses, and what to the unlawful or superstitious uses. There was a clause to provide, that, where there was a doubt about the charity, the usage of twenty-five years should be conclusive.

The Bill was then read a second time.

ADULTERERS' MARRIAGES BILL.

Lord REDESDALE presented a Bill concerning the manner in which the marriages of divorced adulterers shall be contracted; which was read a first time. Second reading on Thursday next.

VEXATIOUS LITIGATION PREVENTION BILL.

Lord BROUGHAM said he did not intend to press the further progress of this Bill, but would take that opportunity of stating what it was his object to do for the prevention of vexatious litigation. He had, to meet the objection of his noble and learned friend, introduced a provision empowering parties to go to court accompanied by counsel and attorney, and this he adopted from the experience of the recent changes in the Examiners' Offices in Chancery. Another portion of the Bill which he should most certainly persist in, was that part which bound parties to find security for costs before going into court. The House need scarcely be reminded of the celebrated case of Smithe and Smithe, where, in an entirely fabricated case, the defendant had to pay £7,000 or £8,000 costs, and the plaintiff had been transported for life. It was well known also, that, in that case, persons were found in London and Bristol to subscribe, in the hope of getting a return of 100 per cent. for their money. To meet such cases, he proposed that previous security should be given; and it would meet even the case of the subscription; for although there were many persons who would advance £50 or £100 in the hope of usurious interest, they would most probably shrink from giving security for the whole costs. He would also introduce a proviso, giving the Insolvency Commissioners jurisdiction to punish in the case of persons, who, having incurred costs in litigation, afterwards took refuge in that court. The 76th section of the Insolvent Act was inoperative, and his object was to make it definite and effectual.

After a few observations from the LORD CHANCELLOR and Lords CAMPBELL and BROUGHAM, the debate was adjourned.

Monday, June 22.

JOINT-STOCK BANKS.

Mr. LOWE, in moving that the House resolve itself into committee to consider the laws relating to joint-stock banks, with the view of a Bill being brought in to amend those laws, said that great difficulties were interposed by the law in the way of forming a company, and when it was formed it gained no privilege by its formation except a bare license to trade, and was still subjected to almost every possible inconvenience which the law could accumulate upon it. Persons desirous of forming a company had first to petition the Crown. That petition was referred to the Board of Trade, which ascertained that all the requisites had been complied with. A charter was then granted, containing a considerable number of conditions, which formed great difficulties in the way of bonâ fide companies (but which were uniformly eluded—as in the case of the Royal British Bank—by companies not bonâ fide), and gave a mere license to trade, but no privilege whatever. Should the company fall into difficulties, the unfortunate shareholders discover that they are subject to all sorts of legal processes. The object of the Bill which he desired to introduce was, simply to extend to joint-stock banks the operations of the Act passed last session with reference to joint-stock companies. In future, therefore, joint-stock banks might be formed like any other joint-stock company, by a memorandum, and the application of the few simple provisions contained in the Act of last session. There would be a register of the shareholders, which would be primâ facie evidence of the persons who were to be called upon to contribute. Such a bank would be liable to certain powers of inspection by one-fifth of the shareholders; and in case it came to be wound up, as soon as it was handed over to the Court which was to wind it up, all actions against the shareholders would be stopped. It was proposed to retain the present limitation of shares in joint-stock companies to £100 and the proposed Bill would not make any alteration in the law; which at present required the liability of shareholders of joint-stock companies to be unlimited.

The House then went into committee.

Mr. MALINS entirely approved the general object of the Bill, but regretted that it was not proposed to limit the liability of joint-stock banks as well as of other joint-stock undertakings.

In reply to Mr. COWAN, Mr. LOWE said the Bill would not apply to Scotland.

Mr. ROEBUCK recollected very distinctly some observations made by the right hon. gentleman when he brought in his Limited Liability Act—viz. that for his own part he did not see why that principle should not apply to joint-stock banks. He was sorry the right hon. gentleman had departed from that which, no doubt, in his heart he believed to be right, and had bowed to a prejudice which pervaded a great many minds, but ought not to have influenced his.

Sir J. SHELLEY considered it perfectly outrageous that the only joint-stock companies to which the principle of limited liability would not now apply should be banking companies.

Mr. HENLEY said, that, if the creditors of these banks were to be deprived of any means of going against the shareholders, he hoped some clause would be introduced preventing the latter from making away with their property before the winding-up was effected. As the law now stood, every shareholder in the Royal British Bank had apparently been able to disappoint every creditor, and nobody had paid anybody anything.

Mr. WYLD said, that, in the case of the British Bank, the debts were £500,000, while the assets were £250,000, and that, as the law now stood, the shareholders were liable for the balance between the debts and the assets. The consequence was, that the shareholders endeavoured to shield themselves from the payment of the debts altogether, whereas, if their liability had been limited, they would have come forward and paid their debts.

Mr. BUCHANAN considered the principle of limited liability as vicious in itself, and as opposed to the maxim that the man who entered into trade, and derived from its prosecution a profit larger than the regular rate of interest, should be held responsible for his liabilities.

Mr. HANKEY said, that, so far as his experience went, the principle of unlimited liability had not proved satisfactory in the case of those who had embarked their money under its auspices.

A resolution upon which to found a Bill was then agreed to.

Tuesday, June 23.

JOINT-STOCK BANKS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. HEADLAM gave notice, that, on the motion for the second reading of this Bill, he would move an amendment, declaring the opinion of the House that the principle of limited liability should be applied to joint-stock banks.

WILLS OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ABROAD BILL.

Sir F. KELLY moved the second reading of this Bill. He was authorised to say that the Attorney-General would not oppose the motion, but would reserve the discussion till the motion for going into committee.

This Bill was then read a second time.

THE CHARITABLE USES BILL passed through committee.

TRANSPORTATION AND PENAL SERVITUDE BILL.

The House considered the Lords' amendments to this Bill, one of which was agreed to, and the other negatived. A committee was appointed to communicate with their Lordships upon the subject; and on June 25 their Lordships agreed not to insist on the clause objected to.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

Mr. MASSEY obtained leave to bring in a Bill to improve the administration of the law in England so far as respects summary proceedings before justices of the peace.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

On the motion of Mr. MASSEY, leave was given to bring in a Bill to amend the Acts concerning municipal corporations in England.

MARRIED WOMEN'S REVERSIONARY INTEREST BILL.

This Bill was considered as amended, and ordered to be read a third time on Monday next.

Wednesday, June 24.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION BILL.

The House went into committee on this Bill.

After three unsuccessful divisions (supported by the Irish members) that the chairman report progress,

Mr. BLAND moved the addition of words to the 7th clause, with a view to give the Court out of which the judgment issued a jurisdiction for subsequently ascertaining whether or not it had been fraudulently obtained; which was agreed to, and the clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 8 was also agreed to.

After further opposition to the progress of the Bill,

Mr. CRAUFURD consented that progress should be reported, expressing his intention to proceed with the Bill on the first open Wednesday.

Thursday, June 25.

CHARITABLE USES BILL.

This Bill was read a third time and passed.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

This Bill was brought up from the House of Lords, and on the motion of Sir G. GREY was read a first time.

COLONIAL ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS.

Mr. LABOUCHERE obtained leave to bring in a Bill to regulate the admission of attorneys and solicitors of colonial courts in her Majesty's superior courts of law and equity in England in certain cases.

PRIVATE BILLS.—(From a Correspondent).

The Committees of the House of Commons have nearly got through the list of private business, though there are one or two heavy matters to be disposed of yet.

The "Salmon" question is settled, by the rejection of the Tweed River Fisheries Bill, and the Tweed Fisheries Bill being passed. The effect of this will be, that the proprietors of the Upper Tweed are left much in the same position as they were, as regards privileges; whereas the lower proprietors near the mouth of the river are considerably restricted in the use of salmon-nets, which have hitherto proved very destructive to the young salmon.

The Richmond and Kew Extension Bill, which was for making a short line from the North and South-Western Junction Railway across the Thames, at Kew, to Richmond, was passed by the Committee on Group 1, not, however, without a short, though vigorous, opposition from Mr. Selwyn, Q.C., in the capacity of a landowner. The West London and Crystal Palace Railway Bill, which empowers that Company to enter into working and traffic arrangements with the London and Brighton, South Eastern, and South Western Railway Companies, was passed by the same Committee. This is a very important measure to the public, as the effect will be, in all probability, that the Crystal Palace will be approachable from Waterloo Bridge Terminus during the ensuing summer.

The East Kent Company have failed in getting their independent line, as was stated last week; and the terms upon the South Eastern Railway Company are, that they shall promote and bonâ fide prosecute a Bill in the next session of Parliament for a West-end terminus. The South Eastern (Greenwich Junction to Dartford line) is passed, the object being to relieve the overgrown traffic on the North Kent, between Dartford and London.

The Taff Vale Railway Company have had a severe struggle with the freighters on the line, and after some days' fighting, the promoters withdrew their Bill sooner than give in. It was, however, recommitted, and proceeded again on Friday, but the questions were adjourned till Monday, with the hope that some arrangement might be made, which would prevent the public losing the advantages of the measures proposed by this Bill, owing to the hostile attitude assumed by the freighters and promoters.

Just before going to press, we ascertained that the Liverpool Committee had decided in favor of passing the Mersey Conservancy Bill. The decision is so complicated that we must defer the details until next week. This much, however, may be stated, that Sir James Graham has in effect ventilated the affairs of the Liverpool Corporation by the admission of a considerable current of "free trade air," the principle of the Bill, as proposed to be passed, being, that the money received for dues in the port of Liverpool shall be employed in the conservancy of the Mersey, and not for Liverpool local purposes. There are possibly twenty, certainly a dozen, resolutions in the preamble; and it may almost be affirmed, that the parties themselves cannot appreciate the decision of the committee until the consultation this evening.

The Doncaster and Wakefield Railway, which was a project for making a line from Doncaster to join the Wakefield, Pontefract, and Goole Railway, with working arrangements with the Great Northern Railway—in other words, a scheme for connecting the Great Northern Railway with the Caledonian Railway system—was rejected by the Committee.

The Committee on the Nene Navigation have commenced their labours without the smallest prospect of settling the question in time for getting the Bill read a second time by the prescribed period in the House of Lords; and it is not impossible that some arrangement may be made for suspending the Bill if it cannot be concluded this session.

The Mid-Kent Railway (Croydon Extension), and the Mid-Kent and South Kent Railway—being a railway from Caterham in Surrey to Croydon—were both rejected by the Committee on Group 2.

Six Election Committees are sitting, but as they have hardly got into their work yet, we will defer particulars till next week. The Committees are sitting on the following petitions, viz.:—Rochdale, Mayo, Cambridge Borough, Pontefract, Marlborough, and Wareham.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The English Funds have been all the week remarkably steady and quiet. Consols for the opening have stood at 93⅜ per Cent. The 3 per Cent reduced, and the new 3 per Cents. have been at 92⅞ to 93 per Cent. without any reported variation.

French Funds have been more sensitive, but the price of the 3 per Cents. is at the end of the week about the same as at the beginning. The Bank of France has reduced its rate of discount on commercial bills from 6 to 5½ per cent. It maintains at 6 per Cent. interest on advances. Other important Foreign Securities have continued steady, with tendency to improvement. Few transactions are taking place, and the demand for money is not active.

It has been announced that the amount of £1,125,000 to be paid to Denmark, in redemption of the Sound Dues, is not likely to be withdrawn from this country.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 20th June, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £18,803,825, being an increase of £31,640; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,172,862, showing an increase of £263,607 when compared with the previous return.

The reduction in the rate of interest made last week by the Directors of the Bank of England seems to have been a natural consequence of the improvement in its position during the last three or four weeks. This improvement is the result of the increased amount of bullion in store, and the lessened amount of its liabilities on private securities.

A comparison with the state of affairs at the Bank, at the corresponding period of last quarter, when, as now, it was greatly strengthened by the accumulation of Government deposits prior to the payment of the dividends, will also show apparent improvement. If, however, the retrospect is carried back to the corresponding period of last year, it will appear that the stock of bullion was greater in 1856 than in 1857 by £1,216,000, and the liabilities on private securities less by the very considerable amount of £4,312,000. Consequently the position of the Bank was then much stronger, and more prepared to resist subsequent pressure, than at thepresent time. If the pressure now to be sustained by the Bank is in proportion to that of last year, the weight will become greater by reason of its larger amount of liabilities, and its less stock of bullion. It should, however, be borne in mind that the rate of discount then was 5 per cent., and that now it is 6 per cent.; the higher rate giving strength to the defensive position, so to say, of the Bank finances. These particulars lead to well founded doubts whether any further early reduction of the rate of interest, or any considerable reduction in the value of money during the present year, is probable.

It is stated that the Ministers of Austria, France, England, Prussia, Russia, Sardinia, and Turkey, met last week in Paris for the purpose of signing the treaty for the frontier settlement in Bessarabia, and for regulating the question of the Isle of Serpents, and the Delta of the Danube.

The statement that a treaty of commerce was signed between France and Russia, on the 14th of the present month, is said to be confirmed. The concessions made, or reported to have been made, by the Government of Turkey, to British subjects, are very numerous. The existing state of the money market throughout Europe and America is sufficient cause to discourage a large proportion of these undertakings, or, at least, to postpone many till some two or three have become active in the management of Englishmen, and the interest of money is easier.

DELAYS IN CHANCERY.

It is now nearly five years since the Court of Chancery was reformed. In some respects, the measures introduced on the suggestions of the Commission have been productive of immense advantage to the suitors of the Court, however harshly they may have interfered with the profits of the profession. The great source of delay and expense in equity proceedings was the complicated and dilatory procedure of the Masters' offices, and it was thought that this would have been entirely removed by transferring the judicial part of the Masters' duties to the judges themselves, and committing the administrative work to chief clerks, who were intended to act under the immediate eye of the Vice-Chancellors. The abolition of the old complex method of taking depositions, and the opportunities afforded for receiving the evidence of witnesses viva voce, were designed at once to improve the quality, and to diminish the cost, of testimony in Chancery suits. A multitude of formal and unnecessary proceedings were abolished, and the profits of solicitors were so severely cut down by the improvements in the practice, that there is no court in which so much bonâ fide work is done for so small a remuneration as in that which was once regarded as the practitioner's gold mine. We are very far from complaining that needless occasions of expense to the suitor, and profit to his advisers, have been swept away; and we have always thought, and still think, that, with a fair scale of fees for services actually performed, solicitors would be compensated by the increase in the amount of business, which must result from the effectual improvement in the procedure of the Court. As yet these expectations have not been realised, and both the suitors and the profession have a right to complain that they have not obtained the full benefit of the reforms to which the Court has been subjected.

Several circumstances have gone far to neutralise the advantages of the Acts of 1852. It has been found impossible, with the present staff of judges, to carry out in its integrity the theory on which the practice in the judges' chambers was based. The ablest Vice-Chancellor cannot be in two places at once; and the scraps of time which can be spared from court for the superintendence of the chamber practice are altogether insufficient. The chief clerks are gradually becoming just what the Masters used to be. The same delay and uncertainty, though considerably mitigated in amount, still arise, from the same causes which, in old times, exposed the Court of Chancery to a measure of odium from which it has not yet entirely freed itself. The evil is certain to increase as the business of the Court grows; and there is little chance of the highest tribunal of the country becoming, as it ought to be, the best regulated and the least dilatory, until the Bench is sufficiently strengthened to enable it really to perform the additional duties cast upon it by the recent statutes. The requisite alterations would involve no inconvenience to either branch of the profession, and the objection to any increase of the charges for judicial salaries is plainly untenable, when it is considered, that, for every £1,000 so expended, ten times the amount would be saved to the suitors who resort to the Court. Probably it would be found that a judge might advantageously devote half his time to the consideration of matters which, from sheer press of business, he is now reluctantly compelled to delegate to his chief clerk—an officer who was never intended to exercise judicial functions in any but the simplest cases. Adjourned summonses and motions to vary certificates would be greatly diminished in number, and a considerable saving of time and expense effected, if all matters involving any difficulty, whether of fact or law, could be regularly argued and decided in the first instance before the judge personally in Chambers. The chief clerks would then be so far relieved as to be able to perform, with the greatest expedition, the less intricate part of the judicial and nearly the whole of the purely administrative work, which, under such an arrangement, would be left in their hands.

To effect this reform—which is, in fact, the necessary corollary of the Statutes of 1852—it would be desirable to add another judge to the courts of the Master of the Rolls, and each of the Vice-Chancellors, so that each court would always have one judge sitting on the Bench, and another occupied in chamber business. This arrangement would not, in the smallest degree, affect the business of the leaders practising in the several courts, each of whom would then be attached to the courts of two Vice-Chancellors, sitting on alternate days, instead of one, as at present. Of course it would not be desirable that the same cause should come sometimes before one judge and sometimes before another, but each should have a distinct paper, the only connection between them being, that they would sit alternately on the same bench, and be attended by the same bar. We have not heard the shadow of a reason suggested against this reform, which is imperatively required for the sake not only of the profession, but of the public at large.

Concurrently with such a modification of the practice in Chambers, it is most important that the subordinate offices of the court should be made much more efficient and rapid in their action than they are under the existing regulations. It is monstrous that the payment of debts and legacies should be delayed, as is often the case, for many months, because the taxing-masters have not time to settle the costs of the various parties, or that the simple process of drawing up a decree, or of effecting a sale or transfer at the Accountant-General's Office, should be obstructed by the rigid adherence to vexatious and unnecessary regulations. We do not desire that any functionary should be overworked or deprived of his fair share of relaxation; but it is quite beyond endurance that the Accountant-General's system of transacting business should be as dilatory now as in the distant time when it was a four days' post to Manchester. What would be thought if the Bank of England insisted on the same formalities, and interposed the same delays, as have been practised from a venerable antiquity by the Bank of the Court of Chancery?

The adoption of the improvements to which we have referred would facilitate another change, which must sooner or later be made. The present mode of taking oral evidence is most unsatisfactory. The delay is excessive, and it is almost always impossible to obtain appointments with the examiners for consecutive days, so as to bring to an early close the evidence in a heavy case. Besides this, the narrative of the examiner does not and cannot convey to the Court the true effect of the testimony given. A shuffling witness may prevaricate as he pleases, and his story is sure to come out at last in a more consistent and plausible shape, and to command much more consideration from the Court than it would do if all the fencings and contradictions had been heard by the judge who decides the cause. But if the number of Vice-Chancellors were made adequate to the requirements of business, they might, without difficulty, and with great advantage to the interests of justice, take the depositions of witnesses themselves, instead of delegating this important function to independent officers. If these modifications of the present practice were introduced, we should have a Court capable of giving effectual and speedy relief at far less cost than is now incurred. Even popular writers might then cease from their perpetual exaggerations of the defects of the Chancellor's Court, and we should no longer hear the Attorney-General amusing the House of Commons by sneering at the redress afforded by the Court in which he practises as a mere mockery of relief. We are glad to learn that the Incorporated Law Society has been engaged in discussing the points which we have noticed, and that its influence is likely to be used in pressing the necessary reforms on the attention of the Chancellor. The experience of the last five years has settled down into an almost unanimous conviction on the part of all Chancery practitioners in favour of some such steps as we have been advocating, and we trust that Lord Cranworth will not be slow to put the finishing stroke to the improvement of his Court, and to make it in all respects worthy of its high pretensions.

LADY PLAINTIFFS.

Every morning brings from Edinburgh an account of the trial of Miss Madeleine Smith, for the murder of her lover. Whether guilty or not, that young lady is prudent enough to neglect no arts by which female charms can appeal to the susceptibilities of a jury. The reporter has always some enthusiastic remarks to bestow on her dress and demeanour. We learn one day that she is becomingly attired in silks and satins, and even that she has a bonnet of the newest fashion. On another day we read of her "airy bearing," and of the sweet smile of confidence with which she fronts inquiry, except when her love letters are read, and then she hangs down her head in becoming bashfulness. Miss Smith is on trial for her life, and it would, therefore, be wise in her to have recourse to every means of safety, however slight might be the probability of its availing her. But she has some reason to suppose that her being a lady, and a young and pretty lady, may be of service to her. There is a fashion just now of petting ladies in courts of justice. The administrators of the law have taken it into their heads to be chivalric; and if they can do a lady a good turn, they make haste to do it. This modern chivalry, like its ancient prototype, certainly gratifies its inclinations at the expense of some poor unthought-of wretches. If a lady plaintiff is favoured, a gentleman defendant is prejudiced: but what is a stupid, common-place heir-at-law, or trustee, or attorney, in comparison with an interesting female?

Of this chivalry of juries a striking instance was afforded in a case which we reported last week. In Carr v. Chapple there was a lady who had suffered the misfortune of losing a sum of money, settled on her at her marriage. She had taken this money out of the funds, and bought some houses with it, which were mere shells, and almost entirely valueless. The vendor sold them to her at a profit to himself of 500 per cent.; and when she found that tenants were not easily to be induced to live in the mere carcases of a row of houses, and that she got no rents, she wished to be off her bargain, and to recover what she had paid to the speculator. She brought an action against him, and the cause was set down for trial. Before it came on, the defendant proposed a compromise, offering to pay two-thirds of what she asked. The lady's attorney consulted the counsel retained on her behalf, and, acting under their advice, and having, as a witness swore, obtained the consent of the lady and her husband, and of her trustees, he accepted the offer. The defendant did not, however, pay what he had agreed, and the lady could not get her money. There was still one chance left. She might get it out of her own attorney. She accordingly brought an action against him for negligence in having entered into an imprudent compromise. It was not very obvious how he was to blame. Two-thirds of the sum demanded is something to get, in order to avoid the uncertainties of a trial; he had acted under the advice of counsel; he had even, as it was sworn, obtained the consent of the persons interested. But then, on the other hand, the plaintiff was a lady, and the defendant was an attorney. Juries love ladies and hate attorneys. It seemed so hard that a poor trusting lady should lose the little sum secured to make her comfortable in marriage. And what could be simpler than to compel one of those horrible attorneys to make good her loss. The jury felt as barons felt in the middle ages who used to rob a Jew, in order to endow a monastery. It was not just, but it was prompted by a noble feeling. Chivalry triumphed over the niceties of legal rights; and the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff, with £200 damages. Henceforth, no Englishwoman in distress need fear to set her cap at a jury of her countrymen.

The degree in which juries suffer themselves to be led away by their feelings is certainly a great drawback to the advantages we may be supposed to derive from their intervention in civil cases. In criminal cases we must candidly say, that juries seldom suffer themselves to be swayed by anything but a wish to do justice. When death or the sufferings of a long imprisonment are to be the result of their verdict, they try to fix their whole attention on the evidence submitted to them. But in civil cases, the verdict does but give a little more money to the one side, and a little less to the other; and jurors permit themselves, therefore, to indulge in the luxury of prejudices and prepossessions. Sometimes, perhaps, they are influenced by motives even less commendable than a tenderness for "lady plaintiffs." The case of Elkins v. Murphy, tried this week before Lord Campbell, suggests that hunger may occasionally play its part in affecting their decision. The jury could not agree, and, after a long and ineffectual waiting, they returned into court petitioning to be discharged, as they were getting faint from want of food. Lord Campbell could only refer them to the parties to the action; and the defendant was willing they should be discharged, but the plaintiff was obstinate, and the most that could be extorted from him was, that they might have a little refreshment, but no stimulants or tobacco. Towards midnight they arrived at a conclusion, and it was favourable to the defendant—favourable, that is, to the man that would have let them go to their homes at a decent hour—adverse to the man who insisted on their staying, and who cut them off from their grog and their pipe. It is possible that they were actuated by considerations of the purest justice; but it must be acknowledged they were under a strong temptation to satisfy their vengeance and display their gratitude. The time is coming, or is perhaps come, when, if juries are to be retained at all in civil cases, they must be treated in a different way. They require at once to be better treated and worse; they must be made physically comfortable, and at the same time restrained when they are inclined to gratify their sentimentalism. If they are fit to decide at all, they must be allowed to decide conveniently and leisurely, not be tortured into unanimity by the pangs of starvation. On the other hand, the sooner chivalry retires from the jury-box into historical novels the better. In a romance it is all very well that the villain should be crushed at the entreaty of a heroine with airy manners and a lace bonnet; but in real life it is too bad that an attorney, who does his best for a client, should be mulcted at the demand of a "lady plaintiff."

Legal News.

The past week has been unusually prolific in debates of professional interest in the House of Commons. The Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill has been very fully discussed upon the second reading, and a general concurrence of opinion appeared in favour of the measure, subject to attempts at modification in committee. The Attorney-General and Mr. Henley both take a hopeful view of the proctorial future, arguing that the loss by sending estates under £1500 to the county courts will be balanced by the gain to metropolitan practitioners from the abolition of provincial jurisdictions. Whatever estimate may be formed of the effect upon proctorial emoluments of thus devolving business upon the county courts, it is not easy to see how any case can be made for compensation. There can be no doubt that there is great need of a cheap local tribunal, which shall authenticate wills, and grant administration of small properties. This demand is quite as well founded as that which led to the original establishment of the county courts. By that measure many attornies saw their business seriously diminished, but no one dreamed that compensation was due to them. Now it would be difficult to show that the case of the proctors at this moment stands on a different footing, so far as regards the county courts, from that of the attornies some years ago.

It was assumed by some speakers in the debate on Friday week that the proctorial monopoly, as now limited and adjusted, is to continue for all time. We are aware that the Lord Chancellor, the Attorney General, and other speakers have lately urged the necessity that exists for maintaining a select body of practitioners, well known to and largely trusted by the court, to assure the due compliance with all statutory and other rules as to granting probate. But the force of these arguments is a good deal weakened by the consideration that some of those who now adopt them were very lately of an opposite opinion. We think, too, that the confidence ordinarily reposed in a solicitor is as great as that subsisting between the judge and the proctors of the Prerogative Court, and we would venture to hope that the average faculties of the profession might be found adequate to comprehend the mystery of proving a will in common form. We do not, in fact, believe that anybody is imposed upon by these arguments; but it is exceedingly difficult to support a compromise, such as is attempted by this Bill, by any reasoning that will stand a close examination. But, admitting that such an arrangement as now proposed is the best practicable at the present moment, we do not by any means see the necessity of proclaiming its absolute finality. Nor, indeed, do the authors of the measure appear to have themselves contemplated any such restraint upon the discretion of posterity. The Bill, when before the House of Lords, provided that "the admission of persons to be proctors of the court should be in the discretion of the judge;" from which enactment it would by no means follow that the present strict limitations upon admission must always be maintained inviolate. On the whole, it would appear that the measure now before Parliament goes as far as is convenient at the present day; and, after the lapse of some years, it may be found both just and expedient to complete the work now left confessedly unfinished.

The Fraudulent Trustees Bill has been subjected to a discussion in committee which deserves attention, as illustrating the probable operation of important clauses that are likely to become law.

We have also had, during the week, a debate provoked by Mr. Locke King, upon the services, past and prospective, of the Statute Law Commission. Having recently expressed an opinion that a good deal of talk and no inconsiderable amount of public money has been expended by this Board with a very disproportionate result, we could have wished to present our readers with an abstract of Sir Fitzroy Kelly's apology for himself and brother Commissioners. The eloquent and experienced advocate, with an engaging candour strongly indicative of a bad case, begins his full and unreserved statement from the time of Queen Elizabeth. Of course, we understand at once the policy of plunging the House of Commons into an investigation of the shortcomings of Lord Keeper Bacon in the matter of the consolidation of the Statute Law. "This great work, which for 250 years had baffled and defeated the efforts of the most eminent jurists and statesmen which this country has produced, is now, upon one single uniform and comprehensive plan actually begun!" Having made this astounding declaration, Sir Fitzroy Kelly skilfully led away the House to contemplate the Consolidated Statute book as "a short, comprehensive, and intelligible work" in four volumes or thereabouts, intending, no doubt, to convey to his hearers the impression that the much-abused Commission was actively contributing towards this result. We can only say that we should be very glad to receive any reliable assurance that the labours of the Commission would bear such fruit as this, even at a distant day. But we cannot pretend that our faith in ambitious programmes, and in commissions composed of men too busy or too great to work on them, is in any degree strengthened by the ingenious oratory of Sir Fitzroy Kelly.

THE UNITED LAW CLERKS' SOCIETY.—The 25th anniversary festival of this society was held on Friday evening, at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street. The Right Hon. Sir A. J. E. Cockburn, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, presided, and was supported by Mr. Roundell Palmer, Q.C., Mr. J. Locke, Q.C., M.P., Mr. Montagu Smith, Q.C., Messrs. G. Calthorp, J. Stuart, J. Malcom, H. Holl, T. Southgate, T. Bayes, J. Lee, W. Purvis ,W. Nettleship, and many other members of the legal profession. The members of the society present were not less in number than 360, and the galleries were graced by the presence of a great many ladies. After partaking of a dinner provided in a very superior style by Messrs. Elkington and Shrewsbury, the chairman proposed the usual loyal toasts, which were drunk with enthusiasm. The annual report of the society was then read by the secretary, Mr. H. G. Rogers. The society was established in 1832, to enable the law clerks of the metropolis to make some provision for themselves and families in sickness, old age, or other infirmity, and on death. A mutual association was afterwards formed to afford assistance in temporary distress. All law clerks, whether members or not, were allowed to participate in the benefit of this fund. The two funds were kept distinct. Among the benefits are a weekly allowance of £1 in sickness; pensions payable weekly, from 10*s.* to 14*s.*; a payment on a member's death of £50; and on the death of a member's wife a payment of £25. Last year 18 persons received relief; this year 29 have been relieved, and the amount paid to these 29 members was 247*l.* 14*s.* The total amount received by members on account of illness has been 3,735*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* There are seven members in receipt of the weekly allowance. One who had been in receipt of it had since died. He contributed to the society's funds 40*l.* 6*s.*, in return for which was received, on the death of his wife, £25; in illness, 81*l.* 18*s.*; on superannuation, 120*l.* 7*s.*; in all 267*l.* 11*s.*; and on his death, a further sum of £50 was paid to his family. In the preceding year the number of deaths of members was four; in the year just past nine. To the family of each £50 had been paid, making a total payment on account of death alone of 5,632*l* 14*s.* 6*d.* The contributions have amounted this year to 1,463*l.* 8*s.*, besides a donation of 30 guineas from the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple. On the 7th of April, 1856, the investments amounted to 19,399*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*, since which 2,598*l.* 11*s.* had been received. The investments on the 20th May, 1856, amounted to 19,728*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.* On the 20th of May, 1857, they were 21,032*l.* 16*s.* 11*d.* The relief afforded out of the casual fund consisted of small gifts not exceeding £5, not restricted to members, but granted to all law clerks and their widows, and to the children of deceased members; but the applicants must be deserving persons, suffering from temporary distress not the result of their own misconduct. The Chairman, in proposing prosperity to the society, expressed his great satisfaction at the report which had just been read. The object of the society was to enable a laborious and meritorious class of men to make provision against the hour of infirmity, sickness, and need for themselves and their families—a class of men but for whom the laborious administration of the law—nay, he might add, the business of society, could hardly go on, and yet men whom, in spite of their exertions, the casualities and chances of life often placed in a position of necessity, which called for the assistance of such a society as that which they were then met to support. The "Health of the Lord Chancellor and the other patrons of the Society" was then proposed by Mr. Roundell Palmer; after which Mr. M. Smith proposed the "Health of the Chairman" in terms of high eulogy, which were enthusiastically cheered by the company. The Lord Chief Justice acknowledged the compliment in terms of great warmth and earnestness, declaring that he knew of no assembly of men the tribute of whose regard he would more gladly accept or more deeply value.—Times.

ELKINS v. MURPHY.—A HUNGRY JURY.—In this action, which was against a house agent, to recover damages for misrepresenting that he had authority to sell a house, the jury, who were not able to agree in the box upon their verdict, retired to their room to deliberate, and remained there from half-past one o'clock until about five, when Lord Campbell, being about to retire from the bench, directed them to be brought into court.—When they had taken their seats in the box, Lord Campbell asked them if they had agreed to their verdict.—The Foreman said they had not, and there was no possible chance that they would agree. He had expended all his strength in arguing the matter over, and endeavouring to make the jury unanimous, but all in vain, and he was now completely exhausted, having had nothing to eat since the previous evening. He lived at Hampstead, and in order to be early in attendance at the court had left that morning without his breakfast. He therefore hoped his Lordship would discharge them.—Lord Campbell said he had no power to do so. They must be locked up again, and he had no doubt if they reasoned over the matter again they would be able to agree.—The Foreman: It is quite impossible, my lord. Two jurymen differ from all the rest, and I have made myself quite ill by expostulating with them, but all in vain; and I am really physically incapable of giving any more attention to the case. We are not permitted to have the slightest refreshment, and my health will be much endangered if I am confined any longer.—Another Juryman: My lord, I feel very ill, having suffered all night from diarrhœa.—Lord Campbell: I am very sorry for your sufferings, but I cannot assist you. I would alter the law if I could, but I am bound to administer it as I find it. I must therefore ask you to retire again.—A third Juror: I am sure, my lord, we shall never be unanimous. For myself, I feel I cannot give a verdict against my conscience and my oath.—The refractory Jurors: Nor can we. (Laughter).—Lord Campbell: Of course, gentlemen, you would not trifle with your oaths.—The Foreman, resuming his seat in an apparently exhausted state, here exclaimed: My lord, I really must refuse to be shut up again in my present condition.—A Juror: Will your lordship allow us to have something to eat, as we are all very hungry, and then we will see what we can do? (Laughter).—Lord Campbell shook his head, and said that if there was no objection by the parties on both sides, he would discharge the jury.—Mr. H. Hill, the counsel for the defendant, said he had no objection to that course.—The plaintiff, who is an attorney, said that under the circumstances he could not consent to the jury being discharged, but he had no objection to their being supplied with refreshments.—Lord Campbell: I suppose there can be no objection to their having moderate refreshments.—Mr. H. Hill: As far as I am concerned, not the slightest.—One of the officers of the court here informed his lordship that when he went to their room, he found several of them smoking (Laughter).—The jury were then again locked up, but on the understanding that they were to have moderate refreshments, but no smoking or stimulants. About 11 o'clock they intimated to the officer that they had agreed to their verdict. They were accordingly taken down to the court, and the foreman stated that they found a verdict for the defendant. It was understood that the ten jurors in favour of the plaintiff yielded to the two in favour of the defendant.—Daily News.

ETIQUETTE OF THE BAR.—COURT OF COMMON PLEAS—June 26.—It was mentioned in our Legal News of June 20, that Mr. Lush, of the Home Circuit, was created a Queen's Counsel, but it was not until the 23rd ult. that the learned gentleman appeared in the silk gown. This morning he came into this court to argue a case, and took his seat within the bar, although he had not been formally called within it. Mr. Justice Cresswell (addressing Mr. M. Chambers, the counsel on the other side) said he did not know that he could recognise the countenance of the gentleman beside him (Mr. Lush).—Mr. Lush said he had mentioned his difficulty yesterday to the Lord Chief Justice, who said he might take his seat provisionally within the bar.—Mr. Justice Cresswell inquired whether his Lordship was then sitting in banco?—Mr. Lush. He was.—Mr. Justice Cresswell. Then, under the circumstances, I will follow the example of the Chief Justice.—Mr. Justice Willes, however, remarked that he had not yet had the opportunity of inspecting the learned gentleman's patent.—Mr. Lush promised that his Lordship should see it in the course of the day.

JUNIOR EQUITY BAR.—We understand that considerable dissatisfaction exists among the junior equity bar on account of the new batch of Queen's Counsel being confined exclusively to the common law bar.—Daily News.

IN RE HUGH INNES CAMERON.—Hugh Innes Cameron, the manager of the Royal British Bank, also the proprietor of a sheepwalk in Scotland, was adjudicated a bankrupt as a dealer in sheep, and he surrendered to the bankruptcy on Monday last.

SOUTHWARK POLICE COURT.—Mr. Hugh Thomas Cameron, a barrister-at-law, and stated to be a magistrate in Ross-shire, and son of Mr. Cameron, the manager of the Royal British Bank, was charged before Mr. Combe with conveying half-a-pint of brandy into the Queen's Prison, contrary to the rules and regulations.—Mr. Combe imposed a penalty of £3, and said he had no power to mitigate it. Mr. Cameron expressed his regret for having unconsciously infringed the law, and immediately paid the fine.—The magistrate then ordered him to be discharged.

THE CONSTITUENCIES OF GREAT BRITAIN.—A return recently issued shows that the grand total number of voters registered in the counties and boroughs of England, Wales, and Scotland, amounts to 1,045,506 including 505,988 in the counties of England and Wales, 439,046 in the boroughs of England and Wales, 50,403 in the Scotch counties, and 50,069 in the Scotch boroughs. Taking the total population of Great Britain (exclusive of Ireland) at some 20,000,000 of souls, it follows that the proportion of electors to the population is about 1 in 20, or just 5 per cent.—Times.

SITTINGS OF THE LORDS JUSTICES.—The Lords Justices will be engaged at the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on Saturday next, and therefore will not sit at Lincoln's-inn on that day. The Lords Justices will sit at Lincoln's-inn next week, and up to the 18th instant inclusive, after which they will probably sit for a few days at the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

SITTINGS AT NISI PRIUS IN LONDON AFTER TRINITY TERM.—The number of causes entered for trial at these Sittings amounts, in the QUEEN'S BENCH, to 130; of these 34 are remanets from the last Sittings, and 50 are marked for special juries.—In the COMMON PLEAS, there are 95 causes in the list, of which 12 are remanets, and 31 special juries. In the EXCHEQUER, the list contains 109 causes; of these 16 are remanets, and 32 are marked for special juries.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

BANKRUPT—ORDER AND DISPOSITION—STOP-ORDER.

Day v. Day, 5 W. R. 701.

This case is the complement of Bartlett v. Bartlett, which we noticed ante, p. 458. That decision, it will be remembered, laid it down that a reversionary fund in court is as capable of being in the order and disposition of a bankrupt as any species of visible property; and that, if an assignee from the bankrupt neglect to obtain a stop-order upon it, the fund must be considered as remaining in the bankrupt's order and disposition with the consent of the true owner. In Day v. Day, L. J. Knight Bruce, with the concurrence of L. J. Turner, expressly declared that he adhered to the doctrine of Bartlett v. Bartlett, but that the circumstances of the present case took it out of the scope of the rule established by that decision. The facts, as they appeared on the appeal (on which additional evidence was adduced which was not before the Court below), were these:—On the 6th of January, 1854, Tucker, the solicitor of the plaintiff, borrowed a sum of money from the United Kingdom Mutual Annuity Society, and ultimately, on the 8th June, 1854, he agreed to assign, as a security for the advance, the costs due to him in the suit. At that time the fund in court was much less than the estimated costs of Tucker, and no order had then been made for payment or taxation of the costs. The Society immediately gave notice to the plaintiff's agent, and to the defendants (the executors) and their solicitors. In August following, the cause was heard on further directions, and an order was made for taxation of Tucker's costs, and for payment of them and prior charges out of a sum in court, and a further sum of £533 which was ordered to be paid in by one of the defendants. The charges prior to Tucker's costs exhausted the whole fund in court at the time of the order, and the remaining fund was not brought in until January, 1855, about three months after Tucker had become bankrupt. The question was, whether this fund, which was sufficient to provide for part of Tucker's costs, passed to his assignees, as being in his order and disposition, or whether the Society was entitled to it under Tucker's agreement to assign it. Upon these facts, L. J. Knight Bruce said, that, up to the time of the bankruptcy, the Society had, by giving notices, done all that could have been done; for there was no fund in court at that time which was charged with the costs, or against which a stop-order could have been obtained. L. J. Turner concurred in the same view, observing that the fund was not in the order and disposition of the bankrupt with the consent of the true owner, as in fact it did not exist at the time of the bankruptcy, and added, that there was no negligence on the part of the mortgagees.

RIGHT OF THE CROWN TO AN ALIEN'S EQUITABLE ESTATE IN LAND.

Barrow v. Wadkin, 5 W. R. 695.

It is remarkable that it should not have been settled before 1857, whether the Crown is entitled to the benefit of a trust of lands declared in favour of an alien. The doctrine was expressly asserted by Lord Hale, in Sir George Sands' Case (Hard. 495), and appears to have been tacitly assumed in a great multitude of cases, the only old authority the other way being a passage in C. B. Gilbert's work on Uses, at page 18. At last, however, a doubt was suggested by the late Vice-Chancellor of England in Burney v. Macdonald (15 Sim. 6), where he intimated that it would be idle to allow the alien himself to insist on the validity of the trust, and that there would be no injustice in refusing to let him have property which he could not hold; and then added, that, if the alien could not enforce the trust, he did not very well see how the Crown, which must claim through him, could have any right to the property. The case, however, was decided on other grounds. The first case in which the point appears to have been expressly decided, is the recent case of Rittson v. Stordy, before V. C. Stuart, reported 3 W. R. 627. There the judgment was, that the alien could not entertain a suit respecting lands; that it would be an abuse of equitable jurisdiction to enforce the trust in order that the Crown might seize; and that there was, consequently, a resulting trust in favour of the heir. That case was brought by appeal before the Lords Justices (4 W. R. 438); but it was ultimately compromised, the Court, in making a decree by consent, being careful to introduce words to guard against any implied affirmance of the opinion expressed by the Vice-Chancellor. In the judgment in Barrow v. Wadkin, the Master of the Rolls entered into an elaborate review of all the authorities bearing directly or indirectly on the question, and came to the conclusion, that, both on principle and authority, a devise of real estate to trustees for an alien is not a void devise; and that it is a trust of which the Crown may enforce the execution, and obtain the benefit. That such a devise would not be void, his Honour held to be clear, as even a devise of a legal fee would not be void; for the alien could take, although he would be incapable of holding, the lands. There was, besides, neither statute nor common law authority for saying that a devise in trust for an alien was ipso facto void. This being so, the trust must be executed; for, even if the alien could not enforce the trust, the Crown would be entitled to do so, there being no reason why the heir should, in such a case, be preferred to the Crown; nor was there any principle on which the right could be refused, unless it were said that the Crown was not entitled to enforce any trust at all—a position which his Honour considered to be contrary to the general principles of the law, and opposed to many decisions. The Crown, therefore, by its prerogative, stood in the place of the alien devisee in trust, and had the same rights in such a case as any assignee by purchase from an equitable devisee in trust who was a natural born subject. A declaration was accordingly made, that the Crown was entitled to the beneficial interest devised to the alien.

TRUSTEE AND CESTUI QUE TRUST.

King v. King, 5 W. R. 699.

The only question in this suit was, whether trustees were justified in refusing to transfer certain mortgage securities to the parties beneficially entitled, without the direction of the Court. These mortgage securities were the subject-matter of a settlement made on the marriage of one of the plaintiffs, who was entitled thereunder to a life estate in the same, with a power of appointment (on the death of his wife, which had happened) to his child or children by that marriage. There was only one child—viz. the other plaintiff—to whom, within two months of his coming of age, the father appointed the mortgages, and thereupon both father and son joined in requesting the trustees to transfer them. The trustees, having taken the advice of counsel on the matter, required that the son should be represented by a separate solicitor; that they (the trustees) should be satisfied that the appointment was the result of no previous bargain between father and son; and that both should join in a proper release—all of which requisitions the plaintiffs consented to comply with. They retained an independent solicitor to act for the son, and each made a declaration that the appointment was not the result of any previous agreement. The defendants, however, refused to transfer, on the ground that the son had but recently come of age; and that he was under the influence and control of his father, who had been engaged in various speculations; all which they submitted by their answer, and also, that, under the circumstances, the effect of a transfer would have been to place the trust property altogether at the disposal of the father. There was no doubt that the plaintiffs were absolutely entitled, and that a court of equity would make a decree that the trustees should make the transfer prayed. The only question was, whether the conduct of the trustees in compelling the plaintiffs to resort to the court was vexatious. Stuart, V. C., held that it was not, being of opinion that the trustees properly regarded with jealousy a transaction for which a court of equity would entertain a similar feeling. Therefore, while his Honour decreed according to the prayer of the bill in everything excepting costs, he ordered that the costs should be borne by the plaintiffs. This decision, following that of the full Court of Appeal in Re Woodburn's Will (ante, 536), bears out the remarks which we made on that case, as to the probable effect which it would have in inducing trustees to prefer, in future, to resort to a suit where they are not disposed to accommodate themselves to the wishes of their cestuis que trust, rather than to proceedings under the Trustee Relief Act. In King v. King, six months having elapsed since the son had attained his majority, he made the declaration required by the trustees, who acted on the advice of their own counsel; both cestuis que trust, father and son, had complied with the other requisitions as far as they could, and were ready and willing to comply with all, when called upon to do so; it was not pretended that there was any doubt as to their right to the transfer asked; the case was one in which the Court did not hesitate to order it to be made; and yet the trustees were not only saved from the payment of costs, but received their costs. According to the decision in Re Woodburn's Will, it is not very certain that trustees would have been so fortunate in an analogous case under the Trustee Relief Act.

INJUNCTION AT SUIT OF ALIEN.

The Collins Company v. Cohen, 5 W. R. 676.

It was argued in this case, upon demurrer, that an alien could not assert a right in this country to a private trade mark, there being no evidence that the law of his own country afforded any protection to trade marks. Wood, V. C., overruled the demurrer, having no doubt that every subject of every country, not being an alien enemy, was entitled to have relief against a fraudulent injury to his property, and was entitled to have the injury stopped at the fountain-head, which could only be, in such a case as the present, by injunction. Apart from all question of copyright, his Honour considered he had the jurisdiction upon the ground of fraud.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—DELIVERY OF GOODS.

Summers v. Solomon, 5 W. R., Q. B., 660.

This was an action to recover from the defendant the price of certain goods which had been delivered to A. S., who had (as it was alleged) authority from the defendant to purchase and receive such goods for him. The defendant resided in London, but had a shop in the country, managed by A. S. The plaintiff had often supplied goods for the defendant's shop on the orders of A. S.; on which occasions the course of dealing had been for him to take the orders from the shop, and to send the goods there. The goods which gave rise to the present action, however, had been ordered by A. S. in London, as for the defendant, and had been carried away by him, and converted to his own use. He was afterwards tried and convicted of obtaining these goods under false pretences; and the present action was brought to recover their value from the defendant. It was held by the Court that there was reasonable evidence to support a verdict for the plaintiff; for that, under the circumstances, he was very well justified in supposing A. S. to be the general agent of the defendant to conduct his country shop. The question was not so much what was the exact relation between the defendant and A. S., but whether A. S. had not so conducted himself as to make it reasonable for the plaintiff to suppose that he acted in that capacity, and had a general authority from the defendant to order goods. It was added by Erle, J., that, in one case to be found in the books, a single instance of recognised agency of the kind had been held sufficient to raise an inference of authority to purchase goods on credit.

The case alluded to by Mr. Justice Erle was that of Hazard v. Treadwell (1 Str. 506), in which Sir John Pratt, C. J., ruled, that, where a master has once paid for goods delivered to his servant for him on credit, the tradesman may trust him on a second occasion on the representation of the same servant, and charge the master with the value of the goods. It may be remarked, that, about fifty years later than the decision of that case, an attempt was made to make a master liable for goods ordered by his servant, which, if it had been successful, would have been a still harder one on the master than the one now under notice. This was Maunder v. Conyers (2 Stark. 281), in which some brandy had been ordered by the butler of the defendant in the name of his master, and had been delivered accordingly, but had been consumed by the butler and the cook, without the defendant being privy either to the order, delivery, or consumption. Here, however, Lord Ellenborough said, "If the defendant had been in the habit of paying for goods ordered by his butler, he would be bound; but we must give up housekeeping if such evidence as this were sufficient to bind a master." It follows, from the cases above instanced, and from others on the subject, that, in order to support an action against the master for goods delivered to his servant for him, the plaintiff must prove either an express authority, or some circumstances from which authority might fairly have been presumed at the time the goods were parted with. It may also be laid down, that, if the master has been in the habit of paying for goods ordered by his servant, he cannot discharge himself from future liability by giving the servant ready money to pay for them, unless he also gives the tradesman notice. But if, on the other hand, he has never authorised or ratified purchases on credit, his having supplied his servant with ready money for the purpose of payment will prevent his being chargeable for goods ordered by such servant on his credit. (See the following Nisi Prius decisions of Lord Ellenborough:—Pearce v. Rogers, 3 Esp. 214; Hiscox v. Greenwood, 4 Esp. 174; Rusby v. Scarlett, 5 Esp. 76).

RULE FOR A CRIMINAL INFORMATION—PERSONAL SERVICE DISPENSED WITH.

Regina v. Tempest, 5 W. R., Q. B., 661.

This case should be added to those instanced (supra, p. 537) as exceptions to the practice requiring personal service of a rule. A rule nisi had been obtained for a criminal information against Lord E. V. Tempest, against which no cause was shown; and it was made absolute on an affidavit stating the belief of the deponent that the defendant was in this country living with his mother; and that a copy of the rule had been read and delivered to a servant at her house, who, on being asked if he would give it to Lord E. V. Tempest, replied—"I can't give it to him till he comes in." Lord Campbell said that there could be no doubt the rule had come to the knowledge of the defendant; and that, if he had wished, he might have appeared to show cause against it.

KINGSFORD v. MERRY—NO TITLE ACQUIRED UNDER POSSESSION OBTAINED BY FRAUD.

Higgins v. Burton, 5 W. R., Exch., 683.

In this case, that of Kingsford v. Merry again came under discussion; and the Barons of the Exchequer expressed their vexation that the alteration of the facts, as stated in the special case for the court of error, from those on which they had themselves given judgment, had excited groundless alarm amongst the merchants of London. In the case now before the Court, one H. D. had obtained possession of some bales of silk from the plaintiff, a warehouseman, by falsely and fraudulently pretending himself to be the agent of one F., and authorised by him to purchase the silk on his behalf. Some of the silk so obtained was sold by the defendant, an auctioneer, at the request of H. D., and the proceeds of the sale were handed over to H. D. in due course. An action of trover was now brought for the silk against the defendant, and the verdict was entered for the plaintiff for their value—Mr. Baron Martin ruling that the property of the plaintiff in the silk had never passed out of him, and that he was consequently entitled to maintain the action. In support of an application to set this verdict aside, it was now urged that the defendant, having received the goods in the course of his business, and without notice of the fraud by which they had been obtained, was not liable to be sued for their value by the true owner, as he had paid over the proceeds to the man who employed him to sell them: for that, in this case, the defendant had neither the goods, nor the proceeds of them, which distinguished it from Kingsford v. Merry. It was, however, answered by the Court, that, whatever might be the expediency of a law providing that, if the owner of property parted with it in such a way as to give everybody the idea that the person invested with the possession was the true owner, such person might pass a title in such goods to a bonâ fide vendee, yet that it would, at all events, be highly unreasonable, if (as in the present case) the owner of goods should be divested of his title by any manner of dealing on the part of one who had obtained their possession by fraud.

ATTORNEY—STRIKING OFF THE ROLL BY REQUEST—ABANDONMENT OF RULE.

Ex parte ——, 5 W. R., B. C., 687.

This was an application on behalf of an attorney for a rule to rescind a rule granted to him at his own request, for striking him off the roll. It appeared that the rule in question had been obtained improvidently, and that no step whatever had been taken upon it. The only difficulty the Court felt in acceding to the application was from a doubt whether the attorney was not off the roll in consequence of the rule which he had sought and obtained; but Master Bunce explained, that, till the rule was taken to the Master's office, the attorney remained on the roll. The rule applied for was then granted.

WRIT OF INJUNCTION UNDER 17 & 18 VICT. C. 125—NOT ISSUABLE IN EJECTMENT.

Baylis v. Legros, 5 W. R., C. P., 689.

This is an important case, as it excludes the action of ejectment altogether from those in which the courts of law are enabled, by virtue of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, to grant an injunction. The action had been brought to recover possession of a factory and other premises, and Mr. Justice Coleridge had ordered, on the application of the plaintiff, a writ of injunction to issue pending the decision of the question in controversy between the parties, restraining the defendant from removing or intermeddling with the machinery and other effects on the factory and premises claimed by the plaintiff.

The injunction had been granted under the 82nd section of the Act, which allows the plaintiff in an action to apply for an injunction "to restrain the defendant in such action from the repetition or continuance of the wrongful act or breach of contract complained of, or the committal of any breach of contract or injury of a like kind arising out of the same contract, or relating to the same property or right." And it was held by the Court, that neither this provision, nor that contained in s. 79, applied to an action of ejectment at all, but to other actions. Indeed, Mr. Justice Willes (who, as one of the Commissioners, may be presumed a good authority) expressly said that the Legislature did not intend to give the courts of law the power of granting an injunction in an ejectment. The rule for setting aside the order was consequently made absolute, but the costs were directed to be costs in the cause.

MASTER AND SERVANT, LAW OF—RESPONSIBILITY FOR ACTS OF SERVANT.

Patten v. Rea, 5 W. R., C. P., 689.

This case may well be read in connection with that of Pidgeon v. Legge, noticed in our last number.* That case showed, that, though the relationship of master and servant may happen to exist between the defendant and the person committing the tort complained of, yet the former is not liable if such servant was not, by the intendment of the law, acting in execution of his master's orders. The present case is an instance of the circumstances under which such an acting will be presumed by the law, and the master consequently be held liable. The defendant was sued to recover damages for an injury caused by the negligent driving of his servant, while such servant was going about the defendant's business in a gig belonging to the servant. And it was held, that the action was rightly brought, because the gig, though the property of the servant, was used by him on his master's business, and with his acquiescence. It may be observed, that, though much stress in the argument was laid on the circumstance that the gig belonged to the servant, this does not really seem to have anything to do with the question as to the master's liability. If the servant had been going about his own business in a gig belonging to his master, without his knowledge or acquiescence, the latter would not have been liable; as was expressly decided in the recent case of Mitchell v. Crassweller, 13 C. B. 237.

QUEEN'S BENCH.—SLIGO ELECTION CASE.

The case of Sedley v. M'Gowan, which has occupied the Court for several days, and has excited considerable interest, arose out of the late election for the notorious borough of Sligo, where party spirit ran high, and the officials engaged appear to have entered into the contest with as much energy as the candidates themselves. The facts of this case lie in a very small compass. Sedley, the plaintiff, who is an elector of the borough, and whose right to vote is not disputed, went up to the polling place to tender his vote, but the officer refused to receive it. The plaintiff's case was, that this conduct on the part of the officer arose from a determination to prevent, as far as possible, votes from being recorded for the candidate who had obtained the plaintiff's support. The defendant, however, alleged that the refusal resulted from an honest impression that the plaintiff had no right to vote. For the injury sustained by the plaintiff in not being allowed to exercise his privilege as an elector, this action for damages was now brought against the returning officer.

The Lord Chief Justice, in charging the jury, said, that, without going into the question, how far the principal—the returning officer—might be liable for all the acts of his deputy, he would state, that, if the plaintiff's vote were rejected by the deputy corruptly, and in furtherance of a design to secure the return of a particular candidate, although no other instance of his having so acted were proved, yet the act of the deputy was the act of the returning officer, and for the consequences of that act the latter would be liable. Many circumstances had been referred to as proving that such a design existed. Among other things it was alleged that the poll-books had been altered, and did not now present the same results as when first delivered up by the proper officers. If the jury should be of opinion that the books had been tampered with, with the design of procuring the return of Mr. J. P. Somers, it was for them further to say whether they could exempt the returning officer from the charge of being a participator in so illegal and corrupt a design. The case was not merely one where it was alleged that a legal right had been violated. If they found against the defendant, they would decide that he had acted illegally and corruptly, and upon a principle most injuriously and publicly mischievous.

The jury found for the plaintiff, with £100 damages.

WARNING TO RAILROAD COMPANIES.

The case of White v. Waterford and Kilkenny Railway Company arose out of a very serious accident which occurred a few months since to a train by which the plaintiff was a passenger; a siding, near Dunkitt, having been negligently left open, the train ran into it, and came into collision with a train of wagons which happened to be standing there, and several persons were very seriously injured, and among the rest the plaintiff, who was Inspector-General of Lunatic Asylums. The emoluments arising from this office amount to about £1,000 per annum, and the injuries sustained by Dr. White were of so serious a nature as to incapacitate him for public employment, and to compel his immediate retirement on a pension equal to fully one-fourth of the salary. Dr. White had, up to the time of the accident, enjoyed excellent health; he was, however, about seventy years of age.

It was proposed, on the part of the plaintiff, by calling a stock-broker, to give evidence of what would be the value of an annuity of equal amount to the plaintiff's income; but this evidence was objected to, and the Chief Justice ruled that it was inadmissible.

The jury found for the plaintiff, with £2,500 damages.

COURT OF DELEGATES—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. WILSON.

In this long contested case, a very large amount of personal property was claimed by the Crown in consequence of the death, intestate and unmarried, of Captain John Wilson, who was the illegitimate son of Richard Wilson, a man of large fortune, in the County of Meath. In a former communication * we adverted to the impropriety of leaving such a question to be determined by delegates nominated by the Crown purposely to try the case. The judgment of the delegates has now been delivered, and it is in favour of the Crown.

Judge Crampton, in delivering the unanimous judgment of the Court, said that the case was instituted in the Court of Prerogative for the purpose of obtaining administration of the effects of the intestate, who died in February, 1855; and the question was, whether Charles Wilson, the impugnant, was his lawful son or not. Only one question of law had arisen in the case; and that was as to the admissibility of evidence of family likeness. That such evidence was admissible as confirmatory evidence, he did not mean to deny, but that it was entitled to any considerable weight he could not admit. Nothing could be more fanciful than the opinions of individuals as to family resemblance—it was altogether matter of opinion. Persons not in any way related to each other often exhibited a wonderful resemblance; while, on the other hand, members of the same family were frequently altogether unlike one another. In the present case the evidence of resemblance was founded on the opinion of persons who had not seen one of the parties in whom the likeness was traced for thirty years; little weight could, therefore, be attached to it. The Court had come to the conclusion that Charles Wilson was the son of Captain J. Wilson; but it had not been proved to their satisfaction that he was also the son of Sydney Booth—a lady who, it was alleged, was privately married to Captain Wilson in 1817. The evidence adduced to prove their courtship and cohabitation was inconsistent and unsatisfactory, and such as the Court could not rely on. Neither could they give credence to evidence that had been given as to declarations said to have been made by Captain Wilson, of the legitimacy of Charles Wilson and his sister. Another branch of the inquiry, and an important one, was as to an alleged marriage between Captain Wilson and Miss Booth (in support of which evidence had been given by the Rev. Mr. Franklin, a very aged clergyman, who professed to have a clear recollection of having performed the ceremony). As to this, the Court were of opinion that Mr. Franklin did not depose to an actual fact, but that he had been persuaded and coerced into the belief of a transaction which was unreal, and had never occurred. The Court, therefore, gave judgment for the Crown.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)

In the estimates laid before Parliament for the present year, may be seen a charge of upwards of £30,000 for the public records of Ireland; annual charges of the same kind occur for the public records of England; but no similar charge appears for those of Scotland. It may not be altogether useless to explain the reason why.

The public records of Scotland are preserved in the general Register House at Edinburgh, and are under the immediate superintendence of the Lord Clerk Registrar. They are of various kinds, and the establishment is branched into several departments, each of which has its own proper objects and its own officials. Some of these have their parallels in England and Ireland: some are peculiar to Scotland. In all the departments, as in England and Ireland, the system of charging fees for access to and for the use of the records prevails—some exceptions being made to the rule, which need not be noticed here. In some cases, the fees so charged furnish an annual revenue which more than suffices to pay the whole expense of maintaining the department; in other cases, there is a deficiency, but the deficiency is not in any case very great.

The principle of making such an establishment maintain itself is by many strongly objected to; but, on the other hand, there are practical objections to throwing the records open to the public free of charge, even under regulation; and the great majority in Scotland would probably be quite content that the system of charging fees in each department should be continued, and that these fees should be applied to the maintenance of that department, or even that all the public departments should be dealt with as one in this matter. And, indeed, with regard to one of the departments of the establishment—that which has the custody of the various registers relating to the land rights of the country—there never has been any objection to the system of charging fees. It is admitted, on every hand, that these registers are not—in the same sense as the historic records of the country—public; that they were established for the special benefit of those interested in present transactions relating to heritable subjects; and that, therefore, these parties ought to pay for that benefit—and so, accordingly, they do pay, and most willingly. But the feeling is universal, also, that the charges so made should not be more than sufficient to cover the expense of the department. And when it is explained that the fees derived from this department not only maintain it, but yield a large surplus after paying all expenses, it will not surprise any one to hear that the greatest possible discontent prevails; and that the system is regarded as an indirect way of imposing a most unjust tax upon land.

It would naturally be supposed that the surplus revenue arising from the department having the charge of the land right registers would be expended in every sort of contrivance to make these registers accessible and useful to those requiring to resort to them, and to secure efficiency, accuracy, and despatch in the transaction of the important business with which the department is charged. It would not be imagined that Government would divert the funds of this, a special department, differing in its nature and objects from all the other public departments, for the purpose of supplementing any deficiency that might occur in these departments: far less would it be supposed possible that they should appropriate any such surplus funds for general revenue purposes. It is bad enough to make the ordinary public (the word is used in its widest sense) departments support each other by mutual contributions, but it is altogether intolerable that the landowners should be specially taxed for that purpose, as well as for general revenue purposes; yet it is a literal fact that the Government not only makes the whole establishment support itself, but, over and above, derives a large annual revenue from the General Record Office in Scotland, the greater part of which is drawn from the department for the registration of land rights, as may be seen by any one who chooses to verify the statement by referring to the Civil Service Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1856; from which it appears that the expenditure upon the Sasine Office for that year was £5,286, while the receipts were £8,804, and that the total expenditure on all the departments was £11,165, while the receipts were £17,137, thus showing an annual profit derived by Government from the Public Record Office of Scotland of £5,972. In England, the difference between the expenditure and the receipts is enormous, the latter seldom amounting to a tenth part of the former, so that there is always a large deficiency, which is, of course, annually voted. It must not be supposed, that, in pointing out this difference in the state of matters in the two countries, it is intended to insinuate that there is anything wrong in the management of the English system, or to object to the charge which is thereby created upon the public funds. The circumstances under which the two systems exist are entirely different, and they cannot, therefore, be compared; but if a system of registration of land rights be established in England, there may come to be some analogy between the systems in the two countries, and it will then be seen whether Englishmen will consent to pay such fees for the new register as will enable Government to strike the charge for the public records of England out of the future estimates submitted to Parliament. It will surprise us if they do. And yet in Scotland there has been remonstrance after remonstrance, public and private, against this very wrong which has not even produced a promise of redress. In the beginning of this year the writers to the signet addressed a memorial to the Treasury on the subject, which did not receive the slightest practical notice.

But that is the usual way in which all remonstrances from this quarter are treated. There are few Scotch lawyers in the House of Commons; and if the few that happen to be there are seized with a legislative furor, they very soon understand each other, and pass Bill after Bill full of blunders and crotchets, simply because no other Scotch member in the House has sufficient knowledge of law to enable him to interfere with any effect.

The legal bodies send up report after report, and these appear to produce about as much effect as waste-paper; but such a state of things cannot be much longer tolerated, and already there is a proposal to associate all the legal bodies of the kingdom into a society, for the purpose of giving more forcible expression to their opinions, and taking more active measures to get them carried into practical operation.

The manner in which the Bill for the Registration of Long Leases in Scotland has been brought into, and forced through, the House of Commons, affords the best possible illustration of the truth of these remarks. It is a Bill which introduces changes that were not called for from any quarter. The existing law caused no practical inconvenience. An entirely new system of conveyancing in regard to leases is called into operation, and the existing rights of landlords are seriously interfered with to meet a few isolated cases of convenience. Besides all this, it introduces a new class of deeds into the registers of land rights, which are already overloaded, and becoming unworkable for that very reason. Many of the clauses of the Bill are remarkable, even among clauses in Acts of Parliament, for the indistinctness of the terms in which they are conceived. As, for example, the 18th section, of the Bill as amended in committee, which runs thus:—"No lease executed after the passing of this Act, nnless where the same shall have been executed in terms of an obligation to renew contained in a lease renewable as aforesaid, and of date prior to this Act, shall be held to fall within the same, or to be registrable thereunder, except in case of subjects held by burgage tenure, the name of the lands of which the ground thereby let consists or forms a part, shall not be set forth therein, or where the ground let shall not be described by boundaries in such lease."

It is understood that the Faculty of Advocates have carefully considered this Bill, and have reported against it; but it seems to have acquired greater vitality on this account. It is not the slightest exaggeration to say that there are many conveyancers in large practice in Scotland, of old standing, who have never prepared a long lease of the description dealt with by this Act, and many have never seen one. This may appear a strange statement to English readers; but when it is explained that in Scotland houses, as an almost invariable rule, are built upon land not leased, but feued (that is, disponed or conveyed in perpetuum), for payment of a fixed annual sum, it will be better understood.

Another of the sheriffships doomed to extinction by the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 92, has fallen, and the counties of Sutherland and Caithness are now judged by one sheriff. When Mr. Sheriff Thomson died, a short time ago, the county of Caithness became amalgamated with Sutherland. The sheriff of the amalgamated counties has since resigned, and Mr. Dingwall Fordyce, one of the advocates depute, has succeeded him. It may, perhaps, be recollected, that, in 1853, a great popular clamour was got up about the insufficiency of the remuneration given to the sheriff substitutes. The agitation would not have met with much opposition—because, so far, it was not without reason—if it had not been coupled with a cry for the abolition of the office of sheriff principal. All sensible men saw that if this clamour was successful, the efficiency of the sheriff courts would be seriously impaired. Those who knew the practical good which was derived from the constant superintendence of the sheriffs principal, residing in Edinburgh, and in daily practice in the supreme courts, and from their periodical visits to their counties, were unwilling to risk the loss of these, and opposed the whole movement; but the pressure was too great to be resisted; so this Act had to be thrown out, as a tub, to amuse the excited mob of so-called reformers. There are few now who would willingly withdraw the sheriff substitutes from the control of their principals.

PROBATE AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, the evils and grievances attendant on the continuance of the present system of obtaining probate of wills and letters of administration had been so long admitted, that he might well assume it was a matter on which there could be no difference of opinion. In fact, for nearly thirty years, different governments had attempted to accomplish this alteration; and unquestionably these courts would have long since succumbed to the attacks made upon them if their assailants had been as determined as to what should be erected in their place, as they were unanimous in their desire to pull them down. The House was aware, that, anterior to the new Statute of Wills, a remarkable difference existed between wills of personal estate and wills of landed property. A will of personal estate needed no attestation; but a will of real estate required to be attested by three witnesses, and to be executed with great solemnity. The Act of 1837 took away that distinction, and required that all wills, whether they related to personal estate or exclusively to real estate, should be executed and attested in the same manner, and with the same solemnity. It might naturally have been expected that instruments subject to the same forms and regulations would be subject to the same tribunals for adjudication—viz. the ordinary tribunals of the country. But a glaring anomaly was allowed to continue, that, whilst they had one single form according to which the will must be made, there were nevertheless two tribunals to which it must be submitted: first, with regard to its validity so far as related to personal estate, to the Ecclesiastical Court; and then to the ordinary tribunals of the country, so far as it related to real estate. If there were both real and personal estate, and there were any contest relative to the sanity of the testator or to the execution of the instrument, that question could not be determined by one single tribunal once for all, but the parties were compelled to take the matter to two different courts having different forms of procedure, and which might arrive at different and opposite conclusions. Only last year they had witnessed one of the most glaring examples of this. A testator in Ireland was pronounced by the Ecclesiastical Courts of that country sane as to his personal estate, but in the courts of common law, in reference to his real estate, he was pronounced insane. This occurred perpetually in the present state of the law. But there might be the same contest between the ordinary tribunals as to real estate; for if a man died having land in Surrey, he might be found insane by a Surrey jury, and if he had also land in Middlesex, a Middlesex jury might find him sane. The first conclusion, therefore, which this state of the law seemed to indicate, was the appointment of a tribunal competent to decide once for all on the validity of a will, whether of real or personal estate, or both. The next thing to be observed upon was, that, in the Ecclesiastical Courts, the mode of arriving at a decision was different from that of the ordinary tribunals. He believed all would agree that matters relative to a testator's state of mind could not be tried in a satisfactory manner except before a jury, because there was no other mode by which the evidence could be so well tested. But the proceedings of the Ecclesiastical Court were formed on the model of the civil law, and the conclusion was arrived at quite in a different way from that in the common law tribunals. The next requisite was that the Court should have one uniform mode of procedure, ascertaining disputed facts through the medium of a jury, unless all parties, where there was no necessity for the sifting of the evidence, agreed to submit the case to the determination of the judge. Uniformity, simplicity, and economy were the principal requisites which should be considered in any change; and he would now at once proceed to show how far the alterations proposed to be made were conducive to these three requisites. The Bill proposed to abolish at once all the existing ecclesiastical and peculiar courts in which wills might now be proved, amounting to about 400 in number, and which were of no manner of use, except to increase that "admired confusion" which had so often prevailed in our system in consequence of the extreme tenacity with which we clung to old institutions long after they had ceased to be of the slightest practical benefit. It was proposed to substitute one single court of probate. Even for the ordinary process of proving, or, as he preferred to term it, of authenticating a will, a court would be necessary in consequence of the minute technical forms which the Statute of Wills required to be observed. The Court of Probate, therefore, would be the court to which wills would be brought, even if they belonged to what was called the common form business, for the purpose of being authenticated; but the mode of procedure would be very much more simple, and much more economical than that which at present existed. Of course the new court would be located in the metropolis; but for the convenience of the country at large, district courts would be formed, and local registries established, to which wills might be taken whenever a person, whose ordinary place of residence was within one of those districts died, leaving personalty not exceeding £1,500, and the parties preferred to go to the local, instead of the metropolitan court. It would not, however, be prudent to extend that privilege to cases where the property exceeded £1,500. Suppose, for instance, a will not complying with all the formalities injoined by the Wills Act was admitted to probate, the executors might go to the Bank of England, or to any public company in which the deceased happened to have stock standing in his name, and get that stock transferred to himself, which he might convert to his own use. If this will proved to be informal, and another will was subsequently admitted to probate in favour of other parties, the Bank or the public company would be compelled to make good the property they had parted with. It was, therefore, desirable to restrict the jurisdiction of the local registrars to £1,500, and insist on all the more important cases being taken up to London, where, of course, greater care and accuracy could be insured. There was another way of proving wills, which was not so simple as this, and which was called the proof "in solemn form." Its object was this: There might not be at the moment any particular contest about the validity of a will, but the parties interested in it might be desirous of having placed on record the evidence both of its due execution and of the sanity of the testator. The Bill provided a mode in which a will might be proved in a manner that would be conclusive in point of validity as regarded both real and personal estate. Suppose a party was desirous of establishing a will; all that would be necessary would be to make a simple allegation that the testator was of sound, disposing mind, and that the instrument had been duly executed in conformity with the law. The heir-at-law and the next-of-kin, and every other party interested, would then be cited to appear in court. The witnesses would be examined before the judge; the sentence would be pronounced; and it would definitively conclude and settle the validity of the will. At present a will devising real estate might be contested after any lapse of time; and the consequence was, that considerable uncertainty sometimes prevailed with respect to the title to real property. The next species of business with which the court would have to deal was what was called the contentious business, which would comprise the suits instituted by parties hostile to any particular will. If the Bill passed, the Lord Chancellor proposed that Orders should be framed under which the form of procedure should be very much simplified. All that would be requisite would be an allegation of ten words by the plaintiff, and a response of half-a-dozen words on the part of the defendant. Then the whole process would be referred to a court of common law. The facts would be examined into, and a verdict arrived at, which, if there was no rule for a new trial, would be a final decision. The present judge of the Prerogative Court, if he pleased, would be the judge of the new court in the first instance; but it was proposed, that, as soon as the judgeship of the Court of Admiralty should become vacant, the judge of the Probate Court should preside over both tribunals; and he (Sir R. Bethell) trusted that at some future time a measure would be brought forward to simplify likewise the procedure in the Admiralty Court. Besides this, it was proposed that the judge of the Probate Court should be one of the judges of the Divorce Court; indeed, he was to be the Judge Ordinary of that tribunal. Nor would the jurisdiction of this judge stop there. One of the great wants of the day was some tribunal which should have authority over the property of deceased persons during the litigation as to the validity of disputed wills. In such cases the property was neglected, and very great prejudice was the result; but the present Bill would give the judge power to appoint an ad interim manager of the personalty, and an ad interim receiver of the real estate. These were the principal functions which the new court would have to discharge. Its daily and ordinary functions would chiefly have reference to questions that might arise on proving wills in common form. With regard to the officers of the new tribunal, it was proposed that they should, as far as possible, consist of the officers of the old courts. As far as was practicable the officers of the Prerogative Court would be transferred to the new court, and the diocesan registrars would be transferred to the new district registries. The relations between the metropolitan registry and those in the country would demand special attention in committee. One question that might arise would be, whether the papers should be sent from the district registries to the London office before they were finally admitted to probate? On consideration, however, it had not been considered absolutely necessary that that should be done; and it would manifestly cause delay, and likewise some additional expense. Some alteration would be necessary in the matter of caveats; and he should introduce a clause to prevent the possibility of a will being proved in one court while there was a caveat against it in another. It was proposed that all the existing wills should be collected in one great registry, and that copies of the wills, which in future would be filed in the district registries, should also be placed in such registry. The Bill proposed also to make arrangements which in a few years would lay the foundation for a very important means of obtaining information as to titles. It was proposed that indexes of all wills should be kept in all the district registries, as well as in Edinburgh and in Dublin. By that means great facilities would be given for obtaining a knowledge of facts, which at present could only be arrived at by tedious and protracted search. Another object of the Bill was to provide a place of deposit for the wills of persons in their life-time, which it was expected would in many cases be found a great convenience. In a word, there was scarcely any inconvenience which had been reported upon by the different Commissions with which the measure did not attempt to deal. He now came to a more painful subject—the manner in which he proposed to deal with the persons who held offices that would be abolished by the Bill. So long ago as 1836, warning had been given to these parties that the offices they held were condemned; and, by the 6 & 7 W. 4, it was provided that no compensation should be given to any officer of the ecclesiastical courts except the judge and registrar of the Metropolitan Court of Canterbury, in the event of these offices being abolished; which warning had been repeated in subsequent enactments down to the 10 & 11 Vict. He, therefore, proposed that those who were in office anterior to the 6 & 7 W. 4, should receive full compensation; and that those who had received their appointments after that date should be regarded as holding their appointments during pleasure, and on that footing should receive compensation. In the one case the parties would be entitled as if they held a freehold office; in the other, they would be regarded as appointed during pleasure, and would be dealt with in a very different manner. The managing clerks in the registry of Canterbury would also be provided for. Those who had served fifteen years in that capacity would be compensated under the provisions of the Bill; and it would be for the House to say whether and how far that proposal should be extended. He now came to the proctors—who were to retain a monopoly of the common form practice. The amount of that business would be very much increased by the Bill, for all the non-contentious business in the country where the property exceeded £1,500 would pass through their hands, one-third of which only was at present transacted in the Prerogative Court, and the House would thus be able to form an opinion how far they would be affected by the proposed change. Besides, the Prerogative Court dealt only with personal estate; but hereafter there would be brought into that court contested cases of real as well as personal estate. In the former Bill which he had introduced, he proposed to abolish the proctors' monopoly, and he provided a measure of compensation. He proposed that the proctors should receive an annuity of one-half their average gains. But he was unable to please them by that proposition, and it was chiefly owing to their resistance that the Bill was lost. The present plan, however, was in part what they had themselves proposed; and he could not, therefore, feel the slightest reluctance in pressing upon the House the adoption of the Bill. It would be idle for the House to assume to prophesy that these persons would sustain a loss, and vote away the public money as compensation. It was impossible to recognise the right of practitioners to compensation. If there were improvements in the law, giving greater simplicity and facility, was the practitioner to have a vested right in delay, and evil, and suffering? What would be thought of the medical man who claimed a vested right in protracted suffering and disease? As the office remained there was no ground on which compensation could be claimed. Though the measure was by no means of so large and comprehensive a character as the former ones, it would be more entitled to general approval; it was more fair and just, and would succeed in removing the inconveniences that had been complained of for the last thirty years.

Mr. HENLEY had great pleasure in seconding the motion for the second reading. He thought the House and the country were indebted to the Attorney-General for yielding his own views, which were in favour of a more theoretically perfect measure, to the requirements of the public. As to the constitution of the Court of Probate, it might be a matter of consideration whether it was wise to load it with the business of the Court of Admiralty; but that was a mere question of detail. He doubted the propriety of the provision for transmitting wills proved before this time; there was a great feeling in the country against it; and he thought it desirable that these evidences of title, relating, as many of them did, to the poor man's cottage, might remain where they were. No point was more strongly felt in the country than that of having the means of verifying their titles easily accessible. The same objection did not apply to wills which might be proved afterwards, as the same evidence was not necessary. He hoped this matter would be considered by the committee. On the question of compensation, the Attorney-General had altogether omitted to speak of the proctors out of London—at Chester, York, Exeter, and one or two other places. These gentlemen would unquestionably entirely lose their business, as solicitors would be eligible to practise in their courts; and they were certainly entitled to some compensation. As to the London proctors, he thought it impossible to say how much they might gain or lose by the change. He was at first rather in favour of throwing open the business, but subsequent consideration had led him to an opposite conclusion. It seemed there was a statute which prevented proctors from entering into partnership with solicitors; in other words, from dividing the spoil with them, where the solicitors brought them business. It was proved by the evidence before the commission that the proctors, being a small body, stood equally between the suitors and the court, and would not lend themselves to anything like improper practices. If the business were thrown open there would be 10,000 or 12,000 practitioners, and the Court would then have much less control over them. The business had been hitherto most satisfactorily conducted, and it was not worth while to run the risk of disturbing this by throwing it open to the profession.

Mr. COLLIER said there were serious defects in the Bill, but he hoped they might be remedied. First, he deemed it unnecessary to create a new court at all; and secondly, he objected to the court as proposed. He proposed that the courts of common law should transact all the contentious business, and that all the common form business should be disposed of, not by a judge, but by a registrar, with a salary of £1,500 a year. Amidst all the complaints against our legal system, he had never heard a complaint that we had too few courts, but rather too many. Out of this fact arose the great opprobrium of our system. Recently, we had witnessed the scandalous spectacle of a contest of jurisdiction between the Court of Chancery and the Court of Bankruptcy over the carcass of the British Bank. At present a commission was sitting to inquire whether there were too many judges, and in the face of that commission it was proposed to appoint a sixteenth judge. In America and in India there were no doctors or proctors—men made their wills and died, and the ordinary tribunals had no difficulty in disposing of the business. Thirty years ago the ecclesiastical courts in Scotland were abolished, but the people would not endure the creation of any new court in their stead. The jurisdiction was transferred to the Sheriffs' Courts and the Court of Session. Why should not the Courts of Westminster do in England what the Court of Session did in Scotland? The ecclesiastical courts were a diseased excrescence, which a healthy action of the existing tribunals ought to absorb. The Lord Chancellor himself, in introducing the Bill in the last session of Parliament, said that the new judge would have next to nothing to do. Now he said, that he proposed the new court and the new judge against his better judgment; but by what influence he was induced to alter his opinion he (Mr. Collier) did not know. On introducing the Bill in the present session, he still expressed the opinion that the new judge would not have enough to do, and, therefore, he proposed to make him assistant judge in the new Divorce Court and also judge of the Admiralty Court. He should like to know on what principle or system these three jurisdictions, which had nothing in common, were to be mixed up together. On what ground were wills, ships, and marriages to be put together, and handed over to one court? They might as well give one court jurisdiction in bankruptcy, burglary, and bills of exchange. With regard to the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, that should be given to the courts of common law. Those courts decided cases of the collision of vessels, and awarded damages; and he could not see why they should not also decide as to the apportioning the damage between vessels. His main objections to the Bill were, that it saddled the country with a new court, which was unnecessary; and that the court would not be an efficient court for the purpose. The judge of the new court would be judicially starved: he would have to live on mere husks and straw, whilst the well-fatted calves would be transferred to another court. He should endeavour in committee to reduce this proposed new court to an office with a registrar, and to refer the whole of the contentious business to a court of common law, in conformity with the provisions of the Bill which he introduced four years ago, and which received the support of the Solicitor-General. One word with regard to the appeal. There was a provision in the Bill allowing an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, who were again to hand the case over to the House of Lords. It was of the utmost importance to give the county courts jurisdiction in cases of probate, because not to do so would amount to a denial of justice to the poor man. But he could not understand why the county court districts should be adopted for contentious purposes, and the diocesan districts for non-contentious. Nothing could be more unsystematic than to have one set of districts for trying the contentious, and a different set for trying the non-contentious questions. This would very much limit the public accommodation. There was only one place of registration for Westmoreland and Cumberland for instance—namely, Chester. Peterborough was the place of registration for part of Northamptonshire, Huntingdonshire, and Cambridgeshire. He should take the sense of the House whether the county court districts should not be adhered to. The Attorney-General adopted his proposition on that point in the Bill of last session. These were the outlines of the objections he felt to the present Bill, and he should submit clauses for the purpose of introducing the amendments he had pointed out. He was strongly of opinion that they ought altogether to get rid of the old cumbrous and obsolete ecclesiastical court, and transfer the jurisdiction to the ordinary tribunals of the country.

Mr. ROLT said, he should certainly despair of the cause of law reform if the views expressed by Mr. Collier were adopted. As he understood the question, the great grievance was the multiplicity of independent jurisdictions with regard to probate of wills and grants of letters of administration, and the difficulty—almost the impossibility—of determining with anything like certainty the particular jurisdiction which should deal with a particular case. That inconvenience was admitted for the greater part of this century. But the grievance did not arise from any defect in the tribunals of the country, or from any abuse in the exercise of the jurisdiction of these tribunals. The defect arose from the rapid increase of wills relating to personal property, so that tribunals which were amply sufficient to discharge the duties they had to discharge when they were created, became wholly insufficient when personal property had increased by the formation of canals, railways, and other property of that kind. Mr. Collier seemed to think that the new court would have nothing to do. That arose from an entire misapprehension of the nature of the common form business of the ecclesiastical courts. The mere authentication of a will was not all that was required. The common form business of these courts required men of knowledge, experience, and education. These courts had to determine who was to be executor, and other questions which affected the rights of property in the highest degree. To suppose, therefore, that, because the Court did not sit every day in the week, it had no business to do, was an entire fallacy. He admitted it might be possible to engraft on that jurisdiction other branches of business based on the civi law. Three members of the commission were of opinion that the jurisdiction in this matter should be transferred to the Court of Chancery; but whether it was transferred to the Court of Chancery, or to a court of common law, or to an entirely new tribunal, it must be made a separate department. It must be a distinct department, with distinct officers, to whatever tribunal the jurisdiction was transferred, and therefore the commission came to the conclusion that it ought to be transferred to a new tribunal. That was the reason why he should oppose any attempt to do less than was proposed to be done by this Bill. There were points in the Bill with which he did not agree, but this was an occasion on which they must sacrifice their particular views in order to carry a great reform. With regard to the compensation, he hoped the House would enable the Government to pass a larger measure of compensation than the Bill proposed to give.

Mr. MALINS had always agreed in the necessity of doing away with the numerous jurisdictions, and removing the whole matter from the control of the ecclesiastical courts, and establishing a Queen's Court of Probate. As he gave a general support to the Bill, he would not then enter into his objections to the details; but he was strongly opposed to the clause which gave the appeal to the House of Lords instead of to the Privy Council. The Bill was one which called on many persons to make great sacrifices, and destroyed great interests. He had heard with much pleasure the declaration of the Attorney-General with regard to the proctors of the Courts of York and Chester; for if the Bill had abolished their offices without compensation, it would have committed a gross injustice. The learned gentleman, however, said he could not make the concession with respect to the proctors in London, on the ground that they had no claim to compensation when a mere improvement was effected. The principle was the same in both cases, as the proctors of York were nothing else than the victims of an improved practice.

Lord PALMERSTON.—They are to be swept off the face of the land.

Mr. MALINS.—The noble Lord admitted the principle with regard to the proctors of York, who were to be swept away, but he refused it to those who would hereafter earn only £100 by their practice, where they now earned £800. The proctors of London were about 120 in number; they were gentlemen of great respectability, and members of a body which had enjoyed its privileges for over six centuries. He was sure the House would admit their claim if it could be proved that the Bill, while preserving their privileges in name, did, in reality, destroy them. The number of wills proved and administrations granted in England was 25,000; of these not more than a hundred were contested, so that it would appear the non-contentious business produced the greater portion of their profit. The Bill, however, proposed that in all cases where the property did not exceed £1,500, the will should be proved in the district court, which would (as the proctors asserted) take away seven-eighths of their entire business. In committee he would go into statements which would place this matter beyond doubt. In the former Bill the Attorney-General had proposed to allow them as compensation the amount of half their receipts, calculated on an average of the last five years. It would be proposed in committee to adopt that scale, and to charge the compensation, as in the former Bill, on the suitors' fee fund. It would thus be no burden on the public.

Mr. WESTHEAD urged the claims of the proctors of York to compensation, whose case (he said) was very different from that of the London proctors. The system at York was unique. It was constituted in 1311, and from that time to the present the number of proctors attached to the court was only eight; each proctor was allowed one clerk, who succeeded as vacancies occurred. He objected to the division of the county of York into four districts, as proposed by the Bill; if it was carried into effect, in case of a death near York, the will would be sent to Hull or Richmond to be proved.

Sir E. PERRY would have been glad to see in the Bill a provision to give jurisdiction, contentious or non-contentious, to the county courts in all cases, no matter what the amount, when the parties agreed to submit to that court; and that the district registrars should be at once attached to the county courts. To the principle of compensation to the proctors he was opposed. Whether the compensation was charged on the fee fund or not, it must come from the pockets of the public. On a former occasion the proctors expressed themselves willing to accept the Bill if they were allowed to retain the common form business for ten years, but the present Bill gave it to them for ever. Therefore, he trusted the noble Lord would not listen to the claims urged on him, but adhere to the principle he had already adopted, and carry the Bill as it now stood.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL congratulated the House and the country on the prospect of at length passing this Bill. Mr. Collier did not deny that this Bill would get rid of the evils complained of, but contended it would not do so in the best manner, and referred to the course proposed by him (the Solicitor-General) of transferring the jurisdiction to the common law courts. He certainly would be glad if such a measure could be carried, but he must remind his hon. friend that the objections entertained to that course were so strong that the Bill had never been allowed to come to a second reading.

Mr. HEADLAM spoke in favour of the Bill, and observed that two of the greatest objections to former measures had been got rid of—centralisation, and throwing the decision of the validity of wills into the Court of Chancery. He thought the proctors of York stood in a different position from the proctors of London, and that their case was deserving of consideration.

Mr. CAIRNS said, that, although this was not the proper time to discuss the details of the measure, the distinction between its principle and details was so fine, that he thought it necessary to throw out some suggestions for the consideration of the Attorney-General in future stages. One point to which he would call his attention was that of a contentious litigation. The Bill provided, that, in every case in which the heir-at-law disputed a will, the matter was to be withdrawn from the judge of probate and sent as an issue into the courts of common law. One of the greatest evils at the present time was the handing of a case from one court to another, and that might be avoided in the case of the new court, if the decision of the jury were obtained under the direction of the judge of probate, who would be peculiarly fitted to direct a jury in such matters. With regard to appeals: Under the Bill the appeal was to be, not to the Judicial Committee of Privy Council as at present, but to the Judicial Committee at stage No. 1, and by that court to the House of Lords at stage No. 2. During the last Parliament a discussion took place respecting the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, and he was not aware that anything had been done substantially to remedy the complaints against that tribunal. What ground, then, could exist for transferring the appellate jurisdiction from one which had hitherto given satisfaction? Then, again, the contentious business was to be decided in small cases by the county courts, but the Bill contained this singular provision, that the appeal was to be to the courts of common law—thus multiplying courts of appeal, and giving rise to differences of decision—when the appeal ought to be to the Court of Probate. He thought a serious question would arise upon that part of the Bill which related to country districts. The proposition was to create forty-one country districts for the proof and registration of wills where the property was under £1,500. It would, therefore, be necessary to provide forty-one substantial fire-proof buildings, and an efficient staff for each; and he confessed he did not think the advantage at all commensurate with the expense. The Bill provided, that, on any person making an affidavit that the deceased had usually resided in a particular district, the will was to be proved there, and the affidavit become conclusive. The person who obtained probate on such affidavit might at once proceed to London, and transfer any stock which stood in the name of the deceased. But if a person wanted to lodge a caveat against the proof of such a will, how was he to do it? If the caveat was to be entered at the central court, and sent into the district, some method ought to be devised by which, upon such entry, the country court should be immediately (e. g. by electric telegraph) apprised of it. He would submit to the Attorney-General whether it would not be better to bring up the original wills to the central office, and preserve copies in the districts, than to have the original documents scattered over forty-one buildings throughout the country. The question of compensation was one of extreme difficulty. The Attorney-General, who considered the principle of compensation altogether vicious, said that it was absurd to talk of it when there would be nothing but an alteration in the practice and rules. The learned gentleman must have greatly changed his opinion on that point, for his name was appended to the Report of the Commission which stated that compensation should be made to the proctors if their business was thrown open. [The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, he proposed to give the proctors what, by their evidence before the Commissioners, they said would be sufficient—the common form business.] The proctors would be content to give up the contentious business if the common form business was left untouched and unaltered; but this Bill proposed to take away from the central court the common form business with regard to all estates under the value of £1,500. The question then arose, whether there was not a case for compensation. In conclusion he would again urge on the Government the propriety of reconsidering the points to which he had directed their attention.

Mr. AYRTON thought the Government ought to place on the table a statement of the public moneys that would be dealt with by this measure, an estimate of the expenditure, whether arising from the creation of new offices or compensation for those to be abolished, and also a statement of the amount which the proctors would be likely to lose, in order to guard against injustice being done. He objected to the principle of compensation; but when he looked at the clause which had been inserted for the benefit of Lord Canterbury, he thought it would be a great scandal if a whole class of industrious individuals should be deprived of their income without compensation, when a nobleman, who had only the expectation of office, was to receive an annuity for life equal to the emoluments of that office which he had never held.

Mr. NAPIER thought the principle of compensation just, but it depended on the particular case. His own feeling was, that the proctors had a claim for compensation.

Mr. W. H. ADAMS hoped the Attorney-General would reconsider the question of compensation. In committee he should be disposed to take the sense of the House as to the Admiralty jurisdiction being transferred to the new court, which he thought ought to be vested in a court of common law.

Mr. WALPOLE agreed in the principle of the Bill, and considered it the best adjustment of a difficult question. He thought, however, the Court should have power to determine every question connected with testamentary jurisdiction, and that to prevent varieties of rules and decisions in the district courts there should be one court of appeal.

The Bill was then read a second time.

FRAUDULENT TRUSTEES, &C., BILL.

On clause 1, Mr. ROLT moved to leave out "property," and insert "estate or interest in land of any tenure, or of any share or interest in any public stock or fund, whether of this kingdom, or of Great Britain, or of Ireland, or of any foreign state, or in any stock or fund of any body corporate, company, or society, or of any security for money whatsoever, or of any chattel." The clause as it stood would have a tendency to prevent persons of character and position from accepting the office of trustee, and the object of the amendment, with another which he intended to propose, was to diminish that tendency. He distinguished between the case of a trustee who applied money to his own use, and one who sold stock or chattel property. In the former case, a man was only criminally insolvent, and could be dealt with by the bankruptcy and insolvency laws, while in the latter his offence partook of the nature of larceny; and he contended that the punishment provided by the Bill ought not to be extended indifferently to both classes of offence. Then the evidence to prove intent to defraud would be very difficult to obtain. There might be circumstances in which a person possessing trust money might, from want of knowledge, commit a breach of trust; and if he innocently stopped payment, he would be liable under this Bill. The trustee who had money in his hands, and did not pay it, was not more than criminally insolvent, and differed from a man who dealt fraudulently with stock. If the amendment was agreed to, it would be possible to strike at those cases of offences of the highest class, while it would exempt those who, though criminal, were yet criminal in a sense different from the other. In legislating on this subject it was well to consider, that, though legislation could do much, it could not do all, and the public must be taught that the greatest safeguard in these matters was the simplicity of the trusts they created, and the trustworthiness of those whom they selected to execute duties, the essence of which was confidence.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, that, in the general tendency of the observations of his learned friend, he concurred; but with regard to the immediate point, which was the substitution of particular for general words which would include every description of property, he could not concur. How impossible was it to say, that, if a trustee took money only, he incurred a debt, and that a trustee who took stock, or any other security, and turned it into money, and used it for his own purposes, committed a crime. If you left out the word "money," the most painful instances of fraudulent robbery would escape punishment, for he hoped that the Bill would reach numerous cases in which small sums passed into the hands of fraudulent trustees, and were used by them. He desired not to interfere with the relations of trustee and cestui que trust, but here there was nothing to frighten the most nervous man; for no one could by possibility come within the scope of the Bill unless he wilfully appropriated to his own use the property of a person whom he was bound to protect.

Mr. HEADLAM said, that the whole clause and the extension of the criminal law which it caused, would be productive of infinitely more mischief than good. There might be cases in which a perfectly honest trustee or guardian might innocently get into such a position as to throw on him at least the onus of proof that he was not liable to a criminal charge, and to a penalty of seven years' penal servitude. What effect would not this have on other persons who became aware of it? Would they not decline to undertake trusteeship when the fact of their being unable to deal with a complicated trust would throw this responsibility and danger upon them? He believed the number of cases which would come into court under this Bill would be exceedingly small, for in most cases the offending trustee was a relative whom the family would be unwilling to indict.

Mr. Serjt. KINGLAKE doubted whether the words "with intent to defraud" were a sufficient restriction on the clause. The question as to such an intention was one of the most difficult which could be submitted to a jury. He objected to the provision made in the 12th clause of the Bill, that no criminal proceeding should be commenced without the consent of a judge or of the Attorney-General, because, under that clause, the prosecution would depend upon an ex parte affidavit. It would be much better that the operation of the Act should be limited to frauds which became apparent in the course of some civil proceeding.

Mr. BARROW said, that, from long experience of trustees in the lower ranks of society, he was quite satisfied that this Act would operate most injuriously upon the interests of the widows and orphans of those classes on whose behalf the Attorney-General had appealed to the House. The Attorney-General had said, that, if a gentleman mixed trust funds with his own money at his banker's, and afterwards overdrew his account, but was able to pay the money when it was wanted, he would not be liable to a prosecution under this Act; but surely in such a case the offence had been completed, and the subsequent repayment of the money would not prevent its being an offence.

Mr. NAPIER said that the objections which had been raised to the Bill ought to have been taken on the second reading, because they attacked its entire principle. The essence of the crime was the intent to defraud; and that was only such a question as was ordinarily submitted to a jury—as, for instance, in the case of a person tried for intent to murder, which was itself a capital offence. In such cases the whole question was as to the intent. The essence of the criminal law was the intent, and the clause was intended to bring within the operation of the criminal law a class of offences which had hitherto escaped.

Mr. AYRTON suggested that words should be inserted to make it clear that a man should not be convicted simply for offences which a court of equity might deem fraud, but which a jury, upon a review of the whole facts of the case, might not think of so deep a dye.

Mr. WIGRAM said, that, if the clause were meant to apply to persons who were guilty of the offence of appropriating to their own use property which was not their own—in other words, of embezzlement—he did not care how large its words were; but, as that was not quite clear, he hoped that the Attorney-General would state whether the clause was meant to apply to that class of offences only, or was to extend to cases where persons appropriated property to other persons' use.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said the question would be best answered by putting this case: that if a person were, on his son's marriage, to transfer to him stock of which he was trustee, that would not be an appropriation to his own use, but to the use of some other person; still it would be a fraudulent appropriation, and one which would go unpunished unless the words which he had proposed were inserted in the clause.

Mr. CAIRNS said that would be met by the words to be found further on in the clause—"otherwise dispose of or destroy such property."

Mr. ROLT replied, he was desirous that a sufficiently severe punishment should be imposed to prevent the commission of crime, but he was unwilling to commingle offences of different characters and classes. He would, therefore, press his amendment.

The gallery was then cleared, but the amendment was negatived without a division.

Mr. BLAKE moved that after the word "person," in line 9, the words "or for any public or charitable purpose" be inserted.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was ready to assent to the amendment. He would also endeavour to carry out Mr. Rolt's object by inserting after the word "appropriate," the words "the same or any part thereof," and to omit the words "or the use of any person other than the person entitled thereto." The clause, with the amendments, would then stand as follows:—"If any person being a trustee of any property for the benefit, either wholly or partially, of some other person, or for any public or charitable purpose, shall, with intent to defraud, convert or appropriate the same, or any part thereof, to or for his own use or purposes, or shall, with the intent aforesaid, otherwise dispose of or destroy such property, or any part thereof, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

On the motion that the clause as amended stand part of the Bill, Mr. WALPOLE said, he quite agreed with the views generally taken in reference to this clause, but he wished to suggest that the clause, as it stood, did not sufficiently distinguish between an actual and an implied trustee. The consequence might be that a man, who was not really aware that he had all the duties of a trustee cast upon him, might be liable to be indicted under this clause. He suggested that the word "trustee" ought to be more clearly limited and defined.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he would consider the suggestion.

The clause was agreed to.

On clause 2, which refers to bankers, &c., possessed as such of property, fraudulently selling, &c.,

Mr. HENLEY asked, supposing a man put £1,000 into a banker's hands in the ordinary way, expecting to get it back again when he wanted it, and the banker, as was usual in such cases, applied the money in any way he liked while it was in his possession, what constituted in that case the act of fraud?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, if a person left money in a banker's hands in the ordinary way, that money was in law a loan from the customer to the banker, and there would be no fraud, though the borrower, when the customer asked for his money, should be unable to meet the debt. But if the money were deposited on the understanding that it should be applied in a particular way, and that was not done, that was a case of fraud.

Mr. HENLEY wished to know what were the circumstances under which a banker might apply money to his own use? and what was it that constituted a fraud when he did so?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, if he took a bag of money tied at the mouth to a banker, and desired him to keep it for him, and the banker cut open the bag and took out the money, he would be applying it to his own use, and came within the meaning of the clause. The difference lay between money lent in the ordinary way and money deposited. If he packed twelve bills of exchange in a parcel and deposited them with a banker to be kept by him, he would be guilty of a misdemeanor if he appropriated those bills.

In answer to a further question from Mr. Henley,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, the words of the clause as it stood would not interfere with any of the ordinary transactions of trade; neither would they interfere with anything that might be wrongfully done, if it was not done with intent to defraud. It would apply to transactions that were wrongfully done by the banker, and to which the law would attach the character of being done with intent to defraud.

Mr. AYRTON read a clause in the Bankers Act (7 & 8 Geo. 4), to show that the offence to which the clause related was already an offence. He thought the terms of that clause more clear and explicit than the terms of the clause in this Bill, and suggested that they should either repeal the existing law or make some reference to it.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, the clauses in the Bankers Act were limited entirely to cases where directions were given in writing, and where the property was specially intrusted to a banker. In this clause the language had been most carefully selected to meet the case of a banker "who becomes possessed of the property of another person," and was much more comprehensive than the language of the clause in 7 & 8 Geo. 4, in order to include a large class of offences which, under the interpretation put upon that Act, escaped punishment.

Mr. HENLEY suggested that it would be better to state distinctly that it should be no longer necessary to prove that the directions were in writing. How could it be shown that this clause would not include every case of payment of money into the hands of a banker? The words seemed to him to be too general.

Mr. NAPIER explained that the clause could not include ordinary payments of money over the counter, because in such cases the property changed owners. The moment the money was handed over it became the property of the banker, and he could not be said to be "possessed of the property of another person."

Mr. MALINS said the distinction between the two cases was obvious enough. If £1,000 were deposited, the property passed to the banker; but the deposit of £1,000 worth of Exchequer Bills would be a different case; that would come within the meaning of this clause, but the first would not.

Mr. CAIRNS said, the Attorney-General had explained that money lodged with a banker became his property, and a debt due to the customer. Now, the interpretation clause said, that the word "property" should include debt, and therefore the banker who appropriated deposits to his own use would render himself liable to the penalty imposed by the present Bill.

Mr. GURNEY asked whether, supposing a banker fraudulently negotiated a bill lodged with him for collection before it arrived at maturity, and appropriated the proceeds to his own use, he would render himself liable to the penalty imposed by the Bill?

Mr. GRIFFITH, in order to meet the difficulty, suggested the insertion, after the word "property," of the qualifying phrase, "not being money on current account."

Mr. J. D. FITZGERALD, replying to Mr. CAIRNS, said, that, if the money deposited with a banker became a debt due to his customer, he could not understand how the banker could appropriate a debt he owed. A banker who negotiated a bill lodged with him under the circumstances stated by Mr. GURNEY, intending to defraud the depositor, would undoubtedly fall within the 2nd section of the Bill.

Mr. WALPOLE would suppose that a banker received from his customer £1,000 across the counter, knowing that he was to break at the end of that day. He would also suppose that he appropriated that £1,000 to his own use, and stopped payment on the following day. The question he wished to ask was, whether the reception of the money and the appropriation of it to his own use would or would not be an offence within the meaning of the Bill?

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL replied that it would not. The offence of the banker in the case supposed would consist in the concealment of his insolvency, but that concealment was not described as a crime within the meaning of the Bill.

The clause as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN was then ordered to report progress.

ELECTION PETITIONS BILL.

Mr. ADDERLEY moved the second reading of this Bill. He said, the Bill was brought in to check the practice of wholesale fraudulent election petitions, which, under cover of the privileges of the House, contained a number of roving, loose accusations made by low attorneys and agents, who knew that there was no truth in the allegations, and that they were in fact baseless slanders. The provisions of the present Bill were drawn by Mr. Rickards some years ago, under the eye, and with the approval of the late Speaker; and yet, with such a grievance and scandal, the Attorney-General was prepared to object to the second reading of the Bill. He saw who was at the bottom of this opposition; it was Mr. Coppock himself. He would notoriously be injured by this Bill, but the character of the House would be sustained by the attempt to remedy such an abuse as now existed.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL heartily concurred in the object contemplated, but did not think the provisions proposed would tend to promote it. Indeed, the silly machinery by which it was sought to carry out that object would only make the House the laughing stock of the world. He moved the adjournment of the debate.

This motion was afterwards withdrawn, and the second reading fixed for Monday next.

Monday, June 29.

MARRIED WOMEN'S REVERSIONARY INTEREST BILL.

This Bill was read a third time and passed.

ELECTIONS PETITION BILL.

Mr. ADDERLEY moved the second reading of this Bill, the object of which, he said, was to prevent collusive presentations and withdrawals of election petitions. It had five clauses: the first and fifth of which contained one provision; and the second, third, and fourth another. The first provision was, that an affidavit should be taken by every petitioner and his agent, both on presenting and withdrawing a petition, that, in their belief, there were good grounds for so doing. The second provision was, that no election petition should be withdrawn without the leave of the House. In exceptional cases the House might refer the petition to the examiners of recognisances to make inquiry as to the grounds of withdrawal, and on his report might refer all the petitions which he thought should not be withdrawn to one select committee. It was objected that the Bill would lead to an unnecessary multiplication of oaths, but the affidavit proposed to be taken was the same that was already taken in courts of law—viz. an affidavit of merits. With regard to the second part of the Bill, it was objected that the House ought not to delegate its functions to any officer; but, in point of fact, that functionary had only to report, the House being at liberty to take what course it pleased in the matter.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER did not think the House would be justified in going into committee on the Bill, unless there was some prospect of moulding it into an unobjectionable shape, of which he saw little probability. The security afforded by affidavit would be worth nothing; for these oaths would come to be taken just as a matter of course. The next part of the Bill seemed to be still more objectionable. At present, a petitioner was allowed to withdraw his petition, which on the whole was favourable to the member petitioned against; but the third clause proposed that he should not be allowed to withdraw it without the consent of the House; and that if the House refused the permission, then the petitioner should be compelled to prosecute the petition at his own expense. What success could be expected from a petition prosecuted by a reluctant petitioner at his own expense and against his will? The effect of the Bill would be to leave the practice just as it was at present; and therefore he moved that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Mr. MALINS asked whether, it being admitted that election petitions were grossly abused, such a state of things ought to be allowed to continue unchecked. He thought, where a man made charges against a member of that House, he ought to be prepared to swear to their truth. It was not a new principle to require parties to swear to their belief in the charges they made, as in the Court of Chancery there were some bills which could not be filed without such affidavit. The right hon. gentleman had said there would be great inconvenience to the House in requiring its sanction to the withdrawal of petitions; but there was no necessity that such sanction should be given by the whole House. There might be a standing committee for that purpose. He believed the Bill would be eminently useful in preserving the dignity of the House, in suppressing unjust charges, and in preventing the gross jobbery of Parliamentary agents.

Mr. WYLD had reason to complain of the loose state of the law on this subject. A person presented a petition against his return, but shortly afterwards withdrew it, his only object being to use the Parliamentary petition machinery as a means of advertising himself as a boot and shoe maker.

The Bill was read a second time.

REGISTRATION OF TITLES.

In answer to Mr. GREER,

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, that the report of the Commissioners appointed to consider the subject of the registration of titles to property in land was not presented to her Majesty until four or five weeks ago. It was thought desirable that that report should be circulated, and that the criticisms of the profession thereon should be obtained, before steps were taken to embody the recommendations of the Commissioners in a Bill. He trusted, however, that there would still be time to bring in a Bill in accordance with the Report of the Commissioners, before Parliament was prorogued, not for discussion in the present session, but to lie on the table for consideration until next year.

Thursday, July 3.

THE STATUTE LAW COMMISSION.

Mr. LOCKE KING rose to call attention to the large sums of public money which have been expended by the Criminal and Statute Law Commissioners without the consolidation of any branch of the criminal or statute law; and moved "that an humble address be presented to her Majesty, praying her Majesty to dispense with the present Statute Law Commission."

Sir F. KELLY defended the Commission, and said that there was no reason to doubt, that, in some eighteen months or two years from this time, the whole statute law of England—and he hoped he might add of Ireland and Scotland—would be completely consolidated.

Mr. NAPIER considered that no good would be effected until the Department of Justice was established.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, there was no subject on which he felt more anxious, or on which he held himself more pledged, than with regard to the undertaking entered into by the Government to carry out the formation of a Department of Public Justice. He had prepared plans with considerable care for that object, great part of which were now undergoing examination by her Majesty's Government. He hoped that the scheme would be sufficiently matured to be made public before the end of the session.

Lord J. RUSSELL was willing to give the Government further time to proceed with this Statute Law Commission. With regard to the Department of Public Justice, he thought it would be attended with considerable expense to the country, but that might be saved by abolishing that useless office, the Lord-Lieutenancy of Ireland.

After a few words from Mr. HADFIELD, condemnatory of the unsatisfactory state of the law, the motion was negatived.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS (COLONIAL COURTS) BILL.

This Bill was read a second time.

SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS BEFORE JUSTICES OF THE PEACE BILL.

On the motion of Mr. MASSEY, this Bill was read a second time.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS BILL.

This Bill was also read a second time, on the motion of Mr. MASSEY.

PRIVATE BILLS.—(From a Correspondent).

The sudden rejection of the Nene Valley Drainage Bill—the consideration of which promised to outrun the period allowed for second reading in the Lords—and the conclusion of the Mersey Conservancy Case by the Liverpool Committee, may be said to have wound up the private business.

Sir James Graham's elaborate decision on the Mersey Bill clearly shows, that, however unpalatable the result may be to the Corporation of Liverpool, the Committee have fully grappled with all the facts and intricacies of the case. As the decision amounts to the confiscation of a great part of the revenues of one of the oldest corporations in the world, we will give the heads of it:—Sir James stated that the opinion of the Committee was, that the House of Commons had recognised the principle of the Bill by passing the second reading; that it was the opinion of the Committee that the docks should be vested in some public body; that the rates and dues arising from shipping should be spent on improvement of the port, and not on the town of Liverpool; they further decided, that the qualification of trustees of the interests of the port should be payment of shipping dues and a residence within ten miles of Liverpool; that this qualification should not apply to those trustees who should be appointed Conservators of the Mersey; that the Birkenhead Dock Estate should be transferred to the Dock Trust, together with the powers for execution of works already authorised, and the debts of that body. This memorable struggle, in which the Committee have dealt with and sifted the evidence of eleven years given before Parliament, has been principally occasioned by the Manchester party. The quarrel between Manchester and Liverpool for many years has been, that Manchester imports and exports at Liverpool, which have formed a considerable portion of the commerce of that port, have been heavily taxed for payment of dues which have been expended on the town of Liverpool. The Corporation of Liverpool are not likely to give up their rights, and, what is of much more importance, £100,000 per annum—at which figure they place their loss—without another shot; so Sir James Graham's decision will probably have to pass through the fire at every stage in Lords and Commons.

The East Kent Company had a farewell contest with the South-Eastern Railway Company on the third reading of their Bill in the Commons, without success. The House, after a long discussion, passed the Bill without a division.

The Bills are fast accumulating in the House of Lords, and the opposed Committees will shortly be taken.

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—(From a Correspondent.)

The first six Election Committees commenced their sittings on the Friday and Saturday of last week respectively. As a general rule, one case is pretty much the same as another, being nothing more than the oft-told tale of the swindling, perjury, and dishonesty which are peculiar to our constituencies, and which, like the cholera, or any other epidemic, come upon us periodically. There are, however, some novel features in the present session, particularly in the Pontefract case, in which Mr. Oliveira, the late member, is one of the petitioners against the present member, on the ground of bribery and corruption. Mr. Oliveira was the first witness, and, in order to prove his case, gave the committee a history of his own election in 1852, stating that he paid £6,000 to get into Parliament, about £4,000 previously to taking his seat, and subsequently £2,000, to compromise with parties who had petitioned against him. There was a distinct understanding that he was to have a "quasi return-ticket," or, in other words, be returned this time for nothing; but Mr. Oliveira was credulous, and the people of Pontefract had itching palms, "hinc illæ lachrymæ." Mrs. Oliveira appeared in the box, and gave an account of her stewardship as her husband's agent.

Friday, 6 P.M.—The Pontefract committee had decided in favour of the sitting member, and counsel were addressing the committee in support of a report that Mr. Oliveira's petition was frivolous and vexatious.

MAYO.—The Mayo petition possibly stands first on the list in a political point of view, as the question at issue discloses the story of a split in the Roman Catholic camp in Ireland. Col. Higgins, the late, and now unsuccessful, member, belongs to one of the first Roman Catholic families in Ireland, and is a repudiator of the ultra-montane school. Hence the wrath of Father Conway, who, from the evidence, appears to have conducted the election, and not content with cursing the Colonel at the altar, and informing his congregation that he would sooner vote for a certain person, who shall be nameless, than for Higgins, headed an onslaught on the Colonel, and on other of the voters proceeding to the poll. The greatest excitement was manifested on Thursday and Friday pending the examination of the titular Archbishop of Tuam, Dr. M'Hale, whose memory displayed the most wonderful powers of retention and of forgetfulness, according to the questions put to him. The case is likely to last some time longer. The case of the petitioners was concluded yesterday, Friday.

TEWKESBURY.—The committee met yesterday (Friday) hereon, and made short work of it. They sat at eleven, and finished the case—one of bribery and corruption—in the course of the day, by seating the present member, Mr. Martin.

The WAREHAM case was decided by the committee reporting two cases of bribery by the sitting member's agent, and one case of a voter being sent away; in all they struck off eight votes, but decided that Mr. Calcraft was duly elected, inasmuch as the acts of bribery were not proved to have come to his knowledge.

The ROCHDALE case lost some of its interest, owing to the excitement caused by the Secret Committee on Mr. Newal's petition relating to the "spiriting away" of witnesses. Much evidence of the usual kind was gone into, which does not reflect any credit on the enlightened constituents, as the committee reported three cases of bribery, and added to their report "that the evidence was so contradictory and unsatisfactory, that the committee feel that very little reliance can be placed upon it." In the Rochdale case, as in the Wareham, the committee have reported that no evidence was given which could fix the sitting member with knowledge of the bribery; so the hon. member, Sir A. Ramsay, remains undisturbed.

MARLBOROUGH.—The committee decided in this case that Mr. Baring is duly qualified to serve. The objection taken was, that the sitting member was a shareholder in a joint-stock company (the Royal British Bank), against which judgments to the amount of £70,000 were registered, and for which he was legally liable. The committee decided in favour of Mr. Baring's qualification.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The English Funds and the Money Market have been less disturbed than was expected by the disastrous intelligence from Bengal. The demand for money is more easy at the conclusion of the week than at the beginning, and is well supplied. The fluctuation in the English Funds during the month of June has been rather less than one per Cent. The French 3 per Cents. suffered gradual and material depression on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, since which a recovery has taken place. In other important Foreign Securities the fluctuation has been very small. The meeting of the Directors of the Bank of England yesterday closed without any alteration taking place in the rate of discount, by which the expectations entertained in many quarters were disappointed. Notice is issued that payment to the public of the July dividends at the Bank, and of the life annuities at the National Debt Office will commence on Wednesday next. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 27th June, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,142,700, being an increase of £338,875, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,378,872, showing an increase of £206,010 when compared with the previous return.

The total amount of silver expected to be shipped to India and China by the mail of to-morrow from London and Marseilles is £1,000,000. As the East India Company have lowered their rate of premium on Bills, the demand for specie is likely to become less active. Other measures, causing a large outlay here on East India account, have a similar tendency.

The monthly returns of the Board of Trade show again a wonderfully large increase. The increase in the declared value of exports for the month of May, compared with the corresponding month of the year 1856, is £2,648,904. The increase month by month is truly surprising, both in regularity and amount. The figures for the month, and for the five months ending with May, are as follows:—

DECLARED VALUE OF EXPORTS.

	Month of May.	Five Months.
1855	8,049,246	34,943,737
1856	8,733,300	43,307,329
1857	11,382,204	50,195,541

Business continually increasing to such an extent, occasions an increasing demand for capital, and serves to explain and account for the demand for money. The largest augmentation is in cotton goods, next follow woollens, and then machinery and iron and steel.

The Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company have made an arrangement in conjunction with the Great Northern Company, to open a new route from Manchester to London, viâ Sheffield, which threatens an active competition with the London and North Western Railway, the additional distance being no more than eight miles.

LAW STUDENTS' DEBATING SOCIETY, at the LAW INSTITUTION, CHANCERY LANE.

QUESTIONS FOR DISCUSSION.

For Tuesday, July 7th, 1857.—President, Mr. HOWLETT.

THE ANNUAL MEETING.

The Report of the Committee will be read The Treasurer will lay before the Meeting a statement of the payments and receipts of the Society during the past year, and a list of the unpaid fines and subscriptions. Mr. SMITH will move "That the words '8th of July' be substituted for the words '10th of August' in the 5th rule."

The Officers of the Society for the ensuing year will be elected. Members are requested to attend punctually at 7 o'clock.

For Tuesday, July 14th, 1857.—President, Mr. ELGOOD.

LX. Should the Government Divorce Bill be allowed to pass into Law?

Mr. G. BRUCE is appointed to open the Debate, and Messrs. FOOTNER, KYNASTON, and LEADBITTER to speak on the question.

For Tuesday, July 21st, 1857.—President, Mr. SMITH.

197. A testator, by will, dated in 1828, devised an estate to his son in fee on attaining twenty-four, subject to the payment of £1,200 twelve months after attaining that age, equally between his (the son's) two sisters; or, in case of the death of one of them, the whole to the survivor. Testator died in 1837. One daughter died in 1848, leaving a husband and children. The other daughter died in 1849, intestate and unmarried. The son attained twenty-one in 1850. Is he liable to pay the £1,200 to the representatives of the surviving daughter? Brown v. Lord Kenyon, 3 Madd. 410; Belk v. Slack, 1 Keen, 238.

Affirmative—Mr. WALTERS and Mr. HILL,
Negative—Mr. TYABJEE and Mr. COE.

For Tuesday, July 28th, 1857.—President, Mr. MARCHANT.

198. Ought the case of Stanfield v. Hobson, reported in 16 Beavan, p. 236, and, on Appeal, in 3 De Gex, Mac. & Gor. p. 620, to be reserved?

Affirmative—Mr. LAWRANCE and Mr. PRICHARD.
Negative—Mr. CHEATLE and Mr. CRUMP.

For Tuesday, August 4th, 1857.—President, Mr. WALTERS.

LXI. Should Grand Juries be abolished?

Mr. CHURCH is appointed to open the Debate, and Messrs. PHILLIPS, G. A. BRUCE, and GREEN to speak on the question.

The Society will adjourn for the Long Vacation until Tuesday the 27th October.

 Gentlemen requiring Books from the Library are requested to attend at five minutes before Seven o'clock on the evening of Debate, to select those desired.

KENWICK ESTATE, NEAR ELLESMERE, SALOP.

Land Tax redeemed and free of Great Tithes, also Tithe Commutation Rent Charges, &c.

FOR SALE by AUCTION, by HILL & SON, at the Bridgewater Arms Hotel, Ellesmere, on Tuesday, the 14th day of July, 1857, at Four o'clock in the Afternoon, in one lot or otherwise, as shall be agreed upon at the time of sale, and subject to conditions to be then produced, all that valuable and important FREEHOLD ESTATE, situate at Kenwick, in the parish of Ellesmere, in the county of Salop, and comprising 664a. 1r. 0p., or thereabouts, of superior arable, meadow, and pasture land. The estate may be conveniently described as follows:—

Premises.	Tenants.	Quantities. A.	R.	P.
Upper Kenwick Farm	John Stokes	239	3	3
Lower Kenwick Farm	Thos. Firmstone	197	1	9
Spring's Farm	Edward Stokes	126	2	7
Two small tenements	John Kynaston & Thomas Edwards	2	1	34
Small tenement	Thomas Manning	3	0	10
Lands in hand		95	0	17
Total Acreage		664	1	0

The situation of the Kenwick Estate is most advantageous. The distance from the market town of Ellesmere is three miles; from Shrewsbury, thirteen miles; and from the Baschurch Station, on the Shrewsbury and Chester Railway, four miles. The turnpike road from Shrewsbury to Ellesmere and Chester also intersects the estate. The farm houses and farm buildings are commodious and convenient, and there is a Malthouse attached to the Upper Kenwick Farm. The land generally is of good quality, and nearly the whole of the arable land is adapted to the four-course system of husbandry. The farms are held at low rents, and are well cultivated. A considerable portion of the land has lately been thoroughly under drained, and drainage works are now in progress on the estates, an advance having been obtained under the drainage acts.

The views from different parts of the estate are very picturesque and extensive, and there are several sites well adapted for the erection of a mansion. The estate lies well together, and, except at one point, is in a ring fence. Game is abundant, and there are extensive preserves on the adjoining estates, which belong chiefly to the Earl Brownlow, and are called the Bridgewater Estates. The Croesmere Lake, which is of considerable extent, skirts the estate offered for sale, and forms in part the southern boundary. This Lake, when viewed from the more elevated points of the estate, is a most beautiful and attractive feature in the landscape.

The estate is sold free of great tithes. The Vicarial tithe rent charges on the whole of the estate amount to £10 yearly or thereabouts. The parochial burdens are low. They are as follows:—Church-rates, 1d. to 1½d.; Poors-rate, 1s. to 1s. 4d., and Highway-rate, 1½d. in the pound.

The estate is subject to a chief rent of 6s. per annum, payable to the trustees of the Earl Brownlow.

If desired a portion of the purchase money may remain secured on mortgage of the estate.

TITHE-RENT CHARGES.

Also, will be offered for Sale, by Auction, certain Rent Charges in lieu of Tithes, amounting to £25 per annum, as fixed by the tithe apportionment of the parish of Ellesmere, and issuing out of certain lands in that parish, belonging to the said Earl Brownlow and others.

The different tenants will show the premises, and further information, with particulars and plans may be had from the Auctioneers; from Mr. J. H. Edwards, solicitor, Shrewsbury; from Mr. Chandler, solicitor, Shrewsbury; and at the offices of Mr. Palin, solicitor, Shrewsbury.

Buckinghamshire.—Sale of further part of the Buckingham and Chandos Estates, including a portion of the Domain of Stowe.

MESSRS. HARRISON and SON beg to announce that they will SELL BY AUCTION, at the White Hart Inn, Buckingham, on Wednesday, the 22nd of July, 1857, at 12 o'clock at noon, very valuable FREEHOLD, COPYHOLD, and LEASEHOLD ESTATES, mostly tithe-free and land-tax redeemed, all in the county of Buckingham, and producing a rental of nearly £2,500 per annum. The estates are admirably suited for investment or occupation, and will be sold in 17 lots, comprising the following particulars:—Lot. 1. Moreton Lodge, and several Cottages and Gardens, and about 56 acres of Land, in Maids Moreton. Lot 2. A Farm-house, several Cottages, and about 103 acres of Land, also in Maids Moreton. Lot 3. The Lot Meadows, near the town of Buckingham, containing 20a. 3r. 30p.. Lot 4. Two Dwelling-houses in the Market Hill, Buckingham, and 1a. 3r. 26p. of Land, in the occupation of Mr. D. P. King and Mrs. Bartlett. Lot 5. Part of Boycott Farm, in the parishes of Stowe and Water Stratford, consisting of a Farm-house and Buildings, a Cottage, and about 152 acres of Land. Lot 6. An Estate, consisting of several Farms, containing about 547 acres of land, situate in the parishes of Stowe and Water Stratford. Lots 7 to 14. Several Dwelling-houses, Shops, and Gardens, in Church-street, Castle-street, and West-street, in Buckingham. Lot 15. An Estate, situate at Preston and Tingewick, consisting of a House and about 160 acres of Land. Lot 16. A Farm, called Ford's Farm, in the parish of Waddesden, consisting of a House and about 70 acres of Land. And Lot 17. Three Closes of Land, in Brill, containing 11a. 3r. 29p. The estates are approached on all sides by good roads, and lie in the neighbourhood of the town of Buckingham, or within an easy distance of the towns of Aylesbury, Bicester, and Brackley, and are within two hours' ride by railway from London, and the farms are in the occupation of respectable tenants at very moderate rents. The lots near Buckingham will be shown by Mr. Thomas Beards, the steward of the estates, who resides at Stowe, near Buckingham.

Full particulars, and conditions of sale, with plans, may be obtained at the offices of Messrs. Currie, Woodgate, and Williams, 32 Lincoln's-inn-fields, London, W.C.; of Henry Small, Esq., Solicitor, Buckingham; of the Auctioneers, Buckingham; and of Mr. Thomas Beards, the Steward, at Stowe.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, JULY 11, 1857.

LOCAL WILL OFFICES.

It is satisfactory to learn that the Government do not intend to relinquish the Bill for the establishment of a new Court of Probate on account of the defeat which they suffered on Monday night. If the decision of the House of Commons on Mr. Westhead's motion were hostile to the principle of the Bill, there might be some ground for the threat of its abandonment, which has been held out by the Attorney-General; but if the effect of that decision is only to make the measure more widely useful, such a course would be deeply to be deplored. That such will be its effect, was the feeling generally entertained by members who took part in the debate of last evening; and Ministers have, therefore, declared themselves willing to accept and abide by the vote enabling all wills to be proved in the locality in which a testator had his fixed residence, without regard to the value of his property. The only question which appears to remain open for discussion on this part of the Bill is that which relates to property in the public funds, and in the shares of railway and other corporations. The Attorney-General is unwilling to intrust to the district courts the power of granting probate for such property, because he thinks that it would afford too great facilities for fraud. The only argument adduced in support of this position is, that, in the case of parliamentary stocks and shares in companies, the executor of a will, of which probate has been improperly obtained, may immediately acquire possession, and misappropriate his testator's estate; while, in personalty of other descriptions, the danger is not so great. Admitting, however, that the consequences of a mistake in the granting of probate might be more injurious in the hands of fraudulent persons, where the testator's property consisted of Three per Cents. or railway shares, than it would be where it consisted of farming stock, it remains to be considered whether such a mistake is less likely to occur in the metropolitan than in a district court.

Practically, the two instances to which we have referred are extremes. Few testators die possessed only of Consols or of farming stock. And even if it were otherwise, it is not easy to understand how an executor, who intended to defraud his testator's estate, would find it more difficult to do so where it consisted of money at his bankers, of stock in trade or on a farm, than where it consisted of parliamentary stocks or railway shares. Once having obtained probate, his power for good or evil over the personal property is complete, and of whatever kind it may be, he can speedily convert it to his own use, to the injury of those beneficially entitled. Granting that he may procure a transfer of stock or shares upon twenty-four hours' notice, and that he may not be able to realise other personalty in a shorter period than as many days, it can hardly be pretended, that, in any appreciable number of instances, probate could be revoked in sufficient time to prevent deliberate fraud.

It is, moreover, very questionable whether mistakes in granting probate would, in fact, be more likely to occur in the district courts than in the metropolitan. The Commissioners in their Report, no doubt, lay great stress upon the skill and vigilance which are required to guard against fraud and mistakes; and they, somewhat unnecessarily, go out of their way in volunteering an opinion that such qualifications would be "most certainly possessed by officers in London, under the immediate control of a judge." Why a practitioner at York or Chester should not be skilful and vigilant, or how the superintendence of a judge, whose province was to determine points of law, could evoke these qualities in officials devoted to practice, are questions on which the Commissioners are silent. The only instance which Sir Richard Bethell adduced against the country proctors was one in which probate had been granted in a case where the will had been obliterated, and it appeared that no inquiry had been made as to whether the obliteration had occurred before or after execution. We believe that it would not be impossible to mention some instances of equal oversight among London practitioners, but it would be trifling to urge any argument on either side upon such grounds; and the truth is, that, under the present system, both in London and in the diocesan courts, the occurrence of such errors is extremely rare. Under the provisions of the Act, the existing diocesan registrars are to be entitled to be district registrars at the same places; and if they only discharge their new duties as well as they have hitherto discharged less onerous ones, there will be no room for complaint as to want of skill or vigilance on their parts. Nor should it be forgotten that there are some reasons why probate is less likely to be improperly obtained in the locality in which the testator had his fixed residence, than it would be at a distance. There are greater facilities for the perpetration of such a fraud where all the circumstances are unknown, and where there must, necessarily, be greater difficulty and expense in attempting to prevent it. Sir Richard Bethell, it is true, particularly insists upon the greater check upon fraud which would be obtained by the fact, that, in the London Court of Probate, wills would be required to pass through the hands of a number of officers successively, while, in the country, they would be subject to the supervision of a registrar only. But if his argument is good in a case where the testator's property includes Government stocks or shares, no matter how small the amount, why should it not be generally applied. It is hard to understand why a district registrar should be allowed to grant probate of a will of a Liverpool merchant or Lancashire manufacturer, and thereby give to an executor control over stock in trade and other personalty of a similar character, amounting to many thousand pounds, and yet not be considered competent to decide upon a will passing a small sum in the Three per Cents., or a few shares in a local railway. If, indeed, district registrars were cut off from all assistance, and in every case obliged to act upon their own unaided judgment, there might be a valid ground for refusing to intrust them with the greatly increased powers given to them by Mr. Westhead's amendment. But the Bill expressly provides, that, in all cases of doubt, they are to transmit a statement of the matter in question to the Registrars of the Court of Probate, who are to obtain the direction of the judge thereon; so that, substantially, they will be subject to the same guidance and control as the officers of the metropolitan court. It should also be borne in mind, that only probates and administrations in common form are to be granted by the district registrars; and that, whenever there is any contention, or it appears to the registrar that the grant ought not to be in common form, he is bound to refuse it, and the case thereupon is to be referred to the Court of Probate in London. With such precautions there is little to fear as to the safe working of the Act; and we earnestly hope that the Government will follow up the concession which they wisely made last night, by adopting the resolution of the House of Commons on Monday, so that one probate shall be sufficient to cover all the property in England. That resolution avoids all the inconveniences arising from the old rule as to bona notabilia; and without it, the Bill now before the House, great and numerous as are its other benefits, would be very incomplete.

The main difficulty which now besets Ministers arises from the hostility which the London proctors entertain, naturally enough, to such concessions to their provincial brethren. Our metropolitan friends, however, ought not to give way to any extravagant apprehensions, considering how well they seem to have succeeded in establishing a general conviction, among members of Parliament, of their right to compensation. In this respect, they have been more fortunate than other branches of the profession, who have endured similar inflictions without any such solace. The principle of compensation once being established, the damage sustained is merely a matter of account, and we have very little doubt that no important items will be forgotten when the time of reckoning comes, which has been considerately postponed so that nothing which accrues in the further progress of the Bill through Parliament may be omitted to the detriment of the ancient and respectable body of Proctors.

A CLIENT'S REVENGE.

An action has been tried during the course of the present week which has considerable interest for the profession. Recently, actions against attorneys for negligence have been so numerous, and so strangely successful, that almost every week we have had to report, and comment on, some instance more or less glaring of the bias entertained by juries in favour of clients, and against their professional advisers. Hitherto, a lady has generally been the plaintiff, and has appealed to the gallantry, as well as the prejudices, of the jury-box. But now a gentleman has been encouraged to follow the example, although even here a lady was at the bottom of the mischief; and it was when smarting under the damages inflicted on him for a breach of promise, that the plaintiff in the present action attempted to screw out of his legal advisers the price of his faithlessness in love. Our readers may remember an action tried last summer, in which a Miss Smith recovered £3,000 from a Mr. Woodfine. The father of the lady swore that Mr. Woodfine had stated his income, chiefly arising from a brewery, to be £6,000 a year; and it appeared that the manner in which Mr. Woodfine had intimated his intention to break off the match was very unceremonious. The damages were not, therefore, excessive; but Mr. Woodfine bitterly resented having to pay them, and burning to discover a victim, he thought he might attack with advantage Messrs. Simpson and Co., of Moorgate-street, who had acted as his attorneys. We will not enter into all the minute details of the case; but we will state what were the precise grounds on which he accused them of negligence.

The first ground was, that Mr. Simpson, the senior partner in the firm, had given him a wrong answer on a point of law. When Mr. Woodfine first came to consult Mr. Simpson on the subject, he asked whether he could himself be examined as a witness, and Mr. Simpson replied that he could. He accordingly gave Mr. Simpson an outline of what his evidence would be. Subsequently Mr. Simpson subpœnaed Miss Smith, the plaintiff; and Mr. Woodfine suggested the line of examination to which she should be subjected. About a fortnight before the trial, Mr. Simpson discovered his mistake, and both he and another of the firm intimated to Mr. Woodfine that neither he nor Miss Smith could be examined. Accordingly, with Mr. Woodfine's approval, Mr. Smith, the plaintiff's father, was substituted; and in the briefs delivered to counsel, the proofs of Mr. Woodfine and Miss Smith were thrown into one, and set down against the name of Mr. Smith. Mr. Woodfine, in fact, directed his attorneys that they might rely on Mr. Smith's testimony to make good the representations on which Mr. Woodfine rested his case. Now, we have no wish to speak as if it were not a part of an attorney's duty to know the Common Law Procedure Act; at the same time, great allowance is to be made when the attorney is an old man, accustomed to a very different state of the law; and we may remark that this very week, the Chief Baron observed that he could not pretend to have at his fingers end all the provisions of this very act. Still it was a mistake, and a mistake to be regretted. But it produced no bad effect whatever, and Mr. Woodfine himself, having notice that it was a mistake, still thought himself safe in defending the action, and trusted to the evidence of Mr. Smith to replace that which he himself had proposed to give.

The second grievance of which Mr. Woodfine complained was, that the attorneys took no steps to show what his income really was. He alleged that it did not exceed £700 a year; but he fluctuated exceedingly in his statements on the subject; for when one of his counsel, on the morning of the trial, questioned him as to his means, he replied, that he might be worth from £1,500 to £2,000 a year. This at least was the impression of the counsel who was examined on the present trial. He also confessed that he had represented to Mr. Smith that the brewery was worth £100,000. This fact alone might naturally make an attorney very uncertain as to the expediency of entering into evidence of this nature, and there was besides another reason for the course which was actually pursued. Mr. Woodfine represented to him that it was not he, but the lady herself who had broken off the match, and he maintained that the evidence of her own father would show this to be the real state of the case. Accordingly, Mr. Simpson considered that the primary aim of the defence must be to get a verdict, and not to reduce the damages. And that this was Mr. Woodfine's view was made evident by the fact that when a compromise was proposed, on the terms that the defendant should pay £1,000, Mr. Woodfine refused, although this sum could not have been considered excessive, even if the property of the defendant was not greater than the smallest of the sums at which he estimated it. Mr. Simpson considered it would not be wise, if a verdict was aimed at, to go into questions of pecuniary means, and he, therefore, purposely avoided a subject that was irrelevant to the main gist of Mr. Woodfine's case.

Thirdly, Mr. Woodfine accused Messrs. Simpson also of negligence, because witnesses were not called for the defence, although he expressly desired that they might be called. Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, then Attorney-General, and Mr. Chambers, were the leaders in the case retained by the defendant, and they both attended in Court this week, and stated most positively that it was by their direction that witnesses were not called. The trial was adjourned from Saturday to Monday, and Mr. Woodfine states that he proposed to have witnesses ready on the Monday morning who should speak to the really small value of the brewery. There is some discrepancy in the evidence on this point, as the attorneys deny that the names of these witnesses were ever communicated to them. But it is certain that the evidence of no witness as to the means of the defendant could have been more important than that of his mother, who was thoroughly acquainted with his affairs; and the defendant's counsel, after hearing on the Monday what she had got to say, determined not to call her. The Attorney-General said he did not like to give the plaintiff a reply, and that he thought the last word was more important than any evidence as to property. The attorneys had nothing to do but to acquiesce; and if ever there was a clear case in which the opinion of counsel acquitted an attorney of all responsibility, it was so here.

The attorneys employed by Mr. Woodfine might, therefore, have confidently expected a verdict in their favour. We understand, however, that the jury sent a note to the judge intimating their opinion that the defendants had been guilty of negligence, but that no damage had thereby resulted to the plaintiff. Hereupon the judge conferred with counsel, and the defendants' advisers, remembering, no doubt, the fate of attorneys in former actions, consented to withdraw a juror, and so the trial terminated. As regards the profession, we do not think a doubt can exist that Messrs. Simpson & Co. were substantially justified in all that they did, and the case presents few features that can be called very important or instructive. But as regards the general public, we may remark that this case strikingly shows that what is called negligence in an attorney, is often nothing but ignorance in the client. A professional man knows that if a defendant has real grounds to expect a verdict, the attention of himself and his advisers should be concentrated on obtaining that result. A professional man also knows the value of the last word, and the great danger of permitting an adversary to reply. But a hot-headed client, full of his own affairs, and utterly ignorant of the chances of a lawsuit, has no notion of all this, and despises the mere proposal to manage the case skilfully as an insult to his merits and to the justice of his cause. Attorneys must, therefore, often act in accordance rather with the dictates of their own experience than with the untutored wishes of their clients. If the client were to dictate absolutely to the attorney, it would be impossible for the attorney to conduct the case satisfactorily. We wish that the juries before whom actions for negligence are brought could be made to understand this, and could be induced to believe that it is not perversity or wilfulness, but knowledge of law and of men, which makes an attorney refuse to let his client adopt a course which the experience of countless trials has made him aware is dangerous.

Legal News.

The Equity Committee of the Incorporated Law Society have held several meetings lately to consider the present state of the Chancery offices, and the measures necessary to remove existing and notorious evils. The Committee have, we understand, this week agreed upon a Report which deals with the Judges' Chambers, the Taxing Masters' Offices, and the Accountant-General's Office, where the present defects are patent, and the remedies obvious. This Report has been adopted by the Council, and transmitted to the Lord Chancellor, who promises to give it attentive consideration.

Lord Brougham has extracted from the Lord Chancellor a similar pledge as regards the Report on Registration of Title to Land. Much interesting discussion has taken place in the House of Commons on the Testamentary Jurisdiction and Fraudulent Trustees Bills. The latter measure has passed through committee. We must reserve our abstract of the debate upon it, along with various other matters, until next week, when there will be more space at our command.

IMPEDIMENTS TO LAND TRANSFER.

(From the Times.)

Among other reforms wanting somebody to take them up in good earnest, there is one which we commend to the attention of the zealous but unemployed agricultural interest. Our great landowners want something to do, and are distrustful of schemes that promise to double the produce of the soil. One thing, however, they may easily do, if they will set their heads to work, which will vastly increase its marketable value. Can they not do away with the greater part of that immense difficulty and cost which encumbers the mere process of buying and selling land? It is an axiom, as Lord Brougham observed at the annual festival of the Law Amendment Society, that in England the transfer of an acre of land is the most difficult thing in the world. Of course, it may be said, the cost of transfer will increase in proportion to the smallness of the quantity. But, under the simplest conditions, and for very ordinary quantities, the cost is altogether out of propertion to the value; and the result is, that if a man has a hundred pounds he invests them in something of which he will get a hundred pounds worth—not in land, for the simple reason that of that commodity he will get only £70 or £80 worth, having to pay the difference for the law costs; knowing also, that, should he ever want to sell it, he will find purchasers deterred by the same consideration. In fact, land in small quantities and in ordinary situations is both difficult to obtain, and difficult to get rid of. No doubt, buying and selling is an expensive process in many other articles. If a gentleman wants a horse, he must pay half as much again as it is worth; if he wants to part with one, he cannot get half its value. The difference feeds the whole tribe of horsedealers and their various auxiliaries. It is the same with furniture, pictures, and a number of other things. The professional buyer says, "It is nought, it is nought," even if he expects to make ever so much by the bargain. In these cases the public are in the hands of the professional dealers, who know a great deal more about the article than the public, and have made it the business of their lives. They have a right to get something out of the transaction. We have no objection to jobbers. We are quite content there should be regular jobbers in land. But there is no such class as land-jobbers. In the transfer of land, the differences lost to the public do not go to a class more knowing than others in the value of land. They are not the natural reward of superior knowledge or enterprise. No; the immense loss upon transfers has nothing to do with value, with uncertainty of value, or fluctuations of value. It is suffered equally upon land of the most certain and of the most speculative value; upon land that a hundred people are ready to buy at a guinea a square yard, and upon land of which a thousand acres may or may not be worth having at all. The cost is in legal forms; in documents ten times as long as need be; in inquiries into title repeated over and over again, even where there cannot be a question, and never was a doubt.

But the most serious chronic depreciation of land is that which arises from the nature of the title itself, and it is one upon which the Legislature, often invoked, has every right to interfere. Whatever damages the property of the commonwealth is a public nuisance, and ought to be abated. Now, that the nature of certain titles does produce this damage is evident from the fact that an immense amount of property passes at a lower value, and remains in a lower condition, on account of its title. We might not be able to pronounce at once on the extent to which this principle should carry us. We may not be ready forthwith to ask for an Act converting all the houses on the Bedford estate from leaseholds into freeholds, even though we might believe that the process would be vastly advantageous to the Bedford family, to the lessees, and to the metropolis at large. But when nothing can be alleged, and nothing is alleged, in defence of a copyhold, or some other tenure, and where the advantage of a general enfranchisement is admitted on all sides, then it is mere prudery to question the right of the Legislature to step in and do a general benefit. When a legal form, itself the creation of the Legislature, clogs, impairs, and imperils the enjoyment of property, exposing it to uncertainty and to periodical difficulty and loss, of course it prevents the investment of capital in the improvement of that property. It deters the occupier, or quasi proprietor, from raising substantial buildings, and from giving his heart to the estate. It prevents, in fact, that very thing which it is the chief object of political and legal institutions to promote; not only for the happiness of individuals, but for the good of the whole nation. When it is evident there is such an incubus upon property, and when it tells its own tale by the depreciation of property, then surely the Legislature may set boldly to work, as it would to rid the community from terror of foreign aggression or social disorder. Yet just such an incubus is every description of title to land which depreciates it, which renders its tenure precarious, which discourages improvement, and sends away to any mad speculation, or to any foreign scheme, the capital which might otherwise be fixed on our own soil.

It is true that the original imperfection of the tenure is often the least defect in a title; and even in the case of the best freeholds accident, or capricious disposition, mortgages, and settlements, may complicate an estate to an extent seriously injurious to the public interest. The owner may so bequeath or so encumber a property that it shall not be worth anybody's while to risk more than a yearly occupation upon it. In this case there will be no improvements, no roads, no houses, no drainage, nothing done, except what the State in some formal and cumbrous manner may compel, on the property of a whole district. We have heard of complications so manifold and absurd, that we should not be believed if we were to state them, except by the lawyers. In these cases no man in his senses will spend his money on an estate which the caprice of one man, the death of another, the disagreement of half-a-dozen others, and possibly some other contingency, will suddenly take away from him, or only leave in his occupation at an unreasonable cost.

But there is no valid reason why land and houses should not be rendered as easy and cheap of transfer as money in the funds. They can be registered and described as easily as the Three per Cents.; divisions, accumulations, and all changes can be perpetually entered in public books, as easily as an inventory made of the furniture of a house; and the transfer can be done simply by the substitution of one name for another. Thus, the title once established, there would be no occasion to scrutinise it over and over again every time a property is sold or a mortgage contracted. The work once done would stand good for all purposes; and if the lawyers had not quite such heavy costs on each conveyance of land, they would find they would have many more such conveyances, that land was in more request, and that more money was spent upon it.

QUEEN'S BENCH.

WOODFINE v. SIMPSON, ROBERTS, & SIMPSON.

July 6.

Sir F. Thesiger, Mr. Jackson, and Mr. Field were counsel for the plaintiff; Mr. Serjeant Byles, Mr. Tomlinson, and Mr. Prentice for the defendants.

This was an action against the defendants, as attorneys, for negligence in the conduct of a cause of Smith v. Woodfine. The defendants pleaded "Not Guilty."

Sir F. Thesiger said that this was a case of very great importance, and more especially to the defendants, who were solicitors of very high respectability, but who were charged with negligence in the conduct of a cause intrusted to them by Mr. Woodfine. The plaintiff carried on the business of a brewer at Hornchurch, in partnership with his mother. The plaintiff's father had died in 1853, leaving his property equally between his widow and three children. The plaintiff's share amounted to about £11,000, and altogether his income was about £750 per annum. In May in last year the plaintiff was informed by the attorney of Miss Smith that he was instructed by that person to bring an action against him for breach of promise of marriage. The plaintiff upon that proceeded to the office of the defendants, who had been his father's attorneys, and he saw Mr. J. A. Simpson, and related to him the facts. Mr. Simpson expressed a very strong opinion with regard to his success in the action, and that the plaintiff had acted justifiably. Mr. Woodfine asked Simpson whether he could be a witness in the action, and Simpson said he could, as the only exception in the Common Law Procedure Act was in the case of adultery. Simpson did not ask him as to the amount of his property. The action was brought, and the damages were laid at £3,000. Woodfine wrote a statement of the case, and took it to Simpson, and a draft brief was prepared and sent to Woodfine, and in that brief, which was very meagre, the first witness set out was Woodfine himself, and there were instructions for the examination or cross-examination of Miss Smith, the plaintiff in that cause; and it would be shown that Miss Smith had been actually subpœnaed as a witness on behalf of Woodfine. A day or two before the cause came on, Roberts, the partner of Simpson, told Woodfine that his partner had made a mistake, and that he could not be examined. The trial commenced on Saturday, the 5th of July, and Mr. Smith was called, and he stated that Woodfine had told him that he was worth £6,000 a year, and that the brewery was worth £100,000. The trial was adjourned that day, and Woodfine and his mother went to Simpson and told him that witnesses must be called to contradict that statement. Roberts said it should be made all right on Monday. Witnesses, however, were not called, and a verdict passed for the plaintiff, with £3,000 damages. The present plaintiff now complained that the defendants had been guilty of negligence in not ascertaining the value of the property, of ignorance of the law as regarded his being called as a witness, and of not following the instructions of the plaintiff by calling witnesses.

Thomas Woodfine.—I am a brewer at Hornchurch. In May, 1856, I received a letter from Clayton & Co., stating that they were instructed by Miss Smith to bring an action for breach of promise of marriage. I went to the defendants, who had been employed by my father, and saw old Mr. Simpson. I stated the facts to him. He said, "They cannot prove a breach, or, if they can, you are justified in making one." I asked him if I could give evidence, and be a witness. He said, "You can; the Common Law Procedure Act has altered the law, and plaintiffs and defendants can be examined except in the case of adultery." I said, "Then I am perfectly safe, as I can prove all I have stated." I received a letter on the 8th of May from the defendants, asking to see any letters. On the 15th of May I received another letter from the defendants, stating that proceedings were commenced, and asking for any letters. On the 17th of May I went to the defendants' office, and handed letters and a full statement of the case (19 sheets). On the 5th of June I received a letter from the defendants with draft brief. On the 14th of June I received another letter from the defendants requesting me to read over the brief. The draft brief contained a statement that the defendant was a brewer in good business at Hornchurch, and that his father died a few months ago possessed of considerable property. That was all that related to the defendant's property. It also stated, that, if it should be thought necessary to go into evidence, the defendant was ready to substantiate his statement; and, in the proofs, the defendant's (Woodfine's) evidence was first set out; and there were minutes for the examination or cross-examination of the plaintiff, Miss Smith, who had been subpœnaed for the defendant. On the 17th of June I accompanied my mother to the defendants' office, and we saw old Mr. Simpson. I said to him, "There is next to nothing in the brief." He said, "I have omitted everything offensive purposely." I said, "How are the judge and jury to know the insults I have received?" He said, "It will all come out on your evidence, and you will stand so much better." I said, "Are you perfectly sure I can be examined as a witness?" He said, "You can; there is no doubt of it." I then said, "I am perfectly safe." He said he had subpœnaed Miss Smith and her father. The trial was fixed for Saturday, the 5th of July; and, the day before, I called at the defendants' office, and saw Mr. Roberts, one of the defendants, for the first time. He said I should come off with flying colours. I said, "I dare say the people will laugh at me for a fool when I get into the box." Roberts said, "Its a mistake; you can't be examined." I said, "Why, that's what I have always relied upon." On the Saturday, I came to town and went into court, and about four o'clock the trial was adjourned. I then went to the defendants' office, and saw Mr. Simpson. My mother said, "I am perfectly astonished at the statements made by Mr. Smith; they are incorrect, and must be denied; for I can prove that he had not a farthing in the funds." Mr. Smith had stated in the court, when examined that day, that I had told him that I had £19,000 in the funds, and that the brewery was worth £100,000, and the profits were £6,000 a year, and that I had other property also. My mother added, that, as regarded my income, Mr. Smith had put an "0" too much. She said the property had all been valued three years before, and my share was only £10,000; that Mr. Collier, of King William-street, had valued it, and he must be called; and Mr. Mason, of Romford, had valued some part of it, and he must be called; also Mr. Shaw, who had been my father's attorney, had prepared the accounts, and he could prove what the amount of my share was. I told Mr. Roberts, who was present, that the statements made were not true; and that Mr. Collier and Mr. Mason must be called, as it would make a great deal of difference. Mr. Roberts said, "It shall be made all right on Monday." On Monday, the 7th, I came to town with my mother and sister. I saw Mr. Collier that morning, and I told him of the statements, and made an arrangement with him as to where he would be during the day, as he would be wanted as a witness. I saw Mr. Roberts that morning, and I told him I had seen Collier and knew where to send for him, as of course witnesses would be called. He said, "Where is your mother? I want to know what she can prove." I called her into the office, and he asked her questions; and she said, that Mr. Smith had told her his daughter could look like any devil, and that she did not care a farthing for me. My mother said she could prove that my income was about £700 or £800 a year. I went to the consultation that morning with the Attorney-General just before the court sat. The Attorney-General asked what my mother could prove. I said, "She can prove many things, and entirely alter the case." The Attorney-General said, "Read over what Mrs. Woodfine can prove." Some one then came and said the cause was called on, and we left. Before Roberts left, he said my mother and sister were frightened. I said, "They must and shall be called, and of course you will call witnesses as to the property; that must be set right. I don't care a fig about the reply of counsel. Witnesses shall be called." Roberts said it should be all right. Witnesses were not called for me, and a verdict passed against me with £3,000 damages, the whole amount laid in the declaration. Mr. Simpson had never asked me before the trial as to the amount of my property, but I had told him all about it before the draft brief was sent—that my share was between £10,000 and £12,000; and that times had been bad for brewing in consequence of the war, and that the property had all been valued on my father's death; but he asked me no question about it. After the trial we went to the defendants' office and told him it was entirely his fault; that he had misled me, and had opened the eyes of the opposite attorney; that he had no lawyer to deal with; that he had not explained anything, and only one side had been heard; that he had letters in his possession which he ought to have produced. On the day after the trial I received a telegraphic message, "Come immediately; counsel say we can get a new trial;" and I went to the defendants' office, when Simpson said it would be necessary to make an affidavit, and I should be examined before the four judges in banco. I afterwards told Simpson I had no confidence in him, and must take the papers away. Simpson said he was extremely sorry: he must admit that he had been in error. I said, "I suppose you will want your bill paid?" He said, "As I have been wrong, I will not make any charge; we will see the result of a new trial." I afterwards paid him £132. I then went to Mr. Taylor, who wrote for the papers, but Simpson said he would not give them up until he was paid. A rule for a new trial was granted, but ultimately was discharged. I have paid altogether £4,000 for damages and expenses. (In the draft brief the present plaintiff was put down as the first witness, but the engrossment was altered to "If the plaintiff could be examined, he would state, &c.").

Cross-examined.—I have since been married. My counsel were the Attorney-General, Mr. M. Chambers, and Mr. Prentice (the last was now engaged for the defendants). There was a consultation on the morning of the trial, at which I was present. My counsel were all there. I did not at that consultation tell my counsel that I had £2,000 a year. Mr. Chambers asked what we returned for property-tax. I answered £1,200 a year. Mr. Chambers said, "Is that your's or your mother's?" I said, "It was all the brewery—my own and my mother's together." I never told the Attorney-General I had £2,000 a year, or that it was from £1,500 to £2,000 a year. They asked me what I had told Miss Smith. They asked me what my income was. I did not tell them from £1,500 to £2,000 a year. I said, some years the whole of the brewery might be £2,000, but my income was not more than £700 or £800 a year. To the best of my recollection, I told them so. I certainly told them £700 or £800 a year. The consultation was much hurried. Mr. M. Chambers laughed, and they joked me about Miss Jones. I have not a farm of my own. I lease a farm of about 370 acres. The brewery is freehold. We have public-houses. There are eleven freehold, three copyhold, and sixteen leasehold public-houses. I don't know what malt duty we pay. I made an affidavit, and did not deny the statement made by Mr. Smith, that I had told him the brewery was worth £100,000. I said I should not like to have that denial put in the affidavit, because there were circumstances that required explanation. I had made remarks in joke to Smith's family. I said in their house, "They say we have sold the brewery for £95,000; is not that a good joke, for I should not have valued it at half that sum." I never told Smith that it had been valued at £50,000 or £60,000, but that it was worth £100,000. I did not tell him that the brewery had brought in the last year £6,000. I did not tell him I had £19,000 in the funds. I had not any money in the funds. There is money standing in the funds in my name and my mother's, as trustees for my sisters. I don't know what the amount is. I can swear it is under £10,000. I think the draft brief was sent to me a month before the trial. I did not correct the statement in the draft that my father died worth considerable property. I was not told a week before the trial that I could not be examined as a witness. It was only two days before the trial that Roberts told me his partner had made a mistake. I was not told so on the 25th or 27th June. At the consultation the Attorney-General came in in a great hurry, and while he was dressing himself, and taking breakfast, he shouted out, "Tell Chambers to take the first witness." The Attorney-General did not tell me he should not call witnesses. He said nothing to me about not liking to give them a reply. I did not correct the draft brief. I suggested a few alterations. I did not expect to have to teach Simpson the law.

Re-examined.—The consultation on the Monday lasted about seven or eight minutes. The counsel were very jocular, particularly Mr. Chambers.

Mrs. Mary Woodfine, the mother of the plaintiff, corroborated him as to the instructions to call witnesses. The profits of the business had been valued at £1,200 a year, but she thought that too high.

Mr. Shaw, who formerly acted for the plaintiff's father as his attorney, but who had retired from business, stated that the real and personal property of the late Mr. Woodfine was valued at about £40,000. That was the whole amount divisible among the family.

Mr. Serjeant Byles then addressed the Court for the defendants. Although he believed the verdict would be for the defendants, yet from the speech of his friend it was impossible but an impression must have been made. The defendants had not stirred up this litigation. The plaintiff had gone to them in his extremity. His friend had twice vouched the respectability of the defendants. The elder Mr. Simpson had been in practice forty years, and his experience was assisted by younger men. There were few positions more honourable than that of a solicitor. He had the confidence of the nobility and all classes, and matters of the greatest complexity and delicacy were placed in his hands. Counsel, who had large emoluments and seats in Parliament, were the makers and administrators of the common law; if they made mistakes they were not amenable because it was supposed they worked gratuitously, but the attorney was held liable for any error or mistake, although his profits were but small. When, however, an attorney acted under the advice of counsel he was safe. The present defendants employed the late Attorney-General, now Chief Justice, and Mr. M. Chambers, and they would both be called, and would state that they advised the defendants that witnesses ought not to be called. In that action a verdict for £3,000 was given, and he (the learned counsel) was sure the present jury would have done the same. That verdict afterwards met with the approbation of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, upon their discharging the rule for a new trial; and now the plaintiff wanted to get all this money back from his unfortunate attorney. In cases of breach of promise of marriage it was a very rare thing to call witnesses for the defendant. There was no doubt of the promise and the breach. Suppose the mother had been called, the counsel would have got out from her these numerous public-houses, and she must have been cross-examined more strictly than was necessary on the present occasion. The Attorney-General had seen all this, and he also knew what this gentleman had said on consultation. The Chief Justice would say that he had told them his income was £2,000 a year. After what the jury had heard, would there have been any use in calling witnesses to try and cut down the value of the property? They had now seen the books under a judge's order, and the value had been very considerably understated. Was the plaintiff now to say, "I did tell Mr Smith so, but I lied?" It mattered not what inquiry had been made, for the Attorney-General had said it was not expedient to call witnesses and give a reply. The brief stating that the father had been a man of considerable property had been laid before the plaintiff, and he had not suggested an alteration. If inquiries had been made, they would only have shown that his property was large. Then it was complained that the defendant had said that Woodfine might be examined as a witness. An Act of Parliament had recently passed altering the law, and anybody, even a judge or a counsel, and more so an attorney, might fall into a mistake. The question then arose as to when the mistake was discovered. He should show that a fortnight before the trial Woodfine was told that he could not be a witness. But if he could have been called, did they believe the Attorney-General would have called him, and subjected him to cross-examination? He was sure he would not have done so. The plaintiff then complained of witnesses not having been called. That was not for his client to do, the responsibility rested with his counsel. God forbid that counsel should be personally responsible; for, if they were, they would in every case say "Call witnesses." The moment counsel decided, the attorney was relieved from responsibility. The counsel at consultation heard the whole case, and they exercised their discretion. They had heard the defendant's admission, and upon that they determined not to call witnesses, or they might enhance the damages. The young gentleman wished the Attorney-General to fight the whole case—first denying the promise, and then denying the breach. He submitted that the former jury had given a most righteous verdict; and, had witnesses been called, the damages might have been larger still. He trusted that he should have the satisfaction of hearing their verdict for the defendants.

The Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas.—Last year I was Attorney-General. I had a brief in a cause of Smith v. Woodfine. I was counsel for the defendant. I don't remember the date of the trial. The brief was delivered in sufficient time for me to master it. There was a consultation on Saturday morning, the morning of the trial. The defendant was present, and took upon himself the business of the attorney. A more hot-headed client I never had. A question was made about Woodfine's property. He made a statement as to his property, but as to amount I cannot say; but he made it amount to such a sum as led me to think, if the plaintiff succeeded, the damages would be something considerable. Mr. Smith was examined, and gave evidence of statements made by Woodfine of his property. It certainly was in excess of what the defendant had said to be the amount of his property. I know we considered whether we should call the defendant's mother. That was submitted to me, and I took upon myself, with the concurrence of my coadjutors, not to call her. I now recollect there was a consultation, if I am not mistaken, on the Monday morning. Smith had made out a much stronger case than the defendant had led me to suppose possible; and as I believed Smith's statement, I was led to mistrust the defendant's statement. One view of the case made by the defendant was that the breaking off the marriage had proceeded from the young lady's family, and not from himself. The plaintiff's case showed it had been done chiefly at the instigation of his mother. I had so much distrust as to the reliance to be placed on the defendant's case that I said, "Although there may have been an exaggeration as to the defendant's means, there would be danger in calling witnesses." I am bound to say the attorney had nothing to do with it. Counsel, and not the attorney, determined the course.

Cross-examined by Sir F. Thesiger.—As regards being concerned in cases of breach of promise of marriage, I see my superior. There was no lack of discussion about calling witnesses as to the property. I thought the defendant might have exaggerated the amount of his means to make himself more acceptable. There was no additional brief delivered, I think. You go away for the long vacation, and it goes out of your mind. I did my best to settle the action. I was not told that it was the defendant's determination to have witnesses called. The defendant put his attorney quite on one side. I could not keep him quiet. It must not be supposed, because I was at breakfast, that the consultation was a hurried one, because such was my habit. The other side wanted £1,000, and I advised Mr. Woodfine to give it. If Mr. Woodfine had insisted upon calling witnesses, I should have said, "I will do so, but it is contrary to my most determined advice." Woodfine took the lead and kept it, and in no case was an attorney less responsible.

Mr. M. Chambers.—I held a brief in that cause. I don't recollect how long the brief had been delivered before the trial. I recollect the consultation. The defendant, in answer to my questions as to property—my impression is, but I won't bind myself to it—said, "From £1,500 to £2,000 a year." I agreed, after hearing the evidence for the plaintiff, that witnesses should not be called. I have no recollection of what occurred at the consultation on the Monday morning. Woodfine did not put his income as low as £700 or £800 a year. I think not. It would have been extremely imprudent to call witnesses. I observed not the least want of skill or care on the part of the present defendants. Woodfine took a very active part at the consultations. He said he had been hardly used by the Smith family.

Cross-examined.—I don't remember the jocularity at the consultation; but it is very likely. I was not aware that Woodfine had insisted upon witnesses being called. I was counsel for Woodfine upon the application for a new trial. I don't know that I ever mentioned that Woodfine had stated his property to be £1,500 a year. I recollect the brief stating that it was £700 a year. I was much surprised at its being put so low. If the attorney says there were three consultations, no doubt there were. I heard that Mason and Collier could speak as to the property, but I don't know when. The usual course in these cases is to state the general circumstances, but I have a very limited experience in breaches of promise of marriage. If I had been told that the client insisted upon witnesses being examined, it is difficult for counsel to say what he would do. I think I should take upon myself to act according to the best of my judgment. When a counsel exerts all his abilities I think he should take the responsibility. Mr. Woodfine was sitting by me in court, and he made no suggestions. Clients will interfere and talk. I should expect to receive communications from the attorney. I have no belief whether I was told or not that Mr. Woodfine had insisted upon witnesses being called. Mr. Woodfine was sitting behind Mr. Prentice.

July 7.

The Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas stated that he wished to add to his evidence. He had stated yesterday that if Mr. Woodfine had acted according to his advice he would have given £1,000. It had occurred to him since, that this might have created an impression that he had advised him to give that sum. What he meant was, that he felt so strongly that the case was desponding, that, if Mr. Woodfine had acted according to the spirit of his advice, he would have compromised the matter by giving that sum. No sum was mentioned but £500, and that sum he had offered, but it was rejected so peremptorily, and the sum named as the minimum on the other side appeared so large, that he thought the case ought to be fought out.

Mr. Justice Wightman said he did not know what view the jury took of the case after the evidence of the Chief Justice—whether there was any culpable negligence; because it was quite clear, that, under the circumstances, the counsel would not have advised witnesses being called.

Sir F. Thesiger said, of course, if that was now the opinion of the jury—

The Judge.—It had occurred to him, that, after the evidence of the Chief Justice and Mr. Chambers, the jury might have formed an opinion on the matter.

A Juror.—It depends entirely whether or not the advice of counsel is to override that of the solicitor; in that case I fancy the trial would be at an end.

Sir F. Thesiger said there would be this consideration, as to whether there was a communication made to the counsel of the strong determination of the client that witnesses should be called.

The Jury.—We would rather hear the case.

Mr. Smith.—I reside at Hornchurch, and was for many years in the Audit-office.

After some discussion it was ruled by the Court that the proper mode of proving what this witness said on the former trial was by reading the transcript of the short-hand notes taken on the trial.

Mr. Cherer put in a transcript of the notes he took of Mr. Smith's evidence on the trial of Smith v. Woodfine this day twelve months.

The transcript was read. Smith stated that Woodfine had told him he had £6,000 a year, and that the brewery was worth £100,000, and that he had £19,000 in the funds.

James Alexander Simpson.—I am one of the defendants. I commenced practice in 1818. The plaintiff called on me on the 5th of May, 1856. He was a stranger to me at the time. The plaintiff brought me an attorney's letter threatening an action against him. He went into a long explanation of the facts, and stated that he had been most shamefully treated by the Smith family, and this was an attempt to extort money, and he would resist it if it cost him £1,000. I was led to believe that Miss Smith had broken the contract, and not he. I had a correspondence with the other attorney, and communicated it to the plaintiff. I cautioned him of the consequences, and told him a refusal in plain words was not necessary. Immediately after the writ was issued I requested him to give me in writing the dates of all the transactions. He brought me a written statement. I asked him particularly whether anything had been said in reference to settlement or means. He said, "No;" he had told Mr. Smith that what he intended to give his daughter he might give to her brother, as he did not want it. Upon that I instructed counsel to prepare the pleadings, which I afterwards explained to him. I consulted him particularly as to the counsel he would wish engaged, and we determined on the Attorney-General and Mr. Chambers. After notice of trial I wrote to apprise him it had been given. He called the next day, and I said I would prepare the brief immediately, that there might be ample time. I prepared the brief, endeavouring to embody in it everything he had told me. I sent him a copy of the brief, and a draft of a proof for him and his mother, on the 14th of June. I wrote also, that, although I had sent him a proof, there was no probability of any witnesses being examined. The plaintiff called on the 17th with his mother, and brought back the brief, and suggested several alterations and corrections, which were all made. Mrs. Woodfine wished the evidence to be corrected. She said, "You seem to have let the Smiths off very easily." I said I should be doing injustice to her son if I introduced such a line of defence. The brief was again sent to him corrected. I was then under an impression that he would be examined. I had mistaken the Act of Parliament. I discovered my error on the 20th of June, and I am under a strong impression that this was communicated to him on the 21st of June. I was afterwards taken ill. On the 27th of June I had a long conversation with Woodfine, and expressed my regret that I had fallen into the error; but I said it would not prejudice him, as in a case of this kind it was an unheard-of thing to call witnesses, the object being to have the last word. Mr. Roberts took the management of the case from that time. I saw Woodfine on the Saturday afternoon of the trial, between the two hearings. Mrs. Woodfine complained that Mrs. Smith had given evidence that was perfectly untrue. I was going out, as I was very ill. I saw the plaintiff again after the trial. He complained of the result, and of the evidence that had been given; that the Attorney-General's speech was an ineffectual one. He made no complaint of me, or about witnesses being called. He never told me what his property was. I always went for a verdict. The day after the trial, he went into a statement of his property. I did not hear them say on the Saturday that they could prove that he had no money in the funds.

Cross-examined.—It is the duty of the attorney to prepare the brief. It is his duty to make the proper inquiries. I always felt that if I went into a statement of his property, I might induce counsel to think I had not confidence in his statement, which I really had. It is a matter of opinion whether I ought to have made counsel aware of everything. In ordinary circumstances it is usual to state the particulars of the property, but it must be left to the discretion of the attorney. I intended leaving it to counsel to ask for any further information they might require. A brief where counsel require further information is not defective. It is a matter of opinion. It is the solicitor's duty to instruct counsel fully according to his discretion. I did not think it expedient to go into particulars of his property. I believed that he could be a witness. He did not ask me whether he could be a witness, as I believe. I don't mean to deny that I might have said that parties might now be witnesses. I did not prepare the brief till after issue delivered. The brief was engrossed, I think, between the 24th and 26th. I have office books. I was under a misapprehension as to the exception in the Act. I think I looked in the Act on the 21st. I subpœnaed Miss Smith under the same impression. I undertook the whole of the business down to the time of the brief being prepared. On the 27th I told Woodfine I had found I was under a misapprehension as to the Act of Parliament. He did not say he believed the brief to be very meagre, but, on the contrary, Mrs. Woodfine said I had not abused the Smith family. After the first day's trial, the plaintiff and his mother did not complain of the statements of the witnesses, and that they must be contradicted. She said the statements were untrue. These particulars will not be found in my day-book. I did not lay instructions before counsel to advise upon evidence. I delivered the brief a week before the trial. I never knew an instance of witnesses being called for the defendant in such a case. I could not get a consultation with the Attorney-General, though I sent every day, he was so much engaged. I might have had a conference with Mr. Prentice, but I did not think it a case that required it. When I discovered the error, I altered the brief. The proof of Miss Smith for cross-examination was engrossed. There was a proof for the present plaintiff which is altered to Mr. Smith, embodying the evidence of Woodfine and Smith. I asked Mr. Woodfine whether I could rely upon Mr. Smith giving fair and impartial evidence, and he said I might. I never had any communication with counsel. I was ill. I had stated in the brief that the plaintiff's family would not hesitate as to the means of obtaining their ends, as the whole was a conspiracy. When the plaintiff was going to take away the papers, I did not say I admitted I had been in error. He said Mr. Roberts had insulted him by stating that he believed Mr. Smith's statement in preference to his. I said I was sure he did not intend it. I never said that I admitted I had been in error, and would not make any charge; not a word of the sort took place. I know affidavits were prepared. On the 8th of July, Mr. and Mrs. Woodfine came to the office and saw Roberts. The names of Collier and Mason were never mentioned: if they had been, I would have taken care they should have been in attendance. I could not have mentioned them to counsel. If my client had insisted upon witnesses being called, I should have mentioned it to counsel. Circumstances may alter the course to be adopted. No doubt the amount of property would influence the jury.

Re-examined.—In my brief I said the plaintiff was the son of a man of considerable property. In my opinion that was a proper statement to make. I did not consult Mr. Prentice, because I thought it desirable to have a consultation with all three counsel.

Mr. Roberts.—I am one of the defendants. The plaintiff first spoke to me on the 21st of June. The plaintiff had the brief three times. He suggested an alteration in the brief. On the 22nd or 23rd I saw the plaintiff, who asked what I thought of his case. I said, "According to your own case, you stand well, but in these cases the juries go with the lady." He said, "I suppose my oath is as good as hers." I said, "You will neither of you be examined as witnesses." He said, "Oh, I did not know that. Mr. Simpson seemed to be doubtful." I saw him on the 27th. I am positive he knew he was not to be a witness. He said, "Can I get any other evidence which I may have supplied?" I said, "I don't think you can, because you seem to have been by yourself on every occasion you saw the Smiths." I saw him frequently afterwards, just for a moment. I did not attend to the case. We were not able to get a consultation earlier. I sent up our clerk every day to the Attorney-General. The consultation was on the morning of the trial; it lasted over half an hour. The other counsel were present. Mr. Chambers asked the plaintiff what his income was. The plaintiff said about £2,000 a year. Mr. Chambers said, "But what did you tell the lady you had?" The plaintiff hesitated, and said, "I might have told her £2,000 or £1,500 a year; but I am not sure." The Attorney-General said, "You have been a great fool, Sir; you will have £2,000 at the least to pay." I asked counsel whether there was anything wanted; they said, "No," all of them. I suggested to Mr. Prentice a proposal as to a compromise, as the Attorney-General seemed to have a bad opinion of the case. Mr. Prentice said, "Which had you rather do, give £1,000, or run the chance of a verdict?" The plaintiff said, "I would prefer going to trial; if the whole amount is given, it will not hurt me." He was in an excited state. He was present at the trial, by the side of Mr. Prentice. I heard Mr. Smith examined about the property, which came upon me by surprise, as the plaintiff had given me no information upon the subject. After the first day's trial, I said to the Attorney-General, "I can't believe that Smith's statements are true; shall I obtain any evidence of fortune?" The Attorney-General said, "No; they are only what Smith said Woodfine stated to him, and you can't contradict them." I asked him again if there was anything else I could do. The Attorney-General said, "Yes; I want to know what the old lady says about the interview." I then left the court. The Attorney-General said, "I must place it all upon the father, the hasty issuing of the writ, and the lawyer's letter." I left the court accompanied by the plaintiff and his family. Between Guildhall and Moorgate-street, I said to him, "These statements of Mr. Smith are very awkward; tell me, did you ever make those statements?" He said, "No; they are all —— lies." I said, "What is the value of this brewery?" He said, "Certainly not more than £50,000, at the outside." Not a single syllable was said to me about Mason, Collier, or Shaw on that day. I then went to my office, and met Mr. Simpson going out. The plaintiff did not to him mention the names of Collier, Mason, or Shaw. Mrs. Woodfine's carriage was waiting. I told her what the Attorney-General had said about the interview with Miss Smith, and requested her to bring me an account of it. On Monday morning Mr. and Mrs. Woodfine came to my office. I went through a written statement which she brought with her, and her statement did not appear to me to be collected and clear. On that morning, either before, at, or after consultation, not a word was said about Collier, Mason, or Shaw. I said to Mrs. Woodfine, "At all events, you can swear that your son has no money in the funds." She said she could state it. I then had a consultation with the Attorney-General, and I communicated to him whatever Mrs. Woodfine had told me. The Attorney-General questioned Mr. Woodfine, and there was a discussion as to calling witnesses. The Attorney-General said, "I do not like to give them the last word. I will not call Mrs. Woodfine." In my judgment I did not think it desirable to call any witnesses. I remember an application to stay the execution. The plaintiff said he was afraid he could not, in his affidavit, deny that he had told Smith the brewery was worth £100,000. The statement as to the plaintiff's income was originally left blank in the affidavit, but was filled up by his dictation as £750. I think on the 9th of July he complained of negligence. He said that the Attorney-General had managed his case very badly; that he had not read a letter of Mr. Simpson to Clayton and Co., and he was sure we had not given him a sufficient fee. He then complained of me for the first time. He did not, on the Saturday after the trial, say there was a great deal of difference between £600 and £800; and I did not say it should be set right on the Monday.

Cross-examined.—The first business I did in the case was the delivery of the briefs on the 1st of July. I had not done anything in the cause before, except just look through the briefs. I did not first enlighten Mr. Simpson as to his being a witness. I had never given such a matter a thought. If I had been asked, I might have said I would look; but it never occurred to me. I would not have given an answer without looking. I did not see in the draft brief that Mr. Woodfine was put down as a witness. When I read the brief he was not put down as a witness. I think I heard that Miss Smith had been subpœnaed. I now do know it. When I heard she had been subpœnaed, I did not go and remonstrate with my partner. On the 21st I had no material conversation on the subject of the cause. When the Court rose on the Saturday, the plaintiff and his family came to the door of the office. I am inclined to think the mother and sister stood by the door. The carriage may have been Mr. Thompson's. At no time on the Saturday or Monday was any mention made of Collier or Mason; nor was anything said about the property having been valued. Mr. and Mrs. Thompson did not walk with me from the court, and find fault with me for not calling Collier and Mason. They walked behind me. They found the greatest fault with the Attorney-General for not calling Mrs. Woodfine.

James Hewlett.—I am clerk to the defendants. I delivered the briefs in "Smith and Woodfine" on the 1st of July. I applied for a consultation every day at the Attorney-General's chambers, and also to his clerk at Guildhall, and got as early a consultation as I could; and that was on the Saturday morning.

The following evidence was then produced for the plaintiff:—

Mr. Thompson.—I and my wife walked from the court on the Monday with Roberts. My wife found fault with him for not having called Mason and Collier, as he had been told to do, on the Saturday.

Cross-examined.—My wife said, "You ought to have called Mr. Mason and Mr. Collier," and—she was most intemperate—"you ought to have called witnesses for the defendant."

Mrs. Thompson.—After the verdict, I walked with my husband and Roberts from the court. I found fault with Roberts, and expressed myself in a manner my husband did not think ladylike.

Cross-examined.—I asked him why he had not called Messrs. Collier, Mason, and Shaw, as my mother and brother had requested on the Saturday. I said they ought to have been called, and asked how the jury could understand the case without their being called.

Mr. Serjeant Byles then proceeded to sum up the defendants' case. Mr. Thompson and his wife differed as to the words used, and the important words were, "as you were desired to do on the Saturday," and Mrs. Thompson varied her statement. If his client were not an attorney, there would not be the slighest doubt as to the verdict, but he knew an attorney had harder measure dealt out to him than others, and a learned judge had said he expected to see the day when a rule should be moved for calling on an attorney to show cause why he should not be executed. An attorney was justified in following the course pointed out by his counsel, and if he did not follow that advice he was not justified. If a client was absent on a trial, an attorney was liable to an action if he did not follow the advice of counsel. It was the bounden duty of an attorney to obey and act under the advice of counsel. Mr. Woodfine had his own counsel, and well had he chosen; for that learned judge had, by his high talent and exertions, well merited the high position in which he was placed, and no man was more properly placed. His friend Mr. Chambers was well known in this hall, and Mr. Prentice was a most eminent lawyer; and both might well aspire to sit in the place, or near the place, of the Lord Chief Justice.

July 8.

Sir F. Thesiger addressed the jury in reply.—He disclaimed any intention of endeavouring to inflame their minds by the vulgar prejudices entertained against attorneys. The question was, not the high respectability of Mr. Simpson, but whether in this cause he had exercised that diligence and judgment which were required of him. When an action was brought against a man he had recourse to his attorney, and fully stated to him the whole of the facts; and it was the duty of the attorney to extract from the client the nature of the action and the evidence that could be brought to bear upon the case of the defendant, and then, after receiving the pleadings, to prepare a brief; and the attorney did not relieve himself from responsibility by sending the brief to the client, who could not be supposed to understand its different bearings. The attorney then delivered the brief to counsel, who could not go beyond the information it contained. When the case came on for trial, then the counsel's responsibility commenced, and he acted in the conduct of the cause according to his judgment and discretion. These being the different duties of the parties, let them look at the conduct of the defendants. In an action for breach of promise of marriage one important point was the amount of the property of the defendant; but in this instance Mr. Simpson seemed to have been inoculated with the sanguine view of Mr. Woodfine, and to have only looked to the verdict. He thought it was the duty of the attorney to look to every phase of the case, and Mr. Simpson ought to have seen, that, if a verdict should go the other way, the amount of property became of the greatest importance. His friend said the brief did contain that information. The brief said, "The defendant is a brewer at Hornchurch, in good business, and his father died lately possessed of considerable property." Did that convey to the counsel any information at all of the amount of the property? But it did convey to them the idea that the defendant was a man of great property. The preparation of the brief was governed by the extraordinary mistake into which Mr. Simpson had fallen. His friend had said that that had been no disadvantage to the plaintiff because he had been informed of the mistake by Mr. Roberts some days before the trial; but the whole brief was prepared upon the assumption that the plaintiff and the defendant could both be examined. The brief had been sent to Mr. Woodfine with his proof, and instructions for the cross-examination of Miss Smith were set forth. But counsel received the brief denuded of the information as to the property, which had before appeared in the evidence of Mr. Woodfine. They then came to the turning point of the case, upon which there was contradiction in the evidence. It was said by the plaintiff that circumstances had occurred which rendered it necessary for the defendants to be extremely cautious, and to have communicated to the counsel the evidence that could have been given upon the value of the property. Mr. Smith's evidence was a statement which he asserted Mr. Woodfine had made to him. He could not be contradicted; but the ascertained value of the property could be shown, and Mr. Woodfine, Mrs. Woodfine, and the two daughters positively stated that a communication of this kind had been made to Mr. Simpson and Mr. Roberts, and they were told witnesses must be called. All this must be true, or must be fabricated, and they must have come here deliberately to perjure themselves. Mr. Simpson and Mr. Roberts denied this, but it might be that they had a blank memory, forgetting that it had taken place. To show how things might be forgotten, the Lord Chief Justice, when first examined, did not recollect that the trial had lasted more than one day; therefore it was easily to be imagined that Mr. Simpson and Mr. Roberts might have forgotten the circumstances; but on the part of the other parties it would remain impressed on their memory to the end of their days. The difference in the position of the parties was extremely great. The fact of Mr. and Mrs. Woodfine meeting Mr. Collier on the Monday morning, and making arrangements with him to come to the court when sent for, would in a great measure go to confirm their statements. The Lord Chief Justice, with the authority of his position, had given an opinion, in which, had he been a more humble person, he ventured to imagine he would have been checked. He stated that he thought there never was a case in which attorneys could be held to be less responsible. He much doubted whether any counsel would be bold enough to take upon himself the hazardous responsibility of not calling witnesses when imperatively desired to do so by the client. But Mr. Roberts, having stated that he never heard Collier's name, or Mason's name, of course could not have communicated to counsel the desire of the client; therefore counsel could not have had that information upon which alone they could exercise a proper discretion. The evidence of Mr. and Mrs. Thompson yesterday, as to what Mrs. Thompson had stated to Mr. Roberts, was a confirmation of the evidence given upon the point by the other parties. He now came to a part of the case which he thought would strengthen the evidence of the Woodfines, because, if the defendants' case was correct, there was no ground for an application for a new trial. The trial terminated on the 7th of July, and on the following day these defendants sent a telegraphic communication to the plaintiff—"Come up immediately, counsel say we can get a new trial;" and they wrote that very day to the plaintiff a letter in which they mentioned the names of Collier, Mason, and Shaw, as persons who must speak to the value of the property. He said there was a mistake of law and neglect of duty, and failure to communicate to counsel the information which was absolutely requisite in the conduct of the cause. His friend had amused himself by reading Mr. Woodfine's letters to Miss Smith; but he (Sir Frederick) must say, that, according to his recollection of his younger days, the letters were as wise as he had ever read; they were, in fact, according to his idea, rather too cold. It was said that Mr. Smith had made a statement of that which had been represented to him by Woodfine, and that that was a contract between them as to the amount of his property, and must conclude him for ever. Many men vapoured and boasted of their property. It was assumed that the damages must have been the same had witnesses been called; but what right had the defendants to speculate upon this? At all events, why had they not performed their duty by informing their counsel of the facts? If they had not done this they were guilty of the negligence imputed to them. He charged them with negligence in not inquiring as to the property of the plaintiff, with a mistake of the law, and with not having called witnesses after the desire of their client, and with not having given that information to counsel.

Mr. Justice WIGHTMAN then summed up. The charge made by the plaintiff was, that the defendants had conducted his defence in the prior action in an unskilful, careless, negligent, and improper manner, by reason whereof Miss Smith recovered a verdict against the now plaintiff for much larger damages than otherwise would have been given. It seemed that the plaintiff was unacquainted with the defendants up to the time of his applying to them. It was said, that, up to a comparatively late period of the case, the defendants were of opinion that Woodfine himself could be examined as a witness. Now, by law he could not, and, therefore, it was suggested, that, so far as the property was concerned, the defendants ought to have called, or instructed counsel to call, or told them the names of, certain witnesses, who could have shown that the property had been very much exaggerated by Mr. Smith. It seemed to him (the judge) that there was hardly any ground for charging negligence in not having discovered, down to a late period, that Woodfine could not be examined as a witness; but the mother was put down in the brief. But it was said that beyond that, the defendants ought to have entered into a statement of the property in detail for the information of counsel. It might be, that, in the first place, it was important in such an action to show the state and condition of the defendant in that action, but it could not be anticipated what evidence would be given on the part of the plaintiff. It seemed to him that down to the Saturday, at the end of the trial, there was nothing unusual in the conduct of those who managed the case. The evidence as to what had taken place on the Saturday afternoon and on the Monday morning was conflicting, and the jury must decide between the parties. But the learned counsel who had been in the case had been examined, and they had stated, that, in their opinion, it would have been very imprudent to call witnesses, and thereby to give a reply to the opposite counsel. The circumstances of the prior case had been introduced to show that there was nothing extraordinary in the jury giving the amount of £3,000. The learned judge then went through the whole of the case of the breach of promise of marriage, and of the evidence appertaining to it. The question for the jury was, whether the damages would have been less had the defendants conducted the case differently, and called witnesses, or had informed the counsel of the desire of the client that witnesses should be called.

The jury retired, and having been absent some time, they sent a note to the judge; upon which his Lordship conferred with the counsel on both sides, and the jury were sent for, and upon their coming into court, his Lordship told them, that, in consequence of their note, the parties had agreed to withdraw a juror.

VACATION BUSINESS AT JUDGES' CHAMBERS.

The following regulations for transacting the business at these chambers will be strictly observed till further notice:—

Acknowledgments of deeds will be taken at ten o'clock.

Original summonses to be placed on the file.

Summonses adjourned by the judge will be heard at half-past ten o'clock.

Summonses of the day will be called and numbered at a quarter before eleven o'clock, and heard consecutively.

The parties on two summonses only will be allowed to attend in the judge's room at the same time.

All long orders to be left, that they may be ready, on being applied for, the following day.

Counsel will be heard at a quarter to one o'clock. The name of the cause in which counsel are engaged to be put on the counsel file.

Affidavits in support of ex parte applications for judge's orders (except those for orders to hold to bail) to be left the day before the orders are to be applied for, except under special circumstances; such affidavits to be properly indorsed with the names of the parties, the nature of the application, and the names of the attorneys.

All affidavits produced before the judge to be properly indorsed and filed.

Queen's Bench Chambers, July 11.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.—At a meeting of the Council on Thursday last the following gentlemen were appointed Lecturers for the ensuing year:—

Mr. Richard Edward Turner..... Common Law.
Mr. Freeman Oliver Haynes..... Equity.
Mr. James P. Peachey ..... Conveyancing.

LAW AMENDMENT SOCIETY.—On Saturday evening the anniversary dinner of this society took place at Greenwich. The president of the society, Lord Brougham, took the chair; and there were also present the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Right Hon. W. Napier, M.P., Sir Erskine Perry, M.P., Colonel Sykes, M.P., Mr. Baron Bramwell, Mr. Dunlop, M.P., Mr. Collier, M.P., Mr. Craufurd, M.P., Chief Justice Draper (of Canada), the Vice-Principal of Brasenose College, &c. The usual loyal and patriotic toasts having been given, the noble president referred to the progress of the society during the past year, which he characterised as most satisfactory, not only with regard to the increased number of influential members that belonged to it, but also to the legal improvements it had effected. He paid a high compliment to the long-continued exertions of his learned friend Mr. Napier, towards the establishment of a regular department of justice, and noticed with true satisfaction the efforts which had been made by the East India Company to improve the constitution and working of their native courts—efforts from which he hoped and expected ere long to see great results. Mr. Napier had also done much towards establishing a system of compulsory examination for barristers, which he (Lord Brougham) was certainly in favour of as an almost necessary measure, and certainly one well calculated to raise the status of the profession. He sincerely hoped the benchers before long would give that question their most serious consideration. During the present session he expected that a great deal would be done in the way of legal improvement; and the measures for a reform in the law of marriage, and in the proceedings of the probate and ecclesiastical courts, were in a forward state, and stood a fair chance of being made law this year. A much-needed legal reform for simplifying the laws relating to the transfer of real property, he feared, would not be brought forward this year; and it was a disgrace to our code that the transference of an acre of land should still remain a process in which the greatest difficulties were encountered. He believed a Government Bill would shortly be brought in with a view of obviating those difficulties; but he (Lord Brougham) fancied he would have to do what he had done with regard to the Bill for the Improvement of the Patent Laws, when, after waiting some time for the Government measure, he was at last obliged to bring in a Bill on the subject himself, on the provisions of which two Bills respectively one very good Bill had ultimately been enacted. The next toast was, "the Bench of England," coupled with the name of Mr. Baron Bramwell, who had done so much to improve the common law procedure. In briefly returning thanks, the learned Baron said, he thought the lawyers of the present day were not of a philosophical turn of mind, and looked more to legal technicalities than to the general facts of the cases. The recent improvements in the common law procedure had been of the greatest benefit. Formerly a plaintiff, even in the recovery of a debt, had to go through eight different forms of procedure before he obtained judgment, and then, after all, he had to prove that he had proved his case in due and legal form. In conclusion, the learned Baron stated that he was very glad to hear that Sir Eardley Wilmot was about to publish the whole of the Bills and Acts which had been introduced to the House and become the law of the land through the exertions of their noble president. Lord Brougham added that he was very sorry to see, in the collection referred to, that there was an undue proportion of Bills compared with Acts; but he might also state, that he had requested the author to include in the volume the unsuccessful proposals of Sir Samuel Romilly to amend the laws, which were thought to be quite chimerical at the time when he brought them forward, but which since then had become the law of the land. The healths of "Chief Justice Draper and the Colonial Bench," "the Marquis of Clanricarde and the House of Lords," "Mr. Collier and the House of Commons," and other toasts followed, and the proceedings were brought to a close at an early hour.—Daily News.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—The next meeting will be held on July 13th, at 8 o'clock, when Mr. T. E. C. Leslie will read a Paper on "Statistics of the Bar, with Observations on the Competition in the Profession."

ABOLITION OF GRAND JURIES.—Mr. Justice Willes, in his address to the grand jury at Hertford, July 9, took occasion to make some observations in reference to the Bill at present before Parliament for the abolition of that body within the metropolitan district. He said it was his opinion that grand juries were most useful, and he hoped they would not be abolished. He was induced to make this observation from the fact of there being now before Parliament a Bill for rendering the summoning of grand juries unnecessary within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court. He, however, looked upon the grand jury as one of the best preservatives of liberty in troublous times, as standing between the Crown and the subject, and protecting the latter from persecution under colour of law; and it was not because we now lived in peaceful times that the necessity of grand juries might not again become apparent. He also could not help thinking that grand juries were of great use in directing the operations of the law in cases that came before the court, and that they were of the highest importance, as a body of gentlemen standing to see justice done to the prisoner on the one hand, while on the other they were of the greatest support to the judge in case an unfair attack was made upon him.

COURTS OF LAW COMMISSION.—The Royal Commissioners appointed to enquire and examine into the constitution of the Superior Courts of Law at Westminster, and into the existing arrangements of the Circuit Courts, have agreed to their report, which will be printed and ready to be submitted to Parliament before the close of the session. It is understood that the Commissioners will express their opinion, founded upon the evidence before them and their own experience, that no diminution of the number of judges can take place. Indeed, at this very time the several courts can scarcely make up a full court or get through the Nisi Prius sittings in time for the circuits. Several changes in the times and manner of holding the assizes will be recommended, as well as the division of the larger counties, and a more equal distribution of the circuits, with other matters of detail of a practical nature, so as to ensure a more speedy and uniform administration of justice, both civil and criminal.—Observer.

QUEEN'S COUNSEL.—Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Monck, and Mr. Maulsty, all of the Northern Circuit, have been promoted to the rank of Queen's Counsel.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER.—Henry Bliss, Esq., Q.C., the senior Queen's counsel attending the assizes at Lancaster and Liverpool, has been appointed Attorney-General of the County Palatine of Lancaster, in the place of C. J. Knowles, Esq., Q.C., resigned.

PRACTICE—ORAL EVIDENCE ON MOTION FOR DECREE.

Pellatt v. Nichols, 5 W. R. 724.

Some inconvenience is often felt from, what has been supposed to be, the necessity of proceeding by affidavit evidence on a motion for decree. If a party wants to obtain the testimony of an unwilling witness, this can only be done by serving him with a subpœna to appear before the examiner. The Orders by which the practice on motions for decree is regulated were evidently framed on the assumption that affidavits would be the only evidence employed. They direct the plaintiff to annex to his notice a list of his affidavits. They require the defendant to file his affidavits within a fortnight, and allow one week more for the plaintiff's affidavits in reply. These regulations are followed by an express prohibition, in the ordinary course, of any further evidence. It was not easy to see how these rules could be accommodated to a case in which oral evidence was to be given. The limitations as to time would certainly become impossible, and it would besides require a very liberal reading of the Orders to understand the word affidavits as including depositions of witnesses who may not have been examined at the time when the list of affidavits is required to be furnished. On the other hand, the Chancery Improvement Act contains an express enactment that a subpœna may be obtained in any proceeding; and this was some time since held (in the case of Wigan v. Rowland, 10 Hare, Ap. 18) to extend to a motion for decree. That case, however, throws no light on the mode by which the requirements of the Orders are to be got over when oral evidence is used. The inclination of the judges, as a general rule, to allow the parties the option, in all cases, of proceeding either by viva voce examination, or by affidavit, as may be most convenient, was strongly manifested by the Orders of January, 1855, which give perfect freedom in this respect when a cause comes to the hearing in the ordinary way. These Orders, however, do not refer in terms to a motion for decree, nor do they provide any substitute for the regulations originally framed which are incapable of being literally followed when witnesses are examined orally. This difficulty arose in the case of Pellatt v. Nichols, on the suggestion of the Court that a motion for injunction should, by consent, be turned into a motion for decree. The plaintiffs objected, on the ground that they would then be precluded from obtaining the evidence of the defendant, whom they wished to examine; but the Master of the Rolls expressed a strong opinion that this was not an insurmountable difficulty, and that the Orders might be sufficiently complied with by serving a list of witnesses intended to be called, together with the list of affidavits. The ultimate arrangement was, that an order to this effect was made by consent, with liberty to apply, it being understood that a reasonable time for the examination of witnesses was to be allowed under the dispensing power reserved by the orders, which fix the short limits of a fortnight and a week respectively. The intimation of the Master of the Rolls seems to amount to a dictum that a similar course may be pursued by a plaintiff in an ordinary case without the authority of any preliminary order; but it may perhaps be found difficult to work out this idea in practice; and it must be remembered that Pellatt v. Nichols, though strongly pointing in that direction, was a decree by consent, and is, therefore, not to be regarded as an actual decision on the question.

AGREEMENTS BY PROMOTERS OF A PUBLIC COMPANY—HOW FAR BINDING ON THE COMPANY.

Williams v. St. George's Harbour Railway Co. 5 W. R. 725.

In the early days of railway decisions, Lord Cottenham laid down and acted on a maxim, that the agreements entered into by the promoters of a Bill for the incorporation of an inchoate company were binding on the company when formed, provided that the stipulations were not beyond the powers given to the company by their Act. Where the contract made during the incubation of the company was such as the company itself might afterwards have made, Lord Cottenham's view was, that, even if the contract did not become the actual contract of the company in the view which a court of law would take, still it was inequitable for the corporation to repudiate it, and equity would not suffer it to take this course. In Edwards v. Grand Junction Railway Company (1 My. & Cr. 650) an injunction was granted to prevent the company from making a road in a manner inconsistent with a preliminary agreement by the promoters. In Stanley v. Chester and Birkenhead Railway Company (3 My. & Cr. 778), a demurrer to a bill seeking specific performance of a contract by promoters to pay £20,000 for certain land was overruled by the same judge. And these cases were followed by Lord Petre v. Eastern Counties Railway Company (1 Railway Cases, 462), where an injunction was granted on a bill for specific performance of a contract by the projectors to pay the enormous sum of £120,000 nominally as compensation for the damage threatened to Lord Petre's park. These cases were substantially overruled by the House of Lords in the recent case of Caledonian Railway Company v. Helensburgh Harbour Trustees (4 W. R. 671), where the rule was distinctly asserted by Lord Cranworth, with the assent of Lord Brougham, to be, that the contracts of projectors do not bind the company when formed, unless the terms are embodied in the Act of Incorporation, so as to give notice to all persons who may take shares in the company. As the law now stands, therefore, it is necessary, in order to bind the company, to show that they have adopted the contract, either by an express agreement under the corporate seal, or at least by taking the benefit of it, and so estopping themselves from refusing to perform it. This doctrine had, indeed, been propounded by the Master of the Rolls in Gooday v. Colchester Railway Company (17 Beav. 132), before the decision in the House of Lords, and must now be considered as settled law. The question which remains is, what acts, if any, short of affixing the seal of the company to the contract, will amount to such an adoption. In the case which we have placed at the head of this notice, the fact that the company afterwards submitted to pay part of the sum stipulated for in their promoter's agreement, so as to relieve him from personal liability to that extent, was held not to amount to an adoption binding the company to the whole contract.

SETTLED ESTATES ACT.

Re Foster's Estate, 5 W. R. 726.

The Lords Justices have settled the controversy as to the time of taking the consent of married women under this Act. It is to be after the presentation, and before the hearing of the petition; and it was also intimated that it ought properly to be before the expense of advertisements is incurred, though this is not essential as a compliance with the statute.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACT, 1854—INTERROGATORIES—PRACTICE AS TO.

Moor v. Roberts, 5 W. R., C. P., 693.

This was a case in which the nature of the interrogatories which will be allowed under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, was again discussed. The provisions of that Act upon this subject, in reference to the particular point raised by the above case, have previously come under the consideration of the Court of Exchequer in Flitcroft v. Fletcher (11 Exch. 543), and of the Queen's Bench in Edwards v. Wakefield (6 Ell. & Bl. 462).* The point in question was, to what extent questions of a fishing character will be authorised—those, namely, the object of which is to enable the party applying to interrogate to find out the position of the opposite party. In the present case, the action was brought against the defendants upon their engagement to see to the repayment of the full sum lent to a certain mortgagor, in the event of the premises mortgaged, on being sold under the power for that purpose contained in the mortgage, proving to be insufficient; and the defendants desired to put certain questions (among others) to the plaintiff, as to whether he was in truth the lender of the money advanced, or a trustee only for another person; as to whether the guarantee on which the defendants were sued was not merely temporary, and not in force when the action was brought; and as to whether the premises mortgaged had, in fact, been sold, so as to disclose any insufficiency—such questions being, in effect, pointed to in the several allegations of the declaration, all of which were traversed by the defendants in their pleas. A rule was obtained to set aside the order of Mr. Justice Crowder, who had disallowed these interrogatories; but it was now discharged with costs, after argument. "For," said Cockburn, C. J., "the intention of the Act was to supersede the necessity of applying to a court of equity in order to obtain a discovery"—that is, to enable a court of law to assist a party, the materials of whose case are in the hands of his adversary. "But it was not intended to apply to a case where a party is desirous of discovering how the other party intends to shape his case, or to find out some defect in it."

It is to be observed, that the Court of Exchequer, in Flitcroft v. Fletcher, came to a decision which seems inconsistent with the criterion adopted by the other two courts. For it was held, in that case, that a defendant in an action of ejectment is entitled to interrogate the plaintiff as to the character in which he sues, and the nature of the pedigree on which he relies. But that case was not much argued, and the Court appears to have been influenced by what they considered to be the doctrine of the Court of Chancery as to discovery, rather than the construction of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854.

JOINT-STOCK COMPANY UNDER 7 & 8 VICT. C. 110—ACTION ON CONTRACT SIGNED BY DIRECTORS.

Charles v. The National Guardian Assurance Society, 5 W. R., Q. B., 694.

The defendants in this case were a joint-stock insurance company registered under 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110; and a policy effected with them by the plaintiff on the life of a debtor having become a claim, the company first tried to establish a fraudulent misrepresentation by the plaintiff as to the life assured, and that he had not a proper interest therein (as to both of which they failed at the trial), and then tried to upset the verdict he had obtained on the ground of the policy being void, because—though signed by three directors, and though the premiums thereon had been regularly paid and accepted—it did not bear the seal of the company. It was, however, held by the Court, on the authority of Smith v. The Hull Glass Company (8 C. B. 668), that, in a company established under the statute in question, the directors may bind the shareholders in matters relating to the business carried on by the company unless their deed of settlement restrains them from so doing; and that, in an action brought against the company on a contract so entered into by the directors on its behalf, it lies on the defendants to show that the deed of settlement does in fact contain such restrictive clause; and that it is not incumbent on the plaintiffs to show that it did not. In the present case, therefore, inasmuch as the deed of settlement had not been produced at the trial by either side, the plaintiffs (who had made out a primâ facie case) were entitled to retain their verdict.

It may be observed that it results from the case of Ridley v. Plymouth Grinding Company (2 Exch. 711), which was much relied on by the defendants, that, if the contract sued on be one unconnected with the business of the company, then (though the company may still be bound by the acts of the directors not under seal) it is essential for the plaintiff to prove in some way that the directors were authorised to bind the shareholders. In other words, where the contract sued on was in the course of business, the law throws the burthen of proof on the defendants; where it was not in such course, then it lies on the plaintiffs.

NEW TRIAL ON THE GROUND OF EXCESSIVE DAMAGES AND SURPRISE.

Smith v. Woodfine, 1 C. B., N. S., 660.

In this case, tried before Willes, J., the defendant was sued for breach of a promise of marriage, and the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff with £3,000 damages. A rule nisi for a new trial was obtained on the ground of quasi surprise and excessive damages. And the motion was founded principally on the affidavit of the defendant, who swore that the statements made at the trial as to the amount of his property by the plaintiff's father were quite erroneous, and that he was taken by surprise at them. In showing cause against the rule, it was urged that the Court would not interfere with the amount of damages given by the jury in such cases as these, unless it was shown that they had been misled by false evidence, or had acted under the influence of undue motives, or from misconception or mistake (see Gough v. Farr, 1 Y. & J. 477); and that the affidavit mainly relied on to establish this was that of the defendant himself, which was not admissible, inasmuch as, by the effect of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 4, he could not be called as a witness in his own defence. The Court discharged the rule chiefly because there was no ground for saying the defendant had been surprised by the evidence as to his circumstances which had been given by the plaintiff's father; for it was his own fault that the facts before the jury remained unanswered. His mother was in court, and she might have been called to explain the real state of the case. Mr. Justice Willes, in his judgment, after carefully going through the cases turning upon the question before the Court, added, "The amount of damages, it is true, is large; and I have remarked, that considerably larger damages are usually given by special juries of the city of London in these cases than are given by those of any other place. It may be because they are accustomed to deal in large amounts themselves, and so are led to estimate wounded feelings higher than other juries do."

It will be observed that the defendant in this case, being defeated in the above application, resolved to bring an action against his attorneys for negligence in not calling witnesses to rebut the evidence of the plaintiff's father. The result of his manœuvre will be found in the report of the case of Woodfine v. Simpson & Others, which we have noticed elsewhere.

INFLUENCE OF POLITICS ON LAW—THE ONLY REMEDY.

The fact is so well known as hardly to require statement, that in Ireland most legal appointments, as well as others, proceed from political motives, and take place for political objects; and this so commonly occurs, that, when in some rare instances other than political considerations prevail, no credit is given in the public mind for the deviation from what has unfortunately become a recognised practice. An illustration of our meaning is found in the circumstances attending the recent appointment of a revising barrister for Dublin, as to which a good deal of angry discussion has taken place, and which is not so clearly explained as the importance of the subject demands. What occurred was simply this:—The revising barristers, who have for some years performed the duty of revising the lists of voters, were some days since suddenly and unceremoniously superseded, and a gentleman of opposite political views was forthwith substituted for them. The "opposition" journals immediately criticised this unexpected change—declared that it was illegal—maintained the right of the ejected functionaries to hold office during their good behaviour, and boldly denounced this step as an attempt to turn the minority at the last parliamentary election into a majority at the next, under the willing manipulation of the lists of voters by a nominee of the Government. This is, however, but one side of the case: the other side presents a very different aspect. It is replied, that, under an old Act of Parliament, the revising barristers sit merely as deputies of the chairman of the county; and that, on the death of the late chairman, his deputies, the aforesaid barristers, became functi officio, and a new appointment by the present chairman was a matter of course. Now, inasmuch as by subsequent statutes the revising barristers have been recognised as distinct officers, rather than as mere deputies of a higher officer, the legality, as well as the propriety, of the recent change seems to be open to doubt; and it must be admitted, that, where a reasonable doubt existed as to the validity of the dismissal of individuals undeniably competent for the duty, the proceeding in question was a harsh and unjustifiable one. To take the lowest ground, everything in the nature of a judicial appointment should be free from all suspicion of improper motives; and the time chosen in this instance was one which could not fail, in the present state of party feeling, to create dissatisfaction in the minds of one-half of the legal and general public of Ireland.

But to proceed from a particular case to general considerations. Every person conversant with the state of affairs here knows, that, in the majority of instances, professional rank is given as the reward of political services, and not as a tribute to professional merit. Several of the judges had, previous to their elevation to the Bench, earned little reputation beyond that of good debaters in Parliament; while, on the other hand, some of the most eminent lawyers are working at the bar, without any prospect of promotion—for, being non-political, they have excluded themselves from the only avenue to the judicial bench. The natural consequence of this state of things is, that the grand object of ambition with a rising lawyer is to obtain a seat in Parliament as soon as possible. That, he knows, leads more surely to the great prizes of his profession, than does any conceivable amount of legal ability, or any extent of practice. The public astonishment was great when the present Solicitor-General (Christian)—long the first equity lawyer in Ireland, but no politician—received promotion; and for making so worthy an appointment great credit ought to be given where it is due; but this rare exception does but prove the existence of the rule we deprecate. Not to the Bench and the chief law offices is this reprehensible practice confined; it extends to nearly all the subordinate ranks in the profession. Crown prosecutorships, Crown solicitorships, and similar offices, are, in very many instances, disposed of with political views, and to partisans of the governing powers for the time being. How far this unwholesome practice is connected with the existence of the Vice-Regal Institution, we will not now stop to inquire; suffice it to say that the number of those is daily increasing who believe in no available remedy but one—the abolition of a "court," where the contending factions alternately reign supreme, and where, consequently, every act of the Government is open to the suspicion of being performed for some partisan object.

Since the above was written, the question so important to Ireland—how long this mode of Government is to continue—has been considered in the House of Commons; and a considerable majority has declared against any change for the present. We cannot, however, accept the result of the division on Mr. Roebuck's motion of yesterday as a well-considered or a final adjudication. At this advanced period of the parliamentary session, it could not be expected that to such a subject any adequate degree of consideration could be given; nor is it one which should be left to a private member of the Legislature. The Government are bound to give their earnest attention to the wide difference between the judicial and administrative systems of Ireland and England, and to trace the causes of the difference. We have little doubt that those causes will be found to be connected with the want of a responsible central government for the whole of the British isles. The opposition that would be offered here to any plan for centralising the government is considerably less than it would have been even a few years since. That opposition would now proceed less from any objection to the plan on its merits than from a vague fear lest the centralising system should also be made to extend to the courts of law and equity. The real fact, however, is, that the tendency of the present age is to localise justice while it centralises government; witness the county courts, and their superadded jurisdiction in insolvency, and in charitable trusts. Many other instances might be adduced to prove that the centralisation of courts of justice was never less likely to be proposed or effected than at the present day. But while sound policy dictates that justice should be readily attainable in every part of the empire, it dictates not less clearly that the whole empire should (unless, indeed, physical obstacles prevent) be under one firm and consistent central administration; for such only can be free from the pernicious influence of sects and parties, and yet amenable to the beneficial action of public opinion.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)

The absorbing interest felt by every one in the melancholy trial which has occupied the Court for so many days recently, has left no room for the discussion of any other subject of legal interest; and, accordingly, the last fortnight presents, in this respect, a total blank. But it would be unfortunate if such a case as Miss Smith's, which, from the whole of the circumstances surrounding it, must have been subjected to the most minute scrutiny of nearly every English lawyer, should not provoke much criticism upon the practice of Scotch criminal lawyers, especially with reference to their application of the rules of evidence. Upon this point there are differences in the laws of the two countries—and a discussion of the principles upon which these rules are based, when the views of parties can be illustrated by a reference to facts perfectly well known to all, would excite a public, as well as a mere legal, interest. But, to be useful, such a discussion must be conducted upon proper principles, and THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL must possess capabilities for eliciting information on a subject so important, which no mere newspaper can have. No doubt we may expect to find the daily journals flooded with letters directed to particular points which may strike the writers as defective—and even barbarous—in the conduct of this case. But lawyers are proverbially jealous—and it is well that they are so—of all one-sided statements; and the consequence is, that all such communications, though they may really raise points of great interest, produce absolutely no effect. If, however, some English lawyer would undertake to furnish a criticism on the whole case, and an arrangement were made with some Scotch lawyer to answer it, the communications would be read with very different interest, and would call forth observations from other lawyers in both countries, which would enlarge the discussion, and if they did not produce any change of opinion, would, at all events, lead to a more accurate knowledge of the principles of criminal law and evidence as applied in the two countries, than exists at present. There can be no doubt that there are many men whose opinions would be valuable, who would gladly put their views upon such a case as Miss Smith's in writing for the purpose of eliciting information, but who are deterred by the knowledge that it is useless labour to write even to the Times.

The time has not yet come for making any remarks upon the evidence or the conduct of the prosecution on the part of the Crown in Miss Smith's case, but there can be no impropriety in making an observation which is applicable to the whole system of criminal prosecution in Scotland, and which has received strong confirmation in the course of that unhappy trial—viz. that a system which vests so much authority in the law officers of the Crown, and is worked out so little in the face of the public till the actual day of trial arrives, as that of Scotland, requires the most anxious supervision on the part of those officers who are responsible to Parliament. There seems to be a natural tendency on the part of all inferior officers of the law to exceed their powers, and to use unfair means to obtain convictions. That this state of matters exists in Scotland cannot be denied: and, without referring to Miss Smith's case, a case which occurred in the High Court of Justiciary a short time ago—viz. that of Mahler and Erenhard—may be mentioned in support of this statement. In this case, which was one of robbery of watches and jewellery, it appears that a dealer of the name of Prince was a creditor of the man from whom the watches and other articles of jewellery had been stolen, and was therefore anxious to recover the property; that, upon the apprehension of Mahler and Erenhard for the robbery, and before the judicial declarations of the prisoners were taken, he went with a deputy-lieutenant of police to the prison, and, in his presence, offered Mahler a free pardon and thirty pounds, on condition of the stolen goods being recovered, if he would make a confession.

He accordingly did so, and afterwards made a judicial declaration in similar terms. At the trial, the Advocate-Depute, who is the prosecutor, in the name of the Lord Advocate, sought to use both the confession and the declaration. These were objected to. The Advocate-Depute replied that neither Prince nor the deputy-lieutenant of police were authorised to act as they had done; that such an act was not within the authority of the deputy-lieutenant of police; and that the prosecutor could not be precluded from using the evidence either of Prince or Mahler, who, so far as he was concerned, were in every sense third parties. An attempt was made, on the part of the defence, to show that the deputy-lieutenant of police was also authorised to act as Deputy-Procurator Fiscal, which would have connected him directly with the prosecutor, the Lord Advocate, as all the Advocates-Depute and Procurators Fiscal act directly under his authority; but this failed. The Court, however, held that the deputy-lieutenant of police, as such, was in such a position as to lead Mahler to suppose that Prince was acting with the sanction of proper legal authority, and that the confession could not be received. They further held, that the judicial declaration might have been given under the influence of the confession, and could not be read either. The question was started, but not decided, whether a confession made in presence of a constable would be equally vitiated in similar circumstances. This was also a Glasgow case, and sufficiently shows that there is much looseness of practice among the criminal officials.

The Lord Advocate's Bill for the regulation of the Court of Session business has been received, and has given rise to great difference of opinion. The writers to the signet as a body seem to be quite resolved to oppose, as far as they can, any change which will deprive litigants of the power of selecting their court. There are a good many dissentients, however, who think that the business should be equally distributed between the two divisions of the Court. This dissent is indicative of a gradual change of opinion; for the feeling in favour of preserving the right of election was unanimous a few years ago, and even yet the dissenters cannot be said to number more than one to four. The bar, almost without exception, supports the Lord Advocate; and the opinions of the other branches of the profession, however expressed, are not therefore likely to carry much weight. By the Bill, it is proposed to give the Lord Justice General the power of distributing the business, when it may be found accumulating in any division; but although the Act makes some provision for the proper exercise of this power, it is a very general opinion that the head of the Court will be called on to exercise what he may sometimes feel to be a very invidious and disagreeable duty. Many think that the business should be distributed in the Signet Office by rotation—that is, in the exact order in which the summonses, which are always the first writs in an action, are presented, for the purpose of being impressed with the signet. A similar arrangement might be made in reference to those processes which originate in petitions, to have them marked by the clerk to whom they are presented; or the whole might be marked in the Fee Fund Office.

TRANSFER OF REAL PROPERTY.

Lord BROUGHAM called attention to the ruinous expense imposed by the law on the transfer of real property, and said that nothing could be worse than the present state of the law on this subject. Land, instead of being as easily transferable as bank-stock, was, owing to the principle and practice of our law, the most difficult article of transfer. He therefore rejoiced to hear that the Commission had recommended the introduction of two most important measures on this subject, and he should be glad to learn that these measures were in a state of forwardness.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he had prepared a measure which he believed would be found in harmony with the recommendations of the Commissioners, and that Bill he hoped soon to be able to lay upon the table. This Bill proposed to substitute a more simple form for the present complicated system of mortgages and judgments, and to allow a declaration to be made of any charge given to any person upon any particular property, and instead of there being contained in the same instrument powers of sale, of appointing receivers, &c., as at present, he proposed that a mere charge upon land should contain all the provisions which were now to be found in mortgage deeds. He also proposed that the Court of Common Pleas should establish a register of mortgages, so that any one about to purchase or lend money upon land might ascertain exactly the charges which were upon it. He feared that the varied nature of our settlements, and the various uses to which land was applied in this country, rendered it chimerical to expect that the transfer of land could ever be made as easy as the transfer of bank-stock, but he thought, nevertheless, that great improvement might be effected, and, during the ensuing recess, the subject should receive his fullest attention.

Lord CAMPBELL had hoped that he might have gone down to posterity as the author of a General Registration Act, but that honour was denied him. He rejoiced to find, however, that the subject was again taken up, and he should certainly give it his most earnest support.

CONVEYANCE OF REAL ESTATES.

Lord BROUGHAM introduced a Bill, the object of which, he said, was to amend the law relating to the conveyance of real estates, and to establish a convenient registration in the case of such conveyances. The Bill, he added, would provide an easy and expeditious mode of transfer of lands, instead of the difficult and expensive system which now prevailed.

The Bill was read a first time.

Monday, July 6.

PROBATE AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

The House went into Committee on the Bill.

Upon clause 2, Mr. COLLIER moved certain amendments, the effect of which would be to give all the contentious business to the superior courts of common law. The business of the ecclesiastical courts was of two kinds—the common form and the contentious. The common form business consisted of proof of wills with respect to which there was no dispute, and might more properly be disposed of by a registrar than by a judge. The contentious business included all the cases in which wills were disputed. This Bill did not give the determination of those questions to the new court, but provided that the new court should send them to the superior courts of common law. To the question, what, then, would the new judge have to do, the Lord Chancellor had supplied the answer, next to nothing. He proposed that the whole of the contentious business should be transferred to the courts of common law, and that the non-contentious business should be done by a registrar under the direction of those courts. He would give the courts of common law powers to make orders, to frame issues, to cite parties, and to make persons parties to an issue, so that all questions in dispute might be settled. There seemed to him to be only two objections—that the superior courts of common law had not time to exercise this jurisdiction, and that they were not competent to do it. As to the first, the county courts had greatly relieved the common law courts of business; and, owing to the Common Law Procedure Act, the number of rules granted by the superior courts in the course of a year, from being upwards of 30,000 had become less than 3,000. Under these circumstances, it seemed difficult to contend that the courts of common law had not time to do the business which he proposed to transfer to them. The next question was, were they competent to it? Several of the common law judges had from time to time been members of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, which sat as a court of appeal from the ecclesiastical courts, and he had never heard it alleged that those judges were incompetent to perform that portion of their duties. It seemed to him that there were only two alternatives before the committee. They must either have no new court at all, or have an efficient one. The Bill proposed to establish an inefficient court. He would therefore submit his amendment transferring the business to the courts of common law; and if not successful in effecting that object, he would then endeavour to make the new court as efficient as possible.

Mr. ATHERTON hoped that Mr. Collier would not proceed with his amendments; and thought that he underrated the amount of business which would be transacted by the new tribunal. An additional amount of business might be thrown upon the new judge by intrusting to him the duty of hearing and disposing of motions for new trials. The Bill was not the best that could be desired, but it was a great improvement upon the existing law, and as such he would give it his support.

Sir F. KELLY said, that that part of the Bill which would give to the proposed court jurisdiction over real as well as personal estate with regard to the proving of wills was a great improvement, and would go far to remedy the grievance of which Mr. Collier had complained, because it would certainly prevent the judge from having scarcely any business to transact. If the judge of the new court were competent—and no doubt he would be—there was no reason why he should be a mere minister in the office held by him, and should send issues to be tried by other courts; he ought to be enabled to try cases in the same way as other judges in Westminster-hall. The result would then be, that, while the common form business was left in other hands, the contentious business, with the exception of that portion of it intrusted to the county courts, would be tried by the new tribunal in London, which would decide on all questions of law and of fact, with the aid of other judges who might be called upon to render assistance. With the single exception of issues to be tried at the assizes, which he would have the same right to direct as the Vice-Chancellors, the new judge would have jurisdiction to determine all causes relating to wills in his own court. It had been observed that the new tribunal would have too little to do until the Admiralty was united with the testamentary jurisdiction. He had already suggested—and he doubted not that the suggestion would be adopted by the Government—the introduction of a clause enabling the judge of this court, in case her Majesty required his services, to sit as a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If, therefore, it should happen—though he apprehended no such thing—that at certain periods of the year the judge should have too little to do, he would then be enabled to render assistance in the administration of justice upon the Judicial Committee, which sat, he believed, for some fifty or sixty days in the year, and would then have ample occupation.

Mr. MALINS opposed the amendment. He reminded the committee that the Chancery Commissioners stated in their report that the probate of wills and granting administration were not mere subjects of registration—that they often involved delicate points, the neglect of which would be very prejudicial to the public interest; and they refused to recommend the transfer of this business to the Court of Chancery or to any court generally occupied by other matters, believing that it should be transacted by no court in which testamentary jurisdiction was not the primary occupation of the judge. They were further of opinion that the machinery of the courts of common law was not adapted to the transaction of the testamentary business. Sir F. Kelly had suggested that there would be a great increase of business in consequence of the court having jurisdiction over wills of real estate, which the Court of Probate had not hitherto had to deal with. In an experience of twenty years, he did not remember more than five instances in which a will affected the real estate only. One will usually disposed of both personal and real property, and then it was necessary to be proved. The additional business brought to the court, therefore, in consequence of giving it jurisdiction over real estate, would not be appreciable. There seemed to be an idea that the new judge would not be fully occupied; but when it was considered that he would have to preside over the whole of the testamentary business of the country, he thought his time would be sufficiently occupied. He did not anticipate that any additional expense would arise from the appointment of a new judge, inasmuch as the present judge of the Prerogative Court would be the first judge of the new court.

Mr. BOWYER entirely approved of the amendment. Its principle was to get rid of a most unscientific distinction of jurisdiction. There was no reason why they should have a separate court for wills any more than for leases or for mortgages. If a will was not disputed, why should it not be treated as a deed that was not disputed? At present, if a real estate of £10,000 a year was left to him, he took possession of it at once; but if he got a legacy of £10, he could not get it without obtaining probate from the Ecclesiastical Court.

Mr. WHITESIDE would wish to know from the Attorney-General why, if a man in the North of England was to be allowed to prove a will of £1,500 on the spot in a cheap way, he should not do the same if it was for £15,000?

Mr. AYRTON believed the Bill was founded on the soundest principle of law reform, that the entire business of wills and letters of administration should be intrusted to a single judge, who would discharge the whole duty.

Mr. DUNLOP said, a system similar to that recommended by Mr. Collier had been in use for the last thirty years in Scotland, and it had been found to work admirably.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the Wills Act was not in force in Scotland. In that country any document, of the most informal kind, would at once be admitted; so that there was not that amount of care required in dealing with wills as in England. A vast proportion of the 25,000 wills which were annually proved needed the personal inspection of the judge to satisfy him that the requirements of the Statute of Wills had been complied with. Now, that was a very onerous duty; for if the wrong document was admitted to probate, and the wrong executor converted to his own use stock standing in the public funds, or in a public company, in the name of the deceased, the executor appointed by the will which ought to have been admitted to probate in the first instance, might go to the Bank, or to the public company, and insist on the money being paid a second time. The duty of granting probates could not be confided, with any chance of its being duly performed, except to a person of practical experience and skill. If they threw the work upon the common law judges, they could only take it at chambers, and the result would be the most conflicting and distracting discrepancies in practice. Besides, he had just received a communication from the Lord Chief Justice, stating that it was utterly impossible for them to undertake either the common form or the contentious business. In a few days the report of the Commissioners who had been appointed to inquire into the constitution of the common law courts would be published, and it would be found to contain a statement to the same effect. He would remind hon. members, too, that it was intended for the judge of the Probate Court to be likewise the judge ordinary of the court which would have to deal with marriage and divorce; and he entirely agreed that this judge should have power to try issues himself when that could be conveniently done. So far, then, from having nothing to do, his apprehension was rather that the judge would not find his time adequate to the discharge of his duties, and that he would not be able to try any considerable number of issues. Still, whenever it could be conveniently done, it would be open for him to take cases instead of sending them before the ordinary common law tribunals.

Mr. COLLIER said, that, after this statement, he would not press his amendments; which were accordingly withdrawn, and the clause was agreed to.

On clause 5, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL proposed to strike out the proviso contained in the last three lines, because that would seem to make it imperative on the judge of the Prerogative Court to be the first judge of the Court of Probate.

Sir F. KELLY concurred in this amendment; and the proviso was struck out.

On clause 6, Mr. ADAMS, instead of uniting the Admiralty Court with the Court of Probate, thought it would be far better to send Admiralty cases before the common law courts, with juries of nautical men, than that the Judge of the Probate Court should, as the Attorney-General had remarked, be overworked, and not have time to try the issues that might arise. He objected to the limitation of the provincial probates to cases where the property did not exceed £1,500.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL had satisfied himself that there were reasons why it would be better that Admiralty cases should be confided to a single judge. The clause before the committee simply provided for a future contingency, upon which a Bill would have, at some future period, to be brought in.

Sir F. KELLY approved of the clause. No doubt many questions came before the common law courts which came before the Court of Admiralty also; but the latter court had a jurisdiction in rem which the former did not possess. This jurisdiction was of the utmost utility where one of the parties, as frequently happened in collision cases, was a foreigner, residing out of the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts. He trusted, therefore, that this jurisdiction in Admiralty cases would be carefully preserved.

The clause was then agreed to.

Upon clause 10, Sir E. PERRY moved to leave out all after "established," and insert "District courts to be presided over by the county court judge in all county court districts except those of the metropolis (Nos. 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 47, and 48), and a public registry shall be attached to each court, the registrar whereof shall be under the control of the Court of Probate." His object was to associate the registrar with the judge of the county court. In Devonshire, probate could be obtained at ten different places; under the Bill, there would be but two places where that facility would be afforded. Now, the effect of his amendment would be to attach an ecclesiastical registrar to each county court. This proposal would lead to the appointment of fifty-one registrars instead of forty-one. There would accrue from such a proposition a benefit to the public, inasmuch as at a future time the registrarships could be held by the county court registrars.

Mr. ATHERTON supported the amendment, considering it to be most desirable, that, in small properties, the greatest possible facilities should be placed in the way of those having to administer estates.

Mr. COLLIER thought it was contrary to principle that the contentious jurisdiction should be marshalled according to the county court districts, while the non-contentious jurisdiction was to be dealt with by the diocesan districts. The diocesan divisions were antiquated and inconvenient, while those of the county courts had recently been settled by a commission which had carefully inquired into the whole matter, and were therefore most likely to meet the requirements and the state of population at the present day.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL was sorry that he could not listen to Sir E. Perry's amendment. The honourable member talked of convenience. People in the rural districts would find it most to their convenience to go to those places to which they had been in the habit of going in order to prove wills. Accordingly, the districts had been so arranged as to preserve the office of the registrar wherever it now existed, and by that means he hoped not only to keep the business in the channels in which it had hitherto been accustomed to flow, but to prevent the necessity of awarding compensation in a large number of cases which would otherwise have to be submitted to the consideration of the House. The hon. member proposed to undo all existing arrangements, and then to impose upon people the necessity of travelling about after the county court judge—for that functionary visited different towns in succession—in order to transact the common-form business of proving a will. And the person to transact that common-form business was to be a registrar of that county court. The Bill proposed to place experienced gentlemen in the position of registrars, and to give them the means of communication with the judge of the Court of Probate in London, and thus it was hoped that due security would be taken for the proper fulfilment of the important duties intrusted to them.

The amendment was withdrawn, and the clause then agreed to.

On clause 15, Mr. MALINS proposed that the fees of diocesan and district officers should be paid by fixed salaries.

Mr ROEBUCK supported the amendment.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL objected. It would be impossible at present properly to apportion the salaries. The amount varied much in different districts; and if the officers were paid by salaries, some would have too much and some too little.

Mr. HENLEY thought that Government had taken the wisest course in adhering to the fees. When the Act had worked for a few years they might be able to fix on a proper scale of salaries.

Mr. ROEBUCK wished to know on what scale the fees were to be regulated.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that the mode of regulating the fees would be twofold. In the first place, they would be regulated by the amount of the stamp, which was sometimes so small as sevenpence, and next according to the length of the document. In some cases the probate might contain only a few words, and in others it might extend to several sheets: the fee would be in proportion.

Mr. BRISCOE opposed the amendment; which was put and negatived, and the clause was agreed to.

Mr. WESTHEAD inquired whether the clerical surrogates would, under the Bill, continue to perform the duties which now devolved upon them of swearing affidavits, &c.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL could not say that it might not be necessary, in framing the rules and orders, to alter in some way the duties which were now performed by the surrogates. But he could say, that, with regard to the surrogates, and the clerical surrogates more especially, it was intended to secure to them the full measure of remunerative employment they now enjoyed.

The clause was then agreed to.

In clause 26, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL introduced several verbal amendments, for the purpose of enacting, that, if any case should arise not provided for by the new rules established under the Bill, the mode of procedure should be in accordance with the present practice—which were agreed to.

Clause 27 was withdrawn, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL stating that he proposed to substitute a new clause in lieu of it.

Clauses 32 and 33 were postponed.

On clause 34, Mr. MALINS objected to the transferring of the appeal from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to the House of Lords, which was a most dilatory and expensive tribunal. He therefore proposed to substitute the Judicial Committee for the House of Lords.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that he admitted the great value of the Judicial Committee; but, if this amendment were carried, there would be two co-ordinate courts of appeal; for questions might arise in the common law courts either the same or of a cognate character with questions which arose before the Court of Probate. Then, the questions arising in the common law courts would be carried to the House of Lords, while those in the Court of Probate would, if the amendment were agreed to, be carried to the Judicial Committee, which would be a great inconvenience. With regard to the House of Lords, he hoped that before long there would be an improved and general court of appeal for the whole kingdom. He was afraid, too, that if the amendment were carried, it would bring the House into collision with the House of Lords, and might, therefore, endanger the success of the Bill.

Mr. CAIRNS deprecated the selection of the worst of the two tribunals as the court of appeal.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that no doubt the appeal now lay from the Ecclesiastical Court to the Judicial Committee, but at present the Ecclesiastical Court dealt only with personalty, and in a peculiar manner, analogous with the procedure of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. By the Bill, however, that form of procedure would be abolished, and the Court of Probate would now be empowered to try issues of fact before a jury. All the incidents attendant upon the trial of issues on matters of fact in a common law court would arise in the Court of Probate, and in that state of things it must be apparent that the House of Lords would have an advantage over the Judicial Committee as a Court of Appeal, because they could summon the common law judges to their assistance, which the Judicial Committee could not do.

Mr. COLLIER said that the question was simply this:—They had decided, in point of fact, upon the appointment of a sixteenth common law judge; should the appeal from fifteen of them be to the House of Lords, and from the sixteenth to the Judicial Committee? He apprehended that that would be an anomaly which the committee would not sanction.

Mr. MALINS did not think there was any great force in the argument about real property, as the only question which the Court of Probate had to decide was, whether there was a will or no will; and the forms to be complied with were the same whether real or personal property was concerned. He denied that the judge of the new Court of Probate was a common law judge; therefore that argument entirely fell to the ground.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that nothing could be more unconstitutional in theory, or impossible in practice, than to refer these cases to the Judicial Committee. To constitute that tribunal, they were obliged to shut up one or two of the law courts by taking away the judges. The Judicial Committee had not the power of hearing a single appeal from Westminster Hall or any of the law courts; how, then, could they give it the power of hearing appeals from a new law court? If this jurisdiction were given it, they must give it other appellate jurisdiction, and must re-constitute it altogether.

The committee then divided—For the amendment, 27; against, 271: majority, 244.

The clause was then agreed to.

On clause 40, Mr. WESTHEAD moved, as an amendment, to insert the words "and that such probate or letters of administration shall cover all personalty, wherever situate." The object of the amendment, he said, was to enable parties to prove wills, or take out letters of administration, in the district court, though the value of the property might be above £1,500. He could not conceive why, when a man had property above £1,500, there should not be the opportunity of proving it in the district court.

Mr. ROEBUCK did not think there should be any limit at all. The tendency of modern legislation was to bring home cheap and efficient law to every man's door, and, acting upon that principle, there was no necessity for any limit in this case.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL thought a reference to the evidence taken before the Commission would at once show the necessity for the limitation. District registrars, it was proved, were more liable than the central authority to issue probate under mistake, fraud, or misapprehension; they were less qualified to detect irregularities, and it might so happen that probate would issue where it ought not; but the result being irretrievable, there would be no remedy for the wrong, and the property would pass into hands that had no right to it. To guard against such liabilities to error or fraud, it was necessary that some limitation should be fixed upon.

Mr. ROLT said, no doubt the estate of the poor man was entitled to as much protection as the estate of the rich; but a mistake committed in dealing with farming stock was more easily remedied than in dealing with funded property. In the former case an erroneous probate might be recalled before the property was converted; but, in the latter, a day, an hour even, might be sufficient to render the mistake irretrievable.

Mr. ROEBUCK remarked that Mr. Rolt assumed that all property under £1,500 was farming stock. It was just as likely, however, to consist of money in the funds; and if the protection of the central court was necessary in one case, it was equally necessary in the other.

The committee then divided, when there appeared—For the amendment, 162; against it, 131: majority, 31.

Mr. AYRTON said, after the decision which had just taken place, it seemed to him, that, if probates were in any manner to be taken in the country, they must be sent to the central registrar to be checked. In that case the clause must be modified, and he therefore moved that the chairman should report progress, in order to give time for further consideration.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, that, unless the House should come to some better appreciation of the subject on bringing up the report, it would be impossible to proceed with the measure. So fully did he feel this, that he would take the sense of the committee again upon the introduction of the words, and it was his determination to give the House the opportunity of deciding whether it would have the Bill at all, by expunging that unfortunate decision.

The motion for reporting progress was then put and negatived, and the committee divided on the question that the words "that such probate or letters of administration shall cover all personalty, wherever situate," be inserted. The numbers were—For the motion, 141; against it, 139: majority, 2.

On the motion of Lord PALMERSTON, the chairman was then ordered to report progress, and the House resumed.

SUMMARY PROCEEDINGS BEFORE JUSTICES OF THE PEACE BILL.

The House went into committee on this Bill.

On clause 1, justices to have power to state a case for the opinion of the superior courts, Mr. HENLEY thought this would throw a great increase of business on the superior courts, and be often used for the purpose of delay.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL believed the effect of the Bill would be to bring up only difficult questions of law, on which the magistrates were as anxious as the parties themselves to have the opinion of the Court; and no case could be stated except on the application of the parties, and with the consent of the justice.

Mr. NAPIER supported the Bill. It was a simplification of procedure, and afforded a substitute for the circuitous process of the certiorari.

Mr. J. D. FITZGERALD considered the provisions of the Bill so valuable, that, at his suggestion, it was proposed to extend its operation to Ireland.

Mr. MASSEY said that at present there was no means of reviewing the decision of a magistrate at petty sessions if erroneous in point of law. The object of the Bill was to remedy this defect.

Mr. HENLEY protested against the magistracy being put to any expense.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL explained, that, under the Bill, all that was necessary was for the magistrate to write down upon a piece of paper the point of law upon which he had based his conviction. Beyond this he had nothing to do, and would be put to no expense.

Mr. MILES moved that the chairman report progress, which was agreed to.

ATTORNEYS AND SOLICITORS (COLONIAL COURTS) BILL.

This Bill passed through committee.

Thursday, July 9.

FRAUDULENT TRUSTEES, &c., BILL.

This Bill passed through committee. The debate (which will be given next week) we are obliged to defer from the press of other matter.

FRIDAY EVENING.

The Wimbledon and Dorking Bill was, together with the Glasgow Gas and Great Northern Capital, sent to a Committee in the Lords on Wednesday last. The Gas Bill was disposed of in an hour, one clause only being disputed. Rather contrary to precedent, the peers heard the opponents who had not petitioned in the Commons; but the subject-matter of the claim having been overlooked whilst the Bill was in the Commons, their Lordships granted the relief sought on the condition of the petitioners paying the costs of the Bill being returned to the Commons.

The Wimbledon and Dorking was opposed by the Brighton and South-Western Companies: by the former, on the ground of competition; but the Committee, after hearing counsel, decided, that the petitioners, having been heard in the Commons, had no locus standi in the Lords. Another point arose upon the Brighton case—viz. the right of the opposing landowners, who appeared under the wing of the Brighton Company, to call the Brighton Company's witnesses, that Company having been shut out. After discussion, the Marquis of Westminster decided that they could not refuse to hear the traffic manager of the Brighton Company in support of a landowner's petition, but that the evidence should not be allowed to touch on the merits of the Brighton Company's case. The London and South-Western Company withdrew their opposition at the close of the opponent's case, the promoters of the Bill having agreed to give them the clauses which they required; and the Bill passed.

The Committee then proceeded with the "Rogue's Bill," as the Redpath Defalcation Bill is called, which probably will last over to day. Mr. Beckett Dennison, the chairman, has been examined at great length.

The Wycombe Railway, a short Great-Western branch, was passed last week; and the Stratford Railway Bill, another Great Western branch, may be said to have passed also, the only point in difference being how the clauses, which are agreed on between both parties, can be framed to meet certain requirements of Lord Redesdale.

ELECTION COMMITTEES.—(From a Correspondent.)

FRIDAY EVENING.

MAYO.—Mr. Montagu Smith opened the case for the sitting member on Saturday. The learned gentleman urged that the "pastoral" of the Archbishop contained no threat or intimidation. It was an admonition to the clergy to return the right men. The isolated cases of the misconduct of the priests could not be connected with the sitting member, or the Archbishop. The evidence taken on behalf of Colonel Higgins is very contradictory, and of the usual kind in cases of riot. The parties on one side see a dangerous set of rioters in the same people who are viewed as enthusiastic partisans only by their own side. The special report made by the Committee that witnesses have been most barbarously treated on their return to Castlebar, was ordered to lie on the table, on the suggestion of the Attorney-General for Ireland, who entreated the House to let the law deal with the case as it stood.

Mr. Moore, the sitting member, was under examination yesterday, and there is a probability of the case being closed and the decision given on Saturday.

OXFORD (City).—The Committee reported on Wednesday that Charles Neate, Esq. was not duly elected. Their report found that Mr. Neate was guilty through his agents of bribery. That 198 persons were employed as messengers and poll-clerks—of whom 152 voted for the sitting member—the payment varying from £1 to 2*s.* 6*d.* They reported 18 specific cases of bribery, and the sums paid. They further found that Mr. Neate was not cognisant of the bribery, and recommended that the writ should not be suspended.

CAMBRIDGE (Borough).—This petition presented no peculiar features of interest beyond the nearness of the race—the sitting member, Mr. Andrew Stuart, saving his election by one vote only. The Committee reported that three electors had received money for their votes, they struck off nine names on the ground of disqualification, and added one name to the list of Mr. Stuart. Their report exonerates Mr. Stuart from the bribery.

GALWAY.—The Committee have commenced this case. From the speech of Mr. Wordsworth (the leading counsel) it appears that the bribery has been carried on with much ingenuity. A., the voter, receives a card from B., and goes to C., and tells him how he (A.) voted. C. puts a seal on the card, and sends him to D., a baker, in Galway. D. tells him to go into a brewhouse at the back, in which brewhouse there is nobody visible to A. A pair of fingers, however, appear through a hole in the wall. A. puts his card between the unknown fingers, and the unknown fingers appear once more with a one or two-pound note in them. Not a word passes.

BURY (Lancashire).—The Committee closed their labours yesterday. They reported that the late election was conducted with unusual sobriety and order; and that although some practices of an illegal complexion were resorted to, nothing was adduced to show that they were authorised by the sitting member. Mr. Robert Needham Phillips, therefore, is returned.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—The Committee are proceeding with this Petition; there are no peculiar features of interest.

BATH.—The Committee commenced sitting at twelve on Friday. It is a case of scrutiny. The numbers returned for the sitting member, Mr. Tite, only exceeded by three votes the return for Mr. Way, the petitioner. It is likely to be a long and tedious case.

MAIDSTONE.—The Committee have reported that the two sitting members, Mr. Beresford Hope and Captain Scott, are duly elected. They have, however, reported that the evidence was very unsatisfactory, and that £3,500 was paid for an uncontested seat in 1847.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The weekly meeting of the Bank Directors has again passed without any further change being made in the rate of discount. The monthly statement of the Bank of France is less favourable than was anticipated. Considerable uneasiness is felt at the result of the elections, and at other symptoms of disquiet in that country. Great anxiety also prevails relative to the course of events in Bengal, and further intelligence is very much desired. Under these circumstances the English Funds continue flat, and without any improvement. Money is in sufficient supply on the Stock Exchance, and in Lombard-street, at ¼ per Cent. less than the rate required at the Bank of England.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 4th July, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,468,535, being an increase of £325,835, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £11,516,856, showing an increase of £137,984 when compared with the previous return.

The payment to the public of the July dividends at the Bank, and of the life annuities at the National Debt Office, commenced on Wednesday.

In the north of Europe hot and dry weather has been more continuous, and more adverse to vegetation, than in the south. In France and Spain the harvest is commenced with a hopeful aspect; from nearly all quarters reports are favourable, and, with a continuance of fine weather, an early gathering of average quantity and quality is expected. Nevertheless, the advance in the price of grain is well maintained. The market is sparingly supplied by home growers, and arrivals from abroad have lately been very moderate. Prices are high in all the foreign markets, both in the north and the south—too high, indeed, to admit of operations for importing into this country. The stock remaining is not anywhere large, and all parties seem disposed to wait the course of the weather and the harvest. Other articles of home and colonial produce maintain high prices. Sugar, coffee, wool, cotton, and all kinds of provisions are dear. The alarm which was excited upon the subject of the cattle murrain in the north of Europe has passed away. Inquiry and investigation have proved that the danger to be apprehended from the importation of cattle is not great, and that the dreaded disease is, in fact, the same as the pulmonary murrain which of late years has never been entirely absent from the cattle of Great Britain and Ireland.

The select committee of the House of Commons on murrain of cattle have reported that they are strongly impressed with the necessity of adopting every available precaution against infection, but that the evidence proves the difficulty of further legislation on the subject. The committee are also of opinion that ample powers for the purposes of precaution are already vested in the Government.

The Revenue Returns for the quarter are subject to many variations by reason of reduction of duties, and of delayed payment of duties. Therefore, a long and complicated investigation is required to see clearly the degree in which there is an increase of revenue. But there seems no reason to doubt that the progress in this respect is very favourable. The wonderful results of trade noticed last week cannot fail to find sympathy in the produce of taxes. It still remains a question of great interest and uncertainty whether the increase is sufficient to justify an expectation that the Property Tax will be wholly discontinued at the appointed time. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has given notice of a proposal, which, if it becomes law, will postpone for two years the fall of duty on tea and sugar, as now settled This is the first pecuniary result of our recent and present contests in the East.

The committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the operation of the Bank Restriction Act are not expected to conclude their labours during the present session of Parliament; therefore, the result of this inquiry is not likely to be fully made public till towards the end of the year 1858.

The absence of excitement on this subject, on the part of mercantile men, is a strong indication that, although the supply of money has occasionally been deficient, and has long been liable to a high rate of interest, it is not generally believed that the influence of the Bank Restriction Act has been productive of injurious effects.

It may be hoped that the result of the present parliamentary inquiry, if it does not put to silence the advocates of measures likely to lead to an inconvertible paper currency, will strengthen and extend the principles of the Act of 1844; and, also, obtain for the Directors of the Bank of England general approbation of the line of conduct which, under the Act of Parliament, they have applied to the management of the finances of the Bank during the long period their policy has had to encounter circumstances of much difficulty.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, JULY 18, 1857.

THE PROCTORS.

The real battle of the Probates Bill is yet to be fought; and the notices of motion which have been given by Mr. Malins, Lord Goderich, and other members of the House of Commons show the energy with which the proctors and their supporters are addressing themselves to the coming struggle. The notion has got abroad that the Government can succeed in carrying this important measure only upon the condition of securing ample compensation to those practitioners whose exclusive rights and privileges would be thereby invaded. Mr. Malins, the foremost champion of the proctors, proposes that they should receive life annuities amounting to one-half of the net profits of their business, taking an average of five years antecedent to the passing of the Act; and that the fees at present payable in respect of grants of probate and administration should be continued, so long as they shall be required to discharge these annuities. Lord Goderich is of opinion that the compensation—for the country proctors at all events—should not be less than an annuity equal in value to three-fourths of their present annual income. Mr. Collins advocates reducing this amount to one-fourth; and Colonel Smyth desires to include in the compensated class advocates of the Ecclesiastical Courts of York, Ripon, and Richmond.

The first thing which occurs to the mind of any person who considers these various propositions—which, we are told, are to be vehemently urged upon the House of Commons in all stages of the Bill—is, a recollection of numerous analogous instances affecting other branches of the legal profession, in respect of which no such claims have been attempted to be set up. Nobody has ever heard of a claim by barristers or attorneys practising in the common law courts for compensation on account of the diminution of their rights and privileges, and of their professional emoluments, in consequence of the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act; nor of any such claim on the part of their equity brethren, on account of the passing of the Chancery Amendment Act. Yet that injurious results were seriously anticipated at the time when these Acts were before Parliament, and that the gentlemen to whom we have referred have suffered heavy pecuniary loss by means of those enactments, any person conversant with the subject must concede. We admit, however, that this argument is not conclusive against the proctors; and that, if they are in justice entitled to the compensation which they seek, they are not bound by any precedent drawn from the conduct of attorneys and solicitors under similar circumstances. It may therefore be quite open to the proctors to demand compensation for the loss which may be occasioned to them by the provisions of the Bill now before the House of Commons. We are not aware that Parliament has ever laid down any clear rule, or acknowledged any intelligible principle, to govern such cases. The only conclusion on the subject which can be deduced from the resolutions of both Houses from time to time, is to give compensation only to persons holding office directly under the Crown, and where the loss is not merely speculative or contingent, but direct and unquestionable. It cannot be denied, however, that Governments have sometimes recognised remote interests, and granted compensation for injury indirectly occasioned by their measures, as the price of peace with those who might otherwise have proved themselves formidable opponents. Possibly, in the present case, Ministers may adopt this course; and, considering the great value of the measure now before Parliament, we should not be disposed to find fault with them for so doing, apart from the abstract question of the principle involved in such a proceeding.

Admitting, then, that as a matter of right or of mere policy the proctors ought to receive compensation, the question of amount remains. Its solution depends obviously upon the loss likely to be sustained by the operation of the Act. The Bill proposes to enable solicitors, without the intervention of proctors, to conduct contentious business in the Metropolitan Court of Probate, where alone litigated causes of considerable amount can be heard. The District Registries are to deal with business in common form only; and in all such business, whether in London or the country, the proctors are to maintain their present monopoly. In other words, the only interference with the "exclusive rights and privileges" of the proctors will be in London; and even there it will be confined to the least remunerative kind of business, viz.—the contentious.

Under these circumstances, the loss of the proctors can be hardly appreciable; especially if any considerable increase of business takes place, as many persons anticipate. To continue, extend, and fortify their monopoly in all points, with one trifling exception, and then to calculate their compensation on the hypothesis of absolute ruin—as Mr. Malins seems anxious to do—is going a little too far. If, indeed, the Act altogether abolished the monopoly of the proctors, and the distinction between them and solicitors, the claim of the former to compensation would have some show of reason, and would no doubt receive the most favourable consideration of Parliament. But it is absurd to talk of compensation, while the effect of the Bill is to exclude, as rigidly as ever, the whole body of provincial, and the great majority of metropolitan solicitors, from practice in the new courts, and to admit the latter only in a very small number of cases, where their ignorance of common form business must necessarily place them at a considerable disadvantage. The proctors must not be allowed to retain their monopoly, and to insist upon extravagant claims in respect of loss which they pretend to sustain by relinquishing it. The proportion between contentious and common form business is so exceedingly small, and the effect of a monopoly of the latter so obviously puts formidable competition in the former out of the question, that the Bill, if allowed to pass in its present shape, will substantially operate to the exclusion of the solicitors, almost as effectually as the law does now.

The reasons which have been alleged for continuing the monopoly of the proctors in the common form business are so puerile, that they are hardly worthy of serious notice, particularly as most persons are aware that they were merely a make-believe. Their real object was to conciliate Doctors' Commons and the diocesan practitioners. It was hoped that if the present possessors were secured in nineteen-twentieths of an increasing business, nothing would be heard about compensation for the loss of the remainder. That expectation, however, has been disappointed; and we now hear threats of unflinching opposition to the whole measure, if the proctors are not compensated upon the principle of a total loss of their business. The solicitors have offered no obstacle to this Bill on the ground of their improper exclusion from a large field of employment, because it was at first understood that there was to be no compensation. If, at the eleventh hour, it turns out to be otherwise, it is surely time to expose the flimsy pretences of superior aptness and capacity for common form business on the part of the proctors; and as they must be hard set to establish their claims in the present condition of the Bill, it would only be a friendly act for the solicitors to make their case somewhat stronger, by inducing Parliament to throw open all the business in the Court of Probate and in the District Registries to the whole profession. Such a step would at once accomplish the object of the proctors, and materially serve the interests of the public.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE IN SCOTLAND.

The facts of the case of Madeleine Smith have been dwelt upon so long and so fully that we should not feel justified in wearying our readers by recurring to them; but the mode in which the trial was conducted is so different from that which prevails in English criminal courts, that some consideration of it may be both curious and instructive. The most prominent, and perhaps the most important, difference between the Scotch and English systems of administering criminal justice is to be found in the practice which they maintain, and which we proscribe, of interrogating the accused person. It appears that one of the first steps in the late proceedings consisted of a declaration made by Miss Smith before the procurator-fiscal in answer to questions put by him to her; a proceeding closely resembling that of taking the prisoner's examination by the committing magistrate, which formerly prevailed in this country, and was only abolished by a very modern Act of Parliament. Strongly as English prejudices make against this practice, we are quite unable to share in them. The obvious argument, that silence can only be a protection to the guilty, and that interrogation may often be a positive advantage to the accused person, appears to us to receive a forcible confirmation from the case of Miss Smith. The declaration which she "emitted" made more strongly in her favour than almost any other part of the evidence in the case. Her admission that she bought the arsenic, her assertion that her appointment with her lover was for the Saturday and not for the Sunday night, her acknowledgment that she once gave him cocoa, and several other points in the statement, were so frank and so fully corroborated by other evidence in some particulars, and so little contradicted in others, that they must have weighed very considerably in her favour. Indeed they furnish the principal ground on which a candid person would be inclined to hesitate not only as to the legal but as to the moral strength of the case for the Crown. The English repugnance to allow prisoners to be interrogated is partly derived from the abuses to which the practice is certainly liable in countries where the judge is in effect counsel for the prosecution, and partly from a traditionary notion handed down from the times when our criminal law was nominally the most severe, but, in consequence of the capricious exercise of the power of pardon, one of the least effective systems in Europe. In those days every one was naturally enough anxious to give a prisoner as many chances of escape as possible, and we still allow our minds to be influenced by a sort of sporting conception of criminal law, which regards the infliction of punishment rather as a forfeit paid by the loser in a game than as the ultimate object for which criminal law exists.

Next to the interrogation of the prisoner the strangest feature of the late cause celèbre to English lawyers was the admission of hearsay evidence. Not only were the prisoner's accounts of his symptoms—which, to some extent, at least, would have been evidence in our own courts—laid before the jury, but a variety of other observations were admitted about the interviews which the deceased had with the prisoner, about her having given him cocoa and coffee, and about suspicions which had passed through his mind as to her having poisoned him. One point arose in the progress of the case, which illustrated very clearly the principle upon which the admission or rejection of such evidence depends in Scotch cases. A memorandum-book of the deceased was tendered in evidence to prove, we believe, the fact that he had had interviews with the prisoner on certain days immediately preceding his attacks of illness; and it was rejected on the ground that hearsay evidence cannot be admitted, unless the statements or memoranda to which it relates were made under such circumstances as to be free from suspicion. If, for example, the deceased said, on such a day I was at such a place, that would be evidence, unless it could be made to appear that he had at the time some corrupt motive—as, for example, vanity or revenge—for saying so. The memoranda were rejected principally on the ground that they were made after the quarrel between the prisoner and the deceased, so that they might have been dictated by improper motives. Such a principle as this must be most difficult to apply; nor does the whole trial appear to us to furnish any ground for dissatisfaction with the severer rules of evidence which obtain in our own courts. It is very remarkable that not a single circumstance of importance was adduced which would have been excluded by our rules. Most of L'Angelier's remarks were just that kind of vague gossip which a serious person would wish not to be aware of in considering a matter of great importance.

We do not think that Miss Smith's trial does much credit to the practice of joining three offences in one indictment. Previous attempts to commit a crime, all forming part of the plan by the operation of which it was ultimately consummated, may reasonably enough be given in evidence to prove the principal offence; but where the jury are asked three separate questions at once it can only confuse them. Cases may easily be imagined in which the proceedings might take a course which would quite supersede the necessity for investigating the subordinate parts of the charge; and in such cases it would surely be as well to rid the jury of a useless inquiry. This was not a very prominent feature in Miss Smith's case; but it caused cruel injustice in the case of Nairn and Ogilvie, tried in the last century for murder and incest; and instances might be quoted from the French courts in which the same habit has produced fatal consequences to the accused.

One feature in the Scotch mode of procedure appears to us to deserve serious consideration, though it is not a matter of first-rate importance. We allude to the practice of allowing the evidence to precede the speeches of counsel, and of giving the prisoner in all cases the last word. Nothing can be more painful, and nothing more injurious to the ends of justice, than the dilemma in which counsel are often placed in England, between the fear, on the one hand, of giving a reply, and the desire, on the other, to call witnesses. Mr. Barber, we believe, attributed his conviction to the fact that his counsel refused to take the first course. A criminal trial should not be, and, to the honour of the bar, it hardly ever is, a scene of rivalry and competition. The right to reply is the only bone of contention which ever produces such a scene; and it would be a great gain to adopt a plan which would preclude the possibility of such a result.

We feel more doubt about the propriety of preventing the counsel for the prosecution from opening the case to the jury. On the one hand, it may be said with considerable justice that a well-contrived and lucid arrangement of the facts to be proved prejudices the jury in favour of the guilt of the prisoner, and that there is some danger that they may remember the speeches of counsel rather than the evidence; but, on the other hand, there is great danger that minds unskilled in marshalling and applying masses of testimony may be bewildered by hearing a number of witnesses, without knowing beforehand what they are to prove; and thus the jury would be led to depend more on the summing up of the counsel for the Crown, than they do at present on his opening. If we were to offer an opinion upon the subject, it would be that the Crown should have the right of replying to the prisoner's evidence, but that the prisoner should in all cases have the last word.

We understand that in Miss Smith's case ten of the jury were in favour of the verdict of "not proven," and five in favour of a conviction. The question was apparently little discussed, as the verdict was found in half an hour. If the majority had been the other way, it would have been all but impossible to execute the prisoner; and the sentence of the Court would have been in all probability reversed by the executive, which is always a misfortune. Open to objection as our own system of requiring unanimity may be in some points of view, it certainly gives a degree of weight to an English verdict, with which, especially in criminal cases, we could ill afford to dispense.

Legal News.

Lord Campbell's Committee on the law of libel have made their report, but it is too late now to attempt to pass any measure founded on their recommendations in the present Session. It is proposed that a report of proceedings in either House of Parliament should have the same privilege as is now extended to reports of proceedings in courts of justice. In order to remedy the evil which arose in the case of Davidson v. Duncan, it is proposed to enact that the defendant may plead that he has faithfully reported the proceedings of a public meeting, and that the plaintiff has sustained no actual damage; and if the jury are of that opinion, they are to find a verdict for the defendant, and thus the penalty of costs will be thrown upon the plaintiff. These proposals fall very far short of satisfying the demands which have been urged by a portion of the press; but we believe that the protection thus afforded will amply suffice for all journals that are conducted with caution and moderation.

The Fraudulent Trustees Bill has found its way into the House of Lords, but there it will encounter the Bill of Lord St. Leonards for Trustees Relief; and if the fate of the two measures is to be linked together, it may be very difficult to accomplish any legislation on this subject during the present session. The Judgments' Execution Bill has been finally arrested by the fixed determination of its opponents to talk away the time allotted to passing it through committee. There is still much to be done in order to fulfil the very moderate programme of law reforms which we ventured to treat as not altogether visionary at the meeting of Parliament. But it is impossible to believe that either House will consent to work much longer; and there is a prospect of exciting party debate on Eastern affairs, which will effectually divert attention from the Lord Chancellor and Sir Richard Bethell. We cannot, therefore, reckon confidently on any very extensive achievements in the way of law reform during this session. But we shall be thankful for whatever may be accomplished.

DEATH OF MR. GERMAIN LAVIE.

On Tuesday morning it was announced in the city that this eminent solicitor had been killed by a fall from his horse on Constitution Hill, while taking an early ride preparatory to the business of the day. It is but a few weeks since that we had to lament the death of Mr. James Freshfield, whom, together with Mr. Lavie, most persons would have agreed to name as the two highest authorities on commercial law existing in the City of London. It will not have been forgotten that Mr. Freshfield died at the age of 56, of a complaint which was probably induced or aggravated by excessive application to his professional duties. Mr. Lavie has died at about the same age, leaving a great reputation, and a void which it will be difficult to supply.

The deceased gentleman was not only a solicitor in large practice and thoroughly master of his work, but he was also gifted with many talents and accomplishments which enhanced the influence due to his professional position. He was educated at Eton, where he was highly distinguished as well for industry and capacity as for general good conduct. From Eton he went to Christchurch College, Oxford, and took his degree in 1823, having obtained a first class in mathematics. At this time he was intended for the bar, but the sudden death of his father, who was a member of the old firm of Crowder, Lavie, & Co., induced him to change his views. In order to supply as far as possible his father's place, he entered the office as clerk to Mr. Oliverson, then and now a member of the firm, and after completing his articles, was admitted to practice as a solicitor in Easter Term, 1827. Mr. Lavie was a student of Christchurch, and it was at one time probable that he would have been elected to a fellowship at Merton College. Up to the time of his death he held the office of auditor of Christchurch, and under this title was the professional adviser of the college; and he enjoyed in a high degree the friendship and confidence of that distinguished body.

Ability and industry had won for Mr. Lavie high academic honour, and when he had taken his degree at Oxford, and turned his thoughts to the bar, his own powers, and the position of his father, as an eminent solicitor in London, appeared to promise him an early and great success. But on his father's death he sacrificed whatever hopes he may have cherished of the more splendid triumphs of the bar, and devoted himself to supply to his family, so far as posible, the heavy loss they had sustained. To this duty he was constant throughout his life, and we have been informed that he remained unmarried in order to discharge more completely the obligation he had taken upon himself of providing for those whom his father's death had left in embarrassed circumstances. To the profession which he thus adopted rather under a sense of duty than from choice, Mr. Lavie brought the same assiduity and the same capacity which he had displayed at Eton and at Oxford. For many years past he has been the professional adviser of a large number of the leading commercial establishments of the City of London, and also of many of the great mercantile firms of Scotland, Ireland, and the provinces. He was a member of the council of the Incorporated Law Society, and always attended the discussion of questions which were deemed to lie within his his peculiar province. He also acted in his turn as an examiner of the candidates for admission.

Our readers will be able to judge of the professional knowledge and ability of Mr. Lavie by reference to a letter of his on the proposed alteration in the law as to sales and pledges, which we published in our paper of the 14th of March. That letter displays a complete mastery of the subject, and the argument is clear and forcible. It is remarkable too as being written in opposition to the published views of the late Mr. James Freshfield, whose melancholy death has been so soon followed by that of his friendly rival. It should not be forgotten that Mr. Lavie was a member of the Royal Commission appointed in 1854, to inquire into the arangements for law study in the inns of court, being the only solicitor who assisted in that investigation. In the Appendix to the Report will be found a statement of Mr. Lavie's own opinion, which must convince every reader that the author of it was a very able man. In his letter to Baron Rothschild, Mr. Lavie says, that "he has not had time to condense" his arguments; but in drawing up his paper on the inns of court, he evidently did take time for full consideration and condensation, and attained, as might be expected, to remarkable terseness, distinctness, and force of language.

We need not repeat the melancholy details of Mr. Lavie's death, which have appeared in the daily papers. It may, perhaps, appear rather strange to hear of a solicitor riding in the park at ten in the morning, at which hour most men are either at, or making their way to, their offices. But it was Mr. Lavie's habit to take exercise at this time, and to go into the City at 11 or 12 o'clock, and to stay there much beyond the usual hour. He was a very early riser; and had been all his life a most hard-working man, although his hours of labour were not exactly those most usually adopted. It is satisfactory to know that there is no ground for imputing delay or neglect to any one who was near the scene of the fatal accident. The injury was so severe as to admit of neither remedy nor hope; and the unfortunate gentleman was insensible and painless from the moment of falling from his horse. This sad event occurred very near the spot which proved fatal to the late Sir Robert Peel. We have heard that, when an undergraduate at Oxford, Mr. Lavie received a severe injury while riding, caused by his horse suddenly throwing back its head and striking him violently on the face. One of his eyes was very seriously damaged by the blow, and his sight was permanently impaired by it. For six months he was absolutely forbidden to look into a book; and he spent the interval at Tours, acquiring a mastery of the French language, which proved most valuable to him afterwards in his business.

We believe that among all who knew the deceased, whether professionally or in private life, the most profound regret has been felt at his untimely death. We have already shown what was his conception of duty towards a mother and younger children who had been left almost without provision by his father's death. We cannot exactly estimate the magnitude of the sacrifice thus made, because we do not know what hopes and aspirations, more or less reasonable, were laid aside for ever when the deceased entered into articles. But we can appreciate the quiet unostentatious way in which Mr. Lavie, like the thorough English gentleman he was, put selfish considerations on one side and simply did what he conceived to be the duty cast upon him. Such a character, both moral and intellectual, as that of Mr. Lavie, commands respect and confidence. It was felt among the profession that, on any question of peculiar delicacy, there was no better opinion than that of the deceased. He was, perhaps, as good an example as could be found of the results of our public school and university training as preparatory to active life, and whoever desires to insist upon the preliminary education of solicitors, will find in Mr. Lavie's career the most striking illustration of its advantages.

COMMITTEE FOR PRIVILEGES.

THE GREAT SHREWSBURY CASE.—HOUSE OF LORDS,

July 13.

Their Lordships sat this morning for the purpose of hearing the claim of the Right Hon. Henry John Chetwynd Earl Talbot to the Earldom of Shrewsbury. His claim was opposed by Lord Edward Howard, the Princess Doria Pamphili and the Duchess of Sora, and by Major William Talbot.

Sir F. Thesiger, Sir F. Kelly, and Mr. Ellis appeared for the claimant; Mr. Serjeant Byles, Mr. R. Palmer, Mr. Fleming, and Mr. Badeley for Lord Edward Howard; Mr. Fleming and Mr. Bowyer for the Princess Doria Pamphili and the Duchess of Sora; and Mr. Peter Burke, of the Irish bar, for Major William Talbot. The Attorney-General appeared to watch the case on the part of the Crown.

Sir F. Thesiger said that before he proceeded to open the claimant's case he must ask whether the parties who had presented petitions in opposition to the claim of Lord Talbot would be heard at the bar of the House.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, the case of the claimant had better be proceeded with, and at its conclusion their Lordships could judge whether it was necessary to hear the counsel who appeared on behalf of the parties opposing, who would be heard, if at all, only with respect to the privileges of the House, and not in respect of any claim of their own.

Sir F. Thesiger then proceeded to open the case of the claimant, and said he appeared on behalf of Earl Talbot, who claimed the dignity of the Earldom of Shrewsbury, which, as he contended, accrued to him upon the death of Bertram Arthur Talbot, the late Earl, at Lisbon, in August, 1856, without issue male. Their Lordships would be satisfied by distinct evidence that upon the death of that nobleman the claimant became the next heir male of the body of the first Earl of Shrewsbury. The evidence, although extending over a long period of time, would be clear and distinct, and he believed he should be able to satisfy their Lordships that the claim to the title was complete, and that there was no single link wanting. The dignity was created in the reign of Henry VI., and commenced in the person of Sir John Talbot, afterwards Lord Talbot, who was well known in history, but perhaps much more so from the historical plays of our great dramatist, as the distinguished leader of the armies of England in France in that reign. He was created Earl of Shrewsbury to himself and the heirs male of his body. He was succeeded by his son John, the second Earl, who was succeeded by his son John, the third Earl. Here the pedigree became divided into three distinct branches. The first branch descended from John, the third Earl; he had an only brother, Sir Gilbert of Grafton. The title descended through the first line directly from father to son down to Gilbert, the seventh Earl, when he was succeeded by his brother Edward, the eighth Earl, at whose death the first branch became extinct. Sir Gilbert had two sons—Sir Gilbert, who died without issue, and Sir John of Albrighton. Sir John of Albrighton was twice married. By his first wife, Margaret Troutbeck, he had one son, Sir John of Grafton, whose grandson George became the ninth Earl on the extinction of the first branch. George died without issue, and the title descended through his brother John to his nephew John, the tenth Earl, who was twice married. By his first wife he had three sons—George, who died without issue during his father's lifetime; Francis, the eleventh Earl; and Gilbert of Batchcoate. Francis left two sons—Charles, the twelfth Earl, who was created Duke of Shrewsbury, but he dying without issue, that title became extinct; and John, who also died without issue. The earldom then went to Gilbert, the thirteenth Earl, the eldest son of Gilbert of Batchcoate, who had three sons—Gilbert, the thirteenth Earl, died without issue. Thomas died without issue, and George's eldest son George succeeded to the earldom as fourteenth Earl. This branch finally became extinct on the death of Bertram Arthur, the seventeenth and late Earl. The evidence which would be offered in support of this pedigree would consist of inquisitions, &c., if their Lordships required it to be proved; but he submitted that the fact of George, the ninth Earl, and the first of the second branch, succeeding to the title, was sufficient evidence of the extinction of the first branch. John, the sixteenth Earl, and the last but one of the second branch, claimed in 1831, as Earl of Waterford, to vote for representative Peers in Ireland. This he considered was proof of the pedigree down to that period, as the title of Earl of Waterford was created in the person of the first Earl of Shrewsbury, and he would, therefore, have to prove exactly the same facts as if he had been compelled to prove his right to the earldom of Shrewsbury. He should prove the death of Arthur Bertram, the late Earl, at Lisbon, in August last, and thus the extinction of the second branch would be satisfactorily proved. He then came to the third branch, under which Lord Talbot claimed. The issue of Sir John of Albrighton by his first marriage having thus become extinct, he would proceed to trace the issue of his second marriage with Elizabeth Wrottesley down to the present claimant. By that second marriage there were two sons—Gilbert, who died without issue, and John of Salwarp, who married Olive, daughter of Sir Henry Sherrington. There would be an attack made upon this portion of the pedigree, because it was said that it was unlikely that Sir John of Albrighton would have named two sons alike, but it would be most satisfactorily proved by inquisitions that such had been the case, the son of the first marriage being called Sir John of Grafton, and the son of the second marriage John of Salwarp. John of Salwarp married Olive, as above stated, by whom he had issue one son, Sherrington of Rudge. The latter married twice. By the first marriage he had six sons, all of whom died without issue except one, Sherrington. The latter had also six sons, of whom the eldest, and the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth, died without issue. His second son, Sir John of Lacock, also married twice. By the first marriage he had one son, Sherrington, who died without issue. By his second marriage he had two sons, both of whom died without issue. That having exhausted the issue of Sherrington of Rudge by his first marriage, he (Sir F. Thesiger) proceeded to trace the issue of the second marriage, through William, the only son who had issue, to William, Bishop of Durham. The latter married Catherine King, and had issue one son. There was no certificate of this marriage to be found, but the proceedings in a Chancery suit would be produced, which would prove that there had been such a marriage. The present claimant was the eldest male issue of the body of William, Bishop of Durham. The whole of this third pedigree would be proved down to 1666 by inquisitions, but subsequently to that period by the books of the Heralds' College, which, together with various wills and other documents, would be produced before their Lordships. He would now mention the fact that a private Act of Parliament had been obtained at the united application of Charles, the twelfth Earl, Sir John of Lacock, William, Bishop of Durham, and his son Charles, by which it was enacted that certain estates should be attached to the earldom. Those estates had been left by will by the late Earl to Edward Howard, the youngest son of the Duke of Norfolk. They were also claimed by the Princess Doria Pamphili as heir-at-law of the sixteenth Earl. Under the Act of Parliament the estates in question would follow the title. Major Talbot claimed through Humphrey, alleged to be a younger son of Sir John Talbot of Grafton, but not mentioned in the claimant's pedigree. If he can make out his claim as descending from the son of the first marriage of John of Grafton, then he would be the nearest male heir of the first Earl, and entitled to the title.

Sir F. Thesiger proceeded to call a witness, who produced the original letters patent creating the title.

Mr. Serjt. Byles, on behalf of Lord Edward Howard, claimed to be allowed to cross-examine the witness called by the claimant. If the present claimant was summoned to sit in their Lordships' House as Earl of Shrewsbury, the estates would follow the title under the Act. This was the only place where the possession of the estates could be disputed. He also submitted that their Lordships could hear all parties, even although not directly concerned, if they thought necessary.

In reply to Lord Brougham, the learned counsel said they had no printed case, but if allowed a reasonable time they would lodge one.

Mr. Fleming appeared on behalf of the Princess Doria Pamphili and the Duchess of Sora, and made a similar application.

He was directed to join his case with Lord Howard.

Mr. Burke also received permission to lodge his case and to cross-examine the witnesses.

Their Lordships then adjourned the further hearing until Tuesday, July 14.

The evidence on behalf of the petitioner adduced to-day was entirely documentary, with the exception of that of Mrs. Hibburd, the mother of the late Earl of Shrewsbury. Her evidence went to show that Earl Talbot was always considered the next heir to the title in the event of Bertram Arthur, the seventeenth Earl, dying without issue.

IMPORTANT TO SOLICITORS AND OTHERS.

Points of some importance have just been raised and argued before the judge of the County Court of Yorkshire, at Halifax. By the 28th section of the recent statute to amend the Acts relating to the County Court, it is provided that in any action "for a debt or liquidated money demand exceeding £20," the plaintiff may at his option issue a summons in the ordinary form, or a special summons in the form thereby provided. The advantage gained by the special summons is, that, if the defendant does not at least six clear days before the return, or court day, give notice in writing to the registrar of his intention to defend the action, plaintiff may, without giving any proof of his claim, have judgment entered up against the defendant for the amount of his claim and costs, and issue execution forthwith. A plaintiff having issued such a special summons for the recovery of £22, it appeared by the evidence adduced at the hearing that the cause of action was of tort, or wrong, and not "debt," or "liquidated money demand;" but that point or objection was not mooted during the hearing, and the judge eventually gave plaintiff a verdict for 16*l.* 5*s.* 5*d.* Subsequently an application was made on behalf of the defendant for a new trial, or to set aside the proceedings, chiefly on the grounds, that, inasmuch as the plaintiff had issued the special summons, it was necessary for him to have proved two things; first, that the action was "for a debt, or liquidated money demand;" and secondly, that it exceeded "£20;" and that as the evidence showed that the action was of tort, or wrong, and that as the judgment was given for less than £20, the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and wrong in point of law. With regard to the first point, or objection, the Judge held, that, as the defendant had not taken such point or objection during the hearing, it was then too late; and with respect to the second point, his Honour held that the amount stated in the plaint determined the right of a plaintiff to avail himself of a special summons. It would, therefore, seem that a verdict renders a a bad summons good, unless defendant objects to it during the hearing; and that, if under £20 is owing, the plaintiff need only enter a plaint for more than is actually due to entitle him to the benefit of a special summons.

APPLICATION TO REVIEW.

On Wednesday last an application was made to the judge of the County Court of Yorkshire, at Halifax, to review the registrar's taxation of certain costs and charges which the latter had allowed.

By the County Court Acts it is enacted that the court fees to be taken on the entry of every plaint shall be 10*d.* in the pound, and for every hearing 2*s.* in the pound; and that in every case where the plaint is for more than £20, such fees shall be estimated as on £20 only. It appears that an action had lately been tried in the aforementioned court, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover from the defendant a sum exceeding £20, but a verdict was obtained for less than £17, and the deduction was not caused by a set-off. Inasmuch as plaintiff had entered a plaint for exceeding £20, the registrar estimated the court fees, and also allowed plaintiff's attorney and counsel the same fees, costs, and charges as if plaintiff had actually obtained a verdict for above £20. If plaintiff had entered a plaint for the amount which he recovered, the court fees would have been 2*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* instead of 2*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* (which the registrar had allowed); and plaintiff's attorney and counsel's costs and charges would have been 1*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, instead of 12*l.* 10*s.* (which the registrar had also allowed). In other words, if the plaint had been entered for the amount of the verdict, the costs would have been only 4*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, instead of 16*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* (thus making a difference of £11 to the defendant); and hence the question for the judge to decide was, whether the plaintiff, under these circumstances, was entitled to the higher or lower scale of costs? On defendant's behalf, his Honour's attention was called to 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, ss. 33, 34, 35, and 36, and to the last clause but two in schedule C to that Act, and also to a certain paragraph required by that Act to be indorsed on the summons. By s. 33, five county court judges appointed by the Lord Chancellor were empowered to frame a scale of costs to be paid to counsel and attorneys "in actions where the debt or damage claimed exceeds £20," and it was submitted that the aforesaid clause in schedule C provides, that, "where the plaintiff recovers less than the amount of his claim so as to reduce the scale of costs, he shall pay the difference unless the reduction shall be caused by a set-off."

It was also submitted, that, by the indorsement on the summons, coupled with the last-mentioned clause, it is provided, that, if a defendant admits a part only of a claim exceeding £20, he may, by paying into the registrar's office the amount so admitted, together with the court fees of 10*d.* in the pound proportionate to the amount paid in, avoid the scale of costs contemplated by the 33rd section, and all other costs, unless the amount paid in exceeds £20, or the plaintiff at the hearing proves a claim against defendant exceeding the sum so paid in. It was further submitted, that the only clause which rendered an apportionment of costs necessary was the clause in Schedule C, and that therefore the apportionment was requisite to be made whether the debt was paid into court before or after judgment, and that, consequently, costs were governed by the amount paid or recovered, and not by the amount claimed. On the part of the plaintiff it was contended that the clause in Schedule C applies to the court fees, and not the scale of costs framed under the 33rd section; and that it was quite clear that that scale was to be paid by the defendant on the amount claimed, and not on the amount recovered. In reply, it was contended that the statute in question did not enact that the defendant should pay costs according to that scale, but that, on the contrary, it was quite clear that if a plaintiff enters a plaint for above £20, and recovers less, he must himself pay to his attorney the difference between the high and the low scale.

The Judge ultimately held, that the court fees proportionate to the reduced amount recovered were payable by defendant, but that the other costs and charges were recoverable upon the amount claimed, and not upon the sum found due upon the hearing, and the costs were, therefore, reduced as regards the court fees, but not as regards the plaintiff's attorney's charges.

From this it appears that if a debtor only owes 21*s.*, and his creditor enters a plaint against him for above £20, the latter's attorney would, in the absence of any special order, be entitled to recover from the defendant the high scale of costs.

DIVORCE A VINCULO MATRIMONII.—From a parliamentary paper published on the motion of Sir E. Perry, we learn that the number of divorces (à vinculo matrimonii) granted by Act of Parliament since the Reformation is 317. The first granted was in 1540, and the next in 1551, and none from that time to 1670. Another passed in 1690, and from 1698 to 1750 there appears to have been one passed at intervals averaging about three years. Since 1752 but eight sessions have passed without a divorce being granted, the last being that of 1818. The year in which the largest number took place was 1799 (10 divorces); 1796 (9); 1839, 1840 and 1842 (8 each); 1772, 1849, 1850 (7 each); 1776 (6); and 1778, 1793, 1797, 1835, 1841, 1843, and 1855 (5 each). Only one divorce was granted in 1852, and two each in 1847, 1854, and 1856. The number of Scotch "Decrets" of divorce during the last ten years was 174, of which 99 were at the instance of the husband, and 75 at suit of the wife.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

ALIENATION OF CHARITY LANDS—EFFECT OF STATUTES OF LIMITATION ON CLAIMS BY CHARITIES.

The Attorney-General v. Magdalen College, Oxford, 5 W. R. 716.

Some important questions have been set at rest by the decision of the House of Lords in this case. The facts were shortly these:—In 1790, parish land was alienated to Magdalen College, in pursuance of the resolution of vestry meetings, and in consideration of a yearly payment. In 1853 an information was filed by the Attorney-General, at the relation of parishioners, to set aside the sale, and to compel the college to reconvey the land, and account for the rents which they had received. All the learned judges who heard the case—both in the court below and on appeal—were of opinion that there were no circumstances showing the sale to have been expedient. The Master of the Rolls considered that the charity trustees had been guilty of a direct breach of trust in conveying the land away; and that the college had distinct notice of the fact that it was held for charity purposes, and were therefore cognisant of such breach of trust; and the Lord Chancellor and Lord Wensleydale fully adopted his Honour's view. The defence of the college was thereby narrowed to a consideration of the effect of the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), in barring the plaintiffs' claim; and on this part of the case, the decision of the Master of the Rolls was overruled in some particulars worth attention. If the provisions of the statute were applicable to claims by charities, then, under ss. 2 and 24, the plaintiffs were clearly barred at law and in equity, unless it were held that the Attorney-General was excluded from the bar. By the 25th section it is enacted, that, where land is vested in a trustee upon any express trust, the right of the cestui que trust to bring a suit against the trustee, or any person claiming through him, to recover such land, shall be deemed to have first accrued at the time at which such land shall have been conveyed to a purchaser for valuable consideration, and shall then be deemed to have accrued only as against such purchaser and any person claiming through him. The Master of the Rolls held that a charitable trust was not within this and the 24th sections, and therefore that the plaintiffs' claim was not barred by the statute. Previously to this decision, there was no case in which it was expressly decided that the provisions of the statute extended to lands held in trust for charitable purposes. In the Act itself, the word "charity" never occurs; nor is there any allusion to charitable trusts, unless they be included under the general term "trusts." Lords Cranworth and Wensleydale, however, entertained no doubt that the words of the 24th and 25th sections applied to all trusts, including charities; so that the bar operated under the 24th section, there being nothing in the 25th section to prevent its operation, except in the case of an express trust; and here there was none. Their Lordships concurred with the Master of the Rolls in holding that the Attorney-General was not a person claiming any estate or interest within the meaning of the Act; but they differed from his Honour by holding that the poor of a parish are a class of persons within the meaning of the interpretation clause; and Lord Wensleydale appears to have doubted whether some members of the class, for themselves and the rest, could not, without making the Attorney-General a party, have instituted a suit against the defendants. The Lord Chancellor thus sums up his reasons for reversing the decree of the Court below:—"The real plaintiffs are the poor of the two parishes. They are a class of persons within the 1st section of the statute; they are merely cestuis que trust. A suit by information of the Attorney-General is a suit by them; they cannot sue except within twenty years, unless against their trustees; but the college were purchasers, and in no sense trustees, and therefore the plaintiffs' claim was barred by the statute."

EQUITABLE DEFENCE AT LAW.

Terrell v. Higgs, 5 W. R. 746.

This case has a good deal of practical value, in enabling the practitioner to decide what is often a difficult question—namely, whether to set up an equitable defence, by way of plea, under the Common Law Procedure Act, or to make it the foundation of an application to the Court of Chancery for an injunction. The view which the common law judges have taken of their equitable jurisdiction has excluded the greater part of the defences which may be made the ground for an injunction; and the application of the decision in Terrell v. Higgs is, therefore, confined to those cases where the defence is one which is, or is supposed to be, admissible by way of plea.

It appears that at law the equitable defence pleaded was, that the defendant was a surety that the creditor made a covert agreement with the principal debtor, and in pursuance of it actually granted indulgence to the debtor without the consent of his surety. The secret agreement was not proved; but the other allegations, which would have been sufficient ground for granting an injunction, were established at the trial. The plea, however, not being proved, judgment went for the plaintiff, notwithstanding that the defendant had really a good equitable defence. He applied, after verdict, to the Court of Chancery, but was held to have come too late; and on appeal, the Lords Justices, without expressing any opinion as to the correctness of that decision, held, that, at any rate, the subsequent delay in the appeal, which was not prosecuted till after judgment had been signed, deprived the plaintiff in equity of his title to relief. It would seem, therefore, that, in order to obtain the assistance of a court of equity, it is necessary to be extremely prompt in applying in any case where the same defence has been first taken by equitable plea at law; and it is still unsettled whether a motion for an injunction will, in any case, be granted after verdict, or whether the mere pleading of the equitable plea may not be a ground in some cases for refusing relief altogether. The view of the Lords Justices appears, however, to be, that, where the application is sufficiently prompt, the injunction may be granted. The practical conclusion, we think, is, that, where it is not pretty clear that the plea will be good, and can be proved at law, it is safer to stop the action by an injunction in the first instance, than to trust to equity to redeem any mishap in the common law defence.

PRACTICE—LAST CAUSE IN THE PAPER.

Flower v. Gedye, 5 W. R. 747.

It was once a rule, founded on a not very intelligible principle of indulgence, that the last cause in the paper was not liable to be dealt with in the same summary manner, in the event of counsel being absent when it was called on, as those which occupy a higher position in the list. An attempt was made to revive this privilege; but the Master of the Rolls said that it was no longer the practice, having been abolished by Lord Cottenham, for very obvious reasons.

SERVICE OF BILL OUT OF JURISDICTION.

Innes v. Mitchell, 5 W. R. 702; and, on appeal, 748.

Prior to the year 1832, the Court of Chancery had no power to effectuate service of its process beyond its jurisdiction. In that year, the 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 33, was passed, enabling the Court, in suits concerning land situate in England or Wales—if it should think fit—to direct process to be served in other parts of the United Kingdom. By the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 82, the provisions of the preceding Act were extended to suits concerning charges or liens on such land, or concerning public stocks or shares in companies. The 33rd Order of May, 1845, prescribes the manner in which a subpœna on a defendant out of the jurisdiction is to be obtained, served, and enforced. It has been held (Whitmore v. Ryan, 4 Hare, 617), that, under this Order, a judge has a discretion to permit service on a defendant out of the jurisdiction, not merely in suits relating to land, stocks, or shares, within the meaning of the two statutes of Will. 4, but in any suit whatever; and even, if the judge thinks fit, upon a foreigner who never has been within the jurisdiction. In that case, Sir James Wigram considered the only material question to be, whether the defendant had due notice of the proceedings, so that he might come in and make his defence. In Innes v. Mitchell, the same subject-matter was in litigation here, and also in the Scotch courts: and on that ground Turner, L. J., was disposed to differ from the opinion of Knight Bruce, L. J. (which agreed with the decision of Kindersley, V. C.), as to the propriety of permitting defendants in the suit out of the jurisdiction to be served, considering that, as all the questions at issue could be determined in the Scotch suit—three of the defendants in the English suit being resident in Scotland—the case was not one in which the Court ought to exercise its discretionary jurisdiction. Both the other learned judges, however, were of a contrary opinion. The testatrix in the cause was a Scotch lady, who made her will in the form prescribed by the Scotch law, and died possessed of very large property in the English funds, and her will was proved at Doctors' Commons. The plaintiffs, who claimed as legatees, were domiciled Englishmen; and three of the defendants were Scotchmen, residing in Scotland. The whole contention in the suit was, who were the next of kin of the testatrix? And the question on the motion before the Court was, whether in such a case the Court would make an order, under the Acts of Parliament and General Order already mentioned, for service of a copy of the bill on these defendants? The Vice-Chancellor made the order, which was affirmed on appeal, but without costs, on account of the adverse opinion of Turner, L. J.

PRIVILEGE OF DEFENDANT ANSWERING—QUESTION TENDING TO CRIMINATE.

Sidebottom v. Adkins, 5 W. R. 743.

It has not yet been clearly decided whether or not a witness is privileged in all cases from answering a question where he swears that the answer would tend to criminate him; in other words, whether or not the witness himself is to be the judge of the tendency in this respect of any question proposed to him. In the case of Fisher v. Ronalds (17 Jur. 393), the Court of Common Pleas appeared to lean strongly towards the affirmative of this proposition. Jervis, C. J., there laid down the rule, that "a witness is privileged from answering any question tending even indirectly, as he bonâ fide believes, to criminate himself." The question remains—Who is to judge of the bona fides of the witness's belief? Is the witness's oath conclusive, not only as to the fact of his belief, but as to its bona fides? In Sidebottom v. Adkins, Stuart, V. C., thought it was not, and took occasion to throw some doubt upon the report of the case before the Court of Common Pleas. It is obvious, however, that, in the majority of instances, the Court could judge of the bona fides of the witness's refusal to answer only upon a full discovery of the facts which, he says, if known, would tend to criminate him; and it is therefore difficult to understand how the rule can be consistently pushed beyond the simple requirement that the witness should swear that he bonâ fide believes the answer would tend to criminate him. The effect of the Vice-Chancellor's decision in this case is to lay down the rule, that, notwithstanding such a statement upon oath of a witness or a defendant in equity, it is always for the Court to decide whether, under the circumstances, the statement ought to be considered conclusive, so as to protect the party interrogated from the consequences of refusing to answer. "He may," said his Honour, "under the 38th Order of Oct. 1841, answer until he comes to the point of danger, and then state that to answer that will subject him to a criminal prosecution." This interpretation of the rule appears to be directly opposed to that which is indicated in the judgment of Maule, J., in Fisher v. Ronalds, where that learned Judge is reported to have said, "If a witness is compellable to answer every question which does not obviously tend to criminate him, a man might be made to prove himself guilty of forgery, or even of murder. It might be proved that a murder had been committed by some one of ten persons in a room, and that a witness was one of the ten. The witness might be asked, 'Did A. do it?' 'No.' And so on through the nine; and then there would be no need to ask him the other question directly tending to criminate him." It may be said, however, that the Vice-Chancellor's judgment does not proceed upon any distinction between a direct and an indirect tendency, but rather on the possibility of discriminating in complicated transactions—some of which might, if disclosed, tend to criminate a defendant—between what has actually such a tendency, and what has not.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

ARREST, PRIVILEGE FROM—COMMON INFORMER.

Ex parte Cobbett, 5 W. R., Q. B., 708.

This was an application to be discharged from an arrest made on a ca. sa., on the ground of the applicant's having been captured while on his way from some petty sessions, where he had taken out a summons—as a common informer—in respect of a penalty incurred by a clerk to turnpike trustees for the breach of an Act of Parliament. The rule, however, for a habeas corpus was refused, the Court saying, that to lay down a rule that a man may obtain protection from arrest by suing out a summons as a common informer "was a novelty which would lead to the most inconvenient consequences." Mr. Justice Crompton, however, intimated, that, in his opinion, the case would have been different had there been a hearing before the magistrate, on the summons which had been taken out, and if the applicant had been arrested on his return from such hearing.

14 GEO. 3, C. 48—POLICY VOID UNDER.

Hodson v. The Observer Life Assurance Society, 5 W. R., Q. B., 712.

It will be remembered that a few weeks ago the Court of Exchequer held * that there is no objection to A.'s effecting a policy on the life of B., and keeping it afoot by himself paying the premiums, provided B. appear by the policy itself to be the party assured, and the sum assured be made payable to his executors; but that, on the other hand, A. could not insure B.'s life for his (A.'s) own benefit—the sum assured to be paid on the decease of B. to A.—unless A. had an interest in B.'s life; such a transaction being prohibited by 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, as a gaming and wagering policy. In the present instance, another question upon the same statute was brought before the Court of Queen's Bench. By the 2nd section of the Act it is necessary that the name of the party interested in the sum assured should be mentioned in the policy. A certain policy recited that one J. H. was interested in the life of one C. W. (the party whose life was assured); but on the policy becoming a claim, J. H. brought an action thereon, and alleged in his declaration that C. W. was the party interested. The Court here held, that, if the averment in this declaration were true, then the statement in the policy, that the plaintiff was the person interested, was false, and that, in such case, the statute had not been complied with, and consequently that the policy was void. They, therefore, gave judgment for the defendants.

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACT, 1854—DISCOVERY—PRACTICE AS TO.

Thompson v. Robson, 5 W. R., Exch., 728.

This was an action on a charterparty, the complaint being that the ship was not sea-worthy; and Bramwell, B., had refused an application by the plaintiff for an order, calling on the defendants to discover all letters and documents in their possession relating to the matters in dispute—the application being supported merely by an affidavit of the deponent's belief that the defendants had written letters to the ship's husband, relating to such matters, of which they had retained and now kept possession; that they had received letters relating to the condition of the vessel during the voyage from the captain; and that there were entries in the books of the defendants which bore upon the question in controversy. The Court, on the application being renewed, now held that the discovery sought could not be allowed. It was, in truth, they remarked, an application based on the possible fact that there might be letters some portions of which might be available to inflame the damages, But the documents sought to be discovered would not be evidence against the defendants of the fact of disrepair. Moreover, the existence of the documents in question was not shown with any distinctness; whereas, to induce the Court to accede to such an application, such existence must appear at least "with reasonable certainty." Watson, B., added, "I am afraid these applications are too often made for the sole purpose of creating embarrassment and increasing expense. This is a monstrous example."

EXECUTION WRIT—MERCANTILE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1856.

Williams v. Smith, 5 W. R., Exch., 729.

It was one of the enactments of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 1), that no execution writ shall prejudice the title to the goods of the judgment debtor, which has been acquired by any person bonâ fide and for a valuable consideration, before the actual seizure by the sheriff; provided that such purchaser had not, at the time, notice that there was in the sheriff's hands, unexecuted, some writ under which the goods in question might be seized. It was decided by the above case, that this provision does not affect any transaction which had taken place before the date of its passing, and that, consequently, goods of a judgment debtor which had been bought by a bonâ fide purchaser after the writ had been lodged with the sheriff to be executed, were liable to the judgment if the writ were lodged before the date of the passing of the Act—viz. 29th July, 1856.

COUNTY COURT—MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—FAILURE OF JURISDICTION.

Hunt v. The North Staffordshire Railway Company, 5 W. R., Exch., 731.

In this case the plaintiff had levied in the county court a plaint, which appeared, by the particulars annexed, to be for the recovery of money expended and loss of time suffered by the plaintiff, in respect of a charge brought against him by a station-master in the service of the defendants, which had been dismissed by the magistrates after hearing. The items charged for included cab and railway fares to and from the hearing, for the plaintiff, his witnesses, and his attorney—the hotel expenses of the plaintiff and witnesses—and the attending fee of the attorney on two separate occasions before the magistrates. And it appeared, that, on the occasion in question, the plaintiff had been charged by mistake for another person, who was afterwards discovered and convicted. On the plaint being levied, the defendants had obtained from Mr. Justice Coleridge a writ of prohibition to the county court against proceeding thereon, on the ground, that, in substance, it was a proceeding for a malicious prosecution—a cause of action over which the county court has no jurisdiction. Upon a rule nisi, obtained by the plaintiff to set aside this prohibition, coming on for argument, the Court held that such rule must be discharged. They arrived at this decision on the ground that the claim could only be supported by proof that the defendants had proceeded maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause; and that, as soon as the cause of action appeared to be of that nature, the jurisdiction of the county court judge would be ousted—there being no suggestion of any contract on behalf of the defendants to reimburse the plaintiff his expenditure. Some doubt, however, arose in the mind of Mr. Baron Bramwell as to the correctness of the reasoning on which the defendants urged the Court to interfere, though he concurred with his brethren as to the propriety of that interference under the actual facts of the case.

CRIMINAL LAW—MURDER AND MANSLAUGHTER—ATTEMPTS TO MURDER.

Reg. v. Hughes, 5 W. R., C. C. R., 732; Reg. v. Gray, Id. 736.

In these cases that part of the criminal law which has reference to homicide was usefully discussed in several particulars.

The first case was that of a death which had been caused by the prisoner; and the question was, whether, under the circumstances, any crime at all, and if a crime, whether murder or manslaughter, had been committed.

The deceased had been at work in a mine, engaged, with others, in walling the inside of a new shaft; and it was the duty of the prisoner to superintend the letting down of the necessary materials for this work into the shaft. This was done by means of buckets filled with bricks, which were deposited on a movable stage, run over half the area of the top of the shaft, and, after the buckets had been lowered, withdrawn. On the occasion of the accident which caused the death of the deceased, the prisoner had omitted to replace the stage over the mouth of the pit—in consequence of which a truck with buckets laden with bricks ran into the shaft, and killed the deceased. The jury found that the death had arisen from the negligent omission of the prisoner to adjust the stage; and on this he was found guilty of manslaughter. This conviction was affirmed by the Court. It was observed that the death had been directly occasioned by the omission of the prisoner to perform his duty; that, if this omission had been the effect of a premeditated design of causing the death, the prisoner would have been guilty of murder; and that there was no authority for the position that there cannot be the crime of manslaughter without some act of commission. An omission to perform a duty is sufficient to constitute either murder or manslaughter. If such omission be by design and of malice prepense, it is murder; if by culpable negligence, it is manslaughter.

In the second case above noticed, the prisoner Gray had been indicted for causing a "bodily injury dangerous to life—namely, a congestion of the lungs and of the heart—with intent to murder." And it appeared that the prisoner had left her infant child, on a cold wet day, lying in an open field, intending that it should die; and that congestion of the lungs and heart had been caused thereby, which would have speedily been fatal; but the child was discovered in time, and afterwards restored to health. The proceedings were taken under 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 85, s. 2, by which it is a capital felony to cause, "by any means whatsoever, to any person any bodily injury dangerous to life, with intent to commit murder." The prisoner, on her trial, was convicted; but the Court of Criminal Appeal held that the conviction could not be supported; inasmuch as, from the character of the other offences provided for by the statute, they thought that the injury must produce some lesion of the body, such as would be occasioned by a "stab, cut, or wound;" and that a mere congestion, or filling the organ with more blood than there ought to be there, was not within the provision.

This decision, it is apprehended, was caused by a desire to save life; and in favorem vitæ such hairbreadth distinctions may perhaps be tolerated. Yet it is observable that Lord Campbell, in the preceding case, had occasion incidentally to remark, that "it has never been doubted, that, if death is the direct consequence of the malicious omission of the performance of a duty (as of a mother to nourish her infant child), this is a case of murder;" and Blackstone quotes from Hale an instance of a harlot who laid her child under leaves in an orchard, where a kite struck and killed it, which was adjudged to be murder in the mother. Now, as the intention of the statute under which the prisoner was indicted was to make the attempt to murder capitally felonious, provided a bodily injury dangerous to life, though not death itself, is the consequence—in other words, to make the crime complete, when everything in the prisoner's power has been done to complete it—it is not easy to see on what principle the general words, "shall by any means whatsoever cause such injury," are to be narrowed in their application by the preceding specification of certain of the commoner methods of occasioning injuries of that description. Indeed, as Mr. Justice Crowder very pertinently remarked, though he did not press his observation, the statute expressly makes the administration of poison, with intent to commit murder, a capital felony; and yet by poison no "lesion of any organ" is caused.

Professional Intelligence.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

A special meeting of the Managing Committee was held on the 30th June.

A draft statement to the Lord Chancellor by the council of the Incorporated Law Society, pointing out various defects in the transaction of business in the offices of the Court of Chancery, and suggesting remedies, was read and considered; and it was resolved that Mr. Field and Mr. Bower be requested to represent the opinions of the Committee as contained in the memorial of the Association to the Lord Chancellor in 1848, and in the petitions of the Association to Parliament in 1852, at the meeting of the General Equity Committee of the Incorporated Law Society, of which they were members.

The Bill to regulate the admission of attorneys and solicitors in colonial courts in her Majesty's superior courts of law and equity in England was considered, and the Secretary was directed to communicate with the promoters of the Bill, and to suggest that the important question of admitting colonial solicitors to practise in English courts might introduce the equally important one of admitting Irish solicitors to practise in the same courts, and that the two questions ought to be dealt with together; that the Bill would be the means of admitting a class of practitioners to practise who had paid no stamp duty on articles, and that the Bill should state specifically that colonial solicitors must pass the same examination as English solicitors.

The Fraudulent Trustees Bill was considered, and a petition in its support was resolved on; but the secretary was instructed to write to the Attorney-General, asking whether the penal clauses of the Bill were to extend to offences which a court of equity might deem fraud, but which might be wholly different in character and degree from the class of offences which the Bill appeared specially intended to embrace, and also whether the penalties of the 13th clause would extend to an attorney receiving payment for professional services out of a fund fraudulently obtained by the client.

The Bill to amend the law relating to wills of British subjects abroad was considered, also the Bill to improve the administration of the law of England as respects summary proceedings before justices of the peace; petitions in favour of both Bills were directed to be presented.

A petition was also ordered to be presented for alteration of the Probates and Letters of Administration Bill, so as to throw open the new Court of Probate to the entire profession, and to compensate proctors.

A letter was read from a country solicitor in extensive practice, suggesting that every deed of appointment of trustees should imply, in the absence of words indicating a contrary intention, a power to the trustees or the survivor to appoint a new or additional trustee or trustees, and also that every power to sell should carry with it a power to give receipts for the purchase money.

The Secretary was instructed to write to Lord St. Leonards and Mr. Malins upon the subject.

A meeting of the Managing Committee was held on the 8th inst.

The Secretary reported that a second letter had been forwarded to the Editor of the Law Times on the 12th of June, referring to the misrepresentations in the Law Times, of the 30th of May and 6th of June, repeating the request for the names of the two members of the Society whom the Editor desired to place on the committee of investigation proposed by himself; and requesting that the same publicity might be given to both letters that had been given to the charges against the Managing Committee; and that neither of the letters had been inserted in the Law Times.

An article in the Law Times, of the 20th of June, was read, stating that the Managing Committee affirm "that the Society has not been in any manner systematically or otherwise perverted to personal purposes for the promotion of a speculation entered into by its Secretary and some of its London managers." And the Editor added, "This, therefore, is the issue to be tried."

The Secretary reported that the first extract from the article was a denial taken from his letter of 21st of May, which the Editor gave as if it had reached him for the first time in the Secretary's letter of the 12th of June.

The Secretary was instructed to reiterate the demand of the Committee for the names of the two members of the Society whom the Editor desired to place upon the committee of investigation; and, having regard to the misrepresentations in the Law Times of the former communications of the Committee, to decline to discuss, in the columns of the Law Times, the charges made against the Committee.

A letter was read from a provincial member of the Association, asking what retaining fees a solicitor is entitled to where he accepts a retainer from several candidates for seats in Parliament?

The Secretary reported that he had had communication with several members of the Association conversant with electioneering business; but that it did not appear there was any general custom as to the fee on retainers. That in many counties and boroughs it was the usual practice for each candidate, whether standing alone or with another, to give a retaining fee of five guineas to each solicitor acting for him, whether such solicitor was in practice alone, or one of a firm.

The further consideration of the subject was postponed—an opinion being expressed that information in reference to the amount of retainers might be obtained from the different election auditors.

The presentation of the petition in favour of the Probates and Letters of Administration Bill was deferred, in consequence of the doubt expressed by the Attorney-General as to whether Government would proceed with the Bill.

The Married Women's Reversionary Interest Bill was further considered, and the Secretary was instructed to prepare a petition for alteration of the Bill.

The Bill to improve the Administration of the Law as respects Summary Proceedings before Justices was further considered, as the Bill empowers justices, on application of a party aggrieved, to state a case for the opinion of the superior court, or, where the justices refuse, authorises the Court of Queen's Bench, by rule, to order the case to be stated, but makes no provision for payment of the costs of preparing the case—a duty which will devolve on the justice's clerk, or for the justice's costs, in case the court should discharge the rule. The Committee directed the Secretary to communicate with the promoters of the Bill with a view to its amendment.

In accordance with a suggestion from the Northern Circuit Committee, a special meeting of the Managing Committee, to consider the arrangements for the provincial meeting at Manchester in October next, was fixed for the 17th instant.

Mr. James Wickham, of Winchester, has been unanimously elected a member of the Association.

YORKSHIRE LAW SOCIETY.—Summer Assizes, 1857.

Report of the Committee of Management presented to a General Meeting of the Society held in York, on Tuesday, the 14th of July, 1857; JOHN MARSDEN, Esq., of Wakefield, in the Chair.

The Commissioners appointed to consider the subject of the Registration of Titles with reference to the sale and transfer of land, have at length made their Report, which is in favour of the adoption of the project submitted to them.

It will be recollected that this Commission was recommended by a Select Committee of the House of Commons, to whom Bills for the Registration of Assurances, and facilitating the sale and transfer of land, were referred in the Session of Parliament of 1853.

Soon after the appointment of this Commission, a petition, signed by many of the leading bankers, merchants, tradesmen, and inhabitants of the principal towns of Yorkshire, was presented to the House of Commons, in which the petitioners stated that they were opposed to any metropolitan or central registration of deeds, as they believed that the same would be highly prejudicial to the trade and commerce of the country, and interpose insurmountable difficulties in the way of dealing with real property for the various purposes for which, in commercial and manufacturing towns and districts, it was made daily available.

The petitioners also stated that the Commission was so constituted as not to insure confidence, inasmuch as members of the House of Commons who were on the Select Committee, who represented large commercial constituencies, and who were known to be opposed to metropolitan or central registration, were not comprised in such Commission; whilst other parties were appointed who were not members of the House, but gentlemen of the legal profession resident in London, one of whom had been examined as a witness before the Select Committee, and propounded views in favour of a system of metropolitan registry.

Your Committee cannot, within the limits of their Report, examine in detail the recommendations of the Commissioners: they do not, however, believe that the project, if adopted, would be of benefit to the community at large, and it does not appear by any means clear that the Commissioners themselves have any very distinct idea of the mode in which their project can be carried out, or that, if their recommendations were adopted, they would lessen the cost of conveyancing, whilst the tendency would be to transfer that description of business to London. The Commissioners have also fully justified the want of confidence of the Yorkshire petitioners, not only by the recommendations contained in their Report, but by the fact that they have not had before them a sufficient amount of evidence from the principal solicitors in the country, by which body nearly the entire conveyancing of the country is conducted.

During the last twenty years numerous efforts have been made to pass an Act for the Registration of Assurances; and some landowners have been led to believe that such a measure is requisite for facilitating the sale and transfer of land, and for lessening the burden thereon. Your Committee, therefore, recommend to public attention the following important passage in the Report of the Commissioners:—

"Having regard to the many and great objections to a Registration of Assurances, which we have considered, we cannot be surprised at the growing conviction that a measure of that description will not be adequate to answer the purposes for which registration is required. The unmanageable accumulation of deeds and instruments in one place; the certainty of an immediate addition to the expense and delay of every transaction relating to land; the risk of involving titles, at no distant period, in increased complication and embarrassment; the apprehension of disclosures, especially in cases of private settlements and family arrangements; and the diminished opportunity of obtaining loans on security of the land for occasional purposes; the risk of disturbing possessory titles, and the complication of indices, have naturally induced the distrust of a scheme, the supposed advantages of which, as an additional safeguard and security to titles, are more or less speculative or remote. Even those advantages are much exaggerated while the positive objections are certain and immediate."

The above description of the consequences of the adoption of a scheme for the Registration of Assurances is quite true, and the testimony of the Commissioners on the subject is valuable. They will, however, have great difficulty in showing that their own scheme is not open to many of the objections they have so forcibly pointed out.

The Committee have been in communication with the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association on the subject of costs in criminal prosecutions; and, as it is well known that the scales of costs in different counties vary considerably in the amounts allowed, and that in some places the allowances are very inadequate, it is intended to make application to the Secretary of State for the Home Department to adopt an uniform scale throughout the country, under the authority of the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55.

Soon after the assembling of the new Parliament, the Lord Chancellor introduced a Bill in the House of Lords to amend the law relating to Probates and Letters of Administration in England. This Bill appears likely to be passed into a law during the present session, and the long-attempted reform of the ecclesiastical courts will, in that case, be accomplished. During the last twenty years this subject has been in agitation, and this Society has invariably opposed all the measures introduced for centralising the deposit and proof of all wills in London.

Whilst it is satisfactory to the Committee to report that the Bill, as amended, seeks to establish district registries throughout the country, having jurisdiction to a much greater amount than proposed in any Government measure during the abovementioned period, yet they hope that provision will be made for the district courts having jurisdiction unlimited in amount, and including all descriptions of personal property within the United Kingdom, so that one probate may in all cases suffice.

DUBLIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)

THE BROADSTONE MURDER.

Full seven months have now passed away since a general horror and consternation was caused by the news that an unoffending and much respected officer of the Midland Great Western Railway had been brutally murdered in the cashier's office at the Broadstone terminus; nor was the discovery that several hundred pounds had been abstracted by the murderer required to convince those who knew anything of Mr. Little's character that plunder, and not personal animosity, had originated the crime. It will be remembered that unprecedented efforts were made to trace the criminal. The entire force of police and detectives seemed to be at work for some weeks endeavouring to solve the mystery; numerous conferences took place between the Crown Solicitor and chosen constables from London as well as from Dublin; and even the Attorney-General for Ireland condescended to visit the premises at Broadstone and assist in the inquiry. All these attempts proved, however, fruitless; and although the public excitement was at one period revived by the publication of authentic likenesses of a certain hammer and razor which had been discovered by the police in an adjoining canal, still nothing could be found to bring home the crime to the door of any one in particular. It is true that the myrmidons of justice were all agreed on one point—that the criminal was well acquainted with the railway premises, and was—a thousand to one—an employé of the company, daily frequenting the scene of the tragedy. A most unpleasant cloud of suspicion consequently rested on Mr. Little's numerous fellow officials, and the garden plots of several of them were even dug up in search of the plunder; but all in vain.

A fortnight since, as our readers are aware, the subject was revived in the minds of all by a most remarkable confession voluntarily made by the wife of a workman living on the railway premises at Broadstone. This woman declared that her husband had committed the murder, and had on the same evening informed her of what he had done. To corroborate her statement she described the particular spot on the premises where the stolen property had been secreted; and to the surprise of the police (who knew very well that they ought to have made a closer search in the first instance) a considerable sum in notes and gold was accordingly discovered in the place indicated. There are, of course, many advantages to be derived by the public from the existence of a highly trained and efficient police force; one disadvantage, however, proceeds from the investigation of crimes where a handsome reward frequently holds out peculiar inducements, and where, in any case, promotion is the anticipated result of superior intelligence, and it becomes an object of ambition with each constable to procure the conviction of the prisoner. We do not intend here to infringe on the wholesome rule so generally observed by the press, of not commenting on the evidence until the result be finally made known; it is, however, allowable to criticise the means made use of to procure a conviction, and the manner in which the case for the prosecution is prepared. The first circumstance which calls for remark in connection with the investigation of the prisoner Spollen's case before the magistrate is, that in the possession of the prisoner, at the time when he was taken into custody, there were found eight sovereigns—two of them soiled in a noticeable manner, the other six in no way remarkable, and admittedly none of them to be identified as having belonged to any person other than the prisoner. Now the police, in their prosecutional eagerness, seized on all the aforesaid coins; when, therefore, the prisoner was brought up, no legal assistance for him had been, or could, at first be procured. We apprehend, that, on a mere suspicion, without any corroborative fact that this money formed part of the plundered property, it was illegal to deprive the prisoner of all means of obtaining professional advice to meet the fearful charge so suddenly brought against him; and even if any portion of the money seemed to be so marked as to render it probable that it would be required in evidence, the impounding process should have been limited to such coins only.

This, however wrong in principle, proved of little practical consequence, as attorney and counsel were subsequently retained for the accused. The next circumstance calling for animadversion is of greater importance. Instead of bringing the prisoner at once before a magistrate, the police detained him for a purpose thus described by his counsel, Mr. Curran, in his address to the Bench yesterday—"It was known to the police that the statements of the wife could not be made evidence at law against her husband; but, to make her story available, she was brought to the police-office, in order that a discussion might take place between the husband and wife, every word of which was treasured up by the police, in order that her words, uttered in the prisoner's presence might be used as evidence quantum valeant." That such really was the object in view, appears the more probable when it is remembered, that, on the first hearing of the charge, although the wife's evidence was, of course, excluded, still several criminatory expressions used by her at the police-office in her husband's presence were repeated to the magistrates by the police-officers, and given in evidence against the prisoner. These expressions, which, of course, gave rise to a strong prejudice against the accused, ought, we apprehend, to have been altogether excluded from the case. Police officiousness was here allowed to violate a fundamental maxim of justice. Our law humanely and wisely forbids the testimony of the wife from being received against her husband; but it is virtually repealing this law if the husband and wife are to be confronted in a police-office, and the accusations of the latter are to be remembered by a bystander, and repeated on oath from the witness-box on a solemn investigation before the magistrates.

The third circumstance calling for remark, arises out of a practice not uncommonly resorted to in Ireland when it is considered important to secure the testimony of witnesses who, from their juvenility, or some other reason, are considered to be in danger of being tampered with. In such cases, the individuals concerned for the prosecution, if they possibly can, adopt the simple expedient of locking up the said witness in safe custody until such time as their evidence is required. An illustration occurs in the case we are now considering; the son of the prisoner Spollen is asked why he did not go away after his first interview with the police-superintendent? He answered, that "he wanted to go away, but the constable left in charge of him would not let him." Thereupon, counsel for the prisoner reminds "the force" of a well-known case of Dixon v. Franks, tried last year, where a stipendiary magistrate had detained a child of the plaintiff, by way of making sure of his evidence; and for such detention the plaintiff brought his action, and recovered very heavy damages. In the present case, the presiding magistrate appears fully conscious of the blunders into which the zeal of his subordinates had led them; and he explains that the magistracy and the executive police are distinct in their authority and functions. As to the legality of this mode of dealing with the witnesses, his Worship significantly says, "I have just been looking over the 32nd sect. of the Act of 5 Vict., which enacts, 'that every person taken into custody by any of the Dublin police force without a warrant, except for the purpose of ascertaining the party's name and residence, shall be delivered into the custody of the constable in charge of the nearest station-house until he shall be brought before a divisional justice to be dealt with according to law.' All I will say is, that this witness was taken into custody, but was not brought to the nearest station-house, nor was he brought before a divisional justice to be dealt with according to law."

From the evidence adduced at the several examinations, it is clear either that the prisoner is justly charged, or that his wife is engaged in a plot against him; and the evidence points to the latter, at least, as clearly as it does to the former conclusion. In an inquiry so fearfully narrowed down to a single alternative, the prisoner stands in need of every indulgence afforded by our law. The hardship becomes, then, the greater when every point is stretched against him—when his means of defence are taken away—when the words of his accuser, though not legal evidence, are quoted against him—and his witnesses are locked up under the custody and tutorship of the police. It is fortunate for the accused that the present inquiry is but a preliminary one; and he may, whether innocent or guilty, look forward to a fair and impartial trial by a jury of his countrymen.

EDINBURGH.—(From our own Correspondent.)

The Town Council of Edinburgh has taken up the question of the regulation of the Court of Session business; and it would seem that their views are to be supported in Parliament by Mr. Black, one of the city members. It is fortunate that this movement has taken place, not because the views taken up are sound, but because it will give time for the consideration of an important principle, and provoke discussion in regard to it. It may also, perhaps, tend to put a stop to the hurried and inconsiderate course of legislation which has marked the progress of the Lord Advocate during the last and present session of Parliament. A course all the more inexcusable, because the legal bodies in Scotland are perfectly willing to discuss, in a calm and liberal spirit, all questions of legal reform that may be mooted, come from what quarter they may. There are other symptoms besides this that the public do not mean to allow important questions to be legislated upon and disposed of without consideration, as heretofore, without an energetic protest. We may instance as one symptom, the change of opinion which has taken place in regard to the Lord Advocate's Lunacy Bill, on account of the repeated exposure of exaggerated statements in the report upon which the Bill is founded, and of the better knowledge which has been acquired of the unnecessary, imperfect, and anomalous provisions of the Bill, coupled with its most cumbrous and expensive machinery. Many of the public prints characterise the Bill as a gross job to acquire patronage; and it has been averred that it has been prepared to oblige an English friend; but these are probably concoctions which have no foundation in fact, and which are merely circulated for the purpose of prejudicing the measure.

In making these observations, however, it is right to state that it is the impression of the great majority of the well-informed portion of the public in Scotland that advantage was taken of the excitement created by the publication of the Report of the Lunacy Commission for Scotland, many of the statements contained in which have met with the most emphatic and indignant denial on the part of men worthy of the utmost confidence, to attempt to force the crude measure founded upon that Report through Parliament before any opportunity had been given for considering or criticising it. And there can be no doubt that the course followed has materially damaged the confidence felt by many in the Lord Advocate. There are other symptoms, besides those before mentioned, of the determination of the public to look more carefully into their own affairs than they have hitherto done, although they have still much to learn. But to return from this digression to the Court of Session Business Bill, it may be observed, that those who oppose the Lord Advocate's present Bill, refer to the provisions of the Act 2 & 3 Vict. cap. 36, which enact, that it shall be in the power of the Court of Session, "if there shall be arrears of business in the said court, or as the state of business otherwise may require, from time to time to direct by act or acts of sederunt, that the winter and summer sessions of the Court of Session, or either, shall be extended, and to specify the time or times of such extension, and the precise duration thereof, and to direct that such extension shall apply either to the whole Court of Session, or to either of the divisions thereof, or to all or any of the Lords ordinary;" under this limitation, that any such extension of sittings shall not exceed two months in any one year, and that her Majesty, with consent of her Privy Council, may, from time to time, "order and direct the extension of the duration of the sittings of the said court, or either of the divisions thereof, or of all or any of the Lords ordinary," to the same extent, as furnishing a sufficient remedy for the present state of affairs if put into effectual operation; for it is admitted on all hands that there have not been two months of extended sittings since the Act passed. No doubt if the sittings had been extended to the full period allowed by the Act, the arrear of business in the first division of the court might have been very much diminished; on the other hand, there are many persons, whose opinion is entitled to much weight, who believe that such extension of sittings by the first division of the court would only have had the effect of drawing away the rest of the business from the second division, to which parties were induced to resort from the state of business in the first division, and so have left things, after all, in the present unsatisfactory position. But, however this may be, it does seem to be unfair now not to treat the accumulations of seventeen years—for it is that time since the statute was passed—as an exceptional case; and we believe that the public will ultimately come to consider that the Lord Advocate has acted wisely in dealing with the question upon this footing. Of course, the first point to consider in this view of the matter was, how the derangement of business arose, and as there could be no dispute that it originated in the privilege given to litigants to choose their court, the simple question to consider was, whether this privilege was to be continued. If it was resolved not to continue it, the remedy was easy; and the Lord Advocate seems to have resolved to apply it. In this view of the matter, he is understood to be supported by the bar, and he has a few supporters in the other branches of the profession, but, it must be admitted, not many. A few might be induced, however, to change their opinion, if they consider that there is an arrear of two years, or, in other words, about twelve months' work, which would take six years of additional sittings to clear off, independently of any new arrears that might arise, while all this time the other division of the court might be, to a great extent, idle. The sound principle certainly seems to be to treat each division of the court as equally competent for the discharge of the duties imposed upon it; and no doubt they are so in reality, though the one court may be at times more popular than the other. Neither should the fact be lost sight of that the pursuer often chooses a court for reasons which would induce a defender to avoid it; and it certainly does seem to be contrary to sound principle that litigants should be allowed to speculate on the peculiar turn of a judge's mind. We have, in a previous communication, made some remarks upon the mode in which it is proposed to distribute the business; and it is not, therefore, necessary to recur to that subject further than to remark that it appears to us to be a most unwise thing to do, to give one judge power to hand over the cases of his court to another court of equal authority. If the business were equally distributed, each court should be compelled to clear off arrears, and the Act before mentioned might be put in force for this purpose. If the present Bill passes into law as it stands, the court in arrear may seek to burden the other court with its own proper work, which would certainly be a very objectionable exercise of power.

The Crown Suits Bill has been hurried through Parliament, to the great prejudice of the public. It certainly seemed to be only fair that if all the public boards, departments, and commissions in the kingdom should be entitled to sue the public in the name of the Lord Advocate, the public should be entitled to sue them in the same manner; but this Bill gives the public no such compensation. It is to be hoped that some patriotic peer will insist upon a clause being inserted in the House of Lords to secure such a counter right to the public; for no fair opportunity has been given for getting this put right in the House of Commons, the present Bill being another instance of the unfair and hurried way in which Scotch matters are legislated upon.

SOLICITORS' REMUNERATION.

(From a Correspondent.)

Not a few of our body are sick of applying to the great authorities of the law for such modification of the rules of taxation as shall allow time and skill to be taken into account by the Master.

They think that a minister of justice could not face a parliamentary inquiry if he were to continue a system which has been denounced from the Bench, as Lord Langdale denounced our present system in several reported cases, and as Lord Campbell did in Reg. v. Wooller (see Sol. J. p. 496). On the other hand, they see the marvellous spectacle of a Lord Chief Justice condemning rules which have their existence only in the will and ipse dixit of the Bench itself, and yet not moving towards its alteration or improvement.

And, therefore, they say, "Let us have a parliamentary head, whom we may perhaps drive, rather than a judicial one, who will do nothing to mend the evil itself denounces."

Lord Campbell, in his 3rd vol. of "The Lives of the Lords Justices," p. 9, says, as bearing on pay by length:—

"It gradually oozed out in the profession that Dunning's opinions were written by Kenyon, and the attorneys thought they might as well go at once to the fountain-head, where they might have the same supply of pure law at much less cost. Cases with low fees came in vast numbers to Kenyon, and so industrious and ready was he, that they were all answered in a day or two after they were left at his chambers.

"He thus became a very noted case-answerer, and his business in the Court of Chancery gradually increased.

"One serious obstacle which he had to surmount was the brevity with which he drew deeds, as well as bills and answers; for the profits of the attorneys unfortunately being in proportion to the length of the papers which pass through their hands, they are inclined to employ the most lengthy, rather than the most skilful, draftsman. But Kenyon refused to introduce any unnecessary recital, avoided tautology as much as possible, and tried to make the language he employed approximate to that of common sense."

When a Lord Chief Justice writes in this way—when a Lord Brougham, in his evidence before the House of Lords on the Masters' Jurisdiction Bill, states that this system of pay by the folio, as the paramount guide, was the plague-spot of the law—and when the whole body of solicitors petition for its reformation, what a scandal it is that the Court will not amend a system so injurious alike to the public and the profession; and what is to be hoped for, unless we can have the matter brought under some different control.

SMITH'S TRIAL—SCOTCH AND ENGLISH LAW.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—In his communication of last week, your Edinburgh Correspondent suggests that the trial of Miss Smith may have provoked among English lawyers criticisms on criminal practice in Scotland, especially with reference to the application of the rules of evidence. This has undoubtedly been the case, and it cannot be denied that it has been a subject of no very favourable comment among Englishmen, that evidence which would not be admitted before a jury in one of our courts, seems to be treated as sufficient to hang a person north of the Tweed. These observations apply, among other particulars, to the apparently indiscriminate admission of hearsay evidence, of which abundant examples might be culled from the case in question; whereas, as is well known, in England such evidence would, save in certain very exceptionable cases, such as questions of pedigree, be altogether excluded. I do not, however, mean now to enter on the very large question of the comparative advantages of admitting or excluding hearsay evidence as a general rule of practice. In this matter English courts act upon the conviction of the great danger there is in admitting a description of evidence to which, in most cases, extremely little, if any, weight ought to be attached, and of the valueless nature of which a popular and inexperienced tribunal like a jury are apt to be very inadequate judges. But leaving Scotchmen to their practice in respect to hearsay evidence, from which I fear it would be difficult to wean them, there seems, to an English reader of the report of Miss Smith's case, to be other kinds of evidence admitted in Scotland which would certainly be inadmissible here, and in reference to which one would be glad to hear from a Scotch lawyer whether they were admitted on principle or by inadvertence. As an instance I would mention the evidence of witnesses, not experts, as to their opinions and suspicions arising out of facts in the possession of the jury. Thus (I take from the report in a Scotch paper) I find that on Miss Smith's trial a witness (Stevenson) for the prosecution, after stating that the letters, &c., found in L'Angelier's desk caused him to have "a feeling of discomfort," was asked by the Solicitor-General "if his feelings of discomfort pointed to any particular person as possibly guilty?" to which he answered, "that they pointed to a particular quarter—L'Angelier's wife that was to be." Now, surely the effect of the letters and the circumstances disclosed was a question for the jury, and for them alone; and however interesting the conclusions at which Mr. Stevenson arrived may have been, they ought not to have been imported into the case as facts that were to have any effect on the minds of the jury. The admission of hearsay evidence is, I believe, defended on the ground that the jury ought to hear everything connected with the case, and to determine for themselves as to the value of the evidence adduced; but, at all events, the evidence admitted ought to be of some value; and it is difficult to see what weight can be given to the suspicions of a witness on facts in the possession of the jury, and of which, as bearing on the issue before them, they alone are to be the judges. It may be, that the question I have mentioned was admitted merely through the inadvertence of the prisoner's counsel; but the mere fact of its being put raises the inference that its inadmissibility is not so clearly recognised in Scotland as it would be here. In England, as is well known, it is a matter of the commonest practice to have to stop a raw and eager policeman from blurting out to the jury his suspicions against a prisoner. But for a counsel to ask a witness as to his suspicions is unheard of.

Although in general the Scotch courts appear to allow a greater latitude in the evidence admissible before a jury, it is rather strange that in that very important branch of a witness's examination, his cross-examination, the scope of the questions allowed to be put to a witness seems to be much narrower than it is here. The large license practised, perhaps in some cases abused, in England, of eliciting a man's antecedents, as bearing on his credibility, is, I believe, very much limited in Scotland; and this circumstance may account for what has struck many English lawyers as an apparent weakness in cross-examination exhibited by the counsel in Miss Smith's case.

A difference on an important point connected with evidence in criminal cases exists between the procedures in the two countries, as to the manner in which the statement or declaration of an accused person is taken by the committing magistrate; it being allowable, or, more properly speaking, the duty of the magistrate in Scotland, after cautioning the prisoner as to the effect of his answers, to put to him what questions he may think proper; but the subject is, perhaps, too large a one to enter upon in my present letter.

Before I conclude, however, I would correct an error into which many of your contemporaries, legal as well as lay, have fallen, as to the effect of the verdict of "not proven," in Scotland; a very general impression appearing to prevail, that, should further evidence be discovered, a person may, after such a verdict, be again put on his trial for the same offence. This is quite a mistake; the legal effect of the verdict in that respect being precisely the same as that of a verdict of "not guilty." In either case the prisoner is "assoilzied" or acquitted of the charge, and he cannot again be put on his trial in respect of it; for in Scotland, as well as here, the sound principle prevails that no man ought to be twice vexed for the same cause. It is to be hoped that our Scotch friends will not take in unkindness the suggestion, that, as legally the effect of "not proven" is equal to that of "not guilty," it would be well if, as in England, the jury were confined to giving the latter verdict in all cases where the prosecutor has failed to make out his case. Where he has so failed, and the jury cannot on their oath say that the prisoner is "guilty," why give currency to their suspicions—it may be unfounded—merely to blacken the character of the accused? When it is understood that a verdict of "not guilty" simply means that the charge is not substantiated, there cannot surely be any conscientious objection to giving that verdict, whatever the surmises and suspicions of the jurors may be.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

London, 15th July, 1857. AN ENGLISH LAWYER.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—The bankruptcy reports of the daily papers occasionally announce that "Mr. Benham appeared for the bankrupt," or "Mr. Benham appeared for creditors," in cases which differ very widely from the class of business in which I am usually engaged. This occurred, for instance, on Wednesday last, in the report of a meeting in bankruptcy, held on the previous day, before Mr. Commissioner Goulburn, in the matter of Leah Isaacs, cigar dealer, of Piccadilly.

As I am the only solicitor of my name, I ask permission to state in your columns that I did not appear in the case I have cited, or in others to which I have referred.

From inquiries I have made, I have reason to believe that the "Mr. Benham" referred to is a clerk to a solicitor in the City; and if this is so, I submit he has no right of audience before a Commissioner in Bankruptcy.

I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

18, Essex-street, Strand, July 16, 1857. E. BENHAM.

Juridical Society.

This society met on Monday evening, June 22, the Hon. Baron Bramwell in the chair, when Mr. P. A. Smith read his paper on "Methods of Education recommended or adopted by some English Lawyers in the last Two Centuries," of which the following is a short summary:—

Legal education in the Inns of Court, as it formerly existed, was to a considerable extent systematic and collegiate. But in the seventeenth century changes took place. Roger North (in a book written towards its close) speaks of the want of instruction then; and thenceforward students in the Inns have been left very much to their own resources, with such varying aids as friendly suggestions or books could supply. The present system of classes, lectures, and examinations is an exception; but in an enlarged form it is of recent date; and private tuition has, for the most part, dealt more with the practice of law than the principles. During the interval between the ancient system and the present, some of our most eminent lawyers have grown up; and an inquiry into the method which they employed seems not an idle or a fruitless one.

An early notice of one of these methods occurs in Sir Matthew Hale's preface to Rolle's "Abridgment," where he tells of the author that he was of the same society with four other eminent men, and that it was "the constant and almost daily course for many years together of these great traders in learning to bring in their several acquests therein as it were into a common stock by mutual communication."

The necessity for this kind of association in study is not superseded by the occasional talk in the pupil-room on legal topics, which is found in the modern system of private tuition; and there is also too much attention to drawing to allow free scope for a well-weighed system of mutual study. Arrangement and selection are the principal advantages of such a plan; but the tutor's papers have to be taken as they come, and are uncertain as to time and subject-matter. Is it not, therefore, of material consequence that law students with any high aims should find companions beyond the limits of his chambers, and concert with them schemes of reading, cross-questioning, analysing, and discussing, which may be made preparatory or supplemental to the usual routine of work? If authority were needed for the advantages of such a plan, the instance of Sir Samuel Romilly would supply it; who used, with his friend Mr. Baynes, to compare the notes which they took in Court; and, in a little society, consisting only of themselves and two others, they argued and acted as judges in turn—an exercise which he describes as very useful to them all.

Roger North, in the book above referred to, gives advice as to legal education in his time, which is curious, and, in part, useful still. For reading, he recommends the text of Littleton's "Tenures" without comment, and notices Perkins's "Profitable Book," and the book known as "Terms of the Law." For a somewhat later stage, and as lighter subjects, a work on "Ancient Tenures," "Doctor and Student," and "Fortescue de Laudibus Legum Angliæ." For more serious reading, after Littleton, Plowden's "Commentaries," and (to be taken along with these) Fitzherbert's "Natura Brevium," Crompton's "Jurisdiction of Courts," and Staunford's "Pleas of the Crown," with the book at the end "De Prærogativâ Regis," and Manwood's "Forest Law." But with the treatises there should be at hand some illustrative precedents—the "Register Brevium," and some of the books of Entries, as Rastall, Coke, &c. He recommends the Year Book called Henry VII, and some of Sir E. Coke's institutionary pieces, as his "Pleas of the Crown," "Jurisdiction of Courts," and "Comments upon Magna Charta and the Old Statutes." Afterwards, the student might enter upon some of what were then the more modern Reports.

The diligent construction of a common-place book by the student himself, North treats as a material part of his scheme, and reasons in favour of it with considerable force. Another of his expedients is reporting; the student's making his own notes in Court of the material points in cases—first, in a rough note-book, and afterwards in one more carefully kept. A peculiarity in this author's views is his disesteem of Coke upon Littleton, partly as being in effect a ready-made, common-place book, without, therefore, the advantages of one of the student's own making. Some advice on the study of the law of about the same period, and of much greater authority, on account of the person who gave it, is to be found in Sir M. Hale's preface (before noticed) to Rolle's "Abridgment." Sir Matthew Hale enforces the importance of method, and gives an outline of a course of study. "First," he writes, "it is convenient for a student to spend two or three years in the diligent reading of Littleton, Perkins, 'Doctor and Student,' Fitzherbert's 'Natura Brevium,' and especially my Lord Coke's 'Commentaries,' and possibly his Reports; this will fit him for exercise, and enable him to improve himself by conversation and discourse with others, and enable him profitably to attend the Courts at Westminster." Afterwards, he treats of common-placing; and, still later, of the Year Books, among which he mentions as chiefly useful the last part of Edward III., the "Book of Assizes," the second part of H. 6, E. 4, and H. 7. After these, he lets the student come down to Plowden, Dyer, Coke's Reports the second time, and other Reports then lately printed. He advises the student to compare case with case, and the pleadings of cases with the "Books of Entries," especially Rastall's.

Of this scheme of Sir M. Hale's, from which these suggestions are taken, Sir Thomas Reeve (Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in the reign of George II.) writes, that it was the best extant. He himself gives some advice to a nephew, mentioning successive objects which the student may set specially before him.

To turn from courses recommended to courses pursued, and from the special mode of studying English law to the auxiliary studies which eminent lawyers have taken as introductory or collateral. Here two instances occur, as among the most obvious and common—History, and the Roman Civil Law. As to the latter, we read of Sir M. Hale, that "he set himself much to the study of the Roman law; and though he liked the way of judicature in England by juries much better than that of the civil law, where so much was trusted to the judge, yet he often said that the true grounds and reasons of law were so well delivered in the Digests, that a man could never understand law as a science so well as by seeking it there, and therefore lamented much that it was so little studied in England."

Distinct authorities may be cited as especially pertinent to other branches of knowledge proper for the student:—Lord Somers, as an authority for the study of constitutional law; Lord Mansfield, for an enlarged view of the study of general history; Chief Justice Wilmot, as an attractive example of the consistency of studious and scholarly tastes, with fitness for eminent legal position and duties; Sir Wm. Blackstone, as one who, failing at first of professional success, was afterwards greatly assisted in arriving at it, by the laborious study of books—coupled in his case, it is true, with an especial skill and taste in the use of written language.

To any one who should doubt whether a comprehensive cultivation of general literature is suitable to a lawyer, Sir Samuel Romilly's may be mentioned as an eminent instance. The extent of his studies would incline a reader to doubt the account of them, if coming from unknown testimony; but we have his own authority for that account.

Both Sir Samuel Romilly and Sir Wm. Jones are leading examples of attention to oratory with a view to the bar; and Sir William is also memorable as an authority for the study of foreign law, both ancient and modern.

It is surely reasonable to expect to find instances of a widely extended pursuit of knowledge in the members of such a profession. The studies and duties of the English bar seem to justify, if not to require, it. Real property law is connected with the history of feudalism; constitutional law, with that of the English Government, and with the principles of government in general; commercial law, with the growth of trade and manufactures; criminal law, with the discussion and application of moral rules. The business of an advocate brings him into contact with the examination of the motives and dispositions which occasion or modify human actions; and some analytical study of the mind of man in the abstract seems not useless, with a view to such an employment. Again, it is almost too little to say that the laws relating to contracts, to trusts, to partnerships, to frauds, and to other classes besides, derive illustration from a comparison with the laws of Rome. There are such points of resemblance and connection, that a moderate amount of time spent on the civil law is among the most obvious of preparatory studies. And it is not these more cognate studies only that are fitted to be of real advantage to a lawyer;—versatility and enlargement of mind are of use in professional duties, and so is a cultivated and ripened taste. It could scarcely be said with truth, of any branch of practical science, that it could not be of valuable service to an advocate; and the advantage is real, though it may perhaps more easily escape attention, of gaining an acquaintance with all wholesome and sterling literature (in so far as such a habit does not trench on more essential studies), as tending to raise the tone of the mind generally, and to make it more influential on others, on account of a genuine superiority.

With respect to a deliberate cultivation of the power of public speaking, there seems reason to doubt the wisdom of the present comparative neglect of it. Several causes minister to this. One is, an idea that eloquence, as well as poetry, is allotted to some favoured persons only; and that there is something of conceit in the attempt to cultivate the power of speaking, as implying pretensions to such an exceptional talent. But it may be answered, that it is well that those who would never be great orators should yet speak with correctness, and clearly; that there is some inconsistency in a a man's going to the bar at all (except as chamber counsel) if he disclaims even a moderate aptitude for speaking; and that it is not desirable either for the client's interests or the barrister's reputation, that the first dubious attempt should be made in a case where there are practical results immediately involved. Whether prepartion and practice be more or less valuable with a view to make a really powerful speaker, they seem the proper means for correcting actual faults of style, and for supplying the degree of confidence, without which good enough materials will not be well handled. And in this, as well as many other things, it is probably true that he that aims high will shoot high, though he shoot not so high as he aims.

The ancient law books recommended by the authorities before cited, are now seldom seen in the hands of practical lawyers, or, perhaps, even of practical students. But it seems strange that this neglect has prevailed so greatly. Is it really the case that nearly all which is of much value in them for present practical use, is to be met with in a serviceable form elsewhere? Or is it not rather that students, disgusted with their supposed dryness, and unable at first to tell what parts of their contents are obsolete, do not fairly test their worth?

Whatever opinion be entertained upon this point, it will scarcely be doubted that there is at least some reason for the importance attributed to companionship in study—the companionship of a few carefully chosen associates, in a hearty, assiduous prosecution of learning—if both general and legal, so much the better, but of legal studies at any rate.

Congenial men, resolutely set upon such a plan, would be likely to place their standard of attainments high, and to arouse in one another tastes for various kinds of excellence, which at first were not common to them; a friendly criticism might detect and expose weak points in their several theories or plans, while there was still time to change; and the discouragements which attend upon the lonely student would be lightened by the consciousness that others were struggling upwards amidst like difficulties, and with like aims. Wearied and refreshed by turns, but seldom all together, such comrades, on the long and rugged ascent which leads to excellence in our profession, might be likely to find their journey less trying and more speedy than that of the traveller who passed on from point to point alone.

The energy which sometimes accompanies loneliness, and seems almost to outweigh its disadvantages, can hardly be unattainable amidst more social studies, while these may increase its value by giving a better direction to its efforts. And not the least pleasant attendant on such a course might be its retrospect, when, in the possession, if not of success, yet at least of the merited friendship of companions more successful than himself, the student should retraverse in memory the old path—rich to him not only with recollections of energy and patience, and of a liberal and philosophical pursuit of the profession, but also with far-extended recollections of the sympathy and esteem of his fellow-travellers. This the lonely student, however successful, would want.

Baron Bramwell, Mr. Prendergast, Mr. Daniel, Q.C., and Mr. W. M. Best took part in the discussion which ensued.

United Law Clerks' Society.

The Twenty-fifth Anniversary Festival of the United Law Clerks' Society was celebrated on Friday, the 26th of June, at the Freemasons' Tavern, under the presidency of the Right Hon. Sir Alexander Cockburn, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. About 300 gentlemen sat down to dinner, and among the company present were—Mr. Roundell Palmer, Mr. J. Locke, M.P., Mr. Montagu Smith, Mr. Cochrane, Mr. Doyle, Mr. Wingfield, Mr. Rose, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Street, Mr. Coulthard, Mr. Lee, Mr. Purvis, Mr. Steere, Mr. Southgate, Mr. Smale, Mr. Maugham, Mr. Harwood, Mr. Baker, Mr. Dolman, Mr. Stuart, and other gentlemen.

After the usual loyal toasts had been proposed by the Chairman,

Mr. ROGERS, the Secretary, read the Annual Report of the proceedings of the Society.

The CHAIRMAN said:—Gentlemen, I have now the honour to propose to you the toast of the evening, "Prosperity to the Association whose anniversary we have met here this day to celebrate; and I am quite sure that no language that I could use could say more in favour of this Association than the Report which you have just heard read. Its simple language, but most interesting facts, must satisfy every one of the excellence of this institution. It is one, the object of which has the highest claims upon our consideration and regard. Its object is to enable a laborious and most meritorious class of men to make provision against the hour of infirmity, sickness, and need, for themselves and for their families—a class of men but for whose labours the administration of the law, yes, and, I may add, the business of society, could hardly go on; but as to whom, many of them, in spite of their exertions, in spite of their laborious industry, the casualties and chances of life must often place in the position of adversity and need. The object of this Society is to relieve them from such occasions of necessity and distress, and to enable them, by a participation in the benefits of this Association, to escape the painful necessity of having recourse to eleemosynary assistance; in other words, it is to encourage prudence, forethought, and independence amongst a class of men especially deserving of our attention and respect. We have heard from the Report which the Secretary has just read to us, in how many instances infirmity, sickness, and want have been alleviated and succoured by the timely intervention and aid of the funds of this Society; how often, in the case of sudden and unforeseen death, the pangs and bereavements consequent upon it have been, to a certain extent, alleviated by the removal of present distress, and by affording an opportunity to the widow to secure for herself and orphan children the means of present support. It is impossible to conceive an association gathered together for a better or for a more benevolent purpose, or one which is more deserving of the assistance and co-operation of all persons who have the feelings of benevolence and humanity practically at work in their hearts. I trust that this Society will never want the support and encourgement of all those members of our common profession who are happily removed, in all human probability, beyond the reach of any such contingencies as those to which I have referred. It is for our common benefit, and for our common honour, that the poorer members of our profession—those who have the least chance from fortune, or from the position in which they are placed, of realising the higher gains and profits of our common order—I say it is for the interest and honour of us all, to lend a helping hand, and give our encouragement and support, to those who are more in need of it than we are ever likely to be; and I rejoice to see that so many of the profession who, as I have said before, will not, in all human probability, ever require the assistance of this Society, have so readily and so cheerfully come forward to render them every assistance. That it may have that assistance, and that it may ever continue to flourish as one of the best and most valuable institutions which the benevolence of this country, and the sense of the importance of the objects of the Society have brought forward, encouraged, cherished, and established, we must all sincerely hope; and I trust to see that it never will be wanting in that encouragement, but that it will last as long as our common profession lasts for the benefit of those whose circumstances render it necessary for them to have recourse to its assistance. I am sure you will all receive the toast that I have now the pleasure to propose to you—namely, "Prosperity to the United Law Clerks' Society"—with heartfel tinterest and common acclamation.

The toast met with the most enthusiastic reception.

Mr. ROUNDELL PALMER.—My Lord Chief Justice and Gentlemen, I have been desired to propose the health of the "Lord Chancellor and the other Patrons of this Society;" and in doing so I feel some envy, I confess, of those who are able to put in the old familiar plea that they are unaccustomed to public speaking, because undoubtedly I have not that excuse to offer for a short speech, for it has fallen to my lot to have been present on several of your anniversary festivals. On the occasion of the last but one, I was called upon to propose the very same toast to your notice; but as the same feelings occur to me now which I then endeavoured to express, and as I feel that some persons may think that they are going to have the same speech over again, I do not propose to make a long speech upon this occasion. Indeed, it is rather an ambiguous position in which I am placed, in proposing this toast, for I find that the patrons of the Society consist, as they ought to consist, of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Lyndhurst—who has in past times filled that office—every judge who now adorns the Bench, either on the common law or equity side of Westminster Hall, some of the ornaments of the ecclesiastical courts, the Attorney-General, and, I have no doubt by this time, the Solicitor-General—although his name does not appear as such at present—and all the Benchers of all the Inns of Court, of which latter body it is my good fortune to be one. Therefore, I am in the somewhat difficult position of having to call upon you to drink my own health. I do not, I am sure, express my own feelings simply, but the feelings of the distinguished persons with whom I am humbly and unworthily associated in this list, when I say that they feel it an honour to themselves that they should be permitted to be placed at the head of this Society, to show the honour which they feel for the class to which this Society belongs, and for whose benefit it is instituted. The higher men may have the good fortune to rise in the profession to which we all belong, the more every day must they know and feel, and have opportunities of observing, the inestimable value—to themselves, in the first place, and in the next place to the public, whom we all endeavour to serve—of the class of law clerks for whose benefit this Society was established: a class in numbers, certainly, exceeding all others in the profession, and in importance, if we consider the indispensable necessity of their services, and the equally indispensable necessity for that intelligence, integrity, fidelity, and affection with which they discharge them. Whether we consider those things as the need of the public and of the profession, or, on the other hand, the manner in which that need is supplied, I take the liberty of saying they are a class which, in point of importance and in point of value, ought not to be put—at least not by any but themselves—below any other of the various classes who contribute to the common objects of this profession. We, especially, who have personal and everyday intercourse with them, whether we consider the clerks of solicitors who attend us and instruct us, and assist us to understand the business which we have to do, or whether we consider our own clerks, the clerks of barristers, of whose services words would fail me if I were to attempt to speak as I feel from experience—I say, whether we consider the one or the other of them, we cannot but feel that nothing which we can say, and nothing which we can do, can be too much to express the value which we feel for their services as a class, or the good which they do to society at large. Entertaining those sentiments, I say, for myself, that it has always been to me a great gratification to be able to take part in these meetings since I first was invited to do so; and I cannot but feel that the circumstance of the whole of the distinguished ornaments of the profession having in a body unanimously placed themselves at the head of this Society, is a testimony so distinct and so important to its value and to its merits, that you, I am sure, will be glad upon this occasion, as well as upon every other, to acknowledge that testimony by drinking their health; and so, on the other hand, it may well excuse those who are called upon to propose this toast from dwelling at any length upon the value of this Society to ourselves and to the public at large. I am sure you will cordially join in drinking the health of the "Lord Chancellor and the other Patrons of the Society."

Mr. MONTAGU SMITH.—Gentlemen, the next toast has been intrusted to me, and I can assure you I accept the trust with the greatest satisfaction, for my task is a most easy one. I speak from my own heart, and I am sure I speak to yours, when I ask you to drink health, long life, and happiness to the distinguished judge and the warm-hearted and amiable man who is your president to-day. Gentlemen, I am sure I could leave that toast to you without another word; but, having joined the Western Circuit at a very early period, when the present Lord Chief Justice was a young man, whose star was just rising above the horizon, I should not do justice to my own feelings if I did not express the pride and pleasure which I naturally feel in the position I now occupy in proposing his health to your acceptance this day. The feeling of pride and affection which we felt for him was well founded—we had a feeling of pride that one so distinguished should have risen from our ranks—and we felt affection for one whose genial temper, whose polished conversation and sallies of wit, so long enlivened our society. Great men had left us. Wilde and Follett, distinguished men in the profession, had risen from the Western Circuit; and it was my lot to see this star of the Western Circuit rise in all its brilliancy, and with equal rapidity with those which had preceded him; and, gentlemen, the echoes of his eloquence had scarcely died away in the west when we heard his voice in that assembly which is the highest and most popular in the world, and in which the force of his arguments and his many talents had placed him in the foremost rank. I believe that our most distinguished chairman would have been well pleased there to have remained; but that fate was not destined to him, and he is now placed in a position in which he manifests that he has all the qualities which should distinguish a judge combined. Gentlemen, I am sure you will all agree with me, from the highest man in the profession down to the lowest, that in that illustrious individual has been found combined the firmness of the magistrate with the urbanity of the gentleman; and I am sure that not only have all those who have practised before him felt that, but no suitor has left his court, even the unsuccessful one, without admiring the patience, the temper, and the excellence which has presided at his trial; if I may so say, he must have felt that the spirit of justice had presided, and that, if he has failed, he has failed because his case has been a bad one. I am sure you will join with me in drinking, with the utmost enthusiasm, the health of our distinguished president.
