there was no reason to apprehend that any danger, or any injury to private character, would result. The noble and learned lord concluded by moving for a select committee, to consider whether the privilege now enjoyed by reports of the proceedings of courts of justice might be safely and properly extended to reports of the proceedings of the two Houses of Parliament, and of any and what other assemblies or public meetings, under any and what conditions or restrictions.

Lord WENSLEYDALE made a few remarks in support of the opinions expressed by Lord Campbell.—The motion was then agreed to.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, Feb. 24.

MASTERS AND WORKMEN.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, in answer to Mr. Pellatt, that the statutes relating to masters and workmen had been consolidated by the Statute Law Commissioners, and a bill with that object was under consideration, and he believed would be introduced into Parliament; but he was not aware that the Government had other measures on the subject in contemplation.

SUITS AT LAW AND IN EQUITY.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said, in reply to Mr. Phillimore, that he should be exceedingly glad to promote any inquiry likely to terminate in abolishing the technical distinction between suits at law and in equity, which he believed would be the foundation stone of any effectual reform in our jurisprudence. It did not, however, appear to the Government that that subject could be well considered in a committee; and he trusted that when the department of public justice should be founded, it would form one of the matters of their deliberations.

JOINT-STOCK BANKS.

Mr. WILKINSON asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it was the intention of the Government to introduce any measure in this session which should have the effect of preventing a recurrence of the state of litigation which had taken place in the cases of the Tipperary and Royal British Banks?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that the Government had prepared a measure on the subject of joint-stock banks, which would be introduced as soon as there should be any prospect of its being taken into consideration.

Wednesday, Feb. 25.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION, &c., BILL.

Mr. CRAUFURD moved, in order to remove one of the objections of the Attorney-General for Ireland, the introduction of a provision by which it should be declared that no judgment should be registered in Ireland if it were twelve months old, unless by special leave of the court. In reference to an amendment to be proposed by the Lord Advocate, he would introduce a provision that advantage should not be taken in Scotland of the absence of a party to issue a citation.

Mr. FITZGERALD said he should press the amendment of which he had given notice, to substitute a copy of the judgment for a memorial, when proceedings under the proposed act should be undertaken. He objected to including the courts of Lancaster and Durham.

Mr. CRAUFURD said, that if he agreed to substitute a copy for a memorial, it would be an abandonment of the whole principle of the bill. He acceded, however, to the suggestion to omit the courts of Lancaster and Durham.

The committee divided on the question that "copy" should be substituted for "memorial," in the first clause, when the numbers were—For the amendment, 99; against it, 77: majority, 22:

The House then resumed,

Mr. CRAUFURD stating that he should consider whether he would proceed further with the bill, the principle of which he thought had been seriously injured by the amendment.

Friday, Feb. 27.

BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. CROSSLEY asked the Attorney-General, if it was the intention of the Government to introduce any measure during the present session to amend the law of bankruptcy, by which the present costs may be greatly lessened; and, if it was the intention of the Government to introduce any measure by which creditors, by means of deeds of assignment, which shall not as at present be deemed acts of bankruptcy, may be enabled by themselves to wind up insolvent estates.

Sir R. BETHELL said it was not intended to bring in a bill on the first subject. The second point was under the consideration of the Government.

New County Court Rules.

110.—Distringas and Warrant of Execution against Defendant's Goods for the Amount of Damages for Non-delivery of the Goods (supposing the Goods delivered under the Order and Distringas), and Costs, under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 2.

No. of Plaint ——. No. of Warrant ——. In the County Court of ——, holden at ——.

(Seal.)

Between A.B., Plaintiff, and C.D., Defendant.

Whereas at a Court holden at ——, on the —— day of ——, 185–, the plaintiff obtained a judgment against the defendant for the delivery to the plaintiff, upon payment by the plaintiff of the sum of £—— [here insert the sum to be paid by plaintiff for the delivery] of the following goods, that is to say [here enumerate the goods enumerated in the judgment], and by the said judgment it was found and adjudged that the plaintiff will have sustained damages to the amount of £—— [here insert the sum assessed for damages if the goods be delivered] if the said goods shall be delivered to the plaintiff under this warrant, and to the amount of £—— [here insert the sum assessed for damages in the event of the non-delivery of the goods] if the said goods shall not be so delivered, and judgment being then given for the plaintiff it was thereupon ordered that execution do issue for the delivery to the plaintiff, on payment by the plaintiff of the said sum of £—— [here insert the sum to be paid by plaintiff for the delivery], of the said goods, and that the defendant should not have the option of retaining the said goods upon payment of the said sum of £—— [here insert the sum assessed for damages in the event of the non-delivery of the goods], and that the plaintiff do recover against the defendant the said sum of £—— [here insert the sum assessed for damages if the goods be delivered] for damages and £—— for costs. And it was further ordered, that if the said goods or any part thereof should not be found within the district of this Court, the bailiff of this Court should distrain the defendant by all his lands and chattels within the district of this Court, till the defendant deliver the said goods, or, at the option of the plaintiff, the said bailiff should cause to be made of the defendant's goods the said sum of £—— [here insert the sum found for damages if the goods be not delivered] or a due proportion thereof. And whereas the said goods have not been delivered according to the said order, and the said sum of £—— so payable by the plaintiff as aforesaid has been paid to the registrar of this Court, and the plaintiff has not expressed his option to have the said sum of £—— [here insert the sum found for damages if the goods be not delivered] or a due proportion thereof made of the goods of the defendant: These are therefore to require and order you forthwith to seize the said goods so not delivered as aforesaid, wheresoever they may be found within the district of this Court, and to deliver the same to the plaintiff, and pay over to the defendant upon seizure of the said goods the said sum of £—— [here insert the sum to be paid by the plaintiff for the delivery] which is delivered to you together with this warrant: And if the same cannot be found by you within such district, you are required and ordered to distrain all the lands and chattels of the defendant, wheresoever they may be found, within the district of this Court, and them hold until the defendant shall deliver the said goods to you; and further to make and levy, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the defendant, wheresoever they may be found, within the district of this Court (excepting the wearing apparel and bedding of him or his family, and the tools and implements of his trade, if any, to the value of five pounds), the sum stated at the foot of this warrant, being the amount due to the plaintiff under the said order, including the costs of this execution; and also to seize and take any money or bank notes (whether of the Bank of England or of any other bank), and any cheques, bills of exchange, promissory notes, bonds, specialties, or securities for money of the defendant which may there be found, or such part or so much thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy this execution, and the costs of making and executing the same, and to pay what you shall have so levied to the registrar of this Court, and make return of what you have done under this warrant immediately upon the execution thereof.

Given under the seal of the Court, this —— day of ——, 185–.

8th Dec., 1856. —— CRANWORTH, C.

NOTE.—It is considered to be unnecessary to give any rules with respect to taking acknowledgments of married women, as it is the duty of the attorney employed to prepare the certificate and affidavit, and swear to the latter; and the course to be followed by the judge is laid down in the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74. The only duty for the registrar to perform beside that of swearing the attorney to the affidavit, is that of putting his initials against all ALTERATIONS, INTERLINEATIONS, or ERASURES either in the CERTIFICATE or AFFIDAVIT.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The money market has not maintained that degree of buoyancy and freedom which was promised by appearances at the close of last week, but the opinion prevails that better times are coming. Cheap money is not expected. The numerous proposals made public for very large investments of capital in the dominions of Turkey and Russia, and the necessity of accumulating capital for the purpose of launching and carrying on these undertakings will prevent money from becoming over abundant or cheap. In the English Funds there has been no activity. The variation in prices results in ⅛ per Cent. decline. In Foreign Securities the French 3 per Cents. manifested some advance upon the price of last week, but have fallen back. Others shew a tendency to improvement. On the Stock Exchange, and in the discount market, the demand for money has been active.

From the Bank of England returns for the week ending the 21st instant, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £18,615,155, being a decrease of £181,260; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £10,404,690, shewing an increase of £145,030 when compared with the previous return.

The Board of Trade returns of shipping employed in the last year, show satisfactory results in conformity with the declared amount of exports and imports, being a large general augmentation compared with the years 1854 and 1855. Returns of Excise duties shew a considerable increase in the quantities of malt, spirits, and paper retained for home consumption. To the favourable returns of last year is added one for the first month of the present year which has opened with a large augmentation of business.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in estimating the amount of taxes to be remitted from and after the 5th of April next, according to the present law, varied by the alterations proposed by himself, includes the reduction of 9d. in the pound on Income-tax. But there will remain six months' arrears of Income-tax to be collected. On this ground, as it appears, it was imputed to the Minister by his opponents, that his statement of reduction was false and deceptive. In regard to the repeal of direct taxes, it usually happens that there is six months' payment in arrear; but a man is not fairly liable to the imputation of making a false statement when he says the tax was remitted on the day it ceased to exist.

The opponents of the Government say that the financial year now under consideration, namely,—the year from the 5th April, 1857, to the 5th of April, 1858, is a year of peace. The Ministers say that, it being the first financial year after the termination of war, the expenditure to be provided for partakes more of circumstances belonging to war than to peace; and they refer to the time last year when the army and navy came home, as evidence that there was no great decrease in war expenditure till near Michaelmas last.

In seeking to adopt a line of policy suitable to peace, the bad effects of war become strongly manifested. It has produced a disposition on the part of the public to large and lavish outlay in various ways, making it difficult to return to the amount of expenditure previous to the war. Great deficiencies in the War Department were found when hostilities commenced, and were attributed to the parsimonious grants by Parliament for military purposes. To remedy these deficiencies, a large expenditure in camps, in dock-yards, and in arsenals, has been incurred. Establishments put into action cannot be discontinued without loss, nor carried on without expenditure. Several large amounts of charge for county police, for refer-matories, and other matters, have been transferred from local rates to the Consolidated Fund, and there is to be a considerable addition to the grant for education. The total of items transferred, and intended to be transferred, from local rates to the Consolidated Fund, is set down at more than £2,000,000 annually. This mode of payment now finds favour generally. Nearly all these transfers date since 1853, and when the expenditure of that year is taken as a guide, must be added and provided for by Imperial taxation, as must also the charge for new establishments and additional grants.

The debates in the House of Commons and the division shew a marvellous confusion of parties, and more strength on the side of Ministers than was expected. The imputation that Ministers had made a clandestine reduction in their estimates, has vanished before the light let in by the debates. No doubt remains that the taxes which Ministers propose to retain during the next three years, will produce as much, or nearly as much money as those previously existing. The statement made by Lord John Russell from documents furnished by some of his constituents shews that the duty on tea alone in the three years, according to the scale now proposed, will produce no less than £3,216,000, more than would be produced by the existing law.

The most important question arising out of these financial discussions is whether or not the ways and means of this country will after the lapse of three years of peace be able to go on without an Income-tax. The progressive extension of trade promises an increase of revenue from Customs and Excise. The practical result to be aimed at is to limit expenditure to an amount which will be covered by these duties and other taxes at present rates. Without this result we must submit to a continuation of the Income-tax.

THE DIVORCE AND MARRIAGE BILL.

Of all the unlucky bills which own Lord CRANWORTH as their father, none has proved a greater abortion than the proposed act to amend the law of divorce and marriage. The gravest evils complained of in the present system are the vile abomination known as the action for criminal conversation, and the costliness of the proceedings by which alone a divorce à vinculo can be obtained. The primary conditions on which the marriage bond can now be dissolved are, that the plaintiff should be possessed of an ample fortune, and should be willing to degrade himself by claiming before a jury a pecuniary recompense for his wife's dishonour. The difficulty arising out of the enormous expense of prosecuting successively an action at law, a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, and a bill in the House of Lords, would be to some extent diminished by the Chancellor's scheme; but the cost would probably still remain so great as practically to confine the remedy of divorce to the same classes who have hitherto enjoyed the questionable privilege. So far as it goes in this direction, the change proposed would be a slight, and only a slight, improvement. But when we have said this, we have exhausted the commendation that we can give to Lord CRANWORTH'S measure. The timidity which prevented him from dealing with the class of actions which are the greatest disgrace to our law is enough in itself to condemn the bill. No doubt the difficulty which he felt was, that, if the action of crim. con. were abolished, it would be necessary either to supply its place by a criminal information, or to leave the injury with which it deals without redress or punishment. Either alternative would be preferable to the present practice. It would be better far that the law should hold its hands altogether than that it should stain them by enforcing the payment of money as the price of pollution. But we do not see any insuperable objection to bringing the offence of adultery within the range of the criminal law. A man may be made to answer criminally for a libel; he may be indicted for a trumpery assault; and we are at a loss to see why he should not be liable to similar proceedings for a far graver offence. We do not agree with those who doubt whether public opinion would sanction the only right course—that of meeting the evil, for which a crim. con. action is now the remedy, by punishment instead of pecuniary mulct. But if the doubt were well founded it would be no reason for permitting the continuance of a class of proceedings which serve no purpose but to disgrace the parties, disgust their professional advisers, and gratify the prurient taste of the worst portion of the public.

But it is not only by its omissions that the Chancellor's bill is condemned. He has gone out of his way to introduce new principles which would change the whole character of marriage. It has always hitherto been assumed, even by those who were foremost in demanding increased facilities for separations, that divorce, whether à vinculo, or only à mensâ et thoro, ought to be strictly regarded as a remedy to be applied only to cases which admit of no other treatment. The doctrine that marriage ought, ordinarily, to be an indissoluble tie, has never before been questioned. Lord CRANWORTH would change all this. He proposes to allow husbands and wives to impose upon themselves by mutual consent a virtual decree for divorce à mensâ et thoro. Instead of a means of redressing unendurable wrongs, he would make such a divorce a privilege open to all who might at any moment desire to return to the liberty of single life. Marriage would become a mere optional union determinable at the will of the parties to the contract. The effect of such a voluntary divorce would in some respects, by the operation of Lord CRANWORTH'S bill, be greater than that of a decree by the Ecclesiastical Court under the present law. The wife would become a feme sole to all intents and purposes, except that she would be prohibited from contracting a second marriage. A more ingenious provision for promoting the corruption of society can hardly be conceived than that which Lord CRANWORTH has devised. Even when limited to cases where the Courts are compelled to interfere, the divorce à mensâ et thoro is anything but conducive to the interests of morality; but to offer it freely to all who think they desire it, is to promote every evil which a marriage law ought most anxiously to guard against. What makes the proposal the more strange is, that in all the discussion which has taken place on the law of marriage and divorce, the idea of such a clause has never, we believe, been suggested. It is the Chancellor's own, and we doubt if he will find a single supporter in his anti-matrimonial crusade.

It would be idle to criticise the details of a bill whose principle is certain to be rejected; and it is only fair to say that, so far as the mere procedure is concerned, the new court would probably work better than either the Ecclesiastical Courts or the House of Lords. There is a provision empowering the court to try matters of fact itself with the assistance of a jury, or at its option to direct an issue. By another clause the evidence is to be taken orally by the court, or to be given by affidavit, subject to an oral cross-examination. This is no doubt the true principle for any tribunal; and it would be a vast improvement in the practice of the Court of Chancery if it were introduced there in the place of the present clumsy and unsatisfactory procedure. The judge who tries the cause ought himself to hear the evidence given. Any one who, after hearing a witness before the examiner, listened to a judgment founded on his deposition, must have been painfully convinced of the extent to which this unfortunate system vitiates the decisions of the ablest judges. It is impossible, even for the most unexceptionable examiner, to convey to the mind of another the true weight and value of oral evidence by means of a written deposition; and if Lord CRANWORTH would bring in a bill to introduce into his own court the practice as to evidence which he intended for the Court of Divorce, he would render a real service to the profession and the public at large.

THE SATURDAY HALF-HOLIDAY.

We have received a pamphlet by Mr. J. R. TAYLOR, law stationer, of Chancery-lane, on the advantages which would accrue to society at large, and particularly to the legal profession, from adopting the plan of leaving off business at one P.M. on Saturday. Probably, we are all of one mind on this subject. Some of us really work too hard—a still larger number think that we do, and we all like to be told so. It flatters our vanity to hear that we are much busier than our forefathers, and when we feel inclined to be lazy, there is no excuse so pleasant or so ready as a character for diligence.

There is always some room for doubt as to the honesty of that species of boasting which consists in self-accusation. No one need feel much alarmed for the safety of a man who blames himself, or lets others see that he is pleased by their blaming him for the rashness with which he runs into danger. We should be sorry to want to borrow money of a gentleman whose friends were in the habit of warning him not to give way to the natural impulses of his noble generosity, and we never could feel the slightest sympathy with the fears of the anxious parents whose most earnest charge to their dear sons is that they will not ruin their health by too severe study. We have, therefore, very considerable doubts as to the genuineness of the cry which is so widely raised in the present day against overwork. In the last generation, the courts of equity sat till 10 at night, and equity draftsmen, pleaders, and conveyancers kept their chambers open till the same hour. The routine work of a solicitor's office might, perhaps, be brought to a close rather earlier than it usually is at present; but to the solicitor himself, if he is in considerable business, holidays, half or whole, must be of rare occurrence. We should be pleased to see a Saturday half-holiday generally adopted, but we are by no means fanatically interested in the movement. Mr. Taylor has, we think, pointed out one class upon which the present arrangements bear very hardly—the class of law writers. Their occupation, as our readers are well aware, is precarious and occasional. Sometimes they have days of idleness—then comes a press of work, which generally has to be done at night, and often on a Sunday. Briefs, drafts, and voluminous documents of all kinds, are given out by the various solicitors' houses to the law stationer, to get them properly copied and examined by Monday morning. On one occasion, Mr. Taylor had to get no less than 20,000 folios completed in this interval. His notion of a Saturday half-holiday, therefore, is mainly this—that solicitors ought so to arrange their affairs as to give out what copying they have on Friday night or early on Saturday. We certainly think that this is a reasonable request, and one which all humane persons ought to make an effort to comply with.

We must, however, say, in all good humour, that if Mr. Taylor really wishes to aid the movement in which he takes so much interest, he ought not to make such a fuss about it. He is, we have no doubt, an excellent man, and a very good law stationer; but neither nature nor education have fitted him for authorship. We do not suppose that he meant it so, but his pamphlet reads like an elaborate puff of himself and his own efforts. First there is an address to the reader, signed "J. R. Taylor;" then there is a preface by J. R. Taylor; then there is a report of a meeting, in which Mr. John Robert Taylor made a speech; next we learn what various persons (including Mr. John Robert Taylor) said to Lord Campbell; also how a deputation (of which Mr. J. R. Taylor was a member) waited on Sir G. Grey; then follows a letter from Mr. J. R. Taylor, which appeared in six newspapers; a little further on, John Robert Taylor, citizen and innholder, writes to the Morning Advertiser; then the same small capitals compliment "the inimitable lecture of Dr. Cumming," correspond with Lord Cranworth, the Master of the Rolls, and other eminent persons; and, finally, the Daily Telegraph is produced as a witness to the merits of "Mr. J. R. Taylor, the eminent law stationer of Chancery-lane," who was formerly "treasurer of the District Visiting Society of St. Andrew's, Holborn." Certainly, if Mr. Taylor's left hand does not know what his right hand is about, it must be a very unobservant member.

We do not wish to be unduly severe upon a man who obviously means well, but we must say that the Saturday half-holiday agitators would do wisely to reflect that their case is a very short and simple one. The single sentence—People are too hard at work, and ought to have more rest—exhausts the subject; and there really is no good, but a great deal of harm, in associating a useful movement with such dreary rubbish as fills Mr. Taylor's pamphlet. At a "great public meeting at the Guildhall," the Rev. Doctor Gregg, after informing the meeting that "an Englishman's Sabbath is his glory and his crown" (as if it were a sort of corporation of London, Gog and Magog, or other exclusively English institution), went on to argue that "we must not rush into it" (the Sabbath) "like a horse into the battle, but devote some labour and some pains to antedate it by corresponding antecedents." The reverend gentleman went on to say, that, perhaps if we shut up our places of business in the afternoon of the Jewish Sabbath, it might tend to bring about "the conversion of Israel." And the eminent law stationer himself asks, in his emphatic way, "What man can pass through the Nineveh Court at the Crystal Palace, the Egyptian Room at the British Museum, the New Geological Museum, or the Hunterian Museum in Lincolns-inn-fields, without his mind being elevated above low and sordid passions. He retires, thanking his Maker for his being," &c., &c.—a curious result of the contemplation of cancers, abortions, malformations, and coprolites. It is wonderful indeed that any cause should survive the assistance of such melancholy nonsense; and why Mr. J. R. Taylor cannot state his case quietly and simply, but must insist upon flooding it with these marvellous flights of eloquence, is to us a profound mystery.

Affectation and fine writing are the curse of our very remarkable, but extremely vain and noisy, generation. Fortunately for ourselves, the subjects with which we have to deal are seldom susceptible of what the Americans expressively call "high-feeluting" treatment. It is very hard indeed to find a way into the seventh heaven from reports, handbooks, bills, pleas, and affidavits; but when a subject occurs affecting the moral interests of the profession, we think that all who have an opportunity of doing so are bound to see that it is treated in a simple and manly tone.

Legal News.

Public attention during the past week has been fixed exclusively upon the great debate in the House of Commons, and upon the probable consequences of the defeat of ministers. Legal intelligence of every kind has been delayed or crowded into obscure corners of the daily papers to make room for the many admirable speeches which suspended from day to day the grave event. At length, on Tuesday night, a vote was given which will have many inconvenient results, and among others this, that all hope of carrying any measure of law reform must be laid aside for the present year. The short interval previous to the dissolution will be occupied in passing such acts as are absolutely necessary for carrying on the business of the nation. When the new Parliament meets in May the grand and all-absorbing question will be, which party is to have the majority in it. A fair and decisive battle will have to be fought to confirm the present government in office or to displace them from it, and when that is over and exhaustion succeeds to excitement, the necessary financial legislation will probably be as much as the remaining energy of our representatives will accomplish by the 1st of August. If the prospects of law reform had been brighter at the outset than they were, we should have had greater reason now to lament their untimely ruin. But it cannot be asserted that either the proposals of the Lord Chancellor or his speeches were of such a character as to inspire any very sanguine hopes of his success. If the present Cabinet remains in power, we trust that the necessity will be felt of handling law reform in a more decided and energetic manner. If, on the other hand, the new House of Commons should prove hostile to Lord Palmerston, and the Government should pass into the hands of Lord Derby and his friends, we may feel tolerably confident that law reform will be prominent in the programme of the new Ministers. Indeed, they will have everything to gain by showing themselves more active in reform than those who still call themselves reformers; and they must be very injudicious politicians if they do not improve to the utmost the opportunity which their predecessors will have most unwisely left to them.

On Wednesday evening, a general meeting of the depositors in the Royal British Bank was held for the purpose of obtaining their assent to the compromise proposed by the shareholders, and approved by the committee of depositors. Mr. WYLD, the chairman of this committee, presided at the meeting. He referred to the unhappy conflict of jurisdictions as accounting for the delay which had occurred in distributing the assets of the bank. A dividend of 5s. 6d. in the pound had been paid immediately upon the decision of that contest, and it was hoped that a further dividend of 2s. or 3s. in the pound would be paid within the next two months. If the assets should turn out as well as was anticipated by the accountant, a further dividend of 1s. or 2s. might be realised, and then the estate would, it was believed, be quite exhausted. The chairman then remarked, in terms of fitting reprobation, upon the conduct of certain creditors who were pressing and harassing individual shareholders and driving them into bankruptcy, not merely for the purpose of obtaining payment of the debts due, but, in many cases, to defray enormous law expenses. Some of the wealthiest shareholders, meantime, not being engaged in trade, and, therefore, not being obliged to remain in England, were putting the Channel between themselves and their liabilities to the creditors of the bank. In this state of circumstances, the committee had considered what course would be best for them to pursue. There were three lists of shareholders. The first list comprised the present shareholders, who were liable for all the debts of the bank. The second list consisted of new shareholders, who alleged that they had been induced to subscribe to the bank by fraud, and who, therefore, under eminent legal advice, disputed their liability to contribute. The third list contained those who were not now shareholders, but had been so during a period of three years. In this state of affairs, a composition was proposed by the shareholders. A list had been handed to the committee with the amount of proposed contribution placed opposite to each shareholder's name. That list had been carefully examined, and upon the best knowledge that could be acquired as to the circumstances of every shareholder, the committee had come to the conclusion that the greater portion of the shareholders would, under the pending proposal, have contributed to the full extent of their means. The question now was, whether the creditors would accept a composition of 15s. in the pound. A dividend of 5s. 6d. had been already paid. Another dividend of 3s. would be paid in two months, and the solvent shareholders now proposed to pay 6s. 6d., making in all 15s. in the pound. To secure the performance of this proposal, a deposit had been required of £20,000 cash; and of this sum, more than one half had been subscribed; and it was hoped that the whole arrangement would be completed before the end of April.

The proposal thus brought forward by the chairman was adopted almost unanimously by the meeting, and a resolution was passed to petition Parliament for an act to render the acceptance of the composition by a majority of the creditors binding upon the minority. Such a measure would appear indispensable to give effect to the settlement now proposed, and it may not, perhaps, be unreasonable to expect that the affairs of the Royal British Bank will receive the attention of Parliament even during the short interval that will precede the impending dissolution. Certainly, this unfortunate association may fairly claim the earnest attention of the Legislature to remedy, so far as is now possible, the miserable calamities which have originated in the confusion of our laws, and in the carelessness of those who make or mar them.

Mr. LINKLATER addressed to the meeting an explanation of the steps taken by him to get the assets of the bank out of the hands of the directors, and to place them under the control of the assignees. He said that an attempt had been made to place the property of the bank in Chancery, under the administration of the directors themselves, over whose conduct the creditors would have had no control whatever. If it had not been for a state of the law which rendered such an attempt possible, the depositors never would have heard of him or of a bankruptcy in this case. He disclaimed all interested motives, and declared that he should have neglected a public duty if he had suffered such vast property to be so mismanaged, and he therefore obtained an adjudication of bankruptcy against the bank. From that time the whole proceedings had been under the control of the committee of depositors. He was content to await the result of time to expose and refute the misrepresentations concerning this bankruptcy.

REPORT OF THE COPYHOLD COMMISSION.— This report gives 1,085 as the total number of enfranchisements and commutations between 1841 and 1856, both inclusive,—viz., 487, clerical, 519 lay, and 79 collegiate. The "consideration" for these 1,085 enfranchisements and commutations was a payment in full of £249,253, rent-charges to the amount of £2,962, and 1,223 acres of land.

REPORT OF THE TITHE COMMISSION.—The commissioners have received 7,070 agreements, and confirmed 6,778. 7,037 notices for making awards have been issued, 5,626 drafts of compulsory awards were received (whereof 5,421 were confirmed). In 12,199 districts the tithes have been commuted by confirmed agreements or awards. The commissioners have received 11,767 apportionments, and confirmed 11,760. They have made 1,624 altered apportionments, and confirmed 1,428. They have received 678 applications for the exchange of glebe lands, and confirmed 625 of such exchanges. At the close of 1856 they had confirmed 14,070 distinct mergers of tithes or rentcharges.

ABUSE OF CRIMINAL PROCESS.—A person of gentlemanly appearance surrendered to take his trial at the Old Bailey upon two charges of forgery and perjury. It appeared that there had been business transactions between the defendant and the prosecutor, and that legal proceedings were pending between them; and in order to prevent the defendant from giving evidence at a trial that was about to take place, the prosecutor went before the grand jury at this court, behind the back of the defendant, and obtained the two bills that were now before the court, never intending, however, to proceed with the charges. Notice had been left at the address given by the prosecutor of the intention of the defendant to appear and take his trial, but he had left, and no one was now in attendance to support either of the indictments, and the prosecutor could not be found. The jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

CASES OF BRITISH BANK SHAREHOLDERS.—In re Hill. —This was the meeting for choice of assignees in the case of Jamas Beech Hill, glass and china dealer, of Blackfriars-road. His trade debts are under £300, while his assets are upwards of £1,200; but being a holder of five shares (four old and one new) in the Royal British Bank, and also exposed to executions at the suit of such creditors as have obtained judgments, he was compelled to place his affairs under the administration of this court. The Commissioner said he found that the British Bank had been made a sort of scapegoat, on which many failures had been laid very unjustly. Nothing was more common than for a bankrupt to say "Oh, my failure is owing to the British Bank." Mr. Bagley—That is certainly not the case here, for the whole of this man's debts, irrespective of the claim of the bank, do not exceed £300; and I believe he has money ready to pay into the official assignee's hands double that amount.

In Re Charles Whitehead.—This insolvent, a merchant's clerk, petitioned under the Protection Act. The insolvency was attributed to the failure of the Royal British Bank, and his only liabilities arose from his connexion with it. He was the holder of four shares, and had inserted Mr. Harding, the official manager, as a creditor for £300, being the amount of a call of £75 on each share. Mr. Lee, the official assignee in bankruptcy, was also entered as a creditor for £200 for calls. The insolvent had a claim of £130 against the bank for the balance of a deposit account.

LENGTHY PLEADINGS.—In a late case in the Queen's Bench the declaration contained four counts, and each count was answered by three pleas.—Lord Campbell said it was lamentable that special pleading, which was of great service in raising important questions for the decision of a jury, sometimes tended rather to perplex them. Here was a case in which there were twelve pleas.—Mr. Joyce, as to the pleas, pleaded that he (Mr. Joyce) was "Not Guilty," and in confession and avoidance he alleged that there were four counts in the declaration.—Lord Campbell said that if pleading was so perverted the necessary effect would be that it must be altogether abolished. Nothing could have been more perspicuous than the manner in which the pleadings had been opened, but still the jury could not have the smallest notion of what the question was they were going to try.—Mr. Skinner said he would endeavour to get out of the London fog in which he found himself.—Lord Campbell hoped the counsel would abandon the special pleading, and come to common sense.—Mr. Skinner said that was a high aspiration, but he would endeavour to do so.

COSTS OF A PROSECUTION.—A bankrupt, named Lillicrap, by order of the Court of Bankruatcy, had been indicted for felony in concealing goods, and also for a misdemeanour in falsifying his books. He was acquitted on the first indictment, and counsel thereupon recommended the second indictment to be withdrawn. The costs had been taxed by the Crown-office at £317, and it was asked that the amount should be paid out of the bankrupt's estate and the funds of the Court of Bankruptcy; and an order was made accordingly.

BROKERS OF THE COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—Mr. Samuel Morley, chairman of the Financial Reform Association, lately offered a suggestion that in certain cases the brokers of the court should not interfere in bankrupts' estates. It was the opinion of a large number of the wholesale houses engaged in the drapery trade that their own appraisers were sufficient for every necessary purpose.

DEATH OF SERJEANT WILKINS.—We regret to announce the death of this able and successful advocate, which took place on Tuesday morning, at his chambers, 8, Queen's-Bench-walk, Temple. It will be remembered, that, in many remarkable criminal trials, the deceased serjeant was the zealous and powerful, and often the successful, counsel for the accused. In the most celebrated case of modern times, that of William Palmer, the prisoner was deprived of the invaluable assistance of Serjeant Wilkins by the sudden commencement of that illness which has now ended in his lamented death.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

There being no provision in the Trustee Relief Act (10 & 11 Vict, c. 96) as to the costs of proceedings thereunder, questions have often arisen as to the costs of paying trust funds into court under the act, and also as to the costs of applications for payment out of court of the capital or dividends of such funds; and there have been several decisions on these questions which it may be useful to notice. The subject is suggested by a case before V. C. Kindersley, in re Jones, 5 W. R. 336, which we shall find, in common with many other cases, to rest upon the general rules of the court applying to the costs of executors and trustees. Where the trust fund has been properly paid into court by trustees, under the act, they are, as a general rule, entitled to deduct out of it the costs of paying it in, or to receive their costs of so doing when it is paid out; and where there are interests for life and in remainder, the costs come out of the corpus, not out of the dividends, being expenses incurred in the administration of the fund. In the case of a legacy not previously set apart, the costs of paying in, which, in fact, so far is executing the testator's will, are borne by the residuary estate (see re Cawthorne, 12 Beav. 56; re Staples' settlement, 13 Jur. 273). Though the words of the act are very large as to the power given to trustees of proceeding thereunder, yet they may act improperly by paying a trust fund into court under its provisions, and in that case they will be disallowed their costs. They must not use the act as an engine of oppression against their cestuis que trust, nor attempt to exercise what Lord Truro called, in Kekewich v. Marker (3 Mac. & Gor. 324), "any wanton or unreasonable discretion;" and see Corington's Trusts, 19 Jur. 1157. It is more difficult to induce the court to refuse their costs of paying in money, than their costs of appearance upon petition for its payment out of court by the cestuis que trust (re Heming's Trust, 5 W. R. 33; re Waring, 16 Jur. 652); though the general rule is, that the costs of all proper parties to a petition are payable out of the fund. In re Jones, however, the Vice-Chancellor held that the executor was entitled to the costs of appearing on the petition, but not of paying in. The ground of his decision was, that a legacy had been paid by the executor of a trustee who had received the whole of the residuary estate of the testatrix by whom the legacy had been given. The legatee was a married lady living abroad, and she and her husband gave a general power to their solicitor to act for them in this country. The trustee, who was also residuary legatee, had retained the legacy for many years, and died leaving the respondent in this petition his executor, who said he considered he could not safely pay the money under the power of attorney, the fact being that the risk was infinitesimal, but yet of such a character as to entitle the trustee, according to the doctrine of the court, to protection.

"It was of great importance," said his Honour "not to discourage trustees and executors from paying money into court under the Trustee Relief Act, and from appearing on the petition for payment out; and the court expected and desired that the trustee should appear." The trustee, therefore, was allowed his costs of appearing on the petition, though the Vice-Chancellor appeared to "suspect or have a moral conviction of the motive which actuated the executor, and it might not have been one creditable to him." The principle is, that though the trustee is indemnified and discharged from all responsibility in reference to the monies paid in, as soon as he has paid them into court, yet (as it is provided by the 5th Order, 10th June, 1848), he must be served with a notice of any application by the parties beneficially entitled, in order that he may attend and assist the court. The trustees may apply, under the 4th Order, 10th June, 1848, to distribute the fund paid in by them among the cestuis que trust, but the usual and proper course is for the latter to make the application; though, with their consent, the trustees may not only apply for the payment out, but also ask for a declaration of the rights of the cestuis que trust (Re Cooper, 23 L. J., Ch. 25; Re Gaffee, 1 Mac. and Gor. 541). In re Housman's Trusts, 4 W. R. 274, V. C. Wood allowed trustees making such an application the costs only to which they would be entitled as respondents. We may add that where the fund cannot be administered properly without a suit being instituted, the court will direct a bill to be filed (Fozard's Trusts, 1 Kay and Joh. 233; In re Hodgson, 18 Jur. 786; and In re Woolland's Trust, 18 Jur. 1012). It will not, upon petition, adjudicate upon any charges of breaches of trust against the trustee (Goode v. West, 9 Hare. 378; Re Bloye's Trust, 1 Mac. and Gor. 488); nor whether the amount paid in represents the whole trust fund (Thorp v. Thorp, 1 Kay and Joh. 438).

A case of Wightman v. Whielton (5 W. R. 337) has nearly, though not quite, settled a point of practice which has long been doubtful. The Chancery Practice Statutes had provided that any witness making any affidavit should be subject to cross-examination. They also provided that upon a motion for decree the defendant's answer should, for the purposes of the motion, be treated as an affidavit. In another section it was enacted that on a motion for an injunction, the answer should, for the purposes of the motion, be regarded merely as an affidavit of the defendant. The doubt was, whether in these last two cases the defendant was bound to submit to cross-examination on his answer. Wightman v. Whielton was a case of motion for injunction, in which the defendant had refused to submit to be so cross-examined. In the argument, the case was distinguished from that of a motion for decree on the ground that in the latter case the defendant would be at liberty to read his answer on what would in substance be the hearing of the cause, and that he therefore could not resist the cross-examination. If, however, he were cross-examined on a motion for injunction, the defendant, though allowed to read his answer on the motion, would not be able to do so at the hearing, and the plaintiff would gain an unfair advantage if he were allowed to get a cross-examination which he might use at a stage of the cause where the answer, as such, could not be read by the defendant. The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, expressed a strong opinion in favour of the plaintiff's right to cross-examine. He did not, however, grant the motion for that purpose, but directed it to stand over, with liberty to the defendant to file affidavits, and to the plaintiff to cross-examine on them. Should the defendant file the usual affidavit verifying the answer, nothing more will be heard of the motion; but the judgment may be regarded as almost equivalent to a decision in favour of the right to cross-examine on an answer, in any case where there is a motion for decree or for an injunction.

In Dean v. Morris, 5 W. R. 345, a curious question arose as to the apportionment of costs between two estates which were held by the same trustee on the same trusts. On the decree the costs were ordered to be paid out of the larger fund, and on the present occasion, which was an application by a purchaser of a part of the smaller fund, it was contended on his behalf that the same course should again be followed, or, at all events, that the smaller fund should bear only its rateable proportion. The court, however, held that these being two distinct estates administered in one suit, the general costs of the proceedings ought to be paid out of the two estates in equal shares.

Selby v. Fraser, 5 W. R. 341, is an important decision on a matter of evidence under the new practice. The suit arose out of a contention between two tailors, the plaintiff accusing the defendant of abstracting his custom by certain improper means. The defendant was served with a subpœna duces tecum directing him to produce his books. On the examination the defendant, admitting that he had the books in court, refused to produce them, though he referred to them when he pleased during the examination to assist his memory. V. C. Kindersley held that the defendant was right, and considered that the proper mode of getting the books was by a motion for production, and not by means of a subpœna duces tecum.

Thorpe v. Milligan (5 W. R. 336) furnishes an illustration of the working of the law of landlord and tenant. A manufacturer, while in occupation as tenant from year to year, agreed to take a lease of his mill, with the engines, gas-houses, and appurtenances. In the gas-houses were several retorts and other matters which the tenant had erected before the agreement. On settling the lease in chambers, on a decree for specific performance, the landlord claimed to have the word gas-works introduced into the demise, the effect of which would be, to make the retorts and other tenant's fixtures in the gas-house revert to the landlord at the expiration of the lease. The Master of the Rolls held, that the word "gas-works" was properly introduced, in addition to the words used in the agreement; the gas-works, even though of the natnre of tenants' fixtures, being included in the term appurtenances.

In Armstrong v. Burnet (20 Beav. 424; S. C. 3 W. R. 433), the rule was clearly laid down which distinguishes between the cases where specific legatees of shares in companies take cum onere, and cases in which the general personal estate of the testator is liable to pay future calls, in respect thereof, for the benefit of the specific legatees. Sir John Romilly, M. R., there stated the rule thus:—"Where the interest of the testator, in the subject-matter which he professes to bequeath, is complete, or where it is so treated and considered by him, and by all persons unconnected with it, as in the case of a share in an insurance company, I think that the future calls fall on the legatee, and not on the general personal estate; but where further payments are required to make perfect the interest which the testator professes specifically to bequeath, then I think that the general personal estate is applicable for that purpose." This appears to have been the principle of the distinction recognised in Marshall v. Holloway (5 Sim. 196; Fitzwilliam v. Kelly, 10 Hare. 266, and other cases). In Moffett v. Bates, 5 W. R. 338, a testator gave freehold property and shares in a banking company to his executors upon trust to apply the rents and produce of the same respectively for the maintenance of an infant, during her minority, and afterwards to her separate use, with remainders over. Before the legatee attained twenty-one years of age, the company became insolvent. The executors, after the testator's death, assented to the bequest of the shares—all calls then made having been paid up,—and applied the dividends for the benefit of the infant. The legatee on attaining her majority repudiated the bequest of the shares; and the bill in this case, which was by the executors and trustees, sought the direction of the court, by whom, and out of what fund, a call made in the winding-up of the insolvent bank, which had been found to be a debt from the testator's estate, was to be paid. The residuary legatee contended that it ought to be paid by the specific legatee, and that if necessary the amount required ought to be raised out of the realty devised in trust for the same specific legatee, who argued, on the other hand, that it should be paid out of the residue. V. C. Stuart considered that the repudiation of the shares by the specific legatee on her coming of age threw the burden on the residue, even though the dividends might have been applied during her minority towards her maintenance, about which the evidence was not very clear; and his Honour was of opinion that his decision did not necessarily conflict with the doctrine enunciated by the Master of the Rolls in Armstrong v. Burnet.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

MAGISTRATE—ACTION AGAINST IN COUNTY COURT—REMOVAL OF PROCEEDINGS.

Western v. Sneyd, 5 W. R., Exch., 317.

It is one of the provisions of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44—the act passed in 1848 to protect justices of the peace from vexatious actions for acts done by them in the execution of their office—that any action so brought in a county court must be in the court of the district in which the act complained of was committed. And there is a proviso (sect. 10) that no action shall be brought in any such county court against a justice of the peace for anything done by him in the execution of his office, if such justice shall object thereto; and that if, within six days after being served with a summons in such action, the justice, his attorney, or agent, shall give a written notice to the plaintiff to that effect, "all proceedings afterwards had in any such action shall be null and void." In the above case, the plaintiff had levied a plaint in the county court against the defendant for an assault and false imprisonment; and two days after the date of his receiving from the defendant a notice of his objection to be sued therein, he obtained a certiorari to remove the proceedings into the Court of Exchequer; and to such writ the judge of the county court made a return, which, together with the certiorari itself, the defendant now sought to set aside or quash. The application was successful; for the court would not listen to the argument advanced on behalf of the plaintiff, that the return to the certiorari made by the judge of the county court, being in truth a transcript or recital merely of the proceedings which had been had in his court, could not be considered as a "further proceeding" in the action such as the above-mentioned section intended to make null and void. The court held, on the contrary, that the intention of the Legislature was, that where a justice gave such a notice, things should be as if the action in the county court had never been brought. In such a case as that before them, they said no procedendo (that is, the writ by which a cause improperly removed is remitted to the court below) could issue; and that proved that no certiorari could issue; for, said Bramwell, B., the liability to the one could not exist without a liability to the other.

It appears, therefore, that the only course for the party aggrieved in such a case is, to give a month's notice of action, and then to commence an action in one of the superior courts. This, indeed, from the report, appears to have been done in the present case; but it is probable that the action was barred by the limitation of time given in the 8th section of the act, unless the proceedings in the superior court could be taken to be in continuation of those commenced in the county court:—for, otherwise, it does not appear why the certiorari was required, or should have been insisted on when objected to by the defendant.

ATTACHMENT—EFFECT OF SERVICE OF ORDER—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEES AS AGAINST EXECUTION CREDITOR.

Turner & Others v. Jones, 5 W. R., Exch., 318.

This case turned upon the relative rights of an execution creditor and the assignees of a judgment debtor, against whom such creditor had obtained an order of attachment. It appeared that the defendant had bought the business and stock of one G. for a certain price, which was to be discharged in part by bills falling due at different times. Before the first of these bills became due, the defendant was served (as garnishee) with an order under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, s. 61, attaching, in the words of the order, "all debts owing or accruing from him to G.," in respect of a judgment which had been obtained by one X. against G. On being served with this order, the defendant gave X. promissory notes to the amount of what he had to pay G. on the bills above mentioned, and made them payable at the same times. Before these notes, or any of them, became payable, G. was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the plaintiffs were appointed his assignees. They now sued the defendant for the debt he originally owed to G., and in respect of which, after such debt had been attached, as above mentioned, he had given promissory notes to X. A question was now asked of the Court, through the medium of a special case, whether such debt had, under the circumstances, passed to the assignees, or whether the defendant was discharged by giving promissory notes, as above mentioned, on being served with an attachment order. It was held by the Court, on the authority of the very recent case in the Queen's Bench (Holmes v. Tutton, 5 Ell. & Bl. 65), that service of the attachment order bound the debt owing by the defendant to G., so as to put X. in the position of being a creditor of G., with security for his debt, and so as to bring him within the 184th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849; but that it did not give him any lien, within the meaning of that section, on any part of the bankrupt's property, and that, consequently, his title could not prevail against G.'s assignees. They further held, that the circumstance of the defendant having given promissory notes in respect of such debt (which was a purely voluntary act on his part) did not better his position. The Court, moreover, appeared to be of opinion, that even if the defendant had actually paid to X. the debt he owed to G., on being served with the attachment order, he would not have been any the more protected against the claim of the assignees for the same debt.

It seems to follow, from these cases, that a debtor (garnishee) cannot safely pay to a judgment creditor, attaching his debt, unless and until he has been served with an absolute order to pay under sect. 61. He may, however, on being served with an attachment order, pay the money he owes into court under sect. 63.

ATTORNEY—DELIVERING OF SIGNED BILL—EXTRA COSTS.

Pigot v. Cadman, 5 W. R., Exch. 353.

This was an action for work and labour as an attorney, and for money paid to the defendant's use. The defendant pleaded that a signed bill had not been delivered a month before action, as required by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. It appeared, at the trial, that the plaintiff had duly delivered a bill, containing various items, principally for disbursements made by the plaintiff for the defendant, which were sufficiently specified, and an item for "extra costs" incurred in a Chancery suit, not further particularised. After the commencement of the action the plaintiff delivered, under a judge's order, two further bills for business, not included in the bill delivered before the commencement of the action, but which business related to a Chancery suit arising out of the business charged for in such bill. To this bill (and to the retention of the verdict, which, at the trial, was pro formâ entered for the plaintiff) two objections were now made on behalf of the defendant. The first of these was, that the want of greater particularity in the item "extra costs," in the bill delivered, vitiated the bill altogether, so as to leave unsatisfied the requirements of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37, as to the delivery, a month before action, of a signed bill of the fees for the recovery whereof such action was brought. And this objection to the bill the court held to be fatal, and directed a nonsuit to be entered, instead of the verdict for the plaintiff. In coming to this decision, the Court took a different view from that taken by the Common Pleas in 1840, in the case of Waller v. Lacy (1 Man. & Gr. 54), which was itself in accordance with a previous Nisi Prius decision of Abbott, C. J., in 1825 (Drew v. Clifford, 2 Car. & P. 69). But in the present case, the Court of Exchequer felt themselves bound by their own more recent judgment in Ivimey v. Marks (16 Mee. & W. 850), wherein the above two cases were distinguished on the ground that they occurred at a time when all parts of an attorney's bill were not taxable, and the Court of Exchequer adhered to the reasoning of Lord Eldon in Hill v. Humphreys (2 Bos. & P. 243). It was intimated, however, that the Court entirely coincided in the remarks of Lord Campbell, in Cook v. Gilliard (1 Ell. & Bl. 37), that the proper and honourable course in such cases was for the client to demand further information, so that the bill might be corrected before action.

The other objection made by the defendant to the bill delivered was, that it did not contain the whole of the charges for which the plaintiff held him liable; and it was insisted that an attorney is bound, when he delivers his bill, to insert therein all the completed business in respect of which he had a claim, up to the moment of such delivery; for that, otherwise, by omitting, for example, a disputed class of items, he might deprive his client of the costs of the taxation in a case where, if the disputed matter had been included, more than one-sixth would have been taxed off. Upon this proposition the court refrained from expressing any opinion at all; but, as observed arguendo, such a rule would be inconvenient where a firm consists of several partners, each of them applying himself to a separate department, and each of whom may happen to transact business in his own department for the same client. It is apprehended that the true remedy for the client in such a case, is that hinted at by Mr. Baron Bramwell—viz., to obtain a judge's order for the delivery of his whole bill, that all parts of it may be referred to taxation—a jurisdiction which is expressly conferred by the same 37th section of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and which, indeed, has been always claimed by the courts.

BANKRUPTCY—APPLICATION UNDER THE 86TH SECTION OF THE CONSOLIDATION ACT.

Hill v. Merritt, 5 W. R., Exch., 351.

We noticed last week an application made to the Common Pleas, under the above section of the Bankrupt Consolidation Act, 1849, by a defendant for the costs of an action in which the plaintiff had recovered a verdict to a less amount than the affidavit of debt he had filed in the Bankruptcy Court, under the 78th section. That application, it may be remembered, was not successful, because the court thought that the verdict by itself was not conclusive as to the existence or non-existence of a reasonable and probable cause for the amount sworn to; and that, under the circumstances, it was probable the plaintiff believed he was entitled to the full amount he filed. The same point has since arisen in the Exchequer; and here, though the court arrived at a different conclusion on the facts of the case, and granted the application, they seem to have been guided by the same principle as the Common Pleas, as they so decided, not merely on the amount of the verdict obtained compared with that of the affidavit of debt filed, but because it appeared by the plaintiff's own case at the trial that he had included in such affidavit a large sum which had to his own knowledge become barred by the statute of limitations.

SIGNATURE TO WILL—15 & 16 VICT. C. 24.

Page v. Donovan & Hankey. 5 W. R., Pre. C. 324.

This case deserves notice, as showing the desire of the Prerogative Court to give effect to the remedial provisions of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 24, in reference to the execution of testamentary papers respecting which there is no question of authenticity. The will in dispute had been made in France; and at the end thereof, on the same sheet of paper, and before any signature at all, there appeared a "notarial minute" to the effect that what was above written was the will of the testatrix, and by her understood; and after this minute, appeared the signature of the testatrix, the notary, and four witnesses. According to the requisition of 7 W. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 9, that the signature must be "at the foot or end of the will," this would not have been sufficient to obtain probate; but under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 24, it was held to be good enough, inasmuch as it appeared sufficiently that the testatrix intended by such signature to give effect to the matter expressed to be her will.

Professional Intelligence.

METROPOLITAN & PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

A meeting of the managing committee was held on the 25th ult., when the assistant secretary's report upon Bankruptcy Administration, and certain resolutions of the Mercantile Law Conference, recently held in London under the auspices of the Law Amendment Society, were further considered; and the secretary was instructed to communicate with the provincial members of the committee, with a view to procure information from them as to the chief evils in the working of the present system of bankruptcy procedure.

The assistant-secretary read a report upon the course pursued by the Lords of the Treasury in the taxation of costs on criminal prosecutions. And he was instructed to obtain, during the present assizes, further information on the subject, with a view to the preparation of a memorial to her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department.

The Judgments Execution Bill was considered, and a petition in its favour ordered to be presented.

Two members of the committee having reported that the new scale of Equity costs would not give an increased profit of more than 10 or 12 per cent, the secretary was instructed to take steps, in conjunction with the Incorporated Law Society, to re-assemble the old Equity committee with a view to consider the new scale.

The assistant-secretary reported that a letter had been addressed to the Under-Sheriffs of the several counties and cities, suggesting to them to summon meetings of the profession at the several assize towns, to invite their support to the Association, and to consider the subjects likely to occupy the attention of Parliament during the present Session.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.

The Society will meet on Monday, the 9th of March, at eight o'clock, P.M., when it will proceed to elect a President for the present year, under Rule 21; after which Mr. N. Lindley will read a Paper on "The Disabilities of Corporations."

RULES FOR THE PUBLIC EXAMINATION OF CANDIDATES FOR HONOURS ON CERTIFICATES, ENTITLING STUDENTS TO BE CALLED TO THE BAR IN TRINITY TERM NEXT.

An examination will be held in next Trinity Term, to which a student of any of the inns of court, who is desirous of becoming a candidate for a studentship or honours, or of obtaining a certificate of fitness for being called to the bar, will be admissible. Each student proposing to submit himself for examination will be required to enter his name at the treasurer's office of the inn of court to which he belongs, on or before Tuesday, the 12th day of May next, and he will further be required to state in writing whether his object in offering himself for examination is to compete for a studentship or other honourable distinction; or whether he is merely desirous of obtaining a certificate preliminary to a call to the Bar.

The examination will commence on Tuesday, the 19th day of May next, and will be continued on the Wednesday and Thursday following. It will take place in the Benchers' Reading Room of Lincoln's-inn; and the doors will be closed at ten minutes after the time appointed for the commencement of the examination.

The examination by printed questions will be conducted in the following order:—

Tuesday morning, the 19th May, at half-past nine, on Constitutional Law and Legal History; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on Equity.

Wednesday morning the 20th May, at half-past nine, on Common Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, on the Law of Real Property &c.

Thursday morning, the 21st May, at half-past nine, on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law; in the afternoon, at half-past one, a paper will be given to the students including questions bearing upon all the foregoing subjects of examination.

The oral examination will be conducted in the same order during the same hours, and on the same subjects, as those already marked out for the examination by printed questions, except that on Thursday afternoon there will be no oral examination.

The reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History proposes to examine on the following subjects:—

He will expect the candidates for honours in the ensuing examination to possess a general knowledge of the leading events of English History, from the Conquest to the close of the last century. He will expect them to be accurately acquainted with the chapters in Hallam's Constitutional History which treat of the Reigns of Elizabeth, of James the First, Charles the First, Charles the Second, and William; with the first volume of Lord Clarendon; with May's History; with the chapters in Rapin and Tindal or Belsham, giving an account of these Reigns; and with Bishop Burnet's Memoirs of his Own Times, during the Reigns of Charles the Second and William the Third. He will expect them to be acquainted with the law of treason and the law relating to the press down to the present time; and with the most important state trials and impeachments during the Reigns he has mentioned. The candidates for a pass will be required to answer general questions in English History, and to be well acquainted with the History of the Reigns of Elizabeth, of Charles the First, and Charles the Second. They will be expected also to show a competent knowledge of the State Trials during the Reigns of Charles the Second and of James the Second.

The Reader on Equity proposes to examine in the following books:—

1. Smith's Manual of Equity Jurisprudence, Mitford on the Pleadings in the Court of Chancery. Introduction; chapter 1, sec. 1 and 2; chapter 2, sec. 1; chapter 2, sec. 2, part 1 (the first three pages); chapter 2, sec. 2, part 2 (the first two pages); chapter 2, sec. 2, part 3, chapter 3. The Act for the Improvement of the Jurisdiction of Equity, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86.
2. The Cases and Notes contained in the first volume of White and Tudor's Leading Cases.

Candidates for certificates of fitness to be called to the Bar, will be expected to be well acquainted with the books mentioned in the first of the above classes. Candidates for the studentship or honours, will be examined in the books mentioned in the two classes.

The Reader on the Law of Real Property, &c., proposes to examine in the following books and subjects:—

1. Joshua Williams on Real Property; the same author on Personal Property; Hayes on the Common Law, Uses and Trusts.
2. The Common Forms of Conveyance and Mortgage of Real Property; of Assignments of Leaseholds for years; and of Marriage Settlements of Real and Personal Estate.
3. The Law of Dower. The Dower Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 105, and the Decisions upon that Act.
4. The Doctrine of Notice, as between Vendor and Purchaser.
5. The Extinguishment and Suspension of different kinds of Powers, and the Excessive Execution of Powers; Edwards v. Slater, Hardre's Reports, 410; Alexander v. Alexander, 2 Ves. Sen. 640, and the Notes to those Cases in Tudor's Leading Cases in Conveyancing pp. 277 and 299 respectively.

Candidates for honours will be examined in all the foregoing books and subjects, and candidates for a certificate in those under heads 1, 2, and 3.

The Reader on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law proposes to examine candidates for honours in the following subjects:—

1. The Elements of the Roman Law of Dominion, Possession, Prescription, and Servitudes, to be studied in the Institutiones Juris Romani Privati of Wankönig (lib. ii. cap. 1, edition of 1834), or in any similar compendium of Pandect Law.
2. The Creation and Extinction of Rights and Duties. Lindley's Introduction to the Study of Jurisprudence Part ii. chapter 4.
3. International Rights of States in their Pacific Relations. Wheaton's Elements of International Law. Part iii. chapters 1 and 2.

Candidates for a certificate will be examined in—

1. The first two Books of the Institutes of Justinian, with the Notes to Sandar's Edition.
2. Wheaton's Elements of International Law. Part iii. chapters 1 and 2.

The Reader on Common Law proposes to examine in the following subjects:—

Candidates for a pass certificate will be expected to be familiar with—

1. The Elements of Our Criminal Law; particularly having reference to the following offences: homicide; simple larceny; assaults, aggravated or otherwise. (This subject may be read from Archbold's Criminal Pleading by Welsby, or from the 4th vol. of Blackstone (21st edition) or Stephen's Commentaries.
2. The first thirty-three sections of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.
3. The Nature and Classification of Contracts and Torts, so far as explained in Broom's Commentaries, pp. 257—377; 658—688; and illustrated by Lampleigh v. Brathwait, and Ashby v. White, 1 Smith, L. C. 4th edit. pp. 118 and 185 with the Notes thereto.

Candidates for the Studentship or Honours will be examined in the first and third of the above subjects, and also in—

4. Smith's Lectures on the Law of Landlord and Tenant (Lects. 5, 6, and 9).
5. The fourth and seventeenth sections of the Statute of Frauds (as explained in any recent Treatise upon Contracts), and the third section of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97.
6. The Case of Humphries v. Brogden, 12 Q. B. 739.

THE SCOTCH SYSTEM OF CONVEYANCING CHARGES.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—I quite agree with you, that should the proposed measure for registering titles to land become law, it must lead to an alteration in the mode of remunerating solicitors for conveyancing business; and it is with much pleasure, therefore, that I noticed the publication in your journal a week or two back of the scale of charges for conveyancing and general business now in use in Scotland, because I believe the Scotch system to be the one best adapted for its purpose, consistent with the taxation of solicitor's bills; and that any alterations in our own, to be satisfactory, must adopt the Scotch system as a model. Undoubtedly, if it were possible to estimate it, the remuneration ought to be in proportion to the skill and labour employed; but as it is impossible for any officer, however competent, to estimate the amount of skill and labour bestowed upon each transaction—and if it were, the task would be endless—the only alternative appears to be to establish a scale of fees for different descriptions of business, varying according to the difficulty and importance of the business, and the value of the property dealt with; leaving it to the discretion of the taxing-master to allow a reasonable sum where, from the nature of the business, it is impossible to lay down any fixed rules for charging; and as this is the principle on which the Scotch system is founded—and the system appears to combine simplicity and clearness of detail—I purpose to call the attention of the profession to some of the prominent features of that system. The charges for conveyancing business in Scotland are regulated partly by the value of the property, and partly by the length and importance of the documents. No charges are made for attendances and general correspondence except in certain cases; but an ad valorem charge is made to cover usual attendances, which, in some instances, is the only charge made. In other business, a charge is made for drawing, as well as the ad valorem charges; and in some instances double regulation fees are charged for drawing, and no ad valorem charge is made. Thus, in purchase deeds, bonds, and other securities for money, a per centage is charged upon the consideration or price stated, and the regulation-fee of ten shillings per sheet of about three folios is charged for drawing the instrument. In settlements, the per centage is charged upon the rental or income, and double regulation-fees are charged for drawing. In ordinary leases the per centage is also charged on the rent, but no charge is made for drawing. In partnership-deeds, the per centage is charged on the value of the stock, in addition to the usual charge for drawing; and where the amount of the stock is not stated, double regulation-fees are charged for drawing the deed. The charges for drawing, copying, and engrossing are generally considerably higher than our own, and are as follow:—

If in the English language, first sheet	0	10	0
Every other	0	6	0
If in Latin	1	0	0
Copying, per sheet	0	1	0
Engrossing, first sheet	0	2	6
Every other	0	1	6

Let us contrast the charges for conveyances and mortgages under the two systems, and it will be seen to what extent our Scotch brethren have the advantage over us. On a conveyance or mortgage-deed thirty folios in length, the charges would be—

Under the English Scale.
Consideration, £100.

Drawing	1	10	0
Copying and engrossing	1	10	0

Consideration £1,000.

Consideration £2,000.

Copying	0	9	0
Engrossing	0	14	6
	4	12	0

Ad val.	5	5	0
Drawing, &c.....	4	6	6
	9	11	6

Consideration £2,000.

	14	16	6

It will be admitted, I think, that the Scotch system is simpler, and that the remuneration is better and more fairly apportioned according to the work done than under our own; and I believe that if a similar system was introduced in England, it would do more to facilitate the despatch of business than any measure which can be devised for simplifying transfers, unaccompanied by an alteration in the present mode of charging.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully, M.

HOW THE REGISTRY OF BRITISH SHIPPING IS CONDUCTED.

To the EDITOR of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—The inconvenience which does and must result from the practice adopted by the registrars of shipping is so great, that it is deserving of notice in your journal.

Perhaps the most annoying feature is, that those who experience the chief difficulty are they who are most anxious to do their business regularly; I mean that lawyers encounter more obstacles in the registry of instruments affecting the title to shipping than do commercial men, who are content to follow the dictates of the officials.

Shortly after the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, came into operation, I had occasion to prepare declarations by individual transferees, of which a form (F) is given in the schedule to the act. I framed the declarations in strict conformity with the given form; but it was pronounced insufficient, because it did not give the name of the master of the vessel, nor the number of his certificate of competency. Forms of this declaration were issued by the Commissioners of Customs, containing blanks for these particulars, in addition to the other particulars of the form F. It is stated that these altered forms have been issued with the consent of the Board of Trade, and by authority of the 96th section; but, assuming that this has been so, it is, I think, very plain the commissioners have not given such public notice of the alterations as was necessary, in order to prevent public inconvenience, which, by that section, they were required to do; and had such notice been given, it is, I conceive, beyond the power of the commissioners to require the introduction of these particulars; for, by section 56, the only requisites of the declaration are: (1) A statement of the transferee's qualification to be registered as owner of a British ship; and (2) a denial that any unqualified person has any interest in the ship. Certainly, the addition is innocent in itself, but it is unpleasant to have an instrument properly framed rejected for its absence; and it is somewhat amusing to have to add, that the registrars make no objection to receiving declarations with the blanks for these particulars remaining unsupplied. It would seem the only way to vitiate a bill of sale or declaration is to obliterate some of the printed words in the commissioners' forms. It is quite unnecessary to make those words significant.

The new act contemplates persons being registered as "joint owners," and prohibits a joint owner from disposing in severalty of any share (sect. 57). Two persons in partnership were registered as joint owners of shares in a ship; and one of them having died, I had occasion to take a bill of sale of those shares. The act contains no declaration what shall be the effect of a joint ownership, and experience has made me too diffident to conclude from the above prohibition, that the joint owners were absolutely joint tenants. I was aware these joint owners had been partners, and "there is no satisfactory authority for the position that the title to partnership chattels survives at law, and the authorities the other way greatly predominate" (Per Lord Wensleydale, in Buckley v. Barber, 6 Exch. 164); therefore, I prepared a bill of sale from the executor of the deceased joint owner, and from the surviving joint owner, and tendered it for registration, with the probate and the executor's declaration, in proof of his title, as required by section 59. It was, however, rejected, on the ground that the commissioners had decided that, in such cases, the bill of sale must be from the surviving joint owner alone, after proof of the other joint owner's death had been furnished. This was a sufficiently peremptory decision upon a delicate point, but it remains to be seen what view the courts will adopt of the rights of joint owners.

I have had occasion to prepare bills of sale of shares, which were already mortgaged to the intended transferee. It happened there were two sets of shares to be dealt with, and for one set I adopted the exact printed form supplied by the commissioners; in the other, I slightly altered it to conform to that in the schedule to the act, as the bill of sale was to be given for a merely nominal consideration. The alteration consisted in obliterating the printed words in the form, acknowledging the receipt of the consideration money; and I may observe, that the insertion of these inoperative words interrupts the flow of the proper language of the bill of sale.

I was not gratified at having both these documents rejected by the official acting for the registrar, upon the ground—I cannot say for the reason—that they appeared to him objectionable. He could not bring forward upon the books the same person as mortgagee and as owner: such a course had been pursued in former instances, but he must decline following it in this. Upon formally tendering the bills of sale, and insisting upon their being recorded, the official refused to do so, because one of the bills of sale did not contain a receipt for the nominal consideration. Be it observed, the statutory form contains no receipt for the consideration money; but these and other merely formal words have been added by the commissioners.

Eventually, to obtain the registry of the bills of sale, the transferree's title as mortgagee had first to be destroyed, and the mortgagor had to give a receipt for five shillings (never paid to him), as the consideration for the giving of the bill of sale.

It is too bad that the practice in the registry office should be so loose, and withal so perplexing; for the consequences of their refusal to register may be most ruinous, as another bill of sale may be tendered, and acquire priority by being first registered.

A very remarkable instance of the way the commissioners conduct this business is to be found in their alterations in the forms of mortgages. They have introduced, in the body of the forms they supply, a condition that the power of sale given by the Merchant Shipping Act is not to be exercised until after a given date. What operation can this condition have? Is it possible it should control or supersede the 71st section of the act? I am, &c.,

THE SOCIAL ESTIMATION OF THE SOLICITORS.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

The position of the solicitor is a question affecting the public as intimately and, perhaps, more so than it affects himself. The rank which he should hold in society, and the estimation of him, as one of a class, are vital questions to the public at large. In the performance of his various duties the continual reference to the "respectability" of the solicitor is a fact which few persons can have failed to notice; or when that attribute is known to exist, can they have failed to notice the extraordinary bearing it has on the business in hand. When the solicitor's influence over his clients is considered, and how his opinion regulates the course of business entrusted to him, how important is it to the public that he should feel and know (apart from his own convictions as a conscientious man and a man of honour) that a deviation from a certain course of action will subject him to a loss of that which is valued by all men—viz., a high consideration in the opinion of others. Suppose a slip in practice to entail consequences serious to one party and of great advantage to another in any business transactions, would it not be a great public benefit if the parties to the transactions had such confidence in the character of the profession as to feel convinced that no solicitor could be found to take advantage of it? And though our law books are filled with cases to meet difficulties of a similar nature, it is not cases involving fair questions of litigation and discussion which are here pointed at; for the solicitors are not called upon to supply remedies unprovided for by the laws of the land, but to act in matters of daily practice in such a manner as is consistent only with a high sense of integrity and honour. If it be said, in such case, the feelings of their clients would in many cases be unrepresented, the answer is: So it must be as far as solicitors are concerned. Some other persons must be found to represent them, for solicitors will not. But how can life exist without food, or honour be nourished without an appreciation of it? To the solicitor himself a high position is due, perhaps, more than to any other man, if his functions are based on this high principle. None but solicitors themselves properly know the continual incentives they have for a deviation from it; the frequent pecuniary advantages to themselves; the not unfrequent suggestions and pressure of their clients; the many actions he could perform, bringing advantage to himself alone, and for which he would be irresponsible but to his own conscience;—such temptations cause him to subject himself more frequently to the judgment of his own conscience than probably any other class of men in this country. And it is to the value of man as a moral being that in justice honour should be awarded.

If the public know this, and feel the justice of the solicitor being rewarded by his position, and the estimation in which he is held, they should also know that it is to their interest that he should be compelled to hold a good position; for otherwise that portion of the body who descend to deny their better nature will, in sacrificing to mammon, often take a better place than better men.

"Let none admire that riches grow in hell."

That in matters of negotiation, litigation, and generally in the administration of the law, a great deal is left indefinite, and to the fair understanding of the parties engaged, so involving the necessity of a high principle in those engaged in its administration, there can be little doubt, and is recognised in the common forms of assurance—viz., "according to the true interest and meaning of these presents." So that if it be true that the honourable solicitor is entitled to a good position, and that the interests of the public will be promoted by his having one, and that solicitors as a class should hold one, and be compelled to do so, why has not this result been attained, if such be the case; and what are the proper means of securing it?

That solicitors as a class do not hold a high position in the estimation of the world must be admitted; for most solicitors are frequently justly appreciated by their clients; and, considering the important duties which they have to perform, the delicate investigations in which they are concerned, the weighty interests entrusted to their daily care, and the great benefits frequently secured by them for their clients, it would be very strange if such were not the case. Still, when do these very clients speak of the body with admiration and respect? Who does not hear lawyers spoken of as a class doubtfully and with inuendoes by no means complimentary? How seldom is the remuneration given to the solicitor acknowledged to be a fair and reasonable reward for his services? the very mention of a bill of costs appearing to suggest to the mind of the public an idea of imposition and sanctioned extortion.

For what public appointments is the solicitor thought fit except those in which his services cannot be dispensed with? How often is his disinterested advice or action attributed to unselfish purposes? What does every act of Parliament show where the interests of the solicitor are interfered with by the Legislature? In what courts of justice is there any accommodation afforded for the solicitor, either for their personal convenience and comfort, or for the better performance of their duties to their clients? How is he frequently treated by the advocate whose position he has been so material in creating? When do the bench really and seriously treat him with consideration? Is he not generally spoken of as the person responsible for every mischance in the suit, but otherwise as a nonentity? But do the solicitors themselves hold their own body in a proper estimation; and is not the remedy chiefly in their own hands? Do solicitors sufficiently take notice of the malpractice of members of their own branch of the profession? Do they make such actions a common offence to themselves? Do they sufficiently esteem a brother sollcitor whom they find and know to be above suspicion? Do they sufficiently combine to repel injustice to one of themselves as a common injury? Do they, when the profession is spoken ill of, make the best defence of it in their power, or leave it to defend itself? and when undeserved reproach is cast upon one of its members, do they feel any of the reproach themselves, or rather do they not look on with indifference, and show themselves wanting the indignation which a consciousness of injustice would arouse? Do solicitors fairly represent to their own clients the policy and conduct of the solicitors opposed to them, or is it not often a fact that they expatiate on the shortcomings of their opponents in one capacity or another, either from the love of vanity, which revels in the contemplation of superiority, or with the idea that awarding too much merit to an opponent might interfere with his own prosperity? Is there not growing up among solicitors a competition for business, and, in some cases, a mode of acquiring it inconsistent with the position they ought to hold. Instead of the client calling upon the solicitor, do not the solicitors frequently make a habit of calling on their clients: more like calling for orders than waiting to be consulted or to receive instructions to do some act requiring the assistance of a legal adviser. Were it not for an inherent conciousness of his ability and integrity, and his knowledge that this is appreciated by his own clients and by his own branch of the profession, and were he to depend entirely for support on the general opinion of the public, the solicitor would frequently feel his condition to be galling indeed.

But he is supported by a consciousness of his power perhaps more than by any opinion of others, which fact may be one of the main causes leading to the results complained of; but to ascertain clearly what these causes are is a great way towards a remedy.

In every highly civilised state of society there must be numerous intricate rights and interests depending for their existence or limitation upon certain fundamental or conflicting laws. And to know the policy and reasoning upon which such rights and interests are based requires no ordinary amount of study and attention, and for this reason in a civilised community there will be a class of lawyers whose sole business it is to be such.

This is a necessity universally felt and acknowledged, and in this necessity lies perhaps the chief discontent existing towards lawyers as a class. The general public are aware of their incapacity to construe and elucidate the intricacies of the law or its practice, and thoughtlessly assume that the law ought to be so simple that those who run may read; and because this is not so, and of the difficulties surrounding every complication of interests, the administrators of the law are punished with the difficulties and faults of the law itself; and to this one cause may be traced much discontent towards the profession—the public not being sufficiently instructed or thoughtful to know that the administrators of the law and its makers have different functions to perform, and are not responsible for each other's acts. The question of costs is perhaps also one of the chief reasons for the feeling with which the profession is regarded; and it is discontent and ill-will which deprive him of the position he would otherwise enjoy. If it is right that the amount of remuneration to be given to the solicitor should be fixed, he, at least, should be liberally paid for his services if it is required that those services should be efficient. And when they are charged for as conferences, letters, attendances, &c., the public seem to forget that the profits of their business and the interest on their capital are often accruing whilst they are doing nothing, whilst the personal labour and attention of the solicitor is required for every shilling he earns; and that if the solicitor did not charge for the letters and attendance (which the public often think a high charge for such services) the solicitor must be paid in some other manner for the time occupied in his client's business, and for his thought and knowledge, and constantly turning over books and considering cases, which alone make him competent for the services required of him. That a great deal of dissatisfaction will exist as long as there are unreasonable men in the world there is no doubt; and in litigation there is always a losing side, for which the solicitor is often and unjustly considered responsible. That solicitors fight the legal battles of the public, and among the public are many losers, lies at the bottom of a great deal of the ill-will with which the profession is visited.

The varied and extensive character of the solicitor's duties, bring him necessarily in contact with different members of the bar, of many of whom there are very few solicitors who have not had reason to speak with the highest admiration and respect; but there is a general idea with the public, as well as with the solicitors, that this feeling is not reciprocated. Whatever the future of either branch of the profession may be, there can be little doubt but that the whole profession as well as the public will be better off by a desire among both branches to assist the true interests of the whole profession.

The solicitor has perhaps had his feelings too strongly enlisted in his client's cause to remember his own interest, but a coolness of head is as necessary for a solicitor as for a general; and a client's interest would be better secured by the solicitor concentrating his whole power ad rem, and never in personam; for the client's interest is best served by the solicitor avoiding anything like personal altercation, and rather by raising than lowering the standard of his opponent; for if a man feels he ought to be what he is said to be, a great step is taken towards his becoming so. But it is, no doubt, a general opinion that the solicitors as a body are sufficiently strong to bear anything which may be said of them; but if this were so, they would command the position it is contended they should hold without waiting for its concession. The universality of the lawyer—for where men buy, and sell, and labour, there must be lawyers—makes the dissemination of his ideas an easy matter, and gives him the means of securing to his profession any advantages it may obtain, should such rules and principles be established as are likely to gain his branch of the profession the advantages of position it has not hitherto attained.

Reviews.

Oke's Magisterial Synopsis. 5th edit. 1857. Butterworths.

We believe that the majority of well-informed persons would indorse the eulogium pronounced by Lord Tenterden upon the unpaid magistracy of England, if considered as a class, and without reference to individuals. Rather more than half a century ago, a rule for a criminal information had been obtained against a certain Lancashire magistrate, charging him with having refused to take the examination of two persons who offered to give their evidence in a case brought before him; and in discharging this rule, chiefly on the ground that such refusal (if erroneous at all, which was doubtful, under the circumstances of the case) proceeded not from any unjust, oppressive, or corrupt motive, but from mistake or error only, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas thus expressed himself:—"This application is made against a gentleman who is one of that class of persons to whom this country is under as great obligations as this or any other nation is, or ever was, to any members of its community. I speak of the gentlemen residing in the different parts of England who act in the execution of the commission of the peace, and who gratuitously devote a great portion of their time, and bestow much valuable, but often thankless labour in the administration of many branches of the law; and amongst others, in those of the early and in many of the mature stages of our criminal jurisprudence. In this most valuable class, many persons are found who possess a sound knowledge of the law, united with the most useful and extensive practical information." Now, this was true when it was said, and is, indeed, still truer now, when the efforts of some fifty sessions have complicated magisterial work and increased the jurisdiction of justices, while the average standard of magisterial ability has been, perhaps, during the same period, proportionally raised. And yet the frequent instances of folly, perversity, and ignorance on the part of individual members of this meritorious class with which the newspapers teem, and which the personal experience of many of our readers must attest, are sufficient to raise a doubt whether paid administrators of the law, versed in the actual practice of their profession, and responsible not only to public opinion but to the wholesome supervision of an official superior, would not, on the whole, be an improvement. The lash of newspaper criticism is all very well as far as it goes, and keeps many a would-be tyrant, and controls many a hasty temper, within decorous bounds; but there is something still more persuasive in a letter from a Secretary of State—followed by the ceasing of stipend, and subsidence into private life. There is, of course, no doubt that a lawyer, who, with undiminished powers, retires from the exercise of his profession to guide with tact and inspire with wisdom the decisions of his brethren at their "special" and their "petty" sessions, deserves all the gratitude which waits on the man who confers on his country a most signal service. But are the rolls of our magistrates composed exclusively of such men? Do we not find there—too often—the purse-proud and the unintellectual; the man who never knew any law at all, and him who has forgotten all that he ever learnt? As long as the office is sought for the power and consideration it bestows, and granted irrespective of the mental qualifications of the applicant, these interlopers, we fear, will often be found, and grievous cases of individual oppression and injustice must be the consequence. Again—we need hardly say, on a very different principle—we would gladly see the clergy, at all events, relieved from duties and responsibilities little akin to their sacred office. It has always struck us as a painful circumstance, that he whose high privilege it is to speak to the penitent sinner the words of peace and comfort, should also carry the rod of secular discipline—that one whose path through life should be followed by the blessings of the poor, should fire the train of evil consequences which too often wait on a conviction before a magistrate. An intimate acquaintance with Burn's Justice, or with such treatises as that now before us, seems scarcely suited to him whose ceaseless study and meditation should be the doctrines of a very different Book; and yet, without such acquaintance, great would be the danger both to the judge and to his victim!

But whatever may be the relative advantages of paid and of unpaid justices, and whatever the virtues or the faults of those who at present occupy the magisterial benches of our country towns, it is, of course, of the last importance that those who administer the law should receive all the assistance which can be given to them by books towards the due fulfilment of their duties. Of such books there are many; but we know of none which has a more practically useful air than the magisterial synopsis by Mr. Oke, of which he has just published a fifth edition. It is difficult to convey an accurate impression of a work which mainly consists of tabulated arrangements, without inserting extracts, which would be unsuited to our pages, and which would after all be inadequate to the object. The merits of such a performance are those of accuracy and system, and can be thoroughly tested only by actual practice and minute comparison with the authorities quoted. But that the present volume possesses these qualities in a very high measure, the rapid sale of each successive edition furnishes strong evidence. The general plan adopted is, to arrange, in alphabetical order (and, first, in reference to summary convictions, under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), each matter on which information can be required by the magistrate, and to present at a glance the nature of the offence; the statute by which it is regulated; the time within which it is necessary that the information in respect thereof should be laid (and whether on oath or otherwise); the number of justices required to convict; the penalty and mode of enforcing it; whether there be an appeal, and, if so, within what time; to whom the penalty is payable; and, finally, a reference to the page of a work by Mr. Oke, called by him the "Formulist," in which the technical description of the offence appears. And a similar collection of tables is given in reference to indictable offences, showing besides the general nature of the offence, and a reference to the statute by which it is regulated, or the treatise in which an account of it is to be found: whether it is triable at sessions or at the assizes only; whether bail is or is not discretionary; the punishment which may be awarded; and last (not least), whether the costs of the prosecution are allowed. There are other portions of the book —such as an introduction on the duties and jurisdiction of justices, and on the office of clerk; and chapters treating of the law and practice of informations, of summary procedure, of bail, and the like; but these Tables form its most characteristic and useful feature;—and that they must be eminently useful, we have not the least hesitation in saying. Everything is told the magistrate which he can be told by any book at all. But, alas! ample room still remains for error and injustice; for it is beyond the art even of Mr. Oke to tabulate the law of evidence, and the rules of natural equity. No treatise can enforce tact or moderation, if either be wanting in the reader. None can steady the scales of justice, if they be biased by prejudice, or by the promptings of personal interest.

But we should be acting unjustly by Mr. Oke, were we to conclude without remarking that there is a class of men who will rejoice in the volume before us, to a greater degree even than magistrates themselves. Mr. Oke was and is a magistrate's clerk; and to those who act in the same capacity, his work must indeed be a boon. In the justice room, as elsewhere, the real labour often belongs to the branches, and not to the head. It is absolutely necessary, for the ease of the Bench, that the clerk should be able, without hesitation, to put his official finger on the act of Parliament, and on the section or sections thereof under which his superiors are to act, so as to keep them on the narrow path wherein they should tread. And in the present volume he will find a silent tutor, who will supply all the deficiencies in education or memory of which he may be conscious, and who will save him not only from "dishonour," but perhaps from "infinite loss."

The Law of Mortgage as applied to the Redemption, Foreclosure, and Sale in Equity of Incumbered Property; with the Law of the Priority of Incumbrancers. By WILLIAM RICHARD FISHER, of Lincoln's-inn, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. Butterworths.

The title-page of Mr. Fisher's book on the Law of Mortgage, taken altogether, has the now-a-days rare merit of telling the reader exactly what he is to expect, and nothing more. The author does not profess, nor does he attempt, to deal with the law further than as it relates to the redemption, foreclosure, and sale of mortgaged property, except that he appends a treatise on the law of the priority of incumbrancers. He plunges at once into the nature of the rights of redemption and foreclosure, and despatches in a somewhat cursory manner his inquiry into the several kinds of redeemable securities. He appears to view his subject almost wholly from an ex post facto point of view; in other words, he always regards a mortgage as a thing accomplished, and as if the only question that remained for him to consider was how the mortgagee might realise his security. We, therefore, must still turn to Mr. Powell's and Mr. Coote's works for complete information as to the subject-matter of mortgages, as to the manner in which they are created, and as to the respective rights attributed to mortgagors and mortgagees, other than those which a court of equity will enforce in the realisation of the mortgage security. Either or both of these works will still be indispensable to the conveyancer. Mr. Fisher's book will also be found by the conveyancer to be very useful; but we think it will be of the greatest utility to practitioners in our equity courts.

The book is divided into nine chapters, as follows:—1, Of the several kinds of securities; 2, of redemption; 3, of foreclosure and sale; 4, of parties; 5, of the appointment of a receiver; 6, of notice; 7, of priority; 8, of accounts; 9, of the decree, and matters arising thereout. We give the author's own account of the division of his subject, because it will afford our readers a better notion than anything we could say in as many words of the manner in which he proposes to treat it. This division (with an exception noticed hereafter) recommends itself, not only because it is accurate and logical, but also because it will be found very convenient for practical purposes, which is no little merit in such a work. Its subdivision into sections, and its minor details generally, are similarly characterised by an anxiety, on the part of the writer, to write for the practitioner. Whoever expects to find any elaborate disquisitions upon black letter law, or upon legal subtleties, that have more interest to the jurist or the legal antiquary, than to persons actually engaged in practice, will be disappointed. At the same time, the general result of a series of cases, or of statutes, as affecting any particular question, is often very clearly and tersely enunciated. The cases themselves have been collected evidently with great diligence, and are generally stated with precision and good judgment; but, as might be expected, we sometimes find that where decisions in the courts of appeal have taken place within the last two or three years, the author has omitted to "post them up," where they overrule the judgment of the court below. Thus, the decision of Stuart, V. C., in Ware v. Lord Egmont (18 Jur. 371; S. C. 2 W. R. 126), is stated to be law, the decision being that where an abstract of title on a purchase disclosed a certificate of the redemption of the land-tax thirty-three years previously by persons acting as the guardians of an infant tenant in tail, the purchaser was held to have had constructive notice of a charge, of which he might have known, if he had inquired how the redemption was effected. Mr. Fisher twice refers to this decision (pp. 318 and 457); and, in the former place, endeavours to show that it is not inconsistent with the doctrine of notice, as recognised by courts of equity. But most equity lawyers are aware that the Vice-Chancellor's decision was expressly overruled by the Lord Chancellor, in a judgment which contains the strongest possible condemnation of the extension of the doctrine of constructive notice, which he considered to be involved in the Vice-Chancellor's judgment. His lordship's decision was pronounced in November, 1854, and is reported in 4 De G. M'N. & Gor. 460; S. C. 3 W. R. 48, and in all the other reports, and certainly ought not to have been omitted from a treatise published two years subsequently. There are also instances of important cases decided within a period of two or three years antecedent to the publication of Mr. Fisher's work, which have been omitted altogether. Thus we find no mention of Cockburn v. Aukett (3 W. R. 641)—a useful case, on the question of necessary parties, where Kindersley, V. C., held, on the authority of Redshawe v. Newbold (12 Jur. 833)—also not noticed by our author—and of Sale v. Kitson, that the trustees of a will, whereby property is devised subject to mortgages, sufficiently represent the mortgagees. We might add several other cases of more or less importance which have been decided within the time mentioned—ex. gr., Hinde v. Poole (1 Kay & Joh. 383, S. C. 3 W. R. 331), Saloway v. Strawbridge (1 Kay & Joh. 371; S. C. 3 W. R. 335), Russell v. M'Culloch (1 Kay & Joh. 313; S. C. 3 W. R. 280), Wilkins v. Reeves (3 Eq. Rep. 494; S. C. 3 W. R. 305), Herries v. Griffiths (2 W. R. 72), Norton v. Cooper (2 W. R. 659), and lastly (not to extend our list too much), Freer v. Hesse (23 L. J., Chanc., 338). It must, however be admitted that an author, engaged in the composition of a work on law, must take his stand at some point of time, beyond which he need not attempt to note up the decisions for the purpose of his book. The only question is, whether there ought not to be some recognised rule on the subject as to time, so that the profession might be prepared to note up the decisions in a text-book from a certain period antecedent to its appearance. We take this opportunity for throwing out the suggestion, not because we are satisfied that the manner in which Mr. Fisher has executed his task particularly calls for it, but simply because it occurred to us when looking for a case which we knew had been decided two years ago, and which, though it related to the subject of mortgages, was not to be found in Mr. Fisher's book.

The most useful part, perhaps, of the entire work is the chapter which discusses all the questions that have arisen, or are likely to arise, between mortgagors and mortgagees in matters of account, including interest and costs. It frequently happens, in foreclosure and redemption suits, that the only real question at issue, when the cause comes on for hearing or upon further directions, is as to the manner of charging a mortgagee in possession; or as to allowances, which he claims to be entitled to; or as to the conversion of interest into principal, the computation of subsequent interest, or the right to set off arrears of interest; or as to the mortgagee's costs, the costs of unnecessary parties, &c.: and it is no uncommon thing to experience considerable difficulty in laying one's hand upon a case in point, should a contest arise upon any of these subjects. The book now before us contains the most ample and carefully digested information on all these topics, and also upon all questions that may arise as to the nature and form of the decree in suits for redemption or foreclosure. Nor should we omit to notice some very useful forms of decrees, taken from the registrar's book, which are to be found in the appendix. In short, the practitioner will find in this book, in a convenient form, pretty nearly everything he may require in actual practice, on the law relating to the redemption, foreclosure, and sale of incumbered property.

The collection of authorities on the rule of constructive notice will also be found of some value; although we cannot help thinking that our author has devoted either too much or too little of his space to this subject. He has devoted too much, if he intended to treat the doctrine so far only as it relates to mortgages; and too little, if his object was to discuss that most subtle and extensive subject in all its bearings. He seems to have aimed at the latter, and in this respect, therefore, has necessarily failed, as any competent lawyer may see by looking at sect. 546, p. 302, where the author states the four different classes of cases in which constructive notice may be imputed. Unlike his logical divisions elsewhere, we find here divisions that are purely arbitrary, and neither accurate nor complete. It would have been quite impossible, in the fifty pages appropriated to the whole subject, to have touched upon, however slightly, and at the same time accurately, all the endless modifications of this rule. The cases in which some trace of the doctrine of notice is to be found are infinite. It is worse than useless, therefore, to take at random one or more cases upon every general head, except they are selected simply with a view to enunciate a general rule, which of itself may be taken as certain. By way of illustration of the danger to which we refer, let us take sec. 561, p. 311, in which Mr. Fisher speaks of the rule of notice as it affects partners. The rule in such cases is stated by Mr. Fisher thus:—"Notice to one of the several partners is notice to the partnership." The only two modifications of the rule which our author gives are in the case of mutual assurance companies and joint-stock banking companies. Nothing is said about such cases as Swan v. Steele (7 East, 210), Jacaud v. French (12 East, 317), and numerous others, where questions arise as to the liability of partners to be affected by notice to a partner who is also a partner in another firm or in a particular adventure, through which he arrives at the knowledge imputed to his partners in the firm, which, or any other member of which, had no actual notice, where it is sought to be implied. The doctrine of notice, actual or constructive, touches the law of partnership in divers other points, as one may see, for example, in Decaynes v. Noble (1 Mer. 579, 616), and in many other cases; but many of these cases, of course, the author was not bound to mention, inasmuch as the particular section to which we now refer comes under the general head of "constructive notice between principal and agent," and, therefore, he here considers the subject of notice only as it affects partners in reference to the general head. However, even within this scope there are numerous decisions which go to qualify the proposition unconditionally stated in sect. 561, upon the authority of Travis v. Milne (9 Hare, 141). Thus, members of a partnership firm may be affected with constructive notice of a fraud by one of the partners whose irregular course of dealing ought to have made them institute such inquiries as would have led them to a discovery of the material facts:—See Sadler v. Lee (6 Beav. 324), where a further question arose as to the liability of an insane partner to be affected by notice. Again, in the case of Mosedon v. Wyer (6 Scott, N.R., 945), which was an action against two persons, being partners, service of a notice of declaration on one of them at their place of business (the affidavit not disclosing that the action was brought for a partnership debt) was held to be insufficient. We might mention numerous other cases in support of our objection—as, for instance, such cases as Alderson v. Clay (1 Campb. 404), Brown v. Leonard (2 Chit. 120), and Kilcock v. Guy (2 Russ. 285), where the liability of partners to be affected by notice to one of them was held or asserted to be subject to the absence of notice to the creditor or other party who seeks to affect the partnership with notice, as to any arrangement between the partners to limit or modify their liabilities as partners.

No one supposes for a moment that, in a book on mortgages, he is likely to find a perfect treatise on the doctrine of notice, or even on the more cognate subject, the priority of incumbrancers; but it is a very useful matter for inquiry, and one that properly falls within the province of a reviewer, as to the present method and arrangement of legal text-books; and we think the question is fairly raised in the book now before us. The doctrine of notice has properly no more to do with the law of mortgages than it has with the law of partnership, of principal and agent, of bills of exchange, of vendor and purchaser, of carriers, of joint-stock companies, of judgments, or of contracts; and we find, in all the text-books upon these respective subjects, and many others, a chapter or two upon the doctrine of notice—not merely as one might expect, so far as it related to the subject-matter of the particular book, but—purporting to be upon the doctrine generally, with scarcely an attempt to deduce general principles, or to reduce the authorities into categorical order, otherwise than in an arbitrary and off-hand manner.

We might mention other instances where other subjects are treated in a similar way; and, if our space permitted, might show that the fault is mainly attributable to an illogical view of the province and limits of any given subject—a fault to which legal writers are more liable than any other class of authors, from the circumstance, that in the cases which actually arise in practice, from which our principles are drawn, these principles are seldom to be found in any other than a complex form—ex. gr., in a suit affecting a mortgage, we may have—besides the special law of mortgages—questions of waiver, acquiescence, lapse of time, laches, breach of trust, notice, fraud, &c. Nevertheless, a book on mortgages could not and ought not to attempt to treat of all these questions, except so far as they have an immediate and obvious relation to mortgages. So far as these general subjects are concerned, they should be left to treatises devoted to them exclusively; and they, in their turn, should not unnecessarily intrude upon the law of mortgages, or any other extraneous subject. But we must now content ourselves with merely throwing out this hint, while we repeat our entire approbation of the work before us, so far as it treats of the proceedings in our courts of equity for the realisation of mortgage securities. We know of no work in which persons requiring information on this subject can more readily and conveniently acquire it; and, upon this ground, we heartily recommend it to the profession.

Lectures at the Incorporated Law Society.

MR. MALCOLM KERR ON THE STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS.

Mr. Malcolm Kerr, in his concluding lecture upon this subject, on the 23rd ult., observed that there now remained but three disabilities to prevent the operation of the statute—infancy, coverture, and unsoundness of mind—and that the effect of the existence of these disabilities was to suspend the operation of the statute only until they were removed. Thus, where a married woman, being an administratrix, lent part of the assets to her husband, and took a promissory note from him and a surety for the amount, it was held that she had six years after her husband's death within which she might sue the surety (Richards v. Richards, 2 B. & Ad. 447). The disability, which was to suspend the operation of the statute, must exist when the cause of action accrued; for where the time had once begun to run, no subsequent disability, however involuntary, would stop its operation (Humphrey v. Scrope, 13 Q. B. 512). The right of action might be suspended by the disability of the plaintiff; the operation of the statute might also be suspended by the absence of the defendant; for it was but reasonable that, if the plaintiff were barred by a six years' abstinence from suing, he should only be barred when he had been in a position to sue. If, therefore, the person against whom the cause of action existed were, at the time the cause of action accrued, beyond the seas, the plaintiff had six years in which to sue him after his return.

This was the effect of the 19th section of the statute 4 Ann. c. 16, to which the 12th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act had reference.

Under the statute of Anne, suspending the obligation of a plaintiff to sue a defendant when such defendant was beyond seas, by giving him six years within which to do so after his return, it was held that Ireland was beyond the seas within the meaning of the statute (Lane v. Bennett, 1 M. & W. 70). The 12th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act was passed to remove this anomaly; for Ireland was not beyond the seas within the meaning of the 3 & 4 W. 4, cc. 27, 42—each of these statutes containing an express provision to the contrary. Where the defendant was beyond seas, which now meant beyond the limits of the United Kingdom (for the statute of Anne was passed after the union with Scotland), the plaintiff had six years after his return. This was well illustrated in the case of Williams v. Jones (13 East, 439). If the defendant once set his foot in this country, though his stay were for a very short time, and were unknown to the creditor, the statute at once attached, and its operation commenced. The action, if not brought within six years of the defendant being thus in England, and within the jurisdiction, was barred (Gregory v. Harrill, 5 B. & C. 341). The same principle applied in the case of the defendant dying abroad, for there the plaintiff might sue his executors at any time within six years, not of the death, but of the executors taking out probate (Douglas v. Forrest, 4 Bing. 686).

This principle was one which, carried out to its full extent, involved another consequence—viz., that if one of several joint debtors were out of the kingdom, the statute did not begin to run until his return, although all the other joint debtors might be resident within the jurisdiction (Fannin v. Anderson, 7 Q. B. 811). The plaintiff was not obliged to sue the joint debtors in this country without joining the absent defendant. The other defendants could not plead in abatement, because in such a plea it was necessary to show that all the defendants were within the jurisdiction, and might be sued, to give the plaintiff a better writ, as it was termed. But the plaintiff was not bound to abandon his claim against the absent defendant, which he in effect did by suing the defendants here; for by getting a judgment against the defendants here, the simple contract for which the absent defendant was jointly liable became merged in the specialty debt created by the judgment; and if the plaintiff afterwards sued the absent defendant on his return, that defendant might effectually plead in bar the judgment recovered against the others. All this was, however, altered by the 11th section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, which consisted of two branches. The first branch of the section enacted that a plaintiff should not be entitled to any time within which to commence his action by reason merely of the absence of one or more of the joint debtors—i.e., that as to any joint debtors who were resident within the United Kingdom, the statute would run from the time that the cause of action accrued. The second branch of the 11th section was to destroy the effect of a judgment obtained against the defendants here so far as it prevented the absent defendant or defendants from being sued on his or their return; for it enacted that no person should be barred from suing by reason only that judgment was already recovered against any one or more of the joint debtors who were beyond the seas at the time the cause of action accrued.

The rules by which to ascertain, in all cases, the time when the cause of action accrued to the plaintiff were:—

1. In the case of torts, the right of action accrued to the plaintiff the instant the injury was done. 2. In the case of contracts, the right of action accrued when the contract, whether express or implied, was broken, and not when the damage was sustained by reason of the breach of contract. There might be a breach of contract without any one being, at the moment, entitled to take advantage of it. Thus, in the case of a bill of exchange payable to a man who died before it became due, and which bill was not paid at all; if the payee happened to be alive when the bill fell due, the contract was broken on its non-payment, or, in mercantile and legal language, its dishonour. But if the payee were dead intestate, there was no one to sue for this breach of contract; no cause of action could accrue to a dead man; but the cause of action accrued the instant the rights of action of the deceased were in the administrator; and, therefore, the six years' limitation ran from the grant of the letters of administration (Murray v. East India Co., 5 B. & Ald. 204).

If the six years had run during the lifetime of the deceased, and no action had been brought by him, the statute was a bar. Nothing the executor could do would defeat its operation; but if the testator had brought an action within the six years, which abated by his death, the executor had a reasonable time (which it seemed to be generally agreed should be a year), after the testator's death, to commence a new action; and the case would be out of the statute, although the full period of six years from the time the cause of action accrued to the testator should have elapsed (Hickman v. Walker, Willes, 27; Rhodes v. Smethurst, 6 M. & W. 353).

The statute of James barred the remedy only, but did not extinguish the debt. From this followed two consequences—that the plaintiff did not lose, by the lapse of the six years, any other means he might have of enforcing his right—such as a lien; the other, that the claim was capable of being revived by an acknowledgment in writing. Before Lord Tenterden's Act, this acknowledgment might have been by word of mouth. The consequence was, that almost in every case in which the statute was pleaded, an acknowledgment within the six years was sworn to, so as to take the case out of the statute, if the jury believed the witness.

The perjuries in these cases were so flagrant, however, that Lord Tenterden's Act was passed, supplementing, in this respect, the provisions of Charles II.'s Statute of Frauds and Perjuries, and providing that no acknowledgment or promise by words only should be deemed sufficient evidence of a new or continuing contract, unless it were made or contained in some writing. This acknowledgment, or promise in writing, must, by Lord Tenterden's Act, have been signed by the party chargeable; it might even be signed either by him or by an agent duly authorised to make such promise or acknowledgment—the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, sect. 13, having put acknowledgments of this kind in the same category as acknowledgments under the Statutes of Limitations.

The principles on which acknowledgments were to take cases out of the statute, had been satisfactorily settled by modern decisions. The earlier cases were, in the great majority of instances, not now to be relied on.

The first essential of such acknowledgment was, that there should be either an express promise to pay, or an acknowledgment in such distinct terms that a promise might be reasonably inferred. This was the principle laid down in Williams v. Griffith (3 Ex. 335). And such an admission would be sufficient to bar the statute, although the parties might differ as to the amount due to the plaintiff (Colledge v. Horn, 3 Bing. 119), for extrinsic evidence was admissible to show what was the amount really due (Cheslyn v. Dalby, 4 Y. & Coll. 328). There must be an express promise, or an acknowledgment in distinct terms, from which a promise might be inferred; where the acknowledgment was guarded or qualified, the promise could not be inferred, and the operation of the statute would not be barred. Thus, if the acknowledgment of the debt were accompanied by a denial of the liability for it, no promise to pay it could be inferred (Brigstocke v. Smith, 1 Cr. & M. 483). Within this principle, that an acknowledgment accompanied by a denial of liability was not one from which a new promise could be inferred, came those cases in which the debtor had admitted the original claim, but denied that the liability existed at the time of the omission, for instance, because the debt had been paid (Birk v. Guy, 4 Esp. 181), or because there was a set-off (Swann v Sowell, 2 B. & Ald. 759), or because the statute had run against it (Coltman v. Marsh, 3 Taunt. 380). And it would seem to make no difference that the denial of liability at the time was founded on fallacious grounds (Partington v. Butcher, 6 Esp. 66; Hellings v. Shaw, 7 Taunt. 608), for a promise could hardly be presumed when the defendant in effect said, "I do not now owe you the money, because it was discharged in such and such a way." But the acknowledgment was equally ineffectual if it were accompanied by a refusal of payment; for in such a case it was evident no promise to pay could be implied (A'Court v. Cross, 3 Bing. 328). So if there were an acknowledgment with a conditional promise to pay, no absolute promise could be inferred by the law (Tanner v. Smart, 6 B. & C. 605). When the promise was to pay on a certain condition, or arrival of a certain time, it might give rise to a new action, in which the performance of the condition or the lapse of the period given must be proved (Tanner v. Smart, 6 B. & C. 603; Humphreys v. Jones, 14 M. & W. 1). From an acknowledgment which contained a statement of an intention to pay if able, no absolute promise could be inferred (Fearn v. Lewis, 5 Bing. 349). So an acknowledgment, leaving the existence of the alleged debt quite open, would not bar the operation of the statute (Sponge v. Wright, 9 M. & W. 629). And on the same principle a letter "without prejudice" was not sufficient (Hart v. Prendergast, 14 M. & W. 741).

There must be an express promise, or an acknowledgment in such distinct terms that a promise might be inferred, and that promise or acknowledgment must relate to the debt claimed; for where it was primâ facie sufficient to take the case out of the statute, evidence was nevertheless admissible to show that there was no such intention in the party making it (Davis v. Cripps, 12 M. & W. 159). Any acknowledgment to bar the statute must also be made before action brought; the legal effect of it being that it was a new promise (Bateman v. Ruder, 3 Q. B. 574). A new promise after action was evidently good for nothing, although there were decisions to the contrary, which were mentioned in the case referred to.

With respect to the agent duly authorised to make such acknowledgment or promise—an attorney instructed to make the best terms he could for his client, would possibly be an agent duly authorised to make such an acknowledgment as would bar the statute. It had been held under Lord Tenterden's Act that the admission of a debt by the authorised agent was not sufficient (Burt v. Palmer, 5 Esp. 145), nor by a third person to whom the debtor referred the creditor for information respecting his demand (Williams v. Innes, 1 Camp. 364), nor by a wife who was accustomed to conduct her husband's business (Anderson v. Sanderson, Holt N. P. 91), nor by the debtor's counsel at the trial in his hearing (Colledge v. Horn, 3 Bing. 119). These persons would now probably be agents within the meaning of the statute, if the words had been, as in the 3 & 4 Will. 4, cc. 27 & 42, "or his agent," but the very precision of the words of the section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, in defining the agent who might make an acknowledgment to be one duly authorised to make such acknowledgment or promise, would call upon the courts for a strict interpretation.

Lord Tenterden's Act expressly provided that in the case of several joint contractors, or executors, or administrators of a contractor, one of them would not lose the benefit of the statute by the written acknowledgment of another; but, at the same time, it enacted that nothing should alter, take away, or lessen the effect of any payment of any principal or interest made by any person. Before this statute part payment of a debt revived the claim as to the residue (Whitcomb v. Whiting, Dougl. 652); part payment had the same effect since the statute (Wyatt v. Hodson, 8 Bing. 309): the reason being, that such part payment was evidence for the jury of a fresh promise (Gowan v. Forster, 3 B. & Ad. 511), and the fact that such payment, like any other fact, might be proved by parol evidence (Cleave v. Jones, 6 Ex. 573.)

Part payment to an agent of the creditor would take the case out of the statute (Megginson v. Harper, 2 Cr. & M. 322), and it was not necessary that the payment should be in cash. If, for instance, goods were given and taken in part payment of the debt, this would be sufficient to revive the claim (Cottam v. Partridge, 4 M. & G. 271). But the part payment must appear by the facts to have been in part payment of the original debt in question. If it were doubtful whether it was a part payment of an existing debt, or a payment generally, it would not have the effect of barring the statute (Waugh v. Cope, 6 M. & W. 824; Burkill v. Blanchard, 3 Ex. 89). The part payment must in all cases be made under circumstances which would warrant a jury in inferring therefrom a promise to pay the residue—this being the promise which the law implied from the fact of payment. If, therefore, it appeared that when the defendant made the payment he clearly intended to pay the whole debt in full, this payment would not operate as a mere promise to pay, and would not revive the plaintiff's claim as to the residue of the debt (Foster v. Dawber, 6 Ex. 839). Where a party, on being applied to for payment of a debt, paid a sovereign, and said that though he owed the money he would not pay it, it was held to be a question for the jury whether he intended thereby to refuse payment, or merely spoke in jest (Wainman v. Kynman, 1 Ex. 110). Striking a balance of accounts converted the set-off into a part payment, and took the case out of the statute (Worthington v. Grimsditch, 7 Q. B. 479).

Payment of interest, where the debt consisted or was composed of principal and interest, had the same effect (Sims v. Bruton, 5 Ex. 802), even when made by an agent (Jones v. Hughes, 5 Ex. 104); and as the debt, being kept alive by part payment of principal or interest, must also be kept alive as to all the persons who were liable in payment of it, part payment of principal or payment of interest by one of several joint debtors or contractors had hitherto had the effect of preserving the remedy against all the joint debtors or joint contractors, and this although the payment was not made until after the six years had elapsed (Channell v. Ditchburn, 5 M. & W. 494); and the part payment had had this effect, even when it appeared that it was made by one of several joint debtors in fraud of the others, and in expectation of immediate bankruptcy (Goddard v. Ingram, 3 Q. B. 839). It was doubtful whether a payment by one executor in his representative character, but without any express authority from his co-executors, would take the case out of the statute (see the cases referred to in Sholey v. Walton, 12 M. & W. 510). But the question was no longer of any practical interest or importance; for the 14th sect. of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act had completely altered the law as to part payment. Lord Tenterden's Act expressly provided that, in the case of several joint contractors, or executors, or administrators of a contractor, one of them should not lose the benefit of the statute by reason of the written acknowledgment of another. It specially preserved the effect of a part payment; consequently, while the acknowledgment of one of several joint contractors, or executors, or administrators of a contractor, had no effect in barring the operation of the statute against the others, a joint payment had that effect. This anomaly had now been removed, and no co-contractor or co-debtor, executor or administrator, would lose the benefit of the statute of James I., or of the specialty limitation act—the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 3—by reason only of the payment of any principal or interest by any other or others of such co-contractors, co-debtors, executors, or administrators.

The fourth head of the subject of the Statutes of Limitations comprised the four years' limitation applicable to actions for assaults, menaces, battery, wounding, or imprisonment, and the two years' limitation in actions for verbal slander—periods of limitation, the pleading of which was almost unknown in practice—for the very obvious reason, that a jury would not think much of a complaint for slander which was two years old, or give large damages for an assault sustained four years before action. [The previous lectures on this subject will be found at pages 57, 104, 159, and 218, ante].

Law Amendment Society.

FOURTEENTH SESSION—TENTH GENERAL MEETING.

MARCH 2nd, 1857.

Mr. COOKSON took the chair, at eight o'clock.

Amongst the others present were—Mr. Pitt Taylor, Mr. Hawes, Mr. Tudor, Mr. F. Hill, Mr. Edgar, Mr. Pritchard, Mr. G. B. Allen, Mr. H. F. Bristowe, Mr. Nugent Ayrton, Mr. Napier Higgins, Mr. Trower, Mr. C. Clarke, Mr. G. Harris, &c.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the first business in the notice for the evening was the reading of a paper by Mr. Nugent Ayrton on Titles to Land, but as the Report of the Registration Commissioners would shortly appear, the Council were of opinion that the reading of Mr. Ayrton's paper should be deferred until after the Report had been made.

Mr. AYRTON expressed his acquiescence in this arrangement.

The report of the committee on testamentary jurisdiction, and the resolutions contained therein, were the subject of discussion.

Mr. PITT TAYLOR said the report itself, and the three first resolutions in it, having been adopted at a former meeting, he would move that the fourth resolution be adopted, that barristers as well as advocates, and attorneys as well as proctors, should be admitted to practise in the new court recommended in the report.

Mr. PRITCHARD contended that the permission sought to be given for throwing open the ecclesiastical courts as suggested, would be productive of serious inconvenience and incalculable evils. The emoluments now derived from practising in the Admiralty and ecclesiastical courts were barely sufficient to act as an inducement for men of talent to devote themselves to these particular branches of the law; and if these inducements were still further limited by adding to the number of those who practise in those courts, it would be the means of preventing competent men from devoting their talents and energies to them. He moved an amendment to the effect that the present practice relative to proctors and advocates be maintained; but that members of the other bars should be allowed to go into the ecclesiastical courts when specially retained.

Mr. LONGDEN seconded the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOWE supported the resolution. He was convinced that the proposition enunciated by his friend Mr.

Pritchard was a most fallacious one, and that the business of the new court would be just as efficiently performed if thrown open, as it is now that it is monopolised by a comparatively few individuals.

Mr. HIGGINS argued in favour of a division of labour in the law, as well as other professions, as being better calculated to insure justice to the suitor. He certainly was not yet convinced from anything he had heard that evening, that any great advantage would arise to the suitor from any change in the manner proposed.

Mr. PITT TAYLOR, in support of the original proposition, said if it was true, as was contended, that the business of the ecclesiastical courts was of such a peculiar nature, and had been done so efficiently by those who now have the monopoly in them, there would be nothing to fear on the part of those gentlemen from throwing open the business of those courts to all who chose to practise in them. Suitors would naturally go to those who would transact their business in the most efficient manner, and, as in the other branches of the law, inefficient men would have no inducement to follow a practice which would afford them no remuneration. He urged the extreme hardship upon the public of being obliged to have recourse to two sets of agents, attorneys and proctors, to do that which ought to be performed by the former; and he believed this was the real cause of the agitation against the present system of procedure in connection with testamentary business.

Some further discussion took place, in which Mr. Fred. Hill, Mr. Clarke, Mr. Edgar, and other gentlemen took part. The resolution and amendment were then put to the meeting, and the former was carried.

Another resolution was also discussed as to the judges and officers which should constitute the new court, but the subject was adjourned.

Parliamentary Proceedings.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this bill, said, that with one or two variations, it was substantially the same bill as that which had passed their Lordships' House last session. Some years ago a royal commission was issued to inquire into the subject of divorce, and make any suggestions which would enable the legislature to get rid of the anomaly of private acts of parliament for dissolving marriages in cases of adultery. The commissioners recommended that the custom of obtaining private acts of parliament in cases of divorce à vinculo matrimonii should be abolished, and a court constituted, in which when the circumstances now required to be proved in order to obtain a bill of divorce in this house, were proved before that tribunal, it should have power to grant a divorce à vinculo matrimonii. In pursuance of these recommendations he prepared the bill of last session, which, having been read a second time, was referred to a select committee. A noble and learned friend (Lord Lyndhurst) made a motion in the select committee for extending the relief of the bill to married women divorced only à mensa et thoro, and not à vinculo matrimonii; and a clause was introduced to enable married women separated from their husbands by a decree of the Ecclesiastical Court, but not divorced à vinculo matrimonii, to have the privilege of single persons; so as to prevent their husbands returning to them and taking possession of any property they may acquire. The bill provided that a court should be constituted, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, the two Chief Justices, the Chief Baron, and the Dean of the Arches. The latter, an ecclesiastical judge, would be called the judge ordinary, and would sit for the ordinary purposes of the court; that is, he would have power to deal with all matters except divorces à vinculo matrimonii, just as the Ecclesiastical Court now did; but in all cases of divorces à vinculo matrimonii, and where it was sought to enable the parties to marry again, three of the judges of the court, of whom the Dean of the Arches was to be one, would be necessary to constitute the tribunal. The course of proceeding would be, that the witnesses would be examined orally, and the court would have power to send issues to be tried by juries. That was the outline of the bill as he now proposed to introduce it, except with a difference which he would proceed to state. After the bill had returned from the select committee, the Bishop of Oxford moved a proviso, which was carried, that in cases of divorce à vinculo matrimonii, the adulterer should not be able to marry the adulteress. But he had left out that proviso, leaving it to their lordships to insert it if they thought fit. He objected to it, because it inflicted a great injury on the woman, and in ordinary cases would be a great boon to the adulterer, and in those cases in which a man of honour might be desirous of making all the reparation in his power to a woman he had injured, that clause entirely relieved, or rather prevented, him from doing so. There was another reason why it was not convenient that this proviso should be inserted in the bill: In the private acts in their lordships' house for the dissolution of marriages, such a proviso was always introduced, although it was invariably struck out in the other house. What reason, then, was there to suppose that such a proviso would be allowed to remain in a general bill, when it was regularly struck out by the other house in all particular private bills? That was one of the changes he proposed to make in the bill as it passed their lordships last year. There was another clause which he had introduced into the present bill, to legalise by enactment deeds of separation between husband and wife. Such deeds had been held to be valid by the courts; and Lord Cottenham on one occasion interfered, by injunction, to restrain a person who was a party to a deed of this kind from taking proceedings in the ecclesiastical court. He was aware that in the deeds in question their provisions were carried out by means of trustees. But if persons agreed to live separately, there was no difficulty in finding trustees by means of whom such a deed could be entered into; and it was substantially an agreement between husband and wife. He proposed that, without this complicated machinery, it should be lawful for persons to make such a deed, and registering it would make it valid in any of our courts; and he did not see why that should not be done directly which was already done indirectly. These were the only two differences between this bill and that of last year; and, having stated so much, he should move the second reading of the bill.

Lord LYNDHURST said the bill of last year, after having passed through a select committee, was passed by their lordships, and it went down to the House of Commons, where he believed it was only dropped in consequence of the lateness of the session. There had been a change in opinion on this subject since the passing of the bill of last session, which he thought was partly attributable to the Bishop of Oxford, who, while he supported the second reading, at the same time stated a circumstance which he (Lord Lyndhurst) was afraid had made a considerable impression, not only on their lordships, but out of doors—viz., that one of the most eminent fathers of the church (St. Augustine), after considering the question during the greatest part of his life, had not made up his mind as to the propriety of granting divorces. Now, he had looked into the voluminous writings of St. Augustine, and he must say that there was no doubt, that, so far from being unable to make up his mind as to the propriety of divorces, he made statements directly in support of the measure, and repeated them over and over again, to the effect that it was lawful to dismiss a wife for adultery. Remarriage was the point on which he declared that he could not make up his mind; to that alone, and not to the question of divorce in general, he supposed the Bishop of Oxford referred. But the authorities on the other side (which his Lordship cited) were overwhelming. Another class of objections had been made to the bill by noble and learned lords. It had been stated that granting bills of divorce had been the practice of Parliament for 150 years, and was equivalent to law. If, then, this practice of Parliament had obtained the force of law, it was asked, why should it be done away with? The answer was, that the remedy was confined to the wealthy, and those of comparatively small means were excluded from it. It was then asked, what were you going to do for the poorer classes? He would answer that it did not follow, because the tribunal proposed was composed of high personages, that the expense of resorting to it would be great; but he trusted the court would make such regulations as would cause its juridiction to apply to all classes of the public. He had heard it objected that this would promote immorality. He had come to a contrary conclusion. If they gave no remedy to people in a humble position of life what did it lead to? To brutal violence and to indifference. And what could be more fatal to morality than to withhold all remedy in cases of adultery? The committee, in their report, referred to the law of Scotland. In that country the remedy was not confined to the rich, but extended to the lowest orders, yet it produced no immorality. There was another part of the subject in which he felt a deep interest. In Scotland the law in regard to divorce was equally applicable to the husband as to the wife. There was no reason why it should not be the same in England. He was justified in his opinion in this respect by the fact that by the ecclesiastical law and in the Reformatio Legum the husband and wife were placed on the same footing in regard to adultery. He proposed that the law as it existed in Scotland on this point should be the law in England, but the committee were averse to his proposition, and he abandoned it. There was, however, one alteration he was anxious to see introduced into the bill. He believed there were four cases of adultery in which, according to the existing law, divorce might be obtained; he wished to add a fifth. He thought where a husband, after a certain number of years, abandoned his wife, broke the marriage vow, and went to a distant country, and intentionally neglected her, that that should be a case for a divorce. In support of this proposition, he referred to the three objects contemplated by the marriage ceremony:—The procreation of children, and bringing them up in the fear of God; secondly, the prevention of sin; and thirdly, the reciprocal love and comfort in sickness and in health between the husband and wife—the mutual society to be maintained together. But, when the man—disregarding the duties thus imposed upon him, and disregarding the stern objects to which he had referred—abandoned his wife, went to a distant country, cut off all communication with her—could they say that under such circumstances it was just that she should continue to be bound by the obligation? Their lordships were, then, not to protect their own sex alone, they were still more bound to protect those who had no means of protecting themselves. There was a novelty in the bill to which he would now advert. The professed object of the measure was to enable parties to do that by a short course which they could only do, as the law stood, by an expensive and circuitous procedure. He doubted, whether, on this particular subject, it was desirable to adopt such a course. Such a clause, for the purpose of facilitating the voluntary separation of husband and wife, was in direct contravention to the policy of the law of England. To prove this, he would refer to the authority of Lord Stowell, who said, that his court (the Ecclesiastical Court) considered a private agreement for the separation of man and wife as an illegal contract, implying a dereliction of the stipulated duties which the parties had reciprocally entered into, and which they were not at liberty to determine; and then he added, that "the ecclesiastical courts, which the law had appointed to decide on all cases of matrimonial contract, had uniformly rejected such covenants as illegal." Again, Lord Eldon said, "I consider a deed of separation to be contrary to the policy of the law." He should explain that, when parties separated by mutual agreement, and the husband entered into a contract to provide sustenance to his wife, and to secure her interest through the medium of trustees, then the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery intervened; but all the learned judges had, nevertheless, protested against recognising such agreements, on the ground that they were contrary to public policy. Lord Eldon, speaking of covenants arising out of such separations, quoted Lord Thurlow, who said, that whether such covenants could be made the foundation of an action at law had long been doubtful in his mind; and if he had been untrammelled by previous decisions he would never have recognised them as the foundation of suits in Chancery. It came to this—that the courts considered the agreement for the separation of a man and his wife to be contrary to public policy, inconsistent with the original contract of marriage, and, therefore, not to be recognised. But there might be something grafted upon these separation agreements which led to a different conclusion as to the auxiliary part of them; and all the judges had protested against the original separation, though they aided in carrying out that auxiliary part. Their lordships, he (Lord Lyndhurst) argued, should do nothing to facilitate these separations, which all men considered inconsistent with the law of marriage, and opposed to public policy. As the present law stood, such contracts were not binding on the wife. She might at any time, notwithstanding the existence of the agreement of separation, sue, in the Ecclesiastical Court, for the restitution of conjugal rights; and there was no instance of the Courts of Equity having pronounced against the right of the wife to institute such proceedings. His noble and learned friend said, that where there was such a covenant, he would leave the parties to their remedy at law—he would not interfere with the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court; but when he pretended to maintain the law and afford a cheap and ready mode of enforcing the law, he was, in point of fact, not maintaining the law, but essentially altering it. He thought, therefore, unless his noble and learned friend made large alterations in this clause, it would not pass the two Houses of Parliament.

The Bishop of EXETER objected strongly to the centralisation of the jurisdiction in Middlesex, and enlarged upon the hardship which would be thus inflicted upon poor suitors residing in Cornwall or Cumberland. He was of opinion their lordships ought to take a much larger view of the subject than had been hitherto done. If they intended to take the Scriptures as the basis of their legislation, they should call in some eminent divines to council. The subject of matrimony was once taken up by a very wise sovereign—Constantine the Great—who called eminent divines to council, and the schem they devised was incomparably better than anything that had been promulgated since. That system lasted for 120 years until the of Theodosius, who suppressed it. He saw no longer in the bill the clause for removing that foul blot on the English law, the action for criminal conversation. Surely the law must provide some remedy for injured men against the wrong of the seducers. Having again recommended the reference of the bill to a commission composed partly of clergymen, he concluded by moving that the bill be read a second time that day three months.

Lord ST. LEONARDS said, his right rev. friend objected to a central court, but did he want a roving commission, or stationary courts studded over the country? He (Lord St. Leonards) wished to see the poor man put on the level with the rich man as regarded the law; but he did not wish to see such facilities given as would enable a man and woman to rush into court on a slight dispute, the same as if they were contending for some ordinary demand. He feared that under any arrangement the poot man would find the expense embarrassing; but it should be understood that it was not impossible for him to get redress in Parliament. If he were really poor he might sue in formâ pauperis, and there were many cases in which justice had been administered in that way. In lieu of the disgraceful action for damages, he would make adultery a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine, and he would make that fine a Crown debt, and the power of prosecution he would give to the injured husband. He would give to the deserted wife power, after two years abandonment, to sue for a divorce, by which means her earnings would be protected from the rapacity of an unprincipled husband But his noble and learned friend had proposed that a man and a woman might, by a common deed, separate for ever with as little ceremony as if they were disposing of an acre of land. At present a man and his wife could not, except with great difficulty, and in a course prescribed by law, relax the tie of marriage. To effect this, it was necessary to apply to some friend to indemnify the husband against the wife's debts. Now a man did not readily subject himself to such liabilities, and the person to whom the wife would be obliged to apply was generally a near relative. The result of this application would be most probably, in the first instance, an attempt on the part of the relative to reconcile the parties. The benefit of this would be entirely lost if the present measure were to pass. But there was in the bill a grave and important omission,—viz., with respect to the children of parties separating. These were not even mentioned. Some provision ought certainly to have been made to meet so important a matter, and that the more especially when it was proposed to do away with the indemnification by the wife's trustee. There was but one other point to which he would refer, the constitution of the new court of divorce. This court was to be a combination of others, and to it as such he certainly had many objections.

The Bishop of OXFORD said, it seemed to him that the object of the Legislature should be to surround marriage with every fence and safeguard which prudence could devise; but the bill before the House proceeded upon a totally contrary principle. At present, persons desirous of separating were viewed as in an anomalous and not very creditable position. It was not through the law, but rather by feints of law, that they were enabled to gain their end. But this measure would give them the means in law of gaining their object, it would legalise that object, and give to the parties a status in society which they did not at the present moment possess. It was said that the present law was unequal, and that it could only be acted upon by the rich. Could a poor man bring his case before this Court of Divorce? True, he might sue in formâ pauperis; but there were many who being worth more than £5, would yet not be sufficiently wealthy to carry their cases before this court. And, with regard to the very poor, what guard was there against the most corrupt collusion being practiced between the man and wife? Amongst the wealthier the loss of character and position which a woman suffered in cases of divorce was sufficient to prevent her from becoming a colluding party, in order to the obtainment of a divorce; but in the poorer classes that check was wanting. He should also strenuously oppose the measure, because it contained no provision for amending that disgrace to our law—the action for crim. con. It had been said that this bill was justified by the law of foreign countries, but this he denied. The French law said:—"Marriage does not subsist for the spouse alone, but for the children and for society; it is in its essence permanent, and we cannot fix a term to it." It was because he believed that this bill tended to unsettle men's minds on this momentous subject, that he gave it his strenuous opposition.

Lord WENSLEYDALE confessed that he had some misgiving upon that part of this measure which had for its object to give the right of granting divorce to a new tribunal. He thought it was hardly a fit thing to give to a court of law the right of giving a relief which Parliament could at present alone afford. When it was said that on the score of expense a new system ought to be introuced, he could not altogether satisfy himself where that system was to stop; for it might be said that justice should be brought to every man's door, and that the county courts ought to have jurisdiction in these cases. But the evils of such a state of things were patent to all.

The Earl of DERBY said that he entertained the greatest possible objection to the substitution of a legal court for the present tribunal. But that substitution was the very essence of the measure. The great and crying evil of the present system was, that it gave an immense advantage to the rich over the poor; and that, practically, it was only the rich who could obtain redress. The chief object of this bill was to do away with this exceptional course of proceeding, and to provide for the bringing of every case on its own merits before a judicial tribunal. He (the Earl of Derby) considered that though marriage was the highest and holiest of human ties, yet it was at the same time, by the law of God as well as the law of man, dissoluble for certain prescribed causes. What the legislature should do was to lay down the causes plainly, and then leave it to the highest judicial tribunal that they could have to decide in each particular case whether the alleged cause had been made out. He thought that no bill should be allowed to pass which did not include the abolition of actions for criminal conversation. He knew not on what ground the committee of last session rejected the proposition to connect with that abolition the power of imposing a penalty. In the ordinary course of criminal procedure, there was no hesitation in imposing a penalty on a person who had robbed another of the most trifling sum of money; but when the happiness of a whole family had been blasted, and the reputation of children endangered by the criminal act of a heartless friend, the law of England said that the wrong inflicted should not be visited with any penal consequences beyond the payment to the injured party of a paltry and miserable compensation in the shape of a sum of money. He admitted that nothing could be more absurd than to attempt to make men moral by act of Parliament; but might not the criminal law step in, not for the purpose of producing morality in individuals, but for the purpose of checking outrages on society, and grievous injury to its members? He did not see why, in such cases, it should not be in the discretion of the judge to inflict both fine and imprisonment on the offender; for if fines alone were imposed, rich offenders might enjoy impunity and poor ones be imprisoned for an almost indefinite period. Temptations to robbery, to burglary, and to violence were not temptations which beset the higher orders of society, while the crimes of licence and adultery were crimes to which they were, to say the least, as liable as the poor; and yet the criminal law was at present more indulgent to the one class of offences than the other. He objected to the seventeenth clause, on the ground that it tended to give additional facilities for separation between married persons without the advice, control, assistance, or restraint of friends, and without the intervention of forms which would give time for consideration, and for the passions to cool down. By the fifteenth clause it was provided that a wife might present a petition praying for a divorce à mensâ et thoro, if she were prepared with proof of desertion by her husband. He thought that provision went too far, and that the wife should only be entitled to that remedy after the desertion had been continued for a considerable period. Though he should vote for going into committee, he would not support the bill on the third reading, unless in the interval some of the most objectionable clauses were struck out, and others inserted which were, in his opinion, absolutely necessary to place the law on a satisfactory footing.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE said he utterly denied that this bill was caculated unduly to facilitate divorce, and to render the law of marriage more lax. He did not deny that there were likely to be a much greater number of divorces under this bill than were obtained at present; but, he must say that the evils arising from the want of the power of obtaining a divorce—the vice and misery which ensued—were much greater among the lower than among the upper orders of society. The fact of the wife's living in a state of adultery or incontinence often lead to drunkenness, which was the greatest bane of the lower orders of society. With regard to the seventeenth clause, which gave power to separate by agreement, he entirely agreed that it was most desirable that it should receive modifications. He thought that a considerable period should be allowed to elapse after the parties had signified their wish to separate before the act of separation obtained the sanction of legal forms. There was a precedent for such a regulation in France. Of the principle of the clause he certainly approved; and, as regarded the interests of children, he was convinced that they would be much better secured under a separation regularly entered into, subject to contracts to be enforced by the tribunal which it was proposed to institute, than they could possibly be while the children were exposed to the matrimonial differences of parents who were half separated, or who, if they lived together, were constantly exhibiting mutual dislike.

Earl GREY wished to explain that if he felt bound to vote for the amendment it was not because he was an advocate for the existing state of things; on the contrary, he considered it disgraceful to the country. If he thought that this bill would be a real reform in the law, he would vote for the second reading; but he was persuaded that to read a second time an immature and undigested bill was not the way to get such a reform. He would vote for the amendment, on the ground that the bill was defective, and that it could never be a real and perfect measure.

Lord REDESDALE said that it was impossible to pass any law which would satisfactorily deal with the question of divorce à vinculo matrimonii. He urged that the present exceptional state of the law was the only one that ought to be retained, and any attempt to give further facilities to divorce would create a revolution in the domestic happiness and the social institutions of this country; and it was absurd to suppose that the extent to which those facilities would go would not far exceed hereafter those which were now proposed by this bill.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, replied in detail to the objections which had been made to the bill in the debate, arguing that the proposed tribunal would give facilities as great to the poorer classes for obtaining the remedy it was desired to give as most other courts, except perhaps the county courts, to which tribunals no one would have ventured to commit the question of divorce. He defended the nineteenth clause, giving a power to married persons to separate by means of a deed; but he admitted that it would be desirable to surround the provision of the clauses with some greater securities, which he would endeavour to suggest in committee. With reference to the action for criminal conversation, if the rule in their Lordship's House which required a verdict in such an action before granting a bill for divorce was abolished, actions of that kind would die a natural death.

Their Lordships then divided—For the second reading—Contents, 25; non-contents, 13; majority, 15. The bill was read a second time.

Thursday, March 5.

PROBATE AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION BILL.

This bill passed through committee pro formâ, and was ordered to be re-printed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

COURT OF CHANCERY, IRELAND (TITLES OF PURCHASERS) BILL.

Mr. WHITESIDE, in moving the second reading of this bill, said, its object was to secure the title of purchasers of estates under judicial sales of the Court of Chancery in Ireland. At present the court had power to decree land to be sold and conveyed, but had not the power to give what was called a Parliamentary title. Many estates were sold in the Court of Chancery which could not be sold in the Encumbered Estates Court, and he did not see on what principle they could refuse to a court which had the authority to decree a sale the power of affording a purchaser the same indefeasible title which was given under the Encumbered Estates Act.

Mr. J. D. FITZGERALD opposed the bill, on the ground that it was calculated to undermine one of the most beneficial institutions which that House had ever conferred upon Ireland. Six or seven years ago the Encumbered Estates Court was established in that country, and had worked well. He thought, however, that they might dispense with that court; but great caution would be required in determining to what tribunal the authority of selling encumbered and un-encumbered estates should be committed; and, in his opinion, the Court of Chancery ought not to be intrusted with that power until it had been completely reformed. By the act of last session the Court of Chancery in Ireland had now the power to reform itself, and if it did not, then it would be the duty of Parliament to do it. The bill would perpetuate the Masters in Chancery, whose continuance had been almost universally condemned; and it would devolve the responsibility of the judge in very important matters on some conveyancing counsel. He would not oppose the second reading, but would reserve his opposition to the next stage.

Mr. G. BUTT and Mr. MACARTNEY supported the bill.

Sir E. PERRY moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. S. FITZGERALD thought it was absolutely necessary that some court in Ireland should have the power of giving an indefeasible title to unencumbered property. There were some portions of the bill which might be amended; but in so far as it would enable unencumbered property to be bought and sold with the same facility as encumbered estates it was deserving the support of the House.

Sir E. PERRY withdrew his amendment, and the bill was read a second time.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION BILL.

Mr. CRAUFURD withdrew the bill in consequence of the approaching dissolution of the Parliament; but expressed his determination, if he had a seat in the next Parliament, to re-introduce it with the amendment of the Attorney-General.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DEEDES wished to know from Sir G. Grey what course the Government intended to take with regard to the private business, which was at present in such a state that the abrupt termination of the session would cause the greatest inconvenience and expense to the parties concerned. On a former occasion of a similar nature the House had come to a resolution to this effect,—"The promoters of all railway bills in the present session shall be empowered on the second reading, or on the completion of any subsequent stage of such bill, or when the bill has been referred to a select committee, but the case for the promoters has not been opened, to abandon any further proceedings in the present session, with the option, under the following conditions, of proceeding with the same bill, in the next session of Parliament, at the same stage at which it shall have been suspended." Then followed certain conditions under which this privilege was to be allowed. If the Government would propose on this occasion any such resolution as this, and if that were their intention, he hoped its terms would be extended so as to include all private bills.

Sir G. GREY replied that it was the intention of the Government to propose to both Houses of Parliament a resolution similar in substance to that which he (Mr. Deedes) had read.

Private Bills before Parliament.

BILLS PETITIONED AGAINST.

The time has expired for petitioning against all Bills which were read a second time, on the 20th, 23rd, 24th, and 25th of February. The following Bills were petitioned against.

The Committee of Selection have made the following alteration in the Groups already formed:—

GROUP F.

They have added the

West Somerset Railway
West Somerset Mineral Railway

} Group F, which was repealed, will now consist of these two bills, and the Watchet Harbour Railway Bill, which have been referred to them by the order of the House of the 2nd March.

GROUP M.

They have withdrawn the Stratford-upon-Avon Gas and Lowestoft Water, Gas, and Market, and have added New Brunswick and Canada Railway and Land Company and South Staffordshire Water,

Mr. Wilson Patten stated (March 6) that all private business, as regards committees on opposed bills, would be suspended until another Parliament was appointed. Unopposed bills would go on as usual, until the dissolution.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON STANDING ORDERS.

February 27, 1857.

The following cases were decided by the Standing Order Committee, and reported:—

1 In the case of the Mallow and Fermoy Railway—Petition of Sir Edward M'Donnell and Francis Bernard Beamish.—Standing Order No. 140 to be dispensed with, if the Committee on the Bill think fit.

2. Torquay and St. Mary Gas.—Standing Orders dispensed with, unconditionally.

3. Birkenhead, Lancashire, and Cheshire Junction Railway.—Standing Order No. 109 dispensed with, in respect of the petitions of the trustees of R. Smith and Others, and of William Potter. Parties allowed to be heard, although petitions were presented after time.

4. Great Northern Railway.—Leave given to deposit a petition for a bill.

5. Belfast Improvement.—In this case the notices were inserted after the time. Leave given to the Examiner to inquire and report whether such notices correctly state the objects of the Bill. The parties who appeared against the petition, before the Examiner, may appear again on the question of the sufficiency of the notices.

March 3, 1857.

1. Liverpool Town and Dock Dues (St. Helen's Canal and Railway).—Petition for leave to deposit a Bill. Standing Orders dispensed with. Parties permitted to deposit a petition.

2. Belfast Improvement.—Standing Orders dispensed with, and parties allowed to proceed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Resolved—"That no private Bill be read a second time after Tuesday, the 7th day of July next.

"That no Bill, confirming any provisional order of the Board of Health, or authorising any inclosure of lands under special report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, shall be read a second time after Tuesday, the 14th day of July next.

"That when a Bill shall have passed the House with amendments, these orders shall not apply to any new Bill sent up from the House of Commons, what the Chairman of Committees shall report to the House, is substantially the same as the Bill so amended."

P.S.—This probably will be moved again in a new Parliament. There is no doubt that on the meeting of a new Parliament, resolutions will be passed which will enable the promoters and opponents of Bills to renew proceedings at the stage at which the Bills were dropped previous to the dissolution; so that, in the event of Bills going through the formal stages again, no advantage will be allowed to either party which they do not at present enjoy.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The defeat of Ministers on Tuesday was not expected. It seems to have been the result of that remarkable confusion of parties which has recently become manifest in the House of Commons. A dissolution of Parliament will follow, and possibly a change of Ministry. The political uncertainty has had, as is usual, a depressing effect on the English funds. The fall has amounted to about ¼ per cent., and has been attended by a great degree of dullness. In other respects the Money Market has been favourably influenced. The heavy payments which fell due on the 4th inst. were well met, the discount. market has become more easy, and money in sufficient supply

The conclusion of peace with Persia by a treaty signed at Paris on Wednesday has removed a very material cause of anxiety in regard to expenditure.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 28th instant which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £18,596,730, being a decrease of £18,425; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £10,343,715, shewing a decrease of £60,975, when compared with the previous return.

The amount of notes to be issued by the Bank of England beyond the bullion retained was fixed, by the Act of 1844, at £14,000,000, with power under authority of an order in council to increase that amount in a certain proportion to the withdrawal from circulation of the notes of other banks of issue. This withdrawal amounted to £712,623. There was, in consequence, an additional issue by the Bank of England on December 13th, 1855, of £475,000 against securities in pursuance of the act. The issue of notes beyond the bullion retained has since that date stood at £14,475,000. Seven other banks have subsequently ceased to issue notes. The amount of their circulation was £111,020.

The Bank of France finds itself in a condition to grant additional accommodation in discounting bills of exchange, thereby affording great facilities to the spring trade in Paris now about to open. The last quotation of the French 3 per Cents. is, 70f. 50c., shewing, in the course of the week, a rise of nearly 1 per Cent. An increased business has been done in other important foreign securities. Those of Russia and Turkey shew an advance.

The new foreign investments offered to the capitalists of this country by the grand net-work of Russian Railways, and by the numerous proposals for mines, railways, and banks, in the dominions of Turkey, attract great attention in the Money Market. Intercourse and trade with Russia, till interrupted by the late war, was steady and regular, largely increasing, and mutually advantageous. The circumstances which rendered the war inevitable, particularly the revelations contained in the dispatches of Sir Hamilton Seymour, kindled a much more hearty and determined hostility on the part of England, than was felt by our Allies. This feeling has been nourished by the differences regarding the rectified boundary of Bessarabia and the Isle of Serpents. A change must come over the public mind, both in Russia and in England, before the animosity so profoundly moved can settle down, and former confidence be restored. The proposals of Russia, for her intended railways, were not expected to offer, and certainly do not offer, to English capitalists any advantages over other parties. And, looking to the present or to the future aspect of affairs, there is no reason to expect that, at St. Petersburg, the influence of the British Cabinet is likely to be very powerful. The sum total of the terms offered seems to be, a guarantee of 5 per Cent. on strict and onerous conditions, and liable to the unfavourable influences of despotic rule.

On the side of Turkey there are many circumtances which appear advantageous to England. The Turks have a fine territory, but no money, energy, nor skill. Various important concessions have been already granted to English capitalists. Among these, are the Railway from Rutschuck on the Danube, to Enos in the Grecian Archipelago, and the National Imperial Bank of Turkey. The concession of the National Bank was granted some weeks ago, and is now ratified by the Government of the Sultan. The amount of capital intended is said to be £10,000,000. The maximum amount of notes in circulation is to be £15 000,000, on condition of one-third in gold being reserved. The existing currency is to be withdrawn gradually and replaced by the notes of the bank. Eighteen months are to be allowed for this operation, and for the amount thus advanced the bank is to receive Government bonds, bearing 6 per Cent. interest, secured on some branches of the revenue.

In a Government like that of Turkey much is required, besides a favourable grant and large privileges to make the investment of capital reasonably secure. One good security will be found in the influence of the British Ambassador, which, although liable to variation, has long continued in the ascendant at Constantinople. The grant of privileges and power to maintain them will not, however, bring success to the complicated affairs of a National Bank without skilful and careful management. The names of the successful applicants for this concession have been previously mentioned, and warrant the belief that they would not engage in it without having power to overcome the corrupt influence of Turkish officials. If the promised reforms in the administration of affairs be not visionary, the energy and perseverance of Englishmen, supported by skill and capital, will insure, as far as can be expected, a gradually extending field of operations, and profitable results.

Red-hill, near Reigate, Surrey.—Valuable Freehold detached Residence with Offices, Pleasure Grounds, Garden, and Land, the whole estate comprising upwards of 12 acres, with possession.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions from the Mortgagees to offer for SALE, at the Mart, on Friday, March 13, at 12, an extremely valuable and beautiful FREEHOLD PROPERTY, known as Blackstones, delightfully situate on the summit of Red-hill, and adjoining the common, a highly picturesque and fine healthy part of the county of Surrey, about ten minutes' walk from the Reigate Junction Station, on the Brighton and South-Eastern Railways, and within an hour's ride of the metropolis. It consists of an elegant residence, most substantially built of stone, at great cost, within the last four years, standing perfectly detached, commanding extensive and lovely views, and containing seven bed rooms, dressing room, bath room, linen room, square landing, a noble lofty drawing room, 31 ft. by 17 ft.; dining room, handsomely decorated, 25 by 16 ft.; morning room, 24 ft. 6 in. by 17 ft.; library, 16 ft. by 12; the windows all opening to the grounds, and fitted with plate-glass, spacious entrance and inner halls, space for conservatory (the foundation of which is laid), wide polished oak staircase, secondary stairs, three water-closets, lobby, footman's waiting room, butler's pantry, housekeeper's room, kitchen, scullery, and other capital offices, strong room, two wine cellars, laundry, yard, hen and wood houses, pleasure grounds surrounding the house laid out in lawn, flower beds, and shrubberies, terrace walk, kitchen garden, melon ground and pits, lodge entrance, containing two rooms, garden, &c., and enclosures of meadow and arable land, comprising in the whole upwards of 12 acres. The residence, which is admirably adapted for a family of the first respectability, is, with the exception of some internal decorations, completely and expensively finished, the accommodation and general arrangements are admirable throughout, and there is an abundant supply of pure spring water to the whole of the premises from a never-failing source. There is also a convenient site for the erection of stabling, &c. Possession will be given on completion of the purchase. May be viewed by cards only, and particulars had at the White Hart Hotel, Reigate; Lakeman's Hotel, Red-hill; the Old Ship, Brighton; of Messrs. Richardson and Wansey, solicitors, No. 3, Moorgate-street; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Cheapside.—Very valuable Freehold Properties, land-tax redeemed, the present low rentals amounting to £385 per annum.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions to offer for SALE, at the Mart, on Friday, March 13, at 12, in three lots, the following valuable FREEHOLD PROPERTIES—viz., Lot 1. A capital and substantial Shop, Dwelling-house, and Offices, situate No. 70, Cheapside, at the corner of Queen-street, and immediately opposite the Atlas Assurance-office, unquestionably one of the most important positions in the city of London; comprising on the upper floor an excellent board room and private office; second floor, two offices and water-closet; first floor, a public office, private ditto, washing-closet, and private entrance from Queen-street (this portion of the property is now occupied by the Observer Life-office); ground floor, a convenient shop with plate-glass front, and kitchen, and other offices on the basement. Let on lease to Mr. Garratt, for a term, which will expire at Michaelmas, 1863, at a very low rental of £220 per annum. Lots 2 and 3. Two excellent Shops, Dwelling-house, and Offices situate Nos. 90 and 91, Queen-street, adjoining Lot 1, and close to Cheapside; let to Messrs. Hadlam and Plews and Mr. Kirkpatrick, at very low rentals, amounting together to £165 per annum. At the expiration of the existing lease and agreement, the present rentals may be considerably increased. Particulars may be had of Messrs. Wilde, Rees, Humphrey, and Wilde, solicitors, No. 21, College-hill; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Kensington.—Compact Leasehold Residence, with immediate possession, and a valuable Plot of Building Land.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions from the Executors to offer for SALE, at the Mart, on Friday, March 13, at 12, in two lots, the following valuable PROPERTIES—viz., Lot 1. A desirable and substantial semi-detached Residence, pleasantly situate, 9, Gordon-place, at the corner of Pitt-street, Kensington, near the church, and only a short walk from Kensington-park; containing a servant's bed room, four bed rooms, drawing room, linen closet, landing, water-closet, dining room, small parlour, kitchen, wash-house, scullery, larder, cellars; yard, knife-house, &c., and small garden; held for 87 years unexpired, at a ground rent of £7, and of the estimated value of £55 per annum. Lot 2. A valuable Plot of Building Land, situate adjoining Lot 1, between Gordon-place and Wilton-terrace, having a frontage to Pitt-street of 35 ft. 5 in., extending in depth about 80 ft., and well adapted for the erection of two comfortable dwelling-houses; held for 87 years, at a peppercorn. May be viewed, and particulars had of Messrs. Barnes and Bernard, solicitors, 2, Great Winchester-street; of Mr. H. D. Clarke, Desborough-house, Westbourne-green, Paddington; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Homerton, near Hackney, Middlesex.—Valuable Freehold Residence and Building Land, within three miles of the city, and only a short walk from the Railway Station.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions from the Executors to offer for SALE, at the Mart, on Friday, March 20, at 12, a valuable FREEHOLD PROPERTY, eligibly situate, at the corner of King's-road, and close to the New Church, in High-street, Homerton, in the parish of Hackney, comprising a comfortable and very substantial detached residence, containing seven bed rooms, dressing room, excellent dining and drawing rooms, store-closets, entrance-hall, fernery, water-closet, kitchen, cellars, all necessary domestic offices, two yards, knife-house, sheds, &c., three-stall stable, harness-room, coach-house, loft, paved yard, pleasure garden, and large walled kitchen garden in the rear. The property abuts upon the North London Railway; it has a frontage of 70 ft. to the High-street, an important frontage of 322 ft. to a capital 40-ft. road, and a portion is immediately available as a profitable building speculation, without affecting the value of the remainder as a residence for a family of respectability. May be viewed, and particulars had of Messrs. Blake and Snow, solicitors, College-hill; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Cunningham-place, Maida-hill.—Valuable Leasehold Residence, with Coachhouse, Stabling, and Garden.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions to offer for SALE, at the Mart, on Friday, March 20, at 12, a substantial semi-detached RESIDENCE, with possession, situate No. 9, Cunningham-place, Maida-hill, St. John's-wood; containing five bed rooms, bath-room, convenient closets, study, two elegant drawing rooms, entrance hall, capital dining room 27 by 16 ft., library, water closets, two kitchens, scullery, and good domestic offices, cellars, and other conveniences; small garden, carriage yard, coachhouse, three-stall stable, two rooms over, enclosed forecourt, &c. Held for 98 years from 1825, at a ground rent of £10, and of the estimated value of £110 per annum. May be viewed, and particulars had of Messrs. Currie and Co., solicitors, 32, Lincoln's-inn-fields; Messrs. Langley and Gibbon, solicitors, 32, Great James-street, Bedford-row; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart and Trist, 62 Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Cheapside.—Important Freehold Property, occupying a frontage of 60 feet.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions to offer for SALE, at the Mart, on Friday, 27th March, at 12, in one lot, a very valuable FREEHOLD PROPERTY, situate Nos. 120, 121, and 122, Cheapside, and forming the eastern corner of Wood-street, in the heart of the city of London, occupying a very important frontage of 60 feet, and in a most commanding position for a Manchester or other Banking Company, public insurance office, or any large mercantile establishment. No. 120 contains, on the upper floors, three warerooms, two counting-houses, parlour, two bed rooms, kitchen, and lumber room; on the ground floor, front shop, small wareroom in the rear, and boarded wareroom on the basement; in the occupation of Mr. Holder, and his under tenants. No. 121 contains two attics, two bed rooms, parlour, kitchen, show room, counting-houses, and boarded warcroom on the basement; in the occupation of Messrs. Evans and Co. No. 122 contains four warerooms, two attics, kitchen, and cellar; in the occupation of Messrs. Rutter and Son. The lease of the whole property will expire at Michaelmas, 1858, when possession may be had. May be viewed by permission of the tenants, and particulars had of Messrs. Western and Sons, solicitors, 7, Great James-street, Bedford-row; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Upper Grosvenor-street.—Capital Town Residence, Coach-house, and Stabling, with immediate possession.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions to offer for SALE, at the Mart, on Friday, April 17, at 12, unless previously disposed of by private contract, an excellent TOWN RESIDENCE, situate No. 22, Upper Grosvenor-street, Grosvenor-square, within two doors of Grosvenor-gate, having a fine view over Hyde-park, and in the most fashionable position in the Metropolis. It is adapted for the occupation of a moderate-sized family, and contains five good bed rooms, dressing room, and water-closet, front drawing room, 20 feet square, communicating with a back drawing room and vestibule on the ground floor, entrance hall and portico, and, in addition to a library in front, a small bed room, dressing room, and water-closet at the back. The residence also possesses the unusual advantage of a spacious and lofty dining-room, 24 ft. by 18 ft., which has been added to the original building. The servants' offices are good and well-arranged, binned wine cellars, detached servants' rooms, double coach-house, and four-stall stable. The property is held on lease for a term of about 30 years, at a ground rent. A fire having occurred on the upper floor of the house, the whole is now being thoroughly restored, and the purchaser will have the advantage of an entirely new roof. May be viewed, and particulars had of Messrs. Parke and Pollock, 63, Lincoln's-inn-fields; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Noble Town Mansion, with capital Coach-houses and Stabling, Stratford-place.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions to offer for SALE, at the Mart, on Friday, April 17, at 12, a noble TOWN MANSION, and offices, situate No. 19, on the west side of Stratford-place, occupying altogether the important area of upwards of 9,000 square feet. It has been built in the most substantial manner, elegantly fitted up, arranged with every possible convenience, and is especially adapted for the residence of a nobleman, or gentleman of fortune. It contains on the chamber floors 11 excellent bed rooms, the principal about 26 by 20, dressing rooms, water-closets, &c., with secondary staircase; on the first floor, a magnificent and lofty suite of four rooms, elegantly finished, communicating with each other, and occupying in their entire length upwards of 100 feet; ground floor, entrance hall leading to an inner hall, in which is an exceedingly handsome stone staircase, well lighted, and having access to the principal apartments; a breakfast room 29 by 21 ft. 6, capital dining room 35 by 22, and library 26 by 19, basement servants' offices of every description, most conveniently arranged, with excellent wine, beer, and coal cellars; in the rear is a spacious laundry, with drying room over, and eight servants' bed rooms, and opening to the mews are double coach-houses, stabling for 12 horses, with lofts and men's rooms over. Part of the property is freehold, and the remainder nearly equal in value to freehold, being held under the city, renewable for ever on payment of a small fixed fine. May be viewed by tickets, and particulars had of Messrs. Pemberton and Meynell, 20, Whitehall-place; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-st., Royal Exchange.

Policy for £2,000 in the United Kingdom Life Assurance Office, with Additions.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions to offer for SALE, at the Mart, on Friday, March 13, at 12, a valuable POLICY for £2,000, with the accumulations thereon, effected in the year 1838, in the United Kingdom Life Assurance, on the life of a gentleman, now aged 56, subject to an annual premium of £57 16s. 8d. The additions to this policy at present amount to £635. Particulars may be had at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Eltham, Kent.—Valuable Freehold Estate, containing about 193 acres.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions to offer for SALE, on Friday, April 24, ELTHAM-PARK FARM, a very valuable and compact freehold estate, land tax redeemed, situate in the parish of, and close to, the village of Eltham, immediately adjoining Eltham-park, about eight miles from the metropolis, in a healthy part of the county of Kent. It consists of a comfortable cottage residence, containing four attics, four bed rooms, dressing room, and water-closet, two parlours, kitchen, and offices, with stabling, coach-house, &c., lawn, garden, and orchard; also, at a convenient distance, a labourer's cottage, farm-yard, barn, stabling, wagon lodge, granary, cow house and sheds, and a double cottage for labourers, together with several enclosures of highly productive arable and meadow land, the whole lying well together, and containing 193 acres and 11 perches; in the occupation of Mr. John Green, a highly respectable tenant, whose tenancy will expire at Michaelmas next. Estimated value as an agricultural rental £300 per annum. May be viewed, and particulars had in due time, at the King's Arms, Eltham; of G. A. Crawley, Esq., Whitehall-place; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Foots-cray, Kent.—Valuable Freehold Residence, with Offices, Gardens, and Meadow Land, Building Ground, &c.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions to offer for SALE, on Friday, April 24, valuable FREEHOLD ESTATES, situate in the village of Foots-cray, in the parish of Chiselhurst, a beautiful part of the county of Kent. Lot 1 will consist of a comfortable residence, containing three attics, three bed rooms, two dressing rooms, two servants' rooms, and water closet, dining and drawing rooms, study, waiting room and store room, domestic offices, four-stall stable, double coachhouse and lofts over, greenhouse, lawn, and flower garden, productive kitchen-garden partly walled in, orchard, and meadow land, also a piece of garden, situate immediately opposite the residence, now laid out in lawn and shrubbery, the whole containing 2 acres and 12 perches in hand. Lot 2. A Cottage and Garden, adjoining Lot 1, in the occupation of Thomas Green. Lots 3, 4, and 5 will consist of plots of Building Land, fronting the high road, and close to the village of Foots-cray, containing together about two acres and a half, in hand. The intended railway from Bromley to St. Mary-cray, for which a bill has been obtained, will add considerably to the value of this property. May be viewed, and particulars, with plans, had in due time at the Tiger's Head, Foots-cray; of G. A. Crawley, Esq., Whitehall-place; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Valuable Freehold Estates, at Harrow and Northolt, in the county of Middlesex.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions from the Trustees to offer for SALE, in May next, valuable FREEHOLD ESTATES, situate at Harrow and Northolt, in the county of Middlesex, the whole containing upwards of 660 acres, a very considerable portion of which is admirably and beautifully situate for building. They consist of Roxborough Farm, close to the town of and church at Harrow, containing altogether, with Honeyburn Farm, about 138 acres, the whole of which will be subdivided into building lots, varying from four to 30 acres. The Mount Estate, on the summit of the hill, at Harrow, with capital residence, gardens, pleasure-grounds, and about 31 acres of park-like land surrounding it. Roxeth-green Farm, immediately adjoining the Mount Estate, parts of it most beautifully situate, containing altogether about 140 acres, the whole adapted for building. Wood-end Farm, offering a first-rate landed investment, situate close to Harrow, in the parish of Northolt, consisting of an excellent farm-house and homestead, with upwards of 190 acres of good arable, meadow, and pasture land, in the occupation of Mr. Whittington; several accommodation enclosures, cottage, &c.; and the Dairy Farm, situate close to the Sudbury Station, within six miles of London, with a very considerable and valuable frontage to the high road leading from Harrow to London, with farm cottage and 137 acres of principally first-rate accommodation meadow land, at present in the occupation of Messrs. Hetherington. From the extraordinary frontage to the dairy farm, which bounds the high road for its entire length, it is peculiarly adapted for subdivision. A more detailed statement, with the general arrangement of the lots, will shortly appear.—62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

The first Section of the White Horse or Beulah Spa Estate.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, AND TRIST have received instructions from the Trustees to offer for SALE, in April next, the first section of this exceedingly valuable and beautiful FREEHOLD PROPERTY, consisting of about 50 or 60 acres of building land, close to the Jolly Sailor and the Norwood Station on the Croydon Railway, and bounded by the high road leading from thence to Croydon. Most of the sites are particularly adapted for immediate building purposes. The arrangement of the lots will be explained in detail in a future advertisement. Particulars and plans may be had in a few weeks of Mr. Peacock, close to the Norwood Station; at the lodge entrance to the Beulah Spa; of Messrs. Marten, Thomas, and Hollams, solicitors, Mincing-lane; of Messrs. Abbott and Salaman, solicitors, 13, Basinghall-street; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Navestock, Essex.—Valuable Freehold and Part Copyhold Estate (land tax redeemed), containing 67 acres.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST, have received instructions to offer for SALE, in the spring (unless previously disposed of by private contract), a valuable FREEHOLD and part COPYHOLD DAIRY FARM, known as the Yew Tree, desirably situate in the parish of Navestock, about four miles from the market towns of Brentwood and Chipping Ongar, six from Romford, and seven from Epping, in the county of Essex. It consists of a comfortable farm-house, with convenient outbuildings, and 67 acres of rich meadow, pasture, and arable land. The whole land tax redeemed. May be viewed by permission of the tenant, and particulars in due time had of Henry Quick, Esq., 27, Ely-place, Holborn; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

The White Horse or Beulah Spa Estate, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Crystal Palace, and extending to the Norwood Station on the Croydon Railway.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST have received instructions from the Trustees to offer for SALE, during the present year, in different sections, the WHITE HORSE or BEULAH SPA ESTATE, a most valuable freehold property, extending over an area of between 400 and 500 acres, situate at Upper Norwood, in the county of Surrey, within half a mile of the Crystal Palace, bounded by the high road leading from London to Herne-hill, Norwood, Sydenham, and Croydon, and extending within a few yards to the Norwood Station on the Croydon Railway. This exceedingly fine property has been for many years known as the Beulah Spa, with its beautiful woods and grounds, commanding universal admiration from the extensive and magnificent scenery which on every side surrounds it, and is pre-eminently adapted for an important and first-class building speculation. The grounds are pleasingly undulated, winding for a considerable distance through ornamental woods and plantations, and intersected by a capital road constructed under the direction of Mr. Decimus Burton, commencing at the entrance to the Beulah Spa, and continuing by a gentle descent for more than a mile and a half to the road leading to Croydon. On either side of this road are splendid sites for the erection of first-class villas; this observation will also apply to the wood lands on the rising ground, and to many other parts of the estate, particularly that portion which is situate close to the church, and fronts the high road from London to Norwood. A considerable portion of the property has valuable frontages to the road leading from the Norwood Station to Sydenham, and also to the road connected with that constructed by Mr. Decimus Burton, the present existing roads giving the greatest facility for the arrangement of any other roads that may be necessary for carrying out a general building scheme. The situation is exceedingly convenient, within half a mile of the Crystal Palace, where there is a Railway Station, and about a mile from the Norwood and Annerley Stations, on the Croydon Railway, giving very easy, frequent, and economical access to all parts of London, and the neighbourhood is notoriously remarkably healthy. There is abundance of brick-earth and gravel, which, combined with all the other advantages appertaining to this exceedingly beautiful property, present an unusually advantageous opportunity of carrying out safe and profitable building operations, and within eight miles of London, sufficiently distant for the enjoyment of a beautiful and lovely country, and sufficiently near to be within an hour's journey of all parts of it. The trustees, with a view to obtain the best possible mode of laying out the estate advertised, offering premiums for such plans as would the most readily facilitate such a purpose, they are now in the course of selection. Those which will ultimately be selected will, in a few days, be forwarded to the offices of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, where they may be inspected at any time from 10 till 4 in the afternoon. It is intended to offer the estate in different sections, unless some advantageous offer be made for the whole; the first section will be offered in April next. Particulars and plans will be ready in due course, and may be had at Mr. Peacock's, near the Norwood Station; at the lodge entrance to the Beulah Spa; of Messrs. Marten, Thomas, and Hollams, solicitors, Mincing-lane; of Messrs. Abbott and Salaman, solicitors, 13, Basinghall-street; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

Enfield, Middlesex, within two miles of two Railway Stations.—Delightful Residence, with extensive and beautiful Pleasure Grounds and Gardens, Conservatory, Greenhouse, Hot and Forcing Houses, Stabling, Farm-yards, Buildings, and Offices, and upwards of 31 acres of Land, with early possession.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST, have received instructions to offer for SALE, at the Mart, in June next (unless previously disposed of by Private Contract), the valuable LEASE of an excellent RESIDENCE, delightfully situate at Enfield, two miles from the Waltham and Enfield Stations, on the Eastern Counties Railway, and 12 miles from London. It contains 10 bed rooms, dressing room, drawing and dining room, breakfast room, opening to a conservatory, entrance hall, &c., and domestic offices of every description, with an abundant supply of pure water, capital four-stall stable, coach-house, rooms and loft over, beautiful pleasure grounds surrounding the house, laid out in lawns and gardens, filled with rare flowering shrubs and plants, paddock or archery ground, with dry gravelled shrubbery walls round, half-a mile in extent, large and most productive kitchen garden, with high walls, an abundance of choice fruit trees in full bearing, grapery, hothouse, forcing pits, gardener's cottage, compact model farm-yard and buildings completely covered in, a smaller enclosed yard, sheds, &c., together with three enclosures of rich meadow land, the whole (with three acres arable) comprising upwards of 31 acres, and held for 17¼ years unexpired, at an exceedingly low rental of £160 per annum. The present proprietor has expended a very large sum of money during the last three years in important substantial additions and general improvements, and the property may be said to be complete for the occupation and enjoyment of a gentleman. May be viewed by cards only, and particulars had of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street Royal Exchange.

Hawkhurst, near Cranbrook, in the county of Kent.

MESSRS. NORTON, HOGGART, and TRIST, have received instructions to offer for SALE, at the Mart, in June next, unless previously disposed of by private contract, NEW-LODGE, for many years the residence and property of the late John Cobb, Esq., situate in the beautiful village of Hawkhurst, in the county of Kent, about four miles from the Etchingham Station, on the Hastings branch from Tunbridge, about equi-distant from Tunbridge-wells and Hastings, and about four miles from the market town of Cranbrook. It consists of a substantial and comfortable residence, containing every accommodation for a moderate family, with stabling, coach-house, farm-buildings, &c. There is a lawn in front of the house, good garden, green-house, shrubbery walks, and plantations, with park-like land surrounding it, containing 32 acres, the whole freehold, and subject to a payment of only 8s. per annum, for land tax. May be viewed, and particulars had of Messrs. Beecham and Son, solicitors, Hawkhurst; at the Inn, Cranbrook; at the Mart; and of Messrs. Norton, Hoggart, and Trist, 62, Old Broad-street, Royal Exchange.

THE LAW OF SALES AND PLEDGES.

The commercial and legal world seems to be more divided on the propriety of varying the law laid down in Kingsford v. Merry than we at first imagined. At the meeting over which Baron ROTHSCHILD presided in the early part of the year, considerable difference of opinion prevailed as to what the law ought to be; and none of the unprofessional speakers seemed to have any very distinct idea of what the law of England is and has been from time immemorial. The want of agreement on the subject among merchants has since become still more apparent; and it has been, not unreasonably, intimated by the Government, that no Ministerial measure will be introduced for the change of the law complained of until the trading community has attained to something like unanimity in its views. The question, when separated from the rather complicated and very startling facts which came out on the trial, may be stated in half-a-dozen words—"If goods or documents of title are sold or pledged by a person who has got possession by theft or fraud, is the loss to fall on the true owner, or on the bonâ fide purchaser or pledgee?"

The law, with certain exceptions—partly introduced by custom and judicial decisions, and partly by modern statutes—says that the right of the true owner shall prevail over that of the bonâ fide purchaser or pledgee. It was the application of this ancient doctrine, in the case of Kingsford v. Merry, which has caused all the excitement. Merchants, however, are not yet of one mind as to the wisdom of altering the rule; and a warm controversy has been maintained, in which Mr. FRESHFIELD has appeared as the most prominent champion of the existing law, while the assault against it is led by Mr. LAVIE. The letters of these gentlemen, addressed to Baron ROTHSCHILD, which we have reprinted in another column, bring out the chief arguments which have been thought to bear upon the dispute. In support of the existing law, it is urged that the change proposed—viz., to shift the loss, in all cases of fraud, from the merchant who takes goods or warrants bonâ fide in the course of business, to the owner from whom they may have been fraudulently obtained—would be a violation of the law of property as it has stood for centuries; that to increase the weight attributed to mere possession and apparent title would be a retrograde step towards the barbarous doctrine, "might makes right;" that to give validity to even bonâ fide transactions, by which title may be derived through rogues, would be a kind of sanction to fraud, and would lead to laxity of public morals; and, lastly, that such a case as Kingsford v. Merry does not occur once in a dozen years, and is not worth the coil that has been made about it.

To these objections Mr. LAVIE replies, that the alleged violation of law is an alteration consistent with the first principles of justice; that the proposed innovation, so far from being a retrograde step in civilisation, is the natural consequence of the expansion of commerce; that its supposed tendency to undermine commercial morals would be more applicable to existing statutes which no one alleges to have had any such effect; that the change now asked for is only the complete application of a principle already acted on; and that, however rare the cases may be in which warrants are fraudulently obtained, the number of actual frauds is no measure of the mischief which infects every honest transaction, by adding a lurking danger of loss against which no prudence or bona fides can guard.

On several of the points thus raised, it is not difficult to form an opinion. So far as the moral grounds of the argument go, we agree entirely with Mr. LAVIE. The protest of Mr. FRESHFIELD against the dreaded assault upon the morals of commerce goes far beyond what his case requires, or past experience can justify. To say that a change of liability from one of two equally innocent victims to the other is a violation of the law of property, seems more a rhetorical flourish than anything else. In all cases of fraud, the violation of the law of property is committed by the rogue; and whether the law prefers the owner who has managed to get robbed or cheated, or the lender who has trusted to an apparently valid document of title, there must be great hardship on one side or the other. If the case were to be considered wholly apart from any question of mercantile convenience, we are not at all clear that the owner would have the strongest moral position. The most material question seems to be, whether it is easier for an owner by reasonable caution to guard against the robbery or fraudulent appropriation of his goods or warrants, or for a dealer in the market to divine the mode in which the documents that are offered to him may have been obtained. We believe that no care could protect the purchaser, and that, on the contrary, an owner seldom loses the possession of his goods without more or less of negligence on his part. Certainly there was negligence enough on the part of Messrs. KINGSFORD; and it seems clear that where a loss must be borne by one of two innocent persons, it ought to fall on him who might, by proper caution, have prevented it altogether. Then, again, it is obvious that to make apparent ownership, when clothed with the possession or the indicia of title, conclusive in favour of a bonâ fide purchaser, or pledgee, is but the last of a progressive series of steps which have been called for from time to time by the necessities of commerce. First we began by upholding the true owner against all the world, except in the case of a sale in market overt. Then came the grand decision, in Miller v. Race, which established the absolute right of the bonâ fide holder of a bank-note, through whatever hands it might have passed; not exactly as Mr. FRESHFIELD argues, on the ground that bank-notes are money, which cannot be ear-marked, but on the sensible doctrine that the convenience of trade requires validity to be given to instruments of currency. It is obvious that the same principle applies, though in a less degree, to all documents which are extensively passed from hand to hand as the representatives of value, and the ground on which the proposed innovation is recommended is, that by the use of dock warrants goods have come to acquire something of the same negotiable character which formerly belonged almost exclusively to money and notes. The real question seems to be, whether the custom which has given to goods, when represented by documents of title, the quality of a quasi currency, is sufficient to justify the application to them of the maxims on which Lord MANSFIELD acted, in Miller v. Race. By a series of statutes, ending in Sir R. PEEL'S Factor's Act, this has been done in the case of persons entrusted with the custody of goods and documents. All of these statutes were steps towards the broad doctrine that possession of goods and warrants shall, in mercantile dealings, be sufficient to give validity to any bonâ fide dealing, notwithstanding the claims of a prior owner, who has been the victim of a fraud.

Mr. FRESHFIELD'S distinction between the cases of fraudulent dealings by factors and fraudulent appropriations by strangers, though it deserves consideration, is not altogether conclusive. The factor, he says, is clothed with the power to deal with the goods by the act of the owner, and if a fraud is committed, the owner, whose act has enabled the rogue to practise it, ought to bear the loss which may ensue. This is sound enough; but if the credulous act of the owner is sufficient to postpone him, even on Mr. FRESHFIELD'S high moral grounds, surely there is a certain amount of negligence which ought to have the same effect; an amount, we may add, which was clearly reached in Kingsford v. Merry, and which may almost be presumed on most occasions of the kind. This, alone, would incline us rather to the side of the purchaser or pledgee, than to that of the loser; and, as commercial habits of convenience point in the same direction, we have little doubt that the suggested innovation ought to become, and will, sooner or later, become the law of the land.

We are, however, decidedly opposed to any attempt to force the reform down the throats of recalcitrant merchants; and we should be sorry to see an act passed for the purpose until the commercial world was prepared to receive it with general assent. Although we differ from Mr. FRESHFIELD'S view as to the question of principle, we quite agree with him that no strong necessity is made out for immediate legislative interference. The risk of suffering by the purchase of stolen commodities, is admitted to be infinitesimal as compared with the chance of getting hold of a forged document. Yet business is not altogether put out of joint by the two risks combined, and it is certainly not worth while to raise a commotion in the City, and to revolutionise commercial law for the purpose of annihilating so very small a per centage of the daily risks of merchants. When the City can accept the measure with unanimity, it will be time to pass it. But, sound as it may be in theory, its practical importance scarcely seems sufficient to warrant its friends in pushing it at present in the face of the influential opposition which it seems likely to encounter.

ATTEMPTS TO MURDER.

Several cases have occurred during the present assizes which can hardly fail to have surprised persons unaccustomed to the administration of the criminal law. A man was tried at Winchester for an attempt to murder one of the officers of the prison in which he was confined. The charge was established beyond the possibility of doubt. The circumstances of the assault, and the conduct of the prisoner both before and after the occurrence, placed his intentions in the clearest light. The offence was one of the very gravest kind. Nothing but circumstances quite independent of the prisoner's will saved him from being a murderer in fact, as well as in intention; and his position was both morally and legally the same as if the crime had been consummated. This being so, it appears to us that it was mere weakness on the part of those concerned not to allow the law to take its full course. The prisoner's life was forfeited, and we think that the forfeit ought to have been exacted. Public feeling is, however, so strongly opposed to the infliction of capital punishment, that we can easily understand that the judge may have felt reluctant to take the responsibility of leaving the prisoner for execution; but the result of the case was the keenest satire on the administration of criminal justice. The prisoner was already under sentence of transportation for life for another offence. The judge was unwilling to pass sentence of death, and he accordingly took the course usual in such cases of ordering it to be recorded. It is no exaggeration, but the simple statement of a fact, to say that, if this precedent is to be followed in similar cases, the effect of it will be to deprive the officers of prisons of all protection from the law as against the worst class of criminals. The position of a prisoner under sentence of transportation for life is neither better nor worse than that of a prisoner against whom sentence of death has been recorded. The two sentences produce one and the same result; and if the only effect of a desperate and most malignant attempt to murder the warder of a prison is, that the name of the punishment of the intended assassin is altered, the law affords literally and strictly no protection whatever against such violence. It would be far better, in such a case, to pass no sentence at all; for to pass a sham sentence, which every one knows to be a sham, is to take the most effectual means of making the administration of justice contemptible.

A somewhat analogous case was tried a few days afterwards, before Lord CAMPBELL, at Leicester. A man was arrested in the evening on a public road by a police-constable, on suspicion of having been concerned in a robbery. He ran away, was overtaken, resisted violently, and in the course of his resistance drew a pistol from his pocket, which he discharged at the policeman's head. The flash singed his whisker, and the ball, which passed through the collars of his great-coat and of his under-coat, would certainly have killed him, if its force had not been broken by the ornaments attached to his police uniform. The indictment charged the prisoner with shooting with intent to murder, with intent to do grievous bodily harm, and with intent to resist his lawful apprehension. The Lord Chief Justice told the jury that they need not direct their attention to the two first counts, as the prisoner was clearly guilty on the third. He was accordingly convicted on that count, and was sentenced to fifteen years' transportation. As in this instance the prisoner, though he had been previously convicted of felony, did not happen to be undergoing a legal sentence at the time of the trial, he did, no doubt, get a very severe punishment, though one which was, we think, hardly adequate to the offence committed. It is not, however, to the quantum of punishment allotted that we would direct attention in the present instance, but to the unsatisfactory character of the legal language used to describe the crime. It is, in our opinion, very unfortunate that the intention of the prisoner should ever be referred to in the indictment. The practice of alluding to it is liable to two objections, both of which appear to us conclusive In the first place, it opens a door to subterfuges on the part of the jury, of which they are, unhappily, only too ready to take advantage. A man is charged upon an indictment, like the one to which we have referred, containing several counts, each of which assigns a different intention as the one which prompted the criminal act. Now, inasmuch as a variety of motives may and constantly do exist in a man's mind at the same time, the charges do not exclude each other. There is no inconsistency in supposing that a person who shoots at another intends not only to resist his apprehension, but to do grievous bodily harm to the man apprehending him, and thereby to murder him. It is not, therefore, very unnatural that the jury should draw the practical inference that they are at liberty to select whichever of the co-existing intentions they please as the one by which the prisoner was prompted; and that they do, in fact, act upon that view of their duties, no one who is in the habit of attending criminal courts can doubt for a moment. There is, however, as it seems to us, a still stronger reason than this against the present practice. No one can have watched the operations of his own mind with any sort of attention, without observing that it is extremely common to act without any such definite mental resolution, as would properly be described as an intention. When, for example, a man stabs another, we should doubt whether, in one case in a thousand, he deliberately said to himself, "I will stab this man to death." In other words, the intention, as laid in the indictment, hardly ever exists; nor can its existence ever be more than matter of conjecture, as to which the jury are to draw their own inferences from the prisoner's conduct. It appears to us that this is a very unsatisfactory arrangement. Where the only possible proof of the crime imputed is a crime in itself, it is surely much simpler to convict and punish the offender for that which is used as matter of evidence, rather than to take the additional step of drawing from the evidence a very doubtful inference, and of making that inference the ground of conviction. If a man deliberately does an act whereby the life of another is likely to be destroyed, it cannot be necessary to go further. The presence of an actual intention to destroy life cannot aggravate the prisoner's guilt, though its absence might extenuate it; and if it so happens that the prisoner has done an act which would naturally lead to the conclusion that he intended to commit murder, it is surely as much incumbent on him to show, if he can, that the fact was not so, as it would be incumbent on him to put in evidence facts reducing the guilt of murder to manslaughter, if the fact of wilful killing were proved against him.

In almost every case in which the intention of the prisoner forms part of the charge against him, one of two undesirable results follows in practice—either the judge tells the jury to direct their attention to what, at a certain time, was passing in the prisoner's mind, as to which there is hardly ever any trustworthy evidence, or he directs them to infer the intention from the act, upon the principle that a man must be held to intend the natural and probable consequences of his actions. This introduces into the question a sort of metaphysical and constructive intention, which many juries refuse to recognise, and which it might sometimes be the height of injustice to impute to an accused person. It seems to us that, by the simple plan of making the definition refer, not to the state of the prisoner's mind, but to the nature and quality of his actions, the whole difficulty might be easily removed.

Legal News.

On Wednesday, Mr. EDWARD ESDAILE, the late governor of the Royal British Bank, was examined at great length by Mr. LINKLATER at the Court of Bankruptcy. He was first interrogated as to matters connected with the opening of the bank, on the 19th Nov., 1849. The concern started with a subscribed capital of £100,000, of which one-half was "paid up" when the bank commenced business. The words "paid up" have, it appears, in the mouth of a speculative bank director, a wider signification than plain men have been used to give to them. The Act of Parliament, says Mr. ESDAILE, was complied with "in spirit," but not "in fact." To his ingenious mind, it is quite open to dispute whether Parliament intended to require payment in actual hard money. Cash, or "the representative of cash," he rather thinks, would equally satisfy the Act. By the "representative of cash," he means "notes of hand, which were deemed to be equivalent to cash," and by means, in part, of such notes, the £50,000 was "essentially" paid up.

It may not be out of place here to inquire how far the use of similar language by a school of thinkers upon the currency may have led to its extensive practical application by financiers like Mr. ESDAILE. For an example of the manner of speaking to which we allude, it is only necessary to refer to the second letter of Mr. FRESHFIELD upon the law of warrants for goods, which we elsewhere publish. It suits the argument in that letter to treat bills of exchange and promissory notes as money, or, at least, they are currency, and currency is money. This is exactly the view adopted at the outset of many books and pamphlets that have been written to propose plans of monetary arrangement different from that which prevails under the existing law. It is quite clear that Mr. ESDAILE declines to adopt Sir ROBERT PEEL's celebrated answer to the question "What is a pound?" It might, however, have occurred to this philosophical financier that Sir ROBERT PEEL's definition had been adopted by the House of Commons, and that, when Parliament required that the paid-up capital of the Royal British Bank should be £50,000, Parliament intended to ask for 50,000 of those very yellow sovereigns, of which Sir ROBERT PEEL, on a memorable occasion, produced one from his waistcoat pocket. The only qualification of this rigid rule contemplated by the Legislature was, that notes of the Bank of England might be substituted for hard gold. Manifestly, the spirit of the legislators who placed our monetary system on its present footing is diametrically opposed to the spirit which presided over the organisation of the Royal British Bank. The entire policy of that unhappy undertaking rests upon a confusion between money and the representatives of money which was propagated by honest but short-sighted theorisers on finance, and has been cunningly turned to account by those who discerned its practical value for their own knavish purposes.

It had been imputed to the directors that, at the starting of the bank, loans were obtained by them in order to make it appear that the account of the concern at the Bank of England was larger than it actually was. It appeared from the books that two cheques were drawn in favour of one JAMES, and that Mr. ESDAILE was one of the directors who signed those cheques. He was pressed very closely to admit that this was a repayment of loans obtained for the above purpose, but the answer ultimately extracted from him was, that "his mind was in a blank state with regard to his belief as to that matter of fact." The matter of fact it will be observed was, that Mr. ESDAILE and two other persons drew cheques on behalf of the bank to the amount of nearly £9,000; and we are to suppose that, as to the destination of that large sum, the mind of Mr. ESDAILE, a director of the bank, had received no durable impression.

We regret that our limited space forbids us to do full justice to the gems of euphemistic language which stud this remarkable examination, and to the variety of curious details of bank direction, which it reveals. We select one or two passages, not as more interesting than many others, but because the result of them may be briefly given.

Eighty-six shares were allotted to Mr. CAMERON, the general manager, and the instalments upon these shares amounted to £4,300. For this sum the directors received Mr. CAMERON'S promissory note. Mr. LINKLATER asks, "Did Mr. CAMERON ever pay one farthing upon these shares?"—to which the witness, mindful of certain convenient theories, answers by inquiring whether Mr. LINKLATER means a payment "in money?"—and then admits that there was no such payment. However, the directors held Mr. CAMERON "strictly responsible," and he was then looked upon "as a man of means quite equal to that obligation." Thus, where the law required payment, the directors substituted the promise of a man whom they thought—wrongly as it turned out—quite able to perform that promise; and this they hold was "in spirit" a compliance with the Act of Parliament.

Again, Mr. MULLENS, who had been solicitor to the bank, died near the end of 1853, and the bank sustained a loss by him of upwards of £10,000. On the 13th December, 1853, the court of directors pass a resolution recording "their regard for the memory of Mr. MULLENS, and their lively recollection of his social and many amiable qualities;" and Mr. ESDAILE remarks, when this eulogium is read to him, that the board were "perfectly impressed with the integrity of Mr. MULLENS' character up to that time." The "social qualities" of the deceased solicitor were not disputed by Mr. LINKLATER, nor do we understand how he could have found much scope to exercise them in his capacity of legal adviser to the bank. We believe that Mr. HARKER, or some other celebrated toastmaster, devotes his graver hours to imposing or collecting income-tax, but we do not apprehend that the victims of Schedule D have at all a lively appreciation of the "social qualities" of the said HARKER. However, it is unhappily too true that the possession of "many social and amiable qualities" is by no means incompatible with that aptitude for confusing the distinctions between cash and credit, which appears to have prevailed among the managers of the unlucky bank. The appreciation of the directors for the kindred spirit of their solicitor was eloquently expressed by the largeness of his uncovered balance, and the entry in the books, "bad debt £10,000," may be regarded as his most appropriate epitaph. The impression of the directors as to the integrity of the character of the deceased may or may not have been affected by the subsequent discovery that he had pledged a client's deeds with them as security for his own debt. The minds of these directors appear to have undergone some peculiar preparation, fitting them to receive strange and unusual impressions from, or to remain "perfect blanks" after, occurrences which would affect ordinary understandings in a very simple and decided manner.

The issues of fact in the now celebrated case of Davison v. Duncan were tried at Durham, on the 6th instant, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, with nominal damages—a conclusion which goes far to justify an opinion lately expressed by us, that the press would not in general be in danger of sustaining harsh treatment at the hands of juries in such cases as Lord CAMPBELL would propose to leave to their decision under the amended Law of Libel. The trial has some additional interest for our readers, from the fact that the plaintiff is a solicitor, in practice at Durham, and who for some years previous to the resignation of Bishop MALTBY, was his secretary. It may be assumed that the conductors of a local journal are well acquainted with the society for which they undertake to purvey news. The reporters and editors of the Durham Advertiser can, therefore, hardly have been ignorant that Mr. DAVISON was a respectable solicitor in their city, and we think it was obvious that such a man was unlikely to have acted in the manner imputed to him in the report. A very short time would have sufficed to satisfy the editors that Mr. DAVISON's own version of his conduct was likely to be different from that given by the speakers at the meeting. The insertion of a single line of caution to the readers of the Advertiser would have sufficed to clear it of the charge of malice, and prepared the way for the explanation which Mr. DAVISON would, no doubt, have offered. According to the Times, it is impossible to find a moment for the exercise of such prudence. If that be so, litigation will often arise where a very little care, and a very little conciliation, might have prevented it; but it is always the absence of these very qualities that brings grist to the legal mill. It is a comfort to reflect that, if we may judge from the case of the Durham Advertiser, the occasional liability to an action for libel is no very serious hardship to a newspaper, but rather a source of popularity.

Lord CAMPBELL'S Committee on the Law of Libel will be re-appointed, he assures us, in the new Parliament; and he gives a hint that vexatious actions might be discouraged, by throwing upon the plaintiff the costs of both parties.

The House of Lords sat to hear appeals on Thursday, and the legal peers present were the LORD CHANCELLOR, Lord ST. LEONARD'S, and Lord WENSLEYDALE. On an appeal coming on, to which the London and North-Western Railway Company were parties, the difficulty arose that both Lord ST. LEONARD'S and Lord WENSLEYDALE were shareholders in that company. The appellant's counsel urged that those learned lords should hear the cause, and the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, speaking for himself, had no objection, but, after the decision in Swinfen v. Swinfen, he could not venture to assent without consulting his clients, who were the railway company in question, and whose directions, therefore, at that moment, it would have been somewhat difficult to obtain. The result was, that an appeal from the Lords Justices proceeded before the Chancellor alone, Lord WENSLEYDALE remaining as a sort of assessor, but not intending to give judgment. Thus, through the ingenious scruple of the Attorney-General, the unsatisfactory character of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Chancery has been placed in the most striking light; and thus, also, a recent statement of the Times, that an appeal lay from the Lords Justices to the Lord Chancellor, has been confirmed in an unexpected manner.

The following are extracts from an article which appeared in the Daily News of Wednesday. We believe that the Report of the Commission on Registration will be found fully to deserve the praise bestowed on it by our contemporary; but we must take leave to remark that the Daily News speaks here rather in the spirit of prophecy than of criticism, inasmuch as the Report which it treats as a present fact on Wednesday, was not then, and, so far as we have heard, is not now, existing in a complete state. We observe with pleasure that our contemporary's influence will be exerted to persuade the public of the justice of the claim of the solicitors to a change in the method of their remuneration. On this point it appears that the Commissioners are on our side; and we anticipate that their opinion, when explained and enforced by journals of ability and authority, will be adopted by the public and by Parliament, and that a most beneficial change will follow.

"In the month of January, 1854, a Commission was appointed for the purpose of considering the subject of Registration of Title with reference to facilitating the Sale and Transfer of Land. This Commission included among its members some of the most competent persons who could be found within and without the House of Commons. * * * Their Report is now before us, and in perusing it we cannot help recognising the pains which have been been bestowed upon its composition. The subject is one of the most difficult and complicated, and yet there is neither obscurity nor tediousness throughout the fifty-four pages of which the report consists. To Mr. Walpole we have reason to believe belongs the chief merit of drawing up the report in question, and certainly the result of his labours is eminently satisfactory, and deserving of all praise. It is impossible, of course, to pronounce a verdict at once upon all the views and arguments it contains, but we must admit that none of the schemes hitherto propounded for facilitating the sale and transfer of land seem to be so simple or so practical as that which is about to be presented to Parliament.

"The plan of a registry of titles is founded, as the report says, on the belief that the transfer of land may for many purposes be assimilated to a transfer of stock in the books of the Bank of England. Every one knows the facility with which stock is transferred from one man's name to that of another; and, without question, if the same system could be applied to land, the gain to the public would be very great. This gain is intended to be secured by the plan propounded in this report; and, having regard to the ability and experience of the Commissioners, and to the fact that the plan has actually been embodied in a bill, we see no reason to doubt its practicability. * * * * * It is impossible, within the compass of a single article, to explain the details of one of the boldest and most complete law reforms which have ever been propounded; but unless we are greatly mistaken, the details carrying the principle into effect have been elaborated with admirable sagacity, and we trust that the new House of Commons, and especially the country gentlemen, like the landowners in the House of Lords, will see the advantages of this new scheme.

"Some country attorneys have sounded the note of alarm, and seem utterly disconsolate at the prospect of this new plan passing into law. Let them be comforted. Fortunately the whole body are not quite without hope. For we observe in a most intelligent periodical, THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, a very able article in favour of this new plan for the transfer of real property. But, besides this, the Commissioners, at the end of their report, allude to the impossibility of dealing satisfactorily with the subject of registration of title without making fresh regulations as to the professional remuneration of solicitors. They propose that, as in Scotland and many foreign countries, the work should be compensated by a brokerage or commission on the purchase-money. In this way the smaller properties would be relieved from a burden which is too great for them to bear—transactions would be increased, and the total profits of solicitors would not be diminished. Indeed, without some such change as this in the mode of remunerating solicitors, it is hardly to be expected that the proposed measure should be allowed to pass."

ASSIZES IN MANCHESTER.—The Manchester Law Association has presented to the commissioners for inquiring into the expediency of altering the circuits, a memorial, showing—"That the assizes for the county palatine of Lancaster are holden at Liverpool, for the despatch of all assize business arising in the southern division of the county. That the said southern division consists of the hundreds of Salford and West Derby—Liverpool being the largest town in the hundred of West Derby, and Manchester the largest town in the hundred of Salford. That the population (as taken at the census of 1851) of Liverpool is 375,955, and of the hundred of West Derby 632,987; and the population of Manchester and Salford is 401,321, and the population of the hundred of Salford is 937,793. That it is the desire of the inhabitants of the hundred of Salford that the assizes should be holden at Manchester, for the despatch of all business arising in that hundred. That of the list of causes entered for trial at Liverpool, two-thirds are from the hundred of West Derby, while only one-third are from the hundred of Salford, although it is believed that the business transactions of the Salford hundred far out-number those of the West Derby hundred, the population of the Salford hundred out-numbering that of the West Derby hundred more than one-third. That the jurymen of the Salford hundred are compelled to stay a considerable time from home and at great expense, and are engaged for the most part in the business of the West Derby hundred; while the jurymen of West Derby are near their homes, and are not called upon to devote an equal amount of time to the business of the Salford hundred. That in criminal cases the number of witnesses in each case is much greater than in civil cases. That vast numbers of persons are compelled to attend at Liverpool as witnesses, generally for a great length of time, at great cost to the county; and, at the same time, frequently at considerable loss to themselves. The memorialists submit that assizes for the hundred of Salford ought to be holden at Manchester." The following statement shows the amount actually paid to witnesses in eight cases recently tried at Liverpool, and the amount to which the witnesses would have been entitled had the cases been tried at Manchester:—

CURIOUS CHARGE AGAINST AN ATTORNEY.—Chelmsford, Mar. 7.—John Cutts and Robert Ezekiel Smith were indicted under the "Bishop of Oxford's Act," and the offence imputed to them was having procured a young girl named Martha Augusta Hills, under twenty-one years of age, to be debauched. Miss Hills was the daughter of a farmer, and three years ago she became acquainted with the defendant Smith, who is also a farmer and a man of property; and the result of their intimacy was the birth of a child. Miss Hills subsequently went to reside with the defendant Smith; and two actions, one for seduction, and the other for breach of promise of marriage, were brought against Mr. Smith by the father of the young lady, but they were settled by the payment of £50 and an undertaking to pay the costs. Mr. Cutts is an attorney, and a man of considerable property, who lives at Bardfield-hall, and he acted as the attorney for Mr. Smith in these matters, and Mr. Shepherd, an attorney at Halsted, represented the friends of the young lady; and it would seem that in the course of the proceedings an agreement of a very extraordinary character was made, which was to the effect that if the young lady would return to the residence of Mr. Smith, and reside there as "heretofore" for a period of eight months, he undertook to marry her at the expiration of that period; but it was under a condition that this agreement should not be shown either to her father or to her legal adviser. By some means, however, Mr. Shepherd came to the knowledge of such an agreement being in existence, and, as Mr. Smith appeared not to have carried out his promise to marry the young lady, the present indictment was preferred against the defendants at the last assizes, and a true bill found, it being alleged that both the defendants were parties to the agreement referred to, and that they had thereby brought themselves within the scope of the Act of Parliament in question. On the application of the prosecutor, the trial was ordered to stand over to the next assizes.

ANOTHER PET OF THE HOME OFFICE.—At the Chelmsford assizes Elijah Ramsey was convicted of burglary, and he was proved to have been previously convicted of the same offence in 1850, and sentenced to be transported for fifteen years.—Mr. Justice Cresswell, in passing sentence, observed that he could not understand how such a man was at large, but he supposed he had succeeded in imposing upon some person who had recommended him to the clemency of the Crown. It was clear, however, that he was perfectly incorrigible, and the sentence, therefore, was that he be transported for life.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

The decision of V. C. Stuart, in Brooker v. Brooker (5 W. R. 382), is one of the highest importance as to the practice of the court. So far as we are acquainted with the cases, it is the first decision that, in proceedings under an administration summons at chambers, the court will grant an injunction, and order the appointment of a receiver, without requiring that a bill should be previously filed for that purpose. It appeared that in June, 1856, an order was made on a summons for the administration of an intestate's estate, under which the administratrix carried in her accounts before the chief clerk. Upon its being discovered by one of the intestate's next of kin that these accounts had been falsified to a considerable extent, he filed his bill, praying for the appointment of a receiver, and for an injunction to restrain the administratrix from further interference with the estate. The person who had obtained the administration summons moved under it, at the same time as the plaintiff in this suit, for the same relief, without having filed a bill; and the question was, whether an injunction could be granted and a receiver appointed on a summary application in an administration under a summons at chambers, or whether it was necessary to institute a suit by bill in order to obtain the relief sought. It was argued that the court was empowered, by the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 45, to make such an order in the proceedings by summons. That section enacts, that it shall be lawful for any person claiming to be a creditor or a specific pecuniary or residuary legatee, or the next of kin, or one of the next of kin, of a deceased person, to apply for and obtain as of course, without bill or claim filed, a summons from the Master of the Rolls or any of the Vice-Chancellors, requiring the executor or administrator to attend at chambers and show cause why an order for administration should not be made; and upon proof of the service of the summons and other matters as therein mentioned, the judge has power to make the usual order for admininistration, with such variations as the circumstances of the case may require; and the order so made is to have the force and effect of a decree made at the hearing of a cause; and the judge has also power to give any special directions touching the carriage or execution of such order. The V. C. Stuart seems to have considered, in Brooker v. Brooker, that if the court could make the order in a regularly constituted suit, it could here, because the order in chambers had the effect of a decree at the hearing of a cause; and upon the question whether such an order could be made in a regular suit instituted by bill, where it was not supported by the prayer, his Honour said that the court has always been in the habit of interfering after decree, without any such prayer, in order to extend its protection to the property which had been brought within its jurisdiction—ex. gr., where, after a decree for administration, a creditor brings his action at law, although no relief be prayed against such creditor, or he may not be a party to the suit. Considerable stress is also laid, in the Vice-Chancellor's judgment, upon the practice of adjourning into open court every case in which a point of difficulty or importance arises.

Now, as to the general rule of the court—viz., that an injunction will not be granted unless upon bill filed—specifically praying for such relief, the authorities are explicit (see 4 Inst. 92; Drew. on Injunctions, 346; Eden, on Injunctions, 45). In Holden v. Chalcraft (14 Jur. 846), L. J. Knight Bruce, then Vice-Chancellor, refused to grant an injunction which was prayed by a claim, and said the parties must resort to a bill. In West v. Laing (3 Drew. 331; S. C. 4 W. R. 1), V. C. Kindersley, speaking of the powers and duties of the court under the 45th section, and administration thereunder by proceeding on a summons at chambers, said: "If, where the application is merely to administer an estate by summons, the court has reason to see that difficult questions may arise, it will decline to make a decree on summons, and will tell the parties they must file a bill." And even after order made and accounts taken, if the judge saw that there were questions depending on controverted facts—a question partly of facts and partly of law—his Honour considered that the judge was bound to say, in the exercise of his discretion, that the matter ought to be made the subject of a suit by bill. The decision of the same learned judge, in Blakely v. Blakely (8 W. R. 288; S. C. 19 Jur. 368), was to a like effect. In that case, an executrix and trustee of a will, directing an immediate sale, allowed her co-trustee to sell and retain the money, and joined in the conveyance of the real estate and assignment of railway shares—part of the testator's estate. She also joined in the receipts for the purchase-money. There was an administration summons, and an order at chambers in the usual form for an account against the executrix, of all moneys received by her or for her use. The Chief Clerk found that she was liable in respect of the moneys received by her co-trustee; and V. C. Kindersley then was of opinion that upon such an order the executrix could not be made liable for wilful neglect or default, and therefore disallowed the Chief Clerk's certificate.

We do not know of any instance in which a bill had not been filed, where the case was adjourned from the "comparative seclusion" of chambers into open court. Where "a point of difficulty or importance arises," in a regularly instituted suit, it can be at once adjourned from chambers, and can be argued by counsel before the judge, because there are a record and pleadings to go upon; but it is extremely difficult to suggest a mode in which you could properly bring "the point of difficulty or importance" before the court, where there is no regular record, where no issues have been raised, and where all the proceedings have gone upon the assumption that there would be nothing to litigate between the parties—if, indeed, there can be properly said to be any parties at all—and that, in fact, nothing of difficulty or importance could arise in the progress of the so-called suit.

In Atkins v. Cook, 5 W. R. 381, a question arose as to the right of a respondent to a petition presented by a person who was not a party to the suit, and was out of the jurisdiction, to move that the petitioner should give security for costs; or whether, on the other hand, the respondent should wait until the petition came on to be heard, and then ask (at the hearing) for such security. V. C. Kindersley held that the respondent was entitled to move before the petition came on to be heard, because if he allowed it to come on for hearing, he might incur considerable costs in answering affidavits, &c., without having any security for their payment; and, in such a case, the respondent, upon principle, was entitled to security before he took any step.

The Lord Chancellor, in Crook v. Whitley (5 W. R. 383), affirmed the decision of V. C. Wood, upon the construction of the word "nieces" in a will. The bequest was to each of the present nieces of P. E., of whom there was only one out of seven surviving at the time when the will was made. It was held, that the bequest was confined to nieces of the first degree, and did not include great nieces, or great great nieces. The decision is analogous to that in Stoddart v. Nelson, (4 W. R. 109), where the Lord Chancellor held, that a bequest to all the testator's cousins included first cousins only.

In Carter v. Haswell (5 W. R. 388), V. C. Stuart said, that it had been fully established, by recent cases, that the 25th section of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), was to be construed upon the principle of assimilating a devise of real estate with a like bequest of personalty; and as a general residuary gift of the latter included every legacy which failed by lapse, so lands which had been included in a devise void as being contrary to law, were held to pass under what was tantamount to, though not in form, a residuary devise.

COSTS ON JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—19 & 20 VICT. C. 108, S. 30.

Heard v. Edey, 5 W. R., Exch., 358.

An important question, as to the costs of an action on a contract brought in a superior court to recover less than £20, in the event of the plaintiff recovering judgment by default, has recently arisen, under the following circumstances:—

An action on a bill of exchange had been brought in the Court of Exchequer, and the amount claimed was under £20. The defendant suffered judgment by default, on which the plaintiff applied at chambers to Martin, B., for an order for his costs—grounding such application on an affidavit that he resided more than twenty miles from the defendant, and consequently was entitled to his costs, by virtue of the 30th section of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, which runs in these words:—"Where an action of contract is brought in one of her Majesty's superior courts of record to recover a sum not exceeding £20, and the defendant in the action suffers judgment by default, the plaintiff shall recover no costs unless upon application to such court, or a judge of one of the superior courts, such court or judge shall otherwise direct." Mr. Baron Martin considered, that, where the case was one of concurrent jurisdiction (as appeared by the above affidavit, see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 128), he had no discretion, but was obliged to make the order; and the present application was to rescind the order he had made accordingly. The Court, however, refused to interfere, and discharged the rule nisi which had been obtained; but without costs.

Not much can be gathered from the reported observations of the court as to their reading of the above section of the Amendment Act of 1856, or as to their reasons for taking the course they did. But on more than one point they incidentally gave their opinion. Thus, a question arose arguendo whether the direction of the judge in the case supposed in the 30th section could be obtained on an exparte order, or whether there must be a summons. And it was intimated as to this that a new indorsement would be issued by authority for writs of summons in the superior court under £20, which would, for the future, serve all the purposes, and save the expense of a summons. The chief question, however, was, as to whether the judge, to whom application was made for the order, had a discretion to refuse it. And as to this the court gave no opinion, unless a remark by the Chief Baron, that, "if the judge had a discretion he exercised it in the case before us," may be so characterised. It was, however, insisted on behalf of the plaintiff that in cases of judgment by default in an action of contract to recover less than £20, and where, by the 128th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, the superior court and the county court had a concurrent jurisdiction, the question whether the judge of the superior court was obliged, on being applied to, to make an order that the plaintiff should have his costs, under the 30th section of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, depended not on the construction of the section last mentioned taken by itself, but in connection with the previous provisions of the County Court Acts affecting the general right of a successful plaintiff to have his costs. And if this be so, it may be useful to consider the course of previous legislation in this matter, which seems to be as follows:—By 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, plaintiffs suing in the superior court in cases within the jurisdiction of the county court were nevertheless entitled to their costs—i. e., their rights under the Statute of Gloucester were not taken away—unless a suggestion were made to deprive them thereof. Then came the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, by the 11th, 12th, and 13th sections of which the plaintiff had, on recovering in contract less than £20 (in cases even of concurrent jurisdiction), to obtain a judge's certificate or order as a condition precedent to his having costs. But from the operation of these sections, cases of "judgment by default" were excepted; and in such cases his general right to costs remained, whatever the sum sued for. Now, upon the construction of one of the above-mentioned sections of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, a question arose—and the courts differed in their opinion—whether the judges were bound, or had the power only to give costs to the plaintiff if he could establish certain facts, as inter alia, that there was concurrent jurisdiction; and to set this question at rest the 4th section of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54, was passed, which differed from the previous provision as to this of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, in this particular, that the word "may" make the rule or order for costs is replaced by "shall" make, &c., thus clearly taking away all discretion from the court or judge as to the plaintiff's costs in cases within that section, provided he could establish the needful facts, one of which, as before, was the fact of the superior court having concurrent jurisdiction, under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 128. At the date, therefore, of the last County Court Amendment Act, in such cases as last mentioned, the judge had no discretion to refuse to make the order on application, if the fact of concurrent jurisdiction, or other fact mentioned in the 128th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, or in the 13th section of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, were satisfactorily established.

But at this date, the case of "judgment by default" was entirely excepted from the operation of any section of any Act depriving plaintiffs of their general right to costs on obtaining judgment; and hence (as appears, among other places, from the evidence of Mr. Hodgson, the able Secretary to the Yorkshire Law Society, given to the County Court Commissioners, in 1854), the abuse often happened, that a plaintiff who expected no defence would sue in the superior court in the hope of getting judgment by default, and, consequently, his costs; while, on the other hand, a defendant would be induced to defend such action though he had no real answer, in order to save his costs—a course manifestly leading to litigation and unnecessary law expenses (see First Report of C. C. Com., 1855, App. p. 108). Now it was to meet this abuse, pointed out by this and other examinees, and in effect to repeal the exception in the statute 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, as to the case of judgments by default, and to place such cases on the same basis as judgment after verdict, that the recommendation of the commissioners contained in the 26th page of their Report was aimed, and their suggestion is thus framed: "The present law as to costs in the superior court, so far as it affects jurisdiction, should, we think, remain unaltered, with the exception that where an action is brought in the superior court on a contract to recover a less sum than £20, and the defendant suffers judgments by default, the plaintiff should recover no costs, unless upon application a judge of a superior court should otherwise direct. This deprivation of costs, however, we propose, should be subject to the exceptions contained in section 128 of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, where the parties reside more than twenty miles apart, or the other circumstances contemplated by the section exist." The Legislature, it will be seen, adopted in the new statute almost the very words of the substantive part of this recommendation; but take no notice whatever of the exception. And it is apprehended, that this was because it was felt that the expression of such exception was not required by law, but would necessarily arise from the previous enactments still in force. Any other explanation would be to suppose that the Legislature agreed with the opinions of Mr. Pitt Taylor, as expressed in his separate observations attached to the Report (to the effect that the right to costs preserved in the cases instanced by the 128th section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, should be taken away), so far as regarded the case of a plaintiff recovering judgment by default, but to that extent only. But that supposition is, to say the least, highly improbable, as there is clearly no reason why a plaintiff recovering judgment by default should be in a worse position than if he recovered the same sum by verdict, or otherwise.

STAMP ON ARTICLES OF CLERKSHIP.—NECESSITY FOR, BEFORE ENROLMENT.

Ex parte Williams, 5 W. R., B. C., 376.

This was an application for an order to the Master to enrol certain articles of clerkship, which had been refused enrolment on the ground that they were not stamped.

By 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 8, an affidavit of execution of a clerk's articles must be filed, and the articles themselves enrolled, within six months of such execution; and unless such articles are presented properly stamped, the practice has been for the officer to refuse to receive them. For by 7 Geo. 4, c. 44, the stamp authorities are forbidden to stamp (among other instruments) articles of clerkship on any pretence whatever after the expiration of six months from their date. Now, however, by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 81, s. 3, they are enabled to do so, notwithstanding that Act, if directed by the Treasury, on payment of a penalty increasing in amount according to the time that may have elapsed since their execution; and it was now argued in support of the present application, that since the last-mentioned statute the duty of the officer before enrolling articles to examine their stamp had ceased. Mr. Justice Erle, however, held that the former law requiring articles to be properly stamped at the time of their execution, as established by 9 W. 3, c. 25, and other statutes, remained in full force; and that it was the duty of the court, through their officer, to see that it was complied with, and not to admit articles to be enrolled which contravened this statutory requirement. As to the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 81, he said, it was intended only to relieve clerks whose interests had been inadvertently injured by the neglect of others, and was by no means intended to give a clerk a right to treat the necessity for a stamp upon articles as being taken away except only in reference to the case of his seeking to be admitted; and to consider that in that event he might qualify himself by paying what might be due for the stamp and the penalty. "The law requiring the stamp," said Mr. Justice Erle, "remains as before, subject to a discretionary power of relaxation in certain exceptional cases; and it is the duty of the Master to enforce this law by refusing enrolment without a stamp."

Professional Intelligence.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY,

The meetings of the Council are held every Thursday at two o'clock, and committee meetings frequently take place on Tuesday or other days.

The following are some of the proceedings of the Council or matters under consideration, at their several meetings in January:—

At the instance of one of the law societies in Scotland, the subject was considered of a renewed application to Parliament to repeal the remainder of the Annual Certificate Duty; but it was deemed inexpedient at present to take any proceedings for that purpose.

Arrangements were made for conducting the examinations of candidates for admission on the roll of attorneys and solicitors for the ensuing four terms, and the names of examiners, selected from the Council, were submitted to the judges and the Master of the Rolls, and the usual orders made thereon.

A letter from the Lord Chancellor's secretary was received in answer to a letter of the Council relating to the intended new scale of solicitors' costs.

The progress of the new building of the Society having been reported, the Council agreed to dispose of the remaining vacant ground, adjoining the hall and library, the same not being required for any further building purposes.

A letter was received from the President of the Law Amendment Society inviting a deputation from the Incorporated Law Society to attend a conference on the proposed amendment of the law of bankruptcy, the law of partnership, the law of merchant shipping, the law of principal and agent, the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, the law of banking, the assimilation of the commercial law of England, Scotland and Ireland, and the establishment of tribunals of commerce. The Council instructed their secretary to return an answer, stating that while the Council were not insensible to the importance of well-considered amendments in the law, and were prepared to give their best attention to any specific amendments which might be suggested thereon, they did not feel it to be within their province to take part in the proposed general discussion of the extensive range of subjects embraced in the papers transmitted.

The Council considered a communication relating to the right of solicitors practising in England to participate in the profits of professional business introduced by them and transacted in Ireland, and of solicitors in Ireland participating in business transacted here when introduced by Irish solicitors; but they agreed in opinion with the Incorporated Society of attorneys in Ireland, that such participation was neither legal nor expedient.

The Council having been favoured with a letter from the Commissioners for inquiring into the arrangement for transacting the judicial business of the superior courts of common law, and the times and places of holding assizes; and the Commissioners having invited the suggestions of the Council on the subject matters of the inquiry, the Council, with the valuable aid of their Common Law Committee, considered it advisable, in the first instance, to transmit suggestions proposing the holding of three instead of four terms, to establish three circuits for civil business, and three Nisi Prius sittings in London and Middlesex, and proposing to consider the details for carrying these suggestions into effect, if they received the approval of the Commissioners.

The names of candidates recommended by the Examiners as deserving of honorary distinction having been reported, the Council awarded three prizes of books to be presented, namely:—for the first candidate, to the value of ten guineas; and to the two other candidates, to the value of five guineas each.

A suggestion was considered for granting certificates of merit to a limited number of candidates in addition to those who obtained prizes; but the grant of honorary distinctions having been recently established, it was not deemed expedient to make any further alteration at present.

Several questions have been considered regarding the sufficiency of the service of articles of clerkship, where the clerks have been engaged in other business than that of the attorneys to whom they are articled, or holding appointments as coroners, clerks to magistrates or boards of guardians. These questions, however, are properly within the province of the examiners, to whom the parties have been referred.

Suggestions were considered relating to the admission of solicitors, who had served articles of clerkship in the colonies and were desirous of being admitted in the superior courts of this country, upon being examined, and paying the stamp duties; but, the 6th & 7th Vict. c. 73, s. 3, requiring the service to be rendered to an attorney or solicitor practising in England and Wales, the proposed alteration appeared to be impracticable without an amendment of the statute.

The names of several gentlemen of the bar were proposed as candidates for the lectureships in common law and equity.

Donations of books were received for the Library, and the thanks of the Society returned.

The following gentlemen have been approved as members of the Society during the month:—

Charles James Partington, South-square; William Elam, New-street, Bishopsgate-street; St. Barbe Sladen, Parliament-street; Joseph Haynes, St. James's-street.

METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL LAW ASSOCIATION.

A Meeting of the Managing Committee was held on the 11th inst., when the arrangements for the Annual General Meeting of the Members of the Association, which will take place on the first day of next Easter Term (15th of April), were considered; and the Secretary was instructed to prepare the Annual Report, and to issue summonses for the meeting to the members.

The Assistant Secretary reported a correspondence in reference to the establishment in connection with the association of a branch society in an important county in the South of England. The promoter of the Society, one of the provincial members of the committee, attended, and informed the meeting that there was every probability of the Society being cordially supported, although the approaching general election might somewhat interfere with the preliminary proceedings in forming the Society.

The Assistant Secretary also reported an active correspondence with the Under-Sheriff, and with the secretaries of provincial societies, in reference to local meetings during the present assizes, for the purpose of obtaining support for the Association.

Several law bills, to which the attention of the committee has been recently directed, were reported as having been withdrawn, in consequence of the approaching dissolution of Parliament.

THE VERULAM SOCIETY.

We have received a prospectus of this society, stating that it has been instituted by articled clerks and other law students, for the purpose of promoting their professional knowledge, and of ensuring, as far as they can, the honourable passing by them of their examinations at the Incorporated Law Society. With this view the Society proposes to hold meetings for the weekly discussion of moot points of law, and also to form term classes for evening study and examination, under a duly qualified principal.

IN RE TIPPERARY BANK—Ex parte Ginger.

The Lord Chancellor, on Friday last, delivered judgment in this case, which came before him on appeal from the ruling of the Master of the Rolls. It will be remembered that Mr. Ginger, and some thirty other persons, chiefly farmers in Buckinghamshire, were induced to take shares in the Tipperary Bank, while that institution was in good repute, and, under the dexterous management of the Sadliers, was paying to its shareholders a dividend of 6 per cent. per annum and a bonus of 3 per cent. in addition. Under the Winding-up Acts Mr. Ginger and his fellow-victims (the "English shareholders," as they are here styled) had been, last year, placed by the Master on the list of contributories; but on appeal to the Master of the Rolls their names were struck off the list, mainly on the ground of their having been induced to take the shares through fraudulent misrepresentations as to the position and liabilities of the banking company. The case now came on appeal before the Lord Chancellor, who arrived at the same conclusion, although on different grounds. The reasons which influenced his mind in so deciding were suggested by some curious information that transpired as to the origin and history of the shares which were transferred to the appellant. In the course of his judgment, after referring to the law as settled by the case of Burns v. Pennell, according to which the court has full power to decide questions of the kind on an application to have a name erased from the list of contributories without any suit being instituted, his Lordship continued:—

"What was the transaction of which Mr. Ginger complained? He said—'I am not a member of the company at all, because I entered into a contract with Mr. A. Farrell to buy from him a portion of the shares of the company, I believing that he was the owner of them, and that he was selling to me shares in a company consisting of shares upon which 10 per cent. had been paid up, amounting, in the whole, to £100,000. I agreed to purchase so many of the shares. I obtained an assignment from him of shares of that class and character professedly, and I received certificates from the company, stating that they were shares of that class and character in express language, because the certificates described them as shares upon each of which £10 had been paid up—words which have no meaning, except that they were shares issued to bonâ fide holders, who had, therefore, paid upon them £10 per share. 'That is the contract,' said Mr. Ginger, 'that I made with Mr. Farrell, and by virtue of which I executed the deed of transfer, and authorised the directors of the company to put my name on the registry book, and upon the proper return to the Stamp Office.' It now turned out that all that contract was pure form—that no such shares existed—that Mr. Farrell owned no shares—and, in fact, did not know that shares were standing in his name, except so far as the execution of the transfer deeds made him aware of it—that he never had paid a farthing upon such shares—that no such thing existed as a company consisting of shares upon which £10 each had been paid up, amounting to £100,000; but that a company did exist upon which only about half that amount had been paid up, and only half the amount of shares had been issued. Mr. Ginger contended, that, instead of having purchased shares in a company solidly established, as that was represented to be, he was called upon to contribute to the antecedent liabilities of a company which was not, in number or amount of shares, the company into which he had bought. He had never intended to have become an original allottee of shares in such a company; therefore, the question became a very narrow one—namely, whether Ginger ever was a member of the company, in the sense in which a member was spoken of—that was, with his authority and assent—or whether he was not deceived and defrauded in the very essence of the contract itself—whether, apart from all considerations of agency, misrepresentations, prospectus, or balance-sheet, he was not deluded by being led to suppose that he was buying one thing when, in reality, he was buying another? . . . . . The directors were the agents, no doubt, of the bank; but it was contended that the directors were not the agents of the company for the purpose of committing fraud. . . . . The fraudulent misrepresentations might, or might not, affect the principal; but if it were in a matter which was the essence of the contract itself, all the doctrines of the courts were, that the conduct of an agent in that manner was binding upon the principal, and that the latter could not enforce a contract effected through the medium of an agent, who, in order to induce a person to act upon it, had made use of misrepresentation. Another maxim known to them all was, that if there were two innocent parties, one of whom was to suffer by the act of a third party, the person who ought to suffer was he who enabled the third party to commit the fraud. That manifestly was the position of the Irish shareholders, who were in the position of being represented by their directors, and enabling those directors to commit frauds by dealing with the shares in the way they had done. . . . . What he (the Lord Chancellor) rested his opinion on simply was, that the contract with Ginger was a contract false in every particular—false as to the thing bought—false as to the vendor—false as to the company into which he supposed he was entering; in a word, he was induced to enter into one contract, and he was now sought to be made the victim of another. That was the case as regarded his position, and those concerned with him."

The result is, therefore, that Ginger and his fellow-shareholders in England are no longer on the list of contributories. The fact of their having accepted, not the real paid-up shares which they bargained for, but fraudulently issued shares, on which nothing was ever paid-up, has, fortunately for them, saved them from ruin, at one time imminent. They have further cause for gratulation in not having compromised the matter for a round sum of money, which they were not long since willing to have done, and probably would have done, but that the creditors could not be brought to unanimity on the point; and under those very defective specimens of legislation —the winding-up acts—no power is conferred upon the major part of binding even the smallest minority of the creditors to any arrangement.

ABANDONED MEASURES.

Mr. Crawford's Judgments' Execution Bill seemed to have some chance of passing into a law during the present session. It was introduced at the earliest possible period; it received the sanction of a majority of the House; and against the principle of it no sound objection could by any possibility be urged. Under such circumstances, it seems, at first sight, strange that the bill should be given up as hopeless. The explanation is found on observing the treatment which this measure received at the hands of the Irish members. For perhaps the first time during the present century, the representatives for Ireland were unanimous. They mustered in great force against the bill; and to their resolute opposition its defeat must be attributed. It was unfairly charged against them, that a desire to protect Irish debtors against English creditors actuated them in their opposition. The real ground of their objection to the measure was, that in their opinion it tended to "centralise" legal business, by dispensing with the expensive formality of an action in Dublin, before execution could issue on an English judgment. It is true that a strict reciprocity was provided for by the bill; nevertheless, the fact that a certain amount of legal business would inevitably be withdrawn from the Irish courts, was sufficient to combine the Irish sections against the measure.

Mr. Whiteside's bill for protecting the titles of purchasers under the Court of Chancery possesses all the characteristics of that learned gentleman's attempt at legislation. It is uncalled for; impracticable in detail; and destined never to become law. The object of this remarkable bill is to enable the masters in Chancery to give a Parliamentary title to purchasers under decrees for sale. But inasmuch as a Parliamentary title cannot safely be conferred without a diligent investigation of the abstract and title deeds, and as even Mr. Whiteside admits that the functions of conveyancers cannot be thrown on the masters in addition to their other duties, this bill proposes that in every case of a sale under decree, the title should be examined and certified as perfect by a Queen's Counsel! This ingenious attempt to benefit the grade to which Mr. Whiteside belongs, at once stamps the character of the bill. The Irish bar will, of course, never submit to such an invidious and absurd proposition. The general opinion is, that the business connected with the bestowal of Parliamentary title is now safely and satisfactorily exercised by the Commissioners of the Incumbered Estates Court; and that any change would be both inconvenient and dangerous.

THE COMING ELECTION.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—Can you, or any of your readers, inform me whether auditors of poor-law union accounts are disqualified from being elected to Parliament? The status of these officers is governed by 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, s. 46, which empowers the Commissioners "to determine their continuance in office or dismissal." The Poor-law Bill of last session, which did not become law, removed the election of auditors from the Chairman of Unions to nomination by the Commissioners. During last year, a case was reported to have occurred in Wales of an auditor being compelled to resign, and on his re-election he was removed by the Commissioners, who substituted another in his room. It is not easy to imagine a less independent position than this, or to doubt that such an auditor holds his situation at pleasure of the Home Secretary and Chairman of the Poor-law Board, both being members of the House of Commons. The auditors of general accounts are disqualified by 46 Geo. 3, c. 141. Thus far for the intention of the Legislature.

Am I correct in assuming that the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 68, directing that all writs for elections shall be sent to the Returning Officer of each constituency, removes the disqualification of a sheriff of a county from being eligible for any place within his jurisdiction?

Yours obediently,

Lincoln's-inn, March 10th. JUS.

Alteration of the Law Relative to Sales and Pledges.

LETTERS OF MR. FRESHFIELD AND MR. LAVIE TO BARON ROTHSCHILD.

SIR,—I take leave to trouble you, as chairman of the committee of merchants appointed at a meeting held at the London Tavern, on the 19th instant, with some observations on the proposed amendment of the law respecting goods and commercial documents then discussed.

I make no apology for doing so, because I am assured that the object of all is to elucidate the truth, and to attain substantial justice.

It appears to me that the question has been entertained under a strong prejudice, arising partly from a mistaken view of the nature of the decision in the case of Messrs. Merry, partly from an imperfect idea of what legislation can effect, and that, under this influence, the merchants are contemplating a measure much more mischievous than the evil they are seeking to remedy.

The case of Messrs. Merry, which has given rise to the general feeling recently manifested, was not particularly directed to mercantile documents, though, in its results, it no doubt affects the negotiability of goods and warrants for goods.

That the effect of it may be understood, I shall shortly state the facts on which the decision turned.

One Anderson, since convicted of forgery, was in negotiation for the purchase of nine casks of tartaric acid, and wished to inspect the goods. To enable him to do so, the broker lent him delivery orders of the goods. Anderson, upon these orders, got the goods delivered to a public warehouse named by him, and had them there entered in his own name. He then applied to Messrs. Merry for a loan of money on the goods, which they agreed to make on having the warrants. Anderson went to the warehouse-keeper, got warrants, and pledged them with Messrs. Merry. Anderson not having repaid the money, Messrs. Merry sold the goods, and the original owner afterwards came forward and sued Messrs. Merry for them. The court decided that Anderson was a mere thief; that the borrowing orders to inspect, and then obtaining delivery, was a robbery; and that the owner might follow his goods. Whether the court were right or wrong in their view of the facts is not material to the public. Perhaps a jury would have decided differently; but the parties had consented that the Court of Error might draw such conclusions from the evidence as a jury might have drawn, and the view the judges took of the facts does not concern the public, because it is confined to the particular case.

The conclusion of law, which alone is material, was, that a thief did not by stealing goods obtain a title; that he did not, by taking out a warrant in his own name, from his own warehousekeeper, improve his title; and that he could not confer a title on persons taking the goods from him by pledge of the warrants. No question here arose on the particular character of the warrants. The pledge was properly treated as a pledge of goods; and it is obvious that whatever considerations apply to the dealing with goods in the possession of an individual, must apply to warrants for these goods when obtained by that individual from his own warehousekeeper.

The strong feeling that has been excited by this decision has arisen from its being supposed to impeach the negotiability of warrants. No doubt, the case points to an instance in which the possession of warrants gives no title, but only because in the same case the possession of the goods would give no title. Accordingly, in the Act proposed by Mr. Weguelin to cure this defect of the law, it is expressly provided that contracts respecting goods, bonâ fide made in the ordinary course of trade, shall be as binding on the true owner as if made with the true owner, provided the person making such contract shall have the possession of the merchandise at the time of such contract, and shall deliver over the same. The proposed Act, as quoted by Mr. Weguelin, applies only to purchasers; I assume that he read it short, and that it is to be extended to pledges, and that the possession and delivery of the documents of title is to give the same rights as the possession and delivery of the goods, otherwise the Act would not reach the case before the meeting.

The proposition, therefore, now before you is distinctly to establish that possession of goods, however acquired, or of the documents of title to goods, shall constitute a good title in the holder to dispose of them without the knowledge or concurrence of the true owner.

Now this is a direct violation of the law of England as settled and acted on hitherto, and it is, I think, a retrograde step in the progress of civilisation. The doctrine of barbarism, that might gives right, is the principle of a state of society in which force is law. The rule by which legal ownership is respected, is the offspring of a more advanced state of society, in which the ruling principle is social order. The rule which would give validity to title acquired by fraud and theft, as against the legal ownership, leads to, if it is not indicative of, a laxity of morals of which the times give too many symptoms.

The title of ownership to goods has hitherto been held sacred, and except in the case of sale in market overt, a case of rare application required in a particular state of society, the law has not given validity to the disposition of goods acquired by robbery or theft. In the various alterations of the law by which the dealing with goods has been facilitated, Parliament has cautiously limited itself to giving validity to the dealings of agents intrusted by the true owner with the goods or the documents of title. In such cases, the legislature considered that the owner must take the consequences of a misplaced confidence; but the present is an attempt to deprive the owner not only of the possession, but of the legal title to his property by acts of violence or plunder.

But it is said that the laws of property must yield to the necessities of commerce, and that the certainty of title is essential in the varied transactions of the present age.

Now no such necessity has been attempted to be shown. I well remember, when the first Act giving validity to pledging goods by agents was under discussion in the year 1823, the evidence adduced of the enormous losses incurred in the then state of the law. Merchants, brokers, and factors all had sustained losses of the gravest character. The law books were full of reports of such cases. No solicitor of extended practice but could report cases where thousands and tens of thousands of pounds had been lost to his clients by the then state of the law, which it was desired to alter. But what is the case here? I looked with some curiosity through the speeches of the eminent merchants who attended the meeting at the London Tavern, to see if any one could point out a case of grievance arising from the state of the law as it exists. But no instance was given by any one. The single reference is to Messrs. Merry's nine casks of tartaric acid. Isolated cases may no doubt be adduced of the title to goods being impeached on the ground that they were stolen, but they are of rare occurrence, and when they occur small in amount. I am quite sure that the experience of every gentleman of your committee will concur with my own on this point, though possibly, if encouragement were given to such transactions by affording greater facility to the disposal of the goods, they might be increased. But upon the facts, as they stand, I am assured that if the object were simply to give validity to the sale and pledge of stolen goods, you would scout it as an unnecessary and indecent violation of the laws of property.

But it is said that the pledge in question was not of goods, but of warrants, and that the alarm of the merchants arises from the impeachment of the title of warrants. Now if once it is admitted that a thief should not be allowed to give a title to stolen goods by pledging them, it can never be permitted that he shall effect the object by lodging the goods in a warehouse, taking out a warrant, and pledging the warrant. The lender, who could acquire no title to the goods if delivered to him, cannot complain if he acquires no title by the pledge of warrants obtained by the thief for those goods. This will probably be conceded; but there remains an apprehension, and which has stimulated the mercantile part of the community, that the decision tends to impair the certainty of the dealings with warrants, and therefore incidentally to throw difficulty in the conduct of those large transactions hitherto carried on with confidence by the transfer of warrants. Now, no one attaches more importance than I do to the facile negotiation of dock warrants, and I should be the last to oppose just measures for maintaining this negotiability. But the law as declared by the judges has been always hitherto the law of England. Under that law the circulation of warrants has arisen, and that law, when understood, will not affect the due negotiability of warrants. If the mercantile community require absolute certainty in their dealings, they desire that which is unattainable. There are risks inseparable from business which must be borne, and a warrant is not an absolute and unimpeachable representation of value. I need not remind you how recently a house of the greatest eminence in the City lent £200,000 on warrants for metals. It was no narrow view of lawyers, no decision of the Court of Error, that deprived that house of their supposed securities, yet you well know that their warrants proved worthless. A house whose affairs came under my management four years ago lent many thousand pounds on wharfingers' warrants, which proved to be forged, and the house was ruined in consequence. Nor are these, as you well know, solitary instances. I need only to advert to the cases of false bills of lading, fictitious invoices, and other frauds daily practised, on which merchants make large advances, often with heavy loss; but it is unnecessary to enlarge on this. I venture to say that the losses in the two cases I have referred to alone, will exceed all the losses of the last twenty years arising from a defect of title such as that in Messrs. Merry's case. Yet the frauds of Cole and Pries have not stopped the negotiability of dock warrants, nor the dealings of merchants with them. When it is desired that dock warrants shall be as secure as bills of exchange and bank notes, I may reply that there are risks attaching even to these; and the losses by forgery of bills exceed tenfold all that has ever occurred, or is likely to occur, by pledge of stolen goods.

On the other hand, the alteration of the law proposed would give effect to frauds not hitherto attempted. It must be remembered that the warrants now in circulation are not merely those of the dock companies, where the public have the responsibility of a company of a large capital to guarantee their instruments. I have adverted to a fraud by a warehousekeeper. Let me suppose that you had deposited goods with a wharfinger, who should, by mistake or fraud, issue warrants to third parties for your goods. The proposed law would give effect to those warrants, and deprive you of your goods lodged with your own wharfinger. Facilities would be afforded to your clerks to place goods and warrants in the hands of persons, who would be enabled to make a good title to them as against you.

Many other cases might be pointed out in which the alteration of the law would operate injuriously, and the hardship would be the more felt from the fact that the law would violate the first principles of justice. The negotiability of bank notes of large value is not without its inconvenience, though properly upheld on different principles. But if warrants were placed on the same footing, additional facilities would be offered for the disposal of stolen warrants, and shops would be opened in Paris and Hambro', at which warrants would be taken without question, as now with respect to bank notes.

In dealing with this question, it must always be borne in mind, that though at this moment your sympathies are excited in favour of the buyer or lender on stolen goods, you cannot secure him without throwing an equal amount of loss on the owner, who is as fully entitled to protection. The question being between the true owner, who has never parted with his right of property, and a third person, who has honestly and bonâ fide bought or advanced money on it, you cannot relieve the last without injury to the first. In this state of facts, the law says that the prior title shall prevail; and I conceive that the law maintains the principle of natural justice—a principle not to be altered with impunity.

But to enlarge on this subject would be to give it more importance than I think it deserves. The truth is, that the evil proposed to be remedied is comparatively rare in occurrence and small in amount, and does not call for legislative interference. Concede for the present purpose that it is desirable to afford every facility to the owner of goods to raise money on them by pledge, I still think that this should not be done at the risk of breaking down the great laws of property, and that to enable a thief to pledge stolen goods, merely because he holds the goods or warrants for them, would be to occasion an evil of much greater magnitude than that which it is proposed to relieve.

My long connection with the mercantile interests of London, appear to me to justify, if not to call for, this expression of my opinion; and I am the more emboldened to do so, because, upon a careful perusal of the speeches at the meeting referred to, I am not satisfied that the gentlemen present were prepared generally to assent to such a subversion of the rules of law and morality as is involved in the measure under discussion.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,

JAS. FRESHFIELD, jun.

Bank Buildings, 31st January, 1857.

SIR,—On the 31st of January, Mr. Freshfield addressed to you a letter on the proposed amendment of the Law of Sales and Pledges; and, following his good example, I venture to send you some observations on the other side of the question.

Mr. Freshfield thinks that the question has been entertained under a strong prejudice, arising partly from a mistaken view of the nature of the late decision, and partly from an imperfect idea of what legislation can effect.

To me, on the contrary, it seems that the late ferment in the City has arisen from the public being suddenly startled with what appears to every man to be the monstrous injustice of a bonâ fide lender losing his money; and from a well-founded alarm that all confidence is destroyed in the safety of any advance on the faith of goods, bills of lading, or warrants, and that there will consequently be great embarrassment to the commercial business of this country.

The facts or law of the case may have been misunderstood, but the full discussion about it has opened the eyes of the public to the fact that they have been acting since 1842 under a mistake in supposing that all bonâ fide advances on the security of warrants were valid; and the public meeting, over which you presided, shows that there was a general call to remedy the grievance which was brought to light.

Where a grievance of this kind becomes apparent, there is often an imperfect idea of what legislation may effect in correcting the grievance, and the public may possibly not have seen as acutely as Mr. Freshfield, that, even if you remove the grievance in question, you could not provide for the case of a forged document. But throughout the commercial world in general there has been for some weeks, and still is, a strong conviction (or, if it be wished, it may be perhaps called a strong prejudice) that legislation should do what it can to prevent the enormous daily transactions of the mercantile world in buying and lending from being embarrassed, and the negotiability of documents from being impaired, though a warrant can never be an absolute and unimpeachable representation of value.

If, under the influence of this feeling, the merchants are contemplating (as Mr. Freshfield supposes) a measure much more mischievous than the evil which they are seeking to remedy, then he is right in protesting against it, and I, for one, would not attempt to promote it.

This appears to be the real question, which I am prepared to discuss in the following form, viz:—

Is the evil of having a doubt existing upon the security of every loan, however bonâ fide, less than the evil of an owner losing his title to goods by their being pledged by a thief or cheat?

In the choice of these two evils, which is the least? Where two innocent persons are to suffer, on which is it most just or most expedient, for the general interest of commerce, that the loss should fall?

I wish to approach the question as one of some importance, with an entire absence of all warmth, prejudice, or undue advocacy.

I am not startled by any horror of appearing to advocate a measure which is denounced as tending to increase fraud, violence, or plunder. I know the weight which does and ought to attach to the opinions of a gentleman of the character, position, and experience of my friend Mr. Freshfield. I know the effect which the strong language which he has used has already had upon some. I am bold enough, nevertheless, to grapple with the strongest passage in his letter, and I undertake to show—

That the proposed extension of the law so as to protect a bonâ fide lender on the security of even stolen goods, is no retrograde step in civilisation, but, on the contrary, is a necessary and natural consequence of the expansion of commerce; and I venture to say, that, to speak of the rule which will give the bonâ fide buyer or lender a valid title to goods which he has honestly taken from the apparent owner, who may afterwards turn out to have been a thief or a cheat, as being a rule which would give validity of title to the thief or cheat as against the real owner, is a mere inversion of the facts and language.

And I further undertake to show, that if an attempt to make an honest buyer or lender safe leads to, and is indicative of, a laxity of morals, and that there is therefore ground, in point of morality, for stopping a law which is to complete the safety of hypothecations, then we must retrograde in civilisation, and repeal the Principal and Factor Acts, which have done infinitely more to encourage fraud than the Act contemplated can ever do.

It is necessary for the completeness of my vindication of the proposed law, that I should trace the history of the law hitherto as regards advances.

Before 1823, all pledges, unless made by the express authority of the true owner, were not binding upon him. If he entrusted goods to an agent for sale, and the agent pledged them, the owner could recover the value from the pledgee, however much the latter might have advanced his money bonâ fide, and under the belief that the goods belonged to the pledger.

The lawyers have always had a notion that a pledge is an irregular transaction, and that the law revolted against giving it any encouragement, or allowing a man in the possession of goods of another to act beyond the express authority given by the true owner.

But advances on consignments from abroad on bills of lading, and afterwards advances on warrants (when the docks were established), became an usual and necessary course of business.

It frequently happened that the agents, in fraud of their principals, obtained money on the security of their principals' property from persons dealing with them as apparent owners; and the then existing law, according to the preamble of the first Act passed in 1823 upon the subject, "produced frequent litigation, and proved in its effects highly injurious to the interests of commerce," and these were the occasions of litigation to which Mr. Freshfield alludes.

It was then a question (as it is now, only differing in degree) between two evils and two innocent parties; or, in other words, a question whether the exigencies of commerce did or did not make it necessary to give validity to transactions, although in those transactions the true owner was cheated of his property.

There was great opposition on the part of the lawyers. There was no expression of horror at the idea of licensing fraud and robbery contained in Mr. Freshfield's letter which was not then loudly proclaimed.

The exigencies of commerce, however, carried the day, and in 1823 the first legislation began, and consignees receiving shipments from abroad, and making advances upon them without notice that the consignors were not the true owners, were protected, although the advances were obtained by the agent in fraud of the owner. And any advance to the possessor of goods or a bill of lading was made valid to the extent of any lien which the possessor might have against the true owner.

This was the first act of what Mr. Freshfield calls violation of the laws of property, by making one man's goods liable for the debts of another; and it was also the first step towards giving effect (in pledging) to the apparent ownership under a document of title.

In 1825 there was an extension of this violation of property, and of the principle of giving effect to apparent ownership; and the proposition (to use Mr. Freshfield's words, with one important omission and some additions) was distinctly admitted, viz.: That possession of goods or documents of title to goods should constitute a good title in the holder to dispose of them (by pledge or sale) without the knowledge or concurrence, and in fraud of the true owner (provided the holder was entrusted with the goods or documents, and the purchaser or lender had no reason to know or believe that he was not the true owner); and this proposition was carried out in all its parts by the Act 6 Geo. 4, ch. 94, passed on the 6th of July, 1825.

As before the Act of 1823, so after that Act and the Act of 1825, very large transactions of advances on the faith of goods or documents continued to prevail and daily to increase. It was so much a necessary part of the commercial system, that it is difficult to say whether it was or was not increased by the protection to pledges which was granted by the Act of 1825.

Much litigation, however, arose both on the construction of the Act, and on the question arising in each particular case how far the bonâ fide advancer of money might have notice of the borrower being an agent.

It was felt that the exigencies of commerce required that validity should be given even to transactions with known agents, if bonâ fide on the part of the lender, however much the agents might be acting in fraud of the principal; and the demand for this very large extension of the violation of property became so great in 1840, that the Government of that day was induced to take up the matter.

In 1841 a petition was presented to the House of Lords, into which House Lord Clarendon had brought a bill.

The petition was signed by twenty-seven bank directors. It was headed by Messrs. Baring Brothers & Co., and Messrs. N. M. Rothschild & Co., and signed by all the principal merchants, bankers, brokers, and dealers.

I quote it at length, because it will be seen that, although the principle on which it is founded is not so extended as that now contended for, still it is the same principle essentially in its nature:—

"To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled.

"The Humble Petition of the undersigned Merchants, Bankers, and others residing in the City of London.

"HUMBLY SHOWETH,

"That the existing law of principal and factor, founded upon the Act passed in 1825, has for some time been ascertained to fall very short of affording a fair protection to bonâ fide advances made upon the security of merchandise or of warrants or other documents of title, and has become a subject of doubt, litigation, and alarm.

"That, since the passing of that Act, the use of documents of title has become almost universal in the City of London, and such documents are in their form as negotiable as bills of exchange or other documents representing money.

"That the admitted benefit of the owners of property, whether resident in England or abroad, from a quick return of their funds, has rendered advances on goods a usual and almost universal course of business, both in London and at the great commercial outports.

"That the lurking danger found to exist in every case of making any advances in the present state of the law, threatens to put a stop to this employment of capital though equally beneficial to the shipper abroad and to the merchant in this country; and the validity of any advances on goods not depending on the possession and apparent ownership, but on the relation between the possessor and some other unknown party, and in many cases on the uncertain and daily varying state of the accounts between them, has long satisfied your petitioners of the absolute necessity of the law on this subject being placed upon a clear and certain basis.

"That your petitioners can see no sound distinction between advances made to an agent who has the possession and control over goods or warrants entrusted to him by the owner, and a payment made by a purchaser upon a sale to the agent so entrusted.

"That your petitioners understand that a sale by an agent is good, whether such sale is or is not authorised, and whether the party dealing with the agent does or does not know him to be an agent, provided such party has no notice of the agent's want of authority.

"That your petitioners also understand that the possession of a bill of exchange, Exchequer bill, or other representative of money entrusted to an agent, gives title to any transfer, though made without the authority of the principal.

"That your petitioners can foresee no real mischief from advances on goods or documents of title being put upon precisely the same footing as purchases from agents, provided there are the same safeguards to the owner which the law affords in case of payments made by purchasers on a sale by an agent.

"That your petitioners respectfully submit, that the distinction between the symbols representing money and those representing goods, if properly examined, will be found to be without any solid foundation.

"That your petitioners are aware that the law which prohibits pledges by an agent has been deemed to be peculiarly for the protection of the foreign merchant; but your petitioners submit that unless the difficulties and dangers be removed, which, under the existing law, attend advances on property, it will be no longer safe to afford the foreign merchant the accommodation of British capital, and the law intended for his protection will prove to be highly to his detriment.

"That your petitioners, on due consideration, are satisfied, that, by legalising advances to an agent (where bonâ fide on the part of the lender, and made on the faith of the property), no mischief will be created which does not exist under the present law.

"That your petitioners have been informed of a bill brought into your Lordships' House during the last session by the Right Honourable Earl of Clarendon, and beg respectfully to testify to your Lordships their approbation of the principle of that measure when extended to all property entrusted to a factor.

"Your petitioners therefore humbly pray that your Lordships will be pleased to adopt such measures as to your Lordships' wisdom shall seem meet, for putting the law respecting advances on property on a safe footing, with a view to the general benefit of commerce, and to the interest of all parties concerned therein."

The proposed bill in 1841 was almost as violently opposed by lawyers as the former one had been. Lord Clarendon, then at the Board of Trade, had however become a convert to the necessity of the new law, and Sir Robert Peel, in coming into office, at once adopted and passed the bill in 1842.

It was in the course of the discussions on this measure that persons promoting it became converts to the necessity of putting goods and documents of title to goods (even though acquired by fraud or theft) on the footing of a bank note, or exchequer bill, or other negotiable representative of money.

But no case like Kingsford v. Merry had then come before the public, because cases of persons acquiring and pledging property by theft or fraud are rare, although cases of agents fraudulently misapplying their principals' property are unfortunately not so.

The whole commercial world were prepared to recognise the principle, that an innocent owner should lose his property if he trusted a dishonest agent.

But I cannot say that even the merchants were at that time prepared (as I think they are now) to carry out a law which shall remove the lurking danger which must always exist in regard to contracts for sales and pledges, unless possession is to make title to a bonâ fide purchaser or lender.

It was therefore deemed prudent to accept the bill of 1842, which completed the law which gives validity to a pledge by an agent, however fraudulent, and from a known agent if the pledgee be honest.

I have thus traced the history of the law, because it shows that as the commercial public have from time to time learnt to feel, and the exigencies of commerce have been found to require, that validity should be given to transactions, the Legislature has felt it necessary to disregard the interests of the true owner, or rather to make them subservient to the necessities of commerce; and all that is now asked is to carry out the same principle even to stolen goods.

The Acts of 1842 and 1825 show the sense entertained of the misconduct of an agent who might pledge property entrusted to him, by awarding to the offence the punishment of transportation.

Yet the same Acts undoubtedly increased the facility for the dishonest agent pledging more than the proposed Act will encourage the thief to steal for the purpose of pledging.

It is Mr. Freshfield's argument, that the owner must take the consequences of a misplaced confidence, but that the present is an attempt to deprive the owner not only of possession, but of the legal title to his property, by acts of violence or plunder.

Now, let me ask any dispassionate man whether this is not a mistake of the whole principle and purpose of legislation, and a leading the judgment astray by the use of exaggerated language.

We are not dealing with crime. I will not revolt people's prejudices by arguing that a burglar is not worse than a dishonest agent; but I do argue, that when we are looking at the consequences of legislation, it cannot be denied that the incitement to crime is infinitely greater by giving validity to pledges by dishonest agents than by giving validity to pledges by a burglar or a cheat; and that the true owner who is cheated by misplaced confidence in a dishonest agent has, in reality, a greater grievance than a man who loses possession and title by violence or plunder.

The moral offence of an agent who breaks his trust is almost greater than that of the clerk who steals a warrant.

Now, it is fourteen years since the Act passed of 1842. During those years, though the law has only given validity to pledges by agents entrusted by the true owners, still I venture to say that there was not one merchant in a thousand who doubted, until the discussion arose in Kingsford v. Merry, that the Act of 1842 had given complete validity to pledges bonâ fide made on the faith of a bill of lading or warrant, however acquired by the pawner; and yet Kingsford v. Merry was the first instance of any pledge being disputed, with, I believe, one exception.

When that case came before the Lord Chief Baron and a special jury, it was assumed by his lordship that to question the title of the bonâ fide advancer was to go to the root of all commercial transactions.

Now the importance of this evidence of universal, though mistaken, belief is this:—

Can Mr. Freshfield, or any other supporter of the existing law, show that this universal, though mistaken, belief of the validity of these pledges (however the property or goods might have been acquired) has led to any increase of fraud or theft, or to any discontent on the part of persons who may have been defrauded or robbed of their property?

If not, what reason is there to suppose that (if the law be actually made, what all the world supposed it to be) there would be any increase of theft or fraud? or that persons lending on the security of goods or documents would be more lax?

On the other hand, now that it is known that a person advancing to another bonâ fide is not protected unless the borrower is entrusted by some unknown principal, what a field of litigation may not arise, and what distrust is not thrown on all transactions, however honest!

For it is never to be forgotten, that, if you allow a lurking danger to remain in every case, you affect all honest transactions, and even the merchant who wishes to get advances on his own property is affected.

It is impossible to know who are owners or not, or who are honest or who are not. Mr. Freshfield has helped me by showing instances where men of the most disgraceful character have stood well in the commercial world, and have obtained credit in their frauds because they were supposed to be respectable.

Looking to the immense transactions daily going on—looking to the enormous advances on the security of bills of lading and warrants made by the bankers and merchants—looking to the vast capital which is thereby applied to meet the demands of commerce—looking, on the other hand, to the few instances, comparatively, which arise of theft or fraud, and to the still fewer instances of fraud or theft being committed except from some negligence or folly of the true owner.

Looking to and contrasting these two sides of this question, I confidently repeat the inquiry, on which side is the greater evil? On which of the innocent parties is it most just, and most for the true interest of commerce, that the loss should fall?

Everybody must feel regret that frauds or thefts should ever take place; but do not let us be startled by being told that we are making a retrograde step in the progress of legislation, or that when we are giving validity to a bonâ fide advance or purchase, we are giving any license to cheat or steal, or really increasing the laxity of morals, of which, I agree with my friend, the times give too many symptoms.

Allow me also to repeat, that the instances are extremely few in which a theft or cheat can be committed upon an owner without some negligence or fault on his part. If he allows his clerks to steal his warrants, he commits the double fault of not having specially indorsed them, and of not having kept them under his own lock and key. If he trusts a wharfinger, who steals or allows them to be stolen, it is his own fault in not making a better selection.

Even in cases of burglary, there is something like a fault in not having taken greater precaution to exclude the burglar.

I advocate no bill that is to remove from any lender or purchaser the onus of establishing, in the strictest sense, that he made his loan or purchase bonâ fide, and without knowledge or reason to suspect that he was not dealing with the true owner. I contend for no new principle, because it has been recognised for centuries, and we have been familiarised with it in the cases of bank notes and other representatives of money.

It is usual to talk of the necessity of not interfering with the negotiability of these money documents. When one looks below the surface, what does this mean except that the course of commerce must not be obstructed by doubts as to the title of the bonâ fide taker?

When we consider the immense daily transactions of this country, why should not the same reason apply to the negotiability of goods or documents?

Why should we be frightened from our propriety when it is intended to pass a law which may enable a thief to pledge stolen property for a bonâ fide advance, and yet regard as an every-day occurrence the complete validity which is acquired by the bonâ fide taker of a bank note, or indorsed bill of exchange, from a thief, even although only taken in payment of an antecedent date?

I wish any means could be devised by which the innocent owner who is defrauded or robbed of his bank note could be saved from loss; but what would be thought of a law, if now passed, which was to give the innocent owner the right to recover back his stolen bank note from an innocent party, who has given good consideration for it?

Whilst we have this established precedent before us, we cannot surely be called upon to admit that, in asking for the same rule to be applied to other things which are as much the subject of commerce as bills of exchange or bank notes, we are violating the first principles of justice, or retrograding in the progress of civilisation?

It is that very progress which makes nearly as large an amount of goods as of money, or its representatives, the subject of daily dealing.

And it is a matter of passing observation that we do not require the check of the true owner's having a right to recover a bank note which is so easily capable of being stolen, though we are desired to continue the same check for the purpose of preventing the theft of goods, which is always so difficult

Again, when it is assumed that we are contending for a new principle, I cannot but think that the principle of what is called market overt has not been sufficiently considered.

In olden times, all sales were made in the market-place, and the seller, though a thief, could give a good title.

In the reign of Henry VIII. a law was introduced to encourage true owners to prosecute thieves; and they were therefore entitled to claim back their property on conviction of the first buyer, if it had not been resold to a bonâ fide purchaser.

But this did not apply to the case of a person being defrauded of his goods, who could under no circumstances recover them after a sale in market overt.

In the City of London, every place of business is market overt, and the law has no repugnance to a buyer acquiring title by bonâ fide purchase from a thief or cheat; and why, it may be asked, should there be a different rule as to advances bonâ fide made?

I quite agree with Mr. Freshfield, that the cases of stolen goods are isolated and of rare occurrence, and, when they occur, of small amount; and it is from that very circumstance that I come to the conclusion, that, by passing the proposed law, you will do little mischief; whilst, on the other hand, you will do inestimable good by putting all bonâ fide transactions on a footing of safety.

I quite agree that we shall fall into all sorts of anomaly if we give validity to pledges or sales of documents of title to goods, unless we give validity to pledges or sales of goods themselves; and the draft bill, which was partly read by Mr. Weguelin, included goods and documents, and both sales and pledges.

I have, then, only one more topic to observe upon, and that is the view taken by Mr. Freshfield, that we ought not to legislate to protect bonâ fide advances on genuine documents, because a man advancing may be sometimes cheated with an advance on a document which is forged.

Although Mr. Freshfield has assumed that the merchants are under the prejudice or imperfect idea of what legislation can effect, I cannot pay the meeting of the 19th of January, or the London merchants generally, the bad compliment of supposing that they could wish for legislation which is to give validity to a forged warrant, any more than to a forged bank note; and I have already said, that I cannot admit the principle that legislation may not be expedient to meet an admitted grievance, because it cannot extend to meet every grievance to which a lender of money may be exposed.

I believe I have observed more or less on every topic in the letter. I have not had time to condense so much as I could have wished. I have ventured to express my own opinions in a way that may appear decided. I have done so, because I entertain those opinions very strongly, and not to-day for the first time.

But it is, after all, not what one man or another may think, but what may be the feeling of the mercantile and trading community generally, that ought to determine the matter.

To houses like your own, and other houses of large capital, and to many of the Bank directors, who neither borrow nor lend, it may appear, as it does to Mr. Freshfield, that no necessity is shown for a change in the law. But I may be allowed to suggest, that no bill of lading from abroad can necessarily, and under all circumstances, afford a title against an unknown owner abroad, from whom the goods may have been obtained abroad by robbery or fraud; and this obviously affects every merchant in this country; and I must venture respectfully to submit that the feeling already shown clearly indicates that there is a large class of merchants and dealers, and there must be many banks and bankers, to whom it must be of the greatest importance to have the matter settled by a statute, which, whilst it protects the innocent purchaser or lender, must, as far as possible, protect the innocent owner, by giving validity to those transactions only which the buyer or lender may show to have been entered upon in honesty and with due caution.

There is always a source of litigation, if words are used which throw on the bonâ fide lender the onus of showing whether due caution has been exercised. But as legislation is only asked to protect and assist the honest lenders, and the borrowers who are borrowing when they have the right to do so, I think that the true owner who is robbed or cheated of his goods has a right to possess, and I should wish that he should possess, an advantage over the innocent lender who is to have the benefit of this new law, made expressly for his protection; and I think this advantage would arise from the words to which I have alluded above.

In conclusion, I may say that I am not insensible that, by extending the law as proposed, there may be some slight facility given to pledges by rogues. But I venture to deny, most emphatically, that the proposed law will be any encouragement, or can in any way be construed as giving any authority, to steal or cheat.

The law which is asked, I now understand to be intended to be confined to mercantile dealings.

The Principal and Factors Act has been construed to apply only to mercantile dealings. I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

GERMAIN LAVIE.

Frederick's Place, 10th February, 1857.

SIR,—Since I addressed you on the 31st ultimo, stating my objections to the alteration in the law as to goods and mercantile documents, proposed at the meeting held at the London Tavern on the 19th ult., I have had an opportunity of seeing the arguments on behalf of the measure, put with all the force of which they are susceptible, in the very able letter addressed to you by Mr. Lavie, dated the 10th instant, and have also learnt how far any answer can be given to the views expressed by me.

I should scarcely have troubled you again on the subject, but there are points in Mr. Lavie's letter which I think require notice, and which I had touched but slightly in my previous communication.

My objections to the measure proposed were, that it was an alteration of the known law, involving a violation of the rights of property, and introduced without necessity.

Now, that it is proposed to make an alteration of the known law, and that it violates the law of property, are self-evident; let us see, then, what is the ground on which it is pressed.

I admitted that a great necessity might warrant even this measure, but I denied in the strongest terms that such necessity existed.

Mr. Lavie frankly admits that the cases to which the new law can apply "are isolated and of rare occurrence, and when they occur of small moment." I take Mr. Lavie's testimony, then, that no necessity exists derived from the number or importance of cases in which mischief has arisen.

But Mr. Lavie urges, as I anticipated, the inconvenience to which bonâ fide transactions may be subjected by a doubt thrown on the negotiability of goods and warrants, and he states the question thus:—"Is the evil of having a doubt existing upon the security of every loan, however bonâ fide, less than the evil of an owner losing his title to goods by their being pledged by a thief or cheat?"

Now I am not prepared to admit that this, which is a question of right of property, is to be decided upon a bare balance of convenience; and I think that a strong case, amounting to what may be popularly termed a necessity, must be shown to exist for depriving the owner of his goods. Mr. Lavie admits that the case is one of rare occurrence, and of small amount when it does occur; but he argues that this risk, in minimis, creates a doubt as to the security of every loan. I have shown the fallacy of this in my former letter.

I have pointed out that causes of comparatively frequent occurrence, and influencing large amounts, do not, practically, so affect confidence as to interfere with the conduct of business.

The doubt excited by the present case has very meagre foundation, and I believe it will have no influence. But whatever influence it has is now at its height, under the excitement that has been produced by newspaper comments and a public meeting. Yet the large money dealers have not ceased to make advances on warrants, nor has business, since the decision of Kingsford v. Merry, been materially interfered with; so that, if the question were to be decided on the terms of Mr. Lavie's proposition, I say that no such doubt has been thrown upon the security of loans as operates on reasonable men, in the conduct of business; and that the evil apprehended from the doubt is imaginary. I do not undervalue the injury to individuals who may be defrauded; but I have pointed out that they can be indemnified only at the expense of other individuals, equally innocent, and with a better title. But the evil of the new law will not be confined to that of the owner losing his goods. It is proposed to interfere with the great principles of right and wrong, not to be violated without a deep sense of injury to the individual, and without wounding the moral feelings of the community. The evil, therefore, of depriving the owner of his property is not, I think, to be put in the balance with an apprehension and doubt which has not had, and never will have, any practical influence on the trade of the country.

But, further, Mr. Lavie insists that the proposed law will not violate the laws of property in a greater degree than others already in force—viz., the law allowing the negotiability of bills and notes by persons who have fraudulently acquired them; and sales and pledges of goods by agents unauthorised so to deal with them.

I will not stop to inquire if one violation of right ought to be ground for another; because the instances adduced do not render it necessary to raise such a discussion. The cases quoted are not analogous, and offer no excuse for the measure now sought for.

As respects bills and notes, I am surprised to be called on at this day to state the principle of their negotiability. Money, according to the quaint legal maxim, has no earmark. The rule is founded upon its character as a medium of exchange, which does not admit of any discussion of title. Notes are money for internal purposes; bills of exchange are money for international purposes. All are commonly known as currency and circulation—the terms implying their free and unfettered course, and necessarily excluding all question of title. In one of the earliest known references to money, it is described as "current money with the merchant," showing that this idea of free exchange is the original character of money.

But money and bills of exchange differ from goods and the indicia of goods, not only in their original character, but in their purposes. Money is a fixed arbitrary standard of value. One hundred sovereigns, a £100 bank note, a bill for £100, are fixed quantities. The money, the note, and the bill, circulate because the value is fixed; but goods depend on kind, weight, quantity, and quality. They cannot pass, and do not, in fact, pass current, and to apply the rules of currency to them is to confuse, not only terms, but things.

But the main stress of Mr. Lavie's argument is upon the protection afforded by law to persons dealing with agents who exceed their authority; and Mr. Lavie's letter contains a history of what has been done upon that subject. I take the opportunity to repeat, that if ever a case of necessity was made out, it was on that occasion. The City of London teemed with cases of extreme hardship and injustice inflicted on persons who had dealt with agents employed and accredited by the owners of goods, and intrusted by them with all the indicia of property, in a form to preclude the public from knowing or suspecting that the authority of such agents was limited. The intent of the Act of 1825 had been evaded by the courts; and in one case alone, which came under my personal observation, shortly before the alteration of the law in 1842, advances to the amount of £80,000 on goods so circumstanced were sought to be impeached, and losses of great amount were sustained daily, so that business was really interfered with.

Under these circumstances, the merchants applied to Parliament in the year 1841 for relief; and freely signed a petition put before them with that object, without scrupulously weighing its terms. Perhaps some of its promoters then contemplated a wider alteration of the law; but Mr. Lavie properly admits, that the merchants were not, at that time, prepared to carry out an alteration of the law to the extent now proposed.

The law established by the Acts of 1825 and 1842 stands upon this principle; that when the owner of goods intrusts them to an agent, he places in the hands of that agent the power to deal with them. He selects and employs the agent—he accredits him to the world—and it is not just that he should afterwards be allowed to disavow his acts, and produce secret instructions which could not be known to those who dealt with the agent so accredited. But this has no relation to the case of a man whose goods have been taken from him by fraud or theft. In the one case, the possessor of the goods has them by the act and consent of the owner, who has voluntarily clothed him with the apparent power of dealing with them. In the other case, the goods are in the hands of a stranger without the consent of the true owner. It would be a waste of time to enlarge on this subject.

I see no reason, then, to withdraw from the opinions before expressed. I believe the measure to be, in itself, of small practical use in its direct application, and called for by no necessity; but it is a direct attack on one of the great principles on which society is founded—principles which cannot be violated without injury to public morals.

My single reason for troubling you with this second letter was, that I felt bound to state the effect produced on my mind by the arguments officially put forth in support of the measure.

I trust I have done so without offence; and, the whole subject being now before the mercantile community, I here take leave of it. I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES FRESHFIELD, jun.

Bank-buildings, 16th February, 1857.

DIVORCE AND TESTAMENTARY JURISDICTION BILLS.

The Lord CHANCELLOR, in reply to Lord LYNDHURST, said, that in the present state of Parliament it was not the intention of the Government to proceed further with these bills at present; but they would undoubtedly be re-introduced, with some slight alterations, after thr re-assembling of Parliament.

COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) TITLES OF PURCHASERS BILL.—COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL.

The orders on these bills were read and discharged.

BILLS WITHDRAWN.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it was his intention to have introduced a bill with respect to Breaches of Trust, of which there had lately been so many examples by directors of companies. In the present state of affairs it would be idle to proceed with it; but that and another measure relating to Joint Stock Companies would be amongst the earliest which he should introduce, if he had the honour of a seat in the next Parliament.

Tuesday, March 10.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT BILL.

Mr. A. PELLATT, in moving the second reading, stated that when he brought in this bill last session, he quoted a return, from which it appeared that there were 1,098 prisoners for debt in England; in 250 of these cases the debt and costs did not amount to £6; and some of these persons had been in prison forty years. He found that the commitments in London alone were, in 1852, 870; in 1853, 916; in 1854, 1,096, and in 1855, 1,234; showing that the commitments were yearly increasing. Then he found that some of the county court judges committed at the rate of 50 per cent., and some at 25, it apparently depending on the temper of the judge. If a man was fined £5 for an assault and he went to prison instead of paying, the imprisonment cancelled the debt; but that was not the case with regard to ordinary debts. After 50 years experience in business, he could state that he had never received a dividend from the Insolvent Debtors' Court, and he never knew anything got by sending a man to prison. The object of the bill was, that a person who was embarrassed in circumstances should be enabled to go before a judge, give in a list of his creditors and an inventory of his property, and that he should not be liable to imprisonment unless he had been guilty of fraud.

After some conversation, the motion for the second reading was negatived.

ANALYSIS OF RESOLUTIONS PASSED IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

On March 12, respecting private business. The resolutions will be published in full on the dissolution of Parliament.

1. One day's notice must be given in the Private Bill Office, previous to the dissolution, of intention to suspend proceedings in the Commons, or to proceed with Bill if in the Lords.
2. Bill in form required by Standing Order 168, to be deposited not later than seven clear days after the meeting of the new Parliament, with declaration of the agent that it is the same Bill.
3. Bill with agent's declaration to be laid on the table of the House, and to be read a first time and second time, if it has been read a second time in this present Parliament.
4. Bills which have been reported from Committees in the present Parliament, will be ordered to be read a third time, or to lie on the table, when no subscription contract has been entered into.
5. When subscription contracts have been entered into, Committees will inquire and report whether subscription has been withdrawn; and if such subscription has not been withdrawn, clauses will be inserted rendering the same valid.
6. All petitions now presented against Bills will stand referred to Committees.
7. Where time for petitioning against Bills has not expired, seven clear days will be allowed after second reading in next Parliament.
8. All instructions to Committees on private Bills moved in this Parliament to stand good.
9. These resolutions are made into standing orders.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

During this week dulness has uniformly prevailed in the Money Market and on the Stock Exchange. The English Funds have varied very little. The whole week shews a decline of about ¼ per cent. Foreign securities have also shewn little variation in price. In the course of the week there have been considerable arrivals of gold from Australia, of which by much the larger part is destined for the Bank of France. Money has been in active demand at full rates both in Lombard-street and at the Bank of England. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 7th March, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £18,827,165 being an increase of £230,435, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £10,310,496 shewing a decrease of £33,219, when compared with the previous return.

Intelligence was received on Thursday from India and China by the Overland Mail. It did not communicate anything important from China of later date than previously received, but these advices stimulate the drain of silver from this country. About £700,000 will be taken out in the next packet.

Great flatness prevails in many departments of trade. The chief cause of this suspension of active operations is the unexpected derangement of political affairs by the war in China, and the vote thereon adverse to the Government. Attention is for the moment directed to the next Parliament, and the Ministry that is to be. An opinion had been formed, and was gaining strength, that pecuniary difficulties in commercial affairs were giving way to better circumstances. Various opportunities for profitable employment of capital, and also a sufficient supply of money, were present, or appeared near. Some immediate relief from taxation was also looked for. Hopes were entertained of a wise and economical public expenditure. It was believed we were, or shortly should be, at peace with all the world. The prospect of an increasing trade was certain. Under this favourable view, reliance upon a prosperous year possessed the mind of the trading classes. Much of this prospect of affairs is for the present disappointed. Disappointment produces inactivity; and the probability of more money being demanded for war is likely to prove a substantial obstacle to that relief from taxation which has been so generally demanded.

The debates in Parliament shew very strongly a necessity for lessening the estimates of public expenditure, but if the Chinese war continues, and takes a larger field of operations, relief from war taxes cannot be had. On the other hand, certain branches of trade will derive additional activity from war. The transport service will again be revived, and the rate of freight, and the amount of insurance to and from the East, will advance.

The day of retrenchment must be postponed, and this with other measures of importance, must be left for the new Parliament, and for the management of a Government which shall combine the powers of more than one or two men of ability: a Government strong enough not to shrink from the performance of its duties in Parliament, willing to bring forward measures of commercial law reform, and able to preserve its measures from the consequences of so-called amendments, the success of which often appears to stultify the authors of the bill under consideration, and to nullify its effect, or lead to its being delayed till another session.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, MARCH 21, 1857.

THE REGISTRATION REPORT.

The Report just issued by the Commission to inquire into the registration of titles is one of the most important documents that has challenged the criticism of lawyers for many years. To form a conclusive opinion as to all the details embraced by this comprehensive project, will require a more careful study of the proposed measures than the short time which has elapsed since the completion of the Report has enabled us to devote to it. At a future time we propose to enter into a careful examination of the scheme, in which we hope to receive the assistance of those among our subscribers who have given their attention to the complicated question of registration. It is very desirable that the opinion of the profession should be distinctly elicited; and with this view we shall be most anxious to give publicity to the opinions which may be entertained by our professional brethren, and to derive from them all the light which they can throw upon a question of such peculiar difficulty. For the present we shall content ourselves with indicating the general character of the Report, and the broad principles by which the Commissioners appear to have been guided in the performance of the duty intrusted to them. In one respect, we have no hesitation in according to the Report unqualified praise. It is an essentially practical document. Notwithstanding the temptations which the subject of inquiry presented, and the extensive nature of the changes proposed, the Commissioners have looked at the question as men of business, and have set their faces against all visionary projects which threatened to sacrifice practical facility to theoretical perfection and fanciful uniformity.

The problem submitted to the Commission is fairly stated by them to be this—"By what means, consistently with the preservation of existing rights, can we now obtain such a system of registration as will enable owners to deal with land in as simple and easy a manner, as far as the title is concerned, and the difference in the nature of the subject-matter may allow, as they now can deal with moveable chattels or stock? No one doubts that it would be a great benefit to the proprietors of land if they were able to convey it with the same facility as the owners of ships, or of stock, or of railway shares can now assign their property in any of them. But the question is—can this be accomplished? and if so, how?" We think, too, that most persons will admit the correctness of the Commissioners' observation, that if land had always been registered and transferred like stock, no one would think of imposing on its present proprietor the harsh and unnecessary burden of furnishing, before he could part with a single acre, a detailed history of every transaction relating to the property for sixty years; and that the real difficulty is not so much in determining what would be best à priori, as in applying a new principle to an old state of things which has become prejudicial to the interests of society. Not that the principle, in a large point of view, is altogether new; for just as the old feudal notions of tenure were based upon the idea of having the freehold always filled by one capable of performing the feudal duty of defence, so, as was aptly remarked by one of the witnesses, the modern commercial spirit equally requires an owner capable of fulfilling the duties demanded by the present state of society, that is, of dealing with land as a free transferable element of national wealth. We are glad to perceive that the Commissioners have not strained the theory of the assimilation of the transfer of land to that of stock further than it will bear, and have kept clearly in view that it is only the documentary title for which the register can be a substitute, and that the investigation of the identity of parcels must continue, with no further change than will be afforded by such regulations as may be made to ensure the careful description of the land, as well by appropriate words, as by annexed plans. The Commissioners have also, in theory, fully recognised the absolute necessity of preserving the facility which is now enjoyed of raising money by means of a deposit of deeds. We reserve to a future occasion the consideration whether their proposed enactments are the best that could be devised for this purpose; our object at present being to point out the spirit in which they have worked, and the aims they have proposed to themselves, rather than to discuss the sufficiency of the provisions which they suggest for giving them effect.

The main objects which they propose to themselves, and which they assure us that their plan will accomplish, are these:—To get rid in course of time of the expense and delay occasioned by retrospective investigations of title—to avoid the accumulation of documents and consequent complication which would result from the registration of assurances—to preserve the private affairs of individuals from disclosure—to facilitate the raising of temporary loans—to assist partial or complete alienation without disturbing existing interests or interfering with the rights of settling property enjoyed under the present law—and to give to such owners as may produce the necessary evidence a parliamentary or indefeasible title, at the same time protecting interests that may have escaped discovery by entitling them in such case to compensation at the hands of Government.

Several preliminary questions had to be settled before a detailed plan could be framed. The first was, whether registration should be compulsory or voluntary, which the Commissioners decide in favour of a voluntary system on two unanswerable grounds; one, that a compulsory system would involve great danger to imperfect titles by arousing dormant claims, and the other, that the sudden establishment of so vast a system would overpower the efforts of the best staff of officers in the world. It followed at once, from the same principles, that an investigation followed by the grant of a parliamentary title, could not be made the universal rule, and must be confined to those who should voluntarily submit to the nece sary conditions for the sake of adding a large percentage to the selling value of their property.

Another question was, whether the registry of legal ownership would be compatible with due protection to beneficial interests, and this question the Commissioners resolve in the affirmative, on grounds which we shall hereafter examine in detail. We have always considered this as the hinge on which the feasibility of registration turns, and it is a topic which deserves a fuller investigation than our space at present will allow. Another moot point was, whether the registry should be metropolitan or provincial; and, after entering fully into the considerations on both sides, the Commission came to the conclusion, which we have before advocated, viz., that there should be a central office in London, and that local registries should be established in connection with it. On another point, the Report contains a recommendation which will, we believe, conduce to the interests, and meet with the approbation, of the profession, viz., that solicitors (as is the case with almost all other agents, including their professional brethren in Scotland) should receive, as part of their remuneration, a commission on the value of the property dealt with.

The following extract from the Report shows that this delicate question has been fairly and honestly treated:—"The changes we propose for the transfer of land, without materially altering the nature or extent of the more important services rendered by the solicitor, or the professional superintendence and responsibility involved, will interfere with those particular processes to which the courts have thought fit almost entirely to attach the solicitor's right to remuneration. If, therefore, it is considered desirable to continue to prescribe by law a scale of remuneration for conveyancing business, it would seem right that an opportunity should be given for reconsidering the whole subject of solicitors' fees with reference to conveyancing. The services of solicitors will be necessary in the conveyancing transactions contemplated by the measure we propose, and reliance must still be placed upon their honour and character in performing the important duties and incurring the responsibilities which will still attach to every transfer."

No one, we think, can doubt that a remuneration based in part, at least, on a per centage, as suggested by the Commission, would be much fairer and more beneficial than the present absurd system. The solicitor ought to be paid for his skill and responsibility, and for the manual labour of his clerks. At present his remuneration is measured entirely by the least important of his services. A fixed brokerage would be an exactly just recompense for his responsibility; and though it is, perhaps, on any scale of fees, impossible to estimate precisely the skill required in any transaction, the proposed mode of paying professional work would, at any rate, be an immense advance on the clumsy and unjust system on which bills of costs are now liable to be taxed.

THE COMING ELECTIONS.

"Le Roi est mort—vive le Roi!" is not the cry of disloyalty or ingratitude, but the natural result of a monarchy; and, on the same principle, it is not indecent to turn our thoughts to the new Parliament, though its predecessor has not yet actually expired. At all events, whether improper or not, every one does so. The patient himself shakes the sands of his hourglass; or, in other words, the members of the existing House hasten forward the day of dissolution, by forbearing, in some measure, to prose; and all over the United Kingdom are ringing the notes of preparation for an occasion which, while it gratifies that passion for excitement which is common to most of us, ministers at the same time to that itching for personal gain which is certainly not less generally diffused. Yes, it is even so. We do not deny that there are many among those, for example, who aspire to seats in the future Parliament, who have the sincerest desire for their country's welfare; and who would recoil from the idea of hazarding that welfare for their own individual advancement. But even these are, perhaps unconciously, influenced by self-seeking motives mixed with their purer patriotism. If not desirous of place or emolument, their yearning is after reputation; or they have accustomed themselves to some political, social, or religious hobby, and they long to be again in the saddle; or they feel a craving for work, and the stimulus of public life—a calling for the committee-room, and a weakness for parliamentary papers. This state of things, indeed, though somewhat humiliating, perhaps, to human vanity, is, nevertheless, as it should be for practical purposes. No country would remain healthy or prosperous without a strong desire among its more influential inhabitants to become senators, and direct its councils. Nor are those even who enter Parliament with decidedly selfish aims—as a mode of getting on, in short—by any means without their use; for, as a general rule, these are they who are shrewd, energetic, far-seeing men, with a purpose to follow out, and with tongues to explain it. And if their first thought is for "Number One," their second is for the community among which their lot has been cast.

But if the candidates for seats are thus influenced by a variety of motives, what shall we say of their electors? It would, indeed, be skilful chemistry to resolve into their bases the votes of a borough constituency. One man votes from the wisdom inspired by the neighbouring tap-room; another, because he hopes that his nephew may obtain a small appointment; a third, in obedience to his Sunday paper; and a fourth, because his wife's baby has been kissed by the white-waistcoated canvasser:—in a word, the combinations of motives are as numerous as the votes themselves. As to your forty-shilling freeholder, indeed, and some of the other poorer classes of county electors, the influences by which their votes are guided are, perhaps, more simple. A wealthy landlord or a grasping agent cannot safely be disobliged, with rent-day approaching, or a lease requiring renewal; neither is it easy for the unsophisticated rustic to divest himself of the awe of the neighbouring squire, which is as much parcel of his inheritance as the field in respect of which he votes. "So runs the world away," and so it will ever run, while the franchise may happen to fall on a lout who can neither read nor write, though withheld from the man fitted by education to value the privilege, and to exercise it with discrimination, but who enjoys no "qualification," except his good sense and weekly salary. Nay, as long as money and money's worth of itself gives a man the right to vote—the consideration of his degree of mental cultivation being altogether excluded—so long, we fear, money will buy that vote; so long will election bribery continue rife—that abomination of abominations, against which so many stringent provisions have been made by legislators whose places are secured, for the moral health of men whose seats are yet to be won, or whose votes are yet to be given. The last panacea, indeed, which has been invented to abate this evil—the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102)—has not yet been fairly tried; but it has already been condemned by one of the acutest minds that ever graced the bench—the late Chief Justice JERVIS—as an Act "by no means plain;" and from the specimens of its working already exhibited in a few isolated cases, we much doubt whether it will stand the ordeal of a general election. Its provisions are aimed against Bribery, Treating, and Undue Influence; and three more formidable giants never opposed the progress of a theorist towards pure representation. If we examine the mode in which our parliamentary Christian addresses himself to the conflict, we shall find that his chief weapon consists in the following provision:—"If any candidate at an election for any county, city, or borough, shall be declared by any election committee guilty, by himself or his agent, of bribery, treating, or undue influence at such election, such candidate shall be incapable of being elected, or sitting in Parliament for such county, city, or borough during the Parliament then in existence."

This is all very well, but it is a curious indication that these offences are instinctively felt to involve no real turpitude in the sight of God or man, but to be the creatures merely of our municipal code, that the punishment is thus confined to exclusion from the representation of the place only where the act was committed, and, even as regards that constituency, to the Parliament in being when the sentence is pronounced. If election bribing be malum in se, why should one who has been convicted thereof be eligible for a seat for any place, or in any future Parliament? Moreover, is this limitation of exclusion consistent with declaring the offence a misdemeanour punishable with fine and imprisonment in addition to pecuniary penalties? However, with these anomalies in election law it is not our purpose here to deal, or to express any opinion upon subjects which would carry us far beyond our limits. As a legal periodical devoted to the interests of the general body of attorneys and solicitors throughout the kingdom, it is our wish to look at the forthcoming elections solely with regard to those interests.

Now, many of our readers will be engaged in the contest, some as candidates for seats themselves, but many more in the service of others. And there are certain of the provisions of the new Act which we commend to their most serious attention, those we mean which have reference to the two new offices of "Election Auditor" and "Agent for Election Expenses," for with these the attorney is pretty sure to be professionally connected, either as filling the office himself, or in transactions with such agents.

The office of "Election Auditor" was created by the Act of 1854, and since then its nature has become tolerably familiar, and in one or two points has been considered in the courts of law. He is appointed by the returning officer for each constituency in the month of August in every year, for the ensuing twelvemonth, and has, by the Act, no more definite qualification than that of being a "fit and proper person"—a return to the probus et legalis homo of more simple times. His function is to be the medium of payment of all the expenses connected with the election, with the exception of certain payments which may be made by the candidate himself, or by his "agent for election expenses," as we shall presently explain. In the performance of this duty, the "Election Auditor" has no judicial power; no authority to reject, on the ground of illegality, unreasonableness, or otherwise, claims and bills properly sent in to him by the candidate for payment; no power to refuse payment out of the assets in his hands (at least, so it would seem, though the pundits of electioneering law are not altogether agreed on this point), even if the payments he is required to make be manifestly corrupt and contrary to law. His office is simply to register the candidates' expenses, and act as a conduit-pipe in the process of their liquidation. Having discharged the claims sent in to him to the extent of the funds provided for that purpose, he has next to make out a full and true account of all the election expenses, to hand this over to the clerk of the peace or town clerk for public inspection, and, finally, to insert an abstract thereof in a local newspaper.

The other office created by the Act is that of "Agent for Election Expenses." And in this capacity attorneys are likely, for the next two or three months, to be extensively employed, in addition to their ordinary services as electioneering agents. The special agency, however, for "election expenses" is the only one which is the subject of legislation in the Act; and there is an important peculiarity to be observed in relation both to the appointment and the duty of this class of agents. As to the first, it must be made by the candidate in writing, either before or at the nomination, or "as soon after as conveniently may be." As to the latter, it consists, first, in paying, at any time before the day of nomination, any lawful and reasonable expenses in respect of the election which he bonâ fide believes fit and proper to be paid in ready money, and the payment of which cannot be conveniently postponed; and, secondly, in making out and delivering to the election auditor, upon or before the day of nomination, a full and signed account of such payments. It is the 16th, 25th, and 31st sections of the Act which chiefly govern the legal position of the "agent for election expenses," and on these many nice questions may be expected to arise, more particularly in reference to the payments which may be lawfully made by him, and not through the medium of the election auditor. "No other than such agents," says the 31st section of the Act, "shall have authority to expend any money or incur any expenses of, or relating to, the election, in the name or on the behalf of the candidate;" and it is here that we would warn our friends to be on their guard, for it is out of this mesh that a dishonest candidate may most easily wriggle himself. A case has very recently been before the Common Pleas where a parliamentary agent was precluded from recovering from his employer his retainer, the price of his labour for fifteen days on election business, and a large sum of money actually paid out of pocket—simply because he sent in his account to the "agent for election expenses" (whose duties, as fixed by the Act, do not include the reception of accounts), and not to the candidate himself, or to an agent expressly authorised by him to receive them, that they might be forwarded in due course to the election auditor. Hence, it cannot be too carefully remembered by those who expend their time or their money in behalf of a candidate—1st, that all their claims must be sent in within one month from the declaration of the election either to the candidate, or to an agent authorised by him in that behalf; 2nd, that the "agent for election expenses" is not primâ facie the agent so authorised; 3rd, that there is nothing to prevent the same person being agent to receive claims, and also acting as "agent for election expenses;" and 4th, that it would seem, on the other hand, that any mere personal expenses of the candidate, defrayed by any one for him by his authority during, but not in connection with, the election, may be recovered as money paid to the use of the candidate without the account thereof being forwarded to any agent at all—such class of expenses not being within the Act.

Perhaps, however, the most important question which has hitherto been judicially decided upon this Act, is as to what are the "legal expenses bonâ fide incurred at, or concerning, an election," which by the proviso at the end of the 2nd section may be paid, or agreed to be paid, by the candidate or his agents, without committing any of the five species of the offence of bribery enumerated in the previous part of that section. This question was raised in reference to the payment of a voter's travelling expenses at the Cambridge election in 1854, when Mr. SLADE the well-known Queen's Counsel on the Western Circuit, having authorised a letter to a voter requesting him to attend the election and vote for him, and adding that his "travelling expenses would be paid" (which expenses were accordingly afterwards defrayed by his agent), was sued for the penalties attached by the statute to the offence of bribery under the 2nd section, which, by its first branch, declares (among other things) that any person who by himself or agent gives money to any voter in order to induce him to vote, or who shall corruptly so do on account of such voter having voted, shall be guilty of bribery. From the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in this case, we will extract three clear propositions for the meditation of our electioneering readers:—1. To promise to pay a voter his travelling expenses conditionally on his coming and voting for a particular candidate is bribery. 2. To promise to a particular voter such expenses without any such condition is legal. 3. To pay a voter his travelling expenses on account of his having voted is legal; provided always no illegal promise or understanding had previously been made to induce him to vote in a particular way.

We are glad for the sake of all parties at the approaching elections that the Court of Error arrived at this sensible decision. It has been said, indeed, that it is to be carried to the House of Lords; but while it remains unreversed, no candidate need fear to be unseated by any election-committee, while he keeps within the limits just indicated. On the other hand, it behoves all engaged in electioneering pursuits to remember that a representative may be unseated, though himself perfectly immaculate, through the folly or ignorance of his friends—nay, may be made liable to all the penalties provided by this self-denying ordinance in respect of the "corrupt practice" against which it is aimed.

We cordially recommend to our readers an unpretending, but useful "Election Manual," which has just been issued by Mr. C. E. LEWIS. That gentleman's experience as an electioneering solicitor makes him a well qualified expounder of the new Act, and we think he has performed his task admirably.

Legal News.

V. C. STUART has, this week, expressed his fear that, in a case now pending in his court, he should only be able to obtain the aid of a single common-law judge. Whether such assistance be, or whether the Legislature intended it to be, sufficient, we do not say; but it is to be remembered, that the equity judges are now required, with such help as they can obtain from one or at most two common law judges, to decide questions which formerly they would have remitted for the consideration of a full court. This duty of attending in the Court of Chancery has been but recently imposed upon the fifteen judges, and the burden of it is by no means likely to decrease. We do not, however, find that it was adverted to by Mr. GLADSTONE, when he recently discussed the question of the competency of twelve judges to discharge all the duties that now fall upon the three courts. We may observe in passing, that the admission of equitable defences to legal demands is beginning to impose upon the common law courts the necessity of a pretty familiar knowledge of the doctrines of the Court of Chancery. The appearance of equity counsel at the common law bar is becoming by no means unusual; but we do not suppose that the principle of reciprocity will be adopted between the courts, and a Vice-Chancellor be invited to aid the deliberations of the Queen's Bench. It must, however, be conceded that the incipient fusion of law and equity has added to the difficulties of all tribunals, and, therefore, the present moment does not appear well chosen to reduce their strength. The authority of the late Baron ALDERSON, quoted by Mr. GLADSTONE, is, we admit, entitled to considerable weight; but when he says that twelve judges are amply sufficient for the term business, he appears to have forgotten that the attendance of three out of that number is usually required at the judges' chambers every afternoon. If four judges are necessary in banco at 10 A.M., their presence is equally essential to the due administration of justice at 2 P.M. It now often happens that a judge listens for several hours to an argument, and then departs to chambers, dismissing from his mind all recollection of a case which he will not be called on to decide. This is nothing else than sheer waste of the judge's time and of the national money which is paid to purchase it. The question, also, may be fairly raised, whether the business at chambers is usually so difficult and important as to demand the attention of a functionary so highly paid as one of the fifteen judges. In this respect, perhaps, some economy of judicial time and salary is more practicable than in the instances selected by Mr. GLADSTONE. It may, also, be expected that the commission now sitting will so arrange the circuits as to save some of the precious hours now absorbed in processions and pageantry, which are not a very impressive introduction to a week's heavy business, and become altogether ridiculous as a prelude to the trial of one common jury cause, and a dozen prisoners.

The vigilance of Mr. GLADSTONE in guarding the Consolidated Fund from further burdens will not be allowed to slumber. At the Mercantile Law Conference held at the end of January, it was proposed to relieve bankrupt estates from the existing load of compensation for abolished offices by transferring that charge to the National Exchequer; and this suggestion was adopted with a degree of unanimity highly gratifying to the chairman of the Conference, Lord BROUGHAM, but calculated, if he noticed it, to arouse the gravest apprehension in the mind of Mr. GLADSTONE.

The examination of Mr. EDWARD ESDAILE, the late Governor of the Royal British Bank, proceeded before Mr. Commissioner HOLROYD, on Wednesday, and a great deal of time was occupied in endeavours to explain and put a different aspect upon matters inquired into the week before. It is proper to notice in connection with this subject, that the name of the deceased solicitor to the Bank was MULLINS, and not MULLENS, as given in our last impression. This error, which we shared with some of the daily papers, has caused not unnatural annoyance to those who bear the latter name. We cannot say that the united exertions of Mr. ESDAILE and his solicitor availed much to alter the character of the admissions he had been obliged to make. The success of the attempted explanation depends entirely upon the use of words in, what was called by one of the solicitors present, "a commercial sense." If it is said that a man is indebted to a bank, a statement is made which we should have thought was generally intelligible in one sense only. But "explanation," it seems, may sometimes be needed; because, "ordinarily speaking," a man is not considered to be indebted "in a commercial sense" on a mere discount account, when good bills are held by the person whom, before we were better instructed, we should have called a creditor. Thus we find we may still live and learn; and, perhaps, when society shall have thoroughly mastered the "commercial sense" of the English language, we may all acquiesce in the proposition that the Directors of the Royal British Bank have been exceedingly ill-used men.

LOCAL RECOLLECTIONS OF SERJEANT WILKINS.—It is not generally known, even by the "oldest inhabitants," that Serjeant Wilkins was, for some years (I know not how many), connected with Birmingham. Of the few who knew him, of course, the lapse of thirty years (supposing they are still amongst us) may make it difficult to remember the facts I am about to relate, or identify the comparatively humble individual of that day with the late brilliant, dashing, and distinguished Serjeant. In fact, I believe even the learned advocate himself had forgotten, or wished to forget, his early connection with this locality. About the year 1828, there stood on the right-hand side of Freeman-street, as you go from Moor-street, a building which looked very like old shopping, and which, no doubt, had been used as such. At the period alluded to, however, it was used as a day school, and the man who used to wield the birch, and preside over a few dirty juvenile subjects, was Charles Wilkins. No one knew much about him. He appeared to be a man originally well connected, but owing to some, perhaps youthful, indiscretion, had forfeited the regard of his friends, and it was reported his father had disinherited him. However, he was determined to turn his talents and education to account if possible, and with this view he not only opened the above school, but it was said joined the Methodists, and preached two or three impressive sermons at Cherry-street Chapel. At the time I am speaking of there was a kind of debating society in existence, which held its weekly meetings at the Lamp Tavern, Bull-street. The subjects which came under discussion were chiefly of a religious character, and the speakers were among the most distinguished of the Roman Catholics and Protestants of the town. The latter cause boasted of Mr. G. Edmonds, Mr. J. Dyer, and I believe Mr. C. Wilkins. I judge so from the fact that soon after hearing the two former gentleman at the Lamp, I was invited to attend a discussion that had been arranged to take place between the two latter, at the schoolroom already described, in Freeman-street. This must have been in the year 1829, as the subject for discussion was the then all-absorbing one of Catholic Emancipation. Mr. Wikins was to oppose it, and Mr. John Dyer (of the firm of Dyer and Cartland, brass-founders, Weaman-row) was to show its necessity. This was the first time I ever saw or heard Mr. C. Wilkins, but I never shall forget the effect, not so much of his speeches as his speaking, upon my youthful mind. I thought I never heard so eloquent a man as the poor schoolmaster. I well recollect his appearance. He seemed about thirty years of age, was even then of a portly and commanding exterior, and had evidently prepared himself for the occasion, intent, no doubt, upon making a hit. He opened the debate in a speech remarkable for its florid language and well-turned periods. His voice was like himself, round and powerful, and reminded me not a little of one of our most popular preachers of that as well as of the present day, and his delivery implied the successful student of elocution. When Mr. Dyer rose to reply, it was felt that he had but a poor chance. He could not please either the eye or the ear, as Mr. Wilkins had done; but he had the best of the argument, and in fact spoke with considerable power and effect. There were none of the flowers of oratory in his speech, but he demolished, by some most telling facts from history, all the beautiful theories his antagonist had set up. Wilkins was not so felicitous in his rejoinder, and was evidently disconcerted by the sledge-hammer mode of dealing with his pet arguments. One witticism, however, I recollect he indulged in, which, though not very brilliant, is perhaps worth recording. Dyer had frequently cited Drummond as an authority in favour of the view he took, and Wilkins remarked that Dyer had drummed so much upon Drummond that he had almost drummed the drum of his (Mr. W.'s) ear off. The discussion terminated, I believe, in favour of the removal of the Catholic disabilities. We now come to that tide in his affairs which, under the semblance of adversity, was designed to lead him to fortune. Soon after the period at which I have introduced him, he appears to have failed in all his attempts to establish himself here, and became so reduced as to be driven to the necessity of soliciting the smallest pecuniary aid that could be extended to him. He was seen at the corners of the streets waiting the appearance of those whom he thought likely to respond to his appeal, and I have it from a most authentic source that he has been so destitute as positively to be compelled to ask permission to sit or lie all night by the side of a brick-kiln fire in the neighbourhood of Highgate, for he had not even the means of paying for a bed in a common lodging-house. When I next heard of him it was in connection with the Shakspeare Jubilee at Stratford-on-Avon.

On that occasion I was informed he had been figuring as an actor, announcing imitations of the elder Kean, Liston, Dowton, &c., in which I am informed he acquitted himself admirably. No doubt in his wanderings he would resort to this as a means of temporary subsistence, and would pick up a few coppers by calling at the public-houses, and asking to be allowed to "fret his hour" before them. It was while thus itinerating about the Midland Counties that he happened to find himself at Newark at the time of the general election, which must have been about the year 1832. Serjeant Wilde was the liberal candidate for that borough, against the powerful interest of the Duke of Newcastle. The town was in a ferment. The day of nomination arrived, and after the respective candidates had been proposed, and the formal business was concluded, a stranger got up on the hustings, and began to address the electors in favour of the liberal candidate. He was the best and most popular speaker of that occasion. He kept his mixed auditory in a roar of laughter at the expense of the Tory candidate, and spoke with such tact and fluency that Serjeant Wilde himself was induced to join the crowd of admiring listeners. The question became general, "Who is he?" The learned Serjeant became interested in it, and at the conclusion of the long address expressed a desire to become better acquainted with a man who had exhibited such extraordinary ability. I need not say much more. This was the turning point in the strange career of Charles Wilkins. I believe it is pretty well known that Serjeant Wilde took an interest in him from that day, and enabled him to pursue his studies preparatory to his being called to the bar. Poor fellow! he had doubtless been called to many bars before that. I had lost sight of him for some years, when happening to be at Manchester about eighteen years ago, I went with a friend to the New Bailey Sessions, Salford, to hear some case tried, when I espied among the gentlemen of the long robe that unmistakable head and face; and I was not long before I heard him address the jury with his characteristic force and audacity. For some time after that, I attended the sessions whenever they happened to be agate (to use the phrase of the district), on my visiting Manchester, for it was always a pleasure to hear him speak; and I was seldom disappointed, for he held briefs in almost every case. To illustrate his peculiar tact, I recollect, on one occasion, he was counsel for a poor girl, who had been charged with robbing her master. It happened that just before Wilkins rose to address the jury, one of the latter had been blowing his nose so powerfully as to produce a red and watery appearance about his eyes. This incident was turned adroitly to account by the learned advocate, who exclaimed, on rising, "I perceive one of the jury has been weeping," and following up the words in a tone of sympathy for the accused, he so worked upon the feelings of the jury, that veritable tears at last did respond to his appeal, and the contagion quickly spread through the court. The consequence, I need not say, was the acquittal of the prisoner. It appears that, like most junior counsel, he was some time before he obtained briefs, being unknown in that locality. This disadvantage, however, he overcame by delivering a public lecture at the Corn Exchange, Manchester, on the writings of William Cobbett, who was then putting up for the borough. In this he so pleased the Tories (for he was all things to all men), that they interested themselves for him, and he speedily held as many briefs as Dr. Brown, and Mr. Brandt, his seniors in forensic experience. I need not follow the subject of this sketch to London, the last and final scenes of the wonderful drama of his life, since his subsequent achievements at the Old Bailey, and on the circuits, have become patent to the world. I fear, however, from what I have lately heard, that all his sad reverses, and the many lessons of adversity, failed to teach him wisdom, and that his singular gifts, varied attainments, and great professional skill, crowned as they were at last with success, did not lead to happiness or permanent prosperity. But while we deplore his failings, let us do justice to his great and distinguishing merit, which I have heard acknowledged by a judge upon the bench, that of throwing his whole heart and soul into the cause of his client. Never in this sense was a man more faithful to the trust reposed in him. And this is a striking and redeeming feature in his character as a public man—a counterpoise to the many errors of his life. If he was not true to himself, he was, at least, true to others.—From the Birmingham Journal.

The late Mr. Serjeant Wilkins was buried, in a very unostentatious manner, on Tuesday last. He was the son of a physician of some repute, and was himself educated for that profession. Circumstances disinclined him to the pursuit for which he had been intended, and consequent differences with his father led to his being cast out upon the world, and left to live by his wits, which were sharp enough for anything. He, at this time, fell in with a very clever fellow, now a commercial traveller, who is well known in many districts of England as a wit, a mimic, and a first-rate comic singer. He has also published several songs, which have gained more than average popularity. These two young men went about from public-house to public-house, in the small towns around Birmingham, Worcester, and Warwick, giving dramatic entertainments in club-rooms, and singing songs for the amusement of the company. In this way they often made a good deal of money, but as they spent it as fast as it came in, a run of bad luck brought upon them many difficulties. All this while, however, Wilkins attended to his studies, and improved himself in his knowledge of Continental languages, with which he was fairly acquainted. Shortly, the irregularities and uncertainties of this mode of life were felt to be inconvenient, and Wilkins, who was by nature an actor, joined a company of strolling players, who were then performing "the legitimate drama" in the neighbourhood of Birmingham. During this engagement, Dr. Newton, a celebrated Wesleyan preacher, paid a visit to the town, and Wilkins (who always ran after orators, and had many times heard Irving, Hall, &c., of whom he was a capital imitator) went to hear him. Strange to say, he was so impressed that he resolved on the immediate abandonment of the stage, settled down in Birmingham as a schoolmaster, and became a local preacher among the Wesleyans (in which capacity he was very popular). He was busied in political and religious agitation when Mr. Serjeant Wilde contested with Mr. Gladstone the Duke of Newcastle's pocket-borough of Newark. Wilde found him out, and secured his services as a speaker.—From the Bristol Advertiser.

MARRIAGE WITH DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER.—The case of Brook v. Brook, before V. C. Stuart, raises a question of great importance—that, namely, as to the validity of a marriage solemnised abroad with a deceased wife's sister, both the contracting parties being domiciled English subjects. The first wife of the testator in the cause died in 1847, and in 1851 the testator married his first wife's sister at Altona, in Holstein. On the 17th of August, 1855, the testator's second wife died of cholera at Frankfort, and on the 19th of the same month the testator died of the same disease at Cologne, being on his way from Frankfort to England. The testator left surviving him five children—namely, one son and a daughter by his first marriage, and one son and two daughters by his second marriage; and by his will, which bore date on the day of his death, he gave all his real and personal estate among all his children by the two marriages absolutely as tenants in common. The son by the second marriage died on the 31st of March, 1856, and the question will be as to his legitimacy; for if the second marriage be legal, and the son by that marriage legitimate, his half-brother by the first marriage will succeed to his share of the testator's real estate, and the testator's four surviving children will be entitled in equal portions to his share of the testator's personal estate. If, on the other hand, it should be held that he was illegitimate, the Crown will be entitled to his share of the testator's real and personal estate.

A JURY LOCKED UP.—A jury at the Middlesex Sessions being so divided in opinion that their agreeing to a verdict was next to impossible, the Assistant Judge, at ten o'clock at night, directed the court to be adjourned until next morning at a quarter past nine o'clock, at which time they were brought into court. They looked exhausted, and several of them complained sorely of having been kept nearly twenty-four hours without refreshment. The foreman said there was not the least possible chance of their agreeing upon a verdict even were they locked up for a week. The only alteration that had taken place was, that one who had been in the majority had gone over to the minority. A juror said he suffered from asthma, and longer detention without refreshment would be very dangerous to him. Two others complained of illness arising from exhaustion. The Assistant Judge sent for a medical gentleman, who examined the complaining jurors, and stated that, with respect to two of them, he apprehended danger if they were kept longer without refreshment. The Assistant Judge thereupon ordered the jury to be discharged.

LUNATIC'S WIFE ACQUITTED OF BIGAMY.—Ann Woodwiss, aged twenty-three, was charged with bigamy, in marrying one John Sharpe, her first husband, John Woodwiss, being still alive. The prisoner was married to her first husband in the year 1852. The husband had previously been insane, but, according to his brother's evidence, he was sane at that time. The husband had subsequently become insane, and was now in a lunatic asylum, and the prisoner married her second husband on the 8th of April, 1856. When taken into custody the woman said she should not have done so if she had not been told that, as her husband was insane at the time of her marriage, in 1852, she was at liberty to marry again. Mr. Justice Willes said there was no case against the prisoner. It was quite true that a lunatic during a lucid interval could enter into a contract, but it rested on those who alleged that the lunatic was at the time in a lucid state to prove it. He did not think the statement of the brother was sufficient to prove that such was the fact in the case of a man who had been a lunatic for twenty years, and he directed an acquittal.

AN UNSATISFACTORY RESULT.—The case of Grey & others v. Pearson, was an appeal to the House of Lords, from a decision of the Lord Chancellor, varying a decree of V. C., now L. J., Turner. The arguments were concluded on Monday week, but their Lordships took time to consider their judgment until last Monday.—The Lord Chancellor retained the opinion he expressed in the court below.—Lord St. Leonard's delivered a long and elaborate judgment, in which he entirely differed from the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, and held that the appeal ought to be allowed.—Baron Wensleydale concurred with the Lord Chancellor in his opinion, that the appeal ought to be dismissed. Appeal dismissed accordingly.

THE CASE OF MR. W. H. BARBER.—On Monday morning a deputation, consisting of Sir Fitzroy Kelly, M.P., Mr. Cobden, M.P., Mr. F. Crossley, M.P. Mr. Headlam, M.P., Mr. Serjeant Ballantine, Mr. Serjeant Parry, Mr. C. W. Dilke, Mr. W. Wills, the Rev. J. G. Wood, Mr. N. Gedge, Mr. R. Lane, and other gentlemen, waited upon Lord Palmerston at Cambridge-house, for the purpose of laying before his Lordship a claim to compensation by Mr. William Henry Barber. Sir F. Kelly stated that in 1844 Mr. Barber, who was then a solicitor in good practice, became professionally connected with a man named Fletcher, for whom he did a considerable amount of legal business. This man Fletcher was in the habit of ascertaining from the Bank of England particulars of unclaimed stock, and then informing the parties who were entitled to it of the fact, receiving a commission for his trouble on the amount secured. Subsequently Fletcher forged the names of persons who were entitled to this stock, and in some cases wills where the persons were deceased. Barber transacted the legal portion of the business for him, but was not aware of the frauds which were being committed. On an investigation taking place, frauds to a large amount were detected, and the result was that Fletcher and Barber were tried at the Old Bailey together. Barber's counsel were very anxious that he should be tried separately, in order that Fletcher and other parties to the transaction might be called as witnesses; but this the Attorney-General (the present Lord Chief Baron) refused. They were found guilty, and transported for life. Barber was sent to Norfolk Island, where he endured every imaginable kind of torment. Some of the officials there, hearing of the nature of his case, made inquiries into it, and made representations which induced Sir George Grey, the then Home Secretary, to grant a conditional pardon, the condition being that Mr. Barber should not come into Great Britain. He wandered about the Continent until Lord Normanby took up his case, and he received a full pardon. For many years after the Court of Queen's Bench refused him permission to practice, but at length that right has been yielded. Mr. Barber had suffered so much that the deputation thought he was entitled to compensation, more especially as the State, who were the prosecutors, had made so grievous a mistake. Serjeants Parry and Ballantine, Mr. Headlam, M.P., Mr. Gedge, and other gentlemen, having urged Mr. Barber's claims, Lord Palmerston said he could not see that the Government had been wrong, or how the judges, the jury, the courts of law, or the Crown, could have taken any other course. It was certainly a great misfortune that Mr. Barber had been mixed up with such bad company, and that he had not exercised more precaution. It was rather a novel course to apply for compensation in such a case, and the way in which such a request could be acceded to was not quite obvious. On the spur of the moment he could not say what he could do, but he would consult his colleagues upon the subject. Mr. Crossley, M.P., assured his lordship that in the North of England, with which he was connected as a manufacturer, and among members of the House of Commons, there was a very strong opinion that Mr. Barber should be compensated. After some further conversation the deputation withdrew.

AN ATTORNEY CHARGED WITH PERJURY.—Edward Sedgfield Donner was indicted, at York assizes, for perjury in an answer to a bill in Chancery. It appeared that one William Hudson Denton was interested in certain lands settled by his father on himself and brothers, and that the defendant, who is a solicitor at Scarborough, was employed to prepare the deed and subsequently to raise a loan on the security of the deed. Mr. Donner himself lent the money and became mortgagee. The debt and interest not being paid he became the purchaser. Subsequently a bill in Chancery was filed to set aside this purchase on the ground that at the time he made it he was acting as the attorney for the vendor, and in the answer to that bill, the defendant swore that in that transaction he was not acting as the attorney for the prosecutor, nor as his agent in any way. On this statement the perjury was assigned.—Mr. Baron Martin was most clearly of opinion that there was no case. It was clear that Mr. Donner's statement was true, because he stood in this transaction, not in the relation of attorney, but of mortgagee. In addition to that, the evidence of the prosecutor was uncorroborated. The jury must, therefore, find him Not Guilty.—Mr. Knowles, said that the answer had been drawn by Mr. Lewin, of the Chancery bar, with a full knowledge of all the facts, and he had deliberately advised this answer. A great number of magistrates were in attendance to speak to the character of the defendant as incapable of the offence imputed.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.—The society will meet on Monday, the 23rd March, at 8 o'clock, p.m., when it will proceed to elect a president for the present year, under Rule 21; after which Mr. N. Lindley will read a paper on "The Principles which Govern the Criminal and Civil Responsibilities of Corporations.

JUDGE'S CHAMBERS.

(Before Mr. BARON CHANNELL.—Feb. 27.)

FLETCHER v. HAMMOND.

Pleading—Common Counts—Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, ss. 91, 222, & Sched. B.

A demurrer to a count—for money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant—omitting the words "for money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff," contained in Sched. B. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, cannot be set aside as frivolous, as, without those, or equivalent words, the count does not show that the money is payable in præsenti.

This was an application to set aside a demurrer to a declaration on the common counts upon the ground that it was frivolous.

The declaration in the commencement omitted the words "money payable," which it is stated, in the directions given in Schedule B. of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), should precede the money counts, and it commenced by alleging that the plaintiff sued the defendant "for money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant," for interest, and on accounts stated—pursuing, in other respects, the forms given by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 59, and Sched. B. of that Act.

The demurrer was to so much of the declaration as related to the count for money lent, upon the ground that, as it was not alleged that the plaintiff was suing for "money payable," it did not appear that the sum claimed was due at the time of the action being brought, or that there was a cause of action.

Mr. O. B. C. Harrison, in support of the application, submitted that the count as it stood was sufficient, and that to allow the demurrer would be to contravene the spirit and intention of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852; that it is expressly provided by the 91st section of that Act that a departure from the letter of the forms in Sched. B. shall not be deemed erroneous so long as the substance is expressed, and that the form adopted here was substantially the same. The law implies that money lent is money due, and a present debt; and the introduction of the words "money payable" would not render the allegation less ambiguous, as "money payable" may mean payable at a future as well as at the present time. In Fagg v. Nudd (8 E. & B. 650), it was decided on demurrer that the omission of the same words, as here, did not render a count on an account stated bad. Place v. Potts (8 Ex. 705), the earliest case upon the point, was there cited, and although in that case, and in Wilkinson v. Sharland (10 Ex. 724; S. C. 11 Ex. 33), it was held that the omission of these words rendered the declaration bad; the counts in both the latter cases were for freight, and not, as here, the ordinary money count.

Mr. Chitty, in support of the demurrer, contended that the demurrer should be allowed. The count, in Fagg v. Nudd, si distinguishable from the count in this case, as the terms of the count on an account stated allege that the money is "found to be due." The same objections which prevailed in Place v. Potts exist in the present case. The count does not show that there is a debt payable in præsenti

Mr. Baron CHANNELL said he would not go so far as to say that the count as it stood was bad, but he could not say that the demurrer was frivolous. It appeared to him that the cause of action was ambiguously and insufficiently stated, as it was not shown that the claim was payable at the time when the action was brought. If it had been alleged that the defendant was indebted, as in the old form of count; or that the money was due, as it is in the count on an account stated in Fagg v. Nudd, the introduction of these statements might have made a difference; but there were no such words here, and the count was not substantially the same with the form provided by the statute.

Application refused.

An application, under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 72, s. 222, was then made to amend the declaration by inserting the words omitted, which was allowed on payment of costs, taxed at £3 3*s*.

The will of the Hon. Sir Edward (Baron) Alderson was rpoved under £60,000.

The Solicitor-General is seriously ill with an attack of brain fever.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

Of all the Orders of the Court of Chancery, there is scarcely one which has given rise to so much conflict of opinion as the 38th Order of August, 1841. Independently of that order, it was a well established rule that a defendant submitting to answer must answer fully, and although Lord Cottenham was supposed to have trenched upon this doctrine by his judgment in Adams v. Fisher 3 My. & Cr. 526, Lord Lyndhurst, in the subsequent case of Lancaster v. Evors, 1 Ph. 349, held, that Adams v. Fisher did not affect the general rule that a defendant answering must answer fully, and that if he has a defence against the plaintiff's equity, he must avail himself of it by demurrer or plea, and not by refusing the discovery sought. The defendant, however, was entitled to demur to the discovery, even though the relief was not open to demurrer. This he could do on various grounds, such as that it would expose him to penalties, that it would involve a disclosure of his own title as distinguished from that of the plaintiff, or that the discovery sought was immaterial to the relief prayed.

In this state of the law, the 38th Order of August, 1841, provided, that a defendant should be at liberty by answer to decline answering any interrogatory, or part of an interrogatory, from answering which he might have protected himself by demurrer; and that he should be at liberty so to decline, notwithstanding he should answer other parts of the bill from which he might have protected himself by demurrer.

The construction of this order was considered by V. C. Wigram, in Tipping v. Clark (2 Hare, 383), and Drake v. Drake (2 Hare, 647), and the Vice-Chancellor held that the order was made to enable a defendant to protect himself from answering any particular interrogatory in a demurrable bill, although he might have chosen not to put in a demurrer, and have submitted to answer other interrogatories. In Fairthorne v. Weston (3 Hare, 387), and Woods v. Woods (3 Hare, 411), the same learned judge adhered to his view that the order applied to a case where the bill was generally demurrable. The same question came before L. J. Knight Bruce, then V. C., in Baddeley v. Curwen (2 Coll. 151), and he held, that, according to the true interpretation of the order, it did not relieve a defendant from answering interrogatories objectionable only on the ground that a demurrer to the whole bill, if filed in time, would have been sustainable. After this judgment, Sir J. Wigram entered fully into the question, in Kaye v. Wall (3 Hare, 283), and again acted upon his original opinion. The point then came before Lord Cottenham, in Mason v. Wakeman (2 Ph. 516), and he held that the word demurrer in the order meant not a general demurrer to the bill, as V. C. Wigram had held, but a demurrer to a particular interrogatory. Again, in Padley v. Lincoln Waterworks, Lord Cottenham laid it down that a defendant is bound to answer all such questions as would not, before the order of 1841, have been open to demurrer for immateriality or other special ground of objection to the particular discovery. It was thus finally settled that the order did not help a defendant whose ground for refusing to answer an interrogatory was simply that the bill was demurrable.

In Bates v. Christ's College (5 W. R. 337), the question has arisen in a different form. The plaintiff, the rector of a parish, filed a bill against the college, who were the patrons, alleging that he, the plaintiff, was in possession of one moiety of the glebe and tithes, and that he was entitled to the other moiety which was in the possession of the college, and praying a declaration accordingly, and delivery up of the title deeds. By one of the interrogatories filed, the defendants were required to make discovery of the deeds and documents relating to the moiety which they claimed. The defendants put in an answer, and claimed to be absolute owners of the moiety of the glebe, and denied the plaintiff's title, and declined to furnish any discovery as to the particulars of their moiety of the glebe or the title deeds relating thereto. To this answer the plaintiff excepted for insufficiency. For the defendants it was argued, that, though the bill was not generally demurrable, so much of it as sought relief as to the glebe lands was demurrable as raising a mere legal question, and that on a bill part of the relief prayed by which was demurrable, the defendant was at liberty to decline answering the interrogatories relating to that portion of the case. L. J. Knight Bruce held, that, on a question of exceptions turning on the 38th Order of August, 1841, all the relief prayed must, for the purpose of the argument, be considered as proper, although at another stage of the suit it might prove to be otherwise, and supported the decision of the court below in requiring a further answer. L. J. Turner expressed himself as not well satisfied on the point; but as the opinion of L. J. Knight Bruce was in accordance with that of the Vice-Chancellor, the judgment of the court below was affirmed. The effect of this decision, therefore, is, that the Order of 1841 gives protection to a defendant only where his objection is founded on the nature of the particular interrogatory, and not where it rests on a want of equity either in the whole or any portion of the relief prayed.

A difficulty often occurs in the conduct of a cause, in procuring the attendance of witnesses for cross-examination. It was settled a long time back that the party desiring to cross-examine cannot require the other party to the cause to produce his witnesses for the purpose (Winthrop v. Elderton, 1 W. R. 318), and it has sometimes happened that where a plaintiff or defendant has himself given evidence, he has succeeded in throwing insurmountable obstacles in the way of a cross-examination by his opponent. In Wellesley v. Mornington (5 W. R. 523), the plaintiff, after filing his affidavits, went to Paris for the season, and the defendant being unable, as was alleged, to afford the expense of sending a special examiner to Paris, applied to the court for an order that the plaintiff might come to London to be cross-examined. V. C. Kindersley, however, considered that it would be impossible for him to make an order upon the plaintiff to come to this country; the practice being not to compel a witness to come to London unless he lives within twenty miles (Read v. Prest, 2 W. R. 86). He, therefore, refused the application; suggesting at the same time that the utmost he could do would be to refuse to hear the affidavits if the plaintiff did not come to be cross-examined upon them. This practice of making the use of particular evidence conditional on proper facilities being given for cross-examination is now frequently acted on by the judges; and if made the invariable rule, it will, no doubt, effectually put down the tricky policy of putting in evidence and then evading cross-examination. We may mention, that, in the case of Wightman v. Whielton, which we noticed recently, this policy was successful, and the defendants afterwards put in affidavits which subjected them to cross-examination.

The courts have generally been rather strict in refusing to admit affidavits filed after the time prescribed by the general orders (see Thompson v. Partridge, 2 W. R. 113). A late case of Douglas v. Archbutt (5 W. R. 393) is an instance in which the indulgence was granted to the plaintiff, one of whose affidavits had been filed more than a week after the evidence had closed. Evidence was given showing that the delay was caused by the inadvertence of a clerk of the plaintiff's solicitor; and on this ground the affidavit was admitted, on the terms of the plaintiff paying the costs of the application, and with liberty to the defendants to file further affidavits on their side within a fortnight.

Wright v. Kirby (5 W. R. 391), is a decision of the Master of the Rolls, which will have an important practical bearing upon proceedings by incumbrancers on insufficient estates. The property in question consisted of a fund, the proceeds of a sale, which was loaded with a multitude of charges, principally judgments, far exceeding the value of the property. The bill was filed by a mesne incumbrancer, who in the course of the suit settled certain prior claims on the estate under the direction of the court. On his part it was contended that his costs were incurred in making the property available for the incumbrancers generally, and that he was entitled to have his costs paid before payment of the charges of prior incumbrancers. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that the plaintiff's costs, like those of any other incumbrancer, were to be paid, together with his principal and interest, according to the priority of his charge, and cited many authorities which seemed to countenance this view. The Master of the Rolls decided in favour of the plaintiff, and allowed him his costs in the first instance, a judgment which, whether novel or not, certainly met the justice of the case.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.—LIABILITY FOR HOUSEHOLD EXPENSES.

Ruddock v. Marsh, 5 W. R., Exch., 359.

This case turned on the often-recurring question, as to the extent of a husband's liability to pay for articles supplied to his wife without his express authority. The defendant's defence was, that he had provided his wife with sufficient ready money for the use of herself and family, and, therefore, that she had no right to pledge his credit; but the jury were directed by the Recorder of Manchester that this was no answer, since the goods supplied were necessaries; and that the husband was bound by her authority in these matters, as his general agent. This ruling was held to be correct by the Court of Exchequer; and they intimated that the plaintiff was justified in supplying the goods, as he had not received notice from the husband that he intended to limit her agency as to the matters usually under the management of the wife, household expenditure being of that description.

It is to be remarked that this ruling is quite in accordance with the cases of Clifford v. Laton (3 C. & P. 15), and Montague v. Espinasse (1 C. & P. 356), which decide that where goods are ordered by the wife, and furnished for the necessary supply of the house and maintenance of the family, the authority of the wife, as agent, is presumed; and that it lies on the husband to show that they were furnished under such circumstances that he is not liable to pay for them. Though, on the other hand, it has been laid down, recently, that the fact of the wife having, without her husband's consent or knowledge, ordered a variety of articles of clothes from different tradesmen concurrently with receiving from him a suitable allowance for dress, is sufficient to rebut the presumption of assent arising from their cohabitation (Reneaux v. Teakle, 8 Exch. 680). It would seem, on the whole, that the same rule applies as between master and servant. If the husband has been in the habit of paying for goods purchased by his wife on credit, that will be evidence of a continuing agency; and, to avoid future liability, he must give notice to the person with whom he has so dealt that he will not be answerable any more.

BANKRUPTCY—ARRANGEMENT CLAUSES.

McNaught v. Russell, 5 W. R., Exch., 360.

To an action on a bill of exchange, the defendant (a trader who was sued as acceptor) pleaded a deed of arrangement, made subsequently to the acceptance, between himself and certain of his creditors. This deed was under, and conformable to, the 224th and the 228th sections of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849, and was executed by six-sevenths in number and value of his creditors, but not by the plaintiff, though he had full notice and opportunity to do so. The deed in question provided for the liquidation of the affairs of the defendant, under the inspectorship of certain parties, and that the effects should be distributed "amongst, and for the benefit of, the creditors," in the same manner, and with the same rights and equities, as if the defendant had been adjudicated a bankrupt at a date a fortnight after the execution of the deed, but with a provision that any creditor party to the deed, who sued the bankrupt, should be excluded from such distribution, and be held to have released his debt. Several objections were now made, on demurrer, to such a deed of arrangement being pleadable in bar to the action. Thus, 1st, it was said the deed did not provide, as it should have done, for the distribution among all the creditors, but those only who were parties. The court disposed of this by saying, that, on the true construction of the deed, all the creditors would be entitled to a dividend. 2nd. It was said that there was no provision for the benefit of such persons as might become creditors between the date of the deed and the period mentioned therein, as that to which the distribution should have reference; but to this it was answered, that the plea contained an averment that no such creditors existed. 3rd. It was said that the deed was vitiated by the covenant it contained, that any party thereto who sued the bankrupt should lose his debt; but the court said the plaintiff was not damnified by such a clause, as he was not a party. And they gave judgment for the defendant.

COMPOSITION WITH CREDITORS.

Boyd v. Hind, 5 W. R., Exch. C., 361.

In this case some important principles of the law of composition between debtors and creditors, not under the superintendence either of the bankrupt or insolvent courts, were discussed.

It appears that the true nature of the defence afforded by such compositions to an action at the suit of a creditor, was first distinctly defined in the year 1831, in the case of Good v. Cheeseman (2 B. & Adolf. 318). Ever since that case, it has been settled law that a composition agreement signed by several creditors, even though not framed so as to be pleadable as a release, or though it remain uncarried out, so as not to amount to a satisfaction, may be pleaded in bar to an action for the original debt, brought by any creditor who signed it; and this, because for such agreement there is a valid consideration to each creditor signing—viz., the undertaking of the other compounding creditors to give up a part of their claim. In the above case, the plaintiff had not himself signed any composition paper, but other creditors had: and it was said that on the paper being brought to him for signature, he had asked if one L. had signed, and, on being answered in the negative, rejoined, "I will not sign till L. has signed;" but that, on L. afterwards signing, the plaintiff still refused to sign; and it was contended that these circumstances brought the case within the doctrine laid down by Lord Tenterden in Wood v. Roberts (1 Stark. 417), where he ruled, that, if one creditor, by undertaking himself to release his debtor, induced another creditor to compound with their common debtor, he could not sue on his original debt, because such action would, by tending to diminish the common fund, be a fraud on the other creditor so induced. But the Court of Exchequer Chamber (confirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer) held that the present case was distinguishable in point of fact from that relied on, as there was no evidence that the plaintiff had induced L. to compound; and they also intimated their opinion that, even if he had, it would have afforded no answer to the action. The court also observed on another case cited for the defendant (Butler v. Rhodes, 1 Esp. 230), in which Lord Kenyon ruled that a plaintiff who had not only induced other creditors to execute a composition deed, but the debtor to assign all his property to trustees, could not recede from what he had done, and sue for the original debt; and remarked that, in the present case, the defendant had not been induced in any way to alter his position from the alleged promise of the plaintiff to sign the composition paper. In connection with this case, it should be noted that the case of Norman v. Thompson (4 Ex. 755), is incorrectly reported, both in the pleadings and the judgment, ex relatione, Willes, J., who was counsel in the case.

MASTER & SERVANT—ACTION UNDER 9 & 10 VICT. C. 93.

Degg v. The Midland Railway Co., 5 W. R., Exch., 364.

This was an action under Lord Campbell's Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, brought by the administratrix of one J. D., who had died of injuries he had received while assisting the servants of the defendants in removing a truck. It appeared at the trial that the deceased had voluntarily offered his services—happening casually to be on the line—and while he was so engaged an engine was driven by servants of the defendants against the truck he was helping to shift, and caused the accident of which he died. The case was argued for the plaintiff on the general principle of respondeat superior; but the court, without much difficulty, decided in favour of the defendants, on the ground that if deceased had himself been the servant of the defendants, they would not have been liable for his death caused by his fellow-servants, if competent generally to their work, and the negligence causing the accident not being authorised by the defendants—a doctrine clearly established by Priestley v. Fowler (3 Mee. & W. 1), and more recently by Hutchinson v. York, Newcastle, and Birmingham Railway Company (5 Exch. 343), and Tarrant v. Webb (18 C. B. 797)—and the circumstance of the party injured in the case before them having volunteered his services (and being, indeed, in some sense a wrong-doer), did not, for the purposes of the present action, confer on him greater rights, or impose on the defendants other liabilities, than would have attached to them respectively had he been a hired servant.

INDICTMENT AGAINST CORPORATION—CERTIORARI—COSTS.

Regina v. The Mayor, &c., of Manchester, 5 W. R., Q. B., 373.

Our readers may remember that a few weeks ago* we drew their attention to a case which had arisen on the recognisances for costs required on removing indictments by certiorari. Another point on the same subject has just been decided. An indictment having been directed by the justices to be preferred at sessions against the defendants for neglecting to repair a road, the prosecutor had obtained a certiorari to remove the indictment into the Queen's Bench, on the ground that the case could not be tried at the sessions by reason of the defendants being a corporation, and, therefore, unable to appear in person. The present application was made by the defendants under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, ss. 4 & 5, to set aside the writ, on the ground that the prosecutor had not entered into any recognisance to pay costs in case the defendants should be acquitted; and it was resisted on the ground that the writ could not be said to have issued "at the instance" of the prosecutor (which are the words used in the 5th section of the above Act), but from the necessity of the case. And inasmuch as the only penalty attached by the statute to not entering into the recognisance is that the court to which the certiorari is directed shall disregard it, and proceed to the trial of the indictment, which was not applicable to the case of a corporation, and would, therefore, in such case, lead to a failure in justice, the court held that the case was not brought within the operation of the 5th section, and refused the application.

COUNTY COURT—NOTICE OF APPEAL—SERVICE ON ATTORNEY.

Evans v. Matthews, 5 W. R., B. C., 404.

This case turned on the notice which is required before appealing from the decision of a county court judge. This notice is regulated partly by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 14, which requires the party appealing to give the opposite party or his attorney such notice within ten days, and partly by the 141st of the county court rules of December, 1856, by which the notice is directed to be in writing, and to contain a statement of the grounds of appeal, and to be sent by post or otherwise both to the registrar and to the successful party.

In the present case there were two defendants, and notice of appeal on the part of the plaintiff was properly served on both within the ten days, but no statement of the grounds of appeal having been inserted in the notice, the plaintiff delivered a second notice, stating the grounds; and this last notice, though duly served on the registrar and on one of the defendants, within the ten days, did not reach the hands of the other defendant till the morning of the eleventh day, though it had been posted to him on the afternoon of the tenth. It appeared that the plaintiff had also endeavoured to serve this notice on the defendant's attorney, but his office was shut up, and it was suggested, in order to prevent the service. The county court judge signed the case for appeal, notwithstanding the defendant's objection and protest.

Mr. Justice Erle disposed of the case in favour of the appellant, chiefly in deference to the decision of Sir John Patteson, in the case of Cannon v. Johnson (21 L. J., Q. B., 164), to the effect that the statement of the ground of appeal was required only for the information of the court below, and that the superior court would receive any notice of which he, the county court judge, testified his approval by signing the case. The court also intimated that a notice left outside an attorney's office who had shut it up on purpose to prevent service, would be held to have been properly served. The respondent was made to pay the costs of the application to strike out the appeal without argument.

Law Offices under a Minister of Justice.

THE ACCOUNTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE.

One great point in having a department of state addressed to the care of legal affairs, would be that we should thus secure a perpetual supervision of all the law offices. Until within the last twenty or twenty-five years every law officer was paid by fees, and he took care to do his work with all expedition so as to earn the fee assigned to him on its completion. Ample abuse arose from this system, and the House of Commons Committee of (we think) 1830, to whom the change of the whole plan is attributable, had full reasons, which we need not now enumerate, for recommending the abolition of the old scheme of official remuneration. In conformity with their report, we believe every officer in every court is now placed on salary. By this change temptation to official extortion and to the multiplication of steps and processes at the requirement of the officers of the courts has been taken away; but on the other hand there is now no motive presented to the officer to get through his work. The principals of the offices have generally no control over their subordinates. If, for instance, any young gentleman can get political patronage enough to be put at the bottom of the list of Chancery registrar's clerks, and if he does not absent himself from office more than occasionally, and does not get tipsy in the office, be his capacity almost what it may, he must in due time advance to the important post of Registrar; and all the time let him do much, little, or nothing, his advance is at the same rate, and his pay the same.

One would think that on such a plan that office must long since have become effete. But things are not in reality nearly as bad as à priori we might expect; and although there are points which might well be looked into in the Registrar's as well as in most other law offices, the public has there in the main a most excellent set of officers.

Theoretically, the Accountant-General's Office is under much better arrangements than the Registrar's. It has a head under whom all the clerks are placed, and who, we believe, might remove or readily cause to be removed any of them. But here, again, the official regulations and the mode of transacting business, and still more the strength of the establishment with reference to the public demands upon it, especially in times of pressure, want a thorough investigation in the interest of the suitor and from the suitor's point of view. This is a very difficult thing to get. Investigation from the patron's point of view, or the judges' point of view, or the bar point of view, is another thing. All these interests are represented in the present Chancery Commission—that of the bar in preponderating numbers. But there is not a solicitor or an officer of Court upon it, or any one else whom the suitors have elected or placed in personal trust or confidence. To proceed to the case of the Accountant-General's Office, we will pass by the question of official arrangements—such, for instance, as that requiring the constant production on every transaction of the one same particular copy of the order of Court, and yet letting it be taken away by any one who pleases to walk to the public pigeon-hole in the office, over which is written "Solicitors are requested to take away their orders." We will come to the question of official strength. The inadequacy of the Accountant-General's Office in respect of strength has for some time been a matter of most serious inconvenience to the suitor, and, we should have thought (but this surely the Accountant-General himself would not have permitted), of undue and unjust pressure on all the office clerks, particularly the seniors. We expect the concern will break down just before the next Long Vacation. We have been attempting to make out the facts bearing on this subject. As far as we can ascertain, the yearly increase of causes and matters fifteen years ago was about 100 a year. There were then, we believe, about ten to twelve thousand accounts opened in the Accountant-General's books. The yearly increase now cannot be less than 600 a year, and the number of distinct accounts, we believe, is at least 20,000. Formerly, accumulations of interest were not allowed to be invested in stock until they amounted to £40; and in practice not till they amounted to a much larger sum. Now, thanks to Lord St. Leonard's, they are invested when they reach 3*l.* 10*s.* And what is a far greater source of labour: formerly investments of income were only made on request of the parties; and now, they are made, as of course, under the general order of Court. The balances of stock and cash in the Accountant-General's books have increased very considerably in the same period — ten millions sterling at least.

In, we think, 1842, when the Equity Exchequer Court was abolished, a fourth division was added to the office, which up to that time consisted of three divisions only. The division R. to Z., has one clerk more than the others—we presume, because it has the suitors' fund and suitors' fee fund accounts; and since 1842, the only addition, we believe, made to the whole of this most important office is that of two junior clerks in each department; and a rumour is now prevalent that this discreditable state of things is proposed to be bolstered up by perhaps a further additional junior clerk each.

* Vide supra, p. 102.

What is wanted in the Accountant-General's office is more departmental strength. No department should have in it more accounts than 4,000 at the outside. In each division the important work is reading the orders, and drawing and delivering principal and income cheques in obedience to them. Neither this work nor the keeping of ledgers, journals, &c., can be subdivided in a division. But, alas! our law offices are always tinkered on the following recipe:—"Wanted more head —Then add to the tail." On this plan the Chancery Judges' Chambers were doctored two years ago. Large salaries are paid to all the heads. Are these heads afraid of public attention being called to that fact?—or what is it?

Another great want is a branch office of the Bank of England to pay the cheques in Chancery-lane. The Bankruptcy Court, though close to Threadneedle-street, has obtained this great convenience for its suitors, and has a branch in Basinghall-street. This want has been pressed upon the Great Seal by the solicitors for years past, but hitherto without success.

It is indeed hopeless and useless to look to the Lord Chancellor or the judges to set these matters right. They possess none of the time, and none of the knowledge requisite. The needs relate to subjects utterly outside all bar experience. What judge ever was inside the Accountant-General's office? Doubtless they even receive their own salaries by power of attorney to their bankers. A department of State, bound to answer orally to Parliament, by its ostensible president or secretary for the efficiency of every office and every court, could not afford such political capital to the Opposition as the continued existence of the present state of things in the offices of the law and its courts would undoubtedly furnish. Whatever other results, good or bad, might follow from the appointment of a State department as to justice, we should certainly get the suitor's business done better in the offices and quicker in the courts. The office we have had under especial consideration is the trustee and bank department of the court. It takes care of fifty millions of property; and does this on the guarantee of the public purse; and, strange to say, it does this gratis as regards these £50,000,000, making the litigant suitors pay the cost. At a cost of eight or ten pounds to the Suitors' Fund, we have known an estate of £100,000 taken care of, and its trusts administered for a period of two or three generations; the rest of the cost to the court beyond the eight or ten pounds being levied upon the poor suitors who come to have their injuries redressed. All this was reported on by a select committee of the House of Commons some years since, and a per-centage charge on the funds under care in this office recommended as the fairest way of raising the Chancery Court tax. V. C. Wood, the Master of the Rolls, and Lord Justice Turner were on that committee. But the Great Seal has not yet listened to its recommendation. Had there been a Secretary for Justice, in the House, could such have been the case?

Correspondence.

CAN COUNSEL AND ATTORNEYS ATTEND NAVAL COURTS?

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—The columns of a law journal seem to be the best to which any Englishman believing himself wronged can appeal for justice. Agitation ever leads to reform. The officers of the merchant service frequenting the Levant are now most deeply interested in the solution of the following question—viz. Can or cannot counsel and attorneys attend naval courts? I do not mean naval courts-martial, but "naval courts" constituted eo nomine under section 260 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, which came into operation May 1, 1855. That section is as follows:—"Any officer in command of any ship of her Majesty on any foreign station, or, in the absence of such officer, any consular officer, may summon a court, to be termed a Naval Court," in certain cases which are specified under the section just quoted.

One of the cases in which a court can be called for has just arisen at Constantinople. The charges in that case are now before me. They are merely worded thus:—"William Bell, James Edwards, Daniel Ker, and John Taylor, of the Inkermann, versus Robert Driver, of the Inkermann, master, for drunkenness and violent conduct; and for assault on the said William Bell, on Feb. 5, 1857." These charges were written as above, and delivered to the master from the British Consulate at Pera. He is by the public still believed to be the victim of his crew, who are said to have trumped up the charges for reasons of their own. The naval court has, however, found him guilty, and he has been removed from his ship, and apparently without any legal means of here recovering the wages due to him. The depositions taken before that court have gone home to the Board of Trade, and a letter from the master's counsel has also been despatched to Lord Clarendon, asking for the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and of the legal advisers of the Board of Trade, upon the question with which this letter is headed.

Let me beg you to bear in mind that it is the general opinion in Constantinople, that, had counsel appeared for the captain, he must have been acquitted. As it was, one of the three judges who sat on the court held out about an hour in his favour. There was doubt, and he ought to have had the benefit of the doubt. The assault, it is said, was really in self-defence; the drunkenness, a matter of opinion; and in this case, the captain had been remarkable for thirty-three years as a sober man. Men do not change their character in a few hours,

> "To black from white,
> In a single night;
> As hair has done from sudden fright."

You must excuse this inversion, as the poet really said, "From black to white." Mais n' importe. The testimonial going to England in the captain's favour is signed by those who have known him for a long period or sailed with him. Since the war, it has been very difficult to manage crews in the merchant service—at least, so it is found in and near Constantinople. One seaman can call a naval court on his captain: (Sec. 260, 261.)

The captain in the present case applied to be heard by counsel. The court refused him. What, then, is the meaning of "defence either in person or otherwise," if a man may not appear by his attorney (sec. 241); or an "opportunity of making a defence" (sec. 261); if, though a good sailor, he is so perfectly ignorant of courts, whether naval, consular, or otherwise, as to require legal assistance. Many a long-headed fellow before the mast—a ticket-of-leave man for instance—is now a better sea-lawyer than his captain. The insertion of this letter may draw many valuable contributions to your columns, do essential service "wherever wood will float," and settle once and for all this vexata quæstio.

Your obedient servant,
Bosphorus, Feb. 26, 1857. TRUE BLUE.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—I observe in your paper of the 14th inst. the following passage, which occurs in the course of some editorial remarks upon the now celebrated case of Davison v. Duncan:—"The insertion of a single line of caution to the readers of the Advertiser would have sufficed to clear it of the charge of malice, and prepared the way for the explanation which Mr. Davison would, no doubt, have offered." Now, Sir, without reminding your readers that, even in the absence of such a "caution" as that to which you refer, both the judge and jury who tried the cause concurred in absolving the defendants from the slightest imputation of malice. I may be permitted, in the face of the actual facts, to doubt very much whether Mr. Davison would have so readily offered the explanation which you appear to think so natural under the circumstances. The fact is, the whole tenor of Mr. Davison's conduct in the matter would lead to exactly the opposite conclusion; and as an instance of this, I may observe that the alleged libellous matter was printed in the impression of the Durham Advertiser of the 10th of October last. The next weekly issue of the paper took place on the 17th of October, and yet, without waiting to ascertain whether any public explanation or apology was offered by the defendants or others, Mr. Davison, on the 16th of October, rushes into law, and sues out his writ, claiming a thousand pounds for the damage done to his character. What, let me ask, would you have said if such a proceeding as this had been adopted by a solicitor as against the proprietors of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL? Would you not at once have said that the party inculpated had not only violated the rules of common courtesy and fair dealing, but had, by the retaliating and vindictive character of his proceedings, entirely disentitled himself to the slightest claim for compensation at the hands of a right-minded jury? Whatever may be thought of the principle of "privilege" contended for by the journals in other respects, I am of opinion that the proprietors of the Durham Advertiser, by their spirited resistance to this attack upon their fair prerogative, have earned—and, in some measure, I am glad to say, have received—the thanks both of the British public and of the press.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

DELAYS IN CHANCERY.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

Under the present rules of practice in Chancery there ought not to be any complaints of delay in that court; but there are complaints of it, and amongst the profession, too. These arise from an abuse of the discretion vested in one set of officers of the court—the chief clerks. I do not wish to be understood as including them all; but, as a body, the chief clerks are far too ready and willing to listen to excuses for delay, and to grant extensions of time for putting in answers and taking evidence. An application, supported by an affidavit that "papers are before counsel," even if it be the second or third, is almost certain to be successful. The time allowed by the rules of court ought not to be extended without good cause being shown, and the delay of counsel ought not to be allowed as "good cause" any more than the delay of the solicitor; and it should be satisfactorily shown that solicitors and counsel have used their best endeavours to perform their work within the limited times.

There are, doubtless, many cases where the discretion ought to be exercised; but it should not be abused, as at present.

Daniell's Practice of the High Court of Chancery. Third edition; adapted to the present Practice of the Court. By THOMAS EMERSON HEADLAM, M.P., one of Her Majesty's Counsel. In 2 vols. London: Stevens and Norton.

The third edition of "Daniell's Practice," edited by Mr. Headlam, M.P. and Q. C., has appeared just at the right time. A sufficient period has elapsed, since the passing of the statutes for the amendment of Chancery procedure, to fix with something like precision the practice which has grown out of them. Most of the manuals of the new practice now in existence were published while the working of the new Acts was in a great degree matter of conjecture; and instead of giving definite explanations of what the practice was, the authors of them were compelled to restrict themselves to copying the statutes and orders, and giving their own views on the probable interpretation which would be put upon them. Some of these, however (as, for example, Ayckbourn's Practice), have been carefully revised in later editions, so as to show the form which the practice has since assumed. A speculative explanation of the statutes was very well for a time, in default of something better, which was at first unattainable; but Mr. Headlam was wise in deferring the issue of his new edition until the courts had accumulated material to give precision to the dogmas of the text writer. The old "Daniell" was in many respects a model book. Except where the law had become doubtful by conflicting decisions, long disquisitions were generally eschewed, and at the same time almost every settled point of practice was clearly stated in the text itself, and supported by a reference to the latest authorities. The book, with the exception of a few portions of it, was framed on the right principle, and generally avoided the two great errors into which the authors of books of practice are most liable to fall. The first and most annoying of these common faults is the introduction into the text of prolix discussions as to what the practice ought to be, in the place of short pithy statements of what it is. The second and by far the most fatal error is where the writer omits from the text the statement of important points, and contents himself with merely putting into a foot-note the names of the cases from which the reader may fish out the practice for himself—thus compelling the practitioner to go through the labour from which a practice book is intended to save him, and reducing the value of the work to the level of a noted-up copy of certain statutes and orders. We need not add that this last offence is enormously aggravated, if the names, as well as the substance, of important cases are omitted altogether.

We are compelled to say that in the new part of the third edition of "Daniell," Mr. Headlam has been guilty of both these faults, and has not even entitled himself to the meagre credit of having diligently noted up the practice cases of the last four or five years. Of course it is impossible for a reviewer to read through and examine a book of practice from cover to cover; nor is it necessary to do so. In order to form a fair judgment of Mr. Headlam's work, we have first looked at the general scope and style of it, and have then proceeded to select portions of the new practice of particular importance for a more minute examination.

Before making any comments on the new matter, we have a few words to say as to the manner in which the old materials have been handled. Much of the former edition has been omitted from the present, and in many instances rightly omitted, as having become altogether obsolete. But the scissors have, we think, been used far too freely; for, as we shall presently have to observe, there are topics on which the reader will still be compelled, in the course of practice, to refer to the old edition. There are some chapters too which, if retained at all in a book on practice, ought to have been brought up to the existing state of the law, instead of being left pretty much in the condition in which they appeared in 1845. For example, an author, if he pleased, would be at liberty to restrict himself to the general jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, leaving the statutory powers to be dealt with in a separate work; but "Daniell's Practice" was not so limited, and included a chapter on the latter subject, which, so far as it extended, has been found a very useful addition to the work. In the present edition, Mr. Headlam, while retaining the chapter, has introduced a sort of apology, to the effect that modern statutes giving particular jurisdiction are so numerous that it would be impossible to go through all, and that he, therefore, purposes to notice only the more important. This excuse may perhaps be accepted with reference to some of the Acts passed since 1845, but as every solicitor knows that there are more applications under the Trustee Acts and Trustee Relief Act than under all other statutes put together, it would naturally be expected that these Acts, which have passed since the publication of former editions of "Daniell," should be included among Mr. Headlam's more important statutes; and the more especially, as a section on the earlier Acts of the same character appeared in the old edition. The reader who looks for this information, however, will find himself referred to a chapter on payment into court, where the Trustee Relief Act is disposed of in a very slovenly and incomplete manner; and with respect to the Trustee Acts he will learn "that they have been published separately, with notes and explanations at some length, and, consequently, that it would be inconvenient to insert them in this work at length." The English of this is, that these most important statutes are left without notice for fear of damaging the sale of a not very satisfactory little pamphlet which Mr. Headlam put forth a few years ago. It is really unpardonable to spoil what pretends to be a complete book of practice by such wilful and interested omissions. But, after all, the distinguishing merit of the new edition should be looked for in the brevity, accuracy, and completeness of its treatment of the new practice; and we shall, therefore, confine our remaining observations to that part of the book. Five minutes spent in skimming its pages will enable any reader to judge how far brevity and terseness are characteristics of the last additions; and a very little more time will, perhaps, enable him to guess pretty shrewdly how the work has been concocted. It is evident, indeed, at a glance, that the compiler sat down with a copy of the Statutes, and of the Report of the Chancery Commission, and manufactured out of them a flowing narrative of what was intended to be done, and what the Statutes had accordingly enacted. After this great feat had been achieved (which, of course, might have been done just as well in November, 1852, and, in fact, was done better by Mr. Shelford and others in unpretending editions of the statutes) the second operation seems to have commenced. This was apparently confined to sprinkling in, at appropriate places, the names of a few of the cases which have been decided upon the construction of the statutes. In some very rare instances a word or two of explanation is actually inserted in the text to show what may be meant by the A. v. B. which is noted up against the particular clause under consideration. But this is quite exceptional; and the general character of the book is that of a loose narrative compounded out of the report and the statutes, with a very moderate proportion of the subsequent decisions appended in the foot-notes. Altogether, it affords less explanation as to the modern practice than a copy of Shelford's Acts, published in 1852, and noted up by a not very careful clerk. The merit of the old "Daniell" was in the skill with which it incorporated into a compact text a multitude of little but very material points of practice. A thorough practical familiarity with the business of the courts, and a minute study of the reports, are essential to the attainment of this kind of success; and we can find little trace of either of these good qualities in the additions which Mr. Headlam has made to the old volume. The fact that he has been an M. P.

and Q. C. during the time in which the new practice has grown up, is enough to account for his want of familiarity with points which seldom get out of the junior's hands. But the high distinctions of the editor are hardly sufficient to make quasi-political discussions on the wisdom of the statutes a satisfactory substitute for the exact guidance in dry matters of practice, which Mr. Headlam's work, if good for anything, ought to afford.

We feel that it would not be fair to condemn a book on mere general allegations as to its style and matter; and we are compelled, therefore, at the cost of considerable space to justify our general remarks by some particular examples. We have, therefore, sought out certain portions of the new practice, the treatment of which may fairly be taken as typical of the work generally. Among the most important modifications introduced by the recent statutes are the changes in the practice as to amendment and revivor, the abolition of common injunctions, and the new regulations as to the parties to a suit. Let us select the chapters on these subjects as the test of Mr. Headlam's accuracy, completeness, and research. The 52nd and 53rd sections of the statute gave enlarged powers of amendment, and substituted in certain cases what are called revivor orders and supplemental statements for the old practice of bills of revivor and supplement. The extent to which these sections operate has been much discussed; and the state of the authorities is still such as to make it sometimes a very difficult matter to determine whether the new practice will, or will not, apply. We propose to examine how Mr. Headlam has treated the principal questions which have arisen upon these sections. And, first, as to amendment:—"Can a suit, which has abated or become defective, be continued by amending the record without obtaining an order of revivor?" This course was suggested in Price v. Hamblett (1 W. R. 363), when V. C. Kindersley said, he should be loth to sanction the practice; and again, in Nicholson v. Gibb (2 W. R. 337), where both plaintiff and defendant had become bankrupt, the same learned judge observed, that there was no doubt power to add parties by amendment, but that it was a most anomalous proceeding. In a later case (Heath v. Lewis, and Stuart v. Sturgis, 2 W. R. 641), a foreclosure suit, which had been taken pro confesso against a defendant Gahan, the mortgagor became bankrupt, and his assignees were brought before the court by supplemental bill; which bill was served on Gahan. Gahan afterwards died, and the court allowed the supplemental bill to be amended by stating the death and making the executrix of Gahan a party. This course of amending an abated bill is now very often pursued in the case of the bankruptcy or insolvency of a defendant; and if it should become, as is likely, the invariable rule, revivor orders may be dispensed with in many cases where they are now commonly employed, and the practice will be greatly simplified. Mr. Headlam, however, has not thought the subject worthy of notice, and the cases we have mentioned are not to be found in his book.

A second question of considerable importance was—"Whether a supplemental order against the executors of a deceased accounting party could be made requiring them to admit assets, or else to account; or whether the order under the 52nd section must be limited to a common supplemental order to carry on the suit against the new defendants?" One of the first cases on this point was Tate v. Leithead (9 Hare, Ap. 51), which decided that orders under section 52 could not be extended so as to require an admission of assets or an account. The only notice which Mr. Headlam takes of this question is by a reference to Tate v. Leithead in a note; and it is rather unfortunate that he should have overlooked all the subsequent cases (Wilding v. Richards, 1 W. R. 15; Dean of Ely v. Hensley, 1 W. R. 190; Grimston v. Ozley, Set. 601; Wright v. Pikstock, Id.; Edwards v. Batley, 19 Beav. 458; Cartwright v. Shepherd, 20 Beav. 122), especially as the result has been to overrule Tate v. Leithead; and orders are constantly made under the new practice requiring executors of a deceased defendant to admit assets or account.

A third question, which has been much debated, was—"Whether a supplemental statement under sect. 53 could be filed so as to put upon record the facts causing an abatement, and to lay the foundation for a supplemental order under sect. 52, in cases where the facts were too complicated to rest upon a mere allegation and recital in the order, that being the only way in which they can be made to appear under sect. 52, taken by itself." In Chapman v. Heath (1 W. R. 344), V. C. Kindersley refused to allow this course to be taken. In Hart v. Tulk (2 W. R. 131), the Lord Chancellor decided that the supplemental statement might be first filed, and an order under sect. 52 afterwards obtained, and this although the application was after decree. In Comerall v. Hall (2 Drew. 194, and 2 W. R. 285), V. C. Kindersley, after consultation with the other judges, stated that the attempt made to work the statute in this way had proved so impracticable that the statement had to be taken off the file; and he laid down the rule, that the supplemental statement can never be used after decree, nor even before decree for the purpose of bringing new parties into the suit. To this the Vice-Chancellor added, that a supplemental bill was necessary — a dictum which has since been overruled. In Nicholson v. Gibb, where a plaintiff and defendant had both become bankrupt before decree, it was proposed to file a supplemental statement as a foundation for an order under sect. 52; but it was held that neither a supplemental statement nor a revivor order was proper, and that a bill was necessary; and in Heath v. Lewis (18 Beav. 527), which was soon after decided, the Master of the Rolls followed Nicholson v. Gibb, and held that a supplemental bill was necessary. Of all these cases, Mr. Headlam only cites Heath v. Lewis as his authority against the use of a supplemental statement under such circumstances, although that case was founded on the supposed necessity of a supplemental bill before decree — a view which has since been overruled; and, indeed, Mr. Headlam notices, at p. 1156, the fact that this case is no longer to be relied on, although at p. 1170 he selects it as his only authority for the conclusion that a supplemental statement under sect. 53 cannot be filed for the purpose of bringing forward new parties. But though Mr. Headlam's statement of the law chances in this instance not to be wrong, it is still short of what has actually been laid down, it being now well understood that the judgments in Comerall v. Hall and Nicholson v. Gibb contain the correct expression of the views of the judges, so far as they decide that a supplemental statement cannot be used to introduce new parties by itself, or for any purpose after decree; and that, notwithstanding Hart v. Tulk, it cannot be made the foundation for a subsequent order under sect. 52. On these two last points Mr. Headlam, not having discovered Comerall v. Hall and Nicholson v Gibb, is altogether silent.

Except by the use of an amendment for the purpose, the only mode under the new practice of restoring an abated or defective suit is, therefore, by an order under sect. 52; and it was long contested whether a supplemental order could be made before decree, although the common revivor order against an heir or executor was always so allowed (Seton, 604). The question most frequently occurred with respect to assignees in bankruptcy, who, according to the old practice, had to be brought before the court by supplemental bill, and not by bill of revivor. Supplemental orders were held to be irregular before decree in Price v. Hamblett (1 W. R. 363), and several other cases; but in Lash v. Miller (4 De G. M. & G. 841), a supplemental order against assignees of a bankrupt defendant was made before decree by the Lord Chancellor, liberty being given to the new defendants to put in an answer. This has been followed since in Pickford v. Brown and Hall v. Clive; and Mr. Headlam has assumed that Lash v. Miller is an authority for the position that orders under the 52nd section are altogether independent of the question whether the application is before or after decree. Whatever the law may ultimately come to be, this is certainly not yet settled; for the orders obtained in the ordinary way, under sect. 52, are always of course (Bonfil v. Purchas, 1 W. R. 13, & Seton, 604), whereas it rather appears from the judgment in Lash v. Miller that a special application is necessary to obtain a supplemental order against assignees before decree. Nor does it appear to be settled at present that the supplemental orders to be made before decree will go to the full extent of those which have been made after decree. We should have been better pleased, therefore, with the treatment of this subject, if Mr. Headlam had taken the pains to classify the decisions to which he refers, so as to show whether the orders were made before or after decree; and it would have been still more gratifying if he had given the reader some information about such cases as Jervoise v. Clerk (2 W. R. 337), Wilson v. Auchterlony (1 W. R. 34), Grimston v. Ozley (1 W. R. 100), Robertson v. Hewetson (1 W. R. 100), Bonfil v. Purchas (1 W. R. 13), Petre v. Petre (1 W. R. 362), Merritt v. Walton (2 W. R. 544), Martin v. Purnell (3 W. R. 395), Phippen v. Brown (19 Jur. 698), and Langdale v. Gill (16 Jur. 1041), all worthy of notice, and some of them very important authorities upon the 52nd and 53rd sections of the statute.

The change introduced by the assimilation of common to special injunctions has led to much doubt and conflict as to the case which it is necessary for a plaintiff to make for an injunction upon a discovery bill, and the extent to which a defendant can properly resist the application by counter-evidence, and as to the bearing of the conduct of the parties in this respect upon the costs. These are points particularly calling for some explanation on the part of a text writer; but Mr. Headlam as usual contents himself with reciting the clause of the Act, and adding in a note a reference to Senior v. Pritchard (16 Beav. 473) and Lovell v. Galloway (17 Beav. 1). But this is not the worst of the matter; for at a subsequent hearing of Lovell v. Galloway (3 W. R. 156), which seems to be unknown to the editor of "Daniell," the Master of the Rolls announced that, after consultation with the judges, he had changed the views which he had previously expressed in the case which Mr. Headlam refers to as the safest guide he can find for his readers. While upon this point, we may also mention Chilton v. Chambers (20 Beav. 533) as another example of Mr. Headlam's numerous omissions.

We must reserve the examination of the Chapter on Parties for a future occasion.

A Manual of the Law relating to the Office of Trustee, with the Recent Decisions and Statutes, including the Trustee Act, and Proceedings under the Trustee Relief Acts; also an Appendix, containing the Acts themselves, Precedents, and a full Index. By R. DENNY URLING, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-law. Dublin: E. J. Milliken. London: Stevens & Norton.

The author of this useful manual informs us in his preface that, in presenting "within a narrow compass the existing law relating to the office of trustee, two objects have been kept in view—a very compressed statement of those established doctrines of equity already treated of in former works, and a fuller statement of the material enactments and decisions recorded since the year 1844"—the date of Mr. Hill's elaborate treatise on the same subject. In the book before us he has fairly accomplished what he thus proposed; but, in our opinion, has succeeded more completely in the latter than in the former object. It is by no means an easy matter to give a very compressed, and at the same time strictly accurate, statement of law. In law, perhaps more than in any other subject, fallacies lie in generalities. Legal text-books upon special subjects are mainly useful when they supply copious illustration of the various modifications of general doctrines; and these latter, as a general rule, are sufficiently stated in works devoted to the maxims and principles of any system of jurisprudence. Generalisation and definition in legal subjects require, therefore, considerable logical skill and very great care on the part of a writer, when he attempts anything more than an obvious induction from particular classes of cases; where, substantially, the judges who pronounce the decisions, make or suggest the proper classification. These remarks apply to the only part of Mr. Urling's performance of which we cannot entirely approve. We are at a loss to understand why he should have in the very outset resorted to such an authority as Stair's "Institutes of the Laws of Scotland" for a definition of a Trust, which our author admits to be inapplicable to our system of law. Lord Coke's well-known definition—than which Mr. Lewin considers there can be none more exact—is quite as intelligible as Stair's, while it has the merit of being applicable to English law. We are also somewhat doubtful as to the logic or the utility of the division of trusts according to their nature and their object—the former being subdivided into passive and active trusts; the latter into public and private trusts. It appears to us that the two categories might reciprocate their names without any dislocation of their constituents. However, having found fault thus far, we are happy in being able to bear testimony to the ability and industry which characterise the more practical portions of this excellent little work. To the student and country practitioner desirous of possessing a good general not on of the duties, liabilities, and incidents of the office of trustee, we can strongly recommend it. Apart from the introductory chapter, to which our fault-finding observations are wholly confined, the author has shown remarkably sound judgment and skill in the arrangement and treatment of his subject; and we do not know of any one work of the same dimensions and price where the reader can find so readily, or stated in so satisfactory a manner, such information on the office of trustee as is likely to be required in every-day practice.

The most valuable part of Mr. Urling's work is that portion which treats of proceedings under the Trustee Acts, 1850 and 1852, and under the Trustee Relief Acts. The cases relating to these several Acts have been diligently collected, and their result is generally stated with brevity and accuracy. The Appendix contains the Acts themselves, and the General Order of 10th June, 1848, consequent upon the Trustee Relief Act; and also the Irish Trustee Relief Act, and General Order; but no mention is made of the Orders of the 12th November, 1856, by which applications under the Trustee Relief Acts, where the trust fund does not exceed £300; and also applications under the Trustee Acts, where any decree or order has been pronounced for the sale or conveyance of lands, are to be made at Chambers. It is not unlikely, however, that Mr. Urling's work may have gone through the press before these Orders appeared, though the title-page bears the date of the present year.

There are also, in the Appendix, some precedents which will be useful to the country solicitors who do not happen to possess Bythewood, Martin, or Davidson. We think that a few precedents of petitions and other proceedings under the Trustee and Trustee Relief Acts might have been equally useful, as solicitors now have generally the responsibility of drawing petitions themselves without the assistance or advice of counsel. The author, perhaps, may make use of the suggestion in a future edition of his Manual, an agreeable fate which we have no hesitation in assigning to it, considering how useful it must prove to the profession generally, and to those members of it especially who are not very familiar with the practice of Courts of Equity.

CRIMINAL BREACHES OF TRUST.

Lord St. LEONARD'S said Government had announced that it was their intention to bring in a bill to render breaches of trust criminal in certain cases, which he had no doubt would meet with very general acceptance. Two bills had been brought into Parliament, but which had not passed their Lordships' House, to enable the South Sea Company, and another company, to carry on, on a gigantic scale, the trade of executing the trusts of every estate in the kingdom. The project of the former company was a failure, but the latter had commenced business on the principle of limited liability. He believed nothing could be more dangerous to the interests of society than that the office of trustee and executor should become a trade. If the bill was brought in to render breaches of trust criminal offences, it ought to be accompanied by a provision which would save trustees from the consequences of acting erroneously when they acted in good faith. He regretted that at present the courts of equity punished with great severity trustees and executors, even when it was proved that they had only erred in judgment. He hoped that Government would not press forward the bill which they proposed to bring in for rendering trustees criminally responsible for breaches of trust without at the same time bringing in another bill to protect trustees in the honest, though it might be in the mistaken, exercise of their trust. He also thought that the proposed bill should be extended to any society taking on itself the office of trustee and executor.

The Lord CHANCELLOR said, his noble and learned friend was quite right in supposing that Government intended to bring in a bill to render trustees criminally responsible for breaches of trust. But for the present state of Parliament it would have been introduced this session. It was difficult to define what might be called breaches of trust; but what had been done was to provide that certain defined breaches of trust committed by a trustee for his own benefit should be criminally punished.

Thursday, March 19.

The LORD CHANCELLOR presented a petition from the Liverpool Guardian Society for the Protection of Trade, which stated that the business of the Liverpool County Court was most satisfactorily administered by Mr. Joseph Pollock, the judge of that court; but, inasmuch as the important mercantile pursuits of the community of Liverpool gave rise to very difficult questions as to the customs of trade, and other points which required very great attention on the part of that judge, (and which he had bestowed to the prejudice of his own health,) the business of the court was often greatly in arrear. They therefore prayed for the appointment of an additional judge, The noble and learned lord said that the question of appointing an additional judge was at present under the consideration of the Government, but it was a very difficult thing to interpose in the case of Liverpool in consequence of the pressure of business, as other places similarly circumstanced might also ask for the appointment of additional judges. It would, however, remain with the Legislature to determine whether an additional judge should be appointed in Liverpool.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, March 10.

REVISION OF EXPENDITURE.*

Mr. GLADSTONE in the course of his speech on the report of of supply being brought up, said—That it did not appear to him that the public moneys were administered by the Government with that fidelity and strictness which ought to be observed. Having said this, he would give an instance, viz., the appointments to the judicial bench. In the course of the last session of Parliament the house was obliged to draw from the public purse £160,000 a year in aid of the county courts, so that the suitors in those courts might be relieved to that extent from the expenses of the litigation into which they entered. He confessed that he had some doubts of the justness of that course. And at the time when the measure was passed, he had urged upon the Government the necessity of considering whether the number of judges in the common law courts at Westminster might not be reduced. Very late in the recess a commission was issued for that purpose, but in the meantime two judgeships had fallen vacant, and, instead of making any temporary provision for the despatch of necessary business pending the report, the judgeships were filled up, and life salaries, and large pensions on the basis of those salaries, cast upon the revenue. Shortly afterwads a third vacancy occurred through the lamented death of Mr. Baron Alderson. Upon this the same course was adopted, and the vacancy was filled up. He had mentioned Mr. Baron Alderson, and the House would permit him to add that which would be a tribute to the memory of that lamented judge. When the learned judge saw that he (Mr. Gladstone) had mentioned the subject to the House, he wrote to him from Italy a letter containing his views on that question. From that letter he would read a single passage: "Now it is indisputable that twelve judges are sufficient for the term business;" and he proceeded to detail a plan by which he thought the circuit business might also be efficiently disposed of. He could not but express his belief, that, if, pending the labours of a commission whose duty it was to inquire into the subject, three new judges had been appointed—Sir Robert Peel would have moved an address of the House; and that that address would have been carried, not only by votes of the opposition, but by those of members on the other side of the house.

The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER replied, that, with reference to the recent appointment of judges of the superior courts of common law he believed a commission was issued during the recess to inquire into the possibility of diminishing their number. Vacancies in the judicial bench, however, occurred since that commission was appointed, which were filled up while the commission was sitting; but it must be remembered that judicial duties cannot remain unperformed, and that so long as the present division of circuits exists, and there is a demand for winter circuits and frequent gaol deliveries, it is necessary that the judicial bench should consist of as many members as now.

Monday, March 16.

MASTERSHIPS IN CHANCERY (IRELAND).

Mr. VANCE asked if it was intended to fill up the vacant Mastership?

Viscount PALMERSTON said the matter was still under consideration.

Mr. WHITESIDE reminded the noble lord that by the existing Act of Parliament the fifth Mastership, whenever it became vacant, was not to be filled up without the consent of the Treasury. It had, moreover, been stated before a parliamentary committee last year that two vice-chancellors would be able to do all the work.

Tuesday, March 17.

THE APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

Mr. BOWYER called attention to the case of Grey v. Pearson, decided on the previous day, as illustrating the present state of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords. In that case, a decision had been given by Lord Justice Turner, which had been partially reversed by the Lord Chancellor. From that sentence the parties appealed; but the decision of the Lord Chancellor was confirmed by the noble lord himself, and by Lord Wensleydale, against Lord St. Leonard's, who strongly supported the view taken by Lord Justice Turner. In other words, the decision of two great equity judges had been set aside by one equity judge, and a common law judge, who had had no experience in equity cases whatever. He wished, therefore, to ask the Home Secretary if he thought this case did not prove that the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was, under present circumstances, unsuited to the wants of the country; whether her Majesty's Government would take the matter into consideration; and whether they would bring forward a measure in the next Parliament for the purpose of constituting an appellate court of the last resort, fully adequate to the requirements of the community?

Sir G. GREY said he knew nothing whatever of the case referred to; but the hon. gentleman's own statement did not lead him to concur in the opinion he had expressed with regard to the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords. For what was the fact? The decision had been come to by a majority—by two judges in opposition to the opinion of a third. Now that was so common an occurrence in courts of appeal, whether in equity or common law, that he could not regard it as proving in the slightest degree the necessity of a change in the ultimate appellate jurisdiction of this country. He thought it would not be a useful mode of occupying the time of Parliament to be discussing the respective merits of different judges, or in considering whether the opinion of one judge ought to prevail against that of two.

BREACHES OF TRUST—BRITISH BANK.

Sir F. KELLY asked the Attorney-General whether a bill, which the honourable and learned gentleman intended to bring forward with regard to the British Bank, would be introduced at an early period in the next Parliament.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said it was a subject of very great regret to him that the sudden termination of the present Parliament had prevented him from bringing in two measures. One of them was with regard to breaches of trust, and he had hoped that it would be a means of punishing in future such delinquencies as they had seen exemplified in the case of the British Bank. The other, he thought, would have afforded a remedy in some degree to the grievous distress which had been occasioned to the shareholders of that unfortunate undertaking. The whole affair had been an opprobrium to British jurisprudence; for it had both shown the inability of the law to punish grave delinquencies, and it had proved its utter inadequacy to administer the relief required. If he were a member of the next Parliament, it would be his desire to bring in these measures at as early a period as possible.

* In consequence of the press of other matter we were obliged to defer our extracts from this debate to the present Number.—ED.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

Various causes combine to continue the depressed and downward tendency which, during the last two weeks, has prevailed in the English Funds. The drain of specie for exportation has been uninterrupted. The demand for money at the Bank, and in the Market, has generally been heavy. A similar demand is described as having increased, and become very active in Paris. The last monthly account of the Bank of France shows that a very large amount had been paid by that establishment for the purchase of specie, and present operations indicate a continued requirement in the same quarter. The result is, that the disposition towards improvement occasionally manifested in the English Funds during the week, has not been maintained, and present quotations do not show any advance.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 14th March, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £18,517,365, being a decrease of £309,800, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £10,297,665, showing a decrease of £12,831 when compared with the previous return. Foreign securities show firmness and activity. A moderate amount of business has been done, at rather improved rates, in Mexican 3 per Cents. and Turkish 6 per Cents.

Further investigation makes more clear the fraudulent course of management pursued at the Royal British Bank, and discloses a line of conduct, on the part of the directors, which amounted to an entire abandonment of their duty and responsibility.

At a recent meeting of the directors and subscribers of the London and Paris Bank a resolution for dissolving the bank was ultimately carried. During the discussion it transpired that a negotiation had been opened with the Royal British Bank shortly before its failure for a transfer of its business; and that it had been abandoned in consequence of the directors of that establishment having refused to allow their accounts to be verified by a public accountant.

The joint-stock establishment known as the London and Eastern Banking Corporation has found it necessary to make arrangements for winding-up its transactions. This bank was established about three years back, with a capital of £500,000, of which one-half was paid up. It has declared dividends at 6 per cent. up to July last, when the condition of the bank was said to be prosperous, and two new branches were deemed expedient. It is stated that pecuniary assistance has been obtained, so as to enable all engagements to be liquidated as they become due, and the concern to be wound-up with the loss of a portion only of the paid-up capital.

Two treaties have been signed in the present month at Copenhagen, for the purpose of abolishing the Sound Dues. The first between Denmark and the Governments of Russia, Prussia, France, Great Britain, and the United States, and the other between the Governments of Denmark and Great Britain, by which it is agreed that the Sound Dues shall be extinguished by a sort of equitable redemption. These dues are to expire on the 1st April next, if the treaty is approved by Parliament, and the compensation to be paid to the Government of Denmark is voted by the House of Commons. But as these questions are reserved for the next session of Parliament, conditions are inserted in the treaty to secure the amount of dues in the meantime to the Government of Denmark. The amount of compensation is fixed at £1,125,206. This amount is arrived at by capitalising at 4 per cent. the average amount of dues to which vessels under the British flag are liable.

LONDON, MARCH 28, 1857.

THE BLACK ART IN AN AGE OF LIGHT.

Staffordshire may now claim the honour of having produced the most consummate villain, and the greatest fool, in England. At the recent assizes for that notorious county, JAMES TUNNICLIFF was tried for obtaining about £30 of THOMAS CHARLESWORTH, by falsely pretending that the prosecutor, his wife, child, cattle, horses, and goods, were bewitched, and that he, the prisoner, had power to remove the spell. The prosecutor was described as a substantial farmer, and a very respectable looking young man. He married at the end of 1855. At that time, his mother was living with him, but she left in the following February. As often happens, she disagreed with her son's wife, and they parted, after a lively interchange of compliments. The old lady probably believed, as old ladies will, that her daughter-in-law was a useless, thriftless thing, that would bring discomfort and ruin on her son, and she felt under no obligation whatever to conceal her thoughts; so she quitted her son's house, uttering a dire prediction of impending woes. Some part of her prophecy, being quite consistent with probability, was fulfilled; and her son's superstition being thus set at work, brought on him greater calamities than any she had ever threatened. After the mother's departure, the cheese would not turn, and the dairymaid was taken ill. The former event no doubt arose out of the unskilfulness of mistress and servant, and the latter from natural causes. But it was suggested to the prosecutor that these misfortunes were caused by witchcraft, and that he should apply to the prisoner, who was in the habit of stopping witchcraft, to contend against the infernal powers. The prisoner, it appears, in the intervals of his sublime function, kept a beer-shop. Probably he thought that the sanctity of his character would be enhanced by his thus following a trade. The apostle PAUL, it might be remembered by the neighbours, was a tentmaker. Resisting witchcraft, however, proved far more profitable than selling beer. At the very first visit, he received from the prosecutor between £6 and £7 for disenchanting himself, his wife, the twenty-seven cows, the dairymaid, and the cheese-kettle. But next day, the unfortunate family were no better; and still the cheese would not "come." The prosecutor went to the prisoner's house to fetch him, and there drank two cups of ale, and was very ill on his way home. It was suggested that the prisoner caused this illness by drugging the beer, in order to obtain the opportunity of pretending that his dupe was now under the influence of a more potent spell, which had been invoked since yesterday by the incensed matron. We soon hear that the magician became regularly installed in the house of his silly victim, and there found ample opportunities, no doubt, of producing appearances for removing which he might be paid handsomely. The prosecutor's mother came to his house about this time, and the prisoner assured him that she had again put a curse on everything, and he must have more money to counteract her spells. On this occasion, he charged 3s. 6d. a-head for all the sheep, calves, and pigs, and 5s. for the baby, and received in all £15. The prisoner resided for some time in the prosecutor's house as a servant. What became of the "Royal Oak" meanwhile we are not informed. Perhaps, the landlord charged his familiar spirit to act as tapster, and to keep the score. ST. DUNSTAN'S servant, we know, borrowed his master's powers, and commanded a broomstick to do the former office for him; and it obeyed only too well, for the monk was drowned in beer. The supposed enchantment began in April, 1856, and continued until the 17th of last month, when the prosecutor began to perceive the true nature of the spell that bound him, and ordered the prisoner off his premises. The amount realised by this ten months' course of knavery was stated to have been £30.

After such an example of credulity in our own day, we shall have no difficulty in understanding the facility with which convictions were obtained for witchcraft two or three centuries ago. In the time of JAMES I., the dowager Mrs. CHARLESWORTH would certainly have been burned or drowned, as was the fate of many an ancient female with a crabbed temper and a scolding tongue. It was shown that the prosecutor and his wife were habitual topers. Their health was impaired, and their faculties were confused by the malignant influence of the bottle-imp. But they insisted upon ascribing these ordinary results of every-day vice to a supernatural agency. The prosecutor believed that his father was bewitched eight years ago, "because he was in a poor low way." The fact was, that the father died of delirium tremens, produced by drinking. The neighbours suggested, in a common-sense way, that if the prosecutor and his wife would eat more and drink less, they would be better, and might kick the prisoner off the premises. The wife, we suppose, had more of the imaginative faculty than her husband, and consequently her description of the nocturnal spirits' working is far more terrible than his. "We heard the cows all lament, and the horses prancing, the dog howling, and a many strange noises." The prisoner one night went into a room alone, saying that it would be either death or glory to him, and he returned with "a blueness over him," and announcing his victory in the spiritual strife. Another night, Mrs. CHARLESWORTH told the court, that she "was snatched up in bed as straight as I am now, and was shaken all to death." The prisoner was sleeping in the same room with the prosecutor and his wife. He got out of bed, and lit the candle, and brought Mrs CHARLESWORTH'S Bible to her bedside. On cross-examination, the solemnity of this midnight scene was a little impaired by the admission that he also assisted her to a drop of brandy. This soothed her, and she "went better after that." The Bible, according to the prisoner, was stopped by him in the very act of making to itself legs, and walking off to aid in some way the incantations of the rival wizard. The "shakings" of Mrs. CHARLESWORTH lasted for two hours. There seemed to be cats fighting in the room, and yells were heard "like unto a dog, but louder." Another night there was an awful shaking at the door, and "we said the LORD'S Prayer;" and then, of course, they had a drop of gin. They went in terror to the house of Mr. COPE, a near neighbour, who had given them the sensible advice before alluded to, and told him that if they had not said the LORD'S Prayer the house would have fallen down. Mrs. CHARLESWORTH complained that her lips were parched, and Mr. COPE recommended a little gin-and-water. The lady "declined the water," and took a glass of neat gin. On another occasion the dog was very bad, and appeared either all on fire, or to be followed by another fiery dog. This story, too, was confirmed by a servant girl, who betrayed no partiality for either brandy or gin, and who, as she possessed some small glimmering of unobscured intelligence, appears to have suspected the fraudulent practices of the prisoner. She, however, sober and sensible as she was, deposed to seeing "our dog, and the shape of another dog after it, all on fire." Still, when she felt ill herself, she impeached neither the prisoner nor anybody else of witchcraft, but complained to her master that the prisoner had dosed her, and soon after that he was sent away.

The delusion had thus lasted for full ten months, and might have prevailed much longer, but that the prisoner was so unwise as to "have some words" with this servant girl, whom he should rather have striven to make his friend. By a most superfluous and unfortunate exercise of his divining skill he "found out something" between the dairymaid and the cowman, and imparted his discovery, real or pretended, to the mistress. The girl "gave him a bit of her mind"—a favour which she also bestowed very effectively on the counsel who cross-examined her—and from this moment the star of TUNNICLIFF declined; his influence over his dupes gave way as soon as they made the smallest inquiry into his pretences. In a few days he was waited upon by a police-inspector, and he is now undergoing a sentence of twelve months' hard labour, which, for a rogue who has lived, and lived well, by simple lazy lying, is certainly an appropriate punishment. Perhaps no stranger history than this was ever told in a court of justice. We see gross and degrading superstition co-existent with, if not fostered by, intemperance. We see that this superstition at once tempts impostors to make the most extravagant claims to supernatural power, and prepares the minds of of their dupes to believe the wildest and most monstrous charges of infernal practice. We can now readily understand, and very slowly censure, the boundless credulity of bygone ages; and we must confess with shame that we are little or not at all superior in enlightenment to our forefathers. Ignorance is as dark, superstition as rampant, imposture as bold as ever. But, in one respect, the progress of the world's life has not been in vain. If we read the proceedings of the witch-finders of the time of JAMES I., and then contrast with them the patient hearing and careful summing up of Mr. Justice WILLES—his anxious consideration of the technical point raised on the prisoner's behalf by his able counsel, and his consultation, before deciding it, with his Brother CROWDER—and, lastly, the just but still humane severity of the sentence passed—if we consider all these things, they may strengthen us in the belief—often it may be very rudely shaken—that the march of civilisation is indeed onward, and that our age is really better than those that have gone before it.

THE TREATMENT OF CRIMINALS.

Mr. PEARSON, the City Solicitor, has published a pamphlet bearing for its title the question—"What is to be done with our Criminals?" The temporary excitement of politics may postpone its consideration, but few subjects stand more in need of comprehensive and statesmanlike treatment. We called attention to some of its features several weeks ago, in commenting on the debate on transportation, and took that opportunity of expressing our conviction that the measures proposed by the Government were mere stopgaps, which would only be valuable if they were followed up by enactments of a wider scope. Mr. PEARSON'S pamphlet is intended to suggest a plan of that kind; and it is due not only to the importance of the suggestion but also to the position of the advocate, to consider its merits. According to Mr. PEARSON, there are three systems for the management of criminals, amongst which the range of our choice is limited. First, there is the cruel and cheap system; secondly, the expensive and effeminate system; and thirdly, the self-supporting and manly system. The cheap and cruel system Mr. PEARSON considers as exploded, though it seems, according to his account, to have answered its purpose. The expensive and effeminate system he considers to be a failure; whilst the merits of the proposed manly and self-supporting system are entirely matter of conjecture—though of conjecture which in his hands is to the last degree hopeful and promising. One peculiarity of Mr. PEARSON'S remarks is, that he recognises facts which do not correspond to his own views. He admits that the cheap and cruel system attained its object to a very great extent indeed; and it is no slight symptom of honesty, as times go, for a man to dare to confess that by unflinchingly hanging all persons guilty of crimes of a certain degree of gravity, a considerable diminution in the number of criminals may be effected. Great restraints, no doubt, both are and ought to be imposed by public sentiment on the severity of legal punishments; but Mr. PEARSON'S pamphlet proves convincingly that within these limits severity of punishment is a most valuable and powerful auxiliary to law. Mr. PEARSON'S exposure of the expensive and effeminate system of prison discipline appears to us both powerful and satisfactory; but when we come to his third head—the proposal of a self-supporting and manly system—our confidence in the soundness of his conclusions is very rudely shaken. Mr. PEARSON'S scheme, in its leading characteristics, resembles the mark system, invented, we believe, by Captain MACONOCHIE. The essential feature of this system is, that the prisoner is to be sentenced to so many hours of labour; that he is to be considered as having a right only to bread and water; but that he is to be allowed by labour not only to work out his sentence, but also to improve his diet while so doing. Thus, if a man were to work for twelve hours, he would not only shorten his sentence by that amount, but earn into the bargain 6d. worth of improved diet. This scheme rests on the principle that idleness is the chief cause of crime; that labour must, therefore, be the most effectual remedy for it; and the hope of obtaining the means of indulgence for certain appetites is the force by which the whole machine is to be set in motion. We do not doubt that these views may furnish valuable suggestions for the improvement of prison discipline; but for two reasons which appear to us conclusive, we cannot join in Mr. PEARSON'S anticipation of obtaining any important results from adopting them in their full extent.

Mr. PEARSON appears to us to fall into the common error of almost all systematic writers, in looking upon human nature as being very much simpler than experience shows it to be. Theft is, no doubt, the commonest of crimes, and idleness is very often the predisposing cause of theft; but there are many crimes which are as congenial to an energetic disposition as theft is to an idle one, and we do not see that a system of which the very best that can be said is, that it has some tendency to foster habits of industry and self-control, has any special means of affecting such persons. Anger and lust lead men into crime almost as often as idleness; the crimes so produced are of a far deeper dye than theft, and they are usually committed by men of an energetic temperament. It would seem, therefore, that Mr. PEARSON'S system is so arranged as to have almost no special influence on the very worst and most dangerous class of criminals. Even with respect to those for whom it is more peculiarly intended, we are very sceptical as to its power. All that it does, is to place the criminal under the same system under which the constitution of nature has placed us all, though in a rather less palpable manner. Indeed, in Mr. PEARSON'S eyes, this is the great recommendation of the scheme, and he is at considerable pains to prove, by theological considerations, that his system is only a new application of the original curse upon the ground which followed Adam's sin. If this is so, we can only say, that the fact itself seems inconsistent with the soundness of his proposal. The people whom he proposes to reform by the application of the law of nature, are precisely those respecting whom it has been already proved that they are beyond the reach of that law. If the prospect of remote advantages to be obtained by a course of self-denying labour, and of some slight additional comfort in their way of life were sufficient for the purpose of reforming criminals, this prospect would have been sufficient for the purpose of preventing them from becoming criminals. It seems to us little less than absurd to suppose that a man who preferred theft with its frequent hardships and positive dangers to a life of industry, leading, through self-denial, to comfort and independence, would be likely, of his own accord, to prefer self-denial and labour to idleness. We believe, that one of Mr. PEARSON'S "manly and self-supporting" prisons would, in fact, be much the same as any other prison. The hope of earning freedom a little sooner, or even of earning tea and beer at the end of the week, would act faintly on people whose views of life are generally limited to the day's indulgence; and we feel satisfied that to ninety-nine prisoners in a hundred the system would make little difference; whilst the hundredth man would probably not require its intervention.

Our doubts about Mr. PEARSON'S views apply even more strongly to his hopes of making his prisons "self-supporting" than to his hopes of making them "manly." It is quite true that "the confiscated labour" of a great number of tailors, shoemakers, carpenters, and agricultural labourers, seems, at first sight, to be capable of forming a very valuable fund, but there are some considerations which Mr. PEARSON appears to us to overlook, which materially diminish its value. The value of labour depends entirely upon the operation of the law of supply and demand. If 100 tailors were to make a present of themselves to the town of Aylesbury, saying, "our labour is worth so much per man per day, therefore, you must of necessity be able to maintain us profitably to yourselves," we suspect that the town of Aylesbury would be but little obliged for the offer. A man's labour is only valuable in certain places, and at certain times. Suppose, for example, there were amongst the convicts ten attorneys, ten barristers, ten physicians, and ten clergymen, how would Mr. PEARSON employ them? Their labour, under favourable circumstances, would be worth that of perhaps 500 or 600 farm-servants, but when they were all brought together in one place it would be utterly worthless. This particular case, of course, is not likely to arise; but the operation of the criminal law would bring people together in a manner quite as arbitrary. It is not at all an absurd supposition, for example, that the population of the "manly" prisons might consist of button makers, smiths, framework knitters, small shopkeepers, tramps, stationers, miners, butchers, and here and there a gentleman or two. How could the labour of such a heterogeneous mass be turned to such a profitable account as to pay for a prison inclosing a park of 1,000 or 2,000 acres of land?

We have left out of account one of the most important objections to the scheme. We cannot be persuaded out of the belief that the great object of punishment is to deter men from crime, and to avenge society upon those who have committed it. Reformation is all very well in its way, but it is an entirely secondary and subordinate object. Men should be reformed out of jail; when they come there, they come to be punished.

UNSEATING A MEMBER.

Before we next address our readers, the fever fit will have in great measure subsided, and the national pulse have resumed its normal condition. Most of the borough "returns" will have showered in upon Mr. ROMILLY, their official recipient, though it will not be known in many counties what knights, "most fit and discreet, girt with swords" (in the old fashioned phraseology still adhered to), have been chosen to serve in the new Parliament. Even while we write, the struggle, in many constituencies is over; but amongst that constituency which we editorially represent, we reflect with pleasure that the fun is only beginning. The game of electioneering is one in which no one need take a part unless he pleases, and in which the players are well able to pay for their amusement. Hence the attorney who makes a "good thing" out of an agency or an election petition is not disturbed, as he sometimes has occasion to be, in a contested and profitable lawsuit, by remembering that that which has given him wherewithal to live, has probably brought misery and privation to one or other of the litigants.

Though, then, we repeat, an election be closed, it would be a great mistake for the friends of the rejected candidate to suppose that there is no room for hope; or for him who fills the envied position of "head of the poll," to rejoice over much at the success he has achieved. The wary practitioner at Guildhall shakes his head, while his client is toasting his verdict, for visions of the rule nisi which may be impending rise and trouble him. And, in like manner, the danger of a "petition against the return" can scarcely ever be altogether disregarded during the first fortnight after the meeting of the new Parliament; though the humanity of our law has limited the time within which it can be presented, unless under special circumstances, to that reasonable period. It may possibly stimulate the exertions or allay the fears of some of our readers, if we devote a little space to the consideration of the more usual grounds, on which a member is sought to be unseated by the verdict of an election committee.

During the Parliament which preceded that which has just expired there were between thirty and forty controverted elections; and in about two-thirds of these one or both of the members were unseated. The grounds of the petition in the larger number were bribery or treating; three were on account of the member being disqualified to sit; and two were in respect of the insufficiency of the notice of election. These data are sufficient to raise a considerable probability that such of the present elections as may hereafter be controverted, will be fought upon one or other of these grounds, or upon the fresh one, of undue influence, which the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854 defined for the first time, if it did not altogether create.

Of these grounds for avoiding an election, that of bribery and treating has always been the most important; and as to the offence of "bribery," it cannot be too carefully borne in mind that the effect of the recent statute upon it is by no means merely to consolidate previous provisions. A new and most complicated definition is laid down; bribery in the candidate is carefully distinguished from bribery in the voter; the agent and the subject are impartially punished; while many acts and payments of the candidate or his agents, which under the old law would have passed muster, will now be impaled on one or other of the five forks of the famous 2nd section. Thus, it was formerly held that the voter must have accepted the bribe in order to complete the offence; but now, to tamper with a coy elector is as dangerous as if your five-pound note were buttoned into his breeches' pocket. So also the present Act for the first time places loans on the same footing as regards the lender as absolute gifts—a species of corruption which, as some of us may remember, was especially denounced and mourned over by the committee which sat on the Lyme Regis election in the year 1842, but which could not be reached by the statutes against bribery then in force. The same may be said of payments of parochial rates for the purpose of enabling a voter to be registered, and the voluntary discharge of a voter's bill for services bonâ fide performed, but payment of which had been refused till the time of election. Such solicitude that all should enjoy their franchise, or such conscientious awakening as that last mentioned, will no longer be safe in its consequences, though, under the less uneasy virtue of other days, they have both, we believe, run the gauntlet of an election committee. Then, again, the offence of bribery in the voter has been now extended so as to make the act complete on his agreeing to vote corruptly as requested, whereas, it was formerly essential that he should have actually voted before his crime was committed. This species of bribery, however, inasmuch as it does not affect our immediate subject—viz. the displacement of a member, we shall pass over without further notice, except to express our astonishment at the singular conduct of those who framed this Act, in repealing and failing to re-enact the 2 Geo. 2, c. 24, by which it was made penal in a voter to ask for a bribe, though the request were not acceded to. Did any compassion for human frailty dictate this leniency, or was it only one of those omissions which our future Minister of Justice is to protect us against?

"Treating," as distinct from bribery, though it has been carefully prohibited since the "Treating resolution" of the year 1677, has yet been always considered as an offence of inferior malignity; and the new Act recognises and preserves the distinction, by making the one indictable, while it visits the other with pecuniary penalties only. As regards the seat of the member whose return is petitioned against, however, there is no practical difference, for his election will be declared void if the committee report against him on this point. And if he be sued for the penalty attached by the statute to "Treating," and proof be made to the revising barrister that judgment has been obtained against him, he will for ever lose his franchise equally as if the offence had been bribery, and—like a weasel nailed against a barn—will be exhibited in a special list on the church doors and other public places, for the warning of others. Such being the consequence of treating in reference to the seat and the electoral franchise, it is very important rightly to apprehend its nature. But, as to this, little additional aid is afforded by the new statute. The "corrupt" motive of the treater is still, as under the previous provision of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 102, s. 22, essential to the commission of this offence. But greater facilities for ascertaining the intention and rebutting the presumption of its being corrupt, which arises from acts of the candidate's agents, seem now to be afforded by recent legislation, viz. by the Evidence Amendment Act (14 & 15 Vict. c. 99), which gives the committee power for the first time to examine, if they see fit to do so, the candidate himself on oath. Hitherto such acts have been held conclusive, as for example when Mr. DEERING was unseated for Aylesbury, in 1851, on its being shown that his agents were present at some entertainments given to voters after they had polled, though the practice of such entertainments had been always customary on both sides at elections for that borough.

To pass on to another ground for controverting an election—the "disqualification" of the member returned. This may happen, in the first place, from his not possessing the requisite amount of property required for this purpose, as fixed by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 48—a declaration as to which he must make within twenty-four hours after being required so to do by any other candidate, or by any two registered voters having a right to vote, and which he is moreover bound to deliver at the table of the House before he either sits or votes; or he may be disqualified by filling some office, or being engaged in some occupation inconsistent by law with a seat in Parliament; or from infancy; or by his having been unseated for the same place, in the same Parliament, in consequence of the express or unexpressed resolution of a committee that he had been guilty of bribery, treating, or undue influence.

As to the offence of "undue influence," which has been established, or, at least, defined by the Corrupt Practices Act, and made not only liable to pecuniary penalties and permanent loss of the elective franchise, but punishable by fine or imprisonment as a misdemeanor, it seems to include four principal species: 1. The use or threat of open force or violence by riot or otherwise. 2. The infliction or threat of any injury, damage, harm, or loss, in respect of votes. 3. Any practice of intimidation not coming under the former heads. 4. Impeding by abduction, duress, or any fraudulent conduct, the due exercise of a voter's franchise. Landlords and agents, priests and middlemen, bullies and schemers, ponder well the reports of the Sligo and of the Cockermouth committees in reference to some of these practices; for it was in consequence of these disclosures, and against you, that these provisions have been framed.

If there be no grounds for alleging bribery, treating, or undue influence, and the member returned be in all respects properly qualified, the other side is in evil case; but even here an arrow may possibly be discharged through the loop-hole of irregularity. We have already mentioned that in two controverted elections of late years the ground of the petition was the insufficiency of the notice of the place and time of holding the election. One of these was the case of the Rye election, in 1848, which was declared void because three clear days' notice from the day of proclamation, of the day on which the election was to be held, had not been given as required by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 81. The other was the Sligo election, in the same year, in which the ground relied on was that the notice had not been signed in the hand writing of the mayor—an objection, however, which was over-ruled by the committee.

And, now—to borrow the pleasant metaphor of the Governor of the British Bank to his absent and sporting Manager—we conclude by saying to all of our readers who may be nursing a petition,—"We wish you much success, whatever game you may be after."

Legal News.

On Saturday last, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council gave a judgment which will have excited greater interest in clerical than in legal circles, and which probably was known to several clergymen who on Sunday betrayed their ignorance of another important, and exactly contemporaneous event—the dissolution of Parliament. It may be proper to state shortly the points decided in the cases of Liddell and Horne v. Westerton, and Liddell v. Beal, in which four common-lawyers have partially reversed the judgments of two eminent civilians, and this with the full concurrence of the Archbishop of CANTERBURY and the Bishop of LONDON, from whose courts the appeals came, and, we presume, to the great satisfaction of that party in the Church which protested so energetically against the intervention of laymen in the GORHAM case.

The Judicial Committee, in the first place, decide that the wooden cross erected on the chancel screen of St. Barnabas, Pimlico, is to be considered as a mere architectural ornament, and the judgment ordering its removal is reversed. The greater portion of the judicial argument is directed to the investigation of this subject, and the Committee conclude that crosses, as distinguished from crucifixes, have been in use as ornaments of churches from the earliest periods of Christianity, and that, when used as mere emblems of the Christian faith, and not as objects of superstitious reverence, they may still lawfully be erected as architectural decorations of churches. The next question was whether the stone structure at St. Barnabas was a communion table within the meaning of the canons and the rubric, and the Committee held clearly that it was not. The decree ordering the chapelwardens of St. Barnabas to remove the present structure of stone, and to provide, instead thereof, a moveable table of wood, was therefore affirmed. Then, with respect to the wooden cross attached to the communion table at St. Paul's, Knightsbridge:—The Committee were of opinion, that the communion table intended by the canon was a table in the ordinary sense of the word, flat and moveable, capable of being covered with a cloth, at which, or around which, the communicants might be placed; and the question was, whether the existence of a cross attached to the table was consistent, either with the spirit or with the letter of these regulations, and the Committee were clearly of opinion that it was not. Upon this point, therefore, the decree complained of was affirmed. Next, as to the credence-tables. The Committee were not prepared to hold that the use of all articles not expressly mentioned in the rubric, although quite consistent with, and even subsidiary to, the service, is forbidden. Organs are not mentioned; yet, because they are auxiliary to the singing, they are allowed. Now, a credence-table is simply a small side-table on which the bread and wine are placed before the consecration. Their removal had been ordered, on the ground that they were adjuncts to an altar; but the Committee thought they might be more properly regarded as adjuncts to a communion-table. As to the credence-tables, therefore, the sentence appealed against was reversed. Then, as to the embroidered cloths, it had been argued that the canon did not mention—and therefore, by implication, excluded—more than one covering; but the Committee were unable to adopt this construction. An order that a table should always be covered, surely did not imply that it should be always covered with the same cloth, or with a cloth of the same colour or texture. The sentence as to the cloths used for covering the table was therefore reversed. The last question was with respect to the embroidered linen and lace used on the communion-table at the time of the ministration of the communion. The rubric and the canon prescribe the use of a fair white linen cloth, and both the judges in the courts below had held that embroidery and lace were not consistent with that expression. The Committee, although not disposed to abridge the discretion allowed to congregations, did not, on the whole, dissent from the construction adopted by the decree, which, upon this point, was consequently affirmed.

The whole result is, that on three points—

As to the wooden cross on the chancel screen,
As to the credence tables,
And as to the embroidered cloths,

the judgment of the court below is reversed.

And on three other points—

As to the stone altar, and the cross upon it, at St. Barnabas,
As to the wooden cross attached to the communion-table at St. Paul's,
And as to the embroidered linen and lace used during the sacrament, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

In the proceedings below, as well as in the appeals, each party bears his own costs. The members of the Committee present were Lord WENSLEYDALE, Mr. PEMBERTON LEIGH, Sir JOHN PATTESON, and Sir W. H. MAULE. The LORD CHANCELLOR would have attended, but was prevented by public duties. The judgment, of which we have thus given the outlines, is a very clear and able and highly interesting piece of reasoning, and it will abundantly repay perusal, even by those lawyers who feel the smallest sympathy with the controversies decided by it.

The further and concluding examination of Mr. ESDAILE, the late Governor of the Royal British Bank, was remarkable, among other things, for the production of a report drawn up in a poetical and almost religious tone, which gives the last finishing touch to this wonderful picture of commercial morals:—"The contributions of innumerable small rills"—thus runs this magniloquent composition—"gradually swelling into a mighty head, might be diffused so as to irrigate and fructify the surrounding space, and be a blessing to the givers and receivers." Evidently, the Royal British Bank was a portion of the divine economy of nature—a beneficent dispensation for which mankind at large ought to have joined the directors in their gratitude. The Board appears to have been fertile in pious sentiments. Mr. WALTON, the deceased governor, wrote a letter to the manager, which alone would immortalise the British Bank. He states plainly that if discount is refused, his house must stop, as well as two directors, and several other persons connected with the bank, and that these failures would bring down the bank itself. Mr. WALTON is dead, and his representatives allege that the bank sustained no loss by him. However this may be, his letter equally deserves attention, as an example of the way in which bad became worse, in endeavours to support houses whose credit involved that of the bank itself. Mr. WALTON'S letter, too, has its touch of piety. He has been ill, but is recovering, and hopes, "by GOD'S blessing," to be in town next week. So Mr. ESDAILE, during his examination, thanked GOD that his hands were clean; a sentiment which, we regret to say, did not appear to call forth a corresponding religious emotion among his auditors. It has been said that the days of private banks are numbered, and it would seem that on every point they are threatened with a formidable competition. If a grave demeanour, and a biblical turn of expression, were useful to Sir JOHN DEAN PAUL, the same advantages were providently secured by the Directors of the Royal British Bank. To say that a joint-stock bank would be as beneficial to the community as a savings' bank is certainly a bold, and perhaps a dubious, proposition. But the scriptural studies of the Board enabled them to banish all doubt and cavil on this point by a remarkable and totally unexpected application of a well-known text:—The profits of the Royal British Bank are compared to the gains of the good and faithful servant, while the managers of savings' banks are likened to unprofitable servants who kept their lord's pound laid up in a napkin until he asked for it. Surely if the cup of bitterness of the depositors in this bank was not full before, this sacred quotation must move them beyond endurance. What would they not now give to have been the masters of such unprofitable servants, and to see their pounds forthcoming from some safe hoarding-place, neither increased nor diminished by the exuberant activity of the depositaries!

The Times of yesterday contained a report of a case (Davis v. Abraham) before V. C. WOOD, and a note is appended to the case calling attention to it as "another illustration of the speedy administration of justice in the Court of Chancery under the new practice." "The contract sought to be enforced," says the Times, "was made in January, the claim filed in February, and a decree made in a most hostile suit on the 26th March." Now, we have ourselves attempted recently to give some answer to the extravagant abuse lavished by the Times on the Court of Chancery, and to show that the delay imputed to it had ceased to be fairly chargeable. We complained that the Times persisted in referring to the traditions of Lord ELDON'S torpid period, rather than to the facts of the present more active age. But if the defence we thus offered wanted anything in force or in publicity, the Times itself has now supplied a most convincing refutation of its own argument. Henceforth, we shall not ask the writers in the leading journal to take the trouble to visit the courts they so liberally abuse, nor even to consult any authorised report or legal publication in order to learn the course of business. All we have to suggest is that these gentlemen will condescend to make themselves moderately well acquainted with the contents of the paper in which they undertake to write. And whenever the questions of reforming the Ecclesiastical Courts, and of settling the present conflict of jurisdiction between Chancery and Bankruptcy, shall be revived, we do hope that these questions will be discussed on their proper merits, and that the Times will not fly off into vehement vituperation of a Court of Chancery, which, whatever may be its other good or evil qualities, does certainly dispose of the business that comes before its judges with a promptitude so extraordinary, that some persons, including the Editor of the Times, require to hear the statement a hundred times repeated before their faculties can embrace it.

We ought not, however, to disguise the fact that the progress of business in certain offices of the Court is not altogether free from the imputation of unnecessary and harassing delay. It is most unfortunate that all questions of real difficulty in a suit should be disposed of promptly, and yet that it should be kept open pending the settlement of matters of account, and the arrangement of details, which require only method and assiduity for their speedy termination. On this subject, we republish below a letter which appeared in the Daily News of Tuesday. It is manifestly written by some one who knows little or nothing of the system he undertakes to criticise. On this account, perhaps, it may be treated by some readers with contempt or ridicule; but this, we think, would be a mistake. Evidently, there is at the bottom some real grievance; and the wisest course would be, to endeavour to discover what it is, showing the complainant where he is wrong, and, so far as he is right, attempting to suggest a remedy. We shall probably take an early opportunity of considering this subject at greater length.

The following is the letter referred to :—

"PRETENDED CHANCERY REFORMS.

"To the Editor of the Daily News.

"SIR,—A great deal has been recently said and written about the reforms of the Court of Chancery, but I trust to convince your readers, with as much conciseness as possible, that those reforms are in a great measure visionary and chimerical, and that, if they were called "deforms," it would be a more apt and appropriate expression; and in support of this assertion I shall, with your permission, adduce a few instances (among many) of the practical working of the system. It is usual when an order or decree is made or pronounced to refer the carriage or conduct of it to the chief clerk of the judge by whom it was made, with a view of ascertaining, by preliminary inquiries, particular facts and circumstances preparatory to the final hearing of the cause. Well, how do you suppose these inquiries are carried into execution? Why, in this manner: Instead of proceeding day by day until the matter or subject be exhausted, a month generally intervenes between one attendance or proceeding before the chief clerk and another, and then half the time is frittered away in endeavouring to remember or re-trace what had been done on the former attendance. For this purpose the chief clerk pulls down and refers to a ponderous portfolio alphabetically arranged, embracing the papers in the cause, and after he has turned over the leaves, and divested himself of a few hums and haws, he finds that he cannot glean anything from the aforesaid portfolio, whereupon he appeals to the solicitors concerned to brush up his memory; and their version of the affair is very often irreconcilable and contradictory, and thus the half-hour usually allotted for the disposal of such matters is frittered away without anything effectual being done towards terminating or winding up the suit. This chief clerk, moreover, requires to be furnished with a duplicate of every document and paper filed for his own use; and only picture to yourself, in such a case as that of the British Bank alone, what a formidable sum must have been squandered away for these superfluous documents, amounting in round numbers, as I understand, to £5,000, a sum which would materially assist in securing to the unfortunate creditors a second dividend. Another prolific source of delay, expense, and vexation is the one which requires the papers of the solicitors to be left before the taxation of their bill of costs, and for this purpose a bevy of solicitors may be seen wending their way in the morning, closely followed by two or three clerks, in the direction of Lincoln's-inn-square, heavily laden with the precious documents, and perspiring in every pore. This is done, it seems, in order that the length of the pleadings, the fees paid to counsel, and other particulars, may be ascertained by one of the junior clerks prior to taxation; but when you call upon this subordinate to know whether he has accomplished this task, he puts you off from time to time with various excuses, such as that the matter had escaped his recollection, or that he had been so pressed that he could not attend to it, or some other excuse equally frivolous. Why, sir, the old system, with its manifest imperfections, was decidedly preferable to the present one, incumbered and surrounded as it is with the Rules and Orders of 1828, 1845, 1849, and 1852, and which are not only absurd and contradictory, but at direct variance with each other. Instead of charging a reasonable per-centage on the amount of the bill as taxed, the present system is to pay a fixed sum, varying according to an ascending scale; and if it be but one shilling over those respective amounts, the suitor has to pay for this paltry sum as if it were one of magnitude, a proceeding which cannot be defended on the ground either of justice or expediency.—M. D., Lincoln's-inn-fields."

A CHIEF JUSTICE "BRAWLING" IN THE CHURCH.—The two learned judges now presiding in the courts at Warwick Assizes, attended St. Mary's Church of the ancient town on Sunday morning last. The Rev. Albert Boudier, the assistant minister, read the service, and in the course thereof commenced to read the prayer usually offered during the sitting of Parliament, doubtless unaware that Parliament had been dissolved the previous evening. Lord Campbell, who was cognisant of the fact of the dissolution, created some excitement by exclaiming, "No, no, there is no Parliament;" upon which the reverend gentleman desisted from putting up an useless supplication.—Daily News.

THE QUEEN v. GEORGE SMITH.—In this case, which was a charge against the defendant, who is a solicitor in London, of having committed wilful and corrupt perjury at the trial of a cause at Guildford last summer assizes, in which he was the plaintiff, Mr. Prentice, who appeared for the prosecution, applied to enlarge the recognizances of the witnesses to the next assizes. He said that a rule for a new trial had been obtained in the original matter, and the Chief Baron had expressed an opinion that it would be advisable that this trial should take place before any further proceedings upon the criminal charge were taken.—Mr. Baron Channell inquired if the defendant consented to the postponement.—Mr. Smith said he had no objection to the case going over.—The judge, in justice to the defendant, stated that it appeared he was in attendance and ready to meet the charge, and that the case was postponed at the request of the prosecution.

JOHN SADLEIR A RECEIVER IN CHANCERY.—In the case of Damer v. Portarlington, a petition was presented seeking to put in suit certain securities against the personal representatives of the late John Sadleir, and against Thomas J. Eyre, James Sadleir, Vincent Scully, Silvester Young, and Clement William Sadleir. John Sadleir had been appointed receiver in the cause. Upon that appointment the gentlemen above-named had become sureties for the due exercise of the duties of the office. A considerable sum was alleged to be due from the deceased in respect of moneys which had come to his hands as receiver. Vice-Chancellor Kindersley ordered £4,371 which had been found due, to be at once paid into court. That being done, and an undertaking being given by the parties to pay such sums as should be found due on taking the accounts, the enforcement of the securities would stand over.

THE ENCUMBERED ESTATES COURT.—A return to the House of Lords shows that the number of abstracts of title in the office of the late Chief Commissioner of the Encumbered Estates Court in Ireland not investigated at the time of his retirement amounted to 118, and the number of cases in which estates had been sold, but the proceeds not distributed at the same date, to 148.

COMPENSATION FOR RAILWAY INJURIES.—At the County Sheriff's Court at York, on Friday week, the case of Waterhouse v. The North Eastern Railway Company was heard. The declaration alleged that the plaintiff was a passenger on the defendants' railway, and that through their negligence he sustained various injuries, in respect of which he claimed £4,000. The defendants suffered judgment by default, and the only question was as to the amount of damages. The plaintiff was one of the passengers in an excursion train, which was run into at Church Fenton station at midnight on the 25th of July last. He was seated in one of the carriages which was smashed to pieces, and sustained very serious injuries—viz., scalp wounds, contused shoulder, lacerated leg, and broken ribs. The plaintiff is a young man, 28 years of age, is married and has one child, and it is doubtful whether he will ever be able to attend to business as he was before the accident. After a deliberation of two hours and a half the jury returned the damages at £2,200. A similar case, Braim v. North Eastern Railway Company was next heard, the plaintiff being the husband of one of the passengers who was killed by the accident. The defendants consented to a verdict for £1,000, one half to go to the widower, and the other half to be equally divided among the children. In a third case, Nicholson v. the North Eastern Railway Company, the defendants agreed to give £150 in conpensation for the injuries sustained.

ROYAL BRITISH BANK.—At the Court of Bankruptcy, on Thursday, Mr. Linklater complained of a circular which stated that "the Attorney-General in Parliament, a few days ago, had pointed out the utter incompetency of the Court of Bankruptcy to wind up the affairs of the bank, and concluded that the bill he would introduce would simply remove all doubts as to the jurisdiction of the two courts, transfer all proceedings to the Court of Chancery, and confirm to it the exclusive jurisdiction to deal with such matters."—Mr. Linklater continued: So far from the Attorney-General having expressed the opinion referred to, he had shown the incompetency of the Court of Chancery for such a task, and it was intended to frame a bill for the purpose of vesting in this court more power in a case like the present.—Mr. Lawrance said that a comprehensive and simple bill had been agreed upon and printed.

HOME CIRCUIT.

KINGSTON-ON-THAMES.—March 21.—Whiting v. Wasp.

Arbitration—Evidence insufficient to prove an award.

The declaration in this action stated that a dispute had arisen between the plaintiff and the defendant with regard to the obligation of putting up a fence between adjoining properties of which they were respectively owners; that they had agreed to refer the dispute to S., and to be bound by his award and determination; and that, although S. had made his award and determination that the defendant should put up the fence, the defendant had refused to do so.

The plaintiff and S. were called in support of the plaintiff's case, and proved that the agreement to refer the dispute to S. was made in a conversation between the plaintiff and defendant; that the plaintiff, after the conversation, wrote to S., naming a time for him to come to his house; but neither the plaintiff nor the defendant at any time told S. for what purpose he was called in, or that they had agreed to abide by his decision. S. kept the appointment, met the plaintiff and defendant, and went with them to see the land; and, after hearing the statements on both sides, and looking at the documents relating to the property, said that it was his opinion that the defendant ought to put up the fence. In giving his evidence, S. said he had never changed that opinion, and thought so still, but that, when he gave it at the interview above mentioned, he did not know that it was to be taken as binding the rights of the parties.

At the close of the plaintiff's case, Mr. Justice Cresswell said, it appeared to him that the plaintiff must be nonsuited—for there was no evidence of any award having been made, or that S. had taken upon himself the burden of arbitrating; nor was there any evidence that the parties had agreed to be bound by the opinion of S.

Hawkins, for the plaintiff, then applied to amend. Mr. Justice Cresswell said, he would willingly assist the plaintiff, and allow an amendment if it were possible, as he thought, after what had passed, the defendant ought to have put up the fence. Ultimately, an amendment was found impracticable, and the plaintiff was nonsuited.

Mr. Hawkins and Mr. C. Pollock were counsel for the plaintiff, and Mr. Serjeant Shee for the defendant.

Stamp on Agreement.

This was an action upon a builder's contract. It appeared that the defendant wrote the original agreement, and that the plaintiff had then made what purported to be a copy of it. The defendant, without reading this copy, signed it, and the plaintiff signed the agreement written by the defendant.

Notice to produce both documents at the trial had been mutually given. The plaintiff being called as a witness, stated that the contract was in writing; whereupon the defendant's counsel called for its production. The plaintiff then produced the copy which he had made; but as it was not stamped, its admissibility was objected to. The plaintiff then called for the production of the agreement written by the defendant, which, after some objection, was produced and read. It was then discovered that there was a variance between the two copies in an important particular, as the copy made by the plaintiff stipulated that he was to have the old materials. His counsel then attempted to put in the unstamped copy in possession of the plaintiff to prove the variance.

Mr. Charnock, for the defendant, objected, that, on account of the variance, the copy made by the plaintiff was a different agreement, and therefore inadmissible without a stamp.

Mr. Baron Channell, after consulting with Mr. Justice Cresswell, held that the objection must prevail, and that the plaintiff's copy was inadmissible.

Mr. Prentice was counsel for the plaintiff; Mr. Charnock and Mr. Salter for the defendant.

Master and Servant—Railway Clerk—Notice of Dismissal—Usage.

There is no usage amongst railway companies which entitles them to dismiss their clerks, engaged at a yearly salary, at a month's notice; and where a month's notice of dismissal only was given, the jury were of opinion that it was unreasonable, and that three months notice should have been given.

This was an action brought against the London and North Western Railway Company for wrongfully dismissing the plaintiff from his employment as clerk in their service. The defendants pleaded, that before dismissal they had given reasonable notice.

It was admitted by the plaintiff that a month's notice had been given, but it was contended that such notice was insufficient. It appeared from his evidence that he first entered the service of the defendants as clerk in 1847, at a yearly salary of £30 payable monthly, which was increased at the rate of £5 annually until it reached £75, and in 1855 the month's notice was given, and he was dismissed. The employment was under a written contract, which contained no provision with regard to notice in case of dismissal.

For the defence it was submitted that the same usage existed in railway companies which prevails amongst bankers, merchants, and others, and that they are entitled to dismiss their clerks at a month's notice; and that evidence of such notice would prove the pleas.

The first witness for the defendants was a clerk at Messrs. Glyn's, the bankers. It was objected for the plaintiff that the evidence of a banker's clerk was inadmissible to prove the usage in the case of railway clerks; but the objection was overruled. The witness proved that amongst bankers the custom is that a clerk engaged at a yearly salary, payable quarterly, may be dismissed at a month's notice.

The second witness, a superintendent of the Great Western Railway, proved that in that company the clerks engaged at a yearly salary, payable monthly, may be dismissed at a month's notice. On cross-examination, he said it was an understood thing, and on re-examination said it was the custom to dismiss at a month's notice when there is no written contract.

A third witness, a superintendent of the Great Northern Railway, gave similar evidence of the usage in that company; but both the last witnesses admitted that in the case of these railways a printed book of regulations is given to every clerk at the time of his engagement, and that one of the rules is that a month's notice only will be given. No evidence was given of any usage on the defendants' railway, nor was it proved that they used any book of regulations similar to that mentioned above.

Mr. Justice Cresswell said he should simply leave it to the jury to say whether the notice which had been given was reasonable.

The jury were of opinion that the notice given was insufficient, and that the plaintiff ought to have had three months notice. They at the same time recommended the defendants to use a book of regulations similar to that used on the Great Northern and Great Western Railways, in order that the clerks might be informed of the terms upon which they were employed, and found their verdict for the plaintiff. Damages, £12 10s.

Mr. Justice Cresswell, upon the application of the plaintiff's counsel, certified for the special jury.

Mr. Joyce was counsel for the plaintiff; Mr. Edwin James, Q. C., and Mr. Lush for the defendants.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

A late case of Horn v. Coleman (5 W. R. 409) is an instance of an exception to the general rule, that there can be no appeal for costs alone. The distinction relied on, however, rested on a very obvious ground—viz. that the question was not as to how costs of litigation should be borne, as between two contending parties, but whether certain costs were properly thrown upon the capital of a testator's estate as part of the general costs of its administration. The matters in dispute were merely whether the executors were entitled to two allowances claimed by them out of the income, and disputed by the tenant for life. In chambers, the executors were successful on both points; but on appeal to the Vice-Chancellor, the certificate was supported as to one sum, and reversed as to the other. It was the costs of this contest between the tenant for life and the executors which formed the subject of appeal. The Vice-Chancellor had treated them as administrative costs, and thrown them upon the corpus of the estate. Upon the appeal, the Lords Justices held that the question was a personal one between the tenant for life and the executors, and each party must bear their own costs personally. It may be supposed that if the same close scrutiny were made into the origin of the different items of costs thrown upon the estate in most administration suits, some portion of them ought, on the principle of Horn v. Coleman, to fall rather on particular parties, than on the general fund. But it must be observed, that in the case of Horn v. Coleman, the court, and especially L. J. Turner, carefully guarded against laying down any general rule, and even went so far as studiously to avoid giving further sanction to the supposed rule on the subject of costs. "It was not necessary," said L. J. Turner, "to give any opinion as to the general rule, that no appeal could be brought for costs, as, if such a rule existed, this was a clear and well-known exception. At the same time, he desired not to be understood as giving any opinion that in the general account of an estate, the accounts of the life estate can be separated from the general account." Taken subject to these qualifications, the decision in Horn v. Coleman must be considered as resting on the peculiar circumstances of the case, and not as a precedent for any alteration in the ordinary mode of dealing with costs in an administration suit.

The case of Attorney-General v. Dedham (5 W. R. 395) is important, as deciding in a large sense a question of jurisdiction between the Court of Chancery and a body of school governors, who had been appointed by Royal charter. The governors relied upon the rule which prohibits interference by the Court with Royal foundations; but the Master of the Rolls held, that, where the charity was originally a private foundation, as was the case with the Dedham school, the jurisdiction of the Court to direct a scheme was not impaired by the fact that a body of governors, with certain powers of succession, had been afterwards created by the Crown.

A recent case (Bartlett v. Bartlett, 5 W. R. 410) before V. C. Stuart, appears to introduce a novel interpretation of the order and disposition clause in the Bankruptcy Act. The facts were very simple. Josiah Bartlett, who was entitled to a reversionary interest in a fund in court in the cause, assigned his share to William Owen Tucker, who obtained a stop order thereon; and Tucker, on the 27th Oct., 1849, mortgaged his interest therein to a lady, who afterwards became the wife of Capt. Monypenny, but no stop order was obtained by the mortgagee.

Tucker was declared a bankrupt on the 26th Oct., 1854, and shortly afterwards the share became divisible; and the question before the court was, whether the neglect to obtain a stop order had the effect of leaving the mortgaged interest in the order and disposition of Tucker, the bankrupt. Two questions were suggested—whether the assignment to Tucker of an unascertained reversionary share of a fund in court, followed by a stop order, had the effect of placing the share in the order and disposition of Tucker, and if so, whether it continued in his order and disposition with consent of the true owner after the mortgage to Mrs. Monypenny, on which no stop order was obtained. On the first point, the Vice-Chancellor, though expressing some doubt as to the effect of an assignment of such an interest, nevertheless laid down the general principle that the effect of a stop order, considering what is necessary to obtain it, is to show that the principal sum is in the order and disposition of the person who obtains the stop order; and the case was ultimately decided upon the assumption that the assignment to Tucker, and the stop order obtained by him, had the effect of placing the fund in his order and disposition, the stop order being assumed to be analogous to notice to a trustee or debtor. Then came the essential question, whether Tucker, after having mortgaged the fund, continued to have the order and disposition with consent of the true owner by reason of no stop order having been obtained upon the mortgage. The Vice-Chancellor referred to Ex parte Richardson (Buck, 480); West v. Skip (1 Ves. sen. 239); and Walker v. Burnell (1 Doug, 317), as authorities for the well-established position that the order and disposition contemplated by the Act must be with the consent of the true owner in such a sense as that the true owner consents to an actual sale or disposition thereof by the reputed owner. His Honour then referred to the class of cases culminating in Voyle v. Hughes (2 W. R. 143), where it was held that an assignment by deed of a chose in action not assignable by law operated as an actual equitable assignment, and not merely as a covenant to assign. From this principle it followed that the mortgage by Tucker put him in the position of a man who had parted with his interest as completely as a man ever does who assigns any kind of property. And his Honour then drew the inference, which is the peculiarity of the case—viz., that "if the title be complete as between the assignor and the assignee, by an assignment, and the assignee is entitled to receive the fund, it is impossible to say that a bankrupt, who has so assigned his whole interest therein, retains the order and disposition of the fund, when, if he attempted to receive it, it would be under circumstances of gross fraud." It was argued that notice to the debtor, or its equivalent, in the case of a fund in court—viz. a stop order—was necessary to prevent the fund from remaining in the order and disposition of the assignor; but his Honour considered that notice in such cases was only material to determine the priority of successive innocent purchasers for value, and that the absence of it did not affect the relative rights of the particular assignee and the assignees in bankruptcy. It was accordingly held that the assignees in bankruptcy took, subject to Mrs. Monypenny's mortgage.

It is not very easy to reconcile the broad doctrine laid down in this case with the general current of authority on the order and disposition clauses. According to the Vice-Chancellor, it would seem that it is enough to take a chose in action out of the order and disposition of an assignor, if it have been so assigned as to make it a breach of trust on his part, as against his assignee, to appropriate the fund to himself; and the principle, if true, would apply equally to any goods and chattels. Now, it has been over and over again decided that an absolute sale of goods does not, without delivery, take them out of the order and disposition of the vendor, within the meaning of the bankrupt acts. Thus, in Lingard v. Messiter (1 B. & C. 313), it is laid down that where a person had once been the owner of goods, and had ceased to be the real owner, he would continue to be the reputed owner until it had been made notorious to the world that he had ceased to be the real owner. Again, in Knowles v. Horsfall (5 B. & A. 134), the vendor had sold some casks of brandy to a purchaser, who, for convenience, left them on the vendor's premises until he should have an opportunity of removing them. The vendor became bankrupt, and the goods were held to pass to the assignees, although the casks had been marked with the purchaser's initials, no notice having been given to the warehouse-keeper of the change of ownership. One might readily multiply cases of this kind which are not easy to reconcile with the decision of the Vice-Chancellor. The nearest cases, however, seem to be those where choses in action and policies of assurance have been held to remain in the reputed ownership of a bankrupt, and to pass to his assignees in the absence of notice to the trustee or the office. If, therefore, the decision should be ultimately supported, it would seem to overrule many of the previous cases.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

Principal and Surety—Equitable Plea of Time given to Principal—Country Bank Notes, How far Payment and Discharge of Surety.

Pooley v. Harradine, 5 W. R., Q. B., 405.—The Guardians of the Lichfield Union v. Greene, 3 Jur., N.S., 247.

Two interesting cases have just been decided on the law of principal and surety. In the first of these (Pooley v. Harradine), the defendant was sued on certain promissory notes, and he pleaded, by way of equitable defence, that he made the notes as surety for one H., to secure a debt due from H. to the plaintiff, and that afterwards the plaintiff gave time to H. without the consent or knowledge of the defendant, and that, if such time had not been given, payment from H. might have been obtained. This plea was demurred to on the ground that there was nothing to show that the notes had been made as surety without travelling out of them; but a judgment in favour of the defendant was given by the Court of Queen's Bench on the equitable doctrine, that, if a man be sued on an instrument by which he is primarily bound, he may set up as a defence, and prove by evidence aliunde (or by the instrument itself), that the relationship of principal and surety inter se existed between himself and another person, debtor of the person by whom he is sued, and that such person, being cognisant of such relationship, nevertheless gave time to his debtor without the consent of him who is sued on the instrument as principal.

The question in the other case above noticed (Lichfield Union v. Greene), was raised for the opinion of the Exchequer under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, in a case stated, without pleadings. One R. G. was treasurer of the Lichfield Union, and defendant was one of his sureties that he would, out of the money of the plaintiffs in his hands, pay "all orders for money which should be drawn upon him when the same should be presented for payment at his house or usual place of business. R. G. was a banker at Lichfield, and stopped payment at 3 p.m. on Dec. 31, 1855. On 28 Dec. the plaintiffs drew orders, which were presented at the bank, and were paid partly in cash and partly in notes of the bank. Similar orders were also presented at 11 a.m., on the day the bank stopped, which were also paid, partly in cash and partly in notes of the bank. The plaintiffs now claimed against the defendant the amount of those notes still in their hands, and they also claimed the amount of a draft on a London bank which the bank at Lichfield had given on the day it stopped, in exchange for an order from the plaintiffs in favour of some persons in London, which was dishonoured. When the above-mentioned orders were presented at the bank, R. G. had sufficient money of the plaintiffs to pay them. The court held, as to the Lichfield notes, that the union clerk, by whom the orders were presented, might, if he thought fit, have insisted on being paid in gold or in Bank of England notes, and that, having submitted to being paid as he was—not objecting at the time (see Miller v. Race, 1 Burr. 452)—his principals could not afterwards repudiate the payment, and particularly as they kept the notes in their possession during the 29th, and as there was no pre-existing debt as between the holders of the orders and the bank (see Camidge v. Allenby, 6 B. & C. 373). Hence the court held, that, as to these notes, the obligation of the defendant as surety had been discharged. Moreover, as to the draft, they came to the same conclusion, inasmuch as the plaintiffs' clerk having it in his power to demand cash, received, for his employers' convenience, a draft payable in London. And they held, that the only remedy of the plaintiffs was a proof on the notes and bill, against the estate, in bankruptcy.

It deserves remark, that, in the argument of this case, Bramwell, B., observed that, by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, the courts of common law can only decide a case on equitable, as distinct from legal, doctrines, where equitable matter is disclosed by plea or replication. Consequently, in a case like the present, stated under that Act, without pleadings, the court was bound to decide on legal considerations alone.

ATTORNEY—CONDUCT MONEY—ACTION TO RECOVER.

Martin v. Andrews, 26 L. J., Q. B., 89.

This was an action against an attorney at Dorchester, the attorney for one C., who had been sued by the present plaintiff. This last-mentioned action was intended to have been tried in London, and the present defendant had been subpœnaed to attend as a witness for the plaintiff, and £4 had been left with the subpœna as "conduct money." On being served, the defendant objected to the conduct money as being insufficient, on which the plaintiff's agent gave him £2 more. The defendant, before the trial came on, went up to London on some other business, and while there settled the action, the trial of which he had been subpœnaed to attend, but refused to return the conduct money. It was to enforce this repayment that the present action was brought. One of the Masters of the Queen's Bench being called as a witness at the trial, stated that the practice was, that if a witness did not attend in obedience to his subpœna, and the conduct money exceeded £1 1s., the party who subpœnaed was required to use his best endeavours to obtain repayment; for that otherwise if he succeeded, and had the costs of the cause, the conduct money would not be allowed in taxation. It was held by the Court of Queen's Bench (Lord Campbell, Coleridge, J., and Erle, J.) that where a witness receives conduct money, and has notice that he will not be required, and has done nothing under the subpœna which he would not have done if he had not been summoned, the money given him is recoverable in an action for money had and received; for being in the nature of a viaticum for the purpose of paying the expenses of the witness's journey to attend the trial, there is an entire failure of consideration if the journey be not undertaken nor any expenses incurred. The action to recover conduct money advanced, as it ultimately turned out, without occasion, does not rest on contract at all, for the party paying such is obliged by law to pay, if he wishes to secure the attendance of the witness.

ESTATE AGENT—QUANTUM MERUIT—SPECIAL CONTRACT.

Prickett v. Badger, 26 L. J., C. P., 88.

In this case a question of some importance to estate agents was decided. The defendant had verbally requested the plaintiffs to find a purchaser for a plot of ground; and it was agreed that they should be remunerated by a commission of £1 10s. per cent. on the amount of the purchase-money, if a sale should be effected. The plaintiffs expended both time and labour accordingly, and found a person who was willing to purchase, but the completion of the sale was prevented by the defendant. The declaration in the present action was not framed on the special contract as above stated; and the question now arose, whether, as the contract had not been carried out, the plaintiff was entitled to recover for the time and trouble he had expended on a quantum meruit on the common courts. It was held by the court, on the authority of Cutter v. Powell (2 Smith, L. C. 18), and of Planche v. Goulburn (8 Bing. 14)—distinguishing De Bernardy v. Harding (8 Exch. 822)—that he was entitled to do so, and might abandon the original contract. They also held that the implied contract to pay on a quantum meruit results from the rules of law, and does not depend on the decision of a jury.

ATTORNEY—LIEN FOR COSTS AS AGAINST JUDGMENT CREDITOR—GARNISHEE CLAUSES.

Hough v. Edwards, 26 L. J., Exch., 54.

A rule had been obtained to set aside a judge's order for payment to the attorney of the defendant in the above cause of a sum of money paid into court by a garnishee. The defendant had recovered judgment against one H.; and the plaintiff, having a judgment against the defendant, had attached the debt due from H., by whom it was paid into court. But the above-mentioned order had been obtained by the defendant's attorney, on the ground that he had a lien on the judgment recovered against H. in the action in which the defendant had been plaintiff. It was now agreed that the general lien of an attorney against his client was superior to the claim of a judgment creditor under an attachment order; for that "an attorney has a general lien against his client for his costs on all the papers with which he is intrusted by his client, and upon money, or upon a judgment recovered by him." But the court relied upon the doctrine laid down by Lord Wensleydale, in Barker v. St. Quintin (12 Mee. & W. 441), to the effect that an attorney's authority (and consequently his lien) does not extend so as to give him the right to marshal the proceedings on the judgment or the execution without the concurrence of the client. Hence, he has a lien on a judgment only in this sense, that he may retain the amount of his bill out of money paid to him on a judgment obtained by his client, if he can get it; but he has no lien on an unrealised judgment, or any other thing in the hand of third parties. The order for handing over to the attorney the money paid into court by the garnishee, was, therefore, set aside.

SERVICE OF NOTICES, &c., IN BANKRUPTCY ON SATURDAYS. CLOSING OF OFFICES.

GENERAL ORDER, made in pursuance of "The Bankruptcy Act, 1854," Tuesday, the 24th day of March, 1857.

"The Right Hon. Robert Monsey Lord Cranworth, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, by and with the advice and assistance of the Right Honourable the Lord Justice Sir James Lewis Knight Bruce, the Right Honourable the Lord Justice Sir George James Turner, Edward Holroyd, Esq., and Edward Goulburn, Serjeant-at-Law, two of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Court of Bankruptcy, doth hereby, in pursuance and execution of the powers of an Act of Parliament passed in the session of Parliament holden in the 17th and 18th years of the reign of her present Majesty, intituled "An Act for regulating appointments to Offices in the Court of Bankruptcy, and for amending the Laws relating to Bankrupts," order and direct that service of all writs, notices, summonses, orders, warrants, rules, documents, and other proceedings not requiring personal service upon the party to be affected thereby, shall be made before seven o'clock in the evening, except on Saturdays, when it shall be made before two o'clock in the afternoon; and if made after seven o'clock in the evening on any day except Saturdays, the service shall be deemed as made on the following day, and, if made after two o'clock in the afternoon on Saturday, the service shall be deemed as made on the following Monday: And doth further order and direct, that the offices of the Chief Registrar, Accountant and Master of the Court of Bankruptcy in London, and the offices of the Registrars of the District Courts of Bankruptcy, shall be closed on Satuadays at two o'clock in the afternoon.

"This order is to come into operation on the 15th day of April, 1857."

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Proceedings of the Council.—February.

The New Orders of January 30, 1857, relating to the Costs of Solicitors having been issued, it was referred to the Equity Committee to consider their effect, and several meetings of the Committee have accordingly been held.

A communication was received from the Hong Kong Law Society, with a recent ordinance relating to solicitors' costs, and providing (inter alia) that in the rules of taxation no distinction should be made as to costs between party and party, and attorney and client; and that special contracts might be entered into to allow any reasonable sum for business done, although higher in amount than the ordinary scale, such agreement to be signed by the client.

The Poor Law Board having requested the opinion of the council on a bill of costs and charges made by a clerk to the magistrates, not an attorney, the council investigated the matter, and pointed out the items which it appeared to them could be charged only by an attorney within the meaning of the statute.

During the last term the council have had under their consideration several complaints of malpractice by attorneys and solicitors, the circumstances of which they investigated. As to three of them, it did not appear proper to take any proceedings. In five cases, the complaints were brought before the Court, and three of the attorneys were struck off the rolls; two others are pending before the Master, and the remainder stand over for further investigation.

The applications for renewal of certificates on the day after Hilary Term were 44 in number. The affidavits in support thereof were considered; and in several instances, where the parties had ceased to practise for several years, an examination was suggested to the judge, prior to the renewal of their certificates, and ordered accordingly.

In another case, an attorney who had been suspended from practice for two years, at the instance of the Society, was allowed to renew his certificate on the production of satisfactory testimonials of subsequent good conduct.

A member of the bar, who had formerly practised as an attorney, applied to be re-admitted on the roll; and on his being disbarred, and his affidavit being considered satisfactory, no opposition was made to the application.

Several suggestions were made to the judge in other cases, requiring payment of arrears of duty, where the applicants had practised since the expiration of their last certificates.

Applications have also been considered for the renewal of certificates without the usual notice, upon the parties entering into partnership or other urgent occasions, and these cases have been strictly investigated, and testimonials required of the respectability of the applicants.

Encroachments of unqualified persons on the business usually transacted by attorneys have been brought to the notice of the council, but the evidence adduced has not enabled them to take any effective steps.

The council have had under consideration several questions of professional usage, the opinions on which are entered in the usage book kept in the secretary's office:—1. As to solicitors entitled to act professionally for intended mortgagees in trust matters. 2. Charges for searching for old deeds, and making schedules. 3. Charges for production and examination of title-deeds.

George Christopher Roberts, Hull.
Charles Dorman, Essex-street.
John Thomas Green, Woburn.
Edward Lawrance, jun., Old Jewry-chambers.
Daniel James Miller, Cannon-st. West.
Sydney Clulow Child, Cannon-st.
Arnold Wm. White, Gt. Marborough-street.
Robert James Doble, Bedford-row.
Charles Reginald Gibson, Dartford.
Samuel Theophilus Genn Downing, Redruth.
James Russell Miller, Eastcheap.
Joseph Eade, Pump-ct., Temple.
Frederick Carritt, Basinghall-street.

During the months of January and February, twenty-eight articled clerks of members were admitted as subscribers to the library.

The several bills introduced in the present session of Parliament relating to Judgments Execution; Probates of Administration; Divorce and Matrimonial Causes; the Property of Married Women; Imprisonment for Debt; and the Lord Mayor's Court, have been to some extent considered, but the dissolution of Parliament renders it unnecessary to bestow further time upon them until the bills are re-introduced.

The Law Amendment Society has adjourned in consequence of the dissolution of Parliament.

The Juridical Society met on Monday, and Mr. N. Lindley read his paper, as announced in our last number. We hope to publish an abridgment of it in our next.

Correspondence.

DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The circuits have at last terminated; and judges and bar have, with a few exceptions, returned to town for the Easter recess. The criminal business on most of the circuits has been more than ordinarily heavy; while the number of records has been so scanty as to give rise to many complaints. Meanwhile, the business transacted in the Courts at Dublin has been, of course, very limited. The Rolls Court has long risen; and the Masters have continued their sittings rather in obedience to the Chancery Regulation Act, which allows them to take but a brief vacation, than because the state of their business required them to sit.

COURT OF CHANCERY APPEAL.

The New Court of Chancery Appeal, created by the Act of last session, and consisting of the Lord Chancellor and Lord Justice, has heard and disposed of several appeals from the inferior Courts of Equity. Rather a singular fatality prevented several appeals from the Incumbered Estates Court from being also heard. By one of those obscure legislative provisions, which demonstrate the necessity of a Minister of Justice, or some other officer charged with the oversight of bills in Parliament, it appeared very doubtful whether three months', or only one month's time was allowed for appeals from orders made by the last-named court. Now, as all the appellants had calculated on the longer period, great consternation was caused by the Court of Appeal ruling that none of the appeals could be entertained, on account of the limit of one month having been exceeded.

Dunlevie v. Hort. In this case, the law, on a somewhat important point, was definitely laid down, following the English decisions on the same subject. The nature of the case will appear from the judgment of the Lord Chancellor—

His Lordship said that the question involved in this case was, whether the petitioner could maintain a suit for the administration of the personal estate of the respondent's father—primâ facie the petitioner,—as an ordinary judgment-creditor was entitled so to do. But it appeared that the debtor, after the judgment had been obtained, took the benefit of the Insolvent Act, and the petitioner was appointed his assignee. By becoming assignee, the petitioner had clearly elected to abide by the proceedings in Insolvency, and to come in as an ordinary creditor. The judgment-debtor afterwards died, and the only fund available on his death for the payment of his creditors, was a sum payable on a policy of insurance on his life. In this sum the petitioner had, as assignee, no interest; and the question to be decided was whether, as creditor, she had any better right in that capacity. His Lordship referred at great length to the decisions in England which were unreversed, and had been acted on for several years. The decision of the Master of the Rolls in favour of the petitioner's claim could not, therefore, be sustained, and the original order of Master Henn, disallowing the claim, must be upheld.

Both the Lord Chancellor, and the Lord Justice, in referring to the late Master Henn's original decision in this case, expressed their deep sense of the loss sustained by the profession and the public, through the sudden death of that able and accomplished lawyer.

IN RE TIPPERARY BANK, EX PARTE STIRLING, AND EX PARTE KENNEDY.

The appeals of these gentlemen from orders of the Master of the Rolls placing them on the list of contributories, have excited considerable interest; and were more particularly fraught with important results to the creditors of the Bank, inasmuch as Messrs. Stirling and Kennedy are almost the only late or present shareholders whose property was so large as to materially increase the prospect of a good dividend. Apart from this consideration, the points decided are of no great legal moment, as they turned mainly on the construction of a clause in the deed of settlement under which the bank was formed. In delivering judgment, the Lord Chancellor entered into the question, what constitutes a contributory within the meaning of the Winding-up Act?

The phrase of a "qualified contributor" (used in the arguments) was not to be found in the Winding-up Acts. The design of the Banking Act was purely with regard to creditors of the concern, and left the liability of the partners, inter se, to be regulated, in a great measure, by themselves. In the present case the company was instituted under a deed of settlement, one section of which—the 157th—was couched in the most extensive terms, and in the plainest language declared, that, after an absolute transfer of shares, the former holder should be discharged, and absolved from all liabilities and claims in respect of them, excepting on foot of calls which might have been theretofore made, or of dividends that might have been previously realised. No liability or claim of this kind existed in the present case; and the transfer therefore constituted a complete release between him and the existing members of the company, for all time, and for all purposes—the responsibilities and liabilities being handed down, and descending regularly, to the existing co-directors and co-partners in the concern. It was, therefore, plain that in no possible way could Mr. Stirling be called on to contribute to the present debts of the company, or, on the other hand, to meet any demands by shareholders who might have left the company previous to the time at which he quitted it; whilst, if any of the present creditors were to make a claim against him, he would have a right to absolute indemnity from the funds of the company. The question then was, in what light could Mr. Stirling be looked upon as a contributory, A person might be liable for an amount in respect of which he was not bound to contribute, being indemnified to the full extent by another; but, in order to be regarded as a contributory, one must be a person liable to be called on by another to join in payment of a debt, or having a right to call on another person to join for that purpose. In his view, however, no such right existed in the present case; and Mr. Stirling was, by the act of transferring, completely exonerated. Having entered at length into the authorities bearing on the point, his Lordship concluded by stating that the same observations applied to Mr. Kennedy's case; and he should, therefore, order both names to be removed from the list.

The Lord Justice (Blackburne) concurred in the judgment.

THE ELECTIONS.

The only subject of conversation in legal circles at present is the general election. It seems probable that the number of lawyers returned for Irish constituencies will be even larger in the next Parliament than it was in the last. Several lawyers of high reputation have issued addresses for the first time. Among these occur the names of F. M'Donough, Q.C., who will contest the little borough of Carrickfergus; and J. A. Lawson, Q.C., who seeks, with a fair prospect of success, to represent, undoubtedly, the first constituency in Ireland—the University of Dublin. The first of these gentlemen would contribute, to the Commons House, Nisi Prius talents of a high order; while the second would bring to bear, on every public question, a mind of vast information, and unsurpassed logical power. Several other names of less note appear on the list of candidates for parliamentary honours. Not a single solicitor has as yet issued an address. In Dublin, Mr. F. W. Brady, a son of the Lord Chancellor, will contest one of the metropolitan seats.

VACANCIES AND APPOINTMENTS.

It is now understood that it is not the intention of the Government to fill up the vacancy caused by the sudden and lamented death of Master Henn. Four Masters are, it is considered, sufficient to transact all the business likely to come into the Masters' offices.

The office of Clerk of the Crown for the county Louth, vacant by the death of Mr. W. Horan is not yet filled up. This is one of the few legal appointments open to solicitors, and there are numerous applicants for the office.

Review.

Daniell's Practice of the High Court of Chancery. Third Edition; adapted to the present Practice of the Court. By THOMAS EMERSON HEADLAM, M.P., one of Her Majesty's Counsel. In 2 vols. London: Stevens and Norton.

[SECOND NOTICE.]

The old edition of Daniell's Practice contained a very copious chapter on the rules concerning parties to a suit. A multitude of decisions may there be found collected, by which the practitioner could generally determine, without much difficulty, who were, and who were not, necessary parties to his suit. The old maxim of the court was, that every one interested in the subject-matter of the suit should be brought before it, so as to enable the court to do complete justice, and to bind the rights of all parties interested in the estate. This rule was productive of great inconvenience and expense in many proceedings, and the Chancery Procedure Act endeavoured to obviate the difficulty, by enacting, that, in a number of specified cases, it should not be competent to a defendant to take objections for want of parties, which, under the former practice, would have been open to him. But the statute did not, and could not, without a violation of natural justice, enable the court to bind the rights of absent parties, without giving them the opportunity of a hearing; and accordingly it was provided, that, in all the enumerated cases, except where absent parties were represented by trustees, the persons who would have been necessary parties should be served with notice of the decree; after which, they should be bound by the proceedings, liberty being reserved to such persons to apply to the court to add to the decree.

The whole effect of the 42nd section, with the exception of one clause relating to trustees, therefore, is to take away from a defendant, in certain cases, the power which he formerly had of defeating a suit by showing that some persons interested were not made parties; but the decree, when obtained, has no operation against such absent persons, until they have been served in the manner directed by the Act. The same persons whose presence was formerly necessary to enable the court to make a decree, must still be brought before the court, the only difference being that this may be effected by a proceeding after decree, instead of by making them parties in the first instance. This being so, it is obvious that the rules formerly applicable as to parties have still to be considered, for the purpose of determining who ought to be served with a decree made in the presence of some only of the interested parties, and no book of practice can be regarded as complete which omits to give the fullest information on this subject. Nearly all the learning upon it which was collected in the former edition has, however, been very injudiciously struck out from the present, and in the place of precise directions as to who must be original parties, and who ought to be served to give the decree its full effect, Mr. Headlam gives little more than a series of extracts from the statute, and the report on which it was founded, prefaced by such general statements as that "technicalities of all kinds are now banished from the subject;" and that, where proper parties are not before the court, "relief will, in some cases, be modified and granted to such an extent, and in such a form, as is consistent with justice in the somewhat defective state of the record." Observations of this kind would be very pertinent, if true, in a work designed to convey a loose impression of the nature of equity procedure to unprofessional readers; but they are wholly out of place in a book of practice intended for use, and a very worthless substitute for the exact information which has been omitted.

If we could regard the many comments of this description which fill the new portion of the work as mere surplus declamation, we should have no other objection to make than that the space which ought to be filled with practical directions is taken up with matter which serves no purpose, but to increase the bulk and cost of the work. But the fact is, not merely that page after page is loaded with loose general statements, quotations from the report of the commission, and discussions on the policy of the statutes, but that the really essential information as to the interpretation which the courts have put upon the statutes and orders is, on a multitude of points, omitted or slurred over. Confining ourselves for the present to the chapter on Parties, we observe that the omission of the useful chapter in the old edition, no part of which has become altogether obsolete, is not compensated for by any precise explanation of the working of the new principles that have been introduced by the recent statutes. An example or two will explain our meaning:—Rule 2 of the 42nd section of the Chancery Improvement Act provides that "any legatee interested in the proceeds of real estate directed to be sold may, without serving any other legatee or person interested in the proceeds of the estate, have a decree for the administration of the estate of a deceased person;" and the 3rd rule entitles a residuary devisee or heir to the like decree, without serving any co-residuary devisee or co-heir. Moreover, the 51st section enables the court to decide questions between some of the persons interested in any property in the absence of the other interested persons.

Now, let us suppose that a suit is to be commenced for the administration of the trusts of a will containing the very common provision, that, subject to certain life interests, the residuary, real, and personal estate is to be sold by the trustees, and divided among certain specified classes. Two questions would arise: who ought to be parties in the first instance?—and who must be brought before the court by subsequent notice, in order to obtain a sale under the direction of the court? The draftsman would turn to his "Headlam" for information. There he would find the clauses of the Act, and a long statement of the reasons which induced the Commissioners to recommend them. Besides this, he would find an allegation on the unsupported authority of Mr. Headlam, that the 2nd and 3rd rules of the 42nd section extend to personal estate alone. This is not merely an unsupported statement, but it is utterly wrong; and if Mr. Headlam had looked to rule 1 of the same section, he would have seen that where the Legislature meant to restrict its enactments to personalty, it used the term "personal estate," and not the general word "estate." With the exception of this incorrect statement, there is not a word in Mr. Headlam's book which pretends to assist the practitioner in such a case as we have supposed. Foiled in his search, he would perhaps set to work to look for authorities on his own account; and the first sources of information he would consult, would be the useful Appendices to Mr. Hare's Reports, and the large collection of Practice Cases in the Weekly Reporter. In both places, he would find a case of Doody v. Higgins (9 Hare App. 32, and 1 W. R. 30) decided, a few days after the Act came into operation, by V. C. Turner. There he would see that the rules in question had been applied to real estate, as might have been presumed; and he would also discover that the court will not proceed to make a decree for sale of an estate without requiring all the parties interested to be brought before it, either as parties or by serving notice of decree. The case is particularly important, as it was decided after consultation with the other judges, and it lays down the general rule, that, though the court might possibly in some cases proceed to a sale in the absence of interested parties, such a course would only be taken in extreme cases. Doody v. Higgins, however, is not thought worthy of mention in Mr. Headlam's book of Practice; and instead of the short statement of the practice as settled by that decision, we have nothing but an extract from the Commissioners' Report, and an incorrect interpretation of the statute on the authority of the learned editor. Densem v. Elworthy, in the same volume of Hare, App. 43, is another important case on section 42, which is not mentioned by Mr. Headlam. It decides, that when a plaintiff frames his bill not against the trustees alone, as he might do, but against the persons interested, according to the old practice, he must include all those persons, or, at least, the special trustees, who represent the interests of each class. We are quite willing to admit that even a laborious editor may occasionally overlook one or two of the cases on a particular point, though such neglect is not very pardonable in a book of practice; but our complaint against Mr. Headlam is, that, without stating, or, as it would seem, even looking for an authority on the subject, he confines his observations on the effect of an important clause to one general remark—and that one, contrary to the obvious meaning of the statute, and the express decision of the courts.

On the other rules contained in the same section, Mr. Headlam is equally uninstructive. The 8th rule relates to the service of notices of decree, and all that the editor has done is to copy the rule, and to add a note referring to Chalmers v. Laurie (10 Hare, App. 27), making no mention of a subsequent decision of equal importance—Strong v. Moore (1 W. R. 509)—deciding that the practice of serving notice of decree extends to proceedings commenced by an administration summons in chambers. But the rule of the section on Parties, which has most frequently come under the consideration of the court, is the 9th, which provides that trustees, in whom real or personal estate is vested, shall represent the persons beneficially interested under the trusts, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as executors and administrators represent those interested in personal estate.

This rule was an extension of the 30th Order of August, 1841, which gave the same power of representation to trustees competent to sell and give discharges. Both before and after that order there had been many decisions as to the necessity of making the cestuis que trust parties, of which the greater number related to foreclosure suits, where the equity of redemption was vested in trustees. We may mention among the cases which were prior to, or not within, the order—Calverly v. Phelp (6 Mad. 229) and Coles v. Forrest (10 Beav. 557); and among those decided upon the terms of the Order of 1841, Wilton v. Jones (2 Y. & Col. 244), in which Knight Bruce, V. C., suggested that the Order did not apply at all to a foreclosure suit. None of these cases are noticed by Mr. Headlam, although they are not without importance as illustrating the law, even under the new practice. But the leading cases are, of course, those which have been decided expressly upon the clause of the new Act. The principal of these are—Goldsmid v. Stonehewer (9 Hare, App. 39), Hannan v. Riley (9 Hare, App. 40), Tuder v. Morris (1 Sm. & G. 508), Young v. Ward (10 Hare, App. 59), Siffken v. Davis (1 Kay, App. 21), Sale v. Kitson (3 De G. M. & G. 119), Cropper v. Mellersh (3 W. R. 202), Wilkins v. Reeves (8 W. R. 805), Fowler v. Bayldon (9 Hare, App. 78), and Read v. Prest (8 W. R. 30). They decide the following points:—1. That the trustees of a settlement of mortgaged property, having no funds applicable to redemption, do not sufficiently represent the cestuis que trust in a foreclosure suit. 2. That a mere devisee in trust does not, in such a suit, sufficiently represent the parties interested. 3. That persons who are both trustees and executors under a will do sufficiently represent the beneficiaries in a foreclosure suit, they being in a position to redeem, if redemption is likely to be beneficial. 4. That the presence of cestuis que trust, when otherwise necessary, will sometimes be dispensed with, on evidence being given that they have notice of the proceedings, and do not object to the proposed decree. 5. That where the decree asked is sale, and not foreclosure, the cestuis que trust, though infants, may be dispensed with on evidence that the sale will be for their benefit. 6. That, where, by disclaimer of the trustees, the estate had vested in an infant heir, no decree could be made in the absence of the parties interested, either for foreclosure or sale. 7. That, subject to certain exceptions, the rule applies to all suits where the interests and powers of the beneficiaries are vested in the trustees. 8. That the trustees do not sufficiently represent the cestuis que trust in a suit to set aside a settlement, and charging the trustees with fraud.

The way in which Mr. Headlam deals with these important decisions is to state in his text the bare words of the statute, and, without a word of explanation as to the actual condition of the law, to add the following note:—"Stansfield v. Hobson (16 Beav. 189), Sale v. Kitson (3 D. G. M. & G. 119), and cases there referred to; see also Young v. Ward (10 Hare, App. 58)."

Stansfield v. Hobson is a case of a very special kind, which throws little light on the construction of the statute. The other two cases are authorities for the 3rd and 6th of the above propositions. By pursuing the reference within reference, suggested by Mr. Headlam's note, the diligent reader would at length succeed in picking out the cases which decide the first of the propositions we have stated. To sum up our observations on this particular clause, we have eight distinct subsidiary rules established by judicial decisions, all of which ought to have been briefly stated in the text of a book of practice. In lieu of this, Mr. Headlam gives us a bald reference to the cases which decide two of the rules, an indirect reference to the judgment on one other, and nothing at all to guide the reader to the decisions on the remaining five. This does not seem to us the way in which a work on practice should be manufactured.

Another clause of the statute, which is treated much in the same off-hand way, is the 44th, which enables the court to proceed in the absence of representation of the estate of a deceased person, or to appoint some person to represent the estate for the purpose of the suit. Upon this Mr. Headlam gives his reader the information, that the power is discretionary (which is obvious enough); that the court will act upon the clause when there is a difficulty in obtaining representation, and when the interest of the deceased defendant is not of very great consequence in the cause (which is sufficiently vague); but that it will not do so when the object is to administer the estate sought to be represented, nor when the person who would be appointed would have the duties of a trustee to perform. He adds, too, that the power extends to claims, special cases, or to any summary proceedings; and that the person who would be administrator ad litem, is the proper person to appoint, and that is all. Mr. Headlam cites some of the authorities for these positions, but he tells us nothing of Chaffers v. Headlam (9 Hare, App. 46), which decided that the application ought to be made on notice, and where the clause was applied to the estate of an insolvent, who had executed a composition deed for the administration of the trusts of which the suit was instituted. Neither does he mention Band v. Randle (2 W. R. 331), where it was laid down that the clause was not meant to authorise an actual decree against the estate represented, but where it was also held that representation to one of two accounting executors might be dispensed with, the deceased executor having died insolvent. Ashmall v. Wood (4 W. R. 60 and 110) affords another instance of Mr. Headlam's negligence; and it is the more serious, because, if he had noticed this case, he would have seen that it purports to qualify the general rule, that the clause does not apply to the estate of a party against whom a decree is sought. By way of being impartial, however, Mr. Headlam also leaves out the case of Bruiton v. Hughes (21 L. T. 123), which lays down that principle, and the important case of James v. Aston (4 W. R. 401), where V. C. Kindersley, though guarding himself against laying down the general rule without exception, declared (in opposition, apparently, to the doctrine of V. C. Stuart in Ashmall v. Wood), that, until such a case should be decided by higher authority, he (V. C. Kindersley) would not make a decree against the estate of any party without a legal personal representative before the court. Mr. Headlam's method of guiding his readers to a correct conclusion on a point in which different branches of the court are scarcely in harmony, seems to be to state no definite opinion of his own, and carefully to suppress the cases which it might be difficult to reconcile. We might go on to refer to other cases, as Gibson v. Wills (4 W. R. 499), Ex p. Cramer (9 Hare, App. 47), and Rawlins v. M'Mahon (1 Dr. 225), but we are weary of pointing out the omissions of this careful editor; and we think we have done enough to justify the conclusion that the new edition of "Daniell's Practice" is one of the most dangerous books which a solicitor could place upon his shelves.

Private Bills

WHICH WILL BE CONTINUED IN THE NEXT PARLIAMENT.

Those against which a line is drawn have been abandoned or rejected in the last Parliament.

Those Bills against which a single star (*) is placed, may be petitioned against after the second reading in the next Parliament; and those against which two stars () are placed, have all passed Committee, and been reported, and some of them have advanced several stages.

STANDING ORDERS FOR THE SUSPENSION OF PRIVATE BILLS.

THURSDAY, MARCH 12, 1857.

Ordered, That the promoters of every private bill which has been brought into this House in the present session of Parliament, shall have leave to suspend any further proceeding thereupon, and to proceed with the same bill in the next session of Parliament.

Ordered, That the promoters of every such bill shall give notice in the private bill office, not later than the day prior to the close of the present session, of their intention to suspend any further proceedings thereon; or, in the case of bills then pending in the House of Lords, of their intention to proceed with the same bill in this House in the next session.

Ordered, That an alphabetical list of all such bills, with a statement of the stage at which the same were suspended, distinguishing those bills in respect of which subscription contracts have been deposited, shall be prepared by the private bill office, and printed.

Ordered, That not later than three clear days after the next meeting of Parliament, the bill (in the form required by Standing Order, No 168) shall be deposited in the private bill office, with a declaration signed by the agent annexed thereto, stating that the bill is the same, in every respect, as the bill with respect to which proceedings have been so suspended, at the last stage of its proceeding in the House, in the present session.

Ordered, That the bills indorsed by one of the clerks in the private bill office, as having been duly deposited, with the agent's declarations annexed, be laid by one of the clerks of that office upon the table of the House, in the next session of Parliament, in the order in which they shall stand upon such list, but not exceeding fifty bills on any one day.

Ordered, That in respect of every bill so laid upon the table, the petition for the same bill, and the order of leave to bring in the same in the present session, shall be read, and thereupon such bill shall be read a first time; and a second time (if the bill shall have been read a second time previously to its being suspended); and (except in the case of bills in respect of which a subscription contract has been deposited) if such bill shall have been reported by any committee in the present session, the order for referring such bill to a committee shall be dispensed with, and the bill ordered to lie upon the table, or to be read a third time, as the case may be.

Ordered, That in the case of bills, in respect of which a subscription contract has been entered into prior to the present session, provided it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the committee to which the bill is referred, that the deposits in respect thereof (see Standing Orders 63 and 64) have not been withdrawn, it be an instruction to the committee to insert a clause enacting that such contract shall be as valid as if the bill had passed in the present session of Parliament; and if any such bill shall have been reported by any committee in the present session, the same shall be referred to a committee solely for such purpose.

Ordered, That all petitions presented in the present session against private bills, and which stood referred to the committees on such bills, shall stand referred to the committees on the same bills, in the next session of Parliament.

Ordered, That no petitioners shall be heard before the committee on such bill, unless their petition shall have been presented within the time limited in the present session.

Ordered, That in case the time limited for presenting petitions against any such bill shall not have expired at the close of the present session, petitioners may be heard before the committee on such bill, provided their petition be presented previous to, or not later than, seven clear days after the second reading thereof in the next session.

Ordered, That all instructions to committees on private bills in the present session, which shall be suspended previously to their being reported by any committee, be instructions to the committee on the same bills in the next session.

Ordered, That the said orders be Standing Orders of this House.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The English Funds continue without animation, and with very little variation in prices. The lowest quotation of Consols during the week has been 93⅛, and the highest 93⅜ per cent. In foreign securities business has been limited and flat, with little fluctuation. Early in the week there was an active demand for money at current rates. Afterwards the market became more easy. To day the demand has revived, and been again active.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 21st March, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £18,584,440, being an increase of £67,075, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £10,322,297, showing an increase of £24,632, when compared with the previous return.

Notwithstanding the arrivals of gold from Australia since the commencement of the present year have been very large, it is seen that the bullion held by the Bank of England has sustained little variation. At the beginning of the year it amounted to about £10,000,000, and up to the period of the last return it has continued at nearly the same amount. As the Bank of England holds the chief public store of the precious metals in this country, and the amount of its store continues steady, it seems evident that the large supplies received from Australia have not exceeded the requirements of our circulating medium and the demands of trade. It is very remarkable and rather surprising, that the millions received during the present year, and the many more millions received since gold fields were discovered in Australia, have not produced a redundant supply. The returns of the Board of Trade shew that our trade exports last year were £20,000,000 in excess of the previous year. This indicates a progressive increase in commerce, keeping in circulation a proportionately larger amount of gold and silver. The price of grain continues to decline. Grain is the article most generally in demand among civilised nations. If the supply of gold and silver were redundant, the price of corn and breadstuffs would advance. But the price of grain continues to decline, not only in the markets of this country, but generally on the continent. The demand in Spain and France which, during last winter, came into competition with the large demand of England, has come to an end, and the present demand is not equal to the supply.

During this week, further investigation has been made into the affairs of the London and Eastern Banking Corporation. The paid-up capital being £250,000, it appears that £237,000 has been lent upon mortgage on estates belonging to Colonel Waugh, one of the directors; other large advances have been made to the directors, and to the manager. At a meeting of the shareholders, the chairman of the company admitted he was indebted £12,000 to the establishment. A director was understood to have borrowed £5,350 on the security of his own shares; another director £5,500 on the security of property worth £3,000; and the manager £27,000 on various securities. A shareholder inquired upon what pretext £237,000 could have been sunk on mortgages, when the legitimate business for which the concern was established offered safe and large profits. It was replied that 10 per Cent. was paid upon the mortgages, which caused a strong feeling that the offer of such a rate of interest in this country, ought to have been a warning that the securities were of a questionable character. The direct liabilities of the bank were stated by the accountant to be £397,784, and it was intimated, that after allowing for losses, the assets may yield £413,450, which will leave about £16,000 to meet the shareholders' paid-up capital of £250,000.

London Gazettes.

TUESDAY, March 24, 1857.

Her Majesty has been pleased to make the following appointments:—The Most Noble Charles Cecil John, Duke of Rutland, to be Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the county of Leicester;

The Right Hon. William, Earl of Burlington, to be Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the county of Lancaster; and William Thomas Spencer, Esq. (commonly called Viscount Milton), to be Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the West Riding of the county of York.

WHITEHALL, March 23, 1857.

The Queen has granted the dignity of a Viscount of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland unto the Right Hon. Charles Shaw Lefevre, late Speaker of the House of Commons, and the heirs male of his body lawfully begotten, by the name, style, and title of Viscount Eversley, of Heckfield, in the county of Southampton.

FRIDAY, March 27, 1857.

Her Majesty, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, is pleased to order that, within one month after this order shall have been published in the London Gazette, all the provisions of the "Common Law Procedure Act, 1854" (except such as are contained in secs. 2, 17, 75, 76, 77, 95, 97, 98), and the whole of the 99th sec. (except so much thereof as explains the meaning of the word "action"), and also except such as are contained in secs. 100, 101, 102, 104, 105, and 107, and the rules made and to be made in pursuance of the said act, except such rules, if any, as apply exclusively to the said excepted sections, shall extend and apply to the Court of Record of the city of Norwich, called the Guildhall Court. And her Majesty is further pleased to order, that all the powers or duties incident to the provisions of the said act hereby applied to the said Court of Record shall be exercised, in respect to matters in the said court, by the judge thereof. And a similar order is made with regard to the application to the said court and the judge thereof, of the "Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 1855."

DIRECTORS AND SHAREHOLDERS.

A man who should discover a method of securing the honest working of joint-stock companies would be the greatest benefactor to the world. Every day shows more and more the impossibility of dispensing with an engine so powerful as that of association, and at the same time produces proof upon proof of the complete failure of every check by which the shareholders have hitherto attempted to guard against fraud. Auditing has turned out nothing but a farce. Annual reports serve only to blind subscribers, who are already caught, and to entrap fresh victims into the net. Vigilance on the part of ordinary members of a company, except by the spasmodic action of irregular committees of investigation, is really out of the question. The very strength of the associative principle consists in the facility of joining in a commercial enterprise which it affords to thousands who have neither the inclination nor the time to take an active part in its management. To say, as some have said, that no one ought to take shares in a company who is not prepared from year to year to investigate its most secret affairs, and drag to the light every transaction which its directors are most interested in concealing, is simply to pass sentence of death upon the joint-stock system once for all. And yet nothing short of this seems sufficient to guard against fraud. Government returns, certified statements, and the like, answer very well the purposes of rogues, by giving a genuine appearance to the most hollow bubble, but as a protection to the honest shareholder, they are worth no more than waste paper. Nothing could be more stringent than some of the statutory requirements which joint-stock banks are required to fulfil. No doubt it was thought a great safeguard to insist on half the capital being paid up before a charter could be granted; but what is the security worth? Mr. ESDAILE and Mr. APSLEY PELLATT have furnished the answer, in their instructive history of the Royal British Bank.

In spite of statutes and regulations, that clever concern managed to start with a working capital of about one-fifth instead of one-half of the amount nominally subscribed. The Act, as Mr. ESDAILE says, was complied with in spirit, because, if the money was not paid up in coin, it was represented by securities, which bore the responsible name of Mr. HUGH INNES CAMERON, the prime mover in the swindle. Mr. APSLEY PELLATT has a rather less elastic conscience, but he makes up for his weakness in this respect by a surprising power of oblivion. He does not go so far as to deny that in putting his name to the statement that £50,000 was in hand, he did in fact certify a lie, but at the time he quite forgot that a large proportion of the pretended capital was composed of worthless notes; and Mr. M'GREGOR told him that the Act was complied with, and what could he do but put his hand to the false certificate? As Mr. PELLATT innocently observed, "It appears now that Mr. M'GREGOR must have been wrong in stating that the Act had been complied with, and that he (Mr. PELLATT) must have affixed his signature under a wrong impression. He signed the document without reading it." If it were worth while now to discuss the relative merits of these worthy Directors, the question would be a curious one for casuists, whether it was more honorable to obey the Act "in spirit," after the manner of Mr. ESDAILE, orto sign a declaration of fact without reading its contents, or taking the trouble to remember the truth or falsehood of the statements thereby conveyed. The only moral we wish to draw from the transaction is, that certificates and declarations by Directors are not very efficient safeguards of the interests of a proprietary body, or of the public at large. What, then, are shareholders to do, if they cannot protect themselves by vigilance, or be kept harmless by the shield which Government in its wisdom may have stretched over them? Are they to trust to the known character or respectability of the gentlemen who volunteer to manage their investments for them? We do not think that all boards are quite as bad as the Directors of the Royal British Bank, but there is still a lesson to be learned from it which admits of a rather extensive application. Directors of the APSLEY PELLATT stamp are not very uncommon, though he may be rather an exaggerated specimen of the school. Whenever a board does go very wrong, you are sure to find, upon an analysis of its composition, that it is made up of two classes of men—those who help themselves, and those who shut their eyes, perhaps wilfully, perhaps carelessly, while their colleagues are pursuing their gainful trade. There are always two or three immaculate directors who, in pure simplicity of heart, have signed everything which was put before them, and, after governing a company for a year or two, have been utterly ignorant of all its affairs—at any rate, of all which they would be ashamed to own. Perhaps it is only in very extreme cases that this kind of innocent blindness is carried so far as to leave the misguided director in ignorance of the secretary who takes down the minutes of the Board, and in doubt as to the nature of his own liability as a member of the company which he represents. But great allowance must be made for a gentleman who has sat in the parlour of the Royal British Bank, as it must be obvious that a very extraordinary amount of ignorance was essential in such a case to enable a director to retire, as Mr. APSLEY PELLATT did, after a year of office, without anything affecting his character, his integrity, or his honesty. The unfortunate conclusion seems to be, that, although a board may contain the names of men who have borne honest, upright characters, there is no security for the unhappy shareholders. Let us grant to Mr. PELLATT, for argument's sake, the character which he claims, and it does but make the matter worse. If he was not the plunderer, his very virtues were the means of decoying the public into the snare. Why, it is the respectable men who do all the mischief! Mr. CAMERON might have worked to little purpose if he had not been backed by associates who pledged their previous character as a guarantee for his nefarious schemes, and it is only too certain that the appearance of a name of supposed respectability upon a Board of Directors affords no certain protection against the most barefaced plunder by one or other of the colleagues of him who bears it.

The more one sees of the internal working of associated bodies the more obvious it is that everything depends on the integrity of the actual manager. An investment in shares is, in substance, a deposit on the personal security of some unknown official. Sometimes it is the secretary, now and then it is the chairman, who rules, or perhaps it may be a clique of two or three of a numerous board who have all the threads in their own grasp. Mere subscribers for shares cannot even tell who the man really is in whom their confidence is practically reposed, much less can they judge how far their trust is warranted. And yet men must and will go on investing in joint-stock companies, to reap profit or ruin according as they chance to fall into honest or knavish hands. There is no way of evading the risk entirely. A moderately crafty manager would defeat the cleverest devices for keeping him honest against his will. The only present mode of diminishing the risk seems to be, to concentrate authority in few hands, so that it may be known in whom the trust is really placed. And the only prospective aid which the Legislature can give, will be to apply the terrors of the criminal law to check a form of dishonesty which is becoming the fashion of our times.

GRAND JURIES.

We have received a pamphlet by Mr. Humphreys, upon the subject of the "Inutility of Grand Juries," which states very distinctly the objections to the institution, and proposes alterations in it which are curiously cautious and moderate. The object for which grand juries were originally instituted was that of protecting accused persons from being put on their trials on insufficient evidence; and every one who has the most superficial acquaintance with English history, must remember the good service which they did in this respect, during the stormy part of the reign of Charles II. It needs no proof that they do not now answer any such purpose. It is altogether inconceivable that any government should, in the present day, institute criminal proceedings from improper motives, or that, if they felt the temptation to do so, they should be in a condition to yield to it. It would, therefore, seem that no real risk to the liberty of the subject could be incurred by dispensing with a precaution so cumbrous and obsolete. At any rate, the simple plan of retaining the present system in the case of persons charged with political offences would amply answer any substantial end which it is ever likely to subserve. Something more, however, is usually required than proof that an institution is unsymmetrical, or even useless, before English people can be persuaded to wish for its abolition. It must further be shown that it involves serious practical inconveniences, and it is principally to this part of his subject that Mr. Humphreys addresses himself.

The grand jury is capable of being made, and, in fact, frequently is made, an engine of extortion. Its sittings being secret and ex parte, nothing is more easy than for a designing man to send up a bill before the grand jury, charging a person with some offence of an infamous character, and then, by working on his fears of exposure—fears which are often as alarming to the innocent as to the guilty—to extort money, as the price of getting the bill ignored. It would be, from the nature of the case, almost impossible that such a transaction should take place before a court in which the proceedings were public, and where the accuser and accused were confronted. The evil of this state of things is so obvious that it forced itself on the attention of those who framed the Central Criminal Court Act, and the course which they took to avoid it is a conspicuous illustration of the way in which English law reformers delight to employ their energy in stopping the holes of a sieve one by one. The 13th section of the Act by which the court was constituted provides, that no indictment shall be found there for any misdemeanor, except perjury, unless the prosecutor is under recognisances, or the person prosecuted in custody or on bail; but Mr. Humphreys points out the fact, that a recognisance to prosecute may be, and often is, entered into secretly and voluntarily, and that the Act does not extend its advantages, whatever they may be, to a quarter sessions—not even to those which are within the venue of the Central Criminal Court.

To the inconveniences which arise from the fact that the functions of the grand juries open a door to fraud and extortion, we must add the further objection that they sometimes defeat the purposes of justice. Mr. Humphreys tells us that on an average twenty or thirty bills are ignored at every sessions of the Central Criminal Court, all the persons indicted in these bills having been committed for trial by some one of the metropolitan magistrates. As the principle of committal for trial is, that a man is never committed whom the committing magistrate considers innocent, it would seem to be almost certain that many of the bills ignored must refer to guilty persons. It is, however, no matter of surprise that this should be the case, for the members of the grand jury are persons of no special legal knowledge, and it requires very considerable tact and experience to elicit even from a stupid witness the whole of the evidence in his possession. If the witness, of whatever intelligence, be corrupt, he may, in many cases, have the power of quashing the charge almost entirely in his own hands.

The expense and inconvenience of the institution of grand juries is by no means a matter of light importance. Every one whose professional duty often takes him there knows that, even with the help of decently commodious seats and mental occupation, it is no slight physical effort to pass several consecutive days in the crowd and bad air of a court of justice; but it must be a real and serious evil to pass a similar period in a state of utter mental vacancy, in dirty, cold, and crowded lobbies, hustled about by clerks, policemen, the friends and associates of criminals, and all the idle riff-raff that invariably besets criminal courts. It is bad enough for a man to pass hours or days in such a scene, but we can imagine no arrangement more likely to hold out the very gravest temptations to young women and children. What person of any feeling would not shrink from sending a foolish, inexperienced maid-servant to stand about for a couple of days amongst all the blackguard hangers-on of the Old Bailey? To do so, would be equivalent, in many cases, to risking her ruin, soul and body.

To a certain extent, these evils are unavoidable, and they might, no doubt, be mitigated by the establishment of proper waiting-rooms, and other conveniences; but they are enormously aggravated by the grand jury. If, as soon as the calendar was complete, it was known who would be tried, and who would not, nothing could be easier than to make lists from day to day of the cases to be taken, due regard being had to their importance, and to the convenience of the persons professionally engaged. This arrangement is impossible so long as the court is entirely dependent on the grand jury, and cannot go on with any case until a bill has been found. We know of hardly any minor reform which would be of so much practical advantage in the administration of the criminal law, as one which would make the courts masters of their own arrangements. Let any one try to imagine the confusion which would be produced by a Nisi Prius grand jury, which must be satisfied that the plaintiff had a primâ facie case, before any action could be tried, and he will have a clear notion of the amount of inconvenience to which we submit from mere habit in the transaction of criminal business.

Mr. Humphreys confines his suggestions to the Central Criminal Court, and no doubt the inconveniences to which he refers are felt more pressingly there than elsewhere. Witnesses must, under any system, be detained a considerable time at an assize town; and where the population is less dense, and the notoriety of any kind of legal proceedings much greater than in London, the power of sending a bill before the grand jury is less likely to be made an engine of extortion. There can be no doubt, also, that the social advantages of the institution are in the counties very considerable, and, under these circumstances, it may be a question whether the grand jury might not be advantageously continued in the country. There can, we think, be no question at all that it is obsolete and inconvenient in London.

Legal News.

We take the earliest opportunity, and devote a conspicuous place in our paper, to inform our readers that Mr. Joshua Williams, so well known to young legal students as the writer of two most useful hand-books, has published a series of "Letters to John Bull, Esq.," in which he has endeavoured to explain to the comprehension of that much-taught, but slowly-learning personage, the necessity which exists, in the nature of things, for lawyers, and the consequent expediency of paying well, and treating with confidence, the members of a profession which cannot be abolished. We do hope that the services of Mr. Williams, as an expounder of legal principles, as well as the merits of his present effort in a very different style of writing, will secure to him the gratitude of the profession. Certainly, the subscribers to this journal are bound to buy, and read, and recommend a book which very happily expresses and illustrates more than one principle which it is our peculiar business to urge upon the public mind. Mr. Williams's second letter, on "Attorneys," places in a very clear light the importance of the duties of the solicitor, the interest which society consequently has in improving his education and moral tone and standing, and the means by which these objects may be best attained. This letter, indeed, handles these points so effectively, and they concern our readers so very nearly, that we cannot resist the temptation to extract the greater portion of it, which we here subjoin:—

"Are there two many low attorneys? Then try to elevate this branch of the profession, rather than to decry and depress it. It is painful to see men who have risen to eminence and wealth on the shoulders of solicitors, trying all they can to cut down their fees, and lessen their importance. Complaints are sometimes made that attorneys and solicitors do not attend the courts themselves, but send mere clerks as their representatives. And what wonder, when the fee allowed will pay a clerk, but will not pay his principal? You do not pay them properly for what they do, and you seek to make up for this by paying them for what they do not. Thus, taxation allows to every solicitor so much a folio of seventy-two words for drawing every bill in Chancery. Some new orders have lately come out, and this item is still there. It is, however, very well known to all concerned but the client, that it is the barrister who draws the bill, and not the solicitor whom you pay for it. So, again, you give a profit on mere copies; whilst time and attention, which are the real staple commodities of the profession, are grossly underpaid. How can you imagine anything more calculated than this to injure a weak, to say nothing of a wicked mind? Every man wishes to get as much and to do as little as he can; and, knowing this, you pay the lawyers not for what they do, but for what they do not. You hold out a premium to idleness, and lay a drawback upon industry. Instead of wondering that there are so many who sink under the temptations thus held out, the wonder is that there are no more. I believe this branch of the profession to be rising and improving; but this is in spite of the mode of their payment, and to be attributed to other causes.

"Of late years a strict examination has been instituted, to which all must submit who would be admitted attorneys. More recently still, prizes have been established, and I have no doubt that the effects will be very beneficial. I believe that this examination has tended greatly to elevate attorneys and solicitors as a class. They have their social status very much in their own keeping. I have tried hard to persuade some of my friends in this branch of the profession to give their sons, whom they intend to succeed them, the inestimable benefit of an university education. I have not unfrequently seen a man who has spent four years in a solicitor's office commence reading with a conveyancer at the same time as another man fresh from the university; and before a twelvemonth has expired, the university man has distanced his competitor, who had had four years' start. The one had learned how to learn; the other had not. If both branches of the profession were equally educated, there is no earthly reason why the social status of a solicitor should not be fully equal to that of a barrister. In Scotland a writer to the signet is in the same social position as an advocate, and why should it not be so here? The duties of an attorney or solicitor require quite as many of those qualities by which human nature is adorned as the duties of a barrister. In some respects I have long thought there is greater scope for noble qualities in the profession of a solicitor than in that of an advocate. The great question whether or not a suit shall be begun is most frequently decided in his office. Counsel indeed are generally consulted in matters of importance; but the case for counsel's opinion—the case which states the facts and gives the colouring—is drawn by the solicitor. Again, the solicitor has to do with the individual client, and needs to be well instructed in that most important study—the study of mankind. You may complain of rascally and blundering solicitors; but how many complaints have I not heard from them of rascally, stupid, and intractable clients. To open the eyes of a blind man,—to show him that his interest consists with his duty,—to make him act rightly, is often the arduous business of his attorney. The good that may be done by an able and rightminded man in this branch of the profession is often incalculable; and despite the absurd system of professional pay, there are many, very many such. The average, however, are like the average of mankind, made of the same flesh and blood, and swayed by the same influences. If a man is tied to a desk at sixteen, filled with technicalities from that time forward, set to study a treatise on costs (for to understand costs requires a treatise),—told to charge for what he knows has not been done, and to make no charge for real labour,—can you wonder if he sometimes mistakes the true end of his profession?—that whereas he used to think the summum bonum was plenty of pudding, now he should think it is plenty of costs?"

Upon another subject which we have much at heart—we mean the importance of the study of the civil law, as a groundwork for the more special studies of the English lawyer—these letters offer some plain advice to Mr. Bull, which, although sadly opposed to the long-cherished prejudices of that worthy but obstinate individual, we hope he may be prevailed upon to adopt in the legal education of his rising family. The evil noticed in the following passage is as undeniable as, we believe, the remedy for it is clear and simple.

"Men of narrow views, mere slaves to precedent, case lawyers, too much abound. If an English physician travels on the Continent, he finds others of his own profession who have a fellow feeling with himself. But an English lawyer, when travelling abroad, is like a fish out of water. The civil law, the law of the most powerful and civilised of the nations of old, the foundation of all continental jurisprudence, is seldom looked into, much less studied, by an English barrister. The bar forms ultimately the material of the bench. Narrow views are not readily expanded. Take a hint and be wise. Insist on some knowledge of the civil law as essential to the education of a barrister. A lectureship on this subject has been established. Bring students to attend these lectures by requiring an examination."

Among all the elections that have taken place thus far, the most outrageous violation of the law has occurred at Kidderminster, where the candidates were both lawyers, or at least members of the legal profession. Mr. Lowe, the half-murdered victor, is, like many other politicians, a nominal barrister; and Mr. Boycott, his opponent, and the favourite of the hard-handed non-electors, is a solicitor practising in the borough he unsuccessfully aspired to represent. It appears, too, that the disposition to defy the law originated at Kidderminster in the candidateship of a well-known lawyer, now deceased, Mr. Godson; and ever since he was brought into Parliament by the moral or physical force of the carpet-weavers, they have claimed the right to wrest the franchise out of the hands in which the law has placed it. In some boroughs it was but a short while since, and may be now, as natural to sell a vote as to sell a crop of cabbages. Indeed the one profit was looked upon by many inhabitants as equally legitimate and ordinary with the other. In Kidderminster it would seem that the non-electors believe themselves to possess a constitutional and well-defined right to break the bones of those who presume to vote against their dictation. We notice this outrage, however, principally because it illustrates very strongly what an urgent need there is of a more numerous and efficient police almost throughout the country. The available force of constables at the Kidderminster riot amounted to eight or nine men, who, if they had been the mightiest heroes of epic or romance, could have done no good in the face of an angry multitude. Achilles himself would effect but little against a mob, if all the circumjacent fragments of granite had been cracked small for road-making, and if his only weapon were a policeman's truncheon—which if he used freely, modern refinement would probably bring a criminal charge against him for excessive zeal. The figure made by the special constables on this occasion will not go far to enhance the national character for pugnacity; but if men are never trained to use their weapons, or to act together, it is vain to expect any readiness or mutual trust when the need of these qualities arises.

We can sympathise most entirely with the devout gratitude of the mayor and the inhabitants when the clatter of hoofs and the clash of steel announced the approach of a troop of cavalry from Birmingham. This incident, and, indeed, the whole drama, has been treated with proper poetic feeling by the reporters of the daily papers. Perhaps, as a matter of purely literary criticism, we may object to the description of Mr. Lowe's "white hairs dabbled in blood," a spectacle which we are told "had no effect on the mob," however much the narrative may move the pity of distant readers imperfectly acquainted with the personages who play a leading part in politics. In many provincial circles no doubt it is believed firmly that Mr. Lowe is as venerable as Priam, whereas the truth is, that that ill-used gentleman is in the vigour of his age, and his hair is not grey with years, but from what is called in the Journal of Psychological Medicine of the present month, "an absence of colouring pigment in the hair and tegumentary tissues." But let all those who read these spirited descriptions just reflect, that if the picturesque incident of the arrival of the hussars had not occurred, the later scenes of the play might have taken a very sombre aspect. We cannot even venture to feel sure that a single reporter would have escaped the violence of the mob. At any rate, it is quite possible that the same state of circumstances may recur with this important variation—that there shall be no troop of hussars to give their aid. The army is henceforth to be governed on a plan which will prevent detachments of it being ordinarily available to do the duties of police and of all citizens. This truth will probably be forced upon the public attention by a variety of disagreeable incidents. Whether the offenders against law and order be angry non-electors or professional burglars and garotters, the remedy against both evils is the same: we must either do the work of police ourselves, or employ and pay a larger force to do it for us. Many people have no idea at all except that of looking for protection to an authorised legal functionary; and, probably, if Satan himself were to threaten them in a visible shape, they would call for a policeman to arrest him, and complain that that official was always gossiping with the cook when wanted. Mayors and country justices will have to learn the lesson inculcated by Sir Charles Napier, when commanding in the North, during the period of Chartist turbulence. They must organise in the communities over which they preside some sort of force adequate to ordinary necessities, and the regular troops will be reserved for great public occasions, and be usually concentrated at a few points, in sufficient numbers to practise the movements and acquire the habits of an army. Nor can the demand for a more efficient police be reasonably objected to on the ground of expense. It costs a vast deal more to spoil the efficiency of an army by scattering the soldiers over the whole country, and making them do the work of constables. It is true there are many men who, as members of Parliament, would vote millions to pay an army, but, as magistrates, would grudge every thousand pounds expended to maintain police. This, however, ought to be difficult in the new House of Commons, at least if only a tithe of the "judicious economy," and "efficient administration," promised in the election addresses of all parties should be ever realised.

We publish elsewhere a letter from a well-known City solicitor, Mr. James Weston, to Baron Rothschild, upon the same question as has already exercised the pens of Mr. Freshfield and Mr. Lavie. The letters of these gentlemen, on the expediency of altering the law bearing on the case of Kingsford v. Merry, appeared in our paper of the 14th ult., and the experience of Mr. Weston on this subject entitles him to be heard with the same attention. We must say, however, that it would be no easy task to frame a bill to carry out his views. He thinks that, when goods are obtained by theft or forgery, the right of the true owner should prevail; but in case of any other sort of fraud, the bonâ fide vendee or pledgee should retain the goods. This distinction appears to be founded on the idea that an owner may fall a victim to theft or forgery without negligence, but not to fraud of any other kind. And even in the former case, if gross negligence can be proved, Mr. Weston would throw the loss upon the owner. But surely a world of litigation would arise upon the question of the degree of negligence which should suffice thus to transfer the loss. We think that a simple statement of this proposal of Mr. Weston will be enough to demonstrate its impracticability.

Campbell v. Corley.—This case, fully argued before the Lords Justices in January last, was expected to stand for judgment.—Mr. Daniel, on behalf of Mr. Corley, asked that the case might be further heard upon the additional letters which had been found in certain boxes.—Lord Justice Knight Bruce said, that, after a full hearing, and after the solicitors on both sides had had an opportunity of ransacking the boxes, and reading letters as fully as they pleased, it was really too bad to apply to the court, whose judgment had been prepared, and was ready to be delivered, for further delay. There was no apology or excuse for such delay and inattention.—Lord Justice Turner: If a day shall be appointed, which, if at all, will be with the greatest reluctance, do not let us have a second edition of this application when we have prepared our judgment.—Mr. Greene presumed that the further discussion would be confined to the new materials in evidence.—Lord Justice Knight Bruce: Let the cause be further discussed upon the new matter, and by only one counsel on each side, and let each side furnish the other with a list of the letters he intends to rely upon by Easter eve.—Mr. Greene: Perhaps your Lordship will more precisely define the day?—Lord Justice Knight Bruce: The older Christian world know when that is.—Mr. Greene: The two learned gentlemen before me (Mr. Anderson and Mr. Bagshawe) differ upon that point.—Lord Justice Knight Bruce: The time is quite sufficiently indicated. The cause may stand in the paper for the fourth day of next term.

Illness of a Juryman.—At Bury St. Edmund's, on Thursday week, a case was taken at the close of the day, when it was adjourned. On Friday morning a surgeon deposed that one of the jurymen was suddenly taken ill and would not be able, in all probability, to attend again during the assizes. The trial was however, adjourned again, in the hope that the absent juror might attend, and in the meantime it was proposed, that, the case having been proved with sufficient certainty against both the prisoners, a path out of the dilemma should be opened by the prisoners pleading guilty and the prosecutor forbearing to press for punishment. A difficulty, however, existed, inasmuch as the solicitor for the prosecution, in the absence of his client, would not take upon himself to sanction this arrangement; so matters stood until the business of the assizes was approaching an end, when the Chief Baron inquired whether the prisoners were desirous of withdrawing their plea? And, being informed that they were, his Lordship said that he should take upon himself to receive the plea of guilty, and to discharge them on their entering into recognisances to appear and receive judgment. Mr. Dasent hoped it was quite understood that his client did not give his assent to this sentence. For himself, appearing for the prosecution, it was enough, in his opinion, that the prisoners should plead guilty. With regard to the sentence, that must of course rest in the discretion of the court. The Chief Baron—No doubt. I adopt this course, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, as the best which can be taken, and that which is most likely to attain the object of the prosecution.

Report on Scotch Prisons.—The 22nd Report of the Prison Inspectors of Great Britain is exclusively devoted to Scotland. The separate reports show that the prisons of Scotland generally, no less than those of the border English counties annexed to the district, are in good order, and under excellent management; the only marked exception being the borough gaol of Newcastle-on-Tyne, which is in no respect improved. The general health of the district has been most satisfactory throughout the past year, and the inspector has every reason to be satisfied with the system of discipline in operation in the prisons of Scotland. The experience of some years shows that crank labour, under judicious rules, may be worked with perfect safety, and the inspector holds it to be the most productive labour to which a convicted prisoner can be subjected, as being that which will prevent him, on his release, from resuming his old employments. The use of the guard bed, too, is found to have a most deterring effect, without in the slightest degree injuring the prisoners' health; and many of the governors of Scotch prisons are anxious to have the use of the bed extended from one to two months after conviction, in the belief that nothing is so likely to induce a thief to consider the propriety of resuming an honest life as an extended use of such beds. It is thought that the deterring system, as carried out in this district, might be extended with advantage to the public, and ultimate benefit to the criminal. Little advantage is taken in Scotland of Mr. Dunlop's (Reformatory) Act, for, up to the 31st of December last, not ten children in all had been committed to reformatories, although there are nine of these useful institutions in the Scotch district. The inspector (Sir J. Kincaid) adheres to his opinion that the ticket-of-leave system "will never answer in this country." The details of the report on the borough gaol of Newcastle will probably induce the interference of the Secretary of State. That prison is to be considered rather "as a nursery for crime than for the correction of criminals." It is a very den of vice; but the inspector does not know who is responsible for suffering things to remain in such a state year after year. The reformatories have not been as yet long enough in operation to allow any opinion to be formed respecting them.—Times.

County Court Functionaries, &c.—There are sixty judges, nearly 600 courts, and twenty-three treasurers, in England and Wales. About £15,000,000 sterling have been sued for since their establishment in 1847, and no less than £7,500,000 have been paid to the officers of the courts, the whole of which has been checked and audited by the treasurers, while in no court have the suitors sustained the slightest loss, which circumstance may be attributed to the audit of the treasurers, as it is notorious, that, under the old Courts of Request, which were, with few exceptions, without the supervision of treasurers, very serious defalcations continually occurred.—Civil Service Gazette.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

In Boyse v. Rossborough (5 W. R. 414), which was an appeal to the House of Lords from a decision of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the practice of the Court of Chancery as contrasted with Courts of Common Law, in cases where a will is impeached by the heir-at-law of the testator, was very fully stated and commented upon by Lord Cranworth, when delivering judgment. The heiress-at-law, in Boyse v. Rossborough, impeached the will upon the ground of alleged undue influence and misrepresentation by the devisee; and she filed her bill, praying that the will might, therefore, be declared null and void, and that the devisee might be restrained from setting up certain outstanding terms of years or temporary bars as a defence to an action of ejectment by the plaintiff. At the hearing, Brady, L. C., directed an issue devisavit vel non; and a verdict having been found in favour of the plaintiff, a motion was made for a new trial, which was refused. In the argument before the House of Lords on behalf of the appellant, it was insisted that the order directing the issue was not in accordance with the practice of the court in such cases, and that the plaintiff's right was merely to have the legal impediments resulting from the outstanding terms removed. Lord Cranworth agreed with this view to the extent that such relief would be the most fit and proper relief; but he denied that the Court of Chancery had not power to direct an issue where such a course appeared to be more convenient; as, for instance, where the subject-matter of the devise was a mere equitable right, such as a contract to purchase, or an equity of redemption of a mortgage in fee where the mortgagee is in possession. In such cases, it obviously would be impossible to enable the heir to raise the question as to the validity of a will by merely restraining a devisee from setting up an outstanding term. In the present case, no such reasons existed to induce the court to depart from its usual course of merely granting the injunction, and allowing the validity of the will to be tried in an action of ejectment. The practical difference between such a course and that which the Lord Chancellor of Ireland adopted—viz. directing an issue devisavit vel non—was substantially thus stated by Lord Cranworth:—Where the question as to the validity of the will is raised in an action of ejectment, if the heir succeeds, the devisee may, after he is turned out of possession, bring an action of ejectment on his part, to which the former recovery would be no bar; and so may the defeated party, from time to time, until the proceedings assume a vexatious character. But where an issue is directed, and, the jury having found against the will, the Court of Chancery declares the devise void, the evicted party is thereby disabled for ever from re-opening the question upon the same state of facts. Therefore, where the verdict of the jury, on the trial of an issue devisavit vel non, is satisfactory to the Court of Chancery, all further litigation and inquiry is stopped. The conclusion which the Lord Chancellor drew from this distinction was, that a court of equity, upon a motion for a new trial, will not act upon precisely the same principles as would guide a court of common law on the trial of an ejectment where the same will was in dispute; the judgment of the former being irreversible by any subsequent proceeding, while that of the latter only affects the particular action in which it is brought.

In the Falkland Islands Company v. Lafone (5 W. R. 413), a curious point of practice appears to have been raised for the first time. One of the defendants put in a written answer, referring to a very voluminous "printed answer," which he prayed might be taken as part of his written answer; and, in the latter, he begged to repeat and depose to each and every of the allegations contained in the former, which was marked as an exhibit by the commissioner before whom the written answer was sworn. The written answer was put on the file, but the printed answer remained with the defendant. The Clerk of Records and Writs refused to file a replication, on the ground that the answer was irregular, and the plaintiffs moved that he might be directed to file the replication. V. C. Wood considered that the answer did not satisfy the rules of the court, and, therefore, dismissed the motion, though his Honour thought it possible, that, in particular cases, leave might be given to a defendant to do what had been here done.

The effect of the subsequent mental incapacity of a covenantor, who covenants that, when he comes into possession, he will execute a power of limiting a rent-charges by way of jointure, was discussed at length by V. C. Stuart, in Affleck v. Affleck (5 W. R. 425). The covenant was entered into on the marriage of the late Sir Gilbert Affleck with the plaintiff, now his widow; and it was to the effect, that, when he should come into the possession of certain estates, to which, if he lived, he would be entitled under his uncle's will, he would, by a proper deed, grant to the plaintiff during her life a rent-charge of £300 by way of jointure, pursuant to the power in the will. Before the covenantor came into possession, he became of unsound mind, and, being in such a condition of mental incapacity after he came into possession, he executed a deed which was prepared in pursuance of the power and the covenant. It was not argued that the covenant was not binding on the ground that Sir Gilbert entered into it before his right of possession accrued; but that it was essential that when he came into possession and purported to execute the power, he should have been of mental capacity to do so, as the right of executing the power only then accrued. The Vice-Chancellor, however, held that the covenant operated as a charge upon the land from the moment of its execution; and, being valid, was in itself such an execution of the power as the court would make good. It seems clear enough upon the authorities that the court would relieve from subsequent dissent or refusal—when the covenantor came into possession—and would compel the execution of the power, or give relief tantamount to such execution. "But if," said his Honour, "a previous covenant by a person of sound mind operates as a charge upon the estate, as soon as the covenantor comes into possession, so as to prevail against his subsequent actual dissent or refusal, it must equally prevail against any subsequent mental incapacity. Having the power or capacity to execute is of the essence of the power, just as much as a will and intention to execute—as much and no more. The same principle, therefore, which gives effect to the covenant as an execution, although a defective execution of the power, against a subsequent want of will and intention, must give effect to it against a subsequent want of capacity. In both cases effect is given to the covenant as a valid instrument binding the estate, without reference to any subsequent want of consent or capacity on the part of the donee of the power." And in the present suit there was the further reason, that "the court is bound to give its assistance and enforce the charge, not merely because the covenant is duly executed, but because it has been executed in consideration of money received, and in favour of a wife who contracted a marriage on the faith of that covenant."

Kohler v. Reynolds (5 W. R. 422) was a suit by the next of kin of an intestate who died in 1800. The bill stated that the intestate died possessed of considerable property, and that administration had been taken out by three successive solicitors of the Treasury, commencing in 1818. There was an averment that a residue remained in the hands of the first Solicitor to the Treasury, but there was no averment that anything had been received by the other administrators. V. C. Wood allowed a demurrer to the bill, with liberty, however, to amend. In support of the demurrer, it was argued that the demand was now stale, and that the absence of any allegation as to the receipt of assets by the defendant Reynolds, the last Solicitor to the Treasury, and his predecessor, was fatal to the bill.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

Practice—Several Prisoners—Order of Defence.

Reg. v. Thomas & Harris, 3 Jur., N. S., 272.

Two prisoners—Ann Thomas and George Harris—were indicted for stealing from the person. In a second count, Harris was charged as accessory after the fact. At the end of the case for the prosecution, it was suggested to the judge, on behalf of the prisoner Harris, that the female prisoner, being named first in the indictment, should make her defence before the male prisoner made his; and to this rule of practice—where there are more prisoners than one indicted for the same offence, with a second count charging one of them as accessory after the fact—Channell, B., assented. It appears also, from Reg. v. Meadows (2 Jur., N. S., 718), that where there are several prisoners defended by different counsel, they should be called on for their defences in the order in which they are charged, as disclosed by the indictmentor the evidence, or both; and this order, generally speaking, will coincide with that of their names in the indictment.

Bankruptcy—Fraudulent Dealings—Punishment.

Re Simond Ex Parte Simond, 29 L. T. 19.

This case was an appeal from the decision of Mr. Commissioner Fane, and is a striking instance of the severity with which bankrupts, who fraudulently obtain large advances of money or goods on the eve of their stoppage, will be treated, both by the Bankruptcy Court and the Court of Appeal.

Two instances of fraud were proved against the bankrupt. In the first place, on the 12th of February, 1856, he bought in the public market at the Exchange bills on Paris, to the amount of £2,000. By the mercantile custom, such bills, though deliverable to the purchaser at once, are not paid for by him till the third day after the sale; but before this day, the bankrupt stopped payment, and a few days after was made a bankrupt on his own petition.

The other fraudulent transaction was in respect of some bills drawn on a Paris correspondent, and accepted by him on the security of certain goods which were to be, but were not, transmitted to him. These bills were negotiated by the bankrupt shortly before his bankruptcy.

The Commissioner remarked upon the previous case of Mark Boyd, in which he had given a first-class certificate—a decision which had been reversed by the Lords Justices, who had suspended the certificate for five years, and refused protection for a short period; and after observing that Mr. Boyd's case was a far more excusable one than that now before the court, refused the bankrupt his certificate altogether, and also protection; and intimated that if any creditor should send him to prison, he should decline to release him till he had undergone a year's imprisonment. The Court of Appeal confirmed this sentence, expressing, however, a hope that the opposing creditors would consent to some mitigation.

Notice of Trial—Irregularity in.

Fenn v. Green, 6 Ell. & Bl. 656.

An application was made to set aside the verdict obtained in this cause, with costs, "on the ground that no sufficient notice of trial was given;" and it appeared by the affidavits of the defendant, that he had pleaded to the action on the 31st March, 1856, and issue having been joined on the 18th April, 1856, he received on that day notice of trial for "the second sittings in next Easter term;" and he swore that he believed this notice to have been given for Easter Term, 1857, and consequently paid no regard to it; and the case was tried and given against him in his absence, although, as he believed, he had a good defence on the merits. In answer, the attorney for the plaintiff deposed that the plea delivered on the 31st March being demurrable, was amended by judge's order, by consent, on the 18th April, and that an issue had been prepared, ready to be delivered on the 2nd April, for the first sittings in the Easter Term then ensuing; but that this issue, requiring alteration on account of the defendant's demurrable plea, had been altered on the 18th, by substituting the 18th April for the 2nd, and the "second" for the "first" sittings, as would appear on inspection of the issue itself. The counsel for the defendant relied upon the decision of the majority of the Court of Exchequer in Benthall v. West (1 D. & L. 599), where it was held, that notice of trial, dated and delivered on the first day of Hilary Term, for trial at the second sittings in next Hilary Term, was insufficient, though it appeared that the defendant could not have been misled by it. It was so held, on the ground, chiefly, that if strict form in these cases were not adhered to, it was impossible to tell what number of inquiries might arise; but Lord Abinger dissented from the opinion of his brother Barons, because the defendant could not, in his opinion, by any possibility have been misled, as, if the plaintiff meant to give him twelve months' notice, the defendant, before that time would expire, would be in a condition to sign judgment. In the present case, the Court of Queen's Bench formally dissented from the decision of the Exchequer in Benthall v. West, and refused to interfere with the verdict; and Mr. Justice Coleridge added, that, as to the defendant's affidavit that he believed Easter Term, 1857, to be meant, he not only did not believe it, but thought it "one of the most impudent affidavits ever filed."

It may be observed, that the decision arrived at by the Queen's Bench appears not only to be justified by the greater latitude of modern practice, but to be consistent even with the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Blackstone, in the case of Tyte v. Steventon (2 W. Bl. 798), which has always been considered the foundation of the learning as to notices of trial, and in which he says, "There is no settled precise form of notice required. Sufficient if it apprises the defendant with certainty that the plaintiff means to proceed to trial." (See Ginger v. Pycroft, 5 D. & L. 554; and see, also, Cory v. Hotson, 1 L. M. & P. 23).

Exchequer Chamber—Rule as to Costs of Appeal to.

Young, appel., v. Moeller, respond., 6 Ell. & Bl. 681.

In this case, a verdict, which had been found for the appellants (defendants below) was set aside by the Queen's Bench, and a verdict entered for the respondent (plaintiff below). The defendants below having appealed under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and the Court of Exchequer Chamber having allowed the appeal, an order for the costs of the proceedings in both courts was now sought from the Court of Appeal. The following general rule as to the costs of an appeal under the above provision was now enunciated by the court:—"Where the judgment below is affirmed, the respondent gets them; but the appellant does not get them upon a reversal of the judgment below." Hence in the above case no costs of appeal were allowed; the costs of the proceedings below were allowed to the appellants.

It may be observed, that, in laying down this rule, the court has followed the practice in error on a judgment, which has been long settled; for there are no costs in respect of the proceedings in error given by the Exchequer Chamber in case of a judgment of reversal (see Wyvil v. Stapleton, 1 Str. 614, and since the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, Fisher v. Bridges, 24 L. J., Q. B., N. S., 165), though on the affirmance of a judgment the judgment creditor is entitled to his costs under 3 Hen. 7, c. 10, and 8 & 9 Wm. 3, c. 11.

CERTIFICATE FOR COSTS—SHERIFF'S FEES FOR SPECIAL JURY.

Bennett v. Thompson, 6 Ell. & Bl. 683.

Two points of practice are to be noticed as having been decided by this case. In the first place, the certificate (under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 12) of the judge who tries an action brought in a superior court, that it appeared to him at the trial that there was a sufficient reason for bringing the action in that court, and not in the county court, may be given and indorsed on the record at any time after the assizes and before taxation of costs. In the next place, the sheriff is not entitled to any fees from the party giving notice under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, that a cause is to be tried by a special jury, except the fee of one shilling for a copy of the panel; for his only claim to other fees would be such as he could establish under 7 Wm. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 55, and the table of fees sanctioned by the judges accordingly; and none there given are applicable to the present system, where a panel of jurors is summoned for all the causes to be tried.

LAW OF COMPOSITION—"DEBTS NOW OWING," MEANING OF, IN A DEED.

Fazakerley v. M'Knight (26 L. J., Q. B., 30).

The case of Boyd v. Hind, noticed in our number of the 21st ult., induces us to refer to another recent decision touching the law of composition between debtors and their creditors, without the intervention of the court. The plaintiff and the defendants had been in the habit of trading with each other; and in October, 1854, the plaintiff drew on the defendants a certain bill of exchange (the subject of the present action) for the amount of the balance then due from the defendants to the plaintiff.

After the defendants had accepted this bill, the balance above-mentioned became considerably reduced by goods they supplied to the plaintiff; and, in the particulars of demand, credit was given to them for this reduction accordingly. While the state of accounts remained thus, and before the bill of exchange became due, the defendants, being in difficulties, called a meeting of their creditors; in consequence of which, a composition deed was entered into and executed by the plaintiff amongst other creditors, to the effect that, in consideration of one H. A., to whom all the defendants' estate was assigned, covenanting to pay the creditors (parties thereto) 10s. in the pound, the creditors covenanted not to proceed against the defendants, either at law or in equity, for "any debt now owing" to them, and, if they did, the deed in question might be pleaded as a general release. When the plaintiff executed this deed there was a blank opposite his name in the schedule of creditors for the amount of the debt due to him; and this blank, without his authority, was afterwards filled up by the agent of the creditors, inserting the amount for which the above-mentioned bill of exchange had been drawn. It was the opinion of the judge at the trial that the effect of this alteration was to avoid the deed, quoad the excess of the sum inserted in the schedule over the balance actually due at the time the arrangement was entered into; and in this view the court above coincided. It was quite evident, they remarked, that, by executing the deed while the debt remained in blank, the plaintiff meant to say, "I release the debt due from you to me, whatever it may be—i. e. the balance due on the bill of exchange after allowing the set-off, not the debt for which such bill was drawn, notwithstanding the expression used in the deed of 'all debts now owing.'" "It would be strange, indeed," said Mr. Justice Crompton, "if in a large mercantile account one party were obliged to take a composition on the whole of a debt due to him, and to pay a cross debt due from him in full."

An important principle, then, may be drawn from the decision in this case, or rather from the reasons by which the court professed to be guided, and one to some extent applicable to all deeds of release—viz. that the expression "now owing," on which such a deed often professes to operate, is not in all cases the debt as originally incurred by the releasee, but may import the balance of such debt after having been reduced by any sum or sums which could be set off in an action for the original debt. The meaning of the expression depends, of course, on the circumstances of the case in each particular instance; but it is strongly in favour of such a construction as that above mentioned, that otherwise by the terms of the deed the debtor would be enabled to recover the whole of what was owed to him, while the creditor would receive only a moiety of his claim.

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY.

Summary of Proceedings of the Council.

At their meetings in March, the Council, with the assistance of their Common Law Committee, proceeded to consider some of the details for carrying into effect the proposed alterations in the terms, circuits, and sittings, and suggested as follows:—

The first circuit to commence about Jan. 6th, and continue till the middle of February. Hilary Term to commence the 14th or 15th Feb., and continue till the 13th or 14th March. The sittings in London and Middlesex then to take place, and continue till the 13th or 14th April.

The second circuit, from the 14th of April to 24th or 25th of May. Easter term to be abolished; and Trinity to commence the 25th or 26th May, and continue to the 22nd or 24th June. The sittings in London and Middlesex to be held from 24th June to about 22nd July.

The third, or summer circuit, from 24th July to the end of August. Michaelmas Term to begin on the 1st Nov., and end on the 27th. The sittings in London and Westminster to commence immediately after Michaelmas term, and continue till the day before Christmas.

A question as to the appointment of perpetual commissioners to take the acknowledgments of married women, was considered.

The application of a solicitor to resume his practice, who had been out of the profession for eleven years, was considered, and an examination was suggested to the judge previous to the grant of an order. Other applications were made, on short notices, for renewing certificates, which appeared to be unobjectionable, the parties being about to enter into partnerships.

In one of the malpractice cases before the Master further evidence has been procured in support of the rule.

Questions were also considered regarding the sufficiency of service of clerkship whilst engaged in elections for members of Parliament.

A complaint against an attorney who had made considerable overcharges for the fees of counsel was considered; but it appeared that he had left his office, and his address was not known.

A further communication having been received from the Poor-law Board relating to the charges for parochial business by a person not a certificated attorney, inquiries were made into the circumstances, and an answer returned to the Commissioners.

A question of conveyancing usage was submitted to the Council as to the right of a solicitor to charge a procuration fee where part of the purchase-money was secured on mortgage of the estate.

The subject of the Annual Certificate Tax was considered with reference to the new Parliament; but it was not deemed expedient to take any step at present.

The following gentlemen have been approved as members of the Society during the month:—

John Eaton M'Leod Wylie, Grove, Clapham.
John Alexander Rudcliffe, Delahay-street, Westminster.
Philip Frederick James, Staple-inn.
Arthur Thomas Stephens, Bedford-row.
Philip Hubbersty, Wirksworth.
William Clarke, Bloomsbury-square.
Charles Frederick Murray, London-street, City.

Books were ordered to be purchased on the recommendation of the Library Committee.

EASTER TERM EXAMINATION.

The Examiners appointed for the examination of persons applying to be admitted attorneys have fixed Tuesday, the 28th April, at the Hall of the Incorporated Law Society, in Chancery-lane. The examination will commence at ten o'clock precisely.

The articles of clerkship, and assignment (if any), with answers to the questions as to due service, according to the regulations approved by the judges, must be left with the secretary on or before Tuesday, the 21st April.

Where the articles have not expired, but will expire during the term, the candidate may be examined conditionally; but the articles must be left within the first seven days of term, and answers up to that time. If part of the term has been served with a barrister, special pleader, or London agent, answers to the questions must be obtained from them, as to the time served with each respectively.

A paper will be delivered to each candidate, containing questions to be answered in writing, classed under the several heads of—1. Preliminary. 2. Common and Statute Law, and Practice of the Courts. 3. Conveyancing. 4. Equity, and Practice of the Courts. 5. Bankruptcy, and Practice of the Courts. 6. Criminal Law, and Proceedings before Justices of the Peace.

Each candidate is required to answer all the Preliminary Questions (No. 1); and also to answer in three of the other heads of inquiry—viz. Common Law, Conveyancing, and Equity.

The Examiners will continue the practice of proposing questions in Bankruptcy and in Criminal Law and Proceedings before Justices of the Peace, in order that Candidates who have given their attention to these subjects, may have the advantage of answering such questions, and having the correctness of their answers in those departments taken into consideration in summing up the merit of their general examination.

Under the Rules of Hilary Term, 1853, it is provided that every person who shall have given notices of examination and admission, and "who shall not have attended to be examined, or not have passed the examination, or not have been admitted, may within ONE WEEK after the end of the term for which such notices were given, renew the notices for examination or admission for the then next ensuing term, and so from time to time as he shall think proper;" but shall not be admitted until the last day of the term, unless otherwise ordered. In case the testimonials were deposited in a former term, they should be re-entered, and the answers completed to the present time.

Reviews.

Pollock's Practice of the County Courts. Third Edition. By C. E. POLLOCK, and H. NICOL, Esquires, Barristers-at-law. H. Sweet. 1857.

Our views as to County Court Practices generally, and our opinion of the respective performances in this behalf of Mr. Archbold and Mr. Lloyd, have been so lately presented to our readers, that it is not needful to introduce the above work, published since we last wrote on the subject, with any prefatory remarks—except, indeed, with a passing observation altogether preliminary to an examination of the contents. Every author, we suspect, has some pet merit on which he secretly prides himself—some device by which he hopes to secure immortality; and we greatly mistake if the crowning excellence of the present volume in the eyes of its authors, is not its outward appearance. "This is a book which will take," we hear them say in their secret conferences. "It is well proportioned, and attractive in its form; and—crafty workmen that we are—we have given it a feature which none but ourselves and the spirited proprietors of the 'Post-Office Directory' have hitherto attempted. We have painted the edges of the leaves in divers rich colours, and thereby the divisions of our book are made evident to the meanest capacity!" For our part, however, we do not feel sure that Owen Jones can be safely imitated in law; and we confess an old-fashioned attachment to the sober colours to which our dulness has been habituated. Perhaps Messrs. Pollock and Nicol (if we have, indeed, detected a harmless vanity) would have been wise to recollect that in publishing books, as in other matters, self-discipline is pretty sure to be rewarded—so that it has been laid down as a fundamental canon for those writers who would attain true excellence, ruthlessly to blunt the point of the epigram, and to cancel the well-rounded paragraph with the pen of resolution. But to turn to more serious matters.

In many respects, the Amendment Act of 1856 wrought important changes in County Court law, and it is important to understand distinctly what they were, before a correct opinion can be formed as to the merits of the present edition of a work which—so far as it expounds the law as it previously stood—has long been before the profession. In this Act are embodied such of the recommendations of the County Court Commissioners in their Report dated in March, 1855, as the wisdom of our lawmakers thought fit to become the law of the land. And this Report may therefore, we think, be used with advantage by those who would construe the statute to which it gave birth. In this opinion we are happy to have the concurrence of our authors, for, as the Report commences with a luminous statement or sketch of the jurisdiction of the County Court as it existed at the date of the Report, this is printed ipsissimis verbis at the outset of the present volume (the additions rendered necessary by the legislation of the last year being added thereto), and forms seven out of the ten pages of the Introduction. Of this, however, we do not complain. The matter of a Blue Book is usually considered common property, and it would not have been easy to re-cast the information there given in as clear a form; but, at the same time, we do think some reference should have been made to the source from which such information was taken.

Passing, however, from these matters, let us test the accuracy and completeness of this edition by the light afforded by this Report, though our space forbids the attempt, except in reference to one or two passages to which our attention has been casually directed. Thus, one of the suggestions of the Commissioners is in reference to the power which litigants in the county court enjoyed under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 17, to agree that certain of the actions excepted from the ordinary jurisdiction of the court should be tried therein nevertheless; and they advised that this power should be extended so as to allow all questions, whether of law or fact, in which the superior courts of common law have jurisdiction, to be tried, by consent, in the county court, with the exception, however, as before, of claims for damages in respect of alleged criminal conversation. But they added, that the provisions of the statute just named, as to the mode in which the consent should be given, should in their judgment continue; and if our readers will turn to the section in question, they will find that knowledge of the nature of the claim and amount in dispute must by it appear on the face of the agreement. Now, the Legislature has dealt with this suggestion thus—it has repealed the aforesaid 17th section of the previous Act altogether, and has replaced that provision by the 23rd section of the new statute, which enacts, in broad terms, that "the county court shall not have jurisdiction to try any action for criminal conversation; but with respect to all other actions which may be brought in any superior court of common law, if both parties shall agree by a memorandum signed by them or their respective attorneys, that any county court named in such memorandum shall have power to try such action, such county court shall have jurisdiction to try the same." Now, the first thing to remark here (but which, by the way, Messrs. Pollock and Nicol have not remarked, see p. 36), is, that the ingredient of knowledge appearing on the face of the memorandum is no longer essential—a mischievous omission, as we think, to give full effect to the suggestion of the commissioners, and caused by a superstitious dread of forms, which are sometimes most useful in their operation. It was a mistake to destroy the security which the former practice afforded that the matter in controversy was really understood; and the defect is one which ought to have been remarked upon, in a note at all events. But though we are told that "an extended jurisdiction by agreement, though more limited than the present, was given by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 17," we are not informed that the section is now repealed, nor is the change in the practice above mentioned alluded to at all. The 23rd section of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, however, made a much more important alteration in the law than this, and one which deserved the closest attention from a careful commentator. It seems clear that its effect is to allow all the actions hitherto excepted from the jurisdiction of the county court (save only for criminal conversation, which remains as before), such as ejectment, libel, seduction, and the like, to be now triable therein by consent. We will leave our readers to judge whether, if this be so, it is sufficiently stated in the following paragraph as to jurisdiction by agreement, the jurisdiction in ordinary cases being first stated thus:—

"The Court has jurisdiction in all personal actions, where the debt or damage claimed is not more than £50, whether on balance of account or otherwise; but not (except by agreement of the parties, as to which see post), in any action of ejectment, or in an action in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments, or to any toll, fair, market, or franchise is in question; nor in any case in which the validity of any devise, bequest, or limitation under any will or settlement may be disputed; nor in any action for malicious prosecution, libel, or slander, criminal conversation, seduction, or breach of promise of marriage."

"EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION BY AGREEMENT.

"By the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, the jurisdiction was limited, as above stated with regard to actions in which any question of title came in issue; but by the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 23, a far more extended jurisdiction is given, both as to the amount and nature of the claim which may be adjudicated upon, if the litigant parties agree thereto; and now, if both plaintiff and defendant agree, by a memorandum signed by them or their attorneys, that the court shall have power to try any action, if it be one which may be brought in a superior court of common law, and not an action for criminal conversation, the court will have jurisdiction. This provision is confined to claims at common law; therefore, consent will not give jurisdiction in cases of partnership or intestacy."—p. 36.

We submit that, instead of the above, the passage should run as follows:—

EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION BY AGREEMENT.

By the previous statutes, the jurisdiction of the county court extended only to cases where the debt or damage did not exceed £50, and was excluded altogether in cases of ejectment, or where the title to hereditaments, &c., came in question, and in cases of malicious prosecution, libel, slander, criminal conversation, seduction, and breach of promise of marriage; but now, by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 23, these limitations and exclusions are taken away, in any case in which the litigant parties may agree to waive them; and if both plaintiff and defendant agree, &c.

Again, the very recent case of Heard v. Edey (see 5 W. R., Ex., 353), induced us to examine the way in which the 30th section of the new Act, on which that case was decided, has been treated in the work before us. After a statement as to the general rule depriving a plaintiff of costs who sues in a superior court and recovers less than £20 in an action in covenant, debt, detinue, or assumpsit, we find the following paragraph:—

"UNLESS JUDGMENT GOES BY DEFAULT.

"It was held, under 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, that where a defendant suffered judgment by default, and the damages were assessed under a writ of inquiry, the provisions of the statute which deprives the plaintiff of costs did not apply. By the later Act, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, this exception was established by express words; and this has been held to apply to interlocutory as well as to final judgment of default. By the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 30, however, if a plaintiff in a superior court recovers, in an action of contract, by judgment by default a sum not exceeding £20, he is deprived of costs unless he obtain a certificate."—p. 44.

Now, we are at a loss to understand why Messrs. Pollock and Nicol should have preferred the words we have printed in italics to those which Parliament used—viz. "unless, upon an application to such court or to a judge, such court or judge shall otherwise direct." And the substitution is the more unfortunate, because it was on the construction of those words that the above case turned. It is true this could not have been foreseen, but the phrase used by our authors is positively faulty, and gives rise to a misconception. The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 30, says nothing whatever about any "certificate." Its concluding words, taken by themselves, would seem to point to an arbitrary discretion, vested in the court or judge, to give or withhold costs on the defendant suffering judgment by default in such an action; and it is only by consulting the Report that we are guided to their true construction. But we there find a suggestion that a judgment suffered by default in an action on contract below £20, should not, for the future (as it did when the Commissioners wrote), generally exempt the plaintiff from the penalty of losing his costs, but that it should still so exempt him in cases in which the superior court had, by sect. 128 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, a concurrent jurisdiction; for example, where the parties resided more than twenty miles apart. Now, here again, the latter part of the suggestion has not been expressed in the words of the new statute; but in this instance we think that the omission is supplied by the course of previous legislation on the subject still unrepealed.

Another objection to the turn given to the 30th section as it appears above, is, that the important distinction between an action "brought to recover" (which is the expression in the Act), and an action "in which the plaintiff recovers," is altogether overlooked. It is where the sum claimed does not exceed £20, and then only, that the new enactment takes effect. It should also have been stated expressly, and not merely by implication, that the practice as to judgment by default in actions of tort remains as heretofore.

Before we conclude, we would observe that there is one abuse of the powers committed to county court judges which has not unfrequently come before the public; and in its attempts to remedy which, the new Act appears singularly defective. We allude to the right claimed by some of the judges to incarcerate a defendant who has obtained his final discharge as an insolvent, for a debt duly inserted in his schedule. We are ashamed to add, that there is much reason to believe that this oppression has been caused by petty jealousy, and by a struggle for power which cannot be spoken of too severely. Neither can we concur in the belief expressed by the Court of Common Pleas in Abley v. Dale, that the Legislature intended to intrust to the "gentlemen discharging the important duties of local judges" any discretion to commit such manifest injustice. On this topic, the Report is (for Commissioners, after all, are human) impenetrable in its obscurity; but without its assistance, some glimmerings of the facts seem to have reached the parliamentary mind. There has been a blunder of course; the peccant section has not been hit; but still, one which had some slight connection with the point in dispute was hunted up and repealed; and hence we may hope, that, when the reformation of our law statutes is again able to interest the public, some measures will be taken to give a proper meaning to the expression "unsatisfied judgment," in the ninety-eighth section of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95. This the present Act leaves untouched, though it has fallen foul of the comparatively harmless 102nd section of the same statute, which only prevented a debtor committed by a County Court judge for contumacy, from procuring his discharge by going through the Insolvent or Bankrupt Courts.

The Country Solicitor's Practice in the High Court of Chancery; with an Appendix of Forms. By JOHN GRAY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. Fifth Edition, by DAVID GRAY BEGG, Esq., of Lincoln's-inn. Lumley. 1857.

The utility of Mr. Gray's "Country Solicitor's Practice" is best proved by the general favour with which it has been received by the profession; and we are glad to find that a new edition, embodying the numerous and extensive alterations which have been made in Chancery proceedings of late years, has been lately published under the direction of the author himself. The work, as it is now presented, is an admirable manual of the present Chancery practice, and will be found of especial value to those for whom it is particularly written. Though the country solicitor has comparatively little to do with the management of suits when they are once instituted, as the duty then devolves almost entirely upon his London agent, yet it is of the highest importance that he should have at least a general acquaintance with the nature of the principles and proceedings of courts of equity. The consequences of ignorance on the subject are sometimes very embarrassing to his agent in town, and very injurious to his client. If it do not lead both himself and his suit into awkward dilemmas and bewildering perplexities, it will at all events involve him in a great deal of troublesome correspondence with his agent, that would otherwise have been unnecessary. Its most disastrous result is generally exhibited in those stages of a suit where time is material, and the country solicitor lets the period pass by in which he ought to have done something which he considered it important to do, but which he failed to do in proper time from want of information. Nor should it be overlooked, that, even before a suit is commenced, it is often of great importance that the country solicitor should be able to advise his client as to the special nature of his remedy for any injury that he has suffered. It is frequently remarked of practitioners whose business makes them more familiar with common law than with equity courts, that whenever they are at a loss to discover a remedy at common law, they always assume they must be safe in going into Chancery, forgetting Mr. Baron Bramwell's remarks in Stimson v. Hall (5 W. R. 367)—"that it is an error to suppose that a court of equity acts according to no rules save some vague justice applicable to the particular case;" and that, in fact, it is "guided by defined rules and recorded precedents," almost as completely as any of the courts of common law.

While it is by no means necessary that every country practitioner should acquaint himself with all that the antiquarian research of the late Mr. Spence has brought to light, or even with the less elaborate commentaries of Mr. Justice Story—both of which require a large amount of collateral reading to make them useful, and sometimes to make them quite intelligible—no man who undertakes legal business ought to be destitute of some general notions of the nature of equity jurisdiction—how far it is exclusive of, where it is concurrent with, and where it is supplemental to, the jurisdiction of courts of common law. It is, however, as a general rule, sufficient for the solicitor's purpose that he knows as a matter of fact in what cases the proper remedy is by bill or information, and in what cases it is proper to have recourse to an action at law, a quo warranto, or a mandamus, without bestowing any particular pains in informing himself as to the origin of the exclusive, conflicting, or concurrent jurisdictions, or even as to the grounds which are sometimes asserted to exist in reason and the nature of things for these distinctions. Such at least seems to be the view which Mr. Gray has taken of the matter; and we think that this view has materially tended to make his book so very useful as it has proved to be to persons engaged in practice.

The chapters relating to proceedings in the judges' chambers will recommend it to the London solicitor, who will find there everything he wants to know about the practice before the judge at chambers, and before his chief clerk; so far, at least, as the practice is settled or intelligible. To both the London and the country solicitor equally, the Appendix at the end of the book will be valuable. We are not aware of any work which contains a more useful collection of forms adapted to the present state of practice. There is hardly a matter that could arise in the progress of a suit, where a precedent might be of utility, for which we may not discover one in this Appendix. The Forms include affidavits under the Trustee Relief Act—as to the production of documents—verifying accounts—proving mortgage, judgment, and bond debts—in support of pedigree, &c.

We have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Gray's Practice, as it now stands, will be of the greatest usefulness to country practitioners, and others who are not very familiar with the proceedings of courts of equity; and while it cannot pretend to rival such books as those of Mr. Daniell and Mr. Ayckbourne on the same subject, with solicitors who devote themselves to Chancery, and therefore do not require to be instructed in its rudimentary knowledge, nevertheless, even to such persons, some portions of Mr. Gray's book will be found extremely useful; and not the less so because it is not over-burdened by a multitudinous citation of cases—a fault to which legal writers of modern times are too prone.

It ought to be mentioned, for the information of those who possess a copy of any of the earlier editions of this work, that the present edition has been almost re-written, in order to incorporate, in the most convenient manner for reference, all the sweeping alterations which have been effected by the Chancery Amendment and other recent Acts, and consequent General Orders. All that part of the book which in former editions related to the practice as to criminal information, mandamus, quo warranto, and certiorari, has been omitted in th fifth edition, it having been transferred to another work by the same author, where it is now more properly placed.

Juridical Society.

A meeting of this society was held on Monday, the 23rd ult., at its rooms in St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square—Mr. Harris Prendergast in the chair. Mr. N. Lindley read a paper on "The Principles which govern the Criminal and Civil Responsibilities of Corporations."

The learned reader observed, that he had been led to the inquiry which was the subject of the paper by being forcibly struck with the apparent injustice to which the doctrine of law relating to the common seal so often gave rise—a doctrine which, though sanctioned by time and the high authority of great men, was, like many others of which the same might be said, still open to discussion in point of principle. A corporation was usually said to be an ideal person, composed of a number of individuals, the collective whole being, juridically speaking, distinct from its component parts. It was, however, plain that the word "person" was here used in a technical, and not in its ordinary, signification. Physically and morally speaking, there was no resemblance between a corporation and a person; in point of fact, a corporation was not capable of acting or forbearing to act, of assenting or dissenting, of willing either good or evil, of doing either right or wrong. In what respects, then, did a corporation resemble a person? In the early stages of civilisation, rights and duties were attributed only to natural individuals, or to persons, in the ordinary sense of the word; but as civilisation advanced, and the transactions of men became more and more complex, it was found advantageous, for the purpose of attaining ends liable to be thwarted by the death of individuals, to invent a being in which rights and duties might permanently reside. When a corporation, therefore, was said to be a person, what was meant was this—It was a body created for certain purposes, endowed by law with certain privileges, and with the faculty of acquiring rights and incurring obligations. Its capacity, unlike that of natural persons (which is unlimited), where not expressly limited, is restricted at its creation by the purposes for the attainment of which it is invented; for it is only with reference to such purposes that personality can be predicated of it. The person thus created, the object thus personified, is subject to law, and is protected by law, and is therefore capable of suing and being sued, in order that its rights and duties may be effectually enforced. Again, the power of exercising privileges (whether they be favourable or onerous), and of acquiring rights and incurring obligations, presupposes a power of willing and of acting; and a capacity to will and to act is, therefore, a necessary attribute of every corporate body. But the power of willing and of acting—of transacting business between man and man—must of necessity be exercised by living people; and a body corporate can only be said to act, or not to act, to assent or dissent, when the conduct of some actual human being is by law imputed to it, and treated as if it were the conduct of the fictitious person. The will and the acts of a body corporate are nothing more or less than the real, unfictitious will and acts of some one or more individuals, imputed, however, on some intelligible principle, not to them as natural persons, but to the body corporate, which is endowed with personality for the very purpose of being treated as if it had a will of its own, and were capable of acting, or not acting, more or less after the fashion of mankind.

The question, whether any act or omission conferred a right or imposed a liability on a corporation, became resolved into two others—viz., 1st. Who did or omitted to do the act? 2nd. Supposing the corporation to be an individual, was there any recognised legal principle or sound analogy by virtue of which the supposed individual would be responsible for the act so done or omitted by another? The person or persons whose acts or omissions could be imputed to the body corporate must be, in the first instance, those to whom the management of the affairs of the corporation was, by its constitution, entrusted; afterwards, there might be other persons appointed by the first, in the exercise of the express or implied powers with which they, as directors, were endowed. A stranger could not represent the body corporate, neither could any one or more individual corporations, inasmuch as a corporation was a totally distinct person from the individuals composing it. By no legal principle could the conduct of any person be imputed to a corporation, unless authorised to act on its behalf, either immediately, by the act of incorporation, or mediately, by appointment under some express or implied powers thereby conferred. Those persons were the only ones whose acts or omissions could be treated as the acts or omissions of the corporation.

With respect, then, to crimes—Could a corporation be guilty of a crime? Some jurists said, "Yes;" but it appeared to the reader that "No" was the proper answer to the question. No one was responsible for a crime who was not personally party or privy to it, and it was only by a fiction that a corporation could be deemed guilty of a crime. The punishment, also, of a fictitious person must be imaginary, and, as such, wholly useless. Those who contended that corporations could commit crimes were driven to make exceptions: for no jurist maintained that adultery or bigamy could, on any principle or by any analogy, be imputed to bodies corporate. At the same time, it must be acknowledged that corporations might be guilty of offences, the remedy for which was a public prosecution—e. g., the non-repair of a highway.

Then, as to civil responsibility:—Capacity to acquire rights and incur obligations does not always depend on a de facto exercise of will, for that capacity was attributed to infants and lunatics, whose exercise of will was juridically ignored. Again, the law of agency punished principals, by which law the acts of one person might be treated as the acts of another. A corporation might be compared to a principal, who gives to his agent all powers and authorities necessary for the accomplishment of the ends for which the corporation was called into existence.

Applying, then, to corporations the familiar doctrines of agency, all torts, of whatever kind, for which a principal having given such authority as is conferred by the act of incorporation would be liable, might, if done by the express or implied authority of the governing body of the corporation, be deemed corporate acts, and might be held to impose liabilities on the corporate body. It had been held, in the case of Stevens v. The Midland Counties Railway (10 Exch. 356), that an action for malicious prosecution would not lie against a corporation. This decision appeared to be right, upon the ground, that, even if a corporation could be actuated by bad motives, it would not be civilly liable for the malicious acts of one endowed by it with such powers and authorities as alone could be supposed to be conferred by a corporation. As to contracts: no contract could be entered into by a corporation which was ultra vires, or entered into in the exercise of powers and authorities not conferred expressly or implied by the law creating the body corporate. All contracts were in reason imputable to a corporation, provided the will of one of the parties could be shown to be the will of those individuals to whom the management of the corporate affairs was intrusted. This led to the consideration of the evidence by which a corporate contract must be shown to exist. The seal had its origin in times when writing was comparatively a rare accomplishment; but no satisfactory reason could be adduced for the English doctrine that nothing but a seal could be evidence of the corporate will. Supposing that the majority of a duly-convened meeting of members are the persons intrusted with the management of the corporate affairs, it followed that the will of the corporation was the will of such majority; and, if so, whatever was evidence of the will of the majority, must be evidence also of the will which the corporation was supposed to exercise. Suppose again, that some officer of a corporation, not having power to bind it, entered into a contract on its behalf, and reported the fact to a duly-convened meeting of its members, that the matter was discussed and approved unanimously, and, then, that a minute to that effect was formally made, could it be said in reason that that ratification ought not to be imputed to the body corporate? Why was it less the act of the body corporate than a document sealed by their authority? Where was the magic of the seal? It was not denied that a seal was a convenient mark whereby to signify to the world the fact that the document had been finally approved by the proper authorities; but what was contended was, that to deny validity to contracts, similarly approved, solely because the seal was absent, was to sacrifice substance to form, and was as unjustifiable in principle as the absurd old English rule which compelled a man to pay his bond twice over, because the first time he neglected to take a release under seal.

The strictness of the rule denying validity to unsealed contracts of corporations was being gradually relaxed; the whole law relating to the subject was obviously in a state of transition; and an attempt was being made, not unsuccessfully, to introduce, by way of exception, the doctrine that contracts which could be looked upon as incidental to the purposes for which a corporation was created, should be valid, though not under seal. This rule ought obviously to be of general application. In America, the strict law requiring in every case the existence of a common seal was wholly exploded; and it was hoped that such would soon be the case in this country also.

Lastly came the case of quasi-contracts, or all acts or forbearances which not being unlawful gave rise to rights and obligations without the intervention of any genuine promise, express or tacit. The effects of such acts or forbearances are similar to those which would have been produced by a genuine contract. Such were the obligations which, in the language of the civilians, arose "ex re," "by the force of circumstances," "utilitatis, æquitatis causâ;" and which were indicated by the maxims, "Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus," and "Nemo debet locupletari ex alterius incommodo." The English phrase, "implied contracts," was one of too great ambiguity to represent this class of contracts. The principles which bound persons quasi ex contractu, were at least as applicable to corporations who obtained materials and services from others, as to infants who were supplied with such necessaries as gold latch-keys and onyx studs. In the case of Diggle v. The London and Blackwall Railway Company (5 Exch. 442), the plaintiff had, with the full knowledge and at the request of the officers of a corporation, executed considerable works for it, and, on claiming payment, was turned round because he could not produce a contract under seal. Surely this was wrong. To hold that the corporation, taking the benefit of the plaintiff's work, was not bound to pay for it, was cruel in the extreme. The object of the paper was to show that some of the harsh decisions to be found in the books arose from a departure from and not from a conformity to the principles which ought reasonably to be applied to the solution of the question, whether any particular act could by law be held to cast responsiblity on a corporation? Corporations were civilly responsible quasi ex contractu upon precisely the same principle as ordinary individuals, and subject to such qualifications as might be rendered necessary by the circumstance that corporations exist for certain definite purposes.

In the course of the paper Mr. Lindley referred to several authorities in the civil law, and to the works of Pothier and other foreign jurists.

Alteration of the Law relating to Goods and Mercantile Documents.

LETTER FROM MR. WESTON TO BARON ROTHSCHILD.

Sir,—I understand that Mr. James Freshfield and Mr. Lavie have given directly opposite opinions on the alteration of the law relating to goods and mercantile documents, proposed at the meeting over which you lately presided.

It would be difficult to say which of those gentlemen is entitled to have the greater weight attributed to his opinion, per se. It would be difficult also to point out any member of our branch of the profession, or indeed of either branch of the profession, to whose opinion greater weight should be attributed than to that of either the one or the other of those gentlemen upon the particular question in dispute.

As my attention has necessarily been much directed to questions connected with warrants and similar documents, and my experience extends over many years, I feel that I may, without presumption, offer an opinion on the subject, with the hope that it may be of some use in guiding those who may be in doubt under the conflicting opinions before them.

I understand Mr. Freshfield to be of opinion, that the law should remain as it is. This will leave an innocent party making advances, or purchasing goods, subject to the risk of losing his money, if the title of the party with whom he deals is affected by some concealed fraud. Mr. Freshfield may think that this will only occur now and then, and that, unless the loss is of frequent occurrence, there is not sufficient ground for an alteration of the law; but a party standing in the position of Mr. Merry may say, "These things may not often occur, but I may be let in for a loss of £80,000 or £100,000, and I shall be ruined—I shall never feel safe."

As a remedy, Mr. Lavie proposes that an innocent party shall be entitled to hold the goods, if they were bought or advanced upon in the ordinary course of trade, and that the true owner shall be bound by the transaction, provided the person making the contract shall have the possession of the merchandise at the time of the contract, and shall deliver over the same—although the goods or documents of title may have been stolen only five minutes before. Mr. Lavie will perhaps say that thefts only occur now and then, and may be considered as exceptional cases, and that the requiring the transaction to be in the ordinary course of trade is a sufficient protection. This, however, as Mr. Gassiot, I believe, remarked at your meeting, is something like legalising robbery. To require that the transaction should be shown to be in the ordinary course of trade is not a sufficient protection. It is not very difficult for such a person as the Mr. Anderson who figured in Mr. Merry's case, when he has made all his arrangements for "bolting," to get into the counting-house of a leading firm, and, without any culpable negligence on the part of the owner, to pocket a couple of indorsed warrants for ten hogsheads of sugar each. He goes immediately to some Mr. Merry—gets an advance of a large part of the value—the tidal train is just about starting—in twelve hours he is in Paris, and the next evening he is in Basle. The loser of the warrants would have no redress, because it would be proved that Anderson was well known in the trade, and that it was quite in the ordinary course of business to make him an advance on the warrants.

Mr. Freshfield's plan encourages carelessness in the owners of goods, and is a "heavy blow and great discouragement" to parties whose business it is to make advances on mercantile documents. Mr. Lavie's plan is (of course very much against his feelings and intentions) an encouragement to thieves, and violates our notions as to the sacredness of property.

It appears to me that the truth, as is often the case, lies between the two extremes.

I venture to recommend to the consideration of yourself and of the committee, who, I presume, still have the subject under consideration:—First, that the law should be left as it now stands with reference to goods or mercantile documents stolen, and to titles to goods affected by forgery, excepting in cases where it shall be shown that the owner has facilitated the theft or forgery by gross negligence, in which cases he should have no redress. Secondly, that the law should be altered as proposed by Mr. Lavie with reference to cases in which goods or mercantile documents have been obtained by fraud of any kind, or under any circumstances, not involving theft or forgery.

The law may reasonably exact that an owner of goods shall take due care of them; but if he (or the party whom he may have intrusted with the custody thereof) is not guilty of any negligence, the law should, I think, maintain the sacredness of his title against all thieves, or persons claiming, however innocently, under thieves.

The law again may, for the general convenience of mercantile transactions, reasonably exact that every owner of goods shall exert such vigilance as not to be, under any circumstances whatever, defrauded of them; and if he is not sufficiently vigilant or astute to prevent his being now and then taken in, he must suffer the occasional penalty, rather than the mercantile community be kept in constant doubt as to the validity or safety of their transactions.

"Vigilantibus non dormientibus subveniunt leges."

In the very case of Kingsford v. Merry, the plaintiffs seem to have been guilty of crassa negligentia in giving Anderson an order for the transfer of the goods into his name upon his ipse dixit that they belonged to him, instead of requiring him, according to the ordinary course of business, to get Leask's indorsement of the delivery order in his favour; and if this point, which has been very little adverted to, had been kept in view, little commiseration would have been felt for the plaintiffs if they had lost their property. To say that every man who has been defrauded shall be entitled to recover his property from parties, however blameless, is to induce him to rely on the protection of law rather than on his own vigilance and caution.

I submit, that the rules which I have suggested would facilitate to a very great extent mercantile transactions, and give confidence where it will not otherwise be felt, without unduly trenching on the rights of property.

It is true, that, by an alteration of the law to the extent above proposed, additional facility for fraud will be afforded; but it may be hoped that this will be counteracted by the increased vigilance which parties will find they must exert.

In all cases of fraud one of two innocent parties must suffer. It seems not to be an unreasonable rule that the party to suffer should be the one who has suffered himself to be deceived. The principle which has been acted upon in reference to merchants and factors applies, though with somewhat less force, to cases of fraud. The merchant selects his own factor, and thinks fit to place his confidence in him. Who is to suffer if the confidence is misplaced? The law says, the merchant is to suffer; not the party whom he would otherwise, though not intentionally, have contributed to defraud. So in cases of fraud, the owner of goods is induced to part with his goods without payment, in the belief that it will be all right. Who is to suffer, if he has been cheated, and if the goods have been bought or advanced upon bonâ fide by a third party? The law may well say, the party who chose to place confidence in an unworthy person. Take the very case of Messrs. Kingsford. Anderson produces a document showing a title in Leask only, but asserts that the goods really belong to himself. Messrs. Kingsford had, I understand, large transactions with Anderson. They thought that Anderson would not deceive them, and gave him a transfer order. Surely they ought to bear the consequences, not the party who would otherwise be defrauded through their instrumentality. The law ought not to encourage the carelessness in dealing which may arise from its being felt that, though the party trusted may cheat other persons, the law will not allow the owner to be cheated, but gives him the right to follow his goods.

It is, I think, desirable that warrants, delivery certificates, and delivery and transfer orders should be assimilated to bills of lading, so as to be deemed to pass such property or title as the party indorsing or signing the same had at the time in the goods represented thereby, together with all his rights and remedies against the parties issuing the warrants, or holding the goods, in whatever character. This, however, does not properly arise upon the present discussion, nor do some other points connected with warrants and delivery certificates, which are worthy of consideration by merchants—e.g. the mode of guarding against loss from the warrants relied upon having been issued for goods not existing, or from double warrants being issued for the same goods, or warrants being issued without the sanction of the owners, or in favour of wrong parties. In the case of warrants of private wharfingers, these points are very material, as instances have actually occurred of large advances having been made, as was supposed, on the security of goods, when, in fact, the lender only had the personal liability of the wharfinger, to whom he probably would not have advanced £1,000 without more substantial security. In dealing with the warrants of the large Dock Companies, the latter points are not of much practical importance.

Before concluding, I would notice that a misunderstanding seems still to prevail as to the much-vexed case of Kingsford v. Merry, the immediate cause of the present discussion. It seems to be generally supposed that the law laid down by the Chief Baron, and supported by the Court of Exchequer, has been overruled by the Court of Error. I apprehend this is not the fact. The Chief Baron and the Court of Exchequer had the power of drawing their own conclusions from the facts proved at the trial, and they drew the conclusion that the relation of vendor and vendee subsisted between the plaintiffs and Anderson. The Court of Error, however, was bound by the statement of facts as appearing in the case which came before them on appeal, and, according to the Weekly Reporter, it seems to have been stated thereby that the plaintiffs gave the delivery order [or rather "transfer order"] to Anderson, and dealt with him as the assignee, not as purchasing goods from them, but as having purchased them from Leask, and that Anderson had no authority to receive but only to inspect the goods. Upon this statement the Court of Error held that the plaintiffs and Anderson never did stand in the relation of vendor and vendee, and that there was no privity of contract between them; and accordingly they reversed the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, in which it would seem they would have concurred if the plaintiffs and Anderson had stood in the relation of vendor and vendee. There appears, therefore, no ground for supposing that the two courts differed upon a point of law which would leave the law in great uncertainty, or for supposing that the Lord Chief Baron was wrong in point of law, which would to some extent diminish the confidence of the mercantile community in the decisions of that eminent judge.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
JAMES WESTON.

31, Fenchurch-street, Feb. 28, 1857.

Parliamentary Practice on Private Bills.

Parliamentary practice is a branch of the profession which has attained a larger growth, in a few years, than any other portion of it. With the exception of a few solicitors, who were engaged in prosecuting bills for the first railway companies, and members of the profession who had occasion to apply for Private Estate Acts, few solicitors, until within the last twelve years, had any knowledge of the practice of Parliament. If a client wished to oppose a private bill, the business was looked on as an interruption to the regular work of the office, and everything was turned over to the parliamentary agent, and as little as possible done by the solicitor.

Formerly, parliamentary agents, or, at any rate, the leading practitioners, were officers of the House of Lords or Commons, who, either alone, or in partnership with others who were not on the establishment, conducted the business through all the formal stages for solicitors. A resolution of the House of Commons, in the year 1835, put a stop to all practice by clerks of that House, and the consequence was that independent firms were established outside the House. The only qualification to become a parliamentary agent is to sign a declaration at the House of Commons, and, if required, to give security to the amount of £500 for obedience to the orders of the House. The parliamentary agents proper—i. e., those who do not practise as solicitors as well—comprise amongst their number solicitors, barristers, and several gentlemen who have not received a legal education. Attempts have been made, from time to time, to get a resolution of the House passed, that no one shall practise as a parliamentary agent who has not been admitted as a solicitor, but without success. This question does not affect the present topic. The London solicitors have the remedy in their own hands, if they do not wish to employ a non-professional man, by conducting their own business. One thing must be borne in mind, however, which is, that it is useless for them to attempt this, unless they are prepared to devote much time and attention to it, as it is absolutely necessary to watch the progress of the business from day to day. At all events, it is a more dignified proceeding for the profession to put their own shoulders to the wheel, and make themselves independent of parliamentary agents, rather than to endeavour to extinguish that branch of practitioners by order of Parliament. Parliament is a court open to all; and if solicitors will not learn the practice, they must depend upon those who are daily engaged in it.

Parliamentary agents proper number amongst their ranks several excellent men of business, and of great experience; and, on the principle of division of labour, are invaluable to those who either have not time or inclination to attend to their own business; but still, it cannot be forgotten that parliamentary agency is a branch of the solicitor's business, as much as Chancery and common law. It is proposed to give, from time to time, a few outlines of parliamentary proceedings, with the hope of assisting solicitors in conducting their own business.

A most excellent and interesting work on the Law and Practice of Parliament has been published by Mr. Erskine May, one of the clerks of the table of the House of Commons; but although invaluable as a work of authority, it does not comprise the details which are needed by a solicitor in conducting the preliminary stages of private bills.

Reverting to the rapid rise of parliamentary business, it will be remembered that the memorable years 1845 and 1846 brought to light the mysteries of parliamentary proceedings. There was not a solicitor of any standing who was not directly or indirectly concerned in prosecuting or opposing some private bill Nearly one thousand petitions for bills were presented to Parliament in 1846, and between three and four hundred private Acts were passed. Ever since that period, there has always been a steady amount of business, fluctuating, as a matter of course, with the state of the money market, and the spirit of speculation. Owing to the rapid strides which have taken place in all commercial pursuits (irrespective of railways), docks, harbours, piers, and other works of great magnitude have been required, and the demand for them has increased the number of applications for private Acts. Again, the improvement of country towns has occupied much attention, and private bills for the establishment of gas and water works, and for other measures of health or of convenience, occur constantly. The railway companies, also, are constantly obliged to come for new powers enabling them to make branches, or for the regulation of their capital.

It does seem strange, with this accumulation of business constantly recurring, that the practice of Parliament is still a "Lex non scripta." The practice, however, has shaken down, so to speak, into a regular system, and is dependent, to a great extent, on precedents and rules, which are generally understood by those who are daily in the habit of attending the committees.

The standing orders of both Houses are now assimilated as to most points of formal proceedings, but in all judicial proceedings before opposed committees much is left to the discretion of the members forming the committee as to who shall, and who shall not, be heard, and what evidence shall be received against the preamble and clauses of the bill. There is, however, one very important body in the House of Commons—viz., the Select Committee on Standing Orders—which is composed of business members, who pay great attention to the conduct of private bills, and to whom are referred all points relating to standing orders, where there has been any non-compliance with the orders of the House, or when it is sought to have any order relaxed in special cases, or to get an instruction to any particular committee moved in the House. The Standing Order Committee relieve the Speaker of a very onerous part of his duty; and not only do they form a tribunal for protecting promoters and opponents from injustice, which might arise from either side taking an unfair advantage of the technicalities of the business, but in all cases of difficulty the leading members of that committee are appealed to by the Chairmen of Committees on opposed Private Bills, for their advice and experience on questions of practice. In short, it may fairly be stated that no paid or unpaid judicial body work better, on the whole, than the Standing Order Committee.

The Chairman of Ways and Means is ex officio chairman of all unopposed committees, and has virtually an absolute power in settling and determining the provisions of bills. Two other members sit with him, but, in reality, the chairman settles the bill.

In the House of Lords, the Lord Chairman is, as a general rule, the sole and absolute authority on all questions of standing orders. In unopposed cases his word is law; but in opposed cases some of the members of the Standing Order Committee of the House of Lords sit with him. There are about forty members of that committee, though it seldom happens that more than ten attend. Of course, the duties and jurisdictions of these several committees will be a subject of future consideration in tracing the progress of a private bill through all its stages; but it is thought better to give the above short outline in the commencement, as the great object is not to write a treatise (which has been ably done by Mr. May) but to give the practical details of the business, in order to give the solicitor, who has parliamentary business put into his hands for the first time, some idea where to begin, what he will have to do, and what he will have to pay.

It would be impossible, in anything short of a three volume book, to set out in detail the proceedings on every kind of bill which can be the subject of parliamentary legislation. Both Houses of Parliament have rendered such a course unnecessary, by classifying the bills under two heads—viz. First and Second Class Bills. They are as follows:—

The First Class Bills comprise the following objects:

Burial Ground—Making, maintaining, or altering.

Charters and Corporations—Enlarging or altering powers of.

Church or Chapel—Building, enlarging, repairing, or maintaining.

City or Town—Paving, lighting, watching, cleansing, or improving.

Company—Incorporating or giving powers to.

County Rate.

County or Shire Hall—Court-house.

Crown, Church, or Corporation Property, or Property held in Trust for Public or Charitable Purposes.

Ferry.

Fishery—Making, maintaining, or improving.

Gaol or House of Correction.

Land—Inclosing, draining, or improving.

Letters Patent—Conferring, prolonging, or transferring the term of.

Local Court—Constituting.

Market or Market-place—Erecting, improving, repairing, maintaining, or regulating.

Police.

Poor—Maintaining or employing.

Poor-rate.

Powers to sue and be sued—Conferring.

Sewers and Sewerage (Lords only).

Stipendiary Magistrate or any Public Officer—Payment of; and continuing or amending an Act passed for any of the purposes included in this or the Second Class, when no further work than such as was authorised by former Act is proposed to be made.

The Second Class of private bills are bills for making, maintaining, varying, extending, or enlarging any Aqueduct, Archway, Bridge, Canal, Cut, Dock, Draining—Making or maintaining any cut for drainage, being a new work, when it is not provided in the bill that the same shall be not more than eleven feet at the bottom.

Embankment—For reclaiming land from the sea or any tidal river.

Ferry—Extending or enlarging, where any work is to be executed.

Harbour Navigation, Pier, Port, Railway, Reservoir, Sewer, Street, Tunnel, Turnpike, or other Carriage Road, Watercourse.

The only variation between the classes in the two Houses is, that in the Lords' Orders sewers and sewerage are classed in the first list, as well as in the second; but the first mention of sewer is applicable only to cases where no new cut, exceeding eleven feet in width, is contemplated, or (as defined by Mr. May) such work as would come under the provisions of a Town's Improvement Bill.

As a general rule, therefore, it may be laid down that a First Class Bill is a bill for conferring powers on companies, corporations, or local authorities, where no works are to be executed; and a Second Class Bill is a bill for obtaining powers to execute works, and to acquire land and houses compulsorily for that purpose. A Second Class Bill must necessarily comprise very many of the powers, and require compliance with all, or nearly all, the formal proceedings incident to a First Class Bill. A First Class Bill, on the contrary, is much simpler to conduct, and is not fettered with many of the requirements which Parliament imposes on the promoters of Second Class Bills.

It will not be out of place here to refer to the Joint-Stock Companies Act, which was passed during the last session of Parliament. By that Act, the former Acts were repealed, and, consequently, one part of the practice has been discontinued—viz. the provisional registration of companies before issuing the prospectus.

The Joint-Stock Companies Act is very valuable, where it is desired to incorporate a company with little expense; and in cases where it is doubtful whether or not it will be necessary to apply to Parliament, no harm can be done by registering under that Act, as the expense is trifling. When compulsory powers are not required, the facilities necessary for carrying on a company are easily obtained. The Joint-Stock Companies Act, however, does not meet all cases, and railway companies and other large bodies cannot be effectually governed without the aid of Parliament. By the provisions of the Joint-Stock Companies Act (19 & 20 Vict. c. 47), it is enacted, that not more than twenty persons shall, after the 3rd day of November, 1856, carry on in partnership any trade or business having gain for its object, unless they are registered as a company under the Act, or are authorised to carry on business under some Act of Parliament, or by Royal Charter or Letters Patent, or are engaged in working mines within, and subject to, the Stannaries. The clause goes on to state that the penalty of so carrying on business in contravention of this Act is, that every partner shall be liable for the whole debts of the partnership, and may be sued for the same, without the joinder in the action or suit of any other member of the partnership.

The memorandum of association must contain the following matters—viz.

1. The name of the proposed company.
2. The part of the United Kingdom in which the registered office of the company is to be established.
3. The objects for which the proposed company is to be established.
4. The liability of the shareholders, whether it is to be limited or unlimited.
5. The amount of the nominal capital.
6. The number of shares, and amount of each share.

N.B. In all cases where the company is proposed to be formed with limited liability, the word "limited" must be the last word in the name of the company.

It must be borne in mind, that no two companies must be registered under the same name, and in the event of a company being registered through inadvertence or otherwise under the same name as another company, the registrar has power to allow a change of name to the company first on the register. The memorandum of association must be prepared in the form annexed to the Act (Table A), and registered; and, when registered, will have the effect of binding the company, and all parties who become shareholders therein, to the same extent as if each shareholder had subscribed his name, and affixed his seal thereto, or otherwise duly executed the same, and there were in such memorandum contained a covenant on the part of himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators to conform to all the regulations of such memorandum. Every subscriber of the memorandum of association must take, at least, one share in the company.

These proceedings are all that are absolutely necessary in the case of a new company. The effect of such registration is, that the subscribers, on obtaining a certificate of complete registration, become incorporated, together with those who from time to time become shareholders, by the name prescribed in the memorandum of association, having a perpetual succession and common seal, with power to hold lands.

It is optional with the promoters whether they will register special articles of association or not. In default of their so doing, they become subject to the regulations for the management of the company set out in the schedule to the Act (Table B.). This table contains provisions relating to—1. The shares of the company. 2. Transmission of shares. 3. Forfeiture of shares. 4. Increase of capital. 5. General meetings. 6. Votes of shareholders. 7. Regulations as to directors. 8. The powers, disqualification, rotation, and proceedings of directors. 9. Audit of accounts. 10. Notices.

In fact, the act of complete registration has much the same effect as if the company were incorporated by Act of Parliament, and placed under the provisions of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act.

On the next occasion, the preliminary proceedings incident to the formation of a new company, and an application for an Act of Parliament for that purpose, will be considered.

Money Market.

CITY, Friday Evening.

The demand for bullion at the Bank of England has increased. It is said that more than half a million has been withdrawn during the week. The arrivals of gold from Australia have been considerable, but the chief part is destined to the continent. It is estimated that the shipment of specie, chiefly silver, by the mail packet of this day to India and China amounts to £700,000. The directors of the Bank of England came to a resolution at their weekly meeting yesterday to advance the rate of discount on bills of exchange, and interest on loans from 6 to 6½ per cent. This measure caused depression in the English Funds which has been only partly recovered. The last price of Consols was 93¼ per cent. Foreign securities are scarcely so well supported as during last week. The corn market continues very flat with a tendency to a further decline in prices. The payment to the public of the April dividends at the Bank, and of the life annuities at the National Debt Office will commence on Wednesday next. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 28th March, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,056,870, being an increase of £472,430, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £9,987,559, shewing a decrease of £334,738 when compared with the previous return. The stock of bullion held by the Bank of France has increased, and it is expected that further demand from that quarter will be relaxed.

The revenue accounts for the year, and for the quarter ending the 31st March, 1857, were published on Wednesday last. At first sight, the aspect of these accounts, compared with the previous year, is not favourable. The return of peace is naturally expected to be productive of a large increase in revenue. The late war did not obstruct the commercial intercourse of nations in so great a degree as the wars of earlier date, but, nevertheless, the cessation of hostilities brought a vast increase in imports and exports, and the result on Customs duties would appear much more favourable at the present moment, but for circumstances arising out of a decrease in rates of duty now taking place upon certain articles. It does not, however, follow that the lower duty will continue to be less productive than the higher duty. On the contrary, our financial measures, since the introduction of free-trade policy, have been successfully grounded upon the principle that low rates of duty cause larger consumption, and instead of loss in revenue, produce an increase.

In the amount received for Customs duties, there is a decrease of nearly £300,000 when compared with the corresponding quarter of the previous year. There has been in the last quarter a considerable increase in the amount received on various articles, but this increase has been counterbalanced by the deficiency which has arisen in the amount of duty paid upon Tea, Coffee, and Sugar. The dealers have been paying duty at the Custom-house previous to the 1st of April, on quantities only from hand to mouth. In this way, about £800,000 is supposed to have been kept back from the revenue during the last quarter of the financial year. It has been stated that 8,000,000lbs of Tea were expected to be cleared at the Custom-house immediately after the 31st March, to put the dealers in stock at the lower rate of duty now chargeable, and also large quantities of Coffee and Sugar. Of these payments, the current quarter will have the advantage. The amount received for Excise in the last quarter shows, by a similar comparison, an increase of about £90,000. The drawback repaid to dealers in Malt in the course of the quarter amounts to £250,000. The increase in Excise for the whole year, compared with the previous year, amounts to £850,000, and the amount re-paid for drawback upon Malt is nearly an equal sum. The increase in Customs for the whole year is £287,000, which increase has been produced and limited by the various causes before mentioned. The large comparative increase in Property-tax has been produced by the additional 2d. in the pound, which came into payment only in part of the previous year. The comparative increase under the head of Stamps in the year amounts to nearly £300,000, and is derived partly, perhaps, from general improvement, but more certainly from the growing amount of duty upon succession to estates.

An examination of these accounts, together with the explanatory notes accompanying them, affords only an indistinct view of the present and future financial position of the country We see that over two and half millions have been received during the financial year now ended, in excess of the previous year. We also know that nine millions a year of property tax now expire. Peace with all the world may be expected to add largely to the late wonderful increase in trade, and a considerable addition to revenue is probable. It will be the duty of Government and the new Parliament, not only to make the revenue equal to the expenditure as settled, but also to leave a good margin for contingent increase in expenditure, and for reduction of the public debt.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, APRIL 11, 1857.

THE REGISTRATION REPORT.

We print elsewhere the report of the Registration Commission. All the leading points which had to be decided before a working scheme could be framed will there be found fully and ably discussed; and we think that few who study the report with care will hesitate to concur in the Commissioners' conclusions as to the general form which the machinery of registration should be made to assume. The part of the proposed arrangements which is most open to question is, the suggestion of separate registers for ownership, charges, and leases. With respect to the last, it is certainly true that the interests created under building leases are, in ordinary dealings, seldom mixed up with the estate of the freeholder; and this is, perhaps, a sufficient reason why they should have a special register, on which the title to the term may appear, instead of leaving it in the position of an equitable or unregistered ownership, subordinate to the registered fee. Neither can it be denied that some advantages would result from having a distinct register of all the incumbrances on each estate. It would be no small gain, that every man who advanced his money would know at once the priority to which he was entitled, and the amount of the earlier charges on the inheritance. On the other hand, it is not very clear how the Commissioners propose to reconcile this system with the continuance of the facility which is now enjoyed by the owners of real property for raising money by a deposit of title-deeds.

We believe that no system of registration will be satisfactory to the commercial world which has the effect of disclosing to any curious inquirer the extent to which the real property of a merchant may, at any time, be mortgaged; and, in principle, the Commissioners fully recognise the necessity of maintaining intact the facilities of obtaining temporary loans without the publicity of registration. Indeed, they consider it one of the strong points of their proposed method of registration, that it would improve the security of lenders by way of equitable mortgage. So far as the details of this part of the scheme are shadowed forth by the report, the idea seems to be, that every registered landowner shall, upon registration, receive a certificate, and that, on every transfer of the registered ownership, the old certificate shall be cancelled, and a new one issued to the transferee. This, in fact, is just what is done by railway companies on transfers of stock; and if the land registration were confined to a single record of ownership, as is the case with stock, it is clear that the possession of the certificate would effectually prevent a fraudulent transfer, and would place the mortgagee with whom it was deposited in perfect security. But the working of the scheme would be somewhat less simple if a register of incumbrances were created, as suggested, side by side with a register of ownership. The Commissioners recommend that the priority of charges shall depend on the order in which they may be placed on the register of charges, and that unregistered charges shall be protected only in the same way as other unregistered interests. The protection to be afforded to such interests is by means of inhibitions or caveats, which are to operate like stop-orders on a fund in court, or distringases on stock, and to prevent any dealing without notice to the person by whom the caveat may have been entered. This would suffice in all cases where no objection existed to the entry of a caveat; but we should think that a man who had raised money by a deposit which he wished to keep secret, would be loath to see the name of an assurance office or of a Jew discounter figuring among the caveats entered against his property. In point of fact, there would be almost as much publicity by such a course as if the incumbrance were regularly entered in the list of registered charges, the only difference being that the caveat need not disclose the amount of the loan. It is quite clear, therefore, that some means must be found for protecting lenders on deposit other than a system of caveats, which is free enough from objection when used merely to guard the ulterior interests under a settlement. The only way in which such loans could be made perfectly secure without publicity would be by giving to the mere possession of the certificate the same power of preventing any dealing with the land which would be obtained by entering a caveat. For this purpose it would only be necessary to enact that no fresh charge should be entered on the register without the production of the old certificate, and that all such incumbrances should thereupon be indorsed upon the certificate before it is restored to the hands of the owner. If this were done, the depositee of a certificate would be in a better position than an equitable mortgagee enjoys now. It is possible, though not always very easy, for a fraudulent mortgagor to create a legal mortgage after having deposited his deeds to secure an advance. If he can succeed in explaining the absence of the deeds, so as to blind the legal mortgagee, the effect is, in the absence of gross negligence on the part of the second incumbrancer, to give him priority over the equitable charge which was first created; and many hard cases have occurred in which equitable mortgagees have been deprived in this way of their security. But if the production of the certificate were a sine quâ non to the creation of a new registered charge, the person with whom the document was deposited might rest assured that nothing which could happen behind his back could possibly invalidate his security on the land.

We have been led to enlarge on the necessity of a provision of this kind, because the report itself is not very explicit on the subject; and the bill which is added, by way of appendix, seems to contemplate the creation of charges by the mere written consent of the registered owner, without requiring the certificate to be produced. In this form, the measure would trench very seriously on the power of raising money easily, or lending it safely, upon a deposit; and some such provisions as we have mentioned seem to be needed to remove all doubt as to this essential point. It is, perhaps, not quite fair to criticise the details of a bill which the Commissioners put forward rather as a specimen to show the possibility of carrying a scheme of registration into practice, than as a perfect measure, which they are prepared to introduce without alteration. In some respects, indeed, the Commissioners tell us that the bill differs from the recommendations contained in the report, and the subject is besides so complicated that no measure ought to be treated as finally approved until it has been thoroughly ventilated in the profession, as was done with the only successful statutes which have been passed in modern times on the subject of real property law. In pointing out what appears to be a serious omission in the present draft, we are not seeking to cavil at the work for which the profession has good reason to be grateful to the Commission, but rather to contribute our mite of suggestion towards a valuable reform. There are other parts of the measure to which we shall hereafter have to refer, but the importance of preserving the facilities for temporary mortgages is so fully recognised by the report, and is so obvious in itself, that any doubt as to the operation of the scheme on such transactions seemed to call for our earliest attention. Registration affords the means of greatly facilitating loans of this description, and it is the more essential that the general scheme should not be impaired by a want of precision in so material a point.

BUSINESS IN THE CHANCERY OFFICES.

We printed in our paper of the 28th ult. a letter which had appeared in the Daily News, complaining that what are called the "reforms" of the Court of Chancery, are really undeserving of such a name, and professing to describe with minute accuracy a course of delay, trifling, and imbecility by which the patience as well as the purse of the suitor is exhausted, and the ancient infamy of the Court preserved in spite of all that has been done for its regeneration. Now it is not going too far to say that every material allegation in this letter may be entirely disproved, as we hope presently to show; but at the same time we are bound to admit that unnecessary delays do occur in the offices of the Court of Chancery, and that some expectations founded on the important reforms inaugurated a few years ago remain at this hour unfulfilled. We must, however, be allowed to add that the solicitors of the Court are not responsible for these shortcomings, and that they are in many cases to be attributed to the neglect of practical suggestions which have been urged upon the authorities by solicitors, with far more public spirit and perseverance than success for the proposal or credit to those who have originated it. The popular notion, we are quite aware, is that the solicitors contrive and preserve all these impediments to the free course of business, and that they are personally interested in so doing. But this is a double fallacy. Some reforms now in operation, and others which we hope in time to see adopted, were first suggested, and have been over and over again recommended by solicitors. And, although there may be a few large offices which, having as much business on hand as they can do or wish to do, and perhaps a great deal more, do find a gentle and often intermitted course of proceeding suit their habits and arrangements best; it is quite certain that the great majority of the profession would discover their true advantage in every change which tended to simplify and accelerate the progress of litigation in our courts.

The writer in the Daily News complains, firstly, of the manner of proceeding in the chambers of the Chancery judges, where the business formerly done with marvellous procrastination and expense in the Master's office, is now conducted, very much more cheaply and expeditiously. He represents that "instead of proceeding day by day, until the matter be exhausted, a month generally intervenes between one attendance before the chief clerk and another, and then half the time is frittered away in endeavouring to retrace what had been done on the former attendance." Now, we believe the truth to be that the chief clerks have really too much to do, and that it would be advisable either to increase their number or to relieve them of a portion of their routine duties by the appointment of junior clerks. It may also be observed that, in the opinion of many experienced solicitors, the progress of business would be much facilitated by enabling the judges to devote more of their time to chambers. This, however, would not be possible unless the number of judges were increased. It may often happen that a long discussion will be carried on before the chief clerk, who, after all, perhaps, declares himself unable to decide the question in dispute, whereas, if the judge had been in chambers and accessible, a few minutes of his attention would have sufficed to solve the difficulty. It is, of course, always possible to adjourn questions of legal nicety for discussion by counsel in open court; and many persons hold that this is the preferable course. We doubt, however, whether that opinion is founded upon an extensive practical acquaintance with the character of the business done in chambers. Suppose the Bankruptcy courts to be organised on a similar principle to the Chancery judges' chambers, we should then have the great mass of business disposed of by an officer of equal qualifications with a judge's chief clerk, and questions of special difficulty would be delayed for final argument and decision by a judge. Would the bankruptcy business be despatched with anything like the same facility as under the present system? We cannot doubt that the answer to this question must be in the negative. We are, of course, aware that solicitors appear before the judge at chambers, whereas counsel would be employed in court; and it may, perhaps, be suggested that we have an interested motive in advocating the employment of solicitors rather than of the bar. But it is scarcely necessary to point out that in this respect, at least, the interest of the lawyers and of their clients is absolutely identical. Whatever tends to improve the efficiency of the Court of Chancery, and to remove every lingering trace of the prejudices that once prevailed against it, tends also to benefit alike the counsel and solicitors practising in that court. It would be blind and suicidal folly to allow any jealousy between the two branches of the profession to interfere with the impartial examination of every suggestion for reform.

But even if the staff of judges and clerks were made as perfect as can be conceived possible, it would not generally be found convenient to proceed "day by day until the matter be exhausted," as is demanded by the writer in the Daily News. A suitor very naturally forgets that he is not the only client, nor is his the only suit existing in the world. His business cannot, under any imaginable system, command the undivided time and attention of his own and several other solicitors, and of the judge's clerk. This can never be effected until there are as many solicitors and judge's clerks as suitors. If this writer went into a barber's shop on Sunday morning to get shaved he would have to wait his turn, and surely he ought not to complain of the same regular rotation at the judges' chambers. Besides, let him inquire how long an arbitrator appointed at common law, or any judge or court at home or abroad, would take to examine accounts of equal length and complication to those constantly investigated at chambers. The Chancery procedure, even as at present organised, and open as we say it is to improvement in various ways, would certainly not suffer by comparison with any other tribunal charged with business of equal difficulty. It would be impossible to proceed from day to day in taking accounts, unless the case on each side as to every item in these accounts were complete at all points, before the first appointment to proceed. But this is quite impracticable, unless, indeed, the discovery of the truth is to be made subordinate to rapidity of procedure. One side, perhaps, produces affidavits which might have been, and were, ready in the first instance. The other side hereupon desires to produce affidavits in answer, and then it may appear expedient to cross-examine vivâ voce the deponents on both sides. For these, and many other equally valid reasons, it is often found convenient to proceed at intervals of perhaps a fortnight, instead of from day to day. But to say that "a month generally intervenes" between the appointments, is a gross exaggeration; and to pretend that "half-an-hour only" is "usually allotted" to each appointment, is altogether contrary to fact. How a writer who professes to be familiar with "the practical working of the system," could hazard such a misstatement, we cannot understand. There is usually no difficulty at all in obtaining an appointment for two or three hours, at the distance not of a month, but of ten or fourteen days. Certainly, we must admit that, even at a fortnight's interval, some short time would necessarily be occupied in retracing what had been done on the last occasion. But if the appointment be for two or three hours, instead of half-an-hour, as alleged, the time thus employed would form but a small proportion of the whole attendance; and if adjournment be, in many cases, inevitable, we must submit, so long as the faculties of chief clerks are merely human, to the delay required for "brushing up their memories." We should add that, in short and simple cases, there is no difficulty in obtaining an appointment for half-an-hour on an early day, and often the clerk's attention may be secured for that length of time without any appointment having been made.

The next important allegation of this letter, that "the chief clerk requires to be furnished with a duplicate of every document and paper filed, for his own use," is singularly at variance with the truth. By the 23rd Order of 16th October, 1852, regulating the course of proceeding at chambers, it is provided that "no states of facts, charges, or discharges, are to be brought in. But, when directed, copies, abstracts, or extracts, of or from accounts, deeds, or other documents, and pedigrees, and conc'se statements are to be supplied for the use of the judge and his chief clerk." Now, under this order, so far from "formidable sums" being "squandered away for superfluous documents," as represented by the writer in the Daily News, it may well be doubted whether the opposite error of too strict economy has not been committed, and whether the course of business is not frequently impeded by the absence of those very copies of proceedings and documents, which, it is said, are unnecessarily multiplied. One could accept almost any statement as to the cost of the Royal British Bank litigation, except the particular fiction which has been hazarded in the Daily News. We do not believe that £5,000, or any sum near that figure, has been wasted in making useless copies to stuff the "ponderous portfolio" of the chief clerk at chambers. In the Master's Offices, an expensive and cumbrous system prevailed of carrying in either copies or proceedings, which differed from copies in little, except that they were far more costly. The Chancery Commissioners, in their anxiety to reform this practice, appear to have run into the opposite extreme. Probably, if printing were more extensively used in Chancery proceedings, the course of business at chambers would be facilitated without additional expense. It would be necessary, however, to take care that the already diminished remuneration of the solicitor should not be still further reduced by the substitution of print for copying without any equivalent for his loss of profit.

In dealing with the Taxing Masters, this writer is as unfortunate in the points he selects for censure, as we have shown him to be in his remarks upon the judges' chambers. In taxing a bill of costs it is necessary to show that the fees charged have been paid to counsel, and that the pleadings contain the number of folios stated in the bill. The practice used to be to produce the necessary evidence to the master who taxed the costs. Afterwards it was very reasonably thought that the verification of these details did not require the attention of an officer very highly paid, and who ought to be very highly qualified. It seemed to be work, not for the taxing master, but for a clerk of ordinary faculties and moderate stipend. The change made was exactly that which we think might now, to some extent, be advantageously imitated in the judges' chambers. It certainly is not necessary to pay a man at the rate of £1,000 or £2,000 a-year to see that a proper voucher is produced for a fee to counsel or for an infant's schooling. And yet the writer in the Daily News denounces as "a prolific source of delay, expense, and vexation," a reform so obvious and undeniable that the only wonder is how it came to be so long postponed, and why it has not been more generally adopted. But this is all the thanks that lawyers and laymen get for labouring to improve the Court of Chancery. Their reforms are called "deforms," and writers affecting a knowledge of detail only too sure to impose upon the public enormously exaggerate evils which are, to a great extent, inevitable, and then attribute them to the very changes which appeared most necessary, and which, if fairly understood, the common consent of mankind would pronounce to have been most judicious.

Legal News.

A recent number of the Manchester Guardian contains a report of a public meeting held at Manchester to adopt resolutions in favour of holding separate assizes in that town for the hundred of Salford. It is intended to present a memorial, agreed to at this meeting, to the commission now inquiring into the arrangements of the circuits, and we think that both the position of the memorialists and the strength of the claim they urge well entitle them to the attention of the commissioners. We published in our impression of the 14th ult. the substance of a memorial on this subject, presented by the Manchester Law Association to the commission, and we regret that the great length of the Registration Report forbids our giving in our present number any further notice of the proceedings at this important meeting. In order to make room for the report, which we print entire, we have been obliged either to omit or curtail much of the usual contents of our Journal.

SIR F. KELLY ON REGISTRATION AND LAWYERS' BILLS.—In the course of his address to the electors of East Suffolk, on Wednesday week, Sir F. Kelly, said:—"There is one measure, and one only which I will detain you by alluding to, because it is one specially affecting the interests of the inhabitants of this county, of all counties in general, affecting those who are closely connected with what is called the landed interest. It is a measure upon which I have bestowed the greatest attention, a measure for what is called the Registration of Titles, for simplifying and cheapening the conveyance, the mortgage, or dealing in any way with land. There is probably no one among you who has not at one period of his life, either bought a piece of land, or sold a piece of land, or mortgaged a piece of land, or lent money upon the mortgage of a piece of land, or done something or other in which the title to the land had to be investigated. If that be so, that person, whoever he may be, knows well what an attorney's or lawyer's bill means. I mean to speak with the greatest respect, and, I may add, with the greatest forbearance, of my many excellent friends belonging to that department of my own profession, but I do say that it is a great grievance, that if a man possesses a thousand pounds in stock he can go up to London, or by signing a power of attorney, can, without any expense at all, sell that stock, and put the money into his pocket, while, if he has to sell a piece of land, for half a thousand pounds, he may be put to £60 or £70 expense for conveyance and lawyers' bills. I have framed a measure, and if the Government will support me in it, before long, when I meet you again, I shall have to tell you that I have passed a measure, so far simplifying and facilitating the dealing with land that you may mortgage it, or deal with it in any way you please afterwards. I mean, of course, except as to stamps and duties—those are matters of fiscal revenue with which we cannot interfere, but, with that single exception, you may deal with land as you may deal with stock in the funds, and get rid of these unfortunate lawyer's bills, which I confess are a great grievance." These observations have called forth the following letters addressed to the Editor of the Ipswich Journal, by solicitors practising in that town.

SIR,—Sir Fitzroy Kelly, in his speech from the hustings on Wednesday last, after mentioning the facility with which a man may sell £1,000 in the funds, and suggesting that probably there were few of his audience who had not been concerned in the sale, or purchase, or mortgage of land, added that if the same man should have to sell a piece of land for £500, he might be put to £60 or £70 expense for Lawyers' Bills.

Knowing this to be a most exaggerated statement, we, who represent five "lawyers'" establishments in Ipswich, have extracted from our books all the cases in which we have, during the last three years, acted in sales, purchases, and mortgages for £500 and under, and the result is as follows;—We have conducted 114 of such sales at an average cost of £7 11s. 1d.; we have conducted 196 of such purchases at an average cost of (exclusive of stamps) £6 5s. 9d.; and we have conducted 139 of such mortgages, also, at an average cost (exclusive of stamps) of £6 5s. 9d.

We have no reason to suppose that the charges in Ipswich are materially lower than those in other places, and, assuming this to be the fact, we think that we, and the profession at large—aye, and the public also—have reason to complain that a man, in the high legal position of Sir Fitzroy Kelly, should make so unfounded a statement as that we have mentioned.

We do not complain that he, or any others, who aspire to be distinguished as law reformers, should attempt to simplify and cheapen the present system of transferring land. If it be (as is asserted, but which we doubt) an impediment to transfer, we should, by an appropriate alteration (if such be possible), receive our compensation in the increased extent of business. But we do complain that he, and others, should commence their labours without being well informed as to the facts with which they propose to deal; and, still more, that they should, on an imperfect knowledge of the subject, seek to excite a popular clamour against a branch of the profession as honourable as their own.

Unless the bill, which Sir Fitzroy Kelly says he has in readiness, is based upon more accurate practical information than his recent statement, we may safely venture to predict that it will end in disappointment to himself as the promoter, and to the public whose expectations he has raised.

We are, Sir, your obedient servants,
S. B. JACKAMAN.

LAW LECTURES.—TRINITY TERM, 1857.

Prospectus of the Lectures to be delivered during the ensuing Educational Term, by the several Readers appointed by the Inns of Court:—

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW AND LEGAL HISTORY.

The Public Lectures to be delivered by the Reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History will comprise the following subjects:—

The Reign of Anne, and the Character of the Government of George I. and George II.; the Progress of our Jurisprudence, the State Trials, and the Proceedings of Parliament during that period.

The Public Lectures will be delivered in Lincoln's-inn Hall, on Wednesdays, at 2 p.m., commencing on April 15.

In his Private Classes the Reader will proceed from the reign of William III. down to the year 1782.

Books.—Millar's "View of the English Constitution;" "The State Trials of the Period;" "Statute Book;" "Rapin's History;" Hallam's "Constitutional History."

The Private Lectures will be delivered in the Benchers' Reading-room, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, at 9½ to 11½ a.m., commencing on April 16.

Equity.

The Reader on Equity proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, twelve Lectures on the following subjects:—

1. On the Doctrine of Performance and Satisfaction.
2. On the Implied Substitution of one gift for another.
3. On Election.
4. On the Jurisdiction exercised by Courts of Equity concurrently with Courts of Law, and on the Amalgamation of Common Law with Equity.
5. On the Jurisdiction of Equity in matters of Account.
6. On Partnership.
7. On Frauds remediable in Courts of Equity.

The Public Lectures will be delivered, in Lincoln's-inn Hall, on Thursdays, at 2 p.m., commencing on April 16.

The Reader will continue with his Senior and Junior Classes the general course of Equity already commenced. He will also continue in the Senior Class, and commence in the Junior, to explain the Leading Rules of Pleading in Equity from the work of Lord Redesdale.

The Private Lectures will be delivered, in the Benchers' Reading-room, on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, at 3¼ and 4¼ p.m., commencing on April 17.

Law of Real Property, &c.

The Reader on the Law of Real Property, &c., proposes to deliver, in the ensuing Educational Term, a course of twelve Public Lectures on the following subjects:—

1. The Devolution and Transmission of Powers and Trusts for Sale.
2. The Law of Mortmain.
3. Attendant Terms; the Satisfied Terms Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 112.
4. The Statute 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106.
5. The Law of Dower.
6. The Apportionment of Rent and Annuities.

The Public Lectures will be delivered, in Gray's-inn Hall, on Fridays, at 2 p.m., commencing on April 17.

In his Private Classes, the Reader on Real Property Law will refer more particularly to the leading cases cited in the Public Lectures. He will also discuss the forms of Requisitions to be made on the Investigation of Titles shown upon abstracts delivered by vendors to purchasers, and the nature of the evidence required by conveyancers in proof of such titles.

The Private Lectures will be delivered, in the North Library, on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, at 11¾ to 1¼ p.m., commencing on April 20.

Jurisprudence and the Civil Law.

The Reader on Jurisprudence and the Civil Law proposes, during the ensuing Educational Term, to deliver twelve Public Lectures on the following subjects:—

The Sources of Personal Law; the Early History of the Law of Property; the Early History of the Law of Contract, and the Mature Jurisprudence of Rome on the subject of Contract; the Law of Testaments, its Ancient and Modern History; the Roman Law of Civil Process.

The Public Lectures will be delivered, in the Middle Temple Hall, on Tuesdays, at 2 p.m., commencing on April 21.

The Reader will, with his Private Class, consider the subject of Roman Law in its bearing on Modern Jurisprudence, using, as his text-book, the Systema Juris Romani Hodie Usitati of Mackeldey (Leipsig, 1847).

The Private Lectures will be delivered, at 4, Garden-court, Temple, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, at 3¾ p.m., commencing on April 23.

Common Law.

The Reader on Common Law proposes to deliver, during the ensuing Educational Term, twelve Public Lectures, of which three (prior to the recess) will be in continuation of the subject treated of in the preceding course, and the nine remaining Lectures will be devoted to Criminal Law and matters therewith connected. The programme of the Lectures will be as under:—

Lectures 1—3 will treat of Mercantile Law generally, Mercantile Persons, and Instruments.

Lecture 4 will be introductory to the subject of Criminal Law.

Lectures 5—7 will treat of Proceedings at the Police Court, or before the Committing Magistrate; Sir J. Jervis's Acts; Superior Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction; the Indictment, its office and nature.

Lecture 8.—The leading provisions of Lord Campbell's Acts will herein be considered and explained.

Lectures 9—12 will be occupied in analysing and defining Offences of ordinary occurrence, triable at Quarter Sessions and the Assizes, and in directing attention to the Rules of Evidence appropriate to their investigation.

The Public Lectures will be delivered, in the Inner Temple Hall, on Mondays, at 2 p.m., commencing on April 20.

With his Class the Reader on Common Law will examine minutely the subjects above specified, illustrating them by reference to the most important recent cases, and to the following works:—Smith's Mercantile Law and Leading Cases; Archbold's Criminal Pleading (by Welsby); Greaves' Edition of Lord Campbell's Acts; and Taylor on Evidence (2nd edit.).

The Private Lectures will be delivered, in the Inner Temple Hall, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, at 11¾ to 1¾ p.m., commencing on April 21.

By order of the Council,

(Signed) Francis Whitmarsh,
Chairman (pro tem.).

Council Chambers, Lincoln's-inn, March 27.

Note.—The Educational Term commences on the 15th April, and ends on the 31st July, subject to a deduction of the days intervening between the end of Easter and the beginning of Trinity Law Terms. The Public Lectures and Private Classes will be suspended after Friday, the 8th day of May next, and will be resumed, at the appointed days and hours, on and after Thursday, the 28th of May.

Chancery Vacation Notice.—The Chambers of the Vice Chancellor Sir R. T. Kindersley will be open on Tuesday, the 14th April, for the transaction of Vacation business.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

There are, in the books, a great number of cases turning upon the widow's election between her right to dower and under her husband's will. In the modern cases of Ellis v. Lewis (3 Hare, 310), and Gibson v. Gibson (1 Drew. 42), the law on the subject has been very fully discussed, and does not now appear to be open to much doubt. It seems to be well settled that where the widow's claim under the will is not inconsistent with her right to dower—where she may consistently enjoy her legal interest paramount to the will, and her testamentary interest under it—the Court will not put her to elect. "A devise of lands, eo nomine," said Sir J. Wigram, V. C., in Ellis v. Lewis, "upon trust for sale, or a devise of lands, eo nomine, to a devisee beneficially, does not, per se, express an intention to devise the land otherwise than subject to its legal incidents, that of dower included. There must be something inconsistent with the enjoyment by the widow of her dower by metes and bounds." Birmingham v. Kirwan (2 Scho. & Lef. 444), and some other decisions, are to the same effect. The question remains, however, as to what is to be considered as exhibiting an intention to exclude the widow from her dower; and on this, considerable difference of opinion among the judges is observable in their decisions. Some, with Lord Alvanley, in French v. Davies (2 Ves., jun., 578), throw upon the party claiming against the widow the entire onus of showing, by "clear, plain, and incontrovertible proofs, that the testator could not possibly give what he has given consistently with her claim of dower;" and have held, therefore, that a widow is not put to her election between her dower and an annuity under her husband's will (Greatorex v. Cary, 6 Ves. 615); or a devise to her for life of a mansion-house and the land held with it, being part of the same estate out of which she claimed dower (Lord Dorchester v. Earl of Effingham, Coop. 319). Others have considered an annuity as inconsistent with dower, as where all the testator's lands subject to the annuity were given by the will of the testator upon other trusts. In such a case (Villareal v. Lord Galway, Ambl. 682), Lord Camden held that there was a necessary implication to bar the dower, because the disposition of the testator's property was such as to leave no fund for her claim of both; and he considered it to be exactly the same thing whether the testator had said she should be barred, or had so disposed of his property as to leave no fund to answer the double claim. In the recent case of Bending v. Bending (5 W. R. 485), the effect of a devise in trust for sale in putting the widow to her election was discussed. In that case, V. C. Wood followed the rule laid down by Lord Thurlow in Foster v. Cooke (3 Bro. C. C. 347), and repeated (as stated above) by Sir James Wigram in Ellis v. Lewis. The testator, in Bending v. Bending, directed his executors to sell all his freehold and copyhold estates, and gave half of the proceeds to his wife absolutely. She also took the same proportion of his personalty. The question was, whether she was also entitled to dower? The Vice-Chancellor held that she was, there being nothing in the will inconsistent with the right of the widow to have her dower set out by metes and bounds.

In Cox v. Bishop (5 W. R. 437) it was held by the Lords Justices, reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls, that equitable assignees of a legal term of years, subject to reserved rents and covenants, were not liable, in equity, after they had parted with their interest, to be sued by the lessor for rent payable and breaches of the covenants accrued during the term of possession and enjoyment by them, under their equitable assignment; inasmuch as the rights of the lessor, whatever they were, were legal rights, and could be enforced at law. The question was substantially the same in principle as arose in Walters v. The Northern Coal Mining Company (4 W. R. 140), similarly decided by the Lord Chancellor little more than a year ago.

In Denne v. Light (5 W. R. 430) the owner of a small piece of arable land, part of an uninclosed common field, surrounded on all sides by the land of other persons, contracted to sell it to a person who lived in the neighbourhood. The contract was silent as to any right of way; but it appeared that there was a custom for the owners of pieces of land within the common field to pass over one another's land at a certain time of the year. The nature or extent of the custom, however, was not in evidence. The purchaser objected to complete the contract, upon the ground that the contract implied a cartway, the land being arable; and upon appeal from V. C. Stuart, the Lords Justices decided in favour of the objection, it not appearing upon the evidence, to the satisfaction of the Court, that the purchaser was aware of the rights of the surrounding proprietors; and there being evidence to show that the vendor made representations inducing the purchaser to believe that there was an undoubted right of way to the field in question. L. J. Turner said, that it was not consistent with the principles of a court of equity to enforce such a contract, without a way for carts and carriages, as such a course would be, in fact, to make a purchaser pay for what he could not enjoy.

CONTRACTS OF SALE—ORDER FOR GOODS TO BE MADE "AS SOON AS POSSIBLE."

Attwood & Another v. Emery, 1 C. B. (N. S.), 110.

This case decides the legal intendment of an expression often used in contracts of sale—viz., an engagement to furnish goods still in the course of manufacture "as soon as possible." The plaintiffs were iron merchants, and the defendant a cooper. The defendant having occasion to finish a large number of casks within a limited time, asked the plaintiffs' manager within what time he could execute an order for iron hoops, and his answer being satisfactory, the defendant afterwards sent a written order for the quantity required (about fifteen tons), requesting that the hoops might be delivered as soon as possible. Ultimately, the hoops not being delivered in time for his purpose, the defendant was obliged to procure them elsewhere, and consequently wrote to the plaintiffs, explaining this, and saying that he could not take the hoops ordered; but the plaintiffs returned for an answer that they had already forwarded a portion, and that the remainder would follow forthwith, and refused to accept the countermand; and the defendant persisting in his refusal to receive them, the present action was brought for not accepting and paying for the goods ordered. The jury at the trial returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, but leave was reserved to the defendant to enter a verdict if the Court above should be of opinion either that the plaintiffs were bound to procure the articles elsewhere, in case they were unable to make them themselves at once, or that they were bound to lay aside every other work in order to proceed to the execution of this particular contract. It was now argued on behalf of the plaintiffs, that they were, by the terms of the contract on which they sued, only bound to deliver the hoops within a reasonable time, regard being had to the means they possessed of executing the order, and to the quantity of work they might happen to have in hand. And this construction was acceded to by the Court; for, as remarked by Williams, J., the plaintiffs could not be supposed to be contracting without regard to orders which they had already received, and which were entitled to priority of execution. If the defendant had desired to have the goods by a limited time, he should have taken care to give a more limited order.

ATTORNEY—RESPONSIBILITY OF, FOR ACTS DONE BY CLERKS.

Re W. V. Eyre, Palmer v. Evans 1 C. B. (N. S.) 161.

This was a rule calling on Mr. E., an attorney of the court, to answer the matters contained in certain affidavits, wherein it was alleged that he had obtained from the defendant an excessive sum for costs, upon an untrue assertion that judgment had been signed, and execution issued. The affidavits used in showing cause failed to satisfy the Court that the alleged extortion had not been practised, but did satisfy them that Mr. E. was not personally cognisant of the matter. And certain observations now fell from the Court, which, on account of the importance of the subject, here follow entire: "It seems that there has been very improper conduct on the part of some one in Mr. E.'s office, in extorting from the defendant an excessive sum for costs, under the false pretext that something had been done, which, in fact, had not been done. It does not, however, appear that the matter came personally to the cognisance of Mr. E. But, inasmuch as it was done in his office, and by a person for whose acts he is responsible, and as he received the money, we think he is so far implicated as to make him responsible. It is our duty to see that the power which the law has placed in the hands of the plaintiff and his attorney is not made an instrument of extortion and oppression. We think the justice of the case will be answered by discharging this rule, on Mr. E.'s refunding the amount received by him in excess, and paying the costs of the rule."

In connection with this case, another decision of the same Court should be noted, viz. that of Dunkley v. Farris (11 C. B. 457), where an attorney's clerk had fraudulently simulated the court seal upon a writ of summons, and the court set aside the writ and all proceedings thereon, and ordered the attorney (though blameless personally) to pay the costs.

Registration of Title.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS APPOINTED TO CONSIDER THE SUBJECT OF THE REGISTRATION OF TITLE WITH REFERENCE TO THE SALE AND TRANSFER OF LAND

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY IN HER HIGH COURT OF CHANCERY.

In pursuance of your Majesty's Commission authorising and appointing us to consider the subject of the Registration of Title with reference to the sale and transfer of land, and generally to inquire into and consider the advantages and disadvantages attending such a system, we, your Majesty's Commissioners humbly beg leave to present to your Majesty the following Report:—

1. Origin of Inquiry.]—The issuing of this Commission was recommended by a Select Committee of the House of Commons, to whom a bill for the registration of assurances, and certain other bills for facilitating the sale and transfer of land, were referred for consideration during the Parliamentary session of 1853. Under these circumstances we deem it right to advert to the report of that committee and the evidence appended to it, in order that we may ascertain and constantly bear in mind the full scope and object of the inquiry, which, by your Majesty's command, we have undertaken.

2. Report of Select Committee of the House of Commons on Registration of Assurances Bill, 1853, and other Bills.]—We find that three bills were submitted to the consideration of the committee, the first of which had been sent down from the House of Lords. These bills were intitled: 1. A bill for the registration of assurances. 2. A bill to facilitate the sale and purchase of land. And 3. A bill to facilitate the transfer of land in Ireland. The committee reported that the first of these bills contained within itself two distinct principles of registration; the one, contemplating the registration of all assurances in any manner relating to land, and the legal or equitable estate and interest therein; the other, proposing that the legal title alone should be entered in the registry, and that there should be no necessity to register the instruments which declare or transmit the beneficial interest or equitable ownership. They also stated that the two other bills proceeded upon a principle similar to that referred to as contained in the first bill, namely, the principle of keeping the registered ownership wholly separate and apart from the equitable right or title. And they further observed, that "pursuing that idea, and confining their attention to that principle, they had examined some witnesses of high professional reputation, who had brought under their notice a scheme for the registration of title or of legal ownership, which, if it could be fully developed and made capable of easy practical operation, would appear to them to fulfil the most important conditions of registration, and to afford the means of insuring great facility for the transfer of land combined with great simplicity and security of title."

The advantages to be derived from some system of registration of land are therefore assumed by the committee, provided that the difficulties which have hitherto stood in the way of a practical settlement of this important question can be removed or obviated.

3. Evidence made use of in this inquiry.]—In prosecuting our inquiries, we have availed ourselves of the labours of former commissioners, especially the second report of the real property commissioners in 1832, and the report of the registration and conveyancing commissioners in 1850. We have also consulted the report of the commissioners appointed to inquire into the working of the Encumbered Estates Court in Ireland in 1855, and the evidence taken before the select committee of the House of Commons on the registration of assurances in 1853, and we have referred to the report in 1856 of the select committee of the House of Commons on the Court of Chancery (Ireland) bills.

We have further directed a series of questions to be circulated in different parts of the kingdom among persons practically acquainted with the subject; and these questions, together with the answers thereto, will be found in the Appendix. We have likewise examined some witnesses vivâ voce, partly with the view of ascertaining more accurately the nature of the plan submitted to the House of Commons in 1853; partly to obtain information on the subject of maps, which afford, in the opinion of many persons, the best means of describing and identifying landed property, and indexing registered titles of it; and partly to learn how the system of stop-orders or distringases works at the Bank of England in restraining the transfer of the public funds.

We have also the pleasure of acknowledging that we have been assisted in our inquiries by different observations and suggestions which have been communicated to us upon the subject of registration, two of which papers we have printed in the Appendix (a), and by several publications upon the subject of registration, and the means of improving the title to landed property, which have been laid before us by the authors of them, and which are mentioned in the note below (b).

As to Registration generally—The Existing Systems—and the Failure of previous Attempts at a General Registration.

4. Expediency of some Registration.]—We need not dwell on the advantages to be derived from registration of the ownership of land; they are, and have been for a long time, very generally admitted.

In the earlier periods of our history, publicity was considered essential in almost all dealings with landed property. The transfer of the immediate freehold in possession was made notorious by livery of seisin; the transfer of the remainder or reversion was made equally notorious by the attornment of the tenant of the estate in possession, by which he recognised the new proprietor; the surrender of copyholds, followed by the admission of the copyholder, was an open avowal in the presence of the lord, and before the whole homage, that an old tenant had died or disposed of his interest, and that a new tenant had come into the manor, and taken his place; fines with proclamations were public acknowledgments in the King's Courts that an estate which was supposed to belong to one man was in truth the estate or property of another; while easements, such as rights of way and rights of water, were evidenced and kept in existence by the notoriety of continued user and actual enjoyment. The Statutes of Uses and Enrolments were passed with similar objects. By them the Legislature sought to abolish that secret transfer of land which had begun to prevail by means of private confidences, enforced by the jurisdiction of Courts of Equity. Accordingly, the former of these Statutes transferred the use into possession; while the latter rendered void any bargain and sale limiting an estate of freehold which was not enrolled in the Court of Chancery. But the object of these provisions was soon evaded by a subtle construction and contrivance; and instead of giving publicity and notoriety to equitable transfers, the Statute of Uses was so interpreted as to make even legal conveyances, what they never were before, secret. So obvious were the evils resulting from this change, that, from the time of James the First to the present, repeated attempts have been made to remedy them by means of public registration, but made in vain. An historical account of these attempts was furnished by Mr. Sanders to the Registration and Conveyancing Commissioners, and it will be found at length in the 6th Appendix to their Report. (c) It appears therefrom that the principle of registration has been constantly recommended by the ablest lawyers and statesmen; that this principle has been repeatedly recognised by both Houses of Parliament separately, though they have failed to agree in the details of a measure which might pass into a law; that the difficulty and uncertainty of finding out such charges and incumbrances as affected the land, was early considered to be highly prejudicial to purchasers and creditors; that as early as the reign of Charles the Second (d) this uncertainty of titles to estates was deemed to be "one cause of the decay of rents and value of lands;" and that the same conviction, instead of being diminished, has been so much strengthened by subsequent experience, that upwards of twenty bills have, within the course of the last twenty years, been brought into Parliament for the purpose of establishing systems of registration. It should also be remembered that the Select Committee of the House of Lords appointed to inquire into the Burdens upon Land, having attributed the diminution of the marketable value of real property to the tedious and expensive process attending its transfer, expressed themselves as anxious to impress on the House the necessity of a thorough revision of the whole subject of conveyancing, and the disuse of the present prolix and vexatious system. They also recommended the improvement of the law of real property, the simplification of titles, and of the forms of conveyance, and the establishment of some effective system in the registration of deeds.

5. Failures of previous measures owing to the objection to a Registration of Assurances.]—With such a remarkable concurrence of opinion, the failure of measures so often proposed and so generally desired can hardly be attributed to any other cause than the practical difficulties which, upon examination, are seen to be inherent in or likely to result from a system of registration of assurances. The fear that such a system of registration would be found to be productive of evils as great, or nearly as great, as those against which it was intended to provide, was probably the main reason with induced the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1853 to pause in adopting the bill then before them, and to suggest, instead of passing a measure of that description, the appointment of a commission for the purpose of considering the subject of registration of title, with a view to facilitate the sale and transfer of land. Bearing this in mind, we deemed it our duty in the first instance to address ourselves more particularly to a careful examination of the defects imputed and the objections entertained to a system of registration of assurances, in order that we might judge how far they might be remedied and overcome by a system of registration of title.

6. Matters to be considered with reference to a system of Registration].—In order to form a just opinion as to the suitableness or sufficiency of a register of assurances, or of the species of registration which we are appointed to consider as a remedy for the objections it is intended to remove, it may be desirable that we should first advert to the examples already existing in our law of modes of registration; secondly, to the chief causes and grounds of complaint which are alleged against the existing system of transfer of land; and thirdly, to the peculiarities in the law of real property and the practice of conveyancing, which cast, as it is considered, unfair burdens on the owners of land, and injuriously interfere with the profitable use and enjoyment of land.

7. The different kinds of Registration existing]. — Various systems and methods of registration are found actually existing in practice, for the protection of the title to landed and other property. The peculiarities and incidents of these different systems we think it necessary to bear in mind in the investigation of the subject before us.

The various kinds of registry, or modes of registration, to which we refer, differ materially in their objects and their extent, and may be distinguished as follows:—

1. A register of incumbrances and securities for debt; as,

(a) "A Plan for the Registration of Titles to Land," by Mr. Randell Macdonnell. "Letter and Plan" of Mr. Edward Thomas Wakefield.

(b) "Shall we Transfer our Lands by Register?" by Joseph Goodeve, Esq. "Suggestions for a General Index of Title to Real and Personal Property," by W. R. A. Boyle, Esq. "The Annihilation of past Titles considered as the only effectual Amelioration of present Titles, with a Scheme for its Accomplishment," by T. P. Keene, Esq. There has also been published since this Report was in print, a pamphlet intitled "The Transfer of Land by means of a Judicial Assurance: its Practicability and Advantages considered, in a Letter to Sir Richard Bethell, M.P.," by Isaac Butt, Esq., Q.C.

The registers of judgments (e), Grants of Annuities (f), Warrants of Attorney (g), Crown Debts and Recognizances (h), and Cases of Lis pendens (i).

2. A Register or inrolment of particular classes of deeds, or deeds having particular objects; as,

The Inrolment of Deeds of Bargain and Sale (k), Disentailing Assurances, or deeds executed for barring estates tail (l), and Bills of Sale of Personal Chattels capapable of delivery (m).

3. A Register of Memorials, of brief abstracts of deeds and instruments; as,

The Registers of Memorials of deeds and wills affecting lands in Ireland (n), and in the counties of Middlesex (o), and York (p).

4. An Inrolment of the Deeds themselves, or full copies of them, and extending to all deeds; as,

The Inrolment of Deeds affecting lands in the Bedford Level (q).

5. A Register of the Title or actual Ownership, independently and irrespectively of the past transactions or deeds by which it has been acquired.

Such is the Register in the books of the Bank of England of the public stocks and funds.

8. Possible Extension of some of the existing systems.]—Besides the foregoing, other schemes or systems of registration, somewhat different in principle, have, as matters of theory, been suggested; but we believe that no examples are found in actual operation in our own country of any other modes or kinds of registration than those above detailed, unless the Court Rolls of Manors form an exception.

If the fourth of the above-mentioned systems were made to extend to the whole country, it would be what is termed a general Register of Assurances, and would supersede the second and third.

If the fifth of these systems were extended to land, or if a register upon similar principles were applied to the ownership of land, it would exclude, or at all events might be made to render superfluous, the second, third, and fourth systems, and (with the addition of suitable provisions) the first also.

9. Policy of existing systems.]—It is important to observe that this institution of registry has always, in each of its several forms, been directed to the attainment of one specific object of public policy, and founded upon a regard to one broad and distinctly defined interest of the community—namely, the security of title and of transactions by means of notoriety and the perpetuation of evidence (r).

10. Extension of that policy.]—This policy accordingly long since suggested the project of establishing a general register of all deeds affecting the title to the landed property of the kingdom, or, as it has been of late years termed, a Register of Assurances.

It was moreover considered that such a measure would furnish a remedy for many admitted evils in our real property system, or was the necessary precursor or accompaniment of any attempt to remedy those evils.

11. Present state of the law as to landed titles.]—By the law of England the possession of land does not conclusively prove the possessor to be entitled to it or to have the right of disposing of it.

The ownership of land is not a simple right, or quantity, or a right which exists only in a simple or single form—like that of a chair or a sum of stock—but is susceptible of modification, by deeds, into a number of independent quantities and degrees of ownership.

These lesser ownerships in the land, if called into existence, must all reunite or coalesce in order to confer the complete title to the land; or, in other words, the subsequent derivation of title must be traced through and must include them.

A possession or transfer inconsistent with them does not put an end to them; they remain integral parts of the title so long as the terms of their own creation admit of their taking effect, and the Statute of Limitations has not barred them.

There is no record in law of the derivation of the title except the title-deeds, and there is no security in law that such title-deeds may not be suppressed or improperly withheld.

A retrospective investigation of the title (or, in other words, the former dealings with the land) must therefore take place on the occasion of a sale, in order to ascertain that the possessor is also the owner, and that no qualifying rights exist.

Though by such means the title be ascertained to be valid, the law provides no permanent or binding record of that fact, or of the fact of ownership, to serve as a rest in the title, or form the foundation of its future deduction.

It becomes necessary, therefore, on the occasion of subsequent dealings with new purchasers, that such purchasers should, in their own interest and for their own protection, repeat the investigation which took place before, and examine the title retrospectively from the date of their own contract, without relying on the previous transfer, or the possession enjoyed under it, and treating these as possibly illusory merely.

Lastly, according (s) to the law of England, the right to the possession, and to recover the rents and profits of real property in a court of law, may be vested in one person, while another is the beneficial owner. The person who is entitled at law is technically said to have the legal estate, and the beneficial owner is technically said to have the equitable estate. All actions and proceedings in courts of law must be brought and defended in the name of the person who has the legal estate:

(q) Established in 1663 by the Act for draining the Bedford Level, 15 Car. 2, c. 17, s. 8.

(r) The Act of 4 & 5 William & Mary, requiring judgments to be docketed, contains the following recital:—"Whereas great mischiefs and damages happen and come as well to persons in their lifetimes, but more often to their heirs, executors, and administrators, and also to purchasers and mortgagees, by judgments entered upon record in their Majesty's Courts at Westminster against the persons defendants, by reason of the difficulty there is in finding out such judgments."

The Act establishing a Register of Grants of Annuities contains the preamble:—"Whereas the pernicious practice of raising money by the sale of life annuities hath of late years greatly increased, and is much promoted by the secrecy with which such transactions are conducted." And the Act of 18 & 19 Vict., which regulates the present register of life annuities, is expressly grounded on the fact, that "purchasers are no longer enabled to ascertain by search what life annuities or rent charges may have been granted by their vendors or others."

The Register of Warrants of Attorney is required, because "injustice is frequently done to creditors by secret warrants of attorney to confess judgments for securing the payment of money, whereby persons in a state of insolvency are enabled to keep up the appearance of being in good circumstances, and the persons holding such warrants of attorney have the power of taking the property of such insolvents in execution at any time, to the exclusion of the rest of their creditors." And the Act of 6 & 7 Vict., passed to enlarge the provisions of the previous Act, proceeds upon the ground that "greater facilities should be given to persons in searching the books" in which the particulars of the warrants of attorney are entered, "and obtaining the information contained therein."

The Register of Crown debts and cases of Lis pendens is founded on the principle "that further protection should be afforded to purchasers" against those incumbrances.

The policy of the Statute of Inrolments, 27 Hen. 8, c. 16, we are told by Chief Baron Gilbert, was to remedy the effect of the Statute of Uses, which, "by executing all uses raised, introduced a secret way of conveyance contrary to the policy of the common law." Accordingly, the Statute provides that the deeds, when inrolled, shall remain in the custody of the custos rotulorum, amongst the other records of the counties, to the intent that every party that "hath to do therewith may resort and see the effects and tenor of every such writing so inrolled."

The inrolment of disentailing deeds, it cannot be doubted, was required in order to answer the purposes of notoriety and perpetuation of evidence, which, in theory, at least, were promoted or secured in the former practice of levying fines and suffering recoveries.

The registration of bills of sale is required upon the ground that "frauds are frequently committed upon creditors by secret bills of sale of personal chattels, whereby persons are enabled to keep up the appearance of being in good circumstances and possessed of property, and the grantees or holders of such bills of sale have the power of taking possession of the property of such persons, to the exclusion of the rest of their creditors."

The Irish Registry Act is grounded on the principle of "securing purchasers, preventing forgeries, and fraudulent gifts and conveyances of lands," &c.

The West Riding Registry Act states, that "most of the traders in the West Riding are freeholders, and have frequent occasions to borrow money upon their estates for managing their trade, but for want of a register find it difficult to give security to the satisfaction of the money lenders, although the security they offer be really good, by means whereof the said trade is very much obstructed, and many families ruined." The North and East Riding and the Middlesex Registry Acts contain preambles, one of which states, that "By the different and secret ways of conveying lands, such as are ill disposed have it in their power to commit frauds, and frequently do so, by means whereof several persons have been undone in their purchases and mortgages by prior and secret conveyances and fraudulent incumbrances, and not only themselves but their whole families thereby utterly ruined."

(s) 2 Bl. Pr. Com. Rep. p. 7

the person who has the equitable estate can only enforce his rights through the medium of a Court of Equity.

12. Evils of the present state of the law.]—Such being the general outline of the nature of landed titles in this country, persons intending to become buyers of land find the practical working and consequences of the system to be something like the following:—

1. There being no registry of deeds or of ownership, fraudulent titles may be made by the suppression or destruction of title-deeds.

2. There is consequently a general insecurity of title and apprehension of risk, even when, to all external appearances, there is an absence of any ground for suspicion.

3. The evidence of title, for want of a register, is, at best, inferential and negative. The title can never be affirmatively and positively shown to be good. The possibility of its being impeachable cannot be excluded. Notwithstanding the dangers, however, thus to be encountered, a person who has entered into a contract of purchase in the usual way, without any information as to the title, is compellable to fulfil his contract, unless he can prove facts showing the title to be bad or judicially doubtful; the possible existence of documents unproduced not being a ground of defence (t).

4. Should the subject-matter of the purchase be only an equitable estate, the purchaser may be defeated by a subsequent purchaser (without notice) of the same estate, if he happens first to succeed in procuring a transfer of the legal estate.

5. Even an innocent purchaser who may possess the legal estate may be put to proof that, at the time of his purchase, he had not notice of some dealing or transaction for which priority is claimed; and such notice may be imputed to him constructively from an infinite variety of circumstances.

6. A second mortgagee may, notwithstanding notice given by him to the first, find his security destroyed by a transfer from the first mortgagee to the third, unless the latter at the time of his loan had notice of the second mortgage.

7. Thus, equitable and derivative or secondary estates become, in fact, not marketable.

8. Contests and artificial contrivances to obtain priority by getting in the legal estate become inevitable; and these merely in order to incline the legal balance in favour of one innocent victim of a fraud as against another equally innocent. Moreover (u), those expenses in the transfer and disposition of real property which arise from the necessity of obtaining conveyances and assignments of outstanding legal estates are very oppressive, and they are submitted to with the more reluctance, because they proceed from a fictitious distinction, which is unintelligible except to professional persons. The expense of applications to the Court of Chancery, to enable trustees under disability to convey, and of the general evidence of representation, and deduction of title to trust estates, with the deeds relating to them, frequently exceed very considerably the expense of the conveyance, or other principal deed for effecting the real object of the parties.

9. Deeds are liable to be lost, and there is no permanent evidence of the contents of the lost deeds.

10. Constant difficulty is experienced in obtaining the production of deeds when they relate in common to two or more estates, or to the divided parts of an estate which was once entire.

11. By this difficulty of obtaining the production of deeds, or insuring their production to buyers, and by the loss of deeds, titles are rendered unmarketable.

12. Disputes arise as to the proper custody of the title-deeds.

13. The possession of the title-deeds by law belongs to the person first interested in the freehold, and this possession, without a registry of the deeds, enables, in many cases, the party having their custody to destroy, to suppress, or even to fabricate particular instruments, in fraud of other persons entitled to posterior interests, and in fraud of buyers and lenders.

14. There being no registry of the ownership, and there being no conclusive record of the past dealings with the property, a history of those dealings must be made, in the form of an abstract of title, on the occasion of every succeeding sale or mortgage.

15. That history must on every such occasion be investigated and put to the proof.

16. Thus the former dealings with the land, however transitory their object, produce a permanent and an injurious effect upon the title, whether they result in conferring a good title or not. The transactions which enter into the history of the title, though spent and determined according to their own proper intention and effect, yet fasten themselves upon the ownership, and continue vital and operative to the extent of obliging every person dealing with the land to see and take care that they are in fact spent, and have done their work.

17. Historical recitals of the previous title become necessary in the deeds executed on the transfer of landed property. These greatly lengthen the deeds, and are the occasion of constantly increasing expense in the future deduction of the title and dealings with the property.

18. Special and restrictive conditions of sale become necessary in order to preclude objections by the buyer, which this retrospective investigation of the title may enable or entitle him to make; and a practice ensues of framing conditions of sale, which, in order not to deprecate the interests of the seller, or injure his sale, are so disguised as often to entrap the unlearned or unwary buyer.

19. The danger of contracting to buy land without a previous knowledge of the title is thus perceived by prudent and cautious buyers, and persons become unwilling to bind themselves as they ought by contract, or until after they have seen the abstract of title.

20. Where a contract is in fact duly entered into, the investigation of the title often causes, not expense only, but delay, annoyance, and disappointment, sickening to both buyer and seller. The seller does not receive his money, nor the buyer his land, until the advantage or the pleasure of the bargain is lost or has passed away.

21. The existence (x) of technical defects in titles substantially good, places an undue amount of power (as has been well said) in the hands of an unscrupulous purchaser. The proceedings towards the completion of a sale, after the contract is made, necessarily occupy a considerable time; during which the purchaser has an opportunity of ascertaining, from the state and changes of the markets, whether his purchase is likely to prove a good speculation or the reverse; and his acceptance or refusal of the title is often unduly influenced by considerations arising from these circumstances.

22. Thus, finally, from these various causes, the sale and transfer of land are impeded, and dealings in it are discouraged (y).

13. Objects which it is desirable to effect.]—From what has been said, we think it may be concluded, that the great objects which the reform of this branch of the law ought to have in view range under the following heads—viz.

1. Security of title.
2. Simplification of the title.
3. A record of the actual ownership.
4. Simplification of the forms of conveyance and general facility of transfer.

We do not conceive, indeed, that it is necessarily an objection to any proposition for a system of registration, that it is not adapted to accomplish all these objects. It may be sufficient for us to say, that if different systems of registration be proposed for consideration, that system which is found to secure these objects in the fullest extent will best serve the interests of landowners and the public generally, and furnish the surest remedy for the evils out of which the demand for a registry of assurances arose.

14. Advantages of a Registration of Assurances.]—That a register of assurances would give increased security of title we see no reason to doubt. All those evils and objections which call for protection against the suppression of documentary evidence of title, would, we think, be removed or remedied by a general register of deeds and other assurances relating to land.

Registration of assurances has been justly said (z) to be a

(x) Mr. Commissioner Hargreave's evidence.
(y) It is well observed by the Real Property Commissioners, in their Second Report, that "the great difficulties which occur in selling estates and obtaining money on real security, the time which usually elapses before the completion of such transactions, and the harassing expenses and disappointments which attend them, are evils universally acknowledged. They are by many persons considered the greatest evils belonging to our law of real property. We believe that it may be confidently asserted, that, of the real property of England, a very considerable portion is in one of these two predicaments—either the want of security against the existence of latent deeds renders actually unsafe a title which is yet marketable, or the want of means of procuring the formal requisites of title renders unmarketable a title which is substantially safe." The Commissioners also allude to "the depreciation of real property occasioned by the general feeling of the present insecurity of title, and by the apprehension of the delay and expense attending transactions relating to real property;" and observe that "it is obvious that by removing them a register would have a tendency to increase the value of estates, and diminish the rate of interest upon mortgages."

system which would protect every man against the ordinary accidents to which deeds and instruments are subject, and would afford a perfect substitute for covenants for production, where (as in the great majority of purchases is the case) a purchaser cannot obtain the deeds; and thus owners of estates would no longer, as to these matters, be in the situation in which they frequently are placed, of utter inability to offer their estates for sale, except clogged with conditions which must necessarily prejudice the sale. One of the most common objections occurring in titles arises from the discovery, pending the investigation, that other deeds besides those which are in the vendor's possession or power relate to the title. If the purchaser cannot obtain access to these deeds, and a binding covenant for the production of them (however unimportant they may be), he will not be compelled to complete the purchase.

Registration of assurances, it has also been justly contended, would afford an effectual protection against deeds or instruments of which a purchaser or mortgagee may not have notice, and against which, unless he obtains the legal estate—the tabula in naufragio—(of the possession of which, by the way, he can have no confident assurance), he cannot protect himself. It would also disable parties from suppressing family and other deeds of which no general notoriety exists, and which are in the custody of persons having only a limited interest in the estates.

In a few words, the result is, that a system of registration of assurances would afford protection and security to those who are equitably entitled to it, and would check fraud and dishonesty. The effect of registration of assurances would, we may admit, as respects these circumstances, be beneficial as well to the proprietors of real property as to the community.

15. If, therefore, there were no other objects to be accomplished than security of title and protection against fraud, or if there were no system which would reach the other objects in view, a register of assurances would be a valuable measure; though, even so viewed, it might happen that incidental inconveniences would arise to counterbalance such benefits. We shall, in fact, have occasion presently to consider whether many and considerable objections would not attend a system of registration of assurances, even assuming it to insure all the requisite security of title.

16. What Registration of Assurances will not effect.]—It is first, however, material to observe that a Register of Assurances would not of itself, as we conceive, operate to simplify title, or facilitate (as respects the title) the transfer of land, or render less intricate the practice of conveyancing, or lessen any of the burdens on land which arise from those peculiarities in the ownership of land to which we have above adverted.

The registration of assurances would not, as we think, render unnecessary the retrospective investigation of the title on the occasion of each succeeding sale or mortgage. The effect of past dealings upon the title to the land would remain the same as at present. No evidence of the ownership would be afforded without examining the former transactions, as is now done. Abstracts of title would not be shortened. The forms of conveyance would not be simplified.

The technicalities and anomalies of the law of real property would, we think, be confirmed, rather than lessened or relieved, by registration of assurances, unaccompanied by alterations in the general law. Those embarrassments and impediments in the sale and transfer of land which arise from the state of the law and the mode of showing title to land would remain as before, if indeed the delay, trouble, and expense in tranferring land would nat be increased rather than diminished by the establishment of a Register of Assurances. A brief consideration of the positive objections that have been taken to that scheme is calculated, we think, to show that this would be the case.

17. First objection to a Registration of Assurances considered.]—One of the most prominent objections to registration of assurances is the vast bulk and increasing quantity of deeds and instruments which would have to be kept, and, on transfers, to be searched and examined (a). It is calculated by solicitors that these instruments would accumulate at the rate of 800,000 annually, requiring a registry of 1,000 a day for every working day. The inconvenience of this, as well as the cost, would be so great, and it struck so forcibly the Commissioners who reported in 1850, that they endeavoured to get rid of the objection by allowing protection in a variety of instances to unregistered assurances. After observing that in one aspect it would seem necessary to the perfection of a register that the registration should be as essential as any other solemnity required to the execution of a deed, the Commissioners in their Report remark, "But (b) we believe that the establishment of such a rule would lead to consequences seriously affecting the practical utility of registration. One great difficulty in the way of the establishment of a register has always been the bulk of written instruments which are forced upon the attention of purchasers. If registration were made imperative, this evil would become very formidable. After careful consideration we see no sufficient reason for denying to an unregistered assurance an effect which is not incompatible with the protection to be afforded by the register to those who seek such protection. An unregistered deed may be safely allowed to have its full effect against all persons except purchasers claiming the protection of the register." A stronger proof of the magnitude of the evil arising from an indefinite accumulation of deeds can hardly be adduced, for the remedy proposed amounts to this, that in establishing a registry of deeds one of the principal advantages intended to be derived from it, namely, the certainty of always being able to ascertain the instruments which by possibility can affect the land, may be withheld, except as against persons who have chosen to claim the protection of registration.

18. Second objection considered.—In the second place, the registration of assurances would involve a specific addition to the existing burdens on the transfer of land, without diminishing, as we think, except remotely and casually, any of the existing causes of expense, tardiness, and difficulty in such transfer. The cost of the necessary searches, and the delay and impediments they will occasion in completing sales are not to be overlooked, if no substantial compensation be afforded by diminishing or removing other causes of expense and embarrassment. The complexities of title and the technicalities of transfer, which are at present the chief causes of cost and difficulty, and protracted inquiries in performing contracts of sale, will not be taken away by any system of registering deeds. To this we must add the important consideration that the additional expense and complication caused by requiring registration would be universal, and would extend to all landed property, and to all sales and purchases of it, large or small. The benefit, however, which the register would confer by excluding the risk of fraud would be exceptional and peculiar. All transactions would, in fact, be made to pay for the machinery contrived to defeat fraud in a few. Were the register calculated to simplify title generally, or the forms of transfer generally, or were it adapted to relieve sellers and buyers from the necessity of retrospectively investigating past titles, the benefit to landed property, and to commerce in it, would be universal, or substantially so; and in such a state of things there would be no harshness in throwing upon all transactions the cost and burden of coming and being admitted to the register. Unless, however, the investigation of the title retrospectively can be dispensed with, the main sources of expense will remain untouched. The expense of this investigation amounts certainly to one-third and often to two-thirds of the whole cost incurred by a purchaser (c). We cannot, therefore, but concur in the opinion expressed by Mr. Hayes, that by "establishing a general register there is an absolute certainty of an immediate addition to the expense of every transaction relating to land, and the risk of involving titles at an early period in almost irretrievable embarrassment, while all the advantages which it tenders are more or less speculative and remote." In small transactions, which are far the most numerous, any increase of expense would be very oppressive (d). An account of a purchaser's legal expenses incurred at various times and in different parts of the country has been furnished by one of the witnesses (e). It gives an average of two and a half per cent. on the purchase-money, or five times the ad valorem stamp duty. But as an average affords no notion of the heavy burden in individual cases, it is necessary to look at the smaller properties; it will there be found that the expenses of the purchase mount up to ten, twenty, and even twenty-three per cent. Make even a slight addition to these expenses, and then a register, which is intended for the benefit of sellers and purchasers, would be the occasion of actual loss to the great mass of the persons interested. The Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1832 were so strongly impressed with this result, that when they considered that a general register of deeds and instruments would be of decided advantage to large purchases, they only recommended it as regards small purchases, upon the ground that such a measure "would be made most perfect by being made applicable to all lands without reference to their value." We cannot think it right to do an injustice to a large body of people merely for the sake of obtaining uniformity, which is miscalled perfection. Such perfection would operate unfairly on small proprietors, and, as Lord St. Leonards has well observed, "probably it would induce them not to resort to the register at all, and then they would be exposed to evils to which they are not now liable; for if the rate of insurance be too high, the mariner prefers encountering the perils of the sea."

19. Third objection considered.] — Increased complication is a third objection to a general system of registering assurances. If any of the instruments affecting the title are withheld from the register, then the system becomes imperfect. If memorials only are registered, the original instruments of which the memorials are given must be searched for, and copied, or abstracted; and if the instruments are once registered, they must remain on the register. However occasional or however temporary their object, they cannot be destroyed; whether satisfied or not they must still be kept, and being kept they must all be examined by purchasers. Thus, the machinery would be too complicated to answer its purpose, and complication would diminish the facilities of transfer, and increase the chances of miscarriage. Simplicity and accuracy are the grand objects to be attained. The absence of these must lead to uncertainty, and uncertainty is insecurity, and insecurity is impediment. But how are simplicity and accuracy to be attained if notice of deeds by the fact of their being registered is to be multiplied and perpetuated? Extinct life estates, and charges or incumbrances which have been satisfied or exhausted, and other interests which have ceased to be of real importance to the title, must more or less form part of the abstract, and the purchaser's solicitor would not be justified in disregarding them

20. Fourth objection considered.]—Another objection raised to a general registration of assurances is the fear of unnecessary and uncalled-for disclosures (f). No man likes to make his private affairs public; and one man has no right to pry into the affairs of another, except for some object, in which the latter has given him an interest. Now the only legitimate object of making public or giving notoriety to any title-deeds is to prevent frauds in the transfer of property by insuring notice to future contractors of all transactions which are to affect them. For that purpose, however, there can be no need of disclosing the whole internal history of the title for an indefinite period. There can be no reason why every particular, however secret or however confidential, should be made known. Why are the trusts which affect an estate in land to be more divulged than the trusts which affect stock or railway debentures? Why are settlements and family arrangements, which are intended to preserve property in families, to be more liable to exposure in the one case than they are in the other? These and similar questions have often been asked, but they have never received a satisfactory answer. The objection is striking; and the force of it constrained the Real Property Commissioners in 1832 (g) to suggest that in many cases, such as that of an appointment of a reversionary interest, or of portions in favour of children, the registration might be safely delayed; and that any provision which it might be desirable to conceal might be made by vesting an interest in trustees in whom confidence could be reposed. They added, moreover, that the peril would be no greater than exists in all settlements of money in the funds, and in many other cases in which trusts are not expressed in the instruments by which the property is vested in the trustees. Such suggestions are by no means unimportant. They show, that, in cases like those pointed out, the Commissioners considered that the difficulty of establishing a registration of assurances would be so great that they were prepared to substitute for it what in fact in the particular case amounted to a registration of title; but if a registration of title would be good for settlements, why would it not be equally good for mortgages and purchases? If requisite for the one, why not for the other? If the analogy from the funds is available for determining the mode of registration in some cases, why not in all? The dread of disclosure can hardly constitute a just distinction between mortgages and settlements; for the danger of disclosures affecting credit would probably be as great as the dangers of disclosures affecting settlements and family arrangements. Nor do we think that there is any inconsistency in attributing weight to this objection, and at the same time regarding as an evil the disuse or loss of that system of public transfer of land which in a previous part of this report we have adverted to as having prevailed in the earlier periods of our history.

21. Fifth objection considered.] — Another objection to a registration of assurances would be, the enhanced difficulty of obtaining loans by a deposit of deeds. The transactions of this kind are very numerous. At present a respectable man in possession of title-deeds may and does obtain relief in sudden emergencies confidentially, easily, and at a few hours' notice. But if a registry of assurances were the only means of establishing title, and if this title could no longer be evidenced, even primâ facie, by the possession of deeds, transactions by deposit of deeds would be seriously impeded. The knowledge of such deposits, ascertained by publication through a general register, would be repugnant to the feelings of most depositors, and the process of search and consequent delay would stop or limit this species of dealing just at the time when facility and dispatch are the chief things needed. These are results which cannot be contemplated in a great commercial country without apprehension and alarm. And we may confidently conclude, that any system of registration which did not provide for arrangements equal in convenience to the deposit of deeds would fail to meet with general acceptance. To obviate this objection as much as possible, the principal bills of late years introduced for the registration of assurances directed certificates of registration to be granted. Upon the faith of these it was supposed that parties could obtain loans in the same way as they can now obtain them on the deposit of deeds. But we doubt whether the same confidence would be given to such certificates as that which is given to the deeds themselves, unless they were considered, not only as certificates of the fact of registration, but also as certificates of the fact of ownership. In the latter case, however, it is perfectly evident that the register would become a register of title rather than a register of instruments and assurances.

22. Sixth objection considered].—Another objection to registration of assurances is, that it would tend to render less secure possessory titles,—those titles, namely, which depend more upon the fact of quiet and long-continued enjoyment than the technical sufficiency and accuracy of the various deeds which may have contributed to form the stages and steps of the title. The evidence of defects and slips in limitations and conveyances would by the register be perpetuated; and that possession which might have continued undisturbed if the possessor had been allowed to keep his deeds in his box, would be made to invite criticism and attack by presenting a public record of some frailty, by which, or notwithstanding which, historically, the possession might have been acquired.

23. Seventh objection considered.] — Lastly, we are not satisfied that any mode of classification of deeds or of titles, for the purpose of furnishing the requisite indexes to a register of deeds, and affording the necessary facilities for search, has been or can be devised so as to be sufficiently free from complication. Without the means of ready, accurate, and complete searches, a system of registering deeds would only be a snare to purchasers. It cannot be doubted, we think, that everything has been done which learning and ingenuity could devise, towards providing efficient and complete indexes, in the Reports of the Real Property Commission and the Commission on Registration and Conveyancing. But we concur in thinking (h) that the system of classification adopted by those Commissions mixes up the technicalities of the law of real property with the process of registration in a greater degree than would be compatible with the objects now generally sought to be attained by registration.

24. Yorkshire and Middlesex Registers.]—We have not overlooked the fact that the local registers of Yorkshire and Middlesex (as remarked by the Real Property Commissioners (i)) "are generally considered to be, on the whole, productive of good, and that no attempt has been made to abolish them."

As, however, these local registers have furnished a lengthened experience on the subject of the registration of deeds, we think it not unimportant to remark that they do not afford any answer to the observations we have found it necessary to make as to the insufficiency of a registry of assurances for removing the existing impediments to the free transfer of land, or as to the positive objections which may be opposed to the institution of such a registry.

Objections to them considered.]—1. In the first place, these registers are signally defective, in not presenting at one view all the documentary evidence which a party investigating a title may have occasion to see. There is no guide to searches which on a sale ought to be made in the register, except a previous investigation of the documents which may happen to be included in the vendor's abstract of title. When the names of former grantors or owners of the land have been ascertained from the documents to which the purchaser obtains access, then (but not till then) he can search the register in the names of those former owners for any assurances which may have been executed by them. These searches must be repeated in new names, as new light is from time to time thrown upon the title; whereas a register of deeds, in our opinion, ought itself to furnish consecutive information of the dealings with the land which have taken place, when once a reference to the proper head in the index has been obtained. The defects of the existing registers in this respect are pointed out by the Real Property Commissioners (k), and we concur in their opinion.

2. These Registers do not, as we have already observed, contain an inrolment of the deeds, but memorials of them only; and these memorials are not required to show more than the names of the parties, and the property affected.

3. In the next place, these registers do not confer a title according to priority of registration, so as to make it indifferent whether the registered deed confers a legal or an equitable estate, or so as to protect the sale of an equitable estate from the infirmities and risks we have already noticed as rendering it practically an unmarketable interest. A subsequent equitable right may obtain precedence over a prior registered right, by tacking to it a legal right prior to the former on the register (l).

4. The objectionable tendency of the rule lastly stated is enlarged by a general doctrine long since settled, that registration is not notice, either actual or constructive, of the deed registered.

5. On the other hand, the efficiency and value of the register are impaired by a general doctrine, that express notice of an unregistered deed is equivalent to the registration of it. A purchase-deed brought to the register, with notice of a prior deed kept off the register, is postponed to the prior deed, although the person claiming under such prior deed has (purposely it may be) disregarded the provisions of the Register Act in not bringing his deed to the register. Thus, from the combined effect of the rules which postpone registered deeds to what may not be on the register, and do not secure priority in all cases to registered deeds over what may come after them on the register, the system of registry in Yorkshire and Middlesex fail in fulfilling many of the most important offices of a registration of deeds.

In all the particulars which we have here pointed out, the defects and errors of the local registers were proposed to be remedied or removed in the scheme for the registration of assurances which was last submitted to Parliament. It is plain, then, that the existing registries of Middlesex and Yorkshire do not furnish any evidence in answer to the observations we have already made on the deficiencies and the objectionable operation of registration of assurances in general. In those observations we have assumed the system to be free from the objections in the local registers which we have here noticed; and we may add that most though not all of the above remarks upon the local registries of Middlesex and Yorkshire are applicable to the general register of deeds in Ireland.

(k) "We may here mention as an important inconvenience belonging to the existing registers, and from which a system founded on classification would be exempt, that where registered deeds are indexed by names several searches of the register at successive times are often necessary. The deeds produced to a purchaser indicate the searches required so far only as the title is shown by those deeds. It is obvious, that every document relating to the title must have been under consideration before the extent of the searches required can be ascertained, and that frequently searches will become necessary with reference to interests which are brought into view by the result of a former search. The consequence is, that in almost every case something is left undone; the purchaser, to escape from inquiries so indeterminate, foregoing the protection which the register would have afforded him. But if the deeds relating to a particular title are brought together in the index, a reference to the class enables the purchaser to ascertain at once whether all the documentary evidence has been produced to him, and to call for any instruments which may appear by the register to be wanting." And again,—

"The purpose of a repertory of documents of title is not answered, in a perfect manner, by any of the existing registers in this country. Whenever the ownership of lands is shown by a deed to which the purchaser has access, a search may be made for conveyances or charges by the grantor and grantee in that deed. Whether in any particular case the search can be continued downwards, so as to get at the whole of the subsequent evidences of title, must depend upon what may be disclosed by the memorials of the respective deeds to which a reference has been obtained by the previous search; and although there would always be the means of ascertaining the subsequently registered title, if registration at length or a deposit of the deed were substituted for the memorial required by the existing registers, it is obvious that a register, framed upon the principle of indexes by the names of parties, could never be relied on for the discovery of the title anterior to the earliest deed to which the purchaser may have access."

AS TO REGISTRATION OF TITLE.—VARIOUS PLANS PROPOSED.—OBJECTIONS THERETO.

25. Registration of title suggested instead of Registration of Assurances.]—Having regard to the many and great objections to a registration of assurances which we have considered, we cannot be surprised at the growing conviction that a measure of that description will not be adequate to answer the purposes for which registration is required. The unmanageable accumulation of deeds and instruments in one place; the certainty of an immediate addition to the expense and delay of every transaction relating to land; the risk of involving titles at no distant period in increased complication and embarrassment; the apprehension of disclosures, especially in cases of private settlements and family arrangements; and the diminished opportunities of obtaining loans on the security of the land for occasional purposes; the risk of disturbing possessory titles; and the complication of indexes, have naturally induced the distrust of a scheme, the supposed advantages of which, as an additional safeguard and security to titles, are more or less speculative or remote. Even those advantages are much exaggerated, while the positive objections are certain and immediate. The main desiderata to which attention is most anxiously directed are not so much security of title (for that, in fact, is to a great extent practically obtained), but the simplification of title, facility of transfer, simplicity of form, and the consequent diminution of delay and expense. To obtain these desiderata a registration of title is the remedy proposed; and several plans for accomplishing that object have been submitted to us. We propose to consider them in due order.

26. First Plan.]—The first of these plans (m) proposes the establishment of a Land Tribunal, to which owners of land (including tenants for life, and in tail as well as in fee) may apply to have the land placed upon a public register, and declared to be registered land. The Tribunal is to inquire into the nature of the applicant's title to the land and its existing circumstances, so as to decide upon the expediency of simply admitting it upon the register. When the land has thus become registered, no subsequent act is to create any new estate less than a fee simple, except registered leases or easements; nor any new incumbrance, except registered debentures to a limited amount.

The plan also proposes that the owner of such registered land may further apply for a full investigation of title, and for an order declaring, in a conclusive form, all existing estates and incumbrances; and that after the making of such order the Tribunal may give to each person so found to be interested a Certificate of his Title. It is also suggested, that, in order to obviate all chance of any injustice to third parties, the State may guarantee the title, upon payment of such small fees or premiums of insurance as will provide an indemnity fund to compensate persons whose prior rights might be superseded; but this guarantee is not an essential portion of the plan.

The privileges considered to be incident to this plan are,—

1.—A Parliamentary or indefeasible title, when conclusively declared by the Tribunal;

2.—A power to transfer by simple entry the registered land:

3.—A further power to obtain on its credit terminable land debentures, transferable either by simple entry like Government Stock, or by simple delivery like bank notes or bills of exchange.

With a view to impart to these debentures an immediate marketable currency, and consequent increase in value, their amount is to be limited,—say, for example, to ten times the annual value of the land; and they are to be for uniform sums, without priority inter se, and bearing a similar rate of interest. The leading object of these debentures is to avoid the existing complexity of incumbrances, and gradually to supersede all other kinds of charge, such as mortgages, legacies, family portions, quit rents, tithe rent-charges, annuities, judgments, recognizances, crown bonds, decrees, orders, and rules of court.

As to family settlements and trusts, it is suggested that they might still be sufficiently effectuated (like settlements of Government stock or of railway shares) through personal confidences, and the equitable jurisdiction of the Land Tribunal; also that equitable mortgages or loans from bankers might be effected easily and without expense. The plan further recommends that the new system should be introduced gradually and in a voluntary form; though, after some years experience of its beneficial working, it might be considered expedient to render its application universal as to all land not specially exempted from its operation.

The professed principle of the whole plan is to facilitate the sale and transfer of land, through the most simple machinery for the registration of an absolute title, both to the land itself and to the charges upon land; with a subsequent capacity in the owner of any registered land or charge to transfer the former by entry, the latter by delivery.

27. Objections to first plan—Land Tribunal.]—Such being the general outline of this plan, we have to observe, that it has unquestionably the merit of great simplicity, and it contains valuable suggestions, of which we propose to avail ourselves. Its contemplated advantages are in a great degree based upon those already derived from the Incumbered Estates Court in Ireland, and indeed it was framed for that part of the United Kingdom, though it is said to be capable of easy adaptation to any English measure of land reform. Ireland possesses superior machinery for carrying into immediate operation a complete system of registration of title through its registry of deeds, its ordnance survey, and its general valuation of lands.

The conclusion to which we have come is adverse to the institution of a land tribunal (n), with judicial powers to decide conclusively upon all titles to land. Such a court may advantageously be established where estates generally are so heavily incumbered that their owners can neither emancipate themselves from existing burdens, nor discharge the duties which attach to the ownership of land. The object in that case is to obtain altogether a new proprietary, and to provide for payment of debts; but the same principle is hardly applicable in a state of society where there is no paramount need of encouraging absolute changes of ownership, as contradistinguished from temporary charges or family settlements, and where a considerable portion of the property will, not improbably, whatever may be the state of the law, still remain in the same families.

28. Objections continued.] — Another objection to this plan is, the want of provisions for protecting beneficial and equitable interests. Without such provisions those who are entitled to beneficial interests in the registered land would not feel satisfied of having adequate protection against the wrongful acts of the registered owners.

29. Land debentures.] — With regard to the proposed system of debentures, we conceive that it is not within the range of the inquiry submitted to us, and therefore we do not recommend it. We may observe that we are not prepared to concur in recommending that the owner of registered land shall be deprived of his legal power to incumber his own land, with the same kinds of charge as he can create at present. Furthermore we may observe that if it would not be advisable to establish a land tribunal for the purpose of investigating the title to land, the same objection would also apply to the establishment of such a tribunal for the creation and issue of land debentures. Moreover, there is not in England any adequate machinery for ascertaining judicially the value of land through public maps or a general valuation, such as exists in Ireland. The preferable way of enabling persons readily to obtain loans on the security of land, is to alter the expensive forms and incidents of mortgages, so that they may be at law what they are in equity, securities merely; and that thus the dry legal estate may not be left outstanding on payment of the money secured, but that the mortgage may then cease for ever. A statutory enactment giving that effect to mortgages, and conferring all the powers which a mortgagee now usually possesses under distinct provisions against the mortgagor, or the mortgagor's property, coupled with a registration of the charge as well as of the land, might probably be framed so as to give to charges on land the same advantages and the same facilities of transfer as those which attach to railway debentures.

Although we do not recommend the adoption of a judicial system of land debentures, we think it right to observe that there may be facilities for trying it in a proper manner in Ireland, where strong opinions have been expressed in its favour (o).

30. Warranty of title.]—The suggestion of a guarantee or warranty of title, supported as it has been from many quarters, is not peculiar to the plan now under consideration, and is in our opinion very valuable. It is well known that when a title has once been investigated and approved of by experienced counsel and solicitors, it is as little likely to be questioned as the right to any chattel which a man buys in open market. Still on a re-sale it is again investigated and again approved by another counsel and another solicitor, because the new purchaser was no party to the former transaction, and he cannot be sure that everything has been done which he may think necessary to make himself safe. But should the second purchaser be a member of the family instead of a stranger, employing and taking the same legal advice, it is probable that he would be satisfied with the previous investigation, instead of requiring a new one to be instituted, which he would deem to be only going over the same ground again. Supposing, therefore, that a public officer, such as a registrar, should have the power, on application made for that purpose by proper parties, to direct that the title, before registration, should be examined and tested under the authority of a counsel and solicitor, he might safely guarantee it, on their recommendation, against all claims which could be brought against it. In such a case it would not be unreasonable that the registered owner who had thus obtained a warranted title should pay a small premium on that account; and the aggregate amount of the premiums paid would constitute a fund to indemnify the state as the public insurer in case any latent claim should be subsequently established.

31. Second plan.]—The second plan (p) which has been submitted to us is founded on a principle which was brought to the notice of the registration and conveyancing commissioners. It has been described, in a word, as registration of the freehold. This plan proceeds on the hypothesis that possession is the root of title; bearing in mind that by possession the possession of the freehold is meant, and by freehold a presumptive fee simple. Credit, therefore, is given to possession until it is shown to be wrongful. The fact that the property is held by the person who is seen to hold it, is presumed to be coincident with the right of property, until the contrary appears. Acting on this hypothesis, the freeholder as thus defined is always to be entitled to have his property registered. But since there may be other rights besides the freeholder's, these rights are to be dealt with as qualifications of the freeholder's presumptive title; for the possession is not necessarily the whole of the evidence upon which the title rests; it should rather be considered as the basis of the evidence, or, as it were, the starting point of the inquiry. When, therefore, other rights exist, protection is to be given to them, and they are to be capable of registration under the heads of "Charges and Notices." Registration of charges and notices is to consist, in effect, of the registration of written instruments or assurances; but each instrument or assurance is to stand upon the register in the name of a person responsible for its introduction into or retention in the registered title, and empowered to remove it at pleasure; and provision is to be made for its compulsory removal from the title as soon as its operation has ceased. The registration of the freehold is to be provisional in the first instance, that time may be allowed—say six years ordinarily, but a longer period, perhaps twenty years, for those who are under disabilities—to interpose the registration of existing incumbrances or adverse titles. It is further proposed that a map of all the land in the kingdom, divided into parishes or districts, should be made by authority, on which each field or other materially defined portion of the surface of the country should be distinguished by a numerical symbol. This map is to be made the basis of a book of reference containing the same numbers as those on the map, with the description and contents of each division, and the names and addresses of the different freeholders. The register at the outset would be formed on the spot by an assistant registrar or commissioner sent down to the different parishes for the purpose of receiving claims; and the assistant registrar would in substance follow the practice prescribed by the General Inclosure Act, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, a limited time being allowed for appeal, with an extension of time in favour of persons under disabilities.

32. This second plan is explained in detail in the Appendix. It contains suggestions of which we shall avail ourselves hereafter; but in the view of the majority of this Commission there are grave objections to it; and unless these objections could be overcome or materially lessened we should not feel ourselves justified in recommending it.

33. Objections to the second plan considered.] — One serious objection is the necessity of sending a commission into (n) Mr. Scully retains his preference for the land tribunal and land debentures proposed by his plan in appendix A. See his paper at the end of the Report.

(o). See Evidence of Commissioners Longfield and Hargreave, Master Brooke, Sir M. Barrington, Lord Dunalley, Colonal Larcom, Mr. Griffith, LL.D., Sir R. every district to ascertain who are to be put on the register of the lands in that district—an objection not merely or mainly on the score of expense, but to the principle of such an inquiry. It would, in fact, involve a compulsory registration of title; for a landowner could not venture to remain passive, lest some one else should procure registration to his prejudice. The presumptive completeness attributed to the freehold title would also tend to stir up dormant claims which might otherwise be settled by mere lapse of time. In the next place, the right which under such a system every freeholder would have to register his freehold, as implying, in the absence of or subject to registered qualifications, a power to transfer the fee simple to a bonâ fide purchaser for valuable consideration, would confer on a person with a limited interest a power which he does not and ought not to possess. The consequence must be, that claims without number would be sent in to the registrar; for the presumptive right which the freeholder might acquire would otherwise destroy the actual rights which the remaindermen, or those who have interests in the property, are justly entitled to. In the next place, the facility with which claims might be made and allowed would lead to the introduction of a mass of documents —some real, some doubtful, some fictitious—which would have to be searched for, examined, and god rid of, before a purchaser could be advised to accept the registered title; and thus the evils already pointed out (q) as necessary incidents to a registration of assurances would here arise, and we do not see how they could well be avoided. Again, since all interests, other than that of the registered owner for the time being, are by this plan remitted to the head of "Charges and Notices," it would often be ambiguous what extent of interest ought to be considered as represented by the registered ownership. In some cases the "claims" may be merely illusory, and in others they may relate to interests certain to take effect (at a future period). The certificate of ownership, however, would be delusive if it were not certain what measure of interest it represented, because the ownership would appear to be the fee, and yet might, in truth be no more than a life interest. On the other hand, the proposed circulation of certificates of registered "claims" might lead to fraud when the claim covered merely an imaginary, a litigated, or a doubtful interest. Once more, the sale of lands by registered owners would, during the period of provisional registration contemplated by this plan be almost prohibited, inasmuch as, until the expiration of that period, modifications and limitations might be put upon the register in the shape of "claims." Assuming, however, that these objections could be more or less overcome, still there would be the difficulty, the expense, and the delay of mapping the whole country, of settling the questions of disputed boundaries, of correcting errors which would constantly creep in, and of revising the map from time to time, so as to make it correspond with the changes, in the various alterations and subdivisions of property, which would constantly take place.

34. Maps.]—The importance of maps as forming the best basis for a scheme of registration has been long and often and ably discussed. In 1832 the Real Property Commissioners (r) reported against such a use of maps. In 1850 the Registration Commissioners reported (s) in favour of it; but two of that body, Mr. Humphry and Mr. Broderip, expressed their dissent. In 1850 a bill for the registration of assurances, founded on the report of the last-mentioned Commissioners, which recommended maps, was brought into the House of Lords' and referred to a Select Committee. The Select Committee, admitting that maps were in theory to be preferred, came at length to the conclusion, that, considering the occasional inaccuracy of the Tithe maps, the insufficient scale of the then existing Ordnance maps, and the great delay and expense of a new survey, it would be inexpedient to propose their compulsory adoption in the first instance, but that means should be reserved of introducing them as opportunity occurred. The bill, in consequence, came down to the House of Commons without that portion of it which was founded on the recommendation of maps by the Commissioners. In the House of Commons the question was slightly re-opened (t) in 1851, but no opinion was expressed. Under these circumstances we have felt it our duty to take further evidence on it; and we have arrived at the conclusion that a compulsory plan for mapping the whole country would not be attended with sufficient advantages to outweigh the inconveniences which must necessarily attend it. The first inconvenience would be the unavoidable delay that must occur in remapping the kingdom. There are no public maps now in existence which would be sufficient to answer all the purposes of registration (u). The present scale of the Ordnance maps in England would not be large enough for minute subdivisions of common fields, and for a clear delineation of town districts. The tithe maps would determine the question of parochial boundaries, but not the boundaries of individual proprietors. Such maps might certainly be useful to a considerable extent; but for registration purposes there must be new surveys; the revision of existing maps must be made, and it would probably require two years before tho map for any one county could be got ready. Again, the expense would be very considerable. Mr. Beamire says (v) that the maps and references in the Tithe office have already cost as much as £2,500,000; and Colonel Dawson (x) estimates at upwards of a million the cost of compiling a map of the entire kingdom partly from maps scientifically constructed, and partly from the revision of other maps to be adopted for the purpose of registration. And this would be independent of the expense which would have to be incurred in settling the boundaries between different proprietors, if such a measure were considered desirable. It appears to us, however, that to compel the formation of a general map of England with the view of making it evidence of the boundaries of properties would of necessity open a vast field for litigation and dispute. Questions of disputed boundaries which are now allowed to remain in abeyance must then be settled. Ths trouble and annoyance thereby occasioned would be harassing in the extreme; and these evils would fall more heavily on small owners than on large proprietors. Every person must defend his extreme rights, for when once the register came into operation, they would be barred for ever. To meet so many and such serious inconveniences, the corresponding advantages should be clear and positive, certain and immediate; but we doubt very much whether this would be the case under a compulsory obligation to map the boundaries of every proprietor.

35. Maps continued.]—For the reasons before mentioned we cannot recommend that the compulsory formation of a general map should constitute the basis of a system of registration of title. At the same time we are not insensible to the numerous advantages which a pictorial representation of property and its boundaries must always have as compared with a mere verbal description of it (y). The verbal description can only state that it contains so many acres, roods, and perches; that it bears such and such names; that it is occupied by this or that tenant; and that it is bounded on the north, south, east, and west by certain specified roads, rivers, buildings, or lands belonging to or in the occupation of certain specified parties. But such a description is not necessarily sufficient to identify the property, or to ascertain correctly its form or shape, or whether the fences or boundary lines are crooked or straight, or to determine what is the general or particular direction of it with regard to the points of the compass. These are matters which a map, constructed upon a basis of triangulation, and according to the principles of science, can best supply as permanent landmarks, accurate at the time when they are originally made, and capable of being restored to their true positions, whatever may be the casual or accidental circumstances by which they may have been disturbed. Although, therefore, for the reasons above given, the compulsory formation of a public map would be open to serious and grave objections, yet the use of a map properly authenticated for each individual estate, and made on a uniform scale, would probably furnish, together with the usual verbal description, the best means of identifying the property, and the clearest mode of indexing correctly the registered title to it. One of the witnesses has observed in his evidence (z) that "a map is a good servant, but a bad master; very useful as an auxiliary, but very mischievous if made indispensable." In this opinion we concur; and while we would deprecate the adoption of maps in any mode, or for any purpose, which would make them binding upon or conclusive of the rights of parties, we would encourage and even require their use in each case, so as to obtain a description and admission of the particular property which the party applying intends to have registered. In furtherance of the same purpose a discretionary power should be given to the registrar for determining how far and under what circumstances any existing public maps might be made available, as well as the scale upon which either the private maps or copies of the public ones should be prepared and employed.

36. Third plan.] — The next plan which has been brought before us is that which was previously submitted to the Select Committee of the House of Commons (a). This plan is founded on the belief that the transfer of land may for many purposes be assimilated to a transfer of stock. Every person who, in respect of power or interest, has the absolute right of disposing of the fee simple of property in land, would, according to this plan, be entitled to put the estate on the register, and to transfer the ownership thereof to any other person, subject to such rights and interests as were created before and existed at the time when the registration of the property was effected. And inasmuch as this part of the plan would be slow in its operation, and for fifty or sixty years would involve an investigation of title anterior to the registry in every dealing with the land subsequent to the registry, it is proposed that the person seeking registration should be empowered to apply to the registrar to have the title duly investigated by a counsel and solicitor of his own selection; and then, if the title should be found in all respects to be perfectly marketable, the registrar is to be authorised to guarantee or warrant it against all claims that might be brought in respect of it. But since persons having limited interests might be prejudicially affected by the acts of the registered owner, it is likewise proposed to enable such persons to protect themselves by the entry of distringases, to be obtained and to operate in the same way as stop orders are now obtained and operate on the transfer or disposition of stock in the funds. A similar mode of registration is likewise provided, by means of a subordinate register, for leaseholders. This plan does not provide for the registry of anything beyond the simple transfer of the ostensible ownership in fee and leases. Dealings which concern partial estates or equitable interests only will not be assisted or protected by the register, except when (as against an improper disposition by the registered owner) a distringas is put on. In fact, the purpose of this plan is, to attach to each landed estate a formal and ostensible proprietorship, to which the right of sale and transfer may be incident, in cases where the whole fee simple is intended to be disposed of, and to remit those who, in any case, may have right to restrain the sale or transfer, or to complain of it, or are interested in its proceeds, to the protection of the distringas, or to their personal claim against the individual.

37. Objections to third plan considered.]—The material objection to this plan is, that transfers by the registered owner are stopped or prevented so long as there are mortgages on the property protected by distringas, and that mortgagees must either be themselves placed on the register as owners in lieu of their mortgagors, or must be content with the protection of a distringas. Another objection is, that a general liberty of entering distringases on the oath of parties, stating that they have an interest in the land, and on an ex parte order of the Court of Chancery, may lead to complications, embarrassments, and litigation, which ought to be avoided. Some further check may perhaps become necessary to prevent this liberty from being abused, and we believe such check may be found and provided.

It is also considered by some of the Commissioners that the advantages to be derived from registration would under this plan be postponed to too remote a period, unless some means could be devised of ascertaining and protecting on the register, within an early period, rights in registered land created anterior to the registry.

The principal change in the law which this plan involves is, that after the commencement of the registry no disposition by a registered owner will be allowed to pass any interest less than the whole fee simple, except leases. The transfer must vest an absolute proprietorship in the transferee, whether the purpose of the transfer be a sale, a mortgage, or a settlement.

38. Other Plans.] — Other plans for the registration of title have also been submitted to us, and are given in the Appendix. One (b) of these, by one of the Commissioners, is substantially the same as the last, with the exception that it makes no provision for a system of warranty to which he objects. The others (c) we have not failed to give attention to, but they do not appear to us to call for special remark in this place.

As to Registration of Title. Observations introductory to the Plan about to be recommended.

39. Points of Agreement in the Plans.]—The previous examination of the different schemes before mentioned will tend to show the special difficulties which we have to avoid, and the particular provisions upon which all are agreed. They are agreed in recommending that the entry in the register should be the only manifestation of actual ownership for purposes of transfer. Each of these plans, moreover, suggests a certain "registration of title" to land; and what is thus proposed is not a registration of that which is now known as "the title" to land, but of some form of landed ownership, which, as part of the scheme in question, and for the purposes of it, must be adopted, and established by alterations in the existing law. Each of the schemes proposes, to a greater or less extent, to remove existing complexities of interest in land, and therefore more or less implies change in the nature of title. The difficulty consists (and here the plans essentially differ) in effecting the transition from the existing system of title, and in endeavouring to reconcile the registered ownership with the preservation and protection of unregistered interests. Most of the plans adopt some kind of mapping and some system of warranty; but they vary in the mode in which these objects are sought to be accomplished.

40. Problem to be solved.]—Bearing then in mind such agreements and differences, and taking advantage of the different suggestions submitted to us in each of these schemes, we find that the problem which has to be solved is this:—By what means, consistently with the preservation of existing rights, can we now obtain such a system of registration as will enable owners to deal with land in as simple and easy a manner, as far as the title is concerned, and the difference in the nature of the subject-matter may allow, as they now can deal with moveable chattels or stock? No one doubts that it would be a great benefit to the proprietors of land if they were able to convey it with the same facility as the owners of ships, or of stock, or of railway shares, can now assign their property in any of them. But the question is, Can this be accomplished?—and, if so, how?

In answering these questions, it must be assumed that no plan of registration will be acceptable or desirable unless it leaves, substantially and practically, to the owners of land, powers of disposition and rights of enjoyment of similar extent and facility of exercise with those which they possess under the present system.

41. Difficulties resulting from long existence of the present system.]—One remark should here be made, which is apt to be lost sight of; it is this,—that if there had been always a register of land, as there is in fact a register of ships, of stock in the funds, and of railway shares, it would be difficult to point out any distinction between property of that description and land, so far as regards the mode and form in which they might respectively be transferred or sold. The distinction between them has arisen, not so much from the different nature of the things themselves, as from the different regulations to which they have been subjected in their origin and in the development of their legal qualities. Both kinds of property are equally the creatures of and require the protection of the law. Both admit of transfer from one person to another. Both may be subject to family settlements. But the right to the one has grown up under the feudal system of law, adapted, no doubt, as far as it could be done by judicial decision, to the varying wants of mankind, but without the aid of a controlling power which alone would be sufficient to simplify its tenure or facilitate its disposition. The right to the other has been created and regulated by Parliament itself, which having to deal with a new subject, determined at once to allow no trusts to affect the transfer of it, and therefore excluded from the register of the right to it all modifications which might otherwise qualify the absolute ownership. Had land always been similarly registered and similarly transferred, no one would now think of imposing upon its present proprietor the harsh and unnecessary burden of furnishing, before he could part with a single acre, a detailed history of every transaction relating to the property for a period of sixty years; nor of forcing him, before he could borrow £100 for purposes of improvement, to prove every birth, marriage, death, settlement, charge, conveyance, or incumbrance that might by possibility affect the title for more than half a century past; and if this be so, how much more beyond reason would it be to compel an owner, after such a process had been gone through on his purchase, again to undergo it, when he might wish to sell that to which the title had been both recently and abundantly proved. Assuming that we are right in this conclusion, and we think that few will doubt it, the difficulty of giving to the owners of land the same benefits as those enjoyed by the owners of ships, stock in the funds, or railway shares, is the difficulty of applying a new principle, which, in a new state of things, has been found to be practicable and advantageous, so far and in such a manner as to render it applicable to an old state of things, which is justly complained of, and which has become prejudicial to the interests of society, in those very particulars in which it disregards that principle. It is the difficulty of unravelling the intricate meshes of form and technicality with which the owners of real property are surrounded and entangled, the difficulty of assimilating the transfer or alienation of that kind of property which has been hitherto subjected to these forms and technicalities to the transfer or alienation of that kind of property which has always been without them; the difficulty, so to speak, of undoing, as regards the future, that which has grown up into a kind of necessity, until it has almost come to be supposed that the security of property in land depends on the fetters with which all freedom of action respecting it is tied up and restrained. We will proceed to show how we think this assimilation may be effected, notwithstanding the complications in which the title to land and the transfer of it are at present involved.

42. Objects aimed at.]—The objects in view are, to form a register of title as distinguished from a register of the various deeds and assurances under which the title has been derived;—to form this register in such a manner that the retrospective inquiry into the former dealings and transactions, which on a transfer is now necessary, may be avoided; to make this register instrumental in simplifying generally the title to land and the forms of conveyance; and at the same time to continue, as far as possible conststently with a simple register of title, the existing system of settlements, and to avoid impairing unduly the security of settlements and trusts. These objects, moreover, we consider ought to be accomplished, if possible, in a manner which will avoid the special objections incident to a system of registration of assurances, but at the same time will secure the particular benefits and advantages which, as we have stated, belong to that system.

43. What a register ought to be and do.]—In endeavouring to accomplish the objects in question, we have come to the conclusion that the register ought to be composed of a succession of simple transfers merely, and should manifest only the actual and existing ownership of the land for the time being, without laying open the history or past deduction of it. It ought, in fact, to be a record of the ownership existing at the time of any supposed search of the register. If the register were to disclose as part of the existing title the former dealings, it would be found not to afford the requisite relief from the obligation of retrospectively investigating the title.

44. What ought to be put on the register.]—We further think, that, consistently with the objects in view, no form of ownership or property, besides the fee or entire ownership, with the exceptions next mentioned, can be allowed to be put upon the register. The registered ownership should, with those exceptions, always be the fee or whole interest in the land forming the subject of the registry. Charges on the fee, however, and leases, being (apart from the fee) subjects of marketable dealing, and interests commonly bought and transferred, should also be admitted to the register, separate places being provided for them.

45. What ought not to be mixed up with it.]—Some of us think, indeed, that beneficial interests in land not amounting to the fee, and dealings with such interests, might usefully and advantageously be registered. We conceive, however, that registration, as to such interests and as to dealings with them, would, in all material points, resemble a registry of assurances, and that such a registry should not be mixed up with or form part of a registration of titles. Any such register should (d) be entirely distinct, and should not in any way affect purchasers of the fee, but should only bind the parties who created minor interests and incumbrances, the owners of such interests, and their heirs and personal representatives and assigns, and the trustees. This distinct register might be useful in regulating the distribution of the money arising from a sale of the fee, and in determining questions of priority, but it should not in any way complicate or impede the sale of the fee.

We, however, confine ourselves in this report to registration of the fee and charges on it, and leases; only observing that the system of registration here recommended will be found compatible, as we believe, with the subsequent establishment of the subordinate registry we have mentioned, should that appear advisable, when the registration of title has been found upon trial to answer the ends which are intended to be promoted by it.

46. Certain preliminary questions stated.]—Before proceeding to state in detail the form and effect of the registration we propose, it may be convenient that we should advert to some questions of primary moment which affect the subject of registration of title generally, and which have received our careful attention, as presenting themselves at almost every stage of our investigation.

These questions are:—

1. Whether registration shall be compulsory or voluntary?
2. Whether the title conferred by the registry shall in the outset be parliamentary or unimpeachable, or shall be subject to be defeated by the claims of persons having rights created before the commencement of registration?
3. Whether, if the registered title be not at the outset unimpeachable, interests created before the commencement of registration shall become in any manner bound or affected by the registration after the lapse of any given period, or otherwise?
4. Whether the registry of the legal ownership will be compatible with the due protection of the equitable or beneficial interests in land?
5. Whether it shall be a metropolitan or a provincial registry, or both metropolitan and provincial?

47. First question (compulsory registration) considered.]—In considering whether registration shall be compulsory or not, it is necessary to bear in mind the various senses in which a system of registry may be said to be compulsory.

1. One form of compulsory registration of title would be to require all owners or persons in possession of land to make their claims and apply for registration within a limited period, on pain of losing their rights, or of other claimants being admitted to the register upon their defaults. This species of compulsory registration of title we do not recommend. Such a system would tend to disturb possessory titles, by arousing dormant claims and encouraging litigation, and would contravene the general policy of the law in respect to possession, which we deem to be a very wholesome one.

2. Persons applying for registration may be required to prove their title or submit it to a quasi-adverse investigation, as a condition of their being admitted to the register. We think such a compulsory investigation of title, though only required as a preliminary to registration, would be highly objectionable; and we do not recommend it. It would involve, as has been pointed out in the evidence before us, the necessity of having every title to every acre of land thoroughly investigated by a competent judicial tribunal. It would (e) be distasteful to landowners, who would be very reluctant to disclose their titles, and it would occasion the bringing forward of many stale and illgrounded claims,—would give rise to litigation,—and would, when completed, be of no practical benefit to any, except those who contemplated selling their estates. It is also to be borne in mind that many persons in quiet possession of land have bought it under special or restrictive conditions of sale, which have precluded them at the time of their purchase from calling for strict or proper evidence of the title, and have limited them to some short period of the title in their investigation of it. It would, we think, be highly unjust to call upon persons in such a situation for strict and technical proof of their title, such as alone any public authority charged with certifying titles ought to be satisfied with.

3. Registration of every dealing with land may be rendered as essential to perfect such dealing as any other solemnity which is required for the legal alienation of land. This is another description of compulsory registration. We think, however, that it is unnecessary to adopt any such principle of compulsion. Except so far as the object of securing a register of the ownership for the protection of purchasers requires registration, dealings with land not perfected by entry on the register ought to be allowed to have effect.

4. Registration may be rendered necessary in order to obtain

(d) Professor Hancock's Evidence.

priority for a transaction affecting land as against another transaction relating to the same land which may claim the protection of the register; in other words, as between two transactions affecting the same lands, priority may be given to that which is first entered on the register. With reference to registration compulsory in this sense it has been urged (f), on the one hand, that by not making the original registration of title compulsory, the gradual adoption (if it shall take place) of the system will be, so far, a test of its usefulness and suitableness to the condition and wishes of the country, whilst its non-adoption would render it innocuous. It is further said, that, considering that the measure is novel in its character as well as in its operation—considering the advantage of gradually introducing it, instead of incumbering the registry office with a mass of applications which it would be difficult to get through—considering that the main object of establishing such a system is to obtain, if possible, a facility of transfer which many persons whose properties are kept in a course of settlement may not desire immediately to possess—and considering that the change is sure to recommend itself if it is likely to be followed by those benefits which are anticipated, it would be advisable, at least in the first instance, to make the registration purely voluntary. It is said, on the other hand (g), that there should be one law for the whole country, and that it would be a highly objectionable system to propose that some purchasers may bring their estates within the pale of registration, and others, at their option, remain unaffected thereby. It is also urged that a main benefit of the system will be lost, if the register should not be the sole and conclusive evidence of dealings taking place after the establishment of the register, or if, as to such dealings, a retrospective investigation of the title by purchasers should in any class of cases be necessary. Generation after generation (h) might pass away in the successive enjoyment of property without any assertion of title on the register; and when made, some thirty, forty, or fifty years hence, it must either be clothed with a Parliamentary or other warranted title, or else after that lapse of time a retrospective investigation of title would be needful. The conclusion to which we have come on this point, though not without some difference of opinion, is that registration shall not, at any rate in the first instance, be necessary to a transfer of the fee in order to obtain for it preference or priority over any subsequent transfer which may be brought to the registry for completion.

5. Another mode in which registration may be made compulsory is to require that, as to all land once voluntarily put on the register, the subsequent dealings and title should be always continued on the register. In this sense we concur in thinking that registration should be compulsory.

48. Second question (Parliamentary Title) considered.]—With reference to the second of the questions above pointed out, we think that the observations already made, showing that applicants for registration ought not to be required first to submit their title to judicial scrutiny, are sufficient to prove the objectionable nature of any scheme of registration which should profess to confer at the outset a Parliamentary or unimpeachable title. It would, we think, be oppressive, either on the one hand to require claimants out of possession to come forward, and make assertion of their rights, in order to avoid losing them, or, on the other, to put the persons in possession to the defence of their rights, as against any stale claims or assertions of right that might be set up. We do not think that in order (i) to pass from our present system to a register of title it would be necessary, as has been suggested, to create a jurisdiction in commissioners, applicable to all land, whether incumbered or not, similar to that of the Incumbered Estates Court in Ireland, by which an absolute or Parliamentary title to the land, subject to leases or tenancies, should be declared. On the contrary, we concur in the opinion of one of the witnesses (k) who has given evidence before us, that to make a judicial or quasi-judicial examination of title an indispensable preliminary to admission to the register would greatly narrow the benefits of registration. The expense alone of the examination would exclude nearly all small properties, and the trouble and expense combined would exclude many others. Defective titles would necessarily be excluded; and we do not see why a defect in the title to land anterior to the introduction of registration need deprive that land of the benefit of an improved mode of transfer subsequently. We think that a registration founded on ostensible or possessory ownership should be permitted in the first instance, and that on such a registration the antecedent title might be left to be the subject of investigation, until by lapse of time or otherwise that investigation should become unnecessary.

49. Third question (pre-existing interests) considered.]—The next question we have to consider is, whether interests existing in land before the time of the first registration of the land shall be in any manner affected by the operation of the register, after the lapse of any given period or otherwise.

It has been strongly urged upon us (l), that, if the provisions of the registry should operate upon the subsequent title only, and if the old title should be left open to investigation for the full period during which it is now liable to be affected by latent rights, the utility of the registry would be wholly lost to the present generation. On the other hand, it is said that any one who by the existing law has an interest which he might set up, supposing there were no registration of the ownership, ought to be allowed the same period of time and the same opportunities that he now has for asserting his right, though the effect of his claim might be to disturb and undo the existing registration at a remote time subsequent to the commencement of the registry. The question hence arises, whether the principal benefit of the proposed system, which is the avoiding the necessity for retrospective investigation of the title, may not be secured by fair and reasonable provisions at some period earlier than the full time when all possible claims existing anterior to the registry would, by the existing law, have expired or become barred. We have been reminded (m) that if the legislature should adopt such a rule, it would be only following an analogy furnished by their predecessors. A statute of Henry 7th gave to a fine levied with proclamations after five years a conclusive effect. The proclamations were nevertheless in practice a mere fiction, and gave no real notice to others, and the period of five years was adopted at a time when communication was difficult and intercourse confined. The effect of a fine with proclamations remained in force until the Act was passed abolishing fines and recoveries; and it is said that its abolition by that Act, without a substitute, has been frequently regretted. It is contended that in the present day we have need, for the purposes of commerce, of the same policy which for different purposes and in a ruder state of society animated feudal tenures; and that the course of years has brought us round again to feel a want somewhat analogous to that felt in the early period of our history, though with different aims. It has been further urged (n) that if provision be made for the due publication of the registration or the application to register, the registration ought to be allowed to attain its conclusive effect, after the lapse of some period shorter than is now required by the general Statutes of Limitation to extinguish dormant rights; in other words, that the title if not impeached in a given time, say a short term of years, after the title is put upon the register, and full notice of it published, might pass into an absolute and unimpeachable title, at least for the purposes of sale, and thus retrospective investigation of the title avoided in the case of a sale to a purchaser. Those who entertain these views consider, however, at the same time, that all parties, or their trustees, should have the power or right, within the prescribed period, to show cause against the title, and should not be obliged to wait until their interests are reduced into possession; and further, that, with the view of justifying and facilitating the application of such a provision, some moderate evidence of ownership, sufficient to exclude the hypothesis of fraud, should be adduced by every applicant for registration.

The conclusion, however, to which we have come, though with some difference of opinion, is, that interests created in land before the commencement of registration should not be adversely bound or affected by the mere registration as such, but should be allowed to be claimed, notwithstanding the registration, within the period now fixed by the Statutes of Limitation.

50. Fourth question (protection of beneficial interests) considered.]—We next proceed to consider whether the registration of the legal ownership will be compatible with due protection of the equitable or beneficial interests in land.

It has sometimes been supposed that any system of registration of title will require a decision as to which of certain principles alleged to be irreconcileable touching the theory of disposition of landed property ought to prevail; whether, on the one hand, the stability of settlements, or, on the other, the safety of buyers, or, in other words, the protection of families or the marketability of land, ought to form the paramount consideration. After mature examination, however, we have been led to the conclusion that no such dilemma is in fact involved in the institution of a registry of title.

Were we to allow, however, that such a difficulty does, in fact, present itself, we should be able to rely, as has been well remarked, (o) on our ancient law as affording for the present purpose a wise and useful precedent; for just as the feudal law required that the freehold should always be filled by one capable of contributing to national defence, and performing the duties of a feudal follower, so the spirit of commerce now demands that for its purposes also the fee simple in land shall always be represented and be in the possession of persons capable of fulfilling those new duties and offices which the ownership of land in the present state of society entails or involves.

As regards the sale and transfer of land, it is clear (p) that much good would not be obtained by merely registering the fee, or, in other words, the legal title, unless the purchaser could dispense with inquiry into the equitable title, with its incidents. Unless a purchaser be protected from inquiring into trusts, there will not be any advantage to him. In other words (q) if trusts and limitations are to continue to form part of the title in all respects as they now do, the registry of title will be useless, or at least not worth the danger and difficulty attendant upon the introduction of a new system.

The question, then, is (r), whether the present system of settlements can be modified without materially interfering with the nature or quantum of interests commonly created by them. Any material interference with the nature of such interests would be objectionable; but, under modified forms, the system may, we think, be continued consistently with the objects contemplated by a register of title.

Equitable interests and trusts cannot (s), consistently with the objects to be attained by registration of title, bind or affect the ownership of a registered purchaser, unless such interests are of his own creation; but they may be allowed to confer a right against the land whilst in the possession of the owner who created the trusts, or in that of his representative, or volunteers claiming under him. When the land is sold without fraud, the equities and trusts must be transferred to the funds arising from the sale; and so the purchaser will take the lands discharged of the trusts. But they may be protected on the register of title by the trustee of the family settlement, or by a trustee named by the Court of Chancery, and sales by the settlor or the trustee in contravention of the trusts may be prevented by entering an inhibition or caveat.

Thus the existing system of settlements, by which the limitations and trusts of the settlement modify and become part of the title, will be unchanged under a registry of title, so long as the land continues in the possession of the settlor or volunteers claiming under him, or the trustees of the settlement. Upon a sale without fraud, these limitations and trusts will attach to the funds arising from the sale.

It has been suggested (t) as another mode of providing for equitable interests, that where a person beneficially interested enters an inhibition or caveat, it would be a convenient mode to enter the name and address of such party in the principal register, with a reference to a distinct register in which the nature of the equity might be specified, and this latter register would be in the nature of a register of trusts, and the legal title could thus be kept distinct from that relating to the equities. This corresponds to the suggestion already made, that in order to perfect the system of registration it may be expedient hereafter to establish a subordinate register of equitable and secondary estates, independent of the principal registry of the fee.

We are aware that it has been objected (u) to the portion of the proposed system now under consideration, that partial and equitable interests constitute a very large proportion of landed interests, and that while to require them to be registered would be to sacrifice the simplicity of the register, to exclude therefrom the register would be to jeopardise them, by placing them at the mercy of the registered owner, except so far as the persons entitled to such interests might become active in using the allowed means of restricting his power of disposition. It is remarked with truth, that the owners of these interests may now remain passive, and yet be sufficiently protected. It is therefore contended, that, to deprive them of their present grounds of security, and substitute the necessity of taking active measure, by distringas or otherwise, to protect themselves from improper dealing on the part of the registered owner, would be placing such owners in a new and critical condition, requiring much intelligence and caution, and would tend greatly to diminish the value of these numerous and very important interests, which are themselves constantly the subjects of sale and transfer. A settlement of land, it is said (w), would, under such a system, come not to differ practically from a settlement of a sum of stock, which would be felt by some to be an evil; many preferring an interest in land, because, to use a not uncommon expression, "while they are sleeping, land cannot run away."

We may remark, however, in reference to these objections, that experience and existing practice will furnish the best answer to them. According to the modern practice of conveyancing, the apprehended danger has not been found to arise in analogous cases, where trustees are clothed with as large powers as they would have under the proposed system. That practice has especially been directed to avoid the embarrassment of a complicated system of trusts, which, by the rules of equity, fasten themselves on the land, and provisions are constantly inserted (x) in settlements, to render it unnecessary that purchasers or mortgagees, when dealing with trustees, should be forced to see to the circumstances under which the trust is performed, or the manner in which the proceeds are applied. For example, under the present system most well-drawn settlements of landed estates contain clauses empowering the trustees to sell, with the consent of the tenant for life, if he be living, but if he be dead, at their sole discretion, and to give absolute discharges for the purchase money; and yet no sales, excepting those within the object and provisions of the trust, are ever heard of. Again, this principle is carried so far that the property is often conveyed to the trustees by one deed, while the trusts are declared by another. And what is the object of these complicated proceedings, except that the trustees may appear to the purchasers, or be treated by them, as absolute owners, and that those purchasers need not know anything of the purposes for which they hold the property? Again, under the present system of conveyancing, a mortgagee has usually a power of sale, which he may exercise without the concurrence of the mortgagor; but experience has shown that this power is very rarely abused, and it is uniformly given without hesitation. We therefore think that the practice (y) of inserting powers of sale in settlements and mortgages proves that the proposed scheme of registration, when properly understood, will not be considered objectionable by landowners. Nor should it be forgotten that there are millions of money in the funds, and in railways, canals, docks, and other undertakings, left to a great extent in the names of trustees, and yet it has been found that property so circumstanced is practically safe. Can it be believed that what is safe for beneficial interests in such property, when prudently looked after, will be otherwise than safe when applied to land, especially if there are thrown over it those additional protections which we recommend in this report? With such protections, prudently claimed and carefully acted on, we conceive the answer must be in the negative. And if any further proof were needed, we should find it in the fact that the legislature itself has recognised (z) the principle upon which we proceed, and applied it to property in British ships, as may be seen by the recent statute for amending and consolidating the acts upon that subject.

It may also deserve remark (a), with reference to the supposed objection arising from the risk of fraudulent sales by trustees, that the contemplated sale of land is usually known to tenants and other persons in the locality, and is therefore less likely to be effected by fraud than transfers of stock.

51. Fifth question (Metropolitan or Provincial Office) considered.] —The remaining question is, whether the register shall be a metropolitan or provincial one, or, in other words, whether it shall be central or local, or both central and local? Or, to put the question more accurately, shall there be—

One central register for the whole kingdom; or,

Several county registers for the several subdivisions of the whole kingdom; or

One central register for the whole kingdom, with branch offices in the principal towns throughout the kingdom?

A central register for the whole kingdom would, of course, be established in the metropolis; county registers would probably be in the largest, or most central, or most generally accessible town in the county.

The advantages of a metropolitan register over county registers have been stated to be the following:—

1st. Under a metropolitan register a uniformity of system throughout the whole kingdom would be established, which would hardly be attainable, or at any rate maintained, in several county registers.

2nd. One metropolitan register would be much less expensive than from fifty to sixty county registers. For in each county register there would necessarily be an efficient registrar, and a deputy competent to discharge the duties of the registrar during his absence from illness or other inevitable cause.

3rd. One metropolitan register, under the superintendence of a registrar of high professional attainments and experience, and efficient deputies and subordinate officers, would inspire more confidence on the part of the landowners of the country than several county registers would do.

4th. The registers of judgments, bankruptcies, and insolvencies must necessarily be metropolitan.

5th. The suggested system of distringas would be more efficiently worked, and uniformity of practice would be more securely preserved, in one metropolitan register than in numerous county registers.

6th. A metropolitan register would be less expensive to parties employing solicitors resident in the country. Every solicitor in the country, without exception, has an agent in London with whom he is in daily confidential unreserved communication, and no additional expense, or the smallest additional expense possible, is occasioned to the client by reason of the employment of a London agent. The remuneration of a solicitor is on a fixed scale, and, as to the business transacted by the agent, the remuneration is divided between the agent and country solicitor. They are, as regards the particular transaction, very much in the position of partners residing in different towns. Through his London agent, therefore, the country solicitor might obtain from the metropolitan registry all the required information, at the same cost to the client as if the register were in the town where the country solicitor practised. But the country solicitor rarely has a confidential agent in any other place than London, and if he does not reside in the register-town he would be obliged to employ a local solicitor, or to make a journey to the registry for the purpose of search or registration, and it would often happen, where secrecy was desired, that he would find it his duty to incur the expense of a journey.

7th. With county registers it would constantly occur, that solicitors in distant parts of the country, as well as solicitors in the metropolis, would have no knowledge of the solicitors in the particular town where the county register might be. Many of the solicitors in large practice in London have clients who are landowners in many of the counties in England, and they would be much inconvenienced and embarrassed by a system of county registers.

8th. The ordinary communication between London and country towns, to say nothing of the telegraph, is often much more rapid and regular than between one country town and another, and of course the postage of letters is the same whatever the distance may be.

It has, on the other hand, been urged (b) that the registrar ought to be charged with the duty of ascertaining the accuracy of the description and identity of the land, and that, to insure this, a local register would be indispensable, and that a union of the two systems would be at once practicable and desirable.

With reference, therefore, to the question whether the office should be a single metropolitan office, or whether it should be subdivided into various provincial offices, our opinion is, that both suggestions may be combined with great advantage. The principal office should be situated in London; but local or district registries should be also established.

We now proceed to state the leading particulars of the registration we recommend.

As to Registration of Title.—Leading Particulars of the Plan recommended.

52. The Office.]—A land register and transfer office for England and Wales will be established in London under the management of a registrar general; and branch offices will be also established in different districts throughout the kingdom, subject to the orders and regulated by the authority of the Registrar General.

53. The kinds of property.]—The registration will extend to all corporeal hereditaments, except copyholds, and to advowsons and rentcharges, except perhaps tithe rentcharges.

54. General right of owners in fee simple to obtain registration.]—After the estsblishment of the office, all owners or proprietors of land who have the right of possessing or the power of disposing of it in fee simple will be at liberty to apply for the registration of the ownership thereof; so that such ownership, or the title to the land which is the subject of the same, may thenceforth be manifested by the register alone.

Supposing this to be accomplished safely and with prudence, the effect of the register, when in complete operation, will be to render it unnecessary, in dealing with land which has so been registered, to look beyond the last ownership appearing on the register, and thus the expense of long investigations of title,—of deducing that title through numerous assurances, pedigrees, and devolutions,—of requiring covenants for the production of deeds in the hands of third parties,—of lengthened abstracts, recitals, and conveyances,—will, on the occasion of future alienation, as the register advances, be gradually diminished, and eventually be altogether avoided.

Two difficulties, however, here arise: the one in first bringing titles on the register; the other, in protectiug the different interests and incumbrances which may now be derived out of or charged on the fee simple of land, and connecting them with the registered ownership. We have endeavoured to remove both these difficulties.

55. Two kinds of registered ownership.]—Registration of title is proposed to be twofold; one, which shall at once enable the registered owner to transfer the estate with a present or immediate statutory title; the other, registration of actual ownership, without the power to transfer an immediate statutory title.

56. Prevention of improper attempts at registration.]—In the second of these cases, that is, in the case of registration unattended with immediate statutory title, the parties applying will be required to produce before the registrar a declaration on oath, stating that they are in the actual enjoyment of the rents and profits, and that they believe themselves to be absolutely entitled to the land in fee simple free from all incumbrances, or subject only to such incumbrances as are distinctly specified; and they will also be required to produce, where it can be done, the last instrument of conveyance of the fee simple, or such other evidence as the registrar may find it necessary to require, with the view of excluding fraudulent claims. Powers also will be conferred on the registrar to give such public and other notices as he may deem necessary of the intention of the parties to have the property registered, in order that they may not wrongfully procure a registration which may be detrimental to other persons.

But where the title to lands has been ascertained by decree or judgment of any court whose jurisdiction is competent to determine the right, there the production of such decree or judgment by the person in whose favour it may have been made, or the order of the court consequent thereon, will alone be sufficient to authorise the registrar to register the ownership of such person, subject to the necessity of making such declaration and serving such notices as above adverted to.

57. Registration with warranted title.]—Registration with immediate statutory title will take place in those cases where the owner of the land desires, not only to obtain a title which, with regard to the future, will be manifested and established by the register alone, but a title which with regard to the past cannot be disturbed. We have already adverted to this part of the subject, and we have stated, for reasons which we need not repeat, that the suggestion of a guarantee or warranty of title is in our opinion most valuable (see paragraph 30). In this class of cases (c) it will be lawful for the parties seeking registration with the benefits of a warranted ownership to apply to the registrar to have the title investigated with that object. In such cases, it will be right that the registrar should cause the title to be fully investigated, at the expense of the parties, by counsel and solicitors; and if he shall be satisfied on their advice that the title is a good one, then, on the payment of a small premium, to be calculated by way of a per-centage upon the estimated value of the property in question, he will register the ownership as a warranted one, either in the name of the party applying, or, if the party applying shall prefer it, then in the name of such persons as he may nominate for that purpose. Since the guarantee of the title will be given by a public officer, the premiums payable by the party obtaining such guarantee will be paid into the Exchequer; and the Consolidated Fund will be liable to make a fair and reasonable compensation to any person who may within the period allowed by law establish a claim in respect of the estate, the title to which has thus been registered with a warranted ownership. A similar provision will also be extended to those cases where land is sold under the decree of a court, subject to the payment of similar premiums, and to the title being examined and approved of in a similar manner (d.)

(b) Mr. J. Meadows White's evidence.

(c) Mr. Headlam objects to the system of warranty. See his paper in the Appendix.

It may here be mentioned, that the suggested warranty has the advantage of precedent in its favour. For when lands are sold (e) by the principal officers of the Ordnance department, Parliament has empowered them to give to purchasers a clear and indefeasible title, making compensation to those persons who can establish within a limited period any legal or equitable right to the property.

58. Certificate of ownership.]—In both the above cases, for the convenience of parties, as evidence of their title to the property registered, and for other purposes which we will hereafter refer to, a certificate of the fact that it has been registered will be delivered by the registrar to the party applying; and this certificate, duly authenticated by the seal of the office, will be a certificate either of warranted or unwarranted ownership, as the case may be. It will be advisable that this certificate should state on the face of it the name of the registered owner, the lands registered, and the incumbrances (if any) to which they are subject. It will also contain a reference to the indexes which relate to the entry thereof in the books of the registry.

59. General effect of registration.]—The general effect of the kind of registration here recommended will be, that, for the purposes of transfer, the registered ownership will at all times represent the fee simple of the property, and, as such, it will not be capable of any subdivision or modification into partial or limited estates or interests, except so far as charges and leases may also be admitted to the benefit of registration under the provisions which we shall presently mention.

60. Right of disposition incident to the registered ownership.]—The right to dispose of and transfer the ownership of land in fee, including the right to charge and lease the same, will belong and be incident to and in fact be taken as forming part of the registered ownership.

61. What unwarranted ownership freed from, and what not.]—When the registered ownership has not been warranted, it will be subject to such rights and interests as existed in or were capable of attaching upon the property at the time of the first registration, but it will not be subject to any rights or interests arising or created at any period subsequent to the time when the first register was effected, except charges and leases admitted to the register, and except interests protected by caveat or inhibition, as afterwards mentioned. Thenceforward the title to the property for the purpose of transfer will be manifested by the register, and by that alone; and so eventually the only title to land which a purchaser need examine will be the last transfer as the same is recorded in the registrar's books. At the commencement, indeed, the validity of the title of the first registered owner will still depend, as it does now, on the validity of the title of the party by whom the transfer has been made. But as time passes on this title will gradually strengthen itself, until it has reached a period which, under the operation of the Statute of Limitations, will make it complete, and mature it into an unimpeachable statutory title. Year by year the purchaser will be brought nearer and nearer to this result, and so the expenses which attend the retrospective investigation of title will be gradually diminished, until they reach their minimum point.

62. What warranted ownership freed from.]—When the registered ownership is a warranted ownership, the special advantages to be derived from this system of registration will immediately follow. In such cases the registered ownership will be subject only to other registered rights, and will be exempt at once from all latent claims and interests which may have been created previously to the time when the property is registered. The registered owner will therefore have, forthwith, for the purposes of transfer, a simple, complete, and indefeasible title.

Such a result will tend, not only to diminish the expenses attending the transfer of land, but also to increase the value of land as a marketable commodity; for the value of land when offered for sale is not merely to be measured by the purchase money paid, but likewise by the costs which the vendors and purchasers must necessarily incur in deducing the title, and ascertaining its validity. In proportion as these costs are diminished the value of the land will be raised. Great as these advantages unquestionably are, they are not the only advantages which may be expected from a system of warranted ownership; for a well-devised scheme of warranted ownership will afford so perfect a security to titles that no latent interests, no dormant trusts, no fresh claims, which may have been concealed or overlooked, can possibly interfere with the enjoyment of the purchaser; and the land will be as clear from all rights, other than those which are actually registered, as stock which is purchased in open market.

63. What registered ownership, whether warranted or not, will be subject to.]—The registered ownership, whether warranted or otherwise, will at all times represent, for the purposes of transfer, what is usually known as the fee simple, subject to such charges and leases as may be admitted to the register, and in the case of ownership not warranted, to the title antecedent to the first registration. In other words, the register will be a substitute for the documentary or parchment title. But the registered ownership, whether warranted or otherwise, will remain subject, as the fee simple now is, first, to such other rights as are not usually included in the abstract of title (f) that is to say, those rights which are incident to the property in a physical rather than a legal sense, and those which are presumed to attach on all landed property; and secondly, also to such rights as may be ascertained by inspection on the land itself, or by inquiry of the occupier. Under the first of these heads we include all easements, such as rights of water, rights of way, rights of sporting, and rights to light, and those interests which are denominated in law profits à prendre, and tithe rentcharges, land tax, and other taxes and rates of a general character; under the second we include short leases at rackrent where the lessee is in actual occupation of the premises. These are rights which are commonly evidenced by known usage or continued enjoyment, or may be ascertained on the spot by inspection or inquiry; and the title to them is generally so independent of the documentary title to the property that they will necessarily form a partial exception to that which will constitute the registered ownership, whether warranted or not.

64. Facility of obtaining loans.]—It may be convenient, before quitting this branch of the subject, to point out as one of the effects of such a system of registration the great facilities which it will afford to landowners to obtain loans for temporary purposes. The possession of the certificate of the registered ownership, as an equitable security for money advanced, will confer the same privileges and be attended with the same rights as those which are derived from the possession of title deeds under a deposit. And it can hardly be doubted, that, for the security of those who advance money under such deposits, the assurance that there could only be one title deed to the property pledged would be of much importance. In transactions of this kind, the lender is always liable to be imposed upon by the suppression or concealment of some particular deeds which may qualify the borrower's right, and we therefore concur in an opinion expressed by one of the witnesses before the Select Committee of the House of Commons (g), that "it is probably not too much to say, that there is no point on which the proposed registration of land property would work better than in improving the security of lenders on deposits of title deeds, and consequently, so far as facilities in borrowing inexpensively may be deemed advantageous, in facilitating the obtaining of loans on such deposits."

65. Mode of protecting unregistered interests.]—The second difficulty to which we have adverted is the difficulty of providing an adequate security for those interests which are not of a nature to be admitted to the register. The ownership of land, whether registered or not, will still be subject to various derivative or beneficial interests which will require protection. The distinction between legal and equitable interests is not a mere technical distinction. It is a matter of fact. Its continuance is necessary for the full enjoyment of property. So far as the interests of purchasers exclusively are concerned, it would be better, no doubt, that the vendors or registered owners should in all cases be the sole owners, both at law and in equity. But the beneficial ownership or equitable estate being often divided between several persons, the right of present enjoyment being in one person, and the right of future enjoyment in another, and the person who is entitled to the present enjoyment being sometimes a minor or under other disability, and the person entitled to the future enjoyment being sometimes unborn or unascertained, a necessity arises which must be attended to of protecting interests such as these, which would still be unregistered, against the unjust acts of the registered owner. Occasionally it has been thought that the equitable interests might be put on the register; but if that is done it is demonstrable, as we have observed in a previous part of this Report, that the advantages of a registry of title would soon be lost, since it would become in fact little else than a registry of assurances, and a very imperfect one. The protection must be provided in some other mode, and we think it may be obtained in various ways.

(d) Mr. Napier approves of the proposal to make decretal titles under judicial sales indefeasible; but objects to a warranty by the registrar as above.

66. Same subject—No survivorship between registered owners.]—Where the parties to a settlement desire it, they will have the power of registering the property in the names of two or more persons as registered owners, with a short note (the words "no survivorship" will be sufficient), intimating that in the case of the death of either the jus accrescendi is not to have place (h). The effect of this will be, that if one of the registered owners die, no alteration of the ownership can be made until his place is filled up. And as the prevailing instances of fraudulent or improper alienation of stock are those where it has devolved upon one trustee, this simple provision (which will completely prevent the devolution of the registered ownership upon a smaller number of persons than those first registered) will operate as an almost perfect protection to all parties who have or may have any kind of interest in the registered land under any settlement of which the registered owners are trustees.

67. Same subject—Caveats to prevent sale without consent].—As a further protection, those parties who are entitled to any unregistered interest which, as the law now stands, would render their concurrence necessary in a sale of the fee, will be at liberty to enter in the registry a caveat (i) or inhibition against the transfer of the registered ownership. This caveat or inhibition may and ought to be of various kinds, or various in its operation, so as to adapt itself to the different circumstances under which it will be required. To prevent abuse it will be lodged at the register office, only under proper sanctions, such as the consent of the registered owner, or the order of the Court of Chancery if the registered owner improperly refuse to give his consent; and to secure protection suited to the various conditions of settlements, the caveat or inhibition will be allowed to be so framed as to prohibit the transfer of the registered ownership either for a time specified, or during particular lives, or until the occurrence of a stated event, or without the concurrence of certain parties who for that purpose may be named or referred to as protectors, or under any other condition conformable to law which the parties themselves may think fit to impose. The simple effect of such a provision will be, that as long as the caveat or inhibition remains, the registered ownership cannot be alienated without the permission of those whose consent will be thus rendered necessary; but if all these parties desire a sale, that consent can previously be obtained, and so the purchaser will always be able to contract for the property, on the express condition, or with the absolute certainty, that he need not move in the matter until the title has become perfectly clear of the equitable interests thus interposed (j).

68. Same subject — Injunction by court.]—When it is remembered that the protection thus afforded to the beneficiaries of land will be greater than that which is now afforded to the beneficiaries of stock or railway shares, there can hardly be a doubt that—taken in connexion with the fact, that, except as against purchasers without fraud, the beneficial interests will continue as now to affect the land—these various methods of protection will be found sufficient. If it be suggested that fraud may still be practised, the answer is, that there will still remain the remedy by suit, by injunction, and by account. For it is to be observed, that an unregistered interest will entitle the beneficiary to enforce the performance by the registered owner, not being a purchaser, of such duties as properly ought to be observed and performed by him; and for that purpose, but for that purpose only, those duties will be deemed to be trusts cognizable, like other trusts, in the Court of Chancery, and determined, like other trusts, on the principles of equity.

69. Registered owner where only a trustee, not to retain the registered ownership as against the beneficiaries after trusts satisfied; but this not to affect purchasers.]—Where the registered owner shall be a person named such for the purposes of any settlement, then, as between such registered owner and the beneficiaries interested under the settlement, he will not be at liberty to retain the registered ownership, or to remain on the register as registered owner for any longer period or under any other circumstances than according to the present rules of courts of equity he would be entitled to retain the legal estate if he were a trustee of the fee upon trusts similar to the provisions contained in such settlement, and he will be bound to make a grant of the registered ownership to such person as may be named in that behalf by the beneficiaries.

70. On death of registered owner his executor to be the new registered owner, or a new registered owner to be appointed.]—In order to keep up the chain of title, and to prevent the difficulty which might arise upon the death of any registered owner in obtaining a transfer, we think it will be convenient, that, for the purposes of this measure, as well as for the purposes suggested by the Chancery Commissioners, a real representative should be appointed, upon whom the registered ownership shall devolve. This representative will be ordinarily the executor; but where an executor has not been named, or where he has died or renounced probate, power will be given to the parties interested to apply to the registrar or to a judge to supply the place of the deceased registered owner, and to enter the name of some proper person in his stead.

71. All powers now possessed by landowners left untouched.]—We have already intimated that in our opinion no plan of registration will be acceptable or desirable, unless it leaves substantially and practically to the owners of land the same power of disposition and enjoyment, and means of protection and security, as those which they possess under the present system. The plan recommended will secure this object. For, subject and in subordination to the registered ownership, qualified and explained as we have mentioned, the owners of land or of the unregistered interests therein will be at liberty to settle, devise, and deal with the same for the like estates, to the like extent, and generally in the like manner, as by the rules of law and equity they would have been entitled to do if the registration of the ownership had not taken place. All the rights of tenants for life or other persons having partial interests will be left unaffected and undisturbed, for the registration will not interfere with the right of beneficial enjoyment and management of the land, and the property cannot be dealt with by the registered owner except when a transfer is by the absence of a caveat impliedly permitted. It may also be observed, that such a system will have the effect of keeping private all family arrangements, while it will continue the enjoyment under them, and provide for their security. So that the advantages of trusts and settlements will be effectually preserved; while the title will not be incumbered, nor the transfer impeded by any notice of such trusts or settlements. The provisions necessary to prevent alienation against the will of those who are entitled to say that the property shall not be sold will not involve any such notice.

72. As to persons becoming registered owners by gift.]—Registered transferees without valuable consideration will be subject to the claims of the persons interested in the unregistered ownership, in the same manner as their transferror would have been; but this can be so provided for as not to affect registered purchasers from volunteers, without fraud; and a further provision can be added, that it shall not be necessary to inquire whether the registered owner acquired his title as a purchaser or not.

73. As to notice and fraud.]—We propose that fraud in obtaining a transfer of the registered ownership shall defeat the title of the person who becomes registered owner by fraud, but that notice of unregistered rights shall not merely as notice have any such effect. We think that though the purchaser in the course of his inquiries, or before he concludes the purchase, has notice of any claims upon the estate, it will not be unjust to deprive the parties interested in such claims of their rights in favour of such purchaser, if their rights are not protected upon the register. We do not agree (k) that any at-

(h) See Mr. Commissioner Longfield's answer to question 24.

(i) Mr. Scully considers that more convenient modes of protecting unregistered interests might be provided than the proposed caveats. See his paper at the end of the report.

(j) It has been suggested that it might be lawful for the parties interested in the trusts of any settlement or will to deposit privately with the registrar a copy of the settlement or will at the time when the lands which are or may be the subject of such settlement are entered on the register, with a private instruction that no transfer shall be afterwards made of the registered ownership without the consent of the parties who for the time being may be interested, or who may have power of consenting under the settlement or will, or otherwise than under and in conformity with the powers of the settlement or will.

tempt to exclude the application of the doctrine of notice would prove abortive. We are aware that it has been said that the judges would, notwithstanding any law to the contrary, in the course of time contrive some means of neutralising any enactment which went to exclude the doctrine of notice, just as our courts of old contrived to prevent the Statute of Uses having the effect intended by the Legislature; and that to abolish the doctrine of notice altogether would be contrary to every principle of justice and equity. After full consideration, however, we cannot adopt these views, but, on the contrary, we concur generally in the reasons adduced by the Real Property Commissioners in their Second Report (l), in favour of excluding the interference of courts of equity on the ground of notice.

74. Mode of describing and identifying lands on register.]—In determining the provisions necessary for securing a proper description of and the means of identifying the lands admitted to the register, it will be useful to bear in mind (m) that in every investigation of title there are three important questions to be attended to, viz.—First, whether the title deeds disclose a clear title to the lands described in them?—secondly, whether in that description all the lands intended to be dealt with are truly comprised?—and, thirdly, whether the actual possession of the lands is consistent with the title as so disclosed? Now, looking at the plan which is here recommended, it is clear that the difficulties arising from the first of these questions will be completely met when the register is in full action. For a purchaser will not be under any necessity of requiring and examining documentary evidence, the register alone, for purposes of transfer, manifesting at once the title to the lands which form the subject of the registered ownership. With reference to the third point, it will still be necessary that the possession of lands should be inquired into by purchasers, lest it should be adverse to the registered ownership. The second, however, of these questions, we have here more particularly to consider. We have intimated our opinion (see Paragraph 35) that although the compulsory formation of public maps would be open to many and grave objections, yet the use of a map properly authenticated for each individual property, together with the customary verbal description, would probably furnish the best means of describing and identifying the land, and indexing it correctly. To accomplish this object in the fullest manner, we accordingly recommend—

1. That the registrar shall have power to require the description of the registered lands to be stated and set forth in such form and manner as he may deem to be best fitted for the purposes of registration.

2. That at the time of registration it shall be lawful for the registrar to require the parties applying to be registered as owners of any lands, to produce a private map or plan of the lands proposed or intended to be registered; and that such map or plan shall be made on such scale and contain such particulars for identifying the same with the property registered as the registrar by any general or special regulation may in that behalf require.

3. That, before the registration of the ownership of any land, the private map or plan so produced by the applicant shall in every case be referred to in the description of the lands required to be entered on the register itself.

4. That the registrar shall also be empowered to require at the time of registration that the property proposed or intended to be registered shall contain a reference in the description given of it to some public map to be kept in the registry.

5. That for that purpose he shall be at liberty to declare that the maps made under the direction of the Master-General of the Ordnance, the Tithe Commutation maps, or any other maps of the accuracy of which he is satisfied, shall be deemed public maps for the purposes of registration; and if he thinks fit he shall cause copies or reprints of any parts thereof to be made, either on the existing or on an enlarged scale; and such maps as are directed to be used for the purposes of registration shall be deposited in the registrar's office, and copies thereof published and sold in such manner and subject to such provisions as the registrar may direct.

6. And that as the main object of the public maps will be to facilitate searches and references, the registrar shall be empowered to adapt the maps to the districts created for the purposes of registration, or to form the districts with reference to the number, quality, and description of the available public maps, so that each district may have its own public map or maps to which the parties seeking for information will be able to refer.

(m) See Mr. Cookson's paper, Appendix A.

75. Mode of transferring the registered ownership.]—Having thus provided for the first registration of title to lands, for the protection to be given to unregistered interests, and for the mode in which the identity of the property may be ascertained, the provision to be made for subsequent dealings with the registered ownership by way of transfer, mortgage, or lease, will be comparatively easy. Beginning with transfers, when the registered ownership is in a single name and unfettered by a caveat, that party alone can go to the registrar, and desire the transfer, on production of the certificate of registered ownership. When a purchaser has bought the land of the registered owner, the application of the one and the authority of the other will, on the production of the like certificate and a deed of grant, be sufficient for the purpose. And when the ownership has been guarded by caveats, the previous withdrawal of them, on the consent of the persons in whose names they are entered, or by an order of court, will enable a purchaser without any trouble or any further inquiry to see at once whether he can complete his contract. The transfer will be made by deed, and in a short and simple form, which the Act will authorise. On proper evidence being adduced before the registrar of the validity of the deed, he will enter in the register the name of the transferree in the place of the transferror. When that has been done the transfer will be complete, and will pass the whole fee-simple; and on the completion of it the registrar will deliver to the transferree a fresh certificate of registered ownership, if the whole of the registered land has been transferred; but if the transfer is confined to a part, he will deliver to the transferree a certificate of ownership limited to such part; and he will deliver to the transferror a fresh certificate of ownership containing a description of the lands retained by him.

The effect of such transfer will be, to give to the person registered an absolute title to the lands so registered for the purpose of alienation, free from all interests created subsequently to the first registration of the land. If the registered ownership is a warranted ownership, it will further be freed and discharged of all estates and interests whatsoever, excepting easements, registered leases, and registered charges; but if the ownership has not been warranted, it will be subject to any claims which existed at the time of the first registration, and have not since become extinguished or barred by time.

76. Registration of incumbrances.]—With regard to incumbrances, we (n) think that the benefits to be derived from registration should be extended to the owners of charges upon the fee of land as fully as to the owners of the fee itself. The registration of charges may properly be subjected to the following rules:—

1. Every charge intended to be registered shall so be entered on the register as to show the name of the owner thereof, the lands upon which the same is made, the amount of money secured thereby, the rate of interest payable thereon, and the date of the instrument by which it is created.

2. Every such charge shall also be entered under some proper sanction, such as the consent of the registered owner to the registration thereof, or the order of a competent Court decreeing or directing the same to be registered.

3. On the registration of such charge the registered ownership will be subject to the legal rights and powers incident to the charge, and either may be transferred independently of the other.

4. A certificate of the charge will be given by the registrar to the party applying to register the same.

5. The priorities of all charges shall be determined exclusively according to the dates of their respective registration.

6. Unregistered charges shall only take effect as unregistered interests, but may be protected in like manner as unregistered intetests.

77. Registration of leases.]—The benefit of registration will also (o) be conferred on the owners of leases for the term of twenty-one years and upwards. The registration of leases will be subject to the following rules:—

1. Every lease intended to be registered shall so be entered as to show the name of the owner thereof, the length of the term, the date of the lease, and the rent reserved.

2. Every such lease shall also be entered under some proper sanction, such as the consent of the registered owner, or the order of a competent court decreeing or directing the same to be registered.

3. On registering such lease the registered ownership will be (n) Mr. Headlam objects to an Independant Register of Incumbrances or Leases. See his paper in the Appendix.

(o) See Note (m).

subject to the legal rights incident to the lease, and either may be transferred independently of the other.

4. A certificate of the lease will be given by the registrar to the party applying for the registration of the same.

78. Transfer of incumbrances and leases.]—The mode of transferring registered charges and registered leaseholds will be similar in all respects, mutatis mutandis, to the mode of transferring the registered ownership. And on the death of the registered owners thereof, their representatives will be entitled to be registered in their place.

79. Extension of powers of sale of Court of Chancery.]—There are some cases in which provisions, in connection with the proposed register, may be made to facilitate the sale and transfer of land, though not provisions which can be said to be indispensable to the system as a system of registration. It has been suggested to us (p) that means might be devised by which the conversion of land into money could be effected at once, with the concurrence only of the person having possession and enjoyment of the land, if care were taken to provide a safe independent place of deposit for the money for division among the parties having pecuniary claims on it. Facilities, it is said (q), might be given in some cases to allow the transfer of the land to proceed, impounding the consideration for the transfer, and fixing it with the equities under notice. This, it is urged, would be specially desirable in cases of pecuniary claims or charges on the land the title to which charges may be embarrassed.

We have adopted these views, and propose to vest in the Court of Chancery certain powers for the purpose suggested.

80. Indexes.]—A provision which it is most important to attend to is the mode of indexing the property registered. This must be left to a great extent to the determination of the registrar. But since there are three matters more or less distinct from each other, yet more or less connected together, which would have to be entered in different ways, namely, registered ownerships, registered charges, and registered leases, there must be also three sets of indexes corresponding therewith; namely, first, an index of registered owners; secondly, an index of incumbrancers; and, thirdly, an index of lessees; and these indexes should so far refer to each other that the registered ownerships should always show by a distinct reference whether such ownership was subject or not to any existing charge or lease.

81. Miscellaneous provisions.]—With regard to some miscellaneous questions as to the machinery of the proposed registry, we think that the title deeds should not be required to be delivered up to the registrar; that the registrar should have a general power of determining conflicting claims by consent, or of putting them in a course of judicial determination; that no tenancy in common should be allowed in a registered ownership; that a general power should be given to the registrar of making necessary regulations; and that there should be a difference of fees for large and small transactions.

82. Authority of register.]—With regard, however, to the powers to be entrusted to the registrar, we conceive, that, as a general principle, his authority should be ministerial and executive in its nature, and not judicial. We agree in an observation contained in the evidence before us (r), that there is no feeling more strongly rooted in the public mind than dislike of official interference with their private affairs, and any system must be considered practically impossible, however theoretically perfect, which would render the approval or sanction of a registrar necessary for the completion of transfers, or would give him any discretionary power to prevent them.

Conclusions in Favour of, and Answers to Objections against, the Plan recommended.

83. General conclusions in favour of the measure.]—This measure, so novel in its character and so difficult in detail, demanded from us and has received the most careful and searching examination. The best means, in fact, of testing its practicability were afforded to us before this report was drawn up, by the labours of one of the Commissioners, who prepared the sketch of a Bill (s), with the requisite provisions and machinery for the practical working of the measure. This Bill, which will be found in the Appendix, was examined by us in detail, and from it we derived much valuable assistance in framing this Report. In some respects it differs from the recommendations which have here been made; in principle, it agrees with them altogether. Novel, therefore, and difficult as the measure may be, we see no reason to doubt its practicability, and we can consequently recommend it with more confidence, and in the belief that while it would obviate all the difficulties which are likely to spring from a registration of assurances, it would provide those benefits in the transfer of land which registration is intended to confer. On the one hand, it will be found, that the expense and delay which must always be occasioned by a retrospective investigation of title,—the evil of accumulating year after year a vast mass of documents in one registry,—the complication and difficulties which would thence arise,—the danger of disclosing the private affairs of individuals, and the other objections above adverted to, in a registration of assurances, will all be avoided. On the other hand, it will be seen that the removal of those impediments with which the alienation of land is surrounded,—the ready means thereby afforded of raising money by temporary loans for purposes of improvement,—the facilities for partial or complete alienation, without disturbing existing interests, or interfering with the rights of settling property which are now enjoyed under the present law,—and the perfect security that a purchaser may acquire by obtaining easily a parliamentary or warranted title,—will confer on land an enhanced value, and free the owners of it from those embarrassments to which no other property has ever been subjected.

84. Objections urged against it.]—The main objections which have yet been urged against such a measure are, first, that it excludes from the registered title all those various modifications of ownership which the law allows, other than fee simples, mortgages, and leases; and, secondly, that the warranty of title to lands will be open to serious inconveniences. We will make some remarks on each of these objections.

85. First objection as to the limited extent of the measure.]—With regard to the first objection, it must be admitted that the benefits intended to be conferred by registration are confined, in the first instance, to the registration of the fee simple, mortgages, and leases. These, it is to be remembered, are the properties in land which most usually form the subject of sale and transfer. Transfers of other rights and interests are for the present excluded from the proposed register, because it is desirable, at least in the first instance, that the plan should not be unnecessarily complicated. In the meantime there is nothing to interfere with those rights and interests. They will be as capable of being exercised and enjoyed after the establishment of the register as they are now. The measure proposed expressly preserves them. And as long as it preserves them, the owners of them will have all the control over the management of the property with which the law now invests them, and which their settlors or testators intend that they should have. Further than this it might be imprudent to go, before the measure has moulded and adapted itself to the practical wants and habits of the community.

86. Second objection as to warranty.]—With regard to warranty, it is considered by some of the Commissioners to be contrary to the general policy of this country to allow the State to enter into pecuniary speculations of any description; that though there may be reason to believe that the sum which landowners would be willing to pay for such a warranty would be more than equivalent to the risk incurred by the Government, or, in other words, that the speculation would be a good one; yet, as there is no experience on the subject, no confident opinion can be expressed; and that it is obvious that if at any time there should be carelessness or fraud on the part of the officers of the Government who have the management of the scheme, the loss to the State might be of a most serious description.

In the second place, it is said that there is a great objection to the plan arising out of the manner in which it deals with the rights of individuals. It provides that any person establishing a claim on land guaranteed by the Government shall forfeit his right or interest in the land itself, and in lieu receive a money compensation to be paid by the State, and apparently to be also estimated by the State; and it is argued to be most objectionable that the contract between an individual and the State should be allowed to affect the rights and interests of a third person, who is not in any way cognizant of or a party to the contract.

Independently of the foregoing objections, which apply to the principle of the scheme, it is considered that there are considerable practical difficulties incident to its execution; and that but few of the titles to land would bear so searching an investigation as would be necessary in order to obtain the warranty. It is lastly said that the costs and expenses of an application for a warranty would be serious and certain, the result of the application would be doubtful, and in the event of a refusal a stain would be cast upon the title, and its defects made known and exaggerated. We have considered these objections, and agree in thinking that they are entitled to attention; but a majority of the Commissioners have come to a conclusion in favour of the principle of warranty. They can see no reason why the great benefits which have been conferred in Ireland on encumbered properties should not, by analogous measures, be extended to unencumbered properties, and also to this country. A parliamentary or warranted title is the one great desideratum to enable parties to deal as freely with their landed estates as they now can do with their personal effects. If the title is investigated with ordinary care, as no doubt it would be, by the counsel and solicitors selected for that purpose, the risk run is more nominal than real. If it should turn out that there was some claimant whose possible rights had been overlooked, he would receive compensation which the premiums paid by way of insurance would probably be more than sufficient to cover. If the purchaser should think that these premiums would entail upon him a new expense, the answer is, that he need not incur it unless he derives an equivalent advantage. But instead of this we believe he would feel that this advantage was more than an equivalent for that expense by the clear title which he would thus obtain, by the additional value given to his land, and by the perfect security in which he would hold it.

Answer to the Inquiry as to "the Advantages and Disadvantages" of the Plan recommended.

87. Whether there are any disadvantages attending the system.]—Having now stated the leading details of the plan of registration we recommend, we propose to consider, in answer to the inquiry intrusted to us, "the advantages of and disadvantages attending such a system."

88. In regard to what may be the disadvantages of registration of title, we may refer to the different parts of this Report in which objections and difficulties have been adverted to and dealt with. We have shown that the existing evils are great; and we have acted upon the principle laid down by the Real Property Commissioners, that it should be made out, to a reasonable degree of certainty, founded on a careful investigation of facts and mature deliberation, that the proposed remedy is practicable, and that it will be effectual, that it is the best that can be devised, and that it will not itself be an evil, or productive of evils, equal, or nearly equal, to those against which it is provided. We are of opinion that the plan recommended by us fulfils or satisfies all these conditions; and at all events these objections, even if allowed to have the character of disadvantages, cannot be deemed seriously to detract from the very great benefits which landed proprietors, and the buyers and sellers of land, will derive from the measure we have recommended.

89. The advantages of the system.]—The advantages of the system will consist in giving facilities to the sale and transfer of land in the following respects:—

1. It will secure the principal benefits and advantages sought to be attained in a system of registration of deeds (t).

2. The system will render unnecessary retrospective investigation of the title as to all dealings subsequent to the commencement of the registration, and will gradually operate to dispense with such investigation altogether.

3. It will simplify the title to real property for the future (though it will not, except where warranty is obtained, confer at the outset a parliamentary title as against interests existing anterior to the registry), and it will have this effect even though it should happen that no concurrent improvements are effected in the general law of real property.

4. It will make purchasers of the fee and leases perfectly secure.

5. It will simplify to the utmost possible extent the forms of transfer and the modes of conveyance.

6. It will tend to increase the saleable value of land.

The system will effect this last benefit (u) by removing difficulties, and thus increasing the desire to invest in land. It will also enable the buyer to ascertain his expenses accurately. At present the expense depends partly upon matters which come to his knowledge only after he has entered into the contract. There will, in fact (v), be a saving to the buyer of the expense of investigating title and conveyance, and to the seller of preparing the title. The seller will indeed still have to bear the expenses of distributing the purchase money, but this he must do under the present or any other system.

7. It will tend to lower the rate of interest on loans secured upon land. It has been well said that the greatest condemnation of the existing system of lending money on land is the reluctance which bankers, the natural traders in loans, have to lend on mortgage or judgment. The security which they refuse, careless trustees, ignorant people who have savings, and widows and others who have some small provisions, are advised to accept, and in this way the whole risk of bad security is thrown on the classes least able to bear it (x).

8. It will confer facilities for the sale of large estates in lots. We agree in the statements of one of the witnesses, that the necessity for investigating the past title, and procuring the means of proving it and substantiating it for the future, places great obstacles in the way of selling a considerable estate in numerous lots; as it is generally difficult and always expensive to furnish each purchaser with the necessary evidence. One of the important advantages of a new and parliamentary title is found in the great facility it confers for the sub-division of estates upon a sale.

9. It will enable persons to obtain a warranty of their titles at the same or nearly the same expense as that incurred in an ordinary purchase under the present system.

Miscellaneous Recommendations and Observations.

90. Improvements in the general law and practice of conveyancing.]—But it is our opinion that as the register cannot in the first instance be made to confer an immediate statutory title in ordinary cases, some changes in the general law, having a tendency to simplify title, should be made concurrently with the establishment of the registry. The evidences of title and its devolution may be rendered more simple in various particulars which have been pointed out in the evidence before us, and are hereafter adverted to. By making those improvements in the law, the register, without being made to confer immediate Parliamentary title, may nevertheless be instrumental in producing immediately many of the advantages in regard to simplicity of title and transfer which will result from its own proper and unassisted operation, when its action has become complete. Facility of transfer and simplification of title act and re-act upon each other. We think that the establishment of a register should only be part of a general plan for amending the law of real property, in the particulars presently adverted to. We concur in the opinion of one of the witnesses (y), that, considering the cumbrous forms employed in conveyancing, it would be extremely impolitic to establish a register that would, as it were, stereotype a decaying system, and perhaps stand in the way of its thorough reformation; or, in case of its being superseded by a better, would induce the inconveniences of a register begun in one era and continued in another.

The improvements in the law of real property and the forms of conveyancing which have been suggested to us we have thought it advisable to embody in the sketch of a Bill, which has been drawn by one of the Commissioners, and will be found in the Appendix. Thereby the title to real property, independently altogether of the registration we recommend, and during the gradual introduction of the system, would be greatly simplified,—by the abolition of certain technical modes in the creation, limitation, and disposition of estates,—by turning mortgages into mere securities, but with the same powers of recovering the money which are usually conferred on the mortgagee,—and by giving to certain instruments such general effects as are now expressed in a lengthened form, and which add greatly to the cost of the transaction. These provisions do not strictly fall within the main object of the inquiry submitted to us, but they are so nearly allied to and so much connected with it that we have deemed it our duty not to overlook them.

(t) There are, however two exceptions:—The exceptions are, that it will not directly tend to make equitable or secondary estates more marketable than they now are, and that it will not afford the means of obtaining evidence of the contents of lost deeds. The former defect or objection will, however, cease to be material if the subordinate register of derivative estates to which we have more than once referred be established, and the objection may at all events be alleviated by an alteration in the law as to the obtaining of priority by the legal estate and the doctrine of tacking, which is one of the amendments of the general law subsequently adverted to in this Report. The latter defect will not, as to future titles, be of any considerable moment as regards purchasers of fee-simple estates, for title deeds will, under the operation of the registry here recommended, become of less consequence than they now are as evidences of title to the fee.

(u) Mr. Commissioner Hargreave's evidence.

(v) Mr. R. J. Farrer's evidence.

(x) Some experience as to the bearing which an improved state of title may have upon the rate of interest is furnished by the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords, appointed to consider whether it would not be desirable that the powers now vested in the companies for the improvement of land should be made a subject of general regulation, for it appears from that Report that one great advantage afforded by these companies is, that a landholder holding in fee can borrow cheaper under these Acts than he could otherwise, by reason of the mortgage being a primary charge under the Acts, and by reason of an investigation of title not being required, as in other cases.

(y) Mr. Dugmore's evidence.

They are also framed upon the principle recommended by experienced witnesses (z), of first deciding on the plan of the register, and then altering and simplifying the general law with reference to that plan. We hope that this Bill, together with the plan which we submit to Your Majesty for the registration of title, will be of use in assisting Parliament to deal at once with the whole subject.

91. Partial establishment of the register in the first instance.]—One practical suggestion there is, which it may be useful we should make, with regard to the policy of establishing the register in the first instance partially. As was said (a) of registration of deeds, we doubt whether any scheme of indexes, which ingenuity may devise, will be such that registration, with all its incidents, may start into life a perfect system, answering at once every purpose for which it is intended. We think there must be some practical experience, some working of the system, before office arrangements can be made which will be so perfect and simple that information (the non-discovery of which may be prejudicial) may readily be obtained. We therefore conclude that it would be desirable to try the registration partially at first, and establish the system to its fullest extent in some particular county or district. If it should be found to answer the objects for which it is intended, it might be then universally established, or the office created for that county or district might be extended to the whole country.

91. Peculiar facilities for the establishment of the register in Ireland.]—Before concluding this Report, we think it right to observe, that the circumstances of landed property in Ireland at the present time afford peculiar facilities for the introduction of an improved system of registration into that part of the United Kingdom. The long-established Register of Deeds, the Ordnance Survey, and the Incumbered Estates Court, in that country, furnish materials and machinery for effecting the transition from the existing system to the new one much more readily and speedily than can be anticipated in England.

We are informed by competent witnesses that the ordnance survey is considered one of the most valuable acts of practical government that has ever been carried out in Ireland. The maps are in universal use in the management of estates, in the sale of land, and in the valuation of land for public and private purposes. The boundaries of the old divisions of the country, such as counties, baronies, parishes, and townlands, are set out on the maps; the poor law unions and electoral divisions are aggregations of townlands, and can therefore be at once ascertained. In the southern counties the maps show the divisions of fields and tenements; and this system is being extended to the northern counties. These maps afford, it is said, the requisite materials to construct a public map as a basis of registration. The scale of the ordnance survey is for the entire country six inches to the mile, and the separate maps of towns are on a scale of sixty inches to the mile.

The existing (b) and long-established registry of deeds in Ireland appears to afford additional facilities for ascertaining satisfactorily the existing titles to and interests in land in that country. These facilities might, of course, be increased by the application for that purpose of the machinery of the Incumbered Estates Act.

Great as are the benefits, however, which the Incumbered Estates Court has conferred upon titles in Ireland, it is a remarkable circumstance that there is no provision for perpetuating and continuing, as to future transactions, the parliamentary title obtained upon a purchase from that court. The title is unimpeachable as to all transactions prior to the time of the purchase; but immediately after the purchase the transfer of the land becomes subject to the general law, and as to all transactions taking place after the purchase the title is liable to become again involved in complications and embarrassments similar to those from which it was relieved by the sale under the Incumbered Estates Act. Permanent simplification of title and simplicity of transfer are not attained by the Act, and retrospective investigation of the title becomes again necessary (though at present not to the same extent as formerly).

The system, therefore, which we have recommended, is required not less for Ireland than for this portion of the United Kingdom, while, at the same time, as we have already observed, the facilities for its introduction there are much greater than in this country.

93. The remuneration of solicitors.]—We take leave further to observe, that we think it will be very difficult to deal fully or satisfactorily with the subject of registration of title without making fresh regulations on the subject of the professional remuneration of solicitors. We observe that the Real Property Commissioners also found it necessary to direct their attention to this subject when making their report in favour of the registration of assurances.

In England a solicitor is allowed to receive such fees only as the judges of the Court assign him, and these fees are so devised as to attach to certain portions only of his work, leaving the rest to be done without fee. In matters of conveyancing, the whole trouble of the transaction is principally compensated by fees assigned according to the length of the various documents. Theoretically, in England, a solicitor is entitled to the same fees for superintending transactions relating to the smallest properties as to the largest. In Scotland, and many foreign countries, the work is principally compensated by a brokerage or commission; a form of remuneration almost universally adopted by the usages of commerce for all other agencies.

The changes we propose for the transfer of land, without materially altering the nature or extent of the more important services rendered by the solicitor, or the professional superintendence and responsibility involved, will interfere with those particular processes to which the courts have thought fit almost entirely to attach the solicitor's right to remuneration.

If, therefore, it is considered desirable to continue to prescribe by law a scale of remuneration for conveyancing business, it would seem right that an opportunity should be given for reconsidering the whole subject of solicitors' fees with reference to conveyancing. The services of solicitors will be necessary in the conveyancing transactions contemplated by the measure we propose, and reliance must still be placed upon their honour and character in performing the important duties and incurring the responsibilities which will still attach to every transfer.

94. We are reluctant to conclude this report without expressing our regret that it has not received the concurrence of one of the commissioners who is known to have given much attention to the subject of registration, and whose opinion on any such subject we all feel to be of weight. While, however, we acknowledge that our report would have derived additional authority, had he felt himself at liberty to affix his name to it, we have the satisfaction, not only of knowing that we have not failed carefully to examine the proposals which he has laid before us, though unable in the result to adopt them, but also that we have had the aid of his deliberations and suggestions, in maturing our views and recommendations, even where they differ from his own.

All which we humbly submit to your Majesty's Royal consideration.

DUBLIN.

The General Election.

The general election still continues to be the chief topic of conversation in legal as in all other circles. Most of the solicitors are hard at work in their respective localities as agents and sub-agents for candidates. A general election is a kind of harvest, the more to be prized as it comes but once in five years. It is stated that in the recent contested election for the county of Tipperary, no less than fifty-two solicitors were engaged on one side or the other. This is, however, a county of unusual extent, and can boast of more resident provincial attorneys than almost any other county. The lawyers, as a body, will be well represented in the new House of Commons, although they will not be more numerous than they were in the last. Among the unsuccessful attempts by members of the bar to win seats may be mentioned those of Messrs. Brady, Lawson, Q. C., Hemphill, M'Donough, Q. C., and V. Scully. The last-named gentleman is well known in London as an agitator for reform of the laws of real property, the introducer of a bill to establish a land tribunal, and, I believe, a member of the Real Property Commission, now concluding its labours. Mr. Cairns, Q. C., of the Chancery bar, has again been returned by the first mercantile constituency in Ireland, Belfast. Sergeant Shee will hardly be so fortunate in Kilkenny. It is confidently anticipated that a large number of election petitions will afford work for committees, and for parliamentary counsel and agents, for several months to come. The stringent, but somewhat obscure, clauses of the Act of 1854 have yet to be tested; and, no doubt, a cluster of points on almost every section will be anxiously debated and elaborately decided.

PARLIAMENTARY TITLE.

The first judgment of an appellate court has at length been obtained as to the validity of the title conferred on purchasers, under the Incumbered Estates Court. Several of the judges have had occasion, at different times, to express an opinion on the subject, but until yesterday the Court of Exchequer Chamber had never done so. In Errington v. Rooke, after a long delay, the judges have delivered their judgments, and, by a large majority, have upheld the title conferred by the Incumbered Estates Commissioners. This decision was confidently expected by the lawyers generally; and it is so fully in accordance with the letter and spirit of the Act, that a fuller notice would be superfluous.

APPOINTMENTS.

The chairmanship of the county of Dublin (an office nearly equivalent to an English County Court judgeship), vacant by the death of Mr. Kemmis, has been conferred on Thomas O'Hagan, Q. C., an able lawyer and successful advocate, and a Roman Catholic. This office differs from similar offices in England, inasmuch as it does not prevent its holder from practising at the bar.

The office of assistant barrister for Longford, vacant by the translation of Mr. O'Hagan to the more valuable chairmanship of Dublin, has been conferred on Mr. Robert Johnston, of the North West Circuit.

Money Market.

CITY, Friday Evening.

This being Good Friday was observed as a holiday, and the Bank, Stock Exchange, and other places of public resort, were closed.

The depression of the English Funds which followed, in last week, the resolution of the Bank directors to advance the rate of discount and interest, was increased by the unfavourable Bank return. A further slight restriction of accomodation has followed during this week. Money has been in active demand. The decline of Consols during the week has amounted to 1 per Cent. Foreign Securities have also sustained material depression. The large payments which became due on the 4th of this month were well met, and the settling day on the Stock Exchange passed favourably.

The payment to the public of the April dividends at the Bank, and of the life annuities at the National Debt Office, commenced on Wednesday.

From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 4th of April, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,537,705, being an increase of £480,835; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £9,343,720, showing a decrease of £643,839, when compared with the previous return.

The agents of Russia appear to be pressing forward in Paris the grand scheme of railways announced some time back. The chief contractor is Baron Stieglitz. In order to overcome some portion of his difficulties, he is supposed to have obtained a state guarantee of the shares to the extent of two-thirds of their value. This arrangement proves that the Russian Government is anxious to prevent failure, and will make the shares more acceptable on the exchanges of Europe. The prospectus published in Paris is for an issue in the present month of 600,000 shares of 500f., equal to £20 each. The deposit per share is to be equal to £6, and the total amount of the present intended issue of shares is equal to £12,000,000. Circumstances connected with England have been dwelt upon, in order to prove the improbability of such undertakings becoming profitable in Russia; but the circumstances of Russia are so different from ours, that no safe analogy can be maintained. It is much more reasonable to draw from the United States of America conclusions relating to the probable results of railway undertakings in Russia. In America, the country to be traversed by the rail is a wilderness without trade, without towns, without population. The rail is begun. People follow and buy the adjacent land, and form communities. In Russia as in America, vast tracts of unappropriated land remain at the disposal of the Government. The rail may be traced, as in the United States, through many miles of wilderness but it may have the advantage of terminating, not in the deep forest as is usual in America, but in the cultivated and well-peopled district of Warsaw or Odessa. In many parts of Russia production has no limit, except the difficulty of conveying its fruits to market, and this the railway will remove.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, APRIL 18, 1857.

ASSIZE ARRANGEMENTS.

Before the commencement of the late assizes we called the attention of our readers to some of the anomalies connected with the existing distribution of the circuits, and to some of the suggestions which had been offered for removing them. We publish elsewhere a report of a meeting at Manchester, which illustrates in the strongest manner the justice of our remarks. We should not, we imagine, be very far wrong if we were to say that the towns of Liverpool and Manchester contain between them not much less than one million souls, and the amount of business transacted in them is probably greater than in any other district of equal population. London, using the word in a wide sense, may, perhaps, contain something more than two millions and a half. Let us compare the provision which our present arrangements make for transacting the legal business of South Lancashire, on the one hand, and that of London, on the other. Confining ourselves to the superior courts, we get the following results: In London, there are sittings in term and sittings after term in three courts four times a year, and on an average each session will last about five weeks. That is to say, each court sits about twenty weeks in the year; or, in other words, the quantity of work which the public get from the judges in return for their salaries, is considerably greater than if one court sat throughout the whole year without any intermission whatever. Besides this, the Central Criminal Court sits for about twelve weeks in the year, and has always two, and generally as many as three, judges sitting at once. South Lancashire, on the other hand—the population of which is hardly, if at all, inferior to that of the metropolitan district—enjoys the advantage of one assize in March, another in August, and a gaol delivery at the end of the year. If we take a very high average, and suppose that each assize lasts three weeks, we shall have just six weeks' sittings for Lancashire against sixty for London; and if we suppose the criminal business of the circuit to be over, on an average, in ten days, we shall have one month's sittings of one court in Lancashire against three months' sittings of two or sometimes three courts in London.

This result is surprising enough, but it by no means exhausts the strange contrivances for producing inconvenience, which, in this case, as in some others, seem to have a positive fascination for English people. As we have already observed, a very large proportion of the population of South Lancashire is comprised in two enormous towns — Liverpool and Manchester—which, as we all know, are divided from each other by thirty or forty miles of railroad. This, perhaps, explains the fact that for many years there were no assizes at either, Lancaster being preferred to both on account of its insignificance and inaccessibility. By a great effort of self-denial this plan was so far modified, that Liverpool was associated with Lancaster in the honour of being an assize town, but the general principle was still maintained by leaving Manchester out of the list. We may form some kind of notion of the inconvenience which this must cause to the Manchester people, by thinking how we should like to be obliged to try all London causes at Brighton or Windsor.

But if the proceeding itself is characteristic, the arguments by which its propriety is supported are much more so. Mr. Justice CRESSWELL suggested "that the establishment of assizes at Manchester might cause additional witnesses to be called." "That," opines Mr. JAMES CROSSLEY, "must have been a pleasantry." It may have been a very good joke for the judge, but we should think it rather a poor one for the suitors. As Mr. CROSSLEY very judiciously remarked, it would legitimately prove that Manchester cases ought to be tried at Exeter; or we might even propose that the judge should be empowered to toss up for the verdict, which would supersede the necessity of witnesses altogether. The SOLICITOR-GENERAL observed "that there could not be more than two assize towns in one county." There is a sublime audacity in such an argument, which makes it difficult at first sight to take in its extreme absurdity. What does the SOLICITOR-GENERAL say to Croydon, Kingston, and Guildford; or to Wells, Taunton, and Bridgewater? If there is anything sacred and mysterious about the number two, is it an absolutely unalterable law of nature that there should be assizes at Lancaster? If Queen, Lords, and Commons are unequal to the effort of producing a third assize town without destroying the fabric of the British Constitution, they might, if they strenuously gave their minds to the task, succeed in transferring the honours of Lancaster to Manchester. A few years ago, they wiped Coventry from the list of assize towns; yet neither Great Britain in general, nor Warwickshire in particular, is much the worse for the change. We do not know, however, whether Lord WENSLEYDALE's argument upon the point is not the most remarkable of all. That learned Peer "seemed to think that we were precluded from making this application by the arrangement under which the Salford hundred list had the precedence at the assizes: that the arrangement was accepted in full of all demands." Many of our readers must have seen an ingenious squib called the "Crogate case," in which Lord WENSLEYDALE is represented as demanding admission after death to the Elysian Fields, and mourning over his exclusion, not so much on account of the personal consequences to himself, as because it showed that Rhadamanthus had loose views about special pleading. There is something eminently characteristic of this turn of mind in his answer to the Manchester memorialists. His lordship seems quite unable to look upon any question in any other light than in that of an action. The application immediately took the shape of a case of Government ats Manchester, and he no sooner heard of it, than he began to consider whether he could not plead accord and satisfaction. It never seems to have crossed his mind that the question was, not whether something might not be said on both sides of the case, but whether, on the whole, the proposed arrangement was not one by which the public convenience would be promoted. But it appears that, however good the plea may be, the verdict must be against his lordship, for the arrangement about the Salford list was accepted expressly without prejudice to the question as to the assizes.

To any simple-minded person it would seem almost superfluous to prove that it is a very inconvenient thing to try a cause at a place forty miles off, instead of trying it in the town where the parties and witnesses all live; but even upon this point there is abundant evidence. "In twenty-five civil causes tried at Liverpool the amount actually paid to witnesses taken down was £1,606 3*s.* 9*d.*, or an average of £64 4*s.* 10*d.*; but making the fullest possible allowance, the amount that would have been paid if those causes had been tried at Manchester would have been £734 15s. 8d., or an average of £21 7*s.* 9*d.*" Independently, however, of questions of expense, there is a most serious inconvenience in concentrating too much business in one town. A judge must be more than human if he does not occasionally give way, under such circumstances, to the temptation of using the power which he practically always possesses of compelling references and forcing verdicts. Even if substantial justice is sometimes done in this way, it is a mode of proceeding most unsatisfactory to the parties, who are thereby deprived of the right, which they undoubtedly possess, of having their causes fully heard and solemnly determined.

TO CANDIDATES FOR EXAMINATION.

On Tuesday week the examination will be held of candidates for admission on the Roll of Solicitors in the present Term. It is most important that the time still left for preparation should be turned to the best account, and we venture to hope that the advice we are about to offer may be found useful by some among the intended candidates.

In the great majority of cases the examination of Tuesday week will be the first important trial of the kind that has ever been undergone by the anxious student. This is an evil which would, to a great extent, be remedied by the institution of an examination previous to entering into articles, and of one or more examinations in certain essential branches of legal and general education during the period of clerkship—a measure which has been advocated by some solicitors who are very desirous to improve the character and social position of their order. To the candidate who received his general education at a public school and college or university, familiarity with examinations has taken away the fear with which they are regarded by some unpractised minds. Perhaps the experience thus acquired can be gained in no other way, but we shall endeavour to lay down for the use of the uninitiated a few plain rules which may possibly prevent some mistakes.

The young student is often unnecessarily anxious about his choice of books. He will buy whatever is specially recommended by any one who either speaks or pretends to speak upon authority. In default of any such adviser, he usually provides himself with the largest and the newest works upon every branch of the expected examination. For legal study it is no doubt necessary to use the most recent editions, but in law, as in other sciences, a little book is often more serviceable than a large one. Questions put in former examinations, and the answers to them, are bought with peculiar avidity, and are studied with a diligence which may or may not conduce to passing the examination, but which certainly will never be of the smallest earthly use afterwards. The publication of examination questions is useful, and perhaps necessary, to show what the required standard is, and to preserve a tolerable uniformity from year to year; but as encouraging discursive reading and affording facilities for mere cramming, it is most undoubtedly pernicious. It is far too late to offer to the candidates of Tuesday week any advice as to the books they should select for study, and we should probably be unwilling to undertake such an office at any time, however much solicited by students to do them what they fancy would be the greatest service. Generally speaking, there will be, in any branch of learning, several roads to proficiency almost equally convenient. If a paper be fairly set, the reader of one book of reputation will have no advantage over the reader of another. This observation will hold good, as it ought to do, of the examination papers of last term. As regards each of the five heads, it would be easy to name several books, any one of which, if thoroughly well mastered, would have enabled a candidate to pass most creditably. In cautioning students against too many large books, we must not, however, be understood to say that one small book is enough, as some would readily believe, for every purpose. The proper use of a compendium is not as the subject of exclusive study, but to render distinct and readily producible ideas which have been acquired from treatises of fuller detail. The week immediately before an examination should be employed in conning short manuals, if any such exist, of the subjects previously studied, and also the student's own notes of his former reading. If these have been carefully made, they will be more profitable than any manual. Of course, a man who knows nothing whatever now of a subject in which he is to be examined ten days hence will, if he possesses unusual quickness, stand some small chance of cramming in the meantime just enough to pass. His prospect, at any rate, cannot become worse than it now is, and possibly it may be improved a little. But in the great majority of cases mischief will be done by any attempt to enter upon fresh subjects of study now. In general it will be found that the men who do best in examinations are not those who have traversed the greatest quantity of print. To read not many things but much is as sound a rule as can be laid down. If one subject be thoroughly understood and fixed in the memory, this is an undoubted and enduring gain. Such knowledge will not only supply correct answers to a certain number of questions, but it will induce any examiner who understands his business, to look with favour upon the candidate's whole performance. Many a student, wanting neither industry nor ability, disappoints himself and his friends by entering on too wide a field. Instead of making sure of one acquirement, he is for ever dropping a subject which he has only half mastered, in order to grasp at another of which he deems it essential to know something, and this again is too soon abandoned in eager chase after a third. In this way not much can be learned that will be useful at examinations, and certainly nothing that will be useful afterwards.

It will be found that a little common sense is the best possession in an examination-room, as everywhere else in life. This quality, indeed, will go far to compensate for the want of learning, and without it an enormous amount of patient poring over books may be utterly thrown away. Coolness and carefulness in those who are examined for the first time in their lives it is not always easy to secure. It may be observed, however, that any natural tendency to nervousness and confusion, is certain to be aggravated by a hurried, scrambling career through the contents of many volumes, in the week that is just commencing. It is vain to attempt to do now all that might have been done in weeks and months gone by. The best course is to take matters as coolly as one can. After all, the hazard may not be as great as it appears; but if it be, there is really no use in thinking of it. Do not attempt to do too much. Do whatever you do as perfectly as you can. It is better now to strengthen yourself where you are already strong, and to trust that the fulness and sufficiency of some answers will go far to compensate for silence on other points. Probably, the very best men that offer themselves in any examination are oppressed with a sense of their own ignorance on many points that may possibly be raised. But, either from previous experience, or from knowledge of their general strength, or from native coolness and self-reliance, they do not allow themselves to be disturbed by this conviction, nor does it prevent them from turning to the best account every scrap of knowledge that their minds contain. The first sight of an examination-paper will often alarm a man who ought not to have any particular reason for his fears. It will very likely seem to him that the little knowledge he once possessed has altogether vanished from his mind just when he had most occasion for it. But a few minutes' quiet thought will recover some ideas, and those will awaken others; and, presently, the candidate perhaps finds himself making very fair way with a paper in which, at first, he did not expect to answer a single question. It is above all desirable to do everything carefully and deliberately and with all the caution and exactitude that a solicitor would display in important business. A candidate who does not possess these qualities is certainly unfit to be admitted upon the roll of practitioners, and his want of them will probably be disclosed in a well-managed examination, and will be fatal, as it ought to be, to his success. In general, the men who fail in these trials would, until they have received some better mental training, be equally sure to fail in any other important crisis which can occur in life. A man is not usually rejected because he has read Mr. A.'s treatise on conveyancing instead of Mr. B.'s, or because an eccentric examiner chooses to grope into all the holes and corners of his subject; but because he wants industry, method, attention, and such a share of sound common sense as is absolutely necessary to the conduct of his own affairs, and without which he would bring inevitable ruin upon any client who should unhappily be beguiled into employing him.

In conclusion, we would say one word to the overworked and unduly anxious candidate, who, unless he will take our advice, will probably damage, instead of improving, his chance by the well-meant but mistaken industry of the coming week. A student who is robust in health, calm in temper, and already well supplied with knowledge, may read, if he pleases, up to the moment before entering the examination-hall. He will not, in this way, do himself any harm, and it is equally unlikely that he will improve his chance by such excessive application. But a candidate whose health is unsound and nerves weak, ought, whatever be the extent of his knowledge on the evening of this day week, to put aside his books then, and for the next two days seek rest and amusement only. He may fear that in this interval he will forget all that he has learned; but that is a delusion of the inexperienced. The more clear he can keep his head of law immediately before the examination, the fuller will it prove to be when the time of trial comes. But, above all things, let him determine, having done his best, to take his chance boldly, and not torment himself with anxieties, and waste his strength in efforts, which can now do no good whatever. There is a fit time for all things. At the end of this week the time for reading will have passed, and it will only remain to seek firm nerves and a composed mind to make the most of what has been acquired.

STATUTE LAW COMMISSION—REPORT OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

(From the Daily News.)

Among the more important inquiries interrupted by the dissolution was that of the committee appointed to consider the best means of "Improving the Manner and Language of Current Legislation." This committee, which will probably be re-appointed in the new Parliament, has reported the evidence taken before it, but, considering the inquiry incomplete, abstains from expressing any opinion upon the subject matter of investigation. The committee examined five witnesses, four of whom were official and one non-official. The official witnesses were Mr. Coulson, the Government draftsman; Mr. Bellenden Ker, the paid member of the present and all preceding Statute Law Commissions; Mr. Rickards, the counsel to the Speaker; and Mr. Erskine May, the clerk-assistant of the House of Commons. The non-official witness was Mr. George Coode, long and favourably known to English jurists as the author of an able work on "Legislative Expression," one of the most zealous of those four gentlemen who, in 1853, were appointed as sub-codifiers under Mr. Bellenden Ker, and, by their rapid energy, caused considerable alarm and discomfort to that model commissioner. The evidence of these five gentlemen, widely discordant on many points, is substantially identical on one; they all concur in thinking that the task of revising the current legislation of the Session ought to be intrusted to one responsible officer, aided by a more or less numerous staff of assistants. It seems also to be admitted by all the five witnesses that the duties of this functionary should consist not in drawing bills, but in revising them, and pointing out their legal effect, particularly as bearing on the existing mass of statute and common law. It also seems agreed that it should be a portion of his functions to group and classify, under appropriate heads, the new acts which each session adds to the present bulk of the statutes. Whether the officer thus appointed is to form a portion of a new Department of Public Justice—whether he is to communicate immediately with the House, or only mediately through a committee, are points on which the evidence hitherto taken throws no great light. Incidentally, these minutes of evidence are, in many respects, interesting not to lawyers only, but to the public at large. Most of us, for instance, may feel obliged to Mr. Erskine May for the accurate information he has supplied on the statistics of the great law-making machine at Westminster for the years 1854, '55, and '56. In the session of 1854, the total number of bills brought into the House was 177. Of these, 67, or rather more than one-third, were introduced by private members. The total number of bills that failed in passing was 65. Of these failures, no less than 48 were among the bills introduced by private members. In 1855, the total number of bills brought in was 197; of bills not passed, 85. Here, again, the proportion of failures among bills introduced by private members was very considerable — 53 out of 75. In 1856, out of 177 bills introduced, 77 did not pass. Out of this number, the bills introduced by private members were 64, of which 46 dropped, or were rejected. Such is the rate at which law-making progresses. It is indeed, somewhat consolatory to learn that the addition to the general public law of the United Kingdom is by no means what these numbers would indicate. Thus, taking the legislation of 1855, we find that out of 184 Acts of Parliament, occupying 1,005 folio pages, only fifty-eight acts, occupying 226 pages, really constituted public general laws such as it would be necessary to print for any purposes of general reference and use. Carrying the analysis still further, we find that of these 226 pages, ninety-three would contain the statutes of the year relating to the whole United Kingdom ten those relating to Great Britain, twenty those relating to England and Ireland, and 103 those relating to England only.—Even with this abatement, the annual increment in the Statute Book is a very serious evil, and seems to indicate that without some radical change in the science of legislative expression as hitherto practised in this country, the hope of bringing our Statute Law into reasonable compass must ever be to a great extent chimerical. We have on previous occasions indicated our opinion of the nature of the change required. We must no longer attempt to frame laws to provide beforehand for every possible case that may arise for their application. We must not attempt to frame laws that shall be proof against every possibility of legal quibbling and perverted ingenuity. Both attempts are almost equally absurd. The one, indeed, is utterly hopeless: the other involves a painful effort after scrupulous accuracy which is in itself often the cause of obscurity and always prolixity. Wherever codes exist, wherever laws are methodised, classified, and reduced into written systems, the sole object of the law writer is tersely and perspicuously to lay down the general rule, trusting to the law administrator that he will apply it not in the spirit of quibbling pedantry—not with the desire of showing that he, the judge, is acute enough to discover that the law does not necessarily and in terms extend to the case before him—but in a large and liberal spirit of enlightened interpretation, seeking to penetrate into the true intention of the legislator, and to vitalise, by an intelligent application, the dead letter of the general rule. It is the rules of judicial interpretation, not only the rules of legislative composition, which absolutely require reconsideration before our written law can ever aspire to a character of manageable conciseness and philosophical accuracy. So well was this understood by our cousins across the Atlantic, that one of the preliminary rules in many of their codes is a rule of judicial interpretation—a direction to the judges so to expound the law as to give effect rather to its spirit than to its letter. That the fact is as we have stated it, is more than once explicitly admitted by the witnesses examined before the recent committee. "Nobody," says Mr. Bellenden Ker (Q. 343), "is more willing than I am to give great praise to the revisers of the code of New York; but our system of judicial interpretation is so different from the way in which the law is interpreted by the judges both in Boston and New York, that I am quite convinced that the code of New York or the code of Boston would not satisfy our courts here. I think there is hardly a line of the code of New York that would not employ the Court of Queen's Bench or the Court of Common Pleas for weeks." Very likely; but where does the discredit rest? Surely not on the law-writers, who have returned to a method of legislative expression consecrated by the practice of the greatest jurists and the politest ages; but on the law administrators, who still cling to a mode of interpretation which sprung up in rude times, and was principally perpetuated in order to defeat by a laudable chicane the Draconic cruelty of a penal code which had become abhorrent to our manners, long before it was abolished from our Statute Book. Until this absurd, and now utterly unnecessary, strictness of judicial interpretation is exchanged for a mode of law-administration more rational and civilised, we confess we have no hope of seeing the language of our written law attain to anything like the scientific precision and the concise yet comprehensive accuracy of the great models of legislative expression. But, in the meanwhile, there is no question that, even upon the present system of providing beforehand against all the possible quibbles of judicial astuteness, the language of our Legislature is capable of considerable improvement. It may be rendered more precise, more uniform, and less tautologous; nor do we know of any better method of attaining these ends than the adoption of such principles of legislative composition as those which Mr. Coode has developed in the Minutes of Evidence just printed by this prematurely extinguished committee.

PROFESSIONAL REMUNERATION.

The first of Mr. Joshua Williams' "Letters to John Bull" is on this subject, and it contains a passage which well deserves extraction:—

"When a man and woman marry, they are not allowed to say anything in their marriage settlement about a separation. Any provision contemplating such an event is absolutely void. The law wisely considers that a union begun by distrust must end in misery; and so it is with other relations. If you begin by continually suspecting that a man is a rogue, you go a great way, so far as you can, to make him one. Now, how do you treat your lawyer? You look upon him as a man who would clutch, if he could, every six-and-eightpence that you are worth; and you provide, in his case, machinery which exists for no other profession, to prevent him from overcharging you. If you want a house built or repaired, you employ a builder, and make the best contract with him that you can. But with all your foresight, there are sure to be many little items left unprovided for, and these, as perhaps you know by experience, sometimes swell to a very considerable and unexpected sum. However, if you think you have been imposed upon, you can resist his demand, and the matter is settled by a jury. It seldom, however, comes to this, for, unless you have been very unfortunate in your choice, a little mutual explanation and concession satisfactorily end the matter. But with your lawyer it is otherwise; you trust him with your family secrets, with matters which, if divulged, might injure your reputation or ruin your credit; you expect him to stand by you, to think for you, to take that most disagreeable thing—trouble—off your hands, and you know by experience that rarely indeed is such a trust betrayed; and yet when you come to pay him for matters like these — matters which in their nature cannot be twisted on a reel or poured into a pint pot—the only question you ask him is, how many words he has written in your service? You set him to count thus:—This, 1; indenture, 2; made, 3; the, 4; first, 5; day, 6; of, 7; April, 8; in, 9; the, 10; year, 11; of, 12; our, 13; Lord, 14; one, 15; thousand, 16; eight, 17; hundred, 18; and, 19; fifty, 20; seven, 21; between, 22; John, 23; Bull, 24; and so on. When he has got up to 72, you give him a shilling, and tell him to begin again; and so he does: and by the time he has got to the end of your deed, he knows how much he has a right to receive, and you are bound to pay. Now this is not mere imagination; it is pure and simple truth. Try, if you can, to imagine anything more preposterous. You know enough of mankind to see that to pay by the length must of necessity breed prolixity. A long deed makes a long copy; a long copy makes a long abstract, a long abstract makes a long recital; a long recital makes another long deed. The habit of prolixity grows like all other habits, creeps into all legal affairs, till the sense is often smothered under a multitude of words. That is one evil. Another evil is, that you tempt your lawyer not only to make his deeds too long, but also to make unnecessary deeds, for the sake of being paid, or, in truth, sometimes for the sake of gaining that remuneration for his trouble, which he feels to be his due, and which he knows he cannot now legally demand in any other manner. Another evil is, as might be supposed, that skill on this system gets no better paid than unskilfulness. A blundering deed that requires another to set it right is more profitable than a clear, concise, well-drawn document, which does not run out to so great a length.

"All this, you reply, is very true; but if you abolish this taxation of lawyers' bills, what safeguard are we to possess against the rapacity of lawyers? In answer to this, I can only say, that, until you have the courage and good feeling to treat in all respects as an honourable man, a man to whose honour you confide all that is dear to you, you deserve to be fleeced; and fleeced you will assuredly be. Try and get rid of the foolish notion, that, when a man enters the profession of the law, he leaves honour and conscience outside. Treat him as you treat everybody else. He has no doubt great temptations—temptations under which some fall—but which many nobly resist. And you may depend upon it, that, if the law contains some of the worst characters, it contains also some of the best. I speak of both classes of the profession. It was formerly the custom to abuse the attorneys. But now the bar has its full share. To judge by the remarks to be found in some of our periodicals, one would suppose that a barrister usually ended his career with a ticket of leave, and that the judges whom everybody respects came from some other quarter. If, however, you still believe that the lawyers are a bad lot, this is the more reason why you should try to improve them. And, to do this, you must begin with a certain amount of confidence. Do not go to him and say, 'I know you will overcharge me if you can; I will therefore measure your words and pay you accordingly.' Trust him to send in a reasonable bill; and if he overcharges, let twelve honest men in a jury box, after having heard both sides, decide between you. Abolish altogether the taxation of costs, and you will have taken one great step towards strengthening the confidence which ought to exist between a man and his professional adviser; towards improving and elevating the profession of the law; and last, though not least, towards saving your own pocket."

THE RULES OF LAW-PAY THE FIRST OBSTACLE TO ALL LAW-REFORM.

The following letter, addressed to the Editor of the Spectator, appeared in that journal on Saturday last:—

"Sir,—In your article of to-day, intitled 'The Cry for Reform,' you say truly that 'law amendment, under one head, would do more for the welfare of every part of society than any other class of measures.' In your review of Williams' 'Letters to John Bull,' you speak of the proposal to abolish taxation of costs 'as abolishing the restraints of the law, and that in favour of lawyers alone.' And you speak as if such a change would only operate in shortening written instruments, and have no bearing on 'other modes in which clients can be fleeced.'

"Permit one who has subscribed to your paper since its birth, and has worked at law-reform during all that time, to express a regret he has felt during nearly the last thirty years, that the Spectator, always looking, he thinks, pretty much in the right way on these matters, has never addressed itself radically to this subject of imposed scales of prices for law work.

"The legal mischief under which the public suffers arises from defects in procedure immeasurably more than from defects of abstract law; and there is not a single defect of procedure which is not more or less sustained by the system on which the tariffs of legal wages are constructed. There is in England no one item of a solicitor's or a barrister's work, as to which the prescribed or allowed remuneration does not more or less militate against the client's interest to have the work done as simply and quickly as possible. If cabs were paid by time and allowed to go at their own pace, and pretty much their own route, and we were forced to ride in them instead of walking, we should have an exact parallel of the system forcibly imposed on every part of the law.

"The principle on which these tariffs are constructed has important bearings on the enforced division of the profession into two or rather half-a-dozen branches (doctor of civil law and barrister—silk gown and stuff—attorney, solicitor, proctor, and so on—divisions only good if they come of themselves), and on the maintenance of licensed legal ticket-porterism; and the required employment of two, three, or four men, to do work which one could often do better alone. In a word, this principle produces, at every point, a variance between the interests of the employer and the employed—pays the ignorant better than the skilful, makes all law work verbose and slow ad libitum, and doubles or trebles the natural number of workmen. It is opposed to the very basis of the rules of political economy. Its sinister influences affect the habits of all the courts and all the judicial offices, and operate on the frame, plans, and language of the laws themselves. Its cost and delay-mischiefs are as nothing to the unwholesomeness of the atmosphere it creates—surrounding the profession as it does with a perpetual devil and tempter to evil.

"The forthcoming report on the Registration of Titles (the greatest project of legal revolution seen in our days) points out that these enforced tariffs, based on words and steps, must be done away with, or that that great scheme cannot be tried. And a special committee of the Law Amendment Society appointed to consider this question, and composed in part of eminent commercial men, has unanimously resolved to the effect that the errors of these legal tariffs lie at the bottom of the evils of the law.

"If we had an efficient department of state addressed to the subject of justice, and bound to maintain the legal establishment in full working order, and to answer to Parliament for unredressed legal evils, the very first thing, if they knew their business, which its officials would apply themselves to, would be this subject of legal costs; not indeed to prohibit taxation of costs, as you say Mr. Williams proposes, but to allow on such taxation the principles on which nature regulates prices and rewards skill to operate as to this most important branch of labour.

"At least so thinks an old and not inactive law-reformer.

(From the Manchester Guardian.)

A numerous and very influential meeting of merchants, manufacturers, bankers, members of the legal profession, representatives of surrounding towns and public bodies, was held lately at the Town Hall, Manchester, "to decide upon what steps it is expedient to take with a view to secure the holding of assizes at or near Manchester for the dispatch of assize business arising within the hundred of Salford." Amongst the gentlemen present were James Watts, Esq., Mayor of Manchester; Stephen Heelis, Esq., Mayor of Salford; J. Knowles, Esq., Mayor of Bolton; Jacob Bright, Esq., Mayor of Rochdale; N. Buckley, Esq., Mayor of Ashton-under-Lyne; J. R. Culthart, Esq., Mayor of the manor of Ashton; Josiah Radcliffe, Esq., Mayor of Oldham; Messrs. Thomas Bazley, President of the Chamber of Commerce; Malcolm Ross, Vice-Chairman of the Commercial Association; James Crossley, President of the Manchester Law Association; Henry Bury, banker; Oliver Heywood, banker; Thomas Peet, Union Bank; Jos. Heron, town-clerk; R. S. Sowler, J. Saunders, J. Cottingham, barristers; J. Knowles, town-clerk, Bolton; James Platt, Alderman Redfern, and J. Summerscales, town-clerk, Oldham; H. Birch, and R. Gartside, commissioners of Stalybridge; — Crundy, one of the commissioners of Bury.

The MAYOR of MANCHESTER was called to the chair, and briefly stated the object of the meeting.—Mr. FRANCIS MARRIOTT, hon. sec. to the Law Association, stated that there were upon the table the following memorials, for presentation to the commissioners for inquiring into the expediency of altering the circuits of the judges:—From solicitors practising at Rochdale; at Ashton-under-Lyne, represented by the town-clerk; at Bury, signed by the majority of the profession; from the Rochdale Improvement Commissioners; the Mayor, Aldermen, &c. of Oldham, represented by the Mayor; the Mayor, &c. of Bolton, represented by the Mayor and town clerk; the Guardians of the Poor of Manchester, represented by Mr. T. D. Crewdson; from solicitors at Bolton, very numerously signed; from solicitors at Oldham; and from the Mayor, &c., of Rochdale. There was also a letter from the town clerk of Stockport.

Mr. T. BAZLEY moved the first resolution:—

"That this meeting is of opinion that the holding of the assizes for the hundred of Salford at Liverpool is the source of very great inconvenience, annoyance, and cost to the inhabitants of the hundred; that such inconvenience, annoyance, and cost may, and ought to be, remedied by assizes being held at Manchester for the transaction of the large criminal and civil business arising within the hundred of Salford; that the present arrangement operates in a great measure as a check upon the due administration of justice; and an alteration is imperatively required."

It was not necessary to occupy the time of such a meeting in arguing that great economy of money and time must result from having the administration of justice brought to their own doors in fact, as it at present was in theory. Now, merchants, manufacturers, tradesmen, workpeople, to the number of at least 2,000 in the course of a year, were taken from the southern division of Lancashire, and kept long at Liverpool, to the great delay of business in various ways; while the absence of the principal police-officers from Manchester, as was the case elsewhere, was detrimental to the proper protection of property.—STEPHEN HEELIS, Esq., Mayor of Salford, seconded the motion. He congratulated the meeting on the various important bodies and interests represented, and himself, upon being able for the first time to address an assemblage composed of commercial and legal gentlemen, equally interested in securing something which he considered in the light of legal reform. Professional men had long felt and suffered under the inconvenience of the present system. Without referring to other classes, those who got into criminal courts deserved sympathy, for they were generally very poor; and how they managed to get people to Liverpool as witnesses, he never could divine. A statement handed to him showed that in twenty-five civil causes tried at Liverpool, the amount actually paid to witnesses taken down was £1,606 8*s.* 9*d.*, or an average of £64 4*s.* 10*d.*; but that, making the fullest possible allowance, the amount that would have been paid, if those cases had been tried in Manchester, would have been £734 15*s.* 8*d.*, or an average of £21 7*s.* 9*d.* The costs of witnesses was certainly a considerable item in the total cost of an action; but the expenses of solicitors, and of those who were interested, were proportionately increased by the holding of the assizes at Liverpool for the Salford hundred.—The motion was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. MALCOLM ROSS proposed—

"That, in the opinion of this meeting, the absence of present accommodation ought not to be permitted to operate as an objection to a recommendation for the holding of assizes at Manchester, as there can be no doubt that suitable courts, and all other accommodation required, ought to be, and will be, forthwith provided, at the expense of the hundred of Salford, for whose immediate benefit and convenience the change in the present arrangements is sought and urgently required."

There could be no novelty in the arguments upon this matter. They wanted cheap and easily obtained justice.— Mr. J. KNOWLES, the Mayor of Bolton, seconded the motion, which was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. JOSIAH RADCLIFFE, Mayor of Oldham, proposed—

"That the following gentlemen—namely, the Mayor of Manchester, the Mayor of Salford, Thomas Bazley, Esq., J. A. Turner, Esq., James Crossley, Esq., and Francis Marriott, Esq.—be appointed a deputation from this meeting to confer with the justices of the hundred of Salford, at their next quarter sessions, relative to the steps to be taken to provide assize courts, and other accommodation required for the holding of assizes."

There could not be two opinions as to the strong feeling throughout the hundred in favour of the proposed change being made as speedily as possible; nor as to the general desire to give the utmost weight to the efforts made to secure that change.— Mr. N. BUCKLEY, Mayor of Ashton-under-Lyne, seconded the motion; and after it had been supported by Mr. J. R. COULTHART, Mayor of the manor of Ashton, it was unanimously agreed to.

The TOWN CLERK read a memorial from the meeting to the commissioners, praying that assizes might be held at Manchester. It was substantially the same as that from the Law Association, already published.

Mr. JAMES CROSSLEY, President of the Manchester Law Association, moved—

"That the memorial be adopted and signed by the Mayor of Manchester as chairman, and on behalf of this meeting; and that such memorial be intrusted to Colonel Wilson Patten, M.P., for presentation to the Commissioners."

He could carry the history of the ineffectual struggles to obtain justice a little further back than Mr. Bazley. In 1823 and 1824, his partner, Mr. Thomas Ainsworth, in connection with the authorities of that day, made a vigorous attempt to obtain an adjournment of the assizes from Lancaster to Manchester. When he considered how the hundred of Salford had, since that time, progressed in wealth, in business importance, and in population, and the great inconvenience to all parties, amounting in many instances to a denial of justice, which arose from the holding of the assizes at Liverpool, he felt that the hour had come when this long-pending grievance should be removed. After the expression of the opinion which the attendance at the meeting indicated, it was impossible that the Commissioners could resist their prayer. He had looked into the report of the deputation who presented the memorial of the Law Association to the Commissioners, to see if there was any plausible pretext for refusing the application, and he could not find any. Certainly Mr. Justice Cresswell suggested that the establishment of assizes at Manchester might cause additional witnesses to be called, but that must have been a pleasantry; if there was any reason in the objection, they might as well, or perhaps better, have Manchester causes tried at Exeter. The Solicitor-General observed that there could not be more than two assize towns in one county; but where did he find such a principle in law? The Act of 1833, which empowered her Majesty in council to appoint new assize towns, and alter the circuits, contained no such limitation, and her Majesty might unquestionably appoint six assize towns in a county, if the convenience of the public required it. Then again Lord Wensleydale seemed to think we were precluded from making this application, by the arrangement under which the Salford hundred list had precedence at the assizes—that that arrangement was accepted in full of all demands. But the fact was, that in 1842, when a deputation from the Law Association waited upon Sir J. Graham, then Secretary of State for the Home Department, and he suggested that the Salford hundred list should have the precedence, it was distinctly stated by the deputation that that arrangement would not entirely remove the inconveniences of the present system, and that their acceptance of it must not prejudice their application to the Privy Council. With regard to the question of the provision of suitable courts, an Act, which was passed in 1837, empowered justices to make all necessary provision, and this would be done immediately upon her Majesty granting to the hundred of Salford the privilege of holding assizes in Manchester. The fact, however, that the courts were not built in the first instance, should not operate as any colourable pretext of refusing the grant.

Mr. Jacob Bright, Mayor of Rochdale, seconded the resolution.

The Town Clerk said he believed this meeting would do more to secure the favourable consideration of the Commissioners than any other circumstance that could have occurred. He then related the particulars of his examination by the Commissioners, and added that their only difficulty was to show a reasonable probability that the required accommodation, as to courts, would be provided. The courts could be obtained with perfect ease; and considering the area of the hundred of Salford, and the amount of the assessment, a sufficient sum might be expended in building courts (to be repaid in twenty years), without any one perceiving that there had been an addition to the hundred rates. The money saving to the common jurors who were now kept at Liverpool a week or more without receiving any remuneration, would repay them tenfold what they would be called on to contribute to the hundred rate. Upon this question he believed Liverpool and Manchester were agreed; for it was a great hardship to the Liverpool people to be kept waiting until the Salford cases were disposed of, and they would be as glad to get rid of the Manchester folks as the latter would be to go.

Mr. J. C. Harter said, he represented the board of the Royal Infirmary. They had often felt great inconvenience through the absence at the assizes of the resident medical officers, and the board would be happy either to join in a memorial to the Commissioners, or to send a separate one.

Mr. R. S. Sowler supported the resolution. He could confirm all that had been said of the serious inconvenience of having the assizes at Liverpool. As to the doctrine that there could be only two assize towns in a county, it was absurd, because in Somerset there were three, although the population of that county was insignificant compared with ours.

Mr. R. Allen said, the Medico-ethical Society, which numbered fifty members of the medical profession, would be happy to memorialise the Commissioners, as they felt very greatly the hardship of transferring their patients to others while they were necessarily absent at the assizes in Liverpool.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

Mr. Alderman Watkins moved—

"That the Mayors and town-clerks of Manchester and Salford, Bolton, Rochdale, Ashton, Oldham, and Stockport, in conjunction with the deputation before appointed, be a committee to initiate and forward such measures as they may see fit, for the purpose of obtaining the object of this meeting."

Mr. Oliver Heywood seconded the resolution, which was also carried.

Mr. George Peel moved—

"That a report of the proceedings of this meeting, and a copy of the resolutions, be transmitted to the Commissioners for inquiring into the expediency of altering the circuits of the judges in England and Wales."

Mr. James Dugdale seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

CORONERS' CHARGES.—The magistrates in Lancashire, as well as those in the West Riding of Yorkshire, appear to be cutting down the fees of coroners. At the Easter quarter sessions at Preston, on Wednesday last, before Mr. T. B. Addison, chairman, and other magistrates, Mr. C. R. Jackson, on behalf of the finance committee, presented the accounts of Mr. Myers, one of the county coroners, amounting to £106 13*s.* 4*d.* for the holding of thirty-eight inquests. The committee generally had taken exception to three of those inquiries, but they were unanimous upon one only, that held upon Thomas Thompson, the farm servant of Mr. Lord, of Standish, who had died of injuries received in falling from a horse that took fright near Martland-bridge. It was stated in the information given to the coroner that no blame was attached to any person, and that he lived eight days after the accident. There was therefore no occasion for the coroner to intrude upon the privacy of the deceased's family by holding an inquest. Mr. Myers replied that no person was present when the accident happened; and supposing that it had turned out hereafter that the horse had been wilfully frightened, and the had not, as he was bound to do by law, held an inquest in this case, which was one of violent death, he would have been liable to a penalty of 40*s.* He was therefore placed in the difficulty of running the risk of being subjected to that penalty or of not having his charges allowed by the court. After some discussion the charge for the inquest was disallowed. Mr. Hargreave's bill for fifty-two inquests held during the quarter amounted to £122 15*s.* 11*d.* The finance committee had queried seven of these inquests, but only recommended one for disallowance by the court. The charge for this was disallowed. Mr. Myers here remarked that he had attended three whole days at the inquiry held at Chorley in the wife-poisoning case, for which he should get £1 6*s.* 8*d.*; and Mr. H. H. Watson, analytical chymist, of Bolton, had presented to him a bill of £26 for his analysis of the contents of the stomach, &c. He did not feel justified in paying that bill till he had taken the opinion of the court upon it. Mr. Addison thought it should form part of the prosecution charges; and it was understood that the matter would be laid before the judge when the prisoner Herdman is tried at the assizes.—Times.

WESTMINSTER COUNTY COURT.—SUING A LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Berridge v. Cockburn (April 15).—This was an action brought by the plaintiff, a cab owner, against Sir James Alexander Cockburn, Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, to recover the sum of 14*s.*—Mr. W. Davies attended for the plaintiff, and said, the case was fixed to come on for hearing at the last sitting of the court, but a communication had been received from his lordship, per telegraph, from Exeter, where his lordship was engaged on the spring circuit, requesting a postponement, to give the judge of the court an opportunity to ascertain whether he had any power to adjudicate in such case, and also raising a point that the money, if owing, was not recoverable except before a police magistrate. It appeared that the plaintiff's driver was engaged by his lordship to convey him from Richmond to Hampton Court and back, when his fare for distance, viz. 10*s.*, was tendered, but plaintiff refused to receive it without an additional 4*s.* for waiting, at 2*s.* an hour, which Mr. Davies contended he was entitled to under the 18th section of the 16th & 17th Vict. c. 35, which says that for waiting the driver of any cab shall charge, and be justified in so doing, 6*d.* for every fifteen minutes.—Mr. Davies said that he had a letter from his lordship, acknowledging the 10*s.*, but repudiating the additional 4*s.*—Judge: That don't give me power to act; and it being under the Metropolitan Police Act, I think the matter one for the exclusive jurisdiction of the police magistrate. I don't think I have any, and such has always been my belief.—A gentleman from the defendant's said that the Lord Chief Justice would be guided in the payment he made entirely by his honour's decision.—Judge: My opinion is, that he would be entitled to sixpence for waiting; but it cannot be recovered before me, only before a magistrate, but if wished for I will hear the particulars. Plaintiff then stated the facts as above narrated, which he only knew from his driver's tale; and, that person not being present, his honour said the case on that ground alone had failed, and he should make no order.—The gentleman here said he would give the plaintiff 10*s.*, and the parties retired.—Daily News.

COMMISSIONER IN LUNACY.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed Robert Nairne, Esq., Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, to be a Commissioner in Lunacy, in the room of John Robert Hume, Esq., Physician, deceased.

CONTEMPT OF THE MARRIAGE LAW.—James Green, 32, sweep, was indicted, at the Old Bailey, before Mr. Commissioner Prendergast, on April 11th, for marrying Margaret Latlief, his wife being alive. The prisoner, it appeared, was a master sweep, and resided in the parish of Tottenham, and his appearance was that of a respectable man. He had for eight years lived with the woman Latlief as man and wife, he being then unmarried. Upon Easter Monday, last year, he married, at St. James the Great, Bethnal-green, a woman named Mitchell, who had for nine years been cohabiting with a friend of his, named Gardner, a master sweep, living at Islington. The woman Mitchell stayed with Gardner until the night before the marriage, and the woman Latlief also remained with the prisoner up to the same time. Upon the prisoner marrying Mitchell, Latlief went the same day and lived with Gardner. Upon the Thursday following, Mitchell, being tired of her new husband, went back to Gardner, whereupon Latlief at once went back to the prisoner, who in April of the same year was married to her at St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, and the parties still kept friends until a short time ago, when the woman Mitchell, from some cause not explained, gave him into custody.—Gardner, who was called as a witness, in answer to the court, said, when he took Mitchell, I took his; and when she came back, I sent the other home. We were all drunk when we did it. The jury found the prisoner Guilty.—The learned Commissioner said, the case was certainly a most remarkable and disgraceful one, and he had never met with a man who treated the marriage laws with greater contempt; but as the second wife spoke well of him, and none of the parties had suffered any injury, he should sentence him to three months' imprisonment, and hard labour.

BOROUGH OF DORCHESTER.—SOLICITOR'S TESTIMONIAL TO MR. THOMAS COOMBS.—At a meeting of the inhabitants, held on the 13th of November, 1856, to consider whether any, and what testimonial should be presented to the late Mayor, Mr.

Thomas Coombs, as an acknowledgment of the liberality and hospitality evinced by him during his mayoralty for the two consecutive years ending 9th November, 1856, it was resolved "That, appreciating the liberal manner in which on several unusual public occasions, the late mayor Mr. Coombs upheld the interests and hospitality of the borough, it would on his retirement from office be a fitting and appropriate opportunity to present him with a testimonial, as an acknowledgment of his liberality during his mayoralty." A public meeting of the inhabitants was held at the Town Hall, on the 13th inst., when a handsome silver tea kettle and stand, together with a silver claret jug, were presented to Mr. Coombs.

Expenses of the Metropolitan Police.—The total sum paid for the Metropolitan Police in the year 1856 amounts to £434,081, and the balance remaining at the end of the year to £45,635. The total amount received on account of the Metropolitan Police included £281,036 from parishes, and £102,377 from her Majesty's Treasury, voted by the House of Commons in Committee of Supply. These, in addition to a balance of £58,105 and miscellaneous receipts, raised the sum total of receipts to £479,717. The following are the items of expenditure—viz. £10,757 for office expenses, £335 for legal charges, £363,478 for the pay, clothing, and equipment of the police force, £2,975 for medical and funeral expenses, £9,639 for horses and vans, £21,904 for police stations and section houses, £15,535 for light and fuel, £6,816 for miscellaneous charges, and £4,691 for retired allowances, &c. The receipts on account of the superannuation fund amounted to £61,585, and the payments to £36,775. The expenditure for the service of police carriages in London amounted to £11,698. The total sum paid for the expenses of the police courts (chiefly out of the Consolidated Fund) amounted to £67,006. One magistrate receives a salary of £1,500, and twenty-two magistrates £1,200 each. The rent of the courts costs £2,003, and the expenses of the Police Gazette, including the salary of its editor (£100), are £3,597. The police force constitutes an army of 5,847 men—18 superintendents, with salaries of £440 down to £200; 142 inspectors, with salaries of £200 to £81 18*s.*; 631 sergeants, with salaries of £109 to £63; and 5,056 constables, whose salaries range from £78 to £49 a-year, with coals and clothing. —Civil Service Gazette.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

There are few legal questions in modern times which have been attended with so much difficulty as those relating to acts of directors of public companies—whether or not particular acts are ultra vires; and if they are, whether or not parties asserting rights under such acts have been affected with notice of the powers and duties of the directors who have so acted. The decisions on these two points have been very conflicting. Some judges have been always disposed to construe very strictly companies' deeds of settlement, as to the powers of directors to bind the company, and to impute knowledge of the provisions of the deed to contracting parties, on the principle of the doctrine of constructive notice. On the other hand, there are several reported cases, in which the rule laid down is much less strict. Some recent decisions in the House of Lords belong to the former class. In one—The Caledonian and Dumbartonshire Junction Railway Company v. The Helensburgh Harbour Trustees (4 W. R. 671)—the Lord Chancellor expressed himself very strongly as to railway companies; that the Act of Parliament incorporating a company was the measure of the obligations and liabilities of its shareholders; and that even beneficial contracts, if not beneficial in the mode prescribed by the Act, were not binding. Again, in Preston v. The Liverpool, &c., Railway Company (4 W. R. 383), the Lord Chancellor said that he had no doubt that it was ultra vires of a corporation, established for the purpose of applying the funds of its subscribers in making a railway, to enter into a covenant to pay money to a person for not having opposed the company's bill in Parliament. Both these cases turned upon contracts by projectors, but the principles here stated apply to companies after formation. In Green v. Nixon (5 W. R. 433) the Master of the Rolls appears to lean in a direction contrary to the rule as stated by Lord Cranworth. In that case, a railway company, already incorporated, petitioned Parliament for an extension of the time limited by the Act for the exercise of compulsory powers of taking land; and, in contemplation of a favourable result, the company entered into an agreement with an engineer for payment of expenses to be incurred by him in supporting the application. Amongst other objections made in the suit by the plaintiff, a shareholder—against whom the engineer (the defendant) had obtained judgment in respect of this claim—he objected that the directors had no power to enter into such a covenant, and that such an application of the funds was illegal. It was not necessary for the Master of the Rolls to decide the case upon this point, he having held that the court would not look into the grounds of the judgment at law which the defendant had recovered against the plaintiff. But his Honour was of opinion that the defendant was not bound to investigate the object of his employment by the directors, or to ascertain whether it was, or was not, in accordance with the provisions of the company's Act of Parliament or deed of settlement. He considered that the proper course to stop unauthorised proceedings by the directors, was to apply for an injunction to restrain any misapplication of the funds; and that where a third person had been employed by the directors on behalf of the company, the contract binds the company and the shareholders. In his judgment, his Honour points out some of the inconveniences and instances of injustice which would arise from maintaining any other rule. The gist of these observations very much coincides with the views expressed in the paper lately read before the Juridical Society, on the Liabilities of Joint-stock Companies, which we published in our number of the 4th instant.

The rule which is laid down, apparently without any restriction in numerous cases—viz., that notice to an agent is notice to the principal—must be considered as being subject to modification, according to circumstances. Thus it appears more than doubtful whether notice by the assignee of a policy of assurance, to an agent of the assurance company, where the agent was himself the assignor, would be a valid notice for the purpose of taking the policy out of the order and disposition of the assignor (Re Hennessy, 2 Dru. & War. 555; S. C., 1 Con. & Law. 559). Under ordinary circumstances, however, the rule is well established that notice may be given to an officer representing the company, and that the effect of such notice, though the notice may never be communicated to the company, is sufficient to bind the company (Ib. per Lord St. Leonards, and Ex parte Waithman, 4 Deac. & Chit. 412). Another modification of the rule that notice to the agent is notice to the principal is, that the notice must be in the same transaction, or if not in the same transaction, yet that it must be presumed from all the surrounding circumstances, from the fact of the former transaction, in which the agent had notice, being recent or closely connected with that in which notice is sought to be imputed to the principal, that the agent must have remembered the former notice (Majoribanks v. Hovenden, Dru. 11). But the qualification of the rule that notice must be in the same transaction, or closely connected with it, has been a good deal questioned by very able judges—as, for instance, by Sir J. Wigram, V. C., in Fuller v. Benett (2 Hare, 404), where his Honour said that he had always understood it to be only a rule positivi juris, adopted by courts of justice in favour of innocent purchasers. Another question as to the application of the more general rule, that notice to the agent is notice to the principal, has been sometimes raised—viz., whether the knowledge imputed to the agent has been acquired by him qua agent (Wilde v. Gibson, 1 Cl. & Fin. Ho. of L. C. 605). Indeed, in France v. Woods (Taml. 176), Sir John Leach is reported to have said expressly that the notice must have been received in the character of agent. In Wilde v. Gibson there appears to have been also a distinction taken as to the character of the notice to the agent for the purpose of affecting the principal—as to whether it was actual or constructive. There are several cases, moreover, where questions have been raised on the ground of the agent having acquired his knowledge as owner of the property in respect of which his principal was to have notice imputed to him (Sheldon v. Cox, 2 Eden, 224; Majoribanks v. Hovenden, supra); and, as might be expected, it has very often been debated what constitutes agency for the purpose of notice (Butler v. Earl of Portarlington, 1 Dru. & W. 48; Allen v. Knight, 5 Hare, 279; Navulshaw v. Brownrigg, 1 Sim., N. S., 581; Mountford v. Scott, 3 Madd. 40; Willis v. The Bank of England, 4 Ad. & Ell. 21). In the recent case of Ex parte Boulton Re Sketchley (5 W. R. 445), a shareholder in a railway company, who was also its solicitor and secretary, deposited with a client, by way of mortgage, the certificate of his shares, and afterwards became bankrupt. There was no transfer of the shares, and no notice to the company, unless it had notice constructively through the equitable mortgagor, who, being its own officer, was ordinarily the proper one to be served with such a notice. Duncan v.

Chamberlayne (11 Sim. 123) having been virtually overruled by Thompson v. Spiers (13 Sim. 469), and Martin v. Sedgwick (9 Beav. 333), both of which have since been generally acquiesced in, it could not be held that the fact of the mortgagor being a shareholder could affect the company with notice: the only arguable point then was on the ground of his being its secretary. Knight Bruce, L. J., was of opinion that this circumstance made no difference. The reason which his lordship gives as the ground of his opinion is, that the knowledge was not acquired by the secretary in that capacity, but only as a shareholder; and, therefore, that the directors or company were not bound by such knowledge. Turner, L. J., seems to have arrived at his opinion on a similar course of reasoning. "Notice of dealings with shares," said his Lordship, "was intended to operate not only to prevent dispositions without the knowledge of the assignee, but also to prevent other persons having claims from being injured by prior claims of which they had no knowledge. It was, therefore, the duty of the assignee to take care that the proper notice reached the party whom it was intended to affect." The decision does not appear to have gone upon the fact that there had been no formal intimation—no instrument of notice—to the company or to the person who, under the circumstances, ought to have represented it; but simply upon the ground that the company itself, or its directors, had no actual knowledge of the mortgage. It was not suggested that if the mortgagee had served the secretary with a formal notice, the shares would thereby have been placed out of the order and disposition of the mortgagor; neither was it suggested in what manner notice could have been effectually given to the directors or the company otherwise than through the secretary. Ex parte Boulton is not the first case where a question was raised as to the effect of knowledge acquired by an agent in another capacity. In Ex parte Bignold Re Theobald (3 Mont. & Ayr. 477), it was doubted whether knowledge acquired by Mr. Bignold, as secretary to a fire insurance company, was notice to a life assurance company, of which he was also secretary; and it seems to have been questioned generally whether in cases of reputed ownership knowledge amounts to notice. But taking the proper object of notice, as to dealings with shares, to be what Turner, L. J., stated it to be in Ex parte Boulton, it is difficult to understand how the court arrived at the conclusion that the company had no notice, unless we assume that the secretary, by improper conduct on his part, would intentionally defeat these objects, which he might, if he chose to do so, in any case. While, however, there might be some difficulty in reconciling this decision of the Lords Justices with numerous reported cases, on the ground that the company had not notice, though its secretary had, yet, if we consider the peculiar object of notice in all cases of reputed ownership, and that in this case its only object was to take the shares in question out of the order and disposition of the shareholder, it is no doubt reasonable and proper that nothing should be treated as notice to the company which of itself, and without any further act on the part of the secretary (being the shareholder himself), would not be sufficient to take the shares out of his order and disposition. If, by the constitution of a public company, it is impossible for an equitable mortgagee or assignee of shares to give effective notice to the company otherwise than through the secretary; or, admitting that such notice were possible, if it must necessarily depend upon the secretary himself subsequently to give the proper operation and effect to such notice, such a reason would be quite sufficient to make a definite and intelligible exception to the general rule. The principle of the exception, we think, would be much more consistent with a long course of former decisions, and more easy of future application, than any distinction between the capacity in which the knowledge or notice is acquired, and that in which it is intended to operate.

Three cases which will be of some importance in conveyancing practice have been recently reported. They all relate to the construction of powers of appointing new trustees, which are so frequently the occasion of difficulties in the way of making a good title on a sale by trustees. In one of these (Nicholson v. Wright, 5 W. R. 481), the power was, "in case the trustees or any of them should die, or be desirous of being discharged, or refuse, or decline, or become incapable to act," and was given to "the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee." The number of trustees named in the will was three; of these, one died in the testator's lifetime; the other two declined to act, and appointed two new trustees in the room of themselves. The survivor of the two trustees so appointed contracted to sell under a power of sale contained in the will, and the purchaser objected that he could not make a good title. It had been already decided by the Master of the Rolls, in Stone v. Rowton (17 Beav. 308), that a retiring trustee was not a continuing or surviving trustee within the meaning of a similar power, in the absence of some special words to extend the meaning. And in the present case V. C. Wood, following the same doctrin o held that the appointment by the retiring trustees was bad. A mode of escaping the difficulty was suggested by the Court—namely, that one of the three original trustees, who was the only survivor, should appoint two new trustees, in the place of the one who died in the testator's lifetime, and of the other who had since died; and declared that trustees so appointed could make a good title.

Re Armstrong's Settlement (5 W. R. 448) is another case of the same description. The case arose upon a marriage settlement, of which Whitmore and Burdon were the trustees. The power was, if the trustees thereby appointed, or to be appointed as thereafter mentioned, should "die, or decline, or become incapable to act;" and Whitmore having died, and Burdon being anxious to retire, after having acted for some years in the trusts of the settlement, it was doubted whether a case had arisen in which the power could be exercised, inasmuch as the words only provided in terms for a trustee declining, or becoming incapable, to act, and not for one who desired to retire after having already acted. His Honour considered the doubt sufficient to warrant the court in appointing new trustees under the powers of the Trustee Act.

Re Woodgate's Settlement (5 W. R. 448) is another very similar case, before V. C. Stuart. The words of the power were these, if the trustees should "die, or become incapable, or be unwilling to act," and an order was made under the Act for the appointment of new trustees in the place of two who had acted for some time, and were desirous of retiring from the trust. The result of these cases is, that if it is intended to provide for the very common case of a trustee wishing to be relieved from a trust in which he has acted, it is not enough to use such words as "decline to act," or "be unwilling to act," but that the express event must be provided for of the trustee desiring to be discharged.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

O'Brien v. Dow, 3 Jur., N. S., 318.

The defendant in this case had been arrested on a judgment which had been obained against him in the year 1850 by the plaintiff, but which had been afterwards assigned to the plaintiff's attorneys, Messrs. Lewis and Lewis, as security for a debt due to them from the plaintiff. After the judgment had been obtained, the defendant had gone to live in Scotland, and while there, had obtained relief from his creditors under the Scotch Sequestration Act, as a trader—the trading being described as that of an underwriter. On his arrest, as above mentioned (which was effected after his return to England in 1856), Mr. Justice Crowder, after summons, ordered his discharge from custody, on the ground of his being protected under the Scotch Sequestration Act, which is analogous in its operation to the English Bankrupt Act. It was now sought to set this order aside, on two grounds—1st. Because the summons for the defendant's discharge had been served on Messrs. Lewis and on the sheriff, but not on the plaintiff. But this objection was overruled by the court, inasmuch as it appeared that at the time of the summons there was a judgment of outlawry against the plaintiff still unreversed, and that consequently he was not entitled to notice; while, on the other hand, the defendant had done all in his power, by serving the sheriff and Messrs. Lewis; for though the writ under which the arrest had been made, purported to have been sued out by the plaintiff in person, it had, in point of fact, been issued by one of the clerks of the Messrs. Lewis, who were therefore the agents, if not the attorneys, of the plaintiff.

The second ground for seeking to set aside the order of discharge was, that the trading under which the protection under the Scotch Act had been obtained, was colourable and fraudulent; but the court held, on the authority of Barrow v. Poile (1 B. & Ad. 633), that the nature of the trading could not be inquired into—that question being entirely for the court by which the protection was granted.

WARRANT OF COMMITMENT, VALIDITY OF—VAGRANT ACT.

Ex parte Cross, 3 Jur., N. S., 373.

This was a proceeding by way of habeas corpus to inquire into the validity of a warrant of commitment under the Vagrant Act, 5 Geo. 4, c. 83. The warrant alleged that T. C., on a certain day, in the city of London, then being a suspected person and reputed thief, "frequenting" the public streets, &c., was found, &c., in a certain place, &c., with intent to commit a felony; and it was urged that according to this form of warrant the term "frequenting" was used only as descriptio personæ, and not in reference to the actual transaction; whereas, to bring a person within the enactment on which he was convicted, it must appear that he was frequenting the place specified with intent to commit a felony. But Martin, B., said, if a man who frequents Fleet-street with the intent specified, sees, while in that street, an opportunity of committing a robbery in Inner Temple-lane, and runs down that lane to commit it there, this would satisfy the Act. And the court, coinciding in this view, remanded the prisoner to custody.

PRACTICE—WRIT OF MANDAMUS UNDER 17 & 18 VICT. C. 125—INTERROGATORIES UNDER SAME ACT.

Benson v. Paull, 6 Ell. & Bl. 273; Edwards v. Wakefield, Ib. 462.

The clauses of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, which allow a claim of a writ of mandamus to be inserted in a declaration (see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 68—77) have scarcely at all come under the notice of the full court, so as to be reported to the profession, but the first of the above cases lays down respecting them one important principle. It will be remembered that the Common Law Commissioners, in their second report, on which the above Act was founded, observed, in reference to the prerogative writ of mandamus—that, viz., which has always issued from the Queen's Bench, commanding the performance of some particular thing where some public right or duty has been infringed (see R. v. Bank of England, 2 B. & Ald. 622), and where no effectual relief can be obtained in the ordinary course of an action (see R. v. Bishop of Chester, 1 T. R. 396)—that the practice thereon might be beneficially extended so as to enable any of the courts of law to direct a duty to be performed on the application of any party who was beneficially interested in the performance of that duty, and for the neglect of which no sufficient remedy would be afforded by an action for damages. In the above case the plaintiff declared on an agreement between himself and the defendant by which it was agreed that a lease of certain premises demised by the plaintiff to the defendant should be prepared and executed at the expense of the latter. And the plaintiff claimed a writ of mandamus commanding the defendant to prepare a lease accordingly, or to accept one prepared by the plaintiff. It was, however, held by the Court of Queen's Bench on demurrer to this declaration, that the new provision, giving a right to a plaintiff to claim a writ of mandamus, commanding the defendant to fulfil any duty in the fulfilment of which the plaintiff is personally interested, does not extend to the fulfilment of duties arising merely from personal contract. If it did so, it would extend to every case of contract, for, no doubt, it is the duty of every one who makes a promise to fulfil it. But an obligation to grant a mandamus ordering the defendant to perform his contract by executing a lease, would entail the necessity (for example) of ordering a gentleman on the application of a lady to fulfil his duty by performing a promise which he had made to marry her. But the obligation thrown on the courts of law is not even co-extensive with that thrown on the courts of equity in enforcing specific performance; for the courts of law have no means of making the inquiries and arrangements which are made in a court of equity, to secure equity being done by the enforcement of the contract. The truth seems to be, that the enactment of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854 on this subject must be confined to such duties as might have been enforced by a prerogative writ of mandamus. The Act facilitates the obtaining of such a writ, and extends the power of granting it to other courts as well as the Queen's Bench. "Now, within such limits," said Lord Campbell, "the power is likely to be very beneficial, but it would not be beneficial if it was extended to all duties arising from contract; and it was not the intention of the Legislature so to extend it.".

The other case (Edwards v. Wakefield), lays down, so far as the Court of Queen's Bench is concerned, a general rule in reference to the provisions in the same statute which have reference to interrogatories. An application had been made by the defendant to be allowed to deliver interrogatories to the plaintiffs, under the 51st section of the same Common Law Procedure Act. The action was in trover by the assignees of a bankrupt, to recover property alleged to form part of the bankrupt's estate; and the proposed interrogatories were for the purpose of compelling the plaintiffs to state upon oath what Act or Acts of Bankruptcy they intended to rely upon in support of the title of the assignees. But the court held that the provision under which the application was made, was intended to apply only to cases where the matters inquired into would be evidence in the cause, and that it was not intended thereby to give one party the power of asking the other how he meant to shape his case; and that, at all events, the provision as to discovery must be confined to the cases in which a discovery would be given in equity; and that in equity the plaintiffs at law would be entitled to say, in answer to such questions as the present, "I shall support my case by any Acts of Bankruptcy which I can prove, and which I shall be advised to rely on."

The court further intimated that they were not disposed to assent to the recent case in the Exchequer of Flitcroft v. Fletcher (11 Exch. 543), so far, at least, as that case was to be considered as deciding that the defendant might always ask the plaintiff to declare on oath how he meant to shape his case.

ATTORNEY—PARISH BUSINESS, BILLS FOR—POOR-LAW AUDITOR, ALLOWANCE BY.

The Queen v. Hunt (6 Ell. & Bl. 408).

This was a rule for a certiorari to remove into the Queen's Bench the disallowance, by a poor-law auditor, of a sum of money which had been paid by the overseers to discharge an attorney's bill of costs, and his reasons for such disallowance. The bill in question had been incurred for parish business, and it had not been taxed before it was presented to the auditor, who, after giving certain reasons for his disallowance, in compliance with the request of the overseers, added that, inasmuch as the bill had not been taxed before it was presented to him, his decision, as auditor, on the reasonableness, as well as the legality, of the charges therein contained, was final and conclusive. It was to test the law as to this view that the present proceeding was taken.

The argument in the Queen's Bench turned chiefly on the 39th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, which enacts that, on the application of the parish officers or attorney, any bill of costs, in respect of parish business, shall be taxed by the clerk of the peace, and that the allowance of any sum, on such taxation, shall be primâ facie evidence of the reasonableness of the amount, but not of the legality of the charge; and then proceeds thus—"and if any such bill be not taxed before it is presented to the auditor, the auditor's decision on the reasonableness, as well as the legality, of the charges, shall be final." The question turned more particularly on the meaning here of this word "final." The court held, that the words of the 35th section of the act clearly gave the appeal by certiorari from the auditor's decision in such a case as that before them, unless in the event of the bill not being taxed before it came before him; and that, in such a case, the words used by the Legislature (whatever might be thought as to their reasonableness) clearly showed that the decision of the auditor, that the parish was not liable, was to be conclusive. The judges all concurred in this view, but each intimated that he felt great difficulty in understanding the reasons which led the Legislature to this enactment. Indeed, Erle, J., said, "I find myself unable to construe this enactment at all. The Act provides that there may be an appeal from any decision of the auditor by sec. 35 to this court, or by sec. 36 to the Poor Law Commissioners, if the matter is supposed to be less of law than discretion. Clearly, therefore, the Legislature looked upon the auditors as fallible, and thought it right that their decisions in general should be subject to review. Then comes sec. 39, referring to attorney's bills, that being a subject, most of all others, requiring a peculiar species of knowledge not likely to be possessed by an auditor; and it is supposed that the Legislature have made it a condition precedent to any appeal on that subject, that the bill should have been previously subject to taxation, that taxation being, it is to be noticed, ex parte. I cannot see what purpose can be answered by this. I cannot, however, read 'final,' as meaning 'final,' unless appealed against. Probably that was the object of the Legislature; but it cannot be done without reforming the words of the statute; and, therefore, I agree that this rule must be discharged." Again, said—and his last words are significant—Crompton, J., "The object of the Legislature (no matter whether wise or not) seems to have been to cause parish offices to tax their bills before they pay them. If they do not, the decision is to be final as against them. We need not now decide how it would be as against a rate-payer."

THE SAVINGS' BANK QUESTION.

Among the subjects of national importance which have long called for legislative interference, is the Savings' Bank Question. All who take an interest in the welfare of the working-classes of society are agreed in this—that savings' banks are highly beneficial, and ought to be conducted on safe and correct principles. We, therefore, assume, at once, that if it can be shown that these institutions are at the present moment based on an unsound and fallacious system, all persons really interested in the amendment of our laws are bound to exert themselves to the utmost to procure an amendment in the savings' bank code. This responsibility rests, in a peculiar degree, on your readers. The solicitors of England, as a body, possess an influence over all classes of society, which, taken in connection with their means of estimating the nature and evils of bad registration, and of suggesting improvements, imposes on them a double obligation to rescue depositors from the snares and pitfalls which now threaten them. Every employer who, being acquainted with the present state of the law, encourages those under his influence to make use of savings' banks, is conniving at a system but a shade better than that pursued by Mr. Hugh Cameron and his brethren of the Royal British Bank.

These observations are suggested by two very remarkable pamphlets,* which differ in object, but agree in their statement of the position and past legislative history of savings' banks. Dr. Hancock approaches the subject in the character of a political economist and a law-reformer; and from his careful and clearly-written summary, much interesting, and some very startling, information may be gathered. For a number of years savings' banks have been resorted to by the most industrious of the employed, under the idea that they possessed Government security for the return of their deposits.

This idea has (of course, in ignorance of the real state of the case) been fostered by Porter, M'Culloch, and many other eminent writers, who, in describing these institutions, have invariably stated that the security of the state is given to each depositor. The class-books issued by Government, and used in the national schools all over Ireland, also impress upon the minds of universal Hibernian childhood the belief that every pound lodged in a savings' bank is lent to the Government, and will be faithfully repaid on demand. Now turn to inquire into the real truth of this statement, and it appears that moneys deposited are lent merely to the managers or trustees (as the case may be) of each bank, who are bound by the terms of the first Act—passed in 1817—to lend all such moneys to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. Thenceforward, and until the Act of 1828 passed, such managers or trustees were, like any other bankers, liable to depositors to the full extent of their property. By the Act of 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 92), it was, however, enacted that no manager, &c., should be personally liable, except for his own acts and deeds, nor for anything done by him in virtue of his office in the execution of the Act, except in cases where he might be guilty of wilful neglect or default. The security of the depositors was now, therefore, very much reduced; still they had some security; and in a few instances, where moneys had been embezzled by clerks—as in the cases of the Killarney and Tralee Banks, the depositors obtained an award against the managers through whose carelessness the loss had occurred. In the year 1844, a total change of system was introduced by a paternal Legislature. Under the important Act of that year (7 & 8 Vict. c. 83), no matter what the neglect or default of the managers, &c., might be, they were not thenceforth to be liable for any money not actually pocketed by them! This Act, indeed, provided that any manager might, if he pleased, declare in writing his willingness to become liable for a certain amount; but as may be supposed, few persons have been found willing to incur responsibility when it might so easily be avoided; and in not more than four or five out of the four or five hundred banks in England, have any trustees or managers so declared themselves liable to the extent of one farthing.

This total relief from all liability was found to work so badly in Ireland—four important savings' banks having stopped payment, for very large amounts—that the law was again patched up by an Act of 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 133). This Act restored, as to Irish banks only, the liability for wilful neglect or default; but provided that managers might, by a written instrument, limit their liability to £100. Since this period, savings' banks have failed at Rochdale, Scarborough, and several other places, but no increased liability has been placed upon managers and trustees of English savings' banks. The general result at the present time is as follows:—Throughout the United Kingdom, including security given by paid officers of the various savings' banks, the entire security from all quarters available to depositors is under £800,000, while the aggregate amount of deposits is over £33,000,000. Supposing, then, every part of the securities could be rendered available, about 2½ per cent. of the amount deposited would be recovered! Under these circumstances, while the wealth of the country has so greatly increased, one is not surprised to find that the amount deposited in savings' banks has fallen off very considerably, and is now steadily diminishing.

A large proportion of Dr. Hancock's space is occupied by an elaborate disclosure of the history of one bank which has particularly distinguished itself by fraud and mismanagement—the bank in Cuffe-street, Dublin. The circumstances attending the gradual decline and fall of this notorious establishment are so utterly strange and unaccountable, that its wide-spread fame, in parliamentary debate and otherwise, is not to be wondered at. Will it be believed, that, when but a small deficiency in the accounts was in the first instance discovered, the Commissioners in London, instead of closing the doors of the bank, and insisting on a thorough investigation of the accounts, advised the managers to proceed as though nothing were wrong—in order that the public confidence in savings' banks might not be shaken. Still more marvellous was the advice given by the "barrister appointed to certify the rules of savings' banks." This gentleman was sent over to make an inquiry into the affairs of the bank, and, after arriving at the conclusion that a certain sum was deficient, he recommended that the deficiency should be paid out of the future profits to be made by the bank. In pursuance of this note-worthy advice, the bank was carried on as before—the peculators remained undisturbed, public confidence was unchecked, deposits flowed in fast, the deficiency increased year by year, and the grand crisis did not take place until 1848. Then the bubble burst. A loss of £60,000 to the depositors testified to the merits of a system, under which fraudulent clerks, and careless trustees, politic National Debt Commissioners, and financial certifying "barristers," are enabled, with more or less of moral responsibility, and no legal responsibility, to co-operate for the ruin of industrious and frugal depositors.

Supposing, however, that all the money lodged in any given savings' bank is faithfully handed over to the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt, the question arises—What do they do with it? It appears that their long-established practice is to purchase into the public funds, and when repayment is required, to make sales of stock. These transactions are, of course, attended with expense; they are moreover attended with considerable loss. The deposits increase in prosperous times, and are withdrawn when times are bad. Consequently, the purchases of stock are made when the funds are high; the sales when the funds are low. More than this, the balances due to savings' banks are under the control of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and that unconscientious functionary has been in the habit of resorting to those funds for the purpose of making up temporary deficiencies in his accounts! It is believed that since 1855 a more honest system has been pursued in reference to the savings' bank balances. It is, however, an undoubted fact that the deficiency in these funds, arising from the foregoing causes, amounted in that year to no less a sum than four millions sterling! This is the tax paid by a careless nation; the penalty, contributed to by every Englishman, for false economic management of savings' banks.

After bestowing due consideration on these facts, your readers will have no difficulty in assenting to my proposition—that savings' banks, as now conducted, are a disgrace to our country; and that an entire new legislation is required for their management. With your permission, I will proceed, next week, to consider certain schemes for improvement and reform in our savings' bank laws.

PRACTICE.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—As there seems to be some difference of opinion on the point in the country, perhaps you or some of your readers will kindly enlighten me as to the general rule with respect to the right of a solicitor to engross original and duplicate deeds, the drafts of which have been prepared by him. The following is a case in which the point has lately arisen with me.

The solicitors of the trustee of a settlement of personalty, on the death of the last tenant for life, is instructed to prepare a release to his client from the persons to whom he is about to pay the trust fund.

These persons in this case are executors and trustees under the two wills of the remainder-men named in the settlement; and these executors and trustees wish the release also to have the effect of a discharge to them from their cestuis que trust, and the draft is prepared accordingly, these cestuis que trust being made parties.

The trustees and executors under each will employ different solicitors to act in the matter of each estate. Three parts of the release are necessarily required—one for the trustee of the settlement, and one for each set of executors. Query, is the solicitor who prepares the draft entitled to engross all the parts, or how otherwise?

Another case in which there has also been a difference of opinion is, when the solicitor of one partner has prepared a draft deed of partnership, and each partner employs his own solicitor to peruse and approve on his separate behalf. Query, who is entitled to engross the different parts required? It is contended, on the one hand, that the practice is for the draughtsman to engross all the originals required of his own draft in the same way as the solicitors of the lessor takes upon himself to engross both lease and counterpart. On the other hand, it is insisted that the part to be held by any one party ought in fairness to be engrossed by his own solicitor, and that such is the practice. I am, sir, your obedient servant,

Berkshire, 14th April, 1857. "Inquirer."

COUNTY COURT LAW.

To the Editor of The Solicitors' Journal & Reporter.

Weymouth—Judge Everett.

Tucker v. Wallis & Another.

Sir,—The plaintiff sued the defendants, as executor and executrix under the will of William Wallis, for £11 4*s.* 2*d.*, goods sold and delivered. The facts proved were that the plaintiff had agreed with the deceased for the purchase of a small cottage for £27, the key of which had been given, as well as the title deeds, to the plaintiff; but the vendor died prior to executing the purchase deed. Plaintiff paid part of the consideration money in cash—viz. £16, and the rest was to be taken out in goods.

After the death of the vendor, the executor and executrix took possession of the cottage, and paid back the £16, but not the amount for the goods, it being agreed that the original contract should be at an end.

For the defence, a bill was produced which a shopman of plaintiff's had receipted, but no proof of payment. Plaintiff stated that this was done by the shopman at plaintiff's request, but no money was received. The judge then said that the signature was primâ facie proof of payment, and that the only way to meet it was by the production of the shopman; and the case was adjourned for that purpose.

At the adjourned hearing, the plaintiff produced the shopman, but at considerable expense, as he lived at some distance. The shopman proved that no money passed. The judge then decided that as these goods formed part of the consideration money for the cottage, they were paid for, and the defendants were not liable.

As this decision seems somewhat strange, one would like to have the opinions of some of your readers; as one would have thought that there was no need of putting the plaintiff to the expense of the adjournment if this was the judge's opinion. It appears to me, that, at the death of the vendor, the contract, although binding in equity, yet at law was incomplete, that the parties waived the orginal agreement, and, therefore, the liability of the defendants arose. If not, how must they be sued?

Review.

A History of the French Bar, Ancient and Modern, comprising a notice of the French Courts, their Officers, Practitioners, &c., and of the System of Legal Education in France. By Robert Jones, of Lincoln's-inn, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. London: Benning & Co. 1855.

In the various controversies respecting legal education which have attracted so much attention, we have heard a great deal of the example of the French. The subject is, however, one upon which there is more talk than knowledge; and we, therefore, feel much pleasure in bringing under the notice of our readers a book which gives a very complete account of one of its branches. Mr. Jones confines his attention to the French avocats, and says nothing of the procureurs, notaires, and avoués, who discharge the functions which in England fall to attorneys and solicitors. In some future edition, he might advantageously add some information upon the division of labour between the three classes which we have mentioned, and upon the conditions which are imposed upon those who wish to enter them. In the meantime, we must be thankful for what we have got. The matter is interesting, and the manner plain and unpretending.

The first stage of the avocat's education is under the direction of the University of France, and consists in the acquisition of the two degrees of Bachelor and Licentiate of Laws. There are nine academies at which these degrees are conferred—Paris, Dijon, Grenoble, Aix, Toulouse, Poitiers, Rennes, Caen, and Strasbourg. They are only granted to those who have previously obtained the degree of Bachelier-ès-Lettres. In order to obtain these degrees, the student has to pass through four examinations, which test his acquaintance with the institutes, part of the pandects, the code civil, the code penal, the code de commerce the code de procedure, and the laws of public administration. He has also the opportunity of presenting himself as a candidate for certain prizes, awarded by the result of a competing examination, and of passing through extra courses in legal history and international law. The course may be commenced at sixteen, and may be concluded in three years; but is generally commenced later and continued longer. A Licentiate in Laws may present himself to the Faculty of Advocates, at Paris or elsewhere, as a candidate for a call to the bar. If he obtains it, he enters upon his stage, or probation, and becomes an avocat stagier. This part of his career corresponds in many respects to what we mean by "keeping terms." The stagier is still under discipline, and is not a full avocat until the end of three years, after which time he may be inscribed on the tableau, or list of practising advocates. The discipline of the stagiers consists in their obligation to assiduité, which is ascertained by a registry of their attendances in court, and at certain conférences, or moots, which are held once a week under the presidency of the Bâtonnier, or President of the Council of the Faculty, assisted by two other members. Though still under discipline, the stagier is an advocate, and is allowed, with some exceptions, to do whatever a full avocat may do. Indeed, arrangements are made for affording him an opportunity of displaying his talents. The Conference gives gratuitous legal opinions to the poor; and those who distinguish themselves at its debates are nominated ex officio as counsel to undefended prisoners.

If our own system were carried out as it ought to be, by means of compulsory examinations, we think it would be the better of the two. The length of study required in France is such that it must practically exclude from the profession almost all persons who are not destined to it from boyhood; a division of authority between the Inns of Court and the Universities, analogous to the system above described, would scarcely be desirable; and we are very sceptical as to the advantages of debating clubs, under whatever superintendence. When, however, we have made allowance for these differences, the comparison between French and English legal education is sufficiently mortifying. We can feel no doubt whatever as to the intrinsic soundness of the French practice of enforcing scientific acquaintance with the principles of law on all persons who are to make it their profession. The distinction between trades and professions is merely nominal, unless the practitioners of the latter are distinguished by the scientific cultivation of the subject-matter of their occupation; nor is there any more effectual way of preserving a pure system of law, or of reforming a corrupt one, than that of taking care that all who are to practise it shall be impressed with the fact that it is, or ought to be, a science capable of being scientifically taught. To the neglect of this principle in England we must mainly attribute the intricacy, obscurity, and chicanery of many parts of our own law.

The status of the avocat, when he has attained his full standing, differs much from that of a barrister. In France, there are local bars, not only at the seats of each of the twenty-seven cours impériales, but at all the other capitals of departments, and in many of the towns which possess tribunals of first instance. Each of these has its own tableau, its own council, and the absolute control over the professional conduct and prospects of its own members. The last part of Mr. Jones's book is occupied by a translation of the rules of etiquette of the bar of Paris, constituting, he enthusiastically tells us, the advocate's "professional religion." This document consists of 101 rules, collected by M. Mollot, bearing an official character. There is a naïve solemnity about some of them which is amusing to an Englishman. For example, M. Mollot tells us there are four "essential and rare qualities—probity, disinterestedness, moderation, and independence"—whence flow all the proprieties of the bar. Their practice is expressly enacted in the 14th article of the ordonnance of the 20th of November, 1822. Some of the breaches of these cardinal virtues sound very odd. Thus:—

"Rule xvii. It is a breach of moderation for an advocate to expose himself to scandal or ridicule by seeking to produce an effect in court, by means of diving into the depths of pathos, and is sometimes even a disciplinary offence."

Again, puffing is a breach of probity:—

"Rule vi. Imitating that pretended philosopher of antiquity, who announced himself, by placards, as possessing the means of gaining a bad cause, would be worse than improbity—it would amount to infamy."

Further, the bar is a family; and on "entering its sanctuary," we have the following piece of advice:—

"Rule lxxvi. An advocate should never make abuse of his wit to turn a brother advocate into derision, still less to persecute him with reproach or contempt."

The virtue of disinterestedness about fees is inculcated with what seems to us rather ostentatious, if not affected, delicacy; and there is something not very pleasing in the jealousy with which a variety of occupations are declared to be incompatible with that of an advocate, and to justify his omission for the time from the tableau. An advocate, for example, may not be engaged in commerce; he may not give lessons in French, in classics, or in mathematics; he may not be professor in a school or college; he may not be director or manager of a newspaper; nor may he be "the husband of a woman who keeps a boarding-school," if he is "in community of goods" with her. Our national love of independence would not submit very readily to the government of the French bar. The administration of the professional code is intrusted to a council, which in Paris consists of twenty members, and judges without appeal all infractions of discipline and all public disregard of morals, having the power of suspending or expelling members from the order. Thus, the council will take notice of endorsing bills, setting up discreditable defences to actions, "speculations in buying or selling real property," and every description of agency. More extraordinary still is the assertion of M. Mollot, that, "it is hardly necessary to observe, that, should an advocate, forgetting himself and his duty, make any attack, whether in pleading or writing, on religion, public morals, the laws, or the established authorities," the council would at once "repress" him. There is obviously no limit to such a jurisdiction, except the personal good sense of the members of the council. Apart, however, from these less pleasing features, there is much in the condition of the bar in France which deserves attention. Both in civil and criminal business the avocat seems to be far less the mere mouthpiece of his client in France than in this country. He may be consulted personally without the intervention of an attorney; he exchanges briefs with the counsel on the other side before the hearing; and he is, to a certain extent, responsible for the character of the defence. For example:—

Rule xxxvii. Giving an opinion according to the statement of the client, positis ponendis, is not fulfilling his duty. Counsel should only rely on their statement so far as he is himself enabled to verify the documents and facts of the case. And Rule xxxviii. If a cause appears to be bad or unjust, an advocate will decline it without hesitation, even though he should have advised thereon or accepted it under error; for he would be sure to support it badly, and be compromising his oath. "When he doubts" as to the morality of the case, he should always refuse, otherwise his own may be suspected.

It must, however, be borne in mind, that there is nothing in France answering to our Nisi Prius business; all evidence in civil cases being documentary. It may also be worth remarking that, in France, the practice of taking fees and not appearing at the hearing is expressly forbidden and severely punished. Even when one avocat gets another to appear in his place, he must return his fees. The same principles obtain to some extent in criminal cases. The French do not, as we do, consider a criminal trial as a struggle between the prosecutor and the prisoner, in which the judge has to see fair play; but an investigation by the court. All prosecutions being conducted by public officers, the "avocat" never has to appear against the prisoner, and he seems to be a sort of extra member of the tribunal, charged with the duty of influencing its deliberations in the prisoner's favour. Thus, he does not cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution, and he constantly pleads, not in denial of the prisoner's guilt, but in extenuation of his punishment. It is possibly upon this principle that every prisoner in France is defended by counsel. If he has not retained them, they are nominated for him, ex officio; and in cases of importance, the most eminent counsel at the bar are often chosen for the purpose, and are sometimes compelled, in the execution of their duty, to take long journeys at their own expense.

We have been obliged to confine ourselves to a few of the more striking points of this valuable book. We would suggest to Mr. Jones the propriety of a somewhat less literal translation. He has adopted his course advisedly, but we cannot quite consent to such words as "reglementary," or to such idioms as "the advocate considered in the spontaneity and intimacy of his actions;" and, on the other hand, we should have preferred the retaining of the French technical names to the translation of stage into "probation," bâtonnier into "president," and tableau into "table." Allowing for such slight blemishes as these, we have seldom met with a work more instructive or more modest.

The Forthcoming Revolution.

Thoughts of a Solicitor of Thirty Years' Standing on the Registration of Titles.

I have watched with great interest all the important Reports of Commissioners and Legislative Committees on legal changes since Lord Eldon's Chancery Commission Report of 1826; but, by a long interval, there has been none proposing such vast changes in legal affairs as the one now before me. The Chancery and Common Law Commissions, for instance, deal with offices and practice only. They propose little more than the milliners do when they put forth new fashions in dress. They propose the old thing, or something very like it, with only a new name. Generically, they leave most things as they were. Except a little as to rules of evidence, there is no fundamental overturning of old ways proposed. This Report, on the other hand, proposes a total overthrow of old principles; a generic change in the very essence of our system of Real Property Conveyancing. And not only is the change proposed so extensive, but, from what I learn of the concurrence of all political parties on the subject, it will, at no distant period, be unquestionably carried out pretty much after the plan here proposed.

The project has been several times commented on in the columns of this paper, and need not be further explained than by saying that it places land, for the purpose of sale, and as between vendor and purchaser, as nearly as possible in the position of stock or railway shares; registering the names of those who have powers of sale, and treating them in facie mundi as absolute owners; making a conveyance from them good, as against their cestuis que trust, &c., and discharging the purchaser from looking to the character of the vendor, or to his right to exercise the power of sale which his being on the register-book is to confer upon him. A stock-holder is by no means always a stock-owner. Near two-thirds of the public funds, on the contrary, are held by trustees under settlements or wills; and the object of the plan under consideration is to make a register of landholders, or rather of legal estate holders, and to say that, as towards the world at large, every estate must and shall always have a registered somebody, who (if not prevented through a distringas or otherwise by his cestuis que trust) may be dealt with by the rest of the world as owner.

"Just as the feudal law (says the Report) required that the freehold should always be filled by one capable of contributing to national defence, and performing the duties of a feudal follower, so the spirit of commerce now demands that for its purposes also the fee-simple in land shall always be represented and be in the possession of persons capable of fulfilling those new duties and offices which the ownership of land in the present state of society entails or involves."

The Incumbered Estates Court in Ireland has been established on this theory; but perhaps a more practical way of looking at the commercial value of the object the projectors of the scheme have in view, would be to ask what would be the effect on the price of the funds if the law required a sixty years' abstract of title to funded property to be shown and examined, as is now required as to land? In other words, given ordinary consols at 94, and pass a law to-morrow requiring all stock held by trustees to be dealt with as land and the title to be investigated, and all cestuis que trust to join in transfer, or be otherwise duly barred, would those trust consols fetch 73? If not, then seven years' purchase would be struck off the price of all consols under that category; and then, say the projectors, why should not seven (or other equivalent) number of years' purchase be added to the price of all land, if we throw over the present method, and adopt the stock principle of title and conveyance? It is really the commercial value of the measure that has made the Incumbered Estates Act so prized for Ireland, and not at all, in the same degree, the anti-absentee object of the Act. The project of granting warranted titles when required, is in effect one for applying the principle of the Incumbered Estates Act to all English lands, whether or not under mortgage. The requirement of an incumbrance to give operation to that Act is purely absurd.

The first observation that strikes me on the whole of this scheme, and on the Report generally, is, that the scheme, good or bad, has peculiarly a purse and client origin. It is a scheme peculiarly emanating from considerations (perhaps mistaken) of what the landowner can get by a change. It is impossible to look at any one of the ponderous volumes of Commissioners' Reports since 1826, and not to see that this vital consideration has been almost altogether out of view in them. The first question that occurs to a solicitor is, How comes it here? A comparison of the money spent and time taken, under various conflicting legal systems, is the true experimentum crucis in all inquiries as to methods and procedure. Good or bad law, in the judgement, it is well known, is of far less commercial value than quick and cheap decision. The value of all property is deteriorated far more by bad procedure than by blundering judges. Legally considered, Eldons may be the best judges, but, commercially, they are the worst imaginable. How, then, is it that we find, for the first time almost, these tests of merit throughout this report? Because the keepers of the client's purse—the solicitors—have been at the bottom of the whole affair. One or two solicitors seem to have been the projectors of the details. Indeed the paper of one of them, in the appendix, gives a far more lucid and comprehensive notion of the whole scheme, in a few pages, than the report itself does in half a hundred. But the real authors of the scheme (whether they know it or not) I should say, are the body of solicitors, and, perhaps, I may say, the council of the Law Institution. I dare say that august body will disclaim it vehemently, but it is the truth all the same. These parties opposed the old Government bills for registering deeds in extenso, and, at the same time, leaving the rules as to equitable interests, &c., as they exist now, their opposition being on grounds which inevitably lead to one of two conclusions—viz., that there can be no land register at all, or that it must be such a one as is here proposed. They showed that to register all documents affecting a title in extenso, and to make each and all these registered documents evermore a part of the title, would be so to incumber, and over-lay, and smother real property, that the project would be ruinous to the owners. The conclusion the landowners came to, and which led them* to advise the Crown to issue this commission, was inevitable. "Why then," said they, "should we trouble ourselves with clearing up the title to all equities when we sell land, any more than when we sell stock?"

This scheme, truly great for good or for mischief, is therefore entirely the production of solicitors, and has entirely had its rise in considerations peculiarly emanating from the custody of the client's purse and pecuniary interests. The scheme at present is not of compulsory application. If it prove bad on trial, it will die a death of inanition. If put on compulsorily, it will either play the devil with the landowners, or it will certainly raise the marketable value of every landed estate five or six, or possibly eight or ten years' purchase; and whichever it does, the solicitors who devised it must have the blame or praise.

A few somewhat small observations, mostly of detail, have occurred to me on the report. The phrase "Registration of Title" is not a good phrase; nor is "the Registration of Ownership." As above observed, the word owner is not correlative as to land, with holder as to stock or shares. The thing really proposed to be registered is the possession of powers of sale. Much of difficulty in the public comprehension of this project will arise, I think, from inattention to the above distinction.

The Report proposes (what would be very valuable as to stock) a power to parties to register titles in two or more names, with a note in the book that there is to be no survivorship as between the registered owners. We solicitors often open deposit accounts on this basis; and it would afford an almost absolute protection against frauds in trustees if it could be adopted as to stock. There seems, however, a little confusion in the Report on this point, as it elsewhere proposes to prohibit tenancies in common in registered ownerships (see ss. 66 and 81).

The registration, by a separate register, of incumbrances, seems to me open to the greatest question. If such a registration is really necessary, then, I think, the whole scheme will fail. The distinction between legal and equitable rights is one existing in the very nature of things, and not to be ignored without the utmost mischief. Courts of law look at rights as between two adverse claimants of the same thing, and these rights are all that signifies for purposes of market overt. The present scheme, in its general outline, proceeds on this distinction. It is to register legal ownerships only, and to discard equitable ones. A first mortgage is a legal transfer, and could be registered as such. All subsequent ones are equitable only, and are not more entitled to registry, and less require the protection of a registry, than all the equitable rights of cestuis que trust. The law allowing mortgages of ships to be registered will, I think, be found to be a mischievous one. It gives rise to endless litigation, all of which would have been saved if the mortgage had to the world been an out and out sale. As long as other equities in ships were prohibited by Act of Parliament, this one exception was necessary. Now it is, I conceive, only mischievous. It seems to me that the view of the Commissioners in the 73rd paragraph of the Report, prohibiting equities arising out of notice, are open to grave question, on the same grounds as have led to the re-establishment of equitable doctrines in the shipping law.

The index part of the affair seems to me the least considered, or perhaps it may be the most obscurely expressed, part of the Report. The object is, that, with reference to every or any piece of land, the state shall possess a book showing who may sell it, or answer (as the Report says) for its feudal duties. Given the piece of land, who is the registered owner? If this is the question; the land, with its metes and bounds, must be the basis of all indexes, and not names of men. The land, too, is permanent, and the owners perishable and transitory.

I strongly agree with the Commissioners, that the registrar must be a ministerial officer only, and not judicial.

"We agree (they say) in an observation contained in the evidence before us, that there is no feeling more strongly rooted in the public mind than dislike of official interference with their private affairs; and any system must be considered practically impossible, however theoretically perfect, which would render the approval or sanction of a registrar necessary for the completion of transfers, or would give him any discretionary power to prevent them."

This remark bears on the question of registering equitable interests. Nothing is more objectionable than that the state should undertake to regulate, or manage, or be the active bailiff or trustee of parties as to private rights created inter se. Land is, in a sense, like air; a thing which every one born into the world must have certain rights in, or he cannot exist. He must have ground for his mother to lie down on, and himself to put his legs upon. Space is a condition of all life. Land is not like an article made by the hand of man, and having no existence but by his effort; but it is a common property, given in great part to private individuals, that it may be protected and fenced and cultivated. The public need requires such cultivation, and sometimes, as for public works, its resumption by the public, on equitable terms. The public may well, therefore, require, and the owner well desire, that, as between the owner and the public, some feudal owner shall be on the register—on what I may call the great court-roll of the state. But as between this owner and his wife, or his children or creditors, it seems to me contrary to the first principles of good legislation that the public should interfere, otherwise than by serving a mere notice or caveat. We might as well appoint a public board the universal trustee, or hand that office for all the kingdom over to the official assignees in bankruptcy, who I do not doubt have often held conclaves how they could capture such a prize. Indeed, when the Legislature last session gave them a right to wind up the affairs of companies who have no creditors, it did really do in part what I am deprecating as a false and mischievous interference by the state in what parties should be required to do for themselves. Two more points occur to me. The Commissioners consider that their scheme will not "make equitable or secondary estates more marketable than they now are." But surely if it answers at all, it will. Suppose real property conveyancing law applied to-morrow to stock, what would be the depreciation in the value of reversionary interests in stock?

* The House of Commons Committee which advised this commission was very much a landowners' committee.

The Commissioners say—"It has been well said that the greatest condemnation of the existing system of lending money on land is the reluctance which bankers, the natural traders in loans, have to lend on mortgage or judgment. The security which they refuse, careless trustees, ignorant people who have savings, and widows and others who have some small provision, are advised to accept, and in this way the whole risk of bad security is thrown on the classes least able to bear it." This is surely fallacious. The rule as to what are proper banking securities turns on the shortness of the time in which the securities are self-converting, and for which the loans are contracted. Bankers are not the proper persons to lend on mortgage. Insurance offices are.

In conclusion, that never-ending fiat experimentum in corpore vili principle indicated in the now every-day proposal to apply the scheme to Ireland first, is rather laughable. I should have said, apply it to Middlesex or Yorkshire first; and turn an execrable registry into one which a little experience will determine either super-excellent or ruinous. Experience is the true analyst. And the Commissioners' plan is, in one respect, most wise—viz., that it does not compel any one to adopt it, but leaves its use for the present entirely at each man's option. Open new roads without closing the old, is the cardinal rule in all wise reforms of procedure.

Finally, I would add that I believe the scheme will answer; and if it does, it will be one of the greatest measures which ever were taken for legal improvement.

Parliamentary Practice on Private Bills.

The prospectus of a new company is one of the first things which demands the attention of promoters of private bills. The same kind of details have to be collected for all works of any magnitude—such as railways, docks, harbours, and other works of a similar nature; and as the undertakings of joint-stock companies are looked on now rather as an opportunity for investment than as an excuse for speculation, the prospectus ought to be based on a fair calculation of probable traffic or commerce, as the case may be, and, in fact, as an indication of the policy of the promoters, and the grounds upon which their claim for public support is founded.

Every abuse is sure to be the means, directly or indirectly, of doing some good; and so with prospectuses. Those who had experience of the visionary absurdities—for they deserve no better name—which were issued during the speculating mania, will remember that schemes which were put forth by bonâ fide companies frequently fell to the ground in consequence of the mistrust which had arisen, generally owing to the trash which appeared in the columns of the papers for the sole purpose of catching dupes. Now, however, a prospectus is a very different thing. It should be as concise as possible, and state in the plainest language the main features of the proposed undertaking—the wants of the district through which the works will pass, or in which they will be made; the amount of traffic or merchandise which will probably arise or be diverted into the new district, and any other striking points which will catch the eye, and also bear the scrutiny of men of business.

It is of great importance, in all cases where a new district is to be accommodated, or where the resources of any locality are to be developed by means of a new railway, or other scheme, to annex to the prospectus a small coloured map, showing the advantages to be afforded by the projected undertaking. Independently of honesty of purpose—which, of course, should regulate the preparation of all advertisements in the nature of prospectuses—it must be born in mind that it is all important that great accuracy should prevail, as no more dangerous weapon can be put into the hands of an adversary than a prospectus which may be pulled to pieces in the committee-room. Subscribers are easily led by the features which matters assume before a select committee; and it not unfrequently happens that a few faint-hearted subscribers may prove a great clog to proceedings on the very eve of success—more particularly, as in the event of the opponents disproving some of the facts of the prospectus, they may imagine that a mistake, which has arisen from inadvertence, is really a fraud.

The form of the prospectus is usually the same. It generally commences with the title of the company, the amount of capital, names of the directors, solicitors, bankers, brokers, and secretary. It should be published in the leading London and local newspapers, together with the form of application for shares. This being done, the company may be considered as fairly started; and unless some unexpected obstacle occurs which nips the thing in the bud, the promoters will be justified in taking the preliminary steps towards obtaining an Act of Parliament.

It may, however, be observed, before quitting the subject of the prospectus, that a very good mode has latterly been adopted of testing the bona fides of applicants for shares—which is, inserting a proviso in the prospectus that no applications for shares will be noticed by the directors unless accompanied with a cheque for one or two pounds (as the case may be) per share as a deposit on making the application. This preliminary deposit, of course, is returned immediately in the event of the shares being refused; but, if they are granted, it goes towards the deposit on the allotment. The application for the shares may be made even stronger than this, and contain an undertaking on the part of the applicant to forfeit the preliminary deposit in toto, in the event of the allottee not paying the full deposit on the shares allotted, and signing the deed of settlement or subscription contract. This has been found in practice to do away, in a great measure, with the swindling which occurred in 1845, when men of straw procured allotments, and sold their letters on the Stock Exchange.

Assuming, therefore, that the prospectuses are published, and that the new scheme embraces objects which come within the scope of second-class bills, three separate branches of the preliminary proceedings require the immediate attention of the solicitor—viz., the plans and sections, book of reference, and parliamentary notices. The main points of the notices and book of reference are so entirely dependent on the plans, that it will be better to speak first of the preparation of the plans and sections.

A new practice has been introduced within the last few years by which it becomes necessary to prepare and deposit plans and books of reference, in all cases where lands and houses are required to be taken compulsorily, under the powers of first-class bills; so that, with the exception of the preparation of the section, which is purely the engineer's work, the same work has to be done in respect of all bills where lands and houses are required to be taken compulsorily.

The nature of the works having been once settled, the plan does not come immediately under the solicitor's notice, in the first instance, unless points are submitted to him by the engineer, until it is put into his hands for the purpose of taking the reference. Parliamentary engineers, under which name all, or almost all, London engineers of any importance are included, are fully acquainted with the details required by the standing orders of Parliament; but should any new order be passed in either House of Parliament, which affects the preparation of the engineering documents, the attention of the engineer should be immediately called to it. In order to relieve himself of all responsibility, it is not a bad plan for the solicitor to prepare and keep revised, from time to time, instructions to engineers and reference takers, as regards the preparation of parliamentary deposits.

It may here be stated, once for all, that where the reader is referred to any standing order, the reference will be indicated by brackets thus [H. C. 62] [H. L. 170]—these abbreviations being "House of Commons Standing Order, 62;" "House of Lords Standing Order, 170;" and when the practice in both Houses is similar, one reference only will be given.

It will always be found better to have the plans prepared on a scale not less than a quarter of an inch to every hundred feet, as, in all cases where plans are on a less scale than the last named [H. C. 43], it involves the necessity of making separate plans of all buildings, yards, court yards, or lands within the curtilage of any building, or any ground cultivated as a garden, either in the line of the proposed works, or included within the limits of deviation.

The plan must, in any event, be on a scale of not less than four inches to a mile, and must describe the lands intended to be taken; and, in case of bills of the second-class, must also describe the line and situation of the whole work (no alternative line or work being in any case permitted), and the lands in or through which it is to be made, maintained, varied, extended, or enlarged, or through which any communication to or from the work shall be made.

The plan must describe [H. C. 44] all brooks or streams which are intended to be diverted into any cut, canal, reservoir, aqueduct, or navigation, or into any variation, extension, or enlargement thereof; and in the case of railways, the distances measured from one of the termini must be marked on the plan in miles and furlongs, and a memorandum of the radius of every curve not exceeding one mile in length must be noted in furlongs and chains [H. C. 45]; and when tunnelling, as a substitute for open cutting, is intended, it must be marked by a dotted line on the plan. The only other point for immediate notice on the plan is the diversion of roads [H. C. 46]. It is necessary to mark upon the plan any diversion, widening or narrowing of any turnpike road, public carriage road, navigable river, canal, or railway.

The plan for a first-class bill differs from that of a second-class bill, inasmuch as it is simply required to be a ground plan of the space intended to be occupied, and the proposed works—such as a market, house, church, or other building—need not be shown in the same way as the line of works is required to be shown on the plan of a second-class bill.

The model of a plan and section are annexed to the standing orders of the House of Commons, and contain all the particulars necessary for the guidance of the engineers; but there are some points connected with the section to which it will be as well to call attention here [H. C. 48]. In the first place, the section must be drawn to the same scale as the plan, and to a vertical scale of not less than one inch to every hundred feet, and must show the surface of the ground marked on the plan, the intended level of the proposed work, and the height of every embankment, and depth of every cutting.

A datum horizontal line, which shall be the same throughout the whole of the work, or any branch thereof respectively, must be referred to some fixed point, stated in writing on the section, near some portion of such work; and in the case of any canal, cut, navigation, turnpike or other carriage road, or railway, near either of the termini. The datum line is simply an imaginary line by which the levels of the work can be tested. The only difficulty, or rather precaution, in fixing the datum point, is to be sure that there is nothing ambiguous in the description—for instance, a datum point described as 200 feet below the Weigh Bridge, in the town of Blank, would be bad, as the Weigh Bridge is a moveable thing; but 200 feet below the easternmost corner of the upper sill of the Weigh Bridge would be good. The datum point must be fixed and immoveable, and be so clearly defined that any one going on the ground with a copy of the plan and section would be able infallibly to pitch upon the precise spot with ordinary care. When it is possible, it is always well to refer to some fixed point in any known public building or thoroughfare—such as 200 feet below the key-stone of the centre arch of a public bridge, or the top of the lowest step of the principal entrance to the county gaol in Queen-street, Exeter.

In all bills for improving the navigation of rivers, the section must specify the level of both banks of the river; and if any alteration is intended therein, it must describe the same by feet, inches, and decimal parts of a foot [H. C. 49].

There are various special provisions as regards sections for a railway [H. C. 49 to 55 inclusive]. In every section for a railway, the line of rail marked thereon must correspond with the upper surface of the rails. The distances must be marked in miles and furlongs corresponding with those on the plan. The vertical measure from the datum line must be marked in feet and inches and decimal parts of a foot at each change of gradients, and the rate of inclination between each change of gradient must also be shown. The height of the railway over, or depth under, all turnpike or public carriage roads, navigable rivers, canals, and railways, and the height and space of all bridges and viaducts, must be marked in figures at every crossing. All level crossings of turnpike or public carriage roads, or railways must be marked: it must be also stated whether the level will be unaltered. If the water level of any canal, or the level of any turnpike, or public carriage road, or railway is intended to be altered, the extent of alteration must be stated on the section, and numbered; and cross sections numbered to correspond with that marked on the section must be prepared to a horizontal scale not less than one inch to every 330 feet, and to a vertical scale of not less than one inch to every forty feet. These cross sections must show by figures the present and intended rates of inclination of such roads and railways, as well as the present surface thereof, and the intended surface when altered. A cross section is also required when any public carriage road is crossed on the level. These cross sections must extend for two hundred yards on each side of the centre line of railway.

The height of embankments and depths of cutting exceeding five feet, and the extreme height over or depth under the surface of the ground, must be marked in figures upon the section; and if any bridge or viaduct of more than three arches intervenes in any embankment, or if any tunnel intervenes in any cutting, the extreme height or depth must be, in each instance, marked in figures. And, lastly, when tunnelling as a substitute for open cutting, or a viaduct as a substitute for an embankment, is intended, it must be marked on the section.

The foregoing details principally affect the engineer; but still it is the solicitor's duty to see to the general accuracy of the plans and sections—such as, the parish boundary being rightly delineated on the plans; that no public carriage roads are omitted; that the datum point is sufficient; and, in fact, that all the requirements of the standing orders are complied with. For accuracy of measurements, and all matters of that kind, he is, of course, dependent on the engineer; but, as will appear in the next paper, the solicitor is obliged to make himself so intimately acquainted with every yard of the ground proposed to be taken, that such a serious omission as the non-insertion of a cross section of a public road, or any other glaring mistake of a similar nature, would fall very heavily on his shoulders.

In the next paper it is proposed to treat of the book of reference, and the preparation and service of the parliamentary notices.

Money Market.

CITY, Friday Evening.

Considerable agitation has prevailed in the money market, and on the Stock Exchange during the present week. The English Funds have generally been variable with a downward tendency, but the market in the latter part of to-day has shown more firmness, and has closed with an advance of ¼ per cent. on the prices of yesterday, partly owing to the receipt of specie by the Atrato from the West Indies. The quotations of French 3 per cents. show a slight improvement. Other important foreign securities have been heavy, but without noticeable decline, except the Turkish 6 per cents. which have receded about ½ per cent. in the week. At the beginning of the week the demand for money was moderate, and very large arrivals of gold from Australia strengthened the market. Later, the application for loans is represented to have become urgent at from 6½ to 7 per cent.; to-day the demand is more moderate. The amount of Australian gold taken to the Bank of England in the course of this week is not less than £670,000. A further shipment of silver to India is being made by the Indus to sail on the 20th instant, said to amount to £600,000 or more. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 11th inst., which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,752,045, being an increase of £214,340, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £9,343,720, showing a decrease of £979,108 when compared with the previous return. This state of affairs shows the soundness of the policy which led the directors of the Bank of England to advance their rate of interest at the beginning of the present month. It appears that in the course of two weeks, the bullion in the Bank had decreased to the extent of £278,577, thereby reducing the stock to a lower sum than at any time since October, 1847. Previous to that memorable crisis, the rate of interest charged at the Bank had not exceeded 5½ per Cent. It has been said, that if a higher rate of interest had been charged in the Spring and Summer of 1847, the commercial disasters of the Autumn of that year would have been greatly mitigated. Whether this inference be correct or not, it may be safely maintained that the late advance of interest was judicious; and that without a favourable change in regard to money, and to a considerable extent, the present rate is more likely to advance than to go back.

It appears that the Bank of France has, at length, succeeded in making head against the drain of gold which, during many months, has been to its managers the cause of constant solicitude, and of a very large outlay of money. The premium paid by that establishment on the purchase of bullion is reduced, in consequence of which, it has become no longer profitable to send gold from London to Paris. During this week, a large amount in sovereigns has come to this country from France. This operation is encouraged by the high rate of interest which rules on this side. Parties engaged in discounting bills of exchange in this way obtain extended means, and thereby secure, in a larger degree, the profits accruing from the present high rate of discount. It will soon be seen whether the favourable change now announced in the affairs of the Bank of France is a reality, and whether the difficulties on this side have been caused so much as has been supposed by the measures of its managers in the purchase of bullion.

The price of grain continues firm, at last week's quotations. In the Corn Market, an opinion prevails that prices have reached their lowest point for some time to come. The importation of foreign wheat during the recent quarter of the year is about two-thirds the quantity imported in the corresponding quarter of the previous year, while the exportation has been larger. It appears that a falling market in grain, and on the other hand the high and advancing rates of money, have discouraged consignments to our markets. In Barley, the demand continues equal to the supply, notwithstanding the price is very high. The demand for distillation is likely to continue active so long as British Spirits are in request to the present extent on the continent. This continental requirement seems to have been produced by the short supply during several years of the native productions from which wine and brandy are manufactured. So long as this requirement continues our supply will not be deficient, and the demand for barley for distillation is likely to keep the price of that article high till the period of another harvest.

THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL.

LONDON, APRIL 25, 1857.

THE SOLICITOR'S TRUE INTEREST.

The Registration Report has now been a fortnight before our readers, and we have published, and hope still to continue publishing, communications which may tend to illustrate its proposals and their probable effect upon the profession. We shall also endeavour to select from the blue book which will be laid before Parliament on its meeting, such portions of the appendix as appear to us calculated to convey a clearer comprehension of the scheme. We are most desirous now to call forth discussion, both of the plan of registration itself and of the prospects of the solicitors under its operation, and our columns will always be open for the free examination of these most important subjects.

It may not be out of place at this moment to remind our readers of the origin of the inquiry which has lately resulted in this Report, and of the extreme probability which exists that, either with or without the concurrence of the body of solicitors, some serious attempt will soon be made to give effect to the recommendations which it contains. It must be remembered that the new Parliament will be deprived of every possible excuse for neglecting domestic legislation. Nobody, we suppose, will accuse the Government of any restless desire for innovation, either in real property or any other branch of law. But the Ministry will be watched in front and on either side by eager competitors for power, who will seize with avidity upon the initiative, wherever it is not from the first assumed by Government. How, under the continued chancellorship of Lord CRANWORTH, any real activity in law reform is possible, we do not pretend to understand; but we are, nevertheless, quite certain that the Cabinet must either bestir itself earnestly in this matter, or at no distant day give place to those who will. We print elsewhere an article from the Daily News, which may be supposed to speak the sentiments of many advanced Liberal politicians, and which enumerates the transfer of land as one of the subjects which must engage the attention of the Legislature. We have also lately drawn our readers' notice to a speech of Sir FITZROY KELLY, in which he stated that he had himself "matured a measure" for simplifying the practice of conveyancing. Mr. WALPOLE, it will be observed, was one of the most active members of the Commission which has produced the present Report. And besides politicians of established character, whom choice or necessity will impel to exertion in this matter, there is the ambition for notoriety, the appetite for business, and the election pledges of all the new members, urging them to activity in law reform.

We, therefore, entreat our readers to consider that some great change in the method of transferring land is certain to be proposed in Parliament, and that it is the true policy of the solicitors not to denounce and stand aloof from every such movement, but to lend to its originators the invaluable aid of their experience. Opinions may differ very widely as to the effect of Registration of Title upon the pecuniary interests of the solicitor, but there can be no doubt whatever that the social estimate of the profession would be greatly raised by its active co-operation in a measure vitally beneficial to society. We must not be understood as expressing any opinion now as to the merits of the proposed plan. But we may surely be allowed to assume that the present system of conveyancing is very far indeed from perfection, and that, by a hearty dedication of professional skill and knowledge to the task, very important improvements could be effected, and a great public service done. It was in the hope of accomplishing this object that the Commission undertook their labours. If they have thus far succeeded, it is the true policy of the profession to lend strenuous aid in the completion of the work; and if they have failed, it is no less the part of far-seeing sagacity to produce a more judicious scheme. That unpopularity of which lawyers sometimes, and not unreasonably, complain, may be enhanced or very much diminished by their conduct in this crisis. Let them raise themselves above a narrow personal view of this and of all similar questions. We can but repeat what we have said before, that professional and individual interests will be best promoted by whatever promotes the interest of the community at large; and this is the principle by which we shall try the present and all other measures proposed for the amendment of legal practice.

The imprudence of setting the profession in antagonism to the public is only equalled by that of dividing the profession within itself. The Registration Report will be read by many landowners, and it is impossible to deny that some of the conclusions contained in it have an air of probability, and will command a favourable consideration. They look like truth, and landowners will be ready to believe that they are true. If, therefore, the solicitors should be persuaded to throw themselves at once into unreasoning hostility to this plan, they could not but incur the suspicion of the public, and become a mark for the vituperation of the press. If it be the fact that this proposal opens a road to a simpler and cheaper transfer of land, can any solicitor persuade himself that the opposition of a class would avail to defeat the measure? We sometimes hear complaints that the auctioneer is better paid upon a sale of land than the solicitor, and without that reluctance which clients are apt to feel to the discharge of a lawyer's bill. It is part of the proposed scheme to redress this injustice by securing to the solicitor a commission upon the purchase-money of the estate sold. To attain this long-desired result, it is really only necessary that the profession should remain united, and urge upon Parliament its fair claims in their proper place—in subordination, that is, and not paramount to the general good. If we spoke with the tongues of angels, we should never persuade the public to pay with a good grace the conveyancing charges which are now customary. But if clients could only feel that they were paying for something of which they understood the use, a liberal remuneration for his trouble and responsibility would be accorded to the solicitor at least as cheerfully as to the auctioneer.

It is impossible to doubt that a deep feeling of dissatisfaction with the existing system of transferring land has long pervaded the public mind. We are not called upon now to decide how far the demand for change is reasonable, or to pronounce upon the merits of the various schemes which have been, and will again be, proposed to satisfy it. But this we say, and upon this we ground all our arguments, that something must be done—with the lawyers' aid, if they will give it; and if not, without their aid.

The question, therefore, for our readers is, whether they will lend their experience and skill to make the measure of reform as perfect as it can be made, or will they stand sullenly aside and allow an inevitable change to be brought about in spite of their resistance. No figures and no arguments will ever persuade the landowner that the present system of transferring land is anything else than an artificial and unnecessary complication, devised and maintained for the benefit of a class which he is disposed to distrust and to dislike. He will continue to believe, at least until the experiment has been tried, that land might be sold as expeditiously as stock, and that the charges upon the transfer of it would be most equitably assessed in the same way. It is vain for the solicitors to ignore or contend against this widely-spread opinion, but we do not apprehend that, if prudently and firmly met, the popular demand for reform will prove injurious to the profession.

THE LANGUAGE OF LEGISLATION.

The minutes of the evidence taken before the Select Committee on the Statute Law Commission have been printed by order of the House of Commons. A few more such commissions, and as many select committees on those commissions, and we shall expect to find our much-abused Statute Book—bulky and voluminous as it is—buried beneath a still greater mass of blue books and parliamentary papers, not much more lucid or intelligible than the enactments which they are intended to improve; while they have not the advantage which the statutes possess, of being necessary, in some shape or other, to the wellbeing of society. It is really becoming a question of the most serious importance, how much longer a work of such moment to the country at large, and of such imperative urgency, as the consolidation of our existing Statute Law, and the scientific arrangement and expression of our current legislation, is to be left in the hands of Mr. Bellenden Ker and his nominees. There is something hopeless, in taking up this new Report, to find the same names and the same nostrums as have been before the public, so little to its benefit or satisfaction, in connection with the same subject, for the last quarter of a century. It is about so long since Mr. Ker was appointed one of the Commissioners to inquire into the expediency of revising and consolidating the Statute Law. More than twenty years ago, he was the first witness examined before the Select Committee on Public Bills. Since then, he has been a paid Commissioner in all manner of commissions relating in any way to the subject: he is now, and has been for the last three years, the only paid member of the Statute Law Commission; and everybody knows the result, or rather the want of result, which has attended his most remunerative career of commissionerships. When we learned, therefore, that Mr. Ker was one of the wizards consulted and mainly relied upon by the Select Committee, we had not much expectation that the Report or the evidence would greatly enlighten our darkness. We are glad to find, however, that Mr. Henley and one or two other members of the Committee are fully alive to the real value of words, and are not disposed to accept mere euphemious phrases, which have titillated the fancies of two or three generations of members of Parliament, but have never served any other useful purpose. As containing some admirable specimens of cross-examination by non-professional persons, these minutes of evidence, if they prove of no higher utility, will not be without their use to the student of law. They are also interesting as giving us an insight into the manner in which the Lord Chancellor is wont to be advised as to proposed Government measures on their coming before the House of Lords. After Mr. Ker's curious explanations on that subject, one can hardly be surprised at the fate of the Chancellor's own measures of law reform during the present session. If we except these two or three little points of incidental interest, and Mr. Coode's evidence generally, the inquiries of the Committee do not much increase our stock of information as to the defects in the manner and language of current legislation, or as to the means which might be adopted for improving them.

From the time of Sir Edward Coke to the present day these defects have been admitted by laymen, and bitterly lamented by lawyers. They have been a prolific subject of satire to those foreign jurists who have condescended to notice English law. They are for the most part patent to all the world; and, therefore, it is not to much purpose, when persons who are supposed to be peculiarly fitted to suggest remedies are consulted, that they should do little else than go over the old ground of grievances, the existence of which nobody denies, and which these gentlemen were called in to remove, and not merely to describe.

The evils of our English system of making statutes may be classified as follows:—

1st. As to the language of our statutes.—There is a great difference of phraseology in different Acts of Parliament to express the same thing, and, what is worse, the language of all statutes, as a general rule, is unnecessarily verbose and involved, both of which evils lead to confusion and uncertainty in the law, and to a great accumulation of enactments that are designed to be merely explanatory and corrective of their predecessors.

2ndly. The absence generally of any attempt at a logical or intelligible arrangement of the subjects comprised in a bill or statute is next to be remarked. It would be easy to mention numerous illustrations of this characteristic of our legislation. We shall merely allude to one of recent date. In a bill which was brought before the House of Commons not long ago by an honourable and learned member, the object of which was the appointment of public prosecutors, it was not considered improper to include a clause by which it was proposed to make it a statutable offence for a servant to steal his master's corn for the purpose of feeding the master's horse. We remember somewhere to have seen a reference to an old statute which still more absurdly commenced by enacting something relating to the admission of attorneys, and finished by prohibiting the importation of horned cattle. Every lawyer can call to mind some ridiculous instance of the same kind.

3rdly. Bills are sometimes framed and passed into laws without much care on the part of the framer or inquiry by the Legislature as to the extent or manner of their interference with existing law. The lamentable case of the British Bank litigation will occur at once to our readers, if proof were needed of what everybody will admit.

5thly. Assuming all these sources of error to be removed, and that every bill, when it is laid upon the table of the House, is accurate and intelligible in its language; that it is logical in its arrangement, and drawn with a perfect knowledge of existing law, as well as with a due regard to its operation on statutes actually in force; it is obvious that in its passage through the two Houses of Parliament many alterations are likely to be made, sometimes hastily and crudely, which must seriously detract from its original merits. Hardly a session passes which does not afford some curious illustrations on this head.

6thly. Considerable embarrassment is sometimes produced by a want of proper attention to the differences between the laws and forms of procedure in Scotland and Ireland, and in England; nor is sufficient care always bestowed in providing that statutes not intended to operate in some parts of the United Kingdom should not have such an effect.

These are some of the principal defects in the mode and form of our legislation, which it is now sought to remedy. In a future number we propose to discuss the various suggestions which have been thrown out to meet the difficulty. It is impossible to overrate the importance of the subject, especially when we bear in mind that all attempts at the codification or consolidation of our existing Statute Law must be comparatively useless, so long as we go on adding every session a heap of ill-drawn statutes, with all the defects of those which we have with so much labour and expense consolidated or reduced into a less objectionable form than that in which they originally obtained the sanction of the Legislature.

IMMINENT LAW REFORMS.

(From the Daily News).

One of the best tests of the practical working power of the new House of Commons will be its ability to deal with those questions of law reform left unsettled by its predecessor. It may not be amiss to give a rapid sketch of some of the more important measures of this kind which are now awaiting the decision of Parliament.

There is, first, the creation of a Department of Public Justice. We give this plan the precedence, as upon the adoption of a wise policy in this respect must principally depend the possibility of a systematic and comprehensive prosecution of Law Reform by the British Legislature. The value of such a department consists mainly in this, that its head would be responsible for preparing and conducting through Parliament those various measures of law amendment which the progress of intelligence and the changes of society imperatively require, and which the existing law functionaries of the Crown, even if they had the will, have not the time to take charge of. A more convincing proof of the necessity for such a functionary can scarcely be conceived than that furnished by the evidence recently taken before the Committee for inquiring into the "Manner and language of Current Legislation." The great difficulty that met this Committee at every turn was how to find a fitting medium of communication between the House and the functionary appointed to revise and classify the public bills of the session. With the introduction of a Department of Public Justice all such difficulty would cease. The two great and important works of revising the language of current legislation, and of expurgating, classifying, and consolidating the Statutes embodying past legislation, would go on concurrently under separate officers, with appropriate staffs of assistants, in the one office of the Minister of Public Justice, who would himself be the medium of communicating the results of their combined labours to the House. The last House of Commons carried an address to the Queen for the creation of a Department of Public Justice: it rests with the new House to follow up their work.

Turning from the constitution of a department charged to watch over the administration and amendment of the law, to the particular measures of Law Reform likely to be brought up for discussion before the new Parliament, we find that many of them involve considerations of the gravest importance, deeply affecting the social and economical interests of the country.

The proposed changes in the Law of Divorce, and in the law regulating the Property of Married Women, will effect, if carried out in a liberal and enlightened spirit, a vast alteration for the better in the legal relations of husband and wife. The Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill of last session will, indeed, require considerable modification before it can be accepted as an adequate remedy for the existing evils. The abolition of the action of crim. con., and of the rule excluding the testimony of the wife, must form part of any measure on this subject intended to be satisfactory. The establishment of an effective Registration of Titles to Land, on the principles developed in the admirable Report to which we have recently had occasion more than once to refer, would work a vast improvement in the laws of land. Without in the slightest degree infringing on the secrecy or security of titles, such a measure would emancipate the owners of the soil from the onerous necessity of submitting to a fresh investigation of their rights of property on every fresh occasion of transfer, and would render dealings in land as facile, as inexpensive, and as safe as dealings in the public funds. While the landed gentry would thus be freed from one of the most grievous of the peculiar burdens now pressing on land, the community at large would benefit in at least an equal degree. The investment of capital in the soil would be encouraged and promoted. The multiplicity of land sales and land pledges would more than make up to the lawyers for what they would lose by the abolition of the present cumbrous system of conveyancing. A fair per-centage commission on land transfers will pay them better and more satisfactorily than the present method of remuneration by skins and folios, by the number of useless steps they can contrive to take, and of useless words they can contrive to darken counsel withal.

Next, probably, in importance to these modifications of the laws affecting Marriage and Land are those relating to the jurisdiction over Wills of personalty. In what form the Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill may be presented to the new Parliament it is impossible to say. We may, at all events, be allowed to hope that the measure which last session called forth such unanimous disapprobation from all the eminent lawyers in the Upper House will never again be submitted to the Legislature. On this matter Parliament has a right to demand from the law officers of Lord Palmerston's Government a practical working measure, not such a legislative abortion as that which earned for Lord Cranworth so unenviable a notoriety in the last Parliament.

Passing from the department of Civil to that of Criminal Law, the questions pending for decision, both as to the administration of the law and its substantive provisions, are of an importance that it is difficult to over-estimate. Of alterations in the substance of the criminal law, the most material is that which proposes to make Breaches of Trust the subject not of civil redress only but of penal retribution: an alteration which has long been imperatively required, and which, as recent notorious instances of mercantile profligacy prove, can no longer be delayed without the gravest reproach to our whole system of jurisprudence. Among the changes in the administration of the criminal law, the institution of Public Prosecutors and the introduction of more available methods for the detection and investigation of crime, will probably again be brought before the attention of Parliament. A far more momentous and more difficult class of questions in connection with the subject of Penal Discipline will undoubtedly occupy their attention. Discussions on the amendment of the Penal Servitude Act, on the continuance or discontinuance, the extension or abridgement of Transportation, will open up again the whole wide question of secondary punishment. The cessation of the ticket-of-leave panic will facillitate the discussion of this question in a calmer and more philosophical spirit than was possible when it was last before Parliament; and we shall hope to see that the new House will not, at all events, fall short of the old, in the statesmanlike temper so essential for wise deliberation on questions entirely remote from party politics, and intimately affecting the most important interests of the community. As a branch of the same great subject, the reformatory treatment of juvenile criminals will, of course, claim its share in the attention of the new House. Our recently elected legislators will find full employment for the best exertion of their highest faculties in accurately drawing the line between that treatment of criminal and vagrant children which the interests of humanity and civilization demand, and that which confers upon offending or predatory poverty, education and care which are denied to the pauper child who has never qualified himself for reformatory or industrial schools by street vagrancy or petty crime. Such is a rapid outline of some of the more prominent measures of social reform more or less connected with the amendment of the law which await the consideration of the new Parliament. It may be that before the House meets we may take the opportunity of recurring more in detail to one or two of the number.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE IN NEW YORK.

Court of Special Sessions—March 21.

Before Judge A. D. Russell.

The court-room was crowded to its utmost capacity this morning with prisoners, witnesses and spectators, and by looking at the culprit's box one would imagine that it would be impossible for even our efficient and discriminating City Judge to give them a fair and impartial trial if he were to preside on the bench till a late hour in the day; but before noon the destiny of most of them was determined, for the coming summer at least. Indeed, if Judge Russell were to allow each witness to spin out a long yarn preparatory to what they know about the matter under investigation, and if he would permit the crowd of petti-foggers who infest the Tombs, and who used to make the walls of this criminal asylum echo their grandiloquent speeches, previous to his elevation to the bench, he would be compelled to sit till midnight. A striking instance of this fact occurred this morning, when the first case was called on. Henry Cone and Robert Lipsey, two young men, were charged with stealing a silver watch, valued at 25 dols., the property of Thomas G. Bennett.

"I appear for Cone, may it please your Honour," said an ambitious disciple of Story, with an unexceptionable moustache. —"I represent Mr. Lipsey, may it please the court," observed another aspirant for legal fame.—Here a dyspeptic old gentleman, who, to all appearance, was one of the water-cure and cracked-wheat disciples, approached the bench, with measured steps, and informed the judge that he was there on that momentous occasion to protect the rights of the complainant.—"I have a word to say," said one of the counsel, "before the case proceeds."—"Say it, sir," responded the judge, in a tone which threw cold water on his hopes of creating a sensation by an elaborate opening.—"We will make it appear, your Honour, that this complainant was so drunk that he mistook a lamp-post for an intimate friend."—"Call up your witness, and stop your speechifying here," shouted the judge peremptorily.—He listened patiently to the evidence for a moment or two, and with remarkable intuition, which seems to be his distinguishing characteristic, perceived that it was insufficient to convict the accused, and said, "I find him not guilty."—At this juncture of the trial the vegetarianish looking advocate mildly addressed the bench, saying "that the story of his client was perfectly truthful."—"I don't want to hear you at all; boys go."—The mother of the young man who lost his watch endeavoured in vain to speak with the judge, and the friends of the party left the court.—New York Herald.

It may be said, indeed, that, with us, cases are tried before a jury of reporters, who do the labour which the law imposes on a regularly empannelled petty jury. Nor does the peculiarity stop here. The vivacity of our people, the unparalleled publicity in which we live, and the intense interest taken in important trials, make us, one and all, parties in leading cases, and more than speculators of the result. We take sides, and discuss them with the earnestness of interested parties. We raise all kinds of side issues in the press and in society, and fight them out before we come to the real issue. A great law case in New York at the present day appears to be a matter of life and death to half the population. Look for instance at the Burdell murder case. Mr. Eckel and Mrs. Cunningham are going to be tried on a charge of murdering Doctor Burdell. Nothing more simple, at the outset, than the main issue—did they kill him or no? But before we can get to that, a thousand minor issues must apparently be adjusted. If we go on at this rate, our trials will come to be more popular elections than judicial proceedings. When the press is discussing the principal and collateral issues of a leading case, every morning in the week, and every newspaper takes a side, it is utterly ridiculous to expect that the public can remain a dispassionate spectator of the scene. The people will take sides, too; will cling to them with the force of prejudice and passion; and will feel a personal concern in the result. The jury will be partisans before they enter and while they occupy the jury box. A trial like that of the persons accused of murdering Doctor Burdell, will be far more like our fall elections than an event in the administration of justice.—New York Herald.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

(Sittings at Nisi Prius before Mr. Baron Watson, and a Common Jury.)

April 18th.—Bastick v. Tullitt.

Agreement—Penalty—Liquidated Damages—Fresh Agreement enlarging Time for Performance—Stamp.

Where an agreement for the performance of several matters stipulates that in default of either of the parties duly performing every part of the agreement the party making default shall pay the other a sum specified, and it is not expressly provided that such sum shall be regarded as liquidated damages, it is to be construed as a penalty. An unstamped agreement, enlarging the time for performance of another agreement previously entered into, the subject-matter whereof was of the value of £20, and which was duly stamped, was admitted in evidence; but quære whether, inasmuch as it amounted to a fresh agreement, the admission of it without a stamp was right?

This was an action upon an agreement, entered into between the plaintiff and defendant, for the sale of the good-will, stock, and fixtures of a public-house. The agreement contained a provision, that, in default of either of the parties duly performing every part of the agreement, the party making default should pay to the other who should be willing to complete the same "the full sum of £50."

It was stipulated that the contract was to be completely performed by a certain day; but the time for performance was subsequently enlarged by the following memorandum signed by the parties, and endorsed upon the original:—"Memorandum. We, the undersigned, mutually consent for this agreement to stand over till Thursday, Dec. 18th, 1856." The original agreement was duly stamped; but the memorandum enlarging the time for performance was not stamped.

Upon these facts two points of law arose during the trial. 1st. The counsel for the plaintiff submitted, that, the defendant having made default, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the entire sum of £50, as liquidated damages.

Mr. Baron Watson held that the sum specified was to be treated as a penalty only, and said it was a general rule, that, where an agreement provides that several things shall be done, and contains a provision that in the event of default in performance of any of them, the party making default shall pay the other a sum of money—unless the agreement expressly provides that such sum shall be regarded as liquidated damages—it is to be treated as a penalty. But this rule does not apply where the agreement is for the performance of one thing only.

2ndly. The plaintiff's counsel submitted that the memorandum of agreement enlarging the time was admissible in evidence without a stamp—that, although the subject-matter of the original agreement was of the value of £20, and although the memorandum amounted to a fresh agreement, the subject-matter of this fresh agreement was not of the value of £20 within the meaning of the Stamp Act (Bacon v. Simpson, 3 M. & W. 78; Hill v. Ram, 5 M. & G. 789).

Mr. Baron Watson said he was of opinion that the memorandum was inadmissible. The first agreement was entirely at an end; and Goss v Lord Nugent (5 B. & Ad. 56) showed that an agreement enlarging the time of performance is a new agreement. His opinion, therefore, was that it required a stamp.

His Lordship then went to consult one of the other judges, and on his return said, his learned Brother thought the question was one of considerable doubt, and it would, therefore, be better to admit the evidence. The unstamped memorandum was accordingly admitted.

The action was ultimately settled by the plaintiff agreeing to accept a verdict for £20 and one shilling, each party to pay his own costs.

Mr. Prideaux was counsel for the plaintiff. Mr. Hawkins for the defendant.

Coroner's Charges.—Court of Queen's Bench, April 20.—The Queen v. The Justices of Gloucestershire.—Sir F. Thesiger moved for a rule to show cause why a mandamus should not issue to the justices of Gloucestershire, commanding them to order payment of certain fees and allowances to Mr. Gaisford, one of the coroners for the county. The present application had been rendered necessary by the circumstance that coroners were obstructed in the performance of their duty by the narrow view taken by the magistrates of that duty, and their disposition to disallow the costs of holding inquests except in a limited class of cases.—Lord Campbell said that in many cases, he believed, the magistrates had rendered great service in checking the abuse of coroners in holding inquests where there was no pretence for their so doing.—Sir F. Thesiger said, the magistrates appeared to have laid down a rule, that where the jury found that the person had died by the visitation of God, or by accident, the coroner was not entitled to hold an inquest, and that his charges in such cases ought to be disallowed. The chairman of the Gloucestershire Quarter Sessions had published a pamphlet, in which he had laid down the rule, that unless there was violence, either known or suspected, and in cases where the jury found that the party died by the visitation of God, or by accident, the coroner was not entitled to hold an inquest.—Lord Campbell said, it could not be laid down as a general rule, that, where the jury found that the party died by the visitation of God, the expenses ought to be disallowed.—Mr. Justice Erle observed, that he had been officially spoken to on circuit by magistrates to know in what way they could check the growing evil of coroners improperly holding inquests.—Lord Campbell said that in some instances the feelings of relatives were very improperly outraged.—Sir F. Thesiger was aware that that was the case, but at the same time he contended that when coroners properly discharged their duties they ought to be supported. In one of the cases upon which application was now made to the court, a woman aged sixty was found lying dead upon the floor. She had not been attended by any medical man, and she had not been subject to any known disease. The coroner had travelled sixteen miles to where the body was lying, and held an inquest, and the jury found that the party died "by the visitation of God." In another case he received notice from a police-officer that a child sixteen months old had been scalded to death. He travelled eleven miles to hold an inquest, and the jury found that the child had died by an "accidental scalding." The account of the expense of holding these inquests was laid before the quarter sessions, and taken into consideration at an adjournment, when the magistrates allowed the coroner the disbursements made by him in holding the two inquests, but they disallowed the coroner's fee of £1, to which he was entitled under the 25th of Geo. 3, cap. 29, and a further fee of 6s. 8d. to which he was entitled under the 1 Vict. c. 68. It was contended that by allowing the disbursments the magistrates admitted that the inquest was properly held, and that the coroner was entitled to his fees. The learned counsel read a passage from the chairman's pamphlet, in which he laid down the rule that the mere fact of a sudden death was not sufficient for holding an inquest; there must also be a "known or reasonable suspicion of violence."—Mr. Justice Erle said, he thought that was very nearly a true rule.—Sir F. Thesiger said, that, while it was of importance to check the holding of improper inquests, it was also desirable that the duties of the coroner should not be interfered with, and he hoped the court would grant the writ in order that the question might be discussed.—Lord Campbell said, it was desirable that a rule should be laid down for the protection of coroners as well as the ratepayers of the county, and for that purpose the learned counsel might take a rule to show cause.—Rule nisi granted.

At the Bath quarter sessions, held on Thursday week, not a single barrister was retained to defend any of the prisoners. The number of barristers present was greater than the number of cases to be disposed of, consequently the briefs for the prosecution did not give them one each.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

TRUSTEE—STOP ORDER—NOTICE.

Elder v. Maclean.

A stop order is analogous to notice to a trustee or the holder of a fund; and though as between the assignor and assignee of a fund in court, it cannot be considered that a stop order is, in any way, necessary to complete the title of the assignee—except, perhaps, in some cases where the question of "order and disposition" arises under the bankruptcy of the assignor; yet it is always necessary in cases where it would have been imperative to have given notice to trustees, if the fund had been in their hands instead of the court's. The principal object, both of a stop order and of notice, is to prevent fraud on the part of the assignor; and to save persons other than the first incumbrancer from dealing with the fund, ignorant of a prior charge. In cases where the trustee himself advanced money to his cestui que trust, and had taken an equitable assignment, it has been held that it was not necessary to give notice to anybody else, or to substitute anything for notice to the trustee, inasmuch as the object of notice was effectually attained, the trustee having all the information which he could possibly get from formal notice; and it might be presumed that he would have no interest to conceal his own incumbrance from any person proposing to advance money on the security of the fund, who applied to him for information as to previous incumbrances. In Elder v. Maclean, 5 W. R. 447, after a trust fund came into court, and while it was in the name of the Accountant-General in trust in the cause, the plaintiff, who was the sole trustee of the fund, made an advance to one of his beneficiaries, on an agreement to charge his share, which was done, and the question was, whether it was necessary for the trustee plaintiff to obtain a stop order to maintain his priority, as it would have been, without any doubt, if he had not been a trustee or a party to the suit? V. C. Kindersley answered this question in the affirmative, upon the ground, that, when once the fund had been paid into court, the court became the trustee of it, and a stop order only would have the same effect as notice to the trustee before it had been paid in. "It might be said," observed his Honour, "if a party to a suit took an assignment on the share of a beneficiary, and applied for a stop order, the fund could not be parted with without his knowledge, because he was a party to the suit; but still the stop order would be granted, not merely that the fund might not be parted with without notice, but that the person who was intending or proposing to advance money might inquire whether there was a stop order, and therefore the trustee could not be absolved from the necessity of obtaining a stop order on account of his trusteeship, or of his being a party."

HUSBAND AND WIFE — CREDITOR — SETTLEMENT — STATUTE OF FRAUDS—PART PERFORMANCE.

Warden v. Jones.

It has long been settled that a parol contract in consideration of marriage, followed only by marriage, will not be carried into effect; marriage being held no part performance of the contract so as to preclude the operation of the Statute. The reason, or rather the necessity, of this doctrine is obvious. The Statute avoids all parol contracts founded on the consideration of marriage. If marriage were held a sufficient part performance to take the case out of the statute, no case would be within it, and there would be an end to the Statute altogether so far as marriage contracts are concerned. The exception, in fact, would be co-extensive with the rule, and every parol marriage contract would of necessity be binding. The objection which exists to holding marriage itself a part performance of a parol contract, does not apply where other acts besides that of marriage are relied on to constitute the part performance. For example, in Dundas v. Dutens (1 Ves. 196), it was strongly intimated by Lord Thurlow that a parol ante-nuptial contract, followed by a post-nuptial settlement in pursuance of it, was not avoided by the Statute of Frauds; and that the execution of such a settlement might even be enforced in a suit for specific performance. The later cases were considered by the Master of the Rolls to have upset this doctrine; and he accordingly decided, in Warden v. Jones (5 W. R. 446), that, where a contract to settle the wife's personalty had been entered into verbally before marriage, and duly executed by a settlement made shortly after the marriage, the settlement was not helped by the consideration of the previous contract, and was voluntary and void against the husband's creditors. The principal authorities on the point are Hammersley v. De Biel (12 Cl. & Fin. 45), Lassence v. Tierney (1 Mac. & G. 551), and Surcombe v. Pinniger (3 De G. M. & G. 571). Hammersley v. De Biel was a case where the lady's father agreed by parol with the husband to make a certain provision for his daughter if the husband would settle an annuity of £500 a-year. The husband did so, and it was held that this was a part performance, and took the case out of the Statute. In Lassence v. Tierney there was a parol contract before marriage, relating to the wife's real estate. After marriage, a deed intended to carry out the contract was executed, but never acknowledged by the wife. It, therefore, had no operation on her real estate; and Lord Cottenham accordingly held that there was no part performance of the parol agreement. "There was nothing," he said, "but a parol contract before marriage, and nothing but marriage following, and that would not support the contract." Surcombe v. Pinniger was a case before the Lords Justices, where a father told the intended husband, shortly before the marriage, that he would give to the couple certain leasehold property. After the marriage, he allowed his son-in-law to enter into possession, and to expend money on the improvement of the property. This was held a sufficient part performance, L. J. Turner observing that the case presented what was wanting in Lassence v. Tierney, namely, acts of part performance, besides the marriage; and adding, that it had been held in many cases, that, if there be a written agreement after marriage, in pursuance of a parol agreement before marriage, this takes the case out of the statute, and so does part performance.

The Master of the Rolls, in the present case, considered that it was essential, in order to constitute a part performance, that the acts should be done in pursuance of an agreement, to which some other person besides the husband and wife was a party. This was the case in both the authorities which we have mentioned, and it has now been laid down that no act whatever can constitute an effectual part performance of a parol marriage contract, to which no one besides the intending husband and wife has been a party.

NEXT FRIEND—DISENTAILMENT BY LUNATIC.

Elliott v. Ince.

This case, reported 5 W. R. 465, contained a new point of practice—namely, that a defendant and respondent, having no adverse interest, may be next friend to a married woman, who is a defendant and appellant. This seems on principle to apply to the case of a plaintiff, a married woman, naming a defendant as next friend; but the practice of the Record and Writ Clerks' Office is still to refuse to file a bill so framed. The main question in the cause was, whether acts of disentailment of copyholds, done under the power of attorney of a lunatic, could be upheld after a long interval, during which the lunatic had died. The old rule seems to have been, that all such acts done by a lunatic, whether as part of a bargain or without consideration, were absolutely void, though, by a legal fiction, a recovery suffered by a lunatic in person was good, because it was assumed to be impossible that a judicial proceeding could have been allowed to go on if the parties were insane. A new doctrine has grown up of late years, and it is now settled that, bonâ fide dealings with a lunatic, by way of bargain or sale, without notice of the lunacy, will not be disturbed. In the present case the lunatic, Mrs. Cumming, executed the power of attorney merely for the purpose of barring the estate tail, and not in pursuance of any contract; and though it was contended that the acts would be treated as voidable only, and not void, as suggested by Lord Truro, in Price v. Berrington, 3 Mac. & G. 486, the Lord Chancellor held that the doctrine had no application, except in cases of contract, and declared the attempted disentailment void, subject, however, to the result of an issue to try the fact of the lunacy at the period in question.

Cases at Common Law specially Interesting to Attorneys.

Wootton v. Dawkins, 5 W. R., Q. B., 469.

The right which the owner of land has to protect his property against the intrusion of others was, by the common law, almost unlimited. But its existence to this extent being found liable to abuse, the 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 18 was passed, by which it was made a misdemeanour to set "any spring-gun, man-trap, or other engine calculated to destroy human life, or inflict grievous bodily harm upon trespassers or others coming in contact therewith," with a proviso, however, as to gins or traps set to destroy vermin, and as to spring guns and other engines set in dwelling houses from sunset to sunrise.

The leading cases upon the subject of injuring trespassers by spring-guns or similar engines are, Ilot v. Wilks (3 B. & Ad. 308), Deane v. Clayton (7 Taunt. 518), and Bird v. Holbrook (4 Bing. 628), all before the date of the above statute; and these decisions so far define the common-law right above alluded to, as to establish that one who, without notice, sets such engine and injures a trespasser, makes himself liable to an action; and in one of the very few cases in which an action for an injury caused by an engine of this kind has been brought since the above statute—viz. Jorden v. Crump, (8 Mee. & W. 782), the dog of the plaintiff only, and not himself, was injured. The case above noticed of Wootton v. Dawkins, is the first, it is apprehended, in which the Statute of George 4 has received any judicial construction. It appeared by the evidence at the trial, that a fowl of the plaintiff having strayed from his premises, and the plaintiff having reason to believe it had wandered into the garden of the defendant, close by, he went in the day time with the defendant and saw it there, but they were unable to catch it. On the following night, about nine o'clock, when it was dark, he climbed, without the defendant's knowledge or permission, into the garden, with the view of catching the fowl, and while stooping under a bush, he came in contact with a wire, which caused a detonating machine to explode, with a loud noise, so as to knock him down, and injure his eyes and hand. No other evidence was given as to the nature of the instrument, or that it was calculated to destroy life, or inflict grievous bodily harm. On this ground, Wightman, J., at the trial, nonsuited the plaintiff; and a rule nisi to enter the verdict for him, notwithstanding, was refused by the Court of Queen's Bench—Erle, J., saying, that there is nothing either at common law, or by the statute, to prevent a man using any instrument calculated to create alarm, provided it is not by an engine dangerous to life or limb.

ATTORNEY'S CLERK—ATTENDING TAXATION BY—SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT SIGNED ON A JUDGE'S ORDER.

Perkins v. The National Assurance and Investment Association, 5 W. R., Exch., 470.

This was an application, on the part of the plaintiff, for a rule to show cause why an order of Mr. Justice Coleridge, setting aside the judgment signed by the plaintiff, should not be rescinded. The order was made under the following circumstances:—On the 24th of March, 1856, an order by consent was made for a stay of proceedings in the above action, on payment of a certain sum by the defendant, and costs to be taxed; on default, judgment to be signed. On the same day on which this order was made the plaintiff served the attorney of the defendant with an appointment to tax for the following day. Accordingly, on that day (March 25), the plaintiff's attorney attended the taxation in person; his costs were taxed, and the Master gave his allocatur for the amount. The taxation was attended by a clerk of the defendant's attorney; and after the allocatur was made, the plaintiff's attorney demanded from such clerk the amount of the sum mentioned in the order, and of the costs allocated; and, on his saying he had not the money with him, signed judgment in the action on the same day, and on the day following issued execution thereon. Mr. Justice Coleridge made the order setting aside such judgment, on the ground that sufficient time for payment of the debt and costs had not been allowed after taxation. It was now argued that the person attending the taxation in such a case ought to be prepared with the money; but the Court said that it was not reasonable to expect that an attorney's clerk, attending to tax the costs, should have in his pocket the exact amount of the debt, together with any costs that might be allowed on taxation. They therefore refused the application; but they declined to lay down any general rule as to the time when judgment might be signed under such circumstances as those above mentioned.

Hence it would seem that applications of this nature must depend upon the special circumstances of the case. Probably the cases in which judgment signed in default of a plea has been set aside on an affidavit of merits, are those which are most likely to afford a useful analogy. Such a case, for example, as that which is reported in 4 Taunt. 885, where the court refused to interfere in favour of the defendant, though he had a good legal defence to the action, because he had refused a liberal offer which had been made to him by the plaintiff before action brought.

MILEAGE—SHERIFF'S OFFICER, RULE AGAINST.

Gill & others v. Jose, 6 Ell & Bl. 718.

A rule had been obtained in the Queen's Bench calling upon J. S., an officer of the Sheriff of Cornwall, who had executed a fi. fa. in the above case, to show cause why an attachment should not issue against him for taking and demanding certain fees not allowed by law. J. S. had charged one shilling a mile as mileage, whereas, by the table of fees sanctioned by the judges under 7 W. 4 & 1 Vict, c. 55, the mileage chargeable is only 6d. per mile. It was, however, admitted that in Cornwall the practice had been to allow one shilling a mile, and, consequently, the court, in making the rule absolute, observed that no great blame could be thrown upon the officer as for a mala praxis; and directed the attachment not to issue, if, in the course of a week, the excess of mileage should be repaid, together with the costs of the application.

It may be remarked, that, before the above Statute, the practice was to call upon the sheriff alone to refund the excess. The effect of the Act is, to allow the officer to be called upon to answer for his contempt; but, from the case of Blake v. Newburn (5 D. & L. 601), the regular course would seem to be, to join in one rule an application that the sheriff should refund, and that the officer should answer. In the application above noticed, the sheriff does not appear to have been included.

BREACH OF CONDITION IN ORDER MADE A RULE OF COURT—REMEDY FOR.

Bayntun v. Bayntun, 1 C. B., N. S., 220.

In this case an application was made to rescind a rule of court which a judge's order by consent had been made, on the ground that the terms of the rule had not been complied with. But the court intimated that this could not be done, and that the only course was to enforce the performance of the rule in the usual manner—i. e., by attachment, or by execution, if a rule for the payment of money.

EVIDENCE, PROCURING—MANDAMUS UNDER 13 GEO. 3, c. 63.

Kelsall v. Marshall, 1 C. B., N. S., 266.

In this case (which turned on the construction of an act of council of India enabling the Union Bank of Calcutta to sue and be sued in the name of their secretary or treasurer) a rule nisi had been obtained for a writ in the nature of a mandamus under 13 Geo. 3, c. 63, s. 44, for the examination of witnesses on the part of the plaintiff before the supreme court of judicature in Bengal. An action having been brought by a creditor against the secretary of the bank, both the declaration and the pleas had been demurred to, and the above rule was obtained before such demurrers had been argued. The Court now held that the rule had, notwithstanding, been moved for at the proper time, and made it absolute.

It may be remarked that an application for a mandamus under the above provision is one of the few which must be made to the Court, and cannot be entertained at chambers (Clark v. East India Company, 6 D. &. L. 278); and that the application must always be for a rule nisi (Doe d. Grimes v. Pattison, 3 D. P. C. 85).

INNKEEPERS—EXTENT OF THEIR LIEN.

Snead v. Watkins, 1 C. B., N. S., 267.

In the case of Broadwood v. Grenara (10 Exch. 417), the Court of Exchequer examined into the nature of an innkeeper's lien upon goods brought into his house by his guests, and they held that such lien did not extend to a pianoforte, lent to a professional pianist there commorant, when the innkeeper knew the instrument was the property of the lender, and continued to give credit, notwithstanding. In the above case it was attempted to exclude the innkeeper's lien from all goods which, in point of fact, belonged to a third person, however introduced into the inn. It was an action by an attorney for the conversion of a blue bag and letter-book belonging to him which had been brought into the inn of the defendant by one H., a witness for the plaintiff in an action in which he was engaged, and formerly his clerk, and which H. had left behind him in the inn on leaving it with his bill unpaid, though he had been provided with proper money by the plaintiff to meet such charges. The Judges of the Court of Common Pleas all held that the fact of the bag being brought by H. to the house of the defendant in the ordinary way, with some things of his own in it, distinguished it very materially from the above-mentioned case of Broadwood v. Grenara; and, without hearing counsel, gave judgment in favour of the innkeeper.

INTERROGATORIES UNDER THE COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACT, 1854.

Bird v. ——, 1 C. B., N. S., 308.

In this action (which was for not delivering, according to contract, iron shipped by the defendant for the purpose of being conveyed for the plaintiff to the Baltic) the defendant sought to deliver interrogatories, under the 51st section of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, to the plaintiff in order to ascertain certain facts which he could, in all probability, have obtained from his own agents—viz. the masters of the vessels in which the iron had been shipped. And, as it did not appear that any steps had been taken to obtain such information from these sources, but that the object of the application was rather to obtain a knowledge of the plaintiff's evidence than anything else, the Court refused to entertain it.

Mr. SHAEN read the following Report:—

The twenty-third of the Company's Articles of Association provides that a General Meeting of the Proprietary shall be held at some period within twelve months from the date of its incorporation, but the Provisional Directors were desirous to make their Report to the shareholders, and ascertain their views as soon as the progress of the undertaking would allow, and the present meeting has accordingly been convened.

No notice of any intended motion has been received, and the business of the meeting will therefore be confined (in accordance with Article 30) to the matters contained in the circular lately issued, a copy of which has been sent to every shareholder.

The Directors proceed to give a sketch of their proceedings from the formation of the Company, and to show its present position and prospects.

The undertaking was engaged in because of a very general feeling among the more active members of the profession throughout the kingdom—a feeling which the Directors have frequently expressed—that the great objects of uniting its scattered members in a common cause of action, raising its tone and character, and vindicating the claims of the attorneys and solicitors of England to occupy a place in public estimation not inferior to that of the practitioners in any other profession, would never be fully secured until the body had made for itself a voice in the press of the country—until it possessed an organ distinctively representing the profession, and conducted with the single view of promoting these ends without reference to mere pecuniary results.

Having met with a cordial assent to these views in various parts of the country, and the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1855, offering the means of practically testing them in a way which would involve but little individual risk to those who might be disposed to co-operate with them, the promoters resolved to assume the responsibility of forming a Company on the footing of limited liability to carry out the objects they had in view.

Accordingly, in May, 1856, three of the present Directors, at the request of a Committee of upwards of twenty town and country solicitors, which had been formed at Birmingham in October, 1855, registered a Law Newspaper Company Limited in their own names.

Various circumstances, however, including the unsettled state of the Law of Limited Liability, retarded the progress of the Company until the meeting of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association at Liverpool in October last. Many solicitors from various parts of the country attended that meeting, and took the opportunity to urge the Directors to proceed without further loss of time. The Directors therefore resolved to commence the work at once, and a memorandum of association was accordingly prepared and signed at Liverpool under the provisions of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856 (which had been passed in the meantime), by seven gentlemen, of whom five were provincial and two were London practitioners. As this memorandum was not accompanied by any articles of association, it was afterwards found convenient to substitute for it another, which was signed by the seven gentlemen who now appear as the first registered shareholders of the Company. Only two of these happened to have also signed the memorandum prepared at Liverpool, though all of them were members of the Provisional Committee formed in 1855.

The scheme was no sooner placed before the profession than numerous applications for shares were received, and in a short time they exceeded by several hundred the number at the disposal of the Directors. The Directors consequently resolved not to allot more than five shares to any applicant, and they have now formed a Company consisting of eighty-one London and ninety-three country solicitors, including members of many of the largest professional houses in town and country, while they have twenty-three shares still unallotted, which they trust will be so disposed of as still further to add to the influence which they are confident the Company must eventually exercise.

In order to avoid adding to the number of legal periodicals already existing, and also wishing to avail themselves of a connection already formed of some strength and of great respectability, the Directors, before commencing The Solicitors' Journal and Reporter, deemed it expedient to purchase from Mr. Maugham the copyright and goodwill of the Legal Observer, which had been originally founded with very similar views to their own, and had been, during its entire existence (a period of upwards of a quarter of a century), the only Journal which was the property of solicitors, and whose interests it distinctively represented.

The Directors believed, that, in order to give to The Solicitors' Journal the authority and circulation which the Legal Observer wanted, it was necessary—first, to increase its size; secondly, to procure the highest available talent for its articles; and thirdly, to supply, in addition to general legal information, a good series of reports in a form adapted to the exigencies of a solicitor's office, and the earliest information of all important decisions of the courts.

For the first object the capital provided will, it is believed, prove ample. The second the Directors trust is already secured by the nomination of a thoroughly independent and able Editor. The third, also, the Directors believe they have successfully attained by the very satisfactory arrangement into which they have entered with the proprietors of the Weekly Reporter.

It remains, therefore, to be seen whether the profession is prepared to receive the Journal in the spirit in which it is offered, and to give to it that widely-extended support which forms in itself the means of usefulness, and, indeed, the very life of all periodicals.

A circulation is already secured, which, in the case of any ordinary professional journal, would be a remarkable success; and it has been highly gratifying to the supporters of this publication to find that whenever they have had the opportunity of fairly stating their views and objects, they have, with very few exceptions, met with the assurance that the Journal supplies a long-felt professional want. But it is notorious, that, without a considerable expenditure and zealous personal exertions, it is next to impossible to secure the attention of any large number of the scattered and busy members of our body.

The Directors feel that their work will not be completed until every attorney and solicitor in the Law List has had the claims and merits of this Journal brought under his personal notice, and a general canvass to effect this important object is now in progress. Wherever it has been carried out at all completely, the result has amply rewarded the exertions made.

The Directors feel it unnecessary to offer any comment upon the ridiculous attacks which have been made upon the undertaking. They have not allowed, and will not allow, themselves to be drawn into any controversy with the conductors of any other journal: the columns of the paper can be more worthily and more usefully filled.

The real nature and objects of the Company having been fully stated, the Directors have now only to request the shareholders to assist them in warning the great body of the profession against the fatal policy of creating divisions between the town and country members—a policy obviously suicidal, and most injurious to both classes.

It is now the duty of the shareholders to elect from among themselves a Board of Directors, whose task it will be to superintend the affairs of the Company during the ensuing twelve months, and who will no doubt exert themselves efficiently to discharge the functions of their office. There are, however, various ways in which it is in the power of the shareholders to assist the attainment of the common object, by services as important as those rendered by the Directors; and the Directors cannot better conclude this Report than by urging upon every shareholder to take every fitting opportunity—first, of bringing before his professional friends and connections the professional claims of The Solicitors' Journal to support; second, of sending advertisements for insertion in its columns; and third, of sending to the editor from his own locality communications of general professional interest.

Mr. Burton moved, and Mr. Peake seconded, and it was carried unanimously, that the Report now read be received and adopted; and that the best thanks of this meeting be given to the Directors for the mode in which they have conducted the business of the Company up to the present time.

The Chairman announced that the next business would be the election of a Board of Directors, of not less than ten, or more than twenty members; and that nominations had been received of Mr. W. L. Farrer, of London; Sir Wm. Foster, of Norwich; Mr. John Stallard, of Worcester; and Mr. John Case, of Maidstone, who, with the retiring sixteen Directors, were all eligible.

It was moved by Mr. Bockett, seconded by Mr. Parkin, and carried unanimously, that the sixteen gentlemen who retired this day be re-elected Directors of the Company.

It was moved by Mr. Lake, seconded by Mr. Burton, and carried unanimously, that Sir Wm. Foster be elected a Director of the Company.

It was moved by Mr. Bockett, seconded by Mr. Field, and carried unanimously, that Mr. W. L. Farrer be elected a Director of the Company.

It was moved by Mr. Peake, seconded by Mr. Barker, and carried unanimously, that Mr. John Stallard, of Worcester, be elected a Director of the Company.

It was moved by Mr. Field, seconded by Mr. Shaw, and carried unanimously, that Mr. John Case, of Maidstone, be elected a Director of the Company.

It was moved by Mr. Pollock, seconded by Mr. Burton, and carried unanimously, that this meeting congratulates the Directors on the appointment they have made of Editor to The Solicitors' Journal, and highly approves of the manner in which the paper has been conducted since its commencement.

It was moved by Mr. T. H. Bower, seconded by Mr. Burton, and carried unanimously, that Mr. Peake and Mr. Pollock be appointed honorary auditors for the ensuing year.

It was moved by Mr. Case, seconded by Mr. Field, and carried unanimously, that the country shareholders be requested to form themselves into distinct committees, for the purpose of canvassing their different localities, and of supplying information and offering suggestions as to the conduct and management of the paper.

It was moved by Mr. Field, seconded by Mr. Williams, and carried unanimously, that, in accordance with the express wish of the Directors, the London shareholders, not being Directors, be requested to form themselves into a shareholders' committee, for the purpose of arranging a complete canvass of both town and country, and that such a number of copies of the paper be placed at their disposal for gratuitous circulation as they may deem requisite.

It was moved by Mr. Burton, seconded by Mr. Pollock, and carried unanimously, that the London shareholders, other than the Directors, do now form themselves into a committee for the purpose of taking measures to increase the circulation of The Solicitors' Journal, and otherwise to promote the interests and business of the Law Newspaper Company, not, however, in any way interfering in the management of the paper, or the duties of the Directors; and that Mr. Shaen, having kindly consented to act, be appointed secretary to such committee.

It was moved by Mr. Benham, seconded by Mr. Rose, and carried unanimously, that the best thanks of the meeting be given to the Chairman, for his conduct in the chair.

Professional Intelligence.

Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association.

A meeting of the Managing Committee was held on the 8th of April, when a communication was read from the hon. secretary of the Northern Circuit Committee, stating that a meeting of that committee had been held on the previous day to consider whether any steps should be taken in consequence of the recent unfounded attacks, by the editor of the Law Times, upon the Association; and that a resolution had been adopted, to the effect that the attacks were wanton and unjustifiable, and bearing a willing testimony to the disinterested labours which the London members of the Managing Committee had at all times, since the formation of the Association, bestowed in promoting the interests and usefulness of the profession at large, in advancing its social status, and carrying into effect the objects of the Metropolitan and Provincial Law Association, and declaring that the London members of the committee were eminently entitled to the confidence and support of that meeting, and of every individual member of the profession. At the same meeting of the Northern Circuit Committee a further resolution was adopted, to the effect that the tone and character of the attacks alluded to would justify the Managing Committee in declining to make any further communications to the Law Times, but recommending them for the present to forward communications to that journal as heretofore.

Letters were read from a considerable number of provincial members of the committee condemnatory of the conduct of the Law Times, but many of them expressing views similar to those of the Northern Circuit Committee as to forwarding communications to that journal.

The managing committee then resolved that minutes of its proceedings should be sent to the Law Times.

Communications were read from provincial members of the committee, and from the Hull Law Society, upon the evils of the existing bankruptcy system.

The correspondence between the committee and the Commissioners for inquiring into the present arrangements for transacting judicial business in England and Wales, respecting a more convenient arrangement of Easter Term, was reported on.

A further communication was ordered to be made to the Incorporated Law Society in reference to the scale of equity costs.

A report of the Liverpool Law Society upon the address of this Association, dated 3rd March, 1857, was received and read.

The draft annual Report was brought up, revised, and referred to a sub-committee.

The tenth annual meeting of this Association was held at the offices, 8, Bedford-row, on Wednesday, the 15th April, 1857. Among the members present during the proceedings were, the Chairman, Mr. W. S. Cookson, and Messrs. T. H. Bower, A. P. Bower, E. Bromley, H. Lake, F. H. Janson, E. Benham, T. H. Devonshire, J. A. Rose, T. Kennedy, R. A. Parker, and G. L. Patteson, London; Mr. J. Hope Shaw, Leeds; Mr. H. H. Statham, Liverpool; Messrs. G. Thorley, T. Sudlow, S. Fletcher, and W. H. Partington, Manchester; Messrs. A. Ryland, J. Powell, and H. Hawkes, Birmingham; Messrs. J. Case and J. Monckton, Maidstone; Mr. A. Hart, Dorking; Mr. J. Summerscales, Oldham.

The Secretary read the Report and the annual balance-sheet, when, after some discussion upon several of the matters mentioned in the Report, the following resolutions were adopted:—

1. Resolved, on the motion of the CHAIRMAN, that the Report be referred back to the Committee to be revised by them, and that it be then printed and circulated in the usual way.

2. Resolved, on the motion of Mr. HART, seconded by Mr. FLETCHER, that the cordial thanks of the Association be presented to the Committee of Management for their labours during the past year.

3. Resolved, on the motion of Mr. ROSE, seconded by Mr. A. P. BOWER, that the following members of the Association be elected members of the Committee of Management for the ensuing year:—

5. Resolved, on the motion of Mr. CASE, seconded by Mr. SUDLOW, that the best thanks of this meeting be presented to Mr. Cookson, for his able conduct in the chair.

After the meeting, the members dined together at Radley's Hotel, Bridge-street, Blackfriars.

The Report of the Committee will be inserted in this Journal.

JURIDICAL SOCIETY.

This Society will meet on Monday evening next, the Vice-Chancellor Sir John Stuart, in the chair; when a paper will be read by Mr. F. S. Reilly, on "Judicial Oaths." Vice-Chancellor Stuart has accepted the presidency for the ensuing year.

CHANCERY SITTINGS.—LORD CHANCELLOR AND LORDS JUSTICES.

During the remainder of the present Term the Lords Justices will sit with the Lord Chancellor for the purpose of hearing appeals.

REGULÆ GENERALES.

EASTER TERM (April 23).

Indorsement of Notice on Writs on Contract.

It is ordered that plaintiffs suing in contract for £20, or less, may, if they claim costs, indorse on the writ of summons the following notice:—

"Take notice, that if judgment be signed for default of appearance the plaintiff will, without summons, apply to a judge for his costs of suit, unless before such judgment you shall give notice to him, or his attorney, that you intend to oppose such application."

And it is further ordered, that, if the defendant give such notice, the plaintiff shall proceed by summons and order. But if the defendant give no such notice, the plaintiff may produce such indorsement to a judge at chambers for an order for costs, ex parte; and if the judge shall sign his name to the indorsement, such signature shall be an order for costs, and the Master may tax them thereon, accordingly. In case of any application for costs without such indorsement, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to more costs than if he had made such indorsement, unless a judge shall otherwise order.

Entry of Satisfaction on Judgments.

Upon a satisfaction piece, duly signed and attested, in accordance with the 80th rule of Hilary Term, 1853, being presented to the Clerk of the Judgments of the Masters in the Court in which the judgment has been signed, he shall file the same, and enter satisfaction in the judgment-book against the entry of the said judgment; and no roll shall be required to be carried in for the purpose of entering satisfaction on a judgment. Signed, &c.

A small publication on this question, bearing the name of the Rev. J. B. Hawkins, has appeared opportunely, as it points out, statistically as well as emphatically, the defects in the existing state of the law. Considerable attention appears to have been given to the subject by Mr. Hawkins, and he presents a detailed statement of the history of savings' banks, the expense of carrying them on in various parts of the kingdom, &c.—information highly useful to those who take an interest in the subject. But while the evils of the present system are commented on, the "remedial suggestions" appended to Mr. Hawkins's brochure are not of a nature to add anything to its value; and any one who expects there to find a satisfactory remedy prescribed for an admittedly unhealthy state of things will be considerably disappointed. Not many weeks since (unless I very greatly mistake) an advertisement appeared in several London and provincial journals of a projected "National Savings' Bank Association," with the Rev. J. B. Hawkins announced therein as manager or secretary. In the reverend gentleman's pamphlet, he does not advert to the fact of his having any interest in, or official connection with, the aforesaid association: he merely states, that, after full consideration of the subject, he can "heartily commend" the project to the attention of the public. He believes that it is full of "sound practical benevolence, sure to yield valuable results, in a minor degree to its depositors, in the highest degree to its shareholders." Whether this speculation will turn out well for its office-bearers and shareholders I do not presume to say. The project is only here noticed because of its claim to be a vast improvement on the existing system, and to be full of "practical benevolence" to the nation at large. Recent experience has shown how ineffectual is the audit of any public company's accounts—how fallacious the idea that good commercial or other names, as patrons or directors, save a company from ultimate insolvency. Depositors in savings' banks are, as a class, mentally and arithmetically unfit to ponder over annual balance sheets, and unable to judge of the financial position of any company. However respectable may be the promoters—however pure their motives—however sound their "monetary basis"—a joint-stock company ought not to be systematically intrusted with the little savings of the poorer classes.

It is generally agreed on by most of those who have studied this question, that savings' banks ought to be under the control of the Government. We have lately seen how in France the populace are actually glad to lend their money to their rulers, at a moderate rate of interest; and it is unnecessary to point out the degree of stability given to the Government by its thus enlisting the working classes as its creditors. Dr. Hancock, Mr. Sikes, and other writers have demonstrated the utility of throwing open the Government funds, as a mode of investment, to all ranks of society, by providing for the purchase and sale of stock in provincial towns. This would be a most important part of any sound scheme for enlarging the operations and increasing the security of savings' banks. The first step that ought to be taken would be to hold a Government audit of all existing savings' banks, prior to their dissolution. "Trustees" and "managers" should have no place in the new system. A responsible officer should be nominated by the Government in every town; he should daily receive deposits; and for deposits paid to him during office hours the Government should be in every case responsible. Wherever a branch of the Bank of England or Ireland exists in any town, it might prove convenient and economical to invest the local manager with the new office. In towns where other banks alone have branch establishments, a similar arrangement might perhaps be made, with advantage to all parties. When the entire sum to the credit of any depositor amounted to one hundred pounds, Consols to that amount should be purchased, and transferred into his name; and to facilitate these dealings in public securities, every branch of the Bank of England or Ireland ought to be empowered to effect transfers of stock. A minor improvement, but not a trivial one, would be the reduction of the stamp duty payable on powers of attorney, where the amount to be affected is small. A central office in London should have the control of all the provincial officers; and travelling inspectors should ascertain that business is everywhere conducted with regularity, books and accounts properly kept, depositors' books balanced, &c. Such is the rough outline of a plan, which might perchance accomplish much good. Would some active and philanthropic representative take up the subject, and devote himself to a reform in our savings' bank system, he might save all future depositors from loss, and earn the gratitude of all ranks of his conntrymen, and more especially that of the millions who daily toil for bread, but have now no secure repository for their hard-earned savings.

LAWYERS IN PARLIAMENT.

The list of lawyers returned to the new Parliament, given in THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL of last week, is in some particulars incomplete. That list contained the names of Messrs. Cairns, Bowyer, and others, members of the English Bar, as also the name of Mr. Davison, M.P. for Belfast, the only Irish solicitor who has a seat in the House of Commons. The following names were, however, omitted:—

BLAND, LOFTUS. . . .	King's County. .	Q.C.
BUTT, ISAAC.	Youghall . . .	Q.C.
DEASY, R.	Cork County . .	Q.C.
DOBBS, CAREY . . .	Carrickfergus . .	Barrister
FITZGERALD, J. D. . .	Ennis.	Q.C. Att.-Gen.
MILLER, STERNE . . .	Armagh	Q.C.
NAPIER, JOSEPH . . .	Dublin University	Q.C.
O'BRIEN, JAMES . . .	Limerick . . .	S.L.
O'CONNELL, D., jun. . .	Tralee	Barrister
WALDRON, L.	Tipperary . . .	Barrister
WHITESIDE, JAMES . .	Enniskillen. . .	Q.C.

In addition to the foregoing, several other M.P.'s for Irish counties and boroughs have been called to the bar; but inasmuch as they have not practised, I have not included them. Among these may be mentioned Cogan, W. H. (Kildare), Forster, Sir George (Monaghan), Greer, S. M. (Londonderry), Hatchell, John, jun. (Wexford), M'Cullagh, W. T. (Yarmouth), and O'Brien, P. (King's County). Mr. I. F. Maguire (Dungarvan), although nominally at the bar, is better known as proprietor and editor of the Cork Examiner; and he goes into Parliament as the only representative of Irish journalism, for the connection of Messrs. Napier and Whiteside with the Daily Express is hardly of a kind to entitle them to the designation of journalists.

APPOINTMENTS.

Rumours have been flying about as to the supposed retirement of one of our venerable judges. It has also been surmised that a change will shortly take place among the Masters in Chancery. Nothing definite has, however, transpired, and even the oldest judge on the bench, who has lived nearly to his ninetieth year, is sitting daily, vigorous in intellect, and apparently destitute of any intention to make way for younger expectants.

Mr. P. J. Byrne, solicitor, of Dundalk, is appointed clerk of the Crown for the county of Louth, in place of the late Mr. W. Horan.

SAVINGS' BANKS.

To the Editor of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL & REPORTER.

SIR,—My attention has been attracted to your Dublin correspondent's article on the Savings' Bank Question, in the last number of THE SOLICITORS' JOURNAL. Having been many years one of the managers of an extensive savings' bank, and feeling desirous that the system of management should be made as perfect as possible—being also strongly impressed with the opinion that nothing less than perfect and entire Government security for each and every deposit is necessary—I still cannot agree in your correspondent's sweeping condemnation of the present practice; and, I believe, I can show that several of the statements in his article are not correct.

I think it is not correct to say that the moneys deposited are lent to the managers or trustees of each bank, and by them lent to the commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt. It might as truly be said, that, if you, Mr. Editor, were to receive under the will of a friend £1,000, as trustee for that friend's children, to invest the same in the public funds, the money was lent to you; and that, if you employed an agent to make the investment, the money was lent to that agent. It is clear there is neither borrowing nor lending in such a transaction.

On the subject of security, your correspondent states that the entire security from all quarters available to depositors is under £800,000, while the aggregate amount of deposits is over £33,000,000. I have before me the general statement of a savings' bank for the year ending 20th November, 1855, from which it appears that the total amount due to all sorts of its depositors at that date was £233,236 12s. 1d., of which the amount invested with the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt, including interest, was £232,740 4s. 11d. Does your correspondent maintain that the depositors above mentioned have not available security for the amount invested with the Commissioners? If he does, the most mild observation that can be applied to such a proposition is, that it is absurd. On the other hand, if he admits that those depositors have available security, it is impossible to reconcile with this admission his statement that the entire security from all quarters available to depositors is under £800,000.

Several cases of loss to depositors in savings' banks by the fraud or negligence of trustees have occurred. It is the duty of Government to prevent such losses, but that is a difficult matter to accomplish. If all management and control be taken from the local trustees, a purely Government establishment must replace the present management at every savings' bank in the United Kingdom, which would be a very bad arrangement. If local trustees are retained, as they must continue to act without payment, their responsibility cannot be reasonably made more extensive. If their responsibility was made to extend individually and collectively to the whole of their property, it would not prevent loss to depositors by fraud or negligence on their part.

It is said reproachfully that deposits increase in prosperous times, and are withdrawn when times are bad. Of course it is so. Is it not the prime object of savings' banks to secure, when times are bad, support from more prosperous times? If depositors are to enjoy the essential advantage of Government security, their money must be lodged in the public funds. A high price of funds coincides with prosperous times, when stock will be bought; a low price, with bad times, when sales will be made. It is not possible to avoid a loss equal to the difference. It may be a question on which party the loss should fall—whether upon the Government, as administering the National Debt, or upon the depositors. It has hitherto been borne by the Government, and this is represented as a "tax paid by a careless nation." It may be so, but if this plan is reversed, and the depositors made to bear the loss, great difficulty will be found in settling such a scheme of accounts as will correctly apportion a share of the loss to each depositor. Moreover, such a deduction would be very likely to produce great repugnance against making deposits. The advantage which savings' banks confer on the working classes are similar to those which the middle classes derive from life insurances. It is impossible to overestimate the advantages which have actually been enjoyed by the working classes from savings' banks on the present system, imperfect as it may be. If the defects of that system cannot all be removed, it would nevertheless be a very high degree of folly on the part of employers to adopt your correspondent's suggestion, not to encourage those under their influence to make use of savings' banks. The experience of forty years has proved these establishments to be not only the best and safest, but, in truth, the only tolerably safe depository for the small savings of the labourer, of domestic servants, and of the mechanic.

I shall be glad to see the promised schemes of your correspondent for improvement and reform: but I can by no means agree in his denunciation that savings' banks, as now constituted, are a "disgrace to our country."

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

P.

Sir,—Reading your last week's impression in a somewhat discursive manner, I happened to commence the observations published under the above title in the middle. I had not read far before I was so struck with the ignorance displayed on many of the points discussed, and the absurdities promulgated, that I at once turned to the commencement to see what tyro of twenty had been accorded by you such liberal space for his crude reflections. To my surprise and dismay, I found that the "thoughts" I had been perusing were those of a "solicitor of thirty years' standing." I cannot, of course, doubt your correspondent's full right to the status he claims, but I must take the liberty of saying that his length of years has either left him strangely ignorant of the practical working of the present conveyancing system, or has endowed him with wonderful recklessness of assertion. I have not the time, and you would probably not accord me the space, to expose all the many errors of fact and of judgment with which these "thoughts" abound; but there are two paragraphs which certainly ought not to pass unnoticed. Indeed, I am almost surprised that you should so far have given them your sanction as to have allowed them to appear without note or comment. The first paragraph to which I refer is as follows:—

"In other words, given ordinary Consols at 94, and pass a law to-morrow requiring all stock held by trustees to be dealt with as land and the title to be investigated, and all cestuis que trust to join in transfer, or be otherwise duly barred, would those trust Consols fetch 73? If not, then seven years' purchase would be struck off the price of all Consols under that category; and then, say the projectors, why should not seven (or other equivalent) number of years' purchase be added to the price of all land, if we throw over the present method, and adopt the stock principle of title and conveyance?"

If I read these sentences aright, they say in effect, that, were the same investigation of title as is now necessary in the case of land, necessary also in the case of stock, the selling value of the stock would be depreciated by seven years' purchase, or about twenty-one per cent. The necessary implication here is, that the present system of conveyancing entails the specified amount of depreciation. Now, sir, your correspondent gives us no facts and no reasons for attributing such an effect to the existing system; and I am at a loss to imagine how any one calling himself a solicitor can have conceived, and can gravely propound to the profession, so monstrous an idea.

Let us see in what way, and to what extent, the present system operates to depreciate the selling value of land, and consequently in what way, and to what extent, the destruction of that system would enhance that value.

The only two points in the present system of conveyancing which I find noticed by the conveyancing commissioners, or which occur to my own mind, as depreciating the value of land, are—1st, the time occupied and delays incurred in effecting a transfer; and 2ndly, the legal expenses attending the transfer.

Now, with regard to the first of these alleged causes, I apprehend that it is entirely a mistake to imagine that it has any appreciable effect on the price at which land is bought and sold. Land is not an article that, for its enjoyment, requires to be handed over bodily to the purchaser at a moment's notice—from its very nature this is impossible. There is always, besides the owner, an occupier whose interests have to be regarded, and in consequence purchases are almost invariably completed and possession given on certain quarterly and half-yearly days concurring with the state of the tenancy. When a man buys land, his own and the vendor's convenience makes them agree on one of these days for the final settlement, and the intermediate time is generally ample to complete the legal part of the business. Even if the matter cannot be quite settled by the time appointed, no loss occurs, as the agreement, or, in default, the general principle of equity, makes provision for the case. A purchaser of land regulates the price he will give by the rate of interest he wishes to obtain, and not by the few days or weeks, more or less, that may elapse before he can fully complete his purchase. To act otherwise would be as absurd as to give more money for a ready-made coat because you can have it at a minute's notice, than for one duly bespoke, which your tailor will require a week to produce. In short, were land made transferable to-morrow by the old plan of handing over a clod or twig, without other formality, I conceive that no purchaser, on the mere ground of the celerity of the transaction, would add one farthing to his intended purchase-money. I have dwelt thus much on this point of time, not only because I imagine it to be one of the notions operating on the mind of your correspondent, but because the Commissioners, in their report, frequently talk of delay in connection with expense. I observe, however, that when, in their eighty-ninth paragraph, they speak of the saving to be effected by their scheme, they are sensible enough not to put down anything as gained on this head. There then only remains the expense occasioned by the present system—that is, solicitors' and counsels' fees. To support the statements of the "Solicitor of thirty years' standing," these fees must amount to seven years' purchase, or twenty-one per cent. on the value of the property. I hope, sir, for the sake of the profession, that your paper is not read by the laity; clients are not over-patient under the infliction of our bills as they actually exist; but I tremble for the consequences when they are given to understand by one of ourselves, a gentleman of thirty years' experience, that they are regularly mulcted of twenty-one per cent. on the value of their property whenever they buy or sell. However, as possibly some trembling landowner may have caught sight of the above frightful suggestion (your professional readers will see its absurdity at once), I would state that the experience of many years in the management of large conveyancing businesses convinces me that the strictly legal expenses on the transfer of land do not, on the average of transactions, great and small, exceed four per cent. on the value, or about one year's purchase. In this calculation I include the expenses both of vendor and purchaser. Further, in answer to the proposition put by your correspondent in the paragraph above quoted as to the Consols, I say that the stock in question, instead of 73, would realise at least 90. The second paragraph to which I have alluded is this:—

"This scheme, truly great for good or for mischief, is therefore entirely the production of solicitors, and has entirely had its rise in considerations peculiarly emanating from the custody of the client's purse and pecuniary interests. The scheme at present is not of compulsory application. If it prove bad on trial, it will die a death of inanition. If put on compulsorily, it will either play the devil with the landowners, or it will certainly raise the marketable value of every landed estate five or six, or possibly eight or ten years' purchase; and whichever it does, the solicitors who devised it must have the blame or praise."

Your correspondent has here outdone even himself. We have now got from a loss of seven years' purchase, to one of ten. Had the writer continued his reflections we should probably have learnt that the entire value of landed estates is consumed in costs on each transfer. As it is, we are coolly told that the present system depreciates land by perhaps ten years' purchase, which, as I have shown, must be entirely owing to the lawyers' fees. Truly, in the elegant language of your correspondent, how we must "play the devil with the landowners!"

The "Solicitor of thirty years' standing" appears to have no fear of insulting the common sense, or of ignoring the practical knowledge, of your readers. I am not so bold, and I, therefore, refrain from further exposing the egregious exaggerations contained in the last quoted paragraph. I am, Sir, your's, &c.,

A Conveyancing Clerk.

To the Editor of The Solicitor's Journal & Reporter.

Sir,—The question of professional remuneration, as raised by the Report of the Registration Commissioners, is a very important one. From the terms in which lawyers' bills for conveyancing are spoken of in that Report, uninformed persons would suppose that they were the sole cause of what is called "the decay in the value of lands." Let us see, however, whether this be so or not. Suppose the case of a large landed estate offered for sale, as is usual, by auction. The solicitors for the parties, in conjunction with the auctioneer, prepare the particulars of sale, and this, with the actual attendance of the auctioneer at the sale to offer the property to the assembled bidders, is, so far as I know, all that the said auctioneer does. For this he is rewarded by a per-centage on the amount for which the estate is sold. We will suppose the estate to be sold for £32,000; the commission on this would be as follows:—

„ ½ ditto on	17,000 . . .	85	0 0
	£32,000 . . .	£235	0 0
Timber on the property valued at £1,511 10s., at 5 per cent.	. . .	75	11 6
	Total . .	£310	11 6

These figures are taken from an actual bill of one of the great London firms, and are quite exclusive of cash paid for advertisements and journeys, &c. It is well known, also, that supposing the auction should not take place, but the estate be sold by private contract, the same commission must be paid; the ground for demanding it being stated to be the custom of the trade. Now, I would ask, what services has the auctioneer performed, that he should be so very largely remunerated?

Turn we now to the solicitors concerned for the parties. They have to investigate, perhaps, a very complicated title, and perform other very arduous and responsible services, extending, perhaps, for several months. And yet I venture to affirm that the bill of costs of the purchaser's solicitor, which in all probability would be the largest, would not in such a case, including all payments, be more than from £150 to £200; and this is to be taxed, reduced, and grudgingly paid after all, while not a word is ever said of the enormous charges made by the auctioneer; and if we compare the time given, the trouble taken, and the anxiety endured by the one and the other, we shall find that the solicitor's is tenfold that of the auctioneer. This is no fanciful picture. If the principle is to be (as it ought to be), that every man be paid fairly for what he does, we should find that the auctioneer, who gives, we may say, a few days, or even a week, to the business, would only be paid a tenth part of his present demand, and what remains would, in most cases, more than pay the solicitor's bill, including every payment out of pocket.

I need not say anything as to taxation of bills, further than to express my surprise that any such system (which is absurd in the last degree) should be persevered in. Mr. Williams, in the paragraph you quoted in your last week's paper, has given it some hard knocks; but I much doubt whether his sarcasms will prevail to upset the present preposterous system of legal tariffs and taxation. I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

April 21, 1857. LEX.

Roman Law and Legal Education. By H. J. MAINE, LL.D., late Queen's Professor of Civil Law in the University of Cambridge. Cambridge Essays for 1856: J. W. Parker & Son.

Mr. Maine, late Professor of Civil Law at Cambridge, and now reader on the same subject at the Inns of Court, published a paper in the last number of the Cambridge Essays, which must be deeply interesting to all persons who wish to see the legal education of the country placed upon a proper footing. The excellence of the style of the paper, and the familiarity with the subject which it displays, are what might have been expected from the well-known talents of the author, and can surprise no one who is acquainted with the powers which have enabled him to obtain, for a subject somewhat remote from the ordinary course of professional business, and having the reputation at least of considerable dryness and difficulty, a degree of popularity amongst the present generation of law students fully equal to that which has rewarded the exertions of the gentlemen who lecture upon more familiar and more interesting branches of the science. Strongly recommending such of our readers as take an interest in the subject to refer to the Essay itself, we will proceed to lay before them some account of the topics which it handles.

The first reason which Mr. Maine alleges for the opinion that Roman law ought to form an important branch in the education of English lawyers, is the fact that it largely enters into and deeply colours very many departments of knowledge with which its connection is not immediately apparent. Roman law is not like our own, a vast congeries of text-books, statutes, and precedents. "It may, for practical purposes, though inadequately, be described by saying that it consists of principles and of express written rules." The business, therefore, of the Roman jurisconsults was confined to ascertaining what were the logical results of a certain set of verbal propositions, and this gave them an unrivalled excellence in an art of which English lawyers are by daily necessity made to feel their own ignorance—the art of interpreting written documents. This art, it is obvious, was capable of a very wide application; and as Roman law was widely adopted on the continent of Europe, its principles of interpretation affected very deeply the character of every branch of intellectual inquiry in which language was used, or in which an attempt was made to use it, with anything like controversial accuracy; much in the same way as our own rules of evidence have exercised a strong influence over all departments of knowledge which turn in any measure upon ascertaining disputed facts. In the case of Roman law these results were peculiarly apparent in its relation to moral philosophy. With the exception of the school of the Casuists, whose views of morality were almost exclusively based upon the theology of the Roman Catholic Church, all continental moral philosophers, from the time of the Reformation to the rise of Kant's philosophy, in the latter part of the last century, could trace their intellectual descent to the great book of Grotius de Jure Belli et Pares. The primary and avowed object of this book "is an attempt to determine the law of nature," of which the Roman jurisconsults were either the inventors or the discoverers. Hence, "the system of Grotius is implicated with Roman law at its very foundation;" and from this it follows, that, without a competent knowledge of that system it is impossible to understand the views of writers who have had a large share in moulding the existing opinions upon this most important subject.

Another great advantage of the study of Roman law is the command which it confers upon the student of a scientific, technical phraseology. Whatever may have been the advantage of the great law reforms of the last twenty-five years, they have altogether destroyed whatever symmetry our technical language may have once possessed. It is no longer possible for any one to obtain a scientific knowledge of (for example) our system of real property law. Indeed, it no longer forms a system at all, though it still retains the old technical language, as Mr. Maine observes, "in a state of disintegration." The evils of such a state of things are patent, and notorious to every lawyer. To say nothing of the impediments which it throws in the way of all attempts to draw Acts of Parliament with accuracy, it is the one great cause of the enormous prolixity by which our reports of cases are discreditably distinguished from those of other civilised countries. To such evils it would, as Mr. Maine observes, be impertinent to attempt to apply any single remedy; but he considers, that, by extending the study of legal expression by the help of the Roman law, an almost indefinite advantage might accrue to the precision and expressiveness of our own legal phraseology. Such a course would, moreover, be attended with the collateral advantage, that it would enable English and Continental writers on many subjects, moral and political, to understand each other far better than they can at present. The language of Roman law pervades the whole range of our thoughts. "Obligation," "Convention," "Contract," "Consent," "Possession," and "Prescription," are words which in that system have a strict technical value. With us their meaning is loose and popular; and the consequence is, that English and continental writers and diplomatists are often at cross-purposes with each other; our countrymen using in an indefinite sense words to which foreigners attach a precise legal import. We may illustrate the inconvenience of this state of things by a fact which occurred within our own observation. A solicitor told his client that a security which formed the basis of an intended marriage settlement was only "equitable"—the client understood him to mean that it—the sum so secured—would constitute a mere debt of honour.

Another circumstance to which much of the educational value of Roman law is due is the fact, that, from the course of events, it is, in Mr. Maine's phrase, "fast becoming the lingua franca of jurisprudence." The Code Napoleon is little more than "a compendium of the rules of Roman law practised in France before the Revolution, and cleared of all feudal admixture." Indifferent as the great body of the public always are to the subject of law reform, the Code Napoleon has taken a strong hold upon the popular favour of countries the political constitutions of which differ very widely from each other and from that of France. It prevails in Austria, in Holland, in Rhenish Prussia, and in Southern Italy; and it is well worthy of remark, that the most popular of the various legal systems which exist in the different parts of the United States is the Code of Louisiana, which Mr. Maine describes as being, "of all the republications of Roman law, the clearest, the fullest, the most philosophical, and the best adapted to the exigencies of modern society."

Another reason for studying the Roman law is its connection with the question of the possibility of codifying the laws of England. Mr. Maine points out that the word codification has two meanings—that of reducing an unwritten system of law to writing, and that of reducing written law to a convenient shape. As to the first operation it has been already performed in this country. There is no legal proposition whatever which is not to be found somewhere or other, either in the Reports, the Statute Books, or the works of text writers of more or less authority. The only open question, therefore, on the project is, whether we have the means of reducing these writings into a concise and convenient form. Mr. Maine's opinion upon the subject seems to be, that, though there are great difficulties in the way of such an undertaking—difficulties arising principally from the absence of a proper technical language—we may hope ultimately to accomplish it, and that the first great step towards that achievement would be an extended acquaintance with "that wonderful terminology, which is, as it were, the short-hand of jurisprudence."

Mr. Maine, it need not be said, thinks very highly of the general character of the system, to the incidental advantages of which he refers so warmly. He points out, that, during some five or six centuries, the study of Roman law was almost the only profession which afforded any real opportunities for the exercise of the highest intellectual powers. During the decline of the Roman Empire, there was little study of natural science, little taste for art, and no opportunities for free political action. When, therefore, a man of capacity had to choose his profession, he had only four courses open to him. If he did not become a teacher of rhetoric, a commander of frontier posts, or a professional writer of panegyrics, the practice of the law was his only resource. Law, therefore, drew to itself an enormous proportion of the available power of the time, and, to conclude our notice with the eloquent words with which Mr. Maine concludes his paper, "unless we are prepared to believe that for five or six centuries the world's collective intellest was smitten with a paralysis which never visited it before or since, we are driven to admit that the Roman jurisprudence may be all which its least cautious encomiasts have ventured to pronounce it, and that the language of conventional panegyric may, for once, fall short of the unvarnished truth."

Curiosities of Local Courts.

There is no rose without a thorn—says the proverb—and, as in most popular metaphors, the wisdom concealed under the figure is wide in its application. Certainly the district county court—the fairest blossom on the tree of legal reform which has budded in our day—forms no exception to its universality. No doubt law, under its influence, has become cheaper; and justice, in a vast majority of cases, is more speedily and effectually obtained. The new system has been a lion in the path of the fraudulent debtor, and the guardian angel of many an honest creditor, who would have gone to the wall while latitats flourished and "bills of Middlesex" were in fashion, and who would have shrunk from embarking in an action in the superior courts even under the simpler procedure of the present day. But these advantages have not been secured without drawbacks. One of these—perhaps the chief—is not, however, a necessary part of the system, but an accidental error in its conception. Where sixty men appointed to judge both law and facts ply their vocation,—each separated more or less from his fellows, all in a great degree from the bulk of the profession, many well-stricken in years, none of the highest order of forensic talent, most living remote from Westminster Hall, and (whether they will or no) playing the tyrant in a little legal kingdom—what, we ask, must be the consequence? It does not require any great amount of sagacity to reply that mistakes will be made; that law will be forgotten or disregarded; that conflicting decisions will be given; and, in a word, that justice will, in many instances, miscarry. But all or most of these dangers might, we think, be met by some such expedient as frequently changing the district of each judge, or, better still, by holding out to the judges the prospect of future promotion as an inducement to present excellence. A shelved man, removed from the pressure of public criticism, never can, and will seldom try to, keep up to the mark. The library of a county court judge usually dates from the year of his appointment. He will never buy more recent books without a very sufficient stimulus; and, indeed, the public may think themselves lucky if he does not dispose of his old ones.

But there is a blot in the system which does not, we fear, admit of an effectual remedy. Under the former state of things, any deformity in law or practice, if it were of a hurtful nature, was pretty sure, sooner or later, to be righted. It speedily became ventilated in Westminster Hall. It became talked of in and out of the profession; and, rising to the surface, was soon worked off under the energy of the Commission or the grievance-monger of the day. But in the county courts, complicated questions of law and crudities of practice are continually emerging, and are quietly disposed of in some out-of-the-way country town, without a single soul being the wiser or the better for the investigation, beyond the immediate parties to the quarrel. There is no tie binding these numerous local tribunals to each other; and none, of any avail, which connects them with their common superior. There is not even any vehicle by which the Profession can taste the delicæ of their practice; though questions involving nice distinctions of law and the very principles of our jurisprudence are continually being dealt with by them in some fashion or other. It is to palliate if not to remedy this evil, that we now invite our country correspondents and subscribers to favour us with reports of any interesting points which may arise in their neighbourhood, or come under their cognisance. Some such means seem necessary to let law-reformers know those blots in our system which are found to be practically inconvenient or injurious, or (again to resort to a proverb) to enable them to see with precision "where the shoe pinches."

It was only the other day that a case came to our own knowledge involving a point of considerable interest in the law of evidence; and which we give as an example of the kind of information we desire from our readers. A certain Mr. Philp was sued at the last county court held at Uxbridge, before Mr. Koe, Q.C., by a Mr. Mallings; and the subject of the claim was a legacy under the will of one Elizabeth Philp. It appeared from the opening of Mr. F. Lawrence (instructed by Mr. Batt, of Uxbridge), who represented the plaintiff—that the defendant (who had been named executor of the will, but had not proved it) had assets in his hands available towards the payment of the legacy, such assets consisting of a sum of money invested in the funds by the testatrix, in her own name together with that of the defendant; and to the legal property in which he succeeded on her death by survivorship, but in which the legatees of the will claimed a beneficial interest. As a foundation for the claim of his client, Mr. Lawrence attempted to put in the original of the will, which was in court, properly attested; but he was stopped by Mr. James Stephen and Mr. C. R. Griffiths (instructed by Mr. Bird), who urged on behalf of the defendant that the only legal evidence of the instrument on which the claim was founded was the probate, and not the will itself. To this objection Mr. Koe was obliged to yield, and nonsuited the plaintiff. But it is evident, that, by the rejection of the will (provided of course the equitable right to the fund in question was as alleged in the plaintiff, and that the defendant was otherwise liable as executor), a great failure in justice has arisen; for even should the plaintiff betake himself to the expensive proceeding of administering with the will annexed, he would still be unable to make such fund available through the medium of the county court; it being only as against a personal representative, and by virtue of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 65, that the county court judge has any equitable jurisdiction; and hence the plaintiff would have to resort to proceedings in Chancery, to reduce his equitable claim on the fund into assets to the use of the will. But in a case like this, where would be the difficulty of entrusting the ancient jurisdiction of the common law county courts over probate of wills, to their statutory successors? A will properly attested, and the authenticity of which is undisputed, might be proved (at all events, for the purposes of the claim before the court) as effectually and far more rapidly in the lay tribunal than in the Commons; and the monstrous abuse would be avoided of rejecting an original document in order to receive a copy of the same instrument. Mr. Collier's Testamentary Bill of last year contained, it may be remembered, provisions by which the duty of proving undisputed wills was thrown on the county courts; and the case we have mentioned indicates some incidental advantages which would arise from the change.

Be this as it may, however, we think the free discussion of such questions as these would be useful; but they must be circulated among the Profession when they emerge in the course of practice. We know of no better medium than the columns of The Solicitors' Journal, and they will always be open for this purpose.

The plan being put into the hands of the solicitor, the next step is the preparation of the book of reference. The standing order, there being only one affecting the reference, is simple and comprehensive, and [H. C. 47] provides that the book of referenec shall contain the names of all the owners or reputed owners, lessees or reputed lessees, and occupiers of all lands and houses in the line of the proposed works, or within the limits of deviation as defined upon the plan, and shall describe such lands and houses respectively. The words reputed owners and reputed lessees will bear as large a construction as possible, provided that no carelessness or laxity is proved against the promoters of a bill in the preparation of the book of references.

From time to time, printed directions have been published for the preparation of the book of reference, many of which are positively absurd and impracticable, and bear evidence of having been written by some one who never took a reference in his life. One of the most popular of these directions recommends that the reference-takers should be on the ground at seven o'clock in the morning, and work till dark; that a light breakfast should be taken previously to starting, and a light dinner on the return; and that the evening should be devoted to writing letters and drafting the evidence. Now the requisites of a reference-taker are, that he should be active, have some knowledge of law, at any rate sufficient to be familiar with the tenures of real estate, so as to be able to decide on the proper parties to be put down as owners or reputed owners, and also be able to bear a good deal of bodily fatigue; independently of this, he should be a man of tact and address; in fact, a first-class clerk should have charge of the work. Supposing that thirty or forty miles of ground have to be got over, it is better to divide the work into portions, putting a separate staff on each portion of ten or twelve miles, if the work is heavy. The best number of clerks to send into the country is three to each district. This number allows two to be working on the ground, and one to be engaged in seeing outlying landowners. Any regulations about hours are useless. If the London solicitor does not employ a local agent, (which is generally done), but sends his own staff to take a reference, he must send clerks on whom he can depend, and leave the time and mode of doing the work to them. It is quite impossible to judge of the amount of work done by the time occupied over it. Sometimes in the open country even—in an orchard district for instance—it will be hard work to get through a mile a day, and sometimes four or five miles a day can be completed.

As a general rule, every occupier should be seen without exception, or an inquiry made at his house, as a mistake in occupation can hardly arise otherwise than through carelessness. Every lessee and owner should be seen also if possible; in fact, subject to the exercise of a little discretion, all owners, lessees, as well as occupiers should be seen, if they reside anywhere within a reasonable distance. Where a large property is intersected by a railway or other work, the assistance of the steward or agent should always be asked, and an offer should be made by the engineer to go over the line, and explain it to the proprietor if desired. The refusal to give information by landowners is the next best thing to having the reference accurate, as, to a great extent, it takes the sting out of an opposition on standing orders.

The reference-takers should have a draft-book, with columns for the description of the property, and the names of the owners, lessees, and occupiers, and a page for observations and remarks; and in every case the name and address of all parties from whom information is obtained should be put down. In towns, the best person to take on the ground, as a guide, is the tax-collector or receiver of rents; and in the country, the parish clerk, or some labourer who has worked many years for the different farmers.

The names of the overseers of the different parishes must be collected, as well as the names and addresses of parish clerks, surveyors of highways, trustees of turnpike roads, churchwardens, and similar public officers; and particular inquiries must be made as to the proper party to be served with notices in respect of parish or common land.

The parish boundary is another point for which the solicitor is responsible; and evidence must be collected in order to ascertain whether the boundary laid down on the plan is accurately described. Another point to which attention should be directed is the nature of the roads, whether they are public, or turnpike, or parish roads, or roads belonging to the owners of estates in the neighbourhood. It frequently happens that evidence is very conflicting on these points; and it is absolutely necessary to exhaust all information which is available. The proprietor of a large estate is very jealous of the privacy of a road over which he retains a power of closing, although the public are allowed to use it; and he might take a very hostile position against a company solely on account of a misdescription. The consequences of describing a private road as a public road would be, that it would appear as such in the book of reference, and cross-sections would be given of it in the sections. When there is a dispute about a road, the best course is to describe it both ways, and do all things necessary for taking either a public or private road. This can be done by describing the road in the book of reference as a "public road, or a private road used as a public road." The owner who claims the road must be put down in the book of reference, and the surveyor of highways also; by so doing, the book of reference will bear on the face of it a record that all inquiries were made.

The description of property in the book of reference must be clear and concise, and there must be a separate number for each property; for instance, if five cottages stand in a block, there must be five numbers, one for each. Property belonging to one owner within the same fence may be marked with one number, such as "house, outbuildings, and garden."

In roads or passages common to several tenants, all who have the right of user must be put down as occupiers. The owners of the property through which the road passes must be inserted as owners.

In common land, the lord of the manor is put down as owner, and the occupiers are described as commoners tenants of the Manor of Blackacre, and John Smith, "Common Reve," or by whatever name the man who looks after the common in that parish is described. When trustees are owners, and have an appointed clerk, the owners are described as "the trustees of the turnpike road leading from London to Dover—Thomas Brown, Clerk." When trustees, who have no clerk, are owners, they should be named where their property first occurs "The trustees of the Wesleyan Methodist Chapel—viz. Thomas Brown, Henry Smith;" afterwards they may be described without their names appearing again. It is for convenience, more than from necessity, that the names are once set out in full, as will appear presently in treating of the service of the parliamentary notices.

These specimens are given just to indicate the amount of care which should be given to the work, so as to make it perfect at the time. The entering into small details, provided the book of reference is not incumbered with them, is always advisable, as it shows that the work will bear sifting, and that the clerks have inquired into the particulars of the property.

The engineer's attention should be drawn to any inaccuracy on the plan, as it sometimes happens that fences may have been erected or removed since the survey was made, or houses pulled down for any town improvement or other purpose of a similar nature. It is always well to have all points which require clearing up in London communicated from time to time by letter. If this system is rigidly observed, a list of queries is compiled in London, and nothing escapes observation at the last moment. The fair copy of the evidence for the printer or lithographer should always be examined by the clerk who took it against his own draft, so that from first to last the responsibility will lie on the shoulders of one man, who will be able, if required, to give an account of the collection and preparation of the whole of it.

The only other matter which suggests itself here is the address-book. It is absolutely necessary that the addresses of all the owners, lessees, and occupiers, and (if absent from the United Kingdom), the names and addresses of their agents, should be carefully collected at the time of taking the reference.

Before the reference and the plans are lithographed, they must be examined carefully together with the engineer, to see that no property is omitted.

Although the parliamentary notices which are published in the "Gazette" and newspapers are obliged to be inserted previously to the time at which the landowners' notices are drawn, it may be more convenient to consider the preparation of those notices here, as they are immediately dependent on the book of reference.

There is considerable difference in the form of notices to landowners in first and second-class bills. The form of notice required for second-class bills is set forth in the Appendix A. to the Standing Orders of the House of Commons. As the forms of all these documents will be given at a future time, it is only necessary to state here that there are two schedules, or rather a schedule with two sheets to that form of notice.

It was stated, as regards the book of reference, that limits of deviation are marked on the plan, and that all owners, lessees, and occupiers of property within those limits must be included in the book of reference. In the upper sheet of the schedule to the notice all property within eleven yards, or thereabouts, of the proposed work must be placed; and if the property is touched by the centre line of the proposed work, the mode in which the property will be dealt with must be stated. In the lower sheet of the schedule the names of the owners, lessees, and occupiers, and description of the property only is inserted. Perhaps the shortest way will be to refer the reader to the schedule set out in Appendix A. to the Standing Order, in illustration of the practice.

The information in the last column of the upper sheet is arrived at as follows:—The book of reference is sent to the engineer, who marks the sectional reference against each number as the case may be; thus—47, "Within 11 yards;" 48, "Off;" 49, "11 feet cutting," "12 embankment;" 50, "Level." This enables the clerks to draft out the notice to the landowners. The best plan is to have the reference-book divided into parishes, and give out one parish to each clerk, and have a separate notice prepared for property in each parish, even supposing that the same party is owner, lessee, or occupier in several parishes. The clerk then takes the first owner of the property—No. 1. John Smith—and goes through the whole of the reference of that parish, and strikes out John Smith's name wherever it occurs. If the property is within eleven yards, and is intersected by the centre line, the description and other particulars must be set out in the top sheet, and will appear thus:—

No. on Plan.	Description of Property.
72.	House and Garden.
Owner.	Lessee.	Occupier.
John Smith.	Thos. Brown.	Michael Smith.
Embankment.	Cutting.
6 feet 8 in.	12 feet 9 in.

If John Smith is owner of property which is not intersected by the centre line, but which is within eleven yards, there will be no description of the embankments and cuttings; if his property is intersected by the centre line, and there are not any embankments or cuttings contemplated, the word "level" is written in the last column. If John Smith's property is not within eleven yards, or thereabouts, of the centre line, and the word "off" is written against his name in the sectional reference, the description of his property will appear in the lower sheet.

After John Smith's notice has been drawn in respect of property in any particular parish, the next owner is taken, and the owners being exhausted, the lessees' notices are drawn in the same manner; and after them, the occupiers'. When an owner is also lessee or occupier of any property in the same parish, the description of the whole property is included in one notice. When the notices are all drawn, the clerk who took the reference should examine them all, and strike the names out again, so that there may be a double check to insure accuracy. The notices are then copied for service, and the draft is retained as a duplicate notice, examined against the index to the book of reference and numbered. The index to the book of reference and notices is thus prepared—It should be arranged ALPHABETICALLY, and contain seven columns for the following particulars:—No. of notice—Names—O.—L.—O. (for owner, lessee, or occupier)—Residence—Parish; and it will read thus—,

No.	Name.	O.	L.	O.	Residence.	Parish.
1.	Ames, Robert	O.			Deptford, Kent.	Greenwich.
2.	Ames, Robert		L.		Ditto	Dartford.

Thus by a glance at the index it will be seen how many parishes Robert Ames has property in, and the number of his notice, and whether he is owner, lessee, or occupier; and if the draft notices are once arranged numerically, and also alphabetically, and if the book is numbered from 1 to 1,000, beginning with A., any notice can be taken out at once. These details may seem tedious; but in practice, unless these matters are carefully attended to at the time that the notices are drawn and prepared, and the particulars of the reference are fresh in the memories of those who collected it, endless confusion will occur in the event of an opposition on standing orders; these notices need not be served until after the deposit of the plans, and other matters which must be first attended to; the service of them will be treated of in its proper place.

As regards notices to landowners in respect of first-class bills where property is to be taken, the practice is to assimilate them as nearly as possible to the form prescribed for second-class notices. The main difference between notices for first and second class bills is, that there is only one schedule to the former, and, there being no section requisite, the land only required to be taken, and the name of the owner, lessee, and occupier, need be described, without entering into any detail as to the mode in which the land will be dealt with. There is one thing to be observed in drawing landowners' notices—viz. where there is more than one owner, lessee, or occupier to a property, it is not necessary to set them all out in the notice; for if John Smith is joint owner with the others, it would be sufficient in the list of owners in his notice to say—Owners: Yourself and others; Lessees: Thomas Brown and others. When there is more than one lessee this saves much trouble.

The notices must be served on or before the 15th of December immediately preceding the application for the bill [H. C. 20 & 21], either by delivering the same personally to each owner, lessee, or occupier, or by leaving the same at his usual or last-named place of abode; or, in his absence from the United Kingdom, with his agent; or by forwarding the same by post, on or before the 12th day of December, with a sufficient address, in a registered letter.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

The English Funds have maintained the prices of last week with variations from day to day, but there is not any noticeable improvement. The demand for money, and the rate of discount, have also been variable; but the money market has closed to day rather easy than otherwise. In Foreign Securities, very little business is reported. Turkish 6 per Cents. have recovered the depression noticed last week. Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. have issued their prospectus of the Russian Railway scheme, for which they are agents in this country. They bring forward £2000,000 of the present intended issue of £12,000,000. The cost per mile is estimated at £16,511, the total cost at about £40,000,000, and the total distance at 2,585 miles. Some difficulties have arisen in organising the Bank of Turkey. The gentleman to whom the negotiation for establishing the bank was intrusted, on behalf of certain English capitalists, is reported to have returned to this country. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 18th of April, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,734,745, being a decrease of £17,300; and the stock of bullion in both departments is £9,605,749, shewing an increase of £541,187 when compared with the previous return.

The managers of the Bank of France have found it expedient to resort again to the higher rate of premium paid by them on the purchase of gold, a reduction of which last week was considered to be an auspicious event by those persons who believe that the drain of gold on this side is caused by the measures of that establishment. The success of the measure said to be adopted for doubling the capital of the Bank on condition that the amount raised in that way shall be advanced to the Government on the security of a deposit of rentes, and for further accommodating the Government with a loan of £2,400,000 by the Bank, must depend upon the disposition of the public to invest their money with the Bank. The events of recent years have exposed society in France to heavy loss of capital. The grain crop of last year was less than an average quantity, and the harvest was unfavorable. The consequent deficiency was aggravated in some extensive districts by the vast destruction of property, caused by tempestuous weather and violent floods. Also those parts of the country which depend upon the cultivation of the silkworm, have sustained by the failure of last year's supply losses unprecedented for many years, and the cultivators and other inhabitants are reduced to great privations. In the districts of the vine, disease has prevailed during many successive years, each succeeding year failing to replace the capital previously absorbed, and making distress more insupportable. These circumstances are alleged to have resulted in destruction of capital, the amount of which is beyond the largest estimate. Commercial people find some palliation for the evils which press upon them. If they meet a short supply and buy dear, they can sell accordingly. But producers are seldom able to obtain relief. Their harvest of grain, or silk, or the grape fails, and their distress is without remedy.

The management of the loan raised by the Government of France during the late war made it apparent that capital was not then deficient. At the present time, the chief requirement may be no more than a safe mode of putting dormant capital into circulation. One view of the difficulties of the case may be obtained from the efforts made for the purpose of keeping in order the national monetary system, and the exceptional measures resorted to for that purpose. It is also probable that difficulties of a more radical nature may arise from the influence of deficient production, and unfavourable seasons. It appears, by the recent census, that population does not increase. Our daily press reproaches, in unbecoming terms, the character and habits of the French people in regard to marriage, and contrasts the rapid increase of our numbers with the slow progress made in France. The contrast would be more pleasing if the education and habits of our teeming population were less repulsive. Early marriages, and numerous children, have produced in England and Ireland other results than those so boastfully put forward in contrast with our neighbours. If the adverse circumstances with which they have, of late years, had to contend have led to some postponement of the responsibilities of marriage, they will probably find a reward in the earlier return of better times.

 In our article of last week several mistakes occurred:—

The stock of bullion in the Bank should have been stated at £9,064,612.

The decrease at £279,108.

The decrease in two weeks at £978,577.

COMPANIES AND AUDITORS.

Some new and striking portraits have been added to Mr. LINKLATER'S British Bank Album. We are already familiar with the admirable photographs which he has produced from the various types of the genus Director. There was, first, the hungry Director—an unattractive, omnivorous animal, very destructive in his habits, and preying equally on shareholders and creditors. Then we had an almost perfect specimen of the sanguine Director, in the person of Mr. ESDAILE. The peculiarity of this curious creature is, that he never knows when he is ruined, and faces the most formidable difficulties, in the interest of his constituents of course, with easy confidence and unscrupulous craft. Perhaps the most interesting species of all is the innocent Director. His great aptitude for business consists in the facility with which he indorses any amount of knavery without sullying the purity of his own exalted conscience. There could not be a better example of this species than Mr. APSLEY PELLATT, who has surpassed all who have gone before him in the practice of signing everything and knowing nothing. It is only a small step further to the fraudulent Director proper, duly illustrated by Mr. HUMPHREY BROWN. We should be very sorry to think that Directors in general are fairly represented by the heroes of the Royal British Bank; but however exaggerated their qualities may be, these gentlemen are probably only abnormal developments of organisations which are to be found in a less monstrous shape in a large proportion of our commercial companies. Among the motives that often induce men to aspire to a seat at a board are self-interest, and the love of management; while too many undertake the duties of superintendence for no conceivable reason, except because they are totally unfitted for them. These are the mild types which the Royal British swindle had the honour of developing to a perfection till then unapproached. The hungry species was only the common self-interested Director, in a preternatural state of expansion; the crafty Director grew out of the managing man by a natural process; while the peculiarities of the incapables were caricatured by the wilful blindness of the "respectable" section of a board of rogues.

The more recent examinations in the Court of Bankruptcy have given us a glimpse of another part of the joint-stock machinery, which is still more worthy of study from its bearing on the system of audit which prevails in almost every company. Every one knows what an auditor is expected to do. His services would never be required if boards and managers were incapable of doing wrong. While everything is straightforward and above-board, the auditor has only to certify that all is right. It is when directors are given to crooked paths, and managers find their interest in fraud and deception, that the auditor is expected to save his constituents from ruin. Twice a year he is to spend a few hours in unravelling affairs that an ingenious manager has spent months in complicating. He must be independent enough to shrink from no investigation, and too acute to be deceived by the cleverest misrepresentations. All this is expected from a man whose salary is some £20 or £30 a year, and whose only acquaintance with the business which he is called upon to watch is derived from a cursory examination of the statements which the managing body choose to lay before him. The task allotted to him is a palpable impossibility; and though the gentlemen who filled the office in the Royal British Bank may have been a shade worse than ordinary, it is a necessity of an auditor's position that he can never fulfil his duty of guarding against fraud, except where there is no fraud against which to guard. As a rule, an auditor must take so much for granted that it is not very material whether he questions a little more or a little less. If he is ever so resolved to discover everything, he has not a chance against the superior knowledge of officials, whose interest it is to keep him in the dark. His opportunities are about equal to those of a spy who should be sent into the enemy's camp for a few hours with a letter of introduction to the general, and express instructions to examine just what the commander might choose to show him, and nothing else.

The auditors of the Royal British Bank seem to have resigned themselves, without a struggle, to the difficulties of their position. One of them, indeed, when fresh at his work, took a fancy into his head that his audit could not be satisfactory unless he saw the bills and securities, and looked at the accounts. But Mr. CAMERON had some conversation with him, and soon convinced him that he had misconceived his duties. After that, everything went quite smoothly. It was clearly understood between them and the officials that the auditing was a mere farce, and could not possibly be anything else. And a very broad farce it was. One or two of the jokes are excessively droll. For example, Mr. PAGE observes that the answers of the accountant, Mr. CRAUFURD, were always clear and satisfactory. The only doubt he expressed was about two debts, one of £32 and the other of £18, and even these he hoped the bank would ultimately recover. At this very time the auditors had before them a balance-sheet in which one of the items of credit was, "London bills, No. 5, £89,000." All these were overdue, and about £50,000 utterly worthless. The excellent accountant and manager, Mr. CRAUFURD, presented the statement in that shape by the orders of his superior, and admits, with charming naiveté, the object of the arrangement: "It was calculated to deceive the auditors. There can be no doubt about that. It was a mode which had always been adopted. It was intended that they should believe that the items represented good assets." Mr. CHANDLER, the other auditor, even surpassed Mr. PAGE in the facility with which he accepted the statements of the balance-sheet which it was his duty to verify. He took it for granted that the £89,000 were current bills, as they were represented to be, and had not the least notion that they were past due loans. Mr. MULLINS, the worthy solicitor, had told him that any school-boy could audit the accounts; and that led to his acceptance of the office. At first, he picked out a few items, but finding these correct, he was less minute in his examination afterwards. This being the principle on which the functions of the auditors were performed, it is not at all surprising that Mr. CHANDLER remained in happy ignorance of everything which it was desirable that he should know. He never heard a word of HUMPHREY BROWN'S, GWYNNE'S, or other debts; he was not even aware that Mr. BROWN had a drawing account at all; he was ignorant of the existence of the Welsh works; he was not at all startled by a suspense account of £36,000, the bulk of which was a fictitious credit for the unlucky mines; and an "adjusting interest account" of £26,000 never suggested an inquiry as to the source from which it was derived, the item being, in fact, mainly composed of an entry of imaginary interest upon the non-existent capital which had long since been swallowed up in the mining speculation. Even if he had seen the entry, he thinks he should not have made any inquiry about it. Mr. CHANDLER, of course, believed the bank to be quite solvent up to the time of its stoppage; and Mr. PAGE was greatly surprised at that unfortunate event.

What makes Mr. CHANDLER'S simple credulity the more remarkable is, that his own little transactions with the bank might have suggested the possible existence of similar dealings on a larger scale. He had borrowed for himself a few thousands; but then he always acted honourably, and devoted the whole of his £25 salary towards the liquidation of the debt. It is a curious circumstance, too, that he was a co-director with Mr. ESDAILE of the Wandle Waterworks Company, which borrowed £17,000 of the bank, and is now preparing to wind up. Besides this, Mr. CHANDLER sat upon the boards of the Irish Peat Company, and the Chartered Australian Land Mining, Importing, and Refining Company (which he tells us is now "in abeyance"), side by side with directors of the Royal British Bank; but all these opportunities failed to suggest that there might possibly be some matters into which an auditor would do well to inquire.

The repeated exposures of personal misconduct on the part of every one connected with the bank are becoming, to us at least, simply wearisome and disgusting. The cool audacity with which Mr. CRAUFURD avowed every piece of knavery in which he had assisted, and the gross collusion of the auditors, are not the most significant part of the last batch of revelations. What strikes us as much more serious is the evidence which is afforded of the inevitable failure of intermittent auditing as a check upon dishonesty. No auditor, unless he is almost continuously engaged in his inquiries, stands the smallest chance against a system of fraud concocted by those who have the power of mystifying accounts to any extent they please; and although Mr. PAGE and Mr. CHANDLER may have been miracles of acquiescence, almost all auditors are to some extent compelled to follow their example, and to take for granted the veracity and honesty of directors, rather than engage in a conflict where they have not the remotest prospect of obtaining a victory. There are many serious and perhaps insurmountable objections to a system of continuous audit; but if that cannot be made effective, it would be far better for shareholders to abandon the attempt to control their managers at all, instead of relying upon the security of an occasional audit, which serves no purpose whatever but to lull them into false security.

MR. NEATE ON CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS.

The new member for the City of Oxford has published another pamphlet on a subject upon which we should have thought there was no room for any further discussion. Almost every argument for and against the punishment of death has been canvassed so repeatedly, and the ground taken by those who adopt either side of the question is so clear, that it seems difficult to say anything new upon the subject. Stripped of all irrelevant matter the question lies in the smallest possible space. Are we or are we not to continue to hang murderers? Those who support the affirmative of this proposition are of opinion that murder is the most enormous of crimes, and that death is the severest of punishments, and that by associating together the two notions we produce a deep detestation of the offence in all classes of society, the effect of which is to check the crime. They also maintain that however slight a check any punishment may impose on passions of extreme violence, when already inflamed to the extreme verge of crime, the disposition to commit murder may in its earlier stages be greatly checked by the consideration that its indulgence would lead to an ignominious death; and much more than by the fear that it would lead to perpetual imprisonment.

Against this view of the case Mr. NEATE has really nothing to oppose but arguments ad misericordiam, and a set of refinements a great deal too ingenious to be true. He tells us for example, that hanging is a very dreadful thing, and describes at some length the sensations of a man who is going to be hung. Of course it is terrible. It is meant to be so, and if it were ten times more terrible, and thereby perhaps twice as efficient as it is, it would be all the better. As to the argument that the association between murder and hanging makes people detest murder, Mr. NEATE admits its force, but he says that people detest murder without it, and that the same argument would apply with more force to other crimes. The answer is, that from time immemorial murder has been punished with death almost invariably, whereas other crimes (with some exceptions) have only been so punished occasionally; and therefore much of the detestation which people habitually feel for murder is probably derived from the fact that it has been so punished, and must be maintained in the same manner. We could mention one or two other crimes of a very deep dye indeed, which, till lately, were always punished by death, and we believe that since that punishment has ceased to be inflicted the detestation of them has not by any means increased; and that, in countries where the law does not notice them, they are commoner than they are here. As to the effect of capital punishment in terrifying criminals, Mr. NEATE observes, that the peculiar characteristics likely to be found in murderers, and the peculiar nature of the temptations to commit the offence, render it probable that, of all criminals, murderers will be least likely to be deterred by the fear of death. He further argues that the fear of death is less effectual than the fear of perpetual imprisonment would be, because it is less certain to follow detection, and certainty, he observes, is the primary cause of the efficiency of any punishment whatever. We attach less weight than Mr. NEATE to the importance of certainty as a deterring element in punishment. Absolute certainty of imprisonment for life would probably have greater deterring force on a murderer than a strong probability of being hanged; but if the chance of his being hanged were even, and the chance of his being perpetually imprisoned as five to four, we think that the difference in the severity would more than overbalance the difference in the probability of the punishment. We think, moreover, that Mr. NEATE overrates the uncertainty which the timidity of jurors throws over the results of capital trials. Uncertainty, at any rate, is a defect in the working of the criminal law, whatever view we may take of capital punishment; and it is a defect which may be to a great extent remedied by sufficiently obvious means.

There is, however, one point in the comparison between capital and secondary punishment which Mr. NEATE quite overlooks. However much the uncertainty of its infliction may diminish the terror of capital punishment, there can be no doubt that the principal element of its horror is the uncertainty of its effects, and the certainty that, whatever they may be, no human efforts can in the least degree avail to alter them. A man, especially if he is an habitual criminal, knows pretty well what imprisonment is like; he can form a sort of picture of the life which he would lead in prison; he may hope that society will get tired of punishing him, and that the same sort of tenderness which has spared his life may induce people in course of time to think that perpetual imprisonment is too hard a lot, even for an assassin. But when the gate of death is once passed, there is no return. All science ends there. No analogy gives more than a taper light in that thick darkness. Death leaves the man alone with his sin. He goes on his way, and we see him no more. This is what gives capital punishment its true value; and so long as life and death retain their present relations, nothing else can equal its effect.

Of the general temper of Mr. NEATE'S pamphlet we cannot speak highly. It is singularly violent, and contains a great deal of matter which is quite foreign to the merits of the question. It begins, for example, with a vehement denunciation of the wickedness of the old penal laws of the last century, which are brought into the discussion professedly because "it is a good thing that nations should be reminded of their sins;" but the manner in which Mr. NEATE, like other advocates of his view of the question, continually recurs to a past state of things, leaves on the reader's mind an impression that, however he may rejoice over the mitigation of the severity of the law, he feels some soreness at the degree in which that measure has weakened his own position. He cannot resist the temptation of making an opportunity to show us how he would have thundered at the old system if it had been still in force. Bad as that system was, Mr. NEATE does not exactly lay the blame of it on the shoulders to which it properly belongs. It was principally, he says, the growth of the wicked eighteenth century, which, with a very offensive sneer he calls "the least glorious, though it must be owned the most English period of our history." He goes on to say, that before that time "the principles of a baser age"—namely, that property should be protected at the expense of life—had only been fully anticipated by Acts of HENRY VIII. and EDWARD VI. against horse-stealing. Can a Barrister and a Member of Parliament really be ignorant that grand larceny, i.e. stealing above the value of one shilling, was felony as far back as the days of EDWARD I., and that this severe law was executed with such unsparing rigour by HENRY VIII. that he hung people all through his reign at the rate of about 2,000 a-year?

Mr. NEATE'S savage hostility to the memory of the judges of the last century, and to English criminal law in general, occasionally leads him into the most flagrant absurdities. He speaks, for example, of the love of freedom which existed in this country in the eighteenth century as "a gross—a sensual—almost an animal passion." Is that the language which a gentleman and a scholar ought to employ in speaking of the feelings which were represented by such men as BURKE, and Lord CAMDEN, and Lord CHATHAM—to say nothing of CHARLES JAMES FOX? Is it fair to speak with the most bitter contempt of the English law and English judges of that time, and yet not to say one word of the faults into which other nations fell? Mr. NEATE hints that the French in particular were infinitely our superiors in humanity. Certainly, by English law, a man was pressed to death for standing mute in 1735; but, horrible as was this penalty, it was the man's own voluntary choice. It is not quite the same thing to starve a child to death simpliciter, and to give it the choice between starving to death and overcoming a prejudice against boiled mutton. Though, however, English law is chargeable with this modified form of torture, it is certainly not chargeable with breaking men on the wheel, cutting out their tongues during their lifetime, or quartering them by four horses after lacerating their flesh with red-hot pincers; and all these things were done by the humane French in the course of the last century. Mr. NEATE, however, is so anxious to decry his country, that he goes so far as to say that there was a kind of mercy in death by torture, because "pain and decay are man's natural comforters against the coming of his great enemy." Following out this idea, if Mr. NEATE could not abolish capital punishment he ought to wish us to flay a woman alive for a child murder, to break men on the wheel for assassination from jealousy, to burn them for murder combined with robbery, and to reserve simple hanging for such men as PALMER or RUSH.

We might extend our observations on this subject to a great length, but we have done enough to show the character of the pamphlet.

Legal News.

The LORD CHANCELLOR and the LORDS JUSTICES have been sitting together in the Court of Appeal, and this arrangement, we believe, is considered by Lord CRANWORTH to be most nearly in accordance with the intention of the Legislature, but still it is liable to be departed from whenever there is an arrear of unheard appeals. We cannot think that this uncertainty in the constitution of the Court of Appeal can be at all satisfactory to the suitors. It is quite a matter of accident whether a judgment of the Master of the Rolls, or of one of the Vice-Chancellors, will be reviewed by one, two, or three judges. But if the powers of a single intellect suffice for the decision of appeals, why should three minds be employed upon them, and three judicial salaries be incurred? If, again, three judges are employed upon any cause, all the suitors who resort to the same tribunal have a right to the same attention? Suppose, again, an appeal from a decision of the LORD CHANCELLOR and the LORDS JUSTICES to the House of Lords, and that that august body should be represented for the occasion, as has sometimes happened, by Lord CRANWORTH and two lay peers. We presume that such an absurdity as this would not be permitted to occur; but it is a sufficient condemnation of our present judicial arrangements to admit that it would be quite according to law. Even under peculiarly favourable circumstances the presence in the House of Lords of two ex-chancellors or retired judges to assist the CHANCELLOR is the very utmost that an appellant could expect. But thus there would be a court of three judges to review the decision of an equal number, and it is quite an open question to which tribunal should be ascribed the preponderating weight of wisdom.

The Daily News of yesterday speaks of a change in the custody of the Great Seal as imminent. We should suppose that the want of a more vigorous and efficient Chancellor has for some time been evident to everybody not a minister. But are we to believe that the recesses of the Cabinet have only now been penetrated by the conviction of this necessity? The same journal disposes rather easily of the pretensions of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, and sets up Sir W. P. WOOD as the most eligible successor to Lord CRANWORTH. The week has been fertile in occurrences suited to call forth endless discussion in professional circles. There was the characteristic declaration of Sir A. COCKBURN at Southampton, that it is a "slow" thing to be Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and that the only life worth living is that of advocate and politician, with its excitement and its brilliant chances. Mr. PHINN is of the same opinion as his distinguished friend, and he has chosen a favourable moment to return to practice. Being no longer in the House of Commons, he may expect a fair share of the plentiful crop of business which is promised before the election committees.

THE REMUNERATION OF SOLICITORS.

(From the Daily News).

We published on Tuesday the programme of the Law Amendment Society. But a programme is one thing, and performance another. Will anything serious be done in the first session of the new Parliament towards law reform? Most people seem agreed that something ought to be done; and, indeed, several schemes of reform have not only been propounded, but have been actually embodied in draft bills. But the question recurs—even if these bills are introduced—will they be permitted to pass? Is the Lord Chancellor—are the law officers—really bent upon improvement? For instance, there is the new scheme for facilitating the transfer of land. This plan has been propounded in a most elaborate report, drawn up by some of the ablest men in Parliament, and sanctioned by eminent barristers and experienced solicitors. It is no party measure, for its authors are to be found on both sides of the Speaker's chair. It will benefit many, and, as we believe, will injure no one. Land will be turned into a marketable commodity, which it can scarcely be said to be at present. Landowners will receive a better price for their property if they sell it, and will be able to borrow money with greater facility. The law of real property will be greatly simplified; transactions will be increased; and if the scheme be adopted in its integrity, solicitors' profits will not, on the whole, be diminished. Why, then, should a scheme, which seems to possess so many advantages and so few disadvantages, fail to receive the sanction of the Legislature? If, indeed, the mass of members, or of their constituents, could be made to understand the subject, success would be almost certain; but with laymen, and even professional lawyers, ignorance and prejudice on this subject are still sadly prevalent. To combat this ignorance and prejudice may be a work of time, but with patience and energy, success is sure. There is nothing more encouraging to the law reformer than to take a volume of Jeremy Bentham and examine its contents. There you will find the far-seeing philosopher arguing desperately in favour of changes which were then denounced as wild chimeras, but which have now, in many cases, become law. The present rules of evidence are a monument of Bentham's sagacity. The monstrous absurdity of the old rules, and the common sense of the new rules, were illustrated by him with overwhelming power, and yet it took some fifty years to induce lawyers to adopt them. At length these principles of common sense were adopted, and now the attempt to re-enact the old principles would be scarcely be more hopeful than to attempt to re-enact the Heptarchy. And all the vehement opposition to Bentham's views arose principally from ignorance. Laymen could not be got to understand them, and lawyers either could not or would not. In fact, the only possible mode of satisfying a practical lawyer that his objections are idle, is by showing the new law in operation. Of late years, this has received abundant practical proof. The science of pleading was to cease with the abolition of special demurrers, and, according to Lord Truro, the domestic fireside was to vanish when a wife was admitted as a witness. But all this has proved a distempered dream. Nevertheless, the same alarming predictions are common now.

We are gravely told that if this new bill for the transfer of land passes into law, the Chancery bar and the solicitors must be destroyed. This is the merest chimera. Still it is true enough that if the bill passes, some alteration must be effected in the mode of remunerating solicitors. Unless provision is made for this purpose, we believe that the success of any scheme for reforming conveyancing is very doubtful. The power of attorneys in both Houses of the Legislature is surprising, not to say somewhat alarming. We will not venture to calculate how many seats in Parliament depend on their fiat. They make and unmake not a few of our senators. We speak not so much of the London attorneys as of the country attorneys. The truth is, the great landed proprietors are in the hands of their men of business. These useful agents know all about the family's affairs, they have lent money on mortgage of the family estates, they can "put on the screw" at pleasure; residing in the country, and being brought much into contact with the voters, they possess great personal influence. Besides this, they are lawyers. Their trade is a mystery: and at the same time their aid in the way of that trade is absolutely necessary. The average country gentlemen, ignorant as he is of law, finds himself in the hands of a master when he enters his lawyer's office. It is not that attorneys are a bit worse than other people, but circumstances give them more influence. Now, it is quite obvious that unless this powerful class are conciliated it is idle to expect to pass any bill for facilitating the transfer of land. If the country attorneys throughout the kingdom choose to go to members, and say, "this bill will ruin me; it must be thrown out, or your seat is lost"—we may rest assured that a large proportion of our representatives will at once succumb. Something must, therefore, be done to disarm opposition, and something can be done. Indeed, justice demands it. The attorney or solicitor must cease to be paid according to the length of the deeds. He must be paid by means of a per centage. Whether a general measure affecting solicitors' fees is to be passed or not, is for the present immaterial. At all events, the system as to conveyancing fees must be altered, and a per centage on the purchase-money is the plan suggested.

It is quite a mistake to suppose that as things stand at present solicitors are overpaid on the whole. It is true that for some things they are grossly overpaid; but it is equally true that for other things they are as grossly underpaid. It is needless to remind those who understand anything of law, that the length of one document, as compared with that of another document, is no test whatever as to its relative value—as to whether one paper has cost more trouble in preparing than another. The old story of the clergyman who apologised for the length of his sermon by saying that he had no time to make it short, applies equally to law. If a lawyer is to be paid according to length, and length only, it is obvious that he must draw a document of such a length as will remunerate him for his trouble. He who hires a cab by time, must expect to be driven rather slowly. Human beings—whether lawyers or cabmen—will protect themselves.

Therefore, if any bill is about to be passed which, without diminishing the trouble of solicitors, will diminish the quantity of writing, some scheme must be devised by which the fair emoluments of the solicitor will be protected. The bill for the transfer of land will no doubt have the effect of diminishing the number and length of deeds. But to pass an act, the effect of which will be to shorten deeds, while you still leave solicitors to be paid solely according to the length of deeds, will operate with unfair severity on them, unless, as things stand at present, they are overpaid. But, as things stand at present, they are not, on the whole, overpaid; it is obvious, then, that with the alteration of the law, an altered mode of payment must be resorted to. The plan of paying solicitors in case of the sale and purchase of land by a per centage of the purchase-money, will meet the difficulty. And it will have this advantage: that whilst it will increase the sum to be paid by the large purchaser and rich man, it will relieve the small purchaser and poor man from a grievous burden. To this we may add, that it is a system sanctioned by the practice both of Scotland and France.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Re VARTY & OWEN.—Before Mr. Commissioner FONBLANQUE.

In this case a petition for arrangement had been presented. The case was adjourned into court, and the parties were made bankrupt. The joint estate had paid 15*s.* in the pound, and the separate estate of Varty 4*s.* 8*d.* in the pound. Under the separate estate of Owen two debts of small amount were proved, which would have prevented an application for the statutable allowance, as there were not sufficient assets to pay even 5*s.* in the pound.

Bower, Son, & Cotton, for bankrupts; Rutter, for assignees; Stansfeld, official assignee.

The bankrupts' solicitors had, after the presentation of the petition, and before the adjudication, incurred divers costs in preparing powers of attorney to vote, and in attendances for the purpose of inducing the creditors to accept the terms offered. Before the adjudication, but after the presentation of the petition for arrangement, the bankrupts' solicitors received money on account of costs. The official assignee proposed to set off the amount so paid against the taxed costs of the petition and proceedings up to choice of assignees. Matter mentioned to the Commissioner, and case of Ex parte Harrison re Lawford (W. R., 17 Jan. 1857, 193), cited to show that the petition for arrangement was no act of bankruptcy.

The COMMISSIONER took time to consider, and ultimately decided that the solicitors had the right of retainer contended for, and directed the costs to be taxed.

Application was then made to erase the two proofs on Owen's separate estate, the admitted and avowed reason being to enable him to make a claim for the statutable allowance, under s. 195 of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act. The consents signed by the creditors, and proved by the attesting witnesses, were tendered. The application was opposed as being for a purpose.

The COMMISSIONER decided that the creditors had as much right to have their proofs expunged as to put them on the file, if the rights between the creditors and the assignees were not affected thereby; and said, that he could not look at the reason why they were expunged.

The two proofs on Owen's estate having been expunged, and therefore no proofs appearing on the proceedings, application was made, after twelve months from the date of adjudication, and after certificate of second class had been awarded, for the statutable allowance. To which it was objected, that no dividend meeting under Owen's separate estate had been held. On which ground the Commissioner held that no statutable allowance could be given.

The COMMISSIONER's attention was called to the fact that the assignees would not apply for a dividend meeting, as they had nothing to pay, and no debts on which to pay a dividend even if they had assets. Whereupon the Commissioner decided that he would appoint a dividend meeting at the bankrupt's request.

A dividend meeting having been held on the separate estate of Owen, application was made for the statutable allowance (fifteen shillings in the pound having been paid), which amounted to £126, being one moiety of the £10 per cent. on the dividend paid.

This amount was objected to on the ground that the bankrupts were entitled, according to the articles of co-partnership, in thirds—viz. Varty to two-thirds, and Owen to one-third—and that, therefore, Owen was only entitled to £84; and this anomaly was pointed out, that a bankrupt who joined without capital might, through the bankruptcy, be able to start in business again with capital.

Mr. Stansfeld reported that the bankrupt Owen had not been sufficiently attentive.

The COMMISSIONER said that the question as to attention should have been brought forward at the certificate meeting; and held, that, on the broad principle that joint bankrupts had no rights as between themselves until all the joint debts were paid, each was entitled to a share of the £10 per cent., calculated on the number of parties irrespective of the articles.

The case of Ex parte Lomas (1 Mont. & Ayr. 525) was cited to the Commissioner, who, after reading the case, observed, that it only decided that each bankrupt was entitled to the allowance on his separate estate, and "his share of the joint estate," but that there was nothing in the case to show what "his share" meant.

BEFORE V. C. KINDERSLEY.

April 23rd.—WILTON EXECUTOR v. HILL.

A plaintiff whose bill has been dismissed with costs, and who has been imprisoned, and is in the hands of a sheriff, is entitled (on his own application) to be turned over to the Queen's Prison.

The plaintiff, as executor of the first tenant for life, filed his bill in the year 1855 against the defendants, for the purpose of taking their accounts, and also for breaches of trust, but as there had been another bill filed by the second tenant for life for the same purposes and under the decree in which he could come in and prosecute the same inquiries, the bill was dismissed against him on June 27, 1856, with costs; these were taxed, and attachments issued against the plaintiff, who, under them, was lodged in the custody of the Sheriff of Surrey. Mr. Ward, on the 17th of April, applied on the plaintiff's own behalf, founded on the affidavit of his solicitor, that a habeas cum causis should issue, directed to the Sheriff of Surrey; this was ordered, and, on its being this day returnable, and the plaintiff being brought to the bar of the court, it was, on the motion of Mr. Ward, ordered that the said Henry Wilton the elder, the plaintiff, be turned over to the Queen's prison; and it was ordered that he should remain there until he should pay the sums mentioned in the attachments, clear his contempt, and the court make further order.—Johnson v. Ledley, 12th June, 1807; Dew v. Clarke, 14th May, 1827; Yeates v. Yeates, 15th March, 1854.

ASSIZES AT MANCHESTER.—At the late Salford Sessions the magistrates passed the following resolution:—"That this court is of opinion that the holding of the assizes for the hundred of Salford, at Liverpool, is the source of great inconvenience and unnecessary cost to the inhabitants of the hundred; and that such inconvenience and cost may and ought to be remedied by assizes being held at Manchester, for the transaction of the large criminal and civil business arising within the hundred of Salford.

LEGAL EDUCATION.—The two societies of the Inner and Middle Temple have recently pronounced in favour of a compulsory examination for candidates aspiring to the bar. We hear that the benchers of Gray's-inn have arrived at a different conclusion. The opinion of Lincoln's-inn will be most important, and we anxiously, but hopefully, await its decision. Under any circumstances, a bill to establish a compulsory examination will be introduced into the House of Commons during this session.—Law Amendment Journal.

IN RE HALL AND HALL, BANKRUPTS.—The bankrupts, Henry Hall and Cheslyn Hall, were solicitors, of New Boswell-court. The adjourned examination meeting was held on the 24th ult., but no accounts had yet been filed.—Mr. Whitmore, the official assignee, submitted his accounts, showing a balance in hand of £2,933, after paying the first dividend of 2s. in the pound on debts of £105,453.—Mr. Lawrance, for the assignees, stated that there had been several adjournments, owing to the accounts of the bankrupts not being ready. The adjournments were inevitable, as they could not make out proper accounts till they had prepared their bills of costs. These were still incomplete, and the same reason, therefore, existed for an adjournment. The only question was as to the continuance of the allowance. Messrs. Hall had worked exceedingly hard. No one but the bankrupts could so well attend to this business; and the allowance had been £5 a week each, and, though it was a heavy charge upon the estate, the assignees did not think it ought to be reduced.—Mr. Rivington, who opposed, said, that nearly £800 had been expended since the bankruptcy, in the preparation of these accounts—£450 in allowance, and nearly £350 in office expenses.—Mr. Whitmore, the official assignee, said he had no complaint to make against the bankrupts; but ten months did seem an extraordinary time to be occupied in making out a lawyer's bill of costs. In answer to the Commissioner, Mr. Lawrance said, that £15,438 had passed through the hands of the official assignee; a dividend of 2s. had been paid, and £2,933 remained in hand. The total expense, including the allowance to both bankrupts, was £14 a week. As requested by the court at the last meeting, his firm had certified from time to time that the bankrupts had been diligently occupied in making out these bills of costs, some of which were fifteen or twenty years old. It was probable the insolvency had arisen from this circumstance.—His Honour said, he would continue the allowance of £5 a week each up to the 26th of June, which would be just twelve months from its commencement, and not a week longer.

PATENT EXTRAORDINARY.—The case of Moses v. Baylis, before V. C. Stuart, was a bill for the specific performance of an agreement by the defendant to assist the plaintiff in procuring, and of working when obtained, a patent for the discovery by the latter of an invention for propelling ships through the water without the aid of steam, and independently of the wind, by means of animals, it being proposed by the plaintiff to use horses and elephants for propelling large ships.

The paragraphs in some of the affidavits in this case not being numbered, as required by the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 37, the Vice-Chancellor took occasion to animadvert on the non-observance of the above enactment, and said that as it was the first, so he hoped it would be the last time he should have occasion to complain of a neglect to comply with the requisition of the above section.

A LEGISLATIVE ENTANGLEMENT.—In a late case Lord Campbell said that the act which had been passed, the 31st of George 3, for the regulation of all matters in a certain township was found so defective, that another act was passed, which recited that the former act had been found in many respects so defective and inefficient that it was desirable that it should be amended. The latter statute, the 6th of George 4, was certainly obscurum per obscurius, and threw the court into a difficulty which they must endeavour to surmount; but his lordship said he was afraid the court could not put any construction upon it which would not operate great injustice to some in the township. His lordship only hoped a third statute would not become necessary, which might be worse than the first. His lordship hoped that local bills, as well as bills of a general character, would soon be subject to some competent examination before they were passed.

RE FULCHER, INSOLVENT.—Mr. Howard sued the insolvent in the Rochford County Court to recover money he had intrusted to him, and obtained a judgment, the judge committing the insolvent to prison for forty days, and subsequently for thirty-one days in default of payment. The insolvent then came to London, and in two or three days afterwards was arrested, as was alleged, by a friend, to enable him to pass through this court and obtain relief from his debts. Upon the part of the opposing creditor it was submitted that the proceeding was collusive and intended to defeat the County Court which had ordered payment of the debt by instalments, as Mr. Howard was willing to receive it.—Mr. Commissioner Murphy said, the arrest was evidently intended as an experiment to defeat the County Court by means of this court, and could not be allowed to succeed. As a friend had put the insolvent into prison, he must further demonstrate his friendship by letting him out again. The petition must be dismissed.

The new Speaker Mr. Evelyn Denison, Member for North Nottinghamshire, has appointed the Hon. George Waldegrave as his secretary, and Mr. G. K. Rickards as his counsel and examiner of election recognisances.

Mr. G. Romaine, late deputy judge advocate to the Forces in the East, and who unsuccessfully contested the borough of Chatham at the late election, has been appointed Second Secretary to the Admiralty, in the place of Mr. Phinn resigned.

Recent Decisions in Chancery.

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—DOUBLE CONTINGENCY.

Grey v. Pearson, 5 W. R. 454.

This case, recently decided by the House of Lords, is likely to exercise an influence upon construction cases beyond the immediate subject of the decision itself. The main point was this:—There was a devise to trustees to maintain A. till twenty-one, and then upon trust for A. in tail; "but in case he shall die under the age of twenty-one years, and without issue," then over. A. did attain twenty-one, but died without issue; and, according to the strict words, the gift over failed, because the double event—death under the age of twenty-one, and death without issue—had not happened. The question was, whether the words of the will could be so far modified as to let in the gift over, and prevent an intestacy. There were two possible ways of doing this. One would have been to change and into or, so as to make the gift over take effect on either of the two events. But this construction was unanimously rejected, and indeed was scarcely pressed in argument, because it would have involved the absurd consequence, that if the first tenant in tail had died under twenty-one, leaving issue, they would, by such an interpretation, have been excluded from the succession which the testator intended for them; and though words may be forced in order to give effect to a devise, this will never be done when the consequence (either in the actual events which have happened, or in any other events which might have happened) would be to destroy the primary intention of the testator.

The other modification of the strict words suggested for the sake of preserving the gift in remainder was in substance to reject the words relating to death under twenty-one, and to read the will as a gift to A. in tail with a remainder to take effect on the death of A. without issue, whether that occurred before or after the attainment of his majority. This was the view taken by Lord St. Leonards, who explained the introduction of the words relating to the age of twenty-one by the previous clause, by which the trustees were clothed with the legal estate, and directed to maintain A. until the age of twenty-one. The House of Lords has, however, decided the other way, the Lord Chancellor and Lord Wensleydale voting in opposition to the construction of Lord St. Leonards. Substantially, the decision was between two conflicting cases, both of which were almost absolutely in point Brownsword v. Edwards, before Lord (Hardwicke, 2 Ves. 242) and Doe v. Jessop (12 East, 288). The former is now overruled, after having embarrassed conveyancers for more than a century.

The broad question opened up by the judgments is, how far a court is justified in modifying the language used by a testator. One class of cases, where there is no dispute as to the principle, is, where a clause, if left unchanged, would be repugnant to other clauses contained in the will.

A second class of cases, to which Brownsword v. Edwards belongs, is, where the change is made, because the clause as it stands is, or is supposed to be, repugnant, not to any other particular limitations in the will, but to what is supposed to be the general intention of the testator. The whole tone of the observations of the Chancellor and of Lord Wensleydale is opposed to the allowance of this license of construction at all; and, had not the principle been acted on by the House of Lords itself in former times, it would probably now have been exploded entirely. The result seems to be, that, except where the settled authorities have distinctly sanctioned the application of this rule, it will not in future be considered allowable to change the language of a testator, unless something more than a conjectural intention can be found to justify the change. The doctrine of Fairfield v. Morgan (2 B. & P. N. R. 38), however, remains untouched. This was, that when a testator devises an estate so as to give the control of the fee simple, but in case the devisee dies under twenty-one or without issue then over, in such a case the court will read or as and, rather than defeat the general intention of preserving the estate at all events to the issue of the tenant in tail. But although to this extent the language of a will may still be modified, even in the absence of any absurdity or repugnancy, Grey v. Pearson may be considered as having established, on all questions not absolutely concluded by authority, the stricter rule of abiding by the grammatical sense of the words of a will in preference to any conjectures as to the testator's intentions. All modern cases have shown a decided tendency towards this principle of construction, and the conflicting judgments in the House of Lords really represented the contest between the old and the modern doctrines of construction—the former being supported by Lord St. Leonards, the latter by the Chancellor, and still more emphatically by Lord Wensleydale. The general rule to be followed is thus laid down by Lord Wensleydale—"I have been long and deeply impressed with the wisdom of the rule, now, I believe, universally adopted, at least, in the courts of law at Westminster Hall, that in construing wills, and, indeed, statutes and all written instruments, the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words is to be adhered to, unless that would lead to some absurdity or some repugnance, or inconsistency with the rest of the instrument, in which case the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words may be modified so as to avoid that absurdity or inconsistency." And he further adds, "The principle of construction which I have laid down is, in my mind, of such paramount consequence, that I think it much more important to adhere to it than to follow the authority of the previous decisions of courts upon words in other wills resembling these."

PRACTICE—SERVICE.—INFANT—SUING IN FORMA PAUPERIS—PAYMENT OF LEGACY DUTY—PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS—WINDING UP.

In Pycroft v. Williams (5 W. R. 464), leaving a copy of an order with the servant of a party, at his dwelling-house, was held by Wood, V. C., to be good service, rendering the party liable to an attachment for disobedience of the order, the party having himself, previously to such service, refused to receive the copy of the order.

In Grimwood v. Shave (Id. 482) the Lord Chancellor required a special certificate of counsel where a party sought to appeal in formâ pauperis without paying the usual deposit of £20. His Lordship said, that the certificate must be something more than what is commonly signed by counsel in appeal cases; that it must be to the effect that, in the opinion of the counsel signing it, there are substantial grounds of appeal, such as will probably lead to the reversal or alteration of the decree or order of the court below.

The Lord Chancellor, in Lindsey v. Tyrrell (Ib.), allowed an infant to sue in formâ pauperis by his next friend. There appears to be no other reported case in which a court of equity has given such an authority; and we are told that the Master of the Rolls, when applied to in this case for leave to file a bill, refused to grant leave, not only upon the ground of there being no precedent for such an order, but also because he considered it to be vicious in principle.

Bryan v. Mansion (Id. 483) is important, as showing the onus that is at present thrown upon solicitors in respect of providing for the payment of legacy duty on moneys received by their clients through the Court of Chancery. The effect of the decision may be shortly stated to be as follows:—Wherever money is paid out of court under a will, directly or indirectly, legacy duty being payable, the party receiving it is bound to see that the duty is paid. In the present case, money was paid to the incumbrancer of an annuity, and it appeared that the fund was not exhausted by the sum ordered to be paid. The order made no provision for the payment of the duty, and, upon the petition of the Attorney-General, the party who received the money was ordered to pay the duty and the costs of the application. Prior to 1854 the practice was to allow fees to the clerks in the Accountant General's office for supplying information to the Stamp-office as to the legacies payable under orders of the Court of Chancery; but by a General Order of March, 1854, that duty was imposed upon the Registrars, who were thereby ordered to notify the fact in the decrees and orders of the court, wherever legacy or succession duty was payable. From the language of the Lord Chancellor in the present case, however, it would appear that, wherever duty is payable under the Act, the court will hold it to be incumbent on the solicitor of the party getting money out of court, to see that the payment of the duty is provided for in the order under which he obtains the money, at the peril of the costs of a special application to the Court by the Attorney-General, such as was made in Bryan v. Mansion.

By the 18th sect. of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, the Court has power, upon the application of a plaintiff in any suit, to make an order for the production by any defendant, upon oath, of such of the documents in his possession or power relating to matters in the suit as the Court shall think right.

In The Attorney-General v. The East Dereham Corn Exchange Company (Id. 486), Wood, V. C., was of opinion that, under this section, he could not make an order for the production of documents upon oath against the secretary of the defendants' company, the secretary not being a party to the suit, inasmuch as the Act only gave jurisdiction to make an order against a defendant; and his Honour did not consider that the company had the power of compelling their officer to produce documents upon oath.

In re The General Indemnity Assurance Society (Id. 465), Wood, V. C., has repeated what has lately been insisted upon in other branches of the Court—viz. that, in cases under the Winding-up Acts, the costs of one petition only would be allowed, unless it were clearly shown that circumstances required, or at all events justified, the presentation of another.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNEES BRINGING ACTION WITHOUT LEAVE—EFFECT OF.

Lee v. Sangster, 5 W. R., C. P., 487.

It is one of the provisions of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act, 1849 (s. 153), that the assignees may commence and prosecute any action which the bankrupt might have commenced or prosecuted, on applying for and obtaining the leave of the Court of Bankruptcy for that purpose, but not otherwise. In the above case, the action had been commenced by the assignees without first procuring leave, and this was an application to the Court in which the action was pending to stay proceedings therein on that ground; but the Court discharged a rule nisi which had been obtained to that effect (though without costs), as they held that all that was intended by the statute was to make it necessary to obtain leave, as between the assignees and the Court of Bankruptcy, but not as between the assignees and the other party to the suit. And the court added that this intention of the Legislature was, in their opinion, further indicated, by the direction the Act contained that the costs of actions brought after obtaining the requisite leave, should be allowed out of the bankrupt's estate.

INSPECTION OF DOCUMENTS—PRACTICE AS TO.

British Empire Shipping Co. v. Soames, 5 W. R., Q. B., 489.

In this case a rule was applied for on behalf of the plaintiffs, to be allowed to inspect certain documents in the possession of the defendants. The plaintiffs were the owners of a vessel which had been repaired by the defendants; and a large sum, claimed as the defendants' charges for such repair, had been paid under protest, the vessel having been detained by the defendants till their bill should be paid. The present action was brought to recover back a part of the sum so paid, the plaintiffs alleging that they had paid more than was really due with regard to the work performed. And the application now before the Court was, to be allowed to inspect the accounts of the various tradesmen and others whom the defendants had employed, and from which they had made out the bill the plaintiffs had paid under protest. The Court, however, said the case was not within the contemplation of the Legislature when the Act for allowing an inspection of documents became law; and they refused the rule.

It is quite clear that such an inspection as above prayed for would not be allowed at common law, inasmuch as the defendants held the accounts in question upon no trust, either express or implied, to produce them when necessary for the use of the plaintiffs; and so also, under the Evidence Amendment Act of 1851, it is a sufficient answer for the party against whom the inspection is sought, to establish (as the defendants in the above case were in a position to establish) that the documents related to his own case, and not to that of the party applying (see Hunt v. Hewitt, 7 Exch. 236). Thus, too, the case of Bolton v. The Corporation of Liverpool (1 Myl. & K. 88), lays down this clear rule with regard to applications under the Evidence Amendment Act, "a party has a right to the production of deeds sustaining his own case affirmatively, but not those which are not immediately connected with the support of his own title, and which form part of his adversary's. He cannot call for those which, instead of supporting his title, defeat it by entitling his adversary."

DE MINIMIS NON CURAT LEX—FRIVOLOUS DEMAND.

Brown v. Hellaby, 5 W. R., Exch., 490.

This was an application to set aside an award made by a county court judge on a compulsory reference to him of the above action, on the ground that he had given a general judgment for the defendant, whereas he should have found specifically on the several issues which had been joined.

In refusing the rule, the following significant observations fell from the Chief Baron:—"Without saying when the Court will interfere in these compulsory references, we find, from the affidavits in this case, that the matters in dispute which are made the ground of this application only amount to £2 2*s*., which is a sum for which we should not disturb the verdict of any jury under any circumstances. We think, therefore, for that reason (a sort of de minimis non curat lex) we ought not to grant the rule, and for that reason only."

It will be remembered, that it has always formed part of the course of the Courts to stay proceedings in any action where it appears that the demand is for a debt under forty shillings (see Kennard v. Jones, 4 T. R. 495). The above application seems to have been dealt with on a similar principle.

LORD CAMPBELL'S ACT—LIABILITY OF OWNER OF PROPERTY—MASTER AND SERVANT.

Dynan v. Leech, 5 W. R., Exch., 490.

This was an action brought by the administratrix of M. D. under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 93. The deceased had been in the employ of a sugar refiner, and while so engaged had been accidentally killed in the manufactory of his master (the defendant), by the falling of a loaded sugar mould, which became, by a jerk, displaced from a clip he had himself fastened. The present application was for a rule to set aside a nonsuit; and it was pressed for on the authority of Paterson v. Wallace (1 M'Q. App. Ca. 748), in which the House of Lords held that the owner of a mine was responsible for the death of a miner killed by the falling of a stone from the roof of the mine, which had been improperly left by the owners in a dangerous position after the danger had been pointed out. But in the present case the Court replied, that the above decision had no reference to the doctrine of master and servant, but to the obligation attaching to every owner of property to take care that it does no injury to others; and they said, that the general principle of law was, that a servant takes upon himself the risk of any accident not produced by the negligence of his employer; and that the facts of the present case showed that the deceased himself was directly contributing to the mischief.

Springbett v. King, 1 H. & N. 662.

This was an action for assault, in which, a verdict having been found for the plaintiff with forty shillings damages, the judge who tried the cause refused at the trial to certify for costs. A summons was then taken out, calling on the defendant to show cause why the plaintiff should not recover his costs, on the ground that there was a concurrent jurisdiction in the superior court. This application was supported by the joint affidavit of the plaintiff and of the clerk of his attorney, disclosing some evidence that the defendant did not dwell or carry on his business within the jurisdiction of the county court within which the cause of action arose; and it also appeared, that, after diligent inquiries, the plaintiff had been unable to ascertain the residence of the defendant; and that his attorney had refused to give any information—writing, in answer to a request by the plaintiff's attorney to be informed as to the residence of the defendant, "My client declines to render any assistance." Upon these affidavits, Bramwell, B., made an order that the plaintiff should recover his costs, on the ground that there was primâ facie evidence of a concurrent jurisdiction, which was sufficient to make the fact of such concurrent jurisdiction appear to his satisfaction within the meaning of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54, s. 4; and in this construction of the Act he was supported by the Court.

NOTICE TO ADMIT—EFFECT OF—COSTS.

The Oxford, Worcester, and Wolverhampton Railway Company v. Scudamore, 1 H. & N. 666.

This was an application for a review of taxation of costs. A verdict had been found for the defendant, and after taxing his costs the plaintiffs claimed to be allowed the costs of proving certain documents which the defendant had refused, on notice, to admit, and which had been proved at the trial at an expense of more than £100. The defendant's attorney opposed the allowance of such costs, and a judge afterwards certified that the refusal to admit the documents in question was reasonable: whereupon the Master refused to allow the costs. It was now declared by the Court—1 That all one party has a right to ask from the other is, to admit the due execution of documents. 2. That if he includes in such a demand a requisition to admit authority, the whole notice may be disregarded. Hence the party requiring the admission must take care he does not ask too much. In the present case, as it appeared on examining the notice to admit that the admission sought would have involved an admission of authority, the Court refused to interfere. Another point was raised, but not discussed—viz. that the certificate given by the judge should have been given at the time of the trial.

It may be remarked, that the course taken by the defendant in this case was a very judicious one, for it appears clear that he might otherwise have so bound himself by the form of admission tendered to him as to have prejudiced him at the trial. See observations of C. J. Tindal in Wilkes v. Hopkins (1 C. B. 745).

CONTRACTING AS AGENT WITHOUT AUTHORITY—EXTENT OF THE AGENT'S LIABILITY.

Collen v. Wright, 3 Jur., N. S., 363.

The above case discussed the extent of liability which attaches to an agent who enters into a contract on behalf of his principal without authority. The plaintiff had entered, and spent money, upon a farm belonging to one G., under an agreement for a lease thereof, signed by the defendant as G.'s agent. This agreement was afterwards repudiated by G., who refused to sign the lease; whereupon the plaintiff (still believing that the defendant had been duly authorised to sign the agreement) took proceedings in Chancery to obtain specific performance of the contract, and a decree for a lease in accordance with its terms. This bill was dismissed, on the ground that the defendant had no authority from G. to sign the agreement as his agent. During the Chancery proceedings, and before the hearing, the plaintiff's attorney served the defendant with a notice that the suit would be proceeded with at his expense, unless he required the plaintiff not to proceed therein further; and that, if it should be dismissed on the above ground, the plaintiff would commence an action to recover both the damages sustained by his not having had authority, and also the costs of the Chancery proceedings; and in answer to this notice the defendant's attorney wrote to say the defendant would resist any attempts to saddle him with the Chancery costs, and would defend any action brought against him for that purpose. It was admitted for the purposes of the action that though the defendant was not, in fact, authorised by G. to sign, he bonâ fide believed at the time that he was so authorised.

Lord Campbell was of opinion that the action was maintainable, on the ground that the defendant had asserted that he had authority, and that on the faith of such assertion the plaintiff had entered into the contracts, which, it was admitted, had been broken, and that, consequently, the defendant was liable to recoup the plaintiff for the loss he had sustained by such breach of warranty. And his Lordship cited, in confirmation of this view, the recent case of Randell v. Trimen (18 C. B. 786). He held, moreover, that the Chancery costs were recoverable as part of the damages, because the defendant had not explained that he had no authority till after he had notice of the suit. In this opinion, generally Crompton, J., concurred, and also Wightman, J., so far as regarded the action being maintainable; for, said he, "if a person contracts with another as agent, he impliedly undertakes that he is the person he represents himself to be, and that he has authority to contract as he does; and if direct damage arises to the other, he is liable to an action; and it is not an essential ingredient that there should have been a fraudulent representation." As to the costs of the Chancery proceedings, however, Mr. Justice Wightman entertained some doubt, as he thought it questionable whether notice should not have been given before commencing such proceedings, and whether it should not have been previously ascertained that the defendant persisted that he had authority.

THE NEW RULES OF COURT, EASTER TERM, 1857.

Heard v. Edey, 5 W. R., Exch. 358; 1 H. & N. 716.

It will be remembered that in our notice of this case a few weeks ago,* we stated, on the authority of the Chief Baron, that a new General Rule would speedily issue to settle the practice as to obtaining an order for costs in the case of a judgment by default in an action on a contract brought in the superior court, to recover less than £20.

A Rule for this purpose has accordingly been just announced by Lord Campbell, in the Queen's Bench, and was printed by us in our last number; from this rule it appears—1. That the plaintiff in such an action may indorse on the writ of summons, a notice of his intention (in the event of judgment by default being signed therein), to make an ex parte application for his costs. 2. That such intention may be frustrated by the defendant (before such judgment shall have been signed) giving notice to the plaintiff that he intends to oppose the application. 3. That if no such notice be given to the plaintiff by the defendant, and judgment by default be signed, the plaintiff may seek from the judge an order for costs on the production of the writ of summons so indorsed; and 4. It is apprehended that such order on such indorsement will in all cases be granted, where primâ facie evidence is shown to the judge that the superior court had concurrent jurisdiction in the action; or that the plaintiff would for any other reason have had costs, if the judgment signed had been after verdict.

The object of the other General Rule announced on the same occasion, is to simplify and render less expensive the entry of satisfaction of a judgment. By the new Rule the form of the satisfaction piece and of the attestation thereto required remains unchanged, but on its production to the clerk of the judgments of the court in which the action is, he is authorised to make the entry in the judgment book against the entry of the judgment which has become satisfied. And this he may now do without the actual roll of the proceedings having been completed; which, unless with a view to error, or for the purposes of evidence, and the like, is unnecessary.

In our last number, the name of the case last treated of should be Bird v. Malzy.

JOINT-STOCK BANKS AND LIMITED LIABILITY.

It is a trite saying that extremes are to be avoided, and one generally admitted as holding good in legislation no less than in all other affairs and pursuits of individuals and of nations. There is much reason for thinking, that, on the important subject of the liability of shareholders in joint-stock companies legislation has veered round from one point of the compass to a directly opposite point with undue rapidity. Not two years ago the shareholder, by becoming such, hazarded all that he might be worth. At the present time he has merely to pay up the amount of his shares (and that amount may be exceedingly small), and thenceforward he is free from all claims and demands against the company. It is highly probable that ere long the constitution and operation of joint-stock banks will undergo inquiry; and the Legislature will be called on to take such steps as may tend to prevent the recurrence of scenes of plunder, and consequent ruin, such as have lately been witnessed in connection with the Royal British and Tipperary Banks. The "limited liability" principle having now been so extensively carried out with regard to almost all other companies, that principle can hardly be ignored when banking companies come to be dealt with. On the other hand, it will probably be considered that a complete limitation of liability, such as is obtainable in the other companies, could not be applied to banks without increasing tenfold the facilities for fraud and peculation. On what principle, therefore, should banking companies be founded?

The Freeman's Journal of this day, in an ably written article, calls attention to the fact that in the colonial charters granted by the Board of Trade a "compromise between the antagonistic systems of limited and unlimited liability is adopted, and has been found to work well." Although, since 1844, no banking company in England or Ireland has been able to obtain limited liability, several colonial companies have been thus formed and incorporated by charter, for carrying on the business of banking in India, Canada, &c. It appears that in these companies the liability of the shareholders is restricted to double the amount of the shares held at the time of winding up. By these charters, moreover, the important privilege is also conferred, that shareholders who have legally transferred their shares previous to the date of the dissolution are relieved from all future liability. There appear, however, to be grave reasons why so extensive an immunity as this should not in all cases be conferred on shareholders. It may perhaps be argued, that the dissolution of a company is generally preceded by some two or three years of unfair or reckless dealing; and, therefore, that shareholders should in all cases continue liable for a certain fixed period after their withdrawal from the concern. But this is a secondary matter. The main question is, how to attain a proper medium between unlimited liability and no liability. Now, supposing that, as a preliminary arrangement, the law were (on the analogy of the bankrupt laws) to declare every company dissolved, or, at least, dissolvable, on any failure to meet an engagement or make a payment, and that only one-half of the amount of the shares were to be in every case paid up, what would be the consequences? So long as the company continued its operations, it would be working, at the utmost, upon a moiety of the entire nominal capital. On any omission to make a just payment, the unpaid creditor would bring into play the machinery of "winding up." The official manager, acting under the directions of the court, would ascertain the position, liabilities, &c., of the undertaking; and to meet those liabilities there would remain at least one-half of the original share-capital. The difference to creditors would be clearly very great; for under the present system, where, as very frequently happens, the entire amount of each share is paid up to begin with, in the event of such capital being lost by any means, creditors have not a shilling to come upon for payment of their demands. With regard to banks and insurance companies, failure of which, to a greater degree, causes wide-spread ruin and misery, I would go so far as to suggest, that, as a necessary condition of their transacting business, a certain large sum should be placed in the Government Funds by each company, as a guarantee of its bona fides, and an indemnity fund for creditors. This guarantee fund should, of course, be placed out of the reach of the company, although to its credit; and the principal should only be accessible in due course of "winding up" under the order of the court. With respect to all other companies, the suggestion would amount to this:—That every shareholder should be liable for twice the amount which the company would be enabled to call up, and make use of, reserving at least one-half of the amount of his shares as a guarantee fund, available only after a dissolution of the company.

It would be quixotic to suppose that any such precautions as those above alluded to would absolutely insure good management and solvency; all that can be hoped for from the most stringent legislation is such an improvement on the present system as may render mismanagement less dangerous, and solvency more probable. Turning from the prospects of creditors to those of shareholders, what effect would the guarantee fund have on them? It is not unreasonable to conclude that a company so constituted, especially if established for mercantile purposes, would possess a degree of credit in the market which can never be enjoyed by any company destitute of a reserve fund, and working merely on a paid-up capital. In addition to this, I may venture to say that the consciousness of such further liability would operate as a check on that reckless spirit which too often pervades directors and managers of joint-stock companies, a spirit which it seems to have been the express design of Mr. Lowe's Act of 1856 to foster and encourage.

Review.

A Summary of the Law of Patents for Inventions, and of Extension of Patents; with Forms, and all the Statutes. Second Edition. By CHARLES WORDSWORTH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law; Associate of, and Counsel to, the Institution of Civil Engineers. Benning & Co. 1857.

The absence of thought, of knowledge, and of labour, which characterises some of the treatises which issue in such profusion from the Bar, has often filled us with sorrow; for we recognise in such productions an impatient craving after notoriety, which is itself the fruit of disappointed ambition, and the consequence of a mistaken vocation. Against some of these works we have already raised our voice, and we shall continue to do so when occasion calls for it; but with regard to the subject of the present treatise, we have a different and a more pleasing duty to perform. We have seldom examined a law book into which so much information has been worked in proportion to its size. Its author truly remarks, at the commencement, that the Patent Law is "one of great nicety and difficulty;" and that, "to compress it into a space of seventy-seven pages, was a task of much labour, and not easy to accomplish." It is only justice to say, that, in our judgment, this task has been very respectably performed.

It is not the fault of Mr. Wordsworth that the branch of the law he has undertaken to expound has been peculiarly prolific of litigation; and yet an inventor who takes up this "Summary" may not unreasonably be discouraged by the formidable list of cases which will meet his eye at the outset. He sees before him the costly experience of 167 victims to their inventive genius, detailed (as it were par parenthèse) in a manual by which he is himself invited to be guided; and our national vanity is disposed to find in this circumstance an explanation of the difference which it seems exists in the number of patents applied for in this kingdom, as compared either with France or the United States. In Great Britain and Ireland, since the 1st of July, 1852, down to the 31st of December, 1855, the number of patents applied for was 9,978; in the United States, during the same period, the number was 13,072; and in France, the number was nearly the same—viz. 13,128. On the other hand, whereas in England the proportion of patents passed to the applications for them was about 7 to 10, in the United States more than half the applications were rejected or abandoned. So that if our Transatlantic cousins "conclude" more easily than ourselves that they have made a discovery, the dogged resolution of old England is manifested in the ultimate result—the patents passed (within the same period above mentioned) in the United Kingdom being 7,019, and those in the United States only 5,904.

One difficulty with which a discoverer has often to contend, and which not unfrequently furnishes (as the newspapers have it) "employment to the gentlemen of the long robe" at his expense, is, as to whether his project is properly a subject for a patent as an "invention," or for registration as a "design." We confess our inability to draw any satisfactory criterion from the two cases in the Queen's Bench cited by Mr. Wordsworth as elucidatory of this difficulty. In one of these (Rogers v. Driver, 20 L. J. 31), the court said that a certain new kind of brick, the utility of which consisted in its being so shaped that when several bricks were laid together in building, apertures were left in the wall, by which the air was admitted to circulate, and a saving in the number of bricks required was effected, constituted a "design" capable of registration under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 65, so as to create a limited copyright therein; while in the other case (Reg. v. Bessell, 20 L. J., M. C., 177) the same court, and the same judges held, that a certain new ventilator, consisting of an oblong pane inserted into an ordinary window-frame, the pane being hinged, and opening in a peculiar manner for the purpose of preventing a downward draft, was the subject of "letters patent," and not of registration. Neither do we find our author meeting the point with his usual spirit, for he contents himself with adopting the language of a brother writer on the law of patents, to the following effect:—"The subject of letters patent is the manufacture itself; the subject of registration is strictly confined to design—that is, to combinations of lines producing pattern, shape, or configuration, by whatever means such design may be applicable to the manufacture." This may be the language of science, but, notwithstanding the distinction above indicated, where is the difference (as regards the nature of the protection which ought in justice to be given by law) between a perforated brick and a perforated window? We are almost disposed irreverently to hum—

> 'Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee."

But supposing this preliminary doubt to be solved in favour of a patent, it then behoves the intended patentee to shut himself up in his closet with that volume of the Statutes at Large which contains the Act "concerning Monopolies," and quietly to consider with himself whether he is or is not within its meaning "the true and first inventor," for otherwise he cannot safely proceed. Hence, where the manufacture is of an obvious character, requiring neither skill nor contrivance for its production, or where the intended patentee is conscious of its having been suggested to him by a neighbour, or that he "cribbed" it from some "Treasury of useful knowledge," or where he has already sold the article for profit, or has given the benefit of it to the public,—he had better abandon the object of his ambition, for it is hopeless. On the other hand, it is no objection that he heard of it in his last "vacation ramble" on the continent, "for it is immaterial,"—so dogmatises the law,—"whether the benefit bestowed on the public be the result of a man's travel and observation, or the fruit of his original genius."

But the meaning of the word "manufacture" in the old statute of James. is the real nut to be cracked; for inasmuch as before that Act all monopolies were illegal, and as thereby the common law on this subject was declared and confirmed save only as regarded the exceptions contained in the statute, it is essential that the subject of the patent should be a "manufacture," such being the expression used. Mr. Wordsworth has selected a passage from a judgment of Chief Justice Eyre, in the case of Boulton v. Bull, which has now held water for more than seventy years as a definition of—or rather gloss upon—this important term. "The word manufacture in the statute is of intrinsic signification, and applies not merely to things made, but to the practice of making—to principles carried into practice by means tangible and capable of being accurately described. Undoubtedly there can be no patent for a mere principle; but for a principle so far embodied and connected with corporeal substances as to be in a condition to act and to produce effects in any trade, mystery, or manual occupation, there may be a patent."

But, again, according to the statute of James, the subject of the patent must not only be a manufacture, but "such a new manufacture which others at the time of the patent do not use," i. e., use in public, as distinct from use in secret; and this necessity is illustrated by Mr. Wordsworth (p. 17) in the following manner, which we think a fair specimen of his power of condensing and popularising the authorities on which he relies:—

"To an action for an infringement of a patent for a lock, the defendant pleaded that the lock was not 'a new invention' as to the public use thereof. It appeared that a lock, similar to that of the plaintiff's, had been used by a third party on a gate by the road-side, for sixteen years before the patent was taken out; and that locks on the same principle had been manufactured in this country for money, from a pattern sent from America, and had afterwards been exported to that country. It was held, that, under these circumstances, the defendant was entitled to the verdict (Carpenter v. Smith, 11 Law J., N. S., 213, Exch.; 9 Mee. & W. 300).

"A patent was taken out in 1839 for an improved method of making cast-steel, by fusing carburet of manganese with ordinary steel or iron. The specification applied not only to the use of the carburet of manganese itself, but to the use of its constituent parts (oxide of manganese and carbon) by introducing them separately into the crucible, and fusing them with the iron. Several years before the patent was obtained, five or six firms were in the habit of manufacturing steel by fusing it with oxide of manganese and carbon in the way described in the patent, and had used the steel so produced in the way of their trade, and without concealment. Two only of these firms had kept the method a secret. In an action for infringing the patent, to which there was a plea denying the novelty of the invention, and alleging that it had been publicly used and vended before the granting of the patent, it was held that the above evidence supported the plea, and that the patent was invalid (Heath v. Smith, Law J. 1854, Q. B., 166)."

It appears to us that more interest attaches, in the eyes of all except inventors themselves, to the general and fundamental principles of the patent law, of which we have thus taken a glance, than to the rules according to which the patent itself is actually obtained; for these last are of a fluctuating nature, and the "Patent Law Amendment Act" of one session is pretty sure to be superseded in the next by fresh provisions. For this reason, among others, we shall not pursue Mr. Wordsworth through all his seventy-seven pages, nor trace the various steps of "the Petition," "the Declaration," and "the Specification." Here, however, as in other of its parts, this little treatise is remarkably clear; and compresses into a short notice the pith of all that is necessary to be stated. The section on "the Specification" is especially satisfactory, and we would abridge it for the benefit of our readers were it not itself a most skilful abridgment; and we would still more willingly extract it entire did the space at our command permit. But we can do neither, for we must not conclude without pointing out to Mr. Wordsworth, for correction in his next edition, a mistake which has unhappily crept into his statement with regard to an important topic at which his essay glances. The passage to which we allude occurs at p. 30 of the "Summary," where, in the account of the present law as to the form and operation of a patent, we meet with the following paragraphs:—

"The patent always contained another clause, providing that it should be void if transferred to more than five persons, or in any of certain modes therein described rendered beneficial to more than five persons. This clause, however, applied to assignments by the act of the party, not to those by operation of law.

"But it is now enacted, that, notwithstanding any such proviso, more than twelve persons may have a legal and beneficial interest in such letters patent."

Mr. Wordsworth must of course, when he wrote this, have been perfectly familiar with the fact, that the form of a patent limiting the number of assignees to five, though in use when Bloxam v. Elsee, the authority he quotes, was decided, was altered in the year 1832, through the instrumentality of the late Lord Denman, then Attorney-General; and the number extended to twelve: but without this omitted link in the chain, the second of the above paragraphs is illogical, and, indeed, not to be understood. We have, indeed, some doubt whether the haziness of this passage is caused altogether by a slip in the pen, or a treacherous memory, but does not rather arise from a misconception of the effect of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83. The words of the Act are (s. 36)—"Nothwithstanding any proviso that may exist in former letters patent, it shall be lawful for a larger number than twelve persons hereafter to have a legal and beneficial interest in such letters patent"—that is, we apprehend, in letters patent already granted, and not in those hereafter to be passed; which are left, as before, to the discretion of the Crown. Surely, if it had been intended to lay down for the first time a statutory provision as to the future exercise of a branch of the royal prerogative, it would have been done in a different manner, and in more express terms. And yet Mr. Wordsworth subjoins in a note—"There will, therefore, no longer be the difficulty hitherto existing as to the working of patents by joint-stock companies. Such companies, incorporated under the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 47, may now take to patents with the capacity of applying a large capital, an advantage that will be felt in respect of many patents. And persons so engaged will be free from liability, except to the amount of their respective shares."

We must take leave to doubt this consequence of the above section. We do not believe that the number of persons who may be interested in a patent came under the special consideration of the framers of the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 185 6, or that the Legislature intended, in passing the Patent Law Amendment Act of 1852, to interfere with the power of the Crown to insert such conditions as it thought proper in the letters patent, with regard to the persons who might become interested therein. It was the ancient principle of the patent law to prevent an unlimited number of persons, by combining capital, to create a greater monopoly in the article patented than would be presumably attainable by a limited number of partners. At the time of the passing of the Amendment Act, 1852, it was no doubt felt that this principle should be relaxed, and hence the provision in question to provide for the patents already in existence; but, as we read that provision, it would be quite competent for the Crown to introduce into letters patent any restriction as to the number of such partners, which experience may hereafter show to be advisable. And it is possible that the formation of patent companies, the members of which are only liable to the extent of their respective shares, might render some limitation proper. In the meantime, however, and even if such an alteration in the practice of the Commissioners of Patents should be introduced, the power of thus working a patent will give, it is reasonable to suppose, a great impulse to the inventive faculties of this country. Let us hope that proportionably satisfactory results will follow with regard to the progress of science and the conveniences of life.

Questions at the Examination.

I. PRELIMINARY.

1. Where, and with whom, did you serve your clerkship?

2. State the particular branch or branches of the law to which you have principally applied yourself during your clerkship.

3. Mention some of the principal law books which you have read and studied.

4. Have you attended any, and what, law lectures?

II. COMMON AND STATUTE LAW AND PRACTICE OF THE COURTS.

5. How many days has a defendant to appear in actions of ejectment? and in actions on bills of exchange? and what step is necessary before appearing in the latter case?

6. What is the course of proceeding under the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, in actions against British Subjects resident abroad?

7. What circumstances must be shown to exist to entitle a plaintiff to a judge's order to hold a defendant to bail?

8. What is the effect of the death of a sole plaintiff or defendant before trial?

9. Mention some of the causes of action which do not survive to executors.

10. Issue having been joined in Hilary Term, after what delay in proceeding to trial can the defendant give the plaintiff notice to bring the cause on for trial? and to what notice is the plaintiff entitled?

11. In what cases can the court or a judge compel a reference of an action?

12. In what case is it necessary to call an attesting witness in order to prove a document? what alteration has been recently made in the law on this subject?

13. Is there any appeal from a judgment of a superior court on an application for a new trial? and what entitles a party desirous of appealing to do so?

14. In what cases is secondary evidence of documents admissible?

15. May payment be given in evidence in reduction of damages, or must it in all cases be pleaded?

16. What is the effect of the plea of non-assumpsit to a declaration on a policy of assurance containing averments of the plaintiff's interest and of the loss?

17. In what instances is a carrier not liable for loss of goods intrusted to him for carriage?

18. Under what circumstances is a master answerable for damages done by his servant?

19. In what case is a husband not liable for debts contracted by his wife during coverture?

III. Conveyancing.

20. In what session of the present reign was the Succession Duty Act passed? How does this affect the title to be shown to real estate?

21. Explain the nature and object of fines and recoveries, and what was substituted in their place by the Act of Parliament abolishing the same?

22. State the usual covenants in the assignment of a lease on the part of assignor and assignee respectively.

23. Is a mortgage of leaseholds best effected by an assignment or by an underlease? State the reason for your answer.

24. Should a second mortgagee take any, and what, precaution to preserve priority over a third mortgagee?

25. When was the Act for the amendment of the law with respect to wills passed, and from what day does it take effect? Under this Act what is the law as to gifts to an attesting witness, and as to the competency of creditors and executors to be attesting witnesses?

26. By what means under the last-mentioned Act can a will be revoked?

27. A., being a surrenderee of copyhold estate, but not admitted, assigns his interest to B.; is the lord compellable to admit B. on payment of a single fine, and how would the case stand, if, instead of a surrender to A., there had been only a covenant to surrender?

28. State the nature and principal incidents of "separate estate."

29. Out of what real estate of her husband is a woman married since the first day of January, 1834, dowable, and by what means can her right to dower be defeated?

30. On a sale of lands what expenses in the absence of stipulation are usually borne by the vendor, and what by the purchaser?

31. Title deeds required to be examined are found not to be in the possession of the vendor, but in the hands of a third person in the country; what is the course to be pursued for the examination of the deeds, and at whose expense?

32. On a sale of leasehold estate what conditions ought to be inserted with regard to the title of lessor and lessee, or either, or both?

33. A., seised in fee of real estate demised to a stranger, dies between two of the quarter-days on which rent is payable. Can A.'s personal representatives claim an apportionment of the rent becoming due on the quarter-day next succeeding his death, against his heir or devisee as the case may be?

34. On a marriage settlement of real estate, it is intended that a sum of money shall be made raisable for younger children of the marriage, state the usual mode by which that would be effected in framing the deed.

IV. Equity and Practice of the Courts.

35. What are the peculiar objects of jurisdiction of courts of equity? Give exempli gratia instances under each head.

36. What is the rule of interpreting the statute law in equity? and does it differ from that of common law?

37. What are the principal kinds of relief afforded? mention those—1st, not comprised within the scope of the common law; and 2nd, the one kind lately conferred upon the courts of the latter.

38. The necessity of a suit by bill being assumed, set forth the mechanical steps of instituting one, by whom drawn, settled, and signed? how ingrossed, printed, or written? where filed, and how indorsed? the service and notice required?

39. If the suit be at the instance of a feme covert or infant, what is to be done before such a bill can be filed?

40. How soon is the plaintiff entitled to examine the defendant on oath, and how is it to be done? and how is the defendant to know what he is required to answer?

41. May the defendant enter into explanations material to his defence, or must he confine his answer strictly to the interrogatories put to him? State the authority for your answer.

42. Can the defendant, before or after answering, examine the plaintiff himself upon matters material to the suit? can he obtain inspection of documents in the plaintiff's possession to enable him to answer, and how can he, the defendant, obtain relief in the suit so instituted against him?

43. What is a demurrer?

44. What is a plea as distinguished from an answer?

45. What a replication? can it be dispensed with when an adverse decree is sought by evidence to contradict the defence? and if so, what is the plaintiff's course to obtain a decree?

46. How is evidence in the cause taken by viva voce and affidavit? before whom, and where filed?

47. Explain the mode of preparing the brief for counsel on the hearing; and what is necessary to be done on the part of a plaintiff before the hearing and after the decree made, to its completion, step by step.

48. When accounts and inquiries are directed, how and where are they to be prosecuted? Explain the steps to be taken before a decree founded upon the results can be obtained.

49. How is such a decree to be enforced, and when costs are ordered to be taxed and paid, how are the last to be ascertained, and how enforced? State the means to be employed.

V. Bankruptcy and Practice of the Courts.

50. What must a creditor do, and what must he be prepared to prove before a commissioner in bankruptcy, in order to obtain an adjudication in bankruptcy against his debtor, and to what court must the creditor apply for such adjudication?

51. Is there any mode by which a creditor can compel his debtor, being a trader, either to pay or give security for the debt, or to commit an act of bankruptcy? If so, give a short account of it.

52. Can a creditor obtain an adjudication of bankruptcy against his debtor at any distance of time after an act of bankruptcy, or is there any, and what, limit?

53. Is a conveyance by a trader of all his property to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors an act of bankruptcy, under any, and what, circumstances?

54. Can a creditor upon a bill of exchange or promissory note not due petition for an adjudication in bankruptcy?

55. What is a fraudulent preference, and is it an act of bankruptcy?

56. Give some account of the doctrine of reputed ownership?

57. From what claims, and demands in general, is a bankrupt discharged by his certificate?

58. Are there any cases in which a bankrupt has no right to a certificate, and the commissioner has no power to grant it? if so, state some of them.

59. Under what classes is the certificate ranged with reference to the bankrupt's general conduct as a trader?

60. A trader is declared bankrupt upon the petition of a creditor, in respect of an act of bankruptcy committed before the petitioning creditor's debt was incurred, is this adjudication valid?

61. Can a debtor be declared a bankrupt upon an act of bankruptcy committed after he has ceased to trade? if so, why?

62. What are the general requisites of a good petitioning creditor's debt?

63. If a lessee for years becomes bankrupt, who is liable for the future to pay the rent and perform the covenants on the lessee's part?

64. A man incurs a debt, and afterwards for the first time enters into trade, and subsequently commits an act of bankruptcy. Is the debt so incurred a good petitioning creditor's debt; and if so, why?

VI. CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEEDINGS BEFORE MAGISTRATES.

65. Writers on the law of nations lay it down as a maxim "that different nations ought, in time of peace, to do one another all the good they can, and in time of war, as little harm as possible, consistently with their own real interests." Is this principle enforced by our municipal law? And point out any instance in which the statute law interposes to enforce the law of nations, with regard to the traffic in slaves.

66. Define treason; and mention the first statute of treasons, and also the Act by which it was confirmed, and by which all the intervening statutes on the subject were repealed.

67. What recent statute has passed to prevent injury or alarm to the Sovereign, and what punishment attends this "high misdemeanour?"

68. Define felony; how is felony distinguished from misdemeanour? Under which head does "counterfeiting the coin of the realm" now rank, and by what statute?

69. Is the returning from transportation a capital offence, or what other punishment is substituted for it; and if so, by what statute?

70. Is there any statute, and what, making it criminal to send letters containing threats of murder, or to burn houses, stacks of corn, or other agricultural produce; and if so, what punishment is annexed to the offence?

71. Define homicide; in what way does our law deal with homicide per infortunium, se defendendo, and felonious homicide?

72. When a delinquent is arrested for an indictable offence, what are the proceedings to be taken in order to his committal or acquittal?

73. What is the nature of bail in criminal cases? Can a prisoner demand it in the case of every crime? if not, mention some of the cases in which a justice of the peace is precluded from taking bail.

74. What is the prisoner's remedy, if the magistrate should refuse to accept of bail, in cases where, at his discretion, he may refuse or accept it?

75. What is the proceeding before a magistrate to obtain a warrant to arrest a person charged with a criminal offence? Is a general warrant to apprehend all persons suspected, without specially naming them, good or void?

76. What officers may arrest an offender without a warrant?

77. On the preliminary inquiry before a justice of the peace, or coroner, may the party charged with an offence insist upon being aided by his counsel or attorney?

78. Is a person, whether held to bail or committed to prison for trial, entitled to copies of the depositions upon which he has been held to bail or committed?

79. Is it necessary in an indictment to state the value of an article which is the subject of the offence; and has the court now the power to amend the indictment, if any technical mistake should appear in it?

Law Amendment Society.

FOURTEENTH SESSION—TWELFTH GENERAL MEETING.
APRIL 27th, 1857.

T. E. HEADLAM, Esq., Q.C., M.P., Vice-President, took the Chair.

The following new members were elected: E. C. Petgrave, Esq.; Thomas Boag, Esq.; Arthur Scratchley, Esq.

The SECRETARY read an Address of the Council to the Society, of which the following are extracts:—

MINISTER OF JUSTICE.

It has been proposed that the Minister of Justice should be an independent Officer of State, having a seat in the Cabinet and the House of Commons; but to this it is objected that the existence of such an officer would not be compatible with the political influence of the Lord Chancellor, who is at present the representative of law in the Cabinet. Whatever weight attaches to this objection seems to apply to another proposition, of making the Home Secretary Minister of Justice, with the additional evil of still further burdening a department which is at present supposed to be fully occupied. Both these plans seem to be grounded on the popular feeling, to which it is hardly possible to attach too much importance, that proper security for the vigilance and activity of such a department is only to be obtained by its direct responsibility to the House of Commons. The Society a few years since approved of a plan submitted to them, which it was thought would in a great degree meet the complicated requirements of the case, and, without interfering with the position of the Lord Chancellor, would make the department of justice sufficiently responsible. It was proposed in this Report that a Board of Justice should be established on the same footing as the Board of Trade; that the Lord Chancellor should be the president; and that there should be in addition a vice president with a seat in the House of Commons, and a permanent non-parliamentary secretary, with a competent official staff. The Council have not yet heard any other proposal which seems to promise on the whole a more satisfactory solution of the difficulty than this; and they have little doubt that a department well organised after such a plan would not only be able to deal with all current questions of law amendment, but would also find in itself ample resources for the consolidation of the statute law and the revision of bills as they pass through Parliament.

TRANSFER OF LAND.

Since the Society last met, the Commissioners appointed to consider Registration of Title with reference to the sale and transfer of land have finally agreed to their report. The subject of their deliberations has been frequently before the Society; and indeed, it was a paper read to the Society by Mr. Strickland Cookson, which first impressed on the public mind the expediency of a registration of title as opposed to a registration of assurances. It was chiefly in consequence of the notice which that paper attracted, and the discussion which ensued on it, that a select committee of the House of Commons was appointed to investigate the subject, the result of their investigation being a recommendation to the Crown to issue the Commission from which the recent report has originated. A system of registration of title is recommended for adoption by the Legislature, and is elaborately worked out in its details; and whatsoever may be the opinion of individuals as to some of these details, it will be generally conceded that no plan for the simplification of the transfer of land has been put out to the public in so exact and tangible a form, or which has furnished such solid ground for expecting a great diminution in the cost of conveyances and the uncertainty of titles.

COMMERCIAL LAW.

The Mercantile Law Conference, held in January last, has given a considerable impulse to the efforts for the improvement of our commercial law. The defects existing in the administration of the bankruptcy law were brought prominently forward at that meeting, and will be the subject of a bill now in course of preparation by the committee appointed at the conference. To diminish the ruinous cost, amounting on an average, to about 45 per cent. on the assets, must be the first object of any amending measure. It is proposed to effect this by transferring the compensation payments now saddled on the suitors to the Consolidated Fund, and by abolishing the offices of broker, messenger, and accountant. Further improvements are proposed in the system of appeal, and the mode of remunerating the official assignee, and the frequency of attendance by the commissioners; also, by giving to the Bankruptcy Courts the jurisdiction in insolvency, by improving the arrangement clauses in the Act of 1849 so as to make them operative, by enacting that a deceased trader may be made bankrupt, by confining imprisonment for debt on execution to cases where the bankrupt's case has been heard and decided on, and by vesting in the Court of Bankruptcy the winding-up jurisdiction.

The Conference also reported in favour of repealing the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, with exceptions as to certain classes of contracts.

The insufficiency of our present tribunals for administering full and speedy justice in mercantile causes excites the greatest attention among the classes peculiarly affected by it. The delegates at the Conference stated, that in nearly all the large towns of the kingdom an absolute denial of justice in cases above the value of £50 prevails throughout the year, except during the two occasions when Her Majesty's judges sit for a few days in each circuit town; that a greater frequency of circuits and a large extension of the jurisdiction, both legal and equitable, of local courts, are measures imperatively demanded; and that to these should be added some means of deciding commercial causes in a more satisfactory way than the present machinery of our courts admits of.

JUDICIAL STATISTICS.

A bill to provide for the regular collection and publication of the statistics of all our courts of justice was introduced in the last session. The recognition of the need of such a system has now become universal, and its establishment would be one of the first and most important duties of a Minister of Justice.

Juridical Society.

At a meeting of the Society, held at its rooms, No. 4, St. Martin's-place, Trafalgar-square, the V. C. Sir John Stuart, President, in the chair, Mr. F. S. Reilly read a paper on "Judicial Oaths" (with reference to the expediency of examination upon oath, the rejection of testimony where oath cannot be taken, &c.).

The learned Reader commenced by referring to the Second Report of the last Common Law Commissioners, who therein discussed the expediency of examination upon oath, and, after giving their reasons for being averse to the abolition of judicial oaths, observed that it might admit of question whether the religious sanction should be made the indispensable condition of testimony in cases where that sanction was admitted to have no existence. They were unable, however, to agree on any recommendation upon the point. Having described the form and mode of administering a testimonial oath, and discussed the antiquity of the rule requiring legal testimony, Mr. Reilly proceeded as follows:—

The observance of this ceremony is, at the present day, required of every witness. It is employed by the law as a means for securing the trustworthiness of his testimony. It seeks to bring to bear on his mind a religious influence in co-operation with the other motives to veracity. And it is based upon this —that it is the fact, and that the swearer believes, that there is a moral government of the world by God, under and in the course of which truth and falsehood, as such, are rewarded and punished.

The oath is in its essence a recognition of the existence of this moral government, and of the obligations that attach to those who are the subjects of it. The oath acknowledges an existing obligation, it does not create a new one. It is a sacramentum; an outward and visible sign of the swearer's present conviction of his responsibility to God. Oaths have often been turned to evil purposes; false and debasing views have prevailed of their nature and objects, and attempts are made to discredit them, as allied to the incantations of Paganism and to mediæval ordeals. But an oath stands apart, untouched by the condemnation that has fallen upon these practices. It is an act of reverence, of Divine worship, and cannot be rejected merely as superstitious except in company with a prayer—the simplest act of natural religion, and one not yet exploded among men.

The reliance which the law places upon the oath as one security for trustworthiness of testimony seems justified by experience. You will hear it said, indeed, that the ceremony is useless; that a man who will tell the truth does not need the oath; that a man who will not, disregards it. But such dilemmas are dangerous guides. It is true that wilful falseswearing is not unknown, but it is equally true that there is, in the words of the Common Law Commissioners, "a large class of persons, who, though less alive than they ought to be to a sense of moral duty, or to the fear of legal penalties, may yet be deterred from falsehood when to these is added the dread of Divine vengeance." It has been well asked, what would become of all the nonsuits if witnesses, when they come to be examined in court, were to say the same things as they said to the attorney before the trial? and to this result the oath contributes, at least. The belief in the efficacy of an oath is not merely a conventional one among professional lawyers: it may be noticed that a prisoner or party cross-examining on his own behalf, often, with almost every question, reminds the witness of his solemn oath.

Then, in the case of a man who has an habitual regard for truth, an oath is far from being devoid of use. By the administration of it he is warned, and by taking it he acknowledges, that, in the discharge of his duty as witness, he is to raise himself above the level of common life, and, laying aside the exaggerations and the reticences that surround ordinary speech, to apply himself seriously and soberly to the task of speaking the whole truth. It does not supply him, indeed, with any new motive, but it peremptorily reminds him of the direction in which his habitual motives should guide him.

An oath, it must be admitted, will be useless where a man is determined to disregard all restraints; and it would, perhaps, be equally useless where a man had arrived at moral perfection. But for the great mass of men which lies between these two extremes, it cannot be doubted that it is effective, in some cases as a check, in others as a stimulus.

The great weight, indeed, of the authority and reasoning of Bentham has been thrown into the opposite scale. Whether principle or experience be regarded, he contends, an oath will be found in the hands of justice an altogether useless instrument. "The supposition," he says, "of its efficiency is absurd in principle. It ascribes to man a power over his Maker; it places the Almighty . . . . under the command of every justice of the peace. It supposes him to stand engaged, no matter how, but absolutely engaged, to inflict—on every individual by whom the ceremony, after having been performed, has been profaned—a punishment (no matter what) which, but for the ceremony and the profanation, he would not have inflicted."

There is, however, no difficulty in seeing that this is rather a caricature than a fair representation of the nature and effect of an oath. The theory of an oath does not necessarily involve the supposition of a specific sin of perjury with a peculiar penalty attached, nor does the use of an oath compel us to any dogmatising about consequences. The law makes no pretension to alter the nature of the moral offence of falsehood. The perjurer offends, indeed, as Paley expresses it, "with a high hand;" and the judgment of conscience must be, that the deliberateness of the act gives it a darker complexion. But this result is incidental only; it is not the object of the ceremony, which only serves to remind the swearer of the necessary consequences of his acts. In short, as it has been pithily expressed, the law uses an oath, not to call the attention of God to man, but the attention of man to God; not to call on Him to punish the wrong-doer, but on man to remember that He will.

Bentham, with copious arguments and illustrations, many of which, however, have little pertinence to the oaths of witnesses, endeavours to show further, that it is a matter of daily uncontroverted and incontrovertible experience, that an oath altogether without efficacy in its character of a security against a man's doing what he has engaged not to do. It would not be suitable to my purpose, on the present occasion, to follow him through these arguments and illustrations, and test their value as a foundation for this opinion. I must content myself with relying on what I have already said, and with referring to the opinion of the Common Law Commissioners, who justify the reliance placed by tribunals on oaths by tracing it to "the general experience of mankind of the effect of the religious sanction on the minds of men."

Bentham had apparently little expectation of his arguments procuring an early abolition of the testimonial oath; he compensates himself, therefore, by the anticipation, that, "bye-and-bye, its rottenness standing confessed, it will perish off the human stage, and this last of the train of supernatural powers, ultima cœlicolûm, will be gathered with Astræa to its native skies."

The Common Law Commissioners, on the other hand, speaking under the pressure of a more immediate responsibility, declare their opinion that "it cannot be doubted that the effect of a transition from the use of judicial oaths to simple declarations would, at least at the outset, by removing one of the barriers to falsehood, encourage false testimony, and tend materially to lessen the confidence of the public in the administration of justice."

On this danger, which would doubtless need serious consideration in the case of a sudden abolition of oaths at the present moment, Bentham is altogether silent. Perhaps he is justified in passing it by; for if, in the course of the revolutions of opinion, his prophecy should ever come to be fulfilled, we may feel sure, that, through the gradual preparation of men's minds for the reception of the change, the danger apprehended by the Commissioners will have vanished, and the new system will find a safe foundation on the ruins of the old.

Reference is habitually made, for the purposes of such inquiries as the present, to "the System of Penal Law for the State of Louisiana," prepared by Livingston. I have looked into it to see how he deals with oaths. He retains them and couches them, too, in very stringent terms. Although he appears to base his argument for their retention mainly on the danger of a change, yet, whatever may be the weight to be ascribed to his authority, it will be found to be thrown more completely into the scale in favour of oaths than might at first sight appear.

He makes part of his description of an oath an agreement to renounce the blessing of God if the engagement should be broken; and the ordinary oath to be taken under his code runs thus:—"I swear, in the presence of Almighty God, and by His Holy Word, and on the faith of a person of probity and honour, that—" concluding thus, "and may God so bless, and man so honour, me as this oath is truly and sincerely made.' His observations in the Introductory Report must be read with reference to this description and form.

"Those," he says, "who are for abolishing the religious sanction say, that it is not only useless, but injurious, and even profane;" going on to state the usual arguments for these views. His conclusion he expresses thus:—"When properly developed, and coolly considered, these objections have weight; and if I were now for the first time devising the formula of a judicial asseveration to declare the truth, I think I should omit the conditional renunciation of God's favour which it now contains. The general impression now existing of its necessity, the abandonment of all pretension to right by any ecclesiastical power in our day to dispense with its obligation, and the danger of a sudden change, have combined to induce me to retain this part of the oath in ordinary cases."

His observations appear deficient in precision; because the objections to which he allows weight are of equal force against oaths, whether this clause of conditional renunciation, as he calls it, is omitted or not, and the form he prescribes would be equally an oath without it. The only explanation which suggests itself for his adoption of this course of argument is, that he did not contemplate the possibility of doing away with oaths altogether, and consequently, as I said before, the force of his authority is really directed more strongly in their favour than his very faint approval of his own form would lead one at first sight to suppose.

I observe, also, that in the case of a community existing under very similar conditions to our own—the State of New York—the framers of the Code of Civil Procedure brought forward there in 1850 did not propose to do away with oaths, although they would allow any witness at his option to substitute a simple declaration.

There is one instance of an authoritative proposal for the total abolition of testimonial oaths, of very recent date, and affecting the greatest of the dependencies of the Crown—I mean British India. The late Indian Law Commissioners, comprising Sir J. Romilly and Sir J. Jervis, propose this article in the intended Code of Procedure:—

"All witnesses shall be examined without oath, or affirmation, or any warning, as a necessary preliminary to their giving evidence, and they shall, upon such examination, be bound to speak the truth as they would have been bound by an oath, or a sanction tantamount to an oath."

The reasons given for so sweeping a measure as this are fully stated in the Report.

The Minister of Justice—For what is he most Needed?

To those who desire that law changes should be really reforms, and not place-making jobberies, as too generally has been the case heretofore, it is very interesting to see the practical good sense with which the Daily News has lately written on these subjects. The Times (generally very powerful in its representation of the views it is advocating, and often doing great service) too much lends itself on these subjects to swelling the cry which for the moment happens to be popular, and rarely pains itself to apply quiet inductive considerations as to what is the practical thing really needed. Its habit in these matters is too much to form itself into the reserve corps, and to rush into the battle just as it is nearly won. How much money does an existing plan cost?—how much time does it consume?—and why and how is so much of each required? These are the true philosophical questions with reference to all matters of reform in procedure; and they require a minute dissection of the facts of actually existing facts, and that this dissection should be made in a large number of parallel cases, just as we take the average expectancy of life, or ascertain any other general law of nature. Now, as far as we know, this inductive method of investigation has not only not been applied systematically to matters connected with legal improvement, but has never, in any case, been applied to them at all. All that we do in England, is to say to a dozen people (and we are so absurd as to call them witnesses, while we might as well call them jurors, or by any other name), Mr. A., what do you say to such a form of procedure? Mr. B., what say you? Mr. C., ditto? And in the average of their unconsidered answers we fancy we have discovered the truth required.

The Daily News, in an able article which we extracted last week, says, as to a Department of Justice, "Its value consists mainly in this, that its head would be responsible for preparing and conducting through Parliament those various measures of law amendment which the progress of intelligence and the change of society imperatively require." Now, it is, doubtless, very material that our legislative machinery should be better organised; but the improvement of procedure is equally, if not more, important. "Take care of the pennies, and the pounds will take care of themselves." Badly devised or badly expressed laws are evils, but as nothing compared to inefficient judges. Inefficient judges, again, are less mischievous than bad officers;—bad officers far less mischievous than false systems of procedure, and bad judicial arrangements. Were the angels of Heaven (instead of Mr. Bellenden Ker and his one helper) to draw up for us a code of laws, we should be very little better off than now, if our system of procedure had to remain what it is, and our courts and offices were to be left uninspected and uncontrolled as they now are,

We, therefore, confidently assert that some of the chief needs of law reform require for their satisfaction no parliamentary action at all. These needs are executive rather than legislative. They arise in the want, not of better laws, but of better application of the existing laws. The perpetual superintendence of the working of the whole judicial machine is, on this subject, far and far away the paramount need.

In a recent article on the Accountant-General's Office, we have attempted, and, in other articles on the offices of the courts, it is our intention to continue to attempt, to point out this most overlooked and yet most important truth. To proceed from particulars to generals is the only efficient method in the science (for science it is) of judicial procedure, just as much as it is in every other science; and, as we stated in the article alluded to, the Legislature, in framing a Department of Justice, if it does but know its business, will have a first eye to construct an establishment most of all to be occupied with laboriously collecting these particulars, and from them deducing the general truths required. Cost and time are the two great points to be investigated; expense and delay (the unhealthy distortions of cost and time) the two great diseases to be eradicated. The Department of Justice must do for the science of procedure what Greenwich Observatory, and other such, do as to astronomy—record and classify, not only facts, but all the facts, bearing on the science to be dealt with,—we may almost say, to be created; for, as an inductive science, it does not yet exist.

But how are these facts to be placed within the knowledge and control of our new Department of State? How can it learn whether any one practice or method of doing any particular thing is more dilatory or expensive than another?—that such an office is slower than its corresponding one in another court, or such a judge procrastinating, inattentive, or otherwise an inflicter of needless delay or expense? Where exist the materials for elucidating these all-essential facts? and what is the class of men to tabulate them and detect the required results? To the solicitor—the keeper of the client's purse—there is little difficulty in answering these questions; and it is, therefore, peculiarly the province of this Journal to speak its views upon them. The materials for determining almost every problem of the science of judicial procedure, and for detecting almost every defect or negligence throughout the great legal machinery of the country, are to be found ready gathered together in the bills of costs of the solicitors, and to be found there only. How far time and cost are necessary or needless can easily be ascertained by our body from these materials. If the legislative delusion, that seven years' standing is a heaven-sent qualification to every barrister for any work under the sun, could but be dispelled, and if the Department of Justice could, without destroying the British constitution, be permitted to comprise an able and upright staff of men, well acquainted with the practical details of a solicitor's business, and competent to investigate the nature of every existing draft on the client's purse; and if these materials were but placed from time to time in their hands for reduction and tabulation, every secret of the great prison-house would infallibly be detected and placed beyond dispute. Prison-house we may well say, for all the prisons of the land, and all such of their misery as is needless, are embraced in the science we are proposing to create. In this science we shall find the true medicament. Guesses and empiricism may possibly, some day or other, after many a failure, also discover the cure; but the proposed system of investigation assuredly can and will, and that at once.

But why trouble ourselves with this subject? Because the interests of our branch of the profession and of the client are identical, except so far as our mutual relations are disturbed ab extra by the childish rules on which we are ordered to regulate our remuneration. The first conclusion of the investigation we propose would be the utter condemnation of these rules. More legal revolutions than one are forthcoming. As to their issue, the body alone known to the client, and alone personally trusted by him, need have no fear. In order to protect through them all our own interests, we have but to make known, widely and distinctly, the real interest of the client.

Parliamentary Practice on Private Bills.

There are other kinds of notices besides those mentioned in the last paper which must in special cases be served on or before Dec. 15th—viz. notices of intention to make a burial-ground or cemetery, or to erect gas-works, or abstract water from any stream.

In the case of a Bill for making a burial-ground or cemetery, or the erection of gas-works (H. C. 25), notices must be served on all owners or reputed owners, and occupiers of every dwelling-house situate within 300 yards of the limits within which the proposed burial-ground, cemetery, or gas-works is intended to be erected or made.

As regards the abstraction of water, it is required by the Lords' Standing Orders (H. L. 181, sect. 2), that, on or before Dec. 15, previous to the application for any Bill whereby it is proposed to abstract water from any stream for the purpose of supplying any cut, canal, reservoir, aqueduct, navigation, or waterwork, notice shall be given to all owners or reputed owners, lessees or reputed lessees, and occupiers of all mills and factories or other works using the waters of such stream, for a distance of twenty miles below the point at which such water is intended to be abstracted, such distance to be measured along the course of such stream, unless such water shall, within a less distance than twenty miles, fall into or unite with any navigable stream, and then only to the owners, lessees, and occupiers between the point of abstraction and the point where such water unites with such navigable stream. The notice must state the name of such stream, if any, the point of abstraction, the parish in which such point is situate, and must state the time and place of deposit, the plans, sections, book of reference, and copy of Gazette notices.

N.B.—It may be convenient to state here, that, for the sake of brevity, the Standing Orders are not always quoted verbatim, and that the order to which the reference is given should be read with this paper.

Although there are other notices which do not require to be served until the end of the year preceding the application to Parliament, still it will be as well, whilst treating of notices generally, to include those also—as the mode of service in all cases is similar. Previous to the deposit of a petition for leave to bring in a Bill relating to crown, church, or corporation property, or property held in trust for public or charitable purposes (H. C. 24), or before the first reading of any such Bill brought from the Lords, notice in writing of such application to Parliament shall be served on all owners or reputed owners of such property, and lessees or reputed lessees holding leases granted for a life or lives, or for any term of twenty-one years or upwards. And (H. C. 26), previous to the deposit of any Bill whereby it is intended to relinquish any work authorised by any former Act, notices in writing must be served upon all owners or reputed owners, lessees or reputed lessees, and occupiers of land in which any part of the work thereby intended to be relinquished is situate. The mode of serving these notices is the same in all cases—viz. by personal service on each owner or reputed owner, lessee or reputed lessee, and occupier, or by leaving the same at his last-named place of abode, or, in his absence from the United Kingdom, on his agent, or by post. In practice it is done thus:—The address list is gone through by a clerk who knows the country, parish by parish. The notices for those who live far away from the district where service is proposed to be effected personally are put aside for service by post, and the notices for landowners who live near one another, which can readily be served by hand, are put into a separate bundle. The list of those for post is made in duplicate, and the names and addresses are set out in full on each envelope, and the number of the notice corresponding with the number in the index is put outside the envelope in which the notice is placed. The post letters, together with the duplicate lists of names and addresses (each letter being pre-paid to the full amount, and bearing a sixpenny stamp also as a registered letter) may be posted at any of the following offices—viz. London, Manchester, Liverpool, Birmingham, Leeds, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Norwich, Lincoln, Shrewsbury, Bristol, Exeter, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Inverness, Dublin, Belfast, Cork, or Athlone. The Postmaster-General, from time to time, regulates the hours for posting such letters. The post-office clerk stamps the lists of letters handed in, and examines the names and addresses on the list against the letters.

Notices which require to be served on or before Dec. 15th, must be posted not later than Dec. 12th; but if there be no reason to the contrary, it is better to be a day or two beforehand, as letters may be returned as undelivered, owing to imperfect addresses or otherwise, in time to remedy the mistake by sending a clerk to serve them personally.

The clerk serving notices personally should at the time indorse on the duplicate the mode in which service was effected, such as "served on servant," or "wife," as the case may be, for he will, in the case of an opposition on Standing Orders, have to prove service of every notice which is challenged by the opponents.

Notices served by hand are invalid unless served between 8 a.m. and 8 p.m. on a week-day. Postal notices may be delivered but cannot be posted on a Sunday or Christmas-day.

It will now be necessary to go back to the parliamentary notices which are required to be inserted in the Gazette and public papers.

The preparation of these notices usually proceed, pari passu, with the plans and sections, as they must in almost every case appear in the public papers for three successive weeks previous to the 1st of December.

The drawing of the notice is one of the important duties of the solicitor, as it is absolutely necessary that every requirement of the Bill should be weighed and determined on before doing so. There must be a separate notice for each Bill, whether of the first or second class, which must be headed by a short title descriptive of the undertaking (H. C. 14). It must state the objects of the intended undertaking, and the time at which copies of the Bill will be deposited at the Private Bill Office.

More objects than one may be included in the notice; for instance, notice may be given for a railway and two or more branches, and a Bill may be brought in for the railway only, and the branches may be dropped; or for making four different sewers, and two only may be included in the Bill; or for "gas and water," and one object only may be included in the Bill.

The following powers, if intended to be applied for, must be specifically stated—viz. for compulsory purchase of land or houses, or extending the time granted by a former Act for that purpose; for amalgamation with another company, or sale or lease of an undertaking, or leasing the undertaking of another company; for amendment or repeal of former Acts; for levying tolls, rates, or duties, or altering existing tolls, rates, or duties, or conferring exemption from payment of tolls, rates, or duties; for conferring, varying, or extinguishing any other rights or privileges.

In the case of second-class Bills (H. C. 15), the termini of the different works contemplated by the Bill; and in the case of first-class Bills, where plans and sections are required to be deposited, the termini of the land to be taken must be accurately stated, and the names of all parishes, townships, extra-parochial and other places, in which any work is contemplated, or any land proposed to be taken, is situate. The time and place of deposit of parliamentary documents made on or before Nov. 30 (which will be alluded to hereafter) must also be stated.

The limits of all burial-grounds, cemeteries, and gasworks must be specified and set forth (H. C. 16).

The intention to divert water into any intended cut, canal, reservoir, aqueduct, or navigation, whether directly or derivatively from any other similar source, and whether with the consent of the owner or otherwise, must be stated (H. C. 17).

The name of any invention must be prefixed to the notice in capital letters in all cases where power is sought to confirm or prolong terms of letters patent, and the notice must contain a description of the letters patent, and an account of the term of their duration (H. C. 18).

As a practical illustration of the course to be pursued in drawing a notice, a notice for incorporating a new company and making a railway will be a fair specimen, assuming that a junction with an existing railway is projected. The notice in this case would commence with the intention (1) to apply for an Act to incorporate a company; it would then set out (2) the main line of railway, accurately describing the termini—as, for instance, "A railway commencing by a junction with the main line of the South-Eastern Railway at a point 200 yards, or thereabouts, east of the Croydon station, in the parish of Croydon, in the county of Surrey, and terminating at a point 100 yards, or thereabouts, west of the market-house at Tonbridge, in the county of Kent, in the High-street there; (3) the parishes and townships and extra-parochial places through which the projected line is proposed to be made, would follow. Each branch would be described with similar accuracy as an independent work; the names of the parishes, townships, and other places, in or through which the work is intended to be made, maintained, varied, extended, or enlarged, would be set out at the end of the description of each separate work. (4). The power to take lands by compulsion would form the next paragraph; and (5) following this would come the notice of the powers relating to tolls, and (6) for stopping up or diverting roads, and extinguishing other rights and privileges; (7) a statement of the time and place of deposit of the parliamentary documents; (8) an enumeration of the Acts proposed to be amended (which in this instance would be those of the South-Eastern Company); and (9) the time and place of deposit of the proposed Bill.

The foregoing is a fair specimen of the general objects of a parliamentary notice, though frequently special powers are desired, in which case the best rule for preparation of the notice is, to set out in the plainest and most concise form what is intended to be applied for.

The principal difference between notices for railways and other works consists in the description of the works, and the powers necessary for extinguishing rights. In a Waterworks Bill, for instance, streams would probably be diverted or stopped up. In an Improvement Bill, streets might be wanted; and in each case the solicitor must consider the nature of the work, and the locality which should be included in the notices, and enumerate all such powers as those last alluded to, bearing in mind that he cannot make the notice too full in these respects. As regards the amendments of Acts of other companies or corporations, it is always wise, when by any possibility a Bill may affect them, to give notice of amendment. All the Acts of each such company must be set out by reign and chapter—for instance, "The Acts relating to the South-Eastern Railway Company—viz. Local and Personal Acts," 1 & 2 Vict. c. 27, &c. The list of Acts must commence with the Act of Incorporation of such company (unless these Acts have been repealed and consolidated, and then the list must commence with the Consolidation Act) and go down to the last Act obtained. The list of these Acts can be obtained from the index to the Local and Personal Acts; and as regards all large companies, it may generally be collected from a Gazette which contains a recent application to Parliament by them. It is confidently hoped that this system of specifying the Acts to be amended will be shortly discontinued. Common sense would dictate that a simple statement, that it was intended to "alter, amend, extend, or enlarge some of the powers and provisions of the Acts relating to the South-Eastern Railway Company," would be sufficient—the sole object being to warn the company named in the notice that their privileges may be affected.

One of the examiners of petitions, however, in the case of the Southampton, Bristol, and South Wales Railway Bill, 1857, held, that it was necessary to specify all the Acts, founding his decision on the universal practice which had prevailed theretofore.

Lastly, as regards the short title:—After the notice is drawn and settled, a very short epitome of the leading objects of the proposed Act is made out. Taking, as a specimen, the railway notice which has been mentioned above, a sufficient short title for the objects stated under the nine specified heads would be, "Croydon and Tonbridge Railway, Incorporation of Company; Power to make a railway from Croydon to Tonbridge; Amendment of the Acts of the South-Eastern Railway Company." The notices must be published in the months of October and November, one of them (H. C. 19), once in the London, Dublin, or Edinburgh Gazette, as the case may be. If the bill relates to England and Ireland, it would appear in both Gazettes; if it relates to England, one publication in the London Gazette is sufficient.

Newspaper notices must appear once in each of three successive weeks during the months of October or November, in one and the same newspaper published in each county in which any city, county of a city, town or county of a town, or any lands are situate to which the Bill relates, or in which any works are proposed to be made, or in which further powers are sought in respect of works already authorised by any former Acts. If the Bill relates specially to any particular city, county of a city, town or county of a town, the notice must be published in some paper published therein.

When the Bill does not relate to any particular city, county of a city, town, or county of a town, one publication in the Gazette only is required; but if the Bill relate to lands situate in more than one county, a further publication of the notice must be made, once in each of three successive weeks, in the case of English Bills, in a London daily paper; in the case of Scotch and Irish Bills, in a paper published in Edinburgh or Dublin twice a-week, and in a newspaper published in the county in which the principal office of the company, or companies, or other parties who are the promoters of the Bill, is situate. To exemplify this, we will revert to the notices which would be required for the Croydon and Tonbridge Railway. The publication of the notice for that Bill would be as follows:—Once in the London Gazette, three times in a paper published in Kent and Surrey respectively, and in a London daily paper. If the principal office of the promoters were situate in any other county than Kent, Middlesex, or Surrey (in which three counties notices would appear), the notice would also appear three times in a paper of the county where the principal office was situate.

When power is taken to amend the Acts of any company or corporate body, it is usual, for caution's sake, to advertise in a newspaper published in the county in which the principal offices of such company or corporate body is situate, although no specific powers are sought by the Bill which directly affect them.

Money Market.

CITY, FRIDAY EVENING.

This being the day for the half-yearly balance at the Bank of England, the Stock Exchange is closed. The meeting of the Bank Directors yesterday broke up without making any alteration in the rate of interest. Money has been in active demand at full rates all the week, and the pressure is likely to increase till the heavy payments due on the 4th May are provided for. Notwithstanding the high rate of interest and the short supply of money, trade remains in a healthy state, and the amount of exports continues to increase. The English Funds are still depressed, and have sustained a decline of ½ per cent. Quotations of French 3 per cents. showed a larger decline, but it has been partly recovered. From the Bank of England return for the week ending the 25th April, 1857, which we give below, it appears that the amount of notes in circulation is £19,788,655, being an increase of £53,910, and the stock of bullion in both departments is £9,555,235, showing a decrease of £50,514 when compared with the previous return.

The arrivals of foreign grain during the last two weeks have been small of wheat, but more plentiful of barley and oats. Flour has been abundant. Larger supplies of wheat are expected to arrive shortly. Prices have been fully maintained in Mark-lane, and generally in the country markets. The result of reported sales is rather in favour of the seller, but without any clear advance.

A question of great interest to commercial men is now about to receive its solution in the settlement of a form of government for the Danubian Principalities. The commissioners charged with this duty having arrived at Jassy, are reported to have encountered considerable difficulties in fulfilling their mission. There appears to be a strong movement on the part of a section of the inhabitants to obtain the union of Moldavia and Wallachia, which meets with decided opposition from the existing authorities. The unionists appear to reckon upon the support of France, and it is believed that the British Ambassador concurs with Turkey in opposing the union. It is to be hoped that, on the one hand, arbitrary measures, and, on the other, faction and party spirit, will be restrained, and that a form of Government may be established giving scope to trade, and developing the industry of these fertile provinces.

LAWYERS AND LAYMEN.

The proposal of the Royal Commissioners to amend the judicial system of India by abolishing the Supreme Courts, has raised an opposition not uninstructive to English law reformers. Under the present system, Europeans not belonging to the Company's service, and living within the capitals of the three Presidencies, or within a certain distance, are exempted from the jurisdiction of the Company's judges, and are subject only to that of the judges of the Supreme Court. These judges are appointed by the Crown from the bar of Westminster Hall. They are generally men of some eminence, or at least promise, in their profession, and are governed in their decisions by the principles and rules of English law. Thus, when a European is tried for his life, or has his fortune at stake, he knows that he will at least have the protection afforded by the superintendence of a competent judge. He knows that the proceedings will be guided by regular professional advisers, and he may reasonably hope that he has as fair a chance of justice at Calcutta as he would have had at Westminster. It is now proposed to alter this system, to do away with the Supreme Courts, and to subject all the inhabitants of India to the same jurisdiction. The Crown, indeed, is not to lose its patronage, for it is to send out from England a certain number of judges, to sit with an equal number of the Company's judges in a court of appeal. But otherwise the Company's judges are to have plenary jurisdiction; the Europeans are to be placed on the same level with the natives, and all alike are to go before the tribunals of the Company according to the district in which they reside. It is not difficult to see why this change is proposed. If the judicial system of India works justice, that is all a European can want; and if it does not, a Hindoo may reasonably complain. It must be very trying to a native of any education and reflection, to find that bad law is thought good enough for him, while his neighbour, the European indigo planter, can always demand to have his case tried before an experienced and able lawyer. As the natives advance in intelligence, and begin to have a more than Asiatic regard for their own lives and properties, it must be painful, and even irritating, to find themselves subjected to so anomalous a humiliation. One of the first things, therefore, which the Commissioners would endeavour to effect was, we might be sure, to bring all the inhabitants of India under the same jurisdiction.

But the Europeans do not acquiesce in the arrangement, however plausible it may appear. They represent that they wish to be tried by judges who know something about law, and that they think their property safer when it is guarded by the support of trained professional advisers, and can only be attacked in a regular way, and on principles of acknowledged law. The Company's judges are not lawyers. The same man is at one period of his life a political agent, at another a tax-collector, at a third a magistrate. Sometimes he combines those duties, and, being principally occupied in collecting the taxes of a district about the size of Scotland, gives any spare time he may have to the dispatch of judicial business. If a civil case is brought before him which can be determined by the establishment of a Hindoo or Mahometan custom, he suffers himself to be guided according as those who deny or maintain the custom swear the hardest. But if there is no custom in point, he judges by the light of nature. English law is not the lex loci; it does not prevail in default of other law. So the Company's judges know nothing about it; and although the establishment of a code would do something to supply the want of a lex loci, yet the present judges, at any rate, are utterly untrained in applying any system of law whatever, and even their successors would find, that, to apply a code properly, requires considerable practice and a peculiar education. The Company, however, do not appear to have any very exalted opinion of what is required for the due administration of justice. Sometimes a lad is sent to represent the majesty of law in a vast district, and sometimes the district has to go without a magistrate at all. Mr. THEOBALD, who has lately written a pamphlet on the subject, states that the city and district of Dacca, containing 450,000 inhabitants, were confided in 1855 to the charge of a magistrate, almost a child in years, whose health unfortunately broke down. The collector of the district took the work in addition to his own, until a new magistrate was appointed. The new magistrate, who had been five years in the country, and who would, therefore, be about twenty-seven years of age, found accumulated arrears, tried hopelessly and helplessly to administer law to half-a-million of people, and then broke down in health, and had to go away. We are not surprised that the Europeans prefer the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

The very eagerness with which they separate their case from that of the natives, though more practical than philanthropic, shows how tenaciously they cling to what they think their only chance of having justice done them. They do not trouble themselves about the fortunes of the natives. If the Company likes to deal out rough justice and the law of natural right to the Bengalese, they are quite welcome, but Europeans can fairly claim something better. They have been encouraged to settle in India, it is represented, by the promise of systematic justice, and the law of a civilised country. They cannot be expected to go patiently and hazard their liberty and their property before tribunals of sick youths, who never heard of the commonest rules of evidence, or the most fundamental principles of English law. Nor, as they point out, does any one trust to a Company's judge who can avoid it. The present Supreme Court has a permissive jurisdiction. Merchants of Calcutta, dealing with persons not within the local or ordinary jurisdiction of the Court, may, in matters of contract, bring them under the Court's jurisdiction by an express agreement. The permission is widely made use of. "Every firm in Calcutta," says Mr. THEOBALD, "has printed forms for agreements with one clause to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction, and no firm will advance capital without this form."

We do not pretend to say how the matter ought to be settled. Indian questions, under the complication of a double government, are not very easy to decide. But we think that the language used by these European settlers might be usefully studied by some persons in England. It has become one of the commonplaces of the day, in popular books and popular speeches, to treat a regular system of law as a gigantic imposture, and the profession of lawyers as a mere burden and curse to the community. Any plain man of sense, it is said, can settle a disputed point in one-tenth of the time, and at a hundredth part of the expense necessary to obtain the decision of a court of law. Speedy justice, based on the utterances of a sterling common sense, is held out as the ideal of a law system. If merchants dispute about a contract, there is no use in their going before a highly-paid judge; the first practical man they meet will tell them which is in the right. This is a capital theme for declamation; but those who are inclined to listen to the declaimers will do well to look at facts. Let them turn from persons who are speaking about what does not concern them, to persons who have an actual and very tangible interest at stake. These Indian merchants and planters are offered a system of cheap law, administered by men who know nothing about law, and who have so much to do that they must get through their business with great speed, or else not get through it at all. But the offer is not welcomed. These men who have real necks to jeopardise, and real properties to lose, clamour for the continuance of trained professional judges, and for the maintenance of a technical system of law. They are not content to trust to the good common sense of tax-gatherers. Arguments may be met with arguments, and a professional man who defends his profession is liable to the suspicion of being interested. But here is a case in point, and whenever a lawyer is told that lawyers are a nuisance, and law a web of useless chicanery, let him refer his assailant to the opinions expressed by the European settlers in India.

THE CASE OF MANSELL v. THE QUEEN.

There was nothing very new in the law laid down in the case of Mansell v. The Queen, decided in the Court of Queen's Bench on Wednesday last. Indeed, we had supposed that the doctrine, that, subject to showing cause after the panel was gone through, the Crown was entitled to an unlimited number of peremptory challenges, was as well established as any doctrine so seldom acted upon could be. It is so laid down by BLACKSTONE (4 Bl. Com. 471); and there can be no question that if we look at the subject from a common sense point of view, it is the only rational and humane course. Some right of peremptory challenge obviously ought to exist; but if the prisoner had an unlimited right of that description, he might prevent his trial from ever taking place at all. There must, therefore, be some limit to it, and that limit is fixed by the law at twenty in cases of felony, and at thirty-five in cases of treason. The persons challenged by the prisoner being set aside, it is obvious that the next thing is to ascertain what members of the panel are altogether unobjectionable, and this is effected by allowing the Crown to order any number of jurors to "stand by," till the jury is completed out of persons to whom neither side objects. To give the practice entire fairness, the prisoner ought, no doubt, to be entitled to exactly the same privilege; but the number of peremptory challenges allowed him is so great, that we believe that such a right would practically make no difference at all.

Though, however, Mansell v. The Queen does not possess much interest in a legal point of view, it is worth notice as one of those judicial curiosities which we are accustomed, whether rightly or not, to look upon as peculiar to our own country. The most prominent feature about it, considered in this light, is far from being a pleasant one. Mansell was left for execution at the winter assize, together with the Hungarian REDANIES, who murdered the girls at Dover. It is now, therefore, considerably more than four months that he has been kept in suspense as to the question whether he was to undergo the ordeal of a second trial for his life or not; and the reason for this dreadful interval was, that the case was one which "could not be argued out of term." We believe that Mansell is a person of singular insensibility, but to a man constituted in the ordinary manner, the prolongation of such uncertainty would have been worse than death itself. An appeal in criminal cases ought surely to be heard and determined at the very earliest opportunity. If Mansell's crime had been of a less important kind, and had entailed a sentence of three months' imprisonment, and if he had been unable to procure bail, he might, in consequence of this delay, have had to undergo a heavier punishment than his original sentence, without having had a legal trial at all. Surely this is a defect in the administration of justice, which ought not in the present day to remain unremedied.

Some other features in the case are remarkable enough to deserve mention. We wonder whether there is any other country in the world in which a judge would begin his judgment in these words:—"Our judgment chiefly depends upon the construction of an ancient statute of the 33 EDWARD I."—i. e., A. D. 1303—534 years ago? We cannot help feeling proud of so curious a testimony of the antiquity of English law, and of the closeness of the bonds by which the present generation is united to the history of their ancestors; and this feeling is strengthened by the fact that the statute in question is so sound that it was re-enacted in the same words in 1826, and is one of the principal foundations of a right almost peculiar to this country and those which have copied its institutions. Such considerations are not quite out o place at a time when ignorant persons make the admitted fact, that our laws are in many respects defective, the ground of absurd statements that they are utterly corrupt and inefficient. We are, however, checked in any vanity which these reflections might produce by turning to another of the assignments of error, which, though not successful, was nevertheless seriously urged and answered. "It was objected that the record does not show that the jurors named in the panel were 'good and lawful men of the county of Kent.'" It was held, that the omission was insignificant; but it is painful to think that such a trifle could have been, for a single moment, allowed to weigh in the discussion of a question which involved the life or death of a fellow-creature.

The collateral circumstances of Mansell's case are far more important that its direct legal bearings. Every one who sees much of courts of law is well aware that the right of challenge is hardly ever exercised. A man may sit for years at the Old Bailey or on the crown side at assizes, without hearing a single man set aside "as he comes to the book to be sworn." The explanation of the unusual course taken in Mansell's case is to be found in the fact that a strong local prejudice exists in the town of Maidstone against capital punishment, and that by challenging all the persons who come from districts in which that feeling does not prevail, the prisoner can secure a jury most unwilling to convict him. It is notorious that a verdict thus obtained in a late case of great importance gave impunity to a most heinous criminal. Some years ago there was far greater unwillingness to convict in capital cases than exists at present; but there is still enough of it left to present occasionally formidable impediments to the proper discharge of what is, perhaps, the most important function of the law. Fortunately, if the public attention were properly called to the subject, the remedy would be perfectly clear. If a short Act were passed, requiring the individual members of the jury to be asked in all trials for murder or treason whether they had any scruples of conscience as to the infliction of capital punishment, and making an answer in the affirmative a disqualification, and if the juryman's oath itself were modified by introducing some such clause as "though in consequence of such verdict the prisoner should be sentenced to die," the difficulty of obtaining a conviction would disappear. The palpable perjury which the violation of such an oathwould involve, is not a bit worse in reality than the constructive perjury which the acquitting juror commits at present, but it would strike his imagination more violently; and the man who from an objection to capital punishment would indirectly perjure himself, is just the kind of person on whom such a test would take effect.

Legal News.

At length Parliament is fully constituted, and for the next two months it may be hoped that few interruptions will arise to the progress of legislative business. The most prominent topic of the Royal speech was law reform. Another Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill will be produced by Government, and a measure for making fraudulent breaches of trust criminal is likewise promised. If both, or even one, of these difficult subjects should be satisfactorily dealt with in the present session, the new Parliament need not fear comparison with its immediate predecessor. But after so many disappointments, we shall ourselves continue to believe in the immortality of Doctors' Commons, until its obsequies have been actually performed. The transportation question necessarily revives, and perhaps may be treated more deliberately now that the days are longer, and the hours of dishonest industry are consequently abridged. Lord CAMPBELL resumes his attempt to place the law as to reports of public meetings on a sounder footing, and another effort is to be made by Mr. CRAUFURD to pass his Judgments Execution Bill. It is very reasonably thought by Government that Parliamentary Reform may be postponed until next session; and for party strife at the present moment there does not appear any very convenient opening. On the whole, therefore, it does not seem extravagant to hope that one or two useful measures of law reform may be carried in the present session.
